I guarantee the average IQ of those in the men's movement is significantly higher than that of the general public. A stupid, willingly ignorant person is much less likely to understand the importance of the issues we combat. As intellectuals – whether you enjoy that label or not – we enjoy theory. But like everyone, we also enjoy the application of theory. We are not just scientists, but engineers.
From Wikipedia:

"Engineers and scientists are often confused in the minds of the general public, with the former being closer to applied science. While scientists explore nature in order to discover general principles, engineers apply established principles drawn from science in order to create new inventions and improve upon the old ones. In short, scientists study things whereas engineers design things. However, there are plenty of instances where significant accomplishments are made in both fields by the same individual. When a scientist has also an engineering education, the same individual would explore principles in nature to solve problems and to design new technology. Scientists often perform some engineering tasks in designing experimental equipment and building prototypes, and some engineers do first-rate scientific research."

MRAs are the scientists and the engineers of men's rights.

When I used to write for The Spearhead, I mostly wrote about current events and popular culture. I understand the theory, sure, but the application is what really interests me. Lately I don't even watch TV, so it's a bit harder to focus on it. But when you cruise the internet, you're bound to stumble upon something worth mentioning.

Speaking of which…

You know what, guys? I love The Lion King, and when it comes out on Blu-Ray, I want to know, even though Disney screwed it up by adding a terrible song called The Morning Report and I will likely just hold onto my laser-disc rip of the original movie. Because of my interest in The Lion King, I am subscribed to Disney Movie Rewards, which informed me on Friday about the upcoming Mars Needs Moms children's movie.

The title struck me as suspect, so I investigated by heading on over to IMDB.com. Judging only by the single review there, I can already tell this movie is a piece of misandric crap. Here are its features, with the lessons it's telling children in parentheses:

Boy's mom raises him alone, no father present. (You don't need a dad, moms are better parents anyway.)

Man on the spaceship tries to help the boy but is too fat and stupid to do much good. (Men are incompetent, bumbling idiots who have no self control.)

Woman comes to the boy's rescue with her brilliant plan. (Girls are smarter and more independent than boys and adult men.)

Thanks, Disney!

Also, I'm guessing the whole idea is to tell little boys to be glad they have moms at all, even when their moms are overbearing and unreasonable. Little boys should just be glad to have a mom at all. No mention of fathers, of course- they don't matter.
Have I watched this movie yet? No. Can I pass judgement on it already? Yes. I'm an MRA. My IQ is enormous, remember?

Anyway, that's just my hypothesis. If you have a different one, tell us what you think by submitting an article to The Spearhead or to A Voice for Men.

I guess what I'm saying is, don't be a scientist. Don't be an engineer. Be both.

About the Author: If you like this article, Jay Hammers urges you to do something about it and either donate to The Spearhead or A Voice For Men or, at the very least, make sure to piss off a misandrist in the next 24 hours, preferably while men are watching (and learning).

Daniel Craig Dresses in Drag for International Women's Day

W.F. Price · 8 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Today is International Women's Day, and it is encouraging to see that nobody seems to care. Perhaps this is because the point of the day is not celebration, but humiliating and shaming men. Daniel Craig, in an unfortunate move that could result in career difficulties down the road, went along with a plan to dress as a woman for an ad produced for the day.

The ad's tone is confrontational and condemnatory — about what you'd expect from feminists:

Pretty twisted, isn't it?

careyroberts · 8 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Republican Study Committee has announced a plan to prune $2.5 trillion from the long-standing federal spending spree. Yes, $2.5 trillion is a lot of pocket change, but the RSC plan doesn't go far enough in ridding the federal government of the feminist strongholds salted throughout the bureaucracy.

Let's be clear, these feminist programs are not about promoting equal opportunity. Au contraire, mon frere. These "female-empowerment" initiatives are all about sex-based quotas, preferences, and earmarks that in practice serve to disadvantage men in schools, in the workplace, and in the legal system.

To its credit, the RSC proposes to axe these feminist social-engineering programs:

1. US Agency for International Development, including its innocent-sounding Women in Development program — $1.4 billion
2. Legal Services Corporation, which helps low-income women get quickie divorces so fathers can't see their kids — $420 million
3. Title X Family Planning — $318 million
4. Women's Educational Equity Act of 2001 — $3 million

The Republican Study Committee also plans to end bans on competitive sourcing of government services. This means no more "woman-owned" set-asides which everyone knows are a joke.

But the RSC should not pass up the opportunity to eliminate altogether the cacophony of feminist-inspired programs that clutter the federal bureaucracy. Given the fact that men are lagging in practically every department these days, it makes little sense to squander taxpayer money to hinder men even further.

First to go will be the Women's Bureau at the Department of Labor: http://www.dol.gov/wb/media/reports/Overview_DOL_Programs_and_Policies.htm . Women now compose half the U.S. workforce and I doubt the National Association of Women in Construction will rue the Bureau's absence. So let's do a victory-lap for gender equality and get on with it!

Second is a phase-out of the "Fulfilling the Potential of Women in Academic Science and Engineering" program of the National Science Foundation. This program supports efforts like Gender Bias Bingo ($300,000) and the Gender Equity Project at Hunter College ($3.9 million). (Women I know are embarrassed by the overt pandering, but are reluctant to take on the feminist cranks.)

At the Department of Ed, the Title IX apparatchiks will need to find a new job. Americans have no need for government-mandated quotas of college sports teams.

Over at the State Department, the Office of Global Women's Issues has done enough gender-bending to last a lifetime. How would Americans like it if some foreign power tried to foist a neo-Marxist initiative on our unsuspecting citizens?

Healthcare is another example of the Alice-in-Wonderland logic that pervades the government's approach to gender issues. Women have better access to health services, enjoy the benefits of twice as many sex-specific research studies, and live 5 years longer than men.

Males do not have any offices of men's health in the Department of Health and Human Services. But females have five offices of women's health strategically located at the Food and Drug Administration, the National Institutes of Health, the Centers for Disease Control, the Health Resources and Services Administration, and at the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Health.

So if women wish to be paragons of gender equality, I'm certain taxpayers will applaud this $4 billion savings.

The Republican Study Committee needs to take a close, hard look at these programs, as well:

1. Office of Child Support Enforcement (no proof of the program's effectiveness, except for putting destitute dads behind bars) — $4 billion
2. Violence Against Women Act (no evidence this Clinton-era hold-over has done anything other than break up families) — $1 billion
3. Perkins Vocational Education Act, which trains women to become car mechanics, welders, and lumberjacks (yes, really!) — $100 million
4. TANF (Temporary Assistance to Needy Families) Family Violence Option (bon-bons for aspiring Welfare Queens) — $63 million

Then we need to rid ourselves of the various and sundry women's advisory committees such as the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services (DACOWITS). (Not to be confused with the now-defunct gender advisory commission aptly named LACK-O-WITS.)

And let's not forget the hulking monstrosity that lurks on the East River, sometimes referred to as the United Nations. Referring to it as a "beast," House Foreign Affairs chair Ileana Ros-Lehtinen recently proposed eliminating funding from the UN Human Rights Council.

And why not make it a clean sweep? Take out the UN Division for Enhancement of Women, the Women's Development Fund (UNIFEM), and other UN gender-agenda programs, too.

And for the squeamish and chivalrous in our midst, keep this fact in mind: There is no such thing as a sensible feminist. Just when you think you've come up with a happy meeting of the minds, she'll come forth with yet another tale of downtrodden women.

And no doubt you'll end up feeling like a quisling of the impious patriarchy.

The Problem with the Dominance Narrative

W.F. Price · 9 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of the typical lines from feminists is that men are conditioned by patriarchal hegemonic culture to attempt to dominate women. Everything is about power and control to these people, which suggests that this is very much on their minds. But is there any truth to it?

I don't think so.

Being a man, I think I'm qualified to make a few generalizations about men, and one thing I can say with some certainty is that when a man goes home, he wants peace. Power games are the last thing on his mind. There's enough stress outside the home. On the road, in the office, and just dealing with the hassles of modern life are enough. How many guys want to deal with competitive coworkers, inconsiderate commuters and difficult bureaucrats only to go home and take on another job as taskmaster of a wife and children? And even if a man did want to do this, where would he find the energy?

The truth is that men don't want to have to manage their wives. No, they really want a cooperative partner. A companion. Call it what you want, but they don't want to have to exercise strict control and monitor everything a wife does. As a parent, I know how much of a pain it is to actually have to manage people in one's family. Although I do the job, and I think it's worth it, I often wish the kids could just take care of themselves. The only "satisfaction" derived from controlling kids is that I know they're safer that way, and they are learning how to behave and become more responsible. The end goal, of course, is to teach them how to get by without external control.

It's possible that power struggles within families are more important to women, because women have always exerted the most control and power through intimate relationships, whereas men tend to do so in groups of men outside of the family. This may be an inborn difference — it is common amongst social primates such as chimpanzees and macaques. So with some investigation, we may find that the feminist obsession with dominance and control in the family is actually a manifestation of a primal insecurity that is common to women. Unfortunately, feminism has brought this desire for control into government and law, creating the monstrosity known as American family law. It's a terrible place for intimate concerns, because the state is by its nature devoid of the sympathies and affections that characterize a family.

However, despite the fact that the idea that men are obsessed with controlling their wives is ridiculous, and largely projection on the part of feminists, it has become fairly widely accepted in some circles. A man who goes through a contested divorce will come face to face with a system largely predicated on the notion, and suddenly find that whether or not he's actually tried to exert any control over his wife, that's the premise the state is working under. This means that the mechanisms of the state, including the police, social workers and the courts will assume that he needs to be systematically stripped of any and all control to "equalize" the situation. And they will do this with all the blind, uncaring force of the law.

This needs to be changed, obviously, but we can't do anything about it until men speak up and challenge the presumptions that have entered the discourse on gender issues. We men may be at an inherent disadvantage, not being as focused on family politics as women, but now that it has become a feature of the impersonal state we have an opportunity to face the problem on equal terms. But first we have to stop personalizing our response to it. What this means is that when we fight this inhuman system that treats men and fathers as the enemy, we have to stop thinking of the fight as with the women in our lives that we love and care about, or the women we used to love.

Men do instinctively care about women, especially those close to us. Our biggest weakness is that we have allowed our personal feelings get in the way, which is a mistake because there's nothing about the family law system that cares about our daughters, sisters, wives and mothers any more than it does about us — it's simply a bureaucratic machine. Striking a blow against this machine does not equate to lashing out against a woman in our lives.

Feminists will certainly portray it that way – that kind of manipulation is how they've come as far as they have – but as more and more women are affected by it themselves, whether they are daughters, granddaughters, sisters, aunts or second wives, even women are starting to lose their faith in feminism.

So, in framing this struggle, we have to depersonalize what it is we're fighting against. And that means even laying aside your feelings about your ex-wife, if you have one, or any other woman who has taken advantage of the system to screw you over. One of the main reasons we've been so helpless against it is that men are not dominant in intimate relationships. As long as any struggle against the injustices men face is tainted by personal feelings of betrayal, or tied up in the deeply complex feelings of intimacy that characterize our relationships with those we love, or have loved, we're going to be at a disadvantage.

If feminists can continue to dominate the narrative and perpetuate the myth that this is about our wives, or other women we care about, we'll continue to flail. Being angry about injustice is fine – it provides much-needed motivation – but as much as righteous anger helps, there's just something base about a collection of domestic squabbles. No, it isn't our wives or girlfriends we're fighting here — it's a cold, heartless machine that mows down families like a combine, leaving nothing but stubble in its wake. If we can stop it, we'll all be the better for it.

The Real Lesson of Scott Adams

By Peter

Pro-Male Anti-Feminist Tech recently posted a deleted blog post from "The Dilbert Blog", the personal blog of Dilbert creator Scott Adams. Many of us are cubicle slaves in one corporatocracy or another, so we've been pretty well exposed to his work; his wit and dark sense of humour bring a degree of sanity to our lives. Here is what Adams has to say about MRAs:

> According to my readers, examples of unfair treatment of men include many elements of the legal system, the military draft in some cases, the lower life expectancies of men, the higher suicide rates for men, circumcision, and the growing number of government agencies that are primarily for women.
> Generally speaking, society discourages male behavior whereas female behavior is celebrated. Exceptions are the fields of sports, humor, and war. Men are allowed to do what they want in those areas.

So far so good. Do we have a famous erstwhile ally? Not quite.

> Now I would like to speak directly to my male readers who feel unjustly treated by the widespread suppression of men's rights:
> Get over it, you bunch of pussies.

There we go. That's what we expect from the mainstream. But wait…

> The reality is that women are treated differently by society for exactly the same reason that children and the mentally handicapped are treated differently. It's just easier this way for everyone. You don't argue with a four-year old about why he shouldn't eat candy for dinner. You don't punch a mentally handicapped guy even if he punches you first. And you don't argue when a women tells you she's only making 80 cents to your dollar. It's the path of least resistance. You save your energy for more important battles.

Interesting. He's basically saying that women are like children throwing a temper tantrum, testing you. No wonder he deleted this blog post, but as an aside, I expect the feminist movement to collect his head by starting a boycott of Dilbert. Anyway, his advice to the giant shit test that is feminism is an odd mixture of shaming language and Game advice: the old "ignore and switch" tactic from Roissy. But is it the right advice?

He's a pretty successful guy, after all.

Go ahead and read the rest of the post if you want, but here is the real lesson of Scott Adams.

From his book "Dilbert 2.0":

> I applied for Berkeley's evening MBA program and was accepted. For the next three years, I worked days, took classes at night, and did homework during the cracks in my schedule.
> … I expected greater opportunities for promotion. This time I was in the wrong place at the wrong time. The media had recently discovered that my employer had virtually no diversity in management… my boss called me into her office. I was the most qualified candidate for the position, she explained, but because of pressure to be diverse there was no hope for another generic white male to get promoted any time soon.

Long story short, Adams quit and found a new job, but the scenario repeated itself at Adams' next employer,

Pacific Bell:

> One day my boss called me into his office and informed that while I was indeed management material, the company had been getting a lot of bad press lately about the lack of diversity in management.

The rest is a familiar American Dream story – young man develops his passion for his work-drawn cartoons into a business by working nights, eventually quits work, and creates a strong brand and profitable business empire. Except with a twist.

Adams has, by the time he is 49, created a fortune for himself. He worked his ass off to do it too, first by putting himself through school, then doing an MBA while working, then when feminism took his job opportunities away, he created his own, cartooning nights and working days. His Dilbert empire must generate in the tens of millions in profits. He owns two restaurants. But then he got married. It is the first marriage for Adams, 49, and the second for Miles, 37, who has two children, a 6-year-old son and an 8-year-old daughter.

Ignore his blog post, for this is, indeed, the true lesson of Scott Adams. After a lifetime of working his ass off and getting pretty damn rich, the best he can do is a divorced single mom with two young children. A woman well past her prime who won't likely give him a healthy child of his own. And this after two and a half decades of paying California's confiscatory taxes; his money probably has supported an entire subsidized housing development full of single moms. If that isn't an indictment of his "path of least resistance" philosophy, I don't know what is.

So, Adams, you say ignore feminism and the way it screws men? Ha! I hope for his sake, Adams avoids a divorce, especially while the children are young. Otherwise she takes the house he's building for her (forgot to mention that), the kids (that aren't even his), and half of the net increase in his wealth from the moment they got married, plus generous child support payments (for the kids that aren't even his). I wonder if he'll be singing a different tune then.

Chuck Ross · 10 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Writing a piece for a series on MRAs at The Good Men Project, Amanda Marcotte argues that the solutions to many Men's Rights Activists' problems is more feminism. Of course, to prove her point she adopts a friendly view of feminism (i.e. not the one that claims all men are rapists or that men are disposable) and the most negative prototype of MRA she can come up with – the ones that are "embittered" by their lack of sex. Marcotte wants to compare notes from the most idealistic and objective feminists with those of the most reactionary and subjective MRA. False equivalency if ever there was one.

People like Marcotte remind us every day that feminists are not monolithic. According to them, one cannot characterize a feminist's philosophy or values based only on her feminist label. Unfortunately, Marcotte doesn't extend the same flexibility to MRAs, and she even forgets her leniency for certain feminists. She focuses on four issues and constructs the most extreme MRA argument to support her disdain for the group and posits a soft brand of feminism while pretending that feminism was created for everyone rather than just for women.

1. Ladies Night

Of all MRA "problems" to dissect, Marcotte says that MRAs are "stupid" for worrying about Ladies Night where bars extend drink specials to women and not to men. She cites "one MRA" who sued over this issue (probably Roy Dean Hollander), but she ignores (or was unaware of) the complaints of a young feminist, Jaime Keiles, who was recently profiled in the Feministing Five. I covered Keiles' recent blog post in which she claims that Ladies Nights are misogynistic, sexist, and stupid and come away with the same conclusion as Marcotte: Ladies Night is a business plan implemented by a bar or a club to maximize profit.

But Marcotte can't just leave it there. She ridicules this so-called MRA beef because "men tend to benefit more, because women still have to pay the price of fending off unwanted advances just to go out and have fun with friends." Of course, Marcotte ignores those empowered women who welcome those Looky Lou's advances and hope to land a suitor. After all, if the burden is so bad it is just as expensive to sit at home and watch TV or to go to Starbucks with a group of girlfriends. MRAs are pro-choice on this one.

Marcotte says "ban Ladies Night or don't, because who honestly gives a crap?" The answer is that the level of "give a crap" on each side of the gender warfront offsets the other which makes me wonder why Marcotte is grasping at these particular straws.

2. Men as Primary Breadwinners

A passage from a report produced by President Obama's Council of Economic Advisers puts this issue in perspective:

> An increasing number of women are breadwinners for their families. In almost two-thirds of families led by single mothers or two parents, women are either the primary or co-breadwinner. In two-parent families, with the wage gap and the loss of jobs traditionally held by men in this economy, reliance on a woman's income in their family budget is even greater…Since women are nearly 50 percent of the workforce, the recession's economic impacts on women are even more consequential for the economy than they would have been in past recessions.

While most MRAs may not be aware that President Obama values breadwinning females far above breadwinning males, gynocentric government reforms have long angered anti-statist MRAs who wonder where government support was when male-headed households were struggling or why nuclear families have never been worthy of investment.

The common view is that if fathers are breadwinners it is likely that they are stepping on someone's throat to maintain their position; if mothers are breadwinners, it is despite being stepped on. Being a part of the hegemonic patriarchy, male breadwinners are viewed as evil authoritarians who only care about their jobs without much thought to the reasons that job is being undertaken. Feminists assume that male breadwinners just love working 60 hours a week without seeing their families.

MRAs are also angered by women who claim they don't get enough love and support from their work-worn husbands who then whip their rationalization hamsters into full throttle to drum up reasons to leave his ass and turn the children against him for being an absentee father. If there is any resentment by MRAs, it is informed by the knowledge that a man providing for his family is either devalued or demonized by the government, the media, his wife, and his children.

Marcotte says:

> Women still make less than men in the workplace, but still do more free labor at home, even when they do work full time. Plus, many men feel scaling back or quitting their jobs is emasculating.

Only women consider housework and non-labor force work to be free. I know of no man who scoffs at the work his wife or girlfriend does around the house or in raising children. And when men earn more than women outside the home, his paycheck usually goes straight into a household kitty that is controlled by the woman who makes 80% of purchasing decisions. Feminists and the rank-and-file consider the name written in the Payee portion of a paycheck, but they don't consider who signs the checks flowing out of the family's bank account.

The entire purpose of Marcotte's piece was to show how feminism could be the solution to these MRA beefs. But she abrogates some of the power that women and feminists would have in assuaging any fears of emasculation that work-displaced men would feel. If anything, convincing men that they can maintain their masculinity while scaling back their jobs requires the prior acceptance of women. But women would have to check their natural desires at the door.

3. Men Have to Do Work to Ask Women Out

Marcotte argues that men often harass women when asking them out. She also says that approaching men gets a woman labeled slutty, bitchy, or desperate.

But she leaves out the fact that men who approach women are called losers if they are rejected. Trick is, it is mostly members of each person's sex who provide these labels. On top of that, a "slut" label doesn't necessarily diminish a woman's chances of finding a man whereas the same man's "loser" label is a death sentence.

Marcotte also constructs the most heinous image of a PUA to support her view that men who can't get laid turn to skeezy methods to shore up their sexual insufficiencies. She accepts the the monolithic PUA who adopts a negative attitude toward women, but she leaves out the whole subset of Game-practitioners who develop their seduction skills in tandem with their inner self-respect. If anything, this minimizes sexism as it dismantles the pedestal on which women are placed. One would figure that feminists would be happy about mens' termination of their inner Nice Guy.

4. Men Killed at Work

Marcotte essentially argues that MRAs hope to maintain the "occupational death gap" because it provides an excuse for the gender pay gap. She then suggests that to bring gendered occupational deaths up to parity, discrimination should be eradicated and various programs should be initiated to inform girls of their options for these types of jobs.

I say that this is all well and good. If such policies were implemented, the gender gaps – pay and death – would decrease. But would women actually move towards combat roles in the military, fire fighting, and coal mining if there were no social barriers to entry? Those occupations have systematically developed with the strongest and most able-bodied people in mind. Those people happen to be men. People started cutting down gigantic trees because a certain type of person mixed with a certain type of equipment could get the job done. It would seem that only a few women could meet the threshold required to participate in these jobs which begs the question, what job-killing changes would be implemented if women did flock to these occupations to create parity? To cut down X log you'd have to have A, B, and C measures in place which would make the whole endeavor unprofitable.

Marcotte started her post by laying out an argument that MRAs haven't quite made:

> When you believe that we live in a female-dominated world where straight men are the most oppressed class, it tends to make you wrong about pretty much everything.

If anything, MRAs seem angry that women have a monopoly on every issue. Everything that is wrong with society can be laid at the feet of Men, and each human with a (natural) penis between his legs shares equally in that burden. MRA's represent the Everyman, and he is angry that he is being forced to carry water for the rapists and violent offenders at the left end and the Patriarchs at the far right. The truth is that there is a large swath of men residing in the middle of this spectrum who have never affronted anyone and whose particular problems have gone unnoticed. The men who are now MRAs once dealt with the extreme elements, but feminists started bunching men all together. It seems, then, that MRAs said "screw it" and turned their focus towards feminists for self-defense purposes. To make matters worse, feminists don't deal with rank-and-file womens' complicity in this whole "hegemonic" system. Surely a great deal of women benefited from the previous set-up, and they helped perpetuate it. But revisionism has painted them all as victims.

Sex and the City of Mean Girls

Delusion Damage · 11 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm watching "Sex and the City". Yes, at first it felt like my brain was being slowly poisoned with some sort of insidious paralyzing agent, but I persevered, since in this age of societal decline the most disheartening aspects of popular culture are often the ones that can tell us the most about it.

The girls who grew up watching Sex and the City during those crucial teenage years of looking for role models and examples of what a grown-up woman is supposed to be like are now approaching their 30th birthdays, closing in on the age of the show's characters.

And they have learned well, at least judging by the words of former teen icon Lindsay Lohan:

> "Sex and the City changed everything for me, because those girls would just sleep with so many people."

Herself an idol and a role model for a younger generation of girls, Lohan, to most men another pointless celebrity among a sea of irrelevant celebrities, is to me more of a tragic figure very symbolic of our times:

Cast in her breakout Hollywood role at the age of 11 or so, she outshone established star Dennis Quaid in 1998′s "The Parent Trap", completely carrying the family comedy from beginning to end in a demanding dual role as a pair of identical twins. Her charisma and talent at such a young age impressed all and sundry – she was heralded as the next big star, and audiences everywhere waited eagerly for her to grow up to be one of Hollywood's biggest names.

By 2003-04, she had grown all the body parts that any Hollywood actress, no matter how talented, needs in order to pull in the big bucks, and nothing more stood in her way: 2003′s "Freaky Friday" and 2004′s "Mean Girls" took the box office by storm and put her firmly on that predicted trajectory to fame, riches and everlasting glory.

Then… then something seemed to go wrong. The media outlets that had previously sung her praises as the next big thing were suddenly only reporting arrests for drunk driving and visits to rehab. In the span of the next five or so years, her career prospects dwindled as Hollywood came to see her as unreliable, and that crucial ingredient of success – her more-than-fair share of natural beauty – entered an equally steep decline. I don't know if the rumors of drug use were ever officially confirmed, but let's just agree that whatever does this to a person in the span of a few years probably didn't come from the supermarket:

What's left for Lindsay now? A romantic lead in a summer blockbuster as a sweet thing for audiences to lust after for decades to come? If I had to take a guess, I'd check the box that says "no". You're free to make your own predictions…

More likely, she'll end up something like her role models from Sex and the City, jumping from bed to bed, pipe dream to pipe dream, wondering why nothing sticks and blaming alternatively herself and everyone else. If she didn't see it watching the show as an adoring teenager, she'll probably see in her own life what the rest of us can see in Sex and the City: those women don't seem to be very happy very much of the time. The reason seems to be obvious: the Sex and the City gang of women has two major problems which they keep putting in their own way.

First of all, they think they should be able to behave like men and enjoy it. They can't, of course, but they never seem to learn. Modeling their own sexual behavior on that of the men around them whom it works fine for results, time and time again, in unhappiness. These women just don't seem to get that they are never going to feel the same way about sex as men do. And all the while, the audience is being told that they should be able to.

Secondly, the entitlement mentality pervading the show defies measure: none of the women stop for a second to consider what might be wrong with them that they should fix in order to improve their relationship prospects. It's just "I'm perfect so why doesn't anyone want me?" all day every day. All the 1.2 million single men in New York must just have something wrong with them, plain and simple, or else they would jump at the chance of a catch like these frequently intolerable, over-the-hill women who seem to think that their lucrative careers somehow make them the hottest thing on the block – another classic projection of "what works for men must work for women".

What's in store for all of Lindsay Lohan's contemporaries who took the Sex and the City lifestyle to heart as a life goal in their teens and are now reaching that stage where they're about to discover that it's actually a show about unhappy women facing the sucker's payoff of their terrible decisions and worse attitudes?

How delighted are they going to be to discover the toll that partying hard every night and bringing home bartender after personal trainer after aspiring artist eventually takes on their minds and bodies?

Only one thing seems certain: one day they're likely to run into that one man who's perfect in every way, but just doesn't seem to want to commit to them no matter how hard they try to analyze his motives over drinks with their girlfriends or how many tantrums they throw.

Just like in Sex and the City.

Transactional Relationship Value and Bell Curves

Almost everything in life involves trade-offs of some sort. If you want something you usually have to give something to get it. I want a new Ferrari. The dealer wants some money – quite a lot of it as it turns out. I don't make that kind of dough, so I look for something I can afford. Ah… that used Porsche looks about right. I give the dealer what he wants and he gives me what I want. I drive away laughing and he laughs his way to the bank. Win-win.

So why am I driving the used Porsche rather than the new Ferrari? Because I don't have something the dealer values as much as what he'd be giving up if he gives me the keys. In this case what he wants is defined as, "More money than I have." I'll refer to the currency of commerce as "Transactional Monetary Value" for reasons that will be obvious in a moment. If I want what he has and do not have the means of coercing him, I have to conduct a monetary transaction with sufficient value to make it worth his while. It works both ways of course: I'm not going to pay for the Porsche in exchange for a rusted-out old Gremlin. He has to offer me something I value at least as much as the money I'm giving him.

But what about relationships: does the same principle hold true? I think it generally does. The term I want to introduce is "Transactional Relationship Value," which I will abbreviate as TRV starting now.

We instinctively understand that some things are more desirable than others – including women. All things being equal, a beautiful woman has higher TRV than an ugly one. The funny one will have more men vying for her attention and affection than the grouchy one. Nothing groundbreaking yet.

Let's apply the principle further. I'm going to stick to things men look for in long-term relationships. TRV in short-term relationships focuses on the superficial, such as "Considering my states of inebriation and arousal, is she good-looking enough and easy enough for my purposes?" Not exactly the stuff good LTRs are made of.

It occurs to me that most guys look for potential wives and girlfriends to possess a whole suite of attributes, unlike the example I used earlier with only two variables: car and money. How much each of those attributes matters varies widely among individual men, but we mostly like the same things. There are ways to rack-and-stack our choices, and I'll get to that a little later. First let's look at some of the attributes. Keep in mind that none of these are exactly quantifiable, so for our purposes let's peg their values at how the average guy would rate an individual woman on each trait. Remember though, it works both ways as women want to get the maximum TRV they can get as well.

Physical beauty. I don't care if you're a leg-man, a butt-man, a bust-man, a face-man, or whatever. Unless you have a serious fetish we men generally agree on who's hot and who's not. We may disagree about points, and I may think someone is a 9 while you think she's a 7, but most guys will put most women within a few points of each other. Anything more is quibbling for purposes of my argument. Plot a bell curve and determine the mean if you want to put some semi-rigor into it.

Age: The old adage is for a man to take his age, divide it in half and add seven years to get an approximation of what he should be looking for at the start of a long-term relationship. Obviously it works the other way for women: they have to subtract seven years from their age and double the result. That fits what actually happens reasonably well. Women in their early twenties go for guys a few years older. Guys in their fifties find those women "pretty but vapid" and prefer women in their thirties instead for LTRs. The closer to the half-plus-seven age a woman is, the higher her TRV is to men at the corresponding age.

Baggage: This is tricky. If she has a high notch count, a couple of kids from the local thugs, daddy issues, control issues, whatever, those psychological rocks in her rucksack lower her TRV depending on what a man's hot buttons are. Again, hard quantification is impossible, but if she has more baggage than a Samsonite factory, she loses TRV.

Money: Not usually as important to men as to women, but a woman who has her finances in order is preferable to a woman who is deeply in debt, all things being equal. This category also includes her ability to make money if you're going that route, and her family connections that may help you in your own career ambitions.

I'm just scratching the surface here, and we could all name other attributes that might matter: sense of humor, intelligence, desire for children (or not), religion, political views, etc. We can debate about what matters most and by how much, and ultimately each of us decides for himself, but let's not pretend that we can't differentiate between treasure and trash. To return to my analogy, even if we all like sports cars, you may prefer your BMW to my Porsche, and I may prefer my Porsche to your uncle's Corvette, but none of us will think the other's choice is terrible. Granted, vehicles are not a perfect example, but stick with me for the sake of the analogy.

Just as the new Ferrari has more Transactional Monetary Value than the used Porsche I ended up with, every man and woman has a certain amount of TRV to bargain with. Under the Marriage 1.0 rules a man brought his TRV to the table, which included looks, money, humor, ambition, etc, and was probably going to marry a woman with similar TRV. What you can offer affects what you will receive.

I promised you a method to rack-and-stack your choices, which I turn to now. You can use something called a Decision Matrix, or DecMat for short. You develop your screening criteria first. Those are the "must haves" or "deal breakers." It can be anything that really matters to you: if "natural blonde" is one of your "must haves" you screen out every redhead and brunette no matter how high she rates on her other attributes. If "already has kids" is one of your deal-breakers you'll screen out single moms. Once you screen out the "no-go" women you rank the remainder using your evaluation criteria. Here's where the DecMat comes in. It's a graph or computer program that asks you to rank each attribute that matters to you against every other attribute. It then assigns weights to each one based on your answers, so when you plug in the values of the attributes it rank-orders your possibilities for you and gives each one a single score. That's your estimation of her TRV. It's not necessarily THE answer, but it's AN answer based on what you say you want. TRV is the aggregate of a person's ratings on all the attributes, weighted in accordance with the decision-making person's preferences.

Here's where it get tricky – and competitive. Sure, your evaluation of a woman's TRV is your own opinion, but chances are if you rate a woman as having a high TRV, other men will too.

Since you want all the TRV you can get, and so does everyone else who's in the LTR market, you need to have a realistic expectation of what your TRV can buy. If we plot every woman's average TRV we'll get some sort of bell curve. Same thing with men. Superimpose the two charts with the means lined up. Even with different preferences and the vagaries of attraction, the odds of you ending up with someone more than one standard deviation above you is probably negligible, although you can easily get someone more than a standard deviation below you – but why would you want to?

Now I'm going to outline the problem, and why this article belongs on an MRA site.

Here's the problem. Feminism lowers a woman's TRV.

A LOT.

I'm going to do a little napkin math here, so don't go nuts with your calculators. I'm just making a point with numbers I think are about right – this is an opinion piece, not a statistical treatise. In the past under Marriage 1.0 a person was a pretty good bet as long they were weren't much more than one and a half standard deviations below the mean of the TRV bell curve.

Feminism in general has lowered the female mean at least one and a half standard deviations. That is a HUGE shift. A guy at the 50th percentile – the middle of the curve – who would have had a decent shot at a decent life with a decent woman under Marriage 1.0 rules is now screwed. The women at the 50th percentile today – under Marriage 2.0 rules – are no longer good marriage risks for average guys (more on risk assessment later). The result is that the group "all men in their prime marriage years" is VASTLY larger than the group "acceptable women in their prime marriage years." What happens is that a relatively small number of guys hit the jackpot, a lot of guys have "okay" marriages, a lot of guys get screwed over when they marry unsuitable women or turn out to be unsuitable themselves, and the rest wait it out while Kay Hymowitz nags at them to "man up."

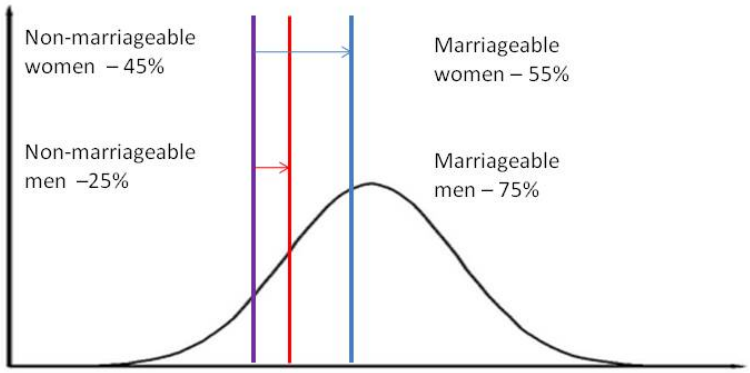
To compound the problem, half a century of misandrist family law has caused millions of boys to grow up without fathers in their lives to guide them into manhood. Feminized schools did the rest, and so the male mean has fallen under the assault as well. How much? I'd guess more than half a standard deviation versus previous generations. The average woman of your grandparent's generation would not be very interested in what two generations of single mothers and feminist education has turned today's average man into either.

We're now two generations into female-headed households, feminized education, and feminist jurisprudence and they've taken a toll on both sexes. If you could take an average man and an average woman today and send them back a few generations the average guy would be in the bottom third of his peers (barely marriageable) and no decent guy from back then would consider the modern woman to be marriageable at all. (Feminism damaged both sexes but lowered women's TRV more.)

Standard Bell Curve for Transactional Relationship Value
Under Marriage 2.0 rules – Women in Blue / Men in Red



After 50 years of feminism the mean female TRV shifted far to the left. Due to the increase in boys being raised by single women and feminized men, the male mean also shifted, but not by as much. Since it's far easier for me to move the vertical lines than the bell curve, I illustrated this by moving the lines between marriageable and non-marriageable to the right for both sexes. Now about half of all marriages end in catastrophic failure.

To add insult to injury, the lines move to the right as we age and TRV decreases faster for women than for men. Stating in the late-20's to late-30's a man's TRV goes into decline while a woman's goes off a cliff. This helps older single men, who now may increasingly choose among women who are much younger than they are.

By the time the party-girls hit their 30's and are awakened by the sound of their biological alarm clocks going off their TRVs are in the dumpster out back under an empty box of truffles. By age 35 their looks are on the way down, and they probably have a fair amount of baggage. (To be fair, I don't look like I did when I was 20 either.) But the sexual dynamic has changed for them. Where they once could have all the guys they wanted in their beds, their male age-peers are now looking for women in their mid-twenties (half plus seven years). The men who are looking at those women are in their fifties, or maybe forties if the woman looks good for her age.

The good news is that half of all marriages do not end in divorce court, so there are a lot of men and women who are making marriage work. It is certain that a significant percentage of those marriages are not ideal, but either party has the ability to file a no-fault divorce petition. So in half of all marriages both parties perceive that the advantages outweigh the burdens. The bad news is that every year feminism pushes the lines a little farther to the right in favor of women hitting the kill switch.

So now people, mostly men, are haggling over evaluation criteria that would have been screening criteria a couple of generations ago. Feminism has turned LTRs into minefields for a lot of people, with the added caveat that it's usually men who lose everything when it doesn't work out. Their kids get the pink shaft too and the cycle continues with the next generation.

That brings me to the topic of risk assessment. Two factors come into play: the likelihood of something bad happening and the severity of the consequences if it does. The potential downside of a bad marriage is catastrophic, so it's very important to set the odds in your favor as much as possible if you want to marry. The things you do to lower your chance of disaster are called risk mitigation. Once you understand the risks – the likelihood of things going wrong and the severity if they do, you have to mitigate the risks by either lowering the probability of failure and/or limiting the damage if they do. Integrity is the number 1 risk mitigation factor in my estimation. Integrity is not the "given" it used to be, so for many or perhaps most Western women today the odds are too high to warrant the risk. Risk assessment and mitigation is a large enough topic to warrant its own article though. Ultimately we all have to balance the risks against the potential rewards and make the call.

The beauty of the bell curve is that no matter how far you skew it there will still be people at the top who make the grade. They just go from being common, to uncommon, to rare, to very rare the farther you push the mean. A quarter century ago when I was dating, acceptable women were common, good women were uncommon, very good women were rare, and exceptional women were very rare. Today you have to slide everything over at least one notch. That means that while there are still a very small number of exceptional women, the average young woman is no longer an acceptable risk once you factor in the results of your risk assessment.

Having said all that, I'll reiterate that integrity must be one of the screening criteria. With the legal power a woman has to wreck your life, a guy contemplating an LTR must know the woman he's marrying will refrain from using her power to screw him to the wall.

Short of just packing it in – which is an option – I posit that learning short Game is a lot less important than having a high TRV, as it allows a man access to women at the high end of the curve. These women are mainly ones that would have been in the upper-middle of the curve 50 years ago, but at least a guy has a fighting chance if they pair off. Of course women more than a standard deviation above the mean are rare, and a man will have a lot of competition before the dynamic flips in favor of men at around age 26, but by that time most good ones are taken and anything else is a crap-shoot with loaded dice. Demographic data suggest that divorce is not spread evenly throughout the population. If two people both bring high TRV and integrity to the match, the odds are pretty good that they'll be okay "'til death do us part."

So if a man wants to marry he must do two things: pick the right woman and be the right man. Some guys here will jump all over that as if I'm blaming men. I'm just acknowledging the fact that men are actors in their own fates. Terrible things do happen to good guys who do everything right, but you can improve your odds a lot by refusing to settle for low TRV and low integrity in yourself and the women you spend time with. Good luck, and be smart.

A Tale of Two Earthquakes

Last year, we covered the earthquake in Haiti, in which hundreds of thousands of people died, and foreign troops were sent in to enforce a "women first" food distribution regime. Haiti, a matriarchal culture, was chaotic after the quake, and rescue efforts, such as existed, were rather uncoordinated and ineffective. No doubt many people – primarily Haitian men – were involved in digging others out, providing food and care to the injured and children, and trying to maintain order among the chaos, despite the fact that foreign soldiers with guns were denying them food on the basis of their sex. However, the response to the earthquake was far from sufficient, and unnecessary deaths were an unfortunately large portion of the toll.

Haiti still hasn't recovered from the quake, and the capital lies largely in ruins. Cholera epidemics have swept through refugee camps, and over a million remain homeless. The earthquake was a tragedy of epic proportions. Despite the obvious problems inherent in Haitian matriarchal society that were revealed by the earthquake and its aftermath, feminists demand more of the same.

The recent earthquake in Japan was significantly stronger than the Haitian quake, and a devastating tsunami added to the destruction and horror. Buildings shook throughout the entire country for minutes from the sixth largest earthquake ever recorded. The tsunami rolled over beaches and seawalls, destroying refineries, shutting down nuclear plants and carrying boats far inland. An earthquake of this magnitude releases so much energy that humans can only mitigate rather than prevent damage. However, early reports suggest that the Japanese did a very good job of that.

In all likelihood, the death toll will be in the thousands, but as grim as that sounds, it could have been far, far worse. Tragedies are still unfolding in Japan, but the people of the island nation are, for the most part, taking care of their own. American search and rescue teams are helping search for survivors, and US Navy helicopters are airlifting food to stranded Japanese civilians, but the bulk of the rescue effort is being undertaken by Japanese. Overwhelmingly, of course, Japanese men. And the women are not complaining. Even the feminists in the US are eerily silent on this score.

When you have a society in which men have a vested interest in protecting and taking care of the whole, and they are allowed to do so, they tend to do a good job. They display selflessness and their efforts are characterized by cooperation and teamwork; often by heroism as well. On the whole, everyone does better. There is no better example of this than the comparison between matriarchal Haiti's and patriarchal Japan's respective responses to natural disaster. Where in Haiti the women are still living in open encampments well over a year after the quake, Japanese women are already sheltered, which is necessary, because it is still cold in northern Japan this time of year. There is no doubt that some displaced Japanese will still be facing significant hardship a year from now, but despite Japan's crowded land vanishingly few will be without a roof over their head, and none will go hungry.

As for the Japanese men, they have it far better than their Haitian counterparts as well. There are no foreign troops pointing guns at them and denying them food, they are taken care of and respected if old, and given jobs and a place in society if young. Perhaps most importantly, They are given the opportunity to do what men often do best — they are allowed to take care of their families and communities.

As we observe these events and their aftermath, they provide us with valuable lessons about nature of things, and give us an opportunity to ask ourselves what kind of a society we want to live in. Do we want, as the feminists would have it, to be helpless, disease infested, homeless and starving if we face hardship, or do we want to have the ability to come together and pull ourselves up from the rubble? For the sane people of the world, the choice is clear.

Women's Fantasy in Anime/Manga Culture

By Neurogal

I know that most of the men's right movement concerns are within Western world, but as women universally are the same, I would like to share what women typically desire in the Japanese subculture that I have been a fan of for 10 years now: the anime/manga culture. As Japan is now in the headlines, and we are all wishing them well in the midst of this disaster, maybe it is appropriate to give some thought to Japan's culture.

So what kind of men do Japanese women want? The anime/manga culture can provide some insight as currently more women than men are fans of this culture, and the industry has changed accordingly to meet the demands of the female readers base.

Let's take one of popular fictional guys in manga. Hibari Kyouya, from the manga Kateikyoushi Hitman Reborn (literally means Home Tutor Hitman Reborn), is a leader of the middle school discplinary comittee. Yet he beats a guy to a bloody pulp if said guy broke one simple rule. He is also involved in blackmailing, extortion, underground crimes and underage driving. Later Hibari Kyouya is said to be the strongest guy within the characters.

Hibari Kyouya is also the No 1 Character "I Want To Be My Groom" for both years in two annual Japanese surveys.

Yes, he is the epitome of what Japanese women want. They don't seem to mind that if this were real life, Hibari Kyouya would be arrested for his violent tendencies. Granted, Hibari Kyouya is not a player; he has little interest in women, and he has a soft spot for animals. But nevertheless, he is violent. His catchphrase is "I'll bite you to death."

But how about the No 1 Character chosen as "I Want To Be My Bride?" The first year was won by Hinagiku Katsura from Hayate The Combat Butler and the second is Akiyama Mio from K-On. The similarities between these two? They are what fans love to call "tsundere".

Tsundere is the type of girl one would call "independent." They are top students in academics, excel in sports and are often the student council president. But then the hero appears. Suddenly, this independent girls is rendered to speechless. They stutter, blush and wanted to get the attention of the hero as subtle as she can. She somehow become more feminine, cared how she looks and shy around the hero. This type of girls are a hit with both male and female readers.

Why is that? From my observation, tsundere fulfills the fantasy of both the men and women. In modern society, more women became like the tsundere. In the manga, the hero will eventually fall in love with the tsundere. In reality, no, guys usually pay less attention to these kind of girls. The female readers used this as sort of escapism from reality, where they projected themselves to the tsundere.

For the men, they love these kind of girls (as the survey shows) because it shows no matter how independent or amazing that girl is, she will be submissive to the guy she likes. She could kick a guy over to the moon, but with the hero she eagerly wanted to please him. This, I suppose, gives a great boost to the men's ego because the hero successfully tamed the girl (usually with no effort from the hero).

As tsundere are well-liked, female fans really hate any normal, childish and non-assertive girls as potential love interest. These female characters are hated simply because she is plain with average grades and suck at sports. The girl is shy all the time and always support the hero in the background. Many female characters who fall into this category are hated and female fans wanted a girl with 'more backbone' and as strong as the hero to be the female lead.

Another genre that is popular with female fans is "yaoi". Yaoi is the male homosexual love anime/manga. Interestingly, in this subculture, the female fans accept the submissive-dominant relationship between the two guys, giving the guys the title uke(submissive) and seme(dominance). Ironically, this mirrors the heterosexual relationship between a girl and guy as the uke actually acts like a girl/feminine. Research papers on yaoi admit this is another projection of female readers to the uke. Acting feminine as a girl is seen as dependent, but if it is a guy he is still seen as independent even though both act the same. It is said the Japanese perception of women has contributed to this.

Whether feminism contributed to the above situation is something uncertain. However as I read English comments, this has held true for Western women as well. There are still many of my observations in this culture about female fans and their expectations, especially in fanfictions.

Loud Noise, Weak Signal

Delusion Damage · 15 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

> "Every night I talk to God, but he don't say nothing back"
> -rap lyrics, "50 cent"

When you talk to people, they will likely say something back. When you talk to people on the internet, you're almost guaranteed that most of the people who say something back will not be the ones your communication was intended for. Anything you say will be misinterpreted to suit the needs of a slew of respondents – and I use the word "respond" generously, since it implies actual consideration of the message that has been received – who really just want to yell their favorite delusions at other people in order to bolster their own sense of trust in them. These people aren't having a conversation with you, they aren't even arguing with you – the constant, loud repetition of a delusion-affirming mantra is a solipsistic activity. It requires another person only in the capacity of recipient – the flow of information is one-way: these people are only sending, they will not receive no matter how cleverly you respond to them. It's a broadcast, not a discussion. Trying to have a conversation with such a person is like trying to have a conversation with your TV – it will say something back, but that doesn't mean it understood or even heard what you said to it.

Like an echo chamber, the internet will send back noise for any noise you put out into it. Most of it will be just that – noise. Some of the noise will be cleverly disguised as words, but do not be fooled, that doesn't mean communication is happening.

The signal put out by The Spearhead is starting to gain more power now, and the noise coming back from the various voice-activated loudspeakers of the great virtual echo chamber is growing louder in response. Like we've gotten used to the fact that most email is spam, we will have to get used to the fact that most responses to thoughtful writing are not thoughtful writing – they're just the auto-responses of mechanistically operating entities which parsed your message, detected a close relationship between the words "feminism" and "bad" and automatically generated a pre-fabricated response for you. There was no higher thinking involved, it was just an instinctual reaction to noise, like a little girl who hears an animal bleating and bleats back.

The Spearhead readership like the audience of all media is comprised of two categories: those for whom the message is intended, and the rest. The people who are being written for – the ones who receive the communication, interpret the signal correctly and understand the message – are not likely to say anything back unless they have something to say. They are, by necessity, people who think, and that means they usually think before they talk. They try to make sure their communication is laden with value for those who receive it. If they have nothing of value to add, they will likely not respond. Some will take the time to write up a short thank you comment, but the signal coming back to The Spearhead from its intended audience will always be weak compared to the noise coming from the voice-activated auto-responders. For every signal that comes back from a reader who appreciated the message, there are more who appreciated the message and found nothing of value to add to it, thus remaining silent.

The much more vocal segment of the audience is those readers who are not being written for. They are the ones who will not think about the message – they will not decode the signal past a few words that will allow them to do what they want to do: relegate the message into their private "bad" category and yell their own never-changing mantra back at its source. Where they find their trigger words – a well-written article, an offhand comment to that article, it doesn't matter. What matters is that these people are looking for an opportunity for self-affirmation by yelling their deluded beliefs at other people, and as soon as they see their trigger words, their brain registers such an opportunity and they start yelling.

The content of their yelling will not be a response to the content of your message. It will more than likely be a direct reflection of what happens in their head: relegating your message to the "offending" category. This will usually manifest itself in a response as some variation on the basic "offending message – must be yelled at and silenced" directive:

The Spearhead outputs a relatively controversial signal that will get caught in the "offending message – must be yelled at and silenced" filter of many, many people with a dire need to affirm their delusions through the yelling of mantras. It will also be received by many who appreciate the message but say nothing back. In what The Spearhead hears back from readers, the noise will likely always be much stronger than the signal.

Our editor in chief is burdened with a difficult balancing act: putting out an effective message for those who are its intended recipients while simultaneously exercising control over the most controversial articles in order to keep the reactionary noise at a manageable level where the weak signal sent back by those who appreciate the message can still be heard.

The fact is, if you aren't being opposed, you aren't saying anything new. You aren't relevant. Right now, The Spearhead is very relevant: the sheer amount of noise coming back from the opposition is a testament to that. Everyone who was ever right about anything fought an uphill battle against the reactionary noise of the masses who always cling to the old for a sense of security, trying to bleat as loud as they can to drown out the offending truth. If ever a time comes where the signal from those who appreciate the message measures up to the noise from those who are offended by it, it's a sign that it's probably time to reevaluate how relevant the message being put out is.

And at times when the response seems overwhelmingly negative, we'll do well to remember 50 Cent's relationship with his God:

Every night we talk to men but they don't say nothing back.
That doesn't mean they don't hear us.

The Flipside of Feminism: Relief for the Discombobulated Woman

careyroberts · 15 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

American women out-vote, out-spend, and out-live their male counterparts. They enjoy an unrivaled array of lifestyle options.

But the fact remains, females have become a decidedly unhappy lot. As a National Bureau of Economic Research report explains, “As women have gained more freedom, more education, and more power, they have become less happy.”

How do we come to terms with this modern-day malady that has no name? The Flipside of Feminism, authored by Suzanne Venker and conservative icon Phyllis Schlafly, incisively diagnoses the problem, prescribes the common-sense cure, and above all, instills hope.

Think of it as a long-awaited reality check from your older, wiser sister.…

The advent of the feminine malaise can be tied to a historically unprecedented gerrymandering of gender roles, with its inevitable biological consequences. As journalist Anne Taylor Fleming once uttered in her maternal cri de coeur:

“I belong to the sisterhood of the infertile. I am a lonesome, babyless baby-boomer now completely consumed by the longing for a baby…I am tempted to roll down the window and shout, ‘Hey, hey, Gloria, Germaine, Kate. Tell us, how does it feel to have ended up without babies, children, flesh of your flesh. Was your ideology worth the empty womb?”

Over the past 30 years, American women have been swayed to believe they have been getting the short end of the stick at the hands of their patriarchal tormentors. Feminists “know it’s easy to get people to succumb to victimhood,” counsel Venker and Schlafly.

The process begins with women’s studies courses that parade themselves as “a training course for radical feminists in radical feminism.” Women’s magazines “are based on telling women their lives are too tough for them to handle and they should feel very sorry for themselves,” recounts former Ladies Home Journal editor Myrna Blyth.

The result is a hydra-headed social-political movement rooted in Marxist theory with a decidedly narcissistic twist – feminism is “inextricably linked to the individualist message,” reveals Dr. Jean Twenge in Generation Me.

The book’s juiciest revelations center around arch-feminist Betty Friedan and her childhood traumas. In Life So Far, Friedan reveals how her mother made her feel “messy, clumsy, inadequate, bad, naughty, ugly.” But rather than getting the psychological help she desperately needed, “It was easier for me to start the women’s movement than to change my own personal life,” Friedan incoherently boasts.

The specter of liberated women blaming men for their personal neuroses would become a leitmotif of American feminism. This pattern would soon evolve into a “full-scale assault on the American male,” as Venker and Schlafly put it.

In their chapter on The Expendable Male, the authors document the contemptuousness that defines modern feminism. New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd once wrote, “Now that women don’t need men to reproduce and refinance, the question is, will we keep you around?” And Jessica Bennett crowed in Newsweek how women will one day “rule the world.”

Venker and Schlafly end their adumbration of feminist misandry with this sober warning: “no society can thrive – or survive – when half its members believe they’re oppressed and the other half are told there is no reason for them to exist.”

For women accustomed to advancing their agenda by reflexively embracing their inner victim, The Flipside of Feminism's prescription begins to resemble a 12-step program:

"Recognizing that feminism failed in its mission, that it is based on faulty assumptions and arguments, and that it drives a wedge between men and women and even among women, is the first step to recovery."

And it's up to sensible women to bring an end to it all:

"If change is going to come, it will have to come from women – they are the ones who changed the nature order of things. Moreover, men aren't the ones who kvetch about their place in the world – not because they have it so great (contrary to feminist dogma), but because it's not in their nature."

For the die-hard ideologues, this may be the hard part:

"We must stop talking about women's rights, women's needs, women's problems, and progress for women. We must stop talking about girl power and female empowerment, and about overturning a patriarchy that doesn't exist. When we frame the debate in feminist lingo, we foster a war between the sexes. It's time to end the war between the sexes."

Over the past 30 years, feminism has sought to expunge from women the primal delights of conjugal partnership, of nurturing motherhood, and of familial constancy. Now, Suzanne Venker and Phyllis Schlafly are courageously calling on women to take a stand against feminism, or risk losing the goose that laid the golden egg.

Cartoonist Calls for “Crusade” for Women

David Horsey, cartoonist cum editorialist of the Seattle PI, has taken up the banner for women’s empowerment across the world, and is pitching Nicholas Kristoff’s microloan deals in the meanwhile. Horsey makes some amazing statements, saying that “elevating the status of women … is the great work of civilized people in the 21st century.”

Whenever someone makes these kinds of proclamations, they are usually dead wrong, so I seriously doubt we’re in for another 89 years of radical feminism, but what’s curious is how some of these boomer guys have latched onto feminism with such a passion in recent years. Horsey and Kristoff are but two examples out of many, and as a guy approaching middle age myself I wonder exactly what their point is. Are women really in crisis around the world? Far from it. Compared to men, they’re doing pretty well — even in the areas Horsey points to in his cartoon.

One thing I’ve noticed in society in general and online that men under the age of 40 or so are a lot more skeptical about feminism and women’s rights than those who are older. Because I’m still under 40 myself, I don’t know whether this is a generational difference or a biological tendency.

Do men past a certain age simply develop some psychological blind spot? Do they go soft where women are concerned? Or is it that they didn’t get screwed over by feminism to the same extent as younger men?

UNLV Proposes to Cut Women's Studies

As the education bubble begins to show signs of bursting, many schools will face hard choices about what to keep and what to cut. Some, as PMAFT has pointed out, have chosen to cut useful academic programs such as computer science, but it seems that others are pursuing a more pragmatic course.

UNLV has included its entire women's studies program in its list of proposed cuts, which would take a couple dozen feminists off the public payroll and eliminate 30 useless majors. Unfortunately, philosophy is also included in the cuts, but truth be told a number of humanities programs are so thoroughly infected by feminism that it might be better in the long run to simply axe them now and start over from scratch when the resources are available.

Lois Helmbold, chairwomyn of the UNLV women's studies department, defends her program as "critical," saying that without women's studies thousands of students would miss the wonderful opportunity to take courses focusing on "gender, class and racial issues." In fact, the trend in the 90s to force all students to take classes from these types was much of the reason for these departments' continued existence; perhaps such forced indoctrination programs have already ended.

As the economy limps along, more schools will be forced to make tough choices, and while many will doubtless choose unwisely, cutting anything they can before touching politically correct departments, that will ultimately be for the best, because they will follow the path of Antioch and die with little more than a whimper as parents refuse to pay to send their children to schools run by decrepit Marxists.

As for the schools that make the right choice and toss the trash departments in the slag heap where they belong, they may yet weather the hard times.

Let's Go for a Ride

Oh me oh my, it seems a very relevant and poignant development has gone largely ignored.

Mainstream news media attention has never been a reliable gauge of what exactly the public at large deems important.

Nevertheless, the recent ruling from the EU targeting British insurance companies has been met with an interesting mix of both loud denunciations and eerie silence.

Long story short, the courts ruled that charging male motorists higher premiums than female motorists amounted to discrimination. U.K. insurance firms have just over a year to comply with the law, after then, the male-female cost gap must be laid to rest.

Needless to say, insurers are less than joyous about this and have put forth a defence of their dastardly practice. They say that men are statistically more likely to get into an accident, injured in an accident, die in an accident etc. Ladies, being genetically ordained as goddesses of the asphalt, suffer lower casualties in all categories of road-related carnage. Debate surrounding the fickle science of Statistics notwithstanding; the spotlight issue in all this is, however one slices it: the new gender dynamics (apocryphally: woman 2.0).

What a colourful assortment of carnival characters this brings out! Equality, sex-discrimination, age-discrimination, wage-discrimination, laissez-faire capitalism, public costs, externalities, civil rights, human rights, kryptonian rights…

This offers to us a fascinating case study of the feminism beast, from whom we have heard every sort of bizarre, contrived, reality-skewing nonsense. Always first to enlighten the world with their two-cents of input on whatever disaster, calamity, or injustice is currently at hand.

As an ideology, Feminism has been predominantly a left-wing domain. Ship-jumping is not uncommon, but the noisiest, most-obnoxious and brazen march in the shadow of the banner of Marxism. This in mind, how would an avowed feminist tailor a response to this blatant miscarriage of justice?

Say they argue against the ruling, calling it discriminatory – but it was the courts who ruled in favour of ending discrimination against male motorists.

Say they argue that this is government intrusion into the free-market – they risk allying themselves with the right, and being viewed as turncoats for defending the patriarchal, unholy juggernaut of capitalism.

Say they argue that the male-motorist is the spawn of the devil, to be kept at bay at any cost – such a claim would be challenged with rational, logical debate, a style completely alien to their M.O.

Say they agree with the ruling, but they want (insert arbitrary condition unsubstantiated by logic or evidence) – this will be all too predictable. Knowing that they are cornered, they wail over the oppression inflicted by men over the ages. Never letting a good opportunity go to waste.

The list goes on.

Feminists and women (I cannot stress the distinction enough) everywhere are slowly beginning to see what genuine equality looks like. Rest assured it resembles nothing of what was in the brochure. In response to this court ruling their options are very limited, and the probability of rank-breaking and infighting is high.

When the dust settles, women may even end up paying higher premiums than men (has a nice retroactive-justice ring to it).

All this is cause for rejoicing as it reminds us that hope survives, but the battle is far from over.

Equality, fairness, justice, solidarity, these issues have long characterized the MRM's battle cry.

Hear that honey? That's the sound of you, coming out of the twilight zone.

Seeking “Best Of” Suggestions from Readers

W.F. Price · 17 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Because we now have plenty to choose from, I’m going to put together an anthology of best posts soon, and suggestions from readers would be much appreciated. For those readers who have been around from the beginning, feel free to bring up any older posts you particularly liked. Additionally, I’d like to include all the authors I can, so the more diverse the selection the better.

I’ll probably put a link to the list online in the sidebar for now, but the idea is to publish them in book form, which I’m finally ready to do, given that readership has reached a level where I can now focus on expanding The Spearhead‘s projects and offering content beyond the site itself.

The Cheating Double Standard

By Szebren

One of the fundamental assertions of feminism is a wife cheats because her husband did something wrong. He is said to be neglectful or unappreciative or self centered. Conversely, they claim a husband cheats because he is egotistical or superficial. A wife did nothing wrong. Therefore, men – BUT NOT WOMEN – should be held accountable for their indiscretions.

This double standard is the basis for women's websites listing the names of men who allegedly cheat.

The most popular website is WomanSavers. Its database lists a man's full name, his picture, hometown and explains what he allegedly did wrong. Additionally, ratings on his character, commitment, trustworthiness, and abusiveness are also displayed. Any woman can add an entry on any man. However, it is against the rules to add a woman into the database. Her character and trustworthiness cannot be evaluated. As is the case throughout feminist society, she is considered above questioning. What makes this website's double standard astounding is that it references four articles which conclude there is only a small difference in the infidelity rate between the genders.

- Intimate Partners, Scarf 1996
- Journal of Couple & Relationship Therapy, Atwood & Schwartz 2002
- Monogamy Myth, Vaughan 2003
- Is Your Relationship at Risk?, Dworkin-McDaniel 2007

Even more astounding, however, is a survey conducted by the website in which 49% of women said they cheated. Another 26% said that they'd have no problem stepping out on their husbands or boyfriends if they knew they could get away with it. THIS MAKES MANY WOMEN ON THIS SITE BLATANT HYPOCRITES.

WomanSavers also has a forum allowing users to engage in discussions. Some women on the forum post excuses on why they have had affairs. They also support other members who have stepped out on their husbands and boyfriends. A few men have commented in the forum. Some have posted their wives have had affairs. Many members will defend the wife's actions, claiming the husband must have done something wrong. However it should be stated not all women defend backstabbing wives. Some heavily criticize them. Others tell the mistreated husband to stop being a doormat.

A website similar to Womensavers is 'Dont Date Him Girl'. This site accumulated a database of allegedly unfaithful men (complete with names, photos and hometowns) supposedly larger than Womensavers. And like Womensavers, adding a female's name to its database was forbidden. 'Dont Date Him Girl' has been featured on CBSNews, ABCNews, New York Times, The TODAY Show, CNN, FOX News and various women's magazines.

Since major media outlets promoted the site, many men became aware of its existence. Some discovered they were listed in the database. They demanded their names be removed from the listing claiming the women were lying. For example, according to 'OnLine Dating Magazine' one woman posted the name of her former boyfriend, claiming he cheated and subsequently gave her herpes. The boyfriend discovered the accusation, actually took a blood test to prove he did not have herpes and demanded his removal from the site's database. 'Don't Date Him Girl' complied.

The obvious conclusion of this incident: the women either lied about her story or was a slut who has no idea which man gave her herpes.

In the fall of 2010, 'Dont Date Him Girl' removed its database. This was not because the site's owner suddenly believed all cheats should be treated the same. Rather, she had come to the realization a successful lawsuit against her was inevitable. A growing number of men were proving their former girlfriends were liars.

‘Dont Date Him Girl’ currently has a forum where anyone can post information on former lovers. However, the same female chauvinist hypocrisy that existed in its database permeates this forum. For example, a husband posted the full name of his backstabbing wife and the sleazebag other man. Rather than gaining sympathy, women criticized him for posting the names – despite the fact there are hundreds of men’s names, many with photos, already listed in the forum. Another man expressed support for the website and asked if there was a similar site listing the names of unfaithful girlfriends. He was denounced and mocked.

Besides men being able to post, the only apparent difference between the forum and the former database is searchability. There is no search tool for the forum. Presumably this significantly decreases the chance of a lawsuit because its more difficult to find information on a specific person.

Holding only half of the population responsible for their actions is sexist (in other words its feminist). Every individual should be held accountable for their backstabbing. Unfortunately, the thousands of immature and narrow minded women using these websites believe differently. They promote a cheating double standard.

Be Prepared

Hawaiian Libertarian · 19 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I was once a Boy Scout. I never attained the rank of Eagle, but the time I did spend in the organization has impacted my life and has given me tools and principles that are a part of me to this very day, over 20 years later.

The Boy Scout motto has always been my credo: Be Prepared.

I expanded it into my own personal maxim that I tell people all the time:

Better to have something and not need it, than to need something and not have it.

When I watched the events that unfolded after Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans, I realized that the veneer of civilization is an illusion. The breakdown of civil society is but one natural disaster away from occurring.

I was determined to never be one of the starving masses, huddling with fellow survivors in some location like the Superdome, waiting to be fed by a Government bureaucracy.

I began buying a little bit of canned food on every grocery trip.

Every time I buy a case of toilet paper, I take a few rolls and stash them in a closet.

I have cases of bottled water, plenty of extra butane, propane and lantern fuel, portable stoves, as well as an abundant stash of whiskey and plenty of ammunition for all of my firearms.

There's no point in having supplies if you can't defend them from someone who is desperate because they did not plan like you did, and they seek to steal or rob it from you.

That being said, I hope every person reading this article takes note of the recent disaster in Japan. Take note of what happens the moment a disaster strikes any urban or suburban community: the first that happens is a stampede of people at the grocery stores to buy up whatever supplies they can get their hands on.

From the appropriately named blog: SHTF Plan – (the Shit Hits The Fan Plan), What Your Grocery Store Will Look Like In An Emergency:

The Guardian reports that panic buying and fear is spreading:

> People in the capital, home to 12 million, snapped up radios, torches, candles, fuel containers and sleeping bags, while for the fourth day there was a run on bread, canned goods, instant noodles, bottled water and other foodstuffs at supermarkets.
> Retailers said the panic buying was reminiscent of the oil crisis in the 1970s.
> The electronics firm Panasonic said it was increasing production of batteries, which were being bought in large quantities as far away as Hiroshima in the south-west.
> Fears are rising that if the hoarding frenzy continues it will affect the ability to deliver emergency supplies to the disaster zone. "The situation is hysterical," said Tomonao Matsuo, a spokesman for the instant noodle maker Nissin Foods. "People feel safer just by buying Cup Noodles."

Prepare now, because you just never know.

The last place you want to be during a disaster is scrounging for scraps at the grocery store.

A perfect example of the panic buying that ensues depending on the disaster or emergency of the moment is what we are seeing with Potassium Iodide tablets. The essentials will go first, within a matter of hours. If you don't have what you need before an emergency, don't plan on getting it after it has happened.

Some people scoff at the idea. They will say it is unfounded paranoia. That it could never happen here. I've seen the grocery stores emptied out here in Hawaii on 3 different occasions within the last decade. All three instances here on O'ahu occurred in the face of a threatened disaster, not even an actual one. When there was an earthquake off of the coast of the Big Island that shook the entire island chain back in 2006, the safety features on the O'ahu power plants caused an automatic shutdown, leaving the island without power for almost 24 hours. The grocery stores were emptied in a matter of several hours after the earthquake.

The same thing occurred again when a Chilean earthquake in 2010 threatened Hawaii with a potential tsunami. Once again, the masses bum rushed the grocery stores leaving empty shelves…long before the 4 inch tsunami washed up on hour shores.

In the face of yet another tsunami threat from the Japanese Earthquake last week, it happened yet again.

Where ever you are in this world, there is some sort of natural phenomenon that can and will occur that will interrupt the regular mode of obtaining your daily food and water.

If you've got a SHTF Plan of your own, you won't need to run out to the store and stand in line as the shelves are emptied by the panic of the unprepared in the face of the next catastrophic event.

Learn from history. Disasters, catastrophes, and cataclysms happen. It's not a matter of if…but when.

Will you be prepared?

How to Tell If You're In A Patriarchy

Elusive Wapiti · 20 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Alte offers up an operative definition of patriarchy:

> I've always followed the definition that patriarchy is "rule by men", when it actually isn't. It is rule by the male heads of family; the paterfamilias. In a patriarchy, the family is considered the lowest-level of government, with a man elected to its head. That man is not always the eldest or even the husband, but it is a man and he is elected. He is implicitly elected by the people in his family, who agree to follow his leadership.

I think Alte doesn't drill down far enough in her definition, but she's right on the concept. A patriarchy is, quite literally, rule by the fathers. As she defines it, a patriarchy would be rule by a father who is subsequently elected "patriarch" over an entire extended family, which is one level too much abstraction to be practical. As usual, simplicity is the more elegant solution, and I contend a better definition of a "patriarch" is one that is suggested by the etymology: rule by married men with children.

It is important to note here that this definition of patriarchy is at odds with the culturally accepted one. We can blame the femmarxists and their abuse of the Queen's English for that. Just as they have expanded the definitions of family to mean just about any social unit under the sun and rape to include sex regretted after the fact, they have widened the definition of "patriarchy" to mean "rule by men" (and successfully attached to it all sorts of negative connotations). Thus defined–a more accurate description of such a social and governing system where men, any man, ruled, would be andrarchy–they then used that word as a billy club to facilitate their poxy vision of a utopian gynarchy.

I suppose I can't place all the blame on the femmarxists, however. For in the United States, the Founding Fathers, in one of their rare screw-ups that we can see now in full 235 year post-hoc retrospect, when configuring this Constitutional Republic, moved the locus of social power away from family men and toward any man with real property. I suppose this was a useful device to temper the democratic beast–how better to mitigate the passions of the Athenian mob than to filter their desires through those among them who had the most to lose–but it disconnected the interests of the married man with children from the interests of society. All one had to do to have a voice was to be born a male and acquire property. No need to find oneself a fertile woman and get busy making babies, since being a husband and a father was no longer necessary to be a man that mattered in the new American-style government.

Someone probably called this new social order a patriarchy out of habit and as a homage to the old ways, and to be honest, the fabric of society looked the same and likely more or less operated the same way despite the change in theory and method of governance after the American Revolution. Men and women still got together, had children, and it was the male head of family that was (a) respected as such, and (b) was charged with the leadership of his wife and the rearing of his family, and (c) was held accountable for the deeds of his wife and family. Socially, it functioned as a patriarchy. But how society governed itself had moved on, and before long, this change in governance would be reflected in the culture and in the family. American culture would soon no longer be accurately labelled patriarchal.

In the meantime, with the family man thus divested in favor of the propertied man, the democratic nature of democracy was being realized. No, we couldn't keep the republic: Not even 100 years after the Founding, suffrage was extended to all men, regardless of family status or property. It seems that, by narrowing down the set of men vested with the vote, landed men were not numerous enough to defend their power from usurpation by those unlanded and therefore unsuffraged men. The will of the democratic mob wouldn't stop there, either, as the interests of the several States was subsumed by the democratic interests of the mob with the passage of the Seventeenth Amendment, thus further upsetting the delicate checks and balances against Federal power the Founders took such painstaking care to install. And then, 150 years after the Founding, women were suffraged too, and the divestiture of the patriarch was complete. Being a family man with children gave a fellow no bigger voice in society, no greater right to rule, than the billionaire playboy on the other side of town, or the hooker plying her trade in the alleyway. He was equal.

So: clearly we are not in a patriarchy, and haven't been for some time. But how to tell if one is in a patriarchy? Well, that's quite easy. Start with the most basic, fundamental unit of government, the one we experience first as humanity–the family–and note who leads it. If that person is a married man (or widower) with children, and each successive layer of government is built upon that foundation, with no exceptions, backdoors, or special privileges, well you are in a patriarchy. If not, government is built off of families headed by choice mommies, or two mommies, or two daddies, or even if it is a nuclear family but Dad's voice is but one in a cacaphonous din of single men, women, choice mommies, two mommies or two daddies, it is something else.

Working out for Weaklings – A Primer from LCpl Durden

J. Durden · 20 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

The Marine Corps is well known for its physical fitness, and things being what they were, I kind of didn't fit in. For those unaware, I spent most of my life as a shut in, neck-bearded closet nerd trolling GameFAQs and other online forums. Ferdinand Bardamu of In Mala Fide is quite hard on places such as GameFAQs – and justifiably so – but they taught me a lot of lessons which applied later in life…but I digress. The point here is that becoming a Marine had been a childhood pipe dream of mine – the way kids dreamed about being President or an astronaut or what have you, I thought of Marines as super heroes (perhaps because my grandfather had been a retired Lieutenant Colonel who survived the battle of Iwo Jima; look it up, get learned).

Suffice to say, the adjustment from a sedentary life to the rigorous demands of the Marine Corps was a rough one. I struggled to keep up but mostly I struggled not to be a burden on fellow recruits during training and later my fellow Marines in the fleet. When I first went down to my recruiter, I was a "triple threat," which meant that I could not pass a single event on the IST or initial strength test – which is kind of embarrassing. All it required of me was to perform two dead-hang pull ups (I went down to boot camp without being able to do a single one and in the three months only managed to get up to three just by the skin of my teeth), 44 crunches in two minutes, and run a mile and a half or something like that in some paltry slow time. (I don't remember exactly.) Point is? I was out of shape – I wans't fat, I just wasn't fit.

Throughout the course of my career I worked really hard to get to just below what is considered a "1st Class" physical fitness test score, and I also scored the bare minimum for 1st class on the newish Combat Fitness Test. I was able to accomplish this thanks in huge part to the mentorship and guidance of several of my peers who had previously been body builders and personal trainers – in particular, one who goes by the nickname Julio and another who is still serving as a Corporal out in Okinawa. They have continued to provide me instruction and guidance in physical fitness and overall health, which I have found a much superior alternative to managing my condition as compared to "doctor's orders."

I have refined a routine that I think could work for anyone who is self-disciplined and believes they can benefit from my system. I am sharing it here, free of charge, in the hopes that it gets tested and I get word whether it works for others or not. Physical fitness is a key component of Game, as well, so if you'd like to do well with the ladies, you'd do well to be in shape. I'll be talking about three key areas of fitness and my strategy for managing them. First up…

Technique

Technique is super important when it comes to working out effectively. Amateur enthusiasts get caught up in the lust for lifting heavier and heavier weights. Some manage to get a degree of success with this strategy – even having "sculpted" bodies – but often their bodies are useless. Pretty trinkets with no real strength. But I digress. Technique is absolutely essential. If you've never trained with a personal trainer or someone who knows the proper form for performing the exercises you are attempting, make sure you do at your earliest convenience. Even if you only work with them for two weeks in order to perfect your form, this will pay you dividends in the long run.

One key is to "mentally trigger" the muscle groups you are supposed to be using during the exercise. Imagine that you are using your chest to push the weight when you do a bench press, instead of your arms. If you get caught up in the lust for more and more weight, this is an easy pointer to miss. Mentally triggering helps activate your muscles and moreover is a sort of mental device for helping ensure your body does the exercise properly. You can tell if you're doing it right because you will feel it in the muscle groups you're targeting.

I cannot stress enough that you should start out at low or no weight (ie body weight – maybe less, depending on your capabilities – there is no shame, we're all different) exercises in order to master your technique. Once you have mastered it you can work on upping the weight and the investment you put into mastering the form will pay off in spades as you sky rocket ahead of people who did it all backwards.

Frequency

Most research (and all of my friends who are in very good shape corroborate) indicates that training to failure is stupid and should be avoided. An ideal work out regimen should be designed around doing small sets, if you can, all throughout your day. For example, if you are training to increase your pull ups, the best idea is to get a pull up bar installed in your home, and then every time you go to the bathroom, do a small set of pull ups that doesn't tire you out. Or so the wisdom goes.

Unless you're a professional body builder who really knows what the fuck you're doing, you probably want to stay away from training to failure, otherwise known as training until you're dead fucking tired. It's far better to keep your work outs energizing and fun. That being said, there are many ways to make sure you don't overtrain; a commonly cited technique to break up repetitions is called the "pyramid" method. What you do is set a target number of repetitions to perform without stopping – say, 10 – but you start out by doing only one, and then taking a break to recover. Then you do 2, take another break, do 3, and so on. When you complete 10, you go back down to 9, then 8, and so on.

The mind is easy to trick. If you count to ten, it seems like you're doing an awful lot of work. If you break up your counting, you can trick your mind into thinking you are doing less work; so I prefer to count my sets in threes. For example, my first "block" so to speak, using the pyramid method, will go 1, 2, 3… If after 3, I feel tired, I go back down to 2, then 1, and stop. If, however, I still feel fresh, I commit to another set of 3, and I go down and count "1, 2, 3, 1…" Then "1, 2, 3, 1, 2…" Then "1, 2, 3, 1, 2, 3…" In this way I can continue to assess whether I should continue my pyramid and abort. Sets of three are good because the extra two or three repetitions isn't really enough to push you over the edge too much if you do commit to them, and counting in sets of three is pretty easy to keep track of.

Nutrition

Your body is some 80% water. Go buy a BPA free water bottle (such as a nice camelback one) and carry it with you wherever you go. Drink as much water as you comfortably can and refill it every chance you get. You will piss probably once an hour, or maybe once every other hour, and if your piss isn't clear as water you aren't drinking enough water. Seriously. Drink water. You will notice you have less of an appetite and more energy. Just drink water. Avoid soda unless you're treating yourself. Juice is okay from time to time. Milk is a good source of calcium. And I drink alcohol socially. But stick to water.

Your diet, unless you are super careful, probably won't give you all the nutrition you need. So you might need supplements. My friend recommended a very good basic set, which consists of a good multivitamin, basic 100% whey protein, and a thermogenic. Brand name wise, I went to GNC to get all this shit, and got the Mega Men Ultra Sport multivitamin, some kind of GNC generic brand protein shake mix, and "Refine" was the thermogenic. Wake up, take your vitamins and thermogenic, wait thirty minutes, then go hit the gym. Afterwards, drink your shake and have breakfast (I usually just have something light like cereal and some bananas).

I eat a lot of fish, rice, pasta, and chicken. I try to avoid beef but it really doesn't matter. Just try to eat protein and stay away from obviously unhealthy food. It's pretty simple really. Anybody can do it. If you follow through with an exercise routine but you aren't properly managing your nutrition you are shooting yourself in the foot and you won't see the benefits. Drink lots of water, eat right, and consider basic supplements. It's pretty easy.

Conclusion

People come up with every excuse under the sun to not start working out. "I can't figure out how to fit in in my schedule" or "I'm not sure what my goals are" or "blah blah blah." Truth is, if you start doing it and you do it right, you'll enjoy it and you'll figure out a way to fit it in. You increase your testosterone levels which are awesome for your health, you'll start feeling more confident, you release endorphins, and you'll overall just start feeling great. But if you sit there convincing yourself there's no point, and you don't believe you can do it, then you're never going to do it. Physical fitness is very much a mind over matter situation, so stop feeling sorry for yourself, stop making excuses, and just fucking do it.

America's Jails Become Stud Farms for Female Guards

W.F. Price · 21 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Yolanda Dickinson, a former jailer at Rikers Island NY, recently came out with a book called "Taboo," which details the trysts between inmates and their guards. Dickinson was fired in 2004 for having phone conversations with inmates, including one she particularly liked, because he beat up another inmate who had offended her and claimed to have murdered a rapist.

Dickinson characterizes Rikers, in which some 4,000 women are involved in guarding the 12,000 inmates, as a "soap opera."

Rikers has seen a steady stream of female guards dismissed for liaisons with inmates in recent years. The most violent and notorious seem to be most in demand:

> At least six female guards have been fired or forced out for undue familiarity with prisoners since 2007, including Kimberly Hurd, 39, who bore an inmate's love child; Yolanda Turner-Goodwin, 44, who was photographed hugging and kissing a prisoner; and Kadessha Mulgrav, 34, who allegedly sneaked away for a midnight liaison with cop killer Lee Woods in a shower room.

There is doubtless something appealing to a number of women in having access to a large population of confined and supervised men who also happen to be under their authority. If the general trend started by feminists were to continue indefinitely (I am certain that it will not), the entire country would resemble Rikers Island, with the majority of men under some form of penal supervision and existing for little more than the pleasures and whims of their female superiors.

Romance Isn't Dead, It's Just Criminal

Delusion Damage · 21 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Women wonder:

> What happened to romantic gestures and seizing the moment?
> Is romance dead?
> Where is my Prince Charming?
> Where is a man who will "sweep me off my feet"?

Well, he certainly isn't employed at your workplace or attending your educational institution, and here's why: what you call "sweeping you off your feet" or "making a romantic gesture" the law now calls "sexual harassment", and people lose their jobs and get expelled from universities for it.

Does this sound incredible? Shouldn't the kind of behavior qualifying as "sexual harassment" be completely outrageous, something that regular people would never do? Good guys just trying to be romantic shouldn't be at risk of crossing over into that territory, right? Wrong.

There is no minimum level for harassing conduct under the law.

The United Nations General Recommendation 19 to the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women defines sexual harassment of women to include:

> "such unwelcome sexually determined behavior as physical contact and advances, sexually colored remarks, showing pornography and sexual demands, whether by words or actions. Such conduct can be humiliating and may constitute a health and safety problem; it is discriminatory when the woman has reasonable ground to believe that her objection would disadvantage her in connection with her employment, including recruitment or promotion, or when it creates a hostile working environment."

In U.S. employment law, "hostile environment sexual harassment" refers to a situation where employees in a workplace are subject to a pattern of exposure to unwanted sexual behavior from persons other than an employee's direct supervisor where supervisors or managers take no steps to discourage or discontinue such behavior.

> Some situations that have been ruled to constitute such a hostile environment are:
> - Consistently telling “dirty” jokes or stories where all employees in the work area can hear them
> - Tolerating employees who make sexually suggestive remarks about other employees within earshot of others
> - Allowing peer employees, clients, suppliers, delivery persons, or even customers (Lockard v. Pizza Hut) to persist in unwanted attention, such as asking for dates
> - Allowing the use of derogatory terms with a sexual connotation (e.g., “pussy,” “girlie-man,” “player”) to be used to describe co-workers
> - Allowing frequent physical contact, even when not sexual

As you can see, the legal definitions of sexual harassment include “unwanted attention”, “asking for dates”, “frequent physical contact, even when not sexual” – and any of this can cost a man his job.

For a man to do his job in an “equal” and “integrated” 50% female workplace without accidentally committing crimes during his workday, he must carefully avoid giving the people he is expected to collaborate with any “attention” that could be seen as “unwanted”, and he must also carefully avoid physical contact with the people who hand him printouts and squeeze past him in hallways, so as not to allow it to become “frequent”. Any behavior can, of course, be seen as “unwanted”, seeing as none of us are psychic and any behavior we do not predict before it happens is unexpected and thus by default “unwanted”.

You want spontaneous romantic gestures? Well, you know, “spontaneous” is just another word for “unwanted”, and that’s a crime.

Spending most of their waking hours living under rules like these, is it any wonder that men learn to cautiously avoid romantic actions? Do you expect men to spend 8 hours a day being taught that any “attention” or “physical contact”, by default “unwanted”, is a crime, and then magically switch off all that programming in the evening to become the romance novel hero who sweeps you off your feet?

Not so fast! The waters are hardly less dangerous outside places of work or study:

> In the United Kingdom the Sexual Offences Act 2003 defines “sexual assault” as when a person (A)
> 1. intentionally touches another person (B),
> 2. the touching is sexual,
> 3. B does not consent to the touching, and
> 4. A does not reasonably believe that B consents.
> In the United States the definition of sexual assault varies widely between the individual states. The Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network defines “sexual assault” as “unwanted sexual contact that stops short of rape or attempted rape. This includes sexual touching and fondling.”

There you go – any spontaneous romantic sweeping gesture that might be interpreted as “unwanted sexual touching” is an express ticket to prison.

These nebulous definitions of sex crimes make many normal ways in which people interact with their friends and colleagues every day into crimes if one party decides after the fact that the “touching” was “unwanted” and “sexual”. “Unwanted” is basically impossible to disprove, and “sexual” comes close – if a man is squeezing through a hallway and bumps into someone around a corner, is it his fault that her “front bumpers” are legally defined as “sexual” in nature? It’s a fact of life that people who crowd into elevators together are going to bump into each other, and this “unwanted physical contact” may even be “frequent”. It’s another fact of life that the parts that stick out in front of a person are the ones most likely to serve as the point of contact with whatever gets in the way, their "sexual" nature notwithstanding. When a man can't do his job without accidentally engaging in illegal "unwanted sexual contact", it becomes very difficult to prove after the fact whether a particular instance of such contact was intentional or not. Any of the two or three romantic gestures a man can still legally make will work as evidence of intent in all those unavoidable cases of "unwanted touching", so he'd better avoid signaling any sort of romantic intent in any way, sexual, non-sexual, touching or no touching, wanted or unwanted.

Are you still wondering where you'll find the men who would sweep you off your feet? Now that sweeping has been made illegal, they can likely only be found in prison or the parts of town where men with no respect for the law hang out. Would you like to go look for them there?

Daughter Down! A Textbook Example of Hypergamy

By Lyn87

My wife and I were having dinner with our best friends tonight to celebrate a recent event that is something of a milestone for me. After a while the husband looked over at me and said, “Well, we had a bad day today.”

…waiting for the other shoe to drop…

Yikes.

It’s not like she didn’t know better. She’s 18 and her bad-boy boyfriend is 21. She’s in high school and he lives with his parents and has an exciting and lucrative career in the fast food industry: I’m sure he’s going to go far.

This has “Train wreck” written all over it.

She’s a textbook example of hypergamy. I’ve never seen a girl who had a case this extreme. She’s passably attractive and I personally know two nice young men who would have thrown themselves in front of a speeding train for a shot at her. The parents kept hoping that she would pair off with one of them. I told them it wouldn’t happen, and I told them why it wouldn’t happen.

She spent a lot of time with the nice guys doing innocuous group activities like shopping and going to the movies. They were always there to keep her company and sympathize with her when some guy she was dating treated her like crap.

Not interested. Not even a little.

Is anyone here surprised by that?

Anyone?

The weird thing is that I gave her parents a lengthy explanation of female hypergamy about two months ago to help them understand their daughter’s seemingly irrational behavior in going for losers while she put the nice guys into the “friend” basket.

Sometimes I HATE it when I’m right.

So what can we learn from this sordid little mess that plays out thousands of times a week all around us?

1) The nice, attentive, beta guys didn’t get the girl, and they’re infinitely better off for it.

2) The bad-boy alpha with “game” is probably screwed for life, and will have little say in how this plays out, although he will be held legally responsible.

3) The parents may well end up raising their daughter’s bastard for quite a while, to the detriment of their other children.

4) Her life is irreparably changed, and not for the better.

5) Unless she gives the kid up for adoption it’s probably screwed as well.

6) She’s going to end up with a beta sooner or later – the only questions are “How long until she snags one?”, “How much human wreckage will she cause in the meantime?” and “How long before she ruins his life too?”

This is what happens when 50 years of feminism unshackles unrestrained sexuality from social opprobrium.

Ironically, the only people who come out ahead are the betas who dodged that bullet, although it’s likely to be a while before they appreciate that fact.

The Na: A Society without Marriage

By Khangray

I'm new to the MRM. I've enjoyed the articles, comments, and ideas and want to thank those who take the time to participate. It has helped me a lot. Many years ago I figured out that the game was rigged but I didn't appreciate by how much until after spending some time at this and similar web sites.

Marriage 2.0 is clearly toxic to men's health and sanity. Women like it a lot but are beginning to wonder where the guys are. Marriage 1.0 was better for men, children, and arguable for women, but not by much. But Marriage 0.0 was what humanity experienced for most of recorded history up until about the 15th Century. It was a partnership between men and women in an effort to survive in a world of grinding poverty and near constant hunger. It gave both access to in-laws with resources and power. The woman produced children who soon added to the family workforce increasing the change of survival for everyone. The man offered protection for his wife and children. Survival was the goal and both stood a better chance of surviving if they were married than single. In Marriage 0.0, you married for resources and connections, not 'love.' For a good history of marriage read Marriage a History by Stephanie Coontz. Eye opening. She doesn't use the term Marriage 2.0 and doesn't address men's issues to any extent but does a reasonable job at discussing the evolution of the institution of marriage.

Marriage has always been about regulating property, sex, and child rearing. It is a set of legal rules that govern how property, and status is handed down from generation to generation. But, because it is a set of legal rules, it allows the state, and church, and other special interests to modify those rules for the benefit of certain groups at the expense of others. OK. Now what?

The problem isn't Marriage 2.0. The problem is marriage in general. But society has to have marriage in order to survive. Right? Maybe not.

The Na is a society of about thirty thousand people in current day southwestern China. With the Na, there is no marriage. Brothers and sisters live together, jointly raising, educating, and supporting the children of the sisters. Sibling relationships are valued and longlasting. Sexual relationships and love affairs are informal and far less important than the sibling relationships. Trained anthropologists have established that some of these sibling-based households have lasted for ten or more generations. Brothers and sisters are practically inseparable. Yet there is no incest. That is a very strong taboo among the Na.

Na babies come from casual romantic encounters. The father has no responsible and no rights to his child. It is the siblings, not spouses, who pool economic resources and share the responsibilities of child raising.

A Na household can consist of a large number of individuals: the siblings, the children of the sisters, mothers, aunts, and uncles of the siblings, and maybe a few great grandmothers, great aunts, and great uncles. Children need both male and female adult role models as they mature. A household with many adult role models generally produces happier and healthier children. The single parent family offers the child a very narrow view of what it is to be an adult and children from such families suffer as a result.

With the Na there is no marriage and no divorce. There is no alimony. The rape issue is mitigated to some extent by the fact that any women will have several brothers and uncles looking after her. Men have no rights or responsibilities to their children. There is no child support. Na men do however have a responsibility to help raise the children of their sisters. These children carry 25% of the genes that make the man unique. He can be certain of that. A married man (in the absence of DNA testing) can never be quite sure that the children he is struggling to support carry any of his DNA.

To know that a thing is possible is half the battle to making it real. The Na have proved that a stable society can exist without marriage. It provides a way for men to have women and children in their lives without having to deal with the legal institutions that have sprung up to regulate marriage.

It is a very different approach to the question of family, procreation, and sex but one worth pondering. Clearly Marriage 2.0 is unsustainable in the long term. Something must replace it. If not the Na approach then what? If you don't like the options available to you, then build another. Men have always been good at that and humanity is much better off because of it.

DV Fakers are Shortchanging the True Victims

careyroberts · 23 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

We should all be concerned about the ongoing epidemic of intimate partner violence. But the March 9 edition of the cheeky Village Voice casts a spotlight on the sordid under-belly to the abuse issue – the problem of scammers who finagle besieged public benefit programs by making a false accusation of partner violence.

The cover story, Ten Worst Tenants by Elizabeth Dwoskin, calls out the hoarders and fraudsters who exasperate, deceive, and torment other tenants and honest-dealing landlords. And fourth on her list are the Domestic-Violence Fakers.

Dwoskin first introduces us to Latonya Malone, 26, who earns $35,000 working as a security guard in Manhattan. Ms. Malone wanted to move into nicer digs – but for a person of her means, these could only be had by qualifying under the HUD Section 8 housing voucher program.

So Malone seized on a bright idea: Claim to be a victim of domestic violence, which would move her to the front of the line. So she got a bogus restraining order that claimed a fictitious "John Brown" had beaten her.

Last October Malone was charged with grand larceny for allegedly stealing government subsidies valued at $14,000. The case is now pending.

Reporter Dwoskin then recounts the story of Chevelle Richardson who filled out a fabricated incident report for daughter Chandera. Then she forged a letter from the Safe Horizon abuse shelter.

Chevelle, Chandera, and four other women were arrested last year for falsely claiming to be victims of domestic violence.

Rose Gill Hearn, commissioner of the NYC Department of Investigation, finds these cases to be repugnant. "I mean, there are real victims of domestic violence out there," she exclaims.

It's not hard to figure out why DV fakers have become a problem — and the scent of the trail leads all the way to our nation's capitol.

On January 5, 2006, President George Bush signed into law the Violence Against Women Act. The law, commonly known as VAWA, contains a provision that domestic violence does not qualify as a serious or repeated violation of a rental lease, and thus does not constitute good cause to terminate the victim's tenancy rights.

The provision makes perfect sense – after all, who would ever want to see a victim of battering turned out to the streets?

But exactly what is "domestic violence"? Under VAWA, partner violence is viewed in vague terms, including the use of tactics designed to "gain or maintain power and control."

No one exactly knows what "power and control" means, so agencies resort to broad criteria that qualify almost everyone. For example in many states, applicants for the welfare Family Violence Option are asked if they have been subjected to "mind games" or have ever felt "emotionally abused."

Other agencies employ similarly broad criteria. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control provides these examples of partner abuse:

1. "getting annoyed if the victim disagrees"
2. "withholding information from the victim"
3. "disregarding what the victim wants."

Getting annoyed…ignoring what a person wants…that's domestic violence?

So when the man or woman applies for Section 8 housing, the person only needs to fill out form HUD-91066, Certification of Domestic Violence, Dating Violence, or Stalking. The government form instructs the applicant, “In your own words, describe the incident.” No police records, photographs, medical documents, or eyewitness accounts are required.

No surprise, a tsunami of would-be “victims” of partner violence is swamping besieged welfare programs.

And the real victims are finding it difficult to get help. In some parts of the country, abuse shelters report a 3-month waiting list. That’s because the facilities are filled with homeless persons claiming to be victims of abusive “mind control” tactics.

The true victims are furious, of course. An advocacy group known as Survivors in Action has started a petition demanding that domestic violence groups be held “accountable for refusing victims the resources and services they desperately need.” To date, over 11,000 male and female victims have signed on: http://apps.facebook.com/causes/petitions/201?m=a4681d42

If resources were ever-flowing, we might be able to dismiss the Domestic Violence Fakers as a pesky distraction. But in an era of shrinking budgets, turning a blind eye to this practice is tantamount to a betrayal of the truly vulnerable.

And for the persons who are falsely accused — usually men — we are doing them a grave disservice as well.

It's a Personal Issue

W.F. Price · 23 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of the reasons I think we're going to eventually succeed in turning around the worst of the feminist excesses is that the monster they've reared has touched many of us personally. For the last generation or so more and more men have faced tragedies as a consequence of the biases of the family court system. Most of these men are still middle aged or younger, and the numbers are growing every day. Fatherlessness has become something of a national shame, and the old "blame it on the men" schtick is pretty worn out by now.

That said, I'm dealing with it myself – again – as my ex has recently declared she intends to remove my children from the US to live with the man she had an affair with, ending our marriage. I don't know whether she can pull it off or not, but I have to put some effort into dealing with it in the most effective manner possible — if she can move them I will need an ironclad parenting plan to ensure that she doesn't cut me off from my kids, who are still very young, permanently.

So while I intend to keep the volume of content at the same level on The Spearhead, my own contributions might be a little less frequent for a short period of time as I prepare for another legal marathon. I'd like to thank contributors for keeping a flow of posts coming in recently, and encourage them to keep it up. As always, I'll be here keeping an eye on things, but the mental energy I dedicate to writing will be partly directed elsewhere for a little while as I work out a strategy to remain a father to my children. Being a parent is never easy – especially in these circumstances – but I owe it to my kids to hang in there for them.

In the meanwhile, I'm sure we'll have a lot of good stuff coming in to keep readers engaged. As for my pending posts, I'm considering writing a few primers on the issues of international child abduction and relocation, because I expect to become something of an expert on it soon, but I'll have to keep it rather general — I don't intend to get into the specifics of my own case. Nevertheless, it is a real problem, and the 1996 Hague Convention, which addresses this issue, is still quite new. In the West, it is overwhelmingly fathers who are victims of child abduction and alienation from their children, so this is very much a relevant men's issue. So in the long run, I expect this latest hassle to result in yet more inspired content. That is really the strength of The Spearhead: every challenge simply provides fresh motivation, momentum and resolve.

A Feminist Regrets Free Sex–Sort Of

Naomi Wolf circa 2000

Naomi Wolf of Algore beta-male-rehab fame, author of such feminist and left-illiberal (aka secular leftist) books such as Promiscuities[image], The Beauty Myth[image], Misconceptions[image], and The End of America,[image] and feminist third waver, seems to have been moderating her rhetoric in her advancing age (born in 1962, she will be 50 next year). Moderating so much, in fact, that she even publicly questioned (HT: Gorbachev) in an anti-pornography article penned in 2008 for the New Yorker, a foundational tenet of feminism–the free expression (i.e., availability) of women's sexuality as a key element of authentic liberation and true autonomy:

> [D]oes all this sexual imagery in the air mean that sex has been liberated—or is it the case that the relationship between the multi-billion-dollar porn industry, compulsiveness, and sexual appetite has become like the relationship between agribusiness, processed foods, supersize portions, and obesity? If your appetite is stimulated and fed by poor-quality material, it takes more junk to fill you up. People are not closer because of porn but further apart; people are not more turned on in their daily lives but less so. The reason to turn off the porn might become, to thoughtful people, not a moral one but, in a way, a physical- and emotional-health one; you might want to rethink your constant access to porn in the same way that, if you want to be an athlete, you rethink your smoking. The evidence is in: Greater supply of the stimulant equals diminished capacity. After all, pornography works in the most basic of ways on the brain: It is Pavlovian. An orgasm is one of the biggest reinforcers imaginable. If you associate orgasm with your wife, a kiss, a scent, a body, that is what, over time, will turn you on; if you open your focus to an endless stream of ever-more-transgressive images of cybersex slaves, that is what it will take to turn you on. The ubiquity of sexual images does not free eros but dilutes it.

That a feminist opposes pornography is not all that surprising, as the feminist camp itself is widely split on this subject. Some find it a liberating expression of women's sexuality, others take solace in the power that porn gives women over sex-hungry men, while still others decry the objectification of the female form for a mostly male audience (while remaining mute or evenly begrudgingly supportive of the female-objectifying porn consumed by women).

It is also unsurprising to see Wolf characterize pornography's adverse affects on men and women according to an Enlightenment model of man that splits his spiritual nature from his rational/corporeal nature. This is straight-up liberalism at its finest, ignoring that man is at heart a spiritual creature and not merely an evolved bag of molecules all vibrating in unison. This stunted and reductionist philosophy also permits her to run down spiritual arguments against pornography–e.g., "thoughtful people" do not oppose porn for "moral" reasons–while elevating the physical rationale against porn–e.g., "thoughtful people" may oppose porn for its adverse effects on "physical- and emotional-health". This stunted and reductionist philosophy also permits her to set aside the true purpose of sexuality–to bring male and female humans together as one flesh, a more complete creature in the image of God–and instead focus on the industrial aspects of sex, the rubbing of genitalia, and the release of bonding chemicals such as oxytocin. This to Wolf was a key reason to oppose porn, because it inhibited the formation of high-quality relationships between actual men and actual women, not because it was inherently wrong in and of itself.

But what I found quite interesting about Wolf's article was how she favorably described the quite retro habits of Orthodox Jews (one of the very few fundamentalist religious groups seen as "cool" enough to receive positive mention by the left-illiberal intelligentsia) and their requirement for women to be modest in their expression of sexuality:

> I am not advocating a return to the days of hiding female sexuality, but I am noting that the power and charge of sex are maintained when there is some sacredness to it, when it is not on tap all the time. In many more traditional cultures, it is not prudery that leads them to discourage men from looking at pornography. It is, rather, because these cultures understand male sexuality and what it takes to keep men and women turned on to one another over time—to help men, in particular, to, as the Old Testament puts it, "rejoice with the wife of thy youth; let her breasts satisfy thee at all times." These cultures urge men not to look at porn because they know that a powerful erotic bond between parents is a key element of a strong family.
> And feminists have misunderstood many of these prohibitions.
> I will never forget a visit I made to Ilana, an old friend who had become an Orthodox Jew in Jerusalem. When I saw her again, she had abandoned her jeans and T-shirts for long skirts and a head scarf. I could not get over it. Ilana has waist-length, wild and curly golden-blonde hair. "Can't I even see your hair?" I asked, trying to find my old friend in there. "No," she demurred quietly. "Only my husband," she said with a calm sexual confidence, "ever gets to see my hair." When she showed me her little house in a settlement on a hill…the sexual intensity in the air was archaic, overwhelming. It was private. It was a feeling of erotic intensity deeper than any I have ever picked up between secular couples in the liberated West.
> And I thought: Our husbands see naked women all day—in Times Square if not on the Net. Her husband never even sees another woman's hair.

It is interesting to note that Wolf sees the wisdom in feminine modesty and the destructive power of pornography on the fabric of relationships between men and women. She even correctly observes the link between Western women's immodest dress and the devaluation of women's sexuality. Yet for all these correct perceptions, she cannot shake off her feminist programming. She could not reject the feminist imperative that claims women achieve "power" through the unfettered expression of their sexuality. She was also apparently unable to bring herself to suppress the hardwired female tendency toward sexual display to attract the sexual attention of a male, that women become "hot" by flooding the environment around them with their sexual signals, oblivious to the fact that the trade-off for such sexual advertisement is the cheapening of the sexuality of all females. Thus we see Wolf completely unable to recognize the slippery slope inherent in "just a little" expression of sexuality. Humans, by our sinful natures, will push boundaries, and "just a little" sexuality will, over time, explode into full-on pornography.

It also comes as no surprise to me that Wolf comes out grudgingly against visual porn,* and would presumably act to stifle it if given the chance, while remaining absolutely mute on the female modesty issue that gives birth to visual porn in the first place. This even though she fully admits that the men around her are assailed by sexual imagery all day long. What is porn, if not packaged and commodified sexual imagery a degree slightly more explicit than one may see simply by taking a stroll down to the marketplace? Thus, when it comes to limiting women's autonomy, even if doing so would be to serve women's physical and mental health in the long run, Wolf finds herself unable to recommend that women's sexuality be put back into the place where it belongs…as a gift to her husband and husband alone.

* As I have observed is typical for most women, not a single mention of "romance fiction"–in other words, emo porn–and its deleterious effects on men's and women's relationship is made in Wolf's anti-porn article. Granted, it is a bit off the subject, but I'd be willing to bet that Wolf's Orthodox friend doesn't consume that sort of porn either, both for the moral as well as the physical and mental tolls it exacts.

I do not think porn is on the whole helpful. But as porn takes, it also evidently gives, as Chuck Ross at Gucci Little Piggy observed the other day, in a post about how the availability of porn seems to decrease rape rates. Yes, you read that correctly…there may be an upside to porn in the sense that porn availability helps sate the appetites of otherwise sex-deprived men and therefore tamp down sexual assault. On this point, Wolf agrees, stating:

> So Dworkin was right that pornography is compulsive, but she was wrong in thinking it would make men more rapacious…the effect is not making men into raving beasts. On the contrary: The onslaught of porn is responsible for deadening male libido in relation to real women. Far from having to fend off porn-crazed young men, young women are worrying that as mere flesh and blood, they can scarcely get, let alone hold, their attention. [Women] can't compete, and they know it.

Thus it is that those like myself who generally tend to take a dim view on porn, both visual and emo, may be convinced to take a more circumspect view of it, for as the sexual market place has been stood on its ear by unleashed female hypergamy, serial polyandry, constant female sexual advertisement, and alpha male/jerk/thug harem-building, in comes porn to release the sexual pressure of those frustrated deltas, gammas, and omegas who find themselves unable to secure the attention and durable fidelity of a flesh and blood woman.

careyroberts · 24 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In ringing prose, President Barack Obama underscored his March 9, 2009 Memorandum on Scientific Integrity with this promise: “Under my administration, the days of science taking a back seat to ideology are over…To undermine scientific integrity is to undermine our democracy.”

As luck would have it, Attorney General Eric Holder issued a statement a few months later designed to spotlight the issue of domestic violence. In Holder’s own words, “Disturbingly, intimate partner homicide is the leading cause of death for African-American women ages 15 to 45.”

Turns out this statement is not one-sided or misleading. It’s flat-out wrong.

Go to the website of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control. There you can fire up the WISQARS (“whiskers”) search engine to glean the leading causes of death for any age group, race, sex, geographical region, or year: http://webappa.cdc.gov/sasweb/ncipc/leadcaus10.html

So I entered the data to match Holder’s proclamation – African-American women in the 15-45 year age range. In 2007, the women’s leading causes of death were:

1. Cancer
2. Heart disease
3. Accidents (unintentional injuries)

Thinking something must be wrong, I fiddled with different years – same result. Domestic violence homicides didn’t make the list.

This factual boo-boo came to light in a February 4 USA Today column by Christina Hoff Sommers. Calling on Holder to remove the misstatement “immediately,” the essay enumerated the harms wrought by such wrongful assertions.

“Misinformation leads to misdirected policies that fail to target the true causes of violence,” Dr. Sommers declared. “Worse, those who promulgate false statistics about domestic violence, however well-meaning, promote prejudice. Most of the exaggerated claims implicate the average male in a social atrocity.”

What’s more, these claims are exploited by dictatorial regimes to buttress antiquated human rights policies. “In Europe almost 70% of housewives are beaten by their husbands,” Iranian President Ahmadinejad once asserted, absurdly.

Columnist Paul Elam highlighted another cause for worry: “The danger here, of course, is that by telling African American women that the leading cause of their death is IPV [intimate partner violence], we are minimizing and helping them ignore the things that really are killing them.”

Eric H. Holder was sworn in as the 82nd Attorney General of the United States on February 3, 2009. Four months later, I happened to attend a speech by the newly-confirmed law enforcement head. Still basking in the afterglow of his controversial confirmation, Mr. Holder spoke condescendingly how the Bush Administration’s Department of Justice had been reflexively smitten by a narrow ideology.

And under his leadership, Holder pledged to the crowd, the faded luster of the DoJ would soon be restored. That was two years ago.

I cannot fault Mr. Holder for his factual hiccup. After all, public officials make statements every day, and they can’t be expected to fact-check each jot and tittle of every speech. And I am not going to suggest that Mr. Holder was intentionally thumbing his nose at President Obama’s Presidential Memorandum on Scientific Integrity.

But now the truth of the matter has come to light and the harm caused by this intellectual flim-flam cataloged. Mr. Holder needs to assure the claims and policies of his department are rooted in scientifically-verifiable fact, not ideologically-driven cant.

Act now, Mr. Holder, to protect the integrity, the professionalism, and the good name of the Department of Justice.

(Warning: this is a very long post because it deals with a lot of issues which can be very subtle and can't be done justice in a handful of sound bites.)

Every once in a while we have experiences which allow us to integrate a number of vague observations into a flash of insight. Previously held ideas fall away and are replaced by a new understanding of something which had made no sense to us as long as we held onto our old beliefs. It is that "aha" moment which allows a quantum leap in understanding of a problem or issue and seeing it in an entirely new way. An example often used to illustrate this experience of sudden insight is Sir Issac Newton's moment when he perceived an apple falling from a tree as "the apple and the earth falling toward each other."

I had such a moment regarding the topic of sexual relations back in the late 90s. It was not a spontaneous revelation by itself, but rather the culmination of years of dealing with a certain woman and how her behavior eventually forced me to abandon a lot of the beliefs I had once held.

One concept you will see mentioned frequently in the manosphere is the concept of "the narrative." It is very important for men to understand the narrative and how it has been used by the cultural Marxists to create a belief system which is totally contrary to reality, but is so relentlessly pushed that it actually overrides reality and people's real experiences. It is at the heart of Political Correctness – what is socially acceptable takes precedence over what is real.

Today we live in a world controlled by the feminist narrative. Feminist theories about the nature of the world and human interactions are ruthlessly enforced through social attack against anyone who dares speak the truth. Most readers here will be familiar with the case of Larry Summers being hounded out of his job as president of Harvard for even daring to suggest that there might be innate differences between men and women. Despite mounting evidence that this is true, it is a truth none dare speak – like "the emperor has no clothes."

Today men are faced with a situation like seeing a picture of the ice palace in the film "Dr. Zhivago", while the narrator's voice-over says something like -

"And the blistering heat and brutal drought continued unabated."

We see examples of the feminist narrative around us all the time – "men have 'oppressed' women for 10,000 years, and now it is payback time", "gender is just a social construct and women are capable of anything men are, as long as we have affirmative action, reduced standards for women, and a huge body of law and government enforcement on our side", "women STILL only make 75 cents for every dollar men make, not because of women's choices, but because the dreaded 'pay-tree-arc-keeee' is holding them down."

One of the best recent examples is the Duke Rape Hoax. The accuser was a stripper, drug addict, child abuser, and later arsonist, who in any sane society would have been considered a low life with zero credibility. But, the narrative of the inherently moral and pure woman, "oppressed" by "privileged" young white males from affluent families, trumped even photographic evidence of one of the accused being somewhere else when the fictitious "rayyyype" supposedly occurred.

False rape accusations depend entirely on a narrative and body of lies which women have worked relentlessly for the past 4 decades to establish and promote – males as the "designated initiators" and females as inherently pure sexless beings who only engage in sex because those dastardly men pressure them into it, and who, of course, would never, NEVER, NEVER lie about it. Males are cast as the villains in the narrative, as the "designated initiator" in any sexual interaction between a male and female – even those cases of adult women statutorily raping boys. Instead of being seen as the targets of sexual predators that they really are, such boys and young men are viewed as "getting lucky" – even in those cases where teenagers are forced to pay child support to their own rapists.

One of my biggest concerns as an MRA is this stereotype of men that we are saddled with as mindless horny beasts in a perpetual state of rut. False accusations are so easy to make against us, and so easy to make stick, because so many many people subscribe to the narrative and are incapable of comprehending that the reality is much different and more nuanced.

More than 30 years ago, feminists escalated their campaign to criminalize male sexuality. Rape on one side and "pornography" on the other became the twin sticks to beat men with for their misfortune of being born with a powerful instinct to be attracted to women. It was the perfect sting operation. The only better way to trap more men would be to somehow make breathing simultaneously shameful and criminal. The crusade by feminists like Andrea Dworkin and Catherine MacKinnon to make laws and the legal system conform to females' subjective whims started by claiming that porn led directly to rape. Thus, it was justified to suppress porn in order to "protect women" from these horny beasts that the narrative claimed all men were.

Now, 3 decades later, we have Naomi Wolf toeing the feminist party line that porn is bad, but now for the opposite reason – instead of making men have too much desire for women as Dworkin hallucinated, it is now bad because it makes men have too little interest in women. Women are now being harmed by men's indifference. But, in the hierarchy of atrocities, a crime of omission is seldom considered as bad as a crime of commission.

There were many comments in response to Elusive Wapiti's recent post, pointing out that it isn't as much that porn pulls men away from women as it is that women themselves have driven men away from themselves and porn is just a conveniently available substitute. As always, women seek to place the blame outside them themselves and their own choices and behavior, and project it onto men or some vague concept.

It certainly does seem true that women in general just are not capable of grasping cause and effect. And, more than anything else this one phenomenon explains their senses of powerlessness and helplessness. If I understand that something I am doing is bringing about the results that I am getting, either positive or negative, then that gives me the power to adjust my behavior to get the results I want. But, having any power at all requires a sense of responsibility – "What I do affects the results I get, therefor I have power to affect my results by choosing appropriate actions." But, people who absolute refuse to take any responsibility give up any chance at having power because they then have to change the entire rest of the world, and all the other people in it. Not bloody likely to happen.

I used to believe that women understood this. In fact, I had a very hard time grasping that anyone could be stupid enough to not understand it. If you point a gun at your foot and pull the trigger, you are gong to end up with one badly hurt foot. Don't want a hurt foot? Then don't point a gun at it and pull the trigger. Simple, right?

Ah, never underestimate the power of the Rationalization Hamster.

Over the years I have watched woman after women determinedly follow her hamster until it totally screwed up her life, and the lives of a lot of people who were involved with her. Here at the Spearhead you will see story after story about women doing this. Throughout my life I have watched women as they destroyed relationship after relationship, even marriage after marriage, simply by being so self-centered and self absorbed that they just used people up and those people got tired of allowing themselves to be used. And, it would be bad enough if they only screwed up their own lives – but most of them leave the carnage of a debris field a mile wide and a totally scorched earth in their wake. They affect not only their own relationships, but the relationships of people whose lives they touch as well.

This is the story of one such woman. It isn't about an ex-wife or GF of mine, but about the ex-wife of a buddy of mine – one of the women I detest most among all that I have met. I've been wanting to tell this story for a long time, because it cuts across so many of the issues we grapple with here at the Spearhead. What spurred me to get down and write it all out was Elusive Waipiti's recent post about how the pornification of western culture has affected relationships between men and women. The point I am making is that a man doesn't even need to be intimately involved with a woman directly in order to get ensnared by "the narrative."

I'll call them Dick and Jane. Dick was my best buddy for years and years – close to 25 years in all. We had almost perfectly overlapping interests and hobbies, and really enjoyed spending time together pursuing our mutual interests. We could go into one of our darkrooms at 6 in the evening, and come out at 4 in the morning, and have a sense that almost no time had passed. After the normal string of replaceable girlfriends for men our age in those days, he met Jane and things seemed to be going in the right direction for them.

They got married back in the early 80s and ended up having what people called a "starter marriage". It lasted about 4 years. She was driven, ambitious, and wanted to make a lot of money. He didn't need to stop to smell the roses, he considered smelling the roses his full-time occupation and only went to work to make enough money to be able to do that. He was so "laid back" that he made most type Bs look like type As. He had been my buddy for years when they got married, and I stood up with him as his best man.

They didn't have any kids, so at the fatal 4 year mark, when they couldn't think of any good reasons to stay married, they didn't.

After they had separated, but before the divorce was final, he told me she was coming back to stay with him (he got the house, because this was during the killer interest rates period, and the house would have sold for much less than they paid for it.)

"Oh?" I asked. "Yes, she is having a 'problem with her breasts' and has to have some surgery, and is going to stay here and I'm going to take care of her after the surgery." he told me.

(" 'Problem with her breasts?!?!?!' OH SHIT! BREAST CANCER!!!!!)

Except, it wasn't. The first time I saw her after the "surgery", I saw that the "problem" had been that she had been an A cup, when she wanted to be a C, or at least a B+. After she had moved out again, I confronted him – "Hey, dude, we have been friends for a long time, and I thought close ones. Why did you lie to me about the fact she was getting fake boobs?!?!"

"I didn't know anything about it until I picked her up from the hospital" he told me. That should have been the first telltale clue about her real personality.

Anyway, the marriage was over at that point. She went west and he went east. I kept in contact with him, and through him heard about her once in a while. It was one of those supposedly very civilized 80s divorces where they parted company with no real hard feelings – it "just didn't work out."

Chapter 2 -

About 10 years went by. She got married again, and he lived with a couple of women for short periods. Then, one day I got a call from him. Both of them were going to "happen" to be in town at the same time, and wanted to get together. So, we made arrangements to have dinner and a night on the town together – kind of an "old times" thing. A platonic woman friend of mine went with us and saw right through them, even though I fell for their lie. "They are having an affair" she said. "Nah," I said, "she's gotten married again and they managed to divorce without hating each other, so I can understand them remaining friends."She looked at me with one of those "you are such a sucker" looks.

She was right, and I soon caught them in a lie and confronted them on it, and the whole story came out. Her husband had no interest at all in her sexually, so she had approached her ex (the safest man in the world for her considering the circumstances) about having an affair. He had never gotten over the sense of failure regarding their marriage, and jumped at the chance to "win her back."

They had been going at it for about 3 months when this took place, and within another month or 2 he had applied for a job transfer to the area where she lived. Since I lived between the 2 locations, he got me to help him move.

I spent a few days hanging out with him after we got there and got the truck unloaded, which also meant hanging out with her a lot. The topic she most wanted to talk about was how bewildered she was that her current husband didn't want her sexually, in front of the ex-husband who was doing everything the could to "win her back", including listen to this drivel of her whining about another man.

I felt both a bit sorry for him and a bit disgusted by him – where the hell was his backbone? But, hey, he was a Niceguy™ and thought that if he was nice enough that would turn the tide in his favor. Today I would send him to read Roissy.

The 3 of us ended up going out to eat together most nights that I was there. I have no idea what she told her husband about where she was (or if he even cared, which I was beginning to suspect he might not) but she was spending almost every evening with my buddy, and since we had once been friends in the habit of doing things together we fell right back into that pattern. Only this time the difference was that the topics of conversation she wanted to talk about were almost exclusively the problems she was having in her marriage – with her ex-husband playing the role of her emotional tampon, and me as an annoyed and impatient 3rd wheel observer.

One evening during dinner she made some statement about the "political differences" between her and her husband. I was operating in that "yadda, yadda, autopilot" mode that men often adopt with women and nodding my head like I was actually listening to what she was saying and offering appropriate cues for uninterrupted verbal output whenever she paused. So, I asked "What sort of political differences?" (mistake on my part, I know – I can only say in my defense that I was only listening to her drone on and not really thinking about what she was saying.)

"Well, let me give you an example" she said. "If a woman goes into a bar wearing sexy clothes and no panties and later gets raped, did she 'ask for it'? "

I was in full bore MRA mode in those days, so I was neither going to let that pass nor play into it. I could tell that she was stacking the deck like a typical feminist with her addition of the "no panties."

After much discussion, and using the example of me going into a poor part of town and waving around a handful of $100 bills just to rub in people's faces that I had something they wanted and didn't have and that they might just decide to knock me in the head and take it from me, I finally forced her to concede that if the hypothetical woman had acted differently that, yes, she would have experienced a different outcome.

But, the hamster was not going down without a fight, and she finished lamely "BUT, I still think a woman 'should' be able to go anywhere she wants, wearing anything she wants, and do anything she wants, and still not have anything bad happen to her."

I took that statement as an admission of defeat.

But, that was back in the days when I was in full-bore MRA jihad mode, and I had had a belly full of her pissing and moaning about her current husband and how he didn't want her, in front of her ex-husband, who at that time I still considered a close friend, who was desperately trying to woo her back and was in full-bore AFC/emotional tampon mode, so I was going to shove her bullshit back down her throat.

I asked what the hell was the woman doing in the bar in the first place – attention-whoring and hustling attention and free drinks, obviously.

Male "attention" is not "free" and women are not "entitled" to be the center of male attention the way many of them seem to think they are. They are playing a high risk game which will sometimes get them hurt, and very often will incur the hostility and animosity of men. A woman who attracts male attention by wearing low-cut tops forfeits the right to bitch about men paying attention to her tits, because all of her actions are designed purely for the purpose of attracting attention. A woman who goes into a bar dressed to attract male attention – down to shoving her panty-less twat in men's faces in a gesture that is as old as time and has always meant "mate me" – is not going to be able to maintain absolute control over exactly what kind of attention she gets and who she gets it from. By acting as she did, she is taking a risk.

But, typically feminist (or FEMININE-ist) Jane absolute refused to even see the way that the woman actually had power over the situation – by acting differently she would have certainly gotten different results. And there is the core of the sore point – you are always hearing women demand how MEN have to change, and the whole world has to change, so that they can do whatever they want to and still get the results they want to get. But, the world does not work that way – never has and never will – and the fact that it doesn't is not some plot men have hatched for the purpose of frustrating women.

Men are not warm-blooded vibrators who exist for women to flip on and off like light switches purely for women's entertainment. We are human beings with our own set of needs, and will keep demanding that women respect those needs as long as they continue to refuse to do so.

What Jane is talking about and committing is interpersonal fraud at the most fundamental level. It is essentially the same as a man who lies through his teeth and says "I love you" frequently just to get women to sleep with him. People who play that sort of vicious exploitive game have already violated the social contract of mutual civility, and thus do not deserve to have the benefit of it keeping them safe.

I responded to her hypothetical panty-less woman with 3 hypothetical men in the bar and pointed out to her how her beliefs and attitudes were contributing to the very pain that she was boring the shit out of me with having to listen to.

Man #1 is your typical naive "NiceGuy™" He hasn't seen enough of women to have wised up to the vicious games they play, so he reacts to the woman's mating display the way men are hard-wired to react. He is your basic AFC just waiting to be taken for a ride. He buys her a drink or two, she shuts him down and blows him off believing that she is just entitled to his attention and free drinks, and he slinks away feeling hurt and pissed off. Man #2 is your typical low-IQ semi-thug. He is the type of petty criminal who is poorly socialized, and considers selling meth or burglarizing houses to be perfectly acceptable vocations. He is already a criminal, so additional criminal behavior don't bother him one bit. Where the NiceGuy™ gets hurt and slinks away to lick his wounds, BadGuy™ decides to not let the bitch get away with jerking him around and decides to push the issue and make her deliver what she was seeming to promise.

Rape is a crime, and people who rape are criminally-minded. But, all this will get denied and swept away and NiceGuy™ will get blamed and branded a rapist for the event even though he was well socialized and did not commit a crime. The rape hysterics are doing something very evil, and in the long run very bad for women, when they do not differentiate between ordinary men and criminals. More on this later.

Which brings us to man #3. He is Jane's husband, and has seen this game being run before. He knows enough to know that the woman is committing sexual fraud to feed her inner attention-whore. So, instead of falling for the sexual scam she is running and allowing his instinctive and reflexive responses to be used to manipulate him, he shuts them down, turns his back on her, and turns his attention back to the ball game on the TV.

And, when he gets home, and Jane would now like a little bit of attention – on her schedule and strictly according to her demands – he remains shut down and wants nothing to do with her. So, rather than face being such a stupid bitch that her own husband doesn't want her, she goes out and cheats on him. But, remaining as gutless and dishonest as ever, she doesn't take the risk to put herself out on the open sexual marketplace and take the risk of having to compete with other women and possibly be rejected (she was, after all, at this point almost 50 years old). No, she approaches the safest man in the world for her, a man who still loves her enough that he would just about cut off his own arm rather than hurt her, and enlists his cooperation in cheating on her husband.

Am I managing to convey the depth of my contempt for this woman?

And, through it all, she cannot and will not step out of the narrative. The very concept that a man might shut down on women in general, or on a particular woman – her, for example – simply will not fit into her nicely furnished hamster cage.

Well, the day of my flight home finally arrived. She was going to take me to the airport and we had lunch before my flight. My eyes were not yet opened to the full depth of her game playing, and I bought the narrative that she was "confused and conflicted" about the whole thing. I laid it out for her and told her that I thought she was behaving in a reprehensible manner. "Don't keep playing these two guys off against each other" I said. "If you realize now that you made a mistake when you divorced Dick and want him back, then tell your husband that, and get a divorce, and marry Dick again. But don't keep playing these guys against each other in a bidding war to see who will offer you the better deal."

I could tell by the look on her face that I had hit nerve. I flew back home thinking she was one of the stupidest, vilest, most self-centered, cunts I had ever met in my life, and for all his good heart and being a Niceguy™, that he was dumber than dogshit to put up with her. But, stupid me, there was still enough of that damned Leo loyalty in me that I still saw her as a misguided friend and not as an evil selfish, self-centered bitch.

Well, my faith in her was justified in one respect – she would eventually help me over that hurdle.

Chapter 3 -

(and this is where the plot curdles)

Another 3 years or so go by, and she sends me an email that she is planning a big surprise party for his 50th birthday and since I was his best friend, she wants me to come. I was "between jobs" at the time, didn't want to spend the money, and not too hot on birthdays or her, so I declined.

Then, another friend of his that I had met started working on me. This guy stated that if I came, that Jane would dance naked. (they live on the left coast)

"Yeah. Right!" was my response. This woman was so sexually uptight that she would go to a beach or something like that, wear a 1 piece bathing suit out of the 50s, and still spend her time huddled up in a beach wrap. I expected the next thing the guy to do was try to sell me the Brooklyn Bridge.

They kept at me for several weeks and finally figured out that I was serious about not wanting to spend the money, so they finally offered to pay for my plane ticket. "Now, you're talking!"

It was Californication to the max. The "theme" of the party was "leather, lace, or nothing at all" and everyone there was either pretending to be a biker-wannabe or part of the nudist crowd. It was supposed to be a total surprise, so everyone hid in the next room when he showed up.

The ruse was that the 2 of them were going out to dinner with another couple. When he showed up, she started this elaborate game of "I planned something special for your birthday" and dropped the coat she was wearing to reveal that she was wearing nothing but a body stocking. Then, the female half of the other couple came in and dropped her coat, wearing nothing but a similar stocking. Of course, everyone was tittering over how excited Dick was going to be over the idea of a threesome with these 2 women.

At that point all the guests walked in shouting “surprise.”

The evening wore on with some of the most bogus, shallow, game playing I’ve ever had to endure. The women were all half or completely naked, and never got too far from their male SOs. There were enough single-unattached males there that the women got plenty of attention, but were perfectly safe from having to follow through on the reason they were getting it, because they had their protective husbands or BFs close at hand.

Many drinks into the evening, Jane stood up and started telling the story of getting me to the party. Of course, the idea that any man would pass up the chance to drop a few hundred bucks on a plane ticket and rush halfway across the country to watch any woman take off her clothes (including a 45-ish one with fake boobs and a saggy ass) was just too unbelievably funny.

Trapped in the narrative – any male of any age will of course spend any amount of money it takes to be able to see any woman naked.

It was my best buddy’s birthday, and I was a bit socially trapped – having been picked up at the airport and taken to a location I had no idea where it was, and dependent on these people for transportation and lodging – so I played along with the joke. I could have walked out, and if I had known in advance what shit she was going to pull, I probably would have walked somewhere and gotten a taxi to a motel and then one to the airport. But, there I was – so I played along.

“Show me the money!” I said.

She then went on to set the stage that she really was going to dance naked, but that she was going to “make him” (meaning me) “work for it.” The game was going to be Trivial Pursuit about Dick, since I supposedly knew him better than anyone else in the world. For every question I got right, she would take off one piece of clothing. She made a BIG deal out of exactly how many pieces of clothing she was wearing right then – which was 3 if you counted each of her shoes as a separate article, plus a totally see through body stocking which left her breasts, nipples, pubic hair, and even cameltoe, totally visible. (BIG, LONG, ELABORATE DRAMATIC buildup here – totally giving away her intention to do something unbelievably bogus)

So, the “game” commenced, with cheering squads for each “side.” Every time I missed a question, the women cheered, every time I got one right the men cheered and the women booed – the battle of the sexes in microcosm – Team Woman against Team Man, played like a sick version of the child’s game “keepway”with the sexuality of a woman in whom I had absolutely no interest being dangled as the “prize” – as the narrative dictates.

So, we got into the game with questions like “What is his niece’s pony’s name.” The funniest thing was that she was so drunk by this point, that she would ask me a question like this, and when I didn’t know it and she told the answer, she would come back and ask me the same question again – at which time I would give the answer she had just told me, and claim the “point.” The women always booed, but the guys stood by me – “asked and answered!”

So, I got about 12 points for 3 items of clothing. By her own rules she was going to end up completely naked. However, I had followed the running gag in the Peanuts cartoon strip about Charlie Brown, Lucy, and the football, long enough to know she was going to weasel out of it somehow.

She disappears for about half an hour with a couple of female helpers, then an accomplice cued her music and she made her grand entrance.

She must have brought a damn trunk full of clothes with her and put on every one of them. She left with 3 items of clothing on, and returned with about 30.

She started out dancing to a song from the movie “9 1/2 weeks” that Kim Bassinger danced to. By this time, she had had to get so drunk in order to do this at all that she was basically falling off her shoes.

I looked around at the people in the room cheering her on and thought to myself that if there had been one damn person in the room who cared about her even a little bit they would have dragged her out of there, stuck her head under cold running water, and slapped some sense into her.

But, that was the weirdest and saddest part of the whole macabre scene – not one person there cared enough about her as a person to intervene in her making a complete ass of herself. Obviously, she had manipulated me into a situation where I couldn't do it, and by this time I was pissed off enough at her that I probably wouldn't have even if I could have.

The dance ended at some point, with her wearing a hat, a pair of panties, and some sort of scarf arranged so that her fake boobs teased out without being actually "on display."

I wandered off to ponder what amazing insanities the human race is capable of and a little while later she sought me out.

"Are you having a good time?" she asked.

"Not really", I replied. "Being around all these nearly naked women with their men just makes me really aware of being here alone."

"WELL, at least you have all these beautiful ladies to look at"

What a glib cutoff and dismissal. In her unbelievable narcissism, she seemingly thought that because being looked at and having her ego fed by being the center of attention and being able to pretend that she was still 18, that gratifying her ego should be equally gratifying to me.

I made the simplest of human comments, that no, I really wasn't enjoying it, and she had to cut me off and silence that. A simple human gesture of understanding on her part would have made me feel very warm toward her, but what I got from her made me hate her guts.

Skankus Americanus. She played the victim game with her boob job by insinuating that she might have cancer, worrying the shit out of my buddy, and still her husband at that point in time. She pledged with complete sincerity to be his wife for life, and didn't live up to that for more than 4 years. She made the same pledge to another man, and when their differences (and behavior she supported other women in doing) resulted in him turning off on her, she sought out the safest man in the world to have an affair with (no risk for her, no way). She strung my buddy along for 4 more years playing on his hope that she might leave her gravy train (oops, I meant "husband") and come back to him. She "celebrated" his birthday by demeaning him over his sex drive and fantasies, played a bogus game she never had any intention on following through with, and when a man who she had known for 20 years and had been pretty much a friend that whole time told her that he really wasn't enjoying the whole charade, she blows him completely off in the belief that gratifying her ego should gratify him.

In a blinding flash of insight I grasped all at once what Ferdinand Bardmanu would later come to call "The Eternal Solipsism of the Female Mind." Every idea I had had about friendship, and how people conducted themselves toward people they called (or thought of as) "friends", got thrown out the window. Her utter and complete lack of conscience about using men in her life who were or had been her husbands, or anyone else within her circle of acquaintances, would have seemed cold blooded and ruthless if she had appeared to give it any thought. It was the complete lack of any thought or concern which was the most chilling and enlightening.

I realized then that she was simply incapable of regarding other people as human beings with thoughts, desires, and needs of their own, and simply regarded them as resources to use to gratify herself – much like someone might regard a tree as nothing more than a source of lumber to cut down and saw into planks to use to build a house or garage. She was incapable of regarding or dealing with people as people, and saw them merely as objects.

While my experience doesn't even come close to what some men have had to go through with divorces, or child custody fights, or false accusations, it still illustrates the need a lot of men have to TOTALLY rethink what they believe about women – and about other men as well.

- Epilogue –

Several months went by – close to a year – and I got an email from my buddy. They had taken me to the airport the day after the party and I had spent the flight back reflecting on what was one of the most bizarre events I had ever experienced in my life without pharmaceutical assistance. His email was just standard "hi, how you doing?" chit-chat. I wrote back and almost idly asked how things were going with him and Jane. He said that he hadn't seen her for about 6 months after the party and then she showed up again. At least he was no longer carrying a torch for her and had copped the attitude "If she shows up and wants to fuck, I will fuck her. But, if she doesn't that is fine, too – I have other women to spend my time with."

Well, if you have hung with me so far through this long prologue, here comes the punch line.

As usual, being a feminist, Naomi Wolf gets it all wrong. The "porn" that women really should be concerning themselves with is the kind walking around on stupid uncomfortable shoes all around us every day. It is the women shoving their tits, and panty-less twats, in men's faces, and absolutely demanding that none of the men that they do not want to react to them do so in any way – but if they do, calling it "rayyype" and "sexual harassment."

FEMININE-ism is about absolute and total control of the external environment by women who refuse to exercise any control over themselves. It is also about absolute and total control of men – demanding they not even think about being human beings, and instead exist only as manbots, whose only option is to follow the instructions given by women – always in the form of a sentence which includes the world "should" - with a grinning army of brain-dead manginas and White Knights as their enforcers.

Women, en masse, have been subjecting men to a sort of culture wide Ludovico technique, in which women are allowed, "empowered", to beat on men's instinctive reactions to female sexuality, and then clobber any man who reacts that they deem "unwelcome" with the full clout of the criminal justice system, destroy their careers, reputations, and everything they have worked in life to achieve. And, just like the ultimate anti-hero in the film, Alex, men begin to associate a stimulus they previously considered quite nice with nausea and all sorts of unpleasantness.

Like the old Aesop's fable about the boy who cried "wolf", women who dishonestly cry "wolf", or "rayyype", or "abuse", or "mate me", and lie about it eventually destroy all their credibility and people no longer believe them – even in those cases when it is true. That is the hidden long-term cost of using lies to manipulate other people to get what you want in the short term.

Unfortunately for men, the sex drive is extremely powerful. And, it takes a whole lot to suppress it. But, once a man masters the skill to do so, he immediately starts to reap lots of benefits. It makes him much more difficult to manipulate. He is able to evaluate women not on their sexual attributes, but on their character. And, he puts a layer of insulation between himself and a false rape accusation of the "he said, she said" type.

I contend that the real underlying cause of women and girls having to become so outrageous in flaunting their sexuality in order to get even a little bit of attention from men is women like Jane – who consider that it is a god-given right of women to shake men's trees, whether or not they actually want any of that man's peaches. It is the women shoving their tits, and their panty-less twats, in men's faces and then demanding, under threat of punishment by law, that those men not react as they hare hard wired to react, who force men to learn not to react even when those women change their minds and start wanting a particular man to react.

And, this totally solipsistic exploitation by men, and the women who support it, eventually erode away even the strongest of relationships. Jane went from being a woman that my buddy Dick would have done anything he possibly could to win back, to being a woman who he will fuck if she shows up and wants to fuck. TOS limitations prevent me from being totally candid about my opinion of this woman that I had thought was a friend for close to 20 years.

I have always believed that men would get through these social changes we are living through. I didn't think that women would like how men adapted, but I had no doubt that they would adapt. The problem for women is that they have thrown away their power base in exchange for unlimited "empowerment."

It does not matter that "NAWALT." Sooner or later we are going to have to face a cultural admission that SOME women really are like that, and that the ones who are can do a great deal of damage to the people around them – especially including the NAWALTs.

And, here is the core of that damage: not only do fewer men want those women at all, having been trained by walking pornography to shut down their desires, but to return to Jane's hypothetical woman – if she goes into a bar wearing sexy clothes and no panties, in order to use men's instinctive and reflexive reactions against them in order to feed their inner attention whores and get free drinks, and later gets raped…

… the question is not whether or not "she asked for it", but instead "who gives a shit?"

Women Don't Want A Revolution

Jack Donovan · 25 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Law student Jay Batman has recently challenged the readers of the "anti-authoritarian" blog Gonzo Times in a ballsy debate about feminism. He calls himself an "anarcho-misogynist" in this seminal essay:

Why I am an Anarcho-Misogynist

His posts and defenses contain some of the most lucid and inspired writing on contemporary gender conflict I've seen this year. Many of his co-authors and readers seem to be white-knighting him and regurgitating a lot of the received and unquestioned feminist ideology that is a given on the radical left. Jay Batman identifies as a libertarian, and as a lot of Spearhead readers seem to be libertarian to some degree, I think you'll find a lot to like.

Further, as still more readers—myself occasionally included—tend to take a "break the system and start over" approach to what appears to be Western decline, his interactions with left-anarchists will be educational. One follow up comment I found particularly interesting was this one, by the site's editor PunkJohnnyCash (who has a real spiffy moniker and avatar that I approve of):

> I made a post back in October asking why it seemed our ranks are full of mostly white males.

Comically, this is also a frequent topic of discussion on the far right. The simple answer is that the immediate interests of women–at least as most women perceive them–are being served by the status quo. Women were radical when they wanted radical change for themselves, but women pretty much got what they wanted. Most companies have anti-discrimination policies and females make up more than 50% of the work force. In fact, aside from a relative handful of ideological purists, women from Hanna Rosin to Oprah Winfrey are declaring victory everywhere. Rosie the riveter has come a long way, baby.

The popular complaints from feminists these days are that men aren't providing them with enough support, that men aren't committing fast enough, that men spend too long in "guyland" or that their men cook too well, or that their men have become "kitchen bitches." It is now men who are falling behind in many ways, and men on the far left seem to have trouble keeping up to date with their feminism. They're rushing to the defense of women who make more money than they do, using scripts that haven't changed since the 1970s. While I'm sure the anarchist left probably attracts more female participants than the radical right, it seems like they still feel like women aren't as interested.

Fewer women are interested in bringing down the system because more women like things just the way they are. They believe they have more to gain from a big government (free or affordable healthcare, entitlement programs, cheap and easy access to birth control and abortions and the means to force men to provide for their offspring through child support or welfare) than they do from toppling a state that offers security and promises them the opportunity to enjoy a nearly unprecedented quality of life. The glass ceiling doesn't much matter to everyday women with average IQs. The average woman is living higher on the hog in the postmodern, globalist, feminist, multiculturalist West than she ever has. The chaos of revolution puts all of that in jeopardy.

You say you want a revolution…

Yeah…well, women don't.

Below are links to the ongoing discussion.

The intent here is not to send a bunch of Spearhead readers to harass the readers of Gonzo Times. In fact, my personal preference is that they work through their own debate without some kind of external ideological conflict stoking the fire and putting everyone on the defensive. I just wanted to draw attention to this development and to Jay Batman's highly quotable writing. If anything, write him to show your support. He's obviously a smart guy, and not just because I generally agree with him.

Patriarchy, Porn and Rape: Mistakes of Feminism

Featured Guest · 26 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Gorbachev

Since the dawn of writing, men have said that it's not men who seek power, but women. There's a major kernel of truth in this, or it wouldn't be what every man instinctively feels.

"Rape is about patriarchy and is an attempt to maintain power over women" always struck me as obviously false, even as a callow, quasi-Marxist/feminist-college freshman. But if feminists were right about this, then they also had to be right about porn. Porn would objectify women and make rape worse. "Porn is the theory; rape is the practice".

Their conclusions seemed to defy my experience of what male sexuality was all about. Almost every other man I knew agreed with me; the ones who didn't had obvious motives for pretending to agree.

There's a very good reason why Dworkin and Mackinnon were dead wrong about the connections between rape/sex/porn/objectification/power. They weren't stupid; they were just mistaken. In fact, their analysis was often very clever and well-argued. Their logic followed, once they made the assumptions they did.

Their failure is interesting. But the process that got them to the wrong conclusion is also very illustrative, because it highlights one reason feminism makes mistakes.

The chief mistake was assuming male and female sexuality are identical, and then "Projecting" female motivations onto male motivations. This made it seem to them that Men were using Rape/Sex as a power play to take power from Women. Porn added fuel to the fire and helped men objectify women, and treat them as targets.

Men aren't primarily after power. They're after sex. Power and social status are just two of many tools that get you to Sex. On the other hand, women are genuinely interested in power, because power gives women what socially concerns them most: social status. Sex is a useful tool for the acquisition of status, but sex isn't usually a goal in its own right.

There's a good reason why these particular feminists missed this completely. They made an ideological error – assuming male and female sexual motivations are the same. They then made a human error- projecting their understanding of their own female sexual motivations onto males.

Rape and Power

Their conclusion, that men used rape as a tool to enforce Patriarchy as a power grab to keep women oppressed, was a natural conclusion and made perfect sense if their assumption was true – that men were primarily using sex to get social status and social power.

If their imagined "Patriarchy" had actually been a Matriarchy, they'd have been spot-on.

But men are simpler creatures, and the Dworkinites were way off base.

Rape isn't about power. It's about sex. (hence: prison rape)
Porn is not the "theory", and Rape the practice. In fact, by supplying sexual gratification, porn seems to dull the urge to acquire sex, and hence, the need to rape.

Naomi Wolf explores this and comes to the frustrating conclusion that porn is putting men off real sex with real women. That's a pretty damned sharp observation for a feminist to make.

MALE SEXUALITY

We want sex. That's pretty much the whole point of it. We may use sex to further this or that goal, and some men may love the power they feel, but most days, the goal is pretty much sex. If we do use sex to further a goal, beyond the further goal is usually more sex, often with, say, a more attractive woman. The fact that some men also enjoy dominating, controlling, or demeaning a woman doesn't change the reasoning.

You have to be a man to appreciate this: Men are interested in sex. Full stop.

More to the point, men often do other things mostly as a means of acquiring sex: work hard, make money, be creative, become famous – for sex. Younger girls, hotter girls, more girls. Get more sex. It's instinctive.

The more men disengage from the quest for access to real females and real sex, the more they tend to drop out of society, stop working hard, stop caring about social status, lose interest and just chill out.

The quest for sex makes men social. It makes them productive and it fosters creativity. Productivity and creativity are the tools they use to acquire social status and access to the females they desire. The desire for sex makes them develop and hone social skills, including the ability to reward (and deceive) women.

As interest in sex drops, so does the tendency to engage in violent behavior and the willingness to take risks among violent men. In all of this, the quest for sex is the primary goal. Everything else is just a means to that end.

Off-topic: The implications for productive economies as this aspect of male psychology plays out is not small. As men fail to find women and shuffle on with life, economies, tax bases and social mechanisms are going to start to decay.

HEALTHY MALE SEXUALITY

Here's a hard fact about men that women always try to either ignore or use for their own advantage:

Healthy, normal male sexuality physically objectifies women.

As visual-sexual animals, on a fundamental level, men absolutely objectify their women. Women are tools for sexual gratification. This is the very basis of "Maleness". Porn explores this in all its elemental glory.

If a woman doubts this, all she has to do is have sex with a man for any length of time to see the bald, naked facts for what they are.

Men also like emotional attachment, just as women do. We're not a separate species. But when you get right down to it, Woman as focus/object of sexual desire is what makes sex interesting to men. "Sensitive Man" is never more than a tactic to get sex by appearing agreeable, or a wallpaper-thin overlay on top of a seething cauldron of sexual objectification. The animal lurks under the skin, and it's not wearing very much.

The difference between gay and lesbian public culture shows this even more clearly.

women actually like it.

Feminists complain about it, but the fact of the matter is that most women instinctively know this truth about men. Not only do they know it, they're sexually stimulated by it. They may not want men looking at porn, but a woman wants her man to look at her that way.

This is cross-cultural. Even when it's considered "indecent", being objectified by (attractive) men reinforces a woman's sense of her own sexual power. An attractive woman who deals with men understands how powerful she is.
All of this is a result of the hard reality of male sexual objectification.

FEMALE SEXUALITY

Women can have sex for its own sake. They share the basic human sex drive with men. Women most definitely objectify men, sexually and otherwise.

However, by and large, women have a different distribution of priorities. They also use sex as a social tool and to further other goals.

Power

Obviously, women use sex to acquire power over and resources from men. This is the core social element of female sexuality: Men want it; women got it.

Men without access, or who don't have the access they want, suffer. But providing men with alternative access to females usually solves the problem in a way it doesn't for women. (Hello, prostitution).

Women also use sex to negotiate difficulties and smooth over social issues. That's something we share to a limited degree with other primates.

Many feminists rightly point out that relying on sexual power / using sexual power basically makes women dependent on men for validation or power. Worse, this power is transitory. Men like youth. Beauty fades: "she's old / ugly / a slut". But this is an old script, a script that is likely burned deep into our brains.

Women want power over the sexuality of the males in their lives.

This is the reason women dislike porn. Some hate it for ideological reasons, but most women dislike it because it disentangles men from females' perceived power. They also dislike prostitutes for the same reason. Most women are hypocrites. They hate prostitution, even when their own men don't pay for it, not because it demeans women, but because it threatens them. It reduces their personal sense of sexual power over men, especially the men in their lives, if men have options.

BAD ASSUMPTION

Some brands of feminism assumed, for ideological reasons, that with male and female sexuality, "Equal" meant "Identical". Some brands of feminism didn't. Some radical feminists saw male sexuality as inherently different and dangerous; others saw female sexuality as different, but complementary.

Rarely did any feminists seek to ask men what their experience of sexuality really was.

Some thought that male sexuality could be changed. A whole generation of men were raised to be sensitive and meek and understanding. And women have since gravitated wholesale to bad boys, because as we discover at some point, women aren't sexually attracted to the Nice, Sensitive Guy. They want Men.

The big mistake the Dworkinites made was to project their own experience (as females), using sex for power, onto their interpretation of Male motivations.

Men don't use sex to get power over others.
They use power over others to get sex.

If "patriarchy" exists, it exists largely for the purpose of regulating the sexuality of other men and their access to women– not of women. It's easy for women to miss this, especially feminists, because feminists only view men as objects, as oppressors or agents. They don't view them as both subjects and agents.

Men don't miss it. They know when other men are trying to control them, even if other men are using women to do it.

PROJECTION

Humans are always trying to work out why others do what they do, so we can predict their behavior. We see other people as tools to manipulate/use/be afraid of/ally with/ally against. A classic study of this in another species is Frans de Wal's book about the Arnhem Zoo chimp colony. Our "psychosocial processing modules" spend huge energy working out why others do what they do and what they're likely to do next.

As social primates, this occupies a truly vast portion of our brains. We are literally political animals. We're "natural psychologists", because most of the opportunities/obstacles in life involve other members of our own species.

A shorthand to figuring out what others do is to compare it to what you want/ need/ think, and then evaluate others based on your perception of yourself or your own desires. This "projection" works pretty well most of the time, because, by and large, humans are all very similar in their motivations. They're not identical, though, and the differences between individuals stick out. We notice them. Some of these differences are individual-level, others are in-group-level.

This clique of radical feminists just did what comes naturally to humans. They projected their own sexual natures onto men, and followed through with their analysis.

But it's women who seek power through sex, not men.

WHY RAPE?

When Mackinnon looked at male rapists, she engaged in projection of female sexual desire. Men want power over women! That's why they rape!

If this were true, why is prison rape so common?

All men, men with male sexuality, know why rape happens. It's this:

1) Remove inhibitions, remove future-time-orientation, remove respect for other people (including the male relatives of a woman), decrease self-control, maybe add in some sociopathy/psychopathy and a tendency to like violence, take away the social reasons to avoid assault ("she's a slut, I'm a Victim, I'm the son of a famous politician, I'm your boss") …

2) Throw in desire to have sex.

That's pretty much the whole explanation for rape.

There's no need for complex, elaborate Patriarchies Oppressing Women to explain it. Occam's Razor does quite nicely.

Feminism Reductio Ad Absurdum

A movie review of the film "Mars Needs Moms[image]".

I had the opportunity to take in the move Mars Needs Moms [wiki] the other day with S3. Adapted from the Berke Breathed illustrated short story of the same name[image], what I saw was a reasonably funny movie fit for kids, as well as an interesting commentary on the end result of feminism were it to be taken to its fully absurd extent. But before I delve into this absurdity, a quick summary of the storyline.

Warning: plot spoilers immediately follow.

Mars Needs Moms is a story about a fully matriarchal Martian society that abducts Terran (human) mothers to help raise Martian females to maturity. But there are several catches to this concept, provisos in which the movie's plot pivots around. First, only Terran mothers that discipline their children are selected for abduction. Those mothers who exhibit too much nurturing or who are not stern enough in their disciplining are not selected by The Supervisor. After abduction, the essence of these Terran mothers is extracted and used to program the nanny-bots intended to be used to raise the next generation of Martian females. Then, in the key event that lays the foundation for the climax of the film, the abducted mothers are incinerated using the focused energy of a Martian sunrise. The cycle repeats for each batch of hatchlings.

The tough-love mother of the movie's protagonist, Milo, is abducted by the Martians with the usual intent of transferring her disciplining personality to a nannybot. Milo stows aboard a Martian spaceship and journeys to Mars, where he meets a young Terran male named Gribble whose mother was also abducted by Martians. Orphaned on Mars, Gribble witnessed his mother's incineration as a young child and has resided in a state of arrested development ever since. Vowing to rescue his mother, Milo is aided by a Martian rebel named Ki who enjoys "tagging" the walls of the Martian city with fractal 1960s-vintage hippie imagery. In the process of rescuing his mother, Milo, Gribble, and Ki discover the ruins of a Martian civilization predating the rise of The Supervisors, and together upend Martian society by reuniting feral Martian males with civilized Martian women. After a scene that demonstrates Milo's mother's sacrificial love, Milo successfully rescues his mother and returns to Earth.

With the basic plot thus summarized, allow me to describe five ways in which the movie depicts fully realized dystopian feminism:

Feminist society may only persist by authoritarian force. In the movie, Martian society is wholly female and fully regimented. All Martians exist to serve the will of The Supervisor from cradle to the grave. The Supervisor's rule is ensured by an omnipresent internal security force (incidentally, the State has a monopoly on violence as well–which unsurprisingly enables the Supervisor to rule more or less unopposed). No freedom of thought or act is permitted, information is suppressed, and knowledge of Martian prehistory–that depicting nuclear families–is literally buried under the floor of the city.

Feminist societies cannot tolerate free will or even "choice". In an echo of Simone de Beauvoir's famous quip that "No woman should be authorized to stay at home and raise her children…because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one", no Martians are permitted to raise their hatchlings. This is the task for nannybots, for all Martians work outside the home.

A fully feminist creature is a stunted version of herself. Related to the point above, it is clear that Martian society is structured so that no Martian female is permitted to be a mother and is therefore not allowed to nurture her children. Each Martian drone has her task to perform, so presumably there is a class of Birthmothers somewhere who lay the eggs from which Martians hatch. Or perhaps The Supervisor herself lays the eggs. However Martian reproduction occurs, in not permitting Martians to raise their children, out of fear of them giving in to their innate urge to nurture, Martian society is unable to raise children with the discipline and authoritative nature necessary to be the drones the Martian social structure requires.

Males must be eliminated completely for a fully feminist society to be realized. This movie implements the feminist fantasy of a guy-free society to the hilt, and does so in nearly the most prejudicial manner possible: it literally (and quite symbolically) throws male hatchlings down the garbage chute. Rescued and raised by other males similarly discarded, these males clearly become the Morlocks to the civilized Eloi above: underground-dwelling, hairy, illiterate, and given to tribal-style face painting, these males eke out a basic existence foraging for food scraps in the discarded garbage that falls from above.

Fully feminist societies are asexual. It goes without saying that, in a society that lacks men, there is little reason for sexual expression. Indeed the whole of the society is dull and gray, with no bright colors permitted. Call it lesbian bed death on a societal scale–while Martian females have breasts, narrow waists, and wide hips, all markers of fully formed females–there is no sexuality, none of the peacocking that is a staple of female mating tactics on Earth.

This is not to say that the movie is a complete repudiation of feminism. For instance, buried under the Martian city are ruins with wall paintings that depict a three-member Martian family. So far so good. However, while the child of the family is clearly a girl, and one of the adult Martians is clearly of the female gender and presumably the mother, the gender of the "father" is much more ambiguous. Is he male? Or does the Martian Heather have Two Mommies[image] as well, where one is femme and the other is a butch she-he? It is hard to say, and in doing so, the movie retreats from what would otherwise be a clearly drawn contrast of a more natural and fully developed society with a stunted, modern, structured, faux-utopian feminist one.

The movie also does not depict adult males or fathers in any substantive or redeeming manner. Milo's father is a the classic absentee provider, visible only in the opening and closing scenes of the movie. The father's daily sacrifices for Milo's (and his mother's) benefit away from the home merit nary a mention, in contrast with the focus on Milo's mother's voluntary act of self-sacrifice during the movie's climax. Moreover, the Gribble character, the only other male character of prominence in the movie, is an embodiment of the SYM about whom so much ink has been spilled of late: immature, technically savvy, earnest, and given to playing video games. He is a Peter Pan, literally, a male that, while physically mature, is caught in a state of arrested development. In other words, of the three main male characters in the movie, one is a phantom and the other two are children. Now, I'll admit the title of the movie is "Mars Needs Moms", but this lack of balance in the storyline merely reinforces in the viewership…many or most of whom will be children…that the key conceit of women is justified: mothers are essential, fathers are nice-to-have but not essential.

In sum, the movie depicts feminism taken to the logically consistent yet ridiculous extreme. I would have liked for fathers and males to be portrayed in a more positive light, especially in a movie primarily marketed toward impressionable young minds, but I suppose one takes criticism of the femmatrix where one can find it.

In Era of Excess, Sex Loses Appeal

W.F. Price · 28 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Columnist Karen Krizanovich, writing for the Daily Mail, opines that "sex isn't sexy any more." According to Krizanovich, a former sex advice columnist, the overexposure and politicization of sex has rendered the act dull and uninspiring.

I suspect that this may be partly a personal/hormonal issue for Krizanovich, as she is well into middle age by now, but she does hit upon certain truths. The seizure of sex as a political tool by feminists has rendered discussions of sex banal, and even repugnant at times. The frequent televised displays of sexual aggression on the part of crass young women are far from a turn-on. The tabloid reports of the trashy love lives of athletes or famous people expose a side of sexuality many of us would prefer remained hidden under some rock.

Those things that many men and women alike find alluring have been declared politically incorrect. Witness the obsession over Mad Men displayed by millions of women – including feminists – who find the fictional chauvinism of 1960s corporate America highly erotic. Do these women really desire an equalist relationship where sex is discussed in the clinical detail of a research paper out of a Swedish gender studies class?

For men, the loss of the mystery surrounding women must be taking a toll as well. The aggressive displays of female sexuality are anything but demure; even a female chimpanzee in the darkest jungle would be put to shame by the behavior of some women on popular TV shows. In fact, it seems that the message young women have internalized is that the harder they throw themselves at a man the more likely they are to end up in bed with him. Perhaps they are correct; I imagine many a man would give in simply from the sheer force of the assault.

But this does not awaken those passions that in past days were kept under cover, subtly stirring beneath the veneer of civility. No, today there is nothing subtle about sexuality: no drama, no tension, no longing made all the more keen by restraint. It is all out in the open, like meat at the butcher shop, dressed and trussed for tonight's consumption.

The Soft Shutdown

What Happened When My Strongman Class Was Invaded By Ms. Pink and the Pussy Power Posse—And What I Learned From It

> "In practice, getting boys to be more like girls means getting them to stop segregating themselves into all-male groups. That's the darker, coercive side of the project to "free" boys from their masculine straitjackets."
> — Christina Hoff Sommers, "The War Against Boys." The Atlantic. May 2000.

About six months ago, I earned a personal trainer certification through a reasonably reputable organization. I never really had any expectation that I would become a full time personal trainer. After a few years working in the fitness industry, my perception is that the bread-and-butter clients for most male personal trainers seem to be middle aged women who want a good-looking young man to pay attention to them for a few hours a week. If you're into basking in the adoration of middle-aged married women as they fantasize about you, and then nailing them like a god after you sculpt them into cougar Venuses, it's probably a great gig. It's also a good gig for the kind of homos who like to gossip with women all day.

Men tend to be self-starters—even when they really need a personal trainer to correct their half-assed ideas concerning the mystical pursuit of biceps and a six-pack—so a lot of them would rather do the research on their own than pay some pretty boy to count reps for them. In a sense, that's what I was doing. I did the coursework to get my certification not so much because I envisioned myself making a living as a trainer, but because I wanted to know what trainers know. Max from FKIN actually directed me to the cert that I ended up getting, and made the comment that even if he had never trained anyone, he thought the getting the cert was worth it for personal knowledge.

That said, I figured it would be a good experience to actually do some real coaching. Nothing reinforces your own knowledge like having to teach what you know to someone else. After I finished my cert, I asked my pal at the gym I go to if I could teach a strongman class. I'm no Mariusz Pudzianowski, but I prefer functional movements to "bodybuilding"—which is really, as the Amish would say, "chust for pretty." I also like the old school, earthy appeal of strongman tasks, which seem to be regaining popularity. As a student of paleomasculinity, I saw a niche for myself and a lot of background information that I could potentially bring to the table. And, as a writer whose main subject is men, I also saw an opportunity to create an escape from the PC, coercively co-ed atmosphere that I think smothers a lot of men.

So, permission granted, I started programming the class. I invested as much money as I could afford to—buying sandbags, sledgehammers, a keg, and one Atlas Stone mold I have yet to fill with concrete.

I had a panic moment when, 5 minutes before the start of the first class, I was standing there alone with a tall blond woman who was a regular at our gym.

This was not what I had envisioned…

A few minutes later, some guys showed up, as well as one of the other coaches and his wife who were nice enough to come and support the class. The first couple of classes went well. The tall blond woman was always polite and she just wanted to work out. I had no problems with coaching her along with the guys. In fact, she brought along a guy friend who then brought his son to the next class. Coaching a father and son together was definitely my most rewarding class. I could tell that it was a good day for them, and that made it a good day for me.

Attendance slowed down a bit after that, probably as much due to the end of football season as anything, and I took a couple of weeks off to work on my book. I also realized that my powerlifting format was taking too long, and I was going to have to restructure the class and limit the program to one big lift and various strongman stunts. The next class was well attended, mostly by enthusiastic guys of various ages and conditioning levels. Everything was going well.

A week or so later, I was standing around before class with a nice married guy who always put in a good effort. His wife was home with a newborn, and I think he liked the break in his Sunday. I was looking forward to the two of us working out, because he's about as strong as I am and I knew I could program something on the fly that would challenge both of us.

Then, SHE showed up…

A skinny, high-energy middle aged woman in a pink FCKH8 t-shirt marched into the room with two other women in tow. Acting as if she'd just railed up a line of Columbian white—though it was probably just free trade organic coffee—she made a beeline for me, asked if I was the instructor, and then quizzed me about what we'd be doing. She told me that she and her girlfriends wanted to flip tires. Because of varying strength levels and limited equipment, I had to program the class based on who showed up, so when someone wanted to do something specific, that was easy to accommodate.

I decided to do dumbbell farmer's carries around the block combined with sledgehammer on a tire for the first third of the workout.

What followed can best be described as a Saturday Night Live skit about an all-male high school basketball practice session, as interpreted by an all-female cast.

I went around the block with the girls. Ms. Pink was carrying 40 pound dumbbells in each hand, and I was carrying 70 pound dumbbells in each hand, but she was admittedly in good shape for a 130 pound older woman and she definitely held her own. The women were shouting each other in caricatured jock-talk all the way around the block.

"Push it, push it push it!"

"C'mon, don't be a sissy!"

"We got this, we got this!"

"Bring it, girl!"

I don't coach like that, and the men I coach never behave like that. Usually, we just shut up and do the work, offering encouragement and congratulations only when it is really necessary or earned.

About mid-block, the girls started letting out blood-curdling shrieks—which was embarrassing, because we were out on the street with people passing by.

As I got back inside and started pounding on the tire with Ms. Pink—who had at that point known me for approximately 7 minutes—she proceeded to make suggestions about improving the class.

She recommended that the name should be changed to "Strongman AND StrongWOMAN Sundays," instead of just "Strongman Sundays." She said she thought it would be "more inclusive."

I gave her a hollow laugh and wondered what she would think if she had any idea who she was talking to.

"You really should," she said.

Another hollow laugh was punctuated my increased efforts with the sledgehammer.

After Ms. Pink and her gal pals were finished posing for pictures with the sledge and tire—"say Facebook!"—I pulled my truck around. We towed it up and down the alley, because I knew that's what the married guy wanted to do, and he had pretty much faded into the background at this point. He was a good sport, I think he had fun with it despite the obnoxious grrl power cheerleading team.

Married guy had to go home after that, and I was left with the pussy power posse, who reminded me again that they wanted to flip tires. So we rolled the big truck tire out into the alley and I showed them how to flip tires. They were having a great time. It's not my gym, and I felt like I had a responsibility to make sure they enjoyed the class out of respect for the owner and my friend who green-lighted the class for me.

After much screaming and shouting from Ms. Pink and the Pussy Power Posse (PPP) as they took turns flipping the tire over the wet black-top, I found myself having one of those cinematic, out-of-body moments. It was as if the camera was overhead, and I was looking up at it—with maybe a few leaves falling down for effect. I was standing around the tire with Ms. Pink and the PPP, and they were actually high-fiving each other. Ms. Pink turned to me, laughing and shouted:

"How do you like that, Jack?!"

"The only ones who can hang with you for your strong MAN class are strong WOMEN!"

"How about THAT?!"

Then she turned back to the PPP and said something inane, like "How about THAT, girls! It's all about the WOMEN!"

I don't know what the exact quote was, because at that point I was spaced out and wondering if there was actually an angry God who was punishing me for something. If you tried to imagine what my Hell on Earth would look like, you really couldn't do much better than forcing me to run a women's empowerment boot camp.

Then they asked about the keg.

We have keg filled to 95 pounds and one filled to the full 160 pounds. I can clean and jerk one easily, but the heavier one never quite makes it the whole way up. I can shoulder it, but cleaning it overhead from the floor is another matter. It's harder than it sounds. I weigh about 205. Ms. Pink wanted to try shouldering the 95 pound keg. Shouldering kegs is a lot easier than getting them overhead, but for a woman who weighs less than 140 pounds, it's kind of a big deal. I've seen it done, but it looks painful and takes some serious practice and effort. Ms. Pink and friends weren't even coming close, and suggested that maybe I wasn't teaching them the proper technique—even though I can actually do it in slow motion and demonstrated several times for them. It wasn't the technique; it was obviously the fact that they were 130 pound women trying to shoulder an odd object that was about 75% of their total body weight, without ever having trained for it.

I wrapped the class up, and made some small talk as we put equipment away. Ms. Pink told me what a great time they'd all had, and how they couldn't wait to come back next week. She even offered to harass the gym owner into buying some new strongman equipment for me.

A few days later I finally caught up with my friend at the gym and acted out the whole sordid affair for him so he could feel my pain. He's read some of my work and knows what I'm about. All of the classes at the gym were co-ed, and we both knew the owner was kind of into being "inclusive," so there was nothing he could really say, and nothing I could really do to prevent these women from coming back and harassing me every week. I also had no interest in putting him in an awkward situation with paying members, and after telling the story, talking about it further just felt like whining.

Obviously, I wasn't going to change the name of the class to make it more "inclusive." That's just not something that is ever going to happen on my watch. Don't they always say you're supposed to "be the change you wish to see in the world?" It would be a seppuku-worthy disgrace for me to become one more guy who rolled over and gave a bunch of mouthy women whatever they wanted to avoid a potential hassle.

It's not that you can't have a Strongman/Strongwoman class. People do it all the time. I have to admit that the world's strongest woman is a lot stronger than I am or even have any desire to be. As an average guy with average genetics, I'm only stronger than 95% of females ever will be.

The thing about a mixed class is that it's just going to be different, and it wasn't what I set out to do. I didn't start the class to make money. I started it to help guys get into shape and tap into some of their physical potential. It's a beautiful thing when some guy who has been couch or cubicle-bound all his life suddenly realizes he can deadlift almost twice his body weight, or that he can lift up a keg or a stone the way his ancestors would have. That's what I wanted to do as a coach—because I get so much out of it myself as a student. There are plenty of people who are more than happy to coach any paying customer.

There was a chance that Ms. Pink & Co. would get bored after a week or so and things would return to normal. There was an equal chance, though, that they would become regulars and ruin the vibe of the class for all of the guys who I really wanted there.

That's what happens. Women push their way in, men lose interest, and women take over.

Obviously, there was no way I was going to volunteer my Sunday afternoons or buy more equipment to teach a women's empowerment class.

So I cancelled the class.

Maybe they figured out why. Maybe they didn't. When some of the guys who had attended or who had planned on attending asked me what went down, I told them an abbreviated version of the story. One former student told me he had overheard Ms. Pink complaining that the gym had a "Strongman" course before she showed up that fateful Sunday afternoon. So she did plan it. I wasn't just being paranoid or overreacting.

To say that the whole experience validated my existing beliefs about women and feminism would be an understatement.

I can't really declare any kind of victory, because in the end, I allowed women to stop me from doing something I wanted to do. On a personal level, it was probably a good thing, because I need the rest of the summer to focus on writing. Getting myself to the gym 6 days a week is already enough of a distraction. I still occasionally substitute coach or assist with a co-ed CrossFit class, and I'm fine with that. CrossFit has always been co-ed, and a deadlift is a deadlift.

What I did with my strongman class is what I think a lot of men do when confronted by the kind of women who seem to live in perpetual fear that somewhere, somehow, men are having fun and don't want them around. I'm calling it the "soft shutdown." Rather than compromise, I just walked away. I knew that the women would get whatever they wanted, because they were the "customers" with cash in hand. This is what is happening to our society on a much larger scale. Women are the customers, and everyone knows that the "customer is always right." They wield economic power, and they are willing to nag until someone bends over backward to accommodate them.

The experience forced me to think creatively about how men could conduct a men's only operation in a coercively co-ed world.

I am highly skeptical of the whole "group therapy" model when it comes to men. Men bond naturally when they are doing something active. I've noticed that I enjoy conversations with men more when walking or hiking or tossing a ball around. Women and many psychologists think men don't talk about their feelings, but in reality I think men are pretty open once they decide they like you—they just don't open up the minute you throw a tea party for them and tell them to share their feelings. I'm a talker, but I'd rather connect with men in an "adventure" setting of some kind—be it lifting, sports, or whatever—then in some awkward, forced "talking" group. Drinking elbow-to-elbow at a bar also works, but it's not exactly the most productive activity.

Men are happier when they get some "guy time." I do deliveries every day, and I've seen a lot of hen-pecked guys (especially older, retired men who spend all day at home with their wives) who seem almost desperate for it.You get the feeling that they'd keep you in their garage talking guy-talk all day if they could.

Men have always been cooperative hunters, and we're inclined to pack up and create separate social worlds away from women. It's how we get shit done. But it is also through those groups that we are best able to assert our interests over women. Keeping men away from each other is the best trick feminists ever came up with. When we sit alone, isolated at our computers, we are really not much of a threat to the status quo. Men in groups—gangs of men—are the only real threat feminists, globalists and other big-government advocates have to worry about.

Curves International, Inc. is a women's fitness franchise that boasts 10,000 worldwide locations and 4 million female members. There seem to be about 40 Curves franchises within about an hour of where I live. I doubt men have bothered trying to demand that any of them be "more inclusive." Aside from the numerous yoga and Pilates studios that cater primarily to women, the Portland area also offers The Diva Den, Elite Sante Women's Fitness Club, Oregon City Fitness and the Northwest Women's Fitness Club. ADAPT Training offers a "women's only" boot camp, Northwest Fighting offers "women's only" kickboxing classes, and I have been in countless gyms that have feature "women's only" areas. I am sure I am only scratching the surface of women's only facilities and classes in my metro area—this is just what I found in 10 minutes with one Google search.

Because of obnoxious feminists like Ms. Pink, white-knighting pro-feminist men, and the lure of the almighty dollar, I doubt any "men's only" operation—or even a "men's only" class—would last for more than a few weeks. Men don't really want to be "included" in "women's only" classes. This is a one-way problem.

There are options, however.

"Black classes" – If you are a trainer, there is no reason you can't hold off-schedule group classes at a gym or rented space. If it isn't publicly advertised, it doesn't have to be "inclusive." Many trainers allow groups of friends to package their training sessions together at a discount. Trainers could advertise to men privately or through networking, using gym spaces per existing arrangements.

Cells – Chartered organizations and clubs draw attention, but loosely organized groups of friends fly under the radar. Text your buddies, meet somewhere, work out together. Maybe one of you runs the class, maybe you figure out what to do as a group.

Whenever I see a large all-male group of middle aged men on bikes and I am able to look past their brightly colored stretchy pants—I suspect that these are SWPLs who managed to work out a way to ditch their wives and get in some male bonding time while priding themselves on being environmentally friendly or progressive or something.

Good idea, shame about the pants.

Garage Gyms—In the future, I see young men having less money, and something like personal training is a luxury that won't be affordable for most of them. I see possibilities, though, for a guy who has access to some resources renting a space or opening up his garage on a barter/trade level. That's actually how a lot of fitness clubs seem to have started to begin with.

These are just a few ideas.

There is obviously a lot more to life than working out. As any feminist sociology professor will tell you, the need to work out is a symptom of men trying to establish or retain their masculine identity in an industrialized world where the demand for physical work is increasingly rare. They're right. We only disagree in that I think retaining and cultivating a masculine identity is exactly what men need to do.

Acting Precedes Becoming

Ever since high school I've been known as an opinionated and outspoken person. I come from a family where talking politics and religion were never taboo. Both my parents put a lot of time and effort into teaching us to understand those subjects instead of just going with the flow.

So it should come as no surprise that I'm not really very quiet about men's issues when I'm with people face to face. I've been pleasantly surprised by how well a lot of this stuff has been received by family and friends; and have also been surprised to see that more women in my life than men have been willing to recognize the inherent problems with feminism and our modern gender dynamic.

One thing that seems to set off both the men and women I talk to, however, is the subject of Game. I was talking with my parents about it on Sunday night and my mom said she doesn't like the idea of my dad constantly manipulating her to keep her attracted to him. I asked her if she thought her wearing makeup, keeping her hair clean and overall taking care of her appearance is a manipulation of my father. Her response struck me pretty well. She said:

"I do those things for your dad because I want him to have the best me he can have."

I immediately replied that that's what this blog and others in the manosphere are all about. Yes there are men online and in the world whose only concern is to bed as many women as possible or otherwise get what they can out of people; but most of us don't function that way.

We use Game as a way to be our best possible selves. All people – both men and women are born with the inherent ability to recognize good from evil. Every single person, whether religious or not, is born with the ability to recognize the good and bad in people. Our actions and thoughts may stifle that ability, but most of us still have it and can subconsciously recognize admirable traits in others.

Women are attracted to men with Game not because they are manipulated, but because they recognize that men are being their best, most masculine selves.

Now obviously there are aspects of Game or aspects of the alpha male that are wrong or simply evil. These are not men being their best selves but a subtle twist and manipulation of men who are. A jerk is just a bad variation of a leader. A cad is the twisted version of someone who is socially dominant. A dictator is the mutation of a leader.

The PUA version of Game works in the 21st Century for two reasons. First, we don't have very many real men anymore. With so many effeminate guys and perpetual man-boys, women will embrace any semblance of masculinity they can find; even if it is a twisted version of it. Second, the good aspects of masculinity are consciously frowned upon. As a result, women don't actively seek out manly, leader-type men, they seek the gods of our day – guys who are like movie stars, artists and musicians. If both of these aspects were to change, the cads and players would have no chance with women. That aspect of Game only works with a civilization that is in a Roman decline.

However, the real foundation of Game –the idea that men and women are very different and that a man should magnify his masculine virtue is a godly attribute.

I have a friend who spent the last two months in Africa. We were talking today and I made a joke about her rationalization hamster. She asked me if I was still into the masculinity stuff and my answer was a solid yes. This stuff isn't a phase once you find it out and are open to it. It's a paradigm shift. It's a set of tools that finally help men cast off what they've been programmed with all their lives and become the men and leaders they should be.

Other bloggers have talked about Game being a toolbox with things like negs, recognition of fitness tests, and an understanding of hypergamy as tools. Tools is all they are. Tools don't make a man competent. A man is more than his instruments. However, they are a necessary part of getting any job done. Man has had tools since Adam because it helps him accomplish his goals. Is a man manipulative because he signifies his professionalism by wearing a suit to work? Is he fake because he uses a car to get himself to work? A man cannot be defined by his tools, but he can use them as a way to improve himself and his surroundings. And just like a car, a wrench or a gun, Game can be used for good or evil. The tool isn't evil, but the man who uses it can be.

Embrace Game for what it is. It is not an end to itself. It is a tool to help men become Men. Eventually a man won't need it because he will become it. That is the ultimate goal – to be instead of act. But until we reach that point, we need to use what we have at our disposal.

The Movement to Disbar Mary N. Kellett

[Special note: I urge and implore all bloggers, anywhere on the internet, to reprint this article in its entirety with a link back to this page. Please help me get this event in front of as many eyes as possible. Thank you – PE]

There are often times that we shake our heads at injustices in the world. Sometimes it seems to be all we can do. And with so many problems in modern life, and their often systemic, intractable nature, it can be difficult to choose what battles to fight and when. Because of this we have increasingly become a nation of head shakers, concerned about an array of injustices but often not knowing where to turn or what to do to solve them.

With that in mind we have an opportunity, right here and now, to face down and fight against a terrible injustice, an absolute evil, going on in the state of Maine.

Vladek Filler is about to face trial for a second time on the charge of raping his wife, Ligia. He was brought to trial the first time by Bar Harbor prosecutor Mary N. Kellett, who has sought to imprison Mr. Filler despite the fact that she knows that there is no physical evidence that he ever committed a crime, and despite the fact that his accuser Ligia Filler, has proven to be a violent criminal, a liar who has been caught in false allegations against her husband, and a physical and emotional abuser of her husband and children with a history of severe psychiatric problems.

Ligia Filler has been referred to as "certifiable" by sheriff's department personnel who she repeatedly threatened to kill.

Mary Kellett's professional conduct in this case breeches virtually all canons of legal ethics where it concerns prosecutors, from intentionally misleading jurors to avoiding pretrial discovery to actually asking a law enforcement officer to refuse to comply with a valid subpoena in order to help her conceal exculpatory evidence.

All of this, and many other similar cases, have been conducted under the supervision of Bar Harbor, Maine, District Attorney Carletta Bassano, leading to the almost unavoidable conclusion that the problem is not just one rogue prosecutor, but one in which District Attorney Bassano is an enabling accomplice.

Additionally, all of these events have transpired without so much as raising an eyebrow in local news media.

Given the complicity of her supervisor and the lack of attention by local media, Kellet appears emboldened to continue this reign of terror on the life of Vladek Filler, his children, and other innocents who reside in the community Kellett is supposed to protect.

After having Filler's first conviction overturned due to prosecutorial misconduct by the Maine Supreme Court, she is coming after him again, putting him through another trial on the same slipshod evidence.

Kellett is not pursuing justice; she is making a mockery of it in ways that border on criminality. She is out of control and no one with authority over her is doing anything about it.

And given the hubris demonstrated by her actions, it is clear she feels free to proceed with impunity.

We cannot, must not, allow this to happen.

This is a battle worth choosing to fight, and A Voice for Men is not the only place that is happening. Glenn Sacks at Father's and Families, the nation's leader in father's rights advocacy is speaking out about this story. You can also read about it at The False Rape Society. This article will also be running at the-spearhead.com, with thanks to our good friend Mr. W.F. Price.

The organization Stop Abusive and Violent Environments(S.A.V.E.) has taken the even more significant action, sending a Complaint for the Disbarment of Prosecutor Mary Kellett to the Maine Board of Overseers for the Bar.

They have also authored a letter to Paul LePage, the Governor of Maine, referencing the disbarment complaint and making an appeal for an intervention on Mary Kellett on behalf of Vladek Filler and the people of Maine.

And you can do your part.

Write Governor LePage here and respectfully insist on an investigation to the practices of Mary N. Kellett. The message can be as simple as. “For the sake of justice, please assure that Mary Kellett is relieved of her prosecutorial duties and disbarred from the practice of law.”

Write the Board of overseers for the Bar here, and insist that they respond to the allegations against Kellett with an investigation.

Lastly, try to get the media involved. Bill Trotter does crime reporting for the Bangor Daily News. You can write email him at btrotter@bangordailynews.com or phone him at 207-460-6318 and ask him to consider investigating this story.

Don’t wait for others to do this, please, or think that just one person calling and writing is enough. That would be a fatal mistake.

When you have done one or all the suggestions listed here, please come back to this thread and simply put the word “done” in the comments, wherever you are reading this.

What is happening in Maine is only a microcosm of what is happening across the western world. So regardless of where you live, your insistent message to one or all of these people can help force them to consider looking in to Kellett’s activities. And make no mistake about it, Kellett’s actions, if unchecked, are a forecast of own future. We know this is a witch hunt, but because most are ignoring it, it will spread. If we take this silently, we have lost in the most tragic and disgraceful of ways.

This is a fight worth fighting, people. If you are reading this, you could be another Vladek Filler, or someone who cares about him. Your children could be hurt the same way his children have And your freedom, even if seemingly secure today, cannot be assured for tomorrow. As long as the likes of Mary Kellett are allowed to practice predatory prosecutions against innocent human beings no one is safe.

And If she is allowed to build a career on doing this, there will be nothing to stop the same from happening where you live.

It is your future, and your move.

Feminist Imperialism: The New Crusade

W.F. Price · 30 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Conservative pundit Jonah Goldberg, writing for National Review, has taken up the cause of spreading feminism across the world, presumably at gunpoint.

Goldberg has long been a war hawk, having been a passionate supporter of the invasion of Iraq, and once wrote:

> "Every ten years or so, the United States needs to pick up some small crappy little country and throw it against the wall, just to show the world we mean business."

Perhaps feminism, which has led directly to a great deal of state violence against men in America, has been recognized as a useful tool in pursuing these aims. If feminists are perfectly comfortable with violent arrests of fathers and husbands to enforce feminist dictates here at home, just think of how easy it would be to recruit their efforts to convince people to snuff out foreigners' lives. As Jonah argues, these jihadis must be a bunch of wife-beating sickos, so why not drop some JDAMs and cruise missiles on their misogynistic heads?

Nothing could better demonstrate feminist triumph than the mutilated corpses of patriarchal Muslims, right? Perhaps having female American soldiers sexually humiliate them a la Abu Ghraib would be the icing on the cake.

Oddly for a conservative (or perhaps not), Goldberg gloats over the fact that American men have been laid low in recent years:

> At a time when education matters more than ever, more American women attend college than men. More women graduate, with better grades and more advanced degrees.
> These are the fruits of feminist success. And, as the father of a little girl, I'm grateful for many of feminism's achievements. And as a conservative, I'm delighted that so much of the energy and passion on the right is fueled by women…

As an American, I'd be somewhat relieved if the feminists were to divert their efforts to foreign wars. But that's a selfish sentiment, and this is an international issue. As I know from very personal experience, the effects of feminist policy transcend national boundaries. This is an international issue that affects all of us, and we have to address it as such.

So, while it isn't surprising to see war hawks donning the mantle of feminism, it is important that men worldwide oppose any efforts to use force against sovereign states in the name of feminism. To do so would be to acquiesce to force being used against us in our own homes, as it is.

Every bomb dropped and every bullet fired in the name of feminism is one more indictment against the totalitarian, supremacist ideology. Every death caused by feminist imperialism is a war crime against free people.

It would be a searing indictment against us as a people were we to justify state aggression on the pretext of interfering with the private, family lives of a sovereign people. We should reject such efforts forcefully, so as to avoid justifying the same action against us.

Kanye West Shines Spotlight On Fathers' Rights

Delusion Damage · 30 March 2011 · Archived copy · Original

For all the time we spend blaming pop music for spreading anti-male cultural attitudes, at least it's not all bad. For once, an extremely popular artist is using that platform to draw attention to something important. The way Mr. West blames himself here is less than ideal, but he gives a decent impression of the legal battle many fathers face, and that's definitely a point for the good guys.

Lyrics excerpted from Kanye West's "All of the Lights":

> Turn up the lights in here, baby
> Extra bright, I want y'all to see this
> Turn up the lights in here, baby
> You know what I need
> Want you to see everything
> Want you to see all of the lights
> Restraining order
> Can't see my daughter
> Her mother, brother, grandmother hate me in that order > Public visitation
> We met at Borders
> Told her she take me back
> I'll be more supportive
> I made mistakes
> I bump my head
> Courts suck me dry
> I spent that bread
> She need a daddy
> Baby please, can't let her grow up in that ghetto university

As a cherry on top, Kanye also throws in a primer on the dangers of cohabiting with a hypergamous female in a legal climate that takes her word over his and gives her the house:

> I slapped my girl, she called the feds
> I did that time and spent that bread
> I'm heading home, I'm almost there
> I'm on my way heading up the stairs
> To my surprise a n* replacing me
> I had to take 'em to that ghetto university

The unfortunately ubiquitous attitude of beta male supplication notwithstanding, at least this song and others like it can have the effect of pushing listeners to wake up to the problems men are facing in today's society. A step in the right direction – a small step, but a step nevertheless.

Anarcho-Misogyny: Confronting Hypergamy

By Jay Batman

The issue of promiscuity among men may be summed up as a matter of quantity; for men, the issue is how many women they have bedded. The issue is quite simple, because sleeping with women means being chosen by women. It is affirming to be chosen by as many women as possible. In this way, men achieve validation.

The issue of promiscuity among women may be summed up as a matter of quality; for women, the issue is who they have managed to bed. Sleeping with a man to a woman means selecting the best of the bunch and getting him to select you in return. For a woman, this equivalent to quality acknowledging quality, and there are no small amounts of arrogance and hubris at play.

The problem for women is that everyone covets quality. Many different women desire a man who is deemed handsome, or intelligent, or wealthy, or some amalgam of the three, especially the first and the third, simultaneously. What women entertain is a fantasy in which they monopolize the best for themselves, because their secret desire is to see themselves affirmed as the best through their exclusive possession of the best.

This does not happen. Alpha males have options, and no single woman can overcome this obstacle to exclusivity. What intelligent men realize early in life is that even for an alpha male, there will always be a bigger, faster, stronger, smarter, and wealthier male. What unintelligent men believe early in life is that love, fidelity, honor, and decency matter to women.

When it comes to institutions like marriage, such ideals do matter, but women are in a state of constant aspiration. They are always looking to move on and up. For women, there's always a better deal on the horizon or a better deal that got away. Contentment with the present is simply not possible with women.

Beta males do not understand this precisely because they entertain unrealistic beliefs about women. Chivalry ought to die because it has nothing to do with success in mating or life. It is an antiquated ideal that has no place in fulfillment for men. It simply renders men into a shoulder for women to cry on; rather than being a full human being, you become an emotional crutch when their first option falls through.

But what is more, beta males have to understand that status is a matter of choice rather than destiny. In an earlier article, Anarcho-Misogyny Revisited, I examined the African cichlid fish Haplochromis burtoni, specifically the males, because they are grouped into two subsets: territorial and non-territorial males. The territorial males are brightly colored, with testes three to four times larger than that of non-territorial males. The non-territorial males are so colored and sized as to be similar to the females of the species. What is relevant about H. burtoni for beta males is this: at any time where a territorial male is struck down by disease or predators, a non-territorial male undergoes physiological changes in his brain neurons and in his body morphology to transmogrify into a territorial male. The territorial males, when moved into proximity with larger territorial males, undergo a reverse transformation into non-territorial males.

Beta males are so pale, so appallingly dull when compared to their alpha peers, as to be almost feminine in their mannerism. They are the girlfriends who pick up the pieces when an alpha defies a female's attempts at hypergamy and refuses to commit to exclusivity.

Human males have a choice as to their lot in life. We are not cichlids whose lives are defined by the evolutionary decrees of necessity in ratios of dominant to non-dominant males. The answer for beta males is to reject a value system that consigns them to a life of disappointment and second-class status, to recognize that the spark present within alphas is also present within their kind. The difference is that the switch is off in a beta male, whereas it is on in an alpha male.

We have only to look at the sorts of men women choose in order to see what women value. Each man, at some point in his life, has been embittered to realize that women prefer men who can rightly be characterized as louts. If you wish to be preferred, you have a behavioral choice to make.

Your brain physiology, like that of the cichlid fish, will change with your decision. In the article Practice-related Changes in Human Brain Functional Anatomy during Nonmotor Learning, researchers noted that a simple variation in a task (either repeated an appropriate verb for a visually presented noun or simply repeating the visually presented noun) could change the brain circuits used to accomplish either variation. This was possible with less than 15 minutes of practice.

Moreover, when you learn new behavior, you gain brain cells in your hippocampal neurons, which are associated with associative memory formation. Simply put, the more you learn, the greater your neurogenesis is. You are as fully formed as your decisions make you. The idea that we should be resigned to our present roles has no foundation in brain physiology whatsoever. There is always room for change, room to learn and develop more and more.

As a human being, the options available to you are endless, but your decision must be to pursue a destiny of your own devising. Anarcho-misogyny is quite unlike any other system that touches on race and gender in that it does not have a victim myth. We believe in only one form of victimization, and that is self-victimization.

Society may be oppressive, culture may be degrading, but that is the fault of whatever class is being oppressed or degraded. You are only entitled to the respect you have earned through due diligence and the accrual of strength as a deterrent. If you are so weakened as to be easy prey due to your own complacency and apathy, you should not be surprised that society sees fit to construct a scapegoat myth out of your group or class. The maintaining of rights is a constant chore, and the only way rights transcend paper and ink is when individuals and groups accumulate the strength necessary to force tyrants and demagogues to acknowledge rights as actual limitations on their own power.

Anarcho-misogyny does not seek to negotiate from any position besides one of overwhelming strength. Those who share in our commitment to equality before the law, defensible inequality based on one's own merit and effort, and the abolition of privilege for classes within the law recognize the necessity to labor for strength. What is strength? From an individual and a class perspective, it is capital.

Economic self-determination is the only self-determination that matters, and with women now making more than men in 148 of the largest 150 markets, we can see why the tide has shifted where the media message on men is concerned. Simply put, the denigration and vilification of men is both profitable and popular. Advertisers and members of the creative class who do so are tailoring their message to accommodate a class with means.

To some degree, the problem confronting males in today's current climate is an attitude of resignation and utter confusion as to what being a man means. Many of us grow up with less than ideal role models as men. Some of us have no consistent male influences in early life at all. We are feminized as a result of our circumstances. We either don't know who our fathers are, or we have absent fathers.

Men have a duty to other men to re-define what it is to be a man, to free future generations of matriarchal influence that seeks at all turns to feminize men into beta males. Simply put, being a man involves self-determination, confidence, and mental and physical strength. Power is both a means and an end in and of itself.

Masculinity is self-control; the rejection of feminine efforts to force men into a constantly reactionary position whereby we appear petulant and even churlish when faced with the baiting of women. Moreover, masculinity involves the ability and willingness to accept constructive criticism when it is offered, and the pride to reject belittling criticism when women put it forth in the guise of legitimate criticism. Certain tones and tenors used by women to make otherwise valid points ought to be torn apart immediately. It's not what they're saying; it's how they say it that betrays their ultimate intent, which is not to help a man grow and progress, but rather to demean him with his shortcomings and relegate him to a role of subordination.

Moreover, masculinity must become militant self-esteem. There is a lot men could learn from women in this area, especially given the developments of the past forty years. When advertisers appeal to women, they do so by calling out to goddesses and queens and princesses. They do so by appealing to a sense of power and entitlement. You are worth it.

In confronting hypergamy from a standpoint of power and militant self-esteem, men are entitled to exercise discretion over their own bodies in the extreme. Advances in vasectomies have given men the option of having a vasectomy in their single years with the possibility of reversal later on. In this day and age of uncertain paternity and women who derive significant income from child support, my advice would be for men to undergo a vasectomy as a form of birth control.

The decision to do so is ultimately private and need not be shared with prospective sexual partners, girlfriends, or even wives. A woman is not required to notify her husband of an abortion, and her husband is not bound to notify her that he had a vasectomy before they got married. Additionally, having a vasectomy gives a man a degree of reproductive self-determination that a woman cannot influence. A man can have a child at his leisure and discretion. Moreover, should he not wish to have a child, he can appear compliant with the desires of his mate in their attempts to do so without being castigated.

Should a man choose a polygynous existence, he can do so knowing that he is free from the concern of impregnating any girlfriend or mistress he might have. He is free to enjoy sex on his own terms, to be affirmed by it as he sees fit without facing exploitation from a former lover.

Beta males who choose to morph into alpha males may do so knowing that their actions will not give rise to reproduction later on, and a medical history that includes a vasectomy will give a court pause in any proceedings on paternity. At the very least, a paternity test can be order that would likely exculpate the male who has undergone a prior vasectomy.

A man is entitled to make these decisions of his own volition without the input of any woman. After all, what woman asks a man for permission to procure an abortion, or makes her decision to carry or terminate a pregnancy entirely contingent upon the consent of her partner?

A woman can still achieve the status of having slept with a desirable male, but other than a status increase, she is not likely to gain either child-support or alimony from the exchange if reproduction is removed as a possibility. It's your body, your money, your sperm, and your life, men. Do as you please with all of it, and take all necessary steps to protect what you've earned and what you have as a man.

There are innovations from other cultures that we might import here as we restore our political power and voice. We might take the example of Iranian Muslims who enter into a contract called the sigheh, where a type of temporary marriage is entered into. The conditions are spelled out at the beginning, from the amount of support that will be provided to the amount of sex that will be given. The contract can be anywhere from a few hours to months or years in duration, and it is renewable.

This seems like a far more reasonable arrangement for men to pursue than the antiquated institution of full-blown marriage. If either partner fails to meet the other's standards or expectations, the contract need not be renewed. Both parties, therefore, have an incentive to maintain themselves and behave in an upstanding manner. If they do not, the contract is voided and the benefits are lost.

Sigheh represents the best of what marriage has to offer without any of the finality or restrictions. It benefits a woman by providing her access to a man's means, and it benefits a man by providing him an outlet for sex and companionship on terms that are mutually agreed up and binding at the outset. Additionally, the breach of the terms by a woman does not a result in costly court proceedings or a division of property for the man.

Additionally, a pre-nuptial agreement ought to be a requisite for every man at the outset of a marriage. Property should be partitioned, with pre-marriage assets placed entirely off-limits. Property accrued as a result of joint purchasing, where the man and the woman have paid for the item in equal or divided amounts should be divided according to the contribution. If the property cannot be divided physically, it should be liquidated and the proceeds divided according to each party's contribution.

Every man should insist on ruling out alimony altogether as a condition of his prenuptial agreement. Moreover, should the woman fail to compromise on any tenet or codicil fundamental to the man, the man should get up and walk away from the entire relationship. Economic self-interest has to trump emotion for a man's well-being and self-interests to be represented. That may sound harsh, and avowedly unromantic, but the simple truth is that a divorce proceeding where the division of property is left at the discretion of a judge is far harsher to the interests of men than women.

The final piece of the strategy in confronting hypergamy is for men to start looking realistically at what women are. Simply put, a male in his twenties is better suited to pursue a relationship with an older woman. A woman hits her sexual peak in her thirties, and a man at that age ought to realistically assess what he wants from a relationship and pursue it without shame. Moreover, older women have their own means and their own status, and the introduction of a younger man into the networks they've already established can be important to later success in employment and business. Your peers in the same age group cannot offer you either the status, the connections, or even the same sexual competency as an older woman because they don't have any of those things.

The economics of the matter do not lie. The older someone is, the more likely they are to have a better economic footing. And let's be realistic: we've all seen older women that we've entertained carnal thoughts about. At various points in my life, I was attracted to Arianna Huffington, Nanette Hansen, and others. They were intelligent, attractive, successful women.

In essence, one of the answers to hypergamy is for men to start realizing that it has merit, and to practice it on some level themselves. If you're a beta male, it isn't because you're oppressed or society has forced you into anything. You are a victim of your own resignation, and just as quickly as you resigned yourself to a fate as a less attractive, less successful, and subordinate mound of self-pity, you can change.

Go to the gym, read a book, and watch what you eat. Start dressing differently and adapting your life to getting what you want out of life. Do what works to get what you want out life on your own terms. Maybe you won't get exactly what you want, but who does? It's not a matter of whether or not something is wrong per se, but whether or not it has practical utility to your life and your ambitions. If it does, do it, so long as it isn't illegal and doesn't put anyone's life at risk.

But most importantly, realize that the brotherhood you have with your own kind will be key to resurgence in male self-determination. We need to mobilize in this country to combat misandry. We need a National Organization for Men to promote men's reproductive self-determination, equality for men in custody and divorce cases, and the abolition of misandry that pigeonholes men in those areas.

We need to organize boycotts of products that make fun of men and denigrate us as dumb, sex-obsessed morons. What's so bad about being sex-obsessed, anyway? Sex is good, isn't it? It's the basic drive that compels us all. Why wouldn't you want it in greater quantities? Why would you feel ashamed of having it? The people who want to put taboo restrictions and attach unreasonable expectations to sex are the ones with the problems, and their puritanical and dogmatic approaches to sexuality have been ruining the sex lives of others throughout human history.

This is clearly seen in the way we refer to those people who "overly" enjoy sex: freaks. The same pejorative we use to refer to someone with an extra toe or an animal with two heads is used to refer to individuals who aspire to have sex on their own terms, for their own edification, and for their own enjoyment. Does this not seem a bit absurd?

It's time to reject this line of thinking, and to take concrete steps to achieve sexual self-determination and pride for men on their own terms. It's time to empower men to define their own lives however they see fit, to remove the institutional and social obstacles to men who seek to live life as an alpha male by their own merits. Moreover, it's time for other men to celebrate their achievements and that of their brothers, as opposed to acting resentful and envious to the point of being bitchy. Cattiness has no place on our side of the fence. If we can stand in the stands at an NFL game and cheer for men whose abilities enable them to aspire to achievements on the gridiron that we simply cannot match, we can recognize greatness in our peers and celebrate when they realize their potential. Just as it isn't to the exclusion of our own potential when an NFL quarterback throws a sixty-yard pass across his body under pressure, it isn't exclusory to our potential when one of our co-workers gets a promotion.

He's realized his potential, and we simply have to work to realize ours. If our bosses aren't giving us a fair shake, we aren't precluded from seeking employment elsewhere. Men have to stop buying into the victim myth and start believing that self-determination comes from effort and a refusal to accept marginalization. Each individual man has his own gifts and abilities, and it's in our interest to bond together to achieve a world where each individual man can realize those gifts and abilities not through privilege, but instead through hard work that leads to the reward of personal achievement.

For women, the interest is clear: having strong, confident, and proud men around is conducive to better sex, stronger friendships, and yes, better relationships. A man who is secure in who he is isn't going to be threatened by who you are. Anarcho-misogyny is concerned with reviling feminists, but we have nothing against women who argue for equality rather than privileged standing to the exclusion of men. We're after a world where merit and personal achievement are the only justifiable bases for inequality.

Confronting hypergamy through an honest assessment of what it is, how men can utilize it to get what they want, and how men bear responsibility and face the consequences for their own choices can only lead to a better outcome in the future for men. Identifying and recognizing misandry and its religion of feminism does not entail whining about how you're oppressed; it entails identifying your opponent, their strengths and weaknesses, and formulating a strategy to go forward and achieve success. That's the manly thing to do.

Feminism succeeded in part because of some of the idiosyncrasies of the culture it was resisting. For example, that awful, stultifying, boring middle class lifestyle of the late 20th century left a lot of time on women's hands. A mere decade before the 1950s women would have been working too hard just getting by to make much noise politically. The affluence and surfeit of spare time spawned an activist class of women who flocked in large numbers to "progressive" institutions that lobbied for government intervention in their favor.

Unfortunately, men don't have that luxury, and never really have. Additionally, the men who have the most to gain from activism are those who have the least time for it. Divorced and unmarried fathers of all sorts are amongst the most hard-pressed people of all in our society, in many cases living an existence barely above the poverty line and having to keep their noses to the grindstone to stay out of jail. In fact, it seems almost deliberate, but I suspect that the primary motivating factor in keeping them under this regime has more to do with the desire to milk them for all they are worth.

Because of this setup, most of the more successful men's rights activists are not dealing directly with the most pressing of the issues themselves. Perhaps one could draw a parallel between them and abolitionists, who were ultimately far more important to the abolition of slavery than slaves themselves.

However, it is still important that men who are going through family law hell have some say, and be given some opportunities to act in tangible ways. Those for the whom the problem is still fresh may be too overwhelmed to do so, but some of the more compelling figures in the news have been fathers whose children have been abducted to foreign countries, men who were locked up for not paying for children who are not their own, and men who spent decades behind bars for being falsely accused and convicted.

Perhaps the most important role wronged fathers and husbands can take on is that of the icon of the oppressed. Their stories should become cultural touchstones that people will remember whenever they hear the term "men's rights" or "fathers' rights."

So, in seeking more public support, we ought to look for and broadcast these painful narratives. There are plenty out there, including many in which children are involved, and we shouldn't shy away from using them to gain sympathy and change the public perception surrounding the issue of custody and fatherly responsibility. If this effort is pursued with enough skill and dedication, eventually the image of the "deadbeat" may be replaced with the far more accurate image of the wronged father and child.

Little Lies

W.F. Price · 1 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Twenty

Some of the most irritating fruits of feminism are the thousand little lies it causes its adherents to tell about the nature of the world. These lies might be consciously told to advance the cause, or subconsciously adopted to resolve uncomfortable contradictions, or mistaken for truth by a mind clouded by a false model of the world. Whatever their genesis, they seem equally grating to anyone who doesn't buy the great, underlying lie of Gender As A Social Construct.

Here's one small example. Today I dropped by Drudge, and saw the rather surprising headline "Gadhafi's blonde lawyer daughter joins soldiers on front line…". That struck me as … unlikely to be true. At least one of Gadhafi's sons did apparently return from a U.S. internship to "[lead] the 32nd Reinforced Brigade, known at the Khamis Brigade, in its brutal suppression of rebel forces", but sons aren't daughters, and brigade commanders don't necessarily lead from the front. So the story linked from Drudge struck me as peculiar.

Here's the story. If you actually read the story, it appears that "joins soldiers" means "rally fresh support among weary troops" by "waving the leader's green flag", and "front lines" means "Tripoli". Now morale operations are a legitimate part of warfare, but they aren't combat. Visiting troops isn't the same as fighting with them. And Tripoli is about as far from the front lines as it's possible to get in Libya.

Just another little lie in the daily avalanche.

I did like this bit from the Daily Mail story, though:

> Aisha has supported the IRA and worked as a lawyer for Saddam Hussein. In an interview in October last year she told of the charity work that she does in Libya for women's rights.

My Weekend

Some supporters have been very candid with me about what motivates them, and I'd like to share a bit in return about what it all comes down to for me. Unsurprisingly, it's pretty much the same thing.

As tiring and difficult as fatherhood may be, I'd give up a thousand nights with the most beautiful women in the world just to keep my children in my arms. Call me beta or omega, and I don't even care when I'm with these little ones. But on the other hand, those who get between me and my children are worth less to me than the scum that washes out with the tide.

It is a Sunday, and my daughter and her chicken puppet suggested this verse:

> Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!
> –Jesus H. Christ

It's good to be back in the fight. I credit the babies. They always come through.

Teen Girl Delinquency a Growing Problem

One of the stars of hit cable show “Teen Mom” was caught on video delivering a beatdown to a female rival, and now girls across the country are engaging in combat, sometimes prodded on by their own single mothers. In some cases, the girls have murdered their opponents.

Oddly, even as the evidence of female aggression and violence mounts ever higher, we are still treated to the same old song and dance about violence against women, the need for men to bow and scrape before these precious little angels, etc.

In a newsclip on MSNBC, reality TV is taken to task for allegedly giving these girls the idea. This may be true to some extent, but first we ought to ask who normalized this kind of behavior in the first place. Who was it that liberated teenage girls’ sexuality and encouraged female aggression in the name of “empowerment,” all the while demanding that females are never held to the same standards of responsibility as males?

careyroberts · 4 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In ringing prose, President Barack Obama underscored his March 9, 2009 Memorandum on Scientific Integrity with this promise: “Under my administration, the days of science taking a back seat to ideology are over…To undermine scientific integrity is to undermine our democracy.”

As luck would have it, Attorney General Eric Holder issued a statement a few months later designed to spotlight the issue of domestic violence. In Holder’s own words, “Disturbingly, intimate partner homicide is the leading cause of death for African-American women ages 15 to 45.”
http://www.justice.gov/ag/speeches/2009/ag-speech-091019.html

Turns out this statement is not one-sided or misleading. It’s flat-out wrong.

Go to the website of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control. There you can fire up the WISQARS (“whiskers”) search engine to glean the leading causes of death for any age group, race, sex, geographical region, or year:
http://webappa.cdc.gov/sasweb/ncipc/leadcaus10.html

So I entered the data to match Holder’s proclamation – African-American women in the 15-45 year age range. In 2007, the women’s leading causes of death were:

1. Cancer
2. Heart disease
3. Accidents (unintentional injuries)

Thinking something must be wrong, I fiddled with different years – same result. Domestic violence homicides didn’t make the list.

This factual boo-boo came to light in a February 4 USA Today column by Christina Hoff Sommers. Calling on Holder to remove the misstatement “immediately,” the essay enumerated the harms wrought by such wrongful assertions.

“Misinformation leads to misdirected policies that fail to target the true causes of violence,” Dr. Sommers declared. “Worse, those who promulgate false statistics about domestic violence, however well-meaning, promote prejudice. Most of the exaggerated claims implicate the average male in a social atrocity.”

What’s more, these claims are exploited by dictatorial regimes to buttress antiquated human rights policies. “In Europe almost 70% of housewives are beaten by their husbands,” Iranian President Ahmadinejad once asserted, absurdly.

Columnist Paul Elam highlighted another cause for worry: “The danger here, of course, is that by telling African American women that the leading cause of their death is IPV [intimate partner violence], we are minimizing and helping them ignore the things that really are killing them.”

Eric H. Holder was sworn in as the 82nd Attorney General of the United States on February 3, 2009. Four months later, I happened to attend a speech by the newly-confirmed law enforcement head. Still basking in the afterglow of his controversial confirmation, Mr. Holder spoke condescendingly how the Bush Administration’s Department of Justice had been reflexively smitten by a narrow ideology.

And under his leadership, Holder pledged to the crowd, the faded luster of the DoJ would soon be restored. That was two years ago.

I cannot fault Mr. Holder for his factual hiccup. After all, public officials make statements every day, and they can’t be expected to fact-check each jot and tittle of every speech. And I am not going to suggest that Mr. Holder was intentionally thumbing his nose at President Obama's Presidential Memorandum on Scientific Integrity.

But now the truth of the matter has come to light and the harm caused by this intellectual flim-flam cataloged. Mr. Holder needs to assure the claims and policies of his department are rooted in scientifically-verifiable fact, not ideologically-driven cant.

Act now, Mr. Holder, to protect the integrity, the professionalism, and the good name of the Department of Justice.

Facing our Demons

W.F. Price · 5 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I wrote a post explaining that I'd need a bit of a break from the frantic pace of writing that has come to characterize my routine here. The main reason, of course, was that I had to finally face the day of reckoning regarding my divorce, which is that I might actually lose my kids. This is something I've feared from the beginning, because the man my ex ran off with told me quite explicitly that he intended to have her and my kids leave the country with him. It didn't work out exactly as he'd planned, but it still might go that way. Such is the lot of the divorced father today.

However, there was something else. It's been exactly a year since my father died, and that brought back a number of the same unpleasant feelings that accompanied the original event. It didn't help at all that in obtaining my daughter's birth certificate a couple weeks ago I had to go back to the medical examiner's office, i.e. the morgue, and see the same guy who sat me down last year and went over the death reports, then handed me the personal effects. It was uncomfortable, to say the least, and combined with a fairly extended period of not seeing my children left me in a darkly reflective mood that was not conducive to productivity.

I've made some statements to the effect that we ought to be a bit more honest about our own lives, and what drives us personally. I'm afraid we American men aren't very good at that. I'm not sure whether it's cultural, or whether it's a universal male trait, but it's a fact. It's also understandable. Men don't generally like to deal with such unpleasantness and the uncomfortable emotions that surround these personal issues. Women's fascination with the ugly details of interpersonal relationships and the intensely private emotions that accompany them has often struck me as somewhat morbid and indecent.

However, we have to give them credit for having stronger stomachs in that regard. It definitely has its utility. For example, could we survive a gut shot if it weren't for some guy willing to roll up his sleeves, reach into those bloody entrails and sew up the damaged organs?

Perhaps, if we are to move on, we have to learn to get over our squeamishness and face the ugly truths in our own lives. That seems almost like heresy in this snake-oil era of personal improvement and boundless optimism, but how can we ever know what the real problems are if we are too afraid to look at them? In a sense, we have been facing them here at The Spearhead from the beginning. We have been exposing the ugly side of feminism for all to see, and it's working. But we've left something out: our own stories.

I've decided it's time to make a couple changes in that regard. Nothing too drastic, but one reaches a certain age and there comes a time when reflection is finally appropriate. For me, at least, that time has come. And I doubt I'm alone in that regard.

So I'd like to encourage people who have reached that time in their life as well to share their own stories, draw their own conclusions, and leave a little wisdom for the rest of us. I'm just getting started on it myself.

Seattle Area Teacher Facing Prison for Alleged Sex With Boy

Barbara Anderson, a 37-year-old teacher in the Kentlke school district, has pleaded not guilty to felony sexual misconduct following her arrest for alleged improprieties with a 17-year-old student. The teacher is alleged to have had sexual contact with the boy in her classroom, and exchanged hundreds of explicit text messages with him. She faces up to a year in prison.

Reports of female teachers taking advantage of male students have reached an entirely new level in recent years, perhaps as women in American society grow increasingly sexually frustrated under the feminist regime. This phenomenon, which was virtually unheard of a mere twenty years ago, has become so commonplace as to barely raise eyebrows today.

The penalty for sex with minor students is rather harsh considering the libertine nature of society in general. In this case, it is a result of anti-male hysteria coming full circle to expose women themselves to the draconian laws meant to protect them from “predatory” males.

Although teachers clearly shouldn’t be sleeping with students, and those that do should be terminated and banned from the profession, a consensual fling with an adolescent over the age of 14 does not merit imprisonment. However, the thinking used to be that innocent little girls were being led astray by wolfish men who couldn’t control their lust, and punishing “bad guys” has always been a popular proposition. In fact, in most cases the students themselves are fully willing participants in the act, and probably deserve a share of the blame themselves.

If there is any reason to imprison a teacher for having sex with a student, it is that the teacher could expose the child to real harm. For example, say a teacher with HIV slept with a student. That teacher should go to jail. Another example would be a teacher that got pregnant by the child, and saddled a boy with 18 years of child support payments. Given that the potential for pregnancy exists for any fertile woman, and the boy would have no say in whether or not he wanted to be a father, it may be fair to say that female teachers who sleep with students should be imprisoned for exposing the boy to ruin. A male teacher who impregnated a female student would not be liable to the same extent, because the female student has the option of abortion, adoption or automatic child support.

Therefore, although it appears unreasonable on the face of it, there may actually be just cause for imprisoning a female teacher who sleeps with a minor male student. Until, of course, such unreasonable laws as we have pertaining to fatherhood are erased from the books.

So, sorry Ms. Anderson. If you end up doing time, thank your sisters.

An Operatic Point of View

Troll King commented the other day:

So which is it? Have women always been seen as virtuous or as evil?

Well, let's see. It has often been noted here, at The Spearhead, that today TV and movies portray men generally as:

- Bumbling idiots, especially men in a family setting, such as fathers, husbands, brothers and sons
- Villains who are evil to the core, who could give Hitler and Stalin lessons.

In either case, strong, confident, virtuous women save the bumbling idiot from himself or save the world from the evil men. In the latter case, the strong woman will inevitably have a perfect figure, wear a skin-tight outfit, weigh about 115 pounds and dispatch ten or more evil, 200+ pound men with her bare hands in the span of a minute or two. I would like to take the reader back to a time when a slightly different view of human nature and the attributes of the sexes prevailed in popular entertainment, this being in opera.

The hey-day of opera was the mid to late 19th century and early 20th century. At that time, opera could be thought of as the IMAX of its day – a spectacular combination of all the arts – music (orchestral and vocal), drama, poetry, painting and sculpture (through set design) – into one super production. As it progressed beyond its beginnings around 1600, opera left the exclusive domain of royalty and became a popular entertainment for the growing middle class. I'd like to present some operas and how they portrayed men and women, both good and bad.

A few points before I proceed:

- All opera composers and librettists (the authors of the words which are sung) worth mentioning, of course, were men.
- This article won't solve our current crisis. It is proffered as instruction on our common, male creative heritage to those who haven't got an operatic clue. Hope you also find it entertaining.
- No, the operatic vocal sound isn't as simple as humming a tune. The vocal technique was developed to allow a single voice to cut through a full orchestra and fill a 1000+ seat opera house without microphones or a sound system.
- The story summaries will cut out some details to save space.

Clowns

Most people have seen a picture of Enrico Caruso in a clown costume and heard a scratchy recording of him singing “Ridi, Pagliaccio”. (His 1907 recording of this piece was the first record to sell a million copies.) You may wonder what his character, Canio, was belly-aching about. Simply this – he had just discovered that his wife, whom he had fully trusted, was an adulteress and was going to leave him that very night.

Using two common theatrical devices: “the sad clown who has to make people laugh” and “the play within a play”, the composer, Ruggero Leoncavallo, weaves a tragic tale with music and prose in his opera, Pagliacci. Premiered in 1892, it was an instant success. Here’s the story.

The characters are Canio, the leader of a small troupe of entertainers, his wife Nedda and two other entertainers: Tonio and Peppe and, finally, Nedda’s lover, Silvio. Act 1 opens with the troupe entering a small village, setting up their portable stage and announcing a play to be held that evening. Canio and Peppe start to go with the villagers to the tavern but Tonio stays behind. The villagers jokingly ask Canio if Tonio is staying behind to woo Nedda. Canio responds (note that in the troupe’s act, he plays “Clown”):

It’s better not to play a game like that with me.

Listen Tonio and everyone, the stage and life aren’t the same thing.

If Clown surprises his wife with a handsome man in her chamber, he’ll only make a funny speech, calm down and let himself be beaten with a stick!

But if I should really surprise Nedda, the story would end quite differently.

It’s better not to play a game like that with me.

Some of the villagers ask if he really suspects Nedda. Canio replies, “Of course not! I adore her!” and gives her a tender kiss.

As soon as the crowd has left, Tonio does indeed make a pass at Nedda, but she strikes him with a whip. She has someone else in mind. After he retreats, Silvio appears from the tavern and asks Nedda to run off with him after the play that night. Meanwhile, Tonio overhearing this fetches Canio. He arrives just in time to hear Nedda say “I will always be yours” to the departing Silvio. Canio runs after Silvio but loses him and doesn’t get a good look at his face. In frustration, he demands that Nedda reveal the name of her lover. She refuses. Canio threatens her with a knife, but Peppe stops him and says it’s time to prepare for the play.

Canio is left alone to get ready, overcome with sadness, pain, anger and frustration from the betrayal which he never suspected. At this point he sings “Vesti la giubba”. Given the scene and the strong emotions felt by the character with which anyone who has been betrayed can identify, here is a moving performance by Giuseppe Di

Stefano that tears at the soul. Canio feels like a powerless fool, a clown who has to make people laugh while he has a dagger of pain and betrayal in his heart.

Vesti la giubba e la faccia infarina.

Put on your costume and powder your face.

La gente paga e rider vuole qua.

The audience pays and wants to laugh.

E se Arlecchin t'invola Colombina,

And if Harlequin steals Colombina from you,

Ridi, Pagliaccio, e ognun applaudira!

Laugh, Clown, and everyone will applaud!

Tramuta in lazzi lo spasmo ed il pianto;

Turn into laughs your spasms of pain,

In una smorfia il singhiozzo e'l dolor.

Turn your tears of sorrow into a grimace.

Ridi, Pagliaccio, sul tuo amore in franto!

Laugh, Clown, at your broken love;

Ridi del duol t'awelena il cor!

Laugh at the pain which poisons your heart!

You might have guessed the ironic plot of the play within the play: Columbina (played by Nedda), wife of Clown (played by Canio) is having an affair with Harlequin (played by Peppe). Tonio plays the servant Taddeo. Act 2 opens with the villagers gathering for the play and Nedda collecting money. Silvio appears and tells Nedda that he'll be waiting. He joins the audience.

The play begins and the events of the afternoon eerily repeat themselves in the play. Taddeo makes a pass at Columbina, whom she chases off. Harlequin appears and begins to serenade Columbina. Clown returns just in time to hear Columbina say "I will always be yours" to the departing Harlequin. Canio exclaims "In God's Name! Those same words!" As the play progresses, reality replaces the play and Canio demands the name of Nedda's lover. She refuses, so he draws a knife and stabs her. With her dying breath she cries out "Silvio" and Silvio rushes up to the stage calling, "Nedda". Canio, blinded by rage, turns on Silvio and stabs him to death. Canio drops the knife and proclaims to the audience, "The comedy is finished!"

Rigoletto

This opera was composed by Giuseppe Verdi, with a libretto by Francesco Piave based upon a story by Victor Hugo and first performed in 1851.

The opera's story takes place in the 16th century. Rigoletto is the hunchbacked court jester to the Duke of Mantua. The Duke is an alpha's alpha, a cad. His hobby is trying to bed the wives and daughters of the noblemen in his court.

The opera opens at the Duke's palace where a ball is being held. While the Duke is making passes at all the women, Rigoletto mocks their husbands and suggests to the Duke that he should get rid of them by imprisoning them or by execution. The noblemen vow to take revenge on Rigoletto after one of them reveals that Rigoletto is keeping a secret mistress in his home. A Count enters whom Rigoletto mocks because the Duke has plowed the Count's daughter. You can tell old Riggy ain't making any friends here. The Duke has the Count arrested. As he is led away, the Count places a father's curse upon Rigoletto. Rigoletto is visibly shaken.

The noblemen arrange a plot and abduct Rigoletto's mistress and bring her to the Duke's palace. When the Duke arrives, he finds out that Rigoletto's mistress is waiting for him in his bedroom. He immediately rushes to her side. Rigoletto arrives in distress and it's revealed the woman is really his daughter, Gilda. The Count's curse has been fulfilled, or so Rigoletto thinks. After the Duke has finished with her, Gilda rushes to her father's side, half undressed.

Here is where it get's interesting. While her father is furious and vows revenge, Gilda still loves and defends the Duke, despite him having just pumped and dumped her. Of course, this is no surprise to Spearhead readers. The father and daughter sing a duet, where he's set on revenge (vendetta) and she begs him to forgive the Duke (here Placido Domingo and Julia Novikova):

Rigoletto and Gilda

Rigoletto: Yes, revenge, terrible revenge is all that my heart desires.

Gilda: O my father, what a fierce joy

Rigoletto: The hour of your punishment hastens on,

Gilda: do I see in your eyes!

Rigoletto: that hour which will be your last.

Gilda: Forgive him and then we too may hear

Rigoletto: Like a thunderbolt from God,

Gilda: the voice of pardon from Heaven.

Rigoletto: the jester's revenge shall strike you down.

Gilda: Forgive, forgive!

Rigoletto: Revenge! Revenge! No! No!

Gilda: He betrayed me, yet I love him; great

Rigoletto: God,

Gilda: I ask for mercy on this faithless man!

The final act finds Rigoletto and his daughter in a shady part of town by the house of Sparafucile, the assassin. The Duke is inside and Rigoletto impresses on Gilda, who's still in love with the Duke, that the Duke has forgotten about her and is now trying to seduce Maddalena, the assassin's sister. Here is where the Duke sings his famous aria, La donna e mobile (this example by Luciano Pavarotti; note Gilda at the window watching while he seduces Maddalena). You've probably heard the melody before, if not the aria. Get a load of what he's singing – no comment needed:

La donna è mobile qual piuma al vento,

Women are as flighty as feathers in the wind.

Muta d'accento e di pensiero.

She changes her voice and her mind.

Sempre un amabile leggiadro viso,

Always a sweet, pretty face,

In pianto o in riso È menzognero.

but in tears or in laughter, she is always a liar.

È sempre misero chi a lei s'affida,

He is miserable who trusts in her and Chi le confida mal cauto il core!

he who confides in her – his unwary heart!

Pur mai non sentesi felice appieno

Yet one never feels fully happy

Chi su quel seno non liba amore!

who does not drink love on that bosom!

Rigoletto makes a deal with the assassin for the Duke's life. He will return with the money at midnight in exchange for the Duke's body in a sack. Rigoletto instructs Gilda to put on the clothes of a man so they can escape later. They depart.

Gilda returns dressed as a man. She overhears Maddalena plead with her brother to spare the Duke's life. He agrees, if he can find a substitute by midnight. Gilda still loves the Duke despite having been dumped by him and seeing him seduce another woman. She decides to sacrifice herself and enters the house. The assassin, realizing this is the looked-for substitute, mortally wounds her.

Rigoletto returns at midnight with the money and receives a body in a sack. He gloats and drags the sack to the river in order to dump it. At that moment, the Duke does a repeat of La donna e mobile, and Rigoletto, hearing it, realizes he's been tricked because the Duke is still alive. He opens the sack to find his daughter, who dies in his arms (picture at the top). He screams out in horror, "The curse!" – the Count's curse has finally been fulfilled.

All Women are Like That Did that title get your attention? The title of Mozart's opera, Cosi fan tutte would more accurately translate to "Thus do all" with "all" referring to women. Sometimes, the title is given as "Thus do they all" and even "The School for Lovers" but "All women are like that" seems to be more common. Unlike the previous two operas, which are tragedies, this one is a comedy. Mozart is the composer but the libretto is by Lorenzo Da Ponte, who had a very interesting life. He was the first professor of Italian literature at Columbia College (now Columbia University, New York City). The opera premiered in 1790.

To keep it easy, I'll simplify the characters' names to English equivalents. The male leads are Ferd and Will, two young soldiers whose fiancées are Dora (Ferd) and Lily (Will). Dora and Lily are also sisters. Their maid is Thorn, and lastly, there's the old philosopher, Al.

The opera opens in a coffeehouse with Al discussing women with Ferd and Will. The soldiers are certain that their fiancées will always be failthful while Al thinks they are just being naïve. Al bets them that he can show the sisters would be unfaithful within 24 hours because all women are the same. He swears them to secrecy and requires their pledge to do whatever he says. They agree.

The scene shifts to the two sisters. Al arrives and announces the bad news that the soldiers have been called to war. Ferd and Will arrive and the couples say their tearful farewells all the while pledging their love and faithfulness. Al laughs to himself. After the couples depart, Al gloats at what he thinks will be an easy win:

Oh, poverini!

Oh, poor fools!

Per femmina giocar cento zecchini?

To bet a hundred sequins on a woman!

«Nel mare solca e nell'arena semina

"He who builds his hopes on a woman's heart,

E il vago vento spera in rete accogliere

Ploughs the sea and sows on sand

Chi fonda sue speranze in cor di femmina.»

And hopes to snare the wind in a net."

The scene shifts to the sisters' home. The sisters are pining for their lovers. Thorn, the maid, arrives and asks what is wrong. When they tell her the men are off to battle, she laughs and says so much the better for them since they will come back crowned with laurel (i.e. victory). When the girls protest that they might be killed, Thorn says so much the better for the sisters because they lose those two and all the remaining men are left.

When the ladies protest that they would die if their lovers were to be killed in battle, Thorn replies that is what they think but they wouldn't do it because no woman has ever died for love or a man – there's plenty more where the two soldiers came from. She admonishes the sisters to not waste their time with tears but to find new lovers because their men will be doing the same.

The sisters leave and Al returns to bribe Thorn to help with the plot and with a promise of more money if the plot succeeds. He introduces her to two Albanian princes who will attempt to woo the sisters. What Al doesn't tell Thorn is that the Albanians are really Ferd and Will in disguise. Since Thorn didn't recognize them, he's certain Dora and Lily won't either. The plot is for each soldier to woo the other's fiancée. The sisters return and the Albanians declare their love and demand a kiss. The sisters turn them away to the men's secret delight.

Act 2 opens with Thorn urging the sisters to fall for the Albanians. She tells them that since their fiancées have gone to war, they, too, should act like the military and recruit new lovers! Dora confesses that there couldn't be any harm in a little flirting and Lily agrees.

The Albanians return and proceed to woo the women. The sisters eventually succumb. Later, the men express their anger to Al and swear off marriage. Al recommends, however, that they go ahead and marry them (sung here by Nicolas Rivenq):

Tutti accusan le donne, ed io le scuso

Everyone accuses women, but I excuse them

Se mille volte al dì cangiano amore;

for changing their affections a thousand times a day.

Altri un vizio lo chiama ed altri un uso,

Some call it a sin, others a habit,

Ed a me par necessità del core.

But it seems to me a necessity of the heart.

L'amante che si trova alfin deluso

The man who finds himself deceived

Non condanni l'altrui, ma il proprio errore;

should not blame others, but his own illusions

Già che giovani, vecchie, e belle e brutte,

Be they young or old, beautiful or ugly,

Ripetetel con me: «Così fan tutte!»

Repeat after me….. "All women are like that!"

And Ferd and Will repeat: "All – women – are – like – that!"

The final scene goes through some confusion with the soldiers "returning" and chasing after their rivals. All is finally revealed and all are forgiven. Al collects on his bet and Thorn gets her share.

Lucy of Lammermoor

Lucia di Lammermoor is a tragic opera by Domenico Gaetano Donizetti. The libretto is by Salvadore Cammarano and based upon Sir Walter Scott's novel, The Bride of Lammermoor. It premiered in 1835.

The opera is set in late 17th century Scotland and the plot takes many twists and turns. To very briefly summarize, the Ravenswood and Lammermoor families have been a feudin'. The Lammermoor family has fallen on hard economic times and Lucy's brother wants her to marry the wealthy Lord Bucklaw. Of course, Lucy doesn't want to, because she just happens to be in love with – whom else – the head of the rival Ravenswood clan, Sir Edgar whom Lucy's brother hates.

Sir Edgar goes away on a political trip to France. While he is gone, Lucy's brother does everything he can to get her to marry Lord Bucklaw – intercepting all of Sir Edgar's letters; spreading rumors that he has another lover etc. Finally, Lucy concedes to marry Lord Bucklaw and signs the wedding contract. At that very instant, Sir Edgar returns to claim his wife.

Let's take a break here. It's at this point that Sir Edgar begins the famous sextet from the opera, "Chi mi frena". Donizetti's genius weaves the music and singing of six characters into one fabulous presentation. (Sung here by Jose Carreras as Sir Edgar in a great production with period costumes.) Of course, guys in the USA might better recognize the melody here or here at 2:14.

Anyway, back to Lucy. Edgar curses Lucy and is forced out of the castle. The wedding goes through with Lucy and Lord Bucklaw. As the marriage celebration takes place in the great hall of the castle, it is announced that Lucy has gone mad and killed her husband in the bridal chamber. Lucy appears drenched in blood (picture) and sings the famous "Mad Scene" aria where she imagines that she is married to Sir Edgar. Lucy collapses and is dying. Edgar is meanwhile waiting for a duel with Lucy's brother when he learns she has died calling for him. Seeing that she really did love him all along, he stabs himself in order to meet her in heaven. Only in an opera, eh?

There you have it – woman as killer, adultress, fickle & unfaithful lover and a thug's lover. Not the typical female character seen today.

Sarah Palin: America's Sweetheart No More?

careyroberts · 6 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Sarah Palin's standing with the American public has undergone a stunning reversal of fortune, according to two recent polls.

Just two and a half years ago, Sarah Palin's star was ascending to the political heavens. A solid 53% of Americans held a favorable opinion of Mrs. Palin, while only 28% had a negative view.

But according to a March 3 Bloomberg News poll, only 28% of Americans now hold a positive view of the former Alaska governor, while a stunning 60% see her in an unfavorable light.

And a March 16 Washington Post-ABC poll found Palin's negative ratings fell to a nadir of 37% among Republicans and right-leaning independents.

So how do we explain the stunning turnaround of this immensely ambitious political wunderkind?

Following John McCain's surprise selection of Sarah Palin on August 29, 2008 and her well-received acceptance speech at the Republican National Convention, the political unknown from Wasilla notched an impressive favorability rating of 53% (all figures I cite are from the Gallup poll, unless otherwise noted).

But as the campaign lurched toward the November election, stories began to circulate about a simmering discord between the McCain-Palin campaign staffs. "She is a diva. She takes no advice from anyone," complained a top McCain adviser just days before the election. "Also, she is playing for her own future and sees herself as the next leader of the party."

Following the GOP's sweeping losses on November 4, Palin's favorability ratings still registered 48%, a respectable number considering the predictable miscues of the grueling campaign.

Soon shaking off the post-election blues, Palin's first move was to establish SarahPAC, which would eventually raise $1 million for conservative candidates around the country. Throughout 2009, Palin's favorability ratings cruised along in the acceptable low to mid 40s range.

Palin's heralded book Going Rogue came out on November 17. Even though the autobiography would eventually sell over 2 million copies, it also raised questions about the former candidate's conservative credentials – even her character.

Going Rogue highlights Palin's endorsement of the controversial Title IX quota program. It reveals her predilection for gender-baiting clichés like "I've been living in a man's world all my life."

The autobiography even suggests a mean streak. When then-boyfriend Todd told his friends that Sarah didn't know how to kiss, Palin's judgment was harsh as it was swift: I "learned a lesson about guys that day: even the good ones can act like jerks."

As if women never gossip about their mates' sexual prowess!

Throughout the year Palin appeared at endless Tea Party rallies around the country. On February 6, 2010, Palin keynoted the inaugural Tea Party convention in Nashville, TN, cementing her position as the charismatic leader for the burgeoning movement.

But in mid-2010, the apparently unstoppable train suddenly took a pro-feminist turn.

During a May 15 speech at a Susan B. Anthony conference, Palin unveiled the term "Mama Grizzly," and invoked the words "feminism" and "feminist" no less than a dozen times. This provoked predictable attacks from the N.O.W. blowhards — and raised conservative eyebrows as well.

Palin's response was to accuse her critics, including her female detractors, of chauvinism – a stance that began to wear thin in the eyes of many.

The cracks in Mrs. Palin's formidable reputation began to show themselves in the Gallup poll taken after the November 2 elections. While she garnered a steady 40% favorability rating, for the first time ever her unfavorable numbers spiked to 52%.

Perhaps the decisive turning point, though, was the day that Palin decided to take on Barbara Bush. First Ladies occupy a revered spot in the American iconography, but the tone-deaf Palin apparently didn't understand this.

When the former First Lady remarked that Palin might prefer to stay in Alaska rather than throw herself into the hurly-burly of national politics, Palin rebuked Mrs. Bush – and her family — as a group of elite "blue bloods."

Wrong move, Mrs. Palin.

Then came Palin's "blood libel" gaffe on January 12. And in February, Palin insinuated former Pennsylvania senator Rick Santorum was a "Neanderthal."

Manhattan Institute scholar Heather MacDonald has ridiculed the "feminist strain" of the Mama Grizzlies and notes that Palin "is living up to her most skeptical assessment of her." But the real reason for her plummeting support is that many Americans are confused about who Sarah Palin is and what she really stands for.

Is Mrs. Palin the tireless spokesperson for a recrudescent Silent Majority? Is she a have-it-all, do-it-all Super Mom? A dazzling, but ephemeral Media Maven?

Or is she an old-school, quota-embracing, male-bashing feminist who also happens to be pro-life? Is she a Shake-and-Bake liberal whose political resumé includes support for the ill-fated Bridge to Nowhere and a record-breaking $6.6 billion state operating budget in 2007?

Until Mrs. Palin takes steps to reconcile these apparent contradictions, these questions will continue to be grist for the political mill.

Estrogen Poisoning in the Boardroom

By Lyn87

Some days I feel like Professor Higgins in My Fair Lady, singing "Why Can't a Woman be More Like a Man?"

> Why is thinking something women never do?
> And why is logic never even tried?
> Straightening up their hair is all they ever do.
> Why don't they straighten up the mess that's inside?

I've known more than my share of top-rate thinkers and leaders and almost all of them are men. That's not to say it's universal: I've known plenty of guys that simper like wet kittens, and a few women who stand up and make the tough calls, but by and large the ratio is not even close.

Sometimes we organize ourselves into groups. We do that because nobody can know everything about everything and if we cooperate we can do things we couldn't do individually. I'll spare you a dissertation on group dynamics by distilling it down to something you probably already know – men cooperate better than women do.

There are a lot of reasons for that. A group of men will go through the "storming" stage of group formation in a more obvious way than a group of women. That doesn't mean it's any more or less tumultuous in its way, but it looks different. A group of guys will rack-and-stack each other, figure out who's on top, and move out. Informal leadership can switch from one guy to another depending on the task at hand and that goes off without much of a hitch unless somebody has an ego problem. But once we butt heads like a bunch of big-horn sheep (Oddsock, you out there?), we cooperate to accomplish the task. Women just don't do that as well. They may not do the same kind of obvious "measuring" we do, but it's just as real. But the big difference is that when women clash they become enemies, whereas men clash in order to establish a hierarchy.

One undermines group cohesion and one builds it. Groups of men can and do organize to beat the crap out of things, usually other groups of men. Whether it is on a battlefield or a market, men organize because we're better in groups than alone. We get it. A lot of women see men in groups and think we're at each other's throats when we're really doing the rough-and-tumble of male group dynamics to get organized to crush something. It's rarely personal.

The obvious question that arises is this: if women suck at organizing themselves, how did they gain the lead in nearly every metric that matters? It is well known that a higher percentage of women go to college than men. They make as much or more than men do for the same work. They get the car, the house, the kids and his income when they get tired of their provider. There is no glass ceiling but the glass floor is still there. Basically every sex-specific thing that is done by any organization of any size benefits women more than men. All of that is attributable to organized feminism breaking down the old order until "I am Woman, Hear Me Roar" is not a revolutionary anthem; it's the foul air we all have to breathe.

The answer, I think, is that women were able to organize to defeat an enemy that really didn't exist (patriarchal oppression) and to the small extent that women got the short end of the stick in pre-feminist society nobody wanted to defend the status quo. Feminism did not win because women created a strong organization capable of vanquishing a real opponent – feminism won because their opponents didn't show up to fight (and in a lot of cases their "enemies" were on their side). If they had no men to fight on their behalf and faced a real opponent – a large group of organized men – the lasses would get their clocks cleaned in short order.

So how do groups succeed? The answer depends on what the organization does, but for my purposes let's assume it's the kind of organization that must compete in some way. In the absence of formal leadership a group of men would form up, jockey for leadership, figure out a plan, and go at it. The weaker men will follow the leaders (and who's weak will depend on the task – not all tasks involve moving heavy objects). A group of women in a real competitive environment will usually dither until it's too late, then do something ineffectual.

But what happens when you mix the sexes in a group? I posit that what happens is often estrogen poisoning. I've seen pretty good guys go wobbly when the women dither, prevaricate, procrastinate, and cry. Any decision that requires someone's feelings to get hurt becomes an emotional hanky-fest where "What is the best way to succeed?" takes a back seat to "What can we do without hurting anyone's feelings?" The reason is that some of the guys allow themselves to be manipulated by the women. When a group is all male and some guy trots out some crap about subordinating facts to feelings he'll be rightly ridiculed and will learn to stop saying stupid, sappy nonsense.

But when the stupid, sappy nonsense comes from a crying woman, a lot of guys that you'd think would be the Rock of Gibraltar turn into the Sta-Puff Marshmallow Man, and not the car-crushing version from Ghostbusters, either. They'll join Team Crying Woman and keep the leaders from hammering out the objectively best plan with endless talk about huuuuurts, and feeeeelings, and the chiiiiildren. It's those guys that are the problem. By themselves the women couldn't keep a determined group of men from accomplishing the task. It's the fact that Team Crying Woman has men wearing their jersey, and those men can throw enough sand in the gears to keep the group focused on the superficial and the unimportant.

I saw this happen recently where a board had to make an obvious call that was going to hurt the feelings of a few people –but they had brought it on themselves. I was trying to figure out the odds based on what the people usually support. Turns out I would have been more accurate looking at the group dynamics.

I was the long-standing informal leader of the group and was pushing for the board to make the only call we could legitimately make. Nobody could name a single pertinent reason not to do the one thing the situation demanded, but one woman turned on the waterworks and the male formal leader pushed me under the bus with a frigging parliamentary maneuver. Did I mention the formal leader was in 100% agreement with me earlier that day and had actually helped me write the motion he was now objecting to, and the crying woman was his wife?

Mere coincidence, no doubt.

I'll add that my wife was there as well and 100% with me, but then again she's a borderline genius and thinks more logically than almost anyone I know. As I like to brag: when it comes to brains my wife has balls. (She's a looker, too, but that's not important for the moment.) Here's the deal though, half of the guys clammed up rather than jump in between a heartless alpha bastard like me and my wife the Ice Queen on one side and the beta formal leader with his crying baby-momma on the other.

From the perspective of a process observer it was a fascinating study in human behavior. The guys would have followed me if not for the fact that the baby-momma was crying and the formal leader folded like origami.

So the beta males asked themselves, "Hmmm…. do I follow the alpha male who is correct or protect the crying woman?" One guy called for objectivity, one went for Team Crying Woman, and the other two sat on the sidelines and said nothing.

So estrogen poisoning flipped the formal leader to the other side and neutralized the other beta males as a bloc. Since he had the gavel and I couldn't beat the numbers, the scales tipped toward Team Crying Woman.

What about the women though? They also had to ask themselves, "Hmmm…. do I follow the alpha male who is correct or the White Knight beta leader (who is now the alpha male on Team Crying Woman) and his crying wife? Two leaned my way a bit but wouldn't commit to a position (knowing them I truly think it was based on my arguments rather than my alphatude in that setting). The other two stayed out of it entirely.

Again, had the formal leader not been under the influence of estrogen poisoning, most of the women would have followed me, especially had the formal leader stayed with me (plus I really was objectively right).

So to sum up, had it been a group of guys we would have dispensed with the problem in about 30 seconds. Had it been a group of women nothing would have been accomplished. And with a mixed-sex group it only took one woman to give estrogen poisoning to the men and cause institutional paralysis – the same outcome as if it had been all women.

I feel sort of like Professor Higgins, except I had to change the lyrics to, “Why Can’t These Men be More Like a Man?” But unlike the good professor I know the answer – one woman transmitting estrogen poisoning turned a mixed-sex group into one that reaches the same decisions as a group of all women.

Fathers: Damned if You Do

One if the most noxious things about American family law and the dialogue that surrounds it is that on the one hand men are implored to be good, attentive fathers, but the system is set up in such a manner to discourage involved fatherhood. Although courts are rarely explicit about it (except behind closed doors), the only role that is unconditionally endorsed is what is known as "obligor," i.e. someone who pays in child support cases. As long as you pay those checks, you are a perfectly sufficient father, no matter whether you care about your kids or not. It goes even farther — if you pay child support you have no other responsibility to your kids at all under the law. You can refuse to see them at all, ignore every aspect of their lives, and even tell them you hate them and wish they'd been aborted, and you are A-OK with the courts.

However, a man who contests custody or tries to see his children more can face a great deal of scrutiny if the mother does not like the idea, and the truth is that most women, after divorce, would prefer to shut the ex out of their lives entirely, and that includes shutting him out of his children's lives. In fact, feminists are some of the most vocal supporters of the idea that fathers who try to obtain custody of their children, or simply more time with them, are perpetrating some kind of "abuse." Therefore, in the feminist universe, being a caring father who actually wants to participate in bringing up children, which is a very hard and sometimes thankless job, makes a man an enemy. Unfortunately, this line of thinking has a great deal of influence in family court. The social workers assigned to evaluate parents for custody are very often feminists themselves, and judges do listen to them. Also, since mother custody is all but a given unless the mother has an extraordinarily dysfunctional life (e.g. heroin addiction, prostitution, felony convictions), litigation is an uphill battle for fathers dealing with an obstinate, uncaring ex-wife, which is unfortunately the norm.

For a man involved in divorce, the path of least resistance is to avoid contesting custody, and use what little legal leverage he has to come to an agreement over child support and a reasonable "visitation" schedule, which will generally include seeing the kids a few days a month. In short, if you want an easy divorce, you really ought to give up on the idea of being a father, and instead simply settle for being a twice-a-month dad, perhaps using the threat of custody litigation only to keep child support reasonable. It may seem counterintuitive, but many women will happily forgo some amount of child support and a great deal of help with parenting simply to keep their ex as far away as possible. People tend to misread this, and women often misrepresent it. Those unfamiliar with the tendency assume that the man must be a horrible father and an all-around disagreeable person if a mother keeps his children away from him even at her own expense. This is sometimes the case, but there's usually another explanation. When a woman leaves a man, she does so in most cases because she wants another man. Having the ex around does not in any way help her fulfill this biological imperative to seek out a new mate. Actually, the farther away he is the better, and because cuckolding men seems to be a natural female tendency, the fact that the man in question is her children's father doesn't matter in her mind at all. She tends to think of the children's father as replaceable; another man will do fine in that role.

Family law in the US has come to reflect women's desires in this regard, far more so than the former institution of marriage ever reflected men's desires, so women's instincts are generally indulged and vigorously defended by feminists, who will often assert with some force that biological fathers are entirely unnecessary to children's well-being, except for the monthly check, of course. This is clearly wrong, and all one has to do is look at statistics regarding convicted felons to see that the most dysfunctional people in our society usually grew up without a father present, but because the primary objective of American-style family law is indulging women and removing money from fathers, it is ignored (fleecing men is big business, as we all know, and all those officers of the court have to make a living somehow).

Because of this reality, there is some merit in the MGTOW philosophy of simply walking away from it all. It is, after all, the easiest thing to do, and if enough men simply let women have what they want, eventually the system would collapse upon itself. However, not all of us are that psychologically tough. Most men care a great deal about their children, and it is extraordinarily difficult to simply let go of that. This feeling is perhaps most keen for men who grew up without fathers themselves, an increasingly large proportion of our population. Hence the custody battles that are the bread and butter for family law attorneys across the country. Most men go into these battles knowing in the back of their minds that they will probably lose, but feel they owe it to their children. They aren't fighting to be with their kids because of a desire for "control" – this is a disgusting, inhuman feminist lie – but because they love them and care about them.

Yet still we hear women complaining that their baby daddy isn't paying enough child support and won't even see his children. Know this: in four out of five cases these women have made it so difficult for the father to see his kids that he's simply given up. They are simply fishing for sympathy from ignorant folks who have no clue what really goes on after divorce. A lot of people look at guys who do this and say "how could a man abandon his children like that?" Well, in most cases he didn't. He was pushed away from his kids, usually with the overwhelming force of the law that lies at the disposal of mothers who want a new lover.

This is why I don't hold it against these men, nor should anyone else. I think of what I've been put through in trying to be a father to my children, including multiple investigations and a SWAT incident, and I wouldn't blame a guy for giving up and moving on. In fact, if I had a strong self-preservation instinct, I never would have tried in the first place. For fathers, fighting for custody of one's children is like taking on a helicopter gunship with an AK-47, and most of us are not John Rambo. Additionally, the payoff for custody is impossible to quantify, because it certainly does not result in material gain. Women are far less likely to pay child support, and when they do the obligations are generally low. A man who cooperates with his ex as she holds the gun of family law to his head is less likely to be destroyed, and he is far more likely to find another woman should he so desire. As Single Dad has often pointed out in comments, women are even less likely to want a relationship with a single father than men with a single mother. A guy who gives up on his kids therefore has a better chance of having a decent life and getting laid. The way the system is set up, there's a sort of measly carrot for dropping the kids, and a big stick with a nail in it for trying to keep them.

Nevertheless, millions of men still fight for their children. What does this say about men? Obviously, that they love and care about their children, in some ways probably more than women. Every day men are sacrificing themselves for their kids with no expectation of reward. They are giving up their careers, their sex lives and their savings simply for an extra few days a month with the people they care about most.

If there is anything that discredits feminism utterly, it is these millions of men who, despite the obstacles and threats they face, keep trying against all odds to be fathers to their children. It is small wonder feminists have resorted to such base lies to cover up this crime — they profit from the greatest injustice of our time.

Google Trends Exposes The Education System

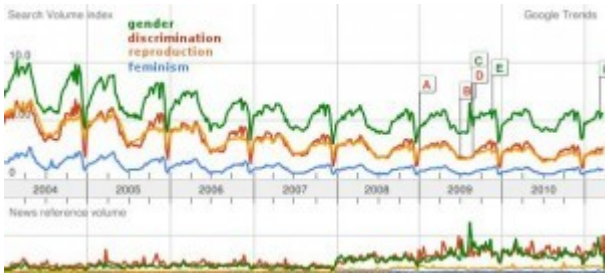
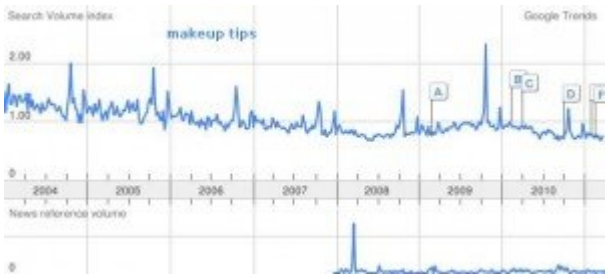
By Charles Williams

Late one night, I was playing around on Google Trends, which is overall a great source of insight into contemporary trends in politics, pop culture, family, common knowledge, and everything else. It documents the relative frequency of search terms in Google over the past seven years.

I threw in a couple of feminist buzzwords and quickly noticed a distinct pattern. I assembled and labeled these below:

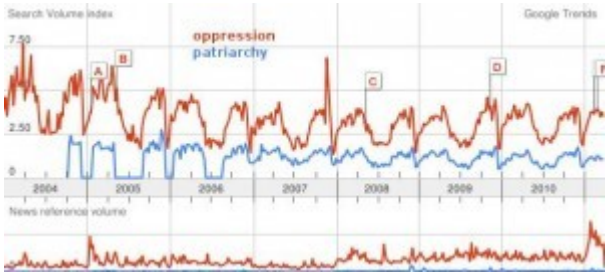


So what was the deal with this pattern of increased activity in the spring and fall, dipping in the summer, with a sharp downward spike near the winter holidays? Being the regular Spearhead reader I am, I immediately conjured up images of thousands of damaged women venting and ranting on the internet about how men are pigs when I considered who was performing these searches. Since even most self-deigned feminists these days still try to capture beauty, I was even more perplexed from this result:

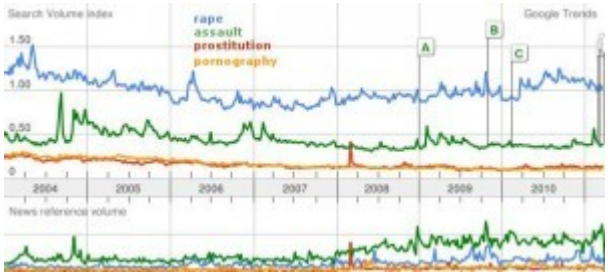


None of the pattern there! It's not as if these supposed women are just using the internet less in the summer. There's nothing to see except for pre-Halloween peaks, but my sense of dread increased as I dared to test another hypothesis. Perhaps the conclusion is already dawning on you as well:

That's right. So many students in high school and college have homework to do and essays to write on gender, discrimination, and feminism that their trends are inseparable from the trends of school being in session. But those aren't the only things that follow the pattern:

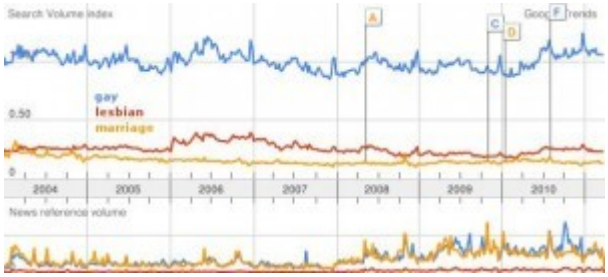


Perhaps you aren't weeping for these children and young adult's futures just yet. What if they also cover some of the real issues that affect men and women in school?



No semblance of an education pattern is detected.

Were all these searches about taking down the non-existent patriarchy associated with the campaign for gay rights? I put some more trends to the test to find out:



They weren't, but the real kicker here that more people search for both gays and lesbians than they do for marriage.

What else do they learn in school these days? Are they learning about the principles of the Bill of Rights? Are they writing about the systems of a republic, or about the freedom that supposedly comes from living in a democracy?

[image]

About the only thing I can tell from these trends is that a lot of people tried to figure out what a democracy was during the presidential elections. I was confused as to why the 2008 peak fell after the election until I figured out that the Guns N' Roses album Chinese Democracy album came out on November 23.

Ascetic Feminism

Jack Donovan · 8 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

For women, there are both ascetic and indulgent styles of feminist extremism. There are humorless academics and angry bra-burners, certainly, but modern feminist women tend to be more self-indulgent—at least in theory. Take, for example, the recent Toronto "Slut March." Many women see feminism an invitation to reject boundaries, to live as they please, to "suck the marrow out of life."

(h/t Richard Spencer)

In contrast, extreme feminist ideology in men requires ascetic discipline.

For a relative handful of particularly effeminate gay and transgendered males, extreme feminism is attractive because it offers freedom from the expectations of other men and traditional sex roles. Transgendered feminist R.W. Connell, author of Masculinities, would fit into this category. However, according to a recent estimate, exclusive gays and the transgendered may make up as little as 2 and .3 percent of the population, respectively.

For the majority of men, feminism does not offer equal parts of "freedom" and "discipline." Feminism requires men to self-examine, repent, and—as one extremist put it—"refuse to be a man." For men to ensure that women have the opportunity to do whatever they want, men are asked to carefully examine and change their own behavior. In response to a popular bumper sticker, I would say that:

Feminism is the radical notion that men should stop doing whatever women say, so that women can do whatever the hell they want.

While women march together proudly as sluts, male feminists like Jackson Katz teach workshops and offer men lists of things they should do to combat gender violence.

> TEN THINGS MEN CAN DO TO PREVENT GENDER VIOLENCE
> 1. Approach gender violence as a MEN'S issue involving men of all ages and socioeconomic, racial and ethnic backgrounds. View men not only as perpetrators or possible offenders, but as empowered bystanders who can confront abusive peers
> 2. If a brother, friend, classmate, or teammate is abusing his female partner — or is disrespectful or abusive to girls and women in general — don't look the other way. If you feel comfortable doing so, try to talk to him about it. Urge him to seek help. Or if you don't know what to do, consult a friend, a parent, a professor, or a counselor. DON'T REMAIN SILENT.
> 3. Have the courage to look inward. Question your own attitudes. Don't be defensive when something you do or say ends up hurting someone else. Try hard to understand how your own attitudes and actions might inadvertently perpetuate sexism and violence, and work toward changing them.
> 4. If you suspect that a woman close to you is being abused or has been sexually assaulted, gently ask if you can help.
> 5. If you are emotionally, psychologically, physically, or sexually abusive to women, or have been in the past, seek professional help NOW.
> 6. Be an ally to women who are working to end all forms of gender violence. Support the work of campus-based women's centers. Attend "Take Back the Night" rallies and other public events. Raise money for community-based rape crisis centers and battered women's shelters. If you belong to a team or fraternity, or another student group, organize a fundraiser.
> 7. Recognize and speak out against homophobia and gay-bashing. Discrimination and violence against lesbians and gays are wrong in and of themselves. This abuse also has direct links to sexism (eg. the sexual orientation of men who speak out against sexism is often questioned, a conscious or unconscious strategy > intended to silence them. This is a key reason few men do so).

> 8. Attend programs, take courses, watch films, and read articles and books about multicultural masculinities, gender inequality, and the root causes of gender violence. Educate yourself and others about how larger social forces affect the conflicts between individual men and women.
> 9. Don't fund sexism. Refuse to purchase any magazine, rent any video, subscribe to any Web site, or buy any music that portrays girls or women in a sexually degrading or abusive manner. Protest sexism in the media.
> 10. Mentor and teach young boys about how to be men in ways that don't involve degrading or abusing girls and women. Volunteer to work with gender violence prevention programs, including anti-sexist men's programs. Lead by example

Feminism calls men to monitor their language and to reject certain worldly goods and pleasures for the feminist cause. Feminst men are asked to put aside their own interests to attend seminars and counseling sessions to study feminist dogma. They are asked to become evangelists, accusers and informers. Finally, men are asked to transform themselves—to undergo a re-birth and become "new men." A new, difficult to watch video making the rounds from "conscious men" captures the essence of male feminist asceticism.

This ascetic feminism is a form of goddess-worship. It is clear that these men do not see women as they are, but as divine creatures who are more connected to the earth, more harmonious, and more innocent than men. They can't see that women are human animals pursuing their own selfish interests—just like men.

"Conscious men" Arjuna Ardagh and Gay Hendricks openly admit on their web site and in their video that they "worship women." While the video above is probably even a bit over the top for academic feminists like Micheal Kimmel or Jackson Katz, what it asks of men is not so new or different. The portrayal of men as greedy, raping war-mongers and women as noble, gentle, angelic souls who only want freedom, equality and harmony is a consistent cliché in pro-feminist writing by men.

A certain portion of men find themselves particularly drawn to ascetic pursuits, but most men can appreciate asceticism on some level or other. The Catholic Encyclopedia has a comprehensive article on various forms of religious and non-religious asceticsm. The word asceticism comes from the Greek askesis—meaning practice, exercise and bodily training. This link between physical and mental discipline sheds a little light on what men and some women find attractive about ascetic lifestyles.

Asceticism is strength turned inward; it requires inner discipline—exercise for the soul. Self denial requires strength and self-mastery, and it has a momentum of its own. Self-discipline is admirable, but for some it can spiral downward into self-negation, and the denial of one's own will to power. As the Catholics might offer, it can also engender a perverse form of "holier-than-thou" vanity.

Male feminists find themselves on a spiritual quest to "save women" through self-denial and solemn religiosity. They self-flaggelate and confess and do penance for the original sin of being born male. As woman-worshippers, they give women the god-like power of absolution, and kneel before her as supplicants seeking grace.

This inequality and slavish devotion to a mythical ideal of women among male feminists cannot be over-emphasized. Shaming them as "manginas" only reinforces their belief system and feeds into their sense of righteousness about the overcoming of traditional sex roles. Recognizing them as cultish, fetishistic woman-worshippers and slavish self-flagellating self-deniers reveals more about the ascetic masochism of the male feminist.

Free Speech and the Men's Rights Movement, Pt. II

By Lee Raconteur

Two months ago RAMZPaul, the former editor of MGTOW forum on ProBoards, wrote a piece about the tendency for the critics of Men's Rights to engage in silencing campaigns such as complaining to the hosting account of your website to have it removed. Since most hosters are busy and cannot be bothered to fight for their clients, almost all of them will instantly cave to this politically correct terror tactic. Were it true that all that the critics of Men's Issues do is complain to the abuse department of your local server farm – they have other arrows in their quiver and they began to use them last week.

Since that article has appeared and the closure of MGTOW, three other fora at that location – Happy Bachelors, MasculistMan and the forum I moderated, Don't Marry, have all fallen under the knife of the 'Abuse Department' in the past two weeks. Being the enterprising sorts that we are, two of three of those fora were reconstituted within 12 hours at new locations.

What happened next, however, was surprising and more than a bit shocking.

On Thursday, March 29th a co-ordinated attack began on several sites, including the three new successor sites I mentioned above. This included script attacks to seize control of email accounts, .php exploits, DDOS via serial uploading of large files to overload a server, attempts to spam forum registrations, repeated hits on the 404 Error page causing a spike in bandwidth, profile spamming of fora and, most troubling, a successful DNS redirect exploit that had those three fora and several others redirect to other random pages for the better part of two days. The targeted sites were only and exclusively Men's Issues in nature and content – no other sites that we are aware of were targeted in this fashion by this particular collection of methods. The timing of this, of course, with the arrival of April Fool's Day in North America is likely not coincidental, but in light of the ongoing weeks long campaign against content such as appears here on The Spearhead, these new elevations were more than an annoyance.

The writing of this article was delayed by several days after I received the go-ahead, due to further attacks on my site and the sites of others in the Men's Issues community. There have been several 'Eras' within the community when many sites and fora were deleted, or experienced a "burndown". 2000-2003 was one of them. 2007 saw a few blogs go dark, but this episode backed by skillful and willful hacking attempts is the largest and most focused to date.

It is no secret to many old guard that there are several sites that due to security exploits and the absense of their owners, have fallen in to a state of limbo and disrepair even while they still maintain a visible web presence. This technological weakness of Men's Issues sites is something that must be addressed so that we can maintain secure sites going forward. Several forum and site owners are working on a set of guidelines tailored to those of us who have a website. While much of this is generic to basic server security there are several methods that are employed against us that are particular to the Men's Issues community and must be addressed if we are to be successful with administering our own websites going forward.

However, a defensive strategy is just one leg of our response to such attacks. We must also respond to these continued and ongoing attacks against our sites that have, as far as I have been able to determine, been ongoing on the Internet since 1998.We must stop acting only from a defensive posture. We need to add an offensive aspect to our campaign to secure our right to free speech. This has gone on long enough.

To borrow heavily from Jean Luc Picard:

"They invade our webspace, and we fall back. They assimilate countless sites and fora, and we fall back. Not again. Not this time. The line must be drawn here! This far, no farther!"

We cannot continue to construct sites, build a viewership and basically wait for someone to take them down, only to rebuild them with tighter security and more precautions over and over again. Each time this occurs we lose a bit of momentum, energy and focus. Crucially, we lose the ability to present our sites as potential money makers to advertisers; this is an essential step to self-sufficiency, a perpetual web presence, and respectability.

Some members inevitably cannot find the new site and are lost.

Content is lost, threads, ideas, arguments and insight that help to build a strong case are deleted. Many ideas posted on fora are picked up by bloggers and expanded upon. This crucial incubator of ideas must not be allowed to be removed every few years for most sites.

In addition to posting articles to blogs such as The Spearhead we must also engage in a concerted – but completely legal and legitimate – campaign to confront those who pull the plug on our sites with little or no warning, the bloggers who openly and actively plan and execute intentional TOS attacks to get a hosting account terminated, and those who campaign via forum membership to willfully violate TOS agreements. A mix of articles posted to various article aggregating sites, blog posts, site articles and forum posts must be brought to bear upon this constant, pernicious attack on our ability to say what we wish to say and think what we wish to think, and freely express ourselves without the threat of harassment.

This has gone on for 15+ years now. We must actively and aggressively take actions against those who are constantly assaulting our rights to free speech and free thought.

The Era of Reaction must end.

The Insertion of Logic into an Illogical Machine

By Una Salus Victus

I have a theory on how the radicals gained momentum to become the 'new' feminist movement which has ultimately undermined the original tenets of the suffragists. The same scenario exists the world over. A movement gets underway and no matter the true intentions, not much headway occurs in enough areas to sustain itself for long. As such, the movement gains some ground and even gets the more important issues addressed, but inevitably fizzles out at some predictable point in the future. To combat this, some members either radicalize or radicals from outside the movement join the ranks. These members have the unique ability to fully utilize the Emotional Language (EL), as well as its' two sub forms: Propaganda (ELP) and Suggestion (ELS). Walls that were previously unassailable are now easily breached with these women at the helm.

In his book "Nonsense: Red Herrings, Straw Men and Sacred Cows: How We Abuse Logic in Our Everyday Language", Robert J. Gula breaks down the three forms of EL. I will include the ones that apply to this issue. (When I have finished this book, I'll do a review. So far, it has proven to be a piece of literature that everyone in the movement should acquaint themselves with in order to better understand the machinations of the radfems arguments and learn effective ways to subvert them)

Emotional Language:

> Appeal to pity: Just when things begin to get difficult, a lot of women will employ this tactic.
> Plea for special treatment: This occurs every time a woman uses emotion to manipulate a situation in order to be treated with kid gloves (ie: crying)
> Appeal to guilt: closely connected to the appeal to pity
> Appeal to fear: If you don't do X then Y will happen. Of course, Y is something dreadful
> Appeal to flattery: If I'm a member of society X, then surely I have good sense; If I have good sense, then surely I will see the wisdom of a certain point of view.
> Appeal to Hope: If you do X, then Y will happen; therefore, if you want Y to happen, do X.
> Appeal to the Bandwagon: This one is familiar to all who have had to deal with the radfems.
> Appeal to Pride or Loyalty: If you really are proud of your country, if you really want to see her prosper and grow, then you'll do xxxx
> Argumentum ad Populum: This is the appeal to the crowd, to the mob, to the gallery. Generalities, clichés, slogans, platitudes, sanctimonious claptrap, and glorification of the masses abound.
> Emotional Language Propaganda:
> The Bandwagon: defined above
> Repetition: if you say something often enough, the masses will believe you.
> Oversimplification: The propagandist takes one side of a situation and treats the one side as if it were the only side.
> Name Calling: The propagandist assigns abusive epithets or uses names that have strong pejorative emotional associations to people or ideas she doesn't like (ie: misogynist, chauvinist, pig)
> Stereotyping: A variation of name-calling and oversimplification where one characteristic of a person is taken then exaggerated and regarded as the only characteristic.
> The Glittering Generality: The propagandist makes broad, sweeping statements, usually ones with complex and far-reaching ramifications, but ignores the complexities and the ramifications. (ie: All men are rapists)

> Slogans: The audience will remember the clever slogan without challenging the meaning of the slogan without even thinking about the meaning of the slogan (ie: Take Back the Night).
> Transfer: Designed with the purpose of transferring emotions from one source to another.
> Testimonial: Variation of the transfer technique. A prominent person will adopt the cause and speak on its behalf (ie: President Obama).
> Statistics Without Context: Statistics with no empirical foundation. (ie: "Less than 2% of all rape claims are false).
> The Manufactured Problem- The Bad Guy, The Scapegoat: The propagandist creates or exaggerates a problem, tries to convince you how serious the problem is, and then appeases you by blaming someone for that problem or by suggesting that his proposal will solve the problem. (ie: VAWA or SAFE Act).
> Arrant Distortion aka Card Stacking: Information selected presents a one-sided view; sometimes data is made up or simply false. Since we do not have the true facts, there is no way any of this can be challenged. (ie: the 2% clause, yet again)
> The Command: This technique is a dangerous one, for it can easily backfire. Some people are comfortable when they are being told what to do. When a command is given, it is designed to appeal to this need for authority (ie: all the women who blindly followed the radfems without considering the ramifications).

Catherine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin were using the above tactics when they mounted that campaign equating pornography with rape. The modern examples of the above tactics can easily be found within any divorce proceeding, family court, rape accusation, or VAWA.

Emotional Language Suggestion:

The Hint: Can be painfully obvious or artfully subtle.

Selection: Selectively offering limited information on a subject that doesn't address the whole point. If pursued no further, a belief is formed that unknowingly contradicts the reality of the situation.

Tone of Voice: This is self-explanatory.

Phraseology: Carefully phrased responses that lead others through emotion. "Saying Betty is late" vs. "Betty hasn't arrived yet", is the example given. They both say the same thing, however, the first statement comes across as disapproving while the second more neutral.

Word Choice: Vitriolic language anyone?

Juxtaposition: Two statements are made without any connection between them established. The mind of the listener will connect the statements despite the missing logic and, with that, an opinion will be formed.

Irrelevant Detail: Details inserted to bias an audience. The radfems have this tactic internalized.

Pompous Language: Often used to make the mundane and the trivial seem important

Image and Negative Image Words: Colorful descriptions of an event or position that is designed to capitalize upon the emotions of the audiences. (ie: defeated vs. slaughtered)

Controlling Phraseology: Leading questions and the like (ie: you feel the same way RIGHT?)

The significance of the above terms will present itself in the rest of this article.

An article titled, Sexual Harassment and the Loneliness of the Civil Libertarian Feminist appeared in 'The Atlantic', written by Wendy Kaminer on the 7th. In the wake of the politically driven farce that is currently happening at Yale University, it would seem that sensible dissent has occurred within some ranks of the feminist movement. Personally, I have never heard of the Libertarian Feminist but I have been made aware that they were the original members of the Second Wave and made the ill-fated decision to allow the radicals to step in and subvert the overall direction, which landed society into the bog where it currently exists. I would like to know, however, why they allowed themselves to go into near extinction? Where was their determination for their cause when they saw the direction it was headed? The writing on the wall was even in braille. Why are they so brave to stand up now, when other women have either been showing dissent all along (Christina Hoff Sommers) or have finally decided to step up? I have noticed from time to time that women will rarely stand alone for what they believe in but, instead, will nearly always follow the direction of the group. Such is the method of the Bandwagon. The numbers simply haven't grown enough for the deserters of the movement to stand up for the wrongs they must clearly see happening around them.

She begins with an explanation on Libertarian Feminists vs. Progressive Feminism. The irony of what she is saying is that this shows how the radfems have been systematically behaving in ways that would suggest that there is no reason for women to stand up; that the oppression is still far too strong. Essentially, they are behaving in ways that suggest that they are weak, both in mind and in purpose. The only way for the weak to evolve is to become strong. Without strength, there is no valid reason to stand up.

> Civil libertarian feminists have always been a political minority, but these days we seem on the verge of extinction. Reviewing the charges of sexual harassment underlying the Title IX complaint by a group of Yale students and alumnae, I can't find feminism — at least not if feminism includes independence, liberty, and power for women. Instead I find femininity — the assumption that women are incapable of fending for themselves in the marketplace of epithets or ideas, the belief that women are rendered helpless by misogynist speech and the sexist tantrums of their male peers

A point was made in the article that points to the overall flaw in feminism; the flaw being, in my opinion, that whenever adversity presents itself, a rule must be put in place to eliminate it. All this boils down to is, instead of standing up for what they supposedly believe they are entitled to, they wish for someone to stand in their stead.

> What accounts for such feminine timidity, this instinctive unwillingness or inability to talk or taunt back, without seeking the protection of university or government bureaucrats? Talking is apparently beside the point. "I just want to be able to walk back to my dorm at night without hearing all this crazy stuff from these guys," one student complains. I sympathize (I was a young woman once, too), but "hearing crazy stuff" from people in public is part of life in a free society, a society in which you enjoy equal rights to say crazy stuff.

Mike Adams wrote an article titled Feminists are No Better than Frat Boys that addresses this point effectively.

She later poses a question and then cites an argument on behalf of the radfems. The strategy that is being applied is the Argumentum ad Populum.

> What accounts for such feminine timidity, this instinctive unwillingness or inability to talk or taunt back, without seeking the protection of bureaucrats?
> Putatively progressive feminists might agree, if only they regarded women as equal to the task of talking back, if only they distinguished between men who "say stuff" about women and men who "do stuff" to women. In the feminist view reflected in the Yale draft complaint, the misogynist rants of some undergraduate men (perhaps a relatively small percentage of them) is not speech. It's a series of "dangerous," "sex-discriminatory threats" that "intimidate" and "terrorize" women, constituting a hostile environment (or "rape culture") that causes sexual violence.

At this point, it is worth remembering the story written in the American University student paper, The Eagle about the "Rules of Anonymous Sex". The backlash that article received was nothing short of apocalyptic. Feminist students went on a rant. One publicly accused, via her Facebook page, males she knew of rape, while others criminally vandalized public property in an attempt to prevent the article from being read. It was a day that showed the latent anger within those of the movement. The reason it is important to remember this is due to the fact that nothing was ever done about it. Even when the female students responsible for the vandalism publicly admitted their involvement, no pursuit of justice against their actions was made; concurrently, there was no whining from the male student body or any male, for that matter, to do so. Adapt and move on. Men are strong simply because they have this ability.

The following quote starkly illustrates the difference between how men behave and how radfems invariably choose the tactics of Appeal to Pity/Guilt and the Plea for Special treatment.

> The only incident of alleged harassment cited in the draft complaint that does not involve pure speech is an act of vandalism. In 2004 and 2005, fraternity brothers stole T-shirts featuring the stories of "rape survivors" from a Take Back the Night project and photographed pledges wearing the T-shirts. But, perversely, this theft to which free speech is irrelevant provokes the only expression of concern for it: "To steal these T-shirts is akin to stealing the voices of the victims," the draft complaint melodramatically asserts — as if the victims were prevented from repeating and reclaiming their stories. If the T-shirt theft was intended to censor women, its success depended on their willingness to respond by censoring themselves.

Notice the Manufactured Problem and Transference techniques? Despite what their sisters will do to men in the name of standing up for the cause, when it is done to them, all they seem capable of doing is crying about how unfair it is that they are being treated this way or how they are oppressed and need more support. It is hard to imagine that this is the group who continually state that they are the equal of men. See, there is another side of male strength that is beginning to show itself. It occurs when a point is reached where adaptation is no longer an option and fighting back becomes much more feasible. There's a saying about dogs and how they will only allow themselves to be kicked for so long before they either leave (MGTOW) or fight back. That none of this was considered is laughable. The women who whine about men not wanting to marry OR WORSE the ones who whine about (and even attempt to instruct others about true beauty) men not finding them attractive despite their attitude or looks compose this category.

The rest of the article deals with the denial and loss of liberty that the US is descending to the level of. Kaminer makes the point that liberty is being both unlearned and forgotten without so much as a batted eye or appreciation of its significance.

> Sad to say, but feminism helped lead the assault on civil liberty and now seems practically subsumed by it. Decades ago, when Catherine MacKinnon, Andrea Dworkin, and their followers began equating pornography with rape (literally) and calling it a civil-rights violation, groups of free-speech feminists fought back, in print, at conferences, and in state legislatures, with some success. We won some battles (and free speech advocates in general can take solace in the Supreme Court's recent decision upholding the right to engage in offensive speech on public property and public affairs). But all things considered (notably the generations of students "unlearning liberty") we seem to be losing the war, especially among progressives.

Another ironic point in all of this is that when liberty is eroded to the point where it is either non-existent or used in convenience, the radfems will likely be the first to scream about it being denied them.

In my short time on the battlefield of the sexes I have continually noticed double standards from the side of the feminists. It defies logic how those who behave like children wish to be classified as adults. It's as if discipline both self (ie: responsibility for one's own actions) and over others (ie: proper child rearing) are the most misunderstood of terms. All we are left with is a stubborn narcissism that stands opposed to their very foundation. That they don't see this, further amazes me.

In closing, I reach out to you readers. I am studying pre-law at George Mason University, yet I cannot find the reason why any of what is happening at Yale University falls under the auspices of Title IX. As I understand it, Title IX pertains to barring admission of others based upon their sex (don't get me started on how the radfems break up every male only institution under this law, yet insist that female only places are justified). Is there one (or more) among you who can explain this to me?

She’s an Assassin — And She’s “Special”

The ass-kicking chick flicks are getting more and more ridiculous as time goes on. In “Hanna” a girl is raised by her father to be a vicious killer somewhere in the arctic. Hanna is played by Saoirse Ronan, an Irish girl with a sweet smile who looks about as tough as a bunny rabbit. Nevertheless, we are supposed to suspend disbelief and accept that this waif is capable of breaking necks with a single blow.

As a father myself, the last thing I want to raise my daughter to be is a stone-cold killer, a job most girls are entirely incapable of in any event. One funny part of the trailer shows Hanna doing pull-ups with her father. In general, women can’t do pull-ups, and the vanishingly few who can don’t look much like Saoirse Ronan.

I know there were a few action shows about women in the 1970s, such as Wonder Woman and The Bionic Woman, but the genre seems to have really taken off some time in the 90s. I attribute this in part to the Hong Kong action flicks, which often feature female fighters. However, a major difference between the HK movies and the Western ones is that the good guys in HK movies often beat the crap out of bad female characters. Another thing is that these movies in China were an outgrowth of Chinese opera, which features a great deal of dancing and gymnastics that require years of training to master. The Western heroines are jokes in that regard — none has anything even close to the athleticism of a real Chinese martial arts actor.

Abuse Shelter Exploits Mentally-Ill Woman to Push Political Agenda

I've reported over the years on the problems facing our nations' abuse shelters, including funding woes, over-worked staff, loosey-goosey procedures, and even illegal conduct. But nowhere have I seen what I'm going to reveal about the Next Step, a shelter located near Bar Harbor in lobster-addled Maine…

On March 15, 2007, the Maine Coalition to End Domestic Violence unveiled three ambitious bills. One bill would create a new class of crimes for "domestic violence assaults." A second bill would establish a so-called "predominant aggressor" policy that would help police sort out cases of mutual abuse. And the third bill would restore $1.9 million from previous budget cuts: http://www.nextstepdvproject.org/2008-dv-legislation/

But to get political traction, the issue would need to garner loads of media coverage. And enticing media interest would require…you guessed it…flesh and blood victims.

As revealed by blog entries on its website, the Next Step staff is a politically active bunch, making frequent lobbying forays to the state capitol in Augusta. The shelter workers knew they desperately needed to find a poster child who could be paraded around so legislators could be persuaded to sign on to the proposed laws.

Problem is, victims of battering are in short supply these days. So when no victim is known to exist, the solution is obvious: fabricate one!

Following is the account of Ligia Filler, 41, a native of Guatemala and ersatz domestic violence victim. A web of police reports, judge's orders, sworn testimony, and a recent Maine Supreme Court decision forms the basis for the improbable tale I'm about to share…

Abandoned as a child, Ligia first traveled to the United States at age 17 to meet her parents for the first time. By then Ligia had developed severe psychological problems, attempting suicide several times.

In 1991 she met Vladek Filler. They married and eventually had two children. But the marital union didn't resolve the emotional torment; in fact, she repeatedly abused the children, both physically and emotionally. Once she punched Vladek in the face in front of the children.

A judge would later award custody of the children to the father, finding that "The children were victims of violence from their mother," including hitting one child "with spatulas and spoons, leaving bruises."

The children began to speak openly about wanting to avoid their mother for their own safety. In the Spring of 2007, Vladek decided he had to take necessary steps to protect the kids from the escalating abuse.

When he announced that he and the children would soon be leaving the marital residence, Ligia went into a funk that turned rageful, her abuse quickly spinning out of control.

The following day, Vladek contacted the Next Step shelter, begging for help. Not only did Next Step refuse his request, the staff mocked him. Little did he realize that the Next Step had already taken Ligia under its wing, coaching her to make allegations of domestic violence against the very victim of her long-standing abuse, Vladek Filler.

April 24 witnessed a complete break-down, with a partially dressed Ligia running in the streets, vowing to kill police officers on the scene, and accusing Vladek of child molestation and marital rape. One officer can be heard remarking the woman was "certifiable" for involuntary commitment: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GsKIcQhjaJg&feature=player_embedded#at=20

Regarding the child molestation claim, the Ellsworth District Court later ruled, "That allegation was false and known to be false. She has shown a capacity to manufacture claims."

But inexplicably, a marital rape accusation by an unhinged woman was viewed as credible. Vladek was arrested and charged.

Ligia was carted off to the hospital for a shrink-check. And as soon as she was released, Ligia became a god-send for the Next Step and its stalled legislative agenda.

Knowing that the Next Step was footing the legal bill, Ligia allowed herself to be persuaded to make lurid allegations of sexual violations, shamelessly amplified by the local prosecutor. “It was sexual punishment,” prosecutor Mary Kellett recounted with a straight face to the Bangor Daily News. “It was punitive and angry.”

Maine newspapers would eventually run 11 separate stories on the case, replete with riveting details of the alleged attack.

The facts that Ligia was a known child abuser, that there was no confirmatory medical or forensic evidence, that she refused a rape kit evaluation, that she was likely motivated by an impending custody dispute, and that Ligia was known to locals as “that crazy woman” gave little pause to the media bloodhounds.

During the trial, DA Kellett improperly withheld key exculpatory evidence, leading the Maine Supreme Court to later chastise her for prosecutorial misconduct and to remand the case for a retrial: http://www.courts.state.me.us/court_info/opinions/2010%20documents/10me90fi.pdf

The Next Step’s devious ploy was successful, the political payoff incalculable. All three domestic violence bills introduced in March were enacted into law. At the ceremonial signing on July 25, 2007, Gov. John Baldacci marveled at the achievement, warning, “Too many women and children are being victimized, and each story is tragic and compelling.”

Vladek Filler and his two children, victims of an abusive woman, were not in attendance. And Ligia, now divorced and estranged from her children, has yet to receive the mental health treatment she so desperately needs.

Elusive Wapiti · 11 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

John Taylor Gatto, author of An Underground History of American Education[image] (which I review here), drafted a synopsis of his landmark book for inclusion a larger compendium entitled Everything You Know Is Wrong[image]. (Note: EYKIW is available on Google Books here, my review of EYKIW is here, and Gatto's synopsis of Underground History contained within EYKIW may be found here).

In this article, Gatto aims to, ironically, "re-educate" Americans on the purpose(s) and methodology of their compulsory public schooling (PS) system. A quote from his article frames his argument the best:

> It was only the law of nature as they perceived it, working progressively as capitalism itself did for the ultimate good of all. The real force behind school effort came from true believers of many persuasions, linked together mainly by their belief that family and church were retrograde institutions standing in the way of progress. Far beyond the myriad practical details and economic considerations there existed a kind of grail-quest, an idea capable of catching the imagination of dreamers and firing the blood of zealots.
> The entire academic community in the US and abroad had been Darwinized and Galtonized by this time, and to this contingent, school seemed an instrument for managing evolutionary destiny [emphasis mine, EW].

But discuss Gatto does, and the lessons come quickly. The first one is that the aim of PS system is not to educate, but to "impose on the young the ideal of subordination" to the aims of the political State, as well as produce two kind of workers…"one class to have a liberal education [and] a much larger class…to forgo the privilege of a liberal education and fit themselves to perform specific manual tasks"* fit to labor in the nation's factories.

Second, the school system teaches that only a certain small elite shall rule, both through structure (the two-tier educational system), and through each student's personal experience in the social cauldron of the PS. Howso? By being lumped in with peers a la Lord of the Flies[image], each student sees how cruel and irresponsible their peers can be, first-hand, in a mass demonstration of human deficiency. It is not hard to imagine how the PS system, by conditioning the citizenry to believe in their hearts that their peers are cruel and intellectually stunted beings incapable of self-control, trains the populace to accept, even desire, the yoke of heavy government. This conviction feeds the growth of the State and with that growth liberty retreats.

Third, the PS system bears the indelible mark of the socialist, even fascist, philosophy in vogue at the time of its creation. Consider the mission statement of Rockefeller's General Education Board in 1906:

> In our dreams…people yield themselves with perfect docility to our molding hands. The present educational conventions [intellectual and character education] fade from our minds, and unhampered by tradition, we work our own good will upon a grateful and responsive folk. We shall not try to make these people or any of their children into philosophers or men of learning or men of science. we have not to raise up from among them authors, educators, poets, or men of letters. We shall not search for embryo [sic] great artists, painters, musicians, nor lawyers, doctor, preachers, politicians, statesmen, of whom we have amply supply. The task we set before ourselves is very simple…we will organize children..and teach them to do in a perfect way the things their fathers and mothers are doing in an imperfect way.

This mission statement makes it clear that the mission of compulsory public schooling is to mold, to centrally direct, and to indoctrinate. NOT educate.

Gatto's fourth lesson is that the PS system utterly fails in its mission to school, providing as evidence plummeting literacy rates after compulsory public schooling was implemented nationwide. Whereas before they were literate, but after they were not. So much so, in fact, that just after World War II, the Army could not believe literacy had fallen so much in a generation that they commissioned a study to find out how over half a million recruits had attempted to fake illiteracy. They hadn't quite yet discovered that yes, their recruits really were that illiterate, and no, they weren't faking it.

Fifth, the PS trains the student to anesthetize themselves, to alienate themselves from themselves, from their families, religions, and culture. Why? So that they could not adequately resist being led by whichever leader was appointed over them. Independent-thinking men are potential revolutionaries. Another quote, from a luminary late 19th-century educator William Torrey Harris:

> Ninety-nine [students] out of a hundred are automata, careful to walk in prescribed paths, careful to follow the prescribed curriculum. This is not an accident but the result of substantial education, which, scientifically defined, is the subsumption of the individual. The great purpose of school can be realized better in dark, airless, ugly places…it is to master the physical self, to transcend the beauty of nature. School should develop the power to withdraw from the external world

The sixth lesson Gatto imparts is the PS system was "expressly created to serve a command economy and a command society, one which the controlling coalition would be drawn from important institutional stakeholders in the future". One can only speculate as to who this "controlling coalition" will be comprised of. The PS system was designed to accomplish this command economy / command society task with six functions:

1. adjustive (how subordinates react to authority),
2. diagnostic (determining the students "proper" role),
3. sorting (training students to serve in their determined role),
4. conformity (children shall be produced so that they are all alike. Standardized testing serves this purpose),
5. genetic hygiene (tagging the unfit so clearly their genes are eliminated from the gene pool…what we men know as the *glass cellar), and
6. continuity (training the next generation of educators).

Many may still be asking, even after reading those lessons, "how is such a diatribe against compulsory public schooling relevant to the manosphere?" The answer, my friends, is simple: members of the manosphere desire freedom, and the public school system is designed to choke off that desire. Instead, it is designed to create and indoctrinate dim, unquestioning subjects to serve as cogs in the great corporatist machine. Your freedoms and futures, and that of your sons and daughters, depends upon your and their ability to think for your- and themselves, and that ability is in many ways contingent upon sidestepping this indoctrination camp, or rehabilitating others who have escaped with their lives and minds intact.

In the end, it is the ultimate rebellion, the clearest expression of 'taking the red pill': how clearly may we, and those whom we love and have custodial responsibility for, see when our thinking is not clouded and our habits are not molded by the social and mental conditioning acquired in halls of concrete and steel with a program of instruction approved by and implemented by agents of the corporatist State? If we want a revolution…that is, a change in how things are…our first step is to free our minds and that of our sons and daughters.

I'll end this column with a quote from, appropriately so, Lenin

> Give me four years to teach the children and the seed I have sown will never be uprooted.

and Der Fuhrer

> When an opponent declares, "I will not come over to your side," I calmly say, "Your child belongs to us already… What are you? You will pass on. Your descendants, however, now stand in the new camp. In a short > time they will know nothing else but this new community."

* This quote is from the world's first fascist head of state, Woodrow Wilson. The quote may be found here.

 I expand upon Warren Farrell's seminal definition of glass cellar to capture also the social condition of men in our society who fall through the cracks. Consider the homeless person, and ponder why is it one sees so few women homeless, vagrants, and bums?

 Boys in particular suffer badly in a PS system, if for no other reason than their maladaptation to such a stupefying environment begs disciplinary action and forced medication.

When Titanic Sank 99 Years Ago This Week, People Were More Honest About Gender Roles Than They Are Today

pierceharlan · 11 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

If I were to ask you to think of a hero who refused to give up his or her seat on a vehicle of public accommodation merely because of their birth class, you likely would think of Rosa Parks, a black woman who refused to give up her seat in the front of a Montgomery, Alabama bus in 1955, even though the seats up front were "reserved" for white people.

You likely would not think of J. Bruce Ismay. Ismay was chairman of the company that owned Titanic, who famously survived the disaster, 99 years ago this week, but was widely accused of cowardice because he took a seat in a lifeboat that, many believed, could have gone to a woman. No one has ever confused Mr. Ismay with Ms. Parks, but one could ask the same question about both: should someone be deprived of their seat — on a bus, a train, a roller coaster, or even a lifeboat — simply because of their birth class? Both Mr. Ismay and Ms. Parks stayed in their seats, yet Mr. Ismay is widely reviled as a coward while Ms. Parks is properly lionized as a civil rights icon, because men are expected to give up their seats in the lifeboat for members of the opposite sex. Even today.

A newspaper article written shortly after the Titanic disaster talked about the "armchair hero" who would sooner sit in judgment of the men who did not lose their lives on the ill-fated ship than applaud the contributions of those who did. The article explained: "'Women and children first,' is the rule of the sea. In the case of the Titanic, it was 'Women, children, and pet dogs.' But the armchair hero would press this rule so far as to veto the escape of any man at all. It is probable that many men died rather than face the armchair hero, who would demand explanations from them of their cowardice in daring to be alive. Perhaps this explains why some of the boats were not filled. The armchair hero is not appeased by the appalling death-roll of men. He asks for more. Surely this is sentiment gone mad, chivalry gone to seed." Excerpt here:
http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2010/07/empty-seats-on-titanics-lifeboats-and.html

It is well to remember Titanic for a number of reasons, not the least of which are its lessons about gender, which still resonate today. For the uninitiated, the disaster struck men much harder than women, because the men aboard Titanic were societally expected to sacrifice their lives for women, and they obliged. The startling demographics from the disaster are as follows:

114 women died, 324 women survived: 72% of the women survived.

In 1912, chivalry was a powerful social influence, and here's the difference from today: both its practitioners and beneficiaries knew it. The giant front page headline of the April 16, 1912 Arizona Journal-Miner read as follows: "1800 ARE LOST IN OCEAN . . . Report is That Most of Saved are Women And Children Indicating Chivalry On Part of Adult Male Passengers."

While the overwhelming consensus at the time was to salute the brave men who gave their lives, the sentiments of one group, the suffragettes, were decidedly less laudatory. The suffragettes seemed to understand that special, undeserved privilege for women did not comport with the gender equality they championed, so they simply refused to acknowledge that the treatment women received was either special or undeserved.

Some of them declared that the propagation of the human race depended on chivalry, but their reasoning had more leaks than Titanic. This, according to the New York Times, April 19, 1912:

"English Suffragettes of prominence, when questioned as to what they thought of the men who died on the Titanic in order that women might be saved, seem to have manifested a disposition, possibly significant, almost to resent the inquirer's obvious belief that the display of chivalry was magnificent. While the strenuous ladies did not deny that the behaviour of the men was rather fine, they hinted that after all it only fulfilled a plain duty and therefore had not earned any particularly enthusiastic praise.

"As one of the suffragettes put the case, by natural law women and children should be saved first, the children because childhood is sacred, and the women because they are so necessary to the race that they cannot be spared. Another said: 'It must be admitted that the lives of women are more useful to the race than the lives of men."

(New York Times, April 19, 1912)

If women were spared because of their child-bearing duties, the suffragettes never bothered to explain why the many women beyond child-bearing years were also spared while their male counterparts, who were able to produce sperm throughout their lives, condemned themselves to an icy grave and the worst kind of death.

Another suffragette went so far as to suggest that men and women aboard Titanic were, in fact, treated equally, even though the men largely died and the women largely were saved. This was so because the "women, though saved through the noble sacrifice of men, were in the equally hard situation of having to see the ship go down" (New York Times, April 20, 1912) You see, there was no qualitative difference between the sacrifice of the persons who actually gave up their lives and the persons for whom that sacrifice was made. Who would have guessed?

The suffragettes wanted their equality but weren't prepared to give up their belief that women were entitled to special treatment, for reasons they couldn't rationally explain.

But most everyone else understood that women were singled out for special treatment on the Titanic, and it was apparent to those who thought about it that such special treatment did not comport with gender equality. Following the disaster, Clark McAdams, columnist for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, contrasted women's desire for the vote with what occurred on Titanic. In significant respects, the poem's words still speak to us:

"Votes for women!"

Was the cry,

Reaching upward to the Sky.

Crashing glass

And flashing eye-

"Votes for Women!"

Was the cry.

"Boats for women!"

Was the Cry.

When the brave

Were come to die.

When the end

Was drawing nigh-

"Boats for women!"

Was the cry.

Nevertheless, the men's chivalry was widely applauded, and the views trivializing the sacrifice of the men did not play well. The headline for an April 20, 1912 New York Times story was openly disdainful of the suffragettes:

SUFFRAGETTES DENY CHIVALRY ON TITANIC

“Women first” Is the Universal Rule, says Sylvia Pankhurst, and This Is No Exception

SACRIFICE IS SCOFFED AT

Jangling Note Disgusts English Nation, Proud of the Way Men Died

Consistent with the prevailing sentiment, and fittingly enough, a 13-foot tall statue in Washington, D.C. erected in 1931 by the Women’s Titanic Memorial Association honors the brave men who gave their lives on Titanic. The inscription reads:

TO THE BRAVE MEN WHO PERISHED

IN THE WRECK OF THE TITANIC APRIL 15 1912

THEY GAVE THEIR LIVES THAT

WOMEN AND CHILDREN MIGHT BE SAVED

ERECTED BY THE WOMEN OF AMERICA

The memorial was not without its detractors. “Some feminists criticized the memorial, saying it was inappropriate to not only commemorate but perpetuate the notion of chivalry. Margaret [Molly Brown] responded that she thought it was very brave that some men had chosen to step aside and let women and children live — but the gesture should never have been required by law or custom.” (Molly Brown: Unraveling the Myth, by Kristen Iversen, Muffet Brown at 226 (1999).)

Molly Brown, of course, “got it.” If only her kind of rational thinking had prevailed.

Now, almost 100 years after Titanic, in important ways, we are less honest about gender than we were when the mighty ship sank. In 1912, society freely acknowleged the chivalry at work on Titanic.

Today, we claim to embrace gender equality, yet chivaly is alive and well and manifests itself in countless ways — and we pretend it doesn’t exist. Like the elephant in the room, it leaves its imprint on virtually every institution, but it’s entirely too politically incorrect to acknowledge. It manifests itself in family law proceedings; the objectively proven gender disparities in criminal sentencing; the lopsided government funding asymmetry favoring diseases affecting women over diseases that affect men; the requirement that only males must register for selective service and that only males may serve in combat; the special government programs that assist girls in school but not boys even though boys need more help; and the fact that there are numerous programs that assist women breaking into the the business world while there are no programs that assist men breaking into the domestic world. And we could go on and on and on, but you already know this.

Like the suffragettes, deep down we are certain that chivalry can’t be reconciled with our enlightened notions of gender equality, so we do what the suffragettes did — we deny it exists, or we rationalize it away. In 1912, such denial was limited to one marginalized group and was disparaged by society as a whole. Today, denial of chivalry is so widespread it’s the norm.

It is no epiphany that the chivalry that manifests itself in our modern institutions is wholly inconsistent with gender equality. This isn’t something concocted by men’s rights groups; it was apparent even when Titanic sank. In the aftermath of the Titanic disaster, a smart woman writing about the astounding chivalry of the Titanic’s men also couldn’t help but notice the decline of chivalry in everyday life. She well understood that chivalry must give way if true equality is to flourish. It is too bad her words aren’t etched into the hearts of all who preach gender equality but close their eyes to the chivalry that disadvantages men. Here’s what she wrote, less than one month after Titanic sank:

“‘Men are not what they were.’ The phrase falls from the lips of every woman. In it’s train falls the stereotyped indictment: Politeness is a forgotten art; deference to womankind is unknown. In a packed tram, the woman is allowed to stand while the man sits; in a rush for the boat, the woman is shoved aside by the more muscular man; in offices or shop, the girl worker receives no consideration from the man; and so on and so on. The grievance is lengthy…

"Yet it may all be true. Very likely 'men are not what they were' because, you see, women are not what they were, and things have to balance themselves. We decline altogether these days to have a sphere of our own; we walk triumphantly into man's. We not only want, we insist on having, his privileges, his pleasures, his work, occasionally ousting him out of them, in any case sharing them willy nilly…

"But we must remember what Nursie taught us long years ago; you cannot have your cake and eat it, much as you wish to. And if man finds you persistently invading his domain, sharing his pursuits, working as a man, acting as a man, aping man's free and easy arrogance, he is apt to forget, despite your apology for petticoats, that you are not a man. You want to be a free and independent comrade? Well, then, accept the penalties as well as the pleasures of comradeship."

Polish Feminism, or how to forget the past and ruin the future

By M

A recent post on /r/MensRights, and an article on on the http://theantifeminist.com/ pondered on whether the public opinion was indeed shifting to be more sympathetic towards the MRM, and the latter linked, as evidence, to the comments section of a Guardian article entitled Polish feminism is no longer ridiculed. The comments were indeed largely opposed to the author's suggestion that Poland's Prime Minister, Donald Tusk, should force a 50% women electoral quota, instead of backing off and requiring only 35%. But being somewhat acquainted with Poland's particular history of gender relations, and its current sociopolitical climate, I found the article to be even more fascinating. One could say, the same old story, but different. Here is what the author thought to be an honest justification for her discriminatory requirements:

> Together, the laws may bring about real change. Poland has one of the lowest proportions of women in the labour market in Europe (53%, compared with the EU average of about 60%). Lack of accessible childcare is a major factor. Workplace discrimination is widespread. The wage gap, now broadly discussed in the media, is about 23%. The last to be hired, the first to be fired, more likely to be stuck with uncertain, short-term employment with no benefits, women have clearly been losers in Poland's turn to free market economy. Young women lose their jobs when pregnant, older women are pushed out of their jobs and asked to retire. Prospects for a decent pension may be grim for all, due to financial and demographic crises, but they are far grimmer for women, who not only earn less, but retire five years earlier then men (60 and 65 respectively). If enough women can leave toddlers in nursery schools and head to work, and if enough women can get elected and press for gender justice, at least some of this might change.

Now for some background: after WW2, Poland, like many other countries on the wrong side (east) of Europe were forced into a communist regime sponsored by the ol' USSR. But Poland's opposition to this political coercion was arguably one of the strongest out of all the so called satellite states. It was partly due to the religiousness of the population, and culminated into the Solidarity movement, contributing to the crumbling of the Soviet block. What happened thereafter was not unique, and could be observed in most of Eastern Europe: massive unemployment, a fragile economy, important emigration and bleak future prospects. But, contrary to a few ex-communist countries, like Russia, whose population somewhat regretted the "glorious" days, most people in Poland still prefered this socioeconomic disaster to the authoritarian government that preceded it. The anticommunist sentiment was strong, so strong in fact that the leading political party still had the punishment of criminal communist officials on their agenda.

Why is this so important? Communism was the gender equality utopia many feminists dream about, if the lowest common denominator is a desirable goal. Men and women had equal rights, equal enrollment rates in schools, equal job opportunities and, according to most, an equally difficult life. Healthcare was freely available, abortion encouraged, marital disputes always fair (it is quite easy to split zero into two equal parts) and places to drop your child to be indoctrinated while you're off to work were right around the corner. But for some baffling reason, most Poles didn't want that. So when the red regime ended, and the communist party got outlawed, it is only natural that most people looked at feminism, which seemingly wanted to go back to the nightmare so many fought to get rid of, with a sense of mistrust.

So feminism was out, and women were oppressed as a result. Let's look at the claims: 53% women on the labour market, in a union average of 60%. Seeing as Poland had not so long ago a very high unemployment rate, this is hardly surprising. The other quotes are just as misleading: lack of accessible childcare (as opposed to all other accessible social services?) the wage gap (taken of course as money earned yearly, which is then on par with the rest of the western world) the fact women retire earlier (companies are forcing women to retire and men have the “privilege” to work until 65) and all sort of generic comments not backed up by any numbers or research (women hired last and fired first). In short, complete disregard for context, whether political, social, economic or statistical. Not present in the excerpt above is the usual blame on the Catholic Church, with the simultaneous refusal to acknowledge that women in this society are even more religious than men, and a large number is against abortion, happy with the idea of becoming a stay-at-home mother, and otherwise couldn’t care less about all the “injustices” mentioned here. Once again, we see feminists trying to drag these women out to work against their will, because of a special care for women’s “choices”.

But things seem to be changing. The younger generation has forgotten or simply hasn’t lived through the hardships of the past. Tuned to western media and culture, they have accepted the foreign misandric messages. That is why feminism is no longer ridiculed, but it is still in a very odd situation: between older women who were raised under a regime that basically claimed total equality in outcome was the ultimate goal, but who were told at church abortion is criminal and they should be good mothers, and younger who may still be influenced by the advice of their grandmothers, but who absorb the American claim they are being (or even have been) oppressed, the dogma is still weak but evidently getting stronger. Let’s not forget Poland’s northern neighbor, Sweden, which is still now a land of emigration for the only European country that had a positive economic growth in 2009. When things get better, some may want to return. Let’s just hope they don’t come back with a certain poisonous souvenir.

Writing in Tongues

> When women's experience is made intelligible in the communications of consciousness raising we can recognize that it is in the structures of men's stories of the world that women don't make sense — that our own experience, collectively and jointly appreciated, can generate a picture of ourselves and the world within which we are intelligible.
> -Women, Knowledge and Reality, Ann Garry and Marilyn Pearsall

When it comes to language, I am something of a conservative. There is little that annoys me more than the propagation of ugly, obtuse and unintelligible writing. This is one of the reasons I admire Orwell, who vigorously protested the degeneration of the English language in essays and books, most notably 1984.

Feminists, for their part, often appear to have taken it upon themselves to wage war on the English language. The style and language they use, which employs a number of neologisms and, dare I say, "neosemanticisms," could be described as having some attributes that mimic classical philosophy, but the effect is more what one might expect from a gang of axe-wielding orcs set loose upon an ancient, wooded grove.

Hallowed academe, once the keeper of the classics, has been invaded by a new form of literature; one that has metastasized throughout the stacks of libraries, shoving the beautiful old books full of clear, delightful prose to the margins. Here, I'd like to offer a few examples of what kind of text can be found in a typical humanities class in the 21st century, and leave it up to the reader to determine why boys and men are fleeing these institutions:

> "The power of the Marxian critique of class domination stands as an implicit suggestion that feminists should consider the advantages of adopting a historical materialist approach to understanding phallocratic domination."
> –Nancy Hartsock in "The Feminist Standpoint"

This is the first sentence of Hartsock's essay. The term "phallocratic domination" is a euphemism for patriarchal society, i.e. rule by men, which is the norm throughout most of the world. Hartsock reduces this to rule by penis. Both Hartsock and I live in Washington state, which is largely ruled by women. Our governor and two senators are female. How would feminists react if men were to call that a "vaginocracy?" Essentially, Hartsock is reducing men to their genitals, which is a very primitive slur. This is easy to do when one has a guaranteed position at a university, and contradicts her fundamental premise that penises rule.

Nancy Hartsock is a tenured professor of Political Science at the University of Washington in Seattle.

> "The relation between ourselves as practicing sociologists and ourselves as working women is continually visible to us, a central feature of experience of the world, so that the bifurcation of consciousness becomes for us a daily chasm which is to be crossed, on the one side of which is this special conceptual activity of thought, research, teaching, administration, and on the other the world of concrete practical activities of keeping things clean, managing somehow the house and household and the children, a world in which the particularities of persons in their full organic immediacy (cleaning up the vomit, changing diapers, as well as feeding) are inescapable. Even if we don't have that as a direct contingency in our lives, we are aware of that as something that our becoming may be inserted into as a possible predicate."
> –Dorothy E. Smith in "Women's perspective as a Radical Critique of Sociology"

Here, Dorothy Smith, who also published "Feminism and Marxism: a place to begin, a way to go", expresses in convoluted terms her anger and frustration about how her maternal duties imposed upon the “conceptual activity” that she apparently cherished. In fact, her grief is shared by plenty of women who are not conceptually capable, and she is simply a more verbose (although far from eloquent, as the quote clearly demonstrates) example of the woman who just doesn’t want to be bothered by motherhood. Note how she uses “predicate” where she clearly intends “predicament.”

Dorothy Smith is currently an adjunct professor at the University of Victoria in British Columbia, Canada.

> One phenomenon feminist historians have focused on is the rape and torture metaphors in the writings of Sir Francis Bacon and others (e.g. Machiavelli) enthusiastic about the new scientific method. Traditional historians and philosophers have said that these metaphors are irrelevant to the real meanings and referents of scientific concepts held by those who used them and by the public for whom they wrote. But when it comes to regarding nature as a machine, they have quite a different analysis: here, we are told, the metaphor provides the interpretations of Newton’s mathematical laws: it directs inquirers to fruitful ways to apply his theory and suggests the appropriate methods of inquiry and the kind of metaphyiscs the new theory supports. But if we are to believe that mechanistic metaphors were a fundamental component of the explanations the new science provided, why should we believe that the gender metaphors were not? A consistent analysis would lead to the conclusion that understanding nature as a woman indifferent to or even welcoming rape was equally fundamental to the interpretations of these new conceptions of nature and inquiry. Presumably these metaphors, too, had fruitful pragmatic, methodological, and metaphysical consequences for science. In that case, why is it not as illuminating and honest to refer to Newton’s laws as “Newton’s rape manual” as it is to call them “Newton’s mechanics”?
> –Sandra Harding in “The Science Question in Feminism”

The assault on men in this instance becomes so ridiculous as to accuse Sir Isaac Newton, a lifelong virgin, of surreptitiously writing a rape manual while publishing one of the most influential scientific works of all time. Keep in mind that this woman is a tenured professor at a public university, and actually gets paid taxpayer money to write these kinds of things. “Phallocracy” indeed!

The site has been using a lot more RAM than usual over the last day, so I'm trying to figure out whether something's buggy in the code and checking the logs. This entails a bit of testing and checking plugins, so a couple features like comment preview and voting will be disabled for a little while until I can identify the source of the problem.

Otherwise, hopefully, nothing will change.

New WSJ Article on Wage-Gap Fraud

W.F. Price · 13 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday was “Equal Pay Day,” which probably sounds great to young feminists working for much richer, older male bosses. However, as an article in the WSJ points out, if pay truly were equal a lot of young men might be doing better than they are now. Although it isn’t exactly news to a lot of young men, female urban workers between 22 and 30 earn 8% more than their male counterparts. As usual, it is the men who never had a thing to do with so-called “patriarchy” – and never benefited from it in any event – who are taking the biggest hit. This is typical. Affirmative action never targeted older, established people; it was always the innocent younger folks who paid the price. It’s simply another form of victimization, only this time worse in some ways than the old Jim Crow because it is perpetrated under the guise of righteousness.

Although the article may not contain anything new to our readers, the tone is a marked departure from what one usually reads concerning feminism:

> Feminist hand-wringing about the wage gap relies on the assumption that the differences in average earnings stem from discrimination. Thus the mantra that women make only 77% of what men earn for equal work. But even a cursory review of the data proves this assumption false.

It is refreshing to see that the lies feminists rely on are no longer taken at face value. In fact, this is a real accomplishment for which those of us out there spreading the word deserve some credit.

Ms. Lukas, who wrote the piece, wraps it up with a fairly strong condemnation of the feminists’ gender jihad:

> Few Americans see the economy as a battle between the sexes. They want opportunity to abound so that men and women can find satisfying work situations that meet their unique needs. That—not a day dedicated to manufactured feminist grievances—would be something to celebrate.

The Chances of Holding Your Son Responsible for a Rape He Didn't Commit Have Just Skyrocketed

You will excuse me if I dispense with the carefully laid out introduction and the painstakingly crafted prose, but I write about a matter of grave importance, and there isn't time for either. False Rape Society has written in excess of 2,000 posts, and this may be the single most important topic we've ever reported on.

In an age when young men are a distinct minority on our nation's college campuses, the Obama administration has just declared open season on the dwindling relatively few who actually bother to attend college. The United States Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights issued a letter dated April 4, 2011 to colleges setting forth unequivocal guidelines for handling claims of sexual harassment, including claims of sexual assault, in disciplinary proceedings brought against students. Of course, the overwhelming majority of sex claims, especially serious claims such as sexual assault, are lodged against male students. According to the letter, from now on, to be in compliance with Title IX, all disciplinary proceedings involving claims of sexual harassment (which includes claims of rape and sexual assault) "must use a preponderance of the evidence standard," as opposed to the "clear and convincing evidence" standard (evidence of a high probability that the offense occurred) currently used by many schools. Vice President Joe Biden, chief architect of VAWA, unveiled the new procedures earlier this month.

What this means is that a male accused of sexual assault may be expelled from college, and his freedom to go on to graduate school and obtain decent employment may be curtailed and even destroyed, even if there is only a very slight probability that he committed the assault. The school can have a reasonable doubt about whether he did it, and the evidence need not even show that there is a strong likelihood of it. If the disciplinary hearing board finds that the complainant's story of the alleged incident is more credible than the accused's, even by a 50.0001 to 49.9999 percent margin, he packs his bags and is banned from the school forever. Forget law school, forget medical school, forget graduate school of any kind. And good luck explaining that to prospective employers. His life has been effectively destroyed.

Former Education Department lawyer Hans Bader posits a well-reasoned argument why the Education Department is wrong as a matter of law: "The Education Department's position is based on a misunderstanding of who is subject to Title IX, the federal law banning schools from committing sex discrimination. Title IX's requirements apply to schools, not individual students." Read the entire piece here.

While it is a terrible thing for a young woman to see her rapist escape without punishment, it is an even more terrible thing to hold a young man responsible for a rape he didn't commit. The chances of the school making a mistake and doing exactly that — holding a young man responsible for a rape he didn't commit — have just skyrocketed with the Education Department's April 4 directive.

A student's interest in obtaining a college degree, with all it entails, is of such weight and gravity that colleges should justify any decision to deprive a student of that interest with proof more substantial than a mere preponderance of the evidence. Even for legal actions seeking only money damages, some states impose the enhanced "clear and convincing evidence" standard to prove claims where fabrications are easiest to make (*e.g.,*claims of oral contracts, fraud, and promissory estoppel). That standard is all the more appropriate in "he said/she said" claims of sexual assault, where lies are easy to tell, too frequently made, and incredibly destructive of the men about whom they are told.

Schools are already lowering their standards of proof in response to the April 4 directive. Yale announced Tuesday that it is lowering its standard to "preponderance of the evidence." Stanford has also just done it. (Associated Students of Stanford University President Angelina Cardona applauded the move, noting: "Lowering of the standard of proof is absolutely crucial to the women's community.") Brandeis, too, will shift its standard of proof for internal hearings on sexual assault to a lesser burden, a university official said, to comply with the directive.

Harvard Law School and U.Va. are feeling the heat as well: both are under investigation because they require sexual assault victims to prove their allegations by “clear and convincing evidence.” One or more schools are lowering the standard in the middle of an ongoing hearing.

Stanford Dean of Student Life Christine Griffith doesn’t seem to have any concern about the school getting it wrong and punishing a young man undeservedly. “For people who might be concerned about the change in the burden, the standard of proof, then [it is] probably an opportunity for people to be saying to themselves, ‘I need to be really educated about these issues because I don’t want to find myself in this circumstance,’” she said.

Our sons have found themselves in the cross-hairs of another politically motivated effort to appease a vocal interest group that has declared them enemy number one. The Education Department’s directive was premised on research finding that one in five college women are victims of sexual assault or attempted sexual assault. The survey that concocted that outrageous number utilized self-selecting respondents, and the problems with such methodology are many and insurmountable. See here. Heather MacDonald summed it up succinctly: the one-in-five stat is ”bogus.” This is not even to mention that the the one-in-five figure yields numbers wildly inconsistent with even the inflated 90 percent under-reporting standard sometimes cited by the sexual grievance industry to justify its existence. See here. The fact is, if that one-in-five figure were accurate, our college campuses would be more dangerous places than even the Tadmor Prison in Syria, where the bloodthirsty guards butcher inmates with axes for the fun of it.

If you need further proof of the Department of Education’s blatant bias against presumptively innocent males, the April 4 letter also says that under Title IX, when there is an accusation of sexual assault, the school must take appropriate interim measures before the final outcome of the investigation. These measures include separating the alleged perpetrator and the complainant. All well and good — but that’s not all it says. It goes on to state the following: “When taking steps to separate the complainant and the alleged perpetrator, a school should minimize the burden on the complainant, and thus should not, as a matter of course, remove complainants from classes or housing while allowing alleged perpetrators to remain.”

The import is clear. In “he said/she said” disputes about sexual assault, he is presumed the guilty party from the moment of her accusation. At least the Department of Education is up front with its misandry.

It is not hyperbole to assert that under this new Department of Education directive, an accuser and a school are free to destroy the life of a young man even if there is only a very slight probability that he did anything wrong. And I ask, why is there not widespread outrage about this?

Obama's War Hens Prove that Women Readily Unleash State Violence

W.F. Price · 14 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The US involvement in yet another war in a Muslim country is slowly turning into yet another quagmire. After Iraq and Afghanistan, who would have guessed that this could happen? One of the main platforms of Obama's campaign was a promise to extricate the US from unpopular wars, and now we suddenly find ourselves in yet another…

And who is responsible for this?

According to the New York Times, it was a clique of female advisors, including Hillary Clinton, Samantha Powers and Susan Rice.

> Only the day before, Mrs. Clinton — along with her boss, President Obama — was a skeptic on whether the United States should take military action in Libya. But that night, with Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi's forces turning back the rebellion that threatened his rule, Mrs. Clinton changed course, forming an unlikely alliance with a handful of top administration aides who had been arguing for intervention.
> The change became possible, though, only after Mrs. Clinton joined Samantha Power, a senior aide at the National Security Council, and Susan Rice, Mr. Obama's ambassador to the United Nations, who had been pressing the case for military action, according to senior administration officials speaking only on condition of anonymity.

Anyone with a cursory knowledge of history should know that women in power are just as likely to use violence to attain their goals as men. From Cleopatra to Empress Dowager Cixi, female rulers have readily ordered men to shed blood on their behalf.

Although a depressing number of people actually bought the feminist claim that female rule would usher in an era of peace and understanding, perhaps the truth is beginning to reveal itself as the West settles into a more Byzantine phase, and is characterized increasingly by class hierarchy rather than patriarchal egalitarianism.

What we have to understand about feminism is that ultimately the movement was not about women as a whole, but rather an elite, dissatisfied subset with a will to power. Of course Hillary Clinton identifies as a feminist — without the ideology and feminist support would she have had a chance to be one of the most powerful people on the planet?

One sees the same with discussions of the mythological wage gap, where feminists will argue that "the most powerful and richest people are men" while ignoring the men in the gutter without a trace of irony. These women do not want equality; they want to go straight to the top. They feel they deserve it. How could anyone be surprised that when they get there they will not hesitate to crush their enemies with bombs and missiles?

Hopefully, President Obama can rein in the bloodlust of these advisors before he involves us in yet another fiasco costly in both blood and wealth.

Truth in Black and White: The Third Man

When we see old movies they tend to look hopelessly out of date and unprofessional by today's standards of cinematography. However, what they lack in special effects and technology they sometimes make up for in superb acting and deep, realistic assessments of human nature.

I recently took the time to watch The Third Man[image], a 1949 film set in postwar Vienna starring Orson Welles and Joseph Cotten. Welles and Cotten already had a history of producing great films, having worked together on Citizen Kane before the war, so the two are naturals together. Cotten, however, played the main role in Third Man, which was directed by Carol Reed.

The plot revolves around the intrigues of occupied Vienna, which was divided into four zones, each governed by one of the victorious allied powers (USSR, USA, UK and France). Cotten plays an American pulp fiction writer named Holly Martins who, out of money and out of luck, takes his old friend Harry Lime (played by Welles) up on a job offer in the shattered city. Holly arrives to find Lime recently deceased, and he attends his funeral, after which he asks around and hears inconsistent stories concerning the death. Finding Lime's girlfriend Anna (played by Alida Valli), a local actress, he has a talk with her and becomes convinced that his friend was murdered.

I won't give away the entire plot, as I really would prefer that readers see the movie for themselves and enjoy it, but as time goes on Holly learns more and more about his friend Harry Lime, and grows increasingly disillusioned. He also finds himself falling for Lime's girlfriend Anna, but she is still devoted to her purportedly dead lover.

The film says a great deal about friendship and the nature of love, particularly of the female variety. While Holly ultimately does the right thing, he never gets the girl, and Anna, for her part, is willing to sacrifice children, and even herself, for the villain who lit up her heart.

The 1674 Women's Campaign Against Coffee

Prohibition, widely enacted in the early 20th century in the US and northern Europe, is often brought up as an example of female activism and a consequence of suffrage, but long before the introduction of universal suffrage similar restrictionist movements had almost resulted in heavy penalties for, of all things, drinking coffee.

In late 1675, King Charles II of England banned the sale and consumption of coffee in "a proclamation for the suppression of coffee-houses." Fortunately, he backed down a couple days before the ban was to take effect. Coffee had, at that point, become very popular amongst the British intelligentsia, spawning a number of all-male coffee clubs where men would gather to discuss philosophy and politics. Apparently, Charles wasn't all that pleased about the activities of the intellectually stimulated men, who were accused of spreading dissent throughout the realm.

However, there had already been political pressure from another group to ban coffee, which is perhaps what gave Charles the initial push toward banning the substance.

It turns out that a group of proto-feminists had approached the king demanding that he shut down the coffee houses a year earlier, as the elixir was held to be causing their husbands to become snotty, "Frenchified" fellows who had lost all interest in sex (with their wives).

The document they presented is "The Women's Petition Against Coffee," and it is well worth reading for the humor therein if nothing else. In one hilarious passage, the "Buxome Good Women" warn that coffee-drinking husbands run the risk of being "Cuckol'd by Dildo's." In another, they express dismay that men have begun to talk as much as women.

Imagine for a moment that all of the illegal immigrants in the United States were on the verge of being granted amnesty and citizenship. Politicians would be falling all over each other in attempts to ingratiate themselves with this massive bloc of new voters.

Otto von Bismarck once remarked that "politics is the art of the possible," and it is clear that American politicians have long since seen the demographer's writing on the wall. A Brookings analysis of 2010 Census data indicated that "Ten states and 35 large metro areas now have minority white child populations," and "In areas of the country gaining children, Hispanics accounted for most of that growth." Savvy, opportunistic political parties and marketers have long since begun re-branding efforts aimed at locking down the brown vote and dollar. In anticipation of these projected population shifts, even the army is re-making its image with the slogan "Diversity Is Our Strength."

Now, imagine if over 50 percent of the population was about to be offered the right to vote in one day.

Writers can't seem to write enough pop sociology pieces about the hit show Mad Men. Perhaps a show about urbanites working in the media hits home for them. I watched an episode or two, but couldn't manage to get into it.

The recent HBO series Boardwalk Empire has held my attention. The first season opens with the passage of the Volstead Act, and follows the growth of Atlantic City bootlegging and organized crime in the early days of Prohibition. The first episode was directed by Martin Scorsese, and the show was adapted from an historical account of the life of political boss and racketeer Enoch "Nucky" Johnson by the producer and screenwriter of The Sopranos.

One aspect that makes the show stand out from familiar Tommy gun and fedora fare is its focus on political and social maneuvering as the Nineteenth Amendment was being ratified. The call for suffrage had past its tipping point, and to secure the future of his extra-political "business" interests, Nucky paints himself as a champion of women. With a wink and a nod to his cohorts, he mouths the sentiments of the feminist Zeitgeist with all of the false sincerity he can muster–like a proto Patrick Bateman lecturing his dinner companions about the need to end apartheid, terrorism and world hunger. Nucky is a practical man, and gaining the political support of women is but one of many means to his many ends. The average feminist woman is, as the provocative French essayist Alain Soral suggested in an interview, a "useful idiot," for greedy fellows like Nucky.

Some regard these slick manipulators as our modern "alphas"—but this is too abstract. The Nuckys of the world are not alphas in any meaningful primitive sense. They work systems and deal in artifice; they are adept businessmen, bosses, players and puppeteers. They are "economic" or "political" alphas—paper alphas, even—who may or may not display the qualities that our natures recognize as dominant. As with the pandering Nucky, they achieve dominant status through affecting the posture of submission—to women, special interest groups, and so forth. These paper alphas will sell out their brothers to make a quick buck—they are without loyalty—which is why men have always been distrustful of those who choose politics as a profession or who place too much value on material gain for its own sake.

For those of us who are not players and who find the game distasteful, it is useful to abandon idealistic thinking and imagine what the paper alphas want, if only to disabuse oneself of false hope and to re-evaluate doomed strategies. The Nuckys are motivated by greed, not justice, common sense or a moral compass—though every man must have his moments.

Female Solidarity: An Additional Aspect Of NAWALT

We are told NAWALT (not all women are like that) over and over again. Naturally, the question comes up on whether all women are like that or not or if a particular woman is like that or not. The answer can be more complicated than being either/or. There are many cases where a particular woman may truly not be like that but pretends to be, acts likes a woman like that, or thinks like a woman like that out of some bizarre sense of female solidarity. Here is an example (from a woman using the username "Doomed Harlot"):

> I self-identify as a "slut" because I have always opposed the double-standard and the transactional view of sex, and have acted accordingly. On the one hand, I may not qualify under the standards set forth here. I never had sex with, or even kissed, anyone other than a premarital boyfriend of several years and my husband.

For the sake of argument let's assume that everything "Doomed Harlot" says about her sexual history is true. She has only had sex with two men, one of which is her husband. Yet, she calls herself a slut out of some bizarre desire to oppose supposed double standards and female solidarity. Is "Doomed Harlot" a slut? Is she like that? Technically not, but if she's willing to talk like one, think like one, and identify as one what is the real meaningful difference between her and an actual slut?

The issue of female solidarity and NAWALT is not limited to slutitude. This applies to a lot of issues. For instance a woman might never intend to divorce or have an abortion herself and find those acts in most or all cases to be immoral, but she will fight against any changes to the law on those subjects. Even if she has no intention of having an abortion or starting a divorce, can she really be said to not be like a woman who does those things?

What has happened is that a lot of women who technically might not be like that have decided that female solidarity is more important than actually demonstrating that they aren't like that. What is the meaningful difference between a woman who is like that and a woman who isn't but talks, thinks, and identifies as a woman like that out of a sense of female solidarity? There really is none because either unintentionally or (most likely) intentionally, the woman who isn't like that but acts like a woman like that is providing cover for the women like that. A woman who truly isn't like that would want to demonstrate the difference between her and women who are like that.

Going back to the "Doomed Harlot" example, if a woman talks like, thinks like, and identifies as a slut, how is a man supposed to know she isn't actually a slut? If she thinks she's a slut then how can men know she really isn't a slut? If "Doomed Harlot" isn't going to make an attempt to differentiate herself from actual sluts, why should men?

Unless a woman is willing to clearly demonstrate she is not like that, using NAWALT as an argument is hollow and hypocritical. If a woman doesn't think it's important to clearly differentiate herself from women who are like that then men cannot be at fault for thinking she is like that.

The Perks of Equality

By Una Salus Victus

For the record, I support feminism. I believe that women should be given complete and total equality. In light of this, no woman should be a candidate for president before she has gained true equality. The sexual privilege women enjoy by not having to serve in the military should they not wish to, in addition to not having to register for Selective Service needs to end. Being able to command the sacrifice of others is too great a power to be afforded those who are automatically exempted said sacrifice due to their gender. As I have said before (and even made a shirt saying), “Equality or Chivalry. It’s time to make a choice”.

Wars the US has been involved in since WWI

1. 1. 1917-18 World War I
    1. a. KIA: 137,000
    2. b. Wounded: 205,690

    20. a. KIA: 4,447
    21. b. Wounded: 31,965
    22. c. PTSD: 88,719

The above list of battles serves as a reminder of all the lives lost during the course of notable wars in this country. There are currently more than 200 wars/conflicts/engagements listed, and that’s just starting from WWI. I listed the ones that most people would recognize. We, as a country, look at a potential president’s ascension with justified scrutiny. We want no one who has skirted military service being in charge of the country. The reason for this is simple; how can anyone who fled their duty to serve be even remotely suited for a job where they will have the ability to send troops into different areas of the world to fight?

As stated above, a president will be afforded the privilege of being able to wage a war or bomb/send troops to any nation in ‘need’. It is for this reason that the potential president should have a personal understanding, through service, (or, at the very least, the ability to have served) that WAR IS HELL and, through this appreciation, be possessed with the knowledge that this country's military force is designed around the notion of keeping our nation safe, not as an international police force or personal agenda forwarding device. One cannot, nor should not, police another country unless the direst circumstances are afoot. It is meant to be understood (even widely accepted) that those who didn't serve during a time of peace should have nothing held against them in this regard during their quest to the Oval Office. It is by their own example that we, as a people, choose who we will allow to lead us.

The hole in the policing tactic is this: There is a consistent, almost round-the-clock, 'ethnic cleansing' happening in Africa, but the US never gets involved. By their own example, anyone who uses the military as an international police force should already have presented ideas/attempts for interventions within the African continent in the name of humanity and peace keeping. Realistically, it could be the front for establishing military bases that could later be used as staging areas for other conflicts that happen on that side of the world. The 'policing' could simply be the rent paid to the country. Just imagine how many tyrants could be removed from power. This is the very reason we are still in South Korea. The last time we pulled out, North Korea crossed the DMZ and attempted an invasion. The US was forced to reoccupy the South and set up bases to serve as a deterrent against another invasion. In other words, we are the police force in that country.

Another point to consider is the fate of the wounded veteran. This person cannot return to any semblance of the life the way it was before and often times has a tremendous lack of success receiving adequate treatment for injuries, not to mention decent employment for their most extreme sacrifice (some say that death is the ultimate sacrifice, but I disagree. I believe that living within a maimed body is far more severe than death could ever be). Let's also not forget those poor men who get taken captive by the enemy. [I say "men", because the last time a woman was taken (Jessica Lynch), she was rescued by Special Forces within a very short period of time, a privilege not afforded to the majority of male hostages]. In the hierarchy of terrible circumstances, the injured rank at No.2 behind those who are badly wounded.

Moving on, since the removal of the draft, there is an agency known as Selective Service that serves to keep tabs on all males who could potentially serve should the need for a draft arise.. According to their website:

Almost all male U.S. citizens, and male aliens living in the U.S., who are 18 through 25, are required to register with Selective Service. It's important to know that even though he is registered, a man will not automatically be inducted into the military. In a crisis requiring a draft, men would be called in sequence determined by random lottery number and year of birth. Then, they would be examined for mental, physical and moral fitness by the military before being deferred or exempted from military service or inducted into the Armed Forces.

The penalty for not registering is severe:

* CONSEQUENCES FOR NOT REGISTERING

The maximum penalty for failing to register with Selective Service is a $250,000 fine and up to five years in prison. Failure to register will cause ineligibility for a number of federal and state benefits including:

* FEDERAL JOBS

A man must be registered to be eligible for jobs in the Executive Branch of the Federal government and the U.S. Postal Service. This applies only to men born after December 31, 1959.

* STUDENT FINANCIAL AID

Men who are not registered with Selective Service cannot obtain Federal student loans or grants. This includes Pell Grants, College Work Study, Guaranteed Student/Plus Loans, and National Direct Student Loans.

* CITIZENSHIP

The U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) makes registration with Selective Service a condition for U.S. citizenship, if the man first arrived in the U.S. before his 26th birthday and was required to register.

* FEDERAL JOB TRAINING

The Workforce Investment Act (formerly JTPA) offers important job-training opportunities. This program is only open to those men who register with Selective Service.

* STATE JOBS, LOANS, AND TRAINING

Most states have added additional penalties for those who fail to register with Selective Service.

* STATE DRIVER'S LICENSE LEGISLATION

As of May 16, 2002, 19 states, 2 territories, and the District of Columbia have enacted driver's license laws supporting Selective Service registration. They are Oklahoma, Delaware, Arkansas, Utah, Georgia, Hawaii, Alabama, Florida, Colorado, Texas, Louisiana, Illinois, Ohio, South Dakota, Mississippi, Idaho, Virginia, Wisconsin, New Hampshire, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Virgin Islands.

As it stands, women are exempted from this process. See here for their write-up on the reason why they adhere to this policy.

For a long time, men who have been discovered evading their duty to the nation were branded as cowards, and rightly so. No one was exempt. Even Elvis Presley served when his number was called. There was even a period in time when the national pastime (baseball) was hindered for a few seasons, as nearly all of the players were called forth to fight. Anyone who dodged this responsibility and then attempted to run for office would quickly find his lot in life nothing short of inhospitable. Currently, those who lie about having served and when discovered are lucky if they only get fired because jail time is more likely.

In closing, if we've become a country where we can now interfere with the business of other countries and ANY feminist ideal is among the list of grievances to support our doing so, then that means this country has satisfied all of the feminist demands and there is nothing else to be done for that cause; for why would the radfems chase their ideal in another country if their own country leaves much that they desire? It makes no logical sense (I know, I know). Furthering this, why didn't the Rosie Riveters demand to be included in military operations? After all, the men who had done the jobs that the Riveters were now doing (the jobs that they used as their proof of ability/equality) were selected to fight a war with no prior military experience. All they had done in their lives was THOSE jobs. Why did the Riveters stop at the jobs? Why not go for the gold?

In the article New WSJ Article on Wage-Gap Fraud, the question comes up of how the wage-gap can still be an issue since it has been debunked by (among others) the US Government's own statistics. Comments at the referenced Wall Street Journal article reveal many who still believe in the wage gap fraud. While some who adamantly believe in feminist myths are being sincere in their belief which is based upon misinformation, there are others who are simply liars – those who create the misinformation.

Let's shift gears for a moment in order for me to provide a little background on where I'm headed. Back in the feminist reawakening of the 1960's and 1970's, there was a need to find an example of a true matriarchy. After all, if the leadership of a people is solely determined by societal constructs and nothing innate, then one would think there would be some examples of a matriarchy during the long span of mankind's presence on the earth. If such a matriarchy could be found, there would be hope that a matriarchy could exist in the future. Readers of The Spearhead know that matriarchies only exist in mythology. Of course, if careful study of history and archeology does not turn up a matriarchy, another method is to lie and fabricate evidence. Just such a lie caused my "ah-ha", eye-opening moment.

I was raised, as probably most baby boomers were, to believe and trust my superiors. University degrees meant something and a professor received automatic respect. While there were occasional hoaxes (e.g. Piltdown Man), in general, learned men and women were to be trusted and respected. That's the attitude I held as a university student and as I started my career.

Before the World Wide Web, blogs and the like, there were (and still are) Usenet newsgroups. Founded in 1980, Usenet provides various newsgroups to which one can post. Posts are then distributed across the entire network. While still in place, its popularity has significantly decreased due to competition from the web. The newsgroups are organized into various categories such as sci. (science related), soc. (social discussions) and misc. (miscellaneous topics). One soc. newsgroup is soc.men which contains unmoderated discussions on topics of interest to men. (As a side note, the group soc.women existed before soc.men. When some men proposed the creation of soc.men, many women were opposed. Some things never change.)

In 1993, the following article was posted on soc.men. It opened my eyes; it gave me my "ah-ha" moment. It is still available at Robert Sheaffer's website and at soc.men (now available in Google groups). I will take the liberty to add some emphasis at various points. In 1993, all we had was the ability to bracket words with asterisks to provide emphasis. For those who are still sitting on the fence, I hope you get your "ah-ha" moment. (The fellow pictured above is an unidentified Innu man photographed in 1912. The Innu are Native Americans and were called the "Montagnais" by the French and also "Naskapi" by others. The Montagnais-Naskapi people figure prominently in the following article.)

by Robert Sheaffer, June, 1993

The late Eleanor Leacock was an anthropologist and feminist who published claims of societies that were supposedly "Egalitarian," in regard both to wealth, and to sex. Her writings display a strong Marxist bent. She wrote a long and admiring introduction for her new edition of Engels' The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State, which was published by International House Publishers (New York, 1972), the publishing arm of the Communist Party of the USA.

Leacock's essay "Women In Egalitarian Societies" was published as chapter one of Becoming Visible, a textbook used in Womens History classes (Bridenthal and Koonz, eds). One of her principal examples of a supposedly nonpatriarchal society (i.e., one where leadership does not rest primarily with the male) was the Montagnais-Naskapi Native Americans of the Labrador peninsula of Canada. Now, the Montagnais-Naskapi of today (on whom she had done field work) are clearly patriarchal, so she cites the 17th century accounts of Jesuit missionaries to make a claim that this society was once gender-equal, but was subsequently "completely transformed" by their contact with Western colonial powers. Leacock also cites the supposedly nonpatriarchal 17th century Montagnais-Naskapi as one of the principal proofs in her book, Myths of Male Dominance.

Leacock gives the following quotes from Father Paul Le Jeune, one of the first Jesuit missionaries to enter that region, without providing any context for it:

> Some observers said of Montagnais-Naskapi women, as they said of other Native American women, that they were virtual slaves. Their hard work and lack of ritualized formalities surrounding them contrasted sharply with the ideals of courtesy for women in the French and British bourgeois family and were taken as evidence of low social status. Those who knew the Indians well reported otherwise. "The women have great power here," Le Jeune wrote, and exhorted the men to assert themselves. "I told him then that he was the master, and that in France women do not rule their husbands." (Becoming Visible, page 22).

However, an examination of the reference Leacock cites shows that the meaning of this incident is entirely different from what she suggests. Le Jeune had asked an Indian man whether he has a son, and whether he would give him that son to take away to be educated as a Christian.

> He replied that he would be very glad to give us his son, but that his wife did not wish to do so. The women have great power here. A man may promise you something, and, if he does not keep his promise, he thinks he is sufficiently excused when he tells you that his wife did not wish to do it. I told him then that he was the master, and that in France women do not rule their husbands. (Jesuit Relations, Vol. 5 p. 181).

Note that the incident, when read in its context, does not in any way support what Leacock would have us believe. The Jesuit is asking this Indian to allow him to take his son away for an extended period of time, to which the father quite understandably objects. Seeking an excuse, the man replies that his wife will not permit it. Le Jeune's remark that "the women have great power here" is seen to be wry irony, not actual description. When an Indian man needed an excuse for breaking a promise, the favorite excuse was that his wife would disapprove. Thus the "power" of women to which Le Jeune refers was not actual authority in the family, but rather the "power" to excuse a man from previous commitments. Note also that Le Jeune did not "exhort the men to assert themselves," as Leacock claims; rather, he urged this one man to be assertive, by way of countering his proffered excuse.

This incident aside, does the account of Le Jeune support the claim of a gender-equal society that Leacock makes? Here are some other statements by Le Jeune from the same work. They are such blatant counter examples to Leacock's claim of 'gender-equality' that she obviously needed to pretend that they do not exist:

> I observed in this place that the young women did not eat from the same dish as their husbands. I asked the reason, and the Renegade told me that the young unmarried women, and the women who had no children, took no part in the management of affairs, and were treated like children. Thence it came that his own wife said to me one day, "Tell my husband to give me plenty to eat, but do not tell him that I asked you to do so."

> the Savages prefer the meat of the Bear to all other kinds of food; it seems to me that the young Beaver is in no > way inferior to it, but the Bear has more fat, and therefore the Savages like it better. Second, the Bear being brought, all the marriageable girls and young married women who have not had children, as well as those of the Cabin where the Bear is to be eaten, and of the neighboring cabins, go outside, and do not return as long as there remains a piece of this animal, which they do not taste. It snowed, and the weather was very severe. It was almost night when this Bear was brought to our Cabin; immediately the women and girls went out and sought shelter elsewhere, the best they could find. They do this not without much suffering; for they do not always have bark at hand with which to make their house, which in such cases they cover with branches of the Fir tree.

> In the third place, the dogs must be sent away, lest they lick the blood, or eat the bones, or even the offal of this beast, so greatly is it prized. The latter are buried under the fireplace, and the former are thrown into the fire. The preceding are observations which I made during the performance of this superstition. Two banquets are made of this Bear, as it is cooked in two kettles, although all at the same time. The men and older women are invited to the first feast, and, when it is finished, the women go out; then the other kettle is taken down, and of this an eat-all feast is made for the men only. This is done on the evening of the capture; the next day toward nightfall, or the second day, I do not exactly remember, the Bear having been all eaten, the young women and girls return.

Thus, Father Le Jeune reports that these Indians prized bear meat so greatly that when a bear was killed, the women and the dogs were sent outside to stand in the snow while the men held an all-night feast. Does this sound like a "gender-equal society"? Professor Leacock somehow failed to mention this counter-evidence as she wrote of her vanished feminist Utopia.

> Some Savages had arrived from Tadoussac on their way to war; Father de Quen and I visited them in their cabin, and, after some conversation, they told us that we should go to see the preparations for a great feast which were being made in a place that they named to us. But they advised us not to remain there long, "Because," said they, "as it is a war feast, the women will serve there entirely naked."

Attempting to demonstrate the supposed lack of feminine delicacy of the Montagnais-Naskapi women before they developed a "feeling of constraint when whites were around," Leacock quotes the following description of them from Father Le Jeune:

"They have neither gentleness nor courtesy in their utterance," he wrote, "and a Frenchman could not assume the accent, the tone, and the sharpness of their voices without becoming angry, which they do not." (Becoming Visible, p. 21-22).

It is extremely revealing to see the two sentences that immediately precede this quote, sentences that Leacock obviously needed to conceal from her feminist readers:

> I have never heard the women complain because they were not invited to the feasts, because the men ate the good pieces, or because they had to work continually – going in search of wood for the fire, making the Houses, dressing the skins, and busying themselves in other very laborious work. Each one does her own little tasks, gently and peacefully, without any disputes. It is true, however, that they have neither gentleness nor courtesy in their utterance, and a Frenchman could not assume the accent, the tone, and the sharpness of their voices without becoming angry, which they do not (Le Jeune, Jesuit Relations, Vol. 6 p. 235).

When Leacock, in claiming this society to be nonpatriarchal, omits the sentences she does while quoting those immediately following, I cannot imagine that this deception was unintentional.

It is now clear beyond any possibility of doubt that the supposed 'gender-equal society of the Montagnais-Naskapi', which is cited in feminist circles as one of the best evidences of a supposed "nonpatriarchal society", has absolutely no basis in fact. It was the deliberate deception of a Marxist feminist, created out of selective quotation and misrepresentation, yet uncritically accepted by her feminist readers. The fact remains that all present and past human societies are patriarchal, in spite of the many feminist lies and half-truths invented to obscure this. Indeed, the ease with which academic feminists will resort to deception to bolster claims such as this one about vanished "nonpatriarchal societies" is perhaps the best reason to doubt their claim that future societies will be nonpatriarchal.

Camille Paglia wrote that "Our best women students are being force-fed an appalling diet of cant, drivel, and malarkey" (Sex, Art, and American Culture, p. 243). We can thank Eleanor Leacock for nicely illustrating Paglia's point.

Sheaffer references the 1977 edition of Becoming Visible. The essay had apparently been renamed in the 1987 edition to "Gender in Egalitarian Societies" and is available online here, the website of a Professor of History Emerita at Washburn University. The lies identified by Sheaffer are still present in the online version. One can safely assume that the essay is still used to indoctrinate gullible university students – 34 years and counting.

Peter Wood, president of the National Association of Scholars, has written a recent article, "Unearthing Matriarchy" in The Chronicle of Higher Education. Wood traces the origin of the prehistoric matriarchy idea back to the 19th century. What's interesting, however, is his observation that individuals who believe this nonsense are not screened but instead appointed to faculty positions. He notes that universities have no problem screening Fundamental Christians, for example, from positions in the Biology department due to their belief in creationism. The process has basically fed on itself such that the belief in a prehistoric matriarchy permeates faculty at universities and is taught "either as an established historical fact or viable hypothesis about pre-history is a staple of thousands of courses." He closes with:

> If it is necessary that a candidate for an academic appointment in biology demonstrate competence in evolutionary biology, it ought surely be necessary that a candidate for appointment in women's studies demonstrate show the ability to distinguish historical fantasy from fact.
> I don't expect that to happen anytime soon, but it is a useful thought experiment. Why won't higher education hold women's studies to ordinary standards of historical accuracy? Because contemporary American higher education cares far more about protecting its favored group of political ideologies than it does its standards of rational inquiry and scrupulous use of evidence. The standards are cited most conspicuously when they lend themselves to fencing off members of disfavored groups. Why is higher education having such a hard time these days attracting public support? A good part of the reason is that it is so self-indulgent.

Is it clear why the wage-gap is still an issue and will be for some time to come?

I landed on a jaded island after reading Sheaffer's expose in 1993, an island where there is no respect for any experts in soft disciplines such as Sociology, Anthropology and Womens Studies. An island where a feminist uttering the phrase “a study shows” is equivalent to “I’ve got a bridge for sale”. And whose fault is that?

Mangum Facing Murder Charges in Boyfriend's Stabbing Death

Crystal Mangum, Duke Lacrosse false rape accuser, has had a number of run-ins with the law in recent years, and they have culminated in the stabbing death of her boyfriend Reginald Daye. Mangum and Daye were heard arguing over money before the stabbing, which prompted a police call. Police visited, and left without making any arrests. After the police left Mangum picked up a kitchen knife and plunged it into the 46-year-old housepainter. Reginald Daye lingered for a while, dying on April 13.

Daye may have been unwise (to put it mildly) to begin a relationship with the notorious Ms. Mangum, but he did not deserve to die for his error in judgment. In any event, the narrative pushed by feminists – that women are eternal victims of men – probably leads a number of less circumspect men to exercise less caution in their relationships with women.

That Mangum, a tool of the feminists who sought to destroy the lives of innocent young men in a false rape case, is now facing murder charges is little surprise. Feminists seized onto Mangum's vicious lies as justification for condemning young college men across the country, using the false accusation as yet another weapon in their jihad against men. Mangum probably does not identify as a feminist, but she is a soldier for their cause nonetheless.

Although feminists may have been deeply disappointed that her false rape accusations ultimately failed under scrutiny, perhaps now they can derive some satisfaction from the fact that one of their tools has at least ended the life of one man, momentarily sating their bloodlust with a singular act of butchery. Lest anyone think this is an exaggeration, we should take care to remember the feminist defense of child-killer Andrea Yates and glee over Lorena Bobbit's genital mutilation.

Male Suicide Rates and Causes

By Szebran

In the US, the suicide rate for men is four times that of women. Suicide is the eighth leading cause of death for all U.S. men according to National Center for Injury Prevention and Control. According to German blogger Simon Rierdon (or at least I think he's German) the number of men committing suicide is up in every non-third world country.

He quoted PR Newswire "Between the ages of 20 and 29 suicide is three times as common in men as in women and the number of attempted suicides amongst young men has doubled in 10 years across most developed countries" Simon also notes that he has seen stories about how German men are committing suicide in record numbers but the suicide rate among young women is not rising.

No country has bothered to address the problem of male suicide. Kerry L. Knox, Ph.D., director of the Canandaigua Center of Excellence for Suicide Prevention of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs stated "Men in the overall U.S. population just haven't been the focus of a lot of suicide-prevention efforts."

Based on studies by Professor John Macdonald, Co director of the Men's Health Information and Resource Centre (MHIRC) in Australia and Thomas Joiner, Ph.D, a professor of psychology at Florida State University, it appears the two primary reasons causing the vast majority of male suicides are modern marriage (sometimes called marriage 2.0 on The Spearhead) and unemployment.

Joiner estimates that "romantic disruptions" and other relationship issues trigger depressive episodes in about 75 percent of men between the ages of 20 and 40 who commit suicide. Macdonald stated "Many men are overwhelmed by social problems like unemployment, family break-ups and not having access to their children. When a number of these social factors come together, they can be enough to send a man over the edge and contemplate self-harm," Additionally, MSNBC Health ('Male Suicide' 2008) states "Data going back decades shows that, like clockwork, economic downturns push more men over the brink — a fact that should concern us all now. Men draw much of their identity from their careers, and when unemployment rises, that underpinning falls away." Lastly, Lisa Firestone, Ph.D., a suicide expert stated "Especially in their early 20s, guys can think, 'This one person was right for me, I've lost her, and it's all over' … they lack the perspective that they're going to have other relationships, maybe even better relationships"

Simon Rierdon quoted an article by Michelle Beaulieu (Reuters Health, 2000) "In addition, divorce or marital separation more than doubled the risk of suicide in men, whereas in women, marital status was unrelated to suicide." Dr. Augustine Kposowa from the University of California suspects that this difference is related to the social networks men and women form outside their marriages, which may be stronger or more meaningful in women than in men. "Women have better ways of communicating," Kposowa told Reuters Health in an interview. "They may have more social support networks, friends and relatives that they talk to, whereas men donít have social support networks."

As stated in this post, these studies appear to indicate some men need a more realistic outlook about modern marriage. They still have obsolete notions of marriage being everything. Being divorced or single is viewed as the end of the world.

At one time, having a wife meant having a companion. Someone who would care about you and help you in life. Those days are gone. Today, modern marriage is centered on the wife. Partnership is discouraged in women's literature As emphasized by Parenting Magazine (Mad at Dad 2009) & repeated by many women's websites, husbands are now expected to do – at minimum – 50% of house chores. However, wives are not be expected to help husbands with housing repairs, auto maintenance or other similar tasks. These are deemed the "husband's job". Additionally, as emphasized by women's literature, house chores and husband's jobs must be completed according to the wife's time schedule. Her husband's viewpoint does not matter.

Any wife that helps her husband or considers his opinions is criticized in women's literature as subservient. Additionally, she will also be the target of peer pressure from other women to change her behavior toward her husband.

Also, in modern marriage, husbands are used as baby sitters so the wife can have her weekly 'girls night out'. This is especially true if she wants to stay out late clubbing. However, boys night out is frowned upon. This is especially true if he wants stay out late clubbing. He will be considered a deadbeat.

Lastly, if a late night girls outing results in an extra marital affair and pregnancy, its tough luck for the husband if he discovers the child isn't his. Nearly all states have laws supporting paternity fraud. The hapless husband must raise & finance the child. The sleazebag other man will have no obligations. I've been told this is also the law in Britain.

Modern wives are taught to view their husbands as living room decorations.

More men should be educated about modern marriage. Letting ex-husbands tell their personal stories is one way to accomplish this task. No names or pictures are necessary. Men can simply explain how they were treated during their marriage and how the family court treated them during the divorce. Ideally, these stories should appear on popular men's websites. But how many websites would be willing to let ex-husbands tell their stories is questionable. Nonetheless, the stories would be educational. They would prompt very fundamental questions: Why have a "modern" wife? What purpose does she serve? What value is she? What benefit is modern marriage? Admittedly, men have previously received a health benefit from being married. However, research by Hui Liu and Debra Umberson (Journal of Health and Social Behavior, 2008) show, today, there is little difference in health status between married and unmarried men.

Eroding the idea a man must have a modern wife in order to have a meaningful, healthy life can have a significant impact on the male suicide rate. Being divorced or single will no longer seem the end of the world. In fact, a better life is staying single, having a series of girlfriends & joining a biking, hiking, swimming, astronomy, history or religious club. Men should join whatever organization interest them. Thousands of these groups can be found by searching the internet. Yahoo groups is one place to start. Being divorced / single is not unique. In America, 48% of the adult population is unmarried (Population Reference Bureau, 2009).

The second reason for male suicides may be more difficult to tackle. Male unemployment is due largely to lack of education. Millions of jobs requiring only a high school diploma have disappeared. In the US, a college degree or at least a degree from a technical school is now necessary for many good paying jobs. The Bureau of Labor Statistics show that since 1970, the unemployment rate for college graduates is half that of high school graduates. It also shows college graduates, on average earn nearly twice what high school graduates earn. Approximately 50% more women earn college degrees than men. This is the primary reason why, in most American cities, young single woman aged (22-30) earn more money than men of the same age group (New York research firm Reach Advisors, 2008). The situation is probably similar in other western countries.

Men have trouble obtaining higher education. In America, this is because the education system is mostly controlled by two feminist groups. One group, the American Association of University Women (AAUW) has blocked every single attempted school reform designed to help increase boys performance & interest in school. They insist girls should remain the focus of education. Another group, The National Women's Law Center (NWLC), is responsible for the anti male culture throughout the school system. Boys as young as 4 have been charged with sexual harassment and suspended. The NWLC demands all schools be financially liable for incidents deemed as sexual harassment. Since schools have no money to defend themselves against NWLC lawsuits, its easier to suspend little boys for any reason. Ultimately, boys learn to become detached from school.

Finally, there is the problem of financing. Because of AAUW pressure, big corporations such as Walmart, Home Depot and Starbucks, donate money to college grant programs with the stipulation the student cannot be male.

Together, the AAUW and NWLC significantly degrade and derail boys education thus making them less likely to advance into college or trade school. There are probably similar feminist groups in other western countries who control the education system thereby hindering boys development. Changing this situation requires directly challenging feminist power. Also, a man must realize the national economy is beyond his control. Sometimes, unemployment is unavoidable regardless of education background.

Adjusting men's perceptions to a realistic view of modern marriage and challenging feminist control of education could have a significant impact on male suicide rates in the West.

Sarah Palin: From Toast of the Town to Plain Toast

careyroberts · 19 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

With every passing week, the prospect of Sarah Palin's presidential bid grows dimmer…and Michelle Bachman's star shines ever brighter. Absent a major scandal, it's highly unusual for a major political figure to witness a ratings nosedive on a scale that Sarah Palin has experienced over the past year.

When Palin was named John McCain's running mate in 2008, she garnered stratospheric approval ratings in the near-90s. But a March Washington Post/ABC News poll showed Palin's approval rating among Republicans and GOP-leaning independents had fallen below 60%. And the latest NBC/Wall Street Journal poll shows her idling in fifth place in a hypothetical Republican presidential primary race.

Many believe Minnesota congresswoman Bachman has the capability to pick up where Sarah Palin left off. So these are the 12 lessons to be learned from the mercurial political career of Sarah Palin:

1. Maintain message discipline. Repeatedly, Sarah Palin would issue a sharply worded Tweet, only to have to issue a "clarification" the following day. And then the "blood libel" remark. That one hurt.

2. Avoid over-exposure. For months, Palin's dazzling visage came from all sides – book covers, conservative websites, lapel buttons, and as a Fox News commentator. Eventually, Palin-fatigue set in. Some began to speculate that Sarah Palin was just another media phenom.

3. Eschew identity politics. Liberals love identity politics because it fits with their divide-and-conquer philosophy. Conservatives don't. The Mama Grizzly routine might work as an inspired classroom skit, but not as a conservative campaign strategy.

4. Don't pigeon-hole yourself as a feminist. For most conservatives, feminism means late-term abortions, expanding the welfare state, and endlessly playing the victim. So don't touch feminism with a 10-foot pole. Repeat after me…

5. Keep your nose to the grindstone. When Mrs. Palin resigned as governor of Alaska, she announced a "higher calling" led to her decision. Fine. But it weakened any claim to becoming a political heavy-weight.

6. Don't invoke Leftist clichés. Following the death of former vice-presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro, Palin made a remark about women needing to break the presidential glass ceiling — implying members of the male gender are somehow conspiring to thwart this historic milestone. PULLEEEASSE.

7. Shun gender preferences and set-asides. Sarah Palin is an avid supporter of Title IX. This Clinton-era quota program has relied on the threat of government-backed legal intervention to shutter thousands of men's sports teams, which pretty much speaks for itself.

8. Pick your battles wisely. Sarah Barracuda was always ready to go toe-to-toe with her detractors, imagined or otherwise. When Barbara Bush made a playful comment that Sarah might prefer to stay in Alaska, Palin issued a catty riposte about the Bush family being elite "blue bloods." Bad move.

9. Don't tolerate a personality cult. In their exuberance, Sarah Palin's supporters sometimes come across as downright intolerant. Just go to any internet discussion site and watch who lapses into the ad hominem attacks and convoluted conspiracy theories.

10. Don't diss men. Veteran media commentator Tucker Carlson touts men as "America's single most important voting bloc," because men tend to vote more cohesively. So try not to indulge in gender-baiting happy-talk.

11. Don't play the sexism card. True, sexism (and other –isms, as well) abounds in politics. And it works both ways…remember the bawdy puns that Leftist women played on President G's last name?

12. Don't pander. In one speech, Ms. Palin claimed, "The working women of this country, those who work inside the home and outside of the home, they're overlooked by politicians in Washington." Voters know red-meat pandering when they hear it.

Michelle Bachman is a hard-worker and charismatic fund-raiser. She has the fire-in-the-belly factor. If she can avoid these mistakes, she might well turn Barack Obama into yet another Democratic one-term presidency.

Gun Rights and Slut Rights — An Analogy

Feminisms main boosters tend to be unmarried, childless women. With the exception of a few professional male feminists (e.g. academics, family law attorneys, politicians), there are virtually no male feminist fathers.

I'm not sure this was always the case; back in the 70s and 80s younger mothers likely identified with feminism far more than today. But now, despite the fact that feminists pushed through a number of policy changes that have resulted in the highest rate of single motherhood in our history coupled with the draconian, punitive laws against their children's fathers, the most active and strident feminists out there are childless women. Sure, wives and single mothers may take advantage of feminist inspired law to nail their chidlren's fathers to the wall in divorce, custody and child support cases, but they do not generally self-identify as feminists. In fact, the women most likely to be particularly vicious to their baby-daddies tend to come from the lower socioeconomic segments of society, in which feminism is a vague concept at best. These are also the women who have arguably been done the most wrong by the ideology, as the power to inflict harm granted by feminism is disproportionate to their ability to judge whether doing so is a good idea.

So feminist family law and policy has served as a sort of statutory arms proliferation, analogous to flooding volatile inner-city neighborhoods with guns. This shows how conservatives and liberals are more like each other than they would like to admit. Your typical conservative in a rural part of the country where gun violence is rare strongly holds onto his gun rights, while the urban liberal surrounded by violent crime is convinced that gun control is a necessity. Feminists and their supporters, for their part, live in a world of moderate sexual activity where everyone is responsible about birth control, children are not the expected outcome of the overwhelming majority of sexual relationships, and the power granted by feminist family law is not seen as a dangerous tool that can cause real harm to innocent people, including children.

As the rural conservative looks around at his community and the people he knows and comes to the conclusion that guns are not the problem, the feminist looks at herself and her friends and decides that feminist policy is perfectly reasonable. She and her friends practice safe sex, plan their pregnancies and generally consort with mild-mannered, well-educated men. Although she may extoll the virtues of sexual freedom, she cannot possibly conceive of what the implications of that are for the less restrained members of our society. As for false rape accusations, neither she nor her friends would ever falsely accuse a man of such, so why would anyone else do it?

In the feminist's world of responsible use of birth control, family planning and "progressive" relationships the laws and policies that have wrought so much havoc throughout the lower socioeconomic strata of society are seen as beneficial and – at worst – harmless. She doesn't see the real effects of being a slut, which include impoverished single motherhood, sexually transmitted diseases, fatherless children and social welfare burdens. Not having children, she doesn't understand how a woman leaving a man on a whim can be a very bad thing. Failing to understand that a great many women act impulsively (as do plenty of men), she can't see why one would make up a lie about rape or domestic abuse.

Perhaps I am giving feminists a bit too much credit here — many of them probably do understand, and through a selfish sort of justification process have convinced themselves that the problems other people face as a result of their policies are due to their inferiority as people. This is one of the fundamental problems with liberals; they tend to dismiss people negatively affected by their actions and politics as stupid and ignorant, and therefore deserving of it.

However, whether or not the people negatively affected by feminism are "stupid," one might think that good people would rather see their children grow up in stable families in which they can know their fathers and respect their mothers. If this is not more important to feminists than the right of women to have sexual gratification with the fewest consequences possible, then it is a failed ideology that must be rejected by anyone with a healthy sense of morality.

Inane in Spain: The Gender Agenda Forges Ahead

Ruben Noe holds the distinction of being the first male transsexual in Spain to become pregnant. Born Estefania, the woman began hormone treatments designed to shrink her breasts, stay her cycle, and eventually become a man.

But then the maternity urge struck, with predictable results. In Ruben's words, "They induced the female hormone cycle with pills and prepared my womb so that it would once again be suitable to carry an embryo. Then they inseminated me."

Ruben Noe is not a medical freak. Hospitals across Spain now offer sex-change services as part of their standard package of healthcare services.

In Malaga, the Carlos Haya Hospital has 800 patients who are in the process of switching their sexual identity. These sex-change services are made available to persons as young as 15 years. In Barcelona, the Gender Identity Unit at the Hospital Clinic has already altered the sex of 25 minors, according a January 24, 2010 article in El Pais.

One 15-year-old girl told the reporter, "I only know I want to have the operation. I hate what I've got. I don't want my vagina in order to f___, but just to be myself." One young man recounted his sexual epiphany: "I looked on the Internet and when I entered transsexual forums, I said to myself, 'That's me.'"

These persons have the Spanish Gender Identity Law to thank for their sexual re-awakening. Passed in 2007 at the behest of socialist Prime Minister Rodriguez Zapatero, every Spanish citizen now has the "right" to select his or her own gender identity.

As feminists willingly explain, "gender" is the social construction of biologically-based sex roles. "Sometimes people of one sex or another disagree with the gender identity that society assigns to them," according to Spain's controversial Manual for Citizenship Education.

Following this logic, acolytes in the Religion of Gender view the maternal instinct as just another tool of the patriarchy: "The myth of the maternal instinct is a clear example of the use of biological facts…in order to confine women in relation to their biological function," the Manual goes on to explain.

Once sex roles become fluid and interchangeable, the basis for heterosexual marriage begins to crumble.

Within the space of a month in 2005, Zapatero succeeded in revamping the country's Civil Code, allowing homosexuals to wed and adopt children, and altering the country's divorce code. Dubbed the Express Divorce Law, the new policy eliminated the waiting period until the divorce becomes legally effective, and allows either person to break-up the union without cause. The new law also contains a provision mandating husbands to "share domestic responsibilities and the care and attention" of children.

The effects of the new policy were immediate as they were devastating. Over a four-year period, the number of marital dissolutions more than doubled, climbing to 121,923 in 2008.

Not to be passed over is the Act for the Effective Equality of Men and Women. Despite its innocent-sounding the name, the law soon became a basis for construing every social difference between men and women as proof of sex discrimination.

But Zapatero's monumental quest to reorder the traditional family remained incomplete, because women seeking an abortion still had to travel to a specialized facility, a requirement that was viewed as burdensome and stigmatizing.

So the Zapatero government instituted a series of measures that made the Morning-After Pill available — without a medical prescription and at no cost — to girls as young as 16. But even early-teenagers can also procure a pharmaceutical abortion because the law contains no requirement to inform the parents.

On the very day that the Spanish Upper House passed the new abortion law, Zapatero was able to declare with Orwellian insouciance, “Nobody has the right to take life away from another human being.”

The effect of these policies was breath-taking. From 1997 to 2007, the number of abortions in Spain increased 49%. Not surprisingly, by 2010 the country’s fertility rate plunged to 1.5 children born per woman, making Spain’s fertility rate one of the lowest in the world.

On a historical scale, the Zapatero Project can be likened to the October Revolution of 1917. But while the Bolsheviks merely sought to realign Russia’s economic structure, Zapatero’s gender agenda is far more ambitious — it seeks to recast Spain’s social order according to a feminist and totalitarian vision.

As Ignacio Arsuaga and Miguel Vidal Santos explain in The Zapatero Project, “faced with the fact that it is impossible to bend the family to its will and make it serve its own interests, the Zapatero Project has decided to destroy it.”

On March 29, 2009, Spain experienced its moment of moral re-awakening. On that day, a half million persons joined the March for Life in the streets of Madrid. One hundred other demonstrations were held throughout the country and outside Spanish embassies around the world.

But Rodriguez Zapatero recognizes a historical opportunity when he sees one. As of this writing, his government is now preparing to introduce the Equal Treatment and Anti-Discrimination Law, an act that would serve to criminalize criticism of his radical gender agenda.

Woman Caught in Fraud, Loses Lifetime Alimony

A woman who took her husband for a house and lifetime alimony payments after a judge ruled that she was disabled and unable to work was caught boasting of her dancing exploits on Facebook and promptly brought to court by her ex-husband.

Dorothy McGurk, the belly-dancing alimony recipient, was fond of showing off to her friends, telling them "My belly-dancing is the reason why I adore myself so much … Even though I dance everyday, it's not enough. It won't be enough until I dance for you all, until you feel my euphoria."

When asked why she didn't post photos, she wrote "Gotta be careful what goes on line pookies. The ex would love to fry me with that."

Apparently, that was enough. When asked to explain herself in court, she claimed she was prescribed belly dancing, a claim her doctor denied under oath.

The judge stripped her of her alimony payments, ordered her to pay $5,000 in attorney fees, and told her to get out of the house.

Imagining this scene playing out in court, I think I can feel her ex-husband's euphoria.

How the Liberated Feminist Slut Created the Pick-Up Artist

Delusion Damage · 21 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've written before about women's sexual "liberation" and how Game provides similar "liberation" to men. What I didn't get around to discussing is that Game is in fact a direct result of said women's liberation. The feminists themselves have created the pick-up artists and players they are now so fond of despising.

Back in the "good old days", people got married. If they didn't get married, they by and large didn't have sex either. This applied equally to men and women. Infamous womanizers in those days were not looked upon kindly by society at large. For a bunch of them to get together to exchange tips and tricks for bedding women faster would hardly have been publicly tolerated. "Players" of the time, like the eponymous Giacomo Casanova, largely made their trade by seducing unsuspecting damsels with promises of marriage and then absconding into the night before their fathers found out. It was a dangerous Game back then.

Then came feminism and women's "liberation" – these women, for some reason, felt that the old rules were not so much for their own protection as for the sick enjoyment of evil patriarchs who got off on oppressing women by making them submit to possessive patriarchal desires. A discussion of those claims will not be included in this article, because, frankly, I like to spend my time discussing things that make sense. In any case, these women wanted the freedom to have sex with anyone and everyone with impunity, and the evil patriarchs, being the sadistic bastards they are, gave the women exactly what they wanted.

Now, it was okay for a woman to be as big a slut as she liked, and consequently, it was also okay for a man to sleep with one without any designs for marriage. This opened the field for unapologetically professional players. Those men who found the lifestyle of a serial conqueror alluring could now practice their craft with impunity, and "liberated" women were available in ample supply to give them all the practice they wanted.

Now, "The Game" was truly born. Regular Joes could avail themselves of the practically inexhaustible slut supply of their home cities without having to run from shotgun-wielding fathers while doing their day jobs on the side. Players' reputations could spread, and they could find each other and network, and no one had anything to say to that. The "seduction community" was formed.

Wherever information gathers, innovation will flourish and scientific progress will accelerate. So, too, in the seduction community – it didn't take long before its pooled talents had distilled the process of getting into a girl's pants into very pure and very effective forms. Armed with unprecedented tactical knowledge, players of a new breed never before seen flowed forth into the streets, bars, nightclubs and grocery stores.

Before the new breed of trained players, women were rendered powerless. The sluts and the shy girls alike fell before the might of the industrially optimized players – right onto their beds with their Birkenstocks in the air.

Women are slowly starting to wake up to the fact that it's getting difficult to secure commitment from men any more. Not all of them are ready to face the fact that giving the milk away for free isn't the greatest way to sell the cow, and even those who face facts can do little about the abundance of free milk available to any man willing to learn Game.

What women really ought to do if they want to make men commit again is push for the reversal of their original "liberation", but I'm not holding my breath for that one. What they are doing instead is further shooting their own gender in the foot with dating advice that'll guarantee a lonely cat-filled future.

The feminists made their bed, and now their daughters lie in it with men who won't remember their faces a month and ten more girls later.

Oh, and if any of the women I refer to as "sluts" here take offense, it's wholly unjustified, because – haven't you heard? – "slut" is now an empowering, positive term!

Jodi's Gettin' Off

Max tipped me off to a term – "Jodi" – that pertains to guys who screw soldiers' wives while they are in theater. These slutty wives are a dime a dozen on base, and big business for certain parasitic attorneys who specialize in removing soldiers' pay. I feel for the poor boys — they come home from war and get hit with something even more devastating than a mortar round.

Well, I'll let this marine bring it home to us:

Marine Veteran Snaps, Beats Wife Brutally in Divorce Court

USMC veteran Paul Gonzalez, representing himself in court, had just heard that he would be ordered to pay Catherine Scott-Gonzalez, his wife and the mother of his children, ages 1 and 3, child support and follow a restrictive visitation schedule. He walked out of the courthouse quietly, but something made him change his mind about leaving, upon which he rushed into the courtroom, knocked his wife out with one blow, and began to pummel her mercilessly. The beating continued until police stormed in and tazed him twice, at which point his wife lay crumpled on the ground in a pool of blood with multiple facial fractures.

The wife had attempted on a couple prior occasions to obtain a restraining order against Mr. Gonzalez, but he had apparently never laid a hand on her before, so it was not granted. Nevertheless, there will doubtless be more calls for even easier restraining orders, despite the fact that in some cases it appears these orders actually provoke rather than restrain people.

In looking over the ABA article concerning the attack, I noticed that the comments make a lot of hay over Gonzales being an "abuser," repeating the same crap that is gospel to those who want to justify their pecuniary interest in perpetuating crazy American family law. Here's an example:

> Absolutely nothing to do with child support guidelines provides even a remote justification for what happened. And what happened here is that this spousal abuser reacted to being systematically stripped of power and control by his spouse with the help of the court by trying, however briefly, to reassert his dominance by physically battering his wife.

Gonzales was not an abuser until he attacked his wife in front of the court, and attempting to explain the rage of a man who had just been ordered to pay his wife a large chunk of his take home salary and have restricted access to his children by saying it was only to "reassert his dominance" is patently stupid. Obviously, he attacked the woman because he felt the order was unfair, and he reacted as warriors sometimes do in response to provocation — violently. In fact, it's a miracle that so few men react in this manner, and lawyers and judges know this well (there's a reason metal detectors in courthouses followed right on the heels of Bradley and VAWA).

What likely happened in that courtroom is that Gonzalez, representing himself, got the shaft. That's what happens when you don't know your way around court rules. Lawyers will eat you for lunch. We don't know what the child support order was, but it was probably pretty hefty (as usual), and the visitation quite meager. Add to that the fact that his wife was already living with another man, despite having so recently given birth to Mr. Gonzalez's daughter, and the situation must have seemed absolutely upside-down to the former marine. It was upside down. His wife is obviously a little tramp who has no problem swinging from one dick to another even while raising two babies, and there she was about to get rewarded with an upgrade in lifestyle while the chump father loses his kids and wallet. That's why Mr. Gonzalez lost it.

Now, beating your wife is always a bad idea. Even if it weren't for over-the-top DV laws, grown-ups should know a lot better than to attack people in their family. And in the above example, the divorcée gets to go on camera making herself out to be a poor, innocent little victim. I highly doubt this woman is innocent. It seems pretty clear she left her husband for another man; how could it be otherwise if their daughter is only one and she already has a new boyfriend before her divorce was finalized? But now how does it look? She looks like the victim and these scumbags in the DV industry get to use this as propaganda for more laws that treat divorcing husbands and fathers like garbage.

So, men, if you face something like what caused Mr. Gonzalez to snap, don't lose your cool. Don't attack the woman; don't go after the judge. Keep yourself out of jail and fight back intelligently. It's hard at first, but in time you'll learn how.

However, I'm afraid that more and more men, like Mr. Gonzalez, won't get the message that there are other options until it's too late.

Paul Gonzalez is currently in jail with bail set at $1 million (!), and faces years behind bars for a felony domestic assault charge.

Palin's 'Fight Like a Girl' Quip Endorses Female Violence

careyroberts · 22 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Across America, teenage girls increasingly are resorting to physical assaults, dating violence, bullying, and sexual violence inflicted upon their fellow classmates.

On April 9, April Kuchta of Valparaiso, Ind. reportedly lured a 17-year-old boy with special needs into her house. The boy was led at knifepoint to the kitchen where he was handcuffed behind his back. Kuchta then sexually assaulted the youth and forced him to make humiliating statements while recording the incident on her cell phone.

The boy allegedly was left in handcuffs for two hours covered with a blanket. Kuchta invited others to her house to witness the confinement.
Then an unknown male reportedly freed the boy. He was recaptured at knifepoint and placed back in handcuffs, only to be freed again and bitten on the arm by Kuchta during a struggle for the knife.
Earlier this week the female was charged as an adult on counts of criminal confinement, intimidation, and sexual battery.

April Kuchta is 16 years old.

A mere five days after the shocking assault, former Alaska governor Sarah Palin journeyed to Madison, Wisc. to deliver the keynote speech at a Tea Party rally. Exhorting Republican leaders to push for hefty budget cuts, the charismatic speaker exclaimed the University of Wisconsin women's hockey team should tell "GOP leaders they need to learn how to fight like a girl!"

When I talk with local high school teachers, they tell me the last thing students need is an exhortation to violence. Schoolyard bouts of fisticuffs are becoming more widespread among girls, teachers say.

These observations are supported by a 2010 Department of Justice report, Delinquency Cases in Juvenile Court, which documents a doubling of female juvenile offenders since 1985. Looking specifically at assaults and other offenses against persons, the female scofflaw rate soared by a sizzling 233%.

Dating violence is another area that cries out for attention.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control sponsors a national survey of high school students to find out whether they have engaged in dating violence. In 2003, the results were even-steven – girls were just as likely as boys to have "hit, slapped, or physically hurt on purpose" their dating partner.

When the survey was repeated four years later, physical aggression by boys remained the same. But physical aggression by girls surged ahead, making girls 25% more likely than boys to be the instigators: http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/preview/mmwrhtml/ss5704a1.htm#tab11

Then there's the problem of bullying, which has become so widespread among girls that the federal government now has a website devoted to the problem. The website reprises common tactics of female bullies, such as hair pulling, biting, pinching, or giving someone the "silent treatment."

The website also states the obvious: "Also, girls sometimes bully boys. Girls may call a boy 'gay' or hit a boy because they know he can't hit them back:" http://www.girlshealth.gov/bullying/

Even in the area of sexual assault, girls have now caught up with members of the opposite sex. According to an article published last year by Bruce Taylor in the Journal of Experimental Criminology, the prevalence of sexual violence perpetration (defined as "pushing, grabbing, shoving, or kicking in the private parts") among 6th and 7th graders in the greater Cleveland, Ohio area is higher among girls than boys.

Alas! Despite these worrisome trends, our society often makes light of female aggression, portraying it as proof of long-awaited female empowerment, and turning it into an atta-girl applause line at a political rally.

Left unchecked, the problem of female lawlessness invariably escalates. Consider the tale of Crystal Mangum of Durham, North Carolina, exotic dancer and drug abuser.

In 2006 Mangum accused three Duke University lacrosse players of sexual assault. Later declaring the players innocent, AG Roy Cooper announced the false-accuser would not be charged with perjury, offering the rather limp explanation that police thought “she may actually believe the many different stories that she has been telling.”

Three years later, following a run-in with her then-boyfriend, police arrested Mangum on charges of attempted murder, first-degree arson, assault and battery, damage to property, and resisting an officer. Mangum was later sentenced to a wrist-slap punishment of 88 days behind bars.

On April 3, 2011 Reginald Daye, 46, fell into an argument with his girlfriend over rent money. The man was repeatedly stabbed him in the chest with a kitchen knife. Reggie Daye died 10 days later.

This past Monday, Crystal Mangum was indicted on charges of first-degree murder in the death of Reginald Daye.

False Hate Crime Reported at UNC

Featured Guest · 23 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Report by Una Salus Victus

A UNC student falsely claimed to be the victim of a hate crime last week. According to him, “A man burned his hand and called him an anti-gay slur.”

The student, Quinn Matney, is a freshman at the university. As it turns out, he made this story up. According to Chancellor Thorp, of the Department of Public Safety, “That report, filed with campus police on April 5, was false.” Thorp also went on to say that, “it is important to recognize that incidents of harassment do occur… When they do, we take them seriously. We strive to foster a welcoming, inclusive and safe environment at Carolina.”

The University officials no longer plan to proceed with plans to report the incident as a hate crime to the federal government.

Matney is expected to face charges for filing the false report.

There is an interesting partnership between feminists and homosexual men. What this poor individual did was simply what he has noticed other women in his age bracket do (and get away with) time and again. The big difference is that women have a victim card in their deck while men (homo or hetero-sexual) do not. Considering all the coddling laws that have been passed in favor of both groups, it isn’t unreasonable that he would consider himself within the protected class and immune from ‘retaliatory’ prosecution when the lie was discovered. Ironically, he has found out that, even though he has laws specific for him, he is still a man and expected to be responsible for his actions (see: victim card holders). If this story gets out, perhaps the gay population can see exactly how they are viewed in the eyes of the law and they need no additional support.

In all actuality, I am glad that he is going to be charged as this would have had the potential to become a double whammy for men. Being besieged on both sides with false allegations would only serve to further alienate the already besieged college male.

Love the Soldier

Max · 23 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

". . . and I had seen nothing sacred, and the things that were glorious had no glory and the sacrifices were like the stockyards at Chicago if nothing was done with the meat except to bury it."

Ernest Hemingway – A Farewell to Arms

There is a strong undercurrent of anti-military sentiment in our part of the web. This community is supposed to be about men. The people who come here, male and female alike, espouse certain conservative, traditional values. They do this while grappling with the changing social, political, and economic realities of our rapidly globalizing world. They (we) are struggling to understand the role of men in these woeful times, so it saddens and disheartens me to see so many people dismissive of the most traditional male role there is.

The negative sentiments run strong when I write things about the military, or military life. They are especially hard when I talk about my own coarse behavior, and some of my internal motivations. At its worst, the criticism calls soldiers stupid, drunken louts and violent sociopaths. Typically it leans on some sort of philosophical argument about the morality of whatever conflict, or of having a military at all. The line goes something like – I pay taxes, I don't approve of . . .

This is a far cry from the sentiments I heard in the days after 9/11.

I first enlisted in September of 2001. The American thirst for vengeance was so strong at the time that the military could have turned the whole Eastern Hemisphere into a free-fire zone. Then the reality hit home, and people realized that war is expensive. The economy took a dump, and Americans soon began to equate military spending with their own paychecks.

That led to the sentiment Love the Soldier, Hate the War.

You can no more simultaneously love the soldier and hate the war than you can love the whip and hate the sting. To love the soldier is to accept him for who he is. A soldier is a fighter. War is more than what he does. War is who he is.

In his book On Combat, Lt. Col. Dave Grossman (ret.) expounds upon the idea that society is made up of certain kinds of people: sheep, wolves, and sheepdogs.

Understand that there is nothing morally superior about being a sheepdog; it is just what you choose to be. Also understand that a sheepdog is a funny critter: He is always sniffing around out on the perimeter, checking the breeze, barking at things that go bump in the night, and yearning for a righteous battle.

Whether you like it or not, there are people who were born with (or developed) what Grossman calls "the gift of aggression". More than likely these people, these men, were mistreated. They were bullied, neglected, ignored. At some point in their lives they were made to experience the worst side of human nature – the side where self interest becomes predatory.

Soldiers are sheepdogs; men with a profound internal sense of justice. Soldiers don't need to ask why to fight because they are already predisposed to fight. Just point the bad man out and they will take the fight to him.

Civilians do not hate soldiers because soldiers cost money. They hate soldiers because the existence of soldiers reminds them that the world is a hard place. Somewhere outside the quiet comfort of your home there are people who want what you have. They will steal from you, they will rape you, and they will kill you. Living in denial of this fact will not make it less true.

And yes, the soldier is a rough son-of-a-bitch. What would you expect of a man whose reality consists of hardship and discipline? You can no more expect a Joe to be a warrior monk than you can be angry at a dog for pissing on your flowers. Lock up your women and hide your booze. If a man's life can be bought with hot chow and pretty ribbons, can you really complain?

None of this should come as a shock to anyone. We all know, in our hearts, that soldiers are as they will always be.

The resentment I encounter has nothing to do with justice or budget gaps or money. Resentment is never truly ideological because resentment is felt, not thought. If there is resentment for soldiers in a community of men, it is because the soldier has something many men lack: a feeling of purpose.

I spent most of my life feeling lost and without purpose. I would still feel that way if I had not looked deep within myself and accepted that there was something I felt I had to do. To Hell with the risks, somewhere there was a fight and I needed to be in the middle of it. I had no right to complain about the character of the fighting if I honestly thought I could do a better job myself . . .

What could be more manly than that?

Happy Easter!

Woman, why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou?

Book Review: Conquer the Crash

Obligatory disclaimer: I am a heavy equipment operator, not a financial advisor. Do not take anything written here as financial advice. You are a special snowflake, and your situation is equally unique. Therefore, before you act on anything suggested below, I recommend you first consult an actual financial professional, one that is remunerated for performing such a service. For those that wish not or cannot, well, take this advice for as much as you paid for it. Cheers, EW.

Robert R. Prechter's 2002 book Conquer the Crash[image] ties Elliot Wave theory, Kondratieff Cycle theory, and Austrian economics together to make the case that (a) a big stock market crash is coming, (b) it is completely predictable and unavoidable, and (c) one can not only avoid getting hurt in the inevitable deflationary depression. While the book is dated…it is 9 years old, after all…the theories, principles, and advice dispensed inside is as applicable to 2011 as it was to the days immediately following 9-11.

The Gist: Using Elliot Wave theory, Prechter contends that business cycles are not driven by monetary policy, fiscal policy, or political twiddling with the country's economy, but by irrational psychological forces driven by the mentality of the human herd. This mentality does all the wrong things at the wrong time, for instance, buying high and selling low, for reasons attributable to popular sentiment, such as Greenspan's famed "irrational exuberance". It (the irrational herd mentality) also manifests itself via market valuations resembling a regular, repeating pattern that consists of five waves: a slow build (wave 1), a slight contraction (wave 2), a much stronger and economically robust climb (wave three), a moderate contraction (wave 4), and terminating with an apparently strong but fundamentally weak climb (wave 5). These five waves are followed by a three down waves a, b, and c, in which a represents the sharp drop characteristic of a depression, wave b is a moderate "dead cat bounce" climb, and wave c is weaker downward trend. These waves can "nest" inside each other, depending upon the span of time in which one looks at the data; Prechter claimed (in 2002, remember) that we were set up for a "grand supercycle" depression of a wave 5 peaking just as a grand wave III was peaking, meaning that we are headed into a wave 4 downwave. See images of Elliott Waves here.

Translation: America's best times for the next century or so are behind her, as she rides out Grand Supercycle Wave IV, waiting for the bottom and the rush up to Wave V.

The following quote conveniently sums up the first half of the first half of the book:

> The fact that price changes are patterned proves that the collective's net valuations are not reasoned, but it also shows that they are not random, either. The remaining option is that they are unconsciously determined. Indeed, shared mood trends and collective behavior appear to derive from a herding impulse governed by the phylogenetically ancient, pre-reasoning portions of the brain. This emotionally charged mental drive developed through evolution to help animals survive, but it is maladaptive to forming successful expectations concerning future valuation. The only way for an individual to temper the consequences of the herding impulse and to gain independence from it is to understand that it exists. Stocks are not registering a Supercycle top like that of 1929, but a Grand Supercycle top…the entirety of Grand Supercycle wave IV should last a century and comprise two or three major bear markets with one or two intervening bull markets

The second part of the first half of the book explains what deflation is and makes the case for long-term deflation following a Wave 5 peak. He touches on the theory of banking and credit, discusses (in a head nod to the Austrians) how fractional reserve banking contributes to the inflationary booms of waves three and five, and introduces the Kondratieff Cycle, which theorizes that monetary contractions are regularly occurring and predictable over time, and are marked by "several years of declining commodity prices, a few years of newly declining wholesale and retail prices, and a sharp decline in industrial production". It is also in this section where he absolutely pops the conceit that the central bank or any other centralized entity can control the economy, since, according to Prechter, said economy is governed more by the invisible hand of popular psychology than it is by the relatively meager machinations and interventions of a central banker or politician.

The second half of Prechter's book focused on what can be done to protect one's wealth and even enlarge it, in what he saw as a sustained bear market for the next few decades. To wit:

1. Bonds: Buy bonds. Safety is your goal. Stay with a short-term bond ladder. Do not rely on "downgrading" via credit rating agencies to signal when to get out; rating agencies lag market forces, so when a bond is downgraded, it is usually too late to get out.

2. Real estate: avoid purchasing or owning real estate until the market bottoms. Real estate is illiquid, and will fall hard when the stock market falls hard. Avoid REITs. Rent if you can, and get out from underneath huge mortgage payments.

3. Collectibles and Numismatic Coins: Do not invest in collectibles or art, since the value of said articles goes through cycles too and are usually subject to fads. In particular, get out of rock and roll and other Boomer memorabilia, as the demand for this niche market is set to fall when the Boomers retire. In addition, Prechter recommends that investors not pay price premiums for the numismatic value of rare coins, since in a depression, the value of a coin will be its melt weight, not its rarity. Moreover, there is no guarantee that the government will exempt numismatic coins from future confiscation attempts as they did some 80 years ago during GDI.

4. Cash: Prechter claims that the watchword of investing … diversification … is a trap in a deflationary depression because everything goes down (as opposed to bonds and stocks moving in opposite directions, as is the typical behavior of these instruments). He advocates that investors have at least some currency on hand, held in certain specific "cash equivalents" that are safe and held in a safe facility. Next to bullion-type gold and silver coins, Prechter recommends holding short-term US treasury debt directly or investing in money markets that themselves invest exclusively in short-term US treasury obligations. For those investors who can and are inclined to invest outside the USA, Prechter recommends opening an account at a stable bank in countries such as Switzerland and/or Singapore, countries who had/have very good fiscal/monetary fundamentals, whose people are financially conservative, and who are unlikely to inflate their currencies.

5. Find a "Safe" Bank: According to Prechter, in a deflationary crash, a relatively safe US bank has a good shot at survival or even prosperity. He also recommends, if the investor has the means and inclination, banks in countries that are unlikely to impose exchange controls, wealth transfer restrictions and the banks themselves have a low overall debt-to-deposits ratio. Once again, such banks reside in Switzerland and Singapore. Prechter takes care to warn the reader that not all banks in Switzerland or Singapore are safe; some are laden with the same derivatives and leveraged investments that US banks are, and that investors must do their homework before selecting a safe harbor for their money.

6. Stocks: Prechter recommends that you do not invest "long" in stocks, stock mutual funds, stock index futures, stock options, or other equity-based investments. He also discusses investment in bear funds at length.

7. Commodities: Unless you are a player in commodities and know what you are doing, Prechter recommends investors stay away from this game.

8. Precious metals: Despite the poor performance of precious metals as a "deflation hedge", "war hedge", and "depression hedge", and despite the staggering losses of those invested in precious metals in the two decades prior to the publishing of the book in 2002, Prechter recommended acquiring silver and gold since both were cheap in relative terms and that people could have it in their physical possession, something they may find difficult when the mad scramble begins. Prechter recommended against buying gold and silver in paper form, as well as gold and silver stocks. Physical metal in the investor's possession and stored somewhere safe (i.e., not a bank deposit box) is the way to go.

9. Your Retirement Account: The track record of countries around the world suggests that countries facing a deflationary depression are likely to seize privately held retirement monies to help balance the books in its public entitlement systems, and Prechter outlined a method by which the USG could do the same without a direct seizure: rule that IRA, 401(k), and Keogh investors could no longer have any portion of their retirement monies in stocks, require that they be invested instead in T-bills, and raise the penalty for early withdrawal to 100%. Bingo…a seizure without a seizure. His advice, get out if you can.

10. Insurance and Annuities. Prechter warns that many insurance and annuity companies are invested in junk-grade debt as a way of maximizing their returns, and recommends that investors move their whole life insurance policies to a sound insurer as soon as possible.

11. Reliable Sources for Financial Warnings. Prechter takes a jaundiced view of the ability of rating agencies to sound any kind of warning with sufficient time to act; often these agencies lag the initial indicators and waiting for their downgrade to move your money is a bad idea.

12. Physical Safety.

> The main social influence of a bear market is to cause society to polarize in countless ways…..social, religious, political, racial, corporate, by class and otherwise. In a bear market, people in whatever way are impelled to identify themselves as belonging to a small ersocial unit than they did before and to belong more passionately. There is always some social unrest, even in the late stages of a bull market, but conflict always escalates in a bear market. One reason that conflicts gain such scope in depressions is that much of the middle class gets wiped out by the financial debacle, increasing the number of people with little or nothing to lose and anger to spare.

Regarding ensuring physical safety in a bear market, Prechter recommends preparing for one's chosen course of action intelligently, asking questions such as "is there a more sensible alternative?" or "is this course of action really necessary?". In other words, preparing for a Zombie Apocalypse may not be the wisest thing to do with one's money. The aim is toward preparing for more likely scenarios over less-likely scenarios, such as the imposition of currency controls in your country or military attack from without.

13. Preparing for a Change in Politics. Bear markets generate a "throw the bums out" sort of mentality when it comes to politicians. Third parties, outsiders, and radicals do well in elections during bear markets. Moreover, national and international moods that is are more radicalized than during bull markets. International politics will become increasingly dangerous, while debt, fiat money, inflation, and liquidity turn monetary risk into political risk. If one has political aspirations, one will want to run for office at the market bottom. This way, political hopefuls will reap the benefits of the cyclical upswing in market valuation. This mentality is not fair, as it is the public that controls the social mood, not elected pols, but it is what it is.

14. Identify a Safe Haven. Ensure that your passport is current. Prechter recommends Anglophone countries, as well as Ireland and Switzerland, all for their mild politics and political traditions. If you can, move to your safe have country now, rather than wait until after the scrambling starts and the doors close.

15. Call in Loans and Pay Off Debt. Ensure that you do not lend your money to a weak debtor, and if at all possible, become debt-free. Governments, particularly municipalities, will probably default on their debt. If you can afford it, the best mortgage is no mortgage at all. Also, do not rely on government programs to feed you or your family, especially in old age.

16. Businesses. Locate your business in a state with "at will" employment laws, reduce large business inventories, offer a discount for cash up front if a supplier, and unwind your derivatives if a financial institution.

A Short List of Dos and Don'ts: Prechter recommends taking the following below actions, which sum up the advice given in the second half of his book: Don't: Own stocks, own anything but the most pristine bonds, invest in real estate, buy commodities, invest in collectibles, or trust rating services to give you sufficient advanced warning. Do: Talk to parents who may be planning to pass assets to you–help them get safe and liquid, keep cash on hand, open accounts at two or three of the safest banks in the world, invest in short-term money-market instruments issued by the most sound governments, own some precious metals, buy insurance only through the safest companies and the safest banks, sell collectibles, and sell your business(es).

Bottom Line: In all, I found the beginning part of this book the most interesting, as I had previously heard of Elliott Waves but did not know much about them. The second half of his book contains quite a few specific steps and companies to contact to execute Prechter's recommendations; readers may access these recommendations by finding a copy of the book and viewing the companies listed. In the hindsight of the last nine years, Prechter's predictions have been more or less right on, whether he continues to be correct about the course of the next century remains to be seen.

Marriage Isn't Dying. It's Dead.

Lot's of people say that marriage is dying because less and less people are getting married. Many men are on a defacto marriage strike refusing to get married. While marriage rates are going down and many men are on a defacto marriage strike, marriage isn't dying. It's already dead.

What we think of as "marriage" or "traditional marriage" is marriage 1.0. Marriage 1.0 was killed a few decades ago by legal changes and marriage 2.0 replaced it. Most people don't understand what the name, marriage 2.0, really communicates. The version number concept comes from software engineering and changing the whole number in a version number says that there were major changes between version 1.0 and version 2.0. When talking about marriage the use of "marriage 2.0″ is correct. There were massive changes between marriage 1.0 and marriage 2.0. Many people who use the term, marriage 2.0, don't really understand this. They think of marriage 2.0 as really being marriage 1.2 or marriage 1.02, minor changes not the major change it is.

When a new version of a software application comes out, no one is forced to upgrade to the new version. They may choose to upgrade. The software vendor may not support the old version anymore but there are no forced upgrades. This is different than the change from marriage 1.0 to marriage 2.0. There was a forced change to the new version of marriage. Everyone who was in marriage 1.0 was forced into marriage 2.0. Since whether marriage 1.0 or marriage 2.0 is available is determined by laws there can be only one or the other available at any time. The only marriage anyone in a Western country can have is marriage 2.0. It doesn't matter if a person thinks there in a marriage 1.0 marriage or "traditional marriage". They are not because it's determined by the law, and the law in all Western countries only allows for marriage 1.0.

This is why marriage is already dead (in the West). In every Western country marriage 1.0 is simply not an option no matter how much someone wants it. Anyone who tries to push "marriage" or "traditional marriage" is really pushing marriage 2.0 and by extension pushing feminism (since marriage 2.0 is feminist marriage) whether they realize it or not. There is no way of having a non-feminist marriage (or marriage 1.0 marriage or "traditional marriage") unless a man expats. (Bringing a woman from a non-feminist country to a Western country is not enough to avoid marriage 2.0 because it's the laws that determine which version of marriage is in force. Thus the man must expat if he wants a marriage 1.0 marriage.)

What does (non-feminist) marriage being completely dead and buried mean for us? Unless a man is willing to permanently expat, he should not get married. Anyone who is pushing marriage even if they claim they're pushing "traditional marriage" is reallying pushing marriage 2.0, a feminist form of marriage. Thus the marriage pushers are either useful idiots for feminism or have no real problem with feminist forms of marriage. If any of the marriage pushers were really interested in rebuilding marriage 1.0, they would not be attempting to shame men into marrying or calling us hedonists or nihilists. They would be in the courts challenging aspects of marriage 2.0 such as no fault divorce, and/or they would be setting up private marriage systems that actually reflect the "traditional marriage" they claim to believe in. (Even if these things didn't work, at least we would know that the social conservatives and traditionalist conservatives who push marriage were actually serious about "traditional marriage" and not attempt to pull a bait and switch on men.) Because of all this marriage in the West is no longer an anti-feminist institution. That kind of marriage is completely dead. The current form of marriage, marriage 2.0, is a solidly feminist institution. To support marriage now (unless said supports are legally challenging marriage 2.0, setting up private marriage systems, or encouraging men to expat to get married) is to support feminism. Anyone in the West who is married is in a feminist marriage whether they like it or not.

A Men's Convention? Seriously?

Some time ago, we discussed the idea of a men's convention here on The Spearhead, and a lot of men really liked the idea. It sparked a lot of interest, some speculation and a few offers of assistance. Eventually, however, the idea sputtered out, largely because most of us simply don't have the time to organize something like that. Of course, pulling a convention off is a big undertaking. Event management is far beyond the scope of my abilities, and probably most others' as well. It takes someone with energy, zeal and dedication, and those people are not exactly a dime a dozen in this workaday world where most of us come home just plain tired five days out of the week.

But what if I told you there's already someone doing this? Some time ago, a man got in touch with me about his business and his idea. He told me about his work and his dream. Not only is he running a men's convention; he's running one that isn't preaching about how we need to be better slaves to women and big brother government. Even better, it was founded in large part out of respect for a good friend who was dealt a very unfortunate hand. In fact, it's about fellowship, moving forward in life, and respect for ourselves and the men around us. And, almost unbelievably, it's already an international event.

To me, it sounded almost too good to be true. Why hadn't I heard of it before? I wondered…

So I had a few conversations with the man behind the convention, and listened to what he had to say. His name is Anthony Johnson, and it turns out he's young, he's idealistic, and he shares a lot of our concerns. I found myself liking this young man quite a bit.

Although Anthony has been focusing on the challenges facing younger men in the Game/dating arena for some time, he's indicated that he wants to expand into other men's issues as well — a move I think shows a lot of maturity and foresight on his part. When we grow up we find that there's more to life than simply getting laid, after all, and he's committed to moving beyond the simple application of Game to life. This is a step I wholeheartedly support, because while Game has a lot of utility, it is simply a first (however important) step toward creating a new, better place for men in today's society. I also think some of our readers and authors could offer him some assistance in that regard, and broaden the appeal of the event.

After a few talks, I told him to let me know when his events are coming up. I knew readers would be interested, but I didn't want to jump the gun. Additionally, I like to catch the feminists flat-footed. It takes time for their squawking to translate into action, and I know they read this site on a daily basis. No point in giving them plenty of prep time to try to sabotage a perfectly decent men's event.

So, here on The Spearhead, I'd like to officially introduce and endorse The 21 Convention, a convocation of 21st century men dedicated to moving forward and taking on challenges.

In 2011, Anthony is holding two conventions. The first, a UK event, will be held in London on June 2. The next will be held in Orlando on July 21.

The respective links follow:

The 21 Convention 2011 of London England

The 21 Convention 2011 of Orlando Florida

Anthony has also been kind enough to offer a discount code for Spearhead readers, which will be offered through the newsletter (sign up through the MGTOW logo and newsletter link on the top left sidebar and the introductory email will provide the code).

Finally, I should add that Anthony let me know that the price will go up incrementally at the end of each month prior to the event due to increased late booking costs, so those who are sure they are interested in attending ought to get in as soon as possible.

Personally, I hope to make it to one of the events. London would be my preference (I've wanted to go to Europe again for some time), but I'll have to act soon and am not sure I can make that one. I'd love to meet some readers, and I think this would be a great venue for that. It would be great to see a contingent from The Spearhead represented at The 21 Convention, and I know Anthony would welcome us with open arms. I'm quite optimistic about this convention, and very pleased to see a young man devoting so much of his time and talent to making it happen. I'm going to keep readers updated on the events' status, and would be happy to have reports from attendees.

Baroness Deech: Immodest Women Responsible for Increasing Use of Injunctions

Injunctions, which are gag orders, have been on the rise in Britain due to the appetite for salacious details concerning the lives of famous people, and the willingness of many people – mainly women according to Deech – to sell these details to tabloids.

Although voyeurism in modern media has been on the rise for some time, what is relatively new is the absolute shamelessness with which people peddle their stories to the press. British tabloids and American talk shows have grown raunchier and more explicit for years, sinking to levels heretofore unknown. In addition to this, the victim culture that has so thoroughly taken hold of Western womanhood appears to be giving women – including mercenary prostitutes – the sense that they can do no wrong as females, and therefore whatever shameful acts they took part in are no reflection on them, personally.

Baroness Deech:

> I do blame women. In many of the cases of gagging orders we read about, women have sold their favours to celebrities and then have tried to make even more money out of the situation by offering to sell their "kiss and tell" stories to the papers.
> This is no doubt an unpopular point of view on my part, but I feel quite ashamed by these women's behaviour, although some say they have the right to "speak out" and "set the record straight." What word do we have for women who make lots of money from illicit sex?

Sadly, contemporary society has so thoroughly failed to instill any sense of shame in women that it now falls to judges to order them to shut up under penalty of incarceration. These injunctions are unpopular with many in Britain due to their limitations on speech, and judges are coming under criticism for issuing them, but according to Deech they are in accordance with law that recognizes the right to privacy in family matters.

When one sees judges taking flak for having to deal with women in this manner, it suggests that the consequences of feminism and women's lib are finally starting to inconvenience society at its highest levels.

Baroness Deech is a supporter of divorce reform, and has gone on record saying "Women's position in society [has changed]. If women, quite rightly, expect equality in pay and employment and education, there is a difficulty in squaring that with the way they are pictured in the divorce courts."

MGTOW Rappers?

W.F. Price · 26 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I don't generally keep up with rap music, but I recently came across a song called "Bitch Feat," which features Too Short and E-40. The message in the video is pretty clear: "don't marry a bitch."

Sometimes I wonder what feminists think of rap; they certainly don't talk about it much. Perhaps the video below explains why:

It seems the message is getting around out there.

Comment of the Week

W.F. Price · 27 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Editor: we've been seeing a lot of criticism here from White Nationalists lately, probably due to someone linking PMAFT's "White Knight Nationalism" post from some time back. I wasn't sure whether a response would be worth it, but commenter "John" left a comment to PMAFT's post that I thought roughly sums up my own views on the matter. Perhaps some of the White Nationalists coming around can read this comment and engage in a little reflection. If you really care about your ethnicity/race/religion, it might pay off to clean up your own house first. That goes for all of us, of course.

By John

The "female" commentators on WN sites are at least as shaming and self-righteous as those on lefty-feminist sites, and I wouldn't be at all surprised if half of them had some sort of moustache getting a bit out of control on the upper lip and hairy armpits. In truth, the majority of their comments are disgusting to read, and that's if you are lucky(?) enough to be able to decipher what they are trying to say because of their almost universal lack of analytical thought process and woeful grammatical skills. I keep thinking "old doublewide trailers" halfway through their first paragraph and simultaneously envision that old hag up on the mountain during the first part of the movie "Rob Roy" presently sitting in front of a computer.

And look at this gem from the article above – "Once again, fellas, the onus is on YOU to please women. Not the other way around. Ghetto Negroes have better wooing, and flirtation skills, than so many White males."

Here we have a supposed W.N. self-imagined "White Goddess" who has experience with being wooed by "Ghetto Negroes" and she expresses admiration for their flirtation skills. Got her thing tingling, I see. Maybe that "tingling" was satiated a few times by one or more of those "Ghetto Blacks", yet some "Bush" swilling W.N. "White Knight" will draw his sword and proclaim, "I will defend this sluts honor to my death!"

Yeah. "Git-R-Done" and all that, Jackass.

Insofar as the WN men go, I'd have to agree that the majority of them are likely bunion-rubbers, drink the cheapest of beer, fondle their Chinese SKS nightly, and do whatever the "Old Lady" tells them to do while they strut around in front of their friends and the mountain of aluminum empties like little Bantam roosters. Almost as a universal, they hold up the WN females as godesses in spite of the fact that 99% of those "ladies" have had their holes punched and left full of biological waste by more men than there are oil companies that have ever drilled wells in Texas. Frankly, it's pathetic. "Yup, I got me a good one down at the used lot! Low mileage but ridden really hard. I like 'em that way. We even goes to church now! Naw, them's her kids from one of them other fella's, I think."

Got an American' flag hanging in the yard over near the pickup, and when properly drunk they sing along with Lee Greenwood, mumbling "and I'm proud to be an American, because at least I know I'm free." Is this a great country or what?

Are W.N.-types correct when they posit that other outgroups are to blame for what has happened in this country? Yes and no. The zeitgeist is the zeitgeist, and indeed powerful and convincing forces are behind it. Yet, no one forces anyone to be a direct participant. Anyone can opt out. There is no "rule" that posits that women must be self-centered, rationalization hamster whores nor does one exist which mandates that men should be layabout cads who "pump and dump" to prove their manhood to themselves. As the Knight Templar stated in one of those Indiana Jones moves, "He chose poorly", and so do women in droves.

I happened upon one of Professor Kevin MacDonalds books, "Culture of Critique" some time back, and this superb work – peer reviewed and footnoted beyond belief (given the topic, a grand idea), left me with absolutely no doubt that what has happened to this country is no accident, but rather by planning and design. Nevertheless, free will is free will, and people chose the immoral and degrading path that was and continues to be followed. Evil forces are indeed hard at work, but as I argued earlier, no one forces anyone to chose evil over good.

Are there “good women” who are also blessed with high intelligence who are ethnically conscious. Assuredly, whether they are White, Black, Asian or Mestisto. I’ve got no problem with people being proud of their race and culture, and if anything, am chagrined that because of “political correctness” it is almost impossible to express pride in the white race without being instantaneously labeled a racist. Nothing like a pejorative to end an intelligent discussion.

Nevertheless, the few times that I have come across W.N. websites, given the general lack of intellectual consideration demonstrated in the writing, the vitriolic garbage spouted by the little goddesses with the worn-out D.N.A. receptacles, as well as the almost moronic defense of today’s white women by the “White Knights”, I am not overly compelled to return. In general terms, outside of the superb work at “The Occidental Observer” (with generally poor commentary), I am not compelled to return. There’s simply no “There, there.” Pro-active solutions are absent, and what you have is just keyboarded yelling by the men and senseless, self-promoting, male-shaming bitching by the bitches.

Insofar as the W.N. men go, they are almost their own worst enemies. The W.N. women? You may as well go over and hang out at feministing. For a good time call 1-800-BITCH. As a rule they are disgusting hypocrites and beyond disappointing. Hell, the best description is repellent. Yes, repellent.

United Way: Funding Feminism

I've noticed recently that a number of the more radical feminists who are active online are working with organizations funded by the United Way. I thought this was a bit curious, so I did some more research, and found that United Way has a long history of dropping large amounts of cash in the hands of some of the most radical women's organizations in North America.

For example, United Way – an organization founded by Christians – has been providing direct funding to abortion clinics for years. Feminist women's shelters, hotbeds of anti-male and anti-family activism, often operate on United Way's dime.

How did United Way come to be a major supporter of virulent feminism? Probably simply from inattention and lack of investigation. A feminist family law/prosecution outfit (women's shelters work hand in hand with attorneys and the DA/county prosecutor) can present itself simply as a charity for homeless battered women, and Christian donors will empty their pockets without question. An abortion clinic can call itself a "women's health center" and United Way will send them a check without question. It's quite a racket, but in recent years this has started to change.

The Catholic Church has disassociated itself from United Way in some instances where there has been a clear conflict of views over funds providing abortions. Some Protestant ministers have begun to raise the issue as well. Feminists are not happy, but this is just the beginning, and it demonstrates that these feminist outfits that rely on charity have some serious vulnerabilities.

For one thing, a great deal of charity, including United Way donations, comes directly from Christians, and feminists tend to be amongst the most anti-Christian people out there. Hatred of "the patriarchy" is usually directed squarely against Christians — probably the group that provides them with the majority of non-government funds. Another one of the odd contradictions of feminism is that Christian political support is often responsible for the policies that have allowed them to operate with so little scrutiny. The old "widows and orphans" refrain of the Old Testament, in the modern day unfortunately applied to single mother households, is a powerful theme in American religious society, and feminist organizations have taken full advantage of that.

However, today it is much easier to research these organizations than it used to be, and exposing the politics of the kinds of feminists who often run women's shelters could have an impact on United Way funding. Particularly important is disseminating information to the congregations that donate to these charities, and prompting some parishioners to bring the issue up with their pastor/priest.

The leadership of many feminist organizations is comprised of die-hards from the 1970s, and although it would be a mistake to underestimate their political savvy, they and their ideology are clearly on the decline. Now is the time to start questioning the basis of the industry that has sustained these ideologues for all these years, allowing them to wreak havoc on the family as they indulge in lesbian affairs.

It is time for donors to start holding charities to account, and to demand that they justify their support for these anti-male harridans who so often receive funds from them. Our readers can help by spreading the word.

Abuse of Restraining Orders Finally Getting Some Attention

W.F. Price · 28 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Family law attorney Liz Mandarano recently wrote a column for Huffington Post detailing some of the many problems with court-ordered restraining orders, which have become a potent offensive weapon in the hands of unethical attorneys and vengeful wives.

Although Mandarano argues that the orders can be effective tools, she exposes the fact that they are far too often misused as a tactic to gain an advantage in family law proceedings. Those of us who have been through a divorce already know this, but there remains a stunning amount of ignorance regarding these orders and how devastating they can be to men falsely labeled "abusers."

Restraining orders often apply to both parties during divorce, e.g. one spouse may be ordered to refrain from disposing of property, papers or financial assets, but the so-called "stay away orders," which eject spouses (almost always men) from their homes, are the most damaging.

Below are some of the effects she lists:

> What does the accuser have to gain in misusing orders of protection? A lot of things, including the following:
> Judicial requests for exclusive use and occupancy of a marital residence are not often granted, and can take up to six months for a ruling. Therefore, unless an allegation of threat of immediate harm is claimed, couples are forced to live under the same roof unless they can come to some form of agreement. Orders of protection force the accused to immediately leave the residence.
> It sets a precedent for custody. Joint custody is presumed. However, if a permanent order of protection is issued containing a finding of domestic abuse, that finding cannot later be disputed. As a result, in many jurisdictions, there is suddenly a rebuttable presumption that the victim should have legal custody. Also, the longer a parent's access to a child is limited, the less likely that person will be deemed the primary caregiver. In fact, often the accused spouse's children are now afraid of their father. Many upstanding citizens are shocked to find themselves automatically subject to supervised visitation with a social worker. This may confuse children, wishing to "please" their mother, and scar them unnecessarily for life.
> It serves as a bargaining chip–many men are forced to agree to a permanent order of protection either of the same or more limited scope in return for something else such as lower spousal support or more access to children.
> It drains resources. It gives the accuser the upper hand in property litigation and spousal support. The ousted spouse has no access to their financial documents, tax forms, personal property, safe deposits, deeds, etc. Although he can always request from his wife's attorney or the court that these items be made available, the process often takes time, and requests for compliance are often ignored.
> It emotionally puts men on the defense. They have no access to their belongings and family. There is the mad dash to find a new place, new clothes, furniture, etc. He is now known as the "bad guy." And, if he acts too aggressively to refute the allegations, it may make him suddenly seem more menacing. The innocent who are accused are therefore thrown into overwhelming turmoil from which it is difficult to recover.
> It creates a windfall for the attorneys. Once a stay away order is issued, the parties cannot communicate with each other. All communications must therefore be carried out via the parties' lawyers. As a result, there is a strong incentive for the less ethically minded lawyer to protract a legal battle by encouraging this tactic.

Essentially, if you get an order of protection against your spouse, you will win custody. That's a powerful motivating factor. People can easily justify saying they are "afraid" under these circumstances, even if there was never any threat of imminent harm. An errant wife may well believe that when her husband finds out what she's been up to (adultery, theft, plotting to rip off her husband), he will react violently, so she may well be frightened whether or not he would do such a thing, and genuine fear is pretty much the only standard for issuing these orders.

Having an order of protection granted stacks the deck so much in the spouse's favor that she'd have to really screw up to lose the upper hand. They are a big part of the reason women continue to outright win in custody cases that might appear fairly even from the outset.

A few statistics:

> A few recent studies examine this problem. One study found that 59% of allegations of domestic violence between couples involved in custody disputes could not be substantiated by the courts as true. A 2008 analysis of orders issued in one county in West Virginia concluded that 81% were unnecessary or false. A 2010 review by Connecticut's Judicial Department noted that ex parte orders increased over 25% from 2003 and 2004, and that nothing was being done to stop frivolous requests****.

So why has Mandarano chosen to bring this up? According to her, the reason the judiciary hasn't acted is because "…unfortunately, those raising this legitimate concern tend to do so using vitriolic rhetoric. Websites focusing on men's and father's rights abound, and most use bombastic language that pretty much undermines their point that these men are peaceful and non-threatening."

I think that's kind of funny, and totally backward. If it weren't for the rising tide of angry men out there this problem would be ignored. There's much profit in it, after all, and it's ridiculous to think that attorneys like Mandarano would voluntarily give that up out of some altruistic change of heart.

She continues:

> There's pretty much no doubting my feminist camp allegiance, and it was a personal challenge to review many anger-driven websites and commentaries blasting women and still write this article and acknowledge that there is a systemic-wide problem.

Let's drag out the old analytic mind here, and ask why it should be challenging to acknowledge that a "systemic-wide problem" would result in a great deal of anger. Seems fairly self-evident to me…

But leaving aside the petty slight of men who have every reason to be angry about what happened to them, at least Mandarano does seem to have some decent ideas for constructive changes. Personally, I don't think they are enough, but they are a good start, and she ought to get some credit for trying.

Also, I think the angry men out there deserve some credit, too. If it weren't for all of us out there bringing these issues up, they would continue to be ignored. It seems, actually, that we are starting to hit a nerve, and Mandarano does acknowledge that in a roundabout way.

The Feminist Rape of Little Boys

Featured Guest · 28 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Americans believe in ideals of equality and fairness. All children, regardless of ethnic heritage, religion, gender or sexual orientation whether straight, gay or transgendered, deserve to be treated with respect and dignity.

How do feminists describe the birth of a baby boy? A crime against humanity.

During 2010, over four million boys, one in five of school age, were victims of feminist rape. (Note 1)

The essential elements of rape are power and control over the victim. Men who rape use physical force to assault their victim. Feminists who rape little boys use psychological manipulation and verbal coercion to assault their victim.

Feminist rape is the sexual attack of an adult woman upon a minor male child either emotionally or physically in an attempt to subtly emasculate a little boy's self-esteem, intellectual and social development. Feminist rape is an attempt to psychologically castrate a little boy from his male identity. Rape is the only word that can describe this crime.

The most vicious and cruelest forms of violence are psychological especially against innocent children. Feminist rape upon little boys is as emotionally destructive, devastating and violent as any male rape attack leaving victims traumatized and debilitated.

Physical rape is a criminal act. Feminist rape is an elusive and insidious act difficult to prove. Little boys do not have the emotionally maturity to realize they are being raped. Feminist rape activities may be so subtle as to appear innocuous and are always rationalized as being in the best interest of the little boy. Feminist rape is the perfect sex crime against little boys.

In Chris Hansen's to "Catch a Predator" there was never an episode of a female predator being caught. Male predators are forced to prey for their victims online. Feminist predators have no need to prey online. They enter education and child care situations where they are in positions of authority, power and control over their victims. Their victims are forced to come to them. Feminist predators are in perfect positions to develop long-term emotional manipulative control of victim relationships.

Feminists dominate education and have successfully gender cleansed elementary schools of male teachers. Over 95% of elementary teachers are women. The primary male academic role model for young boys in elementary schools is the school janitor. Feminist rape culture and shaming language brands any male who wants to teach young children as a male pedophile.

If adult men have been socially bullied, intimidated and terrorized from entering elementary teaching professions then imagine the vulnerability of little boys in feminist classrooms.

Imagine you are a little boy in a feminist classroom. You are going to watch an educational video which will be required in many classes across our country. The reader MUST PROMISE to watch the entire video posted on YouTube. As a little boy in a feminist classroom, you have no choice. It is important to take notes as you watch because I am asking the reader to write a one page essay of what you learned from the video. You will also be required to give an oral presentation of your essay before friends and peers of what you learned. You can go to YouTube and type "Dear Women" in the search box or use the link http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=K_uRIMUBnvw.

This video represents the core values and beliefs of many American elementary school teachers. If you do not agree with the views in the video it is because you, especially if male, are a sexist, are academically inferior or blinded by male privilege. If you found it difficult to sit still, you became agitated or couldn't concentrate on the video; it is because you suffer from ADHD. You would be forced against your will to receive Ritalin in this school to help become a more compliant and passive student. You realize as a boy student, you are not expected to provide any independent or critical analysis in you essay or oral report. You know from experience the teacher will eviscerate, mock and humiliate you in front of the class unless you regurgitate the views in the video.

This type of video presentation format was initially seen during the Korean War when American prisoners were brutally, psychologically tortured into making statements against the United States.

One has to wonder, what happened to the men in the video as little boys to possess such feelings of guilt and shame for being male? Did their fathers teach them these ideas? Some of these men were serially raped by feminists throughout their young lives and to this day do not even realize they were manipulated and abused as little boys. Maybe they should change the title to "Unconscious Rape of Little Boys."

In feminist culture, a mind is a terrible thing to waste, unless it is a boy's mind. Feminists modified teaching methods and redesigned curriculums to guarantee the encouragement and support for the exclusive success of girls.

Teachers have the power to influence and alter a young child's life forever. A teacher's encouraging comment to a young and idealistic student may have a lifetime effect of inspiring and motivating a girl to great achievement. A teacher who blames, ridicules, vivifies, and humiliates a young student who is guilty of being born male may have a lifetime effect to destroy and emasculate the spirit of a little boy.

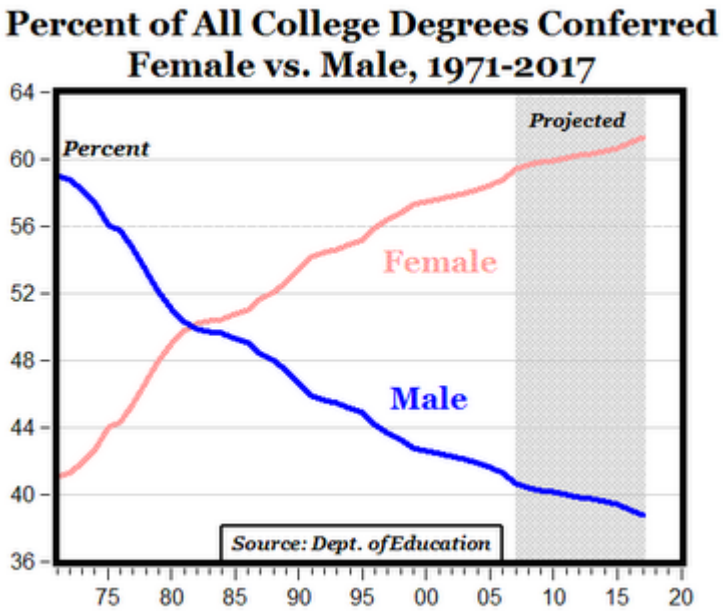
Feminists have imperceptibly programmed little boys for academic and social failure with great success. American education has been designed to oppress achievement, competition and creativity of boys. The cultures of elementary schools are hostile academic and toxic social environments for boys. Boys hate school and rush home to play on video games where they are allowed to express their boyhood.

What real evidence is there that feminists have been raping little boys? The evidence is ordinary common sense applied to social reality.

There was never any real evidence the great American gangster, Al Capone, was ever guilty of any criminal activity but it doesn't mean he was innocent of his crimes. It was the fruits of his crimes, the enormous wealth he accumulated from criminal activity that was used to convict him of tax evasion.

For example, consider "The Graph of Feminist Shame". (Note 2) One would think feminists who preach on the altar of victimhood and believe they represent equality and fairness would be ashamed of the 60%/40% college enrollment of women over men.

In the prior years to 1980, the little boys of the past contributed to landing humans on the moon, developed satellite communications, ushered in the Agricultural Green Revolution, invented birth control pills, the Internet, personal computers and cell phones but in the last two decades have developed serious learning issues.



The graph shows discrimination against girls prior to the 1970's. This became an affront to all fair and reasonable Americans.

Americans agreed that all children, female and male, should have equal opportunities in academics, sports, and all activities in life. During the seventies changes were made and girls began to approach the 50% mark of college degrees conferred. It appeared as though all children were receiving equal educational opportunities.

During the 1970's, feminists lured American society into radical educational reforms saying, "feminism is about fairness and equality " translated "come see the puppy in my van." Feminism was never about fairness or equality. Feminism was and is about power and control.

The changes in degrees conferred since the 1980's in the graph through the present reveal feminists are either the worst teachers of boys in human history and/or the betrayal of feminism to dreams of equal educational instruction demanded by fair and reasonable Americans. There is no other social explanation for the decline of boys in education other than feminist rape and blatant discrimination against little boys. General social problems would apply to both boys and girls yet only boys have been severely impacted. Boys are stupid in not a reasonable explanation. When feminists claim girls are outperforming boys in school because of their academic abilities it is a euphemism for "we've been very successful in raping little boys." Social inequities of the past cannot be used to rationalize or justify rape in the present. The treatment of little boys in the United States today is a national disgrace and tragedy in the enormous loss of human potential.

What do feminist teachers call boys who complete high school and are accepted into college? Damn Survivors. Education in America is stealthy designed to discourage boys from learning and achievement. What do feminist teachers call African American boys who complete high school and are accepted into college? Goddamn Survivors. White feminists in ivory towers have a peculiar hatred of African America boys. What do feminist teachers call effective educational spending for African American boys: build more prisons.

Too many boys do not survive and drop out of school much more than girls. It is boys who kill themselves four times more than girls. It is boys who become promiscuous, abuse alcohol and drugs more than girls. America's boys have lost ambition, lack motivation, lack self-esteem, possess negative self-images, and are depressed even withdrawing from society. America's boys are and have been displaying classic post-traumatic behavior of rape victims.

Social pundits ponder the disintegration of female-male relationships in American society. The tens of millions of little boys who have been raped by feminists find it difficult to trust or respect women. After thirteen years or more of rape and psychological abuse, little boys who grow into men are incapacitated in their ability to develop healthy intimate and long-term relationships with women. There should be no mystery why there are so many single women and single mothers compared to forty years ago.

Feminists will say only a minority of feminists rape little boys and you can't demonize an entire social group. Only a minority of Nazis gassed Jews to their deaths and other people they considered socially inferior. The culture of Nazism was pure evil and the culture of Feminism today is pure evil.

In the spirit of feminist shamming language, any person who identifies themselves as a feminist should be ashamed of themselves. They should be shunned by decent people who sincerely believe in equality and fairness. Individuals who believe in equality and fairness are called Americans. The term American Feminist is an oxymoron that makes as much sense as a Jewish Nazi.

Feminism has become a Marxist Misandry movement. Feminism is the hate of heterosexual love between men and women, husband and wife, father and daughter. Feminism is the hate of heterosexual family. Feminism hates fathers who love who love their children. Feminism hates the religions of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam because of their absolute moral standards and ideals of honor and fidelity. Remember, the very first Feminist was Satan. Feminism is a culture of discrimination and psychological castration of little boys. Feminism has become a reprehensible culture of little boy rape.

Those boys who excel in mathematics and logic begin to realize as they mature into young men that: If all men are rapists then all feminists are boy rapists.

Note 1:

According to the Childstats.gov website, there were 42 million school age children ages six to seventeen in 2010 throughout the United States. About half of these children are boys representing a potential victim pool of 21 million boys. One can estimate 20% of boys have exposure to feminist teachers resulting in 4,200,000 victims of abuse. This is a conservative estimate.

My only qualification for writing this analysis is that I love my sons.

I am the luckiest man in the world to be joyfully married to a beautiful, intelligent, loving and independent thinking woman but do not feel ashamed for being born a male. I express great gratitude to my teachers, male and female, who encouraged and inspired learning for my family and myself.

Sign the Petition to Reject the SaVE Act

pierceharlan · 29 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

We respectfully ask the committed readership of The Spearhead to sign the Petition to oppose the SaVE Act, found here:
http://www.change.org/petitions/reject-the-proposed-save-act-absent-amendments-to-protect-the-presumptively-innocent

The proposed legislation in question, officially called The Campus Sexual Violence Elimination Act (SaVE Act) (S.834), has been introduced in the U.S. Senate to combat sexual violence on college campuses. The problem with the bill is that it will enhance the risk of holding innocent young men accountable for sexual offenses they did not commit.

The bill mandates the following regarding college disciplinary proceedings:

"Each institution of higher education participating in any program under this title . . . shall develop and distribute . . . a statement of policy regarding . . . Procedures for institutional disciplinary action in cases of an alleged incident of domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, or stalking, which shall include a clear statement that– (I) such proceedings shall–(aa) provide a prompt and equitable resolution; (bb) be conducted by officials who receive annual training on the issues related to domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking and how to conduct an investigation and hearing process that protects the safety of victims and promotes accountability; and (cc) use the preponderance of the evidence standard."

In a nutshell: the new law would require schools to switch to the "preponderance of the evidence" standard, which requires only a slight probability that the accused committed the offense in order to punish him. It most certainly will increase the risk of holding innocent men responsible for sex offenses they did not commit. As the Petition says: "It is a hallmark of the American experience and a universally accepted tenet of the common law tradition that it is better that persons responsible for offenses not be held accountable than to hold innocent persons responsible for wrongs they did not commit."

Beyond that, the persons who conduct disciplinary hearings are to receive training about how to conduct a hearing "that protects the safety of victims and promotes accountability." Nowhere in the bill is there even a hint, much less any requirement, that these persons should receive training about protecting the critical rights of the presumptively innocent who are accused of these offenses. The words "promotes accountability" is a code for "imposing more severe punishments." It is widely believed among persons who are pushing for measures of this nature that the punishments college men receive for sex offenses are far too lenient.

There are other serious things wrong with this bill, but the aforementioned are so fundamental to our sons' liberty, that it suffices to focus on them.

The purpose of this bill is to hold more college men responsible for sexual assault and related offenses. To the extent it snags some rapists, all well and good. The problem is that the Democrats behind the bill (Senator Bob Casey (D-PA) and Senator Patty Murray (D-WA)) haven't given any thought to whether it might cause innocent people to be punished for offenses they didn't commit. More frightening: perhaps Senators Casey and Murry have thought about it, and just don't give a damn.

We are aware that our petition will not change minds. But we are hoping that it will help, in some way, to inject these critical issues into the public discourse. Please sign it here:

White Knighting Vigilantes: Dumb Idea of the Decade

W.F. Price · 29 April 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A recent trend in urban areas has involved vigilantes dressed up as superheroes walking around town, dispensing their own form of street justice in ridiculous getups. In addition to annoying urban folk going about their business, they are giving the police headaches. Cops have enough problems themselves enforcing the law; can you imagine how badly guys dressed like superheroes who think they are actually crime fighters might screw things up by getting involved with civilians?

Meet the NYI (New York Initiative), a group of New York guys with a lot of time on their hands who have decided to take on a role traditionally relegated to pimps. Proudly proclaiming that they are "not affiliated with law enforcement," NYI members have posted an ad on Craigslist offering protection services to prostitutes.

The ad itself is quite solicitous of prostitutes. Here are a few excerpts:

> I'm writing you on behalf of a group called the New York Initiative (We are not affiliated with law enforcement), and with the hopes that I've created a system that will help keep you safe when you go on dates! You can find our facebook page through Google, as well as Google us with the words New York Press or Superheroes Documentary 2011 to find out what we're about (Craigslist doesn't allow me to post our URL)…yes, we look a little funny, but believe me when I say that we are all quite competent and capable of doing the things we say.
> So with that out of the way, let me just get down to business… The Long Island Killer is out there. He's a scary bastard, and it's starting to seem like he is focusing on you pretty ladies because some people are slower to report you missing, and also because apparently the law doesn't respect your personal choices and that means cops are slower to follow through when it comes to you. Well, I'm here to say FUCK THAT. We respect you as human beings, we believe in personal freedoms and think that you're doing something that is absolutely your choice to do.
> So rock on, ladies…We are on your side. With that said, we are here to help.

Furthermore, they offer non-police solutions to deal with "funny" dates:

> OPTION 1: Whenever you have a date, make sure a friend knows the address you're going. Have them write it down in a book made specifically for this purpose, with the times and dates included. If you can, when on the date, text your friend with the address you are at or the general area in case your date takes you somewhere else than he had earlier specified , and let your date know that a friend knows exactly where you'll be if he starts to get "funny".
> Give your friend hourly updates on your location so if anything goes wrong, they can send someone to help you faster. We realize that this could alter the mood of your date, but in these crazy times, a pretty lady that's ready is a pretty lady that's alive. If your date watches the news at all, he will understand. Be wary if he doesn't.
> OPTION 2.If you absolutely don't have a friend to help you with this, you may use the services of the New York Initiative as your personal log book, as well as your rescue team in the event of an emergency. If you choose to do this, we will provide you with a number to call and a few one-number or one word codes you can say or text to us so that we can contact someone to assist you with a possibly violent date. Another idea is keeping us on speed dial, and if things get weird just call us and let the line open. We'll know what's going on immediately.

If any dim-witted hookers actually take these guys up on the offer (unlikely many will — nothing would scare off johns faster than the thought of some jackass in a costume) and make use of their services, the outcome could be quite unfortunate, up to and including homicide.

NYI goes on to offer self-defense classes to hookers, promises to “bust asses” and says it “loves” the prostitutes. Isn’t that pimp talk? The obvious question is whether there are any ulterior motives at play here. Probably. A guy who has a decent girlfriend would be content to leave protecting hookers from violent crime up to the police. And even if he did want to help the hookers, it just doesn’t seem that most women I know would want their men rushing off to “rescue” prostitutes in the dead of night or offer them personal self-defense training.

Nevertheless, the NYI has received a number of “good boy!” comments from females on their Facebook page.

Here’s one example:

> I read about you guys on Jezebel. May I just say that I think you’re awesome? It’s nice to know that there are people out there who can see past the external and care about others just because of their humanity! Just don’t get yourselves hurt in the process, mm-kay?

There’s something fundamentally wrong with the approach these guys are taking. Prostitution creates the conditions in which violent, disturbed individuals can operate with some impunity. And, despite what feminists might say, it is not because hookers are stigmatized (the primary source of this stigmatization is other females in any event), but rather because unrestrained, commoditized sexuality is by its nature exploitative of both women AND men. Lust and greed, when combined, create a volatile mixture that needs to be contained rather than celebrated to maintain some order in society.

The sexual revolution of the 60s and 70s, accompanied as it was by rampant prostitution and a lax attitude toward promiscuity, led to the highest rate of sexual violence in US history. If people really want fewer girls to be victimized by sick-minded predators such as Gary Ridgway (Green River Killer), the correct approach is to shame prostitutes and maintain some fairly strict supervision of the occupation. There will always be prostitution in one form or another, but without some pressure from above, including shaming and judgment, it will invariably cause trouble and serve as a breeding ground for vicious social pathologies.

Quite frankly, these NYI “heroes” are clueless, possibly dangerous, and will likely only add to the trouble police have to deal with when it would be better for all of us that they devote their efforts to tracking down the murderer on the loose rather than investigating some deadly incident involving a delusional, white knighting vigilante.

Why we need to stop telling women to settle

By Dalrock

Received wisdom in the manosphere is that women need to settle. I have to say I enjoy a good hamster carpet bombing as much as the next guy. But in the end the entertainment value isn't worth the human cost. I've touched on this before, but after seeing the article Did You Marry the Wrong Guy? from Marie Claire (H/T GudEnuf) I wanted to revisit it.

The problem with telling women they need to settle isn't that they won't listen. The problem is that they will listen, or at least use this message as rationalization for wrecking an honest man's life. The problem occurs because women don't think like men. If you tell a man he has too high a sense of his own value in the dating/marriage marketplace, he is likely to be humbled by this. Actually no one needs to tell the typical guy this because they tend to figure it out based on which women are and aren't attracted to them.

Too many women (especially the kind of women the message is aimed at) however hear this message and decide this means they should marry the well off guy they aren't attracted to, ultimately doing him the favor of taking his kids and half his stuff when they figure out they don't love him anymore. According to the Marie Claire article this is quite common:

> According to recent research conducted by Jennifer Gauvain, a therapist in Denver, 30 percent of now-divorced women say they knew in their gut they were making a mistake as they walked down the aisle — and kept walking anyway. Only a handful backed out.

Being a women's magazine, the article goes on to explain that the women themselves aren't to blame for leaving a trail of wreckage in their wakes because society made them do it. The reality is they feared loosing the option to choose, and wanted the status that came with getting married as well as his money. He wasn't likely to give up half of his stuff and pay for her to have children if she didn't pretend to be in love with him in order to marry him:

> Clark had dated a handsome businessman for four years before they got engaged, and although he didn't make her heart race, she still loved him. "We were best friends, and I thought he'd make a great husband and father, even though I wasn't 'in love,'" she says. "I walked down the aisle thinking, What the hell? During my vows, I wasn't making eye contact with my fiancé."
> Five years and two kids later, their sex life nonexistent, Clark wanted out. "I'd often wish he would cheat," she says. Finally, her husband, sensing her unhappiness, ended it.

I see this woman as beneath more traditional gold diggers and prostitutes. She isn't just harming him, but putting her children through great pain as well. Aside from stealing his wealth and children, she also stole his opportunity for great happiness. The truth is another woman would likely have found this same man quite attractive and lovable. She had no right to rob him of that because she lacked the capacity to reciprocate love but still wanted all of the benefits of marriage. Some might say that he should have learned game and all would have been well. Aside from the fact that this isn't common knowledge in our culture, had he learned game he would have been able to marry a much better woman. She wanted a man of his appearance wealth and status with game, but none of them wanted her or she would have married one of them.

My guess is the root cause of women who are incapable of experiencing reciprocal love and attraction is a blend of the mismatch feminism has created between men and women, the impact of alpha chasing/promiscuity, and an overall entitlement complex. Whatever the cause of the issue, it does appear to be real for a significant percentage of women.

Making things worse, older women consistently advise younger women to pass up men they are in love with and attracted to with the assumption that another better man will be along shortly. We have seen this with Advice Goddess, Amy Dickinson, and the authors of Last one down the aisle wins. The reality is that experiencing mutual attraction isn't a given for women, and should therefore not be abandoned lightly. This also is why the advice to women to postpone marriage and "just have fun" for a decade or more is so detrimental to them. Finding a man who they can reciprocate love and attraction with is difficult for many women, and only gets harder the older they become.

So stop telling women to settle. I beg you! The innocent (but clueless) beta you save may be someone you know.

I think this is the single biggest risk a man looking to marry faces. This is even bigger in my opinion than a woman's sexual history, although the two are often connected.

Hooker Shoes for the 21st Century

W.F. Price · 1 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I thought the real-life Cap'n Save-a-Ho superheroes would be enough nonsense for this week, but it turns out that there is already an almost equally ridiculous scheme to outfit hookers with robotic platform shoes.

When I first came across these contraptions I thought it must be a joke, but these people seem quite serious.

Invoking the Greek goddess of love, the shoes are supposed to be a modern day version of special tramp sandals worn in ancient times to leave secret messages for interested men. However, in this case the shoes are gargantuan pieces of equipment with a confusing array of buttons that perform specific operations as well as an LCD screen that allows hookers to advertise contact info to potential clients.

In addition to the putative allure of screen, the shoes are supposed to provide crucial protection features, including an alarm that makes a loud screeching noise and calls either the police or a virtual pimping outfit (her choice). There is also a GPS in the heel so that the virtual pimp can keep track of her movements.

I'd think that one of the most important things to have in the event of an emergency would be some degree of mobility, but from the looks of it these shoes would fail in that regard. I can't imagine even a lithe young ho moving at much more than a rapid shuffle with these bulky behemoths strapped to her feet.

Somehow, I don't think many of these will sell.

Pakistan Hiding bin Laden All Along

A little off-topic here, but it turns out Osama was living in a large compound just a short walk away from the Pakistan Military Academy in Abbotabad, one of the nicest towns in Pakistan. He was also in close proximity to a golf course and a couple hospitals.

Clearly – obviously – higher-ups in Pakistan knew what was going on. Someone who knew a lot about these things once suggested to me that he was probably living in luxury and under protection, possibly in Bangladesh, but it's still shocking to see that our so-called "allies" were protecting him. All the better reason to get our troops out of the region, go home, and leave these double-dealing scumbags to themselves.

Maybe we should drop a few dozen JDAMs on the military academy as a parting gift…

President Obama Recognizes Efforts of “Men” in Bringing Down Osama

W.F. Price · 2 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a break from the trend of calling all men “soldiers” or “forces” when they are killed or have done something heroic while specifically calling women “women” when they do or suffer anything at all, President Obama explicitly thanked the “men” who took down Osama bin Laden.

The quote is as follows:

> We give thanks for the men who carried out this operation, for they exemplify the professionalism, patriotism, and unparalleled courage of those who serve our country…

The quote starts at 7:39 on the video below:

It may not seem like much, but I was actually surprised when I noticed it on TV. These days, recognizing the heroism of men and identifying them as such is all but taboo, whereas downplaying men’s accomplishments and efforts or outright disparaging them is in vogue.

I have to admit I like the president a little more for these words, but it’s probably his speechwriter who came up with that line. Perhaps the speechwriter is a young man who, in his own subtle way, is doing something to counter misandry in America.

Schools Padding Women's Sports to Comply with Title IX

In a recent NY Times article, schools were taken to task for using deceptive methods to achieve gender equality as mandated by Title IX, which mandates gender equality in all school programs, including athletics. The author, Katie Thomas, implies that the schools are taking shortcuts to avoid obtaining equality, despite the fact that women now outnumber men by a fairly wide margin in university enrollment.

The idea that schools are deliberately fostering inequality is shortsighted at best. The truth is that women simply aren't as interested in sports as men. This is borne out by the fact that virtually every major sport in history was invented by and played by men. Since when have girls flocked to pickup games at the neighborhood vacant lot or B-ball court? You give boys sticks and a ball and they'll invent their own game on the spot. Sports are part of the masculine nature.

Sure, girls have a tradition of outdoor activities as well, such as double dutch and figure skating, but they tend to be more of a form of dance or display than the hunting/warfare type competitions boys engage in. Title IX is a clear example of a Bolshevik-style push for equality despite clear natural differences between men and women.

So, in order to comply with the unnatural law passed in 1972, colleges are resorting to less-than-forthright measures, including listing male athletes as female, signing up women who are unqualified, and adding women who are not even playing at all:

> But as women have grown to 57 percent of American colleges' enrollment, athletic programs have increasingly struggled to field a proportional number of female athletes. And instead of pouring money into new women's teams or trimming the rosters of prized football teams, many colleges are turning to a sleight of hand known as roster management. According to a review of public records from more than 20 colleges and universities by The New York Times, and an analysis of federal participation statistics from all 345 institutions in N.C.A.A. Division I — the highest level of college sports — many are padding women's team rosters with underqualified, even unwitting, athletes. They are counting male practice players as women. And they are trimming the rosters of men's teams.

As athletic programs are currently interpreted, achieving equal numbers of males and females participating in athletic programs without cooking the books will probably require an enrollment ratio of about 85% female to 15% male. As higher education becomes increasingly feminized, that is possible, but unlikely. However, there is another solution: reclassify certain activities that women tend to prefer as sports. If dancing, double dutch, singing, modeling, shopping, doing hair and applying makeup were classified as sports, female participation in sports could be boosted significantly without the need to cut men's programs or resort to deception.

So, bring on shopping competitions, makeup face-offs, and jump-rope routines! The girls will enthusiastically participate, boys' sports can remain unmolested, and administrators can breathe a sigh of relief.

How the Game Changes

I've noticed that almost all of the guys who denounce Game are what one might call "mature," whereas those who are enthusiastic about it tend to be quite young. A lot of people might simply assume that it's because older men are jaded and have had bad experiences with women, while younger men are still hopeful and haven't yet been through the worst of it. However, that isn't the entire story.

There's a fundamental shift in the balance between men and women that occurs right around the age of 35. Naturally, it should happen some five to ten years earlier, but we've pushed marriage later and later in recent years by extending education and institutional obligations to some extreme, and women's expectations about when they need to get on the ball and settle down have followed the trend.

What seems natural to a lot of older men, but is still largely unknown to younger ones, is that by the time men and women are in their 30s the mating game tilts decisively in men's favor. There are a number of reasons for this, such as women's beauty being at its height in the late teens to early 20s, men's hormonal peak being around the age of 20, and female status in the workplace being higher while younger (probably correlated with beauty). Men begin to develop self-control and restraint at the same time women's beauty begins to decline — usually in the mid-late 20s. By this time, men and women begin marrying each other in large numbers, having children and starting families, which takes a great many eligible men off the table (temporarily in many cases).

Single women in their 30s suddenly find themselves facing much more formidable and scarce prey, whereas single men in the same age range find themselves in a surprisingly comfortable position with a fairly wide range of choices. This change is permanent — women never regain their advantage ever again. It is this fundamental shift in status in the mating game that makes Game seem superfluous to older men. Why would one need it when you can take one look around at what's on offer and find yourself far from impressed?

Men who have lived in that reality for some ten years tend to forget what it's like to be a sex-starved college kid surrounded by hot young women. They disparage the idea that game is worth anything at all, because for them it often isn't. In contemporary society, desperate women abound who will throw themselves at guys in their 30s and 40s. Men often find that a surprising number of these women are already married or in relationships, which tends to add to their cynicism and detract from their willingness to put any effort into wooing women. Men don't even have to be all that good-looking or wealthy — all you need is a car, a job and freedom from debilitating or disfiguring afflictions. Put yourself out there, and they will come.

However, it's hard to see this as a guy in your early 20s if you aren't one of the athletes or smooth-talkers that scoop up most of the hot girls while young. It's hard to imagine a time when you'll be the one doing the choosing.

This is why I think it's important that men who can tell youths what women are really about can impart their knowledge. There is so much bullshit regarding women out there that young guys have a hard time cutting through it. You've got men out there telling them that being a feminist will help young men get laid, that being "chivalrous" and kissing their asses is the way to go, or that women all really want to go to bed with a nice, subdued accountant type who always does what they tell him to do. Telling women what they want to hear is big business these days — just ask Dr. Phil.

Unfortunately, a lot of young men are confused by this, and think these peddlers of fiction are being sincere. They think that sleazy professor who declares himself a feminist to ingratiate himself with some butch administrator in a humanities department is actually a righteous, honest man.

Almost all of us men learn sooner or later what garbage this is, but sooner is better than later. So, while many of us may already know that women are nothing like what the feminists or white knights make them out to be, we ought to recognize that young men usually have a great deal to learn. In fact, I'd say that the most important element of "Game" is simply knowing women.

If we put some effort into teaching young men how to see through the fiction and dissembling on the part of women, white knights, and even society in general, a lot more of them might come around and wise up before it's already too late. Hopefully, fewer of them will have to learn the hard way, and they will gain a better understanding of the women around them a few, crucial years earlier.

Till Death did them Part, Osama's Wife Stood by her Man

There have been reports that when American operators stormed Osama bin Laden's compound, he used one of his wives as a "human shield" in some last-ditch effort to save himself. This is ridiculous. A seasoned war veteran like Osama who had faced Soviet troops would know better than to use that tactic against America's most dedicated warriors, who could hardly be expected to flinch at the sight of a woman wailing in Arabic in front of their highest-value target.

Nevertheless, some people will buy anything, so I suppose there is some reason the story was pitched in that manner.

However, according to the most recent accounts, the woman stood between Osama and the grim messengers of Hades of her own volition, facing certain death in an act of self-sacrifice for her lord and master, that enemy of the West and murderer of thousands.

Some say that a woman is incapable of love, but this mere woman with her act of self-abnegation proved them wrong. She loved her man with all her heart, soul and being. She made the choice that without him she was nothing, and placed her frail flesh and bones directly in front of the burst of hot lead that cut her and her husband down and sent them to face their maker. And she was only one of his wives…

To our troops' credit, they did not hesitate, and indulged the woman in her quest for martyrdom.

How many men will ever know such love from a woman? How many good, humble, dutiful men will ever earn a fraction of such sacrifice?

A woman's love is one of the mysteries of the universe. It is lawless and unfathomable to us men. All of our notions of right and wrong – even our sense of the order of things – is swept away as a trifle by the passions of women.

It is lessons such as these that should make it perfectly clear that being a good man is not something done for the sake of or benefit of women, but rather, as their deepest feelings too often betray and actions sadly declare, in spite of them.

The Economics of Male Preference

The neglect of baby girls in Asia is in the news again; these kinds of stories are somewhat popular in the West because they give us a sense of moral superiority while making us feel charitable at the same time. It is true that girls are neglected in Asia when compared to the West. However, this is an overwhelmingly rural phenomenon, and linked to age-old cultural practices that developed around subsistence farming. Male physical labor and technical know-how has always been more highly valued in those parts, because when it comes down to it men put more food on the table. It isn't that women don't bring anything to the table – I've seen Chinese women hard at work in rice paddies – it's simply that pound for pound they don't bring as much. Additionally, since these societies, like almost all societies in the world, are patrilocal, females generally leave when they reach adulthood and get married. Therefore, all that labor invested in raising them is lost.

The articles we see on this subject tend to focus mainly on dowries or other cultural idiosyncrasies, ignoring other, more important reasons for the higher discrepancy between male and female children in Asia when compared to the West:

> Part of the reason Indians favor sons is the enormous expense in marrying off girls. Families often go into debt arranging marriages and paying elaborate dowries. A boy, on the other hand, will one day bring home a bride and dowry. Hindu custom also dictates that only sons can light their parents' funeral pyres.
> But it's not simply that girls are more expensive for impoverished families. The census data shows that the worst offenders are the relatively wealthy northern states of Punjab and Haryana.
> In Morena, a sun-baked, largely rural district in the heart of India, the numbers are especially grim. This census showed that only 825 girls for every 1,000 boys in the district made it to their sixth birthdays, down from an already troubling 829 a decade ago.
> Though abortion is allowed in India, the country banned revealing the gender of unborn fetuses in 1994 in an attempt to halt sex-selective abortions. Every few years, federal and state governments announce new incentives — from free meals to free education — to encourage people to take care of their girls.

First, it should be pointed out in every one of these discussions that Asians naturally have an androphilic sex ratio at birth compared to Europeans, and especially compared to Africans. However, this doesn't make up for all the excess boys, so it's clear that there is some level of preference extended to infant boys. As the above passage suggests, better-off areas have a higher discrepancy, probably because families can afford ultrasound and abortion procedures. Keep in mind that "well-off" is relative in India — basically it means that you have electricity, a telephone and some minimal form of motorized transport.

Secondly, dowries have traditionally been a feature of European society as well, and I've never heard of female infanticide or neglect being a feature of pre-industrial Europe. And in China, bride price rather than dowry is the cultural norm, yet that hasn't stemmed sex-selective abortion in rural China.

So, what is behind the apparent neglect and murder of female babies? The Chinese family planning initiative that began in the 1970s offers a clue. It is largely the introduction of birth control, abortion and family planning measures, enthusiastically promoted by clueless Western feminists who are too wrapped up in their own highly insular worldview to predict what consequences their programs will engender in ancient rural societies.

When there is a restriction on family size, families that would otherwise keep trying will manipulate the sex composition of births to have a son, which often means aborting daughters. Given the reality of life on the farm, condemning them for this is counterproductive, because sons are directly correlated with economic security, which is far more relevant to health and comfort than here in the West (if you are poor, no antibiotics, no surgery — you just suffer and die).

The government and feminist solution to this is socialist measures, which backfired in China and probably will in India as well:

> In Morena, a Madhya Pradesh state government program offers poor families with one or two daughters a few thousand rupees (a few hundred dollars) for every few years of schooling, and more than 100,000 rupees ($2,250) when they graduate high school.

Ironically, socializing responsibility for women eventually leads to a society-wide adoption of male-preference. This is happening in the West as we speak. We often forget that the abusive American child-support guidelines adopted in the late 80s and 90s were largely a result of national outrage about “welfare queens” living off our dime. The burden for women’s welfare was rejected by most Americans, who gladly threw it onto the shoulders of hapless fathers, many of them blameless victims of circumstance who couldn’t afford it themselves. Today, groaning under the load of programs and preferences directed toward women, states are cutting women’s studies departments at universities, closing women’s shelters, and cutting benefits to women’s health services. The “misandry bubble” is nearing its bursting point; the widespread affluence that allowed feminism to thrive is becoming a thing of the past.

So, if socialism is ultimately doomed to failure, what solutions remain? And, in particular, we should ask what humane solutions we can implement.

There is only one rational means to increase the value of females in Asia, and, ultimately, our own society: encourage women to be productive, and create realistic opportunities for it.

In India light industry suitable for female work should be promoted in regions where girls are unappreciated, allowing them to earn some of their own income prior to marriage. Despite Western denunciations of “sweatshops” in China and SE Asia, the truth is that the factories around the Pearl River raised both the standard of living and status of girls in southern China. Both their parents and the men around them appreciated them more for their contribution to the wealth of the family. Although not up to Western standards yet, many parts of south China are thriving today, and it’s undeniable that women played a large role in bringing about this state of affairs.

But were these girls pampered and babied, and were preferences extended to them? Not at all. They were put to work and expected to produce, and they did. Since then, female infanticide and preference for male children has started to subside. Most urban Chinese are now content to have a daughter as their only child, and the imbalance in the sex ration has begun to correct itself.

Here in the West, we might want to start thinking about teaching girls home economics again, and offering courses in small business administration that could help them contribute to their future families’ welfare. Give them realistic goals rather than encourage them to become soldiers and engineers. Sure, there will always be exceptional girls who can match boys in primarily male professions, and they shouldn’t be held back, but focusing on the few to the neglect of many is counterproductive. Women have their strengths, and they should be encouraged to work to their potential, but trying to equalize everyone to the detriment of the majority of boys and girls alike is not only misandric — it is misanthropic.

Quarterly Fund Drive and Report

Since this time last year, numbers for The Spearhead have improved significantly. The level of daily visitors as well as subscribers is significantly higher, and interest in the subjects we cover has risen in the mainstream press. All-time peak traffic for the site, excluding a few bursts occasioned by the Assange case in December, came around late February and early March, when for a few weeks average daily visitors numbered well over 4,000. Monthly page views for those two months also approached 400,000 – quite a high number considering the subject – and total monthly visitors over 70,000.

Mirroring last year's trend, April saw a decline in total page views, but roughly the same amount of monthly visitors. The decline in page views can be explained by the fact that posting was curtailed as I prepared for another potential custody dispute, which, when taken into account suggests that post for post the rise in readership has held steady following the steep gains made from December-March.

I would like to consolidate these gains through more writing, and publishing and prepare for another step up in months to come. As internet use seems to be correlated with inclement weather, it may be a while until another significant step up is made, so hanging on and improving through the summer is a goal worth pursuing.

Those who have supported the site over the last year and a half have made all this possible. They have given me the opportunity to put a great deal of work into writing, editing and disseminating content while taking care of a couple young children much of the time. Additionally, they have allowed the site to be independently hosted, protecting it from the malicious shutdowns that have plagued a number of men's sites in recent months, and they have freed up time for me to aggressively promote the site's content behind the scenes on content aggregators and other online hubs. They have even made it possible for our concerns to rise to the attention of mainstream columnists who write for national publications. Men's concerns, in a short period of time, have gone mainstream to an extent heretofore unseen.

Where a mere year ago Feministing could boast a reach some 12 times higher than The Spearhead, we have now almost achieved consistent parity with the feminist site as measured by Alexa. Originally, this was one of my goals, but now that we near its fulfillment, there are other, more pressing issues rising to the fore.

Young men still face formidable odds in school, the workplace and the family, and rather than expressions of concern we have feminists crowing as though the demise of the people responsible for our future well-being is a victory to celebrate. This disgusting victimization of those we will all someday rely on must be held up for the world to see. Feminists are still mired in the paradigm of gender war, failing to see, or not caring, that the suppression of our society's males is bad news for all of us, including the girls and women who will need them in years to come. Furthermore, they are poised to strike at the most vulnerable and innocent: the trusting children who don't even know what they are up against.

As a father myself, I can't in good conscience give up the fight, so I plan to see this through. In the meanwhile, support from readers is crucial. Each donation to the site makes a difference, and allows me to continue to work on disseminating the message to the wider world. It has made a difference, and I will continue to push on with resolution as long as I can afford to do so, and, as has been the case at times, even when I can't.

Submissions by authors and guest posts are a part of this effort as well. I would like to thank those who have contributed content as well as those who have supported the site — it's been an effort that thousands have contributed to. In our short time online – just over a year and a half – we've published 1,332 articles. That's enough to fill several volumes. I expect around 2,000 by year's end.

So, in closing, I'd like to extend thanks to all those who have supported the site, and to ask for help in keeping it running for some time to come. It's been an honor working for all of you, and one of the most rewarding jobs I've ever undertaken.

Thank you!

Comment of the Week: Financial Implications of Being a Non-Custodial Father

W.F. Price · 6 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Editor: In a comment in today's Taxes and Child Support post, reader Alan B gives us a breakdown of of his own situation regarding child support and tax issues. Keep in mind while reading the following that Alan actually has legally recognized custody of one out the three children, so his tax burden and support is lower than would be typical in the situation. Nevertheless, his ex-wife receives not only a hefty monthly check (tax free) and a good deal of money toward expenses, but also receives thousands of dollars every year in tax credits, while he is left with less than half of his gross income. Although a high earner, after child support, expenses and taxes, Alan has a working-class disposable income. For many men, it is substantially worse.

All men considering marriage should read these accounts before stepping up the altar, so this comment definitely deserves its own post.

Alan B

if you want exact numbers, here ya go

i live in the NE.

i make just about 100k/yr

i pay medical insurance thru my job for all my kids and myself., invest a HUGE 3k/yr (thats three thousand a YEAR on a 100 thousand a year salary) my absolute musts are rent $2350 and commute to work $300. therefore i MUST have 2650 a month to have shelter and method of generating income. *note, im not counting food, cars, boats, girlfriends, gas, electric, soap, etc.

i have 3 children. my EX has custody of 2, and i have 1, all under the age of 18. she is re-married. her husband and her just filed jointly this year and they earned a total $11,980

i JUST got out of court last month, so the numbers are current.

for making 12k/yr and owning 2 of my children (25%) of MY takehome, my EX allows me to pay her $1976 per month AFTER TAXES. Her and her HUSBAND earn approx 6-7k in EIC because they make so little. child support is not claimed anywhere on anyone's tax returns.., its invisible money.

so lets do HER math.

she (and hubby) earn 12k/yr, thats 1,000 a month. (hubby earns $$ off the books as well., but we wont count that.) i pay all medical insurance, PLUS 92% (thats my share of the child care bills) of any co-pays or anything my ex wife says i have to pay.

i pay her 2k/mo for a total of 3k/mo AFTER TAXES (she and her husband dont pay taxes, they GET taxes) thats 36k/yr TAKEHOME, plus the 6k EIC gift that daddy govt gives them.

my ex wife EARNS 42k/yr TAKE HOME PAY and she works a parttime job as does her husband.

My math. i earn just under $9000/mo GROSS (nice right? watch what happes) without getting too detailed, my paycheck deductions are as follows (rounded) this is a paycheck, so multiply by 2 to get my monthly figures..

-176, -61 -699 -228 -1.30 -988(c.s) -16 -10 -9 -43 -218(401k) -60 -133

all those are subtractions from my check, twice per month.

my final takehome pay is $1812 or $3624/month or $43,504 TAKEHOME per YEAR.

i leave my house at 7am and get home at 9pm (suburban commute)

i have the PRIVILEGE of keeping $43,504/yr for a 70/hr work week and her and her hubby get to pocket $42k/yr for holding part time jobs 2 blocks from home.

keep in mind, this all happens while I have custody of one of our three children.

again. recap…

DAD +1 Kid +70hr workweek = 44k/yr takehome pay

Mom +2Kids+New Hubby+40hr workweek(total for both) = 42k/yr takehome pay

BUT, if my kids want to sleep over (if i ever see them, they are teens, they have FRIENDS), i must maintain a 3 bedroom(at the minimum) apt/home, so that they have a place to sleep.

Now this is the kicker.. ready…

I was not “RAILROADED” in court. the judge followed the guidelines to a T, my ex doesnt harass me, the judge wasnt malicious.

This was STANDARD OPERATING PROCEDURE. it was a given. a normal day, no big fuckin deal. Thats the part alot of guys dont get.

You think family court is this big production and you have a chance to defend yourself, or at least say SOMETHING… NOPE.. not a chance. this is just how things are. its not looked at as , “YEA, Lets bend this guy over and take his shit.”

Its merely looked at as, “Hey, its your responsibility, like paying any other bill. get in line, dont complain, you’ll get ur turn to open ur wallet”

So lets re-cap yes.

I make 100k. Without any evil, malicious intent, just me paying my CS debt, i must pay close to $24,000 a year in CASH, AFTER TAXES to my ex.

After all deductions and what not i am in the %18 tax bracket or there-around, which i’ll call $15,000/yr

I work 70 hours, i make 100k

i pay the govt 15k

i KEEP 49k (thats HALF of my GROSS)

So my point is this…Guys… imagine if i got FUCKED in court. Imagine if the judge was having a bad day, or my ex pulled the rape/abuse/victim card, or i looked like an evil gang-member (or a wall-street tycoon, no diff really). What if i had to pay alimony on top of that?? Imagine if they REALLY STUCK IT TO ME. how bad would it be? 30k/yr 35k ?? That’s the roulette game you play with the courts.

btw, this is not a complaint. This is a breakdown of what my payments are so some can get a real-world idea of the numbers.

i pay my CS, it sucks, but yes, i make enough so that i can survive (cant LIVE on $1000 a month in the NE, but i cant make 100k/yr anywhere else). Guys, what if i was Joe Average and made only $50,000 a year and still lived where i lived? how bad would it be for me and my son then?

My brothers.. NEVER MARRY.. EVER (unless she's the heiress, and you're the pauper, then make sure there's no prenup.. jeez i sound like a woman).

if you must start a family, THINK about it till you're at LEAST 35, then think about it for 7 more years.

If you dont want to be one of them OLD dads that has no energy for your kids, DONT WORRY, your wife will divorce you looong before that happens. and you will spend all your time working to pay for HER nails, hair, shoes, boobs, lovers… um i mean her kids.. yea..

Taxes and Child Support

I'm sure some readers recently went through the painful process of forking over a substantial chunk of change to Uncle Sam, and for those of us who are divorced and paying child support it can be an exceptionally depressing experience.

Most people don't dwell on taxes too much, so it probably isn't common knowledge that being a custodial parent confers not only a monthly check, but a tax bonanza as well. The overwhelmingly male non-custodial parent portion of our tax-paying population, on the other hand, gets slapped on both cheeks.

While it may not be news to a number of unfortunate guys (myself included) who shell out child support every month and then have to file as though we were single, unencumbered men, it's worth making it perfectly clear to men who have not been so afflicted.

Here's what happens:

When you pay child support, it is considered a personal expense, like buying diapers or clothes for your kids. This expense, however, is spent at the discretion of the custodial parent (i.e. mother), as though she were still your wife and going to the store for you. Plenty of women will probably think that sounds fair. Some men may, too. That's OK, but this isn't where it ends.

Because this transfer is considered a personal expense, it is not taxed. Therefore, the mother receives a substantial boost to income every month while the father takes a substantial cut. Now, this might be tolerable, but unlike alimony, fathers may not deduct child support from their taxes. Additionally, because the children do not live with fathers most of the time, the fathers may not claim children on the earned income credit, and when the mother works they usually cannot even claim the children as dependents, and therefore have no child-related deductions. Of course, they are not eligible for any other child tax credits either.

The mother, on the other hand, can claim all of these things, despite the fact that the father is paying a good deal of the child-related expenses, and often spending a quarter to a third of the time with the child(ren).

So, in addition to higher post-divorce expenses (usually, everyone loses financially in divorce), men are nailed with both child support and a much higher tax burden. A man making a middling income will often find himself post-divorce living like a part-time fry-cook. Sure, he may be making $4,000 a month or so, but after child support, taxes, rent for his crappy apartment and mortgage (for the house his ex-wife lives in), he isn't going to have much left over. In fact, for all intents and purposes the guy is poor.

It often amazes me how little most men know about these issues before they get married. Every single discussion of the merits and drawbacks of marriage should address the most salient facts, and there is little more salient than the prospect of poverty if one's wife decides she feels "unhappy." It seems to me that too often we ignore these very relevant issues in favor of discussing the emotional or spiritual perks, but when it comes down to it marriage is a business in its own right. From a financial standpoint it is a very risky partnership, particularly for men.

Perhaps those who want to revive the institution ought to pay a lot more attention to the flaws inherent in the current setup. Given these flaws, shaming and appeals to honor can only have a limited effect as the wider culture adapts to the penalties by simply avoiding them. If do-gooders and women really want men to start getting married again, they're going to have to come to the table and make some deals.

Eventually, I think they will. Men are starting to wise up, and when enough men know the score, they will be the ones holding the cards.

Review: Athol Kay's Married Man Sex Life

Featured Guest · 7 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Frost

I didn't expect to find Athol Kay's book, Married Man Sex Life particularly interesting.

I've read enough books, blogs and forums to say that I understand game and evolutionary psychology pretty much from ass to elbow. Furthermore, Athol's specialty is relationship game – i.e., getting girls to treat you like gold – which is a skill set I have mastered more than any other. Roosh, Krauser, et al. are probably more effective than I am in the club or on the street, but when it comes to juggling close, loving, but non-monogamous relationships, I'll go toe-to-toe with them or anyone else, any day of the week.

So while I think Athol's a great writer, and I've always had a lot of respect for his work, I wasn't expecting to pick up MMSL and have my mind blown.

To an extent, I was right. I learned very little from Athol about Game and the biological origins of human behaviour. Most of my readers probably won't either, as MMSL derives much of its content from principles that are common knowledge within the Roissysphere. (To his great credit, Athol acknowledges the impolite and un-PC Roissy extensively, even though he probably could have saved himself many headaches by limiting his citations to more palatable sources.)

But whether I learned a lot or a little from MMSL is not a fair test of the book's quality, because Athol is not writing for jaded twenty-five year old rogues for whom marriage is out of the question. Rather, as the title suggests, he is writing for the married man. And for the most part, he is writing for the beta-ized married man, who needs to step up and inject some Alpha into his relationship.

So let's talk about my Dad.

My father is without question my #1 hero and role model in life. I will resist the urge to turn this book review into a 20,000 word post on why.

But per the zeitgeist within which he was raised, he is imbued with a strong and irrational desire to pedestalize and submit to the women he dates. He is what the PUA community would call a natural, but his instincts have always been to address problems in a relationship with conciliation. Athol would have no trouble identifying him as a man with excellent game, but who sabotages his relationship with women via excessively beta "Nice Guy" behaviours.

When I started reading Roissy, Roosh, Fast Seduction, and the major texts of evolutionary psychology, I also made a hobby of proselytizing my newfound truths to those close to me. I sent my father many Roissy posts; I left Sperm Wars at his reading table; I did my youthful best to explain to him the principles of game, the Alpha/Beta dichotomy, and my relationship management strategies. My favourite analogy to draw was from our recent foray into Cesar Milan and his dog training philosophy of becoming the pack leader. His reply: "So you're saying we should treat women like dogs?" Marketing was not one of my earlier strengths.

More recently, I started sending him posts from Athol's blog.

My father never told me, outright, that he had read them. But one day, he made a comment that I recognized as straight from the MMSL playbook. We weren't even talking about women. Our dog was misbehaving, and he grinned and said, "Maybe I need to be acting more alpha, less beta with him."

I called him out on actually reading something I'd sent him, and he admitted it. We had a long talk about Game, Alpha behaviours, and de-pedestalizing women.

When Athol sent me a review copy of MMSL, I gave it my Dad. He read it cover to cover. He had barely looked at anything I'd sent him about Game before that. Since then, we've had conversations in which he's confessed to doubting some of his longest-held beliefs. He admits the harm his irrational desire to serve women has caused him in his past. He is more comfortable about acknowledging the legitimacy of pursuing his own happiness within his relationship, rather than just his partners. And he has acknowledged that yes, my very not-nice approach towards getting and keeping women might be a valid one.

But while progress can be made, there are some habits that can never be unlearned. My father will never be me. He will always be 90% Nice Guy. But Athol Kay did more to encourage that crucial 10% of change with one book, than I have in a near-decade of haranguing, book-buying and link-forwarding.

So why did MMSL succeed where so many before have failed?

The distinguishing feature of Athol's book and blog, is his inherent relatability to men with Nice Guy syndrome. There are a lot of men in the world who are instantly repelled by the teachings of the Roissysphere, even though they desperately need its advice. Athol Kay is the ambassador who is distilling those truths into a medium that can be digested, even by men still firmly ensconced in the matrix. His most remarkable achievement is that he has somehow done so without watering them down with pretty lies.

Athol succeeds at delivering his message because is not a smooth pickup artist. He's just a regular nice guy – who also has a great family and bangs his wife eight days a week. Recovering nice guys will listen to Athol, because they see themselves in him – a better version of themselves.

When I came of age, I had the realities of Roissy, Style and Tucker Max to compare against the conventional wisdom that men should be nice, and if that's not enough, well gawsh, they just need to be nicer. I easily concluded that the latter philosophy was crap, and the former had the answers I needed. I faced no obstacles to becoming the cynical realist that I am today.

My father was raised in an era without such resources. He drank the feminist Kool-Aid, and sought to create an equal partnership in his relationships, and eventually marriage. The results would not have surprised Athol, Roissy, or myself circa 2011. But they surprised our family, as we went through a decade of experiences that read like a Men's Rights Advocacy pamphlet. Thankfully, our story ends with my father, my siblings and I living healthy, happy, successful lives. But while reading Athol Kay's Married Man Sex Life, I caught myself wondering: What if Athol had published his book twenty years ago? And my father had found it then?

For many of my readers, the idea of marriage ranges from unthinkable to unlikely. But we are a rare minority in a world full of men and families who will be destroyed by their failure to implement the ideas in MMSL. I think Athol's book is going to save thousands from the fate that my family suffered. I suggest you search your life for people you care about, and add their names to that list.

Slut Walks Making the Rounds

Evidently, there was a “slut walk” Boston yesterday, and there will be one in my hometown of Seattle in June. The walks, which have garnered a great deal of attention – probably what motivates most marchers – were organized in response to a Toronto police officer who said that women should avoid dressing like sluts to prevent sexual assault. This sound advice was met with outrage from the usual suspects, and they have mobilized their slut militia to march around in cities across N. America.

Although the officer probably should have avoided the term “slut” for PR purposes, there’s nothing wrong with giving people crime prevention advice. I receive a monthly newsletter from the police that includes tips for avoiding burglary. For example, civilians are advised to avoid broadcasting events such as an upcoming vacation, we are told to avoid making our houses look like easy targets, etc. Obviously, there’s a similar principle at work as far as sexual assault is concerned. Rapists do not randomly select targets; if they did they would be raping dogs, plants, old men, or anything else convenient at the time. They go after women — usually those perceived as an easy mark. Scantily clad women not only attract their attention, but project accessibility.

Let’s do a little thought experiment.

Which woman is more likely to be sexually assaulted:

a. A fully clothed woman walking down the street

b. A stark naked walking down the street

Anyone who says it doesn’t matter is a fool or a liar.

Dressing like a slut bares as much skin as possible. It’s how prostitutes advertise themselves on the street. It is a fact that it arouses men, including rapists, more than conventional clothing.

So was the cop wrong? No. he was giving the women good advice. Of course it doesn’t always matter, but security is never failsafe; it simply improves the odds.

I’m sure that even the slutwalkers themselves know this. I highly doubt any one of them would stroll around a strange neighborhood in fishnets, pumps and a halter top. No, they are marching in a big crowd to draw attention to themselves and attract male attention in a safe environment. They are simply using the political angle as an excuse to flaunt their sexuality and be cheered on for it.

All they are really demonstrating is that if there ever was any dignity inherent in American feminism, it is long gone.

Is There Hope for Single Women Past 30?

It's kind of curious to see how so many women complain about men's "extended adolescence" when so many of them put off marriage and children until the very last minute. For a woman, growing up has even more to do with marriage and childrearing than it does for a man. However, as usual, the blame for women's extended period of screwing around in school, some corporate job or whatever they choose falls on "immature men."

A lot of these women could easily have settled down with some decent guy in their twenties and put off the graduate degree and career for long enough to have a couple kids and raise them to school age, when she can go back to work. For a typical woman in her mid-20s, she could accomplish this quite realistically by her early 30s, and then, if she wants, she could go back to work, get that higher degree, or start some small business. In fact, a lot of what people (men and women alike) do in their 20s is a wash in many cases anyway, so it would probably at least guarantee she did something productive during that period.

But there are no do-overs where age is concerned, so we find a large pool of single women in their 30s suddenly deciding that they want the family that would have been best started some ten years earlier. These women are staring the "game changer" right in the face, and finding that although they thought they could hold out for something better, it is suddenly the men of similar age who have that option. Hence all the endless whining and complaining about men being "afraid of commitment" or "immature."

This is the root of all these complaints — the women making them are upset about the fact that men will not commit to them, personally. Ironically, the same men would have been much more eager to do so some ten years prior, but things have changed.

So what is a potential solution for these women facing a ticking biological clock and a much more difficult mating market? Unfortunately, for many of them there probably is none. Too many guys over the age of 35 have grown cynical, know that the pickings are easy, and are far from excited about the prospect of settling down with a harried wife and chaotic children. Young men are idealists, and really clueless. I was one at one point. I loved the idea of family and children, and could only imagine happy times with kids and domestic intimacy as some kind of heaven on earth. The reality turned out to be far different, but I still wouldn't change things — kids often have a very strong pull on one's heart.

This idealism wanes fast for men. Those who haven't had kids by 40 are not likely to ever do so, so what is the career woman in her 30s to do?

I don't know that I should even give women any advice on the subject, because the issue is fraught with danger for men, but the word will get out there one way or the other so might as well.

For women who have aged out of the prime mating market and are approaching the game-changing event that occurs in the mid-30s, there is still some hope, but it involves a betrayal of feminist principles as well as setting aside some of her youthful expectations.

There is one group of men out there who are more likely to look favorably on the idea of a more mature woman with a career, and possibly having a kid or two with her. Given the financial, emotional and practical realities of divorce and custody issues, divorced fathers are a relatively easy catch for a woman who is past her prime mating and marriage years.

Men in this situation have generally proven that they are willing to be parents, settle down and give it a go. Some have rejected the idea entirely, but by no means all. They are also more likely to value a woman who can support herself and will be much more hesitant about getting involved with another young, unproven woman. Most will be emotionally and financially damaged to some extent, but if they survived the divorce onslaught and managed to keep it together to some extent they've proven themselves fairly resilient, resourceful people.

A lot of women dislike the idea of getting involved with a man who already has children, but such a man is nowhere near the liability a single mother is. Although single mothers are almost universally made out to be victims in mainstream culture, these days the opposite is generally the truth — they have victimized some man in their life with no regard for him or even the children she had with him. Men rarely do that, and they are prevented from doing so by the law in any event, so a single father is not much of a risk in that regard.

Finally, the guy already knows how to handle kids. He won't be starting from scratch. This makes a big difference, and if he does go along with the idea to have another kid, it's going to be much easier than it will with a childless man of equivalent age who has already become rather set in his ways and habits.

So, for the women who are complaining about men who "won't grow up," the problem is that they haven't considered that there are plenty of men who already have, and got burned for doing so. These women actually have an opportunity that is better than fair, and gives them a break they never would have had in days past.

Like so many other things today, the field is tilted in favor of women even when they've missed their first chance. So, next time you hear some woman whining about how men won't commit, remember that there's absolutely no reason to feel sorry for her. Due to the reality that divorced men face today, she still has plenty of options, and if she still can't figure that out then, really, who's the one who hasn't grown up?

FIRE Throws Down Gauntlet over Orwellian Campus Sex Policy

W.F. Price · 10 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

FIRE, the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, has sent a strongly worded letter to the Department of Education's misnamed Office for Civil Rights expressing deep concern over new standards of proof to be in used in accusations of sexual harassment or assault. The feds recently passed a law mandating that schools adopt a "preponderance of evidence standard" in such cases, backed with the ominous threat of withdrawal of federal funding, which these days is a grave threat indeed.

Excerpt:

> II. Right to Due Process
> OCR's April 4 letter mandates that recipient institutions implement certain procedures governing responses to allegations of sexual harassment and sexual violence. While some of these newly announced requirements are beyond the scope of FIRE's mission, others implicate due process rights and call into question the basic fairness of disciplinary proceedings against those students accused of sexual harassment and sexual violence. Given the extreme gravity of such accusations and the potential impact of a guilty finding, FIRE is deeply concerned that OCR's new requirements erode necessary due process protections.
> A. Standard of Proof
> OCR's April 4 letter mandates that colleges and universities receiving federal assistance must employ a "preponderance of the evidence" standard within their grievance procedures governing sexual harassment and sexual violence in order to satisfy their legal obligations under Title IX. Specifically, the April 4 letter dictates:
> > [I]n order for a school's grievance procedures to be consistent with Title IX standards, the school must use a preponderance of the evidence standard (i.e., it is more likely than not that sexual harassment or violence occurred). The "clear and convincing" standard (i.e., it is highly probable or reasonably certain that the sexual harassment or violence occurred), currently used by some schools, is a higher standard of proof. Grievance procedures that use this higher standard are inconsistent with the standard of proof established for violations of the civil rights laws, and are thus not equitable under Title IX. Therefore, preponderance of the evidence is the appropriate standard for investigating allegations of sexual harassment or violence.
> The letter makes clear that schools maintaining a higher evidentiary standard-such as the "clear and convincing" standard-for disciplinary procedures involving allegations of sexual harassment and sexual violence will be subject to OCR review. As the letter states: "In addressing complaints filed with OCR under Title IX, OCR reviews a school's procedures to determine whether the school is using a preponderance of the evidence standard to evaluate complaints."
> In mandating that schools adopt a preponderance of the evidence standard in their grievance procedures governing sexual harassment and sexual violence allegations, OCR has broken significant—and troubling—new ground. In contrast to the April 4 mandate, the 2001 Guidance is silent with regard to the standard of proof required of schools' grievance procedures. While the 2001 Guidance stated that recipient institutions must maintain "grievance procedures providing for prompt and equitable resolution of complaints of discrimination on the basis of sex," it did not specify that a specific burden of proof must be employed in university grievance procedures. Indeed, the 2001 Guidance granted schools considerable autonomy in determining the particular protocols to be utilized on their campuses, noting that "[p]rocedures adopted by schools will vary considerably in detail, specificity, and components, reflecting differences in audiences, school sizes and administrative structures, State or local legal requirements, and past experience." However, the April 4 letter's mandate revokes this discretion-and with it, schools' ability to grant students due process protections that are > appropriate for the gravity of the offenses of which they are accused.

What is most interesting about the letter is that it indicates that the left is finally starting to take issue with some of the more repressive and draconian measures to enforce militant feminism. When movements start out with some legitimate grievances, the left tends to support their excesses for a period of time, but eventually clearer-headed types begin to see the excesses for what they are: the same supremacism they sought to combat from the beginning.

It is becoming increasingly clear that whatever grievances that existed in the beginning of second wave feminism no longer exist, or are nearing the point of irrelevance, and additional measures are undertaken purely in self-interest to the detriment of innocents. The new policy on sexual assault on campus all but guarantees that innocent men and boys will pay a heavy price for feminist supremacy, and anyone with a sense of social justice and moral balance cannot support it in good conscience.

Although it will likely start slowly, I think we'll see more resistance of feminism from the left in coming years, and soon the aging feminist power brokers will come to be seen as reactionaries themselves.

Single Mothers vs. Single Fathers

W.F. Price · 10 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A few readers took issue with yesterday's post suggesting that single, 30-something women were lucky in that they still had access to a pool of decent men — divorced fathers. A couple readers thought I was suggesting that divorced men should take on single mothers, so perhaps I should make myself clear:

Single childless women past 30 may be appropriate for divorced fathers, but single mothers are a big liability these days.

Why is this? Well, let's start with the obvious. Single mothers are overwhelmingly so by choice. Aside from the small number of widows and women whose husbands ran off on their families, single women with children made the conscious choice to put themselves in that situation. This is a choice that has been celebrated at least since Murphy Brown decided to become a single mother on TV back in the early 90s.

Single fathers, on the other hand, are overwhelmingly victims of circumstances. Men have no control over female reproduction, so they cannot abort their children. Men who run off from their families are subject to confiscatory measures on behalf of the mother, and most of them know this and avoid doing so. Women overwhelmingly file for divorce, especially when children and custody issues are involved.

These circumstances exert strong pressure on men, forcing them to stick by their families through thick and thin. Men will put up with a great deal before divorcing their wives.

Since the late 80s, women, on the other hand, have choices every step of the way. They can terminate their pregnancies, they can leave their husbands with some guarantee of custody and support, and they are very often recipients of welfare (e.g. WIC — Women with Infants and Children).

Therefore, single mothers are overwhelmingly women who have:

a. Left their children's father

b. Subjected their children's father to state confiscation

c. Deprived their children of a father figure

d. Relied on others to involuntarily support their choice

Why on earth would a man want a woman like that? Only a fool would think such a woman was a safe bet. Even leaving aside the problems inherent in mixed families, what guarantee is there that she won't simply repeat what she's already proven herself capable of at some point in the future?

Single and divorced fathers, on the other hand, are men who have proven loyalty to their children, have "done their duty" despite the fact that the orders and judgments were unfair, and are not generally responsible for the demise of their marriages (most divorces are filed for "irreconcilable differences" – not abuse or infidelity – by the wife).

Given these circumstances, it doesn't matter much whether men or women are different — the realities of contemporary law have created an imbalance that clearly puts men at a disadvantage in divorce and custody. When such an imbalance exists, those who take advantage of it, i.e. single mothers, have demonstrated their own low character, whereas those victimized by it have no reason to feel ashamed.

Today, there is no equivalency between single mothers and single fathers, and men would be well-advised to avoid single mothers in all but exceptional circumstances.

By Ken Knight

ONE HOUR PHOTO ~Directed by Mark Romanek (2002) starring Robin Williams is a “stalker” themed motion picture featuring the comedian genius Robin Williams in arguably the most intense role of his career to date. The Film did relatively well at the Box Office and in DVD sales as a thriller exploring one lonely single man’s voyeuristic life as a Photo-Tech at a “SAV MART” discount department store somewhere/anywhere in suburban America. Watching this film however, whether you are married or single, you will find a little more to it than that!

Seymour “Sy” Parrish is a middle-aged white male living alone in a “downtown” apartment which is furnished for one solitary occupant who is never expecting visitors and whose job defines him identity-wise, working as a Photo-Tech at the department store’s mini-lab, a profession he’s held for 20 years. The film quickly exhibits that Sy has had a decade-long fixation on one particular family whose photos he’s been developing: The “Yorkins”, a thirty-something suburban couple with one ten year old son named Jake. It has been said that children are naturally intuitive so we see in the opening salvos of this film Young Jake sensing that Sy “The Photo Guy” Parrish (whom he visits every time his mother goes to SAV-MART) is lonely without a family of his own, no wife, no girlfriend, etc. and feels sorry for him. At this point the film shows us how really lonely/solitary the character of Sy Parrish truly is, showing the extent Sy has been keeping tabs on the Yorkin family, an entire wall filled with extra copies of the photos the Yorkins had developed over the past 10 years (stealing photo-copies gets Sy fired later on) and that he secretly views himself as their “Uncle Sy”, fantasizing that he’s a part of their family since they have been nice to him over the years.

The character Sy Parrish is painfully portrayed as the ultimate “Omega” male in American society, a man who is never popular, never athletic, no family of his own, never has a girlfriend (i.e. never gets laid!) usually dresses bland, lives alone with a pet hamster, physically soft, “quirky” and lacking in social skills…the kind of guy most other men ignore and women never give the time of day. Seen as pitiful and sympathetic to some viewers of the film and yet “creepy” and irritating by others, Sy Parrish envies the Yorkin family and the seemingly “ideal” family-life he imagines they lead, to the point that he injects himself in stalker-like times with each one of the Yorkins to fulfill his fantasy as “welcome” among them. What Sy fails to see (until it is too late) is that the Yorkin’s family-life is anything but picture-perfect!

The character of Nina Yorkin is an over-spending, “keep up with the Joneses” housewife driving her husband Will to work harder and longer in order to keep up with her expenditures. When Will confronts his wife about her bankrupting habits, she retorts that he is an “emotionally-neglectful” husband and father! (yep, all his fault for working hard to provide for a gold-digger wife). Far be it for Hollywood to portray the wife as the villain in this film, it turns out that Will Yorkin is having an affair with a female co-worker named Maia Burston, an affair Sy Parrish accidentally discovers when he develops photos the mistress turns in. Sy’s idealistic image of the Yorkin couple is completely shattered and on his last day at the photo-lab he puts one of the incriminating photos in Mina Yorkin’s packet for her and Jake to see (yes, a douche thing to do but Sy begins his “revenge” trip after being fired from his beloved Photo-lab job around the same time he finds the Yorkins are not Ozzy and Harriet). Sy then discovers Nina Yorkin doesn’t appear to give a shit about her husband’s affair as he watches them eat dinner in their home as he sits out at the street.(Why ruin a good dinner when she had her husband by the balls anyway?). With the Yorkin family he envied and idealized not being the picture-perfect family unit he so desperately wanted for himself, and no longer doing the job he felt important in doing, Sy’s own loneliness increases two-fold and in typical Hollywood “creep” fashion, he lashes out at his former boss as well as Will Yorkin who is hammering his hot mistress at a local Hotel.

This film has its complicated “villain” in Sy Parrish and the Marriage 2.0 example of The Yorkins he is systematically stalking is shown as the “victim” by the film’s ending, though the real victim in this tale is the single male “Omega” who should not have envied what other people have, for how wrong he was in his assessment of a married couple! The enigmatic “Loser” who lives alone without wives, kids, divorce-decrees, child-support / alimony payments….became ensconced with the demon of ENVY and sought a taste of someone else’s life! What is not said in this film is the social “pariah” (Sy) is considered a “loser” simply because he is a single man of middle-age. Sy saw a married couple (Marriage 2.0) and in the general social expectation of wife/house/kids-or-else wanted those things for himself, or to at least be around such things since he could not seem to acquire wife/house/kids-or-else all on his own.

How many single men have suffered from the same “expectation” and lost their damn mind chasing the lives of others who are married with kids, wives with boob-jobs, kids who may or may not be theirs, subprime-mortgages, et al? (though maybe not physical stalking as Sy Parrish carried out). How many single men have gone green with envy over the lives of couples and families, pursuing that life for themselves because that is what is “expected” of a man? “Marriage 2.0” (as clearly defined by the fictional Yorkin family) is a surrealistic nightmare for countless denizens who may have imagined the same idealistic “family life” Sy Parrish did during his lonely apartment sojourns in the film. Maybe if Sy Parrish could have been patient enough to see the end-result of the Yorkin Marriage 2.0 > divorce papers, Family Court Judge, lawyers’ fees, husband kicked out of his house while forced to still pay for it, child support and visitation hours determined by the ex-wife, alimony to the non-working-ex-wife, and the mistress bailing as soon as lover boy’s bank account is drained….Sy would have taken his boss’s advice and gone on vacation to Club Med rather than stalk a married couple.

Whoever said a fictional film can’t be a lesson? ONE HOUR PHOTO points out a great example to follow in hindsight for Single men: do not bother to envy the lives of others ~ particularly the lives of married/engaged couples because the married man has more to lose than you do, and he often does exactly that….LOSE!

On The Royal Wedding and Female Empowerment

By Petra

The Royal wedding and accompanying media frenzy are finally over. The masses got to celebrate an opulent, fancy show and can now go back to their reality TV.

The Royal family has presented a fresh, modern face to the world, proving it keeps with the times… with a nice, politically correct wedding. Let's wish the couple a long and successful marriage and hope the very modern, progressive wedding vows will not prove to have been a bad omen for their union.

Now, this may seem a silly little issue to pick on, but, would it have been too intolerably oppressive for Kate Middleton to have kept to the traditional vows including promising to 'obey' her husband? Yes, I know such a thing is not just hopelessly out of fashion but considered almost a crime against their human rights by feminists and millions of brainwashed modern women. But if the Royals won't preserve the last remnants of tradition, who will? And what's the point of Monarchy if not tradition?

Of course Kate Middleton wasn't the first to break with royal tradition. No, she had a great role model at that; Princess Diana refused to promise to obey Charles in her wedding vows thirty years ago. And we know just how well suited she proved to be for her role and responsibilities. Some example to follow…

While Diana's break of protocol caused a scandal at the time, Middleton was praised for her decision to ditch the promise to obey. We've become so much more enlightened and 'progressive' since then, after all. What modern woman could possibly accept such an offensive, oppressive, sexist, paternalistic monstrosity?

Undoubtedly the decision to modernize the vows was taken to show the Monarchy being in step with contemporary culture and to present the new Duchess of Cambridge as a thoroughly modern woman and role model for millions of young women throughout Britain. And that's the biggest tragedy of it all… The country doesn't need any more progressive 'role models' infected with feminist ideology. What we do need, if this society is ever to reverse the present degeneration, are those who stand up for traditional values and mores.

Of course vows don't mean much these days anyway, and barely anyone entering into marriage really takes them seriously. But even the symbolic value is enough to offend feminist sensibilities and so vows must be 'fixed' and politically corrected. Am I alone in thinking that a bride's revolt to say traditional vows (as well as, for instance, the increasingly widespread refusal to take the husband's surname) is a bad sign for the health and longevity of a marriage?

Marriage today is, to many women, just an extravagant social occasion and party, their very own 'princess' fantasy. It doesn't seem to include any consideration on what marriage really means, much less on how to be a good wife. Undoubtedly the mere concept of a 'good wife' would be deemed oppressive these days. (Are you saying women should have responsibilities and not just rights?!) After all, millions of women feel entitled to ditch their marriages and perfectly decent husbands for no better reason than feeling bored or 'unfulfilled'. The princesses deserve to be happy – and if they harm their husbands and children in their insatiable quest for fulfillment, so be it!

To see to what extent our decaying society has succumbed to feminist ideas (and cultural Marxism/political correctness in general)… even the church has become completely infested with the misguided, morally bankrupt dogmas. Granted, if any church has eagerly embraced liberalism and political correctness it's the Church of England; so one should hardly be too surprised to hear Rowan Williams, the Archbishop of Canterbury's views on the vow of obedience.

(In 2006 guidelines) he stated that a wife promising to 'obey' her husband was an outdated concept that could even justify domestic violence (!). Not surprising, I suppose, coming from a church leader who supports women- and gay clergy and gay marriages, in clear breach of Christian principles. It seems only a hopeless optimist could expect the (Anglican) church to promote traditional marriage and sound morality instead of trying to redefine Christian values to fit the moral inversion of our era. (And anyway, why should we, as the enlightened, progressive people we are, want to promote such an antiquated, oppressive institution as marriage?)

But why are modern women so scared of traditional marriage vows?

Apparently, ditching them is proof of being a strong, independent woman demanding 'equality' in marriage. Of course! What else? Our ever-present equality delusion! Gender is, after all, just a social construct (or so we are told) and no real differences between men and women exist; ergo, all traditional gender roles must be evil, sexist and discriminatory. Has there ever been a civilization suffering from as complete a denial of reality as we do?

Of course promising to 'obey' one's husband has nothing to do with being oppressed, a second class citizen with no power or say in a relationship, or a servant to a man. It's a statement of trust and respect, acknowledging the authority of the man as head of family, responsible for and dedicated to his wife's and their children's welfare. Despite us wanting to pretend otherwise, a woman's natural role is to be loving, nurturing and supportive in a relationship. When women usurp the masculine role (power and leadership) and emasculate men it doesn't bode well for marriage.

Women are deluded in thinking they have been 'liberated' from some imaginary shackles, when in fact they've only sabotaged themselves and contributed a great deal to the rotten state of our society. The anti-male bias is ever present in the West today; we are 'empowering' females at the expense of males and conditioning women to disparage men.

The self-absorption and sense of entitlement of today's women make it nearly impossible to form healthy, sustainable marriages and relationships. The results can be seen all around us; disintegration of family, sky-high divorce rates (over 70% of divorces are initiated by women, and nearly 90% among college-educated couples), rampant single motherhood, culture of welfare dependence, damaged children growing up without a father figure, sexual depravity (especially exhibited by young women), drug abuse, and a general lack of values and mores. It is well documented that children brought up by married parents fare considerably better in all aspects of life than those raised by single or co-habiting parents. But who cares about children? As long as women are 'empowered' and feel good…

Of course I don't expect the progressive women of today to agree with any of this. After all, if they did, they would have given up one of their favorite excuses to scream 'discrimination!' Imagine the catastrophic consequences of admitting women have long been enjoying – and often abusing – a privileged and protected status (as the 'oppressed sex'): less ability to blame men for any and all problems and bad outcomes, less affirmative action benefiting the undeserving, fewer rewards for 'discrimination' claims.

The truth is that a woman can be intelligent, independent and strong and yet find it perfectly natural and satisfying to let her husband lead and be the head of the family. You may think that traditional marriage is an oppressive, antiquated institution that should be rooted out. But if you don't, here's an idea: Let your man be a man, show him the respect he deserves… it will do miracles for your marriage. And, if replicated enough, it might just save our fallen society.

P.S.

Isn't it ironic that so many self-proclaimed 'strong' women consider themselves entitled to special treatment and privileges yet are unwilling to accept any corresponding responsibility? And what about pride of being 'independent' from any one specific man while demanding support (in a myriad different ways) by the state apparatus (paid for by many men – taxpayers)? How about intelligence? Would an intelligent person pursue their short term gratification at the cost of destruction of family, morality, social fabric (while dooming their own offspring to suffer the consequences)? So much for the myth of the strong, independent and intelligent modern female.

What's truly sad is that women don't realize they have been serving as an instrument of cultural Marxism and, having swallowed its propaganda, allowed themselves to be manipulated and used to destroy society.

Gramsci and other Marxist disciples realized that the Christian culture in the West was an obstacle standing in the way of a communist conquest, and in order to succeed Marxism had to make a "long march through the culture", discrediting and undermining all foundations and values. The culture and institutions had to be radically transformed and the social and cultural order turned upside down (Gramsci envisioned a 'new proletariat' of women, racial and sexual minorities and even criminals placed in power).

And indeed today our schools, colleges, academia, media, entertainment industry, civic organizations and government have been fully converted to cultural Marxism and are almost universally hostile to family, traditional sex roles, Christianity and traditional morality.

People can't be taken over by Marxist ideas while they have refuge in their religion, families, culture and convictions; once they lose those traditional supports they only have the government to go to, and the path to socialism and communism is cleared. Family is the building block of a nation's middle class; by destroying (family and hence) the middle class one can ruin the economic engine and capitalism itself.

Marxists clearly identified family and religion (as well as nation, property) as targets for destruction. The chief tactics – invalidating traditional gender roles and promoting dysfunctional social structures as normal (including single motherhood, same-sex marriage etc), endlessly portraying marriage and family as oppressive, painting fathers as restrictive and controlling and men as exploiters, propagating sexual revolution and 'free love', legalizing abortion and making it acceptable and accessible, attacking Christian institutions and values, encouraging youth and women to reject Christian morality, monogamy, parental and church authority, etc. Divorce, promoted as understandable and always justified, was made ridiculously easy (no-fault) and wives have been incentivized to leave their husbands (taking their money and children with them).

The bored baby-boomers were the first generation to really have swallowed the cultural Marxist propaganda whole. Hundreds of millions have since been indoctrinated with the new morally inverted 'values'. Today cultural Marxism has completely overtaken Western society.

Women, who eagerly jumped on the 'empowerment' and 'liberation' bandwagon (just as Marx and his disciples foresaw), have been instrumental in the dissolution of family and traditional values. Worst of all, not only are they unaware of what's taken place, they are seemingly proud of the hubris they helped create.

[Note: Naturally this may not apply to all women; but to shockingly many.]

NAWALT Is True, So What's The Problem?

W.F. Price · 12 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

NAWALT – Not All Women Are Like That – is in fact true, so what's the real reason this argument has been forcefully rejected by so many men? We all know that there are good women out there, including some who comment here, in our families, at work and in neighborhoods all over the land, so why shouldn't we listen to women who tell us this is the case?

What it really comes down to is risk. The problem is not that all women are horrible — it's simply that a lot of them are, and we have no assurance that the nice girl who is smiling and saying she loves you won't at some point destroy your life. The reality today is that a woman does have that power, just like a round in a revolver's chamber.

So, to men who have been through the wringer, when a woman says "not all women are like that," what we hear sounds like "not all chambers in that revolver are loaded." The suggestion, of course, is that because not all women are like that, we might as well give it another try.

If somebody handed you a revolver with three loaded chambers and three empty ones and said, "go ahead and aim this at your head and pull the trigger — not all the chambers are loaded," would you go along with the suggestion? Of course not. It would be sheer folly.

So the issue is not that all women are lousy, but rather that the consequences of marrying one who is are extremely serious. And, unfortunately, young, marriage-minded men tend not to be all that discerning.

Unfortunately, decent women are paying the price for the selfish, destructive behavior of those with no scruples and no sense of responsibility to their families. Many of these decent women may feel hurt by the rejection of the NAWALT argument, because they truly do not see themselves as all that bad, but there is a fundamental flaw in their approach to the issue.

The problem is that, in general, women are reluctant to give up their advantages in family law to even the playing field. Perhaps this is because those women who are not the type to destroy their husbands' and children's lives have some worries that they may be taken advantage of themselves. Perhaps they feel that it isn't an issue because they don't see themselves ever doing something like that.

But the consequences of this imbalance are starting to catch up to those women who really "aren't like that." Today, they are less likely to find a man willing to marry them, and more likely to be used and abandoned at the first hint of commitment. Society at large is increasingly skeptical about the virtues of women, and the word is bubbling up from the grass roots that women are a risky proposition.

The obvious solution would be for women themselves to take a harder line on the less responsible members of their own sex, but unfortunately that will probably not happen until the damage has already been done. People in general tend to react to problems rather than take preventative measures — it's part of human nature.

However, women who care at all about the destruction of the family, hostility toward marriage and the gender war should at least have some understanding of what's behind the contemptuous reaction to NAWALT:

It isn't about you, it isn't about all women, and it isn't even a reflection of any particular man's personal attitude toward marriage or relationships; it simply reflects the very difficult, risky situation today's men find themselves in.

Until the laws are reformed and some balance is restored to relationships, men who care at all about their lives will have no choice but to regard any woman he becomes involved with as a loaded gun pointed straight at him.

Slut Walk Documentation Project

Roissy recently called for a "Pimp Walk" in response to the national slut walks, and Jack suggested I go take some photos and make a "hall of shame" post a la zombietime.com when they march in Seattle. If I have the time, I think I'll do that, even though I expect the slutwalk in Seattle to be underwhelming.

However, I think it would be fun to post as many funny pictures from these slutwalks as possible, so if any readers want to go out and get some shots I'd be happy to post the photos up here on The Spearhead.

The slutwalk schedule can be found here, and from the looks of it these slutwalks are being held throughout the English-speaking world.

So, if you've got the time and a digital camera, and you think the slutwalks might be amusing, go for it and send your best shots here.

Comment of the Week: Women Are All Like That

W.F. Price · 13 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor: Laura Grace Robbins offered a very convincing response to yesterday's NAWALT post.

Short and sweet it is, and undeniably true.

I stand corrected...

Women are all like that. It it the default or primal position. If one is to rise out of that they have to continually be consciously aware that they can be “like that” at any minute and have to always keep themselves one step ahead. This just doesn’t happen much though because being so consciously aware takes a lot of work and a willingness to accept a fallen nature. It is much easier to blame men than to look inwards (i.e., “men make me “like that”).

Being like that as a default position is why the same sort of behavior often manifests in the conservative/traditional/Christian women. It is the baseline. Slapping some title on yourself like those does not absolve you of your sinful nature. They think they are absolved though because they are cushioned behind their “traditionalist”, etc., title who believe in morals, family, marriage, etc., so, therefore they can’t possibly be “like that”.

Bello Maasaba of Nigeria, father to 185, husband to 107 so far, receives adulation wherever he goes. An Islamic faith healer, he commands a hefty price for his services, despite the fact that he eschews modern medicine. Although 87 years old, his youngest wife is 19, and he continues to marry new women who take his fancy.

According to Robyn Dixon, writing for the LA Times, he chooses his wives for obedience and submissive qualities. Given his great success with women, perhaps this explains something about what women themselves want. If taking a position of authority were not attractive to women, how could he possibly hope to attract so many?

To be honest, I'm sure there's more to the story than this. However, according to the women themselves, there was never any forcible compulsion in the relationships. I'm sure that most of them are satisfied with the setup, and perfectly at ease submitting to their elderly husband's authority. There is no doubt that, contrary to what feminists would have us believe, women actually prefer high-status husbands who can claim authority. This shows up time and again in high-status women's complaints that there aren't enough men for them, when in fact they have plenty of lower-status men to choose from.

But back to what's really going on with Mr. Maasaba, I can state with some certainty that a high-status African man isn't going to put up all those women without demanding that they provide to some extent for themselves. Additionally, faith healing often involves some "special medicine," so I don't think I'd be going too far out on a limb here in assuming that he is actually a very successful pimp who puts his "wives" to work for him.

It's pretty funny that Westerners seem to take it for granted that he has an exclusive relationship with around a hundred women, but people tend to be unable to see past their own cultural paradigm.

In any event, there's no denying that the man is the master of his own house, and lots – tons, actually – of women are perfectly happy with that.

Again, watch what they do, and don't listen to what they say.

No Laughing Matter

Evidently, Mary N. Kellett, chief feminist kommissar of Maine, has demanded that a judge shut up men's media outlets and activists so that she may more successfully prosecute men on flimsy criminal cases.

Kellett was denied on Constitutional grounds, but don't think for a moment that this will discourage these people. They don't care about the Constitution, due process, free speech or any of those trivial things that might slow down feminism. They've already proven they'll leverage sympathy for women to obtain whatever power they can squeeze out of it, blithely destroying people's lives in the process. Their sycophants will cheer them on.

In the USSR, making a disparaging remark about Stalin could very well result in a bullet to the back of the head. Mary Kellett and her supporters are exactly the kind of people who would carry out such a program if given the opportunity.

Thank our activists, including Paul Elam and SAVE, for standing up to them. And don't forget for a moment that the people they are battling would sit by and smile to see us beaten and murdered to keep them in the positions of power they currently occupy, funded by our taxes, of course.

Fighting them is not just the right thing to do — it is necessary. In this case, people's lives are at stake. It IS that serious.

Most of the arguments and articles about the dangers of marriage and the horrors of divorce seem to assume that the man is the primary breadwinner, and that the woman lives in his house.

But what if we stopped playing according to traditional norms and started taking advantage of the new rules? What if one was to marry a breadwinning wife? Instead of spending most of your time on a job, you could spend most of your time on other pursuits – hobbies, research on men's issues or anything else of interest, raising your kids or even just lounging on the couch once in a while.

The potential legal and social benefits are enormous. Divorce is no longer a threat, for one thing. At worst, you lose nothing and the ex loses nothing. At best, you stand to gain half of everything she owns. This will result in a more equitable distribution of power in the relationship. Instead of having to put up with a wifes excessive nagging and being forced to pander to her needs at economic gunpoint, a man can simply decide that she is out of line and leave. This will help keep her behavior acceptable, and remove any fear that a married man might have under more traditional roles. And as primary caretaker, men would be more likely to get primary custody than they are now.

Furthermore – and this is what i consider the most important part – it would put men back in the role as teachers to their children.
Men have always had a teaching role in society, from the earliest times as hunters and warriors to more recent times in the form of apprenticeships and the early educational system. We would be able to turn our daughters into good women, our boys into good men, and teach both to think.

There is no way to legally fight this without dropping the charade and openly making blatant anti-male laws. If enough men do this, things may eventually change for the better. But whatever change comes of this – or doesn't – at least we won't have to live in fear.

It Ain't in the Genes

By Codebuster

Recently a number of our favourite MRAs have voiced their support for Evolutionary Psychology (EP) as an explanation for human behaviour and how, for example, gender roles arise within cultures. While we applaud their analytical thinking and their efforts to place things within a rational, scientific context, there are problems with EP theory. To put it bluntly, the Neo-Darwinian premise upon which much of EP is founded – with its reliance on genes best described within the context of genetic determinism and genocentrism – is fundamentally flawed. Having said that, though, EP has some redeeming aspects in that it represents the first serious attempt by our contemporary life sciences to integrate biology with culture. Indeed, it was the high priest of genetic determinism, Richard Dawkins himself, who introduced the concept of memetics to explain how ideas spread throughout culture.

But Dawkins is also the progenitor of the bad idea that we've come to know as the selfish gene. Memetics good, selfish gene bad. I suppose that only a person from a selfish culture would project onto the behaviour of genes the selfish priorities that he observes in the people around him.

So what's wrong with this mainstream paradigm that places so much importance on genetics? Some of us might be familiar with the term reductionism, as in "reductionist science". I don't like using this term, because I consider myself a reductionist of sorts. I am interested in the synthesis of ideas and their "reduction" to fundamental principles. Determinism, as in "genetic determinism" is a more appropriate term to describe the linear, simplistic notion of genes as the all-singing, all-dancing explanation for how life works.

Of course genes and DNA are very important. What is at stake is less their importance than how they work. And of course, how they work is way beyond topic here, but for the intellectually omnivorous, might I suggestbiophysics and quantum biology as good places to start. When we bring interpretations such as nonlocality into the equation, the metaphors borrowed from computer-speak just won't do. The brain is less a computer than it is acolony. Personality is less a program than it is a thought. But I digress.

This discussion about genes, Neo-Darwinism and evolutionary psychology is central to the so-called nature/nurture debate.

So why is genetic determinism such a bad idea? Its most pernicious effect is on our understanding of culture. The reality is that culture's power is all around us, we have to contend with it every day of our lives. And it is because of genetic determinism that we have failed to grasp this significance. We have little appreciation of the inextricable relationship between individual personality and culture.

Notice that my beef is less with EP than it is with genetic determinism. If we were able to extricate EP from its genocentric ball-and-chain, perhaps progress in the cognitive sciences would not be as hobbled as it is today. It's pointless labouring over explanations of this stuff, trying to explain something that I've spent many years putting together. So let's instead take a look at a brief list of simplified examples:

1. Accents, the habitual manner in which we implement our spoken language, is learned. When an adult who has lived in China comes to live in the Anglosphere, they learn to speak English with a distinctive Chinese accent. Is their accent in their genes? If it is, then why do their Anglo-raised children learn to speak English perfectly, virtually indistinguishable from the accent of everyone else from that part of the Anglosphere in which they are raised?
2. The fact that everyone in a culture shares the same accent suggests the broader reality that individual personality is at some basic level indistinguishable from cultural personality. Or, to put it another way, individual personality is a manifestation of cultural personality. Within any one culture there are different personalities, but each personality shares a common understanding as to the way the world works.

3. If you were born and raised in Italy or China or among a tribe of Kalahari bushmen or Trobriand Islanders, you would think, speak and act like an Italian, a Chinaman, a Kalahari bushman or a Trobriand Islander. Or do you really believe that you would still be you, with your same personality, your same motivations and your same accent? Very basic stuff really, and genes have nothing to do with it.
4. Do we know what happens when we raise a normally feral animal, such as a cat, among humans? It becomes domesticated. It acquires a sweet disposition that makes little girls want to lavish affection on it, rubbing their pretty little faces into the flee-infested furry bundle. The animal grows up to interpret our behaviour from the perspective of its own mind-body to behave with civility and companionship. It learns human culture. How could it not, given the affection lavished upon it? Of course our aspiring, furry bundle of proto-human can never be a fully functioning human, because it does not have the biology (such as hands or vocal chords) to acquire cultural sophistication. But one thing that our domesticated cat has left behind, at least in this one of its nine lives, is its feral wildness. Its sweet domestication is not programmed into the genes, and it bears no resemblance to the wildness of its feral counterpart.
5. Do we know what happens when we raise humans outside of culture, or among animals? Humans have their own feral counterpart to the domesticated animal.
6. The original US Constitution of the Founding Fathers, before it became the wreckage that it now stands for, asserted assumptions that were designed to impact on cultural evolution towards a higher purpose. In fact politics in general is a form of cultural engineering, whether their designers realize it or not. Cultural engineering has nothing whatsoever to do with genes. Nil, nada, zip. And yet it has a powerful impact on our personalities and what we become.
7. As Daniel Kahneman suggests, there are some recent developments in the cognitive sciences that allude to general principles, or “laws of mind”. Norman Doidge and Stefan Molyneux know that culture impacts on cognitive processes and how the brain is “wired”. They know, albeit from a rather clinical perspective, that our experiences and the choices we make shape our personalities.

To summarize what’s going on here. The thing that happens to a human in a culture is the same thing that happens to a stem-cell in a body. It lives within a context, and it becomes what it has to be, in order to conform to that context and thus fulfil its role. A chef, a nurse, a tradesman, a housewife, a policeman, an engineer, all are different responses to a context that places demands, and each response has its part to play in the survival of the unity that is culture. A stem-cell that finds itself in the medulla oblongata, or the visual cortex, or the cerebellum, also becomes the neuron that it has to be in order to conform to its context and meet the needs of its colony.

I could go on, but I’m sure we get the picture. Once we get our theory right, a whole bunch of stuff falls into place. What are we waiting for? Does this dearth of paradigm for a compelling life science not provide us with an opportunity to make our own mark on history in the most compelling and forceful way possible? At the very least we should try, given that so much of what we are being fed is garbage.

BUT WHY SHOULD THIS MATTER TO US?

The idea that gender roles might be 100% learned supports our case, because it addresses the question of choice, and the habituation of being taken care of versus the habituation of providing. It is because of our natural predispositions, not genetic programming, that equality remains every bit the impossible dream that Manuel Dexter says it is. Genes have nothing to do with it. Saying that it’s programmed in the genes does not add anything to the debate, but rather obscures it. Here are some of the things that women choose that impact on the privileges that they are able to enjoy – it’s the relationship between options, choice, desire, and how these things impact on personality:

1. Women like being provided-for. Who wouldn’t? And men happily oblige them, because women believe that they have something that men believe that they want. Men also know that the material goodies they want, no-one is going to give them out of the goodness of their hearts. Men know that they have no choice but to work for them.

Women as the provided-for sex are not made to suffer this inconvenience. No genes required.

2. Perhaps the only reason that women ever entertain the idea of "equality" in the workplace is because they've never had to work as a matter of survival, and so they grow up thinking that work is fun, a hobby, a choice, something you do if you like, something you do if your fancy takes you. In exactly the same way, little boys often want to grow up to be firemen – only to find that the reality is never what it seems, an inconvenience that most women need never face. And so women grow up imagining all sorts of fun and adventures taking place in a coal-mine or on a boat in a violent storm at sea. And then of course there are the women most likely to become feminists, too unattractive to enjoy the freebies that are routinely lavished upon their more attractive counterparts. Either way, the realities and demands of the workplace have always meant something quite different to men.
3. Women like and indulge in their rape fantasies. And when they throw caution to the wind to override their concern with being provided for, they are predisposed to selecting the types of men that conform to their fantasies. The women that choose brutes do not do so because selecting for brutes has a positive effect on the gene pool. Quite the opposite. If we left choice-making up to women, our next generation would be swinging from tree to tree, or gang-banging in Bonobo nirvana;
4. Women like taking the easy way out… and men happily indulge them. It's inherent in the condition of all life to seek the easier way out, to minimize stress. Men would do it too, if only an easier option were available to them. The fact that men do not is a matter of necessity, not genetic programming. Men know that they won't get the goodies and they won't get pussy unless they fulfil their side of the bargain. It ain't in the genes;
5. Women habituate irresponsibility, being provided for and allowing someone else to take the lead, because they can. They are simply fulfilling the first imperative that motivates all life, which is to minimize stress, maximize pleasure. Men would do it too… if only they could. But there is always a ready pool of men available to tote that barge, lift that bale. Saying that it's all in the genes is misleading nonsense;
6. Women have an escape-hatch in their role as stay-at-home mom. Men do not enjoy any such culturally-sanctioned permission, and those men that take it learn very quickly that they are about as popular as a beauty pageant at a leper colony.
7. To grasp the extent of the madness that is affirmative action is to understand how absurd it is to push women, for whom being provided for is a birthright, into jobs that they don't even care for, while denying men, for whom not providing is not an option, the work-rights and opportunities that are so important to self-respect and identity.
8. When applied properly, game can work because it enables a man to harness the immaturity of women for his own ends. The immaturity attributable to women not having to take responsibility for the choices they make is the immaturity that makes them predictable, predisposing them to the impulses of their rationality hamster. Game is important insofar as it enables a man to see through women's flightiness/insecurity and cues the appropriate responses that enable him to harness it. Roissy's compelling street-smarts are diminished when he invokes EP to try to explain it all.
9. Children first learn from their mommas what's important. And children take that learnin into adulthood and into culture. That's why child-abuse, that other dimension of domestic violence that everybody conveniently overlooks, is so important to us. Women are the primary abusers of children and so it follows that children first learn violence from their primary nurturer. You would think that this is a fairly important observation. But from MRAs? Nothing. Barely a peep. But the truth is that there is no need for MRAs to become defensive whenever the domestic violence fairytale (man as thug) is bandied about in the media. Whether or not women perpetrate domestic violence at the same rates that men do is irrelevant to the vastly simpler fact that adults get most of their learnin about the things that matter from their childhood, back when their primary nurturer laid down the rules of what is and is not permissible. That's why the genes-as-cause fiction is so harmful to our cause. It ain't in the fucking genes.
10. Ever heard of the schizophrenogenic mother? Or what about Thomas Szasz's Myth of mental illness? There exists a confluence of compelling ideas that need to be re-examined with the debunking of political correctness. Political correctness has informed the contemporary debate on schizophrenogenic mothers, dismissing the phenomenon as having no basis in scientific fact. No surprises there. Heaven forbid, holding mothers accountable for anything at all, let alone the schizophrenia of their children. Here is a tongue-in-cheek site that provides 32 reasons why the schizophrenogenic mother concept is incorrect.

11. To understand the relationship between culture and personality is to understand the relationship between options and their impact on the choices that people make. It is to understand the ever-shifting laws of supply and demand, and how these relate to the motivations, conceptualizations and narratives that do the rounds within the context of culture and personality:
    - Our contraceptive technologies provided the spark for the sexual revolution, to lay the foundations for a new reality such that the purpose of sex with respect to procreation has been superseded by its purpose as a commodity or leisure activity, something that can be traded and marketed. And thus we can lay the blame for the latest gimmick doing the rounds, the slutwalks, at the feet of the contraceptive pill;
    - US Constitution, in its original form, provided the framework for options that made American freedoms possible and sustainable, to cultivate an American can-do attitude that inspired confidence;
    - Affirmative action and the other insidious revisions taking place in our zeitgeist represent a fundamental attack on the principles of the US Constitution and the options that Americans have enjoyed since the Founding Fathers. The new, starker reality is reflected in an increasing pessimism, men's soaring suicide rates and an economy going down the gurgler;

Explaining everything in terms of genetics sheds no light whatsoever on how these dynamics play out. Genocentrism is a whitewash that asserts, "What's there to explain? It's all in the genes, you dummy." Which of course, it isn't.

Do we see where I'm taking this? It's about choice, not genes. It's about making choices from the environment that we find ourselves in, and defining reality according to these subjective terms. Genocentrism dismisses that idea, confining it to a straight-jacket of irrelevance. But the truth is that we provide a much more forceful, compelling argument by taking genes out of the equation, rather than deferring to the assumption that it's all in the genes. Dexter's argument dismissing "equality" as a pipedream is much more compelling without having to bring genes into it.

Men can never enjoy women's babying privileges. These are forever denied to most men. The pussy-pass is slapped on pretty much every woman, whether she likes it or not, from the moment of her birth and most are likely to carry it with them, flashing it at every opportunity, to the day they die. That's why women have moral imperatives that are very different to those of men. No such pussy-pass is granted to men, and that's why men develop the skills and abilities that make men more competitive. Men are constantly being tested in the competition for survival. If you baby a human throughout his/her life, male or female, then he/she never stops being a baby. It ain't in the genes. If you mother a boy throughout his childhood and teens, then he becomes a momma's boy. It ain't in the fucking genes. Get it?

YOU WILL KNOW IT WHEN YOU SEE IT

Isaac Newton provided the world with a brilliant yet simple paradigm to which our technologies bear testament. We see it and we know it. No such thing exists in the mainstream life sciences. In the mainstream life sciences, there is no equivalent to Isaac Newton's mechanics that we can look to and say, "yup, I get it."

A scientist devoting six years of his life to studying locust legs needs to get a life. He needs to get out more, lest he become a hospitalized autistic. He needs to seek a broader picture that synthesizes ideas from across different disciplines into a single framework of axioms that hang together. The answers to life's purpose are to be found neither in a locust's leg, nor in any genetic blueprint that might account for it.

Feminists and liberals have already had a go at this systemic stuff. But when they began to suspect that these ideas were detrimental to their cause because no other theory was available that could so compellingly hold women to account, they began to abandon it. Or so it seems to me, anyways. Beyond autistic academics discussing the merits of these theories, the lefties have become silent for the most part. We may notice in my list of examples an absence of references to the leftist culture-gurus in fields such as linguistics (e.g., Ralph Nader, Margaret Mead). There is no reason whatsoever why fields such as linguistics or anthropology should remain the preserve of liberals.

The defensive knee-jerk reaction of MRAs to criticism of EP is misplaced. I used to be a proponent of EP, and I recognize that there is some good stuff there. But it's got too much baggage invested in genocentrism. Either divest that baggage or formulate a new paradigm. Let us take up where the liberals have left off.

In his very recent post, Was Jesus a mangina?, Paul Elam unwittingly enters into this very culture debate, because the question of what Jesus was strikes at the heart of the nature/nurture debate and the importance of culture. Paul is right. Jesus was not a mangina. He couldn't have been, because everything about his attitude and personality suggests a man who has risen beyond his culture. In all his narratives, Jesus was alluding to culture, in the sense of a collective good, except that in his time, the notion of culture was not properly articulated.

Jesus represented something that was from beyond the unquestioning complicity of earthly culture and its dumb, materialistic values. Jesus had as little to do with trumpet-blowing cherubs, Satan in fire and brimstone, or harp-strumming angels on fluffy white clouds as feminism has to do with justice, reason, or commonsense.

CONCLUSION

By focusing on this idea of genes as cause, we lose sight of how our lives are shaped by events. We lose sight of the fact that our lives and our identities are about learning and making choices from culture. We lose sight of the relationship between individual personality and cultural personality, individual personality and cultural heaven and hell, individual personality and cultural karma and nirvana. The reality is that we take our cues from our environment – every organism does – and for humans, that environment is culture. And every organism changes in accordance with what it learns through experience. These are not complex ideas and they are not new, though they represent a radical departure from the established contemporary paradigm ordained within the Church of Scientism.

It is impossible to appreciate how dumb our cultures are until we accept this shift in perspective.

Cultures are wholes. What is happening in one section of a culture reflects what is happening in another. Can we really trust the science of a culture that not only entertains a phenomenon as comprehensively idiotic as feminism, but also allows it to infect our politics and the legal system? Would you trust a thief with your wallet? Would you trust a pedophile with your child? There is no reason why we should place our trust in anything emanating from the Idiotsphere. Indeed, we have a duty to question every last thing about it.

Criminal Manages to Father 22 Children Despite Spending Most of Life Behind Bars

Donald Holmes, a Seattle-area career criminal and sex offender, is facing involuntary commitment at a sex predator facility at the end of his most recent sentence.

The 65-year-old former sailor has spent over 40 years behind bars for various offenses, including child rape and check kiting. He is suspected to have engaged in pimping underage girls he would pick up from local schools.

Holmes has boasted of impregnating a mother and daughter simultaneously, and has received cash from women on a number of occasions.

One might think that his history and reputation would have slowed him down, but on the contrary it appears that women loved him all the more. Fathering 22 children is not easy even without spending so much time incarcerated, so one can only assume that his criminality had absolutely no ill effect on his success with women. In fact, it may have enhanced his love life.

Here again, we see that being a good man has nothing to do with one's success with women, and often is an impediment. One of the big lies of feminism is that women will shower affection on well-behaved men, and have no desire for the low-life thugs of society. Sadly, this is not the case.

Perhaps the most important message we can get out there to young men is that there is little connection between what turns women on and what is objectively good for society. It may be the most crippling myth of the Victorian era that women in general have utterly pure hearts and desires. Deep down, they are every bit the animals that men are. Which is not to say that they aren't human, but that their flaws are no less than our own.

Custody Bias Reveals Hypocrisy of Equality Feminists

We often hear feminists – particularly of the male studies variety – speaking of "toxic masculinity," and how we must redefine masculinity to save society. Aside from the fact that the world is a better, safer and more humane place than it ever has been (largely due to the sacrifices of men) which renders this argument somewhat odd, there is precious little work being done on the part of these feminists to actually reward men who take on nontraditional roles.

The biggest and most important role, of course, is childrearing. This also happens to be a role that many men, taking into account the vast amount of custody litigation, clearly want. Additionally, given higher male unemployment, you'd think a lot of men could be doing more for society by helping raise their children rather than piling up child support arrears.

However, as much as you'll hear feminists whining about how they have to do all the work raising kids, as soon as a father asks for more time with his children he's immediately fingered as a bum who just doesn't want to fork over the child support.

This one issue – parenting – is the most important of all when it comes to relationships between men and women. In fact, it is the very reason men and women have relationships in the first place. Recognizing men's equal role as parents would do more to promote equality between the sexes than anything else, but when it comes to who gets the kids after divorce or separation, feminists either wholeheartedly support mother custody or remain silent. I can't think of one single prominent feminist who has promoted equal parenting, despite the fact that most of them claim to be all for equality in everything else.

Now, for the most part these feminists would say "it's in the best interests of the child," but they don't really care all that much about children. If they did, why would they reflexively support late term abortion of viable infants, which is legally recognized as murder in most states? Why do they throw their support behind child murderers such as Andrea Yates? No, it isn't that they are worried about the children — it's because it gives women the upper hand. And this is because men tend to care a a great deal about their children.

Gloria Steinem once wisely remarked that the most important thing for feminists to control was reproduction, and although she didn't put it in such explicit terms, this is because having complete control over childbearing and childrearing allows them to hold the most valuable hostages of all — our children.

There is plenty of research indicating that children with present fathers have far better prospects in life, and that biological fathers are less likely than any other caregivers, including mothers, to injure their children (some feminists include boyfriends and stepfathers as "fathers," thus distorting the data), and children who grow up with single fathers tend to do better than those growing up with single mothers. And, of course, ideally both parents participate in raising children, but it's pretty clear that a child's biological father is rarely a risk to his children, and far more likely to exert protective influence.

If feminists really want to force men to do their share of domestic work, there would be no better means of accomplishing that than mandating shared parenting. While I have my kids over, I do the equivalent of a ten hour day every day they are with me. Housework with the kids around is about 500% harder than without them, and that may be an underestimate. You have to do a couple loads of dishes a day, do a wash a day, pick up after them, drive them around, cook, shop, etc. It is real, honest work.

So why don't the Michael Kimmels and Gloria Steinems of the world, if they really care about equality, support equal parenting after divorce? Why do they focus on penal re-education for men, support odd, aberrant and useless things like transsexualism (i.e. castration), and focus on haranguing the relatively few men left in higher ed?

It's because they don't really care about equality. They are hypocrites. What they want is power for themselves and their confederates. Kimmel wants to sell books and keep his department “relevant.” Steinem has faded from public view, presumably to enjoy an inheritance from David Bale. As much of a disaster as feminism has been for most of us, it’s been a great perk for many privileged men and women alike. Given that it’s been so useful for certain people, why ever would they want to pursue effective solutions when maintaining a high level of conflict between men and women has been so profitable to them?

Schwarzenegger Fathered Child Behind Feminist Wife's Back

Schwarzenegger's fruitful dalliance with a "household staffer" some ten years ago is just coming to light, and it looks as though his marriage is done for. According to the LA Times, the "staffer" (apparently now a euphemism for concubine) was still sticking by her story that her then-husband fathered the child as of Monday. When confronted with Schwarzenegger's admission of paternity, she declined to comment.

The LA Times has unhelpfully and unnecessarily refrained from naming the staffer in question "to protect [her] privacy." Why an adulteress deserves such protection is a good question; it takes two to tango after all.

This particular staffer was probably only one out of many women Schwarzenegger slept with over the years. She likely was fully aware that he could get her pregnant, and despite being married went along with the sex anyway, possibly as a calculated move. According to a source, Schwarzenegger provided her with cash "from the beginning," and kept her employed until he stepped down as governor.

Now, the question is who spilled the beans? Was it the then-husband? Did he grow suspicious and test for paternity? If so, it would be very interesting to see whether the staffer was collecting child support from both Schwarzenegger AND her ex-husband. Wouldn't surprise me, but it's probably just as likely that the man was paid off — not to do so would be quite a risk to take for a politician. Of course, the staffer would have held all the cards, so that decision would have been up to her.

These kinds of cases demonstrate how sticky things have become since the traditional concept of legitimacy was essentially abandoned some time ago. For unmarried women and adulteresses this has been a blessing, but for wives and adulterous men it is often a serious problem. The solution, of course, is paternity testing at birth, which will obviate both the old and interim systems.

Ordinarily, I sympathize with women who have been betrayed by their husbands. Elizabeth Edwards comes to mind, as does the wife of that pathetic SC governor Mark Sanford. However, Maria Shriver is a committed feminist who has celebrated the victory of women over men, writing A Woman's Nation Changes Everything, a typical triumphalist feminist screed.

Here's an excerpt from her conclusion:

> As we move into this phase we're calling a woman's nation, women can turn their pivotal role as wage-earners, as consumers, as bosses, as opinion-shapers, as co-equal partners in whatever we do into a potent force for change. Emergent economic power gives women a new seat at the table — at the head of the table.

You see, the irony in all this is that Shriver probably really believed she was in charge and in control. Perhaps she acted that way. And what did it take to bring her down off her high horse? Why, just another woman. Probably a younger, prettier one. This is feminists' achilles heel — there's always a woman willing to leverage her sexuality to shove an aging feminist out of the way and claim the resources of the man supporting her. And paradoxically, feminists have given young women carte blanche to do so. I am increasingly entertaining the notion that feminism will begin to die as soon as the youngest feminist cohort begins to age out of the sexual marketplace. This should be all but accomplished within about ten years, as the last of the women born before 1980 hit 40.

Arnold's Babymomma — Arnold, We Hardly Knew Ye...

Arnold's staffer, Mildred Patricia Baena, has published pictures of herself and her son by Arnold (yeah, the kid's his) on Myspace, and it really has to make a guy wonder what the hell the movie star was thinking. The only thing I can think of that might explain it is that Mildred Baena provided some emotional support that Maria Shriver, as an American woman trained to maintain an adversarial relationship with men, was incapable of providing.

This has echoes of the scandal concerning SC gov. Mark Sanford, who fell in love with an Argentine woman (who was much, much hotter than Mildred), and wrecked his family. Perhaps there is actually something to be said for the emotional basis for affairs, even where men are concerned, because I certainly can't think of any other explanation in this case. Foreign women generally provide a much higher level of emotional support than American women, and I can see how a powerful man could come to rely on that.

This will be humiliating for Arnold and Maria both. Human frailty is magnified by power, and here we are watching a high profile train wreck.

The Spatula

By Izzey

I cannot look at one sometimes, without the memories of a year in my childhood. A tool used for flipping burgers or turning an omelet; a weapon of choice for discipline by a woman our mother entrusted her children to.

Our house had an unfortunate fire.

I was seven years old.

“Mommy, wake up, wake up! The house is on fire!”

I will never forget those words or the look of disbelief on our mother’s face, as she sprung into wide-awake action within seconds of my little brother and I announcing this fateful news. My sister Cheryl was downstairs in the living room crying with her long curly locks singed off. It was five a.m. and our mother who worked two jobs to support the four of us, was asleep for only three hours before we exploded into her bedroom.

The fire started in the kitchen. It would turn out to be an electrical fire surging through walls within minutes. The house was an old one. A house my father walked away from, for a different life. We were on our own here, with a mother that not only did not hate our father; loved her children more than her own life.

The smell of smoke was overwhelming.

“Where’s Debbie?” she asked, not waiting for an answer. She could hear Cheryl crying at the bottom of the stairs so she knew where she was, yelling for her to stay put. She had Charlie in her arms, me by the hand, and was already running down the hall to Debbie’s bedroom door.

“Debbie, get up, we have to get out of the house” my mother said calmly- while aggressively pulling her out of bed. She had no time to react with my mother leading us down the stairs. We got to the bottom of the stairs, and she grabbed Cheryl by the hand, not able to address her screams or the sight of her hair that had been singed off. She shoved us out the door scooping up the car keys by the entrance, and then literally threw us all in the car. The car was on the side of the house that was burning. She would tell us later the reason she put all of us in the car and drove the car away from the house was because the car was what took her to work. (Save the children and the means to feed them) My mother was the rock of our lives, and the smartest woman on the planet.

One half of our house burned to the ground. The fireman came and saved my puppy in the kitchen before it was completely engulfed in flames. We found out my sister Cheryl was awoken by my brother, who had smelled the smoke. The kitchen had a door that was pulled closed by the vacuum of the fire, but was not a tightly sealed door. The back-draft that occurred when my sister opened it blew a flash-fire that singed her hair and eyebrows off, miraculously sparing her of a severely burned face and body.

We were alive but now homeless, with nothing but our pajamas on. My sister Cheryl was checked for injuries and burns…but not before the neighbors pointed and made fun, from the safety of their front stoops. My beautiful mother’s newly separated status; not popular with the ever-so-insecure dowdy housewives, that thought she might be ‘after’ any one of their husbands.

We stayed in a motel for a few weeks, with friends and family helping with clothing and food. Our mother went to work every day and night that she could arrange a babysitter, but it was too expensive to keep us in the motel and pay for a babysitter. She had to come up with another idea soon or we would be homeless and broke. A co-worker/friend suggested that she could care for us for a minimal amount of money, as long as my mother provided the food for us. She couldn’t work anymore because of some health issues; which her obesity complicated.

She lived in a huge house with her two children that were close to our ages. She was widowed just two years prior to our dilemma, and my mother considered her to be a friend. Marianne was always overweight, but after her husband died her weight soared at an alarming rate, and we would find out later what an issue that was… her entire life.

My mother saw this as a temporary solution for all. She did not want us split up, and since Marianne lived near one of her jobs she could check on us often. She would sleep at my Nana's house, because she would be sleeping there only. My older sister Debbie would have the watchful eye of Nana, and all would be well until our house was rebuilt.

Or so she thought.

Our first day at Marianne's house was wonderful. It was filled with excitement and laughter. We reveled in our newfound sleeping space and yard to play in. Marianne had enough rooms for us to sleep comfortably, and she even had bunk beds. We settled into our new digs happier than we'd been in weeks. The first night in a bed by myself, I slept like a rock.

The rapid clattering of a spoon inside of a metal pot; woke us up.

"Everyone out of bed NOW!" she yelled while rapidly banging that pot, which reminded me of a homemade New Year's Eve noisemaker; only much louder and accompanied by an angry voice. We all ran towards the noise not knowing what was going on. "Who went into the freezer last night, and ate ice-cream sandwiches?" she demanded. I had never seen her look like this. Her housedress was unkempt from the night before, sporting spills of food or drink on the front of it. Her dark short wavy hair, looked like she was pulling it out or something. She was wild looking, as were her eyes; fixed in an angry stare at each of us, one by one.

I almost peed my pants. I looked over to her children, and they were practically standing at attention. I didn't know what to do, so I said, "I didn't have any ice-cream last night." As soon as I said it, I had a feeling I should not have spoken. What came next would confirm that…"Who told you to talk? Did I give you permission to speak?" she said, in-my-face yelling. "I thought you wanted someone to answer you" I said, ready for tears I was so scared.

She did it so fast; I felt it before I saw it.

The stinging burn on the side of my left thigh made me fall back into my brother Charlie, who was hiding behind me this whole time…scared to death. Charlie was only four years old. He was the last one born after three sisters came first. He was the baby, and we tried to watch out for him. I wasn't doing a great job at the moment; as I had fallen right on top of him screaming. "What did I do, why did you do that?" I asked crying, while rubbing the side of my stinging leg. "I did not give you permission to speak, and if you speak again, I will give you more of this" and pulled it back out from behind her back; a metal spatula. The kind of spatula they made in those days; a heavy-metal square one that had a thick handle just as lethal as the flat-end that swatted me. It was the sixties, when kitchen tools were made so solid they doubled as gardening tools…

This one could have plowed the back forty…without a blemish to its finish.

"Now get up." She said. And I did that quickly, pulling my brother up with me; both of us crying. "I want to know who ate two ice-cream sandwiches out of my freezer, and until the child that did it tells me, you will all stand here at attention…without food, water, or bathroom. That's the way it is done around here."

We were all quiet now. Standing at attention in the living room looking at each other with pleading eyes…hoping someone 'fessed up, so we could end this nightmare. I really had to go to the bathroom, and couldn't imagine the penalty for peeing your pants.

My sister Cheryl was holding my arm; pinching it almost. I was not paying attention to her at all. I knew she was right next to me but I never really looked at her. She was now pinching my arm for real, trying to get me to notice that she had indeed, wet her pants. I noticed it too late; the wild woman saw it first, and just before I was able to jump in front of my sister, the spatula whizzed right by me hitting my sister on the back as she was trying to turn around and run. A loud squeal came from my sister who was trying to stay behind me, holding on for dear life. We were less than a year apart, but she was so much frailer than I. Plus she had her hair burned off… and I wanted to protect her with everything in my power.

“You can’t hit us, we aren’t your children” I said, as grown up as I could at the time. “Oh no? Who’s going to take you in, while your mother works to get your house back…do you want to go to a home for poor people? Do you want your mother to go away and leave you here with me forever because you are bad children? You will do what I say and live by my rules, or you can live in the street…do you want that?” she asked, but no one answered her; we just nodded “no” shaking our heads back and forth.

Back to the ice-cream we were; with no answers in sight. Marianne left us to use the bathroom herself leaving an opportunity for us to talk to each other. “Did you eat her ice cream?” I asked my brother, who probably couldn‘t even reach the freezer to begin with. “No, I didn’t…. not me, uh-uh.” He said, shaking his head. “What about you, Ann-Marie, Michael… did you?” I asked them like I was much older than my seven years. “Nope, neither one of us did…we know better.” She said, also shaking her head. I believed her, because of that woman. She would scare me into being the perfect child. That left only one of us; poor Cheryl Ann. She knew I was about to ask her and told me in a whisper-like voice, “I did it. I was so hungry when I went to bed. I got back up and ate them…am I gonna’ get hit again? Please don’t let her hit me, please Lisa.” She looked ready to cry again, and I hushed her telling her not to worry. She hadn’t eaten any of her dinner last night. She was a fussy nervous eater. The only one in the family. She hated vegetables, all of them. She would eat corn, but there was none of that. We had liver, mash potatoes, peas and carrots. Everything Cheryl hated.

Marianne came back from the bathroom and we were all hushed-quiet. She looked at every one of us, one-by-one again, and asked;” Okay, who ate my ice-cream?” She had a smirk on her face, like she knew she’d already won this round. “I did” I said, and braced myself for that cast-iron fly swatter to come at me again. It didn’t, and we were told to go to our rooms; she would call us when breakfast was ready–telling me to stay behind.

“Lisa, I knew it wasn’t you. Your love for your sister is to be admired. But that doesn’t mean you got away with anything, it just means I will watch more closely from now on. Your mother and I had a long conversation before you came here. She gave me free reign on the discipline. Maybe you’re not old enough to see it yet, but you are all really bad children. I will make you all good children again, you’ll see.”

I could not believe our mother said she could hit us.

She sent me to the room with the others and proceeded to make pancakes, like nothing happened. I was scared for us now. I was wondering how our mother who never hit us, could let this woman do it. I hated it here already…and we would be here for a couple of months, at least. She also warned me if I told our mother anything about her method of discipline, it would just get worse. There would be nothing to say anyway, if we behaved at all times.

Tell that to three children under the age of seven whose house had just burned down, and now had the devil incarnate as their full-time babysitter.

I will fast-forward to the “spatula game”

This game took place, when the beatings did not. We had managed to be good enough to get away with only a few beatings for things we didn’t think were so bad, like accidentally throwing a dodge ball into a rose bush; breaking off two roses. Two of us took a spatula for that… myself, one of them. She hit us in places not visible to our mother, because our mother didn’t see us undressed at night at that time. The rest of the world didn’t either, so she would not be found out by “accident.” She held emotional blackmail over our heads, like we knew better than to ruin our own lives by telling on her. She played a love/hate mind game…especially with food. The spatula game was a simple idea: beat her to the candy without getting hit…you get to keep the candy.

We would be in a bedroom kneeled around a bed. She would put candy in the middle of the bed. We had to have our hands flat in front of us on the bed at all times. We were kind of in a circle all spaced out around a square bed. She was at the head of the bed, with us spread out on both sides. The idea must have come to her when we were being too good, because she seemed to really enjoy this game. It took us a while to get good at it, but one of us inevitably got swatted on the hands really hard before the night was over.

We had to try to quickly grab the candy from the center of the bed, one person at a time. She swatted that bed so hard sometimes, just missing our hands…surely taking a finger or two had she made contact. We got to keep the candy we grabbed…our reward for being faster than she.

One day, she was in really bad shape. She would binge-eat like an alcoholic on a bender. She hated herself the most when she did this. We got the spatula the most, when she did this. This one day, was the worst I had ever seen. She was crying a lot and yelling at everyone. We tried to stay out of her way; unsuccessfully.

My brother was running through the house, coming in from outside. She just lost it, right then and there. She picked up the spatula and whipped him hard with it. He was screaming, and she just kept whipping him on his legs and ass. I couldn't get there fast enough….he really got hurt. I was outside running in, as fast as my feet would carry me. I got in there, and just lunged at this obese creature that was hurting my brother. I took the spatula from her, and hit her with it….I couldn't stop hitting her…and her weight kept her from running.

That would be the last day she'd ever hit any of us. I told her I would kill her the next time she raised her spatula again." Just try me" I said…all of seven years old; and shaking from my newfound strength. She called our mother and told her she couldn't watch us too much longer; her health was failing and she had to make fast arrangements to settle us elsewhere.

Our house was almost ready. We moved back home within the week. Life was good again. We had our mother and our home back. We shared a united front for our mother's sake for a very long time.

Marianne beat her children until they took them away from her.

They were raised by her brother, who gave them college educations.

Marianne died alone.

Slate France Defends Decision to Publish Alleged Strauss-Khan Victim's Name

W.F. Price · 20 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Coming under fire from American (and probably European) feminists – dedicated enemies of free speech – Slate.fr felt it necessary to defend its decision to name rape accuser Nafissatou Diallo, the 32-year-old divorced Muslim woman who claims to have been attacked by former IMF chief Dominique Strauss-Khan.

I've argued against anonymity for both accusers and accused in rape cases, because transparency and justice go hand in hand, and Slate France makes a compelling case for the benefit of the alleged victim. In fact, the more I learn about Ms. Diallo, the worse things look for Mr. Strauss-Khan. Initially, I was pretty skeptical, and of course guilt cannot be established without a trial, but the situation appears grim for Strauss-Khan at the moment. Leaving aside the fact that he fled in a hurry and was snatched off a plane right before takeoff (never looks good in court), more and more examples of alleged boorish behavior on his part have been coming to light.

Our resident French commenter Nico, who would know a lot more about this character than most of us, writes:

> …I believe the accusations against DSK are probably sincere and describe what really happened. The man has already used manipulation and physical strength to try to get sex. Although he chickened out before comitting rape, he went far beyond what most men would deem acceptable.

> When Tristane Banon accused him of rape attempt on French TV and described a real fight on the ground, DSK trying to take off her shirt, he didn't even care to sue her for diffamation, even though most french politicians spend a lot of time and money to sue adversaries for trifles. The mother of Tristane, who is a politician too and knows DSK on a personal level told the press that DSK admitted he went too far and regretted his behaviour.
> More stories are coming out suggesting that he was abusive with women, even with prostitutes who were paid to please him. So much so that they refused to return with him.

Prior allegations aside, if the press is honest about the victim and she turns out to be unimpeachable, unconnected to Strauss-Khan's rivals, and a woman who is willing to face her accuser, it won't be good for DSK. No accusation made in private and behind an impenetrable feminist wall of secrecy can have anywhere near the power of one made in the open, and with full disclosure. A woman who has nothing to hide is a woman who is far easier to believe.

According to Slate, Ms. Diallo came to the US with her husband, a Guinean trader, and daughter in 1998, after which she divorced at some point. Since then she has been raising her daughter, and for the last three years working for the Sofitel hotel chain.

Here's what a family spokesman has to say about her (feel free to correct me if I bungled the translation — my French is pretty rusty):

> "She is a good Muslim. She is really quite good-looking, like many Peul women [her ethnic group], but in our culture we don't accept this kind of aggressive behavior. Frankly, Dominique Strauss-Khan went after the wrong woman! This incident is scandalous and truly sad."

Her cousin, Mamadou Chérif Diallo, when asked whether she's been used for political purposes, responded:

> «Non, non, non! Les gens doivent comprendre qu'ici, on vit dans le communautarisme et que Nafissatou vit dans sa communauté, les Peuls de Guinée, et qu'elle ne s'intéresse pas à la politique. Elle n'a pas le droit de vote aux États-Unis et ne participe même pas à nos associations politiques guinéennes.»
> "No, no no! What people have to understand is that here, we live in a tight community, Nafissatou lives in her community, the Guinean Peuls, and she doesn't have any interest in politics. She doesn't have the right to vote in the US, nor does she involve herself in any of our Guinean political associations."

I'm sure this isn't the entire story, but from what I'm reading here, DSK is looking more and more like a straight-up asshole. If I didn't know a thing about Ms. Diallo, I can say with certainty I'd feel a lot more sympathetic toward DSK and skeptical of the accuser. Of course, I make no judgment concerning DSK's guilt — the point I am making is that anonymity for the accuser does NOT help make a case.

In their defense, Slate editors answer questions about why they chose to name the accuser, writing, among other things, that answering questions about the woman who accused DSK would protect her against rumors, conspiracy theories and character assassination. Furthermore, her surname is evidently very common throughout West Africa, comparable to an American name such as "Jane Smith," and the editors write that they wouldn't have used it if it were particularly rare [this last one is kind of a lousy excuse, and looks wishy-washy].

Personally, I think Slate France did exactly the right thing. Justice should happen in the open, and, it seems, the women who are the least ashamed about making a public accusation are generally the ones who are least likely to be lying through their teeth.

Now we'll see how this story plays out in court. As of today, Dominique Strauss-Khan is innocent until proven guilty in a court of law, as it should be. And, Nafissatou Diallo will publicly give evidence as state's witness without any legal privacy shield. For the sake of honest people everywhere, this is how it should remain, and the caterwauling of feminists to the contrary should go entirely unheeded.

How to Argue with Feminists: Use Facts, True or Not

By RI Canuck

Arguing with a feminist or any other type of woman is an exercise in frustration, because women feel. Rationality does not work. The subject will be changed. She is never at fault, and if she is it is because of something a man did. Do not try to use logic or rationality, the only thing that can sway them is their feelings. They are the more empathetic sex, don't you know. When a man has to say that he is the boss, he is not. When women say they are empathetic, they are not. They are also herd animals, it is important to show their independence by doing the same things and feeling the same things as their girlfriends. They are not bad or evil, they are just women.

So to argue with a feminist, do not use persuasion, do not try to rationally change their minds, do not share your own feelings, remain confident, cool, collected, and never show hurt or anger. I know that those who are discovering the truth will find the last part very difficult.

The following is an attempt to provide a script to dissuade women from following feminism, and to shake their confidence in revealed slogans. It may be re-used without attribution for those who so wish. Your comments for improvement are welcome. Those who wish to create additional scripts are encouraged to do so:

> I am supportive of feminism. Feminism since the late sixties and early seventies, has achieved momentous accomplishments and social changes. Women are in control of their reproductive rights and have freedom of choice. Women are no longer expected to stay in the kitchen and churn out babies. Women can pursue higher education to reach their full capacities and achieve fulfillment. Women have broken into the man's work world and exercise power in the corporate and government world.
> Don't you agree that the achievements and social revolution wrought be feminism can never be overturned? That society will never return to the male breadwinner and stay-at-home housewife model of the 50's?
> Yes, you agree?
> Good.
> Now we can tell the truth about feminism, because it can't be undone.
> During the fifties a generation and a half of women who struggled during the great depression, manned the factories during World War II while the men were overseas, were the first time able to have their own homes, and their own kitchens. A lot of men discovered that many of these women separated from their extended female kin were incompetent to be left unsupervised in the home and kitchen.
> What were men to do?
> The need was to get women out of the home where they had the potential to destroy a man's wealth accumulation. The solution was to convince the incompetent women that they were unfulfilled and missing out on the exciting lives that men had. So there was a mass exodus of women into the work force in search of fulfillment. The fact that so many career women continue to complain about being unfulfilled, but if they just work more outside the home they will be fulfilled, indicates that women easily deceive themselves.
> For us in the patriarchy, our houses and kitchens are safe, now that they are free of incompetent women.
> Now about 'pro-choice'. Do you think we allowed abortion on demand to give you freedom? We encouraged it, because we are very particular about what type of birth canal we want our sons to come from.
> Do you think these slut-walks are empowering? We planned them, as a means to let the unworthy women show themselves.
> Now that it is too late to turn back the clock, we men can tell the truth. Feminists are but putty in the paws of the patriarchy.

The State of The Working Class

I took a break for the last couple days, something I haven't done for a long time, and capped it off with a night with a childhood friend out in one of the working-class suburbs of Seattle. My friend works in construction, and things obviously haven't been all that great in that industry for a while. It's taken a toll on him, and I do worry a bit about that.

I met up with him at a small get together with some of his other friends and coworkers, and although they are essentially the same healthy, strong young men you would have seen in years past, they are much diminished compared to those of my father's and grandfathers' generation. There is no sense of mastery, self-assuredness or even belonging. Jobs are scarce and tenuous, and despite the fact that they are surrounded by oversized houses and cars, one gets the sense that they are living on leftovers from the recently vanished prosperity of the last couple decades. They don't really own anything, and the women around them are the ones with the steady jobs with benefits and potential.

For all the talk about the "patriarchy" and "male privilege," I just didn't see any hint of that at all. It's a big lie. The only reason women enjoy their company is that these are attractive, strong and decent men — the kind that make women happy simply by their physical presence and masculine energy. But that only goes so far. People get old and lose these things. If things don't change, in time, these strong young men are going to be poor old men.

I suppose one can only hope that the young men who are getting the worst of it today start to get angry about this state of affairs and work for change. The aging hipsters – those punker wannabes who still have romantic notions of fighting "the man" – are never going to do anything but rub their faces in the mud. It is one of the tragedies of American activism since the 60s that the most self-righteous of all almost universally stomp on those who are too young and naive to defend themselves. American leftism, which used to be about defending the common man, has degenerated into moral grandstanding and self-aggrandizement.

Although I could say it's depressing to think about these things, just spending a night with the guys and seeing their presence actually gives me some hope. The young ones have the hope and and open honesty that is the root of social vitality. Beneath layer upon layer of bureaucracy and control, there is a living, breathing virility that will have its day.

As for the women, it even seemed that they had some faith in that as well, and are looking forward to that day, too.

Maria Shriver has hired notorious divorce lawyer Laura Wasser to handle her pending divorce from the movie star and former governor. The Schwarzenegger fortune is estimated to be in the hundreds of millions, and could result in one of the most costly divorces in history, which would provide a bonanza to California's family law attorneys.

Although the Schwarzenegger divorce is an outlier due to the vast sums of money involved, it still provides some insight into the shady realm of family law, which employs an army of attorneys. In our society, attorneys are a necessity, and not always an evil one, but it's time people began to question not only the moral, but practical aspects of an industry that feeds on family strife.

I have friends who are lawyers, and they are quite open about the fact that their jobs do not create wealth. Of course, this doesn't mean that they don't provide an important service; one could think of attorneys as the grease in the machine that keeps it from seizing up. However, the political influence of the legal industry is, more often than not, directed toward promoting self-serving legislation and policy. This is to be expected, but due to certain characteristics of the American political system attorneys have a huge advantage in promoting themselves over, say, farmers or manufacturers. It has often struck me as odd that Americans tend to reflexively assume that "Big Oil" runs the country when the number of politicians involved in the oil industry at some point is dwarfed by the number who have participated in the legal industry. In fact, there's a better case to be made for big law running the country, and at least oil enhances productivity…

There's little doubt that family law attorneys play a big part in eating away at household wealth in the US, and serve to concentrate wealth in the hands of the few. Given the costs of divorce and custody litigation, it's also fair to say that many of these attorneys are growing fat at the expense of children.

Unsurprisingly, feminist policy has proven to be a great boon to the family law industry, which raises the question of whether attorneys and their lobbying groups ever really believed in it in the first place, or whether it was simply used as a means to slide money into their pockets. For example, providing incentives to women to divorce makes great business sense if it initiates divorce. Creating abusive, inflexible child-support guidelines and draconian DV policies also works in attorneys' favor, because men who refuse to hire them almost always get taken for a ride or railroaded. Winner-takes-all custody policy is yet another example. The list goes on…

Is this a coincidence, or simply some unforeseen side-effect of feminism? Of course it is neither. It is quite clearly a result of unchecked greed. If you really want to find who is pushing this or that policy, follow the money.

Kay's Man-child Revisited

Jack Donovan · 23 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Kay Hymowitz's piece for the Wall Street Journal, titled "Where Have The Good Men Gone?" drew a lot of criticism from men and women alike. It's old news now, but I just got around to reading her book Manning Up: How the Rise of Women Has Turned Men into Boys.
With either help or direction from her publishers, Hymowitz baited readers with a yellow op-ed, insulting cover art and a goading thesis. At least Micheal Kimmel deigned to call his frat-boy scapegoats "guys." Hymowitz refers to those guys as "child-men" and the book cover shows a baby dressed as a man. It was a sensationalistic and trashy move, but we live in a sensationalistic, trashy culture.

The real problem is that this belittling pitch detracted from the more measured — and often sympathetic — tone of the book itself.

Hymowitz knows that the 20-something, Gen-Y guys she is talking about aren't children. Her argument is that they are stuck in an extended adolescence — what she calls "preadulthood" — that was a necessary byproduct of the knowledge economy.

My paternal grandfather never graduated from high school. He went straight to work. After spending WWII in the Navy, he ended up working for the Pennsylvania Railroad, and stayed on there until he retired.

Jobs like that are few and far between these days. Kids raised in the 80s, 90s and aughts were raised to go to college and "find themselves" in some fulfilling career, working with their heads instead of their backs. The stable lunch pail jobs were often outsourced, and replaced with job growth in more creative, exciting jobs.

These jobs require education and many offer no linear career path, so if young people want to be "fulfilled" by their careers, they often have to put off getting married and having children. This is true of males and females alike, and while Hymowitz makes much of the "New Girl Order," she acknowledges that those successful girls are also stuck in a kind of pre-adulthood, too. However, they hear their biological clocks ticking, and they are up against a pressure to get things underway that simply isn't as pressing for males.

Hymowitz overplays the size and importance of the creative class — while those jobs abound in major metropolitan areas (like New York — Hymowitz lives in Brooklyn), there are too many aspiring graphic designers, web designers, script writers and photographers everywhere else. She also seems to inhabit a mental world where everyone went to Brown or Wesleyan or some posh east coast school, and one wonders if she is writing about the sexes in America, or just Sex in the City.

She is correct, though, that the knowledge and service economies demanded skills which matched female tendencies. Hymowitz concedes that whether nature or nurture is to blame — she's not sure herself — "manufacturing's loss has been women's gain" She also notes that while males aged 13-34 have eluded marketers, young females buy a lot of stuff, and it made sense for employers to look for women to help them create designs and promotions that appealed to their target demographics. This is easy enough to verify. I've noted for years that design seems to be getting "cuter" and virtually all of the new businesses in a neighborhood near to me were created by and for women. My favorite is "branch and birdie : retail catering to the modern home, woman and child." (Notice who is missing…) She writes of the "Bridget Jones economy":

> "the uncomfortable truth is that youthful female careerism is closely intertwined with the growth of consumption for two reasons. First, working women make and spend a lot of money. Second, women can find satisfying (passion-filled?) careers centered around the sorts of products on which women like to spend money."

Refreshingly, the author doesn't blame the ad agencies or the media for pandering to women or to her child-men; she understands that most successful marketing trends exploit an existing demand.

When it comes to feminist heroes and doctrine, Hymowitz is not afraid to criticize Betty Friedan, who she portrays as being a bit spoiled and delusional, or Micheal Kimmel. She dismisses Kimmel's tired 1970s neo-Marxist race and gender "entitlement" narrative tidily:

> "The college-educated inhabitants of Kimmel's Guyland never knew a world where women weren't lawyers and managers or where slayers named Buffy didn't take care of the vampires."

Indeed, Hymowitz is a lot more sympathetic to the plight of young men than Kimmel. She acknowledges that there are demographic, economic, technological, cultural and hormonal reasons why young men haven't "evolved" into "postfeminist mensches." Despite the fact that she hysterically called Roissy an "evil" misogynist, she recognizes that the guys who she calls "Darwinians" have "the preponderance of evidence in their corner." Males and females, according to Hymowitz, have biological clocks running at different speeds, and due to feminism, technology and changes in the economy, males and females alike have little motivation to marry early or produce a population-sustaining brood.
Hymowitz matches Kimmel's bitterness, sublimated envy and ideological blindness with a schoolmarmish, obsessive horror of crude boyish humor — which is I imagine how she justifies the "child-man" moniker. But when she's not wagging her finger or harrumphing about Maxim or Adam Sandler movies, she seems to understand that our society has made it clear that men are expendable as fathers and even in the workplace — so they sometimes act accordingly.

Hymowitz believes that most men want families, albeit after the age when women want them, and she says that men will have to "man up" if they want to have those families. This feels like an afterthought, because while she spends the entire book outlining the problems young men and women face she offers no solutions whatsoever. She admits that the modern young man is "free as men have never been free before," but gives no suggestions as to changes that could be made to encourage men to invest in families and careers before they've had their fill of beer and sluts.

Perhaps she realizes the kind of changes that would be necessary, and doesn't dare.

The Birth of Fatherhood

By Max Stirner

Since my last article about Dr. Wilhelm Reich the psychiatrist, ex-communist and dedicated rainmaker, the Marxist dream of a matriachial society has been occupying my thoughts a lot lately. The dislike of patriarchy represents a common part of a liberal world view. Although Reich distanced himself from Marxist doctrine in his later years after emigrating to the US, he always had a soft spot for women. After resigning from revolutionary politics, he writes about the human notion to look out for a scapegoat in other social groups and calls the communist movement a red version of fascism.

Still the tendency to associate men or patriarchy with the existence of evil on earth and to believe in a ancient golden age of matriarchy prevails in Neo-Reichian circles. In his book "Sarahasia" James deMeo, another orgone scientist, blames desertification of planet earth for turning a peaceful matrist humanity into a bunch of violent patrist tribes 6000 years ago.

But let us take a short look at the beginnings of the communist movement in the 19th century. Here we find an important work of Karl Marx's closest friend Friedrich Engels, published in 1884, called "The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State" . Here, Engels tries to show that humanity developed out of communist matrilinear tribes into an evil capitalist patriarchy. Engels wanted to find an alternative to a a society where people could become enslaved and impoverished, but while attacking division of labor, money as a medium of exchange and private property, he is practically criticizing every development that led humanity from barbarism into civilization. Should it be a mere coincidence that "tribal communism" ended after the iron age? Is it a coincidence that the monogamous family and the state came into existence at the same time, as humanity was making its biggest cultural, technical and economical progress?

In this book Engels, at least between the lines, provides us with a sexual perspective for a future communist society, in which the compulsory monogamous chains of our capitalist society will be broken. Or at least, he gives us the impression that the social development from a matrilinear communist society into patriarchal monogamy was a big mistake. Or, to put it in another way: Engels thought that civilization was a bad idea from the start, a sentiment we can nowadays find in feminist literature. Engels himself sounds pretty much like a contemporary feminist author, seeing women and men as enemies in a historical class struggle. Still the weakest point of the Marxist/feminist critique of the so called "patriarchy" is its economic naivety and blindness towards female sexual preferences that provide the groundwork for a hierarchical society. It comes to my mind that Roissy the infamous pick up artist used to subsume the connection between matriarchy and poverty with the picture of a primitive mud hut with a roof of palm leaves.

Speaking of palm leaves, I would like to take a closer look now at a primitive society that, until the beginnings of the 20th century, was organized in matrilinear tribes, the people of the Trobriand Islands east of Papua New Guinea. Renowned ethnologist Bronislav Malinovski got stranded for several years on the Trobriand Islands during the first world war. He gained extensive knowledge of the social structures of these savage tribes. One of his books "The Sexual Life of Savages in North Western Melanesia" made a big impression on Dr. Reich who saw two of his main theses explained: that sexual suppression of children and sexual starvation was the cause of most mental disorders in patriarchal societies and that compulsive monogamy was the result of cross cousin marriage, and indirectly of male greed. As I am getting bored by simplistic answers for complex problems, I have read Malinovskis book about the sex life of the Trobriand tribes. For the the readers of The Spearhead I will shed a light on the life of men and women in matrilinear tribes. I hope that in doing so we will come to the conclusion matriliniarity does not have to go along with an egalitarian society. Second, I want to point out that it was to a great part the fact of biological fatherhood and its economic interference with matrilineage that put an end to the matrilinear societies.

That humanity in ancient times was partially organized in matrilinear clans has been documented by Lewis Morgan, who already thought in terms of a historical class struggle between men and women. It is a bold assumption that mankind before reaching a certain intellectual level and understanding of nature had no idea of female conception. At least, for the tribes of the Trobriand Islands, the idea that sex led to pregnancy was a very alien concept. In their world view women just gave birth to babies. Keeping that in mind, it is easily understood how matrilinear clans could have evolved on earth on the first place.

If sex and pregnancy are not connected, men cannot contribute to the birth of a child, and therefore the only "biological" connection in a clan is the female blood line. This blood concept has dramatic consequences for society as whole, economics, sexual taboos and marriage restrictions. It comes as a surprise that marriage on the Trobriand Islands is a well established institution, though the idea of the biological fatherhood is nonexistent. The word "father" has therefore only a social meaning. It is the man married to the mother. The man who builds the house, in which the family lives. Sometimes he is called "tomakawa" – a stranger – because he comes from an alien clan. For a better understanding, we should not speak of "fathers" in matrilinear tribes, and only call them husbands or "social dads". On the Trobriand islands, marriage is patrilocal. That means that a wife moves into the village and the house of her husband. For the kids another male figure plays an important role: the mother-brother. "Mother-brother" is not just another word for uncle, but in a matrilinear clan, the uncle(s) are responsible for the economic well-being of their sister(s), because they share the same matrilinear blood line. Only the "mother-brother", as a caretaker of the clan's wealth and can inherit wealth and status, therefore kids grow up with two male figures – the social dad and the mother-brother. And on the other hand a man has two roles, he is a "social dad" for the "kids of his wife" and a male authority for his matrilinear clan – his sisters and the kids of his sisters. The problems that arise from this split role for males in matrilinear clans will be discussed later on. The assumption that in matrilinear societies, men play a more feminine role than in a "patriarchy", must be refuted, at least what we know from Malinowki's studies. The social dad is in theory the authority at home, but male and female responsibilities are more or less evenly distributed. Trobriand men for example hate to cook, and only do so when making a trip to other islands or while going out hunting. Calling someone "a cook" is considered an insult. There are serveral rituals that are reserved for one sex only. Getting water is a typical female dominion. On the other side taking care of babies is a typical male duty, which may function as a replacement for the lack of biological fatherhood. Second, this male duty is the reason why the children of his wife are obliged to take care of him, when he is old. Children of single mothers without a social dad are regarded as "unhappy". Single-motherhood is generally regarded as a bad thing. In the household, wife and husband have their own belongings. Women usually have 12-20 bask skirts for different occasions, make-up, and the ritual water bottles. Men own weapons, tools, and jewelery and drums for dancing. Immobile goods like farming land, trees, houses, boats and life stock belong to men, or generally speaking it belongs to the clan. Sexual activity starts at an early age, but is not tolerated in the family hut. The sexual activity evolves from a chaotic intercourse during infancy into stable relationships during puberty.

An important institution for stabilizing relationships in the Trobriand village is the "bukumatula" the Bachelors' house, a place where teenage couples move in before getting married. The bukumatula belongs to a group of boys and has a scarce interior which in Malinowskis opinion obviously "lacks the female touch". A Bachelors' house is usually inhabited by 3-4 couples and in a typical Trobriand village about 15 to 20 of these huts can be found. If one of these unmarried couples separate, it is always the woman who moves out – into another bachelor hut to her new lover.

Though sexuality before marriage is not regulated, it comes as a surprise that adultery after marriage is not socially tolerated at all. While the institution of marriage itself is not a necessity to legalize a sexual relationship, it is socially required in order to get accepted as a full member of society. Beside of the handicapped, mentally retarded, albinos and old widowers all adult men are married. Malinowski points out that another important motivational factor for marriage comes from economic reasons. It is the clan of the woman who has to support the new husband. Especially for the chief of a village taking a wife from a rich clan with many brothers is a must. By the way – on the Trobriand Islands every village has a chief, who is always male and lives – as you might have already guessed- in polygamy, a privilege that is reserved for chiefs only. For women the financial gain of a marriage is not that important as for men because they are already being supported by the men of her matrilinear bloodline. Only a man not being afraid of poverty will woo for a girl with several sisters and only one brother. A social-dad is supported by the clan of his wife in several ways. They help him with the construction of his house, or his boats, join him on the hunt, or help him against magical attacks or real enemies.

If a man wants to marry a woman he has to seek the allowance from the bride's social dad and also her mother-brother as a representative of her clan. As in every other society envy and adultery are the most severe burdens for a marriage. Adultery is met with the same social disrespect as in prewar Europe, but when it comes down to fidelity the Trobrianders are no better than any other society. If a woman commits adultery with another man, it is not rare that she will get a beating by her husband, or that in a dispute the husband will smash her water pots. Likewise, women often destroy the belongings of their husbands as revenge for infidelity.

Divorce is not a rare thing on the Trobriand islands and it is more likely that women vote for divorce than men, because they have less to lose. The formalities concerning divorce are simple. The wife leaves her husband's house, takes her belongings with her and moves into her mother's or her sister's hut. She will take the kids with her — they don't have a biological father anyway. If she is young enough she will start a love affair or two and move into one of the Bachelors' houses.

There are several rituals that can be considered a replacement for the lack of biological fatherhood. If a man dies, his widow is obliged to follow a very strict mourning ceremony for several months, including cannibalism of parts of the corpse. Real responsibility for the well-being of a man can only be expected form his own matrilinear tribe. This might explain why the strict mourning ceremonies are supervised by the husband's clan. Another fatherhood ersatz can be found in the idea that the love a social-dad gives to "his" children will make these children look like him.

Malinowski couldn't answer the question why few children were born out of wedlock, while sexual intercourse normally started long before marriage. Either frequent sexual activity with changing partners prevents conception – an unlikely phenomenon – or the herbal "magic" of the natives was better than Malinowski expected. Sex was not permitted before marriage for all young Trobrianderss. Children designated for a cross-cousin marriage were kept under strict supervision and excluded from going on love trips to other villages or moving to the Bachelors' houses. A married man with a niece at the age of his own son, by enforcing the marriage of both children, had the chance to pass his wealth (the wealth of his matrilinear clan) on to his own biological son. He could accomplish this, because as a mother-brother he had the authority over his niece. This is the meaning of the cross-cousin marriage.

Dr. Reich dedicated a whole book to the cross-cousin marriage and its significance for the sexual suppression in patriarchal societies. In his opinion the sexual suppression of these children served to stabilize the arranged marriage and glue the young couple together. He points out that it was the cross-cousin marriage that made the transformation of matrilinear clans to monogamous patriarchy possible. Between the lines we can read two smears on men here: first, men were responsible for sexual suppression, and second the motive was – greed. (Keep in mind that Marxism knows at least two deadly sins: greed and egoism). Friedrich Engels plays a similar tune "In family, private property and the state" though he puts more emphasis on the clash of clan and state organization. It comes as a surprise to me that both authors ignore the most significant trigger for the end of the matrilinear clans: the fact of biological fatherhood and its interference with matrilinearity. Second, another issue that is consequently ignored by Reich, Engels et al.: the influence of female sexual preferences on the genetic structure of these clans.

The establishment of matrilineage and patrilineage came at the price of man's economic responsibility not only for a wife and his real biological children but also for children that were not his "own". Let us quote stone-age loving Engels himself:

> "With monogamous marriage, two constant social types, unknown hitherto, make their appearance on the scene – the wife's attendant lover and the cuckold husband. The husbands had won the victory over the wives, but the vanquished magnanimously provided the crown. Together with monogamous marriage and hetaerism, > adultery became an unavoidable social institution – denounced, severely penalized, but impossible to suppress. At best, the certain paternity of the children rested on moral conviction as before, and to solve the insoluble contradiction the Code Napoleon, Art- 312, decreed: “L’enfant confu pendant le marriage a pour pere le mari,” (the father of a child conceived during marriage is the husband). Such is the final result of three thousand years of monogamous marriage.”

Though we have to agree with Engels that the cuckold husband was nonexistent in former matrilinear clans – the children became the economic problem of the matrilinear clan, we can assume from Malinowskis studies: the attendant lover is always around the corner and – adultery is a phenomenon not at all limited to the so called “patriarchy”. Ignoring the fact of biological fatherhood does come with emotional advantages for men. Malinovsky cites the story of a Trobriand man who went on an expedition for one year and after returning home found his woman with a newborn baby. He was overwhelmed with joy.

I have never mentioned the term “matriarchy” and only talked about matrilinearity, because in my opinion feminist historians confuse female status with female power. Who cares if a clan has a female chief? Do female priests really matter? Did Queen Victoria stop the expansion of the British Empire?

The society of the Trobriand natives does not live outside of history. And it cannot be taken for granted that societies in ancient times resembled the matrilinear society structure of the Trobriand Islands. But still the ethnographic studies of Malinowski give us an insight into the problems that arise from matrilinearity. Given the paucity of historical evidence of ancient social structures, ethnographic studies leave less room for speculation than anthropology itself. What more is still left from the ancient past of humanity, than some rocks, cave paintings, smashed water pots and spearheads?

There is still no proof that an advanced civilization can exist without patriarchy.

The popular discourse has divided feminism into “waves,” the first of which is the suffrage movement, the second the feminism that accompanied 1960s Marxist liberation movements, and the third the consolidation of the American cultural revolution. So we could see the first wave as setting the stage for female political power, which led directly to the second wave of actively striving for that power, and finally the third of exercising it. Thus, the first was largely a moralistic appeal, reminiscent of the propaganda and agitation that usually precedes revolutions, the second a more ascetic, combative effort, and the third the implementation of the revolutionary program and the expression of feminism’s nature. It is interesting to see how the different waves each had their own distinct character despite all sharing the same fundamental goal: the establishment of institutional female political power.

Finally, we have arrived at a point where victory has been achieved, and there really isn’t any farther to go. Sure, feminists will argue that there are still many decades of struggle ahead, but the reality is that any further gains would eventually come at the expense of women, because structural necessities for feminism, such as maintaining a police state and economic viability, are already taxed to the limit.

So, whither feminism now?

Let’s start by looking at the last wave of feminism — the third wave. Third wave feminists came to prominence in the 1990s as the younger cohort that was educated under the old revolutionaries of the 1960s and 1970s – many ideologically lesbian – who viewed the feminist effort in warlike terms. Unlike their mentors, they never faced real sex discrimination in school or at work, and they had already had the opportunity to benefit substantially from policies that started to come into force in the 1980s, when the affirmative action began to be implemented on a wide scale.

Third wave feminists were women who slid effortlessly into institutions, and began to surpass men academically by the 1990s. Their vanguard would be over 40 years old today (e.g. Elizabeth Wurtzel), and many of them are already in positions of considerable power, having jobs in entertainment, law, medicine, politics and writing. They are most overrepresented, perhaps, in cultural pursuits, such as journalism, opinion, marketing, etc.

In practice, they differed from the second wave by exercising power through sexuality; where the second wave frequently dismissed the notion that men had any utility at all, third wavers embraced sex as long it was on their terms. One could see the second wavers as having adopted the self-sacrificial, ascetic ideology common to militants/revolutionaries, and the third a pragmatic, self-interested approach more common to administrators.

Because the third wave corresponds with what is known as “Generation X,” the youngest are currently in their early 30s. Sure, there are a few academic hangers on who are younger, just as there were still kids calling themselves “hippies” into the 1990s, but these are the exception rather than the rule — there is a fairly clear demarcation between third wave feminists and women in their 20s today. In short, the third wave is getting kind of old.

Now that the third wave has aged out of activist mode, what has come about to replace it? Evidently, very little. As far as I can tell, young women could care less about feminism, and are simply living life as they please. There is no doubt that they are enjoying many of the benefits feminists fought for, such as higher pay than men of the same age, better education and career prospects than men in general, and a very strong legal advantage over any male partner they may choose to cohabit with, but they don’t have the fire in their belly that would lead to any renewed activism. Rather than vigilant, they are complacent; they are characterized more by sass and entitlement than ambition and a will to power.

Will this change? Probably not. There is no indication that some new generation of women will rise up and utterly subdue and conquer men, setting up some militant matriarchy of the sort envisioned by the more radical second wave feminists.

So, from today's perspective, it looks as though 20th century feminism has almost run its course, and there will be no more "waves" in the foreseeable future. As for what the implications of this are, one can only speculate, but I imagine there will be a slow movement toward legal equality and away from the current model of female supremacism, which will accompany a return to a more normal family model as the advantages women can currently accrue from promiscuity and divorce begin to fade away.

Rather than defeat through some spectacular clash, feminism will likely slowly fade away, until it is remembered only by old, single women whose one remaining glory is the memory of their vanished youth.

It's Time to Acknowledge Notable Women in American History

Keoni Galt · 25 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I think it's high time that the men of The Spearhead, offer a conciliatory gesture of peace towards the female gender on teh interwebz.

There's been too much anger towards the fairer sex 'round these parts as of late, and it's time we MAN UP and give some props to notable females in US History, many of whom deserve recognition for their lifetime achievements. For this article, I wish to focus on those women who were successful entrepreneurs, property owners and businesswomen in the 19th century.

One such noteworthy lady is the woman pictured at the top of this piece, Madam CJ Walker.

> Like most Americans, Sarah suffered from scalp diseases and hair loses. She resolutely wanted to find a cure and started experimenting with home remedies. She found that that application of sulfur can heal most of the hair problems cure which led her to produce her own shampoo and hair ointments which soon after she began selling. She traveled to various states demonstrated he products and even attempted door to door sales. As her popularity grew she established her factory at Indianapolis in 1910 and also started Lelia College to train beauty therapists. She was loved and respected because of her philanthropic contributions for education, childcare, rehabilitation programs and her unflinching efforts to improve living conditions of black women. She gave speeches on political and economic problems at major occasions and she was widely appreciated for her opinions and stands.She breathed her last on May 25th 1919 due to complications from hypertension at an age of 52. Her daughter Lelia stepped into the shoes of her mother and became the proprietor of an million dollar empire that she had left behind. Madam CJ Walker Biography till date provides inspiration to millions of impoverished women striving to curve a respectable life for themselves.

A million dollar empire in 1919 was approximately $13 million in today's Fiat Federal Reserve Notes. And not only was she a member of the oppressed womynz gender, but she was also an African-American to boot! According to oft repeated memes by today's feminists, that's impossible!

Or what about Margaret Borland?

> Margaret married at age 19 and gave birth to a daughter a year later. Soon afterwards her husband died in a gun battle in the streets of Victoria. Margaret's second husband succumbed to cholera in 1852, leaving her with > two more young daughters to support. Within four years Margaret married the richest rancher in the county. She bore four more children and partnered in running the ranch until 1867, when a yellow fever epidemic spread along the Texas coast. Margaret ministered to her ailing family as best she could, but death relentlessly claimed her husband, four-year-old son, 15-year-old daughter, two daughters who had married the previous year, and an infant grandson.

> Now sole owner of the ranch, Margaret capably managed operations and enlarged its holdings. In 1873 she drove her own herd up the Chisholm Trail, accompanied by several ranch hands, her three surviving children, and her six-year-old granddaughter. The group succeeded in reaching the booming cowtown of Wichita, Kansas, but Margaret fell ill with "trail fever" and died in a local boardinghouse before she could sell her cattle.
> Margaret Borland's life parallels the momentous social, political, and economic changes of 19th century Texas. She was earnest and resourceful until the end.

Now how did she get away with being the "…sole owner of the ranch," and "capably managed operations and enlarged its holdings." in the time before the suffrage movement?

What about Mary Ann Hall? (No picture available)

> In 1840, a stagnant canal drained through the center of Washington, dividing the area where the Smithsonian Castle stands from the rest of the city. The area was called "The Island." A few blocks to the east is where Mary Ann Hall settled, started a business, saved her money, and where she eventually built a large, three-story brick home. Mary Ann was just in her early twenties, and the neighborhood was–rough. Nearby neighborhoods were nicknamed "Louse Alley," and even "Murderer's Row." While the census records show that most single women here listed their occupation as seamstress or laundress, Mary Ann's occupation isn't recorded anywhere. But all the physical evidence indicates she was an extremely successful businesswoman.
> District of Columbia court records show that at the time of her death, Mary Ann Hall was worth a grand total of $87,000, with no debts–that's well over $2,000,000 in today's dollars. The records also show a list of her belongings, which included Belgian carpets, oil paintings, an ice box, numerous pieces of red plush furniture, as well as an inordinate number of sheets, mattresses, blankets, feather pillows and comforters.

Hmmmm….so not only could own property, they could actually do so back in 1840 without ever being married, but simply through their own entrepreneurial efforts? You don't say?

Here's another notable woman from America's oppressive Patriarchal past, Lydia Pinkham

> Some would call her the Ann Landers or Dr. Ruth of the 1800s. In 1875, Lydia Estes Pinkham of Lynn, Massachusetts, converted her herbal home remedies into a big business by skillfully marketing her products toward women and educating them about health issues. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound became one of the best-known patent medicines of the 19th century. Pinkham was deemed a crusader for women's health in an > age when women's needs weren't being met by the medical community. Cooper Laboratories bought the company in 1968, though pills and a liquid stamped with Pinkham's name are still available at some drugstores.

How about another "impossible" woman from US history?

Elizabeth Arden

> She brought makeup from the stage to everyday life and slowly developed a global empire. Elizabeth Arden, born Florence Nightingale Graham in Woodbridge, Ontario, moved to New York at the age of 30 to pursue her dream of building a cosmetics corporation. There she began working with a chemist to create a beauty cream, something new for the cosmetics industry at that time. After traveling to Paris in 1912, Arden became the first person to introduce the concept of eye makeup to American women and offered the first makeovers in her 5th Avenue salon. Arden died in 1966, but her brand became as well-known across the U.S. as Singer sewing machines and Coca-Cola. At the end of its fiscal year in June 2007, the company reported $1.1 billion in net sales, up more than 18 percent from $955 million in 2006.

Now here we have 5 notable women from the pages of American history, deserving of genuine acknowledgment for their achievements as business owners, property owners and entrepreneurs. Somehow, this actual history of such women is often ignored or glossed over when your average 21st century indoctrinated feminist-sheeple casually repeats the meme: "women couldn't own property!"

For example:

The History Behind the Equal Rights Amendment

> The new Constitution's promised rights were fully enjoyed only by certain white males. Women were treated according to social tradition and English common law and were denied most legal rights. In general they could not vote, own property, keep their own wages, or even have custody of their children.

Or here: "Years ago women couldn't vote or own property."

Or here. "For years, the social scene at Harvard mimicked the gender norms of an era where women couldn't own property."

Or here: "In 1848, women obeyed men everywhere, even in their own homes. Women couldn't own property either."

Or here: "In the past, American women did not have the same rights as men. They couldn't own property. They couldn't attend the same colleges. And they couldn't vote."

Or here: "I mean, sure, women couldn't own property or vote or practice law or anything, but I bet they'd trade that for having doors held open for them regularly anytime!"

Or here: "For a long time, women couldn't own property*, have jobs, or participate in politics."*

Or here: "This week I am co-chairing an event for the American Civil Liberties Union in my hometown. It's going to be a wondrous evening full of amazing art and talented people. The ACLU will always need funding to continue their work protecting all of our civil liberties. I don't work in those trenches every day, but I am thankful for those that do. Every issue women face – every obstacle they overcome – was and is a civil liberties issue. It wasn't very long ago that women couldn't vote, that women couldn't own property and that women had very little control over their bodies and its intended freedoms."

Or here: "When women couldn't own property*, vote, or be in most professions, someone could have (and many did) made the case that simply allowing divorce for women in abusive marriages wouldn't automatically make things all rosy for them."*

Or here: "until the 1920's, women couldn't VOTE, in most US states women couldn't OWN PROPERTY*, and often wasn't even the one paid for her labor – no, her husband, father, brother, son, or other male was paid because women WERE NOT CONSIDERED PEOPLE."*

Or here: "Oh, and the older I get, the more I remind myself and respect how much old-school feminists have accomplished. To see young women utterly unable to understand that women couldn't own property or vote or get credit cards or bank accounts in their own names is a beautiful thing."

Or how about this Barne's & Noble book review regarding Abigail Adams?: "In a time when women couldn't own property or manage their own money, Abigail was accruing enormous wealth through speculation on government bonds."

Or this statement: "Education Secretary Fiona Hyslop said: 'Without the suffragists and suffragettes, we would still be stuck in an age when women couldn't own property*, they couldn't hold public positions and they couldn't vote.'"*

Or here's another example of the casual way the meme is regularly regurgitated: "Consider the country's state at the Founding — only landowners could vote. Women couldn't own property."

Or how about while presenting a list of the top 10 richest Women in America in 2011: "There was a time in American history, that seems not that long ago, where women couldn't own property or even vote. However, times have changed. Women have been elevated to a status where their names can make this list as well as the ten richest people in America."

All the preceding quotations where taken from a quick google search of the phrase "Women couldn't own property." They represent statements from articles, blog posts, book reviews and anonymous commentary.

Funny isn't it, how the meme that "woman couldn't own property" has become a widely accepted truth by most denizens of our Brave New World Order, and is expressed as a universally accepted statement of fact over teh interwebz?

I guess the Womynz Studies and liberal/progressive Professors in Universities across the land forgot to ~~indoctrinate~~ educate their students about all the wonderful success stories of notable Women in American history who owned property, ran businesses and amassed personal wealth through their own ingenuity and hard work. I guess their stories contradict the feminist's revision of history, so I these ladies will never get there just due in today's ~~brainwashing facilities~~ institutions of higher learning.

How ironic is it that it takes a hateful, bitter misogynist here at this infamous outpost of womyn hatred, to correct this gross injustice, and white knight for these courageous and brave ladies of the past who've been ignored and marginalized by the feminist zeitgeist for too long?

It’s time to put them back up on their pedestals where they belong!

A Man Is a Rape-Supporter If....

By Hadamard

We have all heard the old feminist saying "All men are rapists" at some point in our lives. This quote first appeared in "The Women's Room" by Marilyn French and is spoken by a fictional character in the book. The statement was picked up by feminists of the time and led to many notable quotes such as "Heterosexual intercourse is the pure, formalized expression of contempt for women's bodies. " by Andrea Dworkin, and "I claim that rape exists any time sexual intercourse occurs when it has not been initiated by the woman, out of her own genuine affection and desire. " by Robin Morgan.

Eventually the feminists realized that making bold statements like "All men are rapists" would be their Achilles Heal and they distanced themselves from it. Recently I saw a new incarnation of this old feminist idea in the form of a radical feminist blog post listing the behaviors that indicate that a man supports rape.

This contradictory list includes enough normal male behavior to ensure that virtually all men fall into the category of rape supporter. So maybe not all men are rapists, but we apparently all support our raping brethren. Here is an abbreviated list of some of the more ridiculous items on her blog:

> A man is a rape-supporter if…
> * He has gone to a strip club.
> * He is anti-abortion.
> * He is pro-"choice" because he believes abortion access will make women more sexually available.
> * He watches pornography in which women are depicted.
> * He watches any pornography in which sexual acts are depicted as a struggle for power or domination, regardless of whether women are present.
> * He characterizes the self-sexualizing behavior of some women, such as wearing make-up or high heels, as evidence of women's desire to "get" a man.
> * He expresses enjoyment of movies/musicals/TV shows/plays in which women are sexually demeaned or presented as sexual objects
> * He supports sexual "liberation" and claims women would have more sex with (more) men if society did not "inhibit" them.
> * He ever subordinates the interests of women in a given population to the interests of the men in that population, or proceeds in discussions as if the interests of the women are the same as the interests of the men.
> * He argues that people (or just "men") have sexual "needs."
> * He discusses the "types" of women he finds sexually appealing and/or attempts to demean women by telling them he does not find them sexually appealing.

So now we as men are supporters of rape if we are pro-life or pro-choice, if we enjoy watching sexy women in movies and TV or if we don't find all women sexually appealing, if we think women are dressing up to attract us or if we encourage women be sexually liberated. We as men are also supporters of rape if we can't get any, give up and turn to (non-rape) alternatives such as strip clubs and porn. Is it even possible for a man to not fall into this feminist definition of rape supporter? No, and that is the point. Radical feminists believe that all men are either rapists or supporters of rape (aka potential rapists). They believe there is nothing men can do to escape their natural evil behavior of raping or helping others to rape.

My favorite part is when she states a man is a rape supporter if he discusses what type of women he finds sexually appealing. She is saying that a man shouldn't have a preference when it comes to how a woman looks, I guess he should just wait for a feminist to assign him a woman to serve and provide for regardless of her looks or weight but should not expect anything in return (like sex) because otherwise he would be a rape supporter.

It is no longer possible for feminists to state that all men are rapists or even that all men support rapists without receiving significant backlash in the mainstream media and giving MRA material to attack them with. So instead they make a 30 point list of all the behaviors that indicate a man supports rape such that every man violates at least on item on the list. Therefore allowing feminists to say all men support rape without actually saying "All men support rape. "

Awash in a Sea of False Allegations careyroberts · 26 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Washington has been buzzing over the case of Sean Lanigan, a P.E. teacher in suburban Virginia who was accused of sexual molesting a 12-year-old girl. The jury acquitted Lanigan in less than an hour, one juror reportedly weeping in sympathy with Lanigan for lack of evidence.

Much of the outrage centers around the actions of Nicole Christian, the lead detective who threatened to prosecute school staff for obstruction of justice when they gave her evidence pointing to Lanigan's innocence.

Innocence? Not in this cop's vocabulary.

Christian then refused to re-interview a key witness who knew the accusation was a lie and wanted to recant her story. Christian's declined the meeting because, in her words, "if she changes her story, they're [the jury] going to wonder why she changed her testimony."

Then she ordered an investigation of the witness's mother for alleged child abuse. How's that for bullying the witnesses and manipulating the investigation?

A year after a jury of his peers cleared him of all wrong-doing, the Fairfax County school district continues to treat Sean Lanigan like damaged goods, refusing to offer an apology or pay his legal bills.

And recall the case of Crystal Mangum, notorious accuser in the Duke lacrosse case. Four years ago North Carolina Attorney General Roy Cooper pronounced the three men innocent of all charges. Cooper then informed the stunned audience that he would not charge Mangum with perjury, floating the notion that "she may actually believe the many different stories that she has been telling."

Four years later, Mangum, still reveling in her socially protected status, plunged a kitchen knife into the chest of boyfriend Reginald Daye.

Domestic violence is another area where false allegations have become de rigeur. For years the abuse industry has anointed itself with sack-cloth and ashes, meeting with state legislators to expand definitions and lower standards of proof.

Now the system is a shambles. It's like a welfare system with no means testing – all you have to do is claim you're down on your luck and presto, you're in! Women who used to be known as Welfare Queens now go by the somewhat less regal moniker DV Fakers, according to a recent Village Voice expose.

Researcher Denise Hines of Clark University has studied the plight of men who have been emotionally and physically tormented by their wives. These men can't call the police because their partners threaten to accuse them of being the perpetrators of the violence. So the threat of a false accusation serves to trap these men in the nightmare of an endlessly abusive relationship.

There are many reasons for our current epidemic of false allegations. Prosecutors who wink at perjurers shoulder part of the blame. Casey Gwinn, a well-known San Diego prosecutor, has said:

"If we prosecuted everybody for perjury that gets on a witness stand and changes their story, everybody would go to jail…I would say it's in the thousands of people who take the witness stand and somewhat modify the truth."

But Gwinn misses the point. If prosecutors went after only one in 100 women who batter the truth, the resulting publicity would send an unmistakable message to the community at large.

One Colorado mother, her own son accused of rape by a bi-polar woman who couldn't offer a scrap of evidence of wrongdoing, recently penned this cri de coeur:

"The system has supported all women, even those who lie. They've made it easy for them. If it is proven that a woman has lied, they are not prosecuted. They are at most sent to counseling. And being a 'victim' can be intoxicating to some. It can let them off the hook for being responsible for their own actions."

Civil liberties' proponents aren't the only ones up in arms. Social conservatives wring their hands over the ensuing family break-down and fraying of the social fabric.

Fiscal conservatives take the analysis one step further, pointing out that children in single-parent households are far more likely to become beneficiaries of the welfare state. False allegations of domestic violence cost taxpayers $20 billion a year, thanks to swelling demand for welfare services and public benefits: http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/False-DV-Allegations-Cost-20-Billion

On June 2, a False Allegations Summit will be held in Washington DC, featuring testimonies by persons who have been falsely accused of abuse: http://www.saveservices.org/false-allegations-awareness-month/

I'm willing to bet there won't be an empty seat or a dry eye in the house.

Fewer Young Women Married than Ever

According to the NY Times, in only 25 years, the proportion of never-married young women has nearly doubled, leaving nearly half of all women from 25 to 29 unmarried.

In the meanwhile, divorce rates have eased, but this is clearly a result of the much lower marriage rate. In fact, the divorce numbers have only dropped a measly 5% since 1980, which suggests that marriage is an even worse bet today than it was when divorce rates were at their highest.

The NY Times article suggests that women are cooling to the idea of marriage, but the recent tsunami of articles disparaging young men for failing to “grow up” indicates that, in fact, it is young men’s reluctance to wed that is the deciding factor.

Girl Shoots Father with Bow for Cell Phone Impoundment

A 15-year-old Mason County Washington girl used a hunting bow to shoot her father after he took her cell phone in a disciplinary measure. The girl refused to allow her wounded father use of the phone to call for help, and then fled into the woods with a full quiver, whereupon she was surrounded by a SWAT team and arrested without further incident.

The girl was reportedly “despondent” when arrested, and is currently being held at a local children’s hospital pending clearance to be booked into a juvenile detention facility.

Marriage Counseling is Useless

There's a huge industry devoted to marital problems, and although many of the actors declare that they are dedicated to creating healthy families, the fact that they profit from their dissolution should tell us all we need to know. Marriage counseling is one of these industries that directly benefits from the destruction of the family, so even though some of its proponents may purport to support men, the exercise is a waste of time.

Let's face it: when your wife wants marriage counseling, your marriage is probably over. Men should simply accept that such a request is a red flag, and a clear sign that the marriage is doomed. If she isn't already cheating, she's been talking to her mother or an attorney, which means that the first suggestion of "counseling" is little more than a declaration of war. Women never come straight out and say "I'm about to destroy your life," but when she says "we need to see a counselor" that's about as clear as it gets. No other words besides "I'm not happy" should so obviously prompt men to prepare for the fight of their lives, so rather than spend his money on a counselor any man confronted with them should grab every spare bit of cash he can and find a good attorney.

As men, we have to remember that we are subject to immediate dispossession and possibly incarceration on the word of the women in our lives, so counseling is a very bad bet. In fact, a counselor may be required to testify in court on one's wife behalf, because anything said in confidence to a professional, and even one's medical records, will be handed over to a wife's attorney as a matter of common procedure. Men must understand that any professional is therefore a potential enemy. In fact, even your mother is suspect in this regard — she may well deep-six you in court out of loyalty to her sex or in the hope that it will give her access to the grandchildren.

The sad truth is that no professional who is not legally required to hold your every word in confidence can be trusted. That's not to mention laymen, of course, who should not be trusted much either, but at least if they are male they'll usually (but not always) avoid taking sides.

It is not men in our contemporary society who need counseling and coaching — we have a surfeit of programs dedicated to controlling men. No, it is women who would benefit from a dose of reality, because they simply don't have to face it under our laws. Everything about our society has been arranged to shield women from reality, so men, who have already faced the world and its horrors, simply don't need anyone to tell them how they should change.

If your wife or girlfriend ever suggests that you need counseling, the best practice is to listen patiently, say nothing, and make plans to eject her from your life.

You can talk to your priest, your lawyer and your dog, but never assume it's safe or useful to say anything to anyone else.

Comment of the Week: Why Men are not Marrying

[Editor: Commenter Tom Smith suggests that the reasons behind the decline in marriage are largely a result of economic circumstances - such as debt and the recession - that leave young men without the means to start families]

Many of you seem to think the lack of marriage in the young (25-29 year old men) is due to "footloose and fancy free" young women. Let me offer the two largest reasons for the lack of marriage (though not addressed by the article):

1) The lack of living wage jobs for Americans, particularly men. For a man to have a desire to get married, he must have a financial base. He understands that there will be financial expectations placed upon him by the woman. A man's expectations for himself in this situation means a) the purchase of an engagement ring; b)setting aside money to buy a house; and c) with an expectation that a child may be born, setting aside money to pay for the medical (and other related) expenses of the child.

In today's U.S. society, real wages have slipped- and by this I mean the entry level workers in the post-war generation made more in today's dollars than entry level workers do now. For people in the 25-29 generation, these are people with limited work experience, high educational debt, and particularly for men, unbelievably high unemployment. Most graduate work was funded for members of the post-war generation. This is certainly not the case today; students must incur massive ongoing debt to attend graduate school (as if the debt incurred in undergraduate school was not enough). And educational debt generally is non-dischargable debt in a bankruptcy — the only way to "beat it" is to die.

Marriage (the ring, the ceremony, and "setting up house") costs. And without money, why should a man take the chance?

2) Men's traditional values. While women may have "changed," men have not. Men realize that some women are for fucking (category 1) and some are for marrying (category 2). While the best place to meet a wife may be in high school or university, no man wants to marry a woman who he has seen "passed around" through all of his schoolmates (such is a category 1 woman). And men – and I happen to be one of them – are generally put off when a woman decides to have sex on the first date.

Women of the marrying sort (category 2) are much harder to find. While most men would like them to put out after a period of dating, if they "go to fast" the man will be equally put off (and put them into category 1).

Women in category 2 understand that a man wants to have his financial house in order before committing to marriage. This type of woman will not push the man in the marriage direction, and she will wait for the man as he gets things together before making such a serious commitment. Once married, she will be understanding if a man loses his job (a typical situation these days) and will be willing to financially support him. She will not withhold sex as a "punishment" but instead realizes that sex in a married relationship is something which is expected and freely given.

Accordingly, because most men of the 25-29 generation borrowed heavily for education (or were lay-offs from skilled trade work due to lack of seniority), they are "not ready" financially for marriage. Given the poor economy, many such men are living with their parents (albeit not willingly). They are working Mc-Jobs which barely gives them enough money to go on dates, much less move out of their parents' home.

Such a man has such a low level of self esteem that he lacks the ability to distinguish between either category of woman. For men who are in this age group and not working, they are ashamed and disillusioned. They cannot make a living, have to depend on their parents, and all they believed in (i.e. work hard, study hard, and get a living wage job) seems to be a big lie.

Men of this age group have two choices if they want to get on their feet and marry. Option 1 is to borrow heavily (again) to start a business, and invest nearly 3 years of sweat equity to make it work. Option 2 is to organize and pressure the politicians in Washington to get the economy back on its feet so men can return to living wage employment. With regard to Option 2, no one in Washington seems to give a damn.

Young Men Face Desultory Job Market, Few Prospects

Featured Guest · 27 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Chairman of the Texas Workforce Commission Tom Pauken, writing for the American Spectator, draws attention to the fact that 19% of young men are currently unemployed. Keep in mind that this figure does not include those who only have part-time jobs, have simply dropped out of the labor force for one reason or another or those currently in school.

Pauken outlines a few of the reasons young men are out of work in such staggering numbers:

> One reason that men's employment rate lags behind is that there has been negative growth in the types of jobs men historically have occupied. In the last 10 years, 5.5 million manufacturing jobs were lost. That's one-third of our manufacturing base in an industry where men make up 70 percent of the workforce. In construction, where 87 percent of positions are filled by men, more than 1.4 million jobs went away during that time frame. Approximately 4.4 million jobs have been added in the education and health care sectors, but women dominate this growing field as they make up 77 percent of the work force.

What is interesting about the above figures is that they clearly demonstrate that government policy and expenditure has strongly favored women in the "winner" industries of education and healthcare. However, it goes even farther:

> All levels of government now have special programs designed to make sure that women and minority-owned businesses receive preferences in landing government contracts.
> Pointing this out has long been off limits in polite company, but Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., recently broke the taboo. In an opinion piece published in the Wall Street Journal, he called for an end to the government's preferential treatment programs with the exception of those programs designed to assist African-Americans…

So male unemployment is largely by design — it is not simply a result of the "information economy" or some inevitable consequence of "progress."

This is something that the Kay Hymowitzes and Michael Kimmels of the world either can't see or – more likely – conveniently ignore when discussing the plight of young men today. High male unemployment is a direct result of preferences that have been in place for well over a generation now.

Nevertheless, one still hears feminists and their supporters blabbering on about male privilege, which is simply a chimera held up to divert attention from their own advantages.

What young men have to understand is that there are real people who are to blame for stacking the deck against them — it isn't the result of some irresistible force of nature or Act of God. The young are often politically naive, but in time they will begin to see the light. We can only hope that it isn't too late for them – or for justice – when they do.

Feminist Publishers: Force Men to Read Women's Lit

W.F. Price · 31 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, Esquire magazine published a list of "75 Books Men Should Read," earning the wrath of Atlantic writer Ujala Seghal for its failure to include more than one book written by a female author (Flannery O'Connor's A Good Man is Hard to Find).

Seghal writes:

> One. One! The only book written by a female on the list was A Good Man Is Hard to Find by Flannery O'Connor. No doubt, lists such as this are always imperfect. And based on the list's above-description, it appears a casually constructed bit of fun, rather than a definitive ranking for posterity. But while there is no reason to take offense to every slanted statistic one comes across, out of the 75 "greatest" books, just one by a woman? Not even Harper Lee's To Kill a Mockingbird?

Although I doubt these book lists motivate too many young men to pick up one of the titles on the list, it strikes me as rather mean-spirited of females in the publishing industry to denounce even ineffectual efforts to introduce men to literature. By all accounts, publishing has come to be dominated by women, and men are reading far fewer books than women these days. Given this state of affairs, you'd think that the women in the industry might be a bit gracious and let the boys pick and choose which titles interest them.

But of course that won't do, because feminists must find fault with any and everything men are involved in. Even as female professors assign and recommend books written by women – going so far as to teach classes dedicated to promoting solely female-authored literature – women in media outlets, publishing organizations and, of course, nonprofits, are denouncing one innocent little reading list cooked up at Esquire.

Joyland Publishers writes on their blog:

> This really does imply that men don't/can't/shouldn't read women and we were pretty sure that wasn't the case among readers. We were also sure that part of the editorial reason for making such a list this way was to generate a response, so here it is. Over Memorial Day weekend we asked Joyland readers, editors, and contributors to come up with a list of 75 Books By Women All Men Should Read. We received over 250 suggestions in two hours.

The implication is that men should be forced by political pressure to read female writers (sometimes these feminists come off as whiny, annoying girlfriends complaining that "he just won't listen to me!").

Now let's turn the tables and ask why, if college kids are so often forced to read terrible literature written by women (yes, assigned literature is overwhelmingly awful), there's anything wrong with suggesting that young men (Esquire's prime demographic), should read books written by men? You'd think it would be a good thing if got young men away from the HALO long enough to crack a book and gain some appreciation for the written word. However, it seems that complaining about men is a lot more important in the feminist universe than actually doing anything useful to help them.

Finally, is it even normal for young men to read female literature? How many women have written anything that appeals to a large proportion of post-adolescent boys? I'm trying to think, but all I can come up with off the top of my head is A Wrinkle in Time by Madeleine L'Engle and Frankenstein by Mary Shelley, neither of which is ideal. James Fenimore Cooper, Alexandre Dumas, Robert Louis Stevenson and Mark Twain, among others, capture the youthful masculine spirit in a far more compelling manner than any female author yet to reveal herself. And this isn't sexism, but rather the wisdom of experience. Transsexuals' claims notwithstanding, women just don't know what it is to be a man.

First Female General in IDF to Command HR Brigade

Despite widely-propagated myths about the Israeli Defense Forces' supposed gender equality, the Israelis have successfully staved off feminist demands for equality in its armed forces for far longer than most Western militaries. However, the pushiness of feminists knows no bounds, and even the Israelis are starting to feel the heat. So, in a move that demonstrates some ingenuity on the part of IDF conservatives, the IDF has created a Human Resources battalion, and then promoted a woman to general to lead an army of paper-pushing bureaucrats.

> …the recommendations of a committee headed by Maj. Gen. (res.) Yehuda Segev that the army itself appointed in 2008 – namely, to adopt a model of full equal opportunity for women – is being advanced only at the margins. The barrier stems from the same source: the high command's tendency to avoid clashes with the religious leadership, which it sees as having its hand on the tap from which high-quality personnel flows into combat units.
> Moreover, the exclusion of women from field units serves the interests of conservative forces within the army – including secular officers – who see the integration of women as a threat to the army's capabilities, as the religious rationale grants them a convenient legitimization.
> Under these circumstances, the question arises as to what exactly is intended by the appointment of a female major general to head the Human Resources Branch, of all things.

Israel, of course, needs a top-notch, effective military to maintain viability in the region. Its neighbors – including the tough, Shia Muslim warriors who comprise the fighting ranks of Hizbollah – have no moronic delusions about women's equality in the field, so the Jewish state must remain vigilant to secure its territorial integrity. Perhaps the specter of submission to Allah's fighting men, who certainly wouldn't brook much provocation from noisy, pushy and Godless women, has a quieting effect on Israeli feminists, but Israeli men should keep in mind that these types have a rather limited grasp of the concept of consequences, so I imagine keeping the feminists at bay will involve some struggle over the coming years.

Is Gaming Sapping our Vitality?

In this day and age, young males are blessed with a mind-boggling selection of entertainment. The past afforded little time for pursuits outside work, the main purpose being mainly survival: putting food on the table.

A unique bond exists between a man and his work. Labour has a special place in his psyche, because it unites different parts of his personality in order to achieve a singular goal. (look up flow and maslow's hierarchy). A sense of camaraderie and achievement is important to mind, body, and soul.

It is known that a few industries survive and thrive in economic droughts. The entertainment industry being one of them. This piece will focus on video-games. It is a unique industry to say the least. The lion's share of consumers being young-males in their teens, to players up to 30 years old and beyond. Unlike movies, it is a male majority market. This has always been the case, and will remain that way for some time.

Stepping outside the borders of the pop-culture wasteland, entertainment can be seen in two ways. 1) A yardstick to the economy and individual vs. aggregate choices of how people spend their time and money. 2) A revealing look into the zeitgeist and underlying social nuances. Both have something to say about us individually, and as a group.

Society is undergoing increasing feminisation and obvious misandry. This snowballing trend has been going on strong, with little sign of slowing down. Video games provide the primary form of escapism for men today. These games champion the male spirit in ways that the modern real world can't compete with. Although the categories differ, all games center on themes of violence, conquest, discovery, exploration, and achievement. Is it any wonder the industry is doing so well? In this digital world men are respected, they are rewarded, and above all: they are given a chance.

In the context of the MRM, there are two specific points to make about videogames: one subtle, the other obvious.

We can see the destruction wrought all around us in different forms. As such, young men have always occupied a high position on the feminazi hit list. The timeline of videogames shows just how much progress they made over the last decade. In reaction to the new feminized society, a digital world exists which young men call their own. But everything has a cost. Faint-hearted and deprived, young men overcompensate, and foster unrealistic fantasy caricatures of men and manliness. Over the years games have changed. Not that long ago, an explosion of WW2 games flooded the market. This offered men a glimpse to an age of bravery, fidelity, and no women. Crime-themed games were major sellers and recently have enjoyed a renaissance of sorts. The industry is now dominated by first-person shooters, most of them with grand and (sometimes grossly) unrealistic depictions of war. A casual trip to your local video game retailer will confirm this. As society became more and more feminised, men were forced deeper and deeper into the fantasy escapism of games. Real world camaraderie and accomplishment are replaced with bland substitutes. Meanwhile your connection to the real world is being severed day-in-and-day-out. The sheer repetitiveness of these games erodes your mind.

Despite this fact, the quality of the games is only part of the story (one can argue that the increase in computing power allowed for this, but I digress). Young men are consuming more and more time playing them. The same men who hold the destiny of the nation's future in their hands now hold wireless controllers instead.

Those who hear this may object by saying that it's just a natural response of a generation shunned by the economy and marginalized by the society at large. MGTOW, and proud of it.

However, take a step back for a moment. Even those who disagree with everything written here must admit a problem exists. How much precious time is wasted by the youth of our nation? How much mental and emotional energy is put into these binary-code illusions? How much money is given to those with no interest in our cause, profiting off of our demise? Men are going their own way, but it's the wrong way.

To the prime-aged and younger men reading this, now is the chance to rekindle the fires that have been left smoldering. Learn a skill, take up a new language, start a business, and above all: DO IT NOW!

I have no interest in seeing Rome burn while Nero fiddles. Nor do I want to run from responsibility and die tired. Young men today will be left holding the check whether they want to or not. I want to deny the feminists their Grand prize: an entire generation of docile, mouth-breathing beta wimps.

What did I do, you ask? I didn't spend another 5 hours of my life frying my retinas respawning in some F.P.S. I wrote an article for a Men's rights site, and got it published.

Joseph Biden's Abuse Fantasy Tour

careyroberts · 1 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

What is it with Democratic vice-presidents who embrace radical schemes, and then do complete a U-turn on the truth in order to mislead and alarm the citizenry?

First was Al Gore's high-profile dalliance with international wealth re-distribution in the guise of stopping global warming. And now comes Joe Biden's crusade to destabilize the family and grow the welfare state, under the benign-sounding banner of eradicating domestic violence.

Admittedly I had to restrain the impulse to belly laughter when the current issue of Glamour magazine with the Biden interview crossed my desk. At first I thought Glamour was doing a beta-test on a new science fiction gig. But no, these people really want us to believe this stuff.

First was the tableau of Mr. Biden in full-gravitas mode, seated by a roaring White House fireplace, eyebrows arched in paternal dismay, with the blue suit, regimental tie, and room decor all underscoring the somber theme: http://www.glamour.com/tell-somebody/2011/05/vice-president-joe-biden-and-doctor-jill-biden-say-abuse-is-worse-than-being-in-prison

And where do we begin? The jaw-slacking half-truths, the none-too-subtle fear-mongering, or the outright fabrications?

OK, we'll start with the half-truths.

It's been less than two months since Reginald Daye died at the hand of girlfriend Crystal Mangum, discredited Duke lacrosse accuser, who plunged a kitchen knife deep into his chest following over an argument over rent money. Mangum has now been charged with homicide.

Surveys reveal Mangum is only the latest example of a galloping epidemic of female-initiated partner aggression. The latest report from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control shows teenage girls are now 30% more likely than boys to slap, shove, or try to hurt their dating partners.

But throughout the Biden interview, women are inevitably depicted as victims at the hands of their brutish boyfriends and husbands. Not the slightest suggestion emerges that females may be abuse perpetrators.

This is not a matter of doing a Shake-and-Bake routine on the numbers. It's a case of outright assault and battery on the truth.

True, Mr. Biden sees himself an advocate for women, but does that mean abuse-prone females who need help should be swept under the rug for the sake of political correctness?

Ready for the fear-mongering?

The article alludes to the gallant "fight to keep women safe," and the Vice President floats the notion that any abusive relationship "is worse than being in prison." It's like women need to be constantly at the ready for their daily regimen of bruising and beatings.

But Biden never puts the issue in perspective, failing to inform women that the actual risk of being knocked off by their husband lies on the same order of magnitude as being struck by a bolt of lightning.

Now for the fabrication follies….

Mr. Biden claims the real cause of domestic violence is the "attitude of how society views women as chattel." Of course women in our society benefit from all the legal rights as men, and enjoy endless choices and opportunities. So is Biden's use of the word chattel to be considered absurd, inflammatory — or merely silly?

The Vice President then reports, "when we looked at the statistics for women who are dating, we noticed the homicide rate has actually gone up." Since I have delved deeply into the domestic violence reports and had never heard this factoid, doubts begin to seize my consciousness.

So I contacted the DoJ Bureau of Justice Statistics, asking if they could confirm Mr. Biden's claim. Michael Rand, Chief of Victimization Statistics at the BJS promptly wrote me back, saying "I am not familiar with the study that was the source of the statement you cited."

In response to Joe Biden's well-rehearsed statistical tom-foolery, columnist Robert Franklin commented, "Someone should tell him to lay off the Kool-Aid."

If you want to know the truth about domestic violence, several good resources are available on-line, such as this compilation of 282 studies: http://www.csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm and this summary of key facts: http://www.saveservices.org/pdf/Seven-Facts-Every-American-Should-Know-About-DV.pdf

And if you're looking for an unabashed, full-frontal abuse spoof, be sure to peruse Vice President Biden's recent interview in Glamour magazine.

Decline of Masculinity Accompanied by Decline of Liberty

W.F. Price · 2 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's pretty clear that our day to day lives in the US have become far more regulated and dull than the lives of Americans a generation ago. We technically have freedoms, but they have been systematically stripped from us through economic and institutional pressure. For example, political correctness on campus, which was simply an expression of militant leftism back in the 1980s, has been codified at most schools, and both students and professors who run afoul of the speech standards will pay a price. Writing something politically provocative online, or simply saying it to a coworker, can often result in failure to get some job or even outright firing. People are frightened to voice their opinions — and for good reason.

But it goes a lot farther than that. Regulations around parenting are more comprehensive than ever, so consequently we see far fewer kids playing outside than we used to. Another obvious result of the increased regulation of society is our extremely high incarceration rate, but the effects are felt far beyond the walls of correctional facilities.

There is something to be said for this regimentation of society; kids are safer than they used to be, crime has dropped, accidental death rates have declined and productivity has arguably increased. But at what cost comes this nanny state?

I'd argue that part of the price we pay is our very masculinity, which has become suspect and all but criminalized. Masculine values, such as speaking one's mind without regard for social conventions or political correctness, have taken a back seat to "harmony" and getting along. Schools have become utterly dull institutions where young men are bludgeoned into silence by an overwhelming consensus about what is acceptable. Dishonesty has become the norm in media, where platitudes take the place of frank, open honesty. Additionally, while those who have political privileges strive to create extra penalties for those who criticize them (e.g. hate crime laws), those who are out of favor become eternal scapegoats toward whom it is permissible – even encouraged – to direct invective.

Although the rights put in place by the founding fathers still exist on paper, the spirit of those times is utterly gone. We have gone from a nation of fiercely independent, egalitarian men to one of sniveling cowards and scraping sycophants. SWPL social conventions dominate our higher institutions, where there is no room for a dissenting, masculine voice. In fact, even the Tea Party, which is something of a reaction against this state of affairs, has come to be dominated by ambitious women, possibly because nobody can imagine a man getting away with speaking his mind in a radical, confrontational manner.

There will always be those of us who will break the mold and speak our minds anyway, whether it be due to our nature, circumstances or simply lack of concern for the unwritten rules, but it is tragic that so many men do not believe they have this opportunity. However, this can change. Many of the consequences of speaking out are far less severe than people imagine, and in many cases the result is an increase in one's mental health and a rise in perceived quality of life. Being open and honest is liberating, and can lift the spirit. It is also empowering, in that people will often find that others agree.

Finally, there is only one way to gain respect for masculinity: exercise it.

Egyptian Protesters Complain of Virginity Tests

W.F. Price · 2 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

According to reports from Amnesty International and various Egyptian bloggers, Egyptian women who took part in street protests with men have been accused of promiscuity and prostitution. Some have been detained, where they say they were subjected to humiliating "virginity tests," slapping and taser shocks.

From a Western perspective, this comes off as rather barbaric, perhaps because the overwhelming majority of unmarried women would utterly fail such tests, and the subsequent detention would swamp our incarceration facilities with tens of millions of not-virgins.

It may seem alien to us, but chastity is taken seriously in Islamic countries, and anecdotal evidence suggests that it is supported by women at least as much as men. Even so, as an American, the idea that government officials should be probing people's private parts is repugnant to me.

However, it strikes me as disingenuous to see feminists making so much hay over this particular abuse when they were entirely silent over the depredations of Abu Ghraib. Again, as an American, I find it repugnant when people are gratuitously humiliated by the state — especially when it is our own state doing it.

The Egyptian government is now taking heat for its callous treatment of female detainees. I'm sure feminists are outraged over this. But did they give a damn when it was men who were being sexually tortured by "strong, empowered American women" like Lynndie England?

No, if we raise that issue, they'd dismiss it as no big deal. It isn't only that they don't give a damn — they tacitly support this kind of abuse of men they consider their enemies. Muslims are "patriarchal" after all, so in the feminist universe they deserve to be subjected to humiliation and menaced by attack dogs, just like American men back home.

Lorena Bobbitt and the Politics of Hate

pierceharlan · 3 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

News of the penile mutilation of a Bangladeshi man has elicited some despicable responses by female readers on CBS's Facebook page. To understand this deplorable reaction to unjustified mayhem, we would do well to recall the Lorena and John Bobbitt affair. This is a lengthy piece, but the story is one worth recalling. I promise it will get your blood boiling. It holds a mirror up to modern gender relations, and the image isn't pretty.

Introduction

The mutilation of John Wayne Bobbitt by his wife, Lorena, on June 23, 1993, marks one of the most appalling and reprehensible chapters in modern Western gender relations. The story is well known: Lorena Bobbitt said her husband abused her over a prolonged period of time and that, on the night in question, he raped her. In a moment of what she claimed was temporary insanity, while her husband slept, she went to the kitchen of their apartment, grabbed a knife, came back into the bedroom, and proceeded to cut off most of his penis. She then hopped in her car, penis in hand, and drove away. As she sped by a field, she tossed the severed appendage out the window. The organ was later recovered and, miraculously, reattached to its owner.

The Bobbitt affair was appalling and reprehensible, and not merely because of the gruesome act of mayhem that defined it. It was all the more despicable because of the unspeakable glee, the unbridled delight, and the inexplicable exultation expressed by feminists and, sadly, large segments of the female population, who luxuriated in the vile mutilation of some lower class nobody, a man who had difficulty holding onto a job as a manual laborer. Feminists regarded the event as both a watershed moment in the battle of the sexes and a justifiable assault on maleness itself. Just as ancient warriors sometimes took the penises of their vanquished enemies as war trophies, what better way of trumpeting victory over males in the battle of the sexes than to take a penis from one of its foot soldiers?

In the immediate aftermath of the incident, with de rigueur, mindless, knee jerk fidelity, women's organizations branded the perpetrator "the victim" and the victim "the perpetrator," strictly along gender lines, even though the alleged rape was "he said/she said," and even though there was no question that she mutilated him while he slept.

This wasn't just a rush to judgment; it was a 60-meter sprint, completed in record time. Before a single scrap of evidence was considered by a jury, for feminists and many women, the trial was over even before it had begun. They arrogated to any woman the right to exact the most gruesome vigilante justice on any "member" of any member of the opposite sex. The Bobbitt affair was feminist stardust wishfulness come true.

John Bobbitt: False Rape Claim Victim

The mutilation couldn't then, and can't now, be rationally justified on any level. It was not self-defense. Ample evidence showed that both Mr. and Mrs. Bobbitt abused each other during their marriage. There is no evidence to believe anything stopped either one from leaving the other, and at the time of the maiming, they had been discussing divorce. By any measure, Mrs. Bobbitt's vigilante "justice" didn't fit the crime, even if Mr. Bobbitt had raped her earlier in the evening, as she claims.

But did Mr. Bobbitt rape his wife? When the legend becomes fact, old cowboys and feminists alike insist on printing the legend. In the Bobbitt case, the legend quickly took hold that of course John Bobbitt raped his wife! The problem is, the facts don't support the legend. It seems more likely that John Bobbitt was the victim of not only a horrible bodily mutilation but also of a false rape claim.

Mrs. Bobbitt's version of the facts was the evolving narrative of a woman groping for victimhood. At the time of her arrest, according to the New York Times, she told police: "He always have orgasm and he doesn't wait for me to have orgasm. He's selfish. I don't think it's fair, so I pulled back the sheets then and I did it."

End of case, right? Well, no. Later, she claimed she cut her husband in anger after he raped her, and she told a psychiatrist that she cut him “really fast.” Later still, at her own trial, she claimed she couldn’t even remember doing it.

“This was all contrived to strike back at him after he said he was going to leave her,” said Mr. Bobbitt’s counsel, Gregory L. Murphy. “She was acting out a fantasy that’s in the psyche of many women.” Mel Feit, executive director of the National Center for Men in Brooklyn, might have hit the nail on the head with his explanation for the mutilation. “This is the result of feminists teaching women that men are natural oppressors.”

As befits a case where the accuser’s story is a moving target, at his trial for marital sexual abuse, John Bobbitt was acquitted. Ah, but that was just the beginning of the misandry.

Lorena Bobbitt: Feminist Hero

From the outset, Lorena Bobbitt was widely regarded as a feminist hero.

Time Magazine said there was a “ripple of glee that passed through the female population when Lorena Bobbitt struck back.” Vanity Fair ran a sultry photo spread of Lorena Bobbitt and branded her a “national folk heroine.”

A woman wrote to the New York Times — and don’t read this on an empty stomach: “Prof. Catharine MacKinnon of the University of Michigan and the writer Andrea Dworkin long ago pointed to the institution of marriage as a legal cover for the act of rape and the permanent humiliation of women. Lorena Bobbitt’s life has been a poignant instance of that nightmare, which elicited a bold and courageous act of feminist self-defense. As one who recently returned from a conference of feminist activists in Europe, I can assure readers that the Lorena Bobbitt case has galvanized the women’s movement worldwide in a way the Anita Hill case never did. No feminist is advocating emasculation as the weapon of first choice. And some women question the political prudence of ‘sociosexual vigilantism.’ But whatever the judgment of America’s patriarchal legal system, Lorena Bobbitt is for most feminists no criminal. She is instead a symbol of innovative resistance against gender oppression everywhere.”

Another woman seemed to sum up the feelings of many women without the pretentious feminist patina: “Every woman I’ve talked to about this says, ‘Way to go!’”

A sexual assault counselor said she didn’t condone the maiming but could “understand it,” and “could sympathize.” The severance of this 26-year-old loser’s penis somehow became, in the words of that sexual assault counselor, “a critical event in the history of women.” Why? Because “violence is done to women continuously and pervasively. And this is a retaliatory act of great dramatic value . . . .”

John Bobbitt’s severed penis was a sacrificial offering for the collective guilt of all men on the altar of political correctness.

The mainstream media was only too happy to mirror the feminist glee with barely any more restraint. Progressive writers (we called them “liberal” back then) dubbed the affair a “cautionary tale” for men. The lesson wasn’t that mutilating another human being is never justified; the lesson was that men had better wise up when it comes to how they treat women or they’ll rightly lose their dicks.

Female features writers couldn’t bring themselves to outright applaud the mutilation, but they went to great lengths to make clear that they were sympathetic to it. One columnist wrote: “Personally, I’m for both feminism and nonviolence. I admire the male body and prefer to find the penis attached to it rather than having to root around in vacant lots with Ziploc bag in hand. But I’m not willing to wait another decade or two for gender peace to prevail. And if a fellow insists on using his penis as a weapon, I say that, one way or another, he ought to be swiftly disarmed.” A not-so-veiled justification for mutilation, so long as the mutilation involves a penis, premised on a thousand modern-day Chicken Little fables and made-up stats that encourage young women to see sexual predation oozing and gushing from every male zipper.

Then there was celebrated columnist Ellen Goodman. Radcliffe grad and Pulitzer Prize winner. One of the darlings of progressive feminism whose column appeared in hundreds newspapers across the nation and who, on the entitlement and privilege scale, was a “ten” to John Bobbitt’s “one.” Ellen Goodman took time out from polishing the awards on her mantle to make this working class putz her personal piñata. Ms. Goodman, of course, refused to come out and condone the mutilation, but she certainly could "explain," in a decidedly feminist way, both the mutilation and women's celebratory reaction to it. Ms. Goodman concluded that this story became a national sensation only because a woman finally fought back. "Last year," she declared without bothering to support her pronouncement with silly things like evidence, "the police blotter was full of abused and battered wives — an almost unilateral massacre." (Because, you see, in 1993, women did not commit domestic violence. Even today, few progressive female writers accept the indisputable fact, proven beyond question, that women commit domestic violence in significant numbers — against men, and other women.) Now, Ms. Goodman gushed, men "see a dangerous enemy where there was once a victim." And the men squirming at the thought of being Bobbittized? "If women smile at men who squirm, maybe it's at that recognition of power."

Ms. Goodman's take on the matter, of course, proves one thing: even misandrists can win a Pulitzer Prize.

To use the stilted, stick-up-their-ass syntax of Women's Studies majors, trying ever so hard to convince everyone they are actually getting an education in those wretched classes, Ms. Bobbitt was the leveler of gendered power differentials. She was a feminist Batman, without the codpiece. Never mind that none of the women applauding penile mutilation would applaud any other type of brutal vigilante justice for any other type of crime. Nothing a woman could do would ever justify mutilation of her breasts or vagina. Yet vigilante justice directed at a penis of some below average guy was heralded with a giddy "you go, girlfriend!" heard around the world.

The fact that purportedly enlightened publications were quietly, and sometimes not so quietly, rooting for Mrs. Bobbitt even before a single fact was adjudicated or a scrap of evidence admitted at trial is nothing short of astounding, puzzling, and frightening, all at once.

John Bobbitt Fit the Feminist Metanarrative as Oppressor of Women

What was behind all this contempt, all this hatred for a run-of-the-mill 26-year-old man who, by any logical measure, was the real victim here? He fit the feminist stereotype as an oppressor, meaning he was stereotypically "masculine." He was young and an ex-Marine. The fact that he was anything but "privileged" might be surprising to some, and it belies the notion that it's only powerful men, like Dominique Strauss-Kahn, or presumably privileged men, like the Duke lacrosse players, who are negatively pre-judged in any battle of the sexes. The fact of the matter is that in the court of public opinion, in "he said/she said" cases, "he" always loses. Remember Hofstra? (Read it — it's the most important thing we've ever written at False Rape Society.) The four young minority men who were jailed in that case were less privileged than even Mr. Bobbitt. The fact is, when the men are not powerful, it's an advantage for those predisposed to pre-judge them because they lack the capacity to defend themselves against the Ellen Goodmans of the world.

As Thomas Sowell recently wrote in Intellectuals and Society: "Information or allegations reflecting negatively on individuals or groups seen less sympathetically by the intelligentsia pass rapidly into the public domain with little scrutiny and much publicity." Sowell cited two of the more prominent hoaxes in recent history as evidence for this point: the alleged gang rapes of black women by white men in the Tawana Brawley and Duke lacrosse cases. He might also have cited the Bobbitt affair.

The Politics of Hate

But some columnists couldn't accept that women in general embraced the feminist glee over the mutilation. Syndicated columnist Mona Charen explained why Mrs. Bobbitt was chosen as a feminist pinup girl: the mutilation, they believed, was "every woman's fantasy." The case gripped the media because, Ms. Charen lamented, "they [the media] really believe that most women feel that way deep down." But Ms. Charen recognized how utterly twisted all of it was: "If feminists are seething with such hatred for men, that is evidence of a politics bordering on pathology." She continued: "To see the mutilation of a man's body as a political act and to signal secret approval and a vicarious thrill . . . truly deserves the label 'the politics of hate.'"

Charen found the nation's obsession with the mutilation "bizarre, abnormal and sexist to boot." It would be impossible to disagree with Ms. Charen's observation about reversing the genders: "If a woman were similarly wounded by a man, no one would treat it with ghoulish humor. Men are evidently fair game."

Newsweek nailed it: "Just imagine what [feminists'] reaction would be if someone had tried to cut off a woman's breast. Feminists have a cutting-edge sense of humor…but only if it's directed at men."

Even when Mr. Bobbitt was found not guilty of marital rape, that didn't change the feminists' view that, of course, he was really guilty. Kim Gandy of NOW said the verdict "discourages women and gives men a free ride in marital rape cases." It doesn't seem to have occurred to Ms. Gandy that John Bobbitt might not have raped his wife. Ms. Gandy, obviously, knew better than the jury. Or if it did occur to her that perhaps Mr. Bobbitt was factually innocent, she didn't let that inconvenient fact get in the way of her women-are-always-the-victim metanarrative.

The Lorena Bobbitt Trial: Things Get Really Nutty

Finally, it was time for Mrs. Bobbitt's trial for maliciously wounding her husband. Much of the nation, and beyond, watched intently with sympathies split largely along gender lines. In Ecuador, Lorena Bobbitt's home country, the National Feminist Association called several news organizations to announce that if Mrs. Bobbitt went to prison for mutilating her husband, 100 innocent American men would be castrated (it is not clear if they really meant "castration," which generally means removal of the testicles, or if they meant they would slice off 100 innocent penises). The organization also staged a large protest outside the U.S. consulate.

The Lorena Bobbitt trial was a feminist Woodstock. A carnival atmosphere swept over Manassas, where it was held. A woman sold homemade, penis-shaped white chocolates outside the courthouse. T-shirts were hawked that said "Revenge — how sweet it is," and "Manassas: A Cut Above." Some feminists sold buttons that read: "LORENA BOBBITT FOR SURGEON GENERAL." Disc jockeys handed out "Slice" soda pop and cocktail wieners "with lots of ketchup."

Hundreds of Lorena Bobbitt supporters cheered their champion outside the courthouse. When the man she mutilated — who likely was the real victim — walked outside, he was greeted with boos and whistles, but he stoically showed no reaction. Isn't that just like a man?

Mrs. Bobbitt's self-defense claim — that she was justified in maiming a sleeping man — would be laughable in any context outside feminist jurisprudence. Here's what Newsweek said about it: ". . . the traditional definition of self-defense wasn't enough for radical feminists. And so in the 1970s, feminist psychologist Lenore Walker conceived the 'battered-woman syndrome.' Women beaten by their mates, she claimed, are so demoralized that they become too helpless to leave or to take steps to help themselves. They become convinced their only option to stop the abuse is to kill the abuser. So even if the woman is in no physical danger at the time of the killing, she's defending herself against future beatings. Get it? Because men supposedly have so much power over women in our society, women should be given the powers of judge, jury and executioner.

"Ideas–especially seminal ideas such as these–have consequences. In 1991, the governors of Ohio and Maryland commuted the sentences of a number of jailed women who had killed or assaulted their mates because they claimed to have been victims of battered-woman syndrome. But reporters turned up embarrassing evidence indicating that 15 of the 25 women freed in Ohio had not been physically abused. Six, they said, had talked about killing their boyfriends or husbands. in some cases months before doing so; and two had tracked down and killed husbands from whom they were separated. If they were capable of that much premeditation, they were certainly capable of picking up and leaving."

The female prosecutor kicked off the trial by telling the jurors, apparently with a straight face, that it was "his penis versus her life." Charles Krauthammer called that characterization a "stark summation of feminist victimization theory." Dr. Krauthammer added that the Bobbitt case wasn't one of self-defense but of revenge. He noted that evidence of self-defense, improper though it was, came in quite handy for Mrs. Bobbitt because it allowed her to introduce "the most lurid allegations of sexual abuse." The trial made the Bobbitt marriage "one of the most highly publicized and minutely scrutinized ever," said the New York Times.

One of Lorena's former co-workers testified that Lorena once said she would chop off her husband's dick if he cheated on her. Witnesses testified that Lorena was mean, violent, and subject to jeolous, unpredictable physical attacks.

In the end, the jury found Lorena Bobbitt not guilty of malicious wounding by reason of insanity and committed her to a mental health facility for 45 days for observation. The New York Times reported that "a gasp went up among her supporters in the courtroom."

Did you get that? 45 days in a mental health wing of a hospital. Until relatively recently, many states punished rape with the death penalty. It is clear beyond question that very few rapes are as vicious, as brutal, as inhumane as the attack on Mr. Bobbitt. But while many men and boys have been put to death for rape, a woman who sliced off her sleeping husband's penis got 45 days of observation in a nice, clean hospital.

Whatever this was, it was not justice.

The verdict elicited the predictable response. Self-described feminists cheered and gave each other high fives that a woman was permitted to get away with what now could, quite literally, and officially, be called an insane act. Kim Gandy, executive vice president of the National Organization for Women, summed up the position for the lunatic fringe, which in this case seemed to comprise a regrettably large segment of the nation's female population: "We're glad the jury rejected the twisted argument that a battered woman should be locked up in a prison cell." Ms. Gandy used the verdict as the occasion to push one of her pet projects: ". . . this whole saga drives home the need for swift passage of a comprehensive version of the Violence Against Women Act . . . ."

In Lorena Bobbitt's hometown of Bucay, Ecuador, hundreds took to the streets, cheering and firing shots into the air the way joyous fans do when their team wins the World Cup or the Super Bowl.

The New York Times chimed in, ever so delicately: "[I]n this case," the Times pontificated, "the jury can be forgiven for finding a reason to excuse Mrs. Bobbitt's brutality . . . ." It also noted: ". . . perhaps the verdict will indeed make some abusive men think twice before they strike again." But, the Times refused to go so far as to invite every self-anointed victim to resort to retaliation: ". . . violence cannot be the standard answer to violence." If violence can't be the "standard" answer, this suggests that, sometimes, violence is OK, and presumably that "sometimes" includes any time it is done to a penis by a self-anointed wronged woman.

But Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz said violence is not OK. Mrs. Bobbitt "pulled the wool over the jury's eyes," Dershowitz said, by claiming that abuse left her unable to take responsibility for her actions. He called her a "feminist Dirty Harry." The "abuse excuse," Dershowitz explained, "is dangerous to the very tenets of democracy, which presuppose personal accountability for choices and actions."

Mona Charen, likewise, was in no mood to celebrate. She knew that the reaction of feminists, and of too many women, was as wrong as can be: "Rarely have I been as ashamed of my sex as I have been in the aftermath of the Lorena Bobbitt verdict."

The brilliant Dr. Charles Krauthammer, a Harvard educated psychiatrist before becoming a political pundit, said it best: this verdict took "political correctness to its ultimate extreme, to the point where for those who claim politically correct victimization, the laws no longer apply."

"Politically correct victimization" sums up the entire affair.

Legacy

The Bobbitt affair ripped off an ugly scab and exposed the even more loathsome oozing pus that mainstream feminism had become. It revealed a worse-than-nasty vindictive streak, so wide and drawn with such bright-lines, that proved feminism is less interested in achieving gender equity than in blindly punishing an entire gender for the unnamed sins of a tiny percentage of its members.

The principal legacy of the Bobbitt affair was to "empower" women by insisting they are powerless; because of that purported powerlessness, they are excused from assuming personal responsibility for their actions. The problem is, the more we institutionalize the notion that women are powerless and not held to the same standards as men, the more we underscore that women really aren't men's equals. The Bobbitt affair was a setback for women's quest for true equality.

A more immediate impact was that copycat crimes cropped up and continue to crop up to this day, including the crime that led to the Brigitte Harris trial in 2009, where a young woman admitted to researching the Bobbitt case before severing her allegedly abusive father's penis. Ms. Harris made sure to burn the purportedly offending appendage to avoid Mrs. Bobbitt's mistake that allowed John Bobbitt to be reunited with his organ. Ms. Harris' father died in the ordeal, so his side of the story will never be known. (At the young woman's trial, the jurors convicted her of second degree manslaughter and not murder, which prompted the judge to chide the jurors for elevating their sympathies over the law.)

Mrs. Bobbitt's brutal act of mutilation, and the depraved reaction of feminists, the mainstream media, and, frankly, too many women, cannot be justified, or respected, on any reasonable, logical, moral, or other level. The celebratory reaction and tolerance for this most vicious act of vengeance was morally grotesque and seemed an all too predictable response to the systematic maligning of a gender over the course of several decades. Any assertion that "feminism helps men, too" evaporated with the Bobbitt affair. The detestable reaction to the crime was too hateful to entertain such pretenses any longer. The only lesson for men from this ordeal was to avoid women like Lorena Bobbitt, and to realize that maleness is unfairly held in widespread contempt.

Following the mutilation, men, as a class, were exposed to a disdain many had not known existed, and they didn't know how to react to it. But men's bewilderment was understandable. In the days just before the Internet explosion, men didn't know that they were "all" rapists. Nor did anyone bother to explain to them that they were the supposed beneficiaries of a "patriarchy" that made them undeservedly privileged. You see, most men were too busy working to make ends meet, ironically, to support the very people who actually studied those loony things in college. So when women shamefully applauded the vile mutilation of another human being — a man who was not privileged, or especially smart, or wealthy, or lucky — all that men could muster in the face of this fusillade of misandry was a muffled and chivalrous grumble.

It is fittingly symbolic that John Bobbitt slept while his wife was busy slicing off his penis, because it mirrored the slumber of Western men while feminism hacked away at the very concept of masculinity.

But since that awful night in 1993, the men's movement has grown by the proverbial leaps and bounds. The Internet has exposed countless men to an ongoing battle of the sexes that they didn't even know was being waged at the time Mrs. Bobbitt committed her vile act. If something like the Bobbitt case happened today, would it be met with a different reaction? Would it bring to the front burner the issues of female-on-male domestic violence and false rape claims? No one can say for certain, but my guess is that men would actually answer the bell this time, instead of sitting on a stool in a corner of the ring, allowing women to win by default.

Like Mr. Bobbitt, who was very rudely awakened by the cold, sharp steel cutting through his manhood, men, in general, are also awakening. They are still groggy, and they are wiping the sleep from their eyes. But hopefully soon, they will be wide awake, and with a little bit of luck, they will be able to grab the knife before they are completely emasculated.

More on Female Literature

It seems the feminists really, really care about this issue, so I thought I'd indulge them with a little comparison between female and male poetry. In dealing with feminists, official credentials are always very important, so I chose former US Poet Laureate Kay Ryan, who, having been selected by the government, must surely be the cream of the crop. Ms. Ryan is a 60-something lesbian and English teacher at Marin College (and people wonder why boys are having a hard time in school…) who served as America's official poet from 2008 to 2010, upon which she was succeeded by some guy named W.S. Merwin.

Following is one of her poems, featured in the NY Times upon her selection to be poet laureate.

> HOME TO ROOST
> The chickens > are circling and > blotting out the > day. The sun is > bright, but the > chickens are in > the way. Yes,
> the sky is dark
> with chickens,
> dense with them.
> They turn and > then they turn > again. These > are the chickens
> you let loose
> one at a time > and small — > various breeds.
> Now they have > come home > to roost—all > the same kind
> at the same speed.

Haunting imagery, I must say…

For purposes of comparison, I'll go with one of my personal favorites — Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Here's a passage from Kubla Khan:

> In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
> A stately pleasure-dome decree:
> Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
> Through caverns measureless to man
> Down to a sunless sea.
> So twice five miles of fertile ground
> With walls and towers were girdled round:

> And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills,
> Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
> And here were forests ancient as the hills,
> Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.
> But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
> Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!
> A savage place! as holy and enchanted
> As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
> By woman wailing for her demon-lover!

Is it fair to compare a poem about barnyard fowl with one about Kubla Khan? I'm not sure, but according to the US government Kay Ryan is one of America's most distinguished poets. She is also a woman, and almost certainly a feminist.

Below are a couple videos, including "Turtle," a reading by Kay Ryan (introduced by the insufferably sanctimonious Garrison Keillor), followed by Dylan Thomas reading "Do Not Go Gentle into that Good Night":

Last Word (for now) on Women's Lit

It's nice to see how many readers appreciate literature and poetry, and it was also interesting to note how a number of them – including plenty of men – defended female writers and poets. This speaks to the fact that men are inherently fair when it comes to judging achievement. However, this also raises the question as to whether it was ever anything other than a power play on the part of feminists to increase female representation in various fields. Were women ever really held back and prevented from writing poetry, composing music, etc.? Given the fact that so many readers could find quality female artists from decades – even centuries – in the past, it certainly doesn't look that way.

Furthermore, it appears that since feminism's triumph, female achievement in the higher arts has deteriorated substantially. When women no longer have to excel to be read and recognized, but simply have to advertise the fact that they are women to be celebrated for dubious achievements, they won't put as much effort into producing anything of quality. So the sorry state of women today is a direct result of feminist privilege, which absolves them of all responsibility and deflects any criticism. How can we discern which women are of quality when we must celebrate all of them as strong, creative, beautiful geniuses?

Yes, feminism has wrecked Western womanhood, reducing the young women of today to spoiled brats who can't take a hint of criticism, and immediately turn to authorities to bolster their self-esteem. No woman can be too fat to be beautiful, too dense to be intelligent, or too dull to be creative. They are all equally super-duper goddesses, before whom men must genuflect and heap up mounds of praise.

It is this aspect of feminism above all that ruins women. If we men are honest with ourselves, we'll admit that some women are capable of great things, but under feminism they are restricted to a level grade of mediocrity. Just as it is necessary for the female nature to temper some of the excesses of masculinity, without masculine concepts of competition, excellence and achievement women are reduced to the median, and the potential of exceptional individual women is hidden under the skirts of convention and propriety.

First Western Geisha Flounders, Ultimately Leaves in Disgrace

Fiona Graham, a 47-year-old Australian Oxford grad, somehow convinced an "okiya" (geisha house) in Japan to accept her for training. Enthralled by romantic notions of the profession, in which women train to learn how to be pleasant companions (not prostitutes) in tasteful settings such as dinner parties and tea ceremonies, Ms. Graham decided to take up the flute as her instrument of choice and to call herself "Sayuki," meaning "transparent happiness."

Problems started to become apparent when she decided that the judgment of her superiors at the geisha house, who felt she was not yet good enough with the instrument to perform for guests, did not apply to her. She began skipping practice, clashing with her fellow geishas, and declaring herself "good enough" to perform.

Soon, her disobedience escalated to tantrums and outright insubordination:

> "She says she is a flute player but she does not go to lessons and said she was already good enough," said the fellow geisha. "But to perform in front of guests is very important. You have to be good enough and you need to have permission.
> "No-one would give her permission because she was not good enough – so she became hysterical, yelling at everyone. That is not our style. We have a traditional way of thinking and we have to obey our older 'sisters'."

Even worse in the eyes of afficionados, however, was her disregard for the conventions of the profession:

> …Peter MacIntosh, a documentary maker who has studied the secretive world of geisha for 18 years, said: "I have refused to call her Sayuki. When she starts acting like a geisha, then I'll call her by her geisha name."
> He pointed out that geisha did not normally wear the traditional white make-up after around the age of 30 and that "Western guests are not going to want to see a 47-year-old Western woman in makeup."
> [...]
> One geisha noted that because the association would not permit Ms Graham to perform in front of customers, she began arranging her own events outside the geisha district.
> "She organised these parties, but most of the other geisha didn't go because we don't think that she is a geisha," she said, adding that as Ms Graham had no-one to accompany her flute playing, she used backing music from a portable music player.
> "She played like that in front of the guests – we would not dare do that," the geisha said. "It's embarrassing, but she just does not understand that."

Although there will always be adjustment issues when making the leap from one culture to another, traditional Eastern and contemporary Westen female culture are so profoundly different that it may simply have been too wide a chasm to span even with good-faith effort. Although most of us would probably find the idea that a middle-aged Western woman could pull off being a geisha preposterous, and we might find ourselves holding a derisive attitude toward Ms. Graham, the sad fact is that she's probably better than the average Western woman. She was the only Western woman so far to have been accepted into an okiya, after all…

However, some traits are just too deeply ingrained in contemporary Western women to polish away, such as the eternal need for validation, the overestimation of her own value and the sense of entitlement even without corresponding accomplishment.

It is truly sad to see how Western women's overinflated sense of self has reduced them, diminishing their capacity for introspection and robbing them of the ability to attain excellence.

The Invisible Man

Marginalized, ignored, and forgotten (until he is "necessary")

By Ken Knight

In 1997 horror-writer Bentley Little published his aptly-titled novel THE IGNORED. It is about a man who is so average and fits into society so well he disappears from view, drifts into a state where his co-workers no longer see him, his friends don't recognize him, his parents die and he's not even invited to the funeral. He joins up with others like him, a tiny cabal of men in their own pocket of reality who validate each other in being ignored by those around them and seek "pay back" for the way they've been treated.

Though not nearly controversial as other man-cave classics like "The Satanic Bible" and "American Psycho", THE IGNORED is a vicarious walk with fictional characters whom secretly lash out at society around them because despite their high education, white-collar jobs, and family-raising qualities, they found themselves "forgotten" by the very social order they've been serving. Art imitates life….or so they say!

Much has been said here at The Spearhead about the dynamics of "Alpha", "Beta", and "Omega" males in the human pecking order, but I'll leave those three definitions to you.

What can't be displayed enough is the ongoing "marginalization" of the American male as a whole from the home to the workplace and in the courts, the media/entertainment pitch on men in general being the least of our concern when it comes to Men's Rights but media/entertainment denigration of men nowadays is at such an all-encompassing rate and delivery it would make Nazi Propagandist Joseph Goebbels red with envy!

What I mean when I refer to as "the invisible man" is a rather new phenomenon that has arisen through the radical egalitarianism to become a "result" few men who supported the feminist movement decades ago would have ever imagined could happen. It is the subtle but real vanishing of men from the College Campuses, the workplace (more especially in traditionally-male professions) and in the home with more and more single-parent homes each year in the US where the father of the children has been cast off to become only a paycheck each month.

Indoctrinated by Feminism, the past few generations of women have been inundated by the "men are sexist oppressors" and "men are replaceable" platitudes that flow freely from feminist doctrine through Congress to the Court room to the offices of media barons and motion picture production companies and of course preached in our schools and universities with casual aplomb. Should one not be too surprised when Susie, Franny, and Lilly act accordingly and overtly dismiss, marginalize, and work against the men in their lives without what appears to be a second thought? When what used to be a personality disorder decades ago is now afforded women from the board room to the gym room and even bar room, as countless men are in fact being viewed (and subsequently treated) as second-class citizens in their own country in a manner that should make civil rights lawyers scream to the heavens…..but it doesn't!

Men are pigs, overgrown "boys", or hawkish devils lurking about the office or workplace looking at Lilly's ass in the tight mini-skirt she's wearing…if he's not her "type" and she notices him looking at her, she'll lodge a formal complaint on the "creep" for "reckless-eyeballing".

Men are harassers and potential stalkers who threaten women's safety…

One too many dates asked for by a (unattractive) male suitor brings Franny into the Police Station to inquire about a "protective order". Men are expendable and can be easily replaced in a woman's life…if Susie becomes "unhappy" at some moment of discomfort in a relationship or marriage she simply ends it and gets police protection as well as Family Law Judges to usually decide in their favor when it comes to divorce.

Men are only good for one thing, making a woman 'happy'… the modern sense of entitlement that abounds in many of our ladies out there is thick enough to choke a Rhino and despite the fact their demands for a man's house, pension, property, and 18 years of economic slavery is slowly bankrupting a once great nation as a whole, it continues at full-speed-ahead without regard for consequences. Men have had it good for centuries and now it is a woman's turn to 'rule'…such inane entitlement-thinking stems from the darkest pits of personal insecurity and envy only the worst of tyrants take it seriously.

It is "entitlement" that makes one person view another person as "inferior" and allows for the other person to be minimized at first sight. Ask the survivors of Nazi Germany and Stalinist Russia about how this is the very beginning of something much worse later on.

How one group of people view another group of people is tantamount to how the first group is going to treat the second, that's simple sociology sports-fans…now add in a media/entertainment "propaganda" machine intentionally bent against one group of people and the slant becomes far more insidious than simple comedy and fictional scenarios poking fun at men, women, minorities, etc. The score is pretty simple….

Now I could write volumes of examples of this phenomenon as others have written here, but suffice it to say that the "invisible man" is example enough and unless you are one of those rare cats who has a well-paying gravy of a career "on top" with the additional bonus of Clark Gable good-looks with significant amount of fame, a cool (expensive) car, and home/property to make just about anyone insanely envious of you, odds are you have experienced being "invisible" somewhere along the way at work, home, or in public.

The often-ignored "invisible man" is the everyday man, the bee-hive worker doing what he has to do for a paycheck and to stay afloat, viewed by many of the women he might smile at as beneath them, from the Secretary who hates the way the repairman looks at her but is glad the "creep" fixed the air-conditioning so she's not sweating through her blouse, to the female model who grits her teeth every time she comes across an ordinary man she reluctantly speaks to as she yearns for the "alpha" she feels she is entitled to…..

Personally, I think this is where the derogatory term "Tool" fits the most, for that is what many a woman sees the men around her as, a "tool" in one way or another and only called upon when a "tool" is needed. Of course, thanks in no small part to the way Susie has been conditioned to think, she'll likely dismiss you soon after what she needed is accomplished (without any thought to how "teamwork" makes the world a better place).

Catch is Susie…that ordinary guy you take for granted may one day see the futility of being anywhere near you when the shit hits the fan.

Feminist Moderation in the Face of Absurdity

Featured Guest · 7 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've always been interested in what feminists think of the military draft, given it just kinda goes against the grain of their 'men have always been privileged' view of the world. I guess we need to give them a little credit on this issue (very little, as you'll soon see), as they typically oppose it.

However, in opposing the draft, they trivialize it and turn it in to an issue that's bad for both women and men. Just read National Association of Women's policy statement on the military draft in its entirety:

> "BE IT RESOLVED, that NOW opposes the reinstatement of registration and draft for both men and women. NOW's primary focus on this issue is on opposition to registration and draft. However, if we cannot stop the return to registration and draft, we also cannot choose between sisters and brothers. We oppose any registration or draft that excludes women as an unconstitutional denial of rights to both young men and women. And we continue to oppose all sex discrimination by the volunteer armed services."

Hmmmm, so "any draft that excludes women" denies rights to "both young men and women." I guess that's technically true. After all, Jim Crow, technically speaking, denied rights to both black people and white people.

Why can't the draft just be one issue in which men got shafted and the Selective Service be an example of men getting shafted today? The answer is simply that if such concessions were made, the 'women are always victim' paradigm would fade away into a more nuanced and intelligent view of historical gender relations. And of course there are many such examples of this.

Feministing for one, deals with the old 'women and children first' policy that was sacrosanct in the 19th century and is still used today, by simply pretending it doesn't exist.

Search "women and children first" on their site and you come up with two hits, the first celebrates the 30th anniversary of the charity Women and Children First and the second is an interview with an author who references a bookstore named, you guessed it, Women and Children First.

So feminists take an issue that only affects men directly and turn it into a two sided issue and then ignore another obvious issue that affects men. These examples, however, pale in comparison to my favorite example of feminist moderation in the face of absurdity; feminists ambivalent treatment of the outrageous. Take this article by XX Magazine on the horribly difficult question of whether or not to imprison "deadbeat dads."

The article makes no bones about it; it's called "Deadbeat Dad's and Debtor's Prison." They know we're talking about debtor's prisons here, which were abolished in the United States a generation before slavery.

Unbelievably, the story is not about whether it's moral to jail "deadbeat dads" but rather, as KJ Dell'Antonia opens "Can the state jail a "deadbeat dad" without providing him a lawyer?"

That's like asking 'is it OK for a bank to jail a delinquent homeowner without providing him a lawyer' or 'can a property manager to jail a delinquent tenant without providing him a lawyer.' Why the hell is that even an issue? Why can the state jail someone for being delinquent on a debt? Debtor's prisons are an anachronistic form of tyranny feminists appear to be completely comfortable with as long as the only victims are male. (I should note this is nothing new, according to Warren Farrell, back in the early 19th century, husbands were routinely jailed for debts their wives incurred.)

The lunacy of her discussion about these "hard cases" continues:

> And then there's the question of what "can't pay" means. What of the parent who's lost his job and is now > balancing the mandatory child support payment with supporting children from a new marriage?”

So a guy either provides tribute to his ex-wife and lets his kids starve, or provides food for his children and deal with getting harassed by child support agencies and perhaps imprisoned by them. Why, it seems to me you’re missing something here KJ.

So, if any of you ever find it a mystery how feminists can be so blind to the problems men face, just look at how ambivalent they are toward blatant oppression.

Guilty Until Proven Innocent...Even Then You're Still Guilty

careyroberts · 8 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

This past Thursday men and women from around the country convened to share their experiences facing down false allegations of abuse. The event was a sobering testament to how the former War on Crime has morphed into Open Season on the Innocent, or so it would appear.

The meeting was the first-ever False Allegations Summit, held in Washington, DC and sponsored by a group called Stop Abusive and Violent Environments. Yes, there were anguished sighs and tears as persons recounted their daily battles – for some, obsessions — to exonerate themselves and restore their good names.

The Summit led off with the revelation that 11% of Americans report they have been falsely accused of child abuse, domestic violence, or sexual assault. This astonishing number means tens of millions of persons have had their foreheads branded with the scarlet Abuser label.

The Summit then featured presentations by a parade of stakeholder organizations that have witnessed first-hand the effects of false claims.

The National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers highlighted the "immense, often irreparable harm caused to our clients for false allegations, not only to reputation and personal relationships, but often to the accused individual's livelihood and even health."

The Home School Legal Defense Association documented repeated instances where an anonymous hotline call triggered an unannounced visit by a social worker, sometimes ending in the strip search of a bewildered child. These are not isolated cases – nationwide, over 85% of child abuse allegations are found to be unsubstantiated: http://www.saveservices.org/false-allegations-awareness-month/

The American Coalition for Fathers and Children then testified how an allegation of child abuse or domestic violence often becomes a tactical ploy for an impending child-custody dispute. "When a father can be sentenced to months in jail for simply leaving a gallon of milk on his child's doorstep, we have indeed reached the point of 'hysteria' about the issue of domestic violence," ACFC executive director Michael McCormick commented.

The National Coalition for Men representative recounted the plight of Raul, a ship-welder who was caught in an unhappy marriage with an abusive woman. She began to accuse him of a litany of offenses including sexual abuse of their baby. As the conflict escalated, the woman's family started to threaten the man. Just two weeks ago, Raul was discovered lying in the California desert, a gunshot wound to the head.

Then Encounters International described how so-called Green Card Girls play the abuse card to secure their work authorization and citizenship. Recalling her childhood experiences in the former Soviet Union, Natasha Spivack told the spell-bound audience:

"In Stalinist Russia, innocent people were presumed guilty if reported as 'Enemies of the Motherland.' They were sent to the Gulag or executed without due process. In the United States of America, citizens are presumed guilty if reported as 'Domestic Abusers.'…they lost their jobs, their mental health, their reputation, their trust in justice, and their self-esteem."

Then it was then the turn of the victims, the persons falsely accused, to speak out and break the shroud of silence and shame that too often envelopes the lives of the wrongfully charged.

Cheryl Shanks of New Jersey recounted how her former husband fabricated claims of abuse so he could get special treatment by the immigration authorities: "This ordeal began in August of 2003…The price on my family has been immeasurable. My son has his own therapist who he sees weekly."

Carl Starling of Maryland described how his former wife accused him of repeatedly striking her with his fist, but didn't experience the need to pay a visit to the hospital emergency room to tend to her wounds.

Gordon Smith of Delaware described the Mad-Hatter experience of having an abusive wife who sought to be absolved by accusing him of the very actions that she had committed. When he sought to file perjury charges, the prosecutor demurred, leading Smith to deplore the “state-sponsored protection” of false accusers.

And Terri Quick of Pennsylvania described the ordeal of her son who had engaged in consensual sex with a girlfriend. When the relationship went sour and she decided to re-connect with her previous flame, he suddenly found himself accused of rape. The evidence was all circumstantial, but enough to secure a conviction.

But it was Ben Vonderheide of Pennsylvania who stole the show:
http://www.saveservices.org/2011/06/video-false-allegations-summit-in-america-do-the-accused-deserve-a-hearing/

In 2007 his ex-girlfriend was found guilty of three counts of making false statements to law enforcement officials. Despite the conviction, the ex- continues her campaign to vilify dad in the eyes of her son, and family judges refuse to lift a finger to stop the calumnies. “You’re presumed guilty until proven innocent, and even then you’re still considered guilty,” Vonderheide wryly told the audience.

Are things as bad in the United States as they were in Soviet Russia? Of course not.

But accounts of anonymous informants, a galling presumption of guilt, ideologically driven prosecutions, a no-way-out criminal justice system, and the tacit condoning of perjury all point to an abuse industry that is spinning out of control.

The Spearhead Connection to Weinergate: Weiner Crushed Under Foot of Civic Virtue

W.F. Price · 8 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Back in January, Pierce Harlan wrote an interesting article featured here at The Spearhead on "Triumph of Civic Virtue," a New York City statue that had been neglected for some time due to political correctness. The statue depicted virtue (i.e. manliness) crushing vice and corruption, which were portrayed as medusa-like monsters, beneath his manly feet. Evidently, women took offense that the monsters were female (all bad things must be portrayed as male, of course). Some feminists saw it here, and eventually the article must have made its way to the desk of Anthony Weiner, an up-and-coming NY politician with a "progressive" stance.

Shortly thereafter, Pierce found that Weiner had begun denouncing the statue as "sexist," and in a publicity stunt drew up a Craigslist ad describing the statue as follows:

> Sexist Statue for Sale
> For Sale: 22-ton (sexist) marble "Triumph of Civic Virtue" statue by renowned sculptor Frederick MacMonnies.
> Own a (tasteless) piece of New York City history! Triumph of Civic Virtue created by sculptor Frederick MacMonnies – the artist behind iconic figures such as the Quadriga in Brooklyn's Grand Army Plaza – is now up for sale for a limited time.
> This controversial and offensive statue crudely depicts a young man with a sword triumphantly standing over the defeated bodies of two women. In 1941, then-Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia had the good sense to banish the figure from its initial location in City Hall Park.
> Unfortunately, it ended up in Kew Gardens, where it remains to this day.
> Now, community leaders want to see it go.
> All proceeds from the sale of this sexist eyesore will benefit the city of New York. Shipping is not included.

Surely, Mr. Weiner must have felt that rather than a statue of a virtuous young man, women across the United States would prefer to view cam shots of his genitalia in various states of tumescence…

Sometimes, justice is sweet. I want to give Pierce Harlan credit and congratulate him for assisting in exposing Weiner for the repugnant creature he is. The irony of Weiner being caught in his own web of lies and vice after denouncing a statue making a statement against just these kinds of scummy politicians is almost as satisfying as it gets. Adding to that feeling, of course, is the fact that he made an indirect attack on the content featured here shortly before being so utterly disgraced.

As for the statue, I'll propose a little change that should make everyone happy: carve little Weiner heads on the monsters under Civic Virtue's feet.

Anthony Weiner's Public Hypocrisy Begs for Investigation

W.F. Price · 9 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Despite the damage-control feminists such as Amanda Marcotte and others on the left have attempted to implement to salvage the career of their feminist lackey Anthony Weiner, most of which consists of writing something along the lines of "well, he isn't a hypocrite (and he's pro-abortion!)" more and more evidence has emerged demonstrating that he is exactly that.

Of course, the fact that he is a male feminist is enough for me to want to see the guy's political career go down in flames, but for some others a bit more convincing may be necessary.

Consider this: Anthony Weiner sponsored a bill that would require "sexual predators" (often an overly inclusive designation) to maintain a registered online identity to prevent them from stalking online.

There's no evidence so far that Weiner sent any lewd photos to minors, but it's certainly possible, especially considering how close some of those he approached online were to the legal limit. In fact, he was following at least one teenager, and that's something, given the circumstances, that ought to be looked into.

Personally, I'm highly skeptical of sex-offender hysteria, and think the fear of predators is overblown. Many of the people on sex offender registries are there for piddling offenses, such as urinating in public or hiring a prostitute, and the precedent the lists set is chilling.

But what is really outrageous is that a guy who was actively involved in promoting this kind of draconian measure is skating so dangerously close to engaging in the very thing he would have punished by force of law. This is about as disgusting and vile as hypocrisy gets.

Therefore, it would be entirely appropriate to launch a criminal investigation of Weiner to determine whether he is subject to restrictions and/or punishment under the laws that he promoted while in public office.

Weiner himself has already hired an attorney, which suggests that the congressman may be anticipating such an eventuality. In addition to that, the volume and vehemence of his initial lies combined with his refusal to step down indicate that he may yet have more to hide.

It is time to launch a comprehensive investigation of representative Anthony Weiner. His lies and abuse of taxpayer resources to procure sexual gratification should be sufficient justification for this, but above all he deserves it for being such a raging hypocrite.

Conservative Myopia in Regards to Feminism

I've been reading Robert Stacy McCain on Weinergate, because he's covering it quite well, and, I should add, he's a pretty good writer. Quite funny sometimes, and usually insightful. There's a lot about conservatism – particularly the libertarian brand McCain appears to favor – that appeals to me. However, I can't really climb on board, and one of McCain's latest posts on feminism and Weiner reminds me why.

The article, titled "Feminism and the Friendly Stranger" comes pretty close to the mark, and its conclusion is sound, but it's based on a flawed understanding of feminists and their motives. It even comes dangerously close to portraying feminists as victims, and that right there is the big hurdle conservatives will need to jump before they can effectively tackle this issue.

The gist of the article is that slick pols like Weiner are simply putting one over on women by feigning concern for their issues. Here's the opening premise:

> Guys who make a big show of being on board with the feminist agenda are just doing it to ingratiate themselves with women, perhaps with the worst sort of ulterior motives. [italics in original]

Well, of course these guys have ulterior motives. As for whether they are the worst sort or not, I'm not too sure, because having "getting laid" or "getting paid" as an ulterior motive is pretty damn common. McCain goes on to paint the male feminist as a sinister stranger with dirty plans on his mind, which is a nice effort and much appreciated, but we ought to be honest with ourselves here: the feminists know this game better than 99.9% of conservative men — that is to say, they know it instinctively.

Evolution, God, nature or what have you didn't create women to be gullible dupes and eternal victims. There's a natural balance of power between the sexes that has arisen as a biological measure to maintain the viability of the species. For each advantage one sex has over the other there is an opposing trait that neutralizes it. For example, men may be able to exert a great deal more physical force, but women wield the equally powerful force of persuasion in correspondingly greater measure than men.

Political women are aware of this. They know that a man's weakness is often their strength, and Mr. Weiner's online peccadilloes were evidence of a glaring weakness. Yes, Weiner was embracing feminism to ingratiate himself with women, but it wasn't so much a clever ploy as it was a necessity — as a scumbag politician he had no choice. If Weiner wanted to maintain office while engaged in such appalling behavior and hypocrisy, he had to pander to his most radical supporters. They had him right where they wanted him.

The problem is that too many conservative men give these women the benefit of the doubt. They underestimate their savvy while overestimating their sentimentality. McCain asks: "Don't these women see that guys who make a big show of being "feminist" are just running a game?"

Perhaps Weiner thought he was "gaming" the feminists, but it sure looks like he was dancing to their tune. Who's pulling the strings here?

In conclusion, he writes:

> The fact that they keep falling for that same transparent scam might lead us to suspect feminists of naïveté. They are the kind of suckers who are born every minute, and who should never be given an even break.
> They deserve Anthony Weiner.

They aren't naïve — conservatives are. Feminists know exactly what's going on here, and they are milking it to the last drop.

Given what use they've made of Anthony Weiner's shameless degeneracy, it isn't so much that they deserve him, but rather that he deserves them.

Feminist Weltschmerz?

W.F. Price · 11 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A putatively feminist tract has been making the rounds of the blogosphere, being posted on various men's forums and blogs, as well as a few feminist sites. Titled "Who Cares About Men's Rights," the author, a woman going by the name Ozymandias, answers "I do."

Parts of her piece bring up the old feminist shibboleths about gender identity, but other than that it isn't half bad. The only real problem with Ozymandias' piece is that she has a naïve understanding of what feminism is really about. However, this is an exceedingly common problem; most people just don't understand the true nature of feminism. For their sake, I hope they are never forced to understand, because it's a pretty ugly thing when you learn about it first-hand.

To truly understand feminism, you have to make a study of its obsessions and primary concerns. These include concepts such as dominance, control and privilege, all of which are intertwined and together constitute one thing: power. Feminism arose not in the spirit of liberation, but rather as a quest for empowerment. What makes this dangerous is that the philosophy behind the movement that bloomed in the 1970s was heavily influenced by Marxism, which seeks collective rather than individual empowerment. Such movements, by arbitrarily assigning people to one class, group, race, etc., always victimize innocents.

However, it does seem that Ozymandias has at least a glimmer of understanding of this issue:

> Feminists? You know what you are, as a movement, right now? You are that's not my department says Wernher Von Brauhn. I mean, have we learned nothing from when we got black people in the movement, and poor people, and queer people, and trans people, and disabled people? The side of "well, we shouldn't help with that, it's not our thing really" has never, ever, ever, ever turned out to be the right side! You would think we would have caught on to the trend by now!
> And what's that about "well, men should start their own anti-prison-rape and pro-stay-at-home-dads campaigns"? Oh, no, I have no idea why the single largest and most politically powerful movement about gender issues would have anything to say about gender issues that apply to half the fucking population! Listen, ladies and gentlemen, we are not going to solve this whole sexism thing as long as we're only looking at half the problem. You want women to be equal to men, then you damn well have to make men equal to women.
> And, no, a bunch of talking about how men need to be more feminist does not count as work on men's rights. I agree, men need to be more feminist. But we're not going to get them more feminist unless we show them what feminism can do for them, and that involves working on their problems in addition to being all "men can fight rape too!" Well, you know what, women can fight gender-policing too.

The only problem with the above is that, aside from a few quislings and kapos, feminism can never include men; that would simply be antithetical to its ideology. Assuming this is possible is as ridiculous as assuming that Marxist-Leninist Communism could welcome businessmen and Christians, or German National Socialism Jews and Slavs.

I'm sure some people who call themselves feminists don't see it that way, but whether conscious of it or not, they are living a lie. What they have to understand is that if they don't want to be part of something that has, as its base assumption, an adversarial assessment of relations between the sexes, they will have to drop feminism. I'd leave it up to them, but to encourage them I'd offer that feminism will ultimately be discredited and abandoned as its true nature becomes apparent to all.

One of the main reasons I've been hesitant to label myself a part of any explicit male-empowerment movement is I'd rather not be a hypocrite in this regard. Sure, I've written plenty of provocative pieces and taken women in general to task a number of times, but I don't think I've ever suggested giving male citizens legal privileges over women — something feminists seek for women all the time. In fact, my solution to the problems men face today is not more programs, entitlements and laws, but rather the elimination of those that were introduced to give women an advantage. When feminists call for an end to affirmative action for women and the abolition of VAWA, then I will take this talk of “equality” seriously, but that’s never going to happen. In fact, last I checked NOW wanted to reduce the child support arrearage constituting a felony to $5,000, which could easily pile up in less than 6 months for a working-class man who found himself out of work due to the lousy economy.

Think about that: feminists at NOW would have a poor man thrown in jail, stripped of his right to vote, and his ability to find future employment severely degraded simply for losing a job and falling behind on his bills. NOW placed this legislative effort in their “economic justice” category…

That isn’t justice — it’s sheer cruelty, oppression and disgusting disregard for basic human rights. If you call yourself a feminist, these are your fellow travelers.

Finally, after some criticism of MRAs, Ozymandias states that she wants to start her own movement. Maybe here she’s really starting to get it, because women who care about justice and progress for both women and men are going to have to do just that. Feminism has, quite frankly, failed them in that regard.

So, I suppose the question I’d ask Ozymandias is this:

If you care about men’s rights, why are you still calling yourself a feminist?

Slow Expansion of Topics

The Spearhead was founded by a group of men nearly two years ago to focus more attention on the ill effects of feminism, an ideology that was going nearly unchallenged in the public discourse. Feminist policy has become a real problem for millions of innocent men, fathers in particular bearing the brunt of it, but young, unemployed men, the falsely accused, men seeking a decent mate/partner and ordinary working men are all being exposed to additional burdens and restrictions as well.

The thing is, feminism alone is not responsible for all of this. Yes, it is an indispensable tool in the war on liberty and the growth of the police state, and it needs to be opposed with vigor by all those who want to live life as free men, but it isn't the only force striving for dominance and control over independent citizens. Perhaps it has been the most effective in terms of legislation, especially since the early 1990s, but the string of victories feminists have racked up is coming to a close. At this point, any further gains they make will have to be matched with some concessions; it's pretty much a certainty given the fiscal reality.

That said, I intend to keep an eye on feminists, and will definitely continue to write about these issues, but I'd like to expand the topics we cover to include other issues that pertain to liberty and justice. Although work remains to be done, awareness of feminism and its abuses is higher than it was a few years ago. Now it isn't just a few blogs, but major politicians and media figures who are beginning to seriously question the ideology. People finally recognize it as a threat and a morally bankrupt movement that seeks not equality, but supremacy. Perhaps most importantly, now even prominent men are bold enough to stand up to feminism, and no longer leaving only conservative women like Phyllis Schlafly or disillusioned activists like Camille Paglia to challenge it alone.

Rather than do anything dramatic, I'm simply going to slowly start introducing other issues that pertain to men, and encourage contributors to do so as well. Additionally, I'd like to introduce some ideas for proactive steps people can take to increase their personal liberty and enhance their lives. There's a spiritual lethargy that has gripped our civilization, and it's high time for a new assertion of our humanity and independence in many different areas of our lives.

I'd appreciate ideas from commenters on new topics to cover, and while we'll continue to cover the usual with about the same volume of content, I'm looking forward to writing about a few new issues as well. Personally, I think it's going to be kind of fun, but I thought I'd better warn you guys first so you don't think I've gone off the rez.

Slutwalk New Delhi?

W.F. Price · 13 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a sign that Western culture (the really aberrant kind this time) has again penetrated India, Umang Sabarwal, a New Delhi woman, has decided to follow her "empowered" Western sisters' lead and organize a slutwalk in her hometown.

Sabarwal, a fairly good-looking young woman of 19, complains:

> "Things are getting worse in Delhi for women and we haven't been doing anything about it. You get on a metro (subway) car here and men stare like animals at you, like you're meat. It's weird and yet most women are just silent about it."

Seems the concept of "eye-rape" has made it all the way to India, where poor Umang is under the brutal oppression of the patriarchy's probing gaze. Evidently, her idea to hold a slutwalk in India attracted a great deal of attention, much of it from the West, of course. So far, nearly 12,000 have said they will attend on the Facebook event page.

However, not all Indians are onboard with this. One young Indian man wrote:

> "Women are responsible for the consequences of wearing such outfittings … It is a very sensitive issue … There are other ways of emancipation. They are going back to 5,000 years. How about men start walking on the street exposed. Let's all make the street interesting."

New Delhi is allegedly a dangerous place for Indian women, where there are far more rape accusations than in Mumbai. However, Pavan Kumar, a New Delhi police inspector, says that about 50% of the accusations were false; a result of women lying to their families to cover up for their own indiscretions.

This is really what ought to worry Indian men, because young women are susceptible to suggestion and rape hysteria. Events such as the New Delhi slutwalk could well have the effect of increasing false accusations and vastly inflating the female public's sense of the danger of rape, which is a far less common crime than feminists make it out to be.

Betty Neumar, Bane of Husbands, Escapes Justice through Death

Betty Neumar, who left a trail of dead men and mourning family in her wake, died on monday at the age of 79. Several of her five husbands (since the 1950s) died of gunshot wounds in mysterious circumstances, as did one of her sons. Although circumstances were suspicious in a number of cases, Neumar escaped prosecution each time.

Finally, in 2008, North Carolina investigators reopened a murder case, and began to try to piece together the details of her life. It proved difficult, because the woman had told so many people different stories about herself and her past. However, some former in-laws said she had a violent temper after a few drinks, and could be abusive.

She collected life insurance on at least three men, including her son, her fourth husband Harold Gentry, and her last husband, John Neumar, who died in 2007.

Although we will now never know for sure, Betty Neumar may have been a serial killer whose murderous inclinations were facilitated by a society and political climate that prefers to suspend justice when crimes are committed by females.

These kinds of stories always make me wonder just how accurate spousal murder statistics really are. How many husbands who die in “accidents,” from “suicide” or “illnesses” were actually murdered? A great many more than we realize, I suspect.

The “Lone Ranger” Aesthetic — Riding high (and Single!) on the plains

By Ken Knight

A single man is not “expected” to remain single past the age of 30, that is a given even in this more “enlightened” age. It is also a given that a man who makes it past the age of 30 (even more so 35!) is “expected” to have fathered children. Ask anyone who is a parent of a man over 30 and that is typically what they will say, not to mention the man’s peers.

Any straight dude who has made it into his 30s and 40s without having been married with children or at least begotten some rug-rats of his own somewhere in his 20s knows the “stigma” others around him toss his way from time to time (though it is only a “stigma” to them). “What, you’re not married?” “You don’t have any kids?!!”

are just two of the usual questions asked a bachelor in his late 30s, 40S, and beyond, usually followed up by behind-the-back chatter about “something must be wrong with him” and other defamations once the “Lone Ranger” is out of ear-shot.

Of course, one doesn’t have to look too far to discover that the persons talking in contempt of a childless bachelor over the age of 35 are more-often-than-not ones who have themselves been through a tediously soul-wrenching, bank-robbing DIVORCE and/or CUSTODY BATTLE! Thus begs the argument that those who hurl whispered insults toward their single and childless brethren are more ENVIOUS than you might imagine and that they hold “Lone Rangers” in “contempt” only because they technically see a childless bachelor as a sort of “traitor” to the social order! Yes, if you are single and childless over the age of 35 and have made a name for yourself, afford nice things like a cozy condo, hot car, and possess disposable-income that most married men do not, then you have in the married man and woman’s eyes “betrayed” what is “expected” (unlike them).

I fit into the “Lone Ranger” category myself and have heard the words of “betrayed” friends and family over the years who “expected” me to have wife, kids, huge mortgage, and later a divorce and split of the marital assets as well! Only trouble is, for as urgent as it may feel to explain to your detractors about the pitfalls of Marriage 2.0 and the fact the institution is collapsing in on itself, they do not want to hear it and subsequently label you as having an “attitude” if you try to explain it to them (seems divorce and bankruptcy are this “expected” life as well, hmm?). I have to ask how many men have fallen into the snare of self-pity and overreaction to peers and family expectations for them to have a wife and kids, not to mention the “Broham” (male camaraderie) factor of one’s friends expecting their buddy to have a girlfriend on his arm every time he turns around or they’ll see him as “not getting any” and treat him accordingly with snide remarks and fag jokes?

(If anyone else here recognizes the pain-in-the-ass it is to keep a new girlfriend in your stable at any given time, you might agree that it gets OLD pretty damn fast).

Would it have helped a man like George Sodini who was “not getting any” well past his 30s up to the onset of age 50 and did what he did out of raw frustration over what he was “expected” to have in life? Doubtful, because of the difficulty of explaining how to step beyond what your family and peers “expect” you to have and what YOU want in this one and only life of YOURS, sports-fans. Telling some other guy about how he shouldn’t give one squirt of piss what society-at-large thinks about him “not getting any” and that having a small harem of girlfriends will become far more problematic for him in the near-future than it looks like in the Movies….might be easier to talk a frog out of getting wet!

Of all the “shit-tests” family members, buddies, and especially women have given us all over the years, I have a much simpler and honest one to consider for oneself:

1. Do you enjoy personal liberty to come-and-go as you please?
2. Do you enjoy not having to “answer” to anyone while at your own home?;
3. Do you enjoy eating/drinking/smoking whatever the hell you like?
4. Do you enjoy owning the kind of car or truck you prefer for yourself?
5. Do you laugh at other guys who are cuckolded and/or controlled by a wife?
6. Do you enjoy your disposable-income?
7. Do you avoid controlling, manipulative, and duplicitous women?
8. Do you feel good in your own skin and need no “validation”?

“Yes” to all of these questions places you square in the center of the “Lone Ranger” Aesthetic my friends, and it is really that simple for bachelors over the age of 35 as well as younger brothers who haven’t made the decision yet to go solo or get a female partner to share your horse and buggy. This is the simple test, ask yourself what do you LIKE and then reflect on what you’d be willing to sacrifice in the long term.

Sure, the engaged and married jerk-offs may envy your freedom and imagine a guy like you getting laid “on the fly” as most of us lifelong bachelors tend to do, those same peers of yours will separate themselves from you in short order. It is then that you point your finger and laugh in their honor, because they have far more to lose than you do, and in today’s feminazi divorce-courts, married men do lose more than you ever will, and even Mr. Engaged guy gets hammered if he breaks it off with Susie Sucksalot who sues her Ex for “pain” caused her in the break-up, not to mention any money promised, etc. etc.

Yeah sure Broham, sign me up for that program pronto!

“Expectations” are just that, and having flown through the “expectations” of family and friends over the years without changing one damn portion of who I am for “them”, I can fairly say that despite some difficulty one may discover in living life as a “Lone Ranger” who has his own horse and buggy under his sole proprietorship, the above questions mark the expectations of the only one who really counts in this life…..YOU!

Grandmothers and Institutional Change

The second generation born during the feminist era that started in the 1970s is already here, and they are generally small children. Not counting inner-city teen mom baby stacking, the oldest are still pre-teens. For second-wave feminists, this presents an interesting problem. All those advantages and privileges they fought for have been paid for in large part by their own sons, and many of them do have sons. In fact, anecdotal evidence suggests that a high proportion of militant anti-feminist young men grew up with staunchly feminist mothers. However, problems between parents and children are nothing new. Each generation goes through something like this, and the form it takes varies according to circumstances.

On the other hand, the bond between grandparents and grandchildren is rarely characterized by the competing interests, resentments and ideological clashes that so often beset parents and children. Grandparents and grandchildren tend to have an affection for each other that is based on mutual appreciation — it's a nice, easy sort of relationship with few demands or expectations on either side. Children with grandparents are lucky, as are grandparents themselves. Many adults, myself included, look forward to the day they can relax and enjoy time with grandchildren. It's a blessing and a source of joy in old age.

Today, however, one particular class of grandparents and potential grandparents has a lot less security in that regard. Namely, fathers' parents. Today we are seeing the first generation of feminist women become grandparents, and whatever differences they may have had with their sons – even however much they may have rationalized supporting policies that directly harmed their sons – losing the opportunity to be grandmothers is not a compromise they are willing to make. In fact, in all likelihood they never counted on it at all — they were never supposed to become victims of feminism; that wasn't part of the program!

It seems that lately this has just begun to dawn on some of the more intelligent of these women, and it shows in the increasingly unsympathetic attitude one sees from professional second wavers, like Judge Judy, toward young women. Every now and then I watch her court show, and she is often harder on the girls than the male judges.

Here's an example:

According to Wikipedia, she has at least three sons (maybe four — not sure whether "Jamie" is a boy or girl), and many grandchildren, and there's no doubt in my mind that this makes a difference in her attitude toward young women. Also, being a judge, she's probably witnessed hundreds – if not thousands – of instances of women steamrolling their children's fathers in court. As a grandmother whose grandchildren come largely from sons, this must give her some cause for alarm.

Judge Judy probably caught on earlier than many of the others; born in 1942, she's a bit older than your typical boomer second waver. However, there are a lot of women in their 50s or early 60s who are just starting to wake up to the uncomfortable realization that – as mothers of sons – they are effectively second-class grandparents. I used to think that a lot of older supporters of feminism would carry their bias to the grave, but if there's any issue that will change their attitude, this is it. And the beautiful thing about it is that this is more than simply a design flaw in feminism; it is an inherent weakness. By pitting men and women against each other, feminists wreck the family, and eventually even women pay for that.

Feminism sowed the seeds of its own destruction, and those seeds are beginning to bear fruit even now.

Sock Puppetry of the Penis

What the fake lesbian blogger incidents tell us about misandry in the modern western left

By Peter

Recently, the plight of people resisting the crackdown of brutal Syrian dictator Bashir al-Assad has been in the news. It's not a surprise then that any dissenting bloggers from within the country would be under increased scrutiny and attention. Especially ones belonging to favoured grievance groups. As I'm sure a few of you have heard by now, a blog called "A Gay Girl in Damascus" turned out to have been written entirely by a 40 year old straight American male in Scotland. The blog had been active for over three years.

The deception came to a head when a post claiming to have been by a cousin of the Gay Girl reported she'd been arrested. Alarmed by the news, the blog was traced by one of the administrators of a popular lesbian blog, "Lez Get Real", Paula Brooks, who had given the Gay Girl in Damascus an early platform. The blog was traced, to Scotland, and Paula helped out the fake Syrian Lesbian. In a very ironic development, Paula herself was then outed as a straight male 58 year old retired Air Force veteran and construction worker.

First, let's set aside any easy schadenfreude and just say that such deception is wrong. What personal secrets did these men have confided to them under the guise of their lesbian personas? Who may have put themselves at risk investigating the arrest of the Gay Girl in Damascus? We all place a degree of trust in each other on the internet: imagine if W.F. Price turned out to be a radfem sockpuppet snaking us all? Who then emailed your employers with your names and linked them to all your posts? Creepy to think about, since politically incorrect opinions by straight men are intolerable in society.

But are politically correct opinions by straight men tolerated by the left? Indeed, this is what may have compelled these two leftist men to create these sock puppet personas. The man who pretended as "Paula Brooks" was quoted as saying "I didn't start this with my name because … I thought people wouldn't take it seriously, me being a straight man," he said. Originally, he wanted to start this blog because he noticed some injustice gay friends were facing. The question is, could he have blogged about gay issues openly as a straight man? The answer is no.

As many of you may know, modern leftism is concerned with something they call social justice. Whatever they name it, it's basically a system where people are assigned to castes based on their race, gender, sexual orientation, religion and level of disability. The less white, male, straight, Christian and able-bodied you are, the less "privilege" you have, and perversely, the more your opinions matter. In the world of academia, and its close cousin, the leftist blogosphere, identity politics are the most important factor in whether or not your arguments are accepted. Thus, if you're a straight able bodied white male, you are barred from commenting on issues related to gays, disabled people, and women, since you have straight privilege, ableist privilege and male privilege. Moreover, you're not allowed to criticize any opinions by any gays, disabled people, and women on the left, no matter what the subject. Because you have so much privilege, you see.

It gets worse than that, though. Take, for example, David Futrelle, creator of the Manboobz site dedicated to quoting MRA comments out of context and mocking them. So far, Futrelle is playing by the rules – he's a straight male and he's criticizing other straight males. So he decided to write an article for feminist megasite Feministe criticizing Scott Adams. Even better: straight white male attacking rich straight white male.

But then something strange happened. Even though Futrelle had most definitely paid his feminist dues, even though he'd set up and run his own site and criticized only other straight males, thus making sure he wasn't abusing his privilege, he was still run out of town by the Feministe crowd. Why? Because he used the word "crazy" when describing some opinion Adams had. Obviously this showed what a cruel ableist he was, because "crazy" refers to people with mental disabilities. Check it out, the frenzy the feminists work themselves into in the comment section is worth a read. For the lulz.

Here's my take on what happened. The crowd at Feministe doesn't just hate male privilege. It simply hates men, period. This explains why they disqualified a guy who played by all their rules on a technicality. And that goes for the rest of the leftist blogosphere too. Within this world, and academia, straight white males, because of their imagined privileges, are the lowest of the low. They're the unclean class.

This brings me back to these straight men pretending to be gay women. Why did they do it? Because, in the leftist world, it was the only way for their voices to be heard. Even if they'd been complete flagellants, constantly ritually purifying themselves by "examining their own privilege", they'd still be unclean. And the messed up thing is, as gay bloggers they were effective! " Paula Brooks" and "her" site was among the most popular, which just goes to show you that when men are allowed to compete on even terms, they win. That's why Futrelle wasn't allowed to contribute to Feministe anymore. Because within a week of posting, it was clear that this man, misguided douchebag that he is, was the best writer on the damn site, period.

All of this reminds me of Robert Connell, male feminist professor and head honcho of the feminist approved "Men's studies" academic association. Or should I say, now the trans-gendered Raewyn Connell. And it made me think – obviously this guy had some transgendered tendencies to begin with, caused by estrogen hitting his brain in utero or whatever – but something had to happen to push him into transitioning at age 60. And maybe, given the man-hating environment of the modern left, it wasn't that he was tired of being a man. Maybe he was tired of being a leper.

Employment Game Part II : Recognizing the Need to Change Your Approach

Featured Guest · 16 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Elmer

In Part I we described the femocratized landscape facing men in search of work and its default process for humiliating decent chaps who don't understand how the game is rigged. We continue now with Part II, which rips the lid off the secret body of knowledge known as Employment Game.

The basic concept here is to change your thinking from being a passive, hopeful job-seeker with hat in hand begging for a job to that of an active work monger. It involves learning techniques of salesmanship to open up work opportunities outside of the interfaces, now controlled by females, that you have been led to believe will land you a job.

In times of yore (well, in the modern age, a brief period between 1949-1979), a guy could scan the newspaper job ads, send in a resume or apply in person, and have a reasonable chance of attaining long-term work or even a career with benefits that could support a family. All of us know that times have changed for a lot of reasons, but the job search approach has remained essentially the same. For many men, it not only doesn't get results, it hits their self-esteem pretty hard. Trying to make sense of it, let alone developing a work-around, is a bit beyond most guys. Their needs are immediate; it can take years to get this right. I learned it because I have been such a miscreant ne'er-do-well for the last 35 freakin years that I managed to get fired, layed off, or tossed from sinking ships so many times that I learned to swim the leech-infested waters of post-industrial America and occasionally surface onto dry land, palm trees, and sunshine. So if I tell you to get a pair of gabardines, just listen to what I am saying, Numbnuts, and go out and do it.

Above the small shop level, the current HR front has little to do with finding qualified workers and more to do with putting up a façade to exclude you and funnel your resume into the trash, as well as to make an appearance to being serious about diversity and other social concerns that, apparently, you are obliged to feel responsible for. That is, out of moral suasion, willing to let some competitor slip through the filter and grab the goods. It gets even worse, as often companies have already identified an internal candidate for the job but go through the charade of interviewing some hopeful chap merely to answer legal requirements for filling the position. "Job Fairs" are PR stunts to project compliance with gender and diversity mandates. Your chance of getting a gig through one of these productions are about the same as scoring a babe through some bar scene. Your probability of getting scorned and rejected are about the same as well, but at least at the bar you can say to her "That's OK, I had to take a shit anyway."

Companies routinely lie in your face, yet you are expected to conform to a stereotype of a "good" employee. Let's examine one of these lies. Nowadays every company has a "career opportunities" web page, 90% of which appear to have been coded by the same people to the point of using the same damn stock photo models. What is the message the corporation is trying to convey? That these people actually work at that company? They do not. Then does it mean that these are the kind of people they want you to believe work there? Or that these are the kind of people they are seeking? Whatever the case, it boils down to one truth: it's a big lie. They are lying to your face from the get-go and to submit to their process you are going to have to suspend belief and play along with the charade, all while letting them examine in lurid detail all aspects of your personal life. This, my friends, is a "crazy maker".

To keep your sanity intact, for young and old men alike it means not playing their game. It means developing a narrative and persona that you can apply on a regular basis to score new work. You are going to define and internalize an honest self-image that will take over the controls when you enter a work selling situation and guide it to a satisfactory conclusion, which doesn't necessarily mean that you are getting the job. This takes a lot of effort but you can start simple and build it over time.

Secondly, it means understanding what your market is and who exactly you are going to approach to sell your skills. This is where you are going to have to do some legwork and research. Thanks to the internet it's a lot easier to do this than previous times. That is one advantage the current paradigm gives you.

For the younger man, learn to identify the manager or business owner and approaching him (not "him or her") directly with a short narrative and contact info. Do not walk into a business and ask "are you taking applications" or "do you have any openings". If you hand your application to some low-end employee it is likely get diverted to the trash or you will be told that the position is already filled (because they want their friend to get it). Your act of salesmanship in contacting and talking to the man running the operation will demonstrate a huge difference in initiative over your competitors.

For the older guy, recognize the inherent prejudices against you and develop tactics for cutting through it. You are going to make a stand that you have endured your last interview. It is almost guaranteed that you are going to get treated badly if you go the job ad/interview route so it's time to put that trap behind you. The methods I'm describing work best with guys around your own age, at least in my experience. They are the ones who are going to be least prejudiced against you. Guys in their 50s and 60s are generally going to treat you ok. The upside of this is that they are also the exact players you want to contact using the methods I will describe; they are the guys running companies or being the chief engineer; they are the entrepreneurs who will be most open to consulting services from the self-employed.

There's another thing I've noticed about some older men who run entrepreneurial companies. They could retire but stay in their game because it's balls; they enjoy being in the game too much. These are the guys you want to get to know and emulate. Learn to speak the language that gets them to think "Out-fucking-standing!" because you are one in a thousand that gets it.

The very act of defining your sales persona, and importantly, taking control of the sales interview, gives you a sense of control over your destiny in the face of turbulent economic forces. It is vitally important to develop high confidence. When you follow their script and engage in their role-playing, it is difficult to maintain your self-esteem. Being confronted with the haughty conceits of the employed and their false self-importance while they ask you inane questions about what you see yourself doing in 5 years, or to describe your biggest weaknesses, or worse, to engage in what-if scenarios or interview tests (devised by some HR twit, to be sure), is unendurable. Trudging home to your family after getting skinned alive like this can really make you feel unhinged.

You are going to develop your own script for your skill base and your industry. Guaranteed you are going to get shot down a lot. Get used to it. At least you are fighting on your terms. Each little paper cut prepares you for the next battle. And when you follow your own rules, at least you walk out with your balls intact.

In the first essay I ranted about the feminization of work and the need for men to learn new methods for dealing with it. The timeless craft of salesmanship provides exactly the template you need to customize for your unique talents. I am advocating "salesmanship" but not sales gimmickry. Google(salesman images). That is not what I am talking about here. This is not telemarketing or magazine sales or trying to con someone into buying 200 gallons of parking lot sealer. (By the way, for any of you ladies reading this who think my observations on the feminization of work and wide-spread discrimination of men are BS, google(saleswoman images) and compare that to what you see when you google(salesman images). The emergent behavior of the internet exposes the hideous lies of the feminarchy. Mwhahahahahaha Mwhahahahahaha)

Originally I had hoped to wrap up this series by now but the more I think about this topic the more material spills onto the keyboard of my Alphasmart NEO, thus I will have to write one final installment to send tears of joy streaming down your cheeks.

In Part III of Employment Game : Tools for Transformation, I will lay out what you need to synthesize a system to work the game to suit your needs. It consists of :

-Developing the Right Attitude

-Your Marketing Process

-Your Narrative and Marketing Materials

-The Killer Wardrobe

-Prospect Discovery

-Salesmanship and Rainmaking

-The Structure for Continual Practice

Weiner Wilts Under Scrutiny, Resigns

Anthony Weiner finally announced his resignation after weeks of uproar over his online exhibitionism. Weiner's indiscretions are really nothing important in the grand scheme of things, but they were a further humiliation for Americans who used to have some respect for political office.

The resolution of Weinergate should give men some satisfaction, as it has resulted in the removal of a committed feminist white knight, and a raging hypocrite to boot, from Congress. However, there are certainly plenty of others skulking around in DC at the moment, and we should do what we can to bring their insidious deeds to light and give them the opportunity to share in some Weineresque infamy.

I'd like to point out once again that Weiner's fall from power was preceded by enormous hubris, as he took on "Civic Virtue," attempting to cast it out of New York in a gesture to his feminist allies.

He lost.

"Clark W. Griswold": Icon of a bygone era

By Ken Knight

Anyone who has seen John Hughes' 1983 comedy film National Lampoon's VACATION remembers the affable, hard-working husband/father character of "Clark Griswold" (played by actor Chevy Chase) who seeks to take his wife and two kids on a continent-crossing road trip to the (fictional) "Wally World" Fun Park near Los Angeles. In the early 1980s when the film was released in theaters, it was a hit comedy with an R-rating (due to profanity and actress Beverly D'Angelo's nude shower scene) aimed at adults who might subscribe to the mishap-humor in a "family life" setting.

Over 25 years later, the premise of this film is still funny and enjoyable for its off-color shenanigans (and politically-incorrect scenarios) but it also serves as a "reflection" for men who fail to see the typical American family (of four or five) in similar vein like he did back in the good ol' days of yesteryear. The fictional character of Clark Griswold is an overly-optimistic but educated man who is the sole breadwinner for his family, his attractive wife Ellen a stay-at-home wife and mother of their son Rusty and daughter Audrey, both of whom love their parents even if they deride them as "weird" from time to time as teens often do (but the parental respect remains, even in this comedy flick!).

The character of Clark is smart despite his clumsiness and affable naiveté on many common-sense issues, clearly the head of his household as we notice how his decisions rule the roost, usually getting everything he wants done even if the results are not what he intended (comedy plotline) with his wife and kids tagging along regardless, bitching and moaning but doing what Clark sets out to do nonetheless! From inner-city thugs, corrupt local mechanics, an irritating leech of an Aunt in his backseat who dies on him, a freeloading cousin named Eddie taking half his cash, and a smoking-hot sexy blonde driving a Ferrari (Christie Brinkley) prick-teasing him along the highway….Clark and his clan make it to "Wally World" by his sheer perseverance and reckless audacity all the while his wife and kids wanted to give up and go home. Comical and entertaining Clark is for his wit and bumbling naiveté outside his comfort-zone, the character is a MAN who takes-charge of his family and provides for them while denying his own fun. His wife and kids follow his lead because he always manages to lead them to the sunshine despite the rigmarole of mishaps in between. Clark W. Griswold led his family on what he called a "pilgrimage to see a moose" (the moose mascot of "Wally World") with all the tenacity of Don Quixote, and entertaining us for 2 hours in the process!

Comical as Clark is to watch on screen, the archetype male he represents is today seen by many in a slowly collapsing western civilization as a "dinosaur", "misogynist", and even "oppressor" then scoffed at by the younger generation who might (or might not) catch the movie VACATION on Blue-Ray or late night Cable-TV. Clark Griswold for all his funny actions and mishaps was the patriarch of his family of four, the husband and father whose primary purpose in life was to provide for his wife and two growing children, even if it meant working longer hours to keep their lifestyle intact.

If VACATION was to be re-made by Hollywood today, I would suspect the plot would be scripted differently in order to provide the "corrected" view of family life for the Griswolds and better appeal to a "wider audience" (i.e. women and teens) and it might likely go something like this…. Clark would be living in an apartment following an unexpected divorce from Ellen where she cleaned up in Family Court with full-custody of Rusty and Audrey as well as the house and ¼ of her ex-husband's income in alimony and child support since she was a "stay-at-home" wife all those years, subsequently turning Rusty and Audrey against their father who incessantly plans to take them with him to "Wally World" during "his weekend". Clark's ex-wife Ellen would discover his plan to take the kids to Wally World and naturally be furious about such an adventure, getting her new boyfriend to go sabotage it somehow and follow them along the way (and if the boyfriend fails to thwart her Ex-husband's plans for "family fun" she will get a new boy-toy to take warm showers with her instead). Yes, Generation-Y audiences might laugh at such a premise, enjoying the sight of Clark as the defrocked husband and father, "exchanged" for a boyfriend-thug and half his assets taken out from under him without Clark having done anything wrong besides….getting married in the first place!!

My point is this: fictional stories, movies, and their iconic characters like Mr. Griswold are fast becoming "icons" of a bygone era, examples of what family life used to be like for real (not funny mishaps that normally wouldn't happen) when a man was the head of his house, and provided for his wife and children cheerfully without fear of it all coming to a devastating divorce soaking and end-game thievery that Marriage 2.0 has delivered (without anything to laugh about). Perhaps the fictional example of the comical but seriously-dedicated "family man" of Clark W. Griswold with his loyal wife and kids might be the final televised example of the lost family-man of a bygone era….that is, if there will be anyone of intelligence left in the "modern family" decades to come.

Before Father's Day

Although I support Father's Day and think it's a nice gesture, I'd like to remind people of the other men who contribute to our children's welfare but still so often go overlooked. Unfortunately, these days men are increasingly shut out of this role due to paranoia and feminization of education and childcare, but they still exist.

They are the teachers, coaches, doctors, emergency responders and others who fulfill the masculine role needed to care for our little ones and keep them safe. They are ordinary men who, because of their fundamentally good and caring nature, make a positive difference in the lives of children.

As a father, I am deeply grateful to them. The young man who ran my daughter's preschool class, for example — a decent, good teacher whose calm demeanor combined with no-nonsense self-possession gives him the fortitude to command both respect and affection from the children he is responsible for. My children's pediatrician at Swedish Medical Center, who set my mind at ease when my son was an infant with allergies and colic (both resolved, thankfully). A teacher friend of mine, a New York transplant who worked his way through school and now teaches math in local public schools. My stepfather, who is a good man, great teacher and excellent grandfather. There are far more than I can name or count…

It's good to be appreciative of fathers, but there are good men everywhere – fathers or not – and they deserve recognition from all of us. So, as a father, I'm happy for the recognition of my efforts, but Father's Day isn't close to enough to show appreciation for the men in our society.

As we think about our fathers, or our fatherhood, I think we ought to remember that there's a little of the father in every man. Far from being a threat, the majority of men around us are guardians, benefactors and providers for the rest of us, including and especially our children. What a poor, hostile world it would be without the helping hand of men to guide and protect our little ones!

In the meanwhile, we should celebrate Father's Day by remembering all the good men in our lives — they deserve far more credit than they get these days.

A Trip to the Brothel: A Father's Day Story

Featured Guest · 19 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Uncle Elmer

Gavin McInnes wrote a great piece about "old men" which pretty much describes my dad.

One item caught my eye: "They tell great stories. It's not only their war stories that are a barrel of laughs. These guys have been honing their material for decades and have the whole "beginning, middle, and end" thing down to a science."

In my recent employment essays I discuss the need for ordinary guys to learn marketing techniques, one of which is being able to tell a good story. Most of you can probably tell a good tale to your friends, but doing it in an uptight public situation can be a real challenge. It's tough to tell a story without sounding like a braggart, which can be an instant deal-killer. Seems the ones best received are those that share a common lesson or experience.

In the book "Presentating to Win", Jerry Weissman describes crafting a story to make a sales presentation. Technical types tend to focus on minute details of their product which often leaves the audience wondering how it solves their actual problem.

I tried the storyline approach during some recent sales meetings, and it worked! The financial players funding the project liked my simplified narrative after enduring intensive technical discussions that left them disoriented. I gave them a high-level view with guidelines for managing the project and ended up getting a much needed contract.

Ten years ago I asked my dad to write down stories of his youth. Now Dad was a moral upstanding pillar of his community, so I read with interest the following tale. Notice the format Gavin described : beginning, middle, and end. The vignette of 1930s Arizona border life is fascinating. I wonder what the kid's dad said when he returned with the damaged car.

A Trip to the Brothel

In one's life there are those experiences that stand out from the ordinary, some startling, some dramatic, others joyful, yet others frightening, still others coming out seemingly on the verge of engulfing you with you feeling powerless to prevent your going under. In the early summer of 1939, between my junior and senior year at Nogales High School, Jim Thomas, a friend of mine whom I had known in Naco, came down to Nogales from Tucson, in a convertible coupe driven by a friend of his. The car I believed belonged to his friend's father.

It was early evening, and after being joined by another friend of mine, the four of us went across the border in the coupe to a beer garden where we had a pitcher of beer. Not long after we had sat at our table, Jim suggested we go to a large brothel on the outskirts of Nogales, Sonora. I had no inclination to go there at all, nor did my Nogales friend. But Jim persisted, so in the end we four piled into the coupe again and headed for the brothel. It was made up of a large dance hall and a long, single story row of rooms transverse to the hall. Inside there was an orchestra at one end and young women sitting in chairs along the sides of the hall. At the other end there was a bar. After entering, we four stood together close by. A women came up to us, and striking up a conversation in broken English with Jim, reached an agreement with him for the two of them in indulge in her trade. As they left the hall, we three got into the coupe and followed along the row of rooms to hers. We waited there after she and Jim disappeared into her room. Not very long after, seemingly only a minute or two, Jim burst from the room with his clothes on but holding his underwear in one hand and shouting, "Let's get out of here!". He pushed into the coupe onto my Nogales friend's lap with me in the middle, and the other lad at the wheel.

As we started out, careering down the dirt road, the woman ran from the room shouting "Policia!". We turned away from the dance hall on the road leading away from it. I turned my head to look behind us, and as I did I could see a policeman astride the road with his pistol in his hand taking aim at us and shouting, apparently for us to stop. Simultaneously, I saw his pistol jump twice and next heard the third of one bullet striking the convertible framework immediately above my head. I shouted at the driver to stop the car, that the policeman was firing at us with deadly intention,

Coming to a stop we waited in the car, and in what seemed like an instance a police van had come up and backed up to one side of the car with the policeman along side. We each crawled out the other side the driver's side, and at that point I took the lead in opening up a conversation with the policeman. In an intense exchange, I somehow convinced him that we had the utmost respect for Mexican law, that we had no intention of doing harm, damaging property, or behaving with scorn or indignity against the Mexican people. I added that we would readily compensate anyone having a claim against us. The policeman apparently was mollified by my fluency in Spanish and my respectful attitude towards him, He hesitated momentarily, then said that he had knocked the heel off one of his shoes when he ran down the road from the dance hall in response to the cry, "Policia". I took a collection from the other three, and adding my money, gave it to him. He then let us go. While we were with the policeman, a crowd had gathered. My Nogales friend was crying, and the other two were standing by seemingly in shock. As we left the scene, I felt quite good about myself having maintained my self control and kept my head, and avoided for the four what could have been a calamity. After we got back across the border. Jim and his friend left town heading for Tucson. I can't recall our conversation as we drove back, nor what had caused the dispute between Jim and the woman or if in fact he told us.

The Man who Inspired Fathers' Day

According to an article I just read in the Seattle Times (unfortunately more of the typical backhanded praise of fathers), it was a Spokane, Washington woman who came up with the idea for Fathers' Day. Interested, I decided to do a bit of research, and found a rather touching story behind the holiday.

In 1909 Sonora Smart Dodd, who lived in Spokane at the time, was annoyed at the common portrayal of fathers as lazy, good-for-nothing ne'er-do-wells. This hardly squared with what she knew of her own father, who had raised six children by himself after his wife died in childbirth.

Sonora's father, William Jackson Smart, was born in Arkansas in 1842. Raised on a farm, he joined the Grand Army of the Republic during the Civil War and served as a gunner in the Arkansas 1st Battery Light Artillery. After the war, he married his first wife, Elizabeth Harris, who died at only 30 in 1878. Two years later, he married again (to Ellen Victoria Cheek Billingsley) and eventually moved to Washington state in 1887 to farm near Spokane.

In 1898, his second wife died while giving birth at the advanced maternal age of 47. 56 years old at the time, Mr. Smart was left alone with an infant and five children (his children from his first wife were already grown at the time). Sonora, about 16, was the oldest child still in the house, and the only girl. She and her father raised the boys together, and she grew to have a great appreciation and love for her father as he held things together through those difficult years.

Years later, when Sonora was a grown woman with a husband and son of her own, she came up with the idea for Fathers' Day after hearing a Mothers' Day sermon. She proposed the celebration to a church group in Spokane, choosing a June date, because her father's birthday was in June. The pastors liked the idea, and on June 19, 1910 Spokane held the first Father's Day celebration.

Soon, the celebration gained traction across the nation, and within a few short years it became a tradition. In 1916 President Woodrow Wilson came to Spokane in person to deliver a speech on Father's day, and 50 years later President Lyndon Johnson made the holiday official.

After a brief illness, William Jackson Smart died in Spokane in 1919. All nine of his children were at his side.

On the Tom Ball Incident

W.F. Price · 20 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've been getting a great many emails about Thomas Ball's self-immolation, and some requests to write about it in comments. I think it's an important story, but it's one of those things that I want to think about a bit so as to understand what the lessons are here. Fortunately, the incident has already been fairly well-covered in the manosphere, so it's fairly well known. However, if you haven't yet heard about what happened, it involves a CPS and child support case, and Mr. Ball's struggles with the local bureaucracy and its enforcement arms.

Here's a good article about it, written by William Norman Grigg for Lew Rockwell's site.

I'm going to reflect on this one and see what I can come up. Mr. Ball left us with a fair amount of material in his long essay explaining his decision, and it's not the kind of thing one wants to go off on half cocked.

A friend pointed out how remarkable it is that this incident has received no national news coverage, but actually this doesn't surprise me much. There's a lot here that is extremely uncomfortable for those in positions of comfort and security. In fact, if they have any sense at all, they should be downright terrified, but I'll get to that later.

Seattle Slutwalk

Because the slutwalk was held on Fathers' Day in Seattle, I was unable to observe the event myself (not the kind of thing one brings young children along to see). Fortunately, the Seattle PI put together a photo gallery of the event, and it doesn't appear that I missed anything but an even raunchier, more tasteless version of the local Pride Parade.

The pictures, if one cares to go through them, are a depressing display of the dregs of Seattle — the city's tattooed, flabby, perverted and ugly who always associate with such causes. Mercifully, the sun did not shine on them. It appears that the "Radical Women" showed up, which is not surprising. They are professional demonstrators associated with the Freedom Socialist Party; a Trotskyite organization comprised mostly of older lesbians and their exotic third world immigrant girlfriends. I'm always a bit bemused by how young feminists will claim that feminism has nothing to do with Communism. In fact, it is a direct outgrowth. The Radical Women/FSP here in Seattle features a stained glass Trotsky on their office window — I saw it myself just the other day while walking up 45th near the University of Washington with a friend whose father was a refugee from the Bolsheviks.

I have to conclude that Roissy was right about the slutwalks:

> There is also the self-soothing psychological angle at work here. Beasts who love to brag about their sluttiness aren't convincing others so much as they are convincing themselves of their imaginary desirability. A grrlpower slut walk is just the medicine for a lonely loser girl who's spent one too many nights with her purple saguaro, which now vibrates in fear. She can bellow at the top of her lungs along with the rest of the sideshow freaks what a DYNAMIC and MAGNETIC piece of ass she is, and for that brief moment — that sweet afternoon escape on the streets of the city — she believes it, and her happiness swells as she fondly misremembers all those depressing, sloppy one night stands as some sort of twisted proof of her femininity and sexiness.

Beasts and sideshow freaks indeed.

On the Use of Force

W.F. Price · 21 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Thomas Ball's suicide has prompted discussions about what is an appropriate means of resistance. Because a self-immolation is an act that precipitates a lot of emotion, some people are advocating the use of force (in many cases spuriously, I assume), and some are asking what my thoughts are on "violence" as a solution to political problems.

I don't think it's the right time for men to take on the responsibility that use of force entails. When one takes it to that point, there's no going back, or at least that's what one should assume. If a man is responsible for death, injury or confinement – even if for a just cause – he necessarily carries an enormous burden.

However, accountability goes both ways, and this seems to have been lost on state actors here. Our ideological opponents regularly advocate state violence against men, and it seems that they feel that using the state or the law as a weapon somehow absolves them of responsibility. This is exactly the argument that Pontius Pilate made as he ordered the crucifixion, and it just doesn't wash.

So, rather than speculate about whatever feeble measures individual men could take in retribution for state/feminist abuses, at this point we need to focus on the use of force against men, and hold those who advocate as well as perpetrate it responsible.

Arresting and jailing indigent men for their poverty is unjustified use of force.

Seizing men's children on unproven pretexts or accusations is an abuse.

Beating men in their own homes is an unjustified use of force.

Attacking compliant men with dogs is excessive violence.

Shooting despondent men in the face is unjustified.

All of these things are regularly done as a direct result of feminist policy. Feminists are not even subtle about their calls for men to be jailed on their behalf — the New York Model for Batterer Programs, endorsed by Michael Kimmel's NOMAS, conspicuously places a picture of a man in handcuffs on its website's homepage.

The implication is that this is justice; that batterers deserve it. Well, what about the justice for men who have been falsely accused, wrongfully assaulted by police, wrongfully incarcerated and robbed of their property? Why do the perpetrators in these cases escape punishment?

There is a clear imbalance of justice there, and before anyone starts hurting people, this imbalance must be articulately spelled out. It is never a good idea to pick up a gun and start shooting to address some vaguely defined injustice — that is savagery. Before the American Revolution, for example, patriots took pains to spell out a long list of grievances that justified rebellion. Without prior sustained efforts to redress grievances and a litany of legitimate complaints they would have been entirely without moral support, and that mattered a great deal in the course of the Revolution.

We have to make our own lists, air our grievances, and give the state the opportunity to redress them. Likewise, we, too, can demand justice for outrages against our rights and persons. Before anyone resorts to the same methods the state uses against us, we must put every reasonable effort into working with the law and the political system we have. Because this effort is still in its infancy, any calls for armed resistance are entirely premature and counterproductive, and shouldn't be taken seriously.

Single Man Unwelcome

"No Wife…No Kids…No Dice?"

By Ken Knight

Anyone who is not a cloistered monk has seen signs in restaurants warning that persons must have shoes and shirts upon entering the establishment. (I was always one who wondered why they never included PANTS on the list as well, haha). Anyhow, the warning signs of today still have the clothing requirement but also tend to include weapons, concealed firearms, and tobacco products on their "no-go" lists for entrance into their Mall, restaurant, gymnasium, Movie Theater, etc. Being private-property, I for one can respect such rules since I am entering a domain owned by a private entity that has the legal right to kick my ass out for bringing in something questionable. However, the "barring" of actual people from an establishment just because who they are physically is against the Law, but that little legal formality isn't about to stop would-be tyrants from excluding "undesirables" (men) from the public venue when they get a hard-on in the name of "safety".

Yes it's a given — the single man going into a restaurant alone to dine is often treated to either the worst table or ushered to the Bar (so as to save the tables and booths for larger dining parties and families) and a lone male sitting in a Church without wife or kids beside him is usually viewed as "recovering" from either drugs or alcohol by the rest of the congregation (just ask any Pastor). Nowadays, a couple of men without wife and kids out to play Chess in a New York City public park paid for with his tax dollars can be subject to a fine for venturing into an area of the park where the Chess tables are located, but also happens to be a sector of the park designated for children with parents ONLY! Ask the City about such a regulation and the "protection of children" mantra is foisted as high as one of those rainbow flags in a downtown Manhattan parade.

I don't even need to provide convincing examples (links) of the growing ordinances, legal cases, and police reports posted online, etc. regarding this eerie new "public safety" phenomenon because you've all noticed examples of such creeping draconian Statism on the horizon that clearly does not have MEN in the best interest here in the "free" US of A (I won't even mention what's going on in Europe!). From soft-law tactics such as the "children only" parks and public spaces to the digital communication apps that allows female college students to report "street harassers" (straight men flirting) on their social- network as a quasi-legal "safety" measure, the creeping panther of tyranny directed at a certain segment of the male population in the Western World is becoming undeniable.

Who allows such a thing to grow and creep slowly towards us? WE DO!

Has there been any significant challenge in court to localities like NYC barring single men from taxpayer-funded parks and illegally branding them "suspects" who "might" harm children? NO. Has there been any lawsuit against women who unfairly post pictures of men who say something to them in public on social-networks branding them "street-harassers"? NO. Have single men sued restaurants or even Churches for the way they've been treated or boycotted such places after the first time they were treated like second-class citizens? Well, if they have, it's not been reported in the major news media!

Try walking into a Public School as a man without a child and see the response to your visit even though you're a taxpayer…or simply visit your High School Alma Mata as an adult male by yourself and see how you're treated (say hello to the armed police officer).

The fear of sexual predators anywhere near children is defensible yes, but to what extent the Law will eventually go to keep perceived "sexual predators" from places other peoples' children frequent remains to be seen. It is approaching the point that one does not have to be on a sex offender registry in order to be treated like one, as we are beginning to see with single (childless) men being treated with suspicion from public parks to public schools to Boy Scout Jamborees, and even Video Game Arcades in Malls.

Is it too extreme to imagine that single childless men are inadvertently seen “suspected” as sexual predators of some sort simply because they don’t have a fat wife (and another man’s kids) tagging along with them in public? Maybe, maybe not….

In spite of these larger examples of situations/locations where single childless men are clearly not welcome, there are a growing number of places in the public venue where men in general are handed the “no-go” treatment: one being the trend of Gym franchises setting up “women-only” exercise rooms and “women/children-only swimming” pool hours, which would be fine if the men were not paying gym-dues like everyone else using the facility (men being the only “restricted” members!).

Need I even bring up the unspoken / unofficial “no-go” treatment afforded men who do not fit into a woman’s “Captain Awesome” category? The examples would fill volumes!

This is exactly the premise for Susie and Franny to complain about “street harassment”, and feminists pushing for laws and ordinances against (straight) flirtation in public from men whom the women may not find attractive….it’s coming~just that little road block called the First Amendment has kept “street harassment” codes from being passed here in the US up to now, so they’ll “soft law” it to death, mark my words.

All in the name of “Public Safety” laws and regulations are triumphed and forced to become the law of the land because most people want to feel “safe” and if that means someone else has to be inconvenienced, fined, or jailed to ensure such “safety”, then so be it! A single (straight) childless man over say…30 or 40…oh he’s just got to be up to no good and Hillary-forbid if he somehow comes across the line of sight of Sensitive Susie and her Partner Paula whose adopted kids are playing 1,000 yards from where the “creep” parked his car to read something on his Blackberry® then “911” it is!

And here we thought there were no second-class citizens in America….

Now and Then — The Declaration of Independence

W.F. Price · 22 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In yesterday's piece on the use of force I included a link to the declaration of independence to make the point that before taking any drastic action people ought to have a lot of very good, well-articulated reasons. In looking over the document, it struck me that there are a number of parallels between the colonists' and contemporary men's grievances. Some were uncanny. I suppose I should have known this all along, but we tend to live in the moment and ignore history (at our own peril).

So, because our American Independence Day is nearing, I thought I'd highlight a few lines from the original text for purposes of comparison.

The declaration is fairly long, so I'll just link it here and paste selected complaints against the king, then give modern examples (feel free to add to them in comments):

> He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

EEOC, Social Services, court-appointed special advocates, etc.

> He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:
> For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:
> For protecting them, by mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states:
> [...]
> For imposing taxes on us without our consent:
> For depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury:

The contemporary police state resembles in many ways a "large bod[y] of armed troops," and it is well-known that police misconduct is rarely if ever tried in a court of law.

Alimony and child support are, for all intents and purposes, taxation. Consent to this tax is irrelevant, and nonpayment is punishable by prison (further establishing that it is in fact a tax).

Men are routinely sentenced to jail without the benefit of trial. With family law, we have clearly been subjected to a "jurisdiction foreign to our constitution."

Our government has not yet "plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burned our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people," but is that entirely unthinkable given the naked plundering of American men that has become a feature of contemporary family law?

As we celebrate the 4th of July, we men ought to keep in mind that we are celebrating freedom from the kind of tyranny that is creeping back into our lives under the false front of "equality" for women, which is simply an excuse to subjugate men. When a government privileges one class of people over another, those without protection are inevitably exploited and subject to abuses. The time to stand up and call for an end to special privileges is at hand.

Question for Readers

W.F. Price · 22 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A friend of mine is a defense attorney who asked me whether there is any financial incentive for law enforcement to arrest men (as opposed to women) in domestic disturbance calls. This would seem to be a blatantly sexist policy, but then again VAWA is a blatantly sexist law, so I think it's possible.

If anyone has any information regarding that it would be appreciated. Feel free to share in comments.

The Woman in the Dark Street

By Oliver Guerrero

I was walking at night by the streets of Vancouver. It was a Friday night and people were drinking and partying. While walking, I entered into a dark and empty street. Then, at the other end, I could make out the figure of a woman walking in the opposite direction. She was more-or-less in shape I can recall by her silhouette. As we got closer and closer, I realized she had started moving towards me. I thought she might be drunk initially, even though she was walking rather straight. Suddenly, with less than two meters between us she literally invaded my personal space in an unexpected move. I stopped in order not to collide with her and then a car passing by illuminated her briefly. It was only a moment, but I was able to see her in detail. We were within centimeters of each other.

She must have been at least 45 years old, youthfully dressed and in relatively good shape, but her face was filled with wrinkles as well as her arms. She stared me with those defiant blue eyes I might never forget; standing as straight as she could and raising her head so her eyes could match mine since I was taller. It was as if she was presenting herself to me claiming with all of her body: “I am here!” without saying words. By mere instinct, I almost jumped to my right and walked faster away from her. I glanced quickly at my back to make sure she was not following me, but all I could see was her silhouette again melting in the darkness and disappearing in the street.

Later, in the safety of a bus stop filled with people, I started thinking about that woman and about our close encounter. She might have been probably an 8 in her prime as a typical classical blue eyed blonde. Now, she literally throws herself at men in the street just to freak the hell out of them. In retrospect, I draw some parallels with many of those women in the slut walks: almost no men would even think of raping them. All those displays of rage and indignation looks more to me a display of bitterness by players who are literally left out of the game…out of the sexual market. Women soil their pants with fear, just at the thought of the day that will come when men will pass by, next to them, without even noticing them…as if they were mere ghosts. This might not be that much of a problem if she is able to clinch a good deal (good husband, kids, etc.) but the sad truth is that there are millions who fail at this; and since the number of committing men is decreasing, well…you can imagine the result.

At some point, the game will be over. The rose will lose her petals and they will never regrow; newer younger flowers will attract the bees to keep the cycle of life going…and like someone else said: “God always forgives, man sometimes forgives, but time never forgives.”

Clooney Girlfriend Starts Talking Babies, Marriage, Actor Swiftly Dumps Her

W.F. Price · 23 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Despite being attached to a very good-looking, apparently sweet younger woman, 32 year old Elisabetta Canalis, George Clooney has confirmed his commitment to bachelorhood by telling her to hit the road shortly after she started dropping hints of marriage and children to an Italian tabloid.

In an interview with Italian gossip magazine Chi, Canalis said she "wouldn't be with someone who didn't want to get married or have kids."

Although celebrity gossip is a mere distraction from the issues at hand, there is some reflection of society in general in the behavior and statements of movie stars. 40 years ago a public figure likely would have been far more reserved about his commitment to bachelorhood, but Clooney, who went through a divorce in the early 90s, has openly declared himself to be dead-set against marriage.

It seems that Canalis thought she'd be the one to break him, but when she laid it on the line Clooney stuck to his guns and cut her loose:

> Sources said the Ocean's Star flipped after being being 'pressed' about marriage by Canalis – who two weeks ago had given a gushing interview about how she was 'living a fairytale' and hoped to wed the actor.

As more and more prominent men unashamedly declare their abhorrence of marriage, and others are put through terrible ordeals for being married, the institution inevitably loses its luster for the humble masses who take their example from those above.

The Problem With the Stodden-Hutchison Marriage

51 year old actor Doug Hutchison (The Green Mile) recently married 16 year old Alexis Stodden in Nevada, setting off a wave of complaints from women about how "creepy" it is for such an old guy to marry such a young woman. Well, it is a bit odd, but neither of the two looks their age in all fairness, so they don't make a terrible couple on camera at least…

A lot of women might make the point that a woman that age doesn't know what she's getting into, but I'm not sure that's the case, and in any event I haven't heard many feminists complain about underage boys getting hit up for child support owed to older women. Alexis is from Washington state, where the age of consent is 16 (which is reasonable IMO), so if all Mr. Hutchison wanted to do was sleep with the girl he would be in the clear. Is it morally worse to marry her than to simply have a fling?

We shouldn't be in the business of deciding how people want to live their lives, and if a person can consent to sex why should they be unable to marry? This would verge on religious discrimination, as some faiths consider marriage to be essential prior to sex.

However, there are other problems with the setup, and they affect Doug Hutchison rather than his young bride. While some men may be congratulating Mr. Hutchison on his "score," given contemporary norms and laws I think the guy made a terribly risky decision. A woman that young and that attractive is probably going to sleep around. Sure, some older men may be comfortable with that setup, but say the girl decides to divorce him in a couple years. This is where it gets tricky.

If a woman is under 18, she cannot be held to a legally-binding contract, so even if Hutchison drew up a prenup, it will be entirely unenforceable. All she has to do is show that she signed while a minor, and any judge will throw it out. This means that Alexis can divorce her husband and take him for half of all his assets at any time. He has no protection whatsoever, and she has every incentive to leave as soon as she gets tired of him.

It is kind of ironic that today an older guy has a much bigger incentive to simply use a young woman for sex than he does to actually take responsibility for her, but women got what they wanted. Frankly, most of the women complaining about this marriage probably know deep down that they would have been lucky to pull off what Stodden did. So perhaps it's all just sour grapes.

As for Hutchison, I hope he has fun while it lasts, because when that little birdie flies off it's going to be pretty painful.

UK Child Sexualization Reaches New Low

While mothers, teachers, and police fight tooth and nail to keep men as far away from children as possible, one woman in Northampton is teaching children how to poledance. According to the daily mail (Link above) “Parents pay £5 an hour for their daughters to learn pole dancing at the Little Spinners classes. Instructor Carly Wilford insists it helps youngsters keep fit and boosts their self-esteem.” I expect a lot of these “Parents” are single mothers, and according to one of the captions on he page, “Many pupils want to copy their mothers at the pole dancing classes.”

Given what we already know about western families, I expect that the fathers of these kids were either run out of the house, or are to pussywhipped to put a stop to this. Claude Knight, the director of the charity Kidscape, warns that “The children will innocently enjoy copying the raunchy moves they learn, but be completely unaware of the sexual messages these send out which inevitably can have dangerous results.” I suspect that these girls will not be the only ones at risk-these miscommunications could lead to boys getting in trouble for “Attempted rape,” like the two boys who spent 8 years in prison for a game of “I’ll show you mine if you show me yours.”

Meanwhile, this raises another question. If pedophiles are supposedly lurking around every corner, why are these moms sexualizing their kids by sending them to this class?

The classes are held at the Make Me Fabulous Dance Studio.

Latest Feminist Triumph: Black Family Finally Destroyed

W.F. Price · 24 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When feminists first set their minds toward the destruction of the family, they focused their attacks on the most vulnerable segment of American society: African Americans. Eleanor Roosevelt, notorious feminist icon, put a great deal of effort into creating the social programs that ultimately eroded the black family as early as the 1940s, but the killing blow was matrifocal welfare programs put in place during the Johnson Administration. Rather than focus on keeping black men employed and able to provide for their families, Johnson passed the Civil Rights Act with full affirmative action for women (white women benefited from affirmative action more than anyone) and created a welfare system that rewarded women for illegitimate births and single motherhood. As black men were cast off, rootless, America's remedy was to build an enormous incarceration industry. Today, the primary form of "welfare" for black men in the United States is the criminal justice system.

Now, in an article trumpeting the feminist victory over the black family, Laura Speer of the Annie E. Casey Foundation reminds us, as though we need to be told, that it isn't the 1950s any longer:

> We're moving toward an acknowledgment that we're living in a different world than the 1950s, where married or two-parent heterosexual couples are now no longer the norm for a lot of kids, especially kids of color…

Of course, there were men who saw this coming from the beginning. Dr. Thomas Sowell, a libertarian economist and senior fellow of Stanford's Hoover Institution, was an early critic of government programs that he saw as creating exactly the conditions that prevail today. Born into a poor black family in North Carolina, Sowell served in the Korean War and managed to bootstrap himself into Harvard, where he graduated magna cum laude. Overcoming his naive, youthful embrace of Marxism, he eventually became one of the foremost critics of government intrusion and social engineering.

I was delighted to find the following video, in which Sowell eviscerates a do-gooder white feminist on camera back in 1980. Although it is fun to watch him destroy her in debate, it is sad to see how much of what he predicted has come to pass.

Congratulations, feminists! You have finally succeeded in destroying "patriarchy" in one segment of American society. With one third of young black men under some form of penal supervision and well under 50% growing up with their fathers, you really have something to clap your hands about.

Next target: the white working class.

Lesbian Law Professor has Second Thoughts About Marriage

W.F. Price · 24 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Now that gay civil marriage appears poised to become a reality in more and more states across the US, some homosexuals are starting to question whether they really want to be locked into the same nightmare that afflicts so many straight Americans.

Writing for the NY Times, Katherine Franke, a lesbian, asks whether gays ought to be "forced" to marry to have the same "benefits" that straight couples receive. Her vacillation in the following excerpt speaks volumes:

> It's not that we're antimarriage; rather, we think marriage ought to be one choice in a menu of options by which relationships can be recognized and gain security. Like New York City's mayor, Michael R. Bloomberg, who has been in a relationship for over 10 years without marrying, one can be an ardent supporter of marriage rights for same-sex couples while also recognizing that serious, committed relationships can be formed outside of marriage.
> Here's why I'm worried: Winning the right to marry is one thing; being forced to marry is quite another. How's that? If the rollout of marriage equality in other states, like Massachusetts, is any guide, lesbian and gay people who have obtained health and other benefits for their domestic partners will be required by both public and private employers to marry their partners in order to keep those rights. In other words, "winning" the right to marry may mean "losing" the rights we have now as domestic partners, as we'll be folded into the all-or-nothing world of marriage.

Hmmm, getting a bit worried about the specter of family law here, are we Ms. Franke?

As a lesbian, she is comfortable seeing men destroyed by marriage, but what if she ends up in the same situation? Child support… Custody litigation… Alimony… Domestic violence accusations (lesbians have highest rate of DV in the US)… Asset forfeiture…

"Domestic partnership" is starting to look a lot safer than marriage, now, isn't it?

You know, as a straight male I'd like to have "a menu of options" myself, now that she mentions it. Somehow, I doubt that will be forthcoming…

Still avoiding getting to the point, Franke claims people might have a hard time understanding her position:

> What's difficult to explain is that for some lesbians and gay men, having our relationships sanctioned and regulated by the state is hardly something to celebrate … we've created loving and committed forms of family, care and attachment that far exceed, and often improve on, the narrow legal definition of marriage. Many of us are not ready to abandon those nonmarital ways of loving once we can legally marry.

How on earth is that "difficult to explain?" Perhaps for Franke, "a professor of law and the director of the Center for Gender and Sexuality Law at Columbia Law School," it is difficult to explain to her probably lower-earning partner why she doesn't want a civil marriage, but it certainly doesn't take an advanced degree to wrap your head around that one if you're a straight man. Actually, I doubt Franke herself has any difficulty understanding the drawbacks of marriage — she works in a field that has actively implemented them for decades.

This is a pure, unadulterated case of avoiding a dose of one's own medicine. Now that I think about it, Franke deserves marriage. She and her fellow feminist law professors should walk the line through that "narrow legal definition of marriage" and see how it works out for them.

The Rising Waters of Feminine Penury

By meistergedanken

There was an article in the Raleigh News & Observer recently (authored by Mandy Locke) about women from the Boomer generation, who were (coincidentally?) "single, retired and broke". It contained a revealing combination of facts that delineate an imminent dilemma for American Society while offering specious explanations for that dilemma.

A few key statistics:

• "About 40% of female baby boomers are currently single (up from 30% in 1989)."

• "Nationally there are about 17 million single females ages 46 to 64; about two-thirds of them separated from, divorced or buried their spouse."

• "The Federal Reserve Board found in 2001 that only a third of single women had any sort of retirement savings account; at the same time, fewer than 10% of single women had a pension through their jobs. This compared with about two-thirds of married couples and 42% of single men with retirement accounts."

First, it must be said that often women don't take or deliberately seek jobs that provide retirement accounts, unless it is some government post with a "guaranteed" pension (the quotes here denote the fact that in this day and age, there are no more guarantees). Thoughts of retirement not being a priority, they would rather secure "fun", glamorous or sociable employment that has a lot of inter-personal interaction, where profits are irrelevant or where their schedules are accommodated. The wife of a friend of mine works as the only employee at a high-end jewelry shop, where she has no retirement benefits and poor medical benefits with large deductibles. There is really no future for a career in such an establishment. But she doesn't care: she likes her boss (the owner), is beloved by the clientele, and best of all, gets to regularly travel to New York on buying trips for the shop. She pays for her car, the internet and phone and spends the rest of her money on gifts for her friends and family, and toys for herself. My friend, as the husband, can worry about paying off the house and saving for their old age.

Indeed, it has long been the province of men to shoulder the burden of saving and planning for retirement. Women are typically happy to defer to their husbands in these matters, because financial stuff is BORING. Not fun at all. It does not occur to them that men don't find it exactly stimulating, either. Yet somehow it seems to get lumped in with other manly pursuits, such as watching football, as things men inexplicably like to do that women won't willingly endure. When you take this into consideration, it is not surprising that not only do single men have more retirement resources than single women, but married men are even more likely to have those resources, as they are no doubt well aware that with a woman along for the ride, their expenses went up dramatically.

The article employs – and this will astonish no one – the usual suspect arguments to deflect financial responsibility from retiring women. The old chestnut that women earned only "77 cents to the man's dollar" was regurgitated, for example, so naturally there couldn't save as much as they needed to. Another is that women returning to the workforce after divorce or child rearing are confronted with workplaces that don't "have space or patience for them, " from which the reader can infer is due to a soft form of gender discrimination. Another excuse is that Boomer women weren't properly informed about retirement planning, implying failure on the part of the education system, perhaps. To that I can only say that it is ironic that the very women who scorned Home Economics and banished it from school systems everywhere, when it was the most reliable way to convey to young women the value of a dollar and how to budget for expenses, are the same women who could have benefited from its lessons in frugality and thrift! Next we will hear the wailing of "why didn't you stop us from squandering our money!"

""I never thought about retirement. No one ever talked about it and what I needed to do," said Katrina Philips, 62, of Clayton, N.C. "I guess I was stupid about it.""

Yeah, no kidding – along with all the other chicks who imagined themselves clones of the fictional populace of "Sex in the City", who only swilled drinks and swapped tales about their tawdry escapades!

What is left unsaid is the fact that women in general have poorer impulse control, which ultimately means most of them can't handle money. Obviously, advertisers know this, and craft their pitches accordingly. They succeeded beyond anyone's wildest expectations, skewing the economy and perverting the culture in the process until spending on frivolous consumer items is absolutely necessary just to keep everything from crashing down around us. By its very nature budgeting involves stifling the desires of the present (and curtailing spending) to obtain a measure of security in the future. What the "experts" who cheered the entrance of women into the workplace fail to understand is that it doesn't matter how much money you earn; if you can't handle money, then you never have enough of it. Many men, but to an even greater degree women, have been mortgaging the future to enable buying sprees in the here-and-now.

I can assure you all that this is a temporary state of affairs. As a civilization, we are rapidly approaching the point where that which cannot work, will no longer work. Consumption that is not sustainable will cease. The debt that is too excessive shall be defaulted upon. And the society that adopts leftist-feminist principles will collapse. The refusal to acknowledge this certainty is one of the governing delusions of our times.

And of course – OF COURSE – these women will turn to daddy government, looking to the State to fill the void once filled by their husbands. But guess what? The pockets of the State will be empty, the proverbial cupboard bare. Behold the ongoing fiasco that is the Congress of the United States of America (or the parliaments of most European nations, for that matter)! Does anyone believe that the current fiscal situation can persist for another 10-20 years? Or that our national debt problems will be peaceably resolved in an orderly fashion? Or that we can continue to coast on the fumes of borrowed funds like we have for the last 30 years?

What is going to happen to all these old women living in abject poverty? Some will have to go begging to their children, if they have any, whether they are equipped to take in their mothers or not. Doubtless many a guilt trip will be embarked upon. Maybe they will try and sponge off of their male siblings, if any are still alive (as women tend to outlive men). Others will populate hastily assembled communes and institutions cobbled together from the dwindling resources of cities, others will find religion, return to God and seek shelter in charitable facilities sponsored by various resurgent religious orders, and some will simply become homeless. Ultimately, it's not our problem. And furthermore, the government will be too broke and powerless to MAKE it our problem….

Try not to be overcome with Schadenfreude.

Demographic changes are typically powerful but slow; they tend to sneak up upon us much like rising flood waters: in the morning you look outside and the river looks high. Later on in the afternoon you see the river again and you think to yourself, "Hmm, the river is rising – it seems to be higher than it was this morning." That night you drift heedlessly off to sleep as the murky water creeps up to your doorstep. And in the morning you wake up to find your first floor has four feet of water in it. Now you are fucked.

Women of the Boomer Generation: you have truly fucked yourselves.

Female Guard at Notorious Prison Pleads Guilty to Sleeping with Inmate

W.F. Price · 25 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A female jailer at the Washington state Reformatory at Monroe pleaded guilty to custodial misconduct for sleeping with an inmate. This is the same prison where, a few months ago, another female guard was strangled to death by an inmate, prompting the usual calls for castration.

Guard Danette Skelton would bring special meals to her inmate lover and gave him access to a cell phone, which is a serious security breach.

Female prison guards are in fact far more likely to have sex with inmates than male prison guards, and also more likely to be assaulted by inmates. However, due to the gender laws foisted upon us by feminists, our prisons must indulge the desires of women to work in close proximity to hardened male criminals, no matter how much additional crime, violence and corruption it causes.

Outside the Shop Window

Who doesn't overtly (or covertly) notice the lives of others around us from time to time in detail enough to "learn" from what is seen or draw conclusions that may influence how we as individuals handle and conduct our own lives? It has been said that this life is a "learning experience" in and of itself, so watching others and learning from them may be a little better than memorizing some text book or listening to a cloistered professor in the halls of Academia (who really doesn't know shit about how the real world operates).

How much of your adult life-learning has been gleaned from the deeds, wins, losses, and experiences of other around you, and how much have you learned by simply watching and listening, not to mention "game" people around you so as to benefit yourself later on?

On the subject of marriage, an associate of mine I'll call "Davis" for this article's sake, likes to remind me how he's been married twice (and divorced twice) in the past 10 years, that he's had three big-ass houses in the past 10 years, as well as two successful children and gets women thru online dating sites by lying to them about how much of a "war hero" he is. Nearly ¾ of his gross financial worth has gone to the two divorces and as a six-figure salary man right now he's tight as a snare drum because of divorce court rulings against him….though he likes to refer to himself among his single and less-financially-ruined buddies as a "p*ssy gettin' m#therf*cker" because he bangs single moms met on internet dating sites. Good ol' Davis enjoys reminding MGTOW guys like me that he has kids by saying shit like: "My DNA will go on~blah-blah-blah…." I sit back and look at my friend saying to myself: THAT IS NOT A LIFE I WANT! And I remember the experience of my pal Davis and how he was taken advantage of and unceremoniously dumped-on over just a ten year stretch when he could have avoided it!

As a lifelong bachelor, I have gone through many married friends, and I say "gone through" because after awhile married people eventually stop inviting single friends over and leave them off their rosters for block parties, birthdays, etc. Of all the married couples I have known in the past 20 years or so, I have seen more nasty divorces, infidelities, and stranger stuff such as one guy who enjoyed watching his wife getting hammered by another man (no, I was not one of them! haha) and one guy I was in the Army with indulged the "swinging" lifestyle with his hot wife although that ended when the wife discovered she wanted to be with one of the other swinging husbands full-time!

Other examples are of men I know whose wives take on a "mother" role with them in almost every way except the fact they're sleeping together, then there is one man I used to work part-time with who knew his wife was cheating on him and did nothing about it, saying it was "cheaper to keep her" (but he was screwing someone on the side himself anyway so he just let it go on for years until they divorced over his gambling problem).

I have also seen numerous friends and co-workers locked up in jail over false assault accusations, child-neglect allegations, and failure to pay child support, their lives ruined in more than one way due to the choice they made in getting married and having a family like one is "expected" to. Seeing the trials, tribulations, failures, and fallacies of other people around us (as well as their triumphs!) has and continues to be a valuable learning experience and I cannot stress how important it can become to remember what you see in other people so that you may avoid making the same damn mistake later on in your own personal life.

As a lifelong bachelor who has no children, I cannot tell you how many married and engaged friends, associates, and family members have chided me over my single lifestyle, and one remark from a "happily" married colleague of mine stands out: "You're living outside the Shop Window of life, looking in through the glass while the rest of us are inside". Yes indeed, I see the "life" of most married people I know and they've all convinced me that I have not missed out on a damn thing and by doing so, have dodged more than one bullet. Another friend of mine remarked this past Father's Day weekend to me saying "Happy Bulletproof Day" in reference to me "dodging bullets" of marriage and child-rearing. These days, it is not worth going there unless you're willing to take an awful risk. Don't believe me? Just sit back, relax, and watch your friends and neighbors for awhile and you'll see for yourself. As for "Davis"? Oh he stills considers himself better than me because he has kids and Match.com (looking for wife #3). Since he is trapped inside the "Shop", I'll wave at him from outside the window just before I drive off in my new car.

MGTOW: the time has come.

Slate: NY Women Now a "Higher Species"

W.F. Price · 27 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for Slate, Ron Rosenbaum hails the choice of Jill Abramson as NY Times executive editor as evidence that NY females are no longer merely human, but have evolved into something superior:

> Here's my theory: Women in New York City have evolved into the equivalent of a higher species. Not quite the leap from Neanderthal to Cro-Magnon (especially since Neanderthals have recently been getting props from anthropologists for having bigger brains than previously suspected and for not being quite as cave-mannish as they once were seen). Still a step up the ladder, not just from men, but from women elsewhere as well.
> So when I say New York City women have evolved into a higher species I'm not speaking in a strictly biological, genomic way. (Although I call your attention to a recent Scientific American paper called "Urban Birds Boast Big Brains," which posited that the challenges of urban life to avian intelligence have resulted in an increase in the capacity of their brains to cope with the struggle for survival in the city.)

When I read the first paragraph of the excerpt, I thought Rosenbaum was just kissing ass, but the second suggests he is at least somewhat serious about this "higher species" idea, which says something about Rosenbaum and his head.

Rosenbaum goes on to advocate a full-court press for more feminist legislation from the Times, perhaps in the hope that it is a sufficiently powerful instrument to give feminism a decisive, total victory over American society.

When he isn't praising his new, transhuman overlords, what does Rosenbaum have to say about us men?

Apparently, we are cranky whiners:

> I don't think any similar study has been done on urban birds of the human persuasion. But I think an anecdotal case can be made that if our urban birds aren't smarter than nonurban birds, or other urban birds, New York women are smarter than New York men. Or at least that there are far fewer dumb New York women than dumb New York men. But this is what has always puzzled me: The evolution of women has made them not merely more fiercely intelligent and multitalented, but more sophisticated, witty, charming, and seductive. What's not to like? And yet few were the celebrations of the new realities by New York men, at least in the early years. In fiction, film, nonfiction, and memoirs by New York men, one sees so much crankiness and whiny complaint about the terrible inconvenience the women's movement has caused. Consider Roth, Updike, Mailer, Bellow. Consider, even, the enduring cruel image of the liberated woman in Kramer vs. Kramer. A major portion of the last century's literary history has been written by men unable to deal with the loss of subservience. And by women trying to deal with the inability of men to deal with it. (Even now in the new century, look at all the male literature devoted to whiny men flummoxed by female accomplishment. It's the new whininess. Neo crankiness.)

Rosenbaum isn't fit to lick the boots of the writers he disparages in the above passage, yet he has the gall to declare them inferior to no-name feminist writers.

What garbage. If, as he predicts, Jill Abramson will herald a new era of feminist dominance in our nation's paper of record, the New York Times will cease to be relevant to anyone outside of Manhattan's tiny little world.

Feminist Sentenced to Life for Genocide, Crimes Against Humanity

W.F. Price · 28 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, a prominent Rwandan Hutu and former minister of family affairs and women's advancement, has been sentenced to life in prison by an international tribunal for a variety of heinous crimes, including mass rape, war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.

According to a 2002 article originally published in the NY Times, Nyiramasuhuko followed a fairly standard feminist routine before become a mass-murderer:

> Before becoming Rwanda's chief official for women's affairs, Pauline was a social worker, roaming the countryside, offering lectures on female empowerment and instruction on child care and AIDS prevention. Her days as minister were similarly devoted to improving the lives of women and children. But at the stadium, a 30-year-old farmer named Foster Mivumbi told me, Pauline assumed a different responsibility. Mivumbi, who has confessed to taking part in the slaughter, told me that Pauline goaded the Interahamwe, commanding, "Before you kill the women, you need to rape them."

But Pauline's role went beyond mere encouragement:

> Tutsi women were then selected from the stadium crowd and dragged away to a forested area to be raped, Mivumbi recalled. Back at the stadium, he told me, Pauline waved her arms and then observed in silence as Interahamwe rained machine-gun fire and hand grenades down upon the remaining refugees. The Hutus finished off survivors with machetes. It took about an hour, ending at noon. Pauline stayed on, Mivumbi told me, until a bulldozer began piling bodies for burial in a nearby pit. (When questioned about this incident, Pauline's lawyers denied that she took part in atrocities in Butare.)
> Shortly afterward, according to another witness, Pauline arrived at a compound where a group of Interahamwe was guarding 70 Tutsi women and girls. One Interahamwe, a young man named Emmanuel Nsabimana, told me through a translator that Pauline ordered him and the others to burn the women. Nsabimana recalled that one Interahamwe complained that they lacked sufficient gasoline. "Pauline said, 'Don't worry, I have jerrycans of gasoline in my car,' " Nsabimana recalled. "She said, 'Go take that gasoline and kill them.' I went to the car and took the jerrycans. Then Pauline said, 'Why don't you rape them before you kill them?' But we had been killing all day, and we were tired. We just put the gasoline in bottles and scattered it among the women, then started burning."

Although Pauline Nyiramasuhuko's depravity was extreme even for a feminist, it shouldn't be surprising that the first woman in history to be sentenced to prison for genocide was so keen on the idea of female empowerment before she turned machine guns on innocent people.

In the feminist world, there is a simplistic, black and white narrative of power and victimization. Men are in power, women are victims, and the idea is to turn the tables. Feminists have grown so accustomed to seeing the world in this way that redress of their imagined grievances includes implementing a retributive system whereby former "victims" wield the kind of power they see the patriarchy as having held. Hence human rights abuses against innocent men in the United States are seen as a kind of collective justice by our feminists.

It isn't much of a stretch for a person who believes in feminist ideology to replace one class of victims/perpetrators with another, in Nyiramasuhuku's case Hutus/Tutsis. Unfortunately, no matter what form this kind of thinking takes, innocent people are always victimized when it becomes prevalent in society.

On Friday, Rwandans received some measure of justice in the conviction and sentencing of Pauline Nyiramasuhuko; we can only look forward to the day that innocent male victims in the West receive some of the same.

Founder of Women's Seder Dead at 83

W.F. Price · 28 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Last week, Esther Broner, known as the "Mother of the Women's Seder," died after a long struggle to subvert Orthodox Judaism and create a feminist alternative to the millennia-old celebration of Passover.

According to "Rabbi" Susan Fendrick, women's seders are necessary "to add a feminist, woman-centered dimension to the observance of the universally Jewish holiday of Passover."

This raises the question of why, if Passover is a universally Jewish holiday, there needs to be a separate seder that is not universally Jewish.

According to Fendrick, many children have already been trained in feminist Judaism, and now they are growing accustomed to gay Judaism (represented by a juicy, succulent fruit) as well:

> Women's seders and other Jewish feminist practices in connection with Passover have had their impact on the shape of the seder experience as a whole in many homes and institutions. Already there is a generation of children who would be confused if there were no Miriam's cup on the table, filled with water (and often paired with Elijah's cup of wine)—a symbol of redemption and possibility. And in many homes the placement of an orange on the seder plate—whether to represent the importance of women's full inclusion in Judaism, or to symbolize the need for gay and lesbian equality in Jewish life—is already de rigueur.

Looks like it's time to wheel out the golden calf again…

Feminist subversion of traditional religion is nothing new, and has been a thorn in the side of Christians as well as Jews for some time now; even Muslims are running into it these days. One might ask why feminists are so insistent on attacking "patriarchal" religions in a country such as the United States, where freedom of religion gives them the opportunity to start their own faith. The answer is that if they did, it would last at longest for one generation, as the feminists would be too busy ensuring that they did not create stable families, instead aborting many of their children, engaging in lesbian relationships and alienating the boys among them to the point that they would utterly reject their mothers' faith.

Therefore, as with so many other institutions, feminists choose not to innovate and compete, but rather play the role of parasites, leeching off the shortsighted tolerance and goodwill of the men who keep them running. Inevitably, once an institution has been totally compromised by feminism, it fails and the feminists run off to find a new one. In the meanwhile, you-know-who gets really pissed off.

GUY-FLICKS II: The Days of "Nice"

Featured Guest · 29 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

by Ken Knight

The man's name is Cody Abilene, and he pulled into his own reserved parking space at the shooting range first thing this morning to target-practice his Dan Wesson .44 Magnum revolver with 8-inch barrel. Well at least he hit the board that held the target!

Not the best shot in the world, he shrugs it off and leaves the range to drive out to California's Willow Springs Raceway, no one saying shit about his bad range score because no one talks shit to Cody, he's just way too damn cool. Once he reaches the raceway in his red DeLorean sports car, he watches as his lady friend June Khnockers (yes, spelled with an h!) qualify in her stock car on the track, getting there just as the female racer finishes her final lap. Cody's a likeable guy, enough so he's even welcome inside the locker room as June slips off her helmet and peels down her racing jumpsuit from her otherwise nude body, turning to look at Cody sitting in a chair taking his sunglasses off and asks him what he thought about her driving, to wit he remarks:

"I think they're dynamite…the driving and the body."(in reference to her plump tits she's displaying right in front of him now). June Khnockers walks up to him with a kittenish look and says: "You're such horseshit at showing emotion, but I like that in a man!" then she falls into his arms for a passionate embrace and kiss (i.e. "friends with benefits").

This is the opening scene of an R-rated "Guy-Flick" written and directed by the late Andy Sidaris in 1985 entitled MALIBU EXPRESS. Chances are if you were old enough to stay up late during the mid-to-late 1980s watching Cable TV you likely caught this underrated guy-flick around midnight and enjoyed its outlandish humor and gratuitous nudity (provided by former Playboy® Playmates playing the female roles in the film).

B-movie Potentate Andy Sidaris produced straight-to-video feature films starring such notables as 80s femme-fatale Sybil Danning and famous sex-therapist Ava Cadell (Ava was also the busty motel room chick in the 80s action film COMMANDO). What really stands out in Andy Sidaris' sexploitation films is not just campy "action" with hot chicks and guns but also rather positive (also humorous) male character roles in each of his films that are increasingly non-existent in films made these days. Sidaris' male characters almost always saved the female characters from dangerous trouble, and always…and I repeat…always….got the girl! B-movies yes, with less than stellar acting and usually outrageous situations that would never occur in real life, but that is the bread n' butter of "guy-flick" entertainment: reality sucks and doesn't apply! You want to see reality???

Turn on one of your ex-wife's "cooking" shows or go to Macy's with your cupcake and carry all those shopping bags of over-priced shit to your car for her.

Andy Sidaris' films can be found in a DVD box-set nowadays and I recommend adding them to your guy-flick collection for the simple reason of their "historical" value…what I am referring to is not just the fun action sequences, cheesy sex scenes, and loads of well-shaped naked female bodies not found just anywhere….but also NICE female attitudes and behavior toward men portrayed therein! Seriously guys, how many recent motion pictures produced in the past decade or more have female characters that interact with their male counterparts with nice respectful camaraderie? *As opposed to the snarky "all men are pigs" attitude, "grrrrl-power" trip, or "I'm gonna kick his ass"(and then she is shown doing so) parley showcased in more Hollywood films than I can personally count!

Past B-movie Directors such as Andy Sidaris, Fred Olen Ray, and Dan O'Bannon would show a femme-fatale more as "sexy villainess" and yet still manage to keep blatant misandry from rearing its head in their plotlines and created some of the most memorable (among B-movie fans) female characters who are no feminist heroines by any means, and contrary to most female characters portrayed in major films today: LIKED MEN!

It has been discussed quite extensively here on The Spearhead about women of the western world developing (and getting away with) an increasingly hostile and blatantly androphobic attitude toward men in general, an outlook taught them by a liberal media and feminist-savvy entertainment arenas (and I won't even go into what goes on at College campuses). As a bachelor myself, I see the "men are pigs" attitude in virtually every single woman I meet, and yes…the married ones are even worse. We could fill volumes detailing examples of this growing hatred and poor treatment of men in our decaying western culture, but that is a subject I'll leave to another writer and stick to my point here: "Guy-Flicks" (films that straight men tend to enjoy for action, adventure, sexy chicks and nudity as well as outrageous fantasy fun) may very well become historical points of reference even though they are fantasy-based for men now and in the future to view and see women acting nice and sexy toward men in the storylines without any misandry or the current "you-go-grrrrl" shit thrown in with lesbian love tokens, not to mention the portrayal of male characters as heroic warriors, good cops, valiant citizens, and just plain manliness as a positive. Who hasn't experienced the increasingly hostile and negative attitude from women around you whether at home or in the general public? Even that "Captain Awesome" guy who thinks he's got himself a harem of female admirers in his life has been snapped at by a soccer-mom when he drove too close to her mini-van or got ignored by a secretary whose only love is the 8 cats in her apartment.

With men portrayed as drunken saps, cheating liars, and perverts on the prowl in TV shows like LAW AND ORDER or as weaklings and cuckolded dummies in current major movies such as HALL PASS, is it a stretch to determine that looking into films and entertainment of the past will become an "escape" from seeing men in general portrayed in such ways as well as a "historical record" of the way life used to be between the sexes? No stretch at all, really.

Michele Bachmann Rejects Feminist Label

W.F. Price · 29 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Following speculation that Michelle Bachmann would lead a new "Evangelical Feminism," the Minnesota Representative objected to the "feminist" label, saying instead that she is "pro-woman and pro-man."

From The Daily Beast:

> Unlike Sarah Palin, who has brandished the feminist moniker and spoken of an "emerging conservative feminist identity," Bachmann told me in an interview Tuesday that she wouldn't call herself a feminist—instead, she simply described herself as "pro-woman and pro-man." When I pressed her on the matter, the Minnesota congresswoman said she sees herself as an "empowered American."

Perhaps Bachmann has seen how well Sarah Palin's embrace of the term worked out for her; liberal feminists scorned her, and conservative men abandoned her. However, for some reason feminism has become such an overriding preoccupation in the United States that everyone seems to think any woman in any position of power or responsibility must necessarily be a "feminist" in one way or another.

Because feminism is all about "empowering" women at others' expense, it's an insult to women who have achieved anything to suggest that only feminism is responsible for their success, and undermines their achievements. It looks as though a few female politicians are starting to catch on to this, and avoiding the label for fear that not only could it alienate potential male supporters, but detract from their popular image as well.

Finally, Americans are starting to recognize that feminism is not an inclusive, positive term, but rather a supremacist ideology that justifies oppression for the benefit of a special class of elitist, female ideologues.

Strauss Kahn Accuser Story Disintegrating Under Scrutiny

W.F. Price · 30 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

According to the NY Times, investigators have discovered serious inconsistencies in the rape charges against Dominique Strauss Kahn. Accuser Nafissatou Diallo has allegedly lied repeatedly, and prosecutors no longer believe her story.

Further complicating prosecutors' case, Ms. Diallo has been having problems with her asylum application and may be linked to drug dealing and money laundering.

Lawyers are discussing whether to dismiss charges, which could sink the case.

Fortunately for Strauss Kahn, a great deal of scrutiny and effort went into the investigation, which is not always the case. Given the sloppy prosecutions that have put so many men behind bars on false accusations, one wonders whether he would have had a chance if he were some ordinary Joe plucked off the street.

Also, despite the fact that the criminal in this case is increasingly looking like the accuser rather than the accused, the continued MSM-imposed anonymity for Diallo makes little sense. False rape accusations are so ubiquitous at this point that possibly the only thing that might reduce them at all would be full public disclosure of the accuser's identity. Anonymity for accusers is a relic of a time when virginity was expected before marriage, and ought to be done away with to prevent spurious accusations, just as it is in all other criminal accusations.

If Ms. Diallo's accusation can be proven to have been made with ill intent, the woman should be prosecuted to the full extent of the law, and subsequently deported to her home country.

UK Public Sector on Strike, Makes Little Difference

W.F. Price · 30 June 2011 · Archived copy · Original

All around the Western world governments are looking for ways to cut bloated public sector payrolls and expenses, and government workers have met these measures with outrage. In the UK, hundreds of thousands of public sector workers went on strike to protest pension changes, but according to the government the strike has had little effect, and it is largely business as usual, which suggests that a great many of the people on strike are redundant.

The public sector in Britain is largely female, and not productive. As affirmative action and other feminist policies have come to prominence, female participation in the labor force, rather than spurring innovation and growth, has resulted in a higher tax burden on men and an artificial cap on men's wages. This has led to the revenue crisis, as the productive members of society have less to tax while the non-productive public sector workers and consumers of welfare and other government-funded resources take an ever-larger share of the pie.

The budget crises happening in the UK and other Western countries are clear evidence of the failure of government programs to equalize some groups of people by handicapping others. Rather than lift the economy as a whole, these policies have stunted it, leaving governments broke and unable to provide for the legions of non-productive employees they have been supporting.

Although it would be pleasant for many to think that men and women are equally capable of creating wealth, we ignore reality at our peril. Although in the past women often had productive jobs, the fact is that women have always relied on men economically to a greater extent than men have on women, and this is probably more true today than it was 150 years ago. A farmer's wife, for example, produced more wealth simply by churning butter and selling it at the market than a contemporary grant writer with a master's degree, whose job is to persuade the government to give various organizations money for projects of dubious value.

The point has often been made that government has become the surrogate husband for many women, both protecting and providing for them as well as providing them with the guidance and discipline they need. However, it seems this husband is going broke, as his peasants can no longer provide enough for his enormous harem.

W.F. Price · 1 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've made the point a number of times that today, strident feminists are often from successful, well-heeled families. Having attended a private school for some time as a kid, I've long been well aware that wealthy urban women and girls embrace "progressive" feminism as a matter of course. At first glance it would seem to be an entirely superfluous commitment, as they have the world at their fingertips and lead the most privileged lives on the planet, but I'm starting to think there are practical benefits to it as well.

In the old days, wealthy families always faced the issue of marrying off daughters. If lucky, their daughters would marry a successful man while young and no longer be a burden on the family finances, but if she didn't find a suitable mate, or had to marry down, she could end up being quite expensive long-term — even possibly a scandalous, destabilizing influence on the family.

Today, however, daughters of the wealthy glide right into nonprofit jobs paid for with government grant money, some get jobs as directors of this or that government program "for women and children," and others take on fairly important positions in corporations or government agencies that are now increasingly dominated by women due to affirmative action.

For a wealthy or upper middle class father, having an adult daughter with a considerable income is a huge source of relief. Many of the girls I grew up with who, to put it tactfully, had quite ordinary capabilities and talents, obtained advanced degrees and well-paid jobs in make-work positions that are overwhelmingly female. That wealthy men would support this is perfectly natural; if their daughters can earn a nice government or corporate salary it takes a great deal of pressure off them. Girls who grow up accustomed to luxury cars, vacations in Aspen and platinum cards don't give these nice things up without a hell of a fight, and from daddy's perspective it's far better for Uncle Sam or the local corporate behemoth to be paying for these things than him.

For the women themselves, it allows them to pursue their luxurious, hypergamous lifestyles without having to settle down at an earlier age and without having to answer to daddy. For them, feminism has come to be another entitlement that comes along with the privilege they've always had. I think this explains why feminism is so overwhelmingly embraced by the urban upper classes.

Minnesota Shuts Down Government, Keeps Essential (i.e. Male) Employees

The AP reports that Minnesota's state government has been effectively shut down, however, the governor is keeping the absolute essentials in place, including state troopers, emergency workers, prison guards and court workers. Not surprisingly, the "essentials" are overwhelmingly male.

If all government workers are taken into account, females almost certainly outnumber males, so these kinds of emergency measures make it pretty clear who is most important for keeping things running. They also highlight the fact that government jobs are, in many cases, little more than welfare for beneficiaries of affirmative action.

Although doing away with all but the essentials would be neither realistic nor desirable, the value of these situations is that they force governments to recognize that there is a hierarchy of government functions, and this helps identify superfluous programs. Unfortunately, we'll probably have to face a lot more economic pain before politicians are forced to do away with them, but at least this is a start.

Stepmother of Groom Puts Bride-To-Be in Her Place, Blogstorm Ensues

Carolyn Bourne, a 60-year-old British florist, decided that she had had enough of her stepson's tacky, sassy fiancé, so she sent her a scathing email taking her to task for her atrocious manners.

One of the problems with contemporary young women is that, rather than receive proper training from the older women in society, they were pampered and told what precious treasures they are from infancy. This probably has something to do with the fact that their mothers weren't around enough to teach them how to avoid acting like little savages, but it also has a great deal to do with the fact that their mothers embraced second wave feminism. Somewhere along the way, women of the second-wave generation forgot that their own manners and sense of propriety came from their non-feminist upbringing, and now that they see young women's behavior they are shocked.

The letter is biting, but rather amusing from a male perspective:

> from: Carolyn Bourne > to: heidi withers > subject: your lack of manners
> Here are a few examples of your lack of manners:
> When you are a guest in another's house, you do not declare what you will and will not eat – unless you are positively allergic to something.
> You do not remark that you do not have enough food.
> You do not start before everyone else.
> You do not take additional helpings without being invited to by your host.
> When a guest in another's house, you do not lie in bed until late morning in households that rise early – you fall in line with house norms.
> You should never ever insult the family you are about to join at any time and most definitely not in public. I gather you passed this off as a joke but the reaction in the pub was one of shock, not laughter.
> You regularly draw attention to yourself. Perhaps you should ask yourself why. No one gets married in a castle unless they own it. It is brash, celebrity style behaviour.
> I understand your parents are unable to contribute very much towards the cost of your wedding. (There is nothing wrong with that except that convention is such that one might presume they would have saved over the years for their daughters' marriages.)
> If this is the case, it would be most ladylike and gracious to lower your sights and have a modest wedding as befits both your incomes.
> One could be accused of thinking that Heidi Withers must be patting herself on the back for having caught a most eligible young man. I pity Freddie.

However this turns out, Freddie should thank his stepmother for the warning if nothing else. His fiancé's manner of response should also set off alarm bells, as a woman who makes such a matter public is likely to do the same in the future during a divorce. If she'd responded graciously and with concern it would have been one thing, but she made it a whole lot of other people's business, and that's a very bad sign.

In the haze of love, the groom has probably lost sight of practical concerns, but dealing with a poorly-behaved wife is like having a wildcat in the house, and eventually it breaks even the strongest among us. Freddie would be wise to call the wedding off — he'll be grateful to his stepmother in the long run.

Will MSM Finally Name Nafissatou Diallo?

W.F. Price · 3 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Now that Ms. Diallo, known to most only as "DSK's accuser," has been exposed as a liar, a con artist and hooker, isn't it about time to shine a bit more light on this false accuser? She is a criminal in her own right — an extortionist who fraudulently claimed another woman's child to increase her tax credit, part of a pyramid scheme that shakes down ignorant immigrants from her home country, and a false accuser who couldn't keep her stories straight.

From the NY Post:

> Allegations that she worked as a hotel hooker may explain why Strauss-Kahn insists their encounter was consensual. His defense attorneys refused yesterday to comment on the damning evidence — or say whether he paid her for sex.
> Sources also told The Post Strauss-Kahn's probers uncovered evidence that she was part of a pyramid scheme that targeted immigrants from her native Guinea.
> "We have people who have been victimized, who have claimed she ripped them off. Nice working people from her neighborhood," a source said.

A compelling dissembler, Diallo shed tears and showed great emotion when recounting a fictitious gang rape in her home country of Guinea. She made a fool out of the prosecutor, subjected an innocent man to a terrible, humiliating ordeal, and cheated the US government on her asylum application, her stated income, and the number of children she had. In short, she is a crook and a thief.

So why isn't the NY Times printing her name? Why is the media still granting her anonymity?

The epidemic of false rape accusations is so out of hand that it's time to repeal the old policy of withholding alleged victims' names. There is no law in the US that grants anonymity to accusers — it is simply a policy adopted by the media long ago, when premarital sex was taboo.

Today, the policy serves as a shield for criminals such as Nafissatou Diallo, Crystal Gayle Mangum and countless others who use rape accusations as weapons or tools of extortion. As long as mainstream media outlets continue to follow this policy, they are providing a shield for opportunistic criminals such as Ms. Diallo, and casting a shadow of doubt on those who are making honest accusations.

In the name of transparency and justice, and to do something to stop the epidemic of false accusations, we must demand an end to media-sanctioned anonymity for sex crime accusers.

Careerism and Fidelity

W.F. Price · 4 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Roissy recently wrote a post comparing careerism to infidelity, and while some of his critics panned him for it, I think it was an uncommonly astute observation, especially considering he's never even been married. While he approaches the issue from personal experience with individual women and the sexual angle, I see it as more of general trend with broad implications for which plenty of exceptions exist. However, I think we can get to the root of this, and offer some convincing proof that he was correct from a look at the realities of the modern marriage and workplace.

The seminal issue is authority (and the concomitant sense of security it engenders), which has been seen as essential to marriage across cultures throughout the ages until very, very recent times. I've previously argued that authority is not something men always aspire to, and is often a burden only grudgingly accepted, but it's undeniable that in general terms it makes a big difference in the success of marriage. A man without authority over his wife cannot be said to be a full husband, but rather something between that and a child (is it any wonder that American women are so fond of referring to husbands as "childlike?"). Today, a husband has negative legal authority over a wife, so he starts out at a disadvantage as soon as he signs the marriage certificate.

On the other hand, a boss has a great deal of authority over employees, whether they be male or female. A woman who displeases a supervisor cannot threaten to "divorce" him; the best she can do is threaten a lawsuit. These days that trick has run out of steam as HR departments run interference for the company, preventing such offensive measures in the overwhelming majority of cases. She cannot spend the company money without being subject to prosecution. She cannot quit and claim ownership, nor can she expect to continue to receive monthly funds. When a woman's relationship with her place of employment is terminated, her support is severed and she is on her own.

This guarantees that women who want to continue to receive support will behave themselves and follow instructions. They may often be grumpy about it, and sometimes they complain, but for the most part that's all it amounts to, and in fact they tend to derive a great deal of satisfaction when praised for doing a good job. They also enjoy the security afforded by employment, and look up to their superiors. The fact that there is an authority figure at work comforts most women. It comforts them a great deal more than it does men, who are far more likely to strike out on their own and start their own businesses or go freelance. From this, we can conjecture that women tend not to make it to the top ranks of management not because they are being held back, but rather because most of them prefer being under authority more than most men.

Now, let's take a look at the contemporary marriage. A husband has no legal authority over his wife. If anything, the opposite is true. A man who attempts to exert authority over an unwilling or insubordinate wife is subject to dispossession and possibly arrest. If the marriage is dissolved, the ex-wife is given civil and sometimes criminal authority over the husband; judges will order him to provide for her whether he wants to or not. A husband, therefore, has a position in marriage that is even lower than a common employee, and is more accurately compared to a bondsman.

Under such a setup, a man cannot have any meaningful authority over a woman, and in many – if not most – cases a wife will come to feel a great deal of contempt and resentment. How can such a humble, lowly man possibly provide her the comfort and security she craves? He is barely better than a child, and doesn't even begin to compare to a superior at work.

Therefore, many working women will instinctively feel more attraction for their superiors at work, and it is not uncommon for affairs to ensue. In the United States, it is only strict sexual harassment laws and corporate (and military) non-fraternization policies that prevent this from becoming an outright epidemic.

For most men there is little that can be done about this, and the ordinary man can only hope that his wife has enough common sense and decency to overlook his degraded position as husband — a feeble consolation at best.

However, for some it is possible to restore some authority, but only by merging the office of husband with that of employer; in short, one must hire one's wife in order to establish something approaching the natural definition of marriage. Although this may seem like an odd solution to contemporary ears, some of the best marriages I have ever known of employ exactly this method, and it is far closer to the old definition of marriage than what is currently seen as a "normal" marriage.

Unfortunately, in the current norm of wage slavery, cubicle farms and massive corporations, it is not an option open to most people, but perhaps a bit of reflection on the natural relationships between men and women as analyzed from the universally understood paradigm of the workplace can help us move toward a more realistic appraisal of marriage. Maybe it can even help us edge a little closer to sorely-needed reform of the institution of marriage itself.

Is School Really That Important?

W.F. Price · 5 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Trollking linked a much-discussed (on Reddit) article about the dilemma facing boys in early life. They are failing in school, being eclipsed by girls, feel no sense of belonging, etc. These articles have been coming out with tiresome frequency for some years now, and although I'm not happy with the turn higher education has taken since the advent of state-enforced feminism I think I have a rather different take on this issue from most others:

There are already plenty of boys in school — perhaps too many.

Higher education in the West has become something of a cult. A college degree is supposed to "open doors," but as far as I can tell all this hype about school is only closing doors to people who do not have, and do not want to have, college degrees.

As for female success in school, this is a monumental waste of effort. STEM subjects, more important to innovation and economic progress, are still dominated by bright males. Young women major in psych, English lit. and other soft subjects and then end up in some corporate HR department, which wouldn't even exist without legislation demanding adherence to federal equality laws. While obtaining their degrees, they drink themselves silly and ruin themselves for potential husbands by sleeping with any "hot" guys they can get their hands on. They also ruin humanities programs by eliminating any remaining traces of masculinity, turning classes on Shakespeare and the like into feminist gripe sessions.

College has become a monstrous energy sink, and the requirement that people have degrees is humiliating to many young men who are perfectly capable of hard work, even if they aren't star athletes or math and science whiz kids. Except for a few limited areas, such as the aforementioned STEM subjects and college sports, higher education has become a female ghetto that any normal young man would find a highly annoying, if not painful, experience.

So I'd argue that there really isn't anything "wrong" with young men who are supposedly slacking. They have good reason to avoid college, but the dunderheads in HR and government have decided that it must be a prerequisite for anything besides digging ditches alongside illegal immigrants.

Most young men and women would be better served by trade school following high school. A four year degree is something only about 25% of the population can use effectively, but the common line is that your kids must attend college or fail. If a young man shows promise in engineering or an uncommon talent for logic and verbal analysis, sure, college might be a good idea. But if he really just likes to work on cars, pilot boats or draw pictures of machines, why not let him get to work as soon as possible?

I suspect that the real source of the malaise young men feel is the withdrawal of the opportunity to do something useful. What normal young man feels that listening to some professor drone on about "gender" and then being forced to write some garbage proving he has actually read the mind-numbing subject material is in any way productive?

Give young men the opportunity to do something, and they will seize it. For the majority of young men, school does not and cannot provide that opportunity; it is simply a kind of purgatory where the masculine spirit goes to wither away.

The Better Davis Society

The "better-than-you" crew and the women who love (using) them

by Ken Knight

Having mentioned my buddy "Davis" in a recent essay here on The Spearhead I thought I'd better explain the satirist idea of "The Better Davis Society" of which I named for an associate of mine who despite having been through two divorces in the past 10 years and having lost 2/3 of his net worth and two homes in the process continues to this day to see himself as "better" than single, childless men who have NOT fallen into the traps he so willingly sprung upon himself in less than a decade's time. Davis likes to refer to himself as a "p*ssy getting motherf*#ker" (a la Match.com and his "war hero" profile) who incessantly reminds his single buddies about his two children and the fact his "DNA will go on" etc. etc. etc. solely because he reproduced with a woman (who is now another man's wife).

Marriage 2.0 was lost on Davis because he bought and paid into the "expectation" of wife, kids, big house with picket fence, hook-line-and-sucker…and this is an example of a dynamic amongst men who are single (and particularly men who have no children)….their male peers may often prove their membership in the "Better Davis Society" by simply refusing to see outside the "shop window" where they currently reside and view men who have NOT been married or have not reproduced as "inferior" to them! Yes sports-fans, it is the "betrayal of the social order" thing again, and it is in full swing out there in La-La-Land where white knighting men "shame" their no-nuptials brethren with subtle taunts such as "Hey man, you're thirty-five now…might want to get to reproducing!" or "You like women don't ya?" and the "You can't live all by yaself, you just need to find yaself a good woman and settle down!" (ad nauseum). In short, Davis is "better" than his single and childless associates because he has done what is "expected" of him even though in doing so he lost nearly everything he had in two back-to-back divorces and despite being a $150,000-a-year man, Davis had to get a loan from Mommy and Daddy to complete his court ordered wealth-redistribution to wifey #2.

Amazing dichotomy…and I am sad to say this mental defection is not by any means confined to just one suburbanite named Davis (name changed to protect the guilty~haha).

Unless you married straight out of high school and had no bachelor years to speak of, you may remember seeing buddies get engaged/married and subsequently drop you as a friend because well…you just weren't "in" like he was since you were still swinging- single (and perhaps didn't have a girlfriend his fiancée/wife got along with). The single buddy of a married man gets the pink-slip as soon as cupcake demands it: "Your pal Jimmy is single and weird, I don't want him coming over anymore!" or the oft-used female tirade: "Your buddy Dean must be gay since he's forty and never been married!"

Note to the paladins of political-correctness: many married women flagrantly point the "fag" stick at men who aren't married (conservative and liberal!)

Even the "happily" married men will discriminate against their single brothers on a whim (no invite to their block party for July 4th because well, you're not married!) and these cats are the ones who will tell you that you "just need to find a good woman to marry!" and incessantly point out their life achievements in their marriage from the kids' soccer game scores, honor-roll accolades, junior proms, as well as their wife's weight loss and the fact they have "forgiven" one another for a lot over the years (can you say "cuckolding"?) how marriage is a work of art to be sculpted over the years, blah-blah-blah…then they'll remind you that you should have what they have and that you're f*cked up if you refuse such a life (the reason single men are not welcome in Churches).

Yes, Davis goes to Church because he pathologically operates under what is "expected" and despite not adhering to the dictums of Christianity in his personal life (sorry bro, but the Jesus of the Bible would not approve of you getting your lance waxed by a hooker at the Airport) he goes to Church anyway!

As for the wifey of a man in the “Better Davis Society” of holier-than-thou marsupials, she’s got him by the balls for the most part and will vigorously defend her turf from any and all freedom-loving single men who might happen to drive by their picket fence in a shiny new sports car or on a chopped-out Harley. Cupcake cannot have hubby unduly influenced by “free men” out there, least of all former pals of his who might convince him that he should not be married at all or (clutch the pearls) give him sage advice that may be used in his favor during the future divorce proceedings! Catch is, freedom does exist from the current Marriage 2.0 pitfall and it lies in what more and more men are finding to be little more than a pretty lie wrapped in wedding-cake white, and the ability to say NO to it now and when they’re forty, fifty, sixty: MGTOW.

The Better Davis Society or “BDM” is my new moniker for these married and later divorced guys who continue to view themselves as “better” than single/childless men simply because they went through the hell of marriage (often more than once!) and divorce without reflection upon their colossal poor choice in women as they carried out what was “expected” of them by society at large. Oh there are legions of women who just “love” men in the Better Davis Society because they’ll fall into the same trap time and time again (it is “expected” remember?) and the cycle will continue though it is decreasing in its evolution. Put another way, it’s tantamount to an indentured servant pointing at a man who is walking off the plantation and feeling “better” because he (the indentured servant) has a “master” to tell him what to do and makes decisions for him and the free man does not. The Davis I know likes to tout himself as a “p*ssy getting motherf#*ker” (i.e. being a serial-husband) and I laughed last time he said it, replying to his braggadocio with “Sure, it’s paid dividends for you hasn’t it bro?”

The Better Davis Society (BDM) deserves to become a new term for an entire legion of our brothers out there who lovingly wear blinders over their eyes and wear shackles of compliance for a society that is much like the Titanic on its maiden (and final) course and interestingly enough, doesn’t give a squirt of piss about them!

A Disgusting Sight

I don't really know what happened to Casey Anthony's daughter Caylee — that's a secret only Casey and her father can answer. But lie upon lie, damaging photos and stories that don't match up give me a pretty strong suspicion that at the very least Casey had some hand in her death.

Now that the jury – which was mostly male – has spoken, she is considered "not guilty" in the eyes of the law, and after serving her sentence for lying to investigators she'll be a free woman.

Sure, this is a disappointment, and probably an injustice against the deceased child, but perhaps the most offensive thing from my perspective was the triumphant smirk painted on Anthony's face after acquittal on murder charges. It was a slip-up in the otherwise penitent performance she's put on, and betrays, at the very least, a lack of sincerity.

She let the mask slide during sentencing as well.

This woman is a shameless liar, a manipulator and a sociopath at the very least. She is sadly common in the ranks of young American women of today, who still, if the jury's verdict is any indication, get the benefit of the doubt even in highly suspicious circumstances.

This behavior will not change until Western women are held to the same standards as men, and innocents will continue to pay the price for their misdeeds.

Marriage No Longer Exists

The Spearhead has been ripe with discussion over the so-called marriage strike. Some time back Zed argued that the word "strike" does not describe what should be going on. The word "strike" implies this is a temporary arrangement instead of a permanent state of being. He preferred marriage disbeliever or something to that effect, and with the status quo intact, being a marriage disbeliever is justified. However, I think he's focused on the wrong part of the phrase "marriage strike." A strike implies not that one day we will just give up and "go back to work" but that once our grievances are addressed, then we'll consider returning. The problem with the phrase is not the word "strike," it's the word "marriage."

Because marriage no longer exists.

Which is too bad, because most men would at least one day like to get married. Surely they want to "play the field" while they're young, but survey data , historical evidence and experience tells us that men want to get married and grow old with one partner. Perhaps it's simply tradition and social pressure, or perhaps our polygamous instincts give way to monogamous ones as we age. Regardless, it's needless to say men want to get married. They just can't because marriage doesn't exist.

The reason marriage doesn't exist is relatively simple; it's not a contract so it is thereby nothing. The talk of marriage being a "covenant" or something "divinely ordained" is all well and good on a relational or even spiritual level, but on a legal and political level, it's nothing more than a contract; A contract that binds two people together, ostensibly for the purposes of raising a family.

Legally speaking, contracts–as all contract law states–must hold both parties accountable to the stipulations of that contract. So if one party violates the contract, the contract is now void and the other party can sue for remittance. If the two parties agree to a dissolution and the terms of that dissolution voluntarily, then so be it. But what cannot happen is for one party to break the contract for no reason and be rewarded for it by the other party. To call such a thing a contract is to commit a vicious act of violence against the English language itself.

And here's where "marriage," as practiced today, fails miserably. Today we have a regime of unilateral or "no fault" divorce. One party (usually the woman) can divorce their spouse for no reason and be rewarded for it with the kids, the house, child support and perhaps even alimony. Fortunately for the man being divorced, the courts are usually gracious enough to let him keep the mortgage.

I can think of no better resource on the American family courts than Stephen Baskerville's book Taken into Custody. He documents how fathers (and occasionally mothers) are routinely separated from their children, forced to pay exorbitant sums of child support, forced to pay for attorney's, psychotherapists and social workers they have not hired, jailed without trial for being poor (the modern resurrection of debtor's prisons), prohibited from publicly discussing the trial and an assortment of other outrages.

This process was not agreed upon up front as a method of arbitration, nor is there a stipulation in a marriage contract for it. Indeed, who in their right mind would sign a contract if it was explicit and honest about how the divorce process would go down? Instead, the extraordinarily corrupt family courts do whatever they want through simple fiat.

So in essence, the mother (in the typical case) can break the contract with no reason and be rewarded for it. The father (in the typical case) can uphold the contract and be punished for it. Thus, marriage is not a contract. Marriage is nothing.

Oh, but it is something alright. While marriage is most certainly not a contract under any definition at peace with the English language, it is what I'd like MRA's to start referring to it as; a Politicized Relationship.

A politicized relationship is like any other relationship that is recorded nowhere other than on one's Facebook status. Namely, the parties involved are not contractually obligated to each other in any way whatsoever. The difference with a politicized relationship is that the state will decide what happens when the couple breaks up. The courts invade the most personal aspects of your life, not to enforce a contract but to desecrate upon the facade of a contract. How surprising they almost exclusively decide in a way that allows them plunder the father for all he's worth while standing up as some White Knight who's protecting women from their broke, broken-hearted and often suicidal ex-husbands.

We cannot strike against something that does not exist. We can be disbelievers if we like, but let's not disbelieve in the instruction of marriage, but in the politicized relationships that are disingenuously referred to as marriages. We are striking against the regime of unilateral divorce, family court criminals and a vicious gender bias. We are striking against politicized relationships. If marriage–as a legally enforceable contract–were to ever return, I think most of us would be glad to consider it again.

“Hey man, that’s my girlfriend you’re lookin’ at!”

A new couples-dynamic (and other roadside attractions)

By Ken Knight

Who here has been humored by some (usually younger in age than you) guy walking along with his girlfriend/fiancée/wife in public responding negatively to you checking out his snookem’s rear flank or perky melons up front? Such a reaction to another man’s eyes on the shapely girlfriend or wife belonging to the grieved party is a classic sign of not just being a putz but being an insecure putz that is clearly at the mercy of the two undeniable factors in the relationship of putz and snookems: 1) she has proven her infidelity before 2) worry about hypergamy occuring. Now putz and snookems are just a passing thought as you go about your business but the guy whose babe you just ogled has suffered yet another blood pressure spike as he traverses the public landscape with his scantily-clad honey who insists on dressing like a street-walker because “it’s hot outside” etc. etc.

I have witnessed more and more young men getting amped over other guys just LOOKING at their girlfriends, wives, etc. in recent years than ever before, and I for one feel it is yet another facet of modern living that should be addressed and perhaps a few of our brothers out there can correct such an insecure and “reactionary” way of thinking/acting before it makes their lives even worse. One point in particular is that you may say something aggressive to a lot of male tail-watchers who ogle your girl hawkishly and most won’t respond beyond verbal banter, however you will eventually come upon some dude whose last nerve you’ll step on with your “What are you lookin’ at?!” remark and he’ll likely be that one guy with the strength and training to stomp you into the mall pavement. As for the girlfriend/wife response to her boyfriend/husband being such an insecure douche who gets peeved over other men eyeballing his “honey”: she’ll either LIKE it and take full advantage of the control she has over her paranoid lover using his weakness against him and even getting “revenge play” on him by sneaking out with someone else when he’s not around or she eventually leaves his ass for being such a possessive douche!

If you hold onto someone too tightly, she’ll squeeze through your fingers like grease. Really dude, you get pissed off seeing other men look at your wife or girlfriend? If she’s that attractive, why not be proud of the fact she gets attention? But that can be a snare for men as well! Take my buddy Davis, who considers himself “better” than just about any man he meets and is in total denial over the fact some women I know refer to him as “Waldo”. Davis prefers “in shape” women because he says he “rates that” and enjoys being in public with good-looking (well, “good-looking” in his mind anyway) women he meets on the internet, and he’ll stay attached to the woman either by holding hands and half-hugging her the entire time they’re out of the car, giving her the “Siamese twin” treatment to make sure everyone around them sees that HE is her date and she is with HIM! Same basic insecurity as the aforementioned “putz”, only the “Siamese twin” phenomenon of a man incessantly attaching himself to his female date in public results in the dude using women to prop up his “status” (if he had any to begin with) and therefore falling square into the pitfall that has been discussed here before on THE SPEARHEAD: men who seek women more than anything else to “validate” them as “successful” or not.

The guys I know in either of the aforementioned relationship archetypes are the unhappiest scoundrels I have ever known, and their female partner does not respect them for it, even using their insecurity against them! Some people, both men and women actually, cannot be “alone” for five days let along a few weeks, because of their insecurity…the thought of being “single” for any length of time irks them more than a bullet wound, and the mere idea of their perceived social circle seeing them WITHOUT someone “hot” on their arm is unthinkable! (Internet dating sites make millions off these people). And woe unto any man who merely LOOKS at snookems while she is with Paulie Putz, his dark insecurity oozing out of him as the idea of being without his “validation” (his girlfriend who might run off with another dude) weighs heavily on his mind….when it really shouldn’t!

So think about it Broham, should you really depend on a woman to “validate” you or impress others around you…others like myself who don’t give a damn who you’re hooked up with? Come on, we really don’t care enough about you for it to be worth getting your boxers in a twist….and your girlfriend's tits will be forgotten seconds after we get a glimpse of them.

It's July in Seattle, and I've been taking advantage of the sunny days to spend some time with a friend and relax a bit. Here in the Pacific Northwest, we have a relatively short window of opportunity to enjoy our beautiful surroundings in pleasant weather, so I try to take a bit of a break this time of year when possible.

Nevertheless, I'll continue to keep the site running and will be posting something regularly, but for the next week or so it will be pretty low-key.

I hope all readers are enjoying their summers as well, and rest assured that there's plenty to come.

Feminist Atheism?

W.F. Price · 11 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The story is a bit old already, but it's always instructive when various factions of the left clash with each other, and nobody beats the feminists for causing trouble and drawing attention to themselves.

Rebecca Watson, an atheist groupie and feminist, took offense to a late-night invitation to coffee from a fellow atheist, and subsequently used the experience to engage in feminist posturing and pedantry.

What's kind of funny about these things is that feminists love to talk about how creeped out they are by men who pay attention to them, and they love to carry on in detail about the particular experiences. What they are doing is offering proof of their attractiveness (important even to feminists), making a stir, and calling for people to come to their defense — natural behaviors that females indulge in from time to time.

Somehow, people took the bait in this particular case, and it became a raging issue in the atheist community. Even atheist high priest Richard Dawkins addressed the incident, making light of Watson's outrage:

> Dear Muslima
> Stop whining, will you. Yes, yes, I know you had your genitals mutilated with a razor blade, and . . . yawn . . . don't tell me yet again, I know you aren't allowed to drive a car, and you can't leave the house without a male relative, and your husband is allowed to beat you, and you'll be stoned to death if you commit adultery. But stop whining, will you. Think of the suffering your poor American sisters have to put up with.
> Only this week I heard of one, she calls herself Skep"chick", and do you know what happened to her? A man in a hotel elevator invited her back to his room for coffee. I am not exaggerating. He really did. He invited her back to his room for coffee. Of course she said no, and of course he didn't lay a finger on her, but even so . . .
> And you, Muslima, think you have misogyny to complain about! For goodness sake grow up, or at least grow a thicker skin.
> Richard

Feminist atheist PZ Myers, however, was not all that amused. Myers, who engages in stunts designed to offend Christians, may not believe in a patriarchal God, but he certainly behaves as though he is in awe of the transcendent feminine:

> There is an odd attitude in our culture that it's acceptable for men to proposition women in curious ways — Rebecca Watson recently experienced this in an elevator in Dublin, and I think this encounter Ophelia Benson had reflects the same attitude: women are lower status persons, and we men, as superior beings, get to ask things of them. Also as liberal, enlightened people, of course, we will graciously accede to their desires, and if they ask us to stop hassling them, we will back off, politely. Isn't that nice of us?
> It's not enough. Maybe we should also recognize that applying unwanted pressure, no matter how politely phrased, is inappropriate behavior. Maybe we should recognize that when we interact with equals there are different, expected patterns of behavior that many men casually disregard when meeting with women, and it is those subtle signs that let them know what you think of them that really righteously pisses feminist women off.

Isn't it odd that Myers thinks nothing of desecrating the host – a serious provocation to believing Catholics – yet he demands that people recognize "subtle signs" that might offend women? Of course, as he explains, this is because "liberal, enlightened people" are "equals," as opposed to those benighted religious types, who deserve no such sensitivity.

This is why I, despite my rather unconventional take on religion, am an atheism skeptic — the faith has all the trappings of an elitist cult with its own taboo, ritual and dogma. Furthermore, an irrational belief in qualitative equality is a faith in and of itself.

People who simply don't believe in God or anything beyond what they know shouldn't, as Dawkins suggests, have much to complain about in the West, where they have freedom of conscience and remain unmolested. Myers, however, is not content to leave well enough alone, but instead has made it his mission to eradicate alternative faiths in favor of his own hard-left feminist theology.

PZ Myers has tenure at the University of Minnesota, Morris, where he is supported by taxpayers.

Amidst Budget Cuts, Political Programs Prevail

W.F. Price · 16 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Universities across the US have been struggling with state budget cuts, and many are being forced to cut programs and even entire disciplines. In California's public universities, however, a certain class of programs is untouchable, and even thriving amidst the carnage.

According to Heather MacDonald, writing for City Journal California, the "diversity machine" has been immune to cuts, and is expanding in many cases:

> Not only have diversity sinecures been protected from budget cuts, their numbers are actually growing. The University of California at San Diego, for example, is creating a new full-time "vice chancellor for equity, diversity, and inclusion." This position would augment UC San Diego's already massive diversity apparatus, which includes the Chancellor's Diversity Office, the associate vice chancellor for faculty equity, the assistant vice chancellor for diversity, the faculty equity advisors, the graduate diversity coordinators, the staff diversity liaison, the undergraduate student diversity liaison, the graduate student diversity liaison, the chief diversity officer, the director of development for diversity initiatives, the Office of Academic Diversity and Equal Opportunity, the Committee on Gender Identity and Sexual Orientation Issues, the Committee on the Status of Women, the Campus Council on Climate, Culture and Inclusion, the Diversity Council, and the directors of the Cross-Cultural Center, the Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender Resource Center, and the Women's Center.

In the meanwhile, other degree programs are going under the axe:

> UC San Diego is adding diversity fat even as it snuffs out substantive academic programs. In March, the Academic Senate decided that the school would no longer offer a master's degree in electrical and computer engineering; it also eliminated a master's program in comparative literature and courses in French, German, Spanish, and English literature. At the same time, the body mandated a new campus-wide diversity requirement for graduation. The cultivation of "a student's understanding of her or his identity," as the diversity requirement proposal put it, would focus on "African Americans, Asian Americans, Pacific Islanders, Hispanics, Chicanos, Latinos, Native Americans, or other groups" through the "framework" of "race, ethnicity, gender, religion, sexuality, language, ability/disability, class or age." Training computer scientists to compete with the growing technical prowess of China and India, apparently, can wait. More pressing is guaranteeing that students graduate from UCSD having fully explored their "identity." Why study Cervantes, Voltaire, or Goethe when you can contemplate yourself? "Diversity," it turns out, is simply a code word for narcissism.

And what is the real purpose of these programs?

> The one observable activity performed by these lavishly funded diversity bureaucrats is to pressure academic departments to hire more women and minorities. (Even that activity is superfluous, given the abundant pressure for race and gender quotas already exerted by campus groups, every accrediting agency, and external political bodies.) Should a department fail to satisfy—as it inevitably will in every field with low minority participation—only one explanation is possible: a departmental or campus "climate" hostile to diversity, which then requires more intercessions from the diversity bureaucracy. The fact that every other college and university in the country is scouring the horizon for the identical elusive cache of qualified female and minority hires is not allowed into the discourse.

California tends to lead the nation in trends, and if its universities are any indication we are in for a period of substantial decline in higher education.

The author brings up the issue of sinecures. A sinecure is a position that provides easy income without any real responsibility, and has traditionally been used by politicians to provide patronage to supporters. It may be that California, which is evolving toward the Latin American model, is more susceptible to this than other parts of the country, but given our political climate and the degeneration of the American republic into a diverse hodgepodge of competing interest groups, it's probably inevitable that the rest of the nation will follow to some degree.

Universities, like so many other institutions, are taking on the job of providing welfare rather than performing their putative function. One sees the same happening in government institutions across the land, from the military to county governments. This colossal waste saps the vitality of the private sector, feeding itself at the expense of the productive members of society.

Unfortunately, as long as there is anything left for the beast to consume it will grow and strengthen itself. I'm afraid there cannot be a good end to all this, because at this point it looks as though the only thing that could put a stop to it is bankruptcy.

Back to Court Soon

W.F. Price · 17 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I don't usually get into personal issues, but I thought it might be illuminating for some of the younger, never-married guys out there to hear about various aspects of family law from time to time. I'd also like to let readers know what I was dealing with last week.

People tend not to think of all the messy details that go along with divorce, instead focusing on the most obvious fact of the separation, new partners, etc. However, when children are involved a divorce is never final. It goes on, and on, and on…

So, although my divorce was finalized over two years ago, and I'm pretty much over the emotional and psychological stress that accompanies such an event, it still presents problems on an ongoing basis.

On Monday, I was served with a "notice of intent to relocate," which is required when a parent (usually the mother) wants to move the children away from the other parent (usually the father) for whatever reason. In my case, it's because my ex hitched up with a foreigner, so she wants to move the kids to another country.

I've been expecting this for some time, but it's still a source of some stress to think that one's children might be going away pretty much permanently. When a parent is served with this notice in Washington state, the burden to object is on the parent with less physical custody, so it's up to him to go to court to argue against the move if he opposes it. That is, the presumption is that the mother will get her way, so it's an uphill battle from the beginning.

In relatively close moves (e.g. to a neighboring state), a man might as well simply give up, because he will routinely lose his objection, but when the issues become more complex, as in international cases, the bar is set considerably higher. However, this doesn't so much mean that a father has an advantage in these cases as it does that he will have to shell out a lot of money to an attorney to work through the complexities of international law to either prevent the move or draw up an enforceable, acceptable parenting plan.

Men often complain about how difficult it is to get their ex-wives to comply with visitation even when they live in the same county, so think of how much more difficult it is when she is in another country. It's a logistical nightmare, and for guys with a working or lower-middle class income (i.e. most young fathers) an international move often simply removes them from their children's lives permanently.

The rising numbers of international moves are having one positive effect: they are exposing the problems inherent in the feminist extremist position in child custody cases. That women are presumed to have the right to permanently remove children from blameless fathers is morally appalling, and this system does not hold up to the kind of scrutiny that accompanies international treaties, such as the Hague Convention on international child abduction.

No fault divorce opened up a huge can of worms that has global implications, and is turning out to be an obvious failure. My hunch is that the problems it has introduced will fundamentally weaken the practice of civil marriage, perhaps eventually leading to its disappearance and setting the stage for a new, more functional form of marriage based on mutual responsibility rather than female supremacy.

India's First Slutwalk Takes Another Tack

W.F. Price · 19 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In an attempt to bring Western-style feminism to India, some female Indian students have been organizing slutwalks to protest sexual assault in India. On Sunday, the first Indian slutwalk was held in Bhopal, but it was plagued with problems from the outset. First, the name didn't sit too well with Indian women, who decided to change change it from "slutwalk" to "PrideStride." Evidently, Indian women still have enough self-respect to refuse to associate themselves with sluts.

The next problem was the style of dress. Rather than the revealing, raunchy clothes sported by Western slutwalkers, the Indian women chose to dress conservatively rather than – in their words – "provocatively."

Finally, the numbers and sex ratio were a disappointment to organizers:

> The numbers, however, fell below expectations with organizers estimating that between 60-70 people turned up. "Yes, we were expecting more people…we were expecting at least 150 people," said Radhika Shingwekar, the main organizer of Bhopal's Slut Walk. Their Facebook page shows that about 450 people wanted to attend it.
> Among those who attended, there were more boys than girls. "I was disappointed to see few girls but, on the other hand, it was good to see so many boys…

It strikes me that the entire point of slutwalks, which in Western countries is to offend and provoke while occupying the moral high chair, was undermined in India, which is still apparently a traditional country.

The stark contrast between the slutwalks in the West and the Indian version lends some perspective to the movement. The Western phenomenon of women marching around baring as much flesh as possible and getting in people's faces with it clearly indicates that women occupy a privileged position in society. They are free to be offensive and provocative while intimidating others into silence.

Contemporary feminist displays in the West show little – if any – restraint, and are no more than an exercise in social power and dominance. In countries where some balance remains, women eschew such naked displays of power and aggression.

In the West, and North America in particular, women have adopted a truly ugly, confrontational manner that consists of displaying their private parts to the world and declaring that there's nothing anyone can do about it. When seen for what it is, it's really quite shameful and a major embarrassment to our civilization.

From the Moon to the Gutter

As I go through it all over again, I'm reminded of how utterly wasteful family law procedure is in the US. The loss of productivity, the missed chances for children of divorce and the unnecessary conflict it creates are such a hindrance that I wonder how we can afford it at all. In a sense, it's a return to savagery, where, rather than turn their minds toward human progress, people wasted all their efforts on passing fancies, petty squabbles and vendettas.

Perhaps it's significant that, over 40 years after the first moon landing, as of yesterday we no longer have a space program capable of launching people into orbit. Today, for most Americans, it's all about the newest reality show, celebrity scandals and the next orgasm.

As for me, however this turns out, I just want to get back to work…

Female Judges Making their Presence Felt on Supreme Court

W.F. Price · 24 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Not long ago, a very important case concerning divorced fathers facing incarceration for inability to pay child support went before the Supreme Court. the issue at hand was whether or not men could be jailed for arrears without the benefit of counsel.

In Turner vs. Rogers, a South Carolina mother took her children's father to court to force him to send her money. He had already been jailed a number of times for child support arrears, and finally received a 12 month sentence. Turner then challenged the sentence on the basis of the Sixth Amendment, which guarantees the right to counsel in criminal prosecutions, including criminal contempt proceedings.

The court ultimately found that because child support cases such as Turner's are civil rather than criminal contempt cases, Turner is not entitled to legal assistance. However, it also ruled that Turner's due process rights had been violated, because the state of South Carolina had failed to notify him that inability to pay is a valid defense in child support cases.

The majority opinion, written by Breyer, was tortuous and vague. Andrew Cohen, a legal editor for CBS, wrote a piece for The Atlantic that was fairly critical of the decision, suggesting that it could have implications that extend much farther than family law:

> … there will be plenty of other people in Turner's position, men and women both, who will be sent to prison for up to a year after a legal proceeding in which they were not given the opportunity to confer with a lawyer. You can call it "civil contempt" instead of "criminal contempt," as South Carolina and many other states do. You can call it whatever you like, actually, to skirt the letter of Sixth Amendment precedent. But no matter what the proceeding is called, the defendant still faces serious prison time if he doesn't comply. Didn't the fabled Gideon opinion, handed down nearly 50 years ago now, mandate counsel in those circumstances?
> I think it did. Yet I acknowledge the delicate dance that justices Breyer and Kennedy performed in the case. Justice Kennedy maybe helps rescue Turner by signing on to the opinion. And Justice Breyer maybe helps rescue Justice Kennedy with an opinion that neither guarantees nor precludes due process protections for future defendants in these sorts of cases. At the very same time, therefore, Turner v. Rogers stands both for the proposition that there is no due process protection for a defendant like Turner who doesn't get counsel and for the proposition that a defendant like Turner may, in fact, have his due process rights violated by not having counsel.
> This issue will be back–even if Turner is not. Like many compromises in law and life, the one at the highest level of this case only delays to some near-future Court Term the resolution of the tough questions about how far the Sixth Amendment, or the due process clause, ought to extend into these hybrid cases. If debtor's prisons indeed are back in vogue in America, the law surrounding them surely won't be too far behind.

Cohen certainly makes a good point, and all Americans – not only fathers in arrears – should find this decision worrisome, but what I find rather curious is that he didn't even give a passing mention to the female justices, who to a woman voted against counsel for men in child support cases. The majority was only 5-4, so the female vote obviously was the critical factor here. Additionally, the decision to limit the rights of defendants came from the so-called "liberal" wing of the court, with the most vigorous opposition coming from Clarence Thomas, who argued that finding that Turner's due process had been violated while rejecting the applicability of the Sixth Amendment was a non sequitur.

Wolves in the Wilderness

During my little sojourn to the North Cascades, I decided to stay at Loup Loup Pass north of Twisp, which is in high country bristling with pines. It is the kind of place where ravens croak noisily throughout the day, the pines are filled with songbirds and elk bugle in the woods. At just over 4,000 feet, it is cool and pleasant when compared to the nearby valleys and canyons of the Columbia basin, and it is one of the wildest places in the lower 48. Therefore, it wasn't surprising to find evidence of elk and bears scattered around the campground, but when sun went down I heard a delightful and unexpected climax to the symphony of nature.

While sitting in front of the fire under the sparkling vault, the night sky so clear the stars looked as though they could be plucked right out of the heavens, a long howl pierced the cool air, lingering for some time before another answered. Two wolves were calling each other after the long day; perhaps one was letting the other know he was coming home after a hunt. Then, much to my surprise, a warbling, musical little howl rang out from the same direction as the responding howl and carried on quite excitedly for a while. It was a pup, responding to his returning parent, happy to hear daddy coming home. It was an endearing sound, and it reminded me that in a few noble species the bond between father and child is forged by nature itself.

Wolves, like humans, pair bond to raise their young, and only deviate from that family model in unnatural circumstances, such as captivity, disease and overpopulation.

Hearing the wolf family was reassuring, as it reminded me that nature is resilient. Wolves were eradicated from Washington state by the 1930s due to government bounties and systematic extermination, but they have been returning in recent years. When the state sets its efforts to suppressing nature, the results can be devastating, but when it relents there is hope for recovery.

The return of the wolves to the high country of the Okanogan offers us a hopeful example. Someday, the state assault on the natural family and program to eradicate the father child bond can be reversed. Efforts to domesticate and stunt the natural man, bending him into a servile cur who exists solely at the pleasure of his masters, will eventually fail, and when a father calls to his family his children, like the wolf pup at Loup Loup Pass, will cry out with joy, and not sorrow.

Feminist Bookstore Runs Into Financial Trouble

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 25 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In Other Words, a feminist bookstore in Portland, OR has run into financial trouble. The organization that runs In Other Words, the Women's Community Education Project, ran $18,743 in the red last year. Last month, the store laid off its only two employees. Sales at the bookstore are down 73% compared to four years ago. A plan to redefine the bookstore as a "resource center" has not stemmed the tide of financial losses.

The financial trouble In Other Words is having can be traced to one source, a law that took effect last summer that made it illegal to force college students to buy their textbooks from a single source. Before that law took effect, In Other Words had an exclusive contract to sell textbooks for women's studies classes at Portland State University. All students at PSU taking a women's studies class had to buy their textbooks from In Other Words until last summer. Given that PSU is a state university, In Other Words effectively survived on a government subsidy. Given that the law in question was passed in 2008 and didn't take effect until 2010, the management of In Other Words had a long time to come up with a plan to deal with the lost income from not having a captive market. However, management of In Other Words has been unable to stop the financial losses. Because of this, it is likely that In Other Words will be closing in the near future.

How Many Lesbian Parades Does Portland Need?

Jack Donovan · 25 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It has been a tepid Summer of Sluts.

Organizers of the first SlutWalk in Toronto might have hoped that drawing attention to the common-sense but politically taboo remarks of a Toronto policeman would ignite a blazing rage in women across the world who'd simply "had enough" of men who believe that sexually provocative attire is meant to be sexually provocative. But it didn't. Average women didn't take to the streets and demand men stop leering at their heaving cleavage or panty-revealing mini-skirts. Just as grown men know that no one will take them seriously if they walk around with their dicks hanging out (dick display is apparently what cell phones are for) smart, beautiful women know how to use clothing to attract attention when they want it, and cover up when they want to elicit an intelligent conversation. Several women around the world have publicly questioned the wisdom of these walks, and wondered aloud if average women would truly benefit from this kind of petulant feminist activism.

Heartiste at Citizen Renegade noted early on that SlutWalkers tended to be fat or ugly hags and their proudly moobed fags. In city after city, the SlutWalk scene has looked more like a gay event than a display of outraged hausfraus and successful businesswomen. Condoleeza Rice, Hillary Clinton and Angela Merkel were presumably unavailable to join their sisters on the streets, and Sara Palin never managed to break out a pair of her Naughty Monkey come-fuck-me pumps for one of the events. They're all very busy and important women, so that's understandable. In Seattle, as Mr. Price noted, it was the Trotskyite "Radical Women" who were able to attend.

I've been keeping an eye on developments concerning Portland's SlutWalk. I even donated a Saturday afternoon and designed "Whoregon" t-shirts to help men welcome the sluts to Oregon.

Sadly, it seems that the strippers of Portland will not be sliding down from their poles and taking to the streets to show men, once and for all, that looking does not mean touching, even in the champagne room.

That's because the Portland SlutWalk will be another lesbian parade.

It was a fresh-faced petunia named Abigail Vernon who first jumped on the bandwagon and decided that Portland should have its own SlutWalk. She got to work and aggressively promoted the idea on Facebook. However, she was inexperienced, and didn't realize that the City of Portland was going to want a cut of the SlutWalk action. Abigail changed the date for the walk and tried to raise funds to pay for permitting. Even though there are over a million women in the greater Portland metropolitan area who may be at risk of suffering the burden of male sexual interest, she could only manage to scrape together a little over $300 bucks.

More experienced sluts stepped in and tried to help poor Abigail realize her dream of whoring it up downtown. However, on June 28th, they asked Abigail to "step aside" and issued a press release stating that they "refused to handle lack of understanding or care of race and class politics around sexuality and organizing with empathy or apathy." I've pasted the documentation of this dramatic hen coup below for posterity.

> For Immediate Release
> June 28, 2011
> Four individuals (Sterling Clark, Ryan Basille, Sophia St. James, and Abigail Vernon) came together with a shared interest in holding and facilitating a Slutwalk event in Portland, OR. Three of us, Sophia St. James, Ryan Basille, and Sterling Clark's vision and history as community activists, and anti-oppression politics gelled quickly. Over the next two months, however, it became obvious that the team was not working well together and that our vision was not adopted by all as cohesive, fully inclusive, and decidedly understanding the class and race politics of significant importance to this event, epecially because it is happening in the state of Oregon. Considering these two factors, the three of us understood the subsequent need for us to continue our > consciousness-raising work and to stand firm as anti-racist allies in this event. We did our best to bring the team into alignment on this issue and over time found this was not possible. As a result, we asked Abigail Vernon to step aside. In our late 20s and early 30s, we can only imagine what a daunting task this all could have been for someone as young as seventeen, with limited organizing experience. However, the three of us refused to handle lack of understanding or care of race and class politics around sexuality and organizing with empathy or apathy.

> We would like to collectively express that we handled this matter as thoughtfully and privately as possible, until we felt an explanation was owed to our community and to the event itself. Many factors played into our decision, including: the misrepresentation of our organization and its mission, mismanagement of accounts holding the name of Slutwalk Portland, sponsorship communications while these accounts were under their control, and communications not handled thoughtfully as written by survivors and allies of survivors, slandering of members publicly, and dishonesty as to prior organizing experience.
> We apologize to our communities, survivors, and allies for any confusion surrounding the conflicting event pages and multiple event dates. Upon the joining of forces at the inception of the group, we found the date had been selected at random by this member without permits.
> We would like to sincerely thank our community for receiving this event so fully, enthusiastically, and lovingly! As a team of dedicated organizers who collectively are queer, sex workers, underemployed, class aware, anti-racist white allies, people of color, women identifying, cis-gender, non-cis gender identifying, survivors, allies, domestic violence advocates, and parents, we want to embrace all of the facets of these identities and more in our aim to represent and serve the diverse array of experiences reclaiming sexual identity, refusing rape culture, and revolting against sexualized violence as a means of policing gender and sexuality, reinforcing patriarchy, racism, transphobia, homophobia, fatphobia, and perpetuating the criminalized status of sex workers and women of color.

Sophia St. James, Ryan Basille, and Sterling Clark are hardly suburban soccer moms.

Sophia St. James runs http://www.sophiastjames.com, which is NSFW. She describes herself as a “curvaceous, fun, playful, intelligent, lifestyle top heavy queer femme switch, well mannered, sassy, exotic, pervert with an insatiable hunger for all things sexual.” As far as I can tell, she fancies herself a fetish photographer and wants people of ALL GENDERS to come and help her produce poorly lit, trite pornographic images that belong on http://youarenotaphotographer.com/.

You can find Sterling Clark on MySpace under the name “amorous addictions.” She describes herself as a lesbian swinger from “la la land” as well as an “exotic panhandler/ love warrior/ dream builder.” Sterling appears to be (or have been) a member of “Portland’s Premiere All Queer Burlesque Troupe,” the Rose City Sirens.

There is less information available online about Ryan Basille, but on twitter she describes herself as a “Sex Workers’ rights advocate. GV, queer cultural worker” as well as a “Public policy and yoga enthusiast.” (On July 15, she tweeted that they had raised $1200.)

On June 7th, it was announced that SlutWalk Portland was being officially sponsored by qPDX—a local gay organization. It is co-sponsored by Casa Diablo, Portland’s only vegan strip club (A strip joint without roast beef curtains??), and Aslan Leather, a retailer that guarantees “the best in strap on sex.” REALLY NSFW.

The Portland Gay Pride festival was only about a month ago. I remember it, because I had to re-route a trip to the bookstore that day so that gays, lesbians and transsexuals could stomp around the city in (often) sexually explicit or revealing outfits. If you peruse this photo set, you'll see that many gays and lesbians took the opportunity to dress like sluts.

The Portland SlutWalk isn't a grassroots effort organized by average women, or even average feminists. It's a lesbian parade, organized by professional lesbian exhibitionists and sponsored by a queer organization—and a strap-on company.

How many lesbian parades does Portland need?

SlutWalk is supposed to be about social stigmas that all women struggle with, but why is it only lesbians who care enough to get involved?

If SlutWalk was a movement for average women, spurred by a deeply felt need to comment on a persistent social problem, it would at least be interesting. If it were what it sounds like, it would be of particular interest to the average Joe. However, as another excuse for lesbian exhibitionism, SlutWalk Portland is just boring.

The best SlutWalk Portland has to offer the public is the comedy of dyke infighting and the drama of absurd far-left victim posturing. And maybe a few dirty pictures.

Mirth in the Mutilation of Men careyroberts · 26 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

No one disputes the facts of the case. After a brief marriage, a 60-year-old California business owner filed for divorce, citing irreconcilable differences. He allowed his wife, Catherine Becker, to remain in his condominium while the divorce was finalized.

But Becker apparently became consumed by a jealous rage over the man's new-found romantic interest. So last Monday she drugged the man, lashed him to a bed, severed his penis with a 10-inch knife, and tossed the appendage into a garbage disposal.

Most were appalled and outraged. "It's hard to believe what would motivate a person to do this sort of thing," said Susan Kang Schroeder, chief of the Orange County District Attorney's Office. "It's one of the worst things you could do to a person short of killing him."

Ali Ammar, who handles hundreds of divorce and domestic disputes a year with Orange Detective Agency in Irvine, commented, "I've seen people with their heads blown off, but this story makes me cringe," Not surprisingly, Judge Debra Carrillo ordered Becker held without bail.

But for some, the incident was cause for merriment and glee.

Veronica Roberts of California made light of the incident, headlining how Becker made "mince meat" of her victim's appendage. "Another women performed a 'Bobbit' and goes for the cleaver," she wrote cheerfully.

Leigh Moody, anchor at KSPR-TV in Springfield, Missouri, prefaced her blog entry with the words, "Revenge Attack." Apparently Ms. Moody was not troubled by the notion of vigilante justice implicit in her headline.

At SodaHead News, the attack was cause for ribald hilarity. "What's up with all these severed penises? It's like the new go-to punishment for unruly husbands."

The blogger at Hegemony Heights was inspired to pen this light-hearted limerick:

There once was a woman called Becker who cut off her poor husband's pecker
On her way to divorce
she used drugs and some force to become the ultimate home wrecker

But some dispensed with the façade of facetiousness.

At The Stir, Maijken Brence wrote, "some men deserve things like this happening to them." And over at the Online Dish, Kim commented, "the jaw dropper is the garbage disposal part…hahaha."

And the inevitable Facebook page offering approving "You go girl!" call-outs for Becker:
http://www.facebook.com/pages/Catherine-Kieu-Becker-Fan-page/111461202282860

When Wendy Williams was asked about the incident, the TV personality quipped,
"When you cross a woman, all is fair." Finding humor in the garbage disposal, Williams joked, "It was more efficient than throwing it in a field, where they could pick it up."

Over at ABC's The Talk, Sharon Osbourne decided it was time to goose her audience ratings. So after averring she didn't know the circumstances for his decision to file for the divorce (did the reasons really matter?), she described the incident as "hysterical" and summed it up with the remark, "it's quite fabulous."

A couple days later Osbourne issued an apology, stating, "I do not condone genital mutilation and I didn't mean any harm by laughing about it and I'm sorry that I offended people 'cause that's not my intention or the intention of the show – it's not what we are about."

But that apology misses the mark. The issue is not whether Osbourne intended to offend her viewers or whether people were in fact offended. The point is, Osbourne indulged in grossly inappropriate behavior in a way that minimized the grotesque incident and ridicule men.

Let’s call it woman’s inhumanity to man.

Summer's Eve "Hail to the V" Ads Stir Up Controversy

W.F. Price · 26 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In what appears to be a tribute to Eve Ensler's Vagina Monologues, Summer's Eve has started marketing feminine hygiene products with hand puppets representing talking vaginas. The vaginas, which represent various ethnicities, have been characterized by outraged women as maudlin stereotypes. Furthermore, the suggestion that there's anything wrong with a filthy vagina, according to some women (and the putatively male author), is highly offensive.

Perhaps it was a bit risky to portray the black vagina as a club-hopping, hair-obsessed freak, and the latina vagina as a spanglish-talkin' baby-making machine, but in all likelihood this was simply a result of market research.

All I can take away from this is that women have entirely too little to complain about in this day and age, as the ads, which were probably created by female-saturated marketing teams, are neither particularly racist nor shaming of women, but rather simply crude and stupid, like the Vagina Monologues that inspired them.

A couple examples:

"You're a Bunch of Whiners"

W.F. Price · 26 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most common insults hurled at men who have a problem with the family law regime as it's set up today is that they are simply "whining." It's a typical insult, and one might expect it from feminists, but the odd thing is that a whole lot of men use it as well. I'd say these men fall into three camps:

(1) The head-in-the-sand men who are clinging to the illusion that there's something inherently worthy about civil marriage as it exists in the West today.

First, a clear distinction needs to be made between contemporary civil marriage and traditional marriage. There was a great deal of value in traditional marriage. It was crucial for the success of our civilization. However, the sham that passes for marriage today is a far, far cry from that. For some reason, a very large number of men can't seem to grasp this simple concept, and resort to shaming and insults whenever anyone undermines their noble – if wrong-headed – ideals.

Certainly, traditional marriage still exists, but not in law. It is solely a cultural practice that is sadly slipping away year after year.

When men who have seen the light for one reason or the other (most of us after getting burned very badly), go after "marriage," they are not talking about salt of the earth pioneer couples striving together to raise a family and wealth from the ground up. Rather, they are attacking a cynical set of laws designed to force men into penury to maximize tax revenue and minimize social spending on women who made poor or wicked choices in life. Of course, that isn't even taking legal and court fees into account.

The men who don't understand this tend to see criticism of marriage as an excuse to live a libertine lifestyle, griping from cads and, importantly, a repudiation of their own sacrifices for family. However, it is no such thing. Most of us, despite the invective that results from getting the shaft, have a nostalgic, positive attitude toward the old-fashioned institution. Some reject even that, to be sure, but there have always been men going their own way, and they have always had their place in society and out; we'd be a far poorer people without them.

(2) Men who directly profit from the family law regime/feminized society.

It should hardly need to be mentioned, but the attorneys, social workers, politicians and counselors who have a financial stake in the status quo are perfectly willing to disparage men — for a fee or a favor.

Politicians will gladly throw fathers and husbands to the wolves for the female vote, lawyers will stand up in front of judges and smear them for a share of the wealth their wives stand to gain, and marriage counselors, Dr. Phil, etc. will perform the psychological equivalent of "pelvic massage" for female clients/audiences.

When such men throw insults around, all one needs to remember is that they are being paid to perform; they are essentially turning tricks for the female public.

(3) Lesbians trapped in men's bodies.

Although these men represent a fairly small portion of the male population, they are surprisingly common nonetheless, and very vocal where men's issues are concerned. Typically, they are the guys who have daddy issues, or who were mistreated when young for being perceived as strange, effeminate or awkward. Some of them, especially the male-to-female transsexual types, are mentally ill to some extent and have fantasies of self-mutilation, castration, etc.

Many of us are familiar with these types, as they can be quite vocal online and in the "men's Studies" departments of various universities. They typically have a sublimated self-loathing that expresses itself as hatred for their fellow men.

These are, in my opinion, the most dangerous of all our detractors, because they are so often fanatical ideologues, and, if my inbox is any indication, prone to homicidal ideation.

So, when confronted with the “you’re just whining” smear from a man, remember that he is either (1) in denial; (2) profiting from the current system; or, (3) a damaged individual.

For the first category, I would suggest initially gently pointing out his error, and if he persists in his fantasies, leaving him to them without belaboring the point. For the second, simply call out his motive and deal with him as you would with anyone whose interests are at odds with your own. And for the third, exercise caution and avoid him if at all possible — you do not want or need to deal with such troubled individuals.

British Writer Points Finger at Breivik's Father

W.F. Price · 27 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In an appalling example of shaming, Katherine Birbalsingh, a British schoolteacher, has thrown some of the blame for the Norway massacre on Anders Breivik's father, who was absent for most of the confessed killer's childhood.

Some commenters have noted that he was raised by a single mother, and Breivik himself evidently wrote about this fact in his manifesto, but given that a number of other mass murderers (e.g. Timothy McVeigh) were raised in intact homes, I'm not sure we can draw many conclusions from this. However, people are always interested in the family lives of the infamous, so there is sure to be speculation.

Given the state of family law in the West for the past 40-odd years, blaming a man for "abandoning" his children is akin to blaming a factory worker for losing a hand in an industrial accident. Evidently, the elder Breivik did in fact fight for custody of his son. Naturally, he lost. Birbalsingh compares his attempt to gain custody of his son with "treating him like some kind of football," which is to say he was kicking the infant boy around:

> I wonder whether he thought about his son's peace of mind when he thought it best to move to Paris and then put his son through the ordeal of a custody battle where he and his new wife fought to take him from his mother and half-sister (his mother had a daughter when she married his father) and his homeland, in order to attempt to raise him in Paris? Anders was only one year old at the time his parents separated with his father treating him like some kind of football. Such traumatic events in a child's life so early on can have life-long effects.

Even worse, she goes on to blame him for not being there for the boy, when it was Anders' mother who moved him away from his father. Throughout her entire piece, there is not a mote of criticism of a mother who would separate a child from his father, but only contempt and blame for the father dispossessed of his child.

Far too many of us know first-hand the cruelty of a system that allows women to rip children away from their fathers for any and every reason, but, believe it or not, it was even worse 30 years ago when Anders Breivik was a small child. At that time, fathers hadn't a chance, and "visitation" was extraordinarily meager. I grew up with a number of young men in that situation. Their fathers were, for the most part, ordinary, decent people. I can't say the same for most of their mothers, unfortunately, and the outcomes for these men were mixed, but usually far from ideal, and undeniably worse than for those in intact families or who had continuing contact with their fathers.

Perhaps we'd like to think that fathers still have some means to foster a relationship with their children despite having an unreasonable ex, but the obstacles are very steep. The most straightforward route offered by the law is disengagement from one's children and payment of child support. Fighting an unwilling ex for time with one's children is expensive and fraught with uncertainty — it is a martyr's cause that can lead to poverty and possibly incarceration.

The callousness of Ms. Birbalsingh in attacking a father who is losing his son all over again is breathtaking, but at least it shines a light on one of the ugliest aspects of contemporary Western society: the utter contempt in which fathers are held.

Orthodox Heterodoxy and the Tragedy in Norway

W.F. Price · 27 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday evening, I stopped by the local vigil for the Norwegian victims of Anders Breivik's rampage. It was held at the Nordic Heritage museum in Ballard, which is Seattle's Scandinavian neighborhood. The event was attended by hundreds of people, as Seattle is still home to many Norwegian nationals and people of Norwegian ancestry (I am part Norwegian myself). Norwegian Consul Kim Nesselquist was there, as were Dr. Loren Anderson, the president of Pacific Lutheran University, and a couple Lutheran pastors. It was a Lutheran service, including prayers, some singing and music, a speech by the consul and what was essentially a sermon by the president of PLU.

It was a heartfelt vigil, especially for the Norwegian Consul, whose voice broke as he expressed gratitude to the people of Seattle. It is saying something when a Norwegian man expresses such emotion. To me, what was most touching was hearing the churchgoing women around me sing Amazing Grace in soft tones.

I looked around at the largely Scandinavian crowd, seeing a couple people I recognized, and felt very much at home, despite the fact that I was raised Catholic. Although emotions were subdued, as is the Scandinavian custom, the sense of grief was real and palpable.

My own feelings about the vigil and the tragedy in Norway were those of resignation. Having worked for years cataloging countless atrocities and massacres in the volatile Middle East and other conflict areas, I couldn't help but feel a sense of inevitability about the killings. When I first heard about it, it struck me immediately that it was a sectarian slaughter, the likes of which occur on a regular basis in places such as Kashmir, Northwest Frontier Province in Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Nigeria, etc.

As I listened to Loren Anderson give his sermon, endorsing the lofty liberal ideals of FDR, imploring us to cherish diversity and individualism, and to contemplate the balance between freedom and responsibility, I felt nostalgia rather than hope. The days when these ideals worked tolerably well are drawing to an end.

Dr. Anderson, president of a university, is clearly a proponent of the liberal orthodoxy that has prevailed in the West since WWII, and is the only true bond that unites the elites of our civilization.

In a society that mirrors the demographics of the people I saw yesterday evening, it is a humane, progressive and functional governing philosophy, but in its endorsement of cultural heterodoxy (i.e. diversity and multiculturalism) it contains the seeds of its own destruction. It is essentially a program of atomization and dissolution in the name in the name of freedom and individualism on the one hand, and a heavy-handed repression of any communal resistance to it on the other. The result is that all balance and natural restraint is thrown to the wind, and political and social movements take on the character of tribalism, which is the default (and savage) form of social organization amongst human beings.

Therefore, we have an elite that not only endorses, but actively strives to create a society that lacks cohesion, is suspicious of others in its midst, and necessarily takes an adversarial position over any and all differences. Is it any wonder that some depraved individual may take this to its extreme conclusion and attempt to wipe out the next generation of his perceived rivals? How, in a "diverse, multicultural society" full of competing interests could we expect there to be a sense of obligation to one's neighbors, let alone compatriots?

I know how, but it's nothing like what the Western elites have in mind. In the kind of society they are busy creating, the only solution to endless conflict is an overriding, supreme ideology of some sort, such as Islam, Communism, Christianity or Imperial China's emperor worship. But they will have none of this. Inevitably, the proposed solution will be more heterodoxy, more multiculturalism — more tribalism in short. And they, and we, and everyone else around us, will get it.

Look to a West that increasingly resembles a sectarian frontier; the kind of place Osama bin Ladin lived out the final years of his life. When the resources of the state dwindle, it will be a much harder place to handle than it used to be.

Roissy's blog, Citizen Renegade, appears to have been deleted by the author. The site contained hundreds of articles, many of them very well-written and thoughtful, and we can only hope that they are preserved in one manner or another. Roissy has a particular talent for iconoclasty and exposing the "pretty lies" that are so commonly served up to us for the falsehoods they are.

Although he most recently went under "Heartiste," most of us know the author in the original "Roissy" manifestation, which is a reference to the French novel "The Story of O."

Although Roissy certainly doesn't owe anyone anything after all the work he's put into the blog, I'm sure many of us are very curious about its sudden disappearance and are awaiting some news.

Doing Something Constructive — Marriage Reform

W.F. Price · 29 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

For some time there's been a fair amount of criticism of the lack of "action" amongst men who are fed up with the status quo as regards the family, marriage, relationships with women and fatherhood. It's actually a fair point, but I'm not sure very many people could offer examples of action that would have a lasting, positive effect. Lashing out violently, for example, is unlikely to result in any long term benefits, and it might simply lead to more drastic laws and heavy handed police measures. Ordinary political activism along the traditional lines (i.e. special interest lobbying) does work, and is already having some positive effects, but it is limited by the fact that it's simply an extension to the current system and cannot fundamentally change the paradigm, but rather reinforce it.

However, there is the potential for revolutionary change without violence, especially where sexual politics is concerned. And why not? Men and women do not want to literally go to war with each other, because, despite the eternal reality of sexual tension, they want very much to join together — it's a biological imperative.

Given this compulsion, we have to stress the fact that the current feminist family law regime is nothing natural at all. Take away the draconian laws surrounding domestic relations, the incentives for wives to leave their husbands, and the subsidization of promiscuity, and something approaching traditional marriage will return on a wide scale without any additional effort. However, changing the institutions and laws would be an uphill battle that would take too long for our purposes. So what can be done?

Having personally dealt with the consequences of a disastrous marriage, I've been mulling over the idea of marriage reform for some time. As it turns out, I'm not the only one. As the rest of the country slides into the abyss of single motherhood and unstable partnerships, the upper classes have been strengthening their marriages and enjoying the lowest divorce rate in decades. What is the key to their success?

Aside from the fact that they tend to be better at seeing the negative consequences of divorce, they have begun to regard the institution as a contract, and have been arranging their marriages as exactly that.

Some might be surprised to learn that the idea of marriage as a legal contract is actually very old. The first example of the widespread existence of written marriage contracts is the Ketubah, a Jewish marriage contract that lays out the terms for marriage and divorce. Ketubot (pl.) apparently originated during the Babylonian captivity, where the highly legalized nature of Babylonian society and mobility of Jews combined to create the need for a well-defined, legally binding marriage. Religious obligations were naturally included as well, and over the centuries the Ketubah came to be seen as an essential element of a stable marriage. Ketubot fell out of favor for some time during the libertine 20th century, especially in heterodox forms of Judaism such as Reform, but have made an amazing comeback in recent times.

Whether written down or not, marriage has always been seen as a binding contract, and it is only in recent times that this universally accepted basis for marriage has been undermined and rejected in favor of the modern civil marriage, which cannot be called a marriage at all, but rather more of a tax classification. Marriage does still exist, but none of its conditions are fulfilled by what is known as marriage under Western civil law. It is the only contract that rewards a party for unilaterally breaking it: a wife is under more of an obligation to fulfill the terms of a cell phone contract than to fulfill her marriage vows.

However, too many of us assume that there is no solution to this problem; that the problem lies with marriage itself rather than the backward, ill-conceived mess known as civil marriage. This is not the case. Marriage is the natural state of relations between men and women who cohabit and engage in sexual relations, and has been for thousands of years across a wide variety of cultures, races and faiths. It comes in many different forms, but in all cases there is a contractual element, and the needs and feelings of each spouse are taken into account.

Although laws surrounding domestic relations – VAWA and other incentives to accuse in particular – present some obstacles to marriage contracts, prenuptial agreements could remove some of these incentives and remain enforceable. Men and women can still enter into legally binding agreements under civil law, efforts of feminists notwithstanding, and many of the incentives to unilaterally break promises and vows could be removed with well-conceived contracts.

Furthermore, in the free societies of the West, contractual marriages could render the arguments over the definition of “marriage” moot, as the state’s role in defining the institution would decline as people increasingly defined it themselves. Lawyers who now profit from dissolutions could turn their efforts toward strengthening marriage and defending agreements, therefore contributing to families’ well-being rather than living off their destruction.

A transition from a society in which standard civil marriage is seen as the norm rather than a contractual, natural marriage may take time, but it is already happening. Civil marriage was unnatural and anarchic from the beginning, and represents a return to savagery rather than the progress it promised. Its time has come and gone, and now we have the opportunity to move on.

Because I’d like to offer something positive and constructive here at The Spearhead, I’m going to devote a page (and ultimately much more) to resources for those interested in restoring some sanity to domestic relations. I truly believe that contractual marriage, while it cannot solve all our problems, can make a big difference in coming years as we move away from the anarchic, transitional 20th century and toward a more civilized mode of existence.

Female Teacher/Male Student Sex Trend Continues

It seems that there is a new scandal involving teachers and underage students having sex every other month, and that's just locally. Although unheard of 30-odd years ago, female grade school teachers are sleeping with their male students in prodigious numbers these days. Many of the female teachers are actually married.

I'm sure the usual feminist and white knight suspects will blame the women's husbands for not adequately "providing for their needs," but what's left out here is that these women are clearly exploiting young men for sex. It seems to a trend for older women these days to assume that they are owed sex from very young and underage boys and men, and this is only encouraged by feminists who seek to turn the tables and give females privileges that they imagine men enjoyed at some misty moment in the past.

The truth is that men have never enjoyed unrestricted access to young women, but rather had to pay for sex every step of the way, as they do today. Middle-aged women, on the other hand, seem to have absorbed the idea that sex is a privilege they are owed regardless of the consequences to men. In fact many of the underage child support cases, where boys as young as 15 have been ordered to pay much older women for the privilege of inseminating them, involve teachers who were ostensibly in a position of authority and barred by law and job duties from engaging in coitus with students.

In this latest local case, a teacher takes a "troubled" boy under her wing, and opens her vagina to him. Certainly, there can be nothing better for ensuring the future stability of a 17-year-old boy than having a 37-year-old married woman offer him her vagina. Is this sex ed? Are our teachers being paid to be state-sanctioned whores for teenage boys?

If so, would it be appropriate for middle-aged male teachers to introduce teen girls to the wonders of the mature penis?

Honestly, I'm not all that outraged by an adult having sex with a 17-year-old, but why the hell should we pay for it? Why should extramarital sex be a side benefit for female teachers? The boys would be better off experimenting with girls their own age rather than their mothers' friends. This trend is bound to cause some serious psychological damage in the long run. But I guess it's all in the interests of female empowerment…

Marriage Reform Page Up

W.F. Price · 30 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In the first step in my effort to make a positive change, I've started collecting and linking material relevant to marriage reform. I'd like to invite others who have some interest in the issue, especially those who have written on the subject, to visit the page and post links. Attorneys with experience writing prenups or simply in contract law are also very much welcome.

The goal is to give people who want a better form of marriage the guidance and tools to make it possible. Default civil marriage as it exists today has become an evil and destructive institution that must be changed. People who remain in civil marriages do so despite the incentives to divorce and engage in gender warfare. For the weaker and less sensible it is too often a disaster that literally ruins lives, including those of the most innocent — our children.

Feminism may have done a wrecking job on the Western family, but I am optimistic that this can be turned around. The fight against feminists must continue, but it's time to start discussing reconstruction, and reforming the devastated institution of marriage is where it should begin.

Reviving the Mailing List

W.F. Price · 30 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I have had an email subscription in effect for some time now (it can be accessed on the lefthand link on the MGTOW logo), but shortly after I started it I shut it down after some bastards started subscribing and then immediately trying to label me as a spammer, which is a cheap smear that can cost the victim considerably due to anti-spamming laws. After that, I put it off, but have received assurance that such tactics are now well-recognized for what they are, so there's no longer an issue.

This being the case, those who have signed up for the email updates (over 600 people now — about a quarter of the site's subscribers) will once again start receiving them in digest form (10 per message) at the rate of one or two per week.

Catholic Heretics Still Pushing for Priestesses

Despite repeated warnings from the Catholic hierarchy, liberal Catholic activists continue to call for the ordination of priestesses in the Catholic church. Most of these left-wing Catholics are from an older generation that rose to some prominence during the sexual revolution of the 1960s, which followed the Second Vatican Council's unprecedented reforms. Their mouthpiece, Call to Action, was founded in Chicago by Dan and Sheila Daley, a priest and nun who abandoned their vows and got married.

One priest, the conservative Rev. Anthony Branklin, characterizes Call to Action as "aging feminist nuns and their hangers-on clerics," but evidently some younger female lay Catholics – probably feminists – are involved as well.

Although dissent in any large organization is unavoidable, as is a certain degree of heresy and apostasy in large religions, the United States offers a solution to all who are tired of their church: start a new one. There are hundreds – if not thousands – of variations on Christianity in the US, and there would be no bar to liberal Catholics starting their own offshoot, as some conservative Catholics have done. If they please, they can even set up a giant pink unicorn and have followers worship it — there are no restrictions so long as they do not commit crimes.

The problem for them, however, is that they want to keep the wealth and congregants and have their way with them rather than going through the trouble of convincing people that a feminist church is better than the traditional one. Perhaps they have seen the example of the Episcopalian Church in the US, which has withered on the vine following its adoption of liberal, anti-scripture values, and want to make sure they can seize the money and property before the flock inevitably disperses and heads for more Christian churches, or stops attending church at all.

The problem with churches that deviate from scripture and orthodoxy is that they seldom last many generations before they are abandoned. This is because they are built on hypocrisy rather than a solid foundation. When children raised in the church are told that the church is originally based on scripture that has no meaning in its contemporary incarnation, they wonder as adults: what's the point of even attending if it's all based on a falsehood?

Attempts to change very old traditions to suit temporary trends are often simply self-indulgent efforts on the part of people who can't let go of their traditions, and then try to pick and choose those that suit them personally. If they get their way, they can and will wreck institutions simply to feel more comfortable about themselves and their lifestyles.

Cheating is Deadly in New Video Game

W.F. Price · 1 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Atlus games has come out with a new game, referred to in an MSN review as a "dating simulation and a puzzle game with a splash of survival horror," that takes the main character, a 31-year-old "slacker" named Vincent, through a struggle for survival.

Evidently, some witch is responsible for cursing the men of the city for having been cheated on, and now young men are having terrible nightmares and dying in their sleep. If they fall in their dreams, they die. In the nightmares, they are pursued by ravenous babies or furious women, and they must somehow climb up and out of their horrible predicaments.

From The Daily:

> The skinny: In the sluggish late hours of a recent episode of the "Today" show, host and overbearing mother-figure Kathie Lee Gifford quipped that men over 30 shouldn't play video games. These supposed puerile playthings, in her opinion, distract from adulthood and its responsibilities. Gifford would no doubt take offense, then, to Catherine, a puzzle game dressed as an erotic thriller and designed exclusively for adults.
> Vincent doesn't remember how he bedded Catherine, when he impregnated Katherine or why he's having dreams in which he must climb a mysterious blood-soaked tower of steel cubes. In fact, Vincent doesn't remember doing much of anything; life has just sort of happened to him.
> In that way, Vincent is the archetypal man-child, only outdone by his friends, each more affected and heartbroken than the last. They join him nightly in their dingy watering hole, the Stray Sheep, where the player pounds beers, plays video games and has revealing conversations.

Although the reviews provide one with the sense that the game exposes some of the perils of contemporary manhood, it is a bit disappointing that the only ones paying for cheating are men, but perhaps that is simply a nod to current reality.

As culture increasingly delves into men's issues, expect to see more such efforts emerge in games, film, music and other forms of popular culture.

The End of the Future

Featured Guest · 2 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Petra Gajdosikova

I'm not known for overt sentimentality, but watching the TV coverage of the last Space Shuttle returning to earth last Thursday morning was one of the saddest moments I can recall. Once Atlantis touched down it was all over; there would never be another Shuttle.

I've always had a penchant for all things space related. As a child I dreamt of space ships, aliens and far flung galaxies, religiously followed every NASA mission, and was glued to the TV screen each time a Shuttle rocketed into the sky or landed. I'd often wished to have been born some years earlier, to have witnessed the thrill of watching Neil Armstrong step onto the moon. (Undoubtedly influenced by my dad's recollection of that incredible event as one of the most memorable of his lifetime). It didn't matter that we were in the then Eastern Bloc; we watched the various US advances into space with awe and pride, just as millions of Americans did. It was yet another milestone for Western civilization and human achievement. The greatest of human adventures.

I was convinced some years later we'd get to Mars and beyond. Alas, it was not to be. I suppose it's fitting that all this is over now. The US (and the West) have given up. The end of manned space flight is just one more symptom of the cultural, moral and economic decline.

The space program was an expression of the energetic, vigorous, optimistic, united America of the late 1950s. It symbolized the country's ambitions, aspirations and hopes for a better future, its belief that Americans can achieve great things and do them better than anyone else. All that is history now. Today's America lacks a sense of identity and vision, its confidence is on the wane, exceptionalism has become a nasty word, unity has been replaced by tribal rancor, idealism and pioneer spirit are long gone, substituted by all-pervasive bureaucracy and political correctness.

Is it surprising that instead of reaching out to the stars manned space flight is returning to where it started – science fiction?

The landing of Atlantis ended the 30-year Space Shuttle program. The entire US space age lasted just five decades: it was May 5, 1961 when Alan Shepard's 15 minute sub-orbital flight made him the first American in space. Just eight years later Apollo 11 blasted off for the Moon.

The Space Shuttle fleet began setting records with Columbia's launch on April 12, 1981 and continued with Challenger, Discovery, Atlantis and Endeavor. The Shuttle has, during its 135 missions, carried people into orbit, launched and repaired satellites, conducted cutting-edge research and built the largest structure in space, the International Space Station. One of its key successes was the deployment of the Hubble Space Telescope (launched into space aboard Space Shuttle Discovery in 1990); the Shuttle and its astronauts were also crucial for each repair and servicing Hubble needed over the years. (Hubble, aside of giving us hundreds of thousands of awesome images, has revolutionized our knowledge of astronomy.)

Countless technological innovations we take for granted today are also result of the US space program and Shuttle research. The Space Shuttle program alone has generated more than 120 technology spinoffs, including miniaturized heart pumps that save lives, thermal protection system materials, bioreactors (help chemists design new drugs and antibodies), compact laboratory instruments, sensitive hand-held infrared cameras, light-emitting diodes for treatment of cancerous tumors, lighter and stronger prosthetic limbs, an extrication tool to remove accident victims from wrecked vehicles, and many more. (NASA has an entire website dedicated to spinoff technology.)

Now the Shuttle is gone and there is nothing to take its place. The US no longer has the ability to put astronauts into orbit. NASA will have to rely on the Russians to hitch a ride to the International Space Station – on the old-fashioned Soyuz spacecraft, at some $50 million per ride.

It wasn't supposed to end like this. A few years ago George W. Bush announced the return to manned space exploration with the Constellation program. Missions to the Moon (by 2020) were to be followed by a manned flight to Mars and beyond. Then came Barack Obama who, believing in social programs and wealth redistribution rather than science and exploration, promptly cancelled Constellation, the country's only chance at continuing with human space flight.

In any case the space program no longer seems appropriate for today's America. Space exploration was a symbol and inspiration for Americans who believed in excellence, courage, self-reliance, achievement, science (hard science, not the politically correct pseudo-science of today). That country no longer exists; its spirit has been broken. The "virtues" America, and the West, worship today – equality, diversity, feminism – are a fast-track to a third world status, not to the stars.

As much as we may want to convince ourselves otherwise, it seems clear we no longer have the ability to achieve great things, space flight or otherwise. I suspect Bruce Charlton is onto something when he writes that "human capability reached its peak or plateau around 1965-75 – at the time of the Apollo moon landings – and has been declining ever since".

*"This may sound bizarre or just plain false, but the argument is simple. That landing of men on the moon and bringing them back alive was the supreme achievement of human capability, the most difficult problem ever solved by humans. 40 years ago we could do it – repeatedly – but since then we have not been to the moon, and I suggest the real reason we have not been to the moon since 1972 is that we cannot any longer do it. Humans have lost the capability. "*

The US space program started on its downward trajectory in the early 70s, slowly drifting away from further development of deep space missions and new technologies. (The Shuttle itself is 1970s technology and should have been replaced by a new generation of spaceships years ago.) NASA has been gradually taken over by technologically and managerially inept bureaucrats lacking any vision and imagination. Instead of attracting the brightest engineers, scientists and innovators, the agency has cared more about politics and displaying its commitment to 'diversity'. Well, at least now that manned space flight is no longer, NASA can work on its preferred mission – Muslim outreach.

Those who claim the US could no longer afford its space program would be well advised to look at the actual NASA budget. While during most of the 1960s NASA spending came to between 2-5% of the annual federal budget, since mid 70s it's been less than 1% and in the last few years only about 0.50% of the federal budget ($17-18 billion p.a.).

So you can't afford to spend a minuscule share of the annual fed budget – one half of one percent! – on space exploration, but consider it a good use of money to waste a couple of trillions on entitlements and welfare programs and $700 billion on stifling bureaucracies (i.e. various executive departments and agencies, most of which would serve the nation best by being abolished)? Not to forget the estimated $3 trillion cost of ObamaCare.

And what about the supposedly too expensive Space Shuttle program itself? The total cost of the Shuttle program over its entire four decade lifespan (including 10 years of R&D) was just under $200 billion. Expensive? Well, the US federal government, at present rate, spends $200 billion every three weeks!

I don't see anything that has brought taxpayers a comparable return in industrial and technological advancement, increased understanding of our world and universe, as well as prestige, pride and inspiration as the manned space program.

But this isn't about money or savings… it's about a nation's priorities. An America that spends trillions of dollars a year on welfare, entitlements and bureaucracy is an America that lacks any purpose, identity or belief in future; a space program is something such a nation has no use for.

Mankind has always felt the call to explore and push back the boundaries of human capability. I have no doubt there were people in Columbus's day who wanted to find a 'better' use for the money that was to finance his voyages. Thankfully King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain had more vision and sense than Barack Obama.

We can only hope that a more enlightened people, perhaps the Chinese or Russians or Indians, are going to take over space exploration and become a beacon of hope and inspiration to those in the rest of the world, as America once used to be.

Mother Horrified that Child Killer Deemed “Not a Threat”

W.F. Price · 3 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

20 years ago, Kristine Cushing obtained a .38 special and used it to murder her daughters, aged 4 and 8, as they slept. Her husband was a USMC fighter pilot who was on duty overseas at the time, and according to the NY Times she presented the facade of a model mother. Shocked neighbors wondered how it could have happened, and in court Kristine Cushing blamed a bad reaction to prozac.

It being the 1990s, when women could do no wrong, Cushing’s legal gambit worked, and she was sentenced to a mere four years in a mental institution.

In the meanwhile, her husband divorced her and married Trisha Conlon, with whom he had two sons. Eventually, the two divorced, and then, for whatever reason, John Cushing decided to get back together with the woman who killed his first two children.

It took Ms. Conlon a few years to discover that Mr. Cushing had rekindled his relationship with his ex wife, and when she did she immediately filed for a change to the parenting plan. At the hearing, the court commissioner, Leonid Ponomarchuk, ruled that any change would be unwarranted, as there had not been problems for the past several years.

Naturally, Ms. Conlon is upset by the fact that her sons are staying with a child killer much of the time, but there is nothing she can do about it for the time being.

What I’d like to know is whether the commissioner would have made the same judgment had Kristine Cushing been a man with a statutory rape charge on his record. Probably not; there are laws in place that all but guarantee that men who are marked as sexual predators are subject to restrictions around minors. However, it appears that a woman with a history of murdering helpless children is deemed no threat, because she has allegedly been “cured” of her mental problems.

Although we don’t know all the details of this case, it appears to reflect the stark double standard where child custody is concerned. All it takes for a man to be forced to have “supervised” visitation with his own children, where he must be watched over by state workers (and pay for it) is a mere accusation. It doesn’t even take a conviction or finding of guilt. Yet here we have a woman who admits to having murdered her own children being allowed open access to another woman’s children.

Blogging Family Law

W.F. Price · 4 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As I've alluded to a few times over the past few months, I'm in the middle of yet more custody litigation. My ex wants to move my kids to Canada, and this being Washington state, where there is a presumptive approval of relocation, she'll probably get her way. Online, I've remained fairly tight-lipped about it, because making an issue of the details would probably have negative consequences for me in court. However, I've been putting a lot of work into the latest round of litigation, because it will determine my relationship with my kids for the next 12 years or so. The implications will be permanent, obviously, but not necessarily disastrous.

I'd really like to give readers a taste of what's going on, but I've been advised to wait until the pleadings have been put on the record. So, it's going to take at least a few weeks before I can publish anything from the court, but I will definitely do so when the time is right. I have always thought it was a tasteless to publish one's personal travails, but given the state of family law I'm starting to see it as a duty. I was so thoroughly smeared in my divorce that I stopped caring what people said about me or thought of me, and that has a lot to do with this site's existence.

However, there have been some recent cases in which men have been unconstitutionally ordered by judges to take down websites when they criticized judges' decisions, and I can't afford such an order until I am legally in the clear. Nevertheless, there will come a time, and that time is soon, when I can voice my own opinion without fear of censure about what happens to non-custodial fathers in a typical courtroom.

The last thing I want to do is air dirty laundry, but given the way fathers are treated this is very much a public issue. When the rulings come in, I will go ahead and publish them, so men who are thinking about marriage or facing divorce can have an idea of how this works. Additionally, I'll be perfectly happy to offer my own opinion on what the commissioner decides.

I've come to the conclusion that until men are willing to take these deeply painful personal experiences to the public, those who perpetuate the injustice will feel that they are operating in a climate of impunity. I'd like to play some part in changing this sense of security on the part of our black-robed would-be gods. It's time for the courts to be held accountable.

Portland SlutWalkers Reveal Themselves (Even More)

Jack Donovan · 4 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I had the pleasure of having some of the distressed damsels and hopeful he-men of tomorrow from the SlutWalk "like" my Facebook page, so that they could share their feelings about my article "How Many Lesbian Parades Does Portland Need," as well as my response to some criticisms of said work, posted to QPDX's official web site.

> Elijah Daniel Raven Im liking your page so that I can tell you to suck my tranny cock, and shuve it down your jerk face asshole. kisses. hope you like the taste of my meat. ♥

> Sophia St James I fucking love you Elijah. Here's the thing-> you (jack) thrive off of attention. If you had a boyfriend or lover, you might actually be able to enjoy life and not be so bitter and jaded. Your stories are completely inaccurate and lack true evidence. You take an entire article and twist 85% of it to fit your sad and sorry 'agenda'. WE are not all lesbians who organized the event, get your facts right. For being a homo, you sure are uptight. You need some dick in your world dear one. There were male reporters at the event, in addition to the female ones. Again, if you're gonna TRY and be an 'author' at least have your facts rights. If you knew anything about the event, you would know what it was REALLY about and why it was needed. You are a sad, sad 'man' who lashes out because you are truly not fulfilled in your own boxed in, closed off, outcasted world. I avoided putting my 2 cents in because you are not worth my time, however because you continually attack us for no reason other than to APPEAR larger than life and to add some kind of sorry ass meaning to your existence I chose to reply. You could never organize or be part of any worth while cause. That would mean you'd have to have a spine and actually have some tact. Oh… and I notice you closed the comments on your 'so-called' reply to Q-PDX. Nice one buddy. As far as our funding-> lots of the money came from community members. Q-PDX DIDN'T give us money (again, know your shit before you talk). The crowd at the event was filled with many different races, genders, and styles…. not just lesbians my dear Jack Donovan-> one who does not do their research before typing a hate fill rant. Children were present for simple reasons, instilling true and honest values is for every age. Our message was one for everyone to here. You have zero feelings or compassion for anything or anyone except your own sad state of affairs. Maybe you should go to 'straight camp' and leave the homo stuff to us. You clearly need your gay card revoked.

> Sophia St James Oh-> and being assaulted, raped is not a laughing matter. Y'all are sick f#*ks for even joking about such things.

> Dawn Lynnelle Higgins Dear Mr. Donovan: You seem to make a blanketed staement about everyone who was there and you are making assumptions you REALLY know nothing about. It wasn't just lesbians there at this march, there were bisexual, trans, queer, and even straight women as well as straight, bisexual, queer, and trans men all standing together against rape. Rape is not a funny thing and rape does not discriminate, maybe if you were actually there you would actually not be making these types of bullshit statements. You sir, are a complete idiot who should turn in your queer card at the door IMMEDIATELY!

> Leila Hofstein Rape culture does not imply that all men are pigs. It puts a name to the phenomenon that allows our young men be misogynistic and needlessly violent instead of thoughtful, mature and self-possessed while perpetuating the cycle of victimization for our young women.
> The only people who think all feminists are man-hating pigs are the actual pigs themselves. You make REAL men ashamed to share a gender with you.

> Elijah Daniel Raven To the men who were joking on here about rape…I get it, you HAVE NO IDEA what its like to feel unsafe, to have your body threatened, to have your life threatened, yes in Portland, it happens everywhere every 3minutes to be exact. My friend was brutally rapped last month, another by a cop 3 months > ago. So You also have no idea how good it feels to march in solidarity and scream “NO” at the top of your lungs. You’ve never had to say no while fearing for your life.

> Jack Donovan It’s interesting that two of you have said I should have my “gay card” revoked. However, Alley and Perry said I am part of their feminist queer community whether or not I share any of their values. Could you gals figure out where you stand on that and get back to me? I’d like to know where to send it.
> Elijah Daniel Raven We can be friends, I just really want to change your mind on some of these matters, please stay as gay as possible, as it is the only redeeming quality I can see thus far.

> Leila Hofstein Just shove it up your ass. It’ll save on postage.

It seemed confused to me that a man (presumably, one never knows) would challenge my manhood on behalf of a group of anti-patriarchal feminist women.

Despite their protests, the angriest person — who technically threatened to orally rape me — was a female-to-male transsexual. Not sure how that would work, maybe one of those strap-ons from Aslan, co-sponsor of the SlutWalk? Or maybe I got my acronyms wrong, and the FTM was an MTF. It’s not always easy to tell from Facebook photos. While I did refer to SlutWalk as a “lesbian parade” and at various other points, a “gay and lesbian parade” or possibly even a “a parade for hags and fags” I think the general gist of the article was that there was no need for another parade for queer exhibitionists in Portland, since Gay Pride 2010 happened about a month before the SlutWalk. Lesbians tend to consider themselves a part of the broader LGBTQI community. Bragging that there were also transsexuals and queers present is not a refutation of my claim that SlutWalk was basically a queer event, and not a grassroots effort attributable to everyday women.

At least two of the three organizers are still, to my knowledge, proud queer-identified exhibitionists.

Now, I will respond to a few of the concerns these spirited women have raised.

First, to our Hottentot Venus, the Lady Sophia St. James, Portland’s Sensual Sadist and Fetish Goddess Extraordinaire and “professional FemDom”–

Dear Ms. St. James,

I would like to thank you for your concerns about my sex life. I cannot see how being single or celibate would invalidate my objections to your parade. For the record, I have been living with the same fellow for about 13 years now. As per the terms of our arrangement, I also have another fellow whose company I’ve enjoyed regularly for quite some time. Rest assured, my carnal needs are being tended to thoroughly. I’ve never had much of a problem in this area, so your assumption that I do is off target. Is it possible that your assumptions are based on faulty logic? My home life is a happy one, and while I have no interest in your “queer” culture, I do have as active and rewarding a social life as I can manage in the free time I have available.

Regarding the “facts:”

1) The two articles I saw in the two Portland weeklies were both written by women, and both weeklies (the Mercury and the Willamette Week) are proudly left wing. If your event was covered favorably by any heterosexual men who do not self-identify as liberals (who would be, it can be reasonably assumed, biased in favor of your cause), please do forward a link. Otherwise I think it is safe to conclude that your event was covered favorably by those who were predisposed to support your cause. That’s OK. The media has never really been objective. Objective journalism has always been more of a myth for the gullible than a reality. It’s a game.

2) Your web site proudly announced that QPDX was sponsoring your event. In most cases, sponsorship implies the donation of funds. If they did not financially support your parade, they were your primary promotional partner—along with the strap-on company and the vegan strip club. I must confess that I fail to see how this kind of sponsorship makes the event less lesbian or “queer” oriented.

3) Prior to writing about what I expected to see at the Portland SlutWalk, I did look at photos of other slut walks. Having now seen the photos from Portland SlutWalk, I see very little difference. The majority of people in attendance appeared to be openly lesbian, gay or trans. If there were hoards of average soccer moms and outraged accountant dads bussed in from the ‘burbs, it is strange that they weren’t deemed of particular interest by those documenting the parade.

4) I’d also like to say that Perry’s article about me was also riddled with factual errors. The first being that I am the “principle writer for THE SPEARHEAD.” In fact, I am merely an occasional contributor — you’ll see that W.F. Price, the heterosexual father of two who founded the site, has something like 808 posts to my 49. The verbiage attributed to me in the article was also his.

As I briefly mentioned, I’ve been trying to give back my gay card for years, Ms. St. James. I even wrote a book about it (the first run sold out but it is available on Kindle). I think it is also available through several libraries, though I somehow doubt it would appeal to your tastes. I am anti-feminist, and anti-trans, and I believe that the majority of gay and queer advocacy organizations are self-perpetuating institutions and symptoms of inevitable Western decline. Alley and Perry both insisted emphatically that I was part of their community whether I liked it or not. I disagree. If you agree with my disagreement, we have found some shared ground, and I can get back to the business of being an enemy of your community.

Thank you for mentioning that children were encouraged to come to your lesbian exhibitionism parade. I’m sure you won’t be surprised if I say that strikes me as inappropriate.

For the record, I do not accept comments on any posts on my personal web site. Internet commenting is usually cathartic but rarely productive. I’m a writer, so I like my writing time to be productive.

Finally, I find it inconsistent that you applauded Elijah Daniel Raven’s sexual assault humor, and then scolded others for using the same kind of humor.

And now to you, Ms. Hofstein,

> “The only people who think all feminists are man-hating pigs are the actual pigs themselves.”

Are you an expert on identifying pigs, Ms. Hofstein?

This sounds a lot like the “I’m rubber and you’re glue” argument. You’re a crafty Fräulein.

I also find it curious that while feminists assert that men are not supposed to tell a women how she should behave, you are imply by your statement that I “make REAL men ashamed to share a gender with [me]” that you know what makes a man a “real” man and an “unreal” man. Transsexual feminist R.W. Connell wrote in Masculinities that twentieth-century research “failed to produce a coherent science of masculinity.” (Ch.3) Would you disagree with this statement? Do you believe that there is a such thing as a “real” man and a lesser man? If so, how do you define a “real” man. Are you attempting to coerce or manipulate my choices or beliefs by holding the definition of masculinity hostage to your own political agenda? Again, you are a crafty little thing.

Ms. Megan Elijah,

Of course I can’t comment on crimes about which you’ve provided no proof or information. Rape is considered a very serious crime in our culture, and is punishable by law. It is my duty to advise you to report any possible crimes to the appropriate authorities. Your statement that claiming that I “have no idea how good it feels to march in solidarity and scream “NO” at the top of your lungs” while correct, leads me to believe that SlutWalk is some kind of cathartic group therapy exercise for rape victims.

I found it a little disingenuous that you would say that we could be friends if I changed my ideas on certain topics.

Isn’t that like saying I would have to change who I am to suit some externally imposed standard?

Spearhead readers :

I hope you’ve enjoyed seeing how women associated with SlutWalk represent themselves. I’m not in the habit of getting into protracted Internet exchanges, much less sharing them in article form. However, the point of writing about SlutWalk was to show who these women are, and what they really believe, and make it a searchable public record. They are free to respond to my comments here, of course. I prefer finished replies, and if this discussion continues, I will respond again in finished article form.

SlutWalk is a flash-in-the pan trend, a feminist fad. In the big scheme of things, it doesn’t mean much at all. It is interesting because it sheds light on the many contradictions and hypocrisies of the modern feminist movement. These women are privileged members of a feminist society, but they are not elite east coast media feminists. These women are not Gloria Steinem or Hanna Rosin or even Jessica Valenti. They are the feminists on the ground, the worker bees of modern feminism. SlutWalk is a good opportunity to get to know these gals and see what they are all about.

And, in the spirit of the “This is What a Feminist Looks Like” campaign, well, now we have pictures.

Politicians Tweaking the Nose of Radical Feminism

careyroberts · 5 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Two weeks ago Debbie Wasserman Schultz, Democratic National Committee chair, met her match in one Rep. Allen West. It seems that Wasserman Schultz waited until West left the House floor, then cut loose with a liberal jeremiad for the congressman's support of the GOP-supported Cut, Cap, and Balance Act.

Apprised of the incident, the former Lieutenant Colonel fired back, calling her "the most vile, unprofessional, and despicable member of the House of Representatives…If you have something to say to me, stop being a coward and say it to my face."

It wasn't the first time the libber-turned-congresswoman saw her grandstanding tactics backfire.

A couple months ago Wasserman Schultz accused House Republicans seeking to cut off taxpayer abortion funds with waging a "war on women."

In the past, the slightest suggestion of a GOP "war on women" would be enough to bring out the white flag a-flutter. But this time the stiff-spined GOP refused to be buffaloed by the high-octane rhetoric. Within days a group of Republican women fired back, calling Wasserman Schultz's demagoguery "baseless" and "inaccurate."

For years, feminists have succeeded in dictating the parameters and vocabulary of the gender debate. By trotting out a sympathetic victim, playing on lawmaker chivalry, or resorting to outright falsehoods, feminists have been able to maintain hegemony over the public discourse. Politicians, newspaper editors, even university presidents learned to toe the feminist line, or else become tagged with the "anti-woman" moniker.

All that changed on February 18. That's the day the U.S. House of Representatives' continuing resolution bill scrapped the funding for Planned Parenthood's abortion business.

In short order, revenue-pinched state legislatures took up the same refrain. Planned Parenthood funding cuts were approved in Indiana, Kansas, and North Carolina. Indiana Governor Mitch Daniels signed HB 1210, prohibiting abortion providers from receiving state funds.

Another sacred cow of radical feminism is the near-automatic award of child custody to a divorcing woman. The fact that children who lose contact with their loving fathers are far more likely to drop out of school and get in trouble with the law doesn't seem to register with feminist logic (forgive the oxymoron, if you will).

But in recent weeks, a bevy of Republican presidential candidates, including Herman Cain and Gary Johnson, lined up to pronounce the current system deeply flawed. Newt Gingrich castigated the "extreme anti-male bias" of family courts.

Another gem in the feminist diadem is the Violence Against Women Act, which is used as a slush fund by domestic violence groups to support lobbying efforts for a broad array of radical causes. But two weeks ago, House Judiciary Committee member Ted Poe vowed to make the law gender neutral. "I certainly agree with equal protection under the law. And maybe a name change is in order," the Texas congressman explained.

And it's not just politicians who are poking holes in the feminist catechism of gender victimhood.

Following its embarrassing overtime loss to the Japanese women's soccer team, Bryant Gumbel of HBO Sports revealed the double-standard that permeates sports reporting these days. "Had a men's team turned in a similar performance," Gumbel commented, "papers and pundits nationwide would have had a field day assailing the players, criticizing the coach, and demanding widespread changes to a men's national team that flat-out choked."

Then the cheeky "Everything I Do Is Wrong" campaign by the California Milk Processor Board that lampooned clueless men and hormone-addled women. The campaign triggered the wrath of the feminist Politburo, with Ms. Magazine demanding an immediate end to the "sexist" campaign.

The Ms. Magazine antics elicited this rejoinder from columnist Jenn Taylor: “What better way to expose portrayals of women as irrational whiners and hysterical bitches than by whining irrationally and bitching hysterically?”

It gets worse.

It’s one thing when conservative knuckle-draggers delight in the excesses of feminism. But when a fellow liberal debunks a feminist sacred cow, that’s hitting below the belt!

That’s exactly what the current issue of Time magazine does – it puts to the lie the shibboleth that working women pull a second shift when they come home, facing a pile of dirty laundry and shrieking kids, as dad lounges on the porch to watch the Dodgers game. According to Ruth Davis Konigsberg, “Quantitatively speaking, we have no grounds to stand on. And it’s time that women — myself included — admit it and move on.”

It’s getting harder and harder for the gender guerillas to play the victim card. Things are looking grim.

Spooked Horse Trips, Insane Female Meltdown Ensues

W.F. Price · 5 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A friend sent me a video in which a New York woman is party to an incident with a confused horse, who gets spooked by something and trips, taking a minor spill. The woman subsequently has a full-on meltdown one might expect from a little girl, replete with heaving sobs and accompanying hysteria. It's shameful, and as a father it annoys me exceedingly to see a grown woman engaging in the kind of behavior that my five-year-old daughter has grown out of.

As you will see at the end of the video, the horse is fine. It was the horse equivalent of a guy falling on his butt while carrying something. Big deal. But it becomes the equivalent of a natural disaster to this hysterical woman. Sometimes, you've got to wonder how anyone can put up with contemporary urban American women. Without a degree in clinical psychology, you're going to have your hands full.

Watch it here (she's made an issue over copyright so I won't embed).

You can see more of the fat lady's psychotic antics here.

It's really unbelievable.

Chinese Get Serious about Debt

W.F. Price · 7 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

China has a huge stake in the US economy, and holds more treasury bonds than any other country, so it's hard to blame the Chinese for finally tiring of the antics of our politicians and telling it to the world straight.

Xinhua, the official Chinese media outlet, lists some depressing figures:

> As for the details, the debt deal calls for spending cuts of roughly 900 billion U.S. dollars over 10 years, followed by a second phase of cuts to bring the 10-year total to about 2.4 trillion U.S. dollars. If achieved in full, this is only a little more than half of what is required to stabilize the ratio of public debt to gross domestic product at a safe level.
> The U.S. has long been facing the same problem: living beyond its means. At present, the country has debts as high as 55 trillion U.S. dollars, including more than 14 trillion U.S. dollars of treasury bonds.
> National debts equate to 176,000 U.S. dollars per person, or 670,000 U.S. dollars per household.
> It seems the country will struggle to pay off the debts as its annual tax revenues just average 3 trillion U.S. dollars while the average annual incomes of middle-class families reach around 50,000 U.S. dollars.

According to the Chinese, cuts must be made to defense and welfare:

> Without any plans to increase taxes in the debt deal, spending reductions will be the only means to cut the country's deficits.
> There will be a clash of opinions in Congress about this. The Democrats will firmly oppose reducing welfare expenses, while the Republicans will refuse to cut national defense budgets, as they always do.

Well, I'm glad the rest of the world is finally saying it. This time, we can't fight or spend our way out of problems of our own making. Who is going to give us the money now?

For a certain class of Americans, the hubris that has taken hold of America's elites in the past couple decades has been disastrous. That class happens to be traditionally the most productive: the young middle class.

Rather than provide young men with incentives to start families and contribute to the nation's economic and social well-being, affirmative action, parasitism and ruinous family law has decimated the ranks of what should have been the pillars of society. There is no way that females in government make-work jobs can replenish the country's coffers. With a great many young men impoverished by having to maintain two separate households for themselves and their babymommas, innovation and productivity has been stifled.

Slutwalkers march down our streets, purses full of borrowed money, and fathers – potential taxpayers – languish in jail. The rest of the world is watching, and starting to grow impatient.

America used to be a beacon of hope in a dark world, and now it just looks trashy. Time to call in the chips.

NiceGuy's Site Turns 10!

Featured Guest · 8 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Solaris

How time flies… Recently, NiceGuy's American Women (mostly) Suck celebrated its 10th anniversary! Who would have thought that what started as an early blog on Angelfire would become one of the web's longest continually operating men's sites, with thousands of readers and community members. As a tribute to the longevity of NiceGuy's writings, I thought it would be rewarding to recount the history of the site. I hope it will serve as a trip down memory lane for older readers, and a chance for new readers to get the whole story for the first time.

The eponymous NiceGuy first started a small website he simply titled "NiceGuy's WOMEN SUCK Page!" on the 1st of August, 2001 with page host Angelfire. Although he started writing as a means to deal with his frustrations with American women in his own day-to-day life, he soon found that he had an audience, and they started writing to him in increasing numbers. Within the first month, many of the site's seminal articles had been written, and NiceGuy had posted several sets of reader feedback.

Wouldn't it have been great to be able to see the site's beginnings for yourself? Well, thanks to the magic of the interwebs, we can do just that! If you'd like to see an image of the original site from September 2001, click here, or if you'd prefer an interactive version from the Web Archive, you can click here to check it out. With new articles coming thick and fast, there was always something new to read on the front page.

By early 2002, NiceGuy's site had come to the attention of veteran men's advocate Zenpriest, who wrote to NiceGuy with words of encouragement, and expressed his hope that the site would continue. Prior to his self-imposed retirement, he noted that "NiceGuy's site was one of the first self-sustaining men's communities I'd seen appear online." If you'd like to read more about Zenpriest, his famous essay "Hate Bounces" has been republished many times around the web, and continues to be quoted to this day. An archive of his entire old Geocities site, "eye of the mind" can be found here.

In July of 2002, after his move to Japan in April, NiceGuy met the lovely Haruna, and by September of that year found himself in a steady relationship with her. Concerned about her possible reaction to the site's content (specifically, the story he posted about their first date), he decided to scale back the pace of his writing and focus on his new relationship. An image of the modified front page that greeted readers from September 2002 onwards can be viewed here, or alternatively, you can view the archived page itself here.

The site was put on hiatus until December of 2002, with some readers concluding in the mean time that NiceGuy no longer had any intention of posting updates. That was not the case of course, and new posts once again began to come through steadily during the first half of 2003. It was about this time that NiceGuy met Joshua Dearing of dEaringfilm, who graciously volunteered to move the site to his web host, and set up a subdomain dedicated to it. Angelfire was left behind and most of the content was moved to the new address at http://niceguy.dearingfilm.com/. For an image of the site as it appeared in July 2003, you can click here, or click on the link above to view an archived version of the page.

The most notable addition to the site of 2003 however, was the forum. A large number of the site's regular readers quickly registered, and were able to communicate with each other for the first time, finding out just how much they had in common, and that they came from many countries, ethnic backgrounds and social groups. Although the forum's official name is "NiceGuy's MGTOW Forum", older members simply refer to it as "Mancoat" (for reasons that are known only to Joshua Dearing I'm sure!). The forum proved so popular with readers that by December 2003, a list of the latest forum topics was integrated into the site's front page. You can view an image of the site from that period here, or you can view the archived page by clicking here.

2004 and 2005 were busy and prosperous years for the site. NiceGuy returned to America, with Haruna following close behind and new members continued to pour in to the forum, many directed there by the screams of outrage coming from various feminist blogs. Among those to join during that time were the founders of the philosophy of "Men Going Their Own Way", known to others by their forum handles "Ragnar" and "Meikyo". Ragnar would later recount after the 2006 Mancoat Christmas party that he contributed the distinctive MGTOW road sign, which has become well recognised in the modern Men's Rights Movement.

The end of 2005 saw the site finally move to its own domain at www.the-niceguy.com, separating itself from dEaringfilm. The front page was again redesigned accordingly, though the layout was much more utilitarian that before. For reference, you can view an image of the site from late 2005 here, or browse an archived copy of the site here. Unfortunately, the move caused a severe impact on the site's Google ranking due to a problem with redirection of the old web address. This reduced the influx of potential new readers noticeably. At the same time, other men's issues sites had begun to crop up, and the explosion of services like Blogger and WordPress meant that there were suddenly many blogs vying for the same readership.

2006 and 2007 were difficult years. The site, now titled "The NiceGuy's Women / Ameriskanks (mostly) Suck Page!" was being constantly hammered by spam, and several serious hacking attempts forced the closure of forum registrations to general readership. The forum become invitiation-only and the site effectively went into "stealth" mode in an effort to protect it from being flooded. Additionally, a number of long-time members moved on to start up their own activism projects. The loss of experience came as quite a blow, though of course those departing left with the goodwill of the entire Mancoat community.

Further bad news for readers and forum members came when NiceGuy announced his intention to retire. He posted a final update in January 2007, and made his final forum post on 17 December the same year. There was no grand send-off, but many forum members took the time to wish NiceGuy the best in his life ahead during the lead up to his departure.

With the site's founder gone, NiceGuy's American Women Suck languished in limbo for the better part of 9 months until the most active group of remaining senior members realised they would either have to let the site gradually turn into a sepulchre or make a concerted effort to bring it back to life. In late 2008, a quiet effort was launched to totally revamp the site's content and structure. As most of the original essays written by NiceGuy were contained in a (now partially broken) database, and others had been lost during the various site transitions, a lot of time was spent looking through old backups for content that had vanished. Further, it was decided that the actual html coding of the site's articles, much of it originally generated by Microsoft Frontpage, desperately needed to be re-written to be compliant with modern web standards.

The result, launched 5 months later in March 2009, was a much more professional-looking and reliable site. You can view an image of the site as it appeared then by clicking here. Unfortunately the copy held by the web archive does not render correctly, so the image will have to suffice. The 5 months of hard work paid off, and the forum was once again opened to member registrations. Traffic began to increase, and the site was saved from near-death. Shepherded by the remaining senior members, the site added a Chat Room, RSS Feed and the Contributors Corner section during the following 18 months.

Today, NiceGuy's American Women (mostly) Suck Page is just one voice in the choir of sites devoted to men's issues, but I feel privileged to have been a present for a small part of the history of the Men's Movement. To celebrate the occasion of the site's 10th anniversary, a new site header was commissioned, and produced by the talented Bobby N. For posterity, I also include an image of the site's front page as it stands today, and hope to raise a glass to its continued existence in another 10 years.

Onward and upward!

Talk of America's Demise Greatly Exaggerated

W.F. Price · 8 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm not an economist, but the hysteria over the financial crisis and debt strikes me as misplaced. Sure, New York has put us in a pickle, but the way everyone is going on about this it's as though the rest of the country doesn't exist.

I recently took a trip through northern Washington state, and the vast, productive land inspired awe. As I drove toward highway 20 to cross the Cascades, logging trucks rumbled by loaded with timber on a regular basis. Further along, there was a large hydroelectric plant that supplies the majority of our electricity in Seattle. On the other side of the mountains, in the idyllic Methow Valley, there were fields of hay and alfalfa. Down along the Columbia, orchards with ripening fruit followed the river. Everything was well-run, clean and productive, and there was potential for plenty more.

Here at home on the west side of the state airplanes are being assembled, fishermen's terminal is full of boats, and ships steam into port like clockwork. This is a land of plenty — not some backward banana republic, as some are saying.

The problem is that all this natural wealth and human capital has taken a back seat to "finance," which seems to be mainly about making money out of thin air. The gang in New York is responsible for pumping up the value of anything convenient to prop up this phony system, and apparently has no real understanding of where wealth actually comes from.

From my perspective, outside of New York, it seems as though we'd be fine without these people. Perhaps there will be some pain as we readjust, but the United States has plenty of potential, and I can only see a benefit to discrediting and cutting loose the speculative crooks who have dug us into this mess. They've had their boot on our collective neck for years, and even now as they are called to account by the rest of the world they scream that we need them.

It's really no wonder that Manhattan has become the center of everything weird, parasitic and freakish in our culture. Sex in the City and these pirates go hand in hand — the suspension of reality and defiance of nature have gone so far that the New Yorker who called New York women a new species (although I wouldn't say "higher" as he does) may have been correct. Well, they may have "evolved" themselves right into another dimension, but in all likelihood they simply deluded themselves into believing they've crossed the threshold into godhood.

Make believe systems have a way of propping each other up. Removing the creation of wealth from productivity frees people to come up with all sorts of other stupid ideas. For example, the idea that men and women are essentially the same, that homosexual lovers typically form stable nuclear families, and that single mothers are somehow "empowering" themselves and their children. When the money just drops from the sky like manna from heaven, perhaps a healthy society does look like something you'd see on the Lower East Side's streets at night.

This is why we shouldn't be all that worried about the financial crisis. It's all based on a fantasy, and the foreigners throwing tantrums over it are simply angry that the little scheme isn't going to be enriching them any longer. How did ordinary Americans really benefit from the enormous amount of wealth we've transferred to China, anyway? Of course the Chinese, Europeans, Russians and all the rest were benefiting from the great sellout of the American people.

Well, the party's over, folks — we aren't going to pay for it any longer. As for the idea that we'll all be working overtime the rest of our lives to pay that phony money back to Chinese bankers, I'm afraid the Chinese are going to be disappointed, because so many potentially productive Americans have already divested from the dollar — how can we pay what we don't have?

It's about time this all came to an end, and I think we ought to be relieved that the end is finally here. Things will be better on the other side of this, and the wasteful excesses – both cultural and financial – will be greatly curtailed.

Might be rough for a while, but hey, to a lot of us men here that’s nothing new. We can deal.

Fun at the Viking Festival

W.F. Price · 9 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I went to the “Viking Days” festival at the Nordic Heritage Museum here in Seattle a few weeks ago, and my favorite part was the viking craftwork. There were these guys who make a living off blacksmithing, metalworking and other related stuff. I really enjoyed looking over the swords, spears, axes, chainmail and helmets. Brings out the boy in a guy. These are great events for guys, and even some women enjoy them, so it’s good for a date (with the right kind of woman).

While I was there, I found a few spearheads, and thought about buying one, but settled for taking a picture with one instead. Naturally, I thought it would be fun to post on the site.

In the background you can see some armor and polearms, and a couple flags, including the Vinland flag.

Guy-Flicks III — Revenge of the "Slackers"

Featured Guest · 9 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Ken Knight

Alas, the vicarious thrill of motion pictures…who would have known just 100 years ago during the advent years of the film industry that men would one day sit in a movie theater (or in the comfort of their own homes) and watch a fictional film that tells a story far too fantastic to be "real" but in the same vein spark imagination in the viewers that might just spill over into reality. Life imitates art….if only HG Wells and Jules Verne were alive right now to see the machines, vehicles, and technology they fantasized about in their science-fiction, now fully-functioning in our reality (submarines, spacecraft, etc.).

As previously discussed here at The Spearhead, the trend of women writers, activists, and journalists "shaming" men as a whole by pointing dirty fingers at men's' video-game play, movie and sports watching among other leisure time activities and crying that "men won't grow up" along with other bullshit "slacker" derivatives is growing louder and louder. These female town-criers squawk about men going their own way and NOT catering to women as they "should" (i.e. marriage, procreation, divorce, legalized-theft).

Think it's an over-simplification? Well what happened soon after that banner year of 1920 but the prohibition of alcohol? The biggest lobbies against men having a drink were the Protestant Churches and Women's Groups, both ever-determined to make sure men DO NOT HAVE A GOOD TIME outside the home, church, and sweaty places of work!

Also discussed here on The Spearhead before is the current "town cry" over enjoyment of video games and other electronic leisures, citing "effect on children" whereas in reality it is grown men playing the hell out of video games the most as gaming statistics show.

The Motion Picture Industry and it's Hollyweird crew churn out some really disgusting and stupid films full of misandry and unbelievable sissy-acting held up as "this is what the modern male looks like" not to mention the fact Hollywood cranks out more and more "child-proof" films within the "safe" PG-13 scope claiming a "wider audience" when really they are engaging in a form of soft censorhip that panders to the soccer-mom and "Twilight teens" crowd of movie-goers where no (real) man dare tread. So easy it is for them to ax "Guy-Flicks" that entertain straight adult males and produce more "women-friendly" (i.e. feminist-oriented) films that portray men in a negative light!

GUY-FLICKS are (generally) R-Rated adult-themed action films, erotic-thrillers, and funny-as-hell "Bachelor" storylines are fewer in number these days and mostly delegated to the straight-to-DVD market. And don't say THE HANGOVER (that sort of "men are pigs" film is no Guy-Flick by any means).

However, for those of us "slackers" who do not willingly fall into the modern bear-trap of Marriage 2.0 to overweight hens raising a house full of (another man's) kids, watching movies that portray life different than the norm here in reality, one's imagination is fired…struck on the anvil inside of intelligent minds much like our predecessors who worked on rocket ships and space craft not to mention modern medical procedures such as heart transplants previously thought to only reside in fiction such as 'Frankenstein'. After first IMAGINING the possibility in fiction and doing the research and study, men brought fantasy into reality! And in there lies the hope for a reversal of fortune in these times of blatant misandry that makes men second-class citizens in their own country….

Men will continue to "imagine" as they read books, play video games, and watch movies, imagining life portrayed in certain films where the man is a hard worker and dutiful protagonist who wins the day, gets the girl, and rides off into the sunset a hero…and more importantly as movies portraying straight men in a positive, realistic light become fewer and fewer in number, all is not lost because the "Guy-Flicks" of old are still out there and in-demand to the point they are cheaply mass-produced on DVD.

Men will continue to IMAGINE what it was like before they became wage-slaves and forced-welfare-providers for the “superior” class of women who did not always treat them like they do now, because they’ll see a far better example in films of the past.

Men will continue to IMAGINE what life was like before the advent of state-sponsored misandry, and even as they’re called “slackers” for watching movies over spending their hard-earned dollars on dinner-whores (whom offer nothing in return) and do not actively inspire to become some cupcake’s “Captain Awesome”, these guys might just experience a light-bulb popping inside their heads and then stand up to bring fantasy into reality just as the rocket engineers and medical researchers did decades ago….heralding a new age of men and women as partners in life without an abridged justice system screwing one for the benefit of the other, and individuals as a whole (clutch the pearls!) will be held accountable for their own actions or lack thereof! It’s not impossible my friends, for most revolutions are started by a select few people whom others emulate and follow later on.

I daresay it might just be the so-called “Slackers” (as feminist writers like to call them) who could suddenly realize that they’ve been had by the very society they’re living in and that women were not always antagonistic toward men as the media and justice system pushes them to be now….some will see it in “Guy-Flicks” of the past they pick up for a reduced price once they’re sick of the “men are idiots” plug found in just about every motion picture released to theaters these days. It often just takes a little push for a revolution to begin, and it begins in the mind. Perhaps with the increasing popularity of cheap movies on DVD (and downloads) not to mention video games among grown men and the inevitable feminist push to curtail or censor such fictionalized entertainment, the die will be cast, and life will begin to imitate art….remember my friends, the submarine was once only a tool of fantasy-fiction, so why is mankind’s return to harmony seem so out of reach when all it might take is fiery imagination inspired by an example seen on a theater or television screen?

Judas goats: How feminism is a great business

Nowadays, there are many people (mostly female) studying subjects like (Women / Gender / Queer) studies. Some data first: Undergraduate women's studies courses enrolled nearly 89,000 students in 2005-06. Undergraduate majors enrolled nearly 4,300 students, while undergraduate minors enrolled nearly 10,500 students in 2005-06 (source: nwsa.org). Now you'll be aware of the fact that people don't learn anything in these courses besides blaming straight men and stroking their female / queer egos. Still, they'll have to pay for their degrees in useless studies – nowadays, many students in the anglosphere start with a five-figure debt into working life. (Even more if they aren't able or willing to be thrifty, like all of those who max out their credit cards.) According to Mark Kantrowitz, who publishes the financial aid websites Fastweb.com and Finaid.org, while the average 2011 graduate finished school with about $27,200 in debt, many are straining to pay off significantly greater loans. A debt of $80,000 isn't uncommon. Even if the lenders of student loans take lower interests than credit card firms (where people who decide for the minimum payment will end up paying their original debt several times and never getting rid of their credit card debt, as Cracked knows): Since student loans are not discharged during bankruptcy, they provide a credit risk free loan for the lender, averaging 7 percent a year. (Source: Wikipedia) Quite a nice business if you have enough money to lend out, isn't it?

So much about the situation of students. Now let's talk about the small minority of these graduates who'll be so lucky to snatch a cushy government job as a women studies' professor or something comparable. These few ones play the important role of the "judas goats". Explanation: Judas goats were used in old slaughterhouses to lead the lambs (or other animals) to the slaughter, so that said animals wouldn't be afraid and run away or cause trouble. The judas goats later run free – so they could be used again later, to lead more animals to their fate. Same thing applies here: A few lucky feminists will get well-paid jobs, and all other students of Women Studies and such will have to pay off their student loans, for many years. That's what feminism's good for: Allowing a few intellectuals to spread their agenda, maybe even without them being aware that their only purpose is driving many clueless women into a life of exploitation.

Is there a way out of their situation for unlucky Women Studies students, at the moment? This is one, albeit not one their feminist professors would be happy with.
Will this go on forever? Definitely not. Every bubble can and will break. It's just a question of time. And it has been suggested that after the US government has to make cuts in education now, this amount of time won't be that long.

White Knighting in The ‘Hood

Steve Sailer pointed out a video in which some brainless thugs in Philadelphia decide to avenge some babymomma (Penny Chapman) who was criticized for smacking her kid on the bus. A man on the bus named Lefenus Pickett (the one in the maroon shirt with a shaved head and beard) told her to stop, and then she called up the babydaddy and relatives, who arrived with automatic rifles and subsequently pumped a dozen rounds into the bus in an attempt to murder Pickett. Miraculously, nobody was hurt, but this demonstrates how male violence is so often sparked by female demands for revenge. Part of the reason this is such a widespread problem is that the women who provoke these incidents rarely receive more than a slap on the wrist.

Same thing happened in Seattle not long ago, when an old man who tended a garden in a traffic circle told a woman to drive more carefully, and she subsequently had her fellas beat him to death.

Affirmative action brigade meets a real life riot

Our favorite paper the Daily Mail has an article out filled with pictures of the disturbing riots which are occurring in the UK. One thing which really struck me was the small stature of the riot police in the photographs. Maybe it is just me, but these don't look like a very intimidating lot. Then I saw this picture, which is even more surprising. I think an appropriate caption would be: We'll have this riot sorted out in short order!

I know this was an emergency, so perhaps they were short staffed? Or could it be that they had to assemble a riot squad on short notice? Perhaps this is a demonstration of their new small unit tactics? Feel free to play at home and suggest your own explanations in the comments section. Some of those riot police are so small, it reminded me of a jackass skit (NSFW):

Elsewhere in the article they show this picture of what they call a female robocop standing watch. I'm guessing the editors saw this as projecting an exciting image of girlpower. To me she looks unimpressive, and in fact appears frightened. I'm sure the feminists in the audience will disagree, but to me it looks like she is playing riot squad. Shouldn't she have been equipped with a big enough truck and a belt fed weapon, so she could whoop with glee and intimidate the rioters?

All of this reminded me of a story Oz Conservative noted in his recent post on the topic of the riots. As the Daily Mail explained several months ago, Insp Diane Bamber sued for discrimination because she felt that the physical requirements for the riot squad were unfair to a woman of her age:

> For 30 years it has been used to test the fitness of officers who police riots and other outbreaks of serious public disorder.
> The so-called 'shield run' involves officers covering a distance of 500 metres in less than two minutes, 45 seconds while wearing full riot gear and carrying a shield.
> But when Inspector Diane Bamber, 51, failed to meet the time limit, she claimed she had been left humiliated.

That's right! Physical standards humiliated her! Unconfirmed reports have it that her girl power and moxie were both seriously bruised by having to actually do more than dress up and pose in the gear of a riot officer. She was further aggrieved by the officers who would have to ~~make up for her unfitness~~ serve with her should a riot ever occur:

> When Insp Bamber applied to retake the shield run, it is alleged that one of her colleagues remarked: 'She's got no f chance.'

Fortunately, this travesty did not stand and the tribunal ruled in her favor.

> Judge Hilary Slater said Insp Bamber's claims of indirect sex and age discrimination were 'well-founded'.
> Noting that the officer had 'suffered humiliation at being sent away from the course', Judge Slater added: 'The tribunal concludes that the claimant was put at the disadvantage suffered by women and persons of her age group in that she failed the test and was not able to complete the training.'

She could recieve up to £30,000 for her bruised girlpower and the department has now lowered the standard enough that even she was able to pass the newly watered down test. This opened the floodgates for similarly ~~unqualified~~ discriminated against women in the police force:

> The Mail on Sunday understands that the Association of Chief Police Officers is now reviewing the lawfulness of the physical training formats for 13 specialist operational roles, including those for firearms officers, which could discriminate against women and older officers.

Edit Aug 11: Commenter ruddyturnstone pointed out that the picture I linked to from the original article is not in fact of Insp Bamber, but of her neighbor. From the bottom of the Daily Mail article:

> The newspaper version of this article on June 12 carried a picture said to be of Insp Diane Bamber. In fact the photograph was of a neighbour. We apologise for the mistake.

Felonious Munk puts it to Babymamas and Dumbass Skirt-chasers

W.F. Price · 11 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Over the last couple days, Felonious Munk has attained some notoriety for his denunciation of the government's vacillation over the national debt. It's pretty funny and worth seeing, so take a look if you're interested.

However, more appropriate to The Spearhead is his opinion on gender relations in 2011. He takes both skanks and those who chase them to account. Felonious has plenty of raw talent, but he needs to polish up the delivery a bit. In any event, I know exactly what he's talking about, and so should most of us men.

More people ought to take the man's advice. In a particularly encouraging line (one we all ought to take to heart), he makes it clear that "before I'm an African American, I'm a man." Check it out:

A lot's been written on the unfairness of feminist-lobbied laws designed to void the traditional marriage contract, transfer wealth from men to women, and generally "empower" the female half of the population to fulfill their instinctual desires with impunity and not have to worry about any negative consequences to their behavior.

Many who call these laws generally "anti-male" fail to make the distinction as to exactly which males are paying to keep the hypergamous carousel spinning. Understanding this is key to understanding why the men in positions of power who have the ability to stop or reverse this legal trend allow and even encourage it to continue.

You can look fondly back at the old days – the days of constitutional rights, equality before the law, liberty and justice for all… but you can only do this as a beta male. The working stiff, the dutiful husband, the loving father, the family man, the good guy – that's who's getting screwed here.

Being a philandering alpha male has never been easier. The man who controls a woman's emotions is beyond the reach of the newly lengthened arm of the law. He doesn't get falsely accused of rape. He doesn't get divorced. He doesn't get sued for child support. He gets what he asks for in the backseat of his pickup truck and then he gets to drive off to his other baby mama's house where a home-cooked meal waits for him like it's still the fifties. The women he's left raising delinquent teens in the public housing projects where the welfare checks keep coming in courtesy of the clueless masses of working betas, the women whom he's given the very short end of the stick, the women who could seek legal recourse and use the heavily skewed "justice" system against him… don't. Because… they love him, and who knows… he still might come back. He doesn't have to worry. The clueless masses of working betas will pay to raise his accidental kids and "liberated" society will stand idly by and watch him continue to make sport of its daughters. Life is good, and the "anti-male" laws work in this man's favor.

The men who own this place, the men who make the real decisions behind the ballot box puppet show and have the power to override anything an actual elected representative manages to get written down in law – how many of those men do you think qualify as "working stiffs", or have the slightest amount of sympathy for one? In comparison, how many of them are sociopathic egomaniacs with zero sense of caring or fairness, driven only by an all-consuming thirst for power, conquest, mistresses on a conveyor belt and a citizenry of suckers to clean up after them? Consider this before you label something "anti-male".

It's not quite right to speak of a conflict of interest between men and women, although it can often be tempting to reduce the conversation to those terms for the sake of simplicity. The conflict here is more accurately between two different modes of thinking – between the people who produce, provide and support, and the people who exploit their labors. The provider group in this case may be predominantly male and the exploiter group predominantly female, but if you think of this as a "men vs. women" thing, a crucially important fact gets lost in translation. Men cannot choose to become women no matter how much of a sucker's bet being male becomes, so if you choose to see this as a "men vs. women" thing you will quickly reach a conclusion that doesn't make sense: men are being exploited here, yet men hold all the cards. Men produce, men provide, men lead in politics and business, all the real sources of power lie with men – it seems a foregone conclusion that men should have no trouble at all subduing women and "winning". If you look at it as a "gender war", the fact that the "war" wasn't concluded with a decisive male victory the same day it started is absolutely unexplainable.

The only way to explain a "war" where the more powerful side loses is to conclude that members of the superior force are, for some reason, choosing to defect to the other side in large enough numbers to shift the balance of power. It can't be a "men vs. women" thing because men aren't changing into women. It's a producers vs. exploiters thing, and men are in control on both sides. As the exploiter side scores victory after legal victory, being a producer becomes more and more of a sucker's bet, and more and more men decide that the only smart thing to do is to join the winning side. The population-base of producers built by what used to be, in many ways, a pretty healthy and constructive civilization is still the majority, but every day a fraction of it moves over to the other side, and the worse the producers' prospects become the more this shift will accelerate.

The spirit of the times we live in is not simply "anti-male". A man's chances in life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness are greater than ever – if he's an alpha.

From White Supremacy to Female Supremacy?

The Status of Canadian Men and Families Compared to the Former Plight of Black America

Davd Martin, PhD

The “Moynihan report” was controversial from its publication. Cited as Anonymous, 1965. The Negro[1] Family: The Case for National Action. United States Government Printing Office.

..this centimetre-thick paperback book was written (as acknowledged by the US Department of Labor website, 2010) by Daniel Patrick Moynihan, previously co-author with respected American sociologists and later US Senator from New York.

The purpose of the ‘Moynihan report’ was to urge that

"The policy of the United States is to bring the Negro American to full and equal sharing in the responsibilities and rewards of citizenship. To this end, the programs of the Federal government bearing on this objective shall be designed to have the effect, directly or indirectly, of enhancing the stability and resources of the Negro American family."

The chief problem Moynihan saw in [we would now write Afro-American] families was a tendency toward fatherless, matriarchal household structure. That tendency has spread to society in general, arguably more-so in Canada than in the United States. Given the concerns the report expressed about the effect of family structure on individual accomplishment and societal well-being, we might ask if society in general is now worse off for the change; while given a "morally neutral social science disclaimer" included in the report, we might also ask if the ill effects of a substantially matriarchal family structure as described in 1965, have been remedied by making matriarchy common throughout “society”. These two hypotheses, which can not both be true, are implied by different parts of “the Moynihan report”, and perhaps time did indeed tell, or research could soon tell, which of them be valid.

During the 45 years since the original was published on paper, the matriarchal tendencies it deplored have become much commoner among "non-Afro-American" families; and perhaps especially among the families of “subjects of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II Windsor”: It seems that the dominance of women and girls in the most-Anglophone, most-British-in-ancestry, and most-Monarchist parts of the British Commonwealth, is greater than that in the United States and much of Continental Europe (though some anecdotal reports could be heard to indicate that in Sweden and Finland, women rule in as great a percentage of households as in Canada.)

Tucked away in Moynihan’s text is a "morally neutral social science disclaimer" typical of the 1960s: "There is, presumably, no special reason why a society in which males are dominant in family relationships is to be preferred to a matriarchal arrangement. However, it is clearly a disadvantage for a minority group to be operating on one principle, while the great majority of the population, and the one with the most advantages to begin with, is operating on another." [ch IV, near the beginning]

Moynihan continues, "This is the present situation of the Negro. Ours is a society which presumes male leadership in private and public affairs. The arrangements of society facilitate such leadership and reward it. A subculture, such as that of the Negro American, in which this is not the pattern, is placed at a distinct disadvantage." From my own observations and reading during the 1960s, i would say that Moynihan exaggerated the extent of post-World-War II patriarchy in working class American households[2], and that the median and modal distribution of power in American marriages was very close to equality. Though husbands did exercise some ritual headship, much of it was more courtly than real (for example, driving the car when they were in one together, and opening doors and waiting for their wives to pass through first.) In public affairs, male leadership was indeed the norm. Since 1965, the power of women both in public and in private has increased, and that of men has declined.

Today Canada is not “a society which presumes male leadership in private and public affairs” nor one in which “the arrangements of society facilitate such leadership and reward it;” rather the reverse. There is some residual male predominance among leaders over 40 years of age, but this can be best understood as “societal inertia” (cf. Grant, 1969: 115; Martin, 2011). It is more advantageous to be born a girl in Canada today, than to be born a boy; and that has been the case for about a generation. Much rhetoric between 1965 and the present extolled gender equality; but the actual social change has been from near-equality or modest female dominance in the home, and male dominance in the workplace, to[ward] female dominance in both spheres[3].

Looking at changes in Canadian family law and family statistics since 1965, one might plausibly conclude that Feminists, reading “the Moynihan report”, chose a very different action plan than Moynihan, a high-status Irish-American man, proposed; and that rather than accepting Moynihan’s goal of making the men more prominent in Afro-American family life, they set out to make women more prominent, and men much less, in "non-Afro-American" family life.

Looking at the legal and ‘educational’ treatment of men today, at marital [in]stability and the proportions of single-parent [family?] households, one might conclude that Moynihan failed and the Feminists prevailed—and not only in the US, but even more in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, perhaps also the U.K. In Canada today, with women a strong majority among university students and entrants to the professions, with women advantaged by criminal and “family” law (cf. Martin, 2011), it is more accurate to say, “Canada is a society which presumes female leadership in private and public affairs; the arrangements of society facilitate such leadership and reward it” .. than to say that male leadership is presumed and facilitated[4].

(Might it be relevant that during the intervening years, and for more than a decade before 1965, the Head of State of all these “British Commonwealth” states, has been a woman who, by customary British Royal usage, is explicitly styled as superior to her husband?[5] It does seem to be a truism that the arrangements of the elite are to some extent aped by the middle and even sometimes the lower classes; it has been the case that Canadian and “Commonwealth” ritual has treated Her Majesty Elizabeth II as somehow better than all other people; and what little reference to the Royal Family i myself have read, seems to indicate that Her Majesty’s son Charles, rather than being strengthened as Her heir, has been deprecated. One should probably not infer from this that Her Majesty is a principal influence; but one might well infer that being so deferential[6] to a woman of regal bearing, for over half a century, and seeing the men of her family dominated by her, has had some effect.)

Today, i perceive Canadian family life to be more like the "Negro" family life Moynihan sought to change, than it is like "White" family life in 1965.[7] Moynihan wrote, "Almost One-Fourth of Negro Families are Headed by Females", what is the proportion today in Canada? Men are a decided minority among university students and entrants to the professions, and their rate of representation is falling. As it is advantageous today and has been advantageous all this 21st century, to be born a girl rather than a boy in the Nice countries… so it was advantageous in the first two thirds of the 20th Century, to be born "white" rather than "Negro". Only in the treatment of Afro-Americans before Brown v. Board of Education, and possibly the Canadian "Residential School" scandal, can i find parallel within the common-law tradition before 1965, to the treatment of male Canadians today in criminal and "family" law[8].

In the Afro-American case, false stereotypes of inequality were believed for generations: Blacks were believed to be inherently lazier, of lower intelligence, more violent and criminal; one main task of “the Moynihan report” was to show that differences which might be taken as proof of these stereotypes were better understood to result from discrimination, than to represent inherent differences between races. It is entirely plausible that, if legal gender discrimination is accepted for a generation, most Canadians born after 1990 would come to believe that men are inherently inferior to women in much the same ways as “Negroes” were once held inferior to “whites”: For instance, Clark and Clark (1947) found that Afro-American children downgraded their own race in conformity to prevailing cultural biases.

There appears to be a systematic effort to stereotype men along lines eerily similar to those followed by racist stereotypes of “Niggers” in the early 20th Century. As Jeremy Swanson (2009-2010) has detailed but not yet systematically tabulated, men are often treated as guilty until proved innocent by mass media and police, and sometimes by courts of law; while women are treated as innocent until proved guilty and often excused for homicides of husbands or “lovers” if they testify that the victim threatened them—even if that testimony is not corroborated by a neutral witness or strong physical evidence. Considering the temptation to perjury entailed in a risk of criminal conviction, this practice falls far short of the quality of logic normal to Canadian and Common Law; but it parallels rather well the treatment of “Negro Americans,” and especially of male “Negro Americans,” before 1954 (and for some years afterwards in parts of “the South”.)

Comparing the status of Canadian men with some past racial prejudices in a neighbouring country, we can readily see that conventional stereotypes about gender relations left over from the time of “the Moynihan report” are no longer valid and should be corrected. Specifically:

- gender equality in educational and legal treatment and outcomes, would require an improvement in the status of boys and men! (Where are the Affirmative-Action programmes and Legal Reform programmes for males?)
- demands for favouritism for girls or women cannot be supported by appeals to gender equality; and arguments along those lines have been false for all this young century.
- "Patriarchy" is either a foreign phenomenon, as exotic to the Nice Countries as foot-binding or worshipping carved wooden idols[9]; or else it is pre-industrial history with a few present-day manifestations in numerically small subcultures and pre-industrial societies.

As the disadvantaged gender, men can benefit from less-defensive, more honest “strategy-and-tactics”:

- we should adopt gender equality as a criterion, but perhaps not as a goal[10].
- we should refute and even scorn the misuse of gender equality by Feminists seeking to increase their privilege, years after they reached and passed equality in treatment[11];

- we should look to the U. S. Civil Rights Movement for models we can adopt or adapt;
- we should also look at the Feminist actions of 1966-2006 for models we can adopt or adapt[12];

([these two lists are not necessarily complete; additions are invited])

We might benefit if we adopt a label for ourselves other than merely “Canadian men”; and a case could be made for ironically calling ourselves eunuchs. More affirmatively, if one were to ask, what shall we men call ourselves in analogy to "Negro"? the parallel treatment would be to translate man into Spanish: Hombre. (I like that word because in Spanish speaking countries, the phrase "muy hombre" is a compliment.) The rhetorical meaning of taking a foreign word would be somewhat comparable to Afro-American men discarding a foreign word for the plain English “Black”, and also implicitly claim the respect hombre connotes [and “negro” did not in 1965].

Functionally, adopting a [nickname?] would –

- – acknowledge that we are now subject to systematic and oppressive discrimination;
- – imply that the discrimination is wrong and we do not accept it;
- – show sympathy and solidarity with the Afro-American men who led the Civil Rights movement, but in a way different enough that we are not offending them by using a word they consider to be theirs to employ or not [as Nigger and Negro have become].

– abd also show solidarity with Hispanic Americans, who are perhaps the nearest US ethnic analogue to the Canadian Métis.[13]

The "Moynihan Report"s portrayal of matriarchy seems well worth re-reading in context of today’s marriage laws and differential criminal law enforcement by gender—and of today’s female prevalence in education which, combined with pro-female-biased criminal and family law, leaves us the disadvantaged gender–and to an extent women haven’t been disadvantaged in a hundred years, perhaps far longer. That portrayal also invites a test of the merits of matriarchy, as implied above.

In his ‘morally neutral social science disclaimer’ that "There is, presumably, no special reason why a society in which males are dominant in family relationships is to be preferred to a matriarchal arrangement," Moynihan presented an hypothesis to the effect that consistency of family structure across ethnic groups was important but the difference between patriarchy, matriarchy, and gender-equality was not[14]. In summarizing statistics on education, employment, income, and [social disorganization], Moynihan presented an implicit hypothesis to the effect that matriarchal, fatherless families were cruelly disadvantaged. Both hypotheses cannot be true together. Canadian family changes since “the Moynihan report” appeared, if their consequences can be identified, may indicate which hypothesis is more true:

- Has shifting social leadership toward female predominance and family leadership toward matriarchy done overall societal good?
- Has it done overall societal harm?
- Or, has societal well-being remained effectively unchanged, with women now clearly better off than men?–that is, have women gained and men lost, in close-to-identical amounts?

Moynihan entitled his "report": … The Case for National Action. The national action was not taken; instead, the matriarchal bias he deplored has become more general. How has social well-being changed over the same span of time, and how much of the change is best understood as the consequence of increasing matriarchy? This is a subject well worth the attention of sociologists, psychologists, and criminologists, and might well contain many good thesis topics for graduate students. (It is also a subject where research design must be especially wary of potential biases.)

The results i have noticed, refute Moynihan’s ‘morally neutral social science disclaimer’: The past 45 years have shown us some special reasons “why a society in which males are [equal or] dominant in family relationships[15] is to be preferred to a matriarchal arrangement”—have they not? Children are less well off. Moral standards have declined, and the declines in honesty, respect and charity are in my humble opinion, comparably and perhaps more harmful than the declines in sexual restraint.[16] Men have lost common-law rights whose value cannot be measured in mere money. Millions of foetuses who could have become healthy, happy children and then socially contributing adults have died for the convenience of adult women, many of whom may wish in old age that they had children to come by and help out. The refutation is not absolute; there can be many kinds of egalitarian, many kinds of matriarchal, and many kinds of patriarchal family structures; our experience has compared one largely egalitarian and two significantly matriarchal examples. It does indicate that matriarchy wastes men and boys contributory potential more than an egalitarian system with a few patriarchal bits, wastes women’s.

Our family and moral declines have parallels, perhaps to some extent consequences, in the huge increases in the importance of and in respect for Islam since 1965. Mainstream Islam is not harshly patriarchal, though some sects may be; it is patriarchal in some ways, and usually gently, as mainstream Christianity was when the world was more Christian than anything else. We cannot go back and re-live the last 45 years, to see if forming a gently patriarchal or keeping a carefully balanced gender-egalitarian Canadian society might put us in better stead today than our present predicament; but we can and should compare today's conditions with those of 1965. From what i have lately heard about crime and addiction rates among the young, from what Moynihan wrote and i knew from other sources by the time he wrote, about the effects of fatherlessness on school performance and social pathology; from the criminological truism that men who go to prison don't have fathers they can honour…

… "it is putting it mildly" when i doubt that the changes we have seen, were optimal or even desirable and conclude that the 'morally neutral social science disclaimer' was in error.

It is time "and past due", for men to formulate a vision of the future that is better than matriarchy.

1As those who read Spanish or Portugese recognize already, "Negro" is simply "Black" in a different language. In the mid-20th Century it was deemed more polite to say "Negro" than "Black"; the custom has since changed at the initiative of Afro-American activists: They said they wanted "Black" in English, and we non-Afro folks, from Aboriginals to Euros to Asians, generally went along with that wish.

2In the 1960s i resided in the United States and earned my Ph.D. There. In 1971 i moved to Canada and have lived here since, excepting one year in Finland. I noticed no significant difference between Canadian and US family power balance either on arrival or in anecdotes from people in both countries; but that might be affected by the specific places i lived.

4Female and male dominance, like “matriarchy” and “patriarchy”, are matters of degree, not matters of “kind”. More formally, they are continuous variables, not dichotomies [nor trichotomies, etc.]—hence, “more accurate”.

5… and to a greater degree than her father the King was styled superior to her mother the Queen? Her husband is titled Prince Consort, not King; while the title of the wife of a British King, is Queen.

6It is a criminal offence [cf felony in US usage] to startle the Queen, a lawyer recently told me.

7I don’t have the data i’d need to compare Aboriginal or Asian ethnic groups in the same way; and in 1965 Moynihan had similar difficulties. If any reader should have such data, i hope he’ll start writing them up.

8Apartheid might be adduced. I do not know those old long-replaced laws as well as i know the US “segregation” and Canadian Residential School stories; and i am not sure if South Africa should be considered part of the common-law tradition in the way the United States is. It should perhaps be stressed that i refer not to the harshest days of “Jim Crow” in the Southern US, but to school segregation, and generally to discrimination as experienced in the northern and western US between 1945-1965, as analogous to men’s legal disadvantages in Canada today.

9The ‘totem poles’ of the Northwest Coast of North America are not idols and they are not worshipped, they may be used analogously to Orthodox ikons, but i am not informed enough of Wakesian practice to say for sure. Carved wooden idols are worshipped in parts of Asia (Yohannan, 2001: 58)

10Why not a goal? I have seen indications, as yet not enough for me to form a conclusion [much less write-up formally], that women in power misuse that power and mistreat other women as well as men, to a greater extent than do men in power. It may be that in a decade to a generation from now, if these indications are confirmed, that a predominance of men in holding some forms of power, will prove to be the wisest political arrangement. That said, using gender equality as a criterion remains worth while: If men should return to dominance, it ought to be with good cause and good and documented reason. We have now seen in both race and gender relations, the baleful effects of selfish political oppression.

11Gender equality “on balance”, with women advantaged in the domestic sphere and men in paid employment, may have existed in working-class Canada and “white America” well before 1965.

12The difference between “look to” and “look at” is intentional. Afro-American men are our brothers in spirit [and for some, brothers or at least cousins in genealogy as well] while Feminist activists seeking still-more-preferential treatment while already advantaged, are our oppressors. We can learn from our oppressors, as for instance many believe the founders of the State of Israel learned from the Wehrmacht of World War II; but we should do so more warily than from our fellows—as the State of Israel has perhaps to some degree, failed to do, resulting in greater hostility from the Muslim world, than was needful.

13As there are at least two Hispanic subcultures in the United States (e.g. Chicano, Puerto Rican, Cuban) so there are at least two Métis subcultures in Canada (e.g Prairie, Acadian, rural-Québecois). Métis in Spanish is, of course, mestizo.

14Since such disclaimers were conventional in social science in the 1960s, one cannot tell if Moynihan believed what he wrote or simply “genuflected” to a custom of his time and line of work.

15Oddly, “the Moynihan report” hardly mentions gender equality; yet my observations of dozens of marriages and households from 1955-1980 indicated to me that rough gender equality was commoner than matriarchal or patriarchal household organization—and thus, the median as well as the modal form in working and middle class Canada and USA. We should not despise nor avoid equality! We should neither, mis-label arrangements to our disadvantage, as equal.

It might be worth mentioning, that declines in the crime rate and particularly the rates of some violent crimes, should not be “credited” to Gun Control nor to the degradation of men—but to ageing. It has long been a criminological truism that crime generally and violent crime especially is far commoner among the young than the old; and that the effect of long prison sentences in reducing recidivism is largely due to aging. (At the extreme, of course, the recidivism rate among those who die in prison, is zero.) Canada’s population has grown noticeably older since 1965; and in accord with the ageing hypothesis, Canada’s crime rate has fallen (CBC News, 2010b).

16That is not to minimize the declines in sexual restraint: When prostitutes become “sex trade workers”, real trades are denigrated through no fault of their own; when sexually transmitted diseases become common, public health in general suffers. It is to say that privileging the least moral of women to lie and drive innocent men to suicide (London Daily Mail, June 25, 2010), and then protecting their identity so future victims cannot be forewarned, represents moral decline comparable to that which marked the last years of the Roman Empire.

London in Flames: The un-PC Truth

Featured Guest · 12 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor: this isn't exactly our focus, but as we have a lot of British readers, and I promised some time ago to expand topics somewhat, I thought it ought to be posted anyway (and Petra's fired up -- it's a fun read). The points she brings up are also relevant in that this event is another example of the failure of PC ideology, which encapsulates feminism.]

By Petra

It's been three days and three nights now that London has been burning, and there is no end in sight. An orgy of violence, destruction and looting has been raging across the capital; gangs of mostly black youths continue to smash up and plunder shops, vandalize and torch properties and set cars ablaze.

Yet politicians and much of the media (including the BBC, the bastion of political correctness) persist in ignoring the facts while dishing out fashionable propaganda. And so gang members and criminals become poor, misunderstood and 'socially deprived' young people, and looting and violence are justified as alleged consequence of government spending cuts, poverty and inequality. Not surprisingly, the fact that vast majority of these savages (sorry, disadvantaged youths) belong to certain protected minorities has barely been noted by our PC, diversity-worshipping media and politicians.

Let's put things straight. Spending cuts (which are in any case more imaginary than real – public spending will continue to increase each year for the next four years, according to the government budget) and inequity have nothing to do with what's been taking place in London (and now other UK cities as well). The criminal gangs of looters and arsonists are not victims of the economy or society; they are worthless, feral thugs who never had any interest in honest work, choosing instead to live off welfare and proceeds of crime.

That they – and many millions more – have been allowed to make such life choices, paid for by one of the world's highest tax rates imposed on the hard working and productive Britons, is a consequence of the suicidal policies the UK has adopted in recent decades. Britain has bred (and imported) a vast underclass of savages and degenerates lacking any moral values, oblivious to ideas of hard work and social obligation, ingrained with a sense of entitlement with zero responsibility, and indulged in instant gratification.

Such people should have no place in a civilized society. But then, the UK can no longer claim to be one. It is a crumbling nation that has slowly but surely been descending into utter madness, with its celebration of moral inversion, non-judgmentalism, tolerance for the intolerable, support and protection of all that is evil, criminal, ugly and destructive. What we're seeing in London is the product of a self-indulged, decaying society lacking any moral codes and sanctions or penalties for unacceptable behavior.

Unsurprisingly, even staring reality in the face (in the form of torched buildings, burnt out cars, wrecked buses, Molotov cocktails, and looting gangs) is apparently not enough to wake people from their carefully constructed delusions. The escalating violence has – predictably – brought out a growing army of apologists reveling in an orgy of excuse-making for the widespread lawlessness and violence.

There are also those who blame the feral violence and mass thuggery on alleged police brutality and – what else? – 'racism'. The police certainly have plenty to answer for. They could start by explaining why they have been standing aside, allowing wholesale looting and violence in broad daylight. Their lack of intervention led to a complete breakdown of order, sending out a message that gangsters can act with brazen impunity. From there it was only a matter of time for the attacks to spread across the capital (and now other UK cities).

The British police, courts and justice system have long been a joke, going out of their way to protect and appease law-breakers, while denying both support and any right to self-defense to the victimized, law-abiding citizens whom they unleash the criminals on. It is the soft policing approach coupled with laughable sentencing (no incarceration even for serial violent offenders) and focus on the 'human rights' of the perpetrator that are partly responsible for the plight of all those who were made homeless, had their businesses destroyed and their lives ruined over the last three days (and counting).

Then there is the pervasive culture of political correctness that has, over the years, fatally wounded all British institutions, police force including. That the police made little attempt to restore order in the streets or intervene as looters were lining up to plunder stores and torch buildings has much to do with the 'sensitivities' of the minority population. For years police have been trained to be oversensitive to issues of race and to gently 'engage' and 'reach out' to those who use imaginary discrimination and grievances as excuse for criminal behavior. Police, much as everyone else in the UK, are paralyzed by fear of being called racist. It's safer for their career to stand aside when it comes to minorities' crime.

The Hate Crime guide published by the Association of Chief Police Officers in 2002, and periodically updated, dismissed the strict impartiality principle on the basis that impartial justice was unfair; "colour blind" policing – described as "policing that purports to treat everyone in the same way" was deemed flawed and unjust because it "fails to take account of the fact that different people have different reactions and different needs. Failure to recognise and understand these means failure to deliver services appropriate to needs and an inability to protect people irrespective of their background." Officers who practiced such policing were to expect disciplinary action.)

Years of 'sensitivity training', health & safety focus and false priorities (such as being non-threatening, non-confrontational, and non-provocative instead of effective in crime fighting) have also created a new breed of police officers who are simply too cowardly and unable to do what their job requires.

Hence the appalling scenes of police standing by watching violent mobs destroy vast swathes of the capital. Despite the 16,000 officers on the streets, London has descended into chaos, anarchy and brutality, and law-abiding, tax-paying citizens are getting zero protection as their lives and property are being threatened and ruined. The cops, although fully armed and armored, are not reacting (unless one considers retreat an appropriate response) even as teams of young men are throwing rocks and Molotov cocktails at them.

Today, after three days of mayhem, Home Secretary Theresa May ruled out the use of more appropriate tactics: "The way we police in Britain is not through use of water cannon. The way we police in Britain is through consent of communities." Not that this comes as a surprise; the elites have long proven to be completely out of touch with the reality of ordinary Britons. After all, Ms May et al don't have to suffer the consequences of their delusional and evil policies and decisions.

The black community, unwilling to control its youths and happy to tolerate the criminal activities of its members, rarely accepts any responsibility, yet is always eager to voice indignation against the police. The death of Mark Duggan, a North London gang leader allegedly involved in drug dealing and gun crime (but of course praised by some as a leader of his community) was no exception. His killing on August 4, in an apparent shoot-out with officers from Operation Trident (a unit that deals with gun crime in the Afro-Caribbean communities) sparked a protest rally that soon escalated into demands for vengeance and the mass violence that has now spread across London, Birmingham, Bristol, Liverpool, Nottingham and Manchester.

If Britain was a civilized country with its priorities right, the police would have stepped in immediately and with full force, arresting every looter, arsonist and gang member. Were the police unable to do so, the army should have been sent in to wipe out the scum.

But of course this being a 'caring' and 'compassionate' nation (instead of say zero tolerance, low crime Singapore or Japan), David Cameron et al will instead continue to spout their touchy-feely "hug a hoodie" garbage and throw billions more on 'disadvantaged' and 'disenfranchised' special groups. Meanwhile, the country will keep spiraling down into the depths of moral and spiritual poverty and degeneracy.

And if London's burning now, just wait to see what happens in the coming years, once the economy collapses and the welfare checks stop coming. If you happen to live in the UK and haven't left yet (as I thankfully did earlier this year), better start preparing for war.

London Riots: Feminism No Excuse

W.F. Price · 13 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've seen some MRA talk about how the riots in London were a result of fatherlessness, poor treatment of boys, etc. Maybe they were to some trivial extent, but I don't really buy it. In fact, what I see is a politically privileged group of people acting out because they know they can do so with impunity.

These kinds of riots are familiar to Americans. We've had them since the 1960s. Typically, they develop after some confrontation with police, as they did in London. Our most recent spate of mass disorder was a response to a natural disaster — hurricane Katrina. Katrina was shameful. Groups of looters took advantage of the breakdown of law and order to steal and kill. Some of them were NOLA police officers themselves, which just goes to show how much of a joke the law can be in the US.

Sure, there's a racial component, but that certainly doesn't excuse the murder and mayhem. Nor would fatherlessness or unemployment. And in the UK, it's especially appalling, because the community that kicked it off was never dragged over there in chains, but rather welcomed by native Britons. Not good enough, I suppose…

About ten years ago, there was a brutal riot in Seattle during Mardi Gras. Having seen some indication that gangbanger types were showing up in large numbers, I avoided the festivities, because I knew trouble was brewing. However, it was even worse than I expected. A young man, Kris Kime, was beaten to death for trying to intervene in the vicious beating of an innocent person. Another man was similarly lynched in London a few days ago, and several South Asians protecting their neighborhood were deliberately run down and killed by a truck-driving rioter. Yet, unbelievably, we have some MRAs making excuses for these animals.

In Seattle during Mardi Gras, the police were ordered by the mayor to take a hands-off approach. Former Mayor Paul Schell has blood on his hands for that. Police have been so politicized as to be almost useless in these matters. When the putative point of contention is about some cherished grievance, the cops are not going to intervene meaningfully to restore order. This is nothing new; when southern whites under Jim Crow terrorized black communities, they routinely got off the hook. However, we're dealing with a new kind of tyranny, and this ain't the old South. Today, it's the leftists' pets who are unleashing mayhem.

It doesn't matter whether the thugs in the streets are blacks, huns or low-class whites — they could have been Nazis invading from Calais in 1940 considering the way they behaved, and that's exactly what they should have been treated as. Perhaps the most shameful thing about it is that those tasked with protecting the English people failed them so miserably. The English people themselves could have done a far better job protecting their cities than the so-called police, but they've been disarmed and pacified by their "leaders," who will simply use this as an excuse to pry even more money out of the hands of responsible citizens in an effort to placate the bullies who conducted the mayhem.

Fortunately, some Englishmen did stand up, and there's some video to prove it (HT Quartermain). These are the men I'm going to stand behind, and I hope their spirit picks up steam and challenges the sleazy crooks in Whitehall who fiddled as London burned:

The Prosecution of False Rape Accusers 'Must Be Stopped' pierceharlan · 15 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Lisa Longstaff of the UK's Women Against Rape bemoaned the fact that some women are prosecuted for making false rape claims. "Such prosecutions must be stopped," she declared. "It is a galling diversion for women to be jailed when the vast majority of rapists are not – 90% of rapes are never reported and only 6.7% of those that are reach conviction on a full charge of rape. The prosecution of women and the disproportionate media coverage they get are putting rape victims off reporting and leaving all of us more vulnerable to attack. Is that what they want?" Source: http://www.guardian.co.uk/law/2011/aug/12/layla-jailed-after-reporting-sexual-assault

Longstaff once said this: "Every prosecution [of false rape claims] puts women who have been raped off reporting it." Another time, she called such efforts "a concerted witchhunt."

Longstaff's is not the advocacy of a serious social reformer; it is the advocacy of ugly gender get-evenism that has no place in the public discourse about a critical issue. The notion that society can only combat one form of criminality, namely rape, by ignoring other serious criminality, namely false rape reporting, or that society can only wage the "war on rape" by elevating the victimization of one group of our citizens, our daughters, over that of another, our sons, is as puerile as it is patently unjust.

Holding criminals accountable for their crimes is not a zero sum game, and Longstaff's suggestion paints her as an extremist whose pronouncements are not to be taken seriously.

If some women are being unfairly prosecuted for false reporting, such unfairness is as deserving of society's attention as is the unfairness in wrongly prosecuting persons for rape. In fact, women are rarely prosecuted for false reporting, and typically, charges are lodged only where the evidence is clear and manifest. Instances of unjustly charging women for false reporting are extremely rare and receive inordinate media attention. The problem isn't that too many false accusers are being prosecuted but not enough.

In addition, the suggestion that rape victims are put off from reporting because a few women are prosecuted for making false rape claims is posited without any supporting evidence, and is absurd on its face.

As a general matter, the unfortunate gender politicization of rape renders it impossible to discern whether serious underreporting even exists, much less its extent. See, J. Fennel, Punishment by Another Name: The Inherent Overreaching in Sexually Dangerous Person Commitments, 35 N.E.J. on Crim. & Civ. Con. 37, 49-51 (2009). Yet, paid sexual assault counselors posit every imaginable percentage of alleged underreporting as if there were a scientific basis for it, and none of those figures can be reconciled with the numbers of women they claim are actually raped. For an interesting, and even-handed, assessment of the games played when it comes to claims about the prevalence of rape, see Chad Hermann's landmark One-in-One-Thousand-Eight-Hundred-Seventy-Seven.

Beyond this, there is no evidence whatsoever to support the proposition that holding a liar accountable for her lies will significantly deter women from reporting legitimate rapes, any more than prosecuting some people for arson deters people from reporting fires.

At last year's Specter rape hearing, a feminist writer live-blogged the testimony of Scott Berkowitz, President and Founder of the Rape, Abuse and Incest National Network (RAINN). Berkowitz's testimony cast an interesting light on Longstaff's claims as to why women don't report:

"On reporting [of rape]: More victims may not be reporting their rapes, but the reasoning has changed over the past few decades. 'A generation ago,' the reasons were things like, 'fear of not being believed; fear of being interrogated about and blamed for their own behavior, and what they were wearing. In short, they feared that they would be the one on trial.' Today, 'the perception of many victims has evolved.' Now they don't report for these reasons: 'they don't want their loved ones to know what happened; they're ashamed themselves; they just want to put it all behind them.' Today, 'fear and shame of how the police wil [sic] treat them' has moved down on the list of reasons victims provide for not officially reporting the crime. As much as we need to educate police to take reports seriously, Berkowitz says, we also must 'educate victims on the importance of reporting.'"

Ironically, claims that "only 6.7% of [rape claims] reach conviction on a full charge of rape" may be contributing to whatever underreporting exists. Last year, the Stern Review in the UK said that claims by rape advocates that rape is not being properly prosecuted might actually put women off from reporting. Here is why: in the UK, the Home Office, and politicians seeking to jack up rape convictions, have long cited the attrition rate for rape, which is the number of convictions as a percentage of number of reported crimes. That rate is 6%. But, the Home Office, and everyone, uses the conviction rate (the number of convictions secured against the number of persons brought to trial for that given offence) for all other crimes. In fact, the conviction rate for rape is 58%. The result of such dishonest advocacy has been to make it appear that law enforcement is terribly, and uniquely, ineffective when it comes to rape. The Stern Review noted that use of the attrition rate instead of the conviction rate "may well have discouraged some victims from reporting." Stern Review, see page 45 (emphasis added).

Refusing to prosecute rape lies hurts not just innocent men and boys, but actual rape victims. For every criminal act, our society accepts the notion that punishing the wrongdoer will promote, among other things, deterrence. In false rape case after case after case, judges and law enforcement officials bemoan the harm to actual rape victims done by the lies of false accusers. With every rape lie, the integrity of every rape claim is diminished. In order for rape to regarded as a serious social malady, the general public, including prospective rape jurors, must be assured that the police are not unfairly prosecuting innocent men and boys and are holding rape liars accountable for their crimes.

Violence Against Women Act Must Stop the Hateful Stereotypes

careyroberts · 15 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Senate Judiciary Committee recently held a hearing on the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act. Americans certainly should do all we can to stop partner aggression…but does that mean it's fine to batter the truth?

In order to convince over-burdened taxpayers to pony up the nearly $400 million for VAWA's wide-ranging criminal justice programs, proponents have tucked into the law a series of alarming findings designed to play on the chivalrous impulses of male lawmakers…and the darkest fears of their female constituents.

To put the issue into perspective, every good study has found that women are as likely as men to haul off and slap, kick, or punch their partners. And when women are maimed, more often than not, it's the female who started the melee.

Professor Martin Fiebert at California State University has compiled the results of over 250 studies, concluding "women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners." The problem is especially worrisome with high school girls who, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, are 25% more likely than boys to be the instigators of partner abuse: http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/preview/mmwrhtml/ss5704a1.htm#tab11

So welcome to the world of VAWA-land, where statistics are blithely sliced, diced, and cherry-picked to the point that they bear little resemblance to the truth. Here's just a sampling from the make-believe smorgasbord….

First, the over-wrought generalizations. One of the VAWA findings avers, "One out of every 3 Indian women are raped in their lifetimes." But that statistic is based on the responses gathered from a grand total of…ready for this?…88 women.

Second, the creative mangling of the truth. VAWA claims, "There is a strong link between domestic violence and homelessness. Among cities surveyed, 44 percent identified domestic violence as a primary cause of homelessness." But according to the U.S. Conference of Mayors report that is the basis of the claim, domestic violence is only the fifth leading cause of homelessness.

Next come the weasel words. One finding states solemnly, "the former United States Advisory Board on Child Abuse suggests that domestic violence may be the single major precursor to child abuse and neglect fatalities." But according to the far more authoritative National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect, children living in single-parent households face an 80% higher risk of experiencing serious injury or harm from neglect. In other words, breaking up a family on account of minor abuse constitutes a far greater risk to kids than the initial incident of partner abuse.

Then we come to the one-sided claims: "40% of girls ages 14 to 17 report knowing someone their age who has been hit or beaten by a boyfriend." Shocking indeed, except it fails to mention the percentage of teenage boys who know of someone assaulted by a girlfriend, which is somewhere in the neighborhood of 40%.

This brings us to the gross misrepresentations: "Each year about 324,000 pregnant women in the United States are battered by the men in their lives. This battering leads to complications of pregnancy, including low weight gain, anemia, infections, and first and second trimester bleeding."

Outrageous? Now do you want to hear what the research really says? According to the analysis published by Julie Gazmararian in the Maternal and Child Health Journal, in her words, "we can estimate that between 152,000 and 324,000 women experience violence during their pregnancies."
So VAWA conveniently omits the fact that the actual number may be 152,000, not 324,000. And most incidents of "violence" consist of a minor shove or slap – a far cry from what most people think of as "battering."

Ready for the galloping falsehood? “37% of all women who sought care in hospital emergency rooms for violence-related injuries were injured by a current or former spouse, boyfriend, or girlfriend,” the VAWA finding screams. But the US Centers for Disease Control says the actual percentage is less than 1%. But hey, when we’re talking about a subject as important as domestic violence, any number will do.

And now the grand finale, the gender vilification: “in a national survey of more than 6,000 American families, 50% of men who frequently assaulted their wives also frequently abused their children.” This claim is based on the 1985 National Family Violence Survey. Look closely at Table 14.2 of that study, and you’ll see that child abuse rates for abusive moms and dads are nearly identical.

Overall, VAWA contains dozens of alarming findings that depict a nation of women besieged by loathsome men incapable of containing their abusive impulses. Each year the federal government spends $84 million on domestic violence education and training programs that spew flawed statistics, one-sided claims, and undeserved stereotypes.

It’s time we stop the misinformation and hate.

Single buddies of married men (and the women who hate them)

by Ken Knight

I have mentioned this phenomenon in previous articles and posts here yes, but I have been thinking perhaps I should expand on the subject a bit more. Yes, it is a well-known derivative of marriage that a man's buddies (especially the single ones) are usually dismissed by their newly-married friend as soon as cupcake makes her view of them known and presses hubby to mind his ball-and-chain (household / wifey chores) and act accordingly. Single male friends are seen as possible "saboteurs" by an insecure wife because, to put it simply he's like the escaped slave, he brings news of freedom! (to quote comedian Bill Maher). To toss kerosene onto the fire of argument even more, I'd daresay it is a single man's "freedom" that may indeed make the married buddy re-think his position, with the exception of "smug marrieds" i.e. men who think they are better than their single, unattached, childless brothers because they have "what is expected of a man" and like my buddy Davis who calls himself a "p*ssy getting motherf*cker" because he's been married twice in ten years and is bankrupt to prove it. Hubris may cause blindness!

In my own experience as a lifelong bachelor I have had friends and associates who were single for years, gotten married then divorced, and even ones who got married and (willingly) settled into being "locked down" as soon as the honeymoon was over and never seen again by his male buddies. To wit I have seen/heard wives of married buddies deride single men they knew as any one of the litany of insecure woman's pet-monsters:

1. "He's a creep; no one else hangs out with him! (even though she doesn't see the guy but once in a blue moon and assumes her hubby is said single guy's "only" friend in the world).
2. "He doesn't have a girlfriend, what is he queer or something?" (no girlfriend the wife has ever seen because single guy doesn't want to bring his date/girlfriend anywhere near the bitch).
3. "All he does is drink and party!" (although cupcake has only seen him at a party and finds it convenient to defame the single guy as a raging alcoholic based solely on one or two party-scene observations).
4. "He's a never-been-married loser, why be pals with him?" (yet another example of cupcake playing to a smug husband's bravado in attempt to get him to see his single buddy as a "loser" for NOT having a ball-and-chain).
5. "Guys like him are dangerous…reminds me of Timothy McVeigh" (probably the worst shaming of a single guy I've heard so far from married women I know, and it was based on the fact the guy was single and liked firearms as well as rugged outdoor camping but did not have a wife to "restrain" him).
6. "You think your friend is gay and doesn't know it yet?" (more fag shaming from a wife about one of her husband's never-married single buddies who she doesn't let come around enough times to bring a girlfriend with him, playing on hubby's dislike of homos to get him to drop single buddy).

Far be it for me to assume every dynamic of couples-living because I for one have avoided marriage my entire adult life, but I have seen and heard these very instances of married women shaming the hell out of single men who happen to be friends with their husbands, enough to draw a very definitive conclusion: To the married couple a single man is "kryptonite" and in most cases gets dropped from the invite-list after awhile as many of you already know.

The lesson here for single men comes forth as a looking-glass "powerpoint" where one can view a crystal clear picture of what married life would be like for them by the way he is treated by the wife (and often his recently-married buddy) once the wedding ceremony is over and snookems has sent out her thank-you cards to all the suckers who bought her something pricey for her "special day".

One more lesson to ponder in this regard….what do you think could happen in the latter days (soon to come) of an American Matriarchy with this “kick the single guy out” phenomenon sliding further out into a society-wide spectrum in this growing “public safety” culture?

- Single men without children not allowed being in areas where children congregate
- Single men prosecuted for “street harassment” (flirting w/ uninterested women)
- “Bachelor’s Tax” money-siphoning (backed by Evangelicals of course)
- Single men shamed increasingly more so in media (a la “Our Idiot Brother”, etc.)

For all the freedoms a single man does enjoy, he will always be top of the hate list for married women, single feminists, lesbians, and the men who look down on them because they’re not doing “what a man should do”. If these folks could build a concentration camp and toss men like me in it, they would!

In the thick of it

In an attempt to break my will over her proposed international relocation of my kids with her new husband (the guy she had an affair with), my ex is hammering me with motions right now, demanding attorney's fees, etc., despite the fact that she knows I'm broke after paying for an attorney. In fact, that's the point — women know they have the advantage and can beat a man down through extended litigation. It's the same tactic she pursued before, except this time she can't pull the CPS/police card without being censured by the court, which allows me to at least sleep at night.

However, it's pretty distressing all the same. In order to keep some sanity, I have to take a lot of deep breaths and remind myself that there's only so much that I, as a human being, can do. Of course, she found this website and is trying to use that against me in court. I'm not really all that concerned about that, but we'll see what that gets her. It's all fair game now, I suppose, but I still have to wait for it all to be on the record before I can mention any details.

As usual, I'm getting smeared, and as a man I have to play the moderate even as I'm being called a foaming at the mouth psychopath. This is part of the game — women are given carte blanche to smear, accuse and generally attack while guys are expected to behave as St. Francis of Assisi.

My kids are blissfully unaware, and I will continue on as though nothing has changed until it has. So, I'll keep the posts coming to the best of my ability and wish the best to all men and women of goodwill out there. All we can do is try to do good works and fight evil, and have some faith that our lives on this earth have some meaning. There's really nothing more to it, and if you can accept this there's solace and comfort even in the worst of circumstances.

An inherent disadvantage

One of the problems men face in court is ingrained human nature. When you're facing a judge who has 15 or so minutes to decide the fate of your family, it can present some serious problems. Perhaps the most common of these is the instinctive tendency of humans to have a protective attitude toward women, and a dismissive attitude – even containing some elements of humor – toward female on male aggression. People are so unconcerned about female aggression that radio show hosts will crack jokes about men having their penises cut off and ground up in the garbage disposal.

The upshot of this is that a man facing a judge who goes on the offensive against a woman will be disliked on an instinctive level, whereas a woman who does the same will be indulged, and possibly even garner some sympathy, even if her claims verge on incredible. It's a pernicious problem, and due to the American legal system, which is adversarial, it is tacitly encouraged.

There's really nothing new about this, and for centuries there was a safeguard, known as spousal privilege, that barred spouses from testifying against each other in court. Spousal privilege still exists in law, but is greatly modified from its roots, and is now generally restricted to protecting the confidentiality of private communication between spouses during a marriage. However, as family law stands today, there is now a fairly strong incentive to smear one's spouse.

The problem for men is that that incentive doesn't really apply to them. In fact, it's in a guy's best interest to soft-pedal even serious issues, such as a wife's addiction issues, her parenting skills (or lack thereof), or her general irresponsibility. This may seem counterintuitive, but judges just won't like you if you stand in front of them and attack your wife, no matter what kind of nasty person she may be. The wife, on the other hand, incurs very little risk when she engages in character assassination, and often gains the upper hand through such tactics.

Given the law as it exists today, there's little men can do about this but try to eat it calmly, and hope that the attacks go overboard and into the "obviously false" category. After a certain sustained volume of these kinds of allegations, judges will begin to grow annoyed, and eventually may lose patience entirely. But you certainly can't count on it — the sad fact is that luck always plays a big role in these matters.

As for how this problem could be dealt with, it might be worthwhile to re-examine the concept of spousal privilege, strengthen it, and suspend it only in cases of violent or property crime against a spouse or children. If a spouse wants to trash her husband, she'll have to go all the way and accuse him of a crime — at least that way he'll have due process and a public defender. As for denigrating his habits, parenting skills, political views, etc., this should all be inadmissible. Let a parenting evaluator come and make a determination, and that can be entered into evidence. This would eliminate much frivolity and save families a great deal of money during the very expensive process of separation and divorce.

Furthermore, it would go some ways toward leveling the playing field for fathers, and that's something everyone ought to support for the good of children and families.

Incidents in China Suggest Further International Destabilization

W.F. Price · 19 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Joe Biden's recent trip to China is turning into a farce as petty diplomatic incidents erupt in Beijing. A Chinese basketball team playing a "friendly" match with Georgetown literally beat down and stomped American players over a disputed foul, forcing the Americans to cut the game short to beat an ignominious retreat under a hail of missiles hurled by patriotic Chinese fans. At one of Biden's speeches, Chinese officials told reporters to leave before he finished, and when American reporters objected beefy Chinese guards started shoving them around.

> Only minutes into Biden's remarks, Chinese officials had begun to direct reporters toward the exits. Most reporters and the vice president's staff objected, saying it was important to cover the entirety of Biden's opening statement, as had been the agreement between officials beforehand.
> Soon the stern shooing turned into forceful shoving. As reporters tried to stand their ground, Chinese officials locked arms and pushed forward in a show of overwhelming force. Soon enough Biden did finish, but reporters had difficulty hearing the entire thing because of the fisticuffs.
> Hours later, Biden held another meeting with the chair of the National People's Congress, Wu Bangguo. And again, Chinese officials attempted to force reporters from the room even as Biden was still speaking.
> Though there would not be the kind of physical interaction as in the earlier meeting, the vice president's staff was not pleased with their Chinese counterparts, who they felt were showing disrespect to the office and to the country.

Recently, the American press was singing the praises of Gary Locke, former governor of Washington state and Chinese-American ambassador to China, because the Chinese were impressed by the fact that he carried his own luggage at the airport. Of course, what they don't mention is that Locke is favored by Chinese in large part because of his Chinese ethnicity, which is why he probably shouldn't be the ambassador to China. Locke will be favored over other Americans, and Chinese will assume that his true allegiance and duty is to China — this is entirely normal in a civilization that simply doesn't operate on the Western premise of multiculturalism. It is also why Locke gets special treatment and praise while other Americans get beat up.

The basketball brawl was quite a spectacle. It was clearly instigated by the Chinese players, who started slapping one of the Hoyas around. This cleared the benches, and then the Chinese team and spectators proceeded to give the Americans a beatdown.

See for yourself:

This level of disrespect is far beyond the pale, and must be sanctioned by higher-ups in China, if not in word in spirit. When I lived in Beijing, there were occasionally political incidents between the US and China which the PRC government would use as an excuse to whip up nationalist, anti-American hysteria. Sometimes it would get pretty ugly. Following the bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade (allegedly by mistake) a mob tried to storm the embassy in Beijing, and another torched the US consular residence in Chengdu right about when I left in '99. But engaging in this behavior during an official visit, absent any violent provocation, is different.

China's government is facing some very serious problems, and is trying to shove blame onto the US — a common tactic over there. But given the economic situation and the mutual reliance between the US and China, this renewed acrimony does not bode well for either country. It looks like relations are set to deteriorate for some time, and the US is going to face more collection calls from the Chinese.

The Allure of Romance Draws Women Away from STEM

W.F. Price · 19 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Laura Park, an assistant professor of psychology at SUNY Buffalo, is on the verge of publishing the results from a series of research projects that explored the connection between romance and women's interest (or lack thereof) in math and science. In one study, she showed young men and women romantic images, and then surveyed their interest in STEM subjects and degrees. After viewing the images, the men were unmoved, but the women expressed less interest in math and science.

In another study, she found that when women indulged in romantic fancies, they felt happier and more attractive, but shunned their math studies:

> female undergraduates in a mathematics course were given a mobile device on which they could record their strivings and activities in various areas, including romance and academics. They might note a crush, or calling someone they liked (romantically) or various academic accomplishments (related to finishing assignments, doing well in class, etc.). Likewise they answered questions about their senses of how attractive they found themselves.
> The results: when the women were focused on romance, they felt good about themselves, but were not invested in their math class. And whenever they considered themselves attractive or desirable, the next day they would be disengaged from the math courses.

Naturally, this must be a very bad thing, because it is an obstacle to the ever-elusive goal of equality.

So who's responsible? As usual, it is society, what with those pernicious romantic "scripts" that infect young women from a young age:

> So if bright, college-aged women can easily be discouraged from interest in STEM fields, what should be done? Park said that the first thing to do is to start talking about these issues, and to make clear that talking about them is not a matter of blaming women for their choices. "This is about the cumulative impact of romantic images and scripts for women's lives" that women are exposed to from very young ages, Park said.

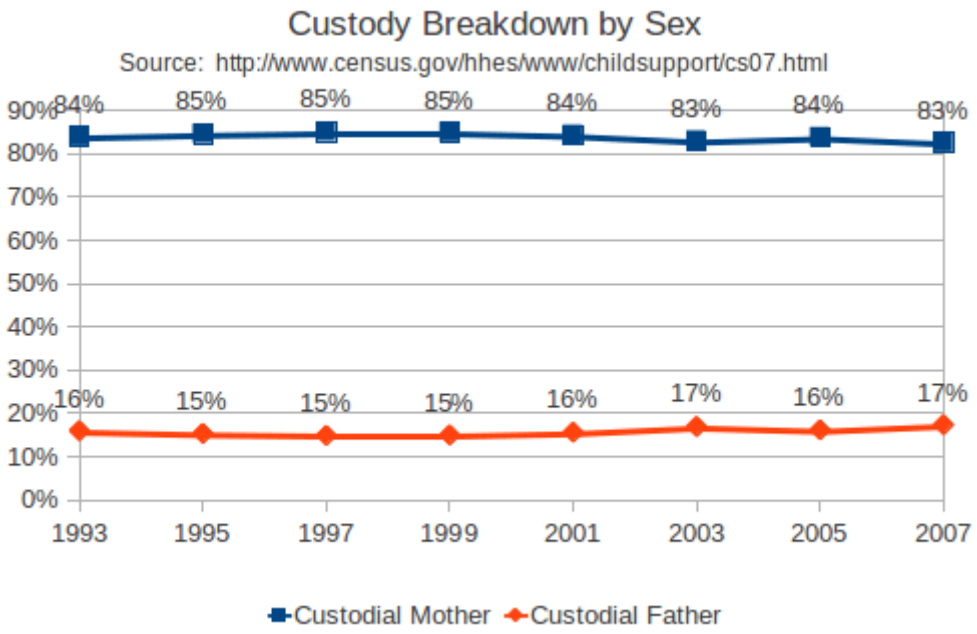
Park speculates that there are two potential solutions: one that simply reduces the possibilities for romance (sex-segregated education), or another that attempts to portray science as romantic. The first solution might actually work — if the will existed to enforce it. However, most young women are sufficiently interested in romance (with men) that they will avoid the largely lesbian women's schools, and would probably avoid college altogether if it didn't provide at least the hope of some romantic interludes.

As for the second idea, any attempts to portray science and female scientists as attractive would simply degenerate into a war between various feminist factions over what exactly constitutes "attractive."

Of course, the most humane and reasonable course of action would be to simply allow young men and women to follow their nature, and stop trying to shove them into roles they do not want. But our official ideology of absolute qualitative equality has gone so far that our social engineers really don't care what people want any longer — all that matters is that we are indistinguishable on statistical charts.

The bias against fathers in U.S. custody and child support

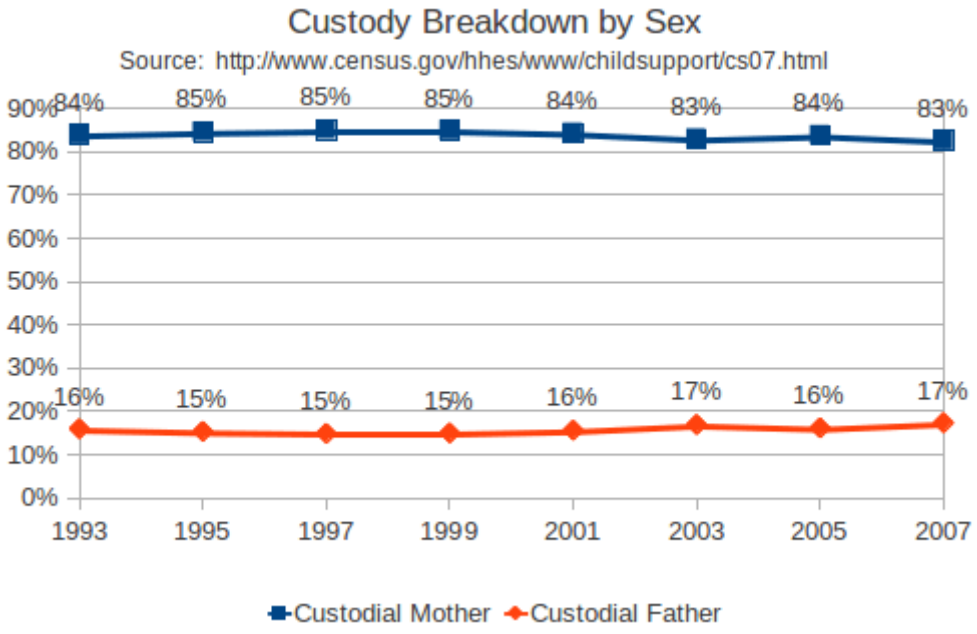
Dalrock · 22 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original



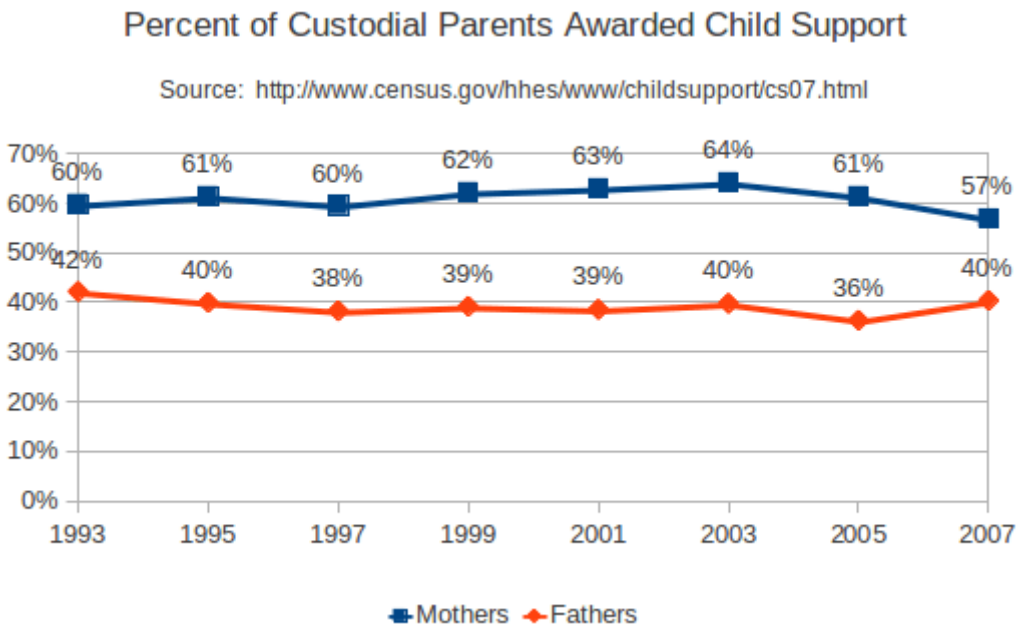
We all know the system is biased against fathers, but the actual data is important when discussing this with those who are skeptical. It can't be that bad, can it? Here is the data I pulled together from Table 1 in the latest US Census Bureau report on the topic, Custodial Mothers and Fathers and Their Child Support: 2007

All of the steps of the process are biased against men except the percentage of support due which is collected (the two are roughly equal).

It starts with who is granted custody:



For those few fathers granted custody, they are less likely than mothers who are granted custody to be awarded support:



For those few fathers who are awarded support, they are awarded less on average than mothers who are awarded support:

[image]

The percent collected is the only area where there isn't a clear bias against fathers. This looks to be a wash:

[image]

However due to the bias in the amount awarded, the average amount received by fathers (per year) is still lower:

[image]

When I shared this data on my own blog, several of the commenters were surprised at how low the average yearly support amount was. Commenter Clarence shed some light on this based on his work experience in the area*:

> I used to work as a temp (for almost a year and a half) for a child support agency in a large city. I was data entry, so pretty much every case they did in the office went through me. Now things might have changed since then, but when I left they were just getting the ability to garnish licenses. What I experienced with the data I entered was this : most of the cases were from single mothers where the father was either unemployed, part-time employed or employed at minimum wage. Such men got very low orders, somewhere around 25 dollars per week. About 30 percent of the cases were middle class or above, usually earning at least 15 an hour. These men were getting socked with child support of at least 700 per month and, most commonly, support orders of around 1400 per month.
> Yeah, that 70 percent skews the data a lot.

As a result of all of these biases against fathers, the percentage of all child support dollars paid is extremely biased. Roughly 90% of all child support dollars received are received by mothers:

[image]

Looking at the figures for 2007, it appears to me that there may be a sampling anomaly. The percentage of custodial mothers awarded support dropped by 4% between 2005 and 2007. This is 3% lower than any other year in the series. I'm not aware of any sweeping changes which occurred in this time frame, and since parents receive child support for between 18 and 21 years it seems highly unlikely that the makeup of the population would change this much in just 2 years. I'm also not sure why they don't have data beyond 2007. Since they publish this every other year they should have data out for at least 2009. Once they publish the 2009 and 2011 data we will have a better understanding of if the 2007 data shows a trend towards slightly less bias against fathers or if it was in fact a sampling error.

*Clarence's experience makes sense, as Table 2 shows that 47.6% of all custodial parents with support agreements in 2007 were on public assistance. In these cases the state is generally the recipient of the child support payment, although some states do pass $50 a month or a similar token amount on to the parent. This also shows up in the numbers, as only 27% of custodial parents who stated they were due support payments in 2007 were on public assistance. Those parents who didn't receive anything aren't included in the average figures reported by the Census, but those who received $50 are.

The Economist Suggests Western-Style Family Law as Solution to Asian Marriage Crisis

W.F. Price · 22 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In one of the most insane suggestions to appear in the press in recent years, a writer for The Economist argues that the solution to plummeting marriage rates in Asia is to introduce Western-style divorce and family law. The writer points to trends that have been ongoing in Asia for some time now as it develops, but comes to the wrong conclusion about how to solve them.

> In most of Asia, marriage is widespread and illegitimacy almost unknown. In contrast, half of marriages in some Western countries end in divorce, and half of all children are born outside wedlock. The recent riots across Britain, whose origins many believe lie in an absence of either parental guidance or filial respect, seem to underline a profound difference between East and West.
> Yet marriage is changing fast in East, South-East and South Asia, even though each region has different traditions. The changes are different from those that took place in the West in the second half of the 20th century. Divorce, though rising in some countries, remains comparatively rare. What's happening in Asia is a flight from marriage.
>
> Marriage rates are falling partly because people are postponing getting hitched. Marriage ages have risen all over the world, but the increase is particularly marked in Asia. People there now marry even later than they do in the West. The mean age of marriage in the richest places—Japan, Taiwan, South Korea and Hong Kong—has risen sharply in the past few decades, to reach 29-30 for women and 31-33 for men.
> A lot of Asians are not marrying later. They are not marrying at all. Almost a third of Japanese women in their early 30s are unmarried; probably half of those will always be. Over one-fifth of Taiwanese women in their late 30s are single; most will never marry. In some places, rates of non-marriage are especially striking: in Bangkok, 20% of 40-44-year old women are not married; in Tokyo, 21%; among university graduates of that age in Singapore, 27%…

Asian studies departments in the West have become bifurcated, with one faction following the traditional historical, political and economic course of study, and the other the anthropological, artistic, religious and, yes, gender course. The former is still a fairly comfortable place for a young man, but the latter has become the typical neo-Marxist feminist domain. The writer of this article has most likely studied anthropology in the context of Asia, which has become stuffed full of genderist garbage, and is probably a committed feminist (who else would advocate Western-style divorce as a "solution?").

According to the article, women won't marry because work is a better alternative:

> At the same time as employment makes marriage tougher for women, it offers them an alternative. More women are financially independent, so more of them can pursue a single life that may appeal more than the drudgery of a traditional marriage. More education has also contributed to the decline of marriage, because Asian women with the most education have always been the most reluctant to wed—and there are now many more highly educated women.

The author is incorrect. What we are seeing here is not women fleeing the drudgery of domestic life, but rather plain old hypergamy at work. In many parts of Asia, young women now earn more than young men. Asian women are as happy as ever to marry up, but that's becoming increasingly difficult as men no longer have an advantage as providers. In fact, in a return to tradition, Chinese women are now increasingly turning to polygamous arrangements as disparities in wealth become wider. It's better for them to share a rich man than to have a poor man all to themselves.

In addition to the marginalization of young men, property prices have gone through the roof in Asia. Young couples – especially more modern-minded ones – tend to delay marriage until they can afford a place of their own.

However, rather than address the issue of the declining status of the average male in Asian society, the author argues that the solution is to further empower women relative to men by introducing Western family law:

> Can marriage be revived in Asia? Maybe, if expectations of those roles of both sexes change; but shifting traditional attitudes is hard. Governments cannot legislate away popular prejudices. They can, though, encourage change. Relaxing divorce laws might, paradoxically, boost marriage. Women who now steer clear of wedlock might be more willing to tie the knot if they know it can be untied—not just because they can get out of the marriage if it doesn't work, but also because their freedom to leave might keep their husbands on their toes. Family law should give divorced women a more generous share of the couple's assets. Governments should also legislate to get employers to offer both maternal and paternal leave, and provide or subsidise child care. If taking on such expenses helped promote family life, it might reduce the burden on the state of looking after the old.

All one has to do to see that this arrangement won't work is take a look at what happened to marriage in the West following the implementation of these "reforms." Giving Asian women the legal upper hand over husbands would have roughly the same effect it has in the West: illegitimacy would skyrocket, and it would no longer be only women who were skeptical about marriage, but men as well. A further exacerbating factor in Asia is that prostitution is culturally tolerated to a degree unknown in the West. Men who felt that a wife was too much of a risk or bother would simply hang out with their friends and use hookers for sex. If marriage is made riskier and more expensive, the prostitution industry will grow to monstrous proportions.

If there is anything about Western society not to emulate, it is our insane divorce laws. The solution to the marriage crisis in Asia is not to legally castrate men, but rather to restructure the economy so that they have more opportunities to provide for a family. It's quite disappointing to see The Economist taking such a wrong-headed approach to this problem, but I suppose this is the result we ought to expect from our feminized universities and the vapid pundits they promote.

Let Them Be Whores: Catherine Hakim Argues for Sexual Empowerment Through Prostitution

Catherine Hakim, a Senior Research Fellow in Sociology at London School of Economics, just came out with a book titled Honey Money: The Power of Erotic Capital. Her latest work argues that women should take full advantage of the short window of opportunity during which they have significant "erotic capital" to wipe the floor with their male and elderly competition.

According to Hakim, young women have a surfeit of erotic capital, but the "patriarchy" has perniciously devalued it. She postulates that despite this enormous power wielded by young women, it is young men who seize the opportunity and go on to greatness. Christians, traditionalists – and, she says, feminists – have all conspired to devalue women's erotic capital, presumably for selfish reasons.

I haven't read the book, and probably won't, but reviewer Will Self does a fairly good job of debunking her solution, which advocates for the deregulation and proliferation of prostitution:

> by advocating that the undoubtedly existent "sex deficit" be made good with prostitution, she exposes the neoliberal calculus implicit in the very term itself. Reading Honey Money, I was reminded again and again of The Communist Manifesto: "It has resolved personal worth into exchange value, and in place of the numberless and feasible chartered freedoms, has set up that single, unconscionable freedom – Free Trade. In one word, for exploitation, veiled by religious and political illusions, naked, shameless, direct, brutal exploitation." We all know what Marx meant by "it", and it certainly wasn't some conveniently inter-sex individual.
> No, the examples of female empowerment quoted by Hakim that have real force come from traditional cultures, rather than those infected by sexually transmitted free-market "sexonomics" (another ugly coinage of hers to explain the beauteous premium). Besides, what would a society look like in which everyone exploited their own erotic capital to its fullest advantage, while ties of affection, responsibility and – dare I say it? – love, were concomitantly downgraded? Surely, among the losers would be roving mobs of poor and plug-ugly sex-starved men … Hm, plus ça change, as one of Hakim's grandes horizontales might well put it.

I'd add that prostitution doesn't work in some free-for-all market — even when legalized it requires strict supervision to prevent a host of social evils from permeating the business. Unfettered sexual competition begets violence, disease and treachery. There is a reason that the occupation of pimping is a logical outgrowth of prostitution. It may be arguably better to have the state act as pimp, but obviously there will be problems with that setup as well. For example, who trusts the police not to keep files on legal customers and occasionally indulge in blackmail?

Hakim may take a certain kind of feminist to task, but her argument is essentially what has already been embraced by third wavers and slutwalkers. Feminism in its current incarnation is more concerned with maximizing erotic capital than with equality, so no new ground is broken with this book. If anything, it is simply a gussied-up academic rendering of the depraved idea that the vagina should be the standard currency of civilized society.

Family Law Proceedings: Act II

I've been busy this morning reviewing and writing up declarations, making sure I'm adhering to the court schedule, and generally poring over the details of the current relocation case. For those who might be curious, when you are preparing a case it's a little like writing a play or a book. Actually, it's two parties writing two conflicting stories, which ultimately become one book that the judge reads.

Studying drama and fiction might be of some use to an attorney, because having an understanding of what makes one character more sympathetic than another could be very helpful in preparing a case. You might think that nailing someone on a technicality can win the case, but this doesn't seem to work in family law. Instead, what the judge will inevitably see is two flawed characters who had a flawed marriage, and what might leave the strongest impression in the long run is some pattern that, subtle at first glance, begins to take on greater weight as the story develops.

When one gains some perspective on life, it is difficult to escape the feeling that we are all merely characters in some grand drama.

Shakespeare said it best:

> All the world's a stage,
> And all the men and women merely players:
> They have their exits and their entrances;
> And one man in his time plays many parts…

The child support catastrophe

Dalrock · 24 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Child support is typically framed as state intervention on behalf of children. However, it is more accurately an alternative to marriage for women. Traditionally, women would find a man willing to formally commit to them before having children. By marrying (and staying married to) the man who would be the father of her children, women would ensure investment from the man and the provision of resources both to her and her children. Note that child support isn't needed in the traditional model, and that it isn't relevant in the case of the death of the father. Even in the case of divorce, child support isn't needed if parents share equal custody. Where child support is needed is if women want to expel the father from the household (or never bring him in). When the facade of Its for the children! is stripped away, child support is all about removing fathers from the lives of their children.

If anyone has any doubt as to the true purpose of child support, they need only look at how it is enforced in practice. In theory whichever parent can better raise the children should be given custody, and the remaining parent would then be compelled to pay child support. In practice it is almost exclusively a way for women who expelled their children's father from the home to extract money from the man. While the law is written under the guise of being gender neutral, this is a sham; the system is strongly biased towards women at nearly every step of the process. I've created a separate post to share all of the data, but here is a quick summary:

Mothers are far more likely to receive custody (over 80% of custodial parents are mothers). Those few fathers who receive custody are less likely than custodial mothers to have support awarded to them. Those fathers who have support awarded to them have less awarded on average than mothers. Due to all of the biases in the system, roughly 90% of all child support dollars are paid from fathers to mothers.

But still there are those who will claim this isn't about money, it is about the best interest of the child. They say this even though the money goes to the mother, not the child, and the mother is under no legal obligation to spend the money on the children. If it were about the best interest of the child, the system would concern itself with maintaining the child's relationship with the non custodial parent. But while the system is draconian in its enforcement of money (which almost always goes to the mother), it is generally uninterested in enforcing visitation (which almost always would be for the father). If the system were about protecting the child, it would enforce support and visitation equally. A parent who denies visitation is denying their child access to their parent. A system acting on behalf of the child would work vigorously to ensure that the child isn't denied something which money can't buy; access to and guidance from their father.

Not only does the system not take vigorous action to ensure that visitation orders are enforced, the system is designed to estrange fathers from their children. It uses draconian measures on the father while acting in the name of their children. Support is said to be based on the income of the father, but often it isn't the father's actual income which is considered. The court will often make up a figure which it assumes the father should be able to earn, and assign (impute) that income to him when setting the amount of support to be paid. W.F. Price described his own experience with this in the comments section of a recent Spearhead post:

> There is really no cap on % of income a man can be ordered to pay. Being unemployed when my ex divorced me (she demanded I indulge her and help her get the job she wanted by watching the kids, and I stupidly went along with it thinking this would be temporary and would save my marriage), I was imputed, and therefore the child support was infinity percent of my income. I was imputed at the standard earning for a man my age in Washington state, despite the fact that we were in a recession and nobody was hiring.
> There is no limit, therefore. Inability to pay is no excuse. You might as well be asking for mercy from the mob. I watched "The Departed" recently, and when one of the bookies said he didn't have the money the enforcer said "this is America — make it" after beating the crap out of him. This is exactly how fathers are treated.

Keep in mind that men can be thrown in jail for failing to make these payments. Fathers all around the country are put in jeopardy of going to prison for money they don't have, based on actions which are taken in the name of their own children. Undoubtedly the vast majority of fathers make every effort to not allow this injustice to poison their relationship with their children, since they know that their children are merely pawns being used by the child's mother and the system. However, this kind of heavy handed tactic combined frequently with denial of time with and influence over their children has to impact the relationship negatively. Not surprisingly fathers who are less cut off from their children are more likely to pay support. In 2007 the Census found that 78% of non custodial parents who had joint custody and/or visitation privileges with their children made their payments, compared to 67% for those who didn't have either (source, P9).

But the ultimate proof of what child support is all about is the end result for children. While there is a grain of truth to the old canard that divorce is caused by philandering or abusive men who either abandon or mistreat their children, the vast majority of divorces are actually requested by women. Professors Margaret F. Brinig and Douglas W. Allen set out to understand why this was in their paper "These Boots Are Made for Walking": Why Most Divorce Filers Are Women:

> Because of the financial and social hardship faced after divorce, most people assume that generally husbands have instigated divorce since the introduction of no-fault divorce. Yet women file for divorce and are often the instigators of separation, despite a deep attachment to their children and the evidence that many divorces harm children.

Here is what they found (emphasis mine):

> Our results are consistent with our hypothesis that filing behavior is driven by self-interest at the time of divorce. Individuals file for divorce when there are marital assets that may be appropriated through divorce, as in the case of leaving when they have received the benefit of educational investments such as advanced degrees. However, individuals may also file when they are being exploited within the marriage, as when the other party commits a major violation of the marriage contract, such as cruelty. Interestingly, though, cruelty amounts to only 6% of all divorce filings in Virginia. We have found that who gets the children is by far the most important component in deciding who files for divorce, particularly when there is little quarrel about property, as when the separation is long.

Keep in mind that getting custody not only determines which parent has their children ripped away from them, but that because of the child support system the children also often come with a hefty payment stream the 'winning' parent can spend however they want. The 'loser' on the other hand is compelled at risk of imprisonment to pay amounts which can exceed their actual ability to earn. While this money is extracted from them in theory on behalf of their children, it robs them of their ability to be seen as wanting to take care of their children. Fathers can't spend money on their children which the mother has already taken by force. Making this winner take all game even more lopsided, in the US the receipt of the payments is considered tax free, since the support payer must pay the income tax on it.

This system which is supposedly about the children encourages mothers to expel their children's fathers from their lives. One divorcée explains how many women think about this:

> The problem with my life, as I saw it then, was my husband, and I imagined divorce as a process that would remove him but change little else — a sort of neutron bomb that eliminated men but left the rest of the world intact.

But divorce is only one way that child support encourages women to become ~~unwed mothers~~ single parents. The direct route to unwed motherhood is to simply get knocked up without getting married. This wouldn't have guaranteed unwed mothers child support in the past. However, the rules were changed in the latter part of the 21st century, as Betsey Stevenson and Justin Wolfers explain in their paper Marriage and Divorce: Changes and their Driving Forces:

> Supreme Court rulings in the 1960s and 1970s also changed the nature of family relationships by eliminating many of the legal distinctions stemming from the marital status of a child's parents. In 1968, the Supreme Court ruling in Levy v. Louisiana (391 U.S. 68) granted equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment to "illegitimate" children. Five years later, the 1973 ruling in Gomez v. Perez (409 U.S. 535) overturned state laws exempting men from financial responsibility for "illegitimate" children. These rulings reduced both the social and economic cost to women of bearing a child out-of-wedlock…

Not surprisingly, this along with welfare payments has lead to an explosion of children being born out of wedlock. You can see the impact in the chart below from NCHS Data Brief No. 18 May 2009, Changing Patterns of Nonmarital Childbearing in the United States:

SOURCE: CDC/NCHS, National Vital Statistics System.

The 2011 Statistical Abstract of the United States provides the breakdown of out of wedlock births by race (Table 86 pdf or image) for 2007, the latest year data is available. 40% of all babies born in the US in 2007 were out of wedlock. This figure was 51% for Hispanics, 28% for whites, and 72% for blacks. The US isn't exceptional for its out of wedlock birth rates either:

[1] Latest data are for 2006.
SOURCE: CDC/NCHS, National Vital Statistics System; Stat Canada; Population Statistics of Japan; European Commission. Eurostat. Accesesed 3/11/2009.

But the direct approach to unwed motherhood isn't preferred by all would be baby mommas. Some have a strong sense of tradition, and prefer the classic approach of marrying the father and then divorcing him after the children are born. Fortunately for them child support along with biased family courts makes this nearly as easy as the direct approach. As an added bonus, they get to attend a big party held in their honor, where they (get this!) promise in front of everyone they know to stay married to the father for life. This more classic approach to baby mamma-hood is also on the rise, as you can see in Figure 1 in Marriage and Divorce: Changes and their Driving Forces.

Divorce has gone from almost unheard of to extremely common. According to the US Census 2009 SIPP data, 39% of all white women aged 50-59 had divorced at least once. This works out to 42% of all white women that age who ever married. For Hispanic women the figures are 27%&30%, and for Black women the figures are 38%&48%.

All of this action supposedly in the interest of children has resulted in millions of kids growing up with little or no access to their fathers. A small percentage of these kids are better off because of the system. They had fathers who either abandoned them or were abusive. Far more have lost something irreplaceable; the chance to grow up with both their mother and father (chart source):

For information on sampling and nonsampling error, see <www.census.gov/sipp/source.html>.

There is a huge body of research showing how detrimental this is to children. In the interest of space I'll only share one small quote from Dan Quayle Was Right (emphasis mine):

> Even for fathers who maintain regular contact, the pattern of father-child relationships changes. The sociologists Andrew Cherlin and Frank Furstenberg, who have studied broken families, write that the fathers behave more like other relatives than like parents. Rather than helping with homework or carrying out a project with their children, nonresidential fathers are likely to take the kids shopping, to the movies, or out to dinner. Instead of providing steady advice and guidance, divorced fathers become "treat" dads.
> Apparently–and paradoxically–it is the visiting relationship itself, rather than the frequency of visits, that is the real source of the problem. According to Wallerstein, the few children in the California study who reported visiting with their fathers once or twice a week over a ten-year period still felt rejected. The need to schedule a special time to be with the child, the repeated leave-takings, and the lack of connection to the child's regular, daily schedule leaves many fathers adrift, frustrated, and confused. Wallerstein calls the visiting father a parent without portfolio.

This is built into any child support scenario, and simply cannot be changed or wished away. The profoundly negative result of fatherless children is widely acknowledged, even by those who enthusiastically support the new family structure child support encourages. However, instead of blaming the process which created the problem, most now blame the very fathers who had their children ripped away from them. This is the final insult by a system which sees fathers as no more than a walking wallet. Instead of blaming the concerted social push to allow women to raise children outside of marriage, the fathers themselves are blamed for being absent! Following the London riots many have pointed out that a major cause of the out of control youths is a lack of fathers. The headline of The Telegraph reads:

London riots: Absent fathers have a lot to answer for

Unsurprisingly, Fathers Now Getting Blame for London Riots

W.F. Price · 25 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Cristina Odone, writing for The Telegraph, has taken aim at absent fathers in a piece titled "London riots: Absent fathers have a lot to answer for." As an American, I fully expected this development, and it is why I knew that trying to score a political point against feminists with the riots was doomed to failure.

Odone is something of a conservative who has been critical of efforts to portray the rioters as members of a disaffected community, but as a devotee of contemporary Christianity she cannot bring herself to view single mothers as anything but hapless victims.

One of the biggest problems men have had in Western society is that they have been sandwiched between two opposing world-views that demand contradictory roles. On the one hand, there is secular liberalism, which advocates for equality of outcome, and on the other there is the conservative Judeo-Christian point of view, which advocates for men taking greater responsibility and having authority over the family. So while the liberals will push to empower women at the expense of men, conservatives will demand that men fulfill their duty as head of household. It's a catch-22 that your average guy can't adequately cope with, and this is what's behind the increasing trend of fatherlessness.

The danger currently facing British men is that linking the riots to fatherlessness will prompt American-style child support laws, which are brutally enforced without regard to circumstances. There will be more talk about how the riots are a result of broken families and mothers on the dole, and people will start to demand that fathers step up and fulfill their responsibility. This responsibility will, naturally, be reduced to cash. Additionally, the laws will be applied evenly across the country, so men in communities that had nothing to do with the rioting will suddenly find themselves facing the same draconian laws meant to solve big city problems.

In a comment on my previous article concerning the London riots, Keyster made the point that the system we have in the US is essentially applied eugenics, and I agree. Unfortunately, it is a very harsh measure that punishes a lot of perfectly innocent people, the overwhelming majority of whom are men. There is something to be said for holding a guy who sires bastards with various women accountable, but the law is just as harsh on men whose wives simply left them to pursue some fancy. So, in practice, the US child support enforcement system punishes both cads and the merely unfortunate. Typically, the unfortunate end up paying more.

Britain will likely see calls for welfare reform emerge as a consequence of the riots, and men will have to be extra vigilant about preventing the burden of funding the legions of single mothers from falling on fathers. It will be a difficult fight, because politicians will find it both expedient and popular to blame fathers, but there are so many unmarried fathers in the UK at this point that with some effort they can be spurred to take political action to prevent this from occurring. First, they will have to argue that having an absent father is no excuse for mass criminality (the logical conclusion people draw from such an opinion is that the absent fathers are therefore the real criminals), and then they will have to demonstrate that men who have more residential time/visitation with their children offer them not only more guidance and stability, but more financial support as well.

A more humane approach to welfare reform in the UK would be to offer all single women under 40 the option of receiving cash for taking Depo-Provera shots on a quarterly basis, and providing more benefits to households where the father lives with the children than otherwise.

Jim Carrey’s “creepy” video message to Actress raises ire of feminized media

by Ken Knight

Having spent the past 20 years watching Actor/Comedian Jim Carrey’s funny antics on TV (“In Living Color”) as well as on film (“Dumb and Dumber”, “The Cable Guy” etc.) I just cannot take the man seriously at all. Arguably the most affable comedian of his time as well as over-acting extrovert, Mr. Carrey has made it to the top of his field and is one of those Hollywood cats who cannot go anywhere in the world without being recognized by a fan. Just the other day, Jim Carrey posted a video of himself professing adoration for young 22-year old Actress Emma Stone who is starring in the new film “The Help”. Being that he is a Comedian I can’t take seriously, my first impression of Jim’s video was as he says it is: a joke! But far be it for a joke by a man professing affectionate kudos to a sexy actress 26 years his junior to slip by the major media and feminist critics without a misandry-oriented slam!

“Creepy” is the term they use against Jim Carrey and his joke video aimed at a younger (but very much an adult) female actress because feminist critics and the liberal media in general eye unsolicited male affection toward women as “suspect” and would love to label it as a near-criminal act. And there lies the rub: the media and feminist critics want such behavior (even a joke) to be doused with gasoline every time it rears its head and therefore push friendly contact between men and women further apart. More especially so when a man addresses a woman without her solicitation for such attention thus making it politically-incorrect for a man (even a wealthy actor/comedian like Jim Carrey) to proposition or make intimate gestures to a woman unless she instigates it first!

The “shaming” in the articles about this “creepy video” Jim Carrey posted centers around the 26 year age difference between Jim and Emma and the “creepy” face-only video the comedian made (the media reporting this conveniently forgot that he is famous for his facial expressions and dark humor roles). Since when does anyone care about age difference as long as the two people are both consenting adults? Well it is convenient boogeyman-bullshit to throw at men in general with the famous Jim Carrey as the “creepy” example…telling the public that unsolicited kudos from a man to a woman is bad ju-ju even for someone on a Hollywood pedestal.

Now if Miss Stone had done the same video at Jim Carrey (or even Ernest Borgnine for that matter) it would not have made the news like this and been just another funny YouTube celebrity video watched by her fans nor would anyone be shamed over the “age difference” if the woman initiated the contact rather than the man. Will we see a day when even “Captain Awesome” is censured and defamed for making a pass at a woman who wants him to? Well if the millionaire Hollywood boys don’t get a pass……

Department of Ed Rewrites the Constitution, at the Expense of Men

careyroberts · 27 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

If college administrators were turning a cold shoulder to rape victims and female students were dropping out like flies, the recent Department of Education sex mandate might begin to make a little more sense.

But here we are. The once-unthinkable has become a Brave New World reality, in which a bewildered Alice quakes before an arrogant Queen proclaiming, “Sentence first — verdict afterwards.”

Let’s say you’re a student at Cal State-Monterey Bay. There, any sexual “innuendoes made at inappropriate times, perhaps in the guise of humor” can get you into trouble with university administrators. At Alabama State University, any “behavior that causes discomfort, embarrassment or emotional distress” is deemed to be harassing.

You may wonder if such vague definitions are constitutional, and indeed they are not.

In Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education, the Supreme Court ruled that only behavior that is “so severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive, and…so undermines and detracts from the victims’ education experience” can be considered to represent sexual harassment.

Nonetheless, such far-reaching concantations of student misconduct have become the norm. According to a recent survey by the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, 67% of top American colleges have enacted speech codes that are unconstitutional under First Amendment standards.

Which means if your son utters a gratuitous “son of a bitch” remark, that could land him in a load of trouble. And a professor teaching a course on 19th century erotic art could be accused of inflicting embarrassment on overly sensitive students – a concern that recently compelled the American Association of University Professors to demand the DED Office for Civil Rights withdraw the regulation.

Or let’s say a student and his new-found paramour share a celebratory glass of Pinot Noir and indulge in a frolic of consensual sex. Surprise! The Office for Civil Rights directive astonishingly dictates the woman (or man) is unable to give consent “due to the victim’s use of drugs or alcohol.”

We’re not talking about a drunken lovefest or even getting a little tipsy — the mere “use” of alcohol now renders the person a “victim.”

It gets crazier, because university disciplinary committees originally were set up to hear cases of cheating or plagiarism, not adjudicate cases involving potential criminal misconduct that arise from murky ‘he-said, she-said’ disputes.

So now it’s your day in court, so to speak. Knowing that the accusation is utterly baseless, you didn’t bother to engage an attorney to argue your case. You plan to cross-examine your former girlfriend on your own behalf.

Sorry, the Department of Education will have none of that. The delicate-as-a-wallflower victim is now deemed too distraught to answer your questions.

In the past, such cases were decided under the “clear and convincing” standard of proof, which means the lay jury needed to be about 75% sure that wrong-doing had occurred. But now, the college must comply with the “predominance of the evidence” standard, which only requires a 51% level of proof.

Fortunately, the disciplinary committee found you innocent of the charges. Now you can go back to your normal routine, hoping your classmates will stop giving you those dirty looks.

Hold on, Joe, because your ex- can still appeal the decision. Double jeopardy is prohibited under criminal law, but in the DED’s Alice in Wonderland universe, she gets a second bite at the apple.

Such Kangaroo Court proceedings do not take place in a vacuum.

Student orientation programs alert doe-eyed coeds to the looming specter of date rape. Women's studies programs hold frenzied "Take the Night" marches. Faculty members indulge in diatribes about "rape culture." And at Arizona State University, students are ominously warned to "avoid parties where males greatly outnumber females."

The effects on the falsely accused can be far-reaching. A recent Wall Street Journal editorial lamented, "Not only is he likely to be expelled, but he may well be barred from graduate or professional school and certain government agencies, suffer irreparable damage to his reputation, and still be exposed to criminal prosecution."

In short, the Department of Education DED Office for Civil Rights is working to remove the constitutionally rooted due process rights of the accused.

Fortunately, the solution is simple. We take away their money.

The Office for Civil Rights enjoys a $103 million budget, including a cushy $730,000 for employee awards and overtime. Right now Congress is searching high and low for ways to trim the federal deficit. I say we cut their budget to $50 million.

And for good measure, we'll mandate the remaining OCR employees to take a course in Constitutional Law 101.

The Problem Is Choice

Helmut Bakaitis as The Architect

I have been critical of Kay Hymowitz in the past, most recently for her "manning up" shaming language missteps, but I have to say that she did an excellent job in a recent article for the Wall Street Journal where she adeptly dismantles "pay gap" agitprop for the lies, damn lies, and statistical manipulation that it really is:

> …the 75-cent meme depends on a panoply of apple-to-orange comparisons that support a variety of feminist policy initiatives, from the Paycheck Fairness Act to universal child care, while telling us next to nothing about the well-being of women. In 2007, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, 27 percent of male full-time workers had workweeks of 41 or more hours, compared with 15 percent of female full-time workers; meanwhile, just 4 percent of full-time men worked 35 to 39 hours a week, while 12 percent of women did. Since FTYR men work more than FTYR women do, it shouldn't be surprising that the men, on average, earn more. [Also], proofers often make the claim that women earn less than men doing the exact same job. They can't possibly know that. The Labor Department's occupational categories can be so large that a woman could drive a truck through them. Among "physicians and surgeons," for example, women make only 64.2 percent of what men make. Outrageous, right? Not if you consider that there are dozens of specialties in medicine: some, like cardiac surgery, require years of extra training, grueling hours, and life-and-death procedures; others, like pediatrics, are less demanding and consequently less highly rewarded. [W]hen you control for such factors as education and hours worked, there's actually just a 5 percent pay gap. [Y]ou can't rule out discrimination. Neither can you rule out other, equally plausible explanations for the gap…for instance, it's extremely difficult to find accurate measures of work experience. [In addition], men had taken more finance courses and received better grades in those courses, while women had taken more marketing classes…women had more career interruption [and]…mothers worked fewer hours. When working mothers can, they tend to spend less time at work. That explains all those female pharmacists looking for reduced hours. It explains why female lawyers are twice as likely as men to go into public-interest law, in which hours are less brutal than in the partner track at Sullivan & Cromwell. Female medical students tell researchers that they're choosing not to become surgeons because of "lifestyle issues," which seems to be a euphemism for wanting more time with the kids.

Ms. Hymowitz is just warming up. What comes next is sure to make feminist heads explode, for Ms. Hymowitz lays the blame for the pay gap myth at the feet of women themselves and their maternal choices. Yes, she's referring to the so-called "mommy track", and claims that it's not some oppressive, omnipotent patriarchy making women shoulder all the burden at work and at home. Rather, the mommy track exists because, well, women want it that way, thank you very little. And not just in the USA, either, but in feminist paradises such as Sweden and Iceland:

> Do women want to be working more, if only the kids-and their useless husbands-would let them? And do we know that more government support would enable them to do so and close the wage gap? Actually, there is no evidence for either of these propositions. If women work fewer hours than men do, it appears to be because they want it that way. About two-thirds of the part-time workforce in the United States is female. According to a 2007 Pew Research survey, only 21 percent of working mothers with minor children want to be in the office full-time. Sixty percent say that they would prefer to work part-time, and 19 percent would like to give up their jobs altogether. For working fathers, the numbers are reversed: 72 percent want to work full-time and 12 percent part-time. In fact, women choose fewer hours-despite the resulting gap in earnings-all over the world. Feminists can object till the Singularity arrives that women are "socialized" to think that they have to be the primary parent. But after decades of feminism and Nordic engineering, the continuing female tropism toward shorter work hours suggests that that view is either false or irrelevant. Even the determined Swedes haven't been able to get women to stick around the office.

It appears that, once again, feminists have arrayed themselves in opposition to human, in this case their very own female nature, and are POed that they are losing their fight against the invisible hand of the natural world. Again. Their denial of forces beyond their control and comprehension doesn't stop there though, for the arguments about the pay gap and how women are supposedly paid less than men for doing "the same work" (a contention I demonstrate to be false here) appear to overlook one simple fact: in a free market system unperturbed by government intervention, businesses that hire more expensive labor cannot compete with ones who have cheaper labor. They either substitute capital for labor, or find cheaper/more productive labor. Putting this into the pay-gap myth dynamic, think offshoring of American jobs to China, only rather than jobs going from Detroit to Shanghai, the work flows from more expensive men to less expensive women. If it were true that women really were paid 75% of a man's wages, the economic invisible hand would ensure very few men in the country would be able to find work and there would be 100% feminine employment.

The problem, as the Architect put it, "is choice". The choice that, Simone de Beauvoir notwithstanding, women choose to make.

Book Review: Glenn Beck's "Broke"

Elusive Wapiti · 29 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: Glenn Beck's Broke[image]

The Gist: This book makes the case for the American nation's current state of moral, spiritual, and financial poverty, and suggests ways to "restore trust, truth, and treasure". It starts with the pre-revolutionary war period and chronicles the attitude of the Founders and their contemporaries toward frugality, thrift, debt, and hard work. This book accentuates its narrative through the quotes of the individuals under discussion, and a trio of quotes from the late eighteenth century well characterizes the Founders' zeitgeist as it pertains to money and governance. The first quote is from legendary classical economist Adam Smith:

> Little else is required to carry a state to the highest degree of affluence from the lowest barbarism but peace, easy taxes, and a tolerable administration of justice; all the rest being brought about by the natural course of things. All governments which thwart the natural course are unnatural and, to support themselves, are obliged to be oppressive and tyrannical

These next two quotes well characterize the Founders' attitude toward debt in particular, that is, if Jefferson's attempt at having a balanced-budget amendment weaved into the Bill of Rights wasn't signal enough:

> [debt is] an ingenious substitute for the chain and whip of the slave driver – Ambrose Bierce

Moreover, after the United States acquired a large amount of debt as a consequence of the Revolutionary War; Andrew Jackson, noting that debt was a "national curse" that destroyed individual liberty in favor of the monied and powerful elites, had this to say about the yoke the country had placed around its neck:

> My vow shall be to pay the national debt, to prevent a monied aristocracy from growing up around our administration that must bend to its views, and ultimately destroy the liberty of our country

This hostility to debt remained through the country's early history, as presidents from Jackson onward sought to drive our debt down to zero. However, at the close of the nineteenth century, the elites' attitude toward debt changed with the advent of the economic theories of Lord Keynes and debt-driven growth. These economic theories were music to the ears of a new crop of intellectuals who broke with the traditions of Classical Liberalism and favored more "State" when considering the rights of man vis-a-vis the State. Although this shift in America started during the Wilson administration, with his social gospel and big spending, big government, big welfare agenda, it was further incubated by Hoover and fully implemented under FDR. Indeed, the governing class' attitudes toward the role of government as a service provider rather than a mere guarantor of natural rights is best characterized by FDR's so-called "Second Bill of Rights". But the Great Depression wasn't enough to pressure Americans to fully accept the newly muscular State; it would take a total war for that. Enter WWII, which offered Progressives their big chance to redraw the American citizens' relationship to his government, to turn the responsibility society into the entitlement society. Beck writes:

> Before the New Deal, most Americans were strongly suspicious of federal power. The grand tradition of self-reliance, free enterprise, local control, and a strong civil society voluntarily helping neighbors in need has persisted throughout American history. While the New Deal presented a more activist government, it was WWII that fundamentally altered the relationship between the American people and their government. In order to defeat Germany and Japan, federal power expanded like never before. Washington decided what goods industry would produce, and when it would produce it. The federal government even provided Americans with ration books specifying how much meat, gasoline, sugar, and other items they could purchase. It was a scary > combination, but big business and government collaborated to run the economy for the sake of the war. After the war, some feared another depression. Instead, the American economy continued to prosper. In what journalist Robert Samuelson called the “cult of Affluence”, the American people came to take economic prosperity for granted

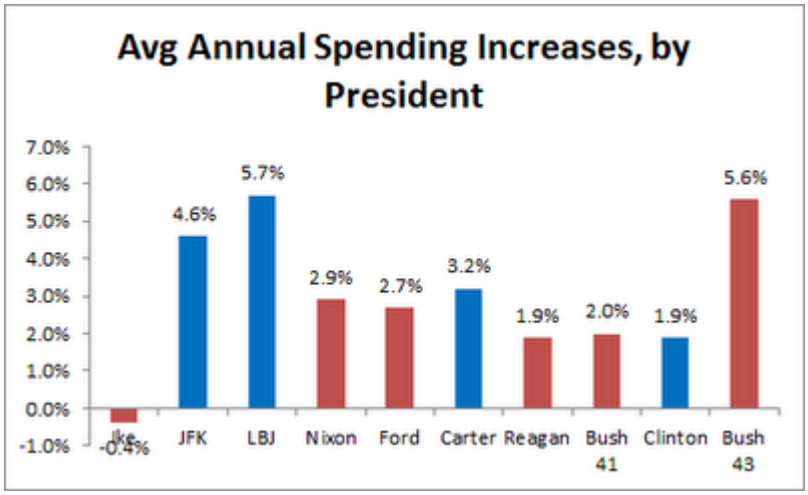
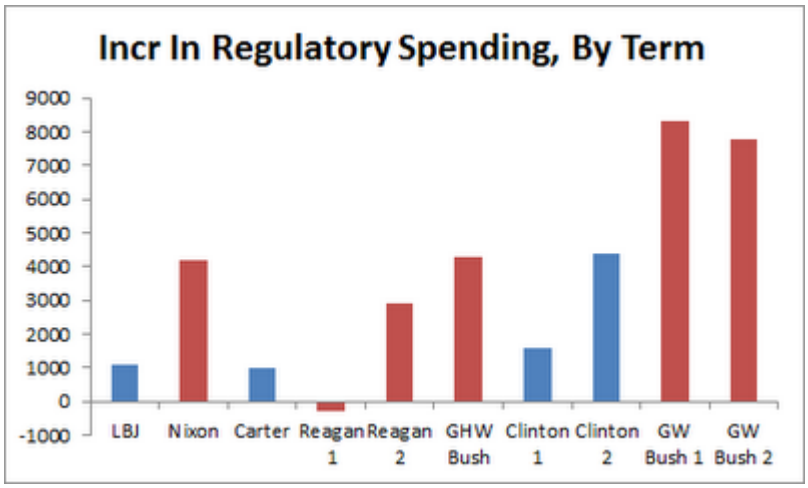
Fast-forwarding to the 60s and the 70s, Beck continues this thread of a debt-driven expansion of the State at the expense of individual liberty. His narrative now centers on Progressive presidents LBJ and Nixon; the former’s Great Society merely extended FDR’s New Deal, while the latter president completed LBJ’s reforms while cementing the deal by taking the USA off of the gold standard for good.



Beck writes how debt continued to soar under presidents Reagan, Bush, and Clinton as the elected leadership lied, broke campaign promises, or just plain succumbed to the culture of Washington corruption. Party affiliation did not seem to matter when it came to expanding the role of government and engaging in a spending spree; in fact, by most measures, Republican administrations expanded the government further and spent more profligately than did Democrat ones, particularly during the term of “compassionate conservative” GW Bush. As a result, America ran deficits in 44 of the last 50 years, and in 9 of the last 10. Total federal spending rocketed 242% in the last 40 years, while household income only climbed 29%, as Congress and the executive branch engaged in accounting trickery (“on budget”, “off budget”, and deceptively titled “pay go“) and brinksmanship and pork barrel spending (“emergency omnibus spending bills”) in their desperate attempts to keep the entitlement society running. Yet, as Beck writes, this debt-fuelled expansion cannot go on forever, if for no other reason than interest payments on the debt will triple (as a share of the budget) and quadruple (in absolute 2010 dollars) between now and 2020, choking off discretionary spending as a proportion of the budget.



After having told the sad tale of the squandering of America’s treasure and abuse of the American public’s trust on the part of her administrators, the last third of Beck’s book lays out a plan of sorts to set America back on the path.

Consisting of seven parts, Beck suggests we:

1) Return the government to the Constitutional Republic it was established to be, and re-align the concept of civil rights with the natural rights of man versus the rights government grants men

2) Return to equality of opportunity versus equality of outcome

3) Restore the role of religion in American society, particularly where religions exhort us to care for each other, rather than task government to accomplish this for us

4) Decentralize government power away from Washington, as designed by the Constitution. This will save money, enhance freedom, permit the "laboratory of democracy to function once again", and make difficult the re-distribution of wealth at the Federal level

5) Use these times of emergency and crisis to pass balanced-budget, term limits, and line-item veto amendments, as well as returning "impoundment authority" to the executive

6) Just start cutting, starting with DoE and DoEd, but also going after DoD as well, as not only is the national debt a national security issue, but a vulnerability that our adversaries seek to exploit:

> We are continuing this policy in bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy. Allah willing, and nothing is too great for Allah – Osama bin Laden

7) Replace the present redistributive and special-interest loophole-laden tax code with a flat tax.

Overall, this is one of Beck's better books, particularly in his description of how America has transformed from a society of self-reliance to one of entitlement. Recommended reading.

In court tomorrow...

W.F. Price · 29 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm headed off for a very important hearing in my children's international relocation case tomorrow morning. As usual, you never know how it's going to turn out until it's over, so the only thing to do is hope for the best and prepare for the worst.

For educational purposes, I'll let you all know what happened as soon as I'm able to do so (probably tomorrow afternoon).

Result of hearing

W.F. Price · 30 August 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Perhaps the most bizarre thing about these custody hearings is that they are so predictable. I sat down with an attorney about six weeks ago, and he told me pretty much exactly what would happen, and it did.

Fortunately, it isn't as bad as it used to be, but it's no picnic. Here in Washington, when presented with a relocation petition and revised parenting plan by a custodial parent, the non-custodial parent has a month to respond, otherwise the proposed move and accompanying parenting plan goes through.

So, the non-custodial parent has to come up with two parenting plans, one of which proposes change of custody (hardly ever granted), and another which proposes a revised plan in case the move is approved, which is likely to happen. I looked over the terrible parenting plan my ex proposed, which would have stripped me of legal custody of my kids and about 60% of my parenting time, and drew up a new one. My plan in the event of a move included much more extensive vacation time, video conferencing, continuing legal custody, and the opportunity to visit the kids when I want in Canada (which is about three hours away) plus a weekend here a month, so it all worked out to roughly the same amount of time with the kids that I have now. I basically reversed it in the event that custody would be changed.

Commissioner Leonid Ponormarchuk went down the list of factors that determine whether relocation would be permitted, then reminded everyone that there is the presumption of an approval, and proceeded to tick off which ones were pro and which con. It was essentially a wash, so presumption won the day, which I expected, although I was hoping he'd delay the move to give me some time for negotiation.

However, although I was disappointed by losing a substantial amount of leverage, the commissioner chose the parenting plan I proposed, in which I keep legal custody and roughly the same amount of time with the kids, right on the spot. Given that my proposed parenting plan prevailed, the end result will likely be that my time with the kids will be contained in more discrete blocks of time, and during the large majority of vacation days.

I can't say I'm thrilled about the outcome, but given the circumstances and the reality in family law, it wasn't half bad. Aside from the fact that my kids will be fairly far away much of the time, what bothers me most is the idea of having to drive an extra 5-10 hours a month during the school year. It could have been a lot worse; it's actually better in some ways than my current situation, in that I'll have more quality, stress-free time with the kids, and they'll have more time with the extended family here in Seattle.

Now, for those who have never been through this, here's the lesson:

If you put effort into staying with your kids and stick to your guns, you can usually do it. Yes, the deck is still stacked against men, and it's a pain in the rear, but the days of sole maternal custody and discretion are drawing to an end. Furthermore, many of the presumptions that favor mothers run up against the emerging consensus that fathers and children do, in fact, have the right to substantial time with each other, and create logistical problems that make unilateral decisions on the part of mothers less attractive — women are now having to bear some of the costs of their choices as well.

I certainly can't claim to have "won," but I didn't walk out of the courtroom feeling like I'd lost either. We've still got a lot of work to do, but finally some light is emerging at the end of the tunnel.

Sitting in on Family Law Hearings

W.F. Price · 1 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm still pretty drained from my hearing a couple days ago. These are life-changing events, and the fallout is pretty heavy stuff. However, as I sat in the courtroom, I saw a few other proceedings that were worth commenting on, and may give readers some important perspective.

Family law is messy business — not for the faint of heart. One way or another, families die, and commissioners and judges are butchers of sorts who cut the carcass into what are supposed to be salvageable pieces. If young men were forced to attend these hearings as part of their education, I think we'd see even less enthusiasm for marriage than currently exists.

In the first hearing, a man was dragged from Spokane to Seattle – some 300 miles – on short notice to attend a contempt hearing on child support. Evidently, he had been taking care of the kids himself until a month prior to the hearing, and as soon as the ex got them back she took him to court for money. The man was disheveled and tired, and asked the judge for some time to respond. He was given three weeks. Presumably, he drove five hours back to Spokane that day and began looking for the money to pay an attorney to represent him in court. Now he'll be even farther in the hole.

Next, came a young Singaporean Chinese woman, looking humble and dressed in modest, cheap clothing, represented by a seasoned lawyer. Turns out she was sitting on a Ferrari, a BMW and about a million Singapore dollars (roughly $800,000 USD), and her ex-husband wanted at least half of the value of these assets back. Problem is that she'd hidden the money very carefully, and nobody could find a trace of it. The ex-husband was demanding the sale of the cars, which she refused to do (how's a girl to get around without her Ferrari and beamer?). The lawyers for both put in long arguments in the case, but the result was inconclusive, because the commissioner ultimately said he couldn't make a decision either way until he saw the hidden assets. He ordered the woman to show where she was keeping the money, but as far as I could tell there was not much in the way of coercion involved. The ex-husband in Singapore will likely never get anywhere near half of these assets.

Perhaps most relevant to the average Spearhead reader, there was a separation hearing as well. This is the hearing that, for all intents and purposes, determines custody. In this particular case, the husband and wife had a falling out, and there had been some domestic scuffles, apparently initiated by the wife, who was clinically diagnosed with mental problems. The man, under intense pressure during the separation, had recently taken to drink. For some reason that I cannot fathom, he decided to tell his estranged wife about it, saying he'd sober up. I can only speculate that perhaps he was making some attempt at reconciliation, and thought that with some effort at a clean lifestyle they'd both be OK. Very big mistake. Naturally, her lawyer chewed him up over that, calling him an "alcoholic" and "an extremely heavy drinker" for admitting to putting away a six pack every night for a few months while under pressure from a deranged, violent wife. Needless to say, he lost custody, but in all fairness the drinking was just a convenient excuse for the court — he would have lost anyway. Where he is really screwed now is that his ex can demand that the state monitor him for compliance with various treatment programs for years, whether he had a long-term problem or not. In being open with his wife about this issue, he has now handed her a big hammer with which she can repeatedly bludgeon him as long as their children are minors.

Mine was the fourth case. Now, after reading my results from my hearing, and comparing them to the three that came before, perhaps skeptical readers can understand why I did not leave feeling that I had "lost."

For young, unattached men out there, I highly recommend a two hour visit to the local courthouse to watch what happens in there. Just knowing how it works will give men a good basis on which to make a decision about marriage and children, and a realistic idea of what to expect if things turn sour. Also, it will help them avoid the most common mistakes men make when they have to go through it themselves. Fortunately, court is public, and anyone can see these hearings for free.

Why a woman's age at time of marriage matters, and what this tells us about the apex fallacy

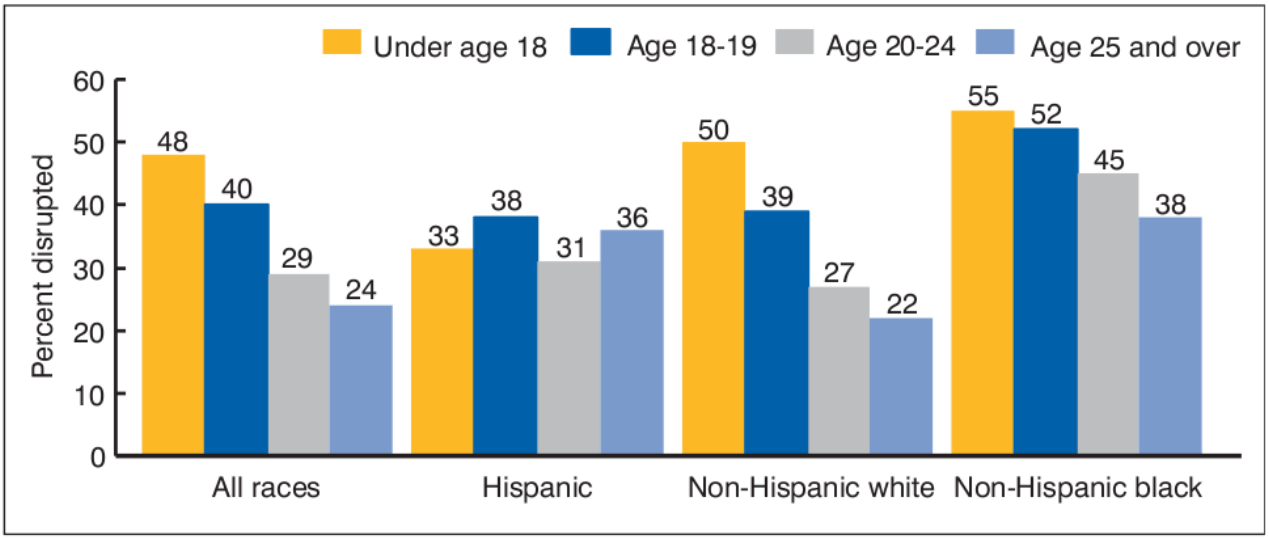

Figure 19. Probability that the first marriage breaks up within 10 years by race/ethnicity and age at the beginning of marriage: United States, 1995

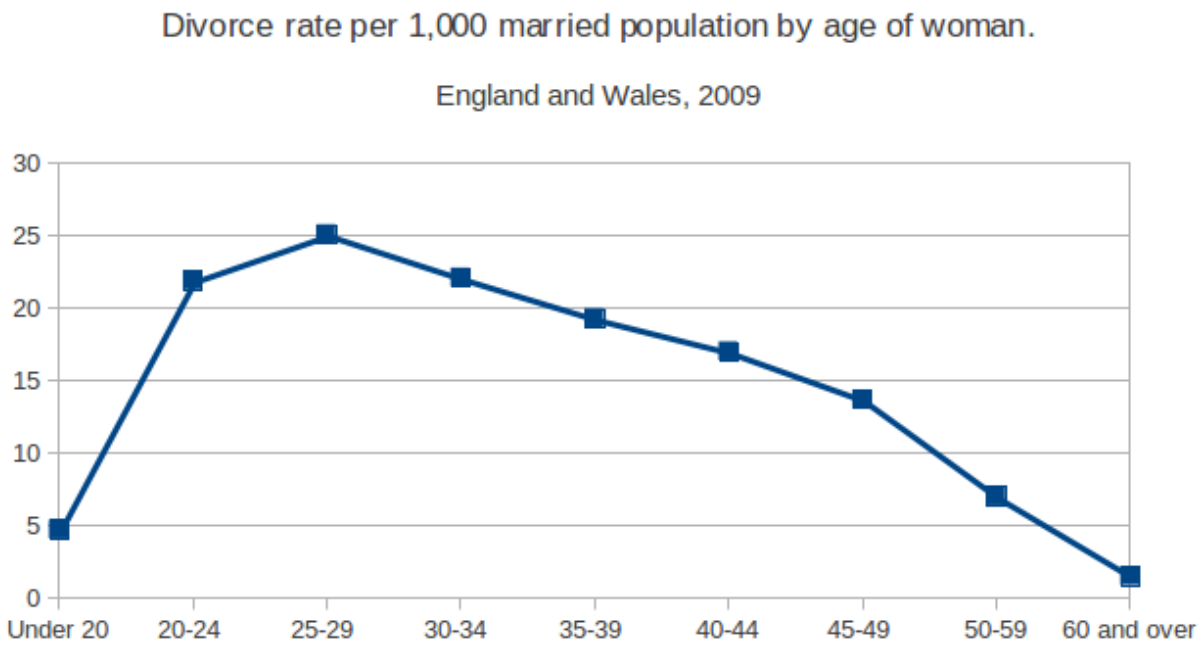
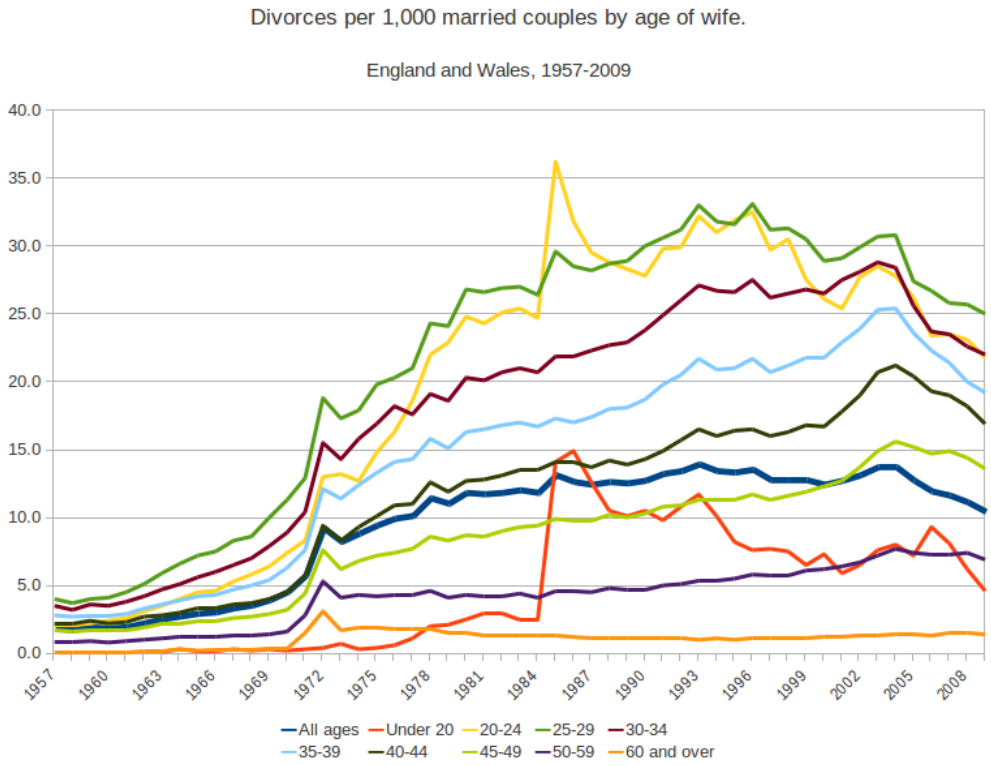
The basic relationship between a woman's age at the time of marriage and her likelihood of divorcing is fairly well known. As the chart above (source) shows, women who marry later are less likely to divorce within the first ten years of marriage than those who marry when very young. However, what is seldom discussed is why this is the case. The standard assumption is that women who wait longer are more mature, better able to pick a husband they can remain faithful to, and more ready for marriage. Also, women who attend college generally marry a bit later, and college attendance correlates strongly with IQ, which has a very strong inverse correlation with divorce. Undoubtedly there is some truth to these reasons, but there is something else very important going on. A woman's likelihood of divorcing in any given year is inversely correlated to her age. Young women in the peak of their sexual marketplace power are far more likely to divorce than older women are. The chart below demonstrates this using data from the United Kingdom's Office Of National Statistics (view table):



Note how aside from the very youngest age brackets, a woman in the UK's likelihood of divorcing correlates strongly with her perceived ability to remarry. The UK under 20 and 20-24 age brackets are perplexing, because they defy conventional wisdom on very young marriage, the US data on early marriage divorce rates, as well as expectations based on the sexual marketplace. With this in mind, I suspect that women who marry that young in the UK are bucking the trend enough that they are a much more dedicated group regarding marriage. The last chart was just a snapshot in time, but the basic effect has been remarkably stable in the UK for as far back as data is available:



Leaving aside the volatile under 20 age bracket, the lines almost never cross. The only change is that the 20-24 year old bracket has moved between being the most likely to divorce, the second most likely to divorce, and the third most likely to divorce. But the trend for women starting in their late 20s has always been the same; the older they are, the less likely they are to divorce. This has remained the case even as the age of first marriage has continued to grow. This isn't simply about divorces occurring in the very beginning of marriage. There is a much stronger pattern involved here.

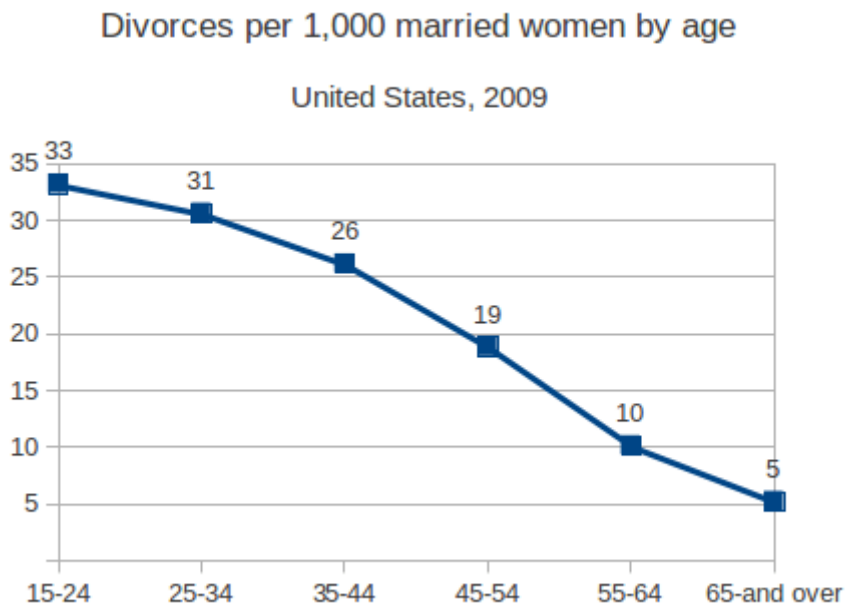
I have yet to find anyone who splits the US data out this way, but just this week I found the missing component I needed to roll my own chart:



The chart above combines data from the 2009 spreadsheet from the US Census (all races) on the percentage of women by age bracket who were married, with the data on divorces by age in 2009 from Table 2 in this recent census paper.* Notice that while US divorce rates are significantly higher than UK divorce rates across the board, the same basic pattern we saw in the UK data exists in the US data minus the unexpected behavior for younger age brackets.

Taken together, this data soundly disproves the apex fallacy regarding divorce. The common belief that divorce rates are driven by men discarding older wives for a younger model simply doesn't fit with the data. This is reinforced when you consider that the AARP found that 66% of the divorces in middle age were initiated by women (figure 2 on page 15). This fits with the historical trends of women of all ages initiating divorce, as shown in page 3 of this paper. Even in middle age women are still the ones driving divorce rates. The myth of the unloyal husband dumping his hapless wife once he feels it is to his advantage is generally just that (a myth). This won't stop women from pointing over and over again to the rare case they know of in the media or in person where this has occurred, but in the scheme of things this is clearly an outlier. Across age ranges divorce is being driven by women, and the likelihood of a couple divorcing in any given year tracks very strongly with whether the wife feels it would be to her advantage not to keep her promise.

*The specific rates for each group in the US chart may not be exact. The figures in Table 2 from the new report on the total number of women in each age bracket vary slightly from the figures in the 2009 census report. This appears to be due to the nature of the sampling they did. Also, table 2 shows slightly different numbers of women and men divorcing and marrying in the same year. This would be expected when looking at different age brackets, but not the overall figures. At any rate, the differences aren't large so the data still appears to be generally valid. Lastly, using the figures in Table 2 I calculated the overall rate of divorce per 1,000 married women in the US in 2009 at 19. This other source calculates it at 16.4 for the same year, however that report omits data from California, Georgia, Hawaii, Indiana, Louisiana, and Minnesota.

Do Mothers Want Feminist Daughters-In-Law?

W.F. Price · 3 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Having come to realize how much grandmothers care about grandchildren, I recently wondered how much women would like to have feminist women be mothers to their grandchildren.

Do women like the idea of their grandchildren's mothers being sexually liberated, careerist types who will hand the care of their children over to the fathers? Do they want them taking their children to slutwalks?

When you view feminism in these terms, it starts to look a lot less like a valid social movement and a lot more like plain old selfishness and irresponsibility. I'd even be willing to bet that women who were straight-up second wave feminists in the 1970s would be highly put off by a daughter in law who refused to do her duties as a mother.

Additionally, what mother in her right mind would want her son to marry a feminist? Unless she really hated him, I can't see the idea doing anything besides giving her chills.

Because feminism is all about "ME" it looks great to a lot of women when they come of age. But when ME comes at one's personal expense, the shine starts to wear off. Today, it comes at the expense of virtually everyone besides fertile women. This is why feminism will never become an entrenched value in society — it will fail the generational crossover test as soon as large numbers of second wavers start to have grandchildren, which is happening right about now.

Employment Game Part III: Prospecting

Featured Guest · 5 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Uncle Elmer

Amidst criticism that my previous essays were long on rant and short on practical advice, I am switching up the sequence slightly to provide some useful tips on how to find work. Also, let's make the distinction that these essays are about marketing your existing skills to find work, not about developing those skills. That is a topic worthy of its own series, and given the feminization of education and the workplace, would be a lively discussion at the Spearhead.

We are putting the cart ahead of the horse here as there a few things you need to get in place before you attempt these moves. Specifically, you need to get your sales package together and implement a continual marketing process so you can handle the interviews that will result from the actions I am about to describe. By "sales package" I mean whatever it takes to make a good impression and leave them with contact information. For some of you guys a clean pair of shoes would be a good place to start. As you grow in sophistication you can add a pair of gabardines and and executive-style hairdo. Part IV of this series will discuss developing your sales narrative, marketing materials, attire, attitude, and presentation skills. Let's assume for now that you have all that in place and are ready to not completely screw up your interviews.

A couple of things to keep in mind : developing your marketing process is a long-term activity. You need to work it continually for the rest of your days. Get the basics in place and hone the details over time. Secondly, there is the sales cycle, the time lag between prospecting and landing the work. This typically takes many months. With that in mind, you can start looking for work and preparing your marketing materials at the same time. But at the least before you begin, have a business card and capability sheet (often referred to as a "resume") prepared so if a prospect calls you or you speak to him directly, the interaction flows smoothly and you come off with some level of confidence and professionalism. The interview is the wrong time to begin practicing your salesmanship. When that happens, you will depart feeling like a chump for not having practiced just a little bit, which would have made all the difference.

Let's also talk about what doesn't work. No doubt you have seen the occasional "jobs concern" storyline, which has an opening anecdote about some poor individual who has sent out hundreds, nay, thousands of resumes and has not gotten one bite. These stories are often acommpanied by a photo of about 2,000 consternated people standing in line at a "job fair". Complimenting these essays are useless 10-point lists for finding work, identified by preposterous directives to "demonstrate your social networking skills" or 'extend your network through family and friends". The taglines for these essays often claim the author as a leading employment search expert, though from the uselessness of their information one can discern that they have not actually spent years toiling in a trade or selling their services as a consultant. Their career is selling "career advice" or "personal success coaching", along with books to sell. The generality of their advice doesn't help you see through the fog and give you tangible actions that make you fel like you're climbing out of the pit. Similar to a lot of "get rich in real estate" books.

Look, I'm just your Uncle Elmer and I'm not selling anything. We're out in the garage looking at an old motor and you just endured Elmer taking an excruciating 4 and half minutes to empty his bladder into the piss jug. He knows you guys are laughing behind his back and elbowing each other to get him to scald your ears with some ribald tales. What he has to say is non-compliant and that's why you think it's so entertaining, but there's a kernel of truth buried cynicism.

And I don't want to dump my crusty negativity on some of the women "career" bloggers out there but my gut sense is that they are short on actual decades of trench experience. The hard-boiled ladies out there who have actually started and operated businesses don't seem to be sharing their experiences. Generally you should ignore advice coming from women because it is just part of their nature to talk up insecurity and social pecking orders.

What I have seen lately are essays advising the use of social media and career link websites to look for work. This, in addition to mass resume mailings, is a shotgun approach that only dilutes the effectiveness of your marketing. The lousy feedback coupled with the high volume effort is likely to cause you to question the fulility of it all. Aesop had a fable with the moral “he who has many friends has no friends”. That applies to social media. Most older men (and that’s really who you want to target) don’t use “social media” anyway. My advice for you is to “link out”, and come up with an alternative method for finding prospects that will actually talk to you.

One other caveat. If you are enjoying long-term employment in a stable industry, or have a trade in such high demand that you don’t have to seek out work, what I have to say may be of little use to you. Whatever industry you work in though, an understanding of how the gears turn coupled with some salesmanship and presentation skills can make the difference between stagnation and self-actualization. If you’re in the habit of keeping your head down and waiting for assignments to process you may be headed for extinction.

To find work opporunities, one needs to look for signs of economic activity. Marketing is understanding the money behavior of your target industry. Just as when you are fishing you look for spots in the water where food may be concentrating and likely have fish to catch, to find work you need to spot where the money is concentrating and new work opportunities will be opening up. What I am about to tell you is a few ways, by no means all, on how to identify the money stream. I am hoping some of the readers offer their own tips. For example, I have not made much use of company business profile or industry reports, but think that could be a valuable resource so long as you don’t pay too much for it.

Let’s get started. This is the hard part and I don’t have all the answers. I will relate what has been working for me, a technocrat with many years experience, but the methods will work wherever you are in the food chain. In fact, I am addressing this essay to my 23 yo son Shemp, who is probably like a lot of younger guys on this site; limited job experience, some community college classes, frustration in finding work while observing that young women appear to have all the advantages. This essay was stalled as I tried to counsel him on how to approach a business looking for work with techniques I used 30 years ago. What Shemp tells me about his work search now is that when he shows up at some place, they say “apply online”, which sounds like a brush-off, and sure enough, he was getting no response until recently when he actually got an interview. But he describes the online processing as immensely frustrating, echoing my own experience in the past few years where I entered my data into a company jobsite and promptly got an email saying “while your qualifications are impressive…”

I no longer even attempt that approach but you may want to do it as a background task as long as you don’t put too much hopefulness in the outcome. Sometimes you will get a bite from the oddest fishing attempts and haul in the big one.

The key point for increasing your probability of getting work is that you have to make human contact with a man placed high enough in the target organization to extend you a job. You identify this man through intelligence gathering. Your primary means of gathering information is of course, your local internet. The important thing is to get in front of the guy who is able to give you work. You accomplish this by careful research and targeting, followed by an attempt to contact. Usually this gets ignored. If you develop a continual process and learn from your mistakes, eventually you are going to get a response. When I finally got it in my head that this was the only way, I made the simple goal of “one act of marketing per week”. That’s really not much effort and has paid off well, with about 51 rejections a year yet at least one contract to keep me alive. But even the rejections have expanded my network and increased my salesmanship potential.

The second thing is once you have gotten audience with a contact, you are going to give a him brief narrative of what you do and what you are looking for, while spinning it as “value added” to his business. A tough thing to pull off, all within 30 seconds before handing him your card and offering him your capability sheet, which you will have ready to fork over. The conversation may continue or he will cut you short, it’s his call. Act like a pro and minimize projecting a bullshit image. Here again, practicing a little before jumping into the stream will pay off. Be prepared, be relaxed, and conversational. When you approach him you want him to sense from your style and body language that your pitch will be short and unpressured. A positive aspect of this approach is that he has likely encountered a steady stream of job seekers which causes him to set up defensive walls from the sheer difficulty in turning people down, not to mention employment legalities he has to worry about. When you approach him as a consultant/free agent (even if you are really seeking direct employment) then the conversation is more relaxed and fluid. There will be a freer exchange of industry knowledge and ideas and possibly some new leads for you. Almost always you leave with a “maybe in the future” handshake. If he has a project in the works you have just bumped yourself up into the realm of real candidacy.

Methods

Here I have also gotten stuck while writing this essay. In no way can I write out a comprehensive list of techniques that works for everyone in all contexts. What I am about to describe works for me, based on my trade skills and industry. Take it as an example, then do the legwork for your particular situation. The basic theme is this : identify the money and players in your industry, craft an approach, execute it, review your mistakes and successes, then repeat.

For low-experience guys approaching small businesses, you may be able to get owner/proprieter info from your local online municipal data. You also may need to get to the right man through trusted low-level contacts, who often can be helpful in getting you mentioned or passing along your capability sheet. The following methods are really for more experienced guys but still have usefulness to low-end seeker in that they help identify companies that might be hiring. If they have received funding they may be looking for people at various levels. So rather than a shotgun job search approach you will narrow your search to companies that are experiencing growth or new projects. Furthermore, on the low end jobs, if they have advertised it you can be sure they have been deluged with applications. Using the following tactics can help you identify those companies before they get the ad out, giving you a huge leg up on the competition.

Though contract job ads can be a good indicator of activity at a company; even if the prime isn’t listed you can usually find our who it is with a web seatch, then find the players, then get your resume directly to him.

Blind internet search. I actually found my last string of work this way. First I crafted a customizable cover letter, capability sheet printed with professional looking header, and business card. The cover and capability sheet cast me as an independent consultant, ElmerTech Services. Also I had some envelopes printed up with my company name and address because running an envelope through your printer usually ruins it. My home address sounds like it could be a business; if yours sounds a little too suburban you might want to consider a PO box. Now the next thing was to search online for tech companies in my city with google(mytown mytrade careers) or google(mytown mytrade employment opportunities) to find local company job listings. Often these are quite old as they don’t update the sites often. Now this might find you some useful info, but you need to work up the chain a little bit and find who the head tech or engineer is, often listed somewhere else on the site. Look at their “in the news” page or “company history” page and you might find someone. Also you want to drop the “career” search and look for companies doing your trade, like “welding suppliers” or “caterers”, whatever. Anyway, after getting all the envelopes and cards printed up, the first guy I sent one to called me in to talk! But it took months to actually get work out of him. He even sent me a “sorry, we gave it to someone else letter”, then when I was overseas, sent me another one offering me the job.

Publications. Most companies in technical industries will routinely publish “white papers” and journal articles about their topic of expertise, usually some research or product development they have done. The authors of these papers often have their contact information listed. You can send the type of letter I described, or just an email (or even a phone call, if you dare) showing interest or mentioning related work you have done. Again, simply use your search engine to find publications. Very often you will only get a citation or first page, but that may be enough to get some contact data. These journal articles also provide a lot of insight into the work going on at the company, such as existing or new projects. The more you dig the more you will find. Reading the article before talking to them is also great preparation and helps you ask intelligent questions or guide the discussion.

Federal Money Spigots. After I got the job with the tech company the owner gave me quite an education in entrepreneurship. He had been working “SBIR” contracts for a number of years, and every cycle submitted several proposals. SBIR means Small Business Innovation Research, a federal program mandating that a percentage of government research dollars goes to small businesses. He lost the contract I was hired to work on, a real letdown for me after a long dry spell. So I attempted my own SBIR proposal, and damned if I didn’t win. After that I started pursuing SBIRs with a vengeance and wrote proposals for several companies. Turns out it was beginner’s luck and the game is much tighter to win than that. But anyway, for you the point is that the SBIR sites list awards given to companies, and from there, you can get a lead on new business. If they have won a Phase II award, there may be greater need for your services. Check out http://www.dodsbir.net and http://www.dodsbir.net/awards

Now there’s another source that has a lot of this kind of information, known as Federal Business Opportunities, or fedbizopp. This is the central website listing all goods and service contracts for the US government. It lists upcoming contracts to be awarded and how to submit proposals or capability statements to win them. I have written quite a few of these with a lot of feedback but little actual award. Apparently by the time it makes it to fedbizopp, the contract is already “wired” even more than a SBIR. At least with a SBIR you have a chance outside the main proposer, whereas for fedbizopp there is only one, and they usually have the inside scoop. However, it is still a great source of award information. A nice thing about their site is that you can set custom search filters and it will automatically send you emails when new contracts appear for that topic or locality. Take a look at https://www.fbo.gov and set up a “general public” account.

Networking. OK, nothing new as everyone says to do it. But you need to take your business card and put it into action.It takes time, perhaps years to build it up, the same for marketing any product. Try to look like you’re a pro and not some desperate job seeker. Join a local trade group, attend trade shows and seminars, and start talking to people. Keep it low key and do it when you have work. You are seeking industry intelligence, not job openings.

Publish. Getting something in print is a big help. If you are in a technical field you should work towards getting journal publications. If you aren’t at that level, putting together a professional looking website with some of your portfolio work is helpful. You don’t have to be a great writer, just demonstrate your work. Take photos of some of the work you are doing and put it in there. Build it up and polish it over time. Put the URL on your business card. Otherwise reduce your internet footprint and get rid of your facebook and other trash.

This is just a beginning and really only a few methods to start with. What I hope to have impressed upon you is the need to gather your own intelligence and craft an approach that will get you in front of people who can hire you. This can be painful as you will be met with no small amount of rejection, but the few successes you will enjoy provide a sense of vindication and confidence that you can pull in the work no matter the current business climate.

Social Media Star Trey Pennington Succumbs to Divorce Tactics, Kills Self

W.F. Price · 6 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Trey Pennington, a 46-year-old father of six who made a name for himself in online marketing and social media, shot himself in the stomach in a church parking lot in Greenville, SC, ending his life and shocking fans.

Trey was facing divorce, and as a father of six who was very close to his family, must have been under a tremendous amount of pressure. Information concerning the suicide is sketchy, and it appears that a restraining order may have been involved, as the suicide was precipitated by a police standoff, as is so often the case in these events.

Unfortunately, the news affiliate WYFF 4 (wyff4.com) has erased the only article describing the events, which supposedly mentioned what looks like a no-contact order.

Divorce is stressful enough without police involvement, but for fathers, the idea of armed men standing between them and their families is often too much to bear. One possible solution to these senseless tragedies would be to demilitarize the divorce process, and, rather than start off by denying fathers access to children (at gunpoint) for some period of time, guarantee them time with their children at the first ex-parte hearing. If a wife does not want to see her husband, that's fine, but the children should not be included in any such order unless he is demonstrably an imminent threat to them.

A man who loses his children suddenly and senselessly can be a very serious danger to himself; there is probably little that can guarantee a consistent trickle of tragedies more certainly than contemporary separation procedures.

Tavis Smiley and Cornel West on White Women Teachers

W.F. Price · 6 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

From the beginning of the Civil Rights Movement, the "struggles" of white women have been linked to the plight of black Americans. A little-known fact is that this was formalized by Howard Smith, a segregationist senator who opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Although the alliance has never been ideal, it worked for many years as the United States was an ascendant nation with plenty to spare for both groups. But in recent years, things have changed, and conflicts have emerged.

First, the issue of child support and welfare reform began to expose rifts, as white women scored huge victories by legally subjugating men in general, while black women found themselves cut off from government aid and their menfolk, many of whom ended up on the run or in prison as a result of the tough new laws. Additions to the 1994 crime bill (VAWA) turned men in general into a criminal class, with black men bearing the brunt of it, and the professionalization of the government workforce proved to be a huge boon to white women.

Now that the gains from the Civil Rights movement have ground to a halt, and there's little more to offer, competition between black men and white women has become a zero-sum game, and neither group can advance without it being at the expense of the other. Given that white American women have always had it better in the United States on just about every measure of well-being than any other demographic, and black men have had it worse, it would be only fair for white women to graciously give up some of the unearned gains they made by hitching themselves to the Civil Rights bandwagon. However, as anyone who has been married to one knows, that ain't ever gonna happen.

No, white women, especially of the liberal sort, are perfectly happy with their Gone with the Wind version of Civil Rights, where they manage the plantation for the "benefit" of all others.

However, it seems that the benefit is rather dubious on the face of it, and some grumbling has made it all the way from the field to the inside of the house.

Recently, I happened to be listening to NPR, and caught part of the Smiley and West show, in which Tavis Smiley and Dr. Cornell West pontificate on matters of interest to black Americans. West was in Seattle, so the show was given a prominent time slot by KUOW, and I heard it while driving around with the kids in the afternoon.

At issue was a recent incident in New Jersey in which a white, female teacher got in hot water for writing that she was teaching "future criminals" on her Facebook page. Most of her students were black and Hispanic, which is probably the only reason it made the news; many men my age and younger of any race can probably remember similar statements from female teachers (and male feminists) concerning male pupils — not all teachers are very good at concealing their opinions. Nevertheless, at least a good number of white and Asian students have fathers who are willing to stand up for them, whereas black kids are – thanks to feminist welfare policy – notably deprived in that regard.

In a rare example of black liberals criticizing their putative allies, both West and Smiley took issue with the fact that while black boys are farther behind than any other group of students, they are overwhelmingly in the charge of white females:

> Smiley: … One of the things, very quickly, that we examine in this prime time special, Too Important to Fail, again on Sept 13th, one of the things that we point out and investigate and find solutions for, Doc, is this simple statistic. The majority of kids being left behind, the group, I should say, of kids being left most behind, never mind this law Leave No Child Behind, they're all being left behind. The group being left the farthest behind are, no surprise here, young black boys. That's a reality; the numbers bear that out. We're losing most black boys in the third or fourth grade we find in this investigative report.
> But consider this, Doc. The majority of teachers in this country happen to be white women. To be exact, 83 > percent of teachers in this country are white women. What we ask in this special, does that mean that the future of black boys in America is in the hands of white women? We dig deep into that question.

> West: Interesting.
> Smiley: Black boys being left the farthest behind. Eighty-three percent of teachers white women. The future of black boys in the hands of white women. What does that mean? What are the challenges to the system, to black men becoming teachers? The tentacles shoot everywhere off of that one factoid.
> [emphasis added]

What does it mean? Well, my take on it is that it means that one of the most powerful political coalitions of American political history is coming undone, and given what a failure it's been, it's about time.

I'll try to stay tuned for "Too Important to Fail" so I can write it up. Should be an interesting show, but I'm afraid Smiley will chicken out and water it down, then go back to the old standbys. We'll see.

Too pretty to do homework!

Dalrock · 7 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

We live in a strange time. Female entitlement is rampant as a result of feminism, yet sometimes the female entitlement message runs afoul of feminists. JCPenney™ recently pulled the this shirt from its online store following a petition drive and outrage from feminists. The shirt said:

> I'm too pretty to do homework so my brother has to do it for me

The copy on the page said:

> Who has time for homework when there's a new Justin Bieber album out? She'll love this tee that's just as cute and sassy as she is.

The strange thing is this kind of I don't have to do anything because I'm a woman theme is extremely common today exactly because of feminism. Given the choice between teaching women and girls real skills and teaching them moxie, feminists chose the latter. Feminists didn't think Amelia Earhart needed to do her homework and learn how to use navigation equipment or communicate in Morse code; there were men for that. All feminists cared about was that she was cute and sassy, just like the girl the shirt is aimed at.

Man Sues University over Feminist Indoctrination

Featured Guest · 8 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Peter The Great

Most guys going to college are not aware of the feminist atmosphere and indoctrination to be found on today's college campuses.

Tom Martin, who matriculated at London School of Economics, which used to be one of the premier colleges of economics, quit after 6 weeks and is now suing the LSE.

He is asking for 50,000£ claiming breach of contract, misleading advertising, misrepresentation and breach of the Gender Equality Duty Act.

Mr. Martin, age 39, states that while attending LSE last year states the university's lecturers ignored male issues.

LSE, after an internal investigation, found (naturally) no evidence of bias.

Martin, who is representing himself in the Central London county court, said there was "systemic anti-male discrimination" and , "The core texts we had to read before each class were typically packed with anti-male discrimination and bias – heavily focusing on, exaggerating, and falsifying women's issues perspectives, whilst blaming men, to justify ignoring men's issues. There was no warning of this sexist agenda in the prospectus."

He states ""They simply refuse to acknowledge the research which contradicts the 'women good/men bad', or the 'women victims/men perpetrators' storyline.

"Science does not come into it at LSE's Gender Institute. Like a religion, the curriculum simply insists, by repetition, attempting to drum the anti-male agenda into the students."

LSE's legal team is asking that the suit be dismissed:

> The university's legal team has asked for the case to be struck out, claiming the core texts were not compulsory, merely recommended readings, and that the texts were equally available for both men and women to read, so therefore did not directly discriminate against men. The team also argues that "any discriminatory effect [against men] was plainly justifiable".

In other words, it is clearly justifiable to slander men, and be biased against them. We should applaud Mr. Martin for his laudable stand against the standard university feminist party line, and hope that his suit will proceed on its merits.

Pissing on Trey Pennington's Grave

W.F. Price · 8 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

After writing up the Trey Pennington suicide, a number of comments came through denouncing the recently deceased man, suggesting that he was a philanderer, bad guy, etc. They mainly came from South Carolina, so I think it's fair to say that some may be actual acquaintances of the man or his wife. I was denounced by some commenters for an inaccurate summary of the events (I was going on a deleted article, so the info was third-hand), but the only detail that was clearly incorrect was where he shot himself. Police told him to put down the gun, so there was a standoff. As for whether there was a no-contact order, nobody has denied or confirmed that, but one commenter said he was being painted as a monster by his ex in court, which suggests that there was. No-contact/restraining orders are routine in separations, and often applied to both parties.

The point of the write-up was that including children in a no-contact order is inhumane, and can drive men to suicide. I don't know whether that happened, but again, these orders are routine, and even when children are not specifically mentioned, a no-contact order barring the man from the residence in the absence of a parenting plan effectively cuts him off from his children. Although none of Mr. Pennington's detractors have confirmed or denied the existence of any such order, they have taken it upon themselves to smear a dead man.

Although this is an especially egregious example of the unfortunate American tendency to gang up on the abandoned husband, which is particularly common amongst the white-trash segment of society, similar stories play out across the US every single day. Wife abandons husband, gang of women immediately goes into full-on attack mode to destroy his character in the community and in court.

This is one of the most shameful and damning characteristics of the American female; there is little more disgusting than a mob of women collaborating to deliver the death blow to a family, but it happens all the time. In this instance, even the man's death was not enough to stop them. Incidentally, this is one more reason fathers should not commit suicide — they will be smeared and denounced after death by the infernal gang without any regard even for their children's feelings.

For many, many men out there, Trey Pennington's story hits very close to home. Suicidal thoughts as a result of the treatment men receive are not just common, they are typical. I ran through much the same gauntlet myself, despite the fact that it was my wife who was having an affair — not me. That didn't stop a number of women, several of whom I'd never met in my life, from denouncing me to the court. I never imagined that people would so eagerly involve themselves in another family's travails, and took pains to keep friends and family out of what I saw as a deeply private and personal matter. However, women don't tend to see it that way. This is something every man who is going through a divorce should know. While there are still decent women who will not drag a man through the mud during a divorce (e.g. Courtney Cox), for too many of them the temptation is too great, and indulgence in the basest kind of vindictive behavior is all too common.

Although one might be tempted to make the case that as social creatures, women will inevitably engage in this sort of social lynching of husbands, there is no adequate excuse. Opportunistic, gangster-type interference in other families' travails is a social evil that deserves only condemnation. Such women (and men) who engage in it are no better than a pack of feral dogs, and deserve to be treated as such.

So, if any ladies are reading this, it's nothing personal, but if you are one of those types who gets between fathers and children and husbands and wives, you are trash. Of course, this applies to the women writing comments denouncing the departed father.

WH Smith Bows to Pressure from "Sisterhood," Eliminates Women's Fiction Category

W.F. Price · 8 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Two 29-year-old British women, annoyed that the bookstore WH Smith had a section devoted to women's fiction, wrote Kate Swann, WH Smith CEO, to demand the removal of the category. They wrote that the section was too pink and fluffy, and lacking in classic authors, and therefore presumably demeaning to women.

Their appeal to the "sisterhood" paid off — Swann agreed and changed company policy:

> WH Smith is many things. Quintessentially British and comfortingly familiar. It's also the one place where you can buy – unplanned, suddenly and right here, right now at the till! – the most gigantic chocolate bar in the world for only £1. A horrific decision where either way feels like the wrong call.
> Until now, however, WH Smith has not exactly been seen as an ovary-pulverising bastion of rampant misogyny. But following an appeal by two female customers from Tonbridge, Kent, written "in sisterhood" to WH Smith's chief exec, Kate Swann, from October the store will remove all reference to "women's fiction" at points of sale.

I find it ironic that Kate Swann, a female CEO, decided to put politics before profits with so little prompting, which would suggest that women are indeed less competent in serious matters, such as classic fiction, big business, etc.

The thing is, women's fiction sells — a lot. So do the comic book, self help book and DIY book genres, each of which also has its own category. It is a perfectly logical category for the millions of British women who buy women's fiction, as well as the authors who sell it. Therefore, one would think that a complaint about such a category from a couple pedantic feminists would be "taken under advisement" at the very most rather than instantly become corporate policy.

What is happening here is that even as the "women's fiction" category is removed from the store's floor, another equally fluffy and pink one is being created in the business world: women CEOs.

Chinese Pass Reasonable Divorce Law, Feminists at NY Times Resort to Yellow Journalism

W.F. Price · 9 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Worried by the rising incidence of divorce in the Middle Kingdom, Chinese authorities passed a law preventing a divorcing spouse from seizing property obtained by the other spouse prior to marriage. The NY Times naturally took the feminist position and ran a sensationalist article suggesting that Chinese women will end up homeless as a result of the new rule.

What the Times failed to mention is that this law reflects the norm even in US family law. Even in community property states, property obtained before marriage is not generally considered community property. Nor is inheritance. In Washington state, for example, a man who purchases property before marriage can keep it, although the wife could claim half of the equity built up following the marriage. Of course, if a man buys a house after getting married, he is taking an enormous risk unless his wife is contributing equally to the mortgage, because in a divorce with children wives almost always keep the house (and men keep paying for it), but people are starting to catch on, which is one important reason young professionals do not favor homemaker wives these days, preferring instead that their wives work, too.

However, things have changed far more quickly in China than in the US. In the last twenty years the country has undergone a capitalist revolution, and modernization came about so quickly that customs and laws have not been able to keep up. In the current climate, Chinese women have leveraged their newly liberated status to the hilt, and generally refuse to marry a man who cannot provide the family with some real estate. Naturally, there will be plenty of mercenary Chinese women in a country of over a billion people, and seizing a house through divorce is a perfectly rational thing for self-interested types, which even the NY Times should concede exist in China. So, given the exploding divorce rate in China, a lot of men will be taken to the cleaners without some reform.

Therefore, Chinese authorities passed a perfectly reasonable and normal law – one that is on the books in many states in the US – and with the help of US media outlets Chinese feminists are throwing a tantrum. Here are a few choice quotes from outraged Chinese feminists:

> “Feudal society is back again. How many hundreds of years will it take before women are free again?”
> [...]
> “That’s feudalism. We smashed that already. Broke it. For them to advocate traditional family structures is a joke!”
> [...]
> “Since the new marriage law came out, the equilibrium has been shattered in countless families. This stone has caused more than a thousand waves.”

There are a couple Chinese cultural references there that I ought to explain to the Western reader. The emphasis on “feudalism” is a relic of the Communist line that China has emerged from the “old society,” in which feudal land owners oppressed the peasants, women, workers, etc. The reference to the stone causing waves draws from Buddhism, which posits that all actions cause “waves” like a stone thrown in a pond.

Chinese are very lively online, so this kind of hyperbole is quite common, and it’s more than a bit dishonest for the Times to use strident online comments as an indication of general outrage. In fact, knowing the Chinese sense of propriety, the new law is probably considered a perfectly sensible measure, especially considering that so many Chinese parents provide their children with the means to purchase property. How could it be fair for some ungrateful wench to make off with half of a house her husband’s parents helped purchase for the express purpose of assisting their son in starting a family?

Nevertheless, it does appear that entitlement feminism has gained a strong foothold in China, and despite the traditional, conservative nature of Chinese this will be a major problem for many Chinese families. Of course, the NY Times cheers this development, and provides support by painting a lurid picture of Chinese damsels in distress for domestic American consumption.

To my fellow American men, I'd like to explain that this kind of underhanded propaganda is one of the most direct causes of anti-Americanism around the world. Not only are feminists causing trouble for Chinese men with their political support of the international sisterhood; they are breeding ill-will and resentment between American men and others around the world. Of course, feminists aren't the only ones doing this, but in recent years they've become some of the most pernicious actors in this regard.

A “sensational” weapon aimed at men

By Ken Knight

Everyone remember a man named Richard Jewell? He was the Security Officer who saved an untold amount of lives after he noticed a suspicious backpack in a public area during the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta Georgia, pointing it out and getting many people away from it before the device exploded. For doing his duty, the stocky Richard Jewell was rewarded with official suspicion following a leaked FBI “profile” pointing out how males such as he would typically pull a “false flag” event such as a fire or explosion then “save the day” by stopping it (or just saving lives) to become a “hero”. Jewell was questioned, tracked, searched, and harassed by Investigators of the domestic terror incident for months leading up to the eventual determination that another man by the name of Eric Robert Rudolph was responsible for the bomb placement at Olympic Park.

Up until that point and the Justice Department’s official release that Jewell was no longer a suspect, the man was utterly roasted alive in the news media from NBC to Jay Leno who jokingly referred to the wrongly accused man as “Una-Bubba” (comparing the overweight Mr. Jewell to the Unabomber) during one late night show airings. Some of you may remember what was broadcast about Jewell at the time, reporters remarking about the fact he was single and childless as well as living with his mother at the time when he was 34 years of age, highlighting his spotty career record and “failure” to become a Police Officer up to that point which was his career goal. The “trial by media” also ran what past employers said about him, the fact he had no girlfriend at the time, his fascination with Police work, etc. etc. Simply put, Jewell was an easy target despite the fact he did nothing wrong and saved lives, something he was later commended for by the Governor of Georgia in 2006 (one year before his death from natural causes). Richard Jewell was easy media prey because: 1) He was male 2) He was single and unattractive 3) He was a “loner” 4) Investigators pinned him as the “type” to commit such a crime.

The Olympic Park bombing and the defaming of Richard Jewell happened 15 years ago before the Internet became the beast it is now and the western media became even more vicious in its defamation of men in general, the situation far worse now with “sensation” carrying the day from CNN to Joe Sixpack, Boston to Budapest, Youtube to Facebook.

What do we have now and what have we seen up to this point but anything less than blatant SHAMING of men in the news whether (or not) rightly charged with a crime, infidelity, etc. whether the man is a famous movie star or some railway worker from Pennsylvania “threatening” his ex-wife. It is “sensational” to report not the facts of each story but the juicy stuff such as some guy’s allegedly “violent” past, his poor luck with girlfriends or lack-thereof, things he said in anger, crap his “friends” say about him now that he’s in the news, and even the word of ex-wives that typically paint him in a bad light no matter what he has (or hasn’t) done. The man in the news for the slightest accusation or “suspicion” is painted with a tar brush in blatantly biased stories that would make a 1940s Nazi propagandist drool with envy. Now my friends, name one female of the species who has been treated by the modern western media in such a way…..

Ken Knight is the Author of “THE MIDNIGHT SHOW~Late Night Cable TV Guy-Flicks of the 80s” and the new zombie-apocalypse novel “DIRGE”.

Tea Party Politician Attacked for Child Support Arrears

W.F. Price · 11 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Illinois Representative Joe Walsh, a Tea Party freshman, is coming under fire from the left-wing blogosphere for owing child support. According to "Think Progress," which refers to the man as a "deadbeat," Mr. Walsh is over $100,000 in arrears.

Child support enforcement in the United States is guaranteed to create a very large population of debtors due to the inflexible nature of the system. There is literally no excuse not to pay, despite the fact that it is a debt that few men willingly expose themselves to. In fact, it is a very handy political control mechanism, as it criminalizes men simply for having had the misfortune to be left by their wives — a very common occurrence in today's climate.

When I was a naive kid, I believed leftist slogans about "social justice" and the like. The Think Progress site itself has "Justice" emblazoned on the header. However, any rational person can see that there's nothing "just" about a system that doesn't take circumstances into account and punishes fathers simply for their misfortune. It is this kind of hypocrisy that disillusioned me over the years, and led me to develop a deep distrust for the political left in the US.

Nevertheless, I think I'm relatively moderate compared to a lot of men out there. I have never signed on with the Tea Party; men of my generation tend to be a bit skeptical of mass movements, which are almost always dominated by those our parents' age, and rarely yield any benefits for us. I thought the Tea Party might be useful in providing some balance to Obama-style Democrat politics, but other than that never felt too excited about it.

But when I read about Mr. Walsh, it struck me that a great deal of the anti-government sentiment is a direct result of family law in the US. I don't know the exact numbers, but it's likely that somewhere on the order of 30 million American men have been put through the wringer by ex-wives and their state agents. That's a lot of men. Is it any wonder that a great many of them dislike – even hate – the government that put them in this position? Should anyone be surprised by this upswell of anti-government sentiment from middle America?

Governments can get away with oppressing people for a long time, but the effects are cumulative, and eventually there will be consequences. Perhaps the popularity of the Tea Party can be explained in part by the absolute disregard for American men that has become standard since the early 1980s.

Enslaved Men Freed in English Raid

W.F. Price · 12 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

24 male slaves were found in a Bedfordshire Traveller encampment living in extremely cramped and filthy conditions. Travellers are an itinerant ethnic Irish caste, also known as “tinkers” and “pavies,” who have gained something of a protected status in recent years by virtue of being disliked by majority populations, including and especially ordinary Irish. The enslaved men, mainly of English and Eastern European origin, were down on their luck when they were lured to the caravan site (essentially a trailer park) from soup kitchens with the promise of food and fair pay. When they arrived, their heads were shaved and they were deprived of contact with the outside world, then put to work for a pittance if anything at all. The freed slaves had been on the site anywhere from a few weeks to 15 years.

Evidently, people had been complaining to the police for some time, as there had been some escapes, but nothing was done for at least three years. It is thought that a number of men may have died and been buried on the site, which would be unsurprising given the poor state of health of many of the slaves.

The Traveller gang bosses were living in expansive houses, and would send their slaves as far as Scandinavia to perform manual labor.

Although this is clearly a criminal case in which the majority of the blame falls on the Traveller bosses themselves, the fact that they could get away with enslaving men – including native Englishmen – for years speaks volumes. Most criminals are opportunists who prey on the weak, vulnerable and unprotected. It seems that today, there is no group in England so disempowered as Englishmen themselves, who can expect little succour when they fall on hard times.

As countless articles are devoted to the plight of alleged female slaves half a world away, these incidents serve to remind us that many of our men, right here in our own countries, have it just as bad. Hopefully, the men will recover from their experience, but it’s likely that many will end up right back on the street when they are released from the institutions currently caring for them.

Video Game Designer Secretly Attacks Feminism

Featured Guest · 12 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Eincrou

The release of multi-platform zombie brawler Dead Island on September 6 has been contentious and controversial. The initial reason for the ire of gamers playing the PC release through the Valve Corporation's Steam content distribution system were technical problems rendering it nearly unplayable. Players also had the bizarre ability to press the "Y" key, thus allowing them to fly and pass through terrain as if they were the brain-eaters' incorporeal cousins.

The open PC platform allows for clever and resourceful consumers to investigate, modify, and fix games on their own. Gamers quickly discovered that the release distributed through Steam was in fact an incomplete development build which still had debugging tools enabled. Developer Techland acknowledged this and quickly released a Day 1 patch to remove these tools.

However, fans eager to make the game playable had not waited for the official patch. Dozens of knowledgeable gamers were already scouring the game files to find fixes to the various issues impairing their enjoyment of the game.

One gamer found some surprising code hidden within a file inside an archive named 'Data0.pak.' He posted his findings to a thread on Steam's Dead Island forum, which now now seems to have been deleted. I saw the thread when it was created on September 8, which described where the line of code was. I was able to find it in my own copy of the game by using a source code editor.

[image]

A file named "default_player_setup.scr" lists the skills of all four playable characters. Purna, a woman who is a former officer of the Sydney police department, has on line 174: "Skill("FeministWhorePurna");"

Gaming site Kotaku was able to receive comments on this line of code from both developer Techland and publisher Deep Silver.

An e-mail from Blazej Krakowiak, Techland's International Brand Manager, stated, "The line in question was something a programmer considered a private joke. The skill naturally has a completely different in-game name and the script reference was also changed."

The in-game name of the skill is Gender Wars and it allows Purna to deal additional damage to male zombies. And no — of course neither of the two male characters has an ability allowing them to deal additional damage to female zombies. The vast majority of violent video games have zero females the player can kill. Zombie games are one of the few that do, in keeping with the lore that some magic or virus has indiscriminately transformed the civilian population into undead monsters.

Krakowiak went on to say, "We deeply regret that fact and we apologize to all our customers or anyone who might have been offended by that inappropriate expression."

It's not clear who would be offended by a single line of debug code hidden within a file deep inside a compressed archive, but we can be sure of who would be offended by the Gender Wars ability as it appears front-and-center in the game itself. Listen carefully enough and you might be able to hear the wind rustling leaves. As expected, nobody even notices the irony that men should be the ones feeling offense.

Krakowiak ended his email to Kotaku with, "The person responsible for this unfortunate situation will face professional consequences for violating the professional standards and beliefs Techland stands for."

Apparently Techland's professional intentions are not only to avoid offending feminists and their sympathizers, but also to pay homage to the mythical “gender war.” Giving the skill this name plays into the fantastical notion that, in pursuit of justice and their rights, women have fought a dangerous war with men in the same manner Purna drives heavy pipes into male zombies’ heads. To the extent that there has been a war between the sexes, a woman felling a zombie in 30% fewer blows doesn’t symbolize or represent the true history at all.

A more appropriate function of the Gender Wars ability would be to have it summon a legion of supplicating white-knights and manginas to fight the zombies as she sits back and watches. Also accurate would be if, upon use, male zombies started fighting among themselves in a vain attempt to remain the last ‘man’ standing and gain Purna’s affection.

Publisher Deep Silver made it clear in their response to Kotaku that: “These unfortunate actions were of one individual… [sic]” The man (while undisclosed, it is safe to say a man is responsible) who wrote this line of code reveals his way of thinking by giving the ability this name.

Most of the other skill names in the file are not the exact titles that appear in-game. Rather, they are descriptive of their functions. This means this programmer was presented with the concept of an ability for a female character allowing her to deal extra damage to male zombies.

His thought process connected the idea of a woman hurting men to feminism; an idea that is strongly suppressed in the mainstream. The addition of “whore” could be in jest, as Krakowiak suggested, but it is also possible is that it was an intentional dissent from the common wisdom that feminism is morally unassailable.

These circumstances are certainly unprofessional from the perspective of the developer, publisher and the man who did the coding. However, this incident highlights how an arguably misandric character skill can pass without notice in a male-dominated hobby, even though it is clearly and directly linked to the object of controversy.

Athena Bodyguard Academy: Who Needs Blackwater When You've got These Ladies?

W.F. Price · 13 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Athena Academy, founded by a severe-looking Greek woman, provides training and motivation for women aspiring to join the security/mercenary industry. According to Athena's promotional video, demand for female bodyguards is growing, although it doesn't say whether that's due to affirmative action or true interest.

However, at least one world leader has made extensive use of female guards — the former Libyan dictator Muammar Gaddafi. Now, that may not have worked out all that well, but hey, you've got to start somewhere.

Athena claims to use special forces training, including American and Israeli commando techniques:

> Athena Academy helps females learn how to become professional bodyguards. Our programs are unique, challenging, and top of the line. We provide specialized training using a combination of former Special Forces and American – Israeli counter-terrorism operatives.

To be fair, Israel has long used female agents, but when it comes to outright combat, the IDF has always been an exclusively male fighting force. US special forces, too. I wonder whether women are even capable of implementing many of the special forces fighting techniques, as they often require a great deal of physical strength and speed to execute.

Athena also teaches women about security and safety, including tips on "dressing conservatively." What would the slutwalkers think of that? (It's probably OK because a woman is saying it rather than a man)

What I really wonder is whether the female bodyguards bring anything to the table that men could not. Do they also include babysitting in their services? I can see someone like Bill Gates hiring a nanny who knows how to use a 9mm, but if I felt truly threatened (and could afford it), I'd rather have these guys at my side.

Athena has provided an inspirational (and entertaining) video, which I'm sure will convince at least a few dozen little girls around the world that they want to grow up to be bodyguards:

Fall Fund Drive

W.F. Price · 13 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's time for my quarterly fund drive again, and this time it's pretty crucial. My recent court case with my ex drained my reserves, and bills are waiting — ah, the colorful life of the divorced father!

Stats are headed back up after a decline over the months I was focusing on my kids' relocation case. Quite sharply up in the last couple weeks, in fact, which just goes to show that in online publishing, like so many other things in life, you get back what you put into it. Now that I have a lot more time on my hands during the work week, the site will be brimming with content once again, and I'll have time to look for and publish a broad range of articles.

Reader support is what has kept the site alive for the last two years (that's right — The Spearhead is almost two years old). It has given me the opportunity to keep the site running and prolific — we've published over 1,500 articles. Hopefully, there will be many more, because I know that all this content has made an impact (between 1,500 and 2,000 people access the site from search engine results per day).

I greatly appreciate the support readers have provided so far, which has given me the resolve to continue publishing material on men's issues. Apparently, there is a real demand for this content, and I am happy to crank it out as long as I can afford to do so.

So, once again, thank you all for keeping the site alive and well. I look forward to publishing thousands of additional articles, and keeping men informed for years to come.

Men Biologically Respond to Fatherhood

W.F. Price · 13 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A study conducted in the Philippines has found that men respond to babies with hormonal changes, including a drop in testosterone. This suggests that like mothers, fathers are primed by a birth in the family to take on the role of parenting.

From the BBC:

> The lead investigator of the work carried out in the Philippines, Christopher Kuzawa, said: "Raising human offspring is such an effort that it is co-operative by necessity, and our study shows that human fathers are biologically wired to help with the job.
> "Fatherhood and the demands of having a newborn baby require many emotional, psychological and physical adjustments. Our study indicates that a man's biology can change substantially to help meet those demands."
> [...]
> Dr Allan Pacey, senior lecturer in andrology at the University of Sheffield, said the findings were fascinating:
> "Testosterone levels in men generally don't change that much. They can slowly decline as men get older and change in response to some medical conditions and treatment. But to see dramatic changes in response to family life is intriguing."

Humans are one of a few mammal species in which the father maintains an intimate connection with children. Without two parents, it is very difficult to raise human children, as they require enormous parental investment compared to other species. The one thing that makes us special – our high intelligence and ability to create and maintain culture – was likely made possible by paternal investment in children, because human mothers cannot raise children alone in a natural state — both are too vulnerable.

Most mammal species are featured by very low paternal investment — if any. For these animals, it is not much of a problem, because the young need only learn to walk and a few other rudimentary skills. Additionally, they mature very quickly compared to humans, so the mother can handle them by herself. For people, on the other hand, learning has almost entirely substituted for instinct, so the parenting process is very involved.

Ironically, rather than celebrate and cherish this unique human characteristic, the special bond between fathers and children is ignored, and sometimes even treated with suspicion. Public policy readily separates fathers from children, as though fathers are some vestigial organ, like the appendix. Nothing could be more shortsighted.

Perhaps authorities believe that due to socialized welfare fathers are no longer necessary, but anyone who studies outcomes in intact vs. broken families knows this is not at all true. Now, finally, we are starting to see some of the biology behind the human family. Feminists are not known for respecting biology, so they'll probably ignore mounting scientific evidence of the importance of fatherhood, but eventually the truth will prevail.

A Father Cannot Be a Mother, and He Should Not Try

W.F. Price · 14 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

From the beginning of the identity politics era, which is when women and men began to see each other as rivals, there's been a lot of one-upsmanship over parenting, and who is the more important parent. In the public sphere, women won hands-down, but this has turned out to be a disaster for the millions of children who, as a consequence, grew up in broken, fatherless homes.

Concerned men have responded to this by saying that they are every bit as good at parenting as women. Many have embraced the concept of equality, suggesting that women are no more capable of raising children than men. In a sense they are correct, as children raised by fathers seem to do better than those raised by single mothers, but they are also wrong in some regards.

Mothers and fathers are both important, but they are complementary; each has a role to play. The tragedy of the modern family is that the father's role has been overlooked, replaced by the idea that children need only mothering and material provision to be properly raised. This attitude has become so thoroughly entrenched in our culture that even men who defend fatherhood have internalized it, and often their responding argument seems to suggest that men are just as good at mothering as women.

The truth is that men, in general, make inferior mothers. Men can care for infants and small children in a pinch, but they aren't very well suited to it. Mothering comes to a man about as well as fixing cars does to most women, which is to say it's a forced task. When an infant comes into a man's family, he will feel a great deal of tenderness for the child, he will be protective of it, and he will go to work ensuring its safety. However, he doesn't understand the baby's vocalizations as well as women, the nonverbal communication eludes him, he cannot nurse, and he is usually clumsier with the details of cleaning, dressing and feeding the child. With infants and small children, emotional communication is standard, so women's tendency to think with their feelings is an advantage in dealing with them.

However, just because men don't make very good mothers does not mean that they have no role to play. In fact, it is because they are not mothers that fathers are important to children. Childhood is temporary; along with physical growth it is a time to prepare for adulthood. As children grow, they must learn to think rationally, communicate directly and navigate the physical world. Humans, as cultural beings, need to learn to do these things. Nobody has to teach a baby to cry or suckle, or even walk, but as children grow the number of things they need to learn increases exponentially, and it is up to parents to teach them.

Although encouragement and emotional support may be helpful, rational, deliberate teaching is a very different process from caring for a baby. And the best teaching is both rational and deliberate. Teaching a child to ride a bicycle, for example, involves some encouragement, but instruction is far more important. When it comes time to learn to drive, it is crucial. As adults, we take many of these tasks for granted, but for children they are significant challenges. For most of us it was our fathers, or other men in our lives, who taught us to do many of these things.

Another important role fathers play is setting a behavioral example for their children. There is little more pathetic than a young man who resorts to emotion whenever he faces a problem. Temper tantrums and physical aggression may be the norm for toddlers, but the adolescent who engages in this behavior is on the path to prison. Young men who grew up without a rational, calm male presence in their lives are handicapped in that they have not had the benefit of a good example to follow. It is therefore no surprise at all that our penal institutions are generally filled with men who grew up without father figures in their lives.

Because infants and small children relate to their mothers on an emotional level, it sets a pattern for life. This emotional bond is crucial to the well-being of infants, and to becoming an emotionally functional human being, but if it is not balanced with another kind of relationship, it can hinder maturity. This is where fathers step in, providing a refuge from the emotionally demanding and taxing relationship between mother and child. As the child approaches maturity and begins to take steps toward independence, it is indispensable. Arguably, this is good for mothers as well; without a father to step in and provide an emotional time-out, mothers will often exhaust themselves in a fruitless effort to manage their adolescent children with the same techniques they used when they were smaller.

Because of the psychological power of the mother-child bond, people tend to think of the mother as the default parent, and this has influenced public policy. Sentimentality tends to have a great deal of influence in democratic decision making, so we've enshrined the mother with child as a sort of holy, inviolate icon. This is nothing new, and examples of this thinking can be found throughout the world. Catholics venerate Mary mother of Jesus, Buddhists Kuan Yin, and the Chinese character for "good" (hao) is an ideogram of a mother with a child (left part of character woman, right part child):

So, we can see that it would be futile to try to undermine or replace the mother figure in the common mind, because it appears to be innately associated with our most basic concept of parenthood and all that is good in the world. However, this is more of a rebuke to feminist concepts than it is to the idea that fatherhood is important. The idea of the hard-driving woman who takes on a masculine role and eschews motherhood is repugnant to our deepest sense of propriety; fatherhood is not.

The question this leaves us with is what can we do to restore respect for and recognition of the importance of fatherhood? We cannot achieve this by claiming that there is no qualitative difference between mothers and fathers, because that would be a false, deceptive argument, just like the feminist claim that men and women are innately the same except for "social conditioning." Although it may be counterintuitive given contemporary politics, the best way to restore a respect for fatherhood would be to emphasize the difference between mothers and fathers. We have to reject the idea that men can and should be motherly, and instead emphasize how important it is to children that fathers be men, and provide them with those things that mothers cannot. Rather than argue that the role mothers play is overrated and easily substituted for by a man, we should concede that motherhood is unique and essential, and then point out that it precludes women from adequately taking on the father's role.

Fathers may not be able to suckle their children, and they may not be very good nannies or nurses, but women are not as good at teaching their children practical skills and to be independent adults. Perhaps a good way to put it is this:

Mothers are essential for healthy, well cared for children; fathers are essential for healthy, functional adults.

As men, we do not need to pretend that we can be mothers, nor should we want to. Our role as fathers is perfectly respectable, and our parenting is just as important over the many years of human childhood.

New Masculism / MRA Wiki

Good news for our movement: The English WikiMANNia is ready for you! Wondering what WikiMANNia is? WikiMANNia is an independent wiki (mostly in German so far) where masculists, antifeminists and men's rights activists can gather information without being censored or banned. You can find it at http://en.wikimannia.org/Main_Page (and you may want to bookmark this!). The goals of WikiMANNia are: to give anyone quick access to the most important issues regarding discrimination against men and favoritism towards women in politics, laws and society, and to offer an overview of antifeminism and the men's rights movement. It is dedicated to everyone who has to defend himself against feminist injustice, providing them with information for discussions on the web and elsewhere.

The name was chosen to avoid confusion with the Wikipedia conference Wikimania, and because in German, "man"/"the male" = "Mann". The software used is MediaWiki, the same which Wikipedia is based on – hence, no changes for the WP contributors among you. During the last two years, WikiMANNia has become one of the most important sites for German masculists, and many men's rights blogs are linking to it. May WikiMANNia gain the same importance internationally!

Our staff (including the author of this article) has spent the last month creating the first bunch of articles and making sure that there's a working structure, including help for wiki initiates. All the masculists, MRAs and antifeminists out there are cordially invited to join us. Just register yourself and create some new articles, and spoil a feminist's day!

Chicago man harassed by child support enforcement for 20 years, court knew kid wasn't his for last 10

W.F. Price · 15 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Proving that child support enforcement is an extraordinarily draconian, unfair system, a Chicago man has been subjected to state harassment for 20 years despite the court finding that he was excluded from paternity in 2001. When Sean Harbin suspected the child was not his and stopped paying support, the state began to seize his money, which prompted him to litigate over custody. He was proven by testing not to be the father, but when he showed up at court he was stonewalled by procedure. Unable to afford an attorney, Mr. Harbin would stand in front of the judge with the proof that he was not the father, but according to the Illinois Division of Child Support Services "Sean's biggest mistake was not knowing what petition to ask for. When the genetic test came back, all he had was the results. He never had the order to end the support or vacate the order."

In other words, he had proof, but that wasn't enough. It never is. This is why the term "justice" should not be associated with US family law. The system is designed to trap men in a well of debt, no matter what the circumstances. In 2009, the court suspended his driver's license. To this day, despite everyone in the Cook County court system being fully aware that he is not the father, Sean Harbin is still on the hook. This is America, folks.

If you're ever tempted to consider a feminist's position, just remember that you could be in Sean Harbin's shoes, and feminists are to blame for this state of affairs.

Dear Salon Letters

Featured Guest · 15 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

by Uncle Elmer, noted MRA humorist

Many of you are probably aware of the liberal-minded website “Salon”, which in terms of traffic, ranks about 570 in the U.S. At one time many years ago they had some pretty good journalism, the feminist overtones notwithstanding. There was a section called “Broadsheet” relegated to a corner of the website, which featured daily compilations of man’s inhumanity to women, which of course was real troll bait. Eventually Broadsheet came out of its closet and took over the entire site, which now features daily first-person women’s sex narratives, pillow-biting over obscure anti-woman outrages, and the ever popular searing confessionals to the advice column, from which issues much useful counsel from Salon’s female readership on how to handle the situation. Typical outrage themes include : American Men/Asian Women, Creepy Old Men/Young Women, Men Being Creepy in General, Men Not Taking Women Seriously, Women Underrepresented in Arts and Letters, Women Underrepresented in Industry and Finance, Fashion Trends that Exploit Women, Women of Colour and Why We’re Just Like Them, Look Out : The Cougars Are Coming, My Lesbian Wife, The Men’s Movement : Why it Will Fail (because women won’t take it seriously), Why Don’t Men Read Women’s Writing?, Why Aren’t There More Women on “Serious” Talk Shows?, Why are Women Politicians Subjected to Sexism?, The DSK Scandal : All Men are Pigs (at least all rich, White men, that is), Let’s Talk About “Sluts” Again, and on and on and on, every day.

Being a self-made troll I would stop by to offer at a contrasting viewpoint to some of these essays. My comments were always thoughtful and considerate, and never devolved into ad-honinems or all-caps directives. Of course, as a troll, bellows of “Fuck You” in response were like troll crack, and the biggest stroke I got from one reader in response to Elmer’s Law was : “Congratulations, that’s the stupidest thing I have ever read on the internet.”

At one point I asked the editors if they would be interested in paying for one of my first-person sex narratives but I never heard back from them. At least they demonstrated their open-mindedness by publishing my comments, save for the one they deleted detailing my initial encounters with my foreign-born wife in response to the “Creepy Old Men Buying Foreign Brides” outrage meme.

Then last week they ran the periodic domestic-abuse outrage meme :

Do a “Glee” star’s photos glamorize domestic abuse?

A series of controversial images ignites debate over the line between art and exploitation http://www.salon.com/entertainment/tv/feature/2011/09/06/glee_star_heather_morris_domestic_violence_photo_shoot/index.html

To which I posted :

blame women for this

As TV and media are controlled by women, this was created of women, by women, for women.

It’s women exploiting women.

Leave the men out of this.

———————-

Promptly deleted by the brave feminists of Salon. Three follow-up comments, in no way abusive, just pointing out that females are responsible for this propaganda towards further extraction of money from males, also promptly deleted. I guess they weren’t really interested in “debate” after all.

Perhaps they provided me with an epiphany. Why the hell was I doing this? Offering my genius before swine, really, only to see it trampled underfoot and forgotten. Maybe it was time to stop trolling, climb out of my mother's basement, and do something positive with my life.

But I thought perhaps the astute readers of the Spearhead would enjoy the hit parade of commentary I offered Salon, for free mind you, over the last few years. Taken in the context of their essay titles, jaded Spearheaders may get a chuckle.

So without further ado, here they are. Elmer offers his personal insight on massage, strip clubs, prostitutes, breast augmentation, masturbation, sexual harassment, domestic violence, and other topics of import to the Salon staff. Mind you, it was all in jest and I never, repeat, never engaged in these activities or would advise any young man to do so. Just wanted the Salon readers to consider alternative and possibly valid perspectives over their standard "men are scum" narratives.

Original article: I'm a nude dancer trying to finish my Ph.D.

Stripping in America is not dancing

It is a pathetic mockery of everything dancers hold sacred.

Our culture of sexual hyperstimulation and frustration of men ensures that the parking lots of porn shops and strip clubs are always full, where they endure unerotic travesties of dance as fake as the silicone bags implanted in the women's chests.

It is demeaning exploitation of men, and that is the reason you should get away from it. If dancing is in your soul, then start dancing for the joy of it and share yourself with men without the stain of money and acquisition.

Original article: How does a single father ever get laid?

advice from you, ten years on

Get another pocket pussy, if you didn't salvage the last one. The ladies will also enjoy your discreetly stashed and artfully presented realistic love toys.

Keep in mind that excessive masturbation irritates your prostate. Also switch to an alkali diet for your prostate's well-being. At your age you need to start thinking about this, and divorce can aggravate prostate difficulties.

Do not allow yourself to be manipulated and demeaned by American sexual culture. Become a man's man. Cut the ex loose from your dwelling and sexual imaginations.

Forget yoga, museums, renassaince fairs, and other such static suggestions for meeting females. Learn to dance; tango, salsa, swing, and all other forms. When you acheive dance actualization, women will approach you. Women, when exerting themselves in the close contact of dance, give off microchemicals that stimulate your corpuscles and enhance prostate function. When you are not dancing, you will have immense power over them, and they love it.

Work continually on building your man's wardrobe, as it makes your job of attracting femals much easier. Read men's work on this, R.Don Steele is a good starting point.

And yes, make the kids absolute number one in all considerations. The rest will flow from that.

Original article: Should I get my breasts enlarged?

don't do it

Sexually experienced men prefer small breasted women.

Fake breasts destroy the nipple's sexual sensations and frankly, look and feel terrible. A man wants you to enjoy the feelings you get from his mauling your breasts. Smaller breasts have more intense nipple sensations than big ones because the nerves are more concentrated.

To make a man love your breasts, enjoy and give him loud, continuous verbal feedback (moaning and groaning) whenever he touches or kisses them. His satisfaction with your breasts really depends on your true enjoyment of them.

Original article: Have I ruined my karma by sleeping with prostitutes?

ladies, can we please masturbate?

Being "allowed" to masturbate is a feminist shame-tool, whereby you may only participate through corporate approved masturbatoriums such as porn shops and stripclubs, where you can be properly monitored and controlled in order to keep you sexually frustrated and willing to open your wallet in support of western females, and by extention the corporate super-organism.

By consorting with prostitutes you are committing a subversive act against the feminarchy, as the prostitute is a free-agent and willfully gives you shame-free sex for an agreed price. The thought of an American male simply enjoying sex cannot be tolerated, thus the venomous, self-righteous insults towards you and the prostitutes that you are reading here.

Now think back dude, you were a good husband and your wife's sexuality declined while yours was still roaring with passion. So you went to a working girl and there enjoyed her feminine charms; the lingerie, the quiet, respectful talk, the touching, the acceptance, the humor, the contemplation of karma.

You felt better after this basic human interaction. Only later did you allow shame and guilt conditioning to cause you grief.

Shake it off and go back at 'em.

Original article: Have I ruined my karma by sleeping with prostitutes?

@reader

As you know, women are way ahead of us in terms of manipulation, subjecation, and exploitation. Men are only starting to awaken.

Masturbation by males is disgusting and creepy. Even a nocturnal emission triggered by dream imagery of American sweathogs is blatant objectification of women.

Whereas, like women's farts, which are petite hints of potpourri or even extreme-o free-range herbs&spices, women's masturbation is an empowering act with their bodies, themselves, where they get all in touch with their inner vaginalogue.

But masturbation is unhealthy for an older male, and he needs the soul-completing contact with a caring female, so seeking a prostitute or concubine while honoring his wife by staying married, even as her sexuality has all but vanished, is acceptable and should be pursued without stupid guilt trips imposed by absolute moralizers.

Original article: NOW: No more "massage" ads

"I don't like these unsexy and racially offensive ads because the thought of beautiful asian women cheerfully upending western sexual power structures enrages me"

In Asia, massage is everywhere, and often provides sexual services as well. Within a few hundred meters of any population there is excellent, accepted, and universally patronized massage services. During recent visits my fiance took me to massage parlors in her well-to-do neighborhood and would treat me to two pretty girls while she watched and learned. There were many female customers as well.

In China I have been to huge family-oriented massage spas where everyone gets a huge soft chair and a fabulous massage. A little off-topic, but I have had some of these masseuses correctly identify my physical conditions through my feet and hands.

In the east, sexual release through massage is widely and cheerfully available. In the states massage is anti-sex, expensive, and served up with a crystal-worshiping feminist attitude.

The only reason he is looking up his old flame(LW) is that he has returned to the dried-up men’s penal colony affectionately known as America. He is disoriented by the sexual disparities and needs some action soon.

Unless the LW is asian, she is history with this guy. He will run off with the first asian grad chick he can find, or simply return to Asia next time he gets the chance.

Original article: My fiancée attacks me because I don’t earn enough

Women at this age (26-27) feel a lot of anxiety about taking care of the marriage grail.

She is basing much of her rage on your inability to live up to the life scripts defined by her family and friends. She is more interested in pleasing them than you.

Here’s an alternate script for you : drop out of this situation, get your act together (and it sounds like you are on the right track), stabilize yourself financially, and later on, say at 35-40+, find a third-world babe who will love genuinely you as a person and act out her cultural script, which to summarize, is take to care of her man.

You will of course have to match third-world babe’s script requirements that you be a decent, caring, hard-working man. This you are programmed to do and you will thoroughly enjoy it.

Good luck.

Original article: Go to her already, Mark Sanford!

Mark Sanford is the victim in all of this

Politics aside, his behavior is just a symptom of a man driven over the edge by the feminarchy.

In a sane society, the governor would have a harem or concubines while honoring the social construct of his marriage.

As it is, he is a western male trapped by the constraints of marital expectations, to which he was only vaguely aware of when he entered that contract. In typical fashion, he remained robustly sexual while his wife became disinterested, and then had to endure increasing demands on controlling his lusts in the face of her decline.

Forget what any women are telling you now. Here’s what you do Mark, bro : get off this bus and fade into anonymity, then book a flight to a foreign land where you can swim through a thousand brothels. When you awaken on the dark side of the moon you will understand that it was not your fault.

The physical performance metrics for female soldiers are far below that for males. Men performing at the level of females would be eliminated. The very argument against female combat soldiers is written into the performance requirements.

If women were drafted into a conscript army in equal amounts and held to the same physical standards, statistically the burden of combat would fall on the men.

Original article: Clean up this Wall Street mess, woman the difference between men and women

Men create, women scheme.

Men create the institutions, structures, and technology. Women seek security and comfort.

The only thing women create are petty rules to provide security and transferrance of wealth to women.

Women are destroying the economy by feminizing man-created institutions so they can have safe, comfortable, secure jobs where someone hands them easy assignments that they can process with their feminized educational training.

No woman will risk her job for any reason. 93% of men in our feminarchy are the same. 7% of men routinely take risks and are thus the engines of creation. In earlier times 50% of men had balls; the feminarchy has effectively castrated the modern male.

A feminized organization becomes rigid and ossified, spiraling towards death in pursuit of gender fairness and opportunity for women's "careers".

The media is now fem-controlled. The spike in pundit whining and denigration of men is really just the sound of neutered males nervously trying to please their female overlord. They are manginas and traiterous to ballsy men everywhere.

The only thing women can do is kill Wall Street.

She has no case. It’s just this week’s skankwhore “I rogured a celebrity” cash grab.

This has nothing to do with Al’s politics and everything to do with extortion. All men are targets, and any celebrity or athlete had better start paying attention and taking measures to protect themselves.

As for the laughable massage services, her ribald fabrication is a good example of why a western woman cannot properly administer a massage to a man.

Massage is hard work. It takes selflessness, generosity, and a compassionate appreciation for a man’s natural need to get his dick milked. Most western females are devoid of these traits. Oh sure, you may find one that will cuff your carrot, but she’ll do it with all the zen passion of a lunch lady stirring a vat of instant potatoes.

And that brings me to another complaint : Why do all the resort photos always show a young female getting a massage, while the guy is shown swinging a golf club? It’s the damn hard-working dude that needs the massage for Wrong. Most of them just want contact with an attractive and feminine woman. For this they are exploited by the clubs and strippers and held up for scorn and ridicule by everyone else. Always with the same angle of pedestalizing the women ("working their way through school" "providing for their kids" and other lies).

We need to council these men to save their cash, travel abroad, and enjoy authentic feminine women and their charms. Perhaps there's funding for a grant or study to empower men in this direction.

Please refer to R.Dn Steele's seminal classics : "How to Date Young Women for Men Over 35″, volumes I and II.

Original article: The argument against ladies nights

it's the exploitation, stupid

Wow. A lot of angry women here.

The reason men are complaining about this is the exploitation that many of them have realized after falling for the implication that going to bars will get them laid, and then hearing feminist whining as if men, the real victims in all this, are responsible for the whole construct whereby women can leech drinks and other favors off men while refusing in the end to spread their harry laigs for a good rogurin. Or if they do spread 'em it's such a nightmare you'd be better off fukin a hole in the mud.

I mean, what're you supposed to do at a bar? Look suave, make eye contact, go over to her and try to yell something clever in her ear over the deafening music? If she's in a hen house you are guaranteed an extra dose of scorn and humiliation.

It’s not that men are stronger than women or that women’s assaults don’t hurt.

It’s that women instigate most episodes of domestic violence by ceaselessly nagging and berating their partners, and if that doesn’t get him to take a swing at her, will start pushing and slapping him until he defends himself. At that point he becomes a criminal and the mangina law services descend to remove him from the house he paid for, deprive him of his children, brand him a predator, and garnish his wages for the duration to pay the ex-wife as well as the domestic violence industry.

The marriage rate is plummeting in this country. The domestic violence industry is one of many reasons why sane men are walking away from western women in droves.

I’m a relationships expert; here’s an explanation :

Match.com publishes a bogus “study” about young men looking for marriage to attract women to its website and make money.

Original article: Men: The new romantics?

whistling past the graveyard

“Massive survey” cough cough, “women feel entitled” cough cough, “women feel independence more important” cough, hack, caphuthe.

Here’s the ugly truth : young American men are walking away from marriage in droves because it’s a bum deal for a man and they know it. No amount of shaming or trumpeting women’s superiority will turn this back. The word is getting out, and it doesn’t follow the grand theorems mandated by feminist science.

Soon to follow, another repeat essay about men being “dicks” because they are intimidated by strong, successful women (when in fact they just want to come home to a woman, not a coworker).

These b.s. studies and essays may bring you smug comfort but fact is you are not helping young women at all.

Original article: I married a gay Muslim let’s talk IMBRA you hypocrites

As this is a feminist site and feminists perpetrated the IMBRA abomination, whereby American men seeking foreign brides must submit to Draconian background checks to prove they aren’t perverts and abusers, it is hypocrisy in the extreme for you to publish this essay on blatant immigration fraud.

Men, listen up, understand IMBRA and its implications. Education will help you work around this blatant insult to your rights as an American citizen.

Original article: The Russian brides next door

IMBRA : The Big Lie

Jeanne Smoot is the policy director at the Tahirih Justice Center, and the center’s mission is to provide legal protections from abuse for immigrant women and girls. They offer direct legal services (leveraging both in-house and pro bono attorneys) as well as national public policy advocacy.

No, the center’s mission is to provide taxpayer-funded high salaries to feminist busybodies who can’t stand it that American men don’t want to offer up their testicles to the feminarchy.

Original article: The Russian brides next door

comments that don’t fit the narrative will be removed

The narrative : vulnerable foreign women are exploited and abused by the American men who bring them to the U.S. on fiance visa.

My true comment describing the strong, successful Vietnamese woman that reluctantly left her beautiful country and culture to come live in this feminist shithole to live with me, her loving and supportive husband, was promptly deleted by the dessicated man-haters of Salon. Off-narrative, not allowed.

Of course, a few weeks ago they were breathless about a “study” published by match.com proving that young men are romantic and hot for matrimony; just what the unmarriable hags who might be match.com customers want to hear.

Original article: The Russian brides next door

At Salon, the juggernaught of feminist hypocrisy spews forth

Salon at one time published fairly decent journalism. It has now descended into a fetid feminist shit-rag.

In just the past few months alone you published an essay about the virtues of “big dicks”. This was about the same time you were screeching at American men for “being dicks” because they were “intimidated by strong, succsessful women”. Not long after you had a story about that Australian news-cunt that viciously joked about her co-anchors small penis. Never mind that she probably had a big pussy, large enough to park a fleet of sausage tricks with room left over to film a bottomless cave movie.

Then it was the Lara Logan affair, in which you chastised American men for not leaping up to defend the rights of American women to dress and act however they like anywhere on the globe while trying to “do their job”. Except that being a self-promoting media whore constantly putting herself in danger to make the story about her being in danger is not a job but a gig. It’s not like she was working at the chicken processing plant or the retirement home.

Then a few days ago you were positively atwitter about Kay Hymowitz execrable screed calling American men immature babies for avoiding marriage to 30+ hags who screwed away their youth and now demand some man show up to sweep them off their feet and provide house, kids, and retirement.

Now this, trying to breathe new life into the old feminist corpse of IMBRA. When I posted my anecdote about my happy marriage to my lovely Vietnamese bride you promptly removed it.

Off-narrative essays or comments are not allowed at Salon.

Original article: The Russian brides next door

the real risk about foreign women

many of these mail order brides learn to game the system by spending maybe a year or two in the marriage and then taking half of her American husband’s assets in a divorce.

In fact, IMBRA and other initiatives such as VAWA are overt attempts by feminists to destroy American men who have the audacity to seek marital happiness with a foreign bride.

They are actively counseling foreign brides to falsely accuse their husbands of abuse in order to garnish his wages and property, obtain protected status and income from the state, and funnel still more money towards profligate feminist “careers”. This is done to the man without any evidence or due process.

Original article: Is the men’s rights movement growing?

admit this : you’re a fool more girls are more qualified. They work harder and are more disciplined, and this is the case at all levels. There needs to be a male movement of some kind that encourages young boys to seek success in the classroom and later. Men also need to hear that women still need them. Women may no longer need a breadwinner to support them, but they definitely want and need the support of a partner.”

The schools have been utterly feminized. There are very few male teachers at the primary level. Any movement to encourage young men to succeed in classrooms designed for and run by females is destined to fail, as it has so demonstrably.

If you want young boys to succeed then perhaps we should Title IX college Education curriculums to mandate 50% males, then establish quotas for men primary teachers, and while we’re at it, how about all-male schools and classrooms so that boys are provided an academic atmosphere where they can thrive and reach their potential without the dead weight of rule-following females to hold them back.

As for the partner crap, men want a wife, not a co-worker.

Original article: Is the men's rights movement growing?

Wow. Just Wow.

Wow, there are guys with some female problems here. I guess they are not getting laid."

Actually I get laid every night, as I traveled abroad and found a foreign bride. We are very happy together.

And when I posted a comment on Salon saying as much in response to an essay disparaging men who marry foreign women, it was promptly removed. Just too crazy for Salon and its fudge-packing readership.

As an older man, I face blatant discrimination in the workplace due to government mandates for promoting women. I have two young sons who also will face lifelong discrimination and I have been discussing it with them so they understand how to work around it. In no way am I counciling them to litigate their way through life, as the Womyn of Walmart are attempting to do.

Women are competing for jobs but are not creating them. Other than providing a mass market for their vanity products, they are not forging new industries or technologies. They are marginilizing that small percentage of men who passionately innovate, destroy, and create ideas and take the risks to drive them to actualization

Though men shank me and insult me, only men provide me with opportunity. Women can only insult me and deprive me of opportunity. Only men, and only a small fraction of them, take the risks that create industry and opportunity. Women can only serve as mere functionaries in man-created structures. When an organization becomes feminized, priority shifts from efficient and profitable production of goods and services to development of labyrinthine rules for the comfort and security of women. Ossification and organizational death are inevitable.

Sam Walton, a man and an entrepreneur, conceived and created Walmart, which has provided jobs to millions and good product value to countless families. The Womyn of Walmart act as if they turned down lucrative careers in other industries to give their all to Walmart, when in fact they were damn lucky that Walmart provided them opportunity in the first place. If they succeed in their bullshit lawsuit it may well be the straw that breaks the camel's back in the feminist war on American men.

This is the ultimate insult.

Instead of bellowing “asshole” at someone who has dared grab your turfspace in traffic, yell “You amateur!”

The look on their face is priceless. Usually they are momentarily stunned and by the time they figure out that you insulted them, you are long gone.

As for “slut”, you dumb cunts aren’t reclaiming anything. You’re pushing the envelope of female histrionics while normal humans have to deal with the aftermath of sweeping cultural feminization.

You can’t even get your marketing message straight. The slutwalker’s message seems confused as they carry densely-written placards while exposing their cellulite to an uninterested public. I’m not Jewish

But I left my sons Shemp and Hermann intact.

I know as a young child I mourned the loss of my foreskin before I even knew what circumcision was. Found out later when I was reading a “Life” magazine book showing a bunch of robed guys crowded around “performing a cicumcision”. I ast my dad, what’s circumcision? When he told me I ast, Why? He said, “don’t need it.”

Later when my first son was born my mom called my uncircumcised brother to have him pressure me into getting my newborn circumcised. He called me. We talked about fishing and backpacking, but not about circumcision.

I was telling Hremann how cruel it was to hack off part of a little guy’s genitals at birth and how I made sure it didn’t happen to them.

He was silent for awhile, then said quietly “Thanks for not circumcising me.”

I said I was thinking of converting to Judaism for the business contacts and he would have to get circumcised.

He said “No thanks.”

Original article: Are “sugar-daddies” really johns?

another side to this is the exploitation of men

Countless men have financed their girlfriend’s college tuition only to get dumped when she acquires her diploma.

And in less sexually repressed culture, it is common and accepted for young women to provide sexual services to older men in exchange for money. The Japanese practice of enjo kasai being one example. In China it is not unusual to see a very young women with a retired older gentleman and nobody cares.

So tiresome to hear feminists and gay-marriage advocates try to shame older hetero men seeking to enjoy younger females, as if that was perverse and immoral.

As for “trophy wives”, for a western woman, her husband is a trophy if ever there was one. And an older man just wants to enjoy a younger female. Not so much “a trophy” as just something he deserves without having to answer to anyone else’s objections.

It’s junk science. You did not even post a link to the bullshit “studies”, which are no doubt penned by some matriculating fine-arts or psych majors.

PUA tactics work on a tiny fraction of bar skanks and are useless to the majority of men who do not spend their time in bar-holes.

And once again you are making sweeping conclusions to the effect that women who go for pickups are “sexist”, thus stupid cunts in betrayal of the sisterhood.

R.Don Steele in his seminal “How to Date Young Women for Men Over 35, Volumes I and II” exploded the PUA scam twenty years ago. It only lives on because the internet provides a vast audience of dupes who still think bars are the place to meet women.

On the plus side though these guys at least get some training in chick psychology, which can be played to advantage when they mature towards more effective fishing techniques.

But the goofy hats and other contrivances are just retarded. A pair of gabardines, clean matching shoes and belt, an executive-style hairdo, and one or two glittery but refined accessories are all it takes to get the women stampeding like crazed bovines in your direction. “Dress for Success” by John Malloy is a good place to start for all you young bucks still wearing stupid graphic-tees and cargo pants.

Original article: How sexists find love

I never bought drinks for chicks

Who’s bitter and angry here? The women who are so hostile and disdainful of men applying techniques of persuasion towards getting laid, that’s who.

The whole psychology of western women is wrapped up in packaging for male attention and subsequent ego-stroking. There exists a gigantic industry, staffed and promoted by females, vying for market share to offer them advice and products towards that end. That a few books and websites exist to offer a contrary view for men struggling to plumb the shallow depths of modern female psychology is enough to send women into paroxyms of rage and shaming in an attempt to shut them down.

The pros know how it works.

So begins this ribald tale of self-discovery…

Original article: Is marriage for white people?

Black Men would agree with me

No white feminist can offer anything to a Brother other than to act as a receptacle for his baser intentions.

Virtually all feminist writings at some point try to make a false link between the struggles of white suburban females with that of Black Folks (whom they refer to as "people of colour").

If they truly cared about the plight of the Black Man they would resign from their government-sponsored nonjobs so that Black men could fill the void and have a seat at the table. This would enable many of them to support a traditional family rather than the typical funneling of tax dollars to lesbian marriage or cat husbandry.

Organization Pushes Feminist, Gay Oil

W.F. Price · 15 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

"Ethical Oil" is an organization that is pushing people to buy oil from feminist/liberal countries rather than countries with different value systems. A quick glance at the website indicates that the oil the organization is promoting is largely that derived from the Athabascan oil sands, a vast deposit of heavy crude mixed in with soil in western Canada. The oil sands comprise one of the world's largest reservoirs of oil, but there is a catch: the crude must be mined and separated from the sand and clay before it can be sent to the refinery, unlike the light sweet crudes of Arabia. This is a huge industrial undertaking, requiring some of the world's heaviest machinery and a great deal of energy which, necessarily, creates a lot of pollution.

Because of the dirty nature of the extraction process, a lot of environmentalists are opposed to mining this oil, and political resistance is growing. Apparently, someone figured that the solution would be to market this oil as feminist and homosexual oil, which morally elevates it above sexist (Muslim) and chauvinist (South American) oil.

Here's what Ethical Oil has to say about itself:

> EthicalOil.org encourages people, businesses and governments to choose Ethical Oil from Canada, its oil sands and other liberal democracies. Unlike Conflict Oil from some of the world's most politically oppressive and environmentally reckless regimes, Ethical Oil is the "Fair Trade" choice in oil.
> Countries that produce Ethical Oil protect the rights of women, workers, indigenous peoples and other minorities including gays and lesbians. Conflict Oil regimes, by contrast, oppress their citizens and operate in secret with no accountability to voters, the press or independent judiciaries…

In an ad condemning sexist oil, ethical oil condemns Saudi sexism, saying we have to choose Canada's oil, because unlike Western women, Saudi women are not allowed to drive around town and disobey their husbands:

I'm sure their motives are pure, and profit has absolutely nothing to do with this political ad…

Australian child welfare program placing boys with lesbian gender-benders

W.F. Price · 16 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

After a couple lesbians dressed up a six-year-old male foster child in girls' clothing and posted pictures of him on Facebook, questions have arisen in New South Wales about how the decision was made to place the child with this family. The two lesbians were selected by Barnardo's Find a Family program, which placed both the boy and a girl with the women. When initially placed, the boy was 3 and the girl 12. The girl soon expressed displeasure with the arrangement, and was removed from their care, but the three-year-old boy was too small to advocate for himself either way, so he stayed.

A psychologist who investigated the "family" reported to the court:

> Overall, [names not published] impressed as a young couple who have had quite a turbulent period through the course of Campbell's placement. This period has included a separation and reconciliation, ongoing difficulties with Abby resulting in a subsequent breakdown of her placement, a large wedding and honeymoon, fertility treatment and preparation for gender transformation for [name not published], as well as a current house move."

So Barnardo's placed the boy with a tranny… I know it's fashionable these days to advocate for transsexual rights, but transsexuals are not normal people. They are far from ideal parents. People who cannot accept their natural sex have a mental illness, no matter what the weirdo gender theorists say. Furthermore, lesbians are very questionable as mothers of boys. Many of them have deep-seated problems with the entire male sex, and this can easily translate to problems with boys.

All else being equal, a three-year-old boy is far better off with a normal single man than he is with a couple lesbians.

But today, both contempt for fatherhood and idiotic political correctness have combined to create the kind of situation where a couple of unstable, mentally ill lesbians are given equal consideration in adoption. Additionally, perhaps misandry has given the people at Barnardo's an excuse to not worry about placing a little boy in a situation with a high potential for abuse.

The responsibility for this lies largely on the shoulders of a few strange, family-hating academics and activists, who still cling to the belief that "gender is a social construct." Now, it's starting to become apparent that these people are actually dangerous, but still they retain tenure at public universities and often work for government-funded agencies (such as Barnardo's). Would we hire muggers to our police forces? If not, why hire those who advocate that children be placed in highly abnormal, potentially abusive situations? It's time to put these people in their place, and remove them from any positions of authority over children and families.

Feminist nostalgia for traditional gender roles

Dalrock · 16 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

After writing my last post on Cord Ivanyi teaching boys chivalry I found a story on the same topic by ABC News. It had a hilarious quote by the acting VP of NOW:

> NOW Unsure of High School Etiquette Lessons
> But Erin Matson, acting vice president of the National Organization for Women, said she wonders if singling out the boys for good manners is the way to go, even though she called the idea of old-fashioned manners "adorable."

They had a quote by the mother of one of the girls in the same class which was similar:

> "I was a little torn to begin with as a child of the 1970s and growing up with women's lib and women's rights," she said.
> But now, she said, it's almost like a "lost art form" seen only in old movies.

This nostalgia by feminists for the good ol' days is surprisingly common. In December of 2009 Hanna Rosin, perhaps the most hairy legged feminist of them all, bemoaned changing gender roles in her article The rise of the kitchen bitch. She opened the article with:

> Ladies, it's time to reclaim cooking.

A little later on she writes:

> I first heard this term in Sandra Tsing Loh's recent Atlantic story about her divorce. She used it to describe a friend's husband who was anal and fussy and altogether too feminine—he belonged to an online fennel club, for God's sake. Loh's bitch was wholly unsavory, a prop designed to justify universal divorce.

Granted, many would argue that her feminist credentials come out entirely untarnished. After all, she was emasculating her husband in the feminist submagazine he let her create after he became editor of Slate. Plus, feminism's core philosophy is about women bitching. Still, I find this rather strange.

Loh wrote about her own nostalgia for traditional gender roles in her NY Times

Op Ed piece My So-Called Wife:

> I am stricken with the peculiar curse of being a 21st-century woman who makes more than the man she's living with …
> …I seem to have an ever more recurring 1950s housewife fantasy. In this magical Technicolor world, the breadwinner husband, Brad, leaves home (where his duties are limited to mowing the lawn and various minor home repairs) at 7 a.m. When he returns from work at 6 p.m., aside from a savory roast with mashed potatoes, his homemaker wife, Nancy, has pipe, slippers and a tray of Manhattans ready.

And who can forget the quote by feminist Pamela Haag from the Daily Mail piece I referenced in my Trapped in a not unhappy marriage! post. Ms. Haag complains:

> From a historical perspective it's a departure. Go back to the Fifties and husbands and wives had many different roles – as hostess, decorator, breadwinner, volunteer.

Likewise all of the women complaining about reversed gender roles in Alpha women, Beta Men. You may also recall how blogger Big Little Wolf feels that men should offer women chivalry, although she feels this has nothing to do with gender roles:

> My planet is called Fred – where I get to pick and choose the typically masculine or feminine behaviors that suit me…
> Pick up the tab for a date? Yes – I will expect that….
> Guys – is opening doors not your thing? No problem. I'm not going to hold it against you.
> I'm capable of opening doors, pulling out chairs, and so on. However, if you drive a truck or SUV, given my diminutive stature, you are going to have to offer me a hand to climb up into the seat, and a hand to get back down. (At five feet, it's either that or a step stool.)

I was confused by this at first, because if you offered a short man a boost into your truck or SUV you would have a fight on your hands. After much consideration, I came up with a handy way for men to remember what she expected:

> chivalry means giving the little lady some extra help

I thought she would be delighted that I had made sense of her seeming contradiction, but later in the day I noticed she had a new post up about how people can be mean on the internet. To this day I'm at a loss as to how she ended up with a picture of me.

But I have saved the best for last. I found a blog by a women's studies major discussing Cord Ivanyi teaching boys chivalry titled, Bringing Old-School Back (emphasis mine):

> …when I read the article"Teacher Emphasizes Old-Fashioned Etiquette"by David Knowles, I couldn't help but hope that Old School was trying to make another comeback.
> ..the boys became accustomed to anything from pulling chairs out for the girls to sit, to standing up whenever a girl entered the room–something I hadn't come across since I read Pride and Prejudice last year. And I was happy to read that the girls loved it.

Happy indeed. Men waiting on women, what's a feminist not to love? She continues:

> As a women studies major who is familiar with feminist criticism, I have a good feeling that many would view > these practices as sexist. Such behavior from men may imply that women are weaker and more helpless. That if women begin to accept this behavior as normal, they will believe in and become comfortable with their dependence on men.

She is of course right. The charming ladies at Feministing may have required medical attention after reading about this. But as I said, I saved the best for last. The women's studies major blogger continues (emphasis mine):

> But I would like to offer another level of insight. When men and women are seen as the same, men somehow always seem to get the upper-hand…
> More than ever now we are realizing that men and women are not quite the same, after all. And Ivanyi's lessons from the past are finally being called in to shed light on a problem we have been unable to solve.

Help Keep The Spearhead Alive

W.F. Price · 16 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

More support is needed for The Spearhead to maintain operations through the fall quarter. Some generous readers have already come through, but more is needed to keep the site running consistently through the next few months. The Spearhead has become a community site that publishes a consistent stream of content, which requires regular maintenance and a lot of time-consuming writing and editing. I'd really like to keep it running at the same level, but that won't be possible without adequate funds — I'll have to drastically curtail the time I spend working on the site to stay above water.

The site provides a unique perspective on men's issues in the West, and has already made a substantial impact on the MRM, inspiring many men to come out in the open and speak in favor of their interests. Where men used to be confined to fora and other relatively isolated communities, they are now expanding into other forms of media. This is why I named the site "The Spearhead" — it was intended to thrust men's issues into the popular consciousness. It has worked in this regard – better than I expected, in fact – and even the mainstream media has begun to take notice.

One idea I've come up with to justify the time I've put into the site is to sell my own services here, because, after all, the site does get a lot of traffic, and it wouldn't be very smart of me to waste that opportunity. So, for those who are interested, I'd be happy to write, edit and publish (electronically and in print) for hire. I'll expand on that with a "hire me" page, but for now anyone interested in the service should simply contact me by email (through the contact page) and I'll be happy to talk about what I can offer.

I'd like to thank those who have supported The Spearhead — I am very grateful. Every donation helps, and if every regular reader gave the cash equivalent of eating out once a year (or, alternatively, one café latté per month) it would be entirely adequate, but this being the internet, it's necessary to ask from time to time.

Cunning Women in Hindu Tales

W.F. Price · 17 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I was reading about India to fill in some gaps in my understanding of the world's civilizations, and came across a peculiar and captivating prose story, originally written in Sanskrit. It is a story that I thought might interest contemporary men, as it is so similar to the narrative we have come to be familiar with.

The story is contained in the Dashakumaracharita, which is a Sanskrit romance concerning the lives and adventures of ten young men of high rank. Much of the text pertains to the relations between men and women, and there are some choice excerpts that lay the truth of human sexuality bare.

Often, feminists claim that what they call "sexism" and such are Western inventions, but men who have the time and inclination can easily find examples of what they decry peppered throughout the literature of all the great civilizations over the span of history. When one knows enough about these things, feminism starts to look like little more than a minor bout of insanity on the historical timescale, and it becomes much easier to put the movement in its proper place; as the aberration that it is.

I've chosen a couple excerpts that will illustrate two sides of the female: one evil, and the other wholesome and good. Both present the true nature of women, and demolish feminist values.

The first is about a loving husband and his ungrateful, scheming wife. The story begins with one of the princes, a young brahmin, meeting a Raksha (demon) who demands he answers questions in return for his life (translation by PW Jacob):

> As I came out of the water, carrying a large root on my shoulder, I saw standing on the bank a terrible Rakshas in human form, who called out, in an angry tone "Who are you? Where do you come from? What are you doing here, destroying my flowers?"
> Without showing any sign of fear, I walked boldly up to him, and said: "I am a brahman, who has just escaped many dangers. I was treacherously thrown into the sea, rescued by a merchant-ship, then attacked by pirates; and now, after conquering them, we have put into this island for water. I have much enjoyed my bathe, and wish you good morning."
> "Stop!" said he. "You will not get off so easily. You seem a bold fellow, however, and I will give you a chance for life. I shall ask you four questions. If you can answer them, you are free; if not, I shall devour you immediately."
> "Very good," I answered; "I am ready to hear them." Then he began:
> "What is cruel?"
>
> "A wicked woman's heart."
> "What is most to the advantage of a householder?"
>
> "Good qualities in a wife."
> "What is love?"
>
> "Imagination."
> "What best accomplishes difficult things?"
>
> "Cunning. Dhumini, Gomini, Ratnavati, and Nitambavati," I added, "are examples of what I have said."
> "Tell me," said he, "who they were, and how they prove the truth of your answers?"
> "Certainly," I replied; "you shall judge for yourself.
> "There were formerly in the country of Trigarta three brothers, all wealthy, having several wives, many servants and slaves, and numerous flocks and herds. In their time it happened that there was a great drought; no > rain fell for several years; the streams and fountains ceased to flow; the pools and lakes were turned to mud, the beds of rivers almost dry, plants burned up, trees withered; all mirth and festivity were at an end; bands of thieves roamed about; the dead lay unburied or unburnt, and their bodies were scattered over the fields. At last the famine was so great that men began to devour each other. The three brothers, from their great wealth, were able to hold out a long time; but when their stores of corn and rice were all consumed, and their cattle all slaughtered, they, like the rest, were driven to cannibalism. First they killed and ate their slaves; then, even their wives and children, till all were gone but themselves and their three favourite wives. The famine still continuing, they were driven to eat them also, and drew lots which should be killed first. The lot fell on Dhumini, the wife of the youngest brother, who, unable to bear the thought of devouring her, escaped with her in the night. After walking a long way, till they were quite exhausted, they came to a large forest, where they found a well of water, and many fruits and roots, besides deer and other animals, on which they were able to live without difficulty; and they built a hut there.

> “One day when the husband of Dhumini was going about in search of game, he found a man who had been cruelly treated by robbers; they had cut off his hands, feet, and nose, and left him to perish. Having compassion on the poor wretch, he bound up his wounds as well as he was able, and carried him with much difficulty to his hut. There he and his wife nursed him till his wounds were healed, and took care of him afterwards.
> “Now such is the depravity of women, that Dhumini fell in love with this poor mutilated wretch, and determined to have him whether he would or no.
>
> “One day her husband came home from hunting, tired and thirsty, and asked her for water. She answered: ‘I have a very bad headache, you must go and draw for yourself.’ Then walking softly behind him as he went, she waited till he stooped down over the well, and pushed him in.
> “Having thus, as she thought, got rid of her husband, she took the maimed man on her back and carried him till she reached an inhabited country, where there was no famine, telling those who asked her, that this man was her husband, and had been mutilated in that manner by a spiteful enemy.
> “She thus became the object of much compassion, and praise, for devotion to her husband, and the king of the country bestowed on her a small pension on which she lived in the city of Avanti. Meanwhile her real husband had managed to climb up from the well, and wandered about a long time, not knowing where his wife was gone. At last he came to Avanti in great distress, and was begging for food when she chanced to see him. Going at once to the king, she said, ‘That wicked wretch who mutilated my husband is now here; I have seen him going about as a beggar.’
> “Upon this he was immediately seized, and, notwithstanding his protestations of innocence, condemned to death, and led away to execution.
> “On the way, with but faint hopes of saving his life, he said to the executioner, ‘I have been condemned on the evidence of one witness only; let that man whom I am accused of injuring be questioned; if he says I am guilty, then indeed I deserve to die.’
> “The executioner saying, ‘Perhaps he may be innocent—a few minutes’ delay can do no harm,’ took him at once to the house of his wife, and there the poor mutilated wretch, with many tears, declared the kindness with which he had been treated by the supposed criminal, and the wickedness of the woman who had forced him to live with her as her husband.
> “Thereupon the execution was stayed, and the king, having been made acquainted with the whole affair, ordered her to be cut in pieces and given to the dogs, and showed much favour and kindness to her husband.
> “I say, therefore, there is nothing so cruel as the heart of a wicked woman.”

The next story follows right on the heels of the first, and is also about a cunning woman, but instead of using her arts for wicked purposes, she uses them for her own and her husband’s good:

The Rakshas appeared to be satisfied with this story, and said: “Go on, tell me about Gomini.” I continued therefore:

“There was formerly in the country of the Dravidas a young brahman of great wealth. Somehow he was not married when a mere boy, as is often the case, and when he grew up he thought to himself: ‘Those who have no wives and those who have bad wives are equally unfortunate, I will not let my friends choose for me, but travel about and look out for myself till I find a girl who may suit me.’

“Having formed this resolution, and changed his name, he set out alone, taking very little with him, but a small bag containing two or three pounds of rice in the husk.

“Whenever he saw a maiden of his own caste whose appearance he liked, either in the houses where he was admitted or elsewhere, he would say to her: ‘My dear, could you make me a good dinner with this rice?’ This he did many times, but though parents in general would have been willing to give him their daughters, he was always laughed at, and often treated with contempt. One day, while sitting in a public place in a town which he had lately entered, he observed a young girl whose parents had fallen into poverty, which was shown by her scanty dress and slender ornaments. She passed by him accompanied by an old woman, and stood for a time very near him.

“The more he looked at her the more he was pleased, and thought to himself: ‘This is just the wife to suit me; she is neither too tall nor too short, too stout or too thin; her limbs are rounded and well knit; her back is straight, with a slight hollow; her shoulders are low; her arms plump and soft; the lines of her hands indicate good fortune; her fingers are long and slender; her nails are like polished gems; her neck is smooth and rounded as a slender shell; her bosom full and well shaped; her face has a sweet expression; her lips are full and red; her chin small and compact; her cheeks plump; her eyebrows glossy black, gracefully curved, meeting in the middle; her eyes are long and languishing, very black and very white; her forehead, adorned by beautiful curls, resembles a piece of the moon; her ears are delicately formed, and well set off by the ear-rings; her hair is glossy black, brown at the ends—long, thick, and not too much curled. My heart seems to be drawn towards her; if she is what she seems to be, I will certainly marry her; but I must not act rashly; I will first try her with my test. Then approaching her with a polite salutation, he said: ‘My dear, are you clever enough to make a good dinner out of this bag of rice;’ Without answering a word, she looked significantly at her old nurse, and taking the rice from his hand, signed him to sit down on a terrace close by; and sat down herself near him. Then, first spreading out the rice in the, sun that it might be quite dry, she rubbed it gently between her hands, so as to get off the husk unbroken, and giving it to the nurse, she said: ‘Take this to some goldsmith; they use it when prepared in this way for polishing their gold, and you will get a few pence for it—with them buy a little firewood, a few cheap dishes, and an earthen pipkin, and bring also a wooden mortar with a long pestle.’ On this errand the old woman departed, and soon returned, bringing the things required.

“Then the girl put the rice into the mortar, and very gracefully moving the pestle up and down, separated the rice thoroughly from the remaining particles of husk and awns; which she carefully winnowed away.

“After this she washed the rice thoroughly, and the old woman having meanwhile lighted a fire and placed the pipkin full of water on it, she threw the rice into the water as soon as it boiled, in such a manner that the grains lay loose and separate. When they began to swell and burst, she took the pot from the fire, which she raked together, and set it with the lid downwards near the embers, first carefully draining off the rice liquor, and stirring the grains several times with a spoon to prevent their sticking together.

“After this she put out the fire by throwing water on it, and taking the charcoal, sent the old woman to sell it, and with the money to procure some herbs, ghee, curds, tamarind fruit, spices, salt, myrobalan, and sesamum oil. When these things were brought, she mixed the myrobalan, finely pounded, with salt, and desired the nurse to give it with the sesamum oil to the young brahman, and tell him to go and bathe and anoint himself; and he having received these things, went to bathe.

“When he was returned and comfortably seated, she gave him to drink rice liquor, mixed with spices and > cooled by fanning, and he was much refreshed by it; afterwards, soup made with some of the liquor, a few spoonfuls of rice, butter, and spices; and, lastly, the rest of the rice mixed with curds, buttermilk, and several condiments, and he had plenty, though some was left.

> “When he had finished, he asked for drink. She gave him water in a new cooler, sweetened and perfumed with lotus and other flowers; and it looked and felt so cool, gurgled so pleasantly, and tasted so sweet, that all his senses were gratified, and he drank eagerly again and again.
> “After waiting on him in this manner, as soon as the dishes and the remains of the meal had been removed by the old nurse, she sat down beside him, arranging her scanty patched dress as well as she was able.
> “The young brahman having thus satisfied himself of the capabilities of the maiden, made known his real name and position to her parents, and they having gladly accepted him, he married the girl in due form, and took her home to his own house.
> “Not very long afterwards, with very little consideration for her, he took to himself another wife, a woman of bad character; yet such was the sweetness of temper of the first, that she showed no anger at this, but continued to treat her husband with all due honour and respect, and so gained over her fellow-wife that she became her dearest friend. At the same time she managed the household admirably, keeping everything in order, yet making all the servants attached to her. In short, she acted in such a manner that she entirely gained the respect and affection of her husband, and he enjoyed great happiness, and trusted and consulted her in all affairs.
> “Therefore I say that the best thing for a householder is to have a good wife.”

It is always refreshing to find that people have gone over our material long ago, and effectively rebuked feminism long before it ever started. The real tragedy is that we have not sufficiently instructed our young men in these matters, but finally there are a few of us making some effort to do so in our time and our own vernacular. Hopefully, thousands of years from now, scholars will be able to sift through the feminist garbage that litters our culture and find a few similar gems written by some as-of-yet unknown Western man.

Tennessee Supreme Court Rules Against Lifetime Alimony

Featured Guest · 18 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Peter The Great

In a case that is sure to be a precedent setter, the Tennessee Supreme Court ruled Friday that a man does not have to pay lifetime alimony to his ex-wife.

In 2009 the Tennessee Appeals Court had ruled that Craig Gonsewski had to pay his ex $1250 a month in alimony for life or until she remarried.

The news is saying that this is different from most cases because the ex-wife was employed, worked the whole time of the marriage, and was in her 40's at the time of the divorce.

Mr. Gonsewski appealed the Appeals Court ruling claiming that the decision went too far in giving her alimony for life.

At the time of the divorce Craig Gonsewski made $137,000 as a controller for a corporation, while Johanna Gonsewski, who worked for the state as an information manager, made $72,000.

Johanna's attorney had argued that Craig had "struck gold" with his job, while Johanna had topped out; and also claimed that she had helped put him through college.

The Tennessee Supreme Court ruled unanimously that the lifetime alimony was inappropriate because Johanna Gonsewski held a stable job, earned considerable income and was awarded a significant amount of assets in the property settlement.

The Court of Appeals found that Johanna was unlikely to earn any more as a state employee, that she needed more money, and he had the ability to pay.

The Supreme Court stated, "In many instances, the parties' assets and incomes simply will not permit them to achieve the same standard of living after the divorce as they enjoyed during the marriage" – Chief Justice Cornelia A. Clark wrote.

The Court also found that the ex-wife was not entitled to the lump-sum alimony award of her attorney fees because she was partially responsible for generating them and had the financial resources to pay them.

Taking on the Appeals Court, the Supreme Court also ruled that trial courts have broad discretion in awarding alimony, and that "an appellate court should not reverse a trial court's alimony decision unless the trial court has abused its discretion."

It noted that the lower court did not abuse its discretion when it decided to award no alimony to either party, and reinstated the judgment of the trial court.

Johanna Gonsewski's attorney said that his client "will be extremely disappointed."

This case can well be a real precedent in overturning automatic alimony and lifetime support everywhere due to the status of the Court. It was a good day for men!

As Feminism's Poison Does its Work, Anti-Female Brutality Explodes onto the Scene

W.F. Price · 19 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists asked for a gender war, and sadly it is starting to look as though they got what they wanted. Repeated provocations against men, systematic discrimination against men, and state-sanctioned debt slavery are starting to have the inevitable effect. In a triumph for the feminist movement, men are lashing out violently against women, fulfilling the feminist fantasy of a gender war.

For feminism to exist as a valid movement, there must be violent conflict, so many of the efforts of feminists have sought to provoke just that. For example, in teaching that women must "take back the night" from men, women were encouraged to be militant against all males, which can only have unfortunate results, given the hands-down male superiority in combat. Women have further been encouraged to fight men in all areas of society rather than cooperate with them, which is guaranteed to create some violently anti-female men. Unsurprisingly, more mentally unstable and out-of-luck men are lashing out violently against women, just as feminists have always hoped for.

You see, for a feminist to justify her job there must be some degree of brutality against women. Gender war is essential to feminism. So, if you are a feminist, the hapless women murdered or assaulted by the damaged men feminists have created are necessary sacrifices for advancing the feminist agenda. It's a pretty simple concept. Too bad for the girls who ended up on the wrong end of these men's rage, but hey, if you're a female senator or staffer it's good business for your cause. And we all know that feminism has never been about the typical woman who lives a humble life, but rather the ambitious elite who want to have access to the big boys and big money on Capitol Hill and Wall Street.

Here are a few very recent examples of the results of the feminist gender war campaign:

Trucker murders hookers across South.

Florida man kills wife, shoots two pastors.

Arkansas man attacks courthouse.

Women's best bet for security is not in denouncing and fighting men, as feminists would have it, but in cooperating with them and taking on their proper role. Feminists would willingly sacrifice women for their own power, but ordinary men will sacrifice themselves for the women in their families.

This is why the arguments one often hears that women are stupid and inferior sometimes seem to carry some weight — what woman would give up this natural protection for an uncertain guarantee of government support? Only a foolish, stupid, shortsighted one. But perhaps that is the point — the most economically secure, educated and privileged women in Western society rarely leave their husbands. It is overwhelmingly the hapless, unintelligent and disadvantaged who believe the lies about "empowerment" and strike out on their own, only to fail in the overwhelming majority of cases.

Disadvantaged women are truly the cannon fodder of feminists. For Machiavellian types, this is a net bonus, but for anyone with a shred of morality, it's a despicable path to power. The United States will once again be a righteous society only when feminists are jailed for interfering with families, and their academic apologists are removed by security from their jobs in taxpayer-funded educational institutions. This would be the most humane course of action to take. Far more humane, in fact, than provoking men and women to physically attack one another, as feminists would have it today so that they can unleash state agents on confused and demoralized families.

Straw Dogs — A Learning Review

Featured Guest · 19 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

by Ken Knight

The recent 2011 re-make of the controversial 1971 film "STRAW DOGS" captures the base storyline and over-the-top characters of the original only instead of rural England the backdrop is the American South (the "deep" south) and the characters are American in this re-make. When nerdy writer David and his hot young wife Amy move to her backwater hometown for him to write (and her to go jogging in skimpy attire) the local roughnecks (one of whom is Amy's old high school boyfriend) see this as a testament to upscale outsiders "taking" what is "theirs" and rubbing their faces in it. Basically, this is the clichéd "jock-versus-nerd" tale only with a rape scene and the ambiguous rapport between the nerd's hot wife and the more "alpha" roughneck guys who take it to the next level and attack her as well as her hubby and the town pervert in a climatic attack that rivals the one in the equally-classic (re-made) film "Assault on Precinct 13".

There are a few points in both the original and this re-do that is worth considering in the vein of real life parallels: the first being the hot young wife "Amy" shit-testing her brainy husband David as soon as the more rugged and physically-imposing men begin working for the couple, instantly pitting him against them to try her husband's manhood against the men working outside on their barn. Amy even goes so far as to sexually tease the men working outside by disrobing in front of a window the guys have full view of.

The second is Amy's response to her ex-boyfriend invading her home while her husband is gone, her half-hearted resistance to the thug forcing himself on her then "giving in" to her former lover as he gets totally carnal, freaking out when one of his buddies comes in for "his turn". Everyone from you, me, and the milk man would consider what happens to the character of Amy in this scene to be a rape, but in the film Amy keeps what happened to herself, not reporting it at all nor telling her husband even as she has flashbacks of the crime, she does and says nothing. In the 1971 original STRAW DOGS starring Dustin Hoffman, the "rape" scene was controversial with critics because of that time period's censorship, but also with feminists who felt that the character of Amy "enjoyed" the intrusion by her ex-boyfriend (as portrayed in that scene by actress Susan George).

The character of Amy in both the original and the re-make clearly "sparks" the hostility between her husband and the roughnecks working for the couple, creating a dynamic where the more physically-strong males are chomping at the bit for the female who is paired with a physically-weaker man. In both films, the character of Amy is exasperated by her nerdy husband's "cowardice" (she even openly calls him a coward) when faced with stronger, sexually-aggressive men and she ramps up the hostility by taunting her ex-boyfriend who eventually goes overboard to commit a felony in pursuit of her. Having watched both versions of this film, the main question I had to ask was WHY did the character of Amy move back to her hometown with her wealthy new husband, the place where she would know her past lover would be??

So are the two versions of the film STRAW DOGS a subliminal tale of "Alpha-versus-Beta" or one showing the ambiguously-complicated dynamics between a woman who cannot make up her mind as to what type of man she wants…the wealth and comfort of the talented intellectual (her husband David) or the poorer roughneck "Marlboro Man" whom she has been with before? Precisely, and that dynamic shown within a fictional realm such as the film(s) STRAW DOGS is worth noting. Walking out of the theater the other day after watching the re-make, I couldn't help but to reflect on how such a violent tale kicked off between the characters and who was really responsible for "lighting the fuse"….then I decided that it all really went south after the character Amy intentionally flashed her bare bod out the window at the roughnecks working for her, her ex-boyfriend among them. Of course culpability not withstanding, the character of Amy reminded me of the type of human personality who causes friction between others and does not see such friction reaching critical mass until it is too late. So if you'd like to view a cinematic example of a very timely "couples dynamic" this film is worth catching along with the original STRAW DOGS that is available on DVD.

Iowa Attorney General's Office Pulls No Punches in Rape Suit Defense

W.F. Price · 20 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Despite American Universities' cowardly capitulation to federal demands that male students are afforded no legal or constitutional protections when accused of sexual assault or harassment, when it comes to safeguarding their own pocketbooks schools are more than willing to scrutinize every detail of an alleged victim's story:

> DAVENPORT, Iowa — Attorneys defending the University of Northern Iowa are heavily scrutinizing the life of a former student who was sexually assaulted by two football players in 2004 and is now accusing the school in a civil lawsuit of mistreating her and mismanaging its athletics department, court records show.
> The Iowa Attorney General's Office has been seeking details of the woman's history on social media sites like Facebook since 2003, years of her cell phone records and personal photos and records detailing her mental health treatment before and after the assault, records show. In addition, the office has repeatedly asked for records about her employment as a dancer at a strip club, a copy of her personal journal, and documentation related to her father's mysterious death when she was a young child.
> The woman filed a civil lawsuit in 2007 alleging that most university administrators treated her with "great animosity" after the assault. She claimed they failed to make academic accommodations she requested, declined to let her move to another dormitory and did nothing when she reported receiving harassing calls from players. After she quit school weeks later, the university sent her tuition bill to a collection agency and the dean of students told her she was disappointed "she didn't tough it out," according to the lawsuit.
> The lawsuit seeks damages for the loss of her access to education at UNI, pain and suffering and an order requiring the school to reform policies on assault and harassment to rein in what her attorneys call a culture where football recruits are more likely to show violence toward women. UNI has broadly denied her allegations in court documents.

The original case involved the usual college he-said she-said rape case, in which the two accused men were tried multiple times, resulting in hung juries and eventual pleas for relatively minor sexual assault convictions. Given the way colleges are run today combined with the new legal and cultural confusion regarding legitimate sex, these incidents are pretty much unavoidable on campus. For example, athletes are treated as royalty on campus, but it is against the rules to pay them, so part of the assumed tradeoff is in access to young flesh, most of which is entirely willing, of course. But now and then, there's bound to be the odd mistake, and what's a school to do?

If you're in administration in a typical school, the solution, obviously, is to hang the boys out to dry and wash your hands of the matter. But it didn't work in this case, possibly because the victim didn't get enough special treatment, and now she wants some cold, hard cash.

However, the state of Iowa, which is tasked with defending the school, is not rolling over. No, they are fighting back hard, and using what appears to be the "she's a lying slut" defense.

There's nothing that quite illustrates the hypocrisy of government like when it is hoist on its own petard. The same state that fought so hard to convict her accused rapists – going so far as to try one three times – has done an about face and is digging up every bit of dirt on the woman it can find.

What this teaches us is that as soon as the state can no longer count on men to foot the bill for feminist policies, they will be abandoned post-haste. In coming days, we're going to see a lot more of this, and we men can sit back and chuckle as it plays out.

First Wave Antifeminism: E. Belfort Bax

W.F. Price · 21 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I came upon the works of E. Belfort Bax last night while reading about John Stuart Mill, the English philosopher who published an early feminist treatise known as "The Subjection of Women." Bax responded some 50 years later with "The Legal Subjection of Men," which details the highly privileged status of Anglosphere women in the Victorian era.

Bax was a lawyer who knew quite well what men faced when facing a woman's accusation in court, and he offers us a very detailed picture of a familiar legal regime. It's uncanny how similar contemporary legal practices are to the Victorian ones. There are differences, to be sure, but the end result is the exact same: women have the upper hand under the law.

Here's an excerpt concerning Victorian alimony/child support:

> 3. MAINTENANCE.
> As against her husband, the law confers on a woman who has married him the unilateral privilege of maintenance. The earlier law made this privilege dependent on her obedience, cohabitation with her husband, and 6 her observance of outwardly decent behaviour. The present law has set her free from all these restraints. Since 1857 the Secular Court, which then assumed juris- diction in matrimonial matters, has given up all attempt to enforce obedience, but the most violent methods, in- cluding imprisonment and sequestration of the property of the husband are employed to enforce her claim to maintenance. By a recent Statute (the Act of 1884) the process of imprisonment to make a wife obey an order to return to her husband was abolished. By the famous decision in the Jackson Case the husband was prohibited from himself using force to compel her to return. But the deserted wife by magisterial order can get her deserting husband sent to gaol [jail]. And neither legislature nor the Courts, which took away her duties of obedience and cohabitation, ever dreamt of depriving her of her privilege of being maintained by the man whom she can flout and insult with impunity. As a successful lady litigant (May, 1896) remarked to her husband, "There is no law which compels me to obey or honour you, but there is a law that you must keep me." This woman tersely sums up the position. In the case of a man of property the Courts will expropriate him for the benefit of his wife. In the case of a wage-earner the Courts from police magistrates to Supreme Court will decree him to be her earning slave, bound to work for her or go to prison. A wife, no matter if rolling in wealth, is not obliged to contribute a penny to her husband's support, even if he be incapacitated from work through disease or accident. The sole exception which the law makes in derision is that if he be actually in such destitution as to go to the workhouse, then the wealthy wife is obliged to pay, not to her hus- band, but the local authorities, the cost of his main- tenance at the exiguous scale usual in such cases. Even a wife who, against her husband's wish, leaves his house after assaulting and insulting him can obtain 7 against him an order for restitution of conjugal rights. This is a mere preliminary to form a basis for a claim for sequestration of his property for her maintenance. The Act of 1884 forbids the Court to order imprisonment for refusal to obey an order of restitution of conjugal rights, but enables such a refusal to be made a ground for confiscation of the husband's property in favour of the wife. No reciprocity here. Imprisonment before 1884 affected both husband and wife. Sequestration of property, the husband alone. Now imprisonment is abolished for the wife, and so the wife goes scot free, while the husband is as much bound as ever in person and in property. This iniquitous statutory rule is made use of by women who have no wish whatever to return to their husbands. After overbearing ill-usage and desertion of the husband for years, the wife applies to the Court for an order for restitution, well knowing that her unfortunate victim will not obey the order. Then the robbery of his property is completed by a second order in Court. But no disobedience to a like order on her part enables her property to be confiscated, or herself to be sent to prison.

Amazing. Seems there's a lot of precedent for contemporary family law.

Bax was an early socialist and Marxist while socialism and Marxism were still largely men's movements, as both concerned the lives of working men. Although there was some proto-feminism incorporated in early-20th century Communist movements, feminism never made as much headway in Marxist societies as it did in Anglo-capitalist societies. The direct association between Marxism and feminism seems to have developed in the 1960s, possibly under the influence of the CIA, which is known to have funded feminist Marxist organizations. This raises the question of what exactly the point was in associating feminism with Marxism. Although I never thought of this before, it may be that the CIA wanted to present Marxism as something disadvantageous to the average American/Western working man, and feminism, which has always been hostile to working men, was quite capable of doing just that.

Bax's writing is fascinating, in that it fills out the picture of the development of feminism in the Anglo world. We are lucky that his works survive, and I intend to collect and concatenate his writings concerning feminism in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

More of Bax's work can be found at marxist.org, where his writings have been archived.

So anyone out there who enjoys the site and wants to help assure its continued operation can help with a donation of any amount. Any financial support to the site goes directly to work on its content and maintenance, which is a job I enjoy performing for our thousands of readers.

For those who are interested, the renewed effort following the resolution of my latest custody case has paid off with rising traffic and page views, and we are back over 10,000 page views per day during the work week, and 3,000+ uniques, in addition to nearly 2,000 RSS subscribers.

For future projects, which should help with the site's income, I have been spending my spare time learning another typesetting program so that I can produce quality e-books for both sale and free distribution. This is a project I've been wanting to take up for a long time now, and it looks like I finally have the time to put it into motion (learning the markup takes a lot of sustained effort). If the books are compiled from open source content, I'll give them away for free, but those with fresh content will be for sale (lower prices for regular readers/subscribers, of course). Ultimately, I'd like to produce books from a wide variety of writers, including some of the authors who have contributed here, and others whose subject matter dovetails with the site's focus.

Finally, I'd like to thank those who have already helped out, and express optimism about the continued viability of The Spearhead, which has started to become something of a cultural feature in the blogosphere. I think it can safely be said that it's made a real difference out there, and things are slowly but surely starting to change in men's favor as more and more people come to see the double-standards and injustices that face ordinary men throughout our society.

Domestic Violence and Death Sentences in Imperial China

Sometimes it helps to have a little historical and global perspective on how other cultures have approached marital strife and domestic violence over the years. Non-Western cultures have an entirely different attitude toward culpability in such matters; i.e. the husband is not considered automatically guilty, and women are not generally given a pass on crimes they may commit as they are in Anglo countries.

I recently remembered a passage I read some time ago about the Kang Xi emperor of the Manchu (Qing) dynasty of China, which ruled from the mid-17th to the beginning of the 20th century. By the mid-18th century, Qing China was the most powerful, wealthy country on earth. By the end of the 19th century, overcome by Western industrial powers and internal corruption and disorder, it was a mess, but this is the common life cycle of Chinese dynasties, so we can't necessarily draw any conclusions about the superiority of Western customs from the decline of the Qing.

The following passage concerns death sentences, which the emperor would review at the end of the year to see which cases might merit a reduced sentence. In 1699, Kang Xi remarked upon several domestic violence murders to distinguish between those sentences worthy of reduction and those that should be upheld:

> Each year we went through the lists, sparing sixteen out of sixty-three at one session, eighteen out of fifty-seven at another, thirty-three out of eighty-three at another. For example, it was clear to me that the three cases of husbands killing wives that came up in 1699 were all quite different. The husband who hit his wife with an ax because she nagged at him for drinking, and then murdered her after another domestic quarrel — how could any extenuating circumstances be found? But Pao-erh, who killed his wife for swearing at his parents; and Meng, whose wife failed to serve him properly and used foul language so that he killed her — they could have their sentences reduced.
> [From "Emperor of China: Self Portrait of Kang Xi" by Jonathon D. Spence]

Chinese justice in the late 17th century seems more humane and fair than contemporary American, which recognizes no extenuating circumstances in such crimes when they are committed by men, and often excuses women for outright murder of husbands.

Another example from the text further illustrates the difference:

> Sudden murders without a cause could sometimes be forgiven — deaths resulting from drunken brawls, for example, or a lover killing his mistress in anger when her husband tried to dun [sue] him…

Here, the culpability of the female is taken into account — a foreign concept in our culture.

What the above passages illustrate is that our own culture, which defers to women at every level of justice, is not universal, and is actually aberrant by other standards. In fact, it is probably odd and aberrant from Kang Xi's English and colonial American contemporaries' perspective as well.

Thus, we see that the legal superiority of women is not a constant in human society, but rather an odd feature of contemporary Anglo-American law; one we can and should work to change.

Man-Bashing On The Road to Serfdom

Elusive Wapiti · 22 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Selwyn Duke postulates the theory–misandry leads to authoritarianism–thusly:

> [W]hat would you do if you wanted to grow government? I think you would try to remove any hope in women's minds that they could find security through a husband. You do this by destroying the man. You need to make him look weak, ineffectual, feckless, and buffoonish.
> Here is how you would proceed: Portray men in sitcoms, movies, and commercials as inept, foolish, and pusillanimous. Make sure these overgrown Hollywood boys are always outshone by the female characters. Also ensure that there are at least as many female characters in action roles as men — and don't neglect to make them as hard and as tough, if not more so, than the fellows. And definitely show them beating men up as much as possible. Then men certainly won't seem very strong.
> This perception is far easier to instill if you can actually bring men and boys down. To this end, make sure you feminize the curricula and atmosphere in schools so that boys receive neither the stimulation nor the discipline they need to succeed. And when these little outside-the-box male creatures' (boys are more likely to be revolutionary-minded, for good or for ill) energies are misdirected due to this lack of discipline, you can pickle their wills in psychotropic drugs such as Ritalin. The idea here is to lower boys' grades and college-graduation rates so that they're less capable of being a family's breadwinner. And then they certainly won't seem very intelligent.
> There must also be institutionalized discrimination against the lads. So be sure to have affirmative action, quotas, and set-asides for women. For instance, you can have government aid for female-owned businesses but not male-owned ones; if this is done right, a situation might even arise in which women start four times as many new businesses as men do [Ed: they already start twice as many]. The idea is to, as much as possible, work towards a point where men aren't very wealthy or powerful.
>
> By sexualizing everything in society and presenting girls as objects of pleasure, we can instead make the boys more predatory. Then they will leave a trail of broken hearts in their wake, ensuring that girls' hopes of bonding with a man are crushed; this causes women to harden their hearts to avoid being similarly hurt again, which reduces the chances that they will ever truly bond with a man.
> The result of all this will be men who seem weak, powerless, and unintelligent, and who are poor. Women must feel that the only reliable source of security and resources in their lives, the only strong man, is Uncle Sam.

In other words, misandry is functionally the same as hating freedom. If you love freedom, then you fight misandry wherever you find it. If you love liberty, then you labor tirelessly to restore and protect the position of men as fathers and as patriarchs of their families. If you crave independence, then you work to foster durable marriage and ensure interdependence between husbands and wives.

On the other hand, if you welcome the yoke, if you want your sons and daughters to be serfs, if you enjoy the boot heel of authoritarian rule pressing against your neck, go ahead and suppress men, masculinity, and dispose of patriarchal marriage and family.

I've argued before that while women are the center of gravity of a civilization, it is individual men operating within a framework of other men who transmit the technology of civilization from one generation to the next. Reading Mr. Duke's line of reasoning, it seems I need to extend my argument a bit and claim that it is the male-led family structure that enables freedom and liberty and that the female-led family drives a society toward tyranny and serfdom. A society based upon the female-headed family fails to bring men into the fold of marriage and family, fails to secure their investment into their children, and fails to direct men's surplus energies toward socially productive ends sans the use of government force.

It is this failure to capture male investment that makes Mr. Duke's observation about sexually predatory boys and hard-hearted girls especially salient. For our society is increasingly failing to efficiently capture male investment while at the same time establishing a moral ecology wherein evo psych and game theory justify the despoiling of the womenfolk…making them progressively poorer candidates for marriage with each happy roguring.

Speaking of marriage, Mr. Duke also had this interesting observation about how the marriage calculus has been stood on its head by all this man-hatin' going on:

> [W]omen have been sacrificing liberty for security for thousands of years — in an appropriate context. This context was marriage, when a woman would accept a man's protection and his headship (with today's hen-pecked Western man, it's different; upon getting married, he sacrifices liberty for insecurity) [Emphasis mine].

So on top of the postulate that misandry leads to tyranny, we see, through several degrees of separation, that all this bustin' on the guys has had the effect of negating the marriage contract for men. It still brings a (temporary) security for women while failing to secure for men what it used to. But it's worse than that, for it is not only a lack of security, men who marry face an insecurity, a negative security…they risk more by marrying than by not. And by not marrying, they feed into Kay Hymowitz' SYM stereotype, which in turn begets more misandry and so forth.

Thus does misandry circle back around in a self-sustaining spiral down into chains. The message is clear: a free society that makes a habit of disrespecting and suppressing and repressing its men won't remain free for too much longer.

E-Books: A Question for Readers

W.F. Price · 23 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I was up all night last night working on typesetting for both e-books and print, as one can now produce files that serve both purposes quite well. As I was doing so, I came across a program that allows for conversion of files to formats compatible with various e-book readers, such as the Amazon Kindle, the Nook, etc.

As I was tinkering with the program, I wondered how many Spearhead readers use an e-book reader.

So, the question is, do any of the readers here use these devices? And if so, would it be more convenient for them if I offered texts in particular e-book reader files?

Washington Times: Fall TV Features Rotten Women

W.F. Price · 23 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, commenter Rocco posted a link to a Washington Post article that expressed a good deal of disgust over the "post-feminist" fare that is filling up this season's TV Lineups. Written by Hampton Stevens and titled "Fall TV's mean women, milquetoast men," the article takes aim at a number of new shows that portray men as a bunch of ineffectual wimps and women as, well, "jerks:"

> If the fall TV season is any guide, the sexual revolution that was supposed to liberate men and women from traditional sex roles seems to have resulted instead in a straight-up role reversal. The male characters are messes — insecure, jobless, barely able to dress themselves without a wife or girlfriend and/or living in mom's proverbial basement. Their female counterparts, meanwhile, are flaunting the same selfish, boorish ways that once got men called "chauvinist pigs." The only difference today is that when these female characters act like jerks, we are expected to cheer them on as "empowered."

Heroines on TV are portrayed as tough, pitiless bitches who think nothing of being abusive and demeaning toward those less powerful than them. They are even meaner than male heroes from the bad old days, who at least wouldn't stoop to bullying the stupid and weak. Today, anyone who is pathetic in any way – almost always a man – is a fair target. And, according to the author, the men on the small screen are really pathetic:

> As many critics have noted, 2011 is the season of emasculation with a bevy of new shows about the purportedly dire state of American manhood. For example, "Man Up" (which premiered Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. on ABC) features a Judd Apatow-ish bunch of latte-sipping best friends in their 40s who go on a quest for their inner "Iron Johns."

Perhaps TV here is a reflection of society at large. Women have a higher employment rate, more money, and are better educated. And, as many of us know all too well, they can be really, really mean. Nothing new here.

However, what is new and different is the fact that a man is actually expressing some disgust with this state of affairs in a mainstream media outlet. And Mr. Stevens pulls no punches:

> Unlike their broke, wimpy male counterparts, the women on these shows are mostly strong and self-sufficient, and critics describe them with glowing words such as "assertive," "edgy" and, heaven help us, "sassy." However, what these women actually are, generally speaking, are utterly awful human beings. They may be inspired by "Sex and the City's" Carrie Bradshaw, but they act like Samantha, openly bragging about how badly they treat men. They make the sorts of crude jokes that are rightly decried when men make them on prime-time network TV, yet are celebrated for women as signs of emancipation.

Awful human beings indeed…

George Orwell wrote that power corrupts, and our women, empowered as they are today, have become thoroughly rotten. When a movement starts to lose steam, the first thing to fall of is its moral standing. Just a few years ago, women could still count on near-unanimous support in bashing men, but that's starting to change. Today, too many of them have just turned out to be too awful, and finally it's too obvious to ignore.

Violence and “Real Men”

Davd · 24 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Two Lessons from Human Evolution

By Davd Martin

Human nature formed in hunting and gathering societies, where all adults were producers. Men hunted (e.g Harris, 1989: 278-281), and mostly they hunted co-operatively. Women gathered—foraged roots, berries, and sometimes other edible or useful parts of the natural environment. Most of what they gathered were plants or parts of plants.

Human evolution shifted from being primarily biological to being primarily cultural “at some point during the last 100,000 years, and perhaps only within the last 40,000 years” (Lenski, Lenski and Nolan, 1991: 92) while big-game hunting as men’s work and gathering as primarily women’s work began much earlier (ibid.: 89-90). Hunting shaped men’s nature, and gathering shaped women’s*.

Hunting is inherently violent. Those neat styrofoam trays of meat in the supermarket contain cut-up portions of the dead bodies of animals. A few days ago i spent 3-4 hours turning 47 recently killed mackerel into stored meat; i have killed and butchered fish and game many times, and farm animals a few times. As the meat providers in prehistoric human societies, men used violence to feed their communities. Real men are violent—but disciplined and restrained in our use of violence. Lack of discipline can cause injury, and it can cause tainted meat.

Undisciplined men don’t have the reproductive—the evolutionary—fitness of disciplined men. Men who resort to undisciplined violence have lost some of their humanity. They are not “real men” in the full sense. For anyone, and especially for a Feminist purporting to be expert, to describe a violent rampage as typical of man-nature, is—if not a malicious lie or a self-deception—ignorant to the point of folly.

Real men are co-operative. During the thousands of centuries when humanity evolved, there were no rifles, no shotguns, no compound bows or fiberglass arrows. Our earliest ancestors [and here i refer to the first Homo sapiens, as well as Australopithecus and H. erectus] didn’t even have crude longbows. Clubs, spears, maybe slings were the weapons available, and with those weapons, teams of our ancestors killed elephants!—as well as aurochs, bison, caribou, elk, moose, pigs [which can be both large and deadly], and zebra. Even elk and zebra are too large for one man, armed only with spears, clubs and stone knives, to reliably kill alone.

During those hundreds of millennia of human genetic evolution, human nature was formed. Men [and male pre-humans] needed co-operation, discipline, and restraint to provide high-protein, immensely valued food using tools and weapons we would find incredibly crude. Men would not be on Earth today if we did not have co-operation, and discipline including restraint, bred into us.

* During these hundreds of centuries, perhaps millions of years of evolution, women seldom if ever hunted big game. The co-operation, discipline, and restraint that was bred into men could possibly have their main loci “on the Y chromosome”, such that women are less co-operative, less disciplined, less restrained by nature, not merely for cultural reasons associated with civilization. “Charles Martel” (on The-Spearhead, January 2010) summarized neurological research indicating major differences between men’s and women’s brain anatomy: It is virtually certain that important gender differences in personality are “inborn” rather than learned. Whether men’s co-operation, discipline, and restraint are genetically based in brain features that differ from women “is not [to my knowledge] yet established”. We should keep in mind that they very plausibly might be.)

 If there were instead, some species of big-brained ape that lacked co-operation, discipline, and restraint, it would not be human as we know humanity.

On The Road

W.F. Price · 25 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Headed to Canada today to see the kids. I'm hoping to find some cool things to do with kids in the Vancouver area. Today, we'll probably go to the beach and hang out there, but the weather is not going to permit those excursions for too much longer.

Any readers familiar with Vancouver and have ideas for fun things to do with a couple little ones? This is going to be a monthly trip for me, so any ideas would be appreciated.

Canada Compared to the US

W.F. Price · 26 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I had a nice time taking a day trip to Canada to see my kids. It's kind of a long drive, but not all that bad by West Coast standards. My folks live in San Francisco, and they often drive up here to Seattle, so I don't think I have much to complain about in that regard. However, I would really appreciate one of those fast, European-style trains that could make the trip in an hour and a half or so.

It's been a while since I've been to British Columbia, but one of the things I remember about the place from my youth still applies: it is very British. However, it isn't British in a crass, fatass manner, but rather in a more natural, healthy style. I'm not sure what Canadian men's take on this is, but British Columbian women – despite being very Anglo – are not half bad. I'm sure many readers are aware of the SWPL acronym — "Stuff White People Like." BC residents are SWPL without affecting it. That's just what they are. I found this kind of endearing, despite my tribulations at the border (more on that later).

Although the climate in Vancouver is almost identical to that of Seattle, there were palpable differences between the cities. First, Canada is very white. Not to say that there aren't minorities, but it isn't the same. There are lots of Chinese, Hindus and other minorities in the Vancouver area. All over, in fact. But the working class is overwhelmingly white Canadian. This difference was obvious to me despite the fact that Seattle is one of the whitest big cities in the US.

Another thing that struck me was that the Canadian men are affable and gentle. There is little evidence of the bravado and menacing that is common in the states. However, in my recent experience, the women can be fairly harsh.

This part of the world – the Pacific Northwest – is kind of unique. Americans aggressively grabbed the best land and squeezed the British long ago — Thomas Jefferson sent Lewis and Clark out here to stake a claim to the good land, and then William Seward sealed the deal by buying Alaska from the Russians seven decades later. One result of this is that BC's agriculture is squeezed into a small area just north of the border. I'd forgotten how many farms there were in the Fraser River valley, but drove past many yesterday. In contrast, Washington state produces huge amounts of grain and fruits east of the mountains in its inland west, which is far more fertile and productive than east BC due to the soil-depleting effects of glaciers during the last ice age, which stopped advancing just south of the border. So, Vancouver is sort of an island in the wilderness, boxed in by mountains, the sea, and the United States. Despite the handicap, the Canadians have done very well.

The final contrast I'll mention applies to the officials. I had to cross the border twice yesterday, so I had the opportunity to compare officials on both sides.

For some reason, the Canadian inspector in the border booth decided I needed extra attention, so sent me to be checked out. I was assigned a couple of female agents, one of whom was in her twenties and another, must have been her superior, who was a broad, thick woman of about 50 with a bleached blonde crew cut and wire-framed spectacles. The latter was almost a caricature of butch. So, the two started grilling me, upon which yet another young female joined in, and then they went to search my car. I felt confident at first, but then it turned out that I had not inspected my car very thoroughly and had left a half-empty box of .45 ACP in the trunk from the last time I took target practice. This prompted more intensive searching, more harsh, rapid-fire questions, etc. Eventually, they let me go (ammunition is apparently not contraband), and even seemed a little contrite, but it was not a particularly pleasant experience.

One thing I sensed from the search was that the young women involved were making a big effort to be tough, but were perhaps in over their heads. As for the butch one, she seemed entirely self-assured, but it was a little surreal to have two young, fairly attractive women giving me the third degree. I'm sure they are adequate for most situations, but as in the case where Ahmed Ressam was caught by American inspectors at the same border crossing with a bomb in his trunk, I'm not sure they would have been ideal.

The American border was, as one might expect, militarized. There are thermal imaging devices, lots of cameras, and uniformed men with dogs going up and down the lines of cars. The beefy American guards were self-confident and relaxed, which gives one a calm feeling, as though you'd probably be fine if terrorists or criminals suddenly burst onto the scene (unlikely, but it definitely could happen). When I came to the booth, the guard asked me only two questions: "Where are you from?" and "What were you doing up here?" I told him I was from Seattle and visiting my kids, and he just said "see ya," casually waving me through. It was nice to be home.

Australian Rape Political Prosecution Going to High Court

W.F. Price · 27 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Political prosecutions often say a lot about who wields power in a country, and they are often pursued on dubious grounds. An 80-year-old Australian man is currently facing prosecution for allegedly raping his wife nearly 50 years ago, despite the fact that the crime of "spousal rape" did not exist at the time (such laws were first introduced in the West in the 1970s).

In the United States, such prosecutions are precluded by the Constitution, which expressly forbids ex post facto laws. In Europe, only the UK's parliament (under parliamentary sovereignty) reserves to the right to pass ex post facto laws, but this is in contravention of the European Convention on Human Rights, to which the UK is a signatory nation. Even Iran prohibits such laws — virtually the entire civilized world holds the practice of retroactive prosecution in abhorrence.

Australian courts, however, are under no such restriction, and feminist-driven prosecution has taken advantage of this to pursue its agenda. Given that spousal rape claims are notoriously difficult to prosecute, as sex is a given in marriage, it's fairly likely that any attempt to make a prosecution on an old spousal rape charge, in which evidence has been lost and memory faded, is based on political motives.

Whether the man is prosecuted or not, the case will have a chilling effect in Australia regarding human rights. That such an attempt at prosecution has even made it to the high court should give us all pause, as cultures and customs change, as what is perfectly legal at one point could be used to punish us at some later date. Say, for example, that animal testing were banned in the future as cruel and inhumane. Could scientists then be punished for having taken part in research decades in the past? Under Australian law, apparently so.

However, in most cases reasonable people would decline prosecution even if they were able. What this particular case demonstrates is that feminists are not reasonable people. They do not care about the principles that uphold civilization, but rather only concern themselves with power. This is a truly dangerous precedent, and it should give us a clear idea of why feminism should not be taken lightly.

Hugo Schwyzer on Consent

W.F. Price · 27 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In giving Hugo Schwyzer a platform, the Good Men Project has lost whatever credibility it may have had. Although Schwyzer stirs up some controversy and thus garners pageviews, his questionable personal morality and willingness to collaborate in deception have already tainted the publication. Founder Tom Matlack, on the other hand, strikes me as a fairly sincere person who just happens to be incorrect about some things.

Sincerity, however, is not Schwyzer's forté. In an article that enraged many an MRA, he argued that it doesn't really matter whose kid you're bringing up — "…it is love, not sperm, that makes a great dad." In the article he reveals that he may have fathered a child with a woman, and then collaborated with her to deceive the other man she was sleeping with at the time into thinking the child was his. This is a disgusting thing to do to both the other man and the child, and a sneaky way to disguise parental irresponsibility and selfishness as some sort of noble act. I accuse Schwyzer of insincerity because I'm pretty sure he'll ask for a DNA test if he gets socked with a paternity suit for years of back child support some years down the line (assuming the story is true). I can see him in front of a judge arguing: "your honor, it was just my sperm, and that doesn't mean anything…" I'd fork over some cash to sit in on that hearing.

He later defended that piece by saying that guys who felt differently about a child upon learning that he or she was fathered by another man are "contemptible," and then proceeded to shamelessly excuse himself for his act of deception because the woman he conspired with was "not in an exclusive relationship when she last slept with me." Well, duh.

In his latest piece, Schwyzer touches upon the issue of "accidental rape." From a legal standpoint, this could be an interesting issue, because fudging the notion of consent has resulted in prosecutions where there is no clear indication of mens rea — usually a requirement for a crime to have occurred (in fact, I think statutory rape is one of the very few crimes where mens rea is not required). However, rather than clarify the issue, Schwyzer further muddies the waters by offering a deceptive etymology for the word consent:

> The root of consent is the Latin consentire, which means "with feeling." Consent is not just about words "no" or "yes"—it's about the unambiguous presence of desire.

This is sleight of hand. The Latin root sentire means "to feel" or "to hear," but it does not mean emotion or desire, as in "I feel sad," or "I feel horny," so much as it means "to think" (e.g. "sentire cum ecclesia" — to think with the church). A more accurate translation would probably be "to perceive." In any event, Latin terms generally entered the English legal lexicon through French or the church. Given the fact that the word "sentient" (conscious, perceptive) also derives from sentire, it can safely be assumed that the meaning of the term consent is much closer to "accept with awareness" than it is to "agree with 'the unambiguous presence of desire.'" For example, I consented to a search of my car at the border on Sunday, but I certainly wasn't overcome by desire at the prospect.

In fact, what Schwyzer is describing is not consent at all. We already have a word for it: assent. If feminists want to change the standard for rape to sex without assent, they should be honest about that, but I don't think it would work, because the term consent has just enough neutrality to it to be acceptable to the ordinary female sensibility, which recoils from the idea of "assenting" to sex, because that's just too slutty.

Semantics aside, the article is just another example of Hugo's disingenuous hand-wringing over the finer points of female sentiment. As a "gender studies" teacher, he is paid to do that, so no surprise there, but what we must keep in mind is that what Mr. Schwyzer is propounding could have some very nasty blowback, including inducing one of his young female students to say that she had been "raped" because she didn't enthusiastically assent to sex and (in retrospect, of course) realized that she only reluctantly went along with it (i.e. consented). After her friends convince her to call the cops and the boy's name is dragged through the mud in the press, maybe the poor sap will be “lucky” enough to avoid prison.

Would such a scenario bother him? To answer that, we need only ask whether it would bother a man who has no moral qualms about hiding the fact that another man may be raising his child from both the man and his child. This man demonstrates that claiming to act on behalf of women is the perfect cover for utter scum, and that’s exactly what we should expect to find in gender study departments across the land. “Good men” my ass.

Commenting Policy Reminder

W.F. Price · 28 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Because some of the comments have been getting out of hand (again), I'm going to start enforcing the commenting policy more rigorously for some time, and will put people who repeatedly violate it on moderation. Of course, it's going to be arbitrary, but that can't be avoided. Now that comment volume has gone down to a reasonable level (a year ago there were just too many to handle, and winter of 2010 was insane), it should be easier for me to do this without simply hacking away blindly.

The majority of commenters should just carry on as usual, but those who frequently violate the commenting policy in deed and in spirit will have to calm down.

A few things that have been bothersome:

1. Excessive crudity, disgusting imagery, graphic obscenities, etc.

2. SHOUTING

3. Making arguments too personal

4. Drunken rants/excessive belligerence

5. Racial, ethnic and religious slurs/baiting

Please keep in mind that I really dislike moderating comments, so it would be nice if folks would not force the issue. I should say that I've been tempted at times to either (a) eliminate comments entirely or, (b) put everyone on moderation and only approve good comments. I don't do this because I like and appreciate most commenters, and I know that they appreciate being able to comment in real time.

Therefore, I'm willing to do the unpleasant job of moderating to ensure that valued commenters can continue to have the opportunity to have their say. And, now that the site has matured, I think it's time for a little more civility and an emphasis on thoughtful commentary.

Feminists as Bolsheviks

Davd · 28 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Can a good look at Leninism and Stalinism help us improve on "Feminazi"?

Davd Martin,

September 2011

Feminism began (a rather unfriendly Feminist told me 30-40 years ago in Thunder Bay, Ontario) with a "Marxist class-analysis of gender relations". Feminists, she said, viewed men as a bourgeoisie and women as a proletariat. I don't recall her going on to assert "the dictatorship of the proletariat" as the Bolsheviks did, but it may have occurred to her. Other things she said indicated that she considered me—and men in general—unworthy of equality with her gender.

Marx foresaw the bourgeoisie shrinking (through financial competition) to a tiny minority, too small to hold power over a huge proletariat (which huge proletariat then took over.) In fact, the first "communist" government took power in Russia, where at the time there were: A small pre-industrial ruling class, a smaller, separate bourgeoisie, a rather small proletariat, and a peasant majority… which history that Thunder Bay Feminist knew, or ought to have known.

The Russian Marxist-Leninists who took power were known as the Bolsheviks—a word meaning, approximately, "the majority party". They claimed that name based on winning one particular vote; and they were skillful enough at propaganda that they managed to make Bolshevik their name. Two parallels with Feminism can be argued: Women do outnumber men [though not on as fluctuating a basis as votes in an assembly], and Feminists have been deadly skillful at propaganda and politicking. Trey Pennington and Tom Ball are two of their better-known victims.

"The dictatorship of the proletariat" in Russia and "her satellites" turned out to be a dictatorship of the bureaucracy (Djilas, 1957; Komarov, 1980). The average Soviet or Yugoslav proletarian probably was better off under [bureaucracy wearing the name of "communism"] than a pre-Soviet, Russian serf; and maybe as well off as a pre-Soviet, Russian peasant with enough land to feed his family but too little to think of having serfs of his own[1]. The bureaucrats lived and dictated, not as a proletariat but as a ruling class.

This is a blog and not a book, so the details of the analogy between Feminism and Bolshevism are too many "to go over". It does seem "obvious" to me, that Feminism rules through political intrigue and a bureaucracy which is more a ruling class than a representative of the population. It distorts facts in a manner reminiscent of Soviet-bloc "intellectualism" and government prose: This site and other men's sites have seen dozens, perhaps hundreds, of refutations of Feminist-promulgated invalid statistics, especially as to wage levels and gender violence. Sakharov, Solzhenitsyn, Djilas himself, were treated not that differently from how men are treated who challenge Feminism today. Marx may or not be amazed at how his vision has been warped; I am more than 90% sure he is disgusted—and i'm not even an admirer.

I don't even believe Marx, from his house-arrest somewhere between Purgatory[2] and Heaven, really approved of Lenin. (Nor do I believe Jesus approved of the Inquisition and the sack of Constantinople—bureaucracy is, my best guess anyway, inherently inclined toward evil. Distance bureaucracy from public control and you invite worse than mere "trouble".)

There are important flaws in the analogy. Marx's notion of the bourgeoisie shrinking though competition that evicts bourgeois "losers" into the proletariat, doesn't work with biological gender[3].

Women do constitute a majority of the adult population in many modern States, thanks largely to medical advances that have made death in childbirth and lactation, extremely rare. Men contributed immensely to those advances, and applauded them—we have been friendly to women most of the time, and with very few exceptions, we have been unfriendly only with good cause. A Bolshevik bourgeoisie is not so friendly to the proletariat… nor so nearly as large.

Those flaws must not be crucial, because the parallels are disquieting. Having beaten the Soviet system in the economic "cold war", the West finds itself today, arguably "more Soviet than the Russians"—subject to a bureaucratic ruling class that shamelessly misuses "gender equality" as Soviet bureaucrats and propagandists once misused "the dictatorship of the proletariat."[4] What must the old "anti-Communists" be thinking? Some of the old "communists", such as Djilas, Komarov, and Solzhenitsyn, warned us, not about Feminism perhaps, but definitely about bureaucracy.

In the "Soviet bloc", those who had Party membership were privileged, and those who had important Party offices and connections were very privileged. There isn't a major Feminist Party—at least, not yet—in Canada or the US; but there are elite networks within Feminism who get more of the benefits than ordinary women get, and who (one might infer from horror stories including Tom Ball, Timothy Emerson, and Vladek Filler) persecute enemies (the Soviet officials once sent theirs to Siberia.)

Bolshevism fell. Russia may not be a perfect democracy today—but neither is Canada or the USA. (Switzerland may well be the nearest thing to a perfect democracy among "nation-states", and Finland seems to do better than North America.) If we take notice of the substantial analogy between oppressive Bolshevism 25-75 years ago, and oppressive Feminism today, we might learn some useful ways to restore the democracy and freedom which Jefferson, Adams, Franklin and the rest, had in mind (as had the men of Uri, Schwyz and Unterwalden, as had Gabriel Dumont and Louis Riel).

At the least, i believe the analogy gives a valuable warning, and a valuable guide to attitude for us men.

Notes:

1. The word kulak, as best this non-Slav can tell, includes both "big peasants" who exploited the landless and those with too little land; and smallholders who were independent of exploitation but had only enough to live in modest security.
2. I doubt Purgatory exists—Orthodox Christianity regards it as a pagan importation made by Augustine of Hippo. Augustine was a Platonist before becoming Christian, and Orthodox scholars generally believe he mistakenly treated some of his early Pagan beliefs as Christian. However, Purgatory is a very handy, well-known image for where a merciful God might put an abrasive atheist who loved the poor, rather than throw him into Hell. Since i do serve Jesus Christ partly for His strong emphasis on love and mercy, i imagine Marx's Purgatory as resembling the house-arrest where Hitler wrote Mein Kampf (and better deserved than by Hitler, who i might imagine in Hell continuing his battle with Stalin, this time in their own bodies…?)
3 Homosexuals born boys, aren't women; and even "trans-sexuals" are anatomical contrivances who lack ovaries and uteri. We have not seen men becoming a tiny fraction of the human population in the States where Feminism has prospered (though a few Feminists have advocated reducing men to a small minority, i know of none having said it will occur by competition among men—certainly not by men turning other men into women.)

4. “The dictatorship of the proletariat” never actually existed. Might the same be true of gender equality, or at least of stable, enduring gender equality? I’m not going to judge, certainly not today.

French Feminists Object to “Mademoiselle”

W.F. Price · 29 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A French feminist group calling itself “La Barbe” (the beard) has taken a stance against the term mademoiselle, preferring that all women be called “madame.” Feminists say that the former carries negative connotations, and can result in women not being taken seriously. Back in the 1970s, American women similarly rebelled against convention by demanding that they not be referred to as “Mrs.”

Controlling language has been a favorite cause of feminists, not only because they appear to feel that calling people or things by different names can qualitatively change them, but also because it is often relevant to legal status and whether or not people are willing to give them what they want. In the US, this has led to all unmarried women with children being called simply “single mothers” regardless of the reason they are single, and has resulted in government and public support for single mothers whether they are at fault for their status or not. For example, most would agree that a widow deserves more support than a single mom by choice, but public policy no longer discriminates. This is really what is behind the feminist obsession with language.

Men tend not to understand what is going on here, because our family status cannot actually benefit us from a hiring/public policy perspective (although it can certainly harm us). However, when one relies on public largesse and opinion for jobs and benefits, these things take on much greater importance.

The reason American women rebelled against “Mrs.” was that employers generally didn’t want to take on married women, because they were seen as more likely to get pregnant and drop out of the workforce, and it was assumed that their husbands would support them in any event. Calling themselves “Ms.” gave them the opportunity to hide their marital status. According to French women, mademoiselle suggests frivolity and lack of maturity on the one hand, and is insulting to older unmarried women on the other (suggests they are old maids).

At its root, this desire to control language is about freedom to conceal and deceive. Feminists like to be able to manipulate others’ perceptions in order to portray themselves in the most convenient light at any given time. A feminist who was interested in a man at a social gathering would likely prefer to be referred to as Mademoiselle in that context, but when applying for a public sector job she would prefer Madame. The goal is endless options.

Police Put Pressure on Josh Powell by Removing his Children

W.F. Price · 29 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The travails of Josh Powell, who is a "person of interest" in his missing wife Susan's case, have been all over the local media in the Seattle area. Powell moved to Washington state shortly after his wife went missing in 2009. In these cases, spouses are naturally suspected, so Powell has been under a great deal of scrutiny for the last couple years, but so far absolutely no physical evidence has emerged to suggest that he harmed his wife, and without a body there's no conclusive evidence a crime was even committed.

Most recently, police arrested his father in a peeping tom investigation, following cooperation with West Valley Utah police to put pressure on Josh. His father, Steve Powell, has allegedly been taking naughty pictures of women and girls for some time.

In the wake of Steve Powell's arrest for voyeurism, Josh's children were removed from his custody, because they lived with Josh together with Steve, but the local media is reporting that the children have been removed because their father is under scrutiny in the missing person case. Although family courts have a great deal of leeway in taking children from parents, the legal reason for the removal of the kids is likely Steve Powell's arrest, as allowing police to essentially kidnap children when they merely suspect someone of a crime (and Josh has never even been named a suspect) would be too blatant an abuse of police power.

Nevertheless, removing the kids even for that reason is going too far, as Josh has neither been arrested nor charged with anything.

What appears to have happened recently is that Steve Powell, who worked for the Department of Corrections before his arrest, was sticking his thumb in the eye of the police. He had access to Susan Powell's diary, and was threatening to publish portions of it. He involved himself in the investigation, invited media attention, and generally acted in a provocative manner toward the cops. Police tend to hang together, so local police in Pierce County cooperated with Utah's West Valley PD to stick it to him, raiding his house and seizing his computers, in which they allegedly found illicit photos.

Cops really don't like it when people make them look bad, and the failure of the West Valley PD to find anything to pin on Josh Powell in his wife's disappearance was making some cops look pretty incompetent. Steve Powell was rubbing this in their face, hence the raid.

Now, the police have effectively punished Steve Powell, and they have succeeded in putting enormous pressure on Josh, who is broke, and given his reputation has no chance of finding work. In showing up at the custody hearing he argued without an attorney, and the judge, naturally, turned custody over to his wife's parents. This is a temporary custody hearing, but when men lose temporary custody hearings, they often turn out to be permanent — especially in Washington state. Furthermore, if Steve Powell is financially drained defending himself, Josh could well end up homeless, which would further complicate any efforts to get his children back.

Although the police went after Steve Powell in part because of his provocative antics, ultimately, the target is his son, Josh. This kind of pressure is designed to induce a confession, so the West Valley PD can achieve their goal of resolving the Susan Powell case. However, these tactics raise serious questions about police power in contemporary society. Should police use child dispossession as an investigation tactic? Should they take sides in custody cases? Cops and prosecutors know that there is no right to an attorney in these cases, so it's an easy end-run around basic protections.

When looking into "exceptions" to the US Constitution and Bill of Rights, many (if not most) of them are found in family law. Although Josh Powell's wife's disappearance could easily lead reasonable people to suspect him, it is exactly these cases that test human rights and civil liberty. All Americans supposedly have the right to due process, a fair trial, and the assumption of innocence. But what does any of this mean if the police can seize one's children merely for suspicion?

Tyranny has arrived in the guise of protecting women and children.

Nothing is more subversive than the truth

Dalrock · 30 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The culture war is over. Feminism won.

Feminism has completed its long march through the institutions of the west. Even the church is collaborating with an enthusiasm which would have made the Vichy French blush. The war is over. It is time to accept facts. Its all over but the crying.

Those looking for a leader to rally our forces and launch a bold new counterattack on feminism are misguided. There will still be opportunities for individuals and small groups to win isolated victories, but neither men nor women are going to take any meaningful action en masse. There simply are no institutions left which could facilitate this.

But the completeness of feminism's victory is also its core problem. They control all of the institutions, but we are still here. Millions of men and women still haven't accepted the mantra of feminism. Despite all of their efforts and having all levers of state and society available to them, the glorious new breed of woman they envisioned hasn't come to be. And she won't come to be. What more can feminists try except more of the same?

Now is the time for the insurgency. While there won't be mass coordinated action, this doesn't mean that individuals won't respond to the post feminist reality and make choices which are in their own best interest.

For men the key will be to avoid the worst effects of the sexual revolution and the corrupt family law system. This means only marrying a woman if she demonstrates the ability to keep her promise. Many men who understand the current landscape will choose not to marry. For such a man the options are to disengage from women entirely (MGTOW) or to learn enough game to tilt the uncommitted sexual marketplace in his favor. To the great dismay of sluts and social conservative women, those women looking to use uncommitted sex to manipulate men into falsely believing they have commitment will find the men with game (the men they most want) turning the tables on them. Their planned McFling with an unsuspecting paypal will turn unexpectedly into joining a soft harem or pump n dump. Their attempt to snare an unsuspecting beta provider after riding the carousel will be haunted by the prospect of the men who might turn their own con against them. But not all men will immediately learn about the realities of the post sexual revolution sexual marketplace (SMP), and still others will hear the truth but refuse to believe it. We can only try to educate men to make better choices. Some will listen, some will not. All we can do is remain prepared to patiently share the message to those who are ready to hear it.

For women the choice will be to make a conscious decision about how they want to participate in the SMP as well. Some will undoubtedly decide that marriage isn't important to them, and will knowingly ride the carousel. Others will decide that marriage really is important to them, and will take it seriously early on. Some will marry but then falsely assume they can continue to re-choose without consequence. Just like men, many will either not hear the message, or will refuse to accept the reality of it.

So the bad news is not all men and women can be helped, and we won't be able to spawn a mass cultural movement. The good news is we don't need to convert anyone else to be successful. We have an essential advantage; our message happens to be the truth. We don't need to win the argument. The truth is the truth, whether others believe it or not. Feminists need to convince everyone that their view of the world is correct, or individuals will continue to peel off to follow their own best interest. All we have to do to win is accept the truth, and act in our own best interest. Ideally we should attempt to help others with this as well. If we can do this, we will change the culture one good choice at a time. However, we don't need to convince others of anything to take practical measures for ourselves.

This isn't to say that all of the effects of feminism and the sexual revolution can be merely ignored. The laws and courts are still biased. Men will continue to have their children taken away and their role as father reduced to that of walking wallet. Other men will be forced to pay support for children they never fathered. Other men will be falsely accused of rape or domestic violence, and face a legal system designed to placate feelings over justice. This is all true, and will remain true until and unless enough of the population acknowledges the truth. In the meantime, all we can do is figure out the best way to protect ourselves, our families, and (if they are willing to listen) as many other men and women as possible.

But what do you say to a man who is about to marry an alcoholic party girl, foolishly thinking that putting a ring on her finger will turn her into a wife? And what do you say to a young woman who is ready to choose the allure of the carousel instead of taking the search for a husband (and her own chastity) seriously from the beginning? You of course should try to help them see the light, and try to be patient as they resist the uncomfortable truth. If you can convince them, fantastic! This is one more life spared (or at least somewhat sheltered from) the awful effects of feminism. If not, their election not to take the wise path actually makes it easier for another man or woman to do so. Each man who marries a party girl leaves a virtuous woman available for another to marry. Each woman who rides the carousel leaves another greater beta available for a virtuous woman to marry.

Life's wisdom delivered in a joke.

> You fool. You can't outrun a bear!

His partner replied:

> I don't have to outrun the bear. I only have to outrun you.

Utopian Dreams

Featured Guest · 30 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

by Ken Knight

Much has been written and spoken in regards to the failed doctrines of communism, socialism, fascism, and feminism which will fill volumes and make for endless hours on any college speaking circuit. Personally, I take the "Ferris Bueller" approach: "I don't condone fascism or any 'ism' for that matter," as the character in the movie joked.

The one thing all of the "ism's" have in common is their purported "dream" for humanity and the future society to come out of following its tenants and "savior" doctrines.

Pipe Dreams have a way of getting out of hand and for the most part should remain in the confines of one's imagination due to the simple realization of humankind's base nature being what it is. That Quixotic dream of a "Utopia" still haunts mankind like a scar that won't completely heal, and there are legions of people who for one reason or another (often to try quenching a personal insecurity!) embrace a Utopian dream such as Communism, Nazism, Feminism, Theism, etc. holding fast to the idea that they can affect the future and "save" their fellow human beings and make life "better" as they see fit for generations to come. Whether it be financial and social salvation of the working-class or "saving" the white race from an existential threat, or perhaps "saving" the souls of everyone around them for God, many people will take up such banners and sacrifice everything they have in pursuit of their cause no matter how unpopular such a "cause" is in the mainstream populace. What drives such an obsession on the personal level? The possibility of success at the end of the tunnel…though I suspect the original Bolsheviks – who numbered no more than 25 originally – didn't see the axe swinging once a blood-thirsty dictator named Josef Stalin took their "cause" to the extreme.

For most of the population experiencing such Utopian Dreamers who eventually delight in FORCING their dreamy agendas upon the general public once the jig is up and the bullshit actually doesn't work very well (i.e. communist collectivism) the "Utopia" becomes a Dystopia! Though it may sound "reactionary", I think it is the right-thinking man's duty to remain watchful of and guard against extremist "causes" that creep into the mainstream however most people do not and before they know it, tyranny is sitting in the big chair and the public is wondering what the hell happened while they were asleep?! Feminism for example, has become more "evolutionary" than overt revolutionary in its crawling progress toward complete hegemony over the West, showing up in the folds of mainstream court decisions, media entertainment, and even workplace etiquette to the point where most men never saw it coming until such unfair practices and one-sided policies became enforceable law. "Give a mouse a cookie, it's gonna want a glass of milk!" as the old saying goes. Once the blood of the "enemy" of such a "cause" is tasted, the revolutionaries only want more and more….justified by past "victimhood" and nowadays in the name of "safety" Whoever doesn't like "safety" please stand up!

Is it entirely a "male" point of view that encompasses LIBERTY as defined by the coolest cats in our history, the American Forefathers? Is it a man's point of view that there are inherent inequalities in life one has to accept or work around to achieve a life one is suited for and can enjoy? I may not drive a Porsche like my neighbor, I may not have a 12-inch tool or a girlfriend who posed in Playboy® nor may I be a Movie Star or the CEO of a Brewing Company, but hey…fair (fare) is what I pay to get on the Bus! Maybe it is an entirely male point of view, but it makes me remember the quote from Teddy Roosevelt: "Far better it be to dare mighty things than to take rank with those poor timid creatures who know neither victory nor defeat". If Teddy wasn't referring to "manginas" I'll eat my cigar…

Realistically, all one needs is an open field of opportunity (as Libertarians speak about but rarely get quoted on) where you begin at the starting line of life and take off all on your own accord to win, lose, draw, or flush….no hand-outs, no guarantees, no special rights or quotas, nothing at the expense of others, and the only thing that is enforced upon individuals is one's own responsibility (or lack thereof). However, this "Agoge" credo is not acceptable to those legions of people whom inherently fear life and its endless dangers, uncertainties, unfairness, meanness, and sometimes catastrophic consequences that may or may not affect them as individuals.

Many want the Utopian Dream of total “fairness” enforced by the State so that they as individuals do not have to worry about discrimination, financial collapse, or the inherent differences between men and women, and when some politico tyrant-wannabe offers such a plan for Utopian fairness and future dreams of easier living, they vote that way!

Karl Marx is over a hundred years in his grave, Susan Sontag and Betty Friedan no longer with us, but the alluring “Utopian Dreams” continue to be formulated, mapped out, and acted upon with clever processes by people who think they have their fellow humans in mind as they try to implement such foolish designs one way or the other!

When the rest of the populace resists, the iron glove of tyranny gets pulled out of the old dusty drawer once again… how dare the masses disagree with such a grand plan for their own salvation?!

California Prison Program Granting Mothers Early Release — Fathers Need Not Apply

W.F. Price · 1 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As budget cuts force reductions in corrections budgets, America's love affair with incarceration is starting to fade, and for the first time in four decades the prison population is actually shrinking. The incarceration rate is so high in California that inmates are packed together like sardines, with prisons and jails far over capacity, leading courts to demand reduction.

To save money and ease crowding, California has decided to release women, specifically mothers, despite the fact that far more fathers are incarcerated than mothers. In an interview with KCRA news, the constitutionality and fairness of the program was questioned, but CA Department of Corrections spokesperson Dana Toyoma said "we don't have the resources" for fathers. This has got to be a lie, because not only could the state save more by releasing imprisoned fathers, who are far more numerous, it will have to spend more on social services for the mothers upon release, because mothers consume far more social welfare than fathers.

Mexico City Assemblyman Proposes Temporary Marriage Contracts

W.F. Price · 2 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a surprisingly frank piece of legislation designed to deal with divorce, Mexico City assemblyman Leonel Luna has introduced a bill that would allow temporary marriage contracts with agreements on property and child custody in the event that the marriage does not work out in the first few years. The idea is to avoid the trouble inherent in divorce, but such a setup could have other implications as well.

Although traditionalists may frown on this kind of arrangement, renewable contracts could remove some of the advantages of divorce that wives typically enjoy, especially if the contracts were enforceable in regards to custody and and property. Couples whose marriages work out could renew the contract.

Temporary marriage contracts are an interesting idea that could have significant influence on the behavior of wives, who would be obliged to at least make some attempt to be accommodating if they counted on their husbands for support. Rather than increase the divorce rate, my hunch is that they would actually reduce it, given that the overwhelming majority of divorces are initiated by women.

Occupy Wall Street Protests: Real Movement or More Party Politics?

W.F. Price · 2 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of the biggest problems with post-60s American activism is that protest movements have been consistently encapsulated by elites and professional activists. In the 60s, the huge protests against the Vietnam War were driven by the draft, which was highly unpopular at the time. However, the narrative young people are presented with today minimizes this very important, populist component of civil unrest, giving, for example, the feminist and gay rights movements equal consideration, despite the fact that these causes simply hitched a ride on the much larger and more powerful anti-war movement. The most massive and effective protests of the 1960s, including the half-million strong Moratorium Protest in DC in 1969 were, essentially, draft protests. Since then, protests have tended to be conducted by and for minority interest groups, and have had little populist appeal.

Today, we don't have a draft, and casualties in our foreign wars are nowhere near as high as they were in Vietnam, so the issues young people face are qualitatively different. Most importantly, the young are burdened with debt and poor employment prospects, and they live in an extraordinarily repressive environment that would have been foreign to young activists of the 1960s. Ironically, many of the young protesters of the 1960s went on to occupy positions of power a generation later, and they then created the most comprehensive police state the US has ever known. Today, incarceration remains near its all-time high of a couple years ago, the Constitution is regularly ignored, and young people routinely start out in life indebted to the federal government. It's a pretty lousy time to be young, and it's clear who is responsible for this: the three most recent occupants of the White House are definitely among them.

But amazingly, the young protesters tend to be involved with exactly the same people and policies that have created this situation, and this undermines the legitimacy of their protests. An article from the Crains New York points to the SEIU as being heavily involved in the protests, and the SEIU is a major Obama supporter:

> Some of the biggest players in organized labor are involved in planning for Wednesday's demonstration, either directly or through coalitions. The United Federation of Teachers, 32BJ SEIU, 1199 SEIU, Workers United, Transport Workers Union Local 100 and the Communications Workers of America are all expected to participate. The Working Families Party is helping to organize the march, and MoveOn.org is expected to mobilize its extensive online regional networks to drum up support.

Americans have a lot to be upset about these days. Civil rights abuses have been escalating for nearly a generation now, but they have been largely supported as the majority tended to see them as little threat. However, now that joblessness has reached a critical level and ordinary people have cause to protest, they are finding themselves attacked by the police and arrested en masse.

For divorced men and non-custodial fathers, the police state is nothing new. Civil rights abuses and involuntary debt are entirely familiar. Arrest and incarceration is a constant threat. Although the young people protesting Wall Street may have entirely different issues on their minds, they are reacting to similar circumstances. When the state is allowed to act in a repressive manner toward one group of people, it tends to extend this to others over time, and the US government has taken full advantage of "innovations" in family law, the war on drugs, and the war on terror to treat its citizens like serfs. Deals between politicians and corporations have also granted disproportionate power to big business, which has subsequently introduced even more control over workers in the private sector, where employees are regularly subject to intrusions into their private lives.

The students and youths who are protesting Wall Street certainly have a right to complain, but in collaborating with organizations closely allied with the President and party politics they are playing right into the hands of those in power. Neither the left nor the right – Democrats or Republicans – have done anything substantial to stop the rising tide of the police state and the reduction of the American people to peonage. Young men and women who value their freedom and economic security must first oppose government power, which has grown tremendously in a short period of time and has had disastrous effects on both our economy and civil liberties.

As man who has faced the business end of the police state first-hand, I would stand with the young protesters in solidarity, but if they are simply stumping for the powers that be I want no part of it.

Amanda Knox Freed on Appeal

W.F. Price · 3 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Amanda Knox, the young American woman tried and convicted in Perugia, Italy for the 2007 slaying of her roommate Meredith Kercher, has been released following an appeal. The appeal saw her murder conviction overturned due to shoddy police work and questions about DNA evidence used to convict her.

Knox, who was a 20-year-old exchange student when arrested, was very much in the public eye during the original trial. Every detail of her private life was scrutinized in the press, and her behavior and online antics, which were fairly typical for an American college girl, served to paint a damning picture of the young woman. She was portrayed as vicious, frequently intoxicated and a shameless slut; essentially how the rest of the world sees American women.

Despite the circumstantial evidence pointing to Knox, such as the garbled “confession” and her allegedly odd behavior during the investigation, I was always skeptical of the story the prosecution told – that of a satanic blood ritual sparked by jealous rage – and preferred the simpler explanation that implicated Rudy Guede as a lone assailant. Amanda Knox certainly could have been involved, as Kercher was her roommate and her alibi was shaky, but it just doesn’t seem as though such a brutal murder involving multiple stab wounds and spraying blood could have occurred without an abundance of physical evidence, and the evidence police relied on to make their case was found to be entirely insufficient.

If Knox is innocent, then justice has been served, but lest we forget, innocent men are released from our prisons every single year without anywhere near the fanfare that has accompanied the Knox case. There are, without a doubt, thousands of innocent men languishing in America’s prisons and jails. This fact has far more moral significance than the reversal of Knox’s conviction, but is shamefully underreported by the press, which attaches far greater weight to the salacious details of a young American woman’s sex life.

Dr. Who – the last positive male role model on television?

J. DeVoy · 3 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Jay DeVoy is an attorney focusing on First Amendment issues and regular contributor to the award-winning law blog The Legal Satyricon.

I remember when I was very young and my father introduced me to Dr. Who. My first recollections of watching the show begin around 3 or 4 years old, but I'm sure he exposed me to it before then. This was in the days before cable was widely available, and I hadn't learned the value of harmless escapism. Two decades later, having entered my father's profession, and watching hardly any television or movies in my free time, I still watch Dr. Who to relax. And with Steven Moffat running the show for the last two years, I often feel like a child, as an impossibly complex and dramatic sequence is resolved in an obvious-though-seemingly-impossible conclusion.

For those unfamiliar with the show, The Doctor (his name is unknown, thus the semi-eponymous title "Dr. Who") does not die, but instead regenerates any time he is critically injured. This allows the franchise to continue beyond any one actor, and the character to evolve, as different facets of the Doctor character are explored with each one of its iterations. To date, the Doctor has been depicted by 11 actors, the latest and current one of which is Matt Smith (the "11th Doctor").

The 11th Doctor. Promotional image courtesy BBC; all rights reserved to same.

The Doctor is a classic hero, one who comforts the afflicted – saving them from situational and often intra-dimensional harms – and fights against classical enemies representing oppression and evil. In one episode, the Doctor will travel through space and time to help a young boy overcome his fear of his wardrobe closet – which, of course, has an extraterrestrial twist that endangers everyone else on the show. Over longer arcs, the Doctor will fight Daleks and the Cybermen, competing robot factions seeking to eliminate and convert all life forms in the universe, respectively. Still other threats that the Doctor fights, such as religious fanaticism that aims to kill the Doctor himself so that he cannot challenge the sect's dominance over space and time, represent the Doctor character's equity and pursuit of the common good.

The Doctor's positive traits are innumerable but subtle. He is skilled with technology and navigation. While a bit awkward and bumbling – due more to the professorial nature the character has assumed under Smith's tenure – the Doctor is not an oaf and is not depicted as a dull white male, nor is his physique unnaturally exaggerated like most protagonists'. The Doctor is loyal to his companions and allies, though strategic enough to know when debts must be called in, and prudent in placing his friends out of harm's way when necessary. Most importantly, the Doctor is fallible. He errs. He fails to protect them close to himself, and he appropriately feels remorse – but does not let it consume him or derail him from his tremendous duties to save humanity.

This is in stark comparison to… Are there comparable shows on television these days? Are there similar movie protagonists. Even the fictional characters who ultimately do the right thing in American popular culture, such as Homer Simpson and Hank Hill, are besieged with inherent flaws. Homer is cavalier in his stupidity and, while entertaining, is demoralizing to males. Hank Hill is less flawed, but the victim of naivete most men – and most people – wish they could embrace. Hank is an optimist who believes in the system, and that public officials a) care, and b) are there to serve the public good. While small components in the pastiche of Hank's character, they are flaws that anyone who has lived in the last 40 years, and especially men – men who have suffered through divorce, the loss of their children, and ruinous alimony and child support payments that were used for anything but their intended purposes – cannot believe.

What makes the Doctor particularly surprising, though, is that he is a product of the BBC. Granted, the Doctor is a holdover from his creation in the early 1960′s, and his consistent portrayal as a white male likely owes more to the British regard for tradition and institutions than the prevailing political beliefs of the show's writers. (See also, the royal family.) Still, in a country that all but antagonizes men – particularly fathers victimized by divorce – and blames them for all stripes of social ills (while rabidly defending culpable women), it is impressive to see that a positive role model can emerge in a position so prominent in Britain's pop culture and national psyche. Even if he is an anachronism, we are desperately in need for more role models like the Doctor.

Invisible Men: Mark Simpson's Male Impersonators and the Misandry of Gender Studies

Featured Guest · 4 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Quiet Riot Girl

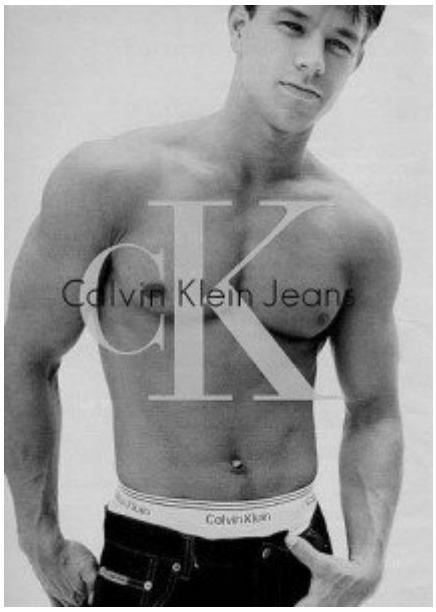
Tom Martin is becoming quite well know in the feminist and anti-feminist blogosphere. He has taken the unprecedented action of suing a Gender Studies department – the renowned LSE Gender Institute in London, UK – for discrimination against men. As Martin has said:

'When "women's studies" became "gender studies" departments, it signalled a new era of inclusion for men's issues – a rejection of this now is a betrayal of men and equality.'

I have a PhD in gender studies, and my view is that no matter what the subject is called, it will always be based on feminist dogma, and on a misandrist view of the world. Again, as Martin has pointed out:

'Patriarchy theory – the idea that men typically "dominate" women – is omnipresent, when research shows women tend to boss men interpersonally. Texts highlight misogyny but never misandry, its anti-male equivalent'.

It is in the light of this bias in gender studies that I came to read Mark Simpson's 1994 classic Male Impersonators . And to examine how and why it has been omitted from the reading lists of gender studies courses, including modules on 'masculinity'.



'Marky Mark' Wahlberg was famous for being a Calvin Klein model back in 1994

In Male Impersonators, Simpson undresses the idea of the 'natural man' and shows us how men perform masculinity, in popular culture in particular. Gay strippers and drag artists, 'macho' body builders, pornography, sport, The War Movie, reality television, rock and roll. They all reveal, as examined by Simpson, the complexities and subtexts of modern masculinities. One of the many striking things about reading this book in 2011, seventeen years after it was first published, was that it seemed as 'fresh' and new as it must have done in 1994. I think this can only be because the subject it focuses on- men, and their representation in culture, is one that has been ignored and distorted by subsequent gender theory, and by day to day feminism.
Feminism has done three things particularly in relation to masculinity that relate to how gender studies has come to ignore and belittle men's experiences and perspectives. And these three things explain why books such as Male Impersonators are not on gender studies reading lists:

1) Whatabouttehwimmin?

Feminism has been based on the assumption that men are 'catered for' by society at large, and within academia, and so any treatment of gender has been focused on the disadvantages faced by women, and how women have been 'omitted' from research, arts, literature, history etc.

An example of this assumption can be found in another book published in 1994 –Angela McRobbie's Postmodernism and Popular Culture. The book has many discussions of women, girls and 'femininity', but look for 'masculinity' in the index and you will draw a blank. She justifies this glaring omission with statements such as this one:

'It is in buying and selling clothes that girls and young women have been most active. The male bias of subcultural analysis has relegated these activities to the margins…'

(McRobbie 1994:163). (my emphasis).

2) Men are Monsters

Feminism, when it has considered masculinity, has tended to treat it as 'a problem'. Heterosexual masculinity in particular has been 'pathologised' by feminist gender academics, with heterosexual men being portrayed as the oppressors of everyone else: hetero women, queer women, queer men. In 1995, Raewyn Connell (Then Robert W Connell) published Masculinities, and this became the 'bible' of masculinity studies. Its core idea of 'Hegemonic masculinity' gave the 'problem of heterosexual men' a fancy name.

The idea that straight men have power that they use to oppress women in particular, has been used by feminist writers such as Elaine Rapping, an American media and film analyst, to justify statements such as this:

'Everywhere you look there are books, movies, discussions and news reports about male violence… Faced with the deadly serious question: 'why are men such creeps?'…' (Rapping, 1993:114)

3) 'Masculinity' is Gay

The only aspect of masculinity that feminism has allowed to be considered without completely dismissing its value, has been 'queer' masculinities, and this has been left to 'queer theory' and considered an issue for gay men to worry about. Mark Simpson for example tends to be categorised as a 'gay' writer on 'gay' men's issues, and when he is mentioned in books about masculinity, it is often in relation to his work on gay pornography. Feminist writers suggest there is a definite line between 'straight' and 'gay' men, and in doing so they are endorsing 'gay' men as somehow better than straight men, suggesting they deserve consideration as people, not just 'oppressors'. But at the same time they are marginalising any positive representation of masculinity into the box of 'queer theory'. In other words, feminism suggests that taking an active interest in men and masculinity is 'gay' in itself.

Mark Simpson's Male Impersonators is an interesting case study then, because, far from actually ignoring it, feminist academics have in fact taken its ideas and effectively stolen them and manipulated them for their own, feminist ends. In doing so they have 'erased' Simpson himself, by deliberately failing to cite his work in their bibliographies.

A number of feminist academics have made it clear they must have read Male Impersonators, but have not acknowledged just how much his book has 'inspired' them, and in some cases have not mentioned Simpson at all.

The most well-known of these is probably Susan Faludi. Her book Stiffed: The Betrayal of the American Man, published in 2000, the year after Bordo's The Male Body, certainly draws on the themes introduced by Simpson in Male Impersonators.

In particular, Faludi's chapters on 'hood ornaments' – men's newfound 'decorative' role in culture, and 'waiting for wood'- men in pornography, seem to owe a great deal to Simpson's Male Impersonators. Anecdotal evidence tells of an interview with Faludi, where Simpson's name was brought up and she declared 'Oh Mark Simpson. I'm his biggest fan!' But not such a big fan that she could include his book in her huge bibliography.

Other academics who have obviously drawn on Male Impersonators with little or no reference to Simpson include

Susan Bordo, whose The Male Body (1999) completely ripped off Simpson's earlier book (I explain how here), Germaine Greer (2003), Ros Gill et al, (2005), Harris (2007) Eric Anderson et al (2009) and Hall (2010).

Though its lack of recognition saddens me, there is something about the fact that Male Impersonators is a 'lost' treasure that makes it so much more precious. Not only does it seem as radical now in its ideas as it was when it was written 17 years ago, but it also provides a clue to 'how we got here'. The book is particularly precious to me because the thing that has been hidden from view and from our understanding, the thing it uncovers, is something I love dearly: men.

Male Impersonators gives us a clue to why David Beckham is now such an iconic man.

Male Impersonators blows the lid off our preconceptions and the lies we tell ourselves about men and masculinity. It blew it off back in 1994, but feminists and gender academics and 'masculinity experts' and queer theorists have spent the last seventeen years trying to force it back on. Unfortunately they succeeded.
But Male Impersonators is back and it is as explosive and as dangerous as ever. Maybe they won't be able to get the lid back on this time. I hope not, for all our sakes.

Metrosexy by Mark Simpson is out now on Amazon Kindle. Male Impersonators is being re-released soon in the same format.

Quiet Riot Girl is an anti-feminist blogger with a keen interest in men and masculinity. It is that interest in fact, which turned her into an anti-feminist.

Men's Issues on The Simpsons

W.F. Price · 4 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When something appears on The Simpsons, you know it's finally become part of the mainstream consciousness, so I was happily surprised to see that the last two episodes aired were about exactly what we've been discussing on men's sites for a while now. In fact, the first episode – a brand new one – was actually sympathetic.

In the October 2nd 2011 episode, titled "Bart Stops to Smell the Roosevelts," superintendent Chalmers accepts Principal Skinner's challenge to educate Bart. Here's the plot synopsis on Wikipedia:

> Principal Skinner challenges superintendent Gary Chalmers to take over the education of Bart after one of his pranks leads to a school fundraiser debacle. Meanwhile, Chalmers takes an unconventional approach to teaching American history which sparks a fascination of President Theodore Roosevelt. Encouraged by the educational renaissance of Bart, Chalmers takes Bart and his band of "Rough Riders" on an overnight excursion to Springfield Forest, however after a minor accident, the school administration fires Chalmers for taking the boys on an unauthorized field trip. Determined to get Chalmers' job back, Bart and the boys hold the school hostage until the administration reinstates Chalmers, and they stand up for the teacher who made a meaningful impact to them.

What isn't included in the Wikipedia writeup is that the show dealt directly with the feminization of schools and how it negatively affects boys. It also included a few jokes about how degrading marriage can be in contemporary America (Marge frequently forces Homer to monitor the boys for what she considers suspicious, boy-type behavior).

The next episode aired was from last winter (Feb. 13, 2011), and featured elements of Game. Titled "The Blue and the Gray," it portrayed Homer as a "wingman" and Marge as a crazy cat lady.

Plot synopsis:

> After spending another Valentine's Day alone, Moe attends a seminar led by Dr. Kissingher in the hopes of gaining more confidence with women. Moe takes the doctor's advice and asks Homer to be his wingman. Meanwhile, Marge discovers her first gray hairs and surprises both her family and the neighborhood by going completely gray and sporting a brand new mature hairdo, but Bart is not humored when the neighborhood kids tease him about Marge's look. Later, Marge confronts Homer when she learns that he is becoming increasingly popular with the young ladies, but Homer helps Marge realize that he only has eyes for her and proves that love is still in the Springfield air.

The Blue and the Gray panned Game a bit, including a Game coach (Dr. Kissingher) and concepts such as the "cockblock." It was a light-hearted episode, and notable only in that it included material straight from the world of PUAs and Game writers.

However, the October 2nd episode had a message that was both positive toward masculinity and critical of the way boys are educated and their needs overlooked. I was encouraged to see this, especially the sympathetic treatment of Chalmers and the boys. Perhaps even pop culture is starting to wake up to the fact that there's something good about men being men and boys being boys, and that it's time for us to take a more critical look at the effects of institutionalized feminism.

North Carolina Courts' Odd Interpretation of Equal Protection Clause

W.F. Price · 5 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Eugene Volokh, a law professor and prolific blogger who writes about interesting and controversial legal issues of our time, exposes the North Carolina crime of "Assault on a Female," which, all else being equal, can result in significantly more jail time than a similar assault on a male. However, women are not only granted a greater degree of protection, but more leeway as well: only men can face more serious sentences as a result of assaulting a female.

Volokh explains:

> North Carolina, it turns out, makes "[a]ssault[ing] a female" a class A1 misdemeanor, if the attacker is "a male person at least 18 years of age"; female-on-male, male-on-male, and female-on-female assaults are generally class 2 misdemeanors. This can translate into a substantial difference in sentencing — for instance, someone who has no prior convictions would face up to 60 days in jail for a class A1 misdemeanor, but only up to 30 days for a class 2. And the statute seems to be used often; searching for "assault #on #a female" & date(= 2010), for instance, uncovered 37 appellate cases just last year.

One thing I like about Volokh is that he is consistent and strict in his interpretation of law, and that, at least, does not work against men. Courts routinely give women greater consideration despite the fact that laws are often written to appear neutral in regards to sex, but where there's a clear example of discrimination (e.g. VAWA's name), the result will obviously be worse. Often, the best we can hope for is a moral victory, which could be achieved through consistency in interpretation of the law, but even that often eludes us.

Below, Volokh offers his opinion that the North Carolina law is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's findings in Equal Protection Clause cases:

> I don't think this is consistent with the Supreme Court's Equal Protection Clause cases, both before 1979 (Craig v. Boren (1976)) and since (United States v. Virginia (1996)); but North Carolina courts obviously disagree with me.

Reader Responses to Bill Bennett's "Man Up" Piece

W.F. Price · 5 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A number of readers brought up an article penned by former Secretary of Education William "Bill" Bennett, a conservative pundit who has evidently been living in a cave for most of his adult life. Bennett addressed the crisis besetting men – young men in particular – by telling them to get a job and get married. he concluded, naturally, with "It's time for men to man up." Although it has always annoyed me when leftists refer to religious Americans as "American Taliban," Bennett, who has expressed approval of the idea of suspending habeas corpus and beheading narcotics offenders, may actually fit the bill.

I like to give people the benefit of the doubt, but if one assumes Bennett means well here we'll also have to assume that he's either been completely isolated from reality for the last 40-odd years, or has developed an age-related cognitive impairment. All one has to do to see the utter futility of his advice is turn on daytime TV or take a look at the women's magazines on the rack at the grocery store, but Bennett blithely proposes the idea that young men can overcome two generations of feminist depredations by grabbing the nearest woman and saying "I do."

Bill Bennett is showing signs of a peculiar affliction that has a tendency to strike aging, socially conservative males. The condition results in a selective sort of aphasia, which deprives them of the ability to understand what is coming out of women's mouths, and even renders them unable to consciously perceive any nonverbal cues, such as exposed cleavage, pumps, or even lack of underpants.

For example, men with this disease are unable to distinguish between a fat, heavily made-up babymomma screeching on TV and an image of the Blessed Virgin Mary. It may be that Bennett's problem involves this particular condition, which remains unnamed (although I would propose "dinosauric dementia" until some bright young researcher comes up with a medically recognized term).

But rather than speculate on what exactly is wrong with Bill Bennett, the man, I should let the readers themselves expose what is wrong with his article. Below are some selected passages that do a good job of deconstructing the nonsense:

First, Lyn87 (full comment here):

> I just read the article by that bloviator Bill "Lucky 7s" Bennett. Since he claims to speak for guys like me (Christian, conservative), I thought I'd give a brotha' a little help and clarify a few things for him:
> > While women are graduating college and finding good jobs,
>
> By which he means, "Jobs that pay far more than they're worth, like the glorified babysitting that passes for primary education, teaching worthless subjects to undergrads, or shuffling papers in an HR department."
> > This has led some to ask: do we even need men?
>
> Well, unless you want society to regress to the point where everyone is living in grass huts, then, yes, Bill, you do.
> > So what's wrong? Increasingly, the messages to boys about what it means to be a man are confusing. The machismo of the street gang calls out with a swagger.
> Since mothers routinely use judges to eject fathers from the family, and schools react to masculine behavior by boys with massive doses of Ritalin, where will boys get different messages?
> > Video games, television and music offer dubious lessons to boys who have been abandoned by their > fathers.

> And by “abandoned” he means, “Ejected from the lives of their children by the legal profession acting on behalf of women who initiate most divorces.”
> [...]
> > We may need to say to a number of our twenty-something men, “Get off the video games five hours a day, get yourself together, get a challenging job and get married.”
> Get a job to support a family from which you may be ejected for any reason or no reason at all? Get married to an Ameriskank who is likely to take your children, and your income? Really?

And, GT66 (full comment):

> Men have been legislatively forced to play ball with one hand tied behind their backs; castigated as oppressors and rapists and pedophiles to the point that many men fear for their freedom just by leaving the house; badgered into corners of the work force with “harassment” hysteria, blacklisted on campuses across the country for being the wrong gender, run out of the church and all but locked out of any rational dialogue…
> Men are walking away in droves, going ghost, striking marriage and letting the ship wander in ever more hostile seas because the thanks for putting up with any of it boils down to attitudes expressed by types like the pack of hateful shrews on the View or the Talk or whatever inane program it was laughing over a man having his penis severed by his deranged wife, by clowns like Maria Shriver gloating over the marginalization of men, by giving national attention to the hypocrisy of feminist “equality” and the lie that violence is never okay in a relationship unless it happens to men…
> Ever seen a ribbon campaign for fighting prostate cancer? See any women wringing their hands that 95% of workplace deaths are male? That three times as many men commit suicide as women? That more men suffer from mental illness? That more men suffer drug addiction? That more men are victims of violence? That more men are homeless? And with all this, the best you can do is be another platitude spewing doofus admonishing men to “man up?” Well we did, by walking away from angry hateful fools, rigged games and sucker’s bets and finding peace for ourselves. We don’t refuse to grow up. We refuse to be society’s pinata…

Both are strong responses, and worth reading in their entirety. Maybe if enough men have the courage to raise their voices in this manner, those in high positions will eventually hear them. That’s really the point of this site, and it’s inspiring to see the conviction and passion behind the above comments.

The Childishness of the Public Discourse About Rape pierceharlan · 6 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I stumbled upon an assertion posited with such in-your-face buffoonery that it encapsulates the childishness of the entire current public discourse about sexual assault. Abbey Francis, Class of 2014 and Opinions Editor of the Wesleyan Argus, posited the following breathtaking assertion, in print, no less: "One partner seductively convincing another to have sex might indeed be romantic—but if the person being convinced instead feels coerced, it's sexual assault." See here: http://wesleyanargus.com/2011/09/15/the-new-rules-reexamined/

Read it again: if she "feels" coerced, it's sexual assault.

You see, for too many gender warriors who happily spew their uninformed opinions all over us, sexual assault is not a crime that needs to be defined with sufficient due process specificity to put the public on notice about the conduct it proscribes, it is a 1970s mood ring, a free floating clearinghouse designed to redress any sexual encounter deemed unsatisfactory at the caprice and whim of a self-anointed victim.

But, of course, what else should we expect? We are stranded in an era where gross distortions of the truth about rape–from "women don't lie about rape," to "one-in-four college women are raped" (sometimes it's "one-in-four Freshman women before Thanksgiving" or "one-in-four women by the time they enter college," or" one-in-three women" or "one-in-five women" or "one-in-six women" or any number of other manifestations of this canard), to "only two percent of rape claims are false"–have become the accepted narrative. Where "take back the night" participants stomp about shouting angry, puerile slogans into a bullhorn. And where young men shakily "walk a mile in her shoes," thinking they are actually making a difference about rape instead of what they're really doing, helping the sexual grievance industry justify its existence.

Diatribes replace dialogue. Ranting at one another replaces reasoning together. Lashing out replaces listening. And anyone who dares to take issue with any of it is deemed not just backward — in a good old-fashioned progressive "guns and religion" sense – but evil, too. Few things engender as much anger as telling the truth about rape. To quote Ronald Reagan talking about Jimmy Carter, "I sometimes think he's like the witch doctor that gets mad when a good doctor comes along with a cure that'll work."

And it isn't just extreme leftists. The other side that insists all rape claims are lies is scarcely any more intelligent, it's just not as smug about it. (And, frankly, it's voice has been so marginalized in the public discourse, it's not worth giving it equal time in this post.)

When it comes to rape, it is difficult enough to maintain that delicate balance between (1) punishing the guilty, and (2) insuring the innocent aren't punished with them, without having to entertain the idiocy of extremists on either end who would insist only one half of that balance is at all pertinent. But idiocy is the hallmark of the public discourse on rape, and it's time to elevate the dialogue to an adult level.

Let's focus on two of the more complicated areas where there needs to be an adult discussion.

Sexual Coercion

Colleges are branding certain behavior that has never been classified as criminal as "sexual misconduct" in an effort to construct a progressive, supposedly female-friendly, sexual utopia. Perhaps the most extreme manifestation of this trend is found in the effort to punish males for engaging in consensual sexual behavior obtained by emotional or verbal "pressuring" (e.g., cajoling, coaxing, or nagging). Such conduct is punished even though the woman assented to have sex, was not physically threatened, and had reasonable alternatives to engaging in sex but chose not to exercise them. Despite the fact that the policies are gender neutral, men have a monopoly on being punished for these purported offenses.

In the Department of Education's infamous April 4 "Dear Colleague" letter addressed to American institutions of higher learning, the Obama administration made clear that "sexual coercion" is a form of sexual harassment covered under Title IX.

What's wrong with making sexual coercion an offense?

First, by punishing men for sex procured by emotional and verbal pressuring, colleges are lumping into the definition of sexual assault acts long considered by law to be consensual. Men who do what society has been telling them to do for decades — ask for sex — are punished for asking in a boorish, immature, selfish, or annoying manner. And, no, I am not condoning such behavior, I'm merely asserting that, like many things I find morally reprehensible, it should not be made a punishable offense.

The closest concept in the common law to sexual coercion is duress, a concept employed to invalidate contracts. Duress need not involve a loaded gun pointed at someone's head with a threat that "either your brains or your signature will be on the contract" per The Godfather. A contract is voidable for duress if a victim's manifestation of assent has been induced by an improper threat, and if the victim has no reasonable alternative but to agree. At the very least, that last part — the "no reasonable alternative" – is missing from sexual coercion.

The only pertinent inquiry should be whether the woman manifested consent to engage in the sex act when she had a reasonable alternative not to. Once such consent is found, Big Brother/Sister should stay out of the bedroom. In the absence of improper threats, to try to undo her manifested consent by inquiring into her subjective motivations is unworkable, and flat-out wrong on a multitude of levels. In no rational world does nagging rise to the level of an improper threat or sexual misconduct.

Second, sexual coercion policies are so vague they do not pass Constitutional muster. Our criminal law should not be a guessing game. A valid criminal statute clearly puts the public on notice as to the conduct that is forbidden. This is a component of due process. "The test is whether the language conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices." Jordan v. DeGeorge, 341 U.S. 223 (1951). A law that does not meet that standard is unconstitutionally vague.

In the realm of sexual coercion, "seduction," whatever that means, is OK, but, apparently, too much "seduction" is bad because it can become "coercion," which even the purported experts have a difficult time defining. The guy can ask for sex, but he can't ask too much (and just how much is too much?) because that would cross some indistinct line that's about as clear as a dense fog in Maine. When does asking become nagging? When does "seduction" turn into "coercion"? There is no mistaking midnight for noon, but at what point does twilight become night? To say that the contours are fuzzy is an understatement. No one — no one — can be sure at what point the line is crossed.

As a law, it is wholly unworkable; as a policy, it accomplishes the seemingly impossible task of insulting both genders at once. It insults men by telling them they are akin to rapists even when they ask and get permission for sex before proceeding because they asked too much, and it insults women by telling them they are not free moral agents capable of saying "yes" when they want sex, and "no" when they don't. That is political correctness run amok, a policy bordering on pathology.

Preponderance of the Evidence

Despite an avalanche of well-founded concerns, colleges are now required by law to adjudicate sexual assault and similar claims — but no other offenses — using the lowest standard of proof, preponderance of the evidence.

If a student is accused of stealing a small sum of money from another student, he or she likely will have a disciplinary claim adjudicated under a clear and convincing evidence standard (which is higher than a preponderance of the evidence standard). If a student is accused of the far more serious crime of rape, the claim against him must be adjudicated under a preponderance of the evidence standard, the lowest standard of proof in our jurisprudence. In what world does that double-standard make sense?

To put it plainly: a college disciplinary board needs only to be 50.0001% certain that the accused committed the offense of sexual assault in order to expel him. If someone told you that a parachute was only 50.0001% certain to open, would you jump? Of course not. Yet, the Obama administration thinks that an almost 50% level of uncertainty is acceptable when it comes to our sons and sex offenses on campus.

For the sexual grievance industry, the April 4 directive was an almost unparalleled triumph. Its members believe that the absence of hard evidence in many rape claims makes it too difficult to punish rapists and, thus, justifies the lower standard of proof. They have it backwards. The absence of hard evidence to prove any crime is a sound reason to be wary about convicting persons accused of it, not a valid justification to make it easier to convict even the innocent with the guilty.

As Cynthia Bell pointed out: “Lowering the burden of proof in these cases puts more college students at risk of being wrongly found guilty and having their reputations permanently damaged. How many innocents does [the Department of Education] want to see mistakenly expelled as rapists in the name of getting tough on crime?”

Conclusion

The older I get, and the more I write False Rape Society, the less sure I am about anything. Do I think I have a monopoly on the truth about these issues? Nope, I know I don’t. What I’d really like to see is a serious dialogue about them, not being smugly dismissed as a misogynist by angry people who don’t bother to take the time to actually inform themselves about the subject.

What is lost in the entire discourse is any recognition that the above issues, and many related issues, are both complex and serious matters that are ill-served by screeching, or by shrill pandering to powerful interest groups. I am not sure about many things, but I am sure about this: basing a public policy on the desire to punish the guilty without protecting the innocent from being punished with them is not just childish and mean-spirited, it is morally grotesque.

Elderly Spanish Duchess Weds Again

W.F. Price · 6 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Maria del Rosario Cayetana Alfonsa Victoria Eugenia Francisca Fitz-James Stuart y de Silva, the 85-year-old Spanish woman known as The Duchess of Alba, got married for the third time, this time to Spanish civil servant Alfonso Diez, a man 25 years her junior.

Ordinarily, I don't pay much attention to these things, but the pictures of the duchess are just too much to ignore. The woman looks like a plastic surgery horror show, and one has to wonder what Mr. Diez – not a bad looking guy – is getting out of the deal. When old men marry younger women, we often hear howls emanating from the usual suspects about how awful and exploitative it is, but really, it doesn't get any worse than this (click the picture for a gallery):

These images should be enough to silence complaints about older men with younger women for at least a decade.

Domestic Violence Misdemeanors Going Unprosecuted in Shawnee County, Kansas

W.F. Price · 8 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Fights between the Topeka City Council and county officials have resulted in a budget impasse, prompting DA Chad Taylor to announce that he will no longer prosecute domestic misdemeanors in Topeka. In response, the city council has threatened to decriminalize domestic violence misdemeanors in city limits, forcing the county to bear the financial burden and political fallout.

The spat goes to show how vast the resources devoted to regulating domestic relations are in a typical American jurisdiction, where a significant proportion of budgets are devoted to policing families, lovers, etc. The breakdown of social norms and marriage as an institution has greatly aggravated the problem, as decreased family stability inevitably leads to more stress and, sometimes, physical aggression. Essentially, we have subsidized hypergamy and "free love" by creating a police state that enforces docility in the face of infidelity, betrayal, theft and other provocations despite the fact that these things normally agitate humans of both sexes.

To both save money and lower DV rates, courts should follow the age-old practice of giving people legal redress for grievances in domestic disputes — i.e. at fault divorce, alienation of affection suits and the like. There is no reason that at fault divorce cannot exist along with no fault, and men and women who thought they had some recourse in the event of adultery or some like betrayal would be less likely to lash out with physical violence. In fact, civilized peoples have allowed for this outlet for thousands of years, because without it the ensuing social disorder becomes bothersome and expensive.

The law in question is misdemeanor domestic battery, and criminalizes the following behavior:

> (1) Intentionally or recklessly causing bodily harm by a family or household member against a family or household member; or
> (2) intentionally causing physical contact with a family or household member by a family or household member when done in a rude, insulting or angry manner.

The first part looks reasonable; the second, ridiculous. In fact, the latter act is probably more commonly committed by females, who initiate aggressive physical contact more often than men. If being physically contacted in a "rude, insulting or angry manner" by a girlfriend or wife is a crime, I've been a victim many times over, and I'm sure just about every male reader who has been in a relationship can remember something along those lines. I wonder, would feminists have supported arresting my ex wife for shoving me out of the way when she came to my place to look for things she wanted weeks after she vacated the premises? Of course not, and neither would I — she was just being rude, pushy and vindictive (and also giving clear evidence she wasn't afraid of me in the least, which is a helpful thing for a guy to have on the record). But that isn't the point — the law is intended to be used to prosecute men for anything.

It's the kind of thing that can be used as a "gotcha" in divorce disputes, typically against the man. Get in an argument with a girlfriend, she's using some object as provocation (e.g. car keys), snatch it away in anger and that's domestic battery! Push her out of the way when she's blocking your way out the door — you're going to jail! Also, any physical contact could be "rude" if she isn't in the mood. You might not even know that by putting your hand on her shoulder when she's grumpy you are committing battery. If she's snoring at night and you nudge her to make her stop, that's against the law, etc.

The second part of the law should be thrown out for sure. Intentional harm should be a crime – and already is under plenty of other laws – but when people live together there's bound to be some unappreciated contact at some point, some time, and if that's a crime we're all criminals. Therefore, tossing the Topeka law is entirely justified. Intentional harm is already covered by common assault/battery, so the domestic version isn't even needed: it's just a perk for vengeful wives and an excuse to arrest men on no evidence (“victim said suspect poked her arm”), removing them from property to set the stage for the typical divorce scenario — she gets the kids and house and he pays her a chunk of his income in return for her taking back the accusation.

Aggravating the situation in Topeka, there is evidently a feminist on the council:

> Rinker told commissioners that while Councilwoman Sylvia Ortiz said last month that council members needed to “man up” and let commissioners know they won’t tolerate a continued lack of domestic battery prosecution, “I’m here to ‘woman up’ to this body.”

Unfortunately for her, somebody is going to have to pay the attorneys handling the cases, and that includes attorneys for the accused — a necessary expense in our country. I expect feminists, in frustration, to start demanding that those accused of DV no longer be afforded legal counsel. They will not take lack of funds for an answer, and they are too unimaginative and ideologically bound to think of the obvious solution: remove the tortuous “domestic” laws written to give women the upper hand and replace them with standardized, uniform criminal law. Assault is assault, battery is battery: lover’s quarrels are not a police matter unless they meet the same criteria as other crimes.

White Knight Electrocuted in Paris Metro Station

W.F. Price · 9 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A recent news story in France, in which a Sikh named Rajinder Singh was electrocuted following a confrontation with an Egyptian man who had approached a young female in a Metro station, prompted a flurry of outrage. French were hailing the Sikh – also known as Babu – as a hero for defending the honor of French women on the metro.

Press conferences were held, the man was hailed in France and abroad in the subcontinent, and the miscreant who shoved him onto the high voltage rail was arrested.

But all is not as it appears at first glance, and a video of the incident has surfaced that allegedly shows Babu starting the fight with Mohamed, a smaller man, and going after him with several other men. According to his attorney, Mohamed was accosted by an aggressive Babu and several other men, and did not strike the first blow.

Evidently, Babu was enraged by the hapless Arab, a small time hustler, junkie and gigolo, who was handing out packets of candy for some reason or other (skittles man?). After the Arab tried to give some candy to a young woman, Babu and some friends followed him onto the train and accosted him in a "menacing" way. When he tried to get away, they pursued him, a scuffle ensued, and Babu was pushed onto the live rails, where he was shocked to death.

This story demonstrates the futility of interceding on behalf of women for what are, when you put it in perspective, trivial annoyances. If the interpretation of the video Mohamed's attorney gave is correct, Babu's white knighting bordered on criminal, and although he didn't deserve to pay with his life, it was a dumb decision. Of all the ways to go, scuffling with an Egyptian street hustler ranks fairly low on the scale.

What's really unfortunate, however, is the approval French officials immediately bestowed upon this stupidity. A couple of ministers – Frédéric Mitterrand and Thierry Mariani – gave a eulogy of sorts, replete with flowers and babble about "compassion" and "courage," for the late Babu. Hopefully, French men will see this posturing for what it is, and decline to put themselves in danger over some perceived slight of a woman.

On the Road Again ... Free-Range Men

zed · 10 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm going to begin with a small personal note. One of the regular readers here – one of the rare females who gets it – that I have known on-line for several years (going back to the Niceguy's forum) emailed me recently noting that some people had commented on my absence from the on-line world. The reasons for that are more mundane that some people might be thinking – life, as it has a tendency to do, shucked me out a couple of jokers to try to fit into my hand.

Early in the summer I experienced an episode of having 4 strokes one evening. I was on vacation in Washington state and ended up in one of the hospitals in Bill Price's home city. As a result of Bill doing me an extremely large favor while I was incapacitated, we finally met face to face – which was a great pleasure for me, despite the circumstances leaving much to be desired.

The largest of the 4 strokes was in the language processing area of the brain, leaving me unable to form a sentence or even say my own name. At the hospital all I could do was to take my ID out of my wallet and point to it. When I tried to write down some of my family's phone numbers, I got all the digits right, but could not get them in the right order. Fortunately I was visiting friends who provided the needed information to the hospital personnel.

To make a long story short, my recovery has been – to me, at least – nothing short of miraculous. Fortunately, my motor skills were not affected and I didn't lose control or use of the muscles on one or both sides of my body. Compared to what might have been, my circumstances are so favorable that when anyone asks me how I am doing – my only response is "FANTASTIC!!!" So, if anyone has the urge to offer condolences – save them. I fell into a dung heap, and came up smelling like a dozen roses.

Congratulations for my excellent luck are the only order of business on the table for me.

I related that story as a sort of sideways introduction to a whole lot of thoughts inspired by the September 28, 2011 edition of Paul Elam's (and other's) A Voice For Men radio show. Anyone who hasn't listened to it yet really should do so – http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2011/09/28/men-going-their-own-way

The topic for that evening was Men Going Their Own Way. Paul started out the show talking about how much he hates the acronym MGTOW. There is no phonetic way to pronounce it, so it must either be spelled out or the words spoken individually. He prefers the term "Zeta Male", which may be useful to reduce the concept to a sound bite in order to explain to someone who doesn't know what is going on – what is going on. In some ways it is like the term "Marriage Strike" – a catchy term that people remember and eventually come to understand that it means something a little more than it actually says.

Except, MGTOW isn't like that – it is exactly, and only, what it says. It is too simple for a lot of people to grasp.

It is the social, and cultural, equivalent of men hanging out a "Gone Fishing" sign, closing and locking the door, and disappearing to mental and emotional whereabouts unknown. And the most salient and significant characteristic is that those men who have done this don't feel much need to explain or justify where they went – they just left.

So, for Paul's benefit and for anyone else who finds the acronym MGTOW a bit of a mouthful, and doesn't want to try to explain all the "Game" and "Red Pill" terminology and background which underlies it, I would offer the simpler alternative – "Free-Range Men."

Paul went on to explore the phenomenon emerging in Japan of the men that are being called "Herbivores" or "Grass Eaters." No one started out a few years ago and said "Hey, I have a great idea – I'm going to start a mass movement of the men in this country and I am going to call them 'Herbivores'." Men, millions of them, individually and on their own initiative, decided to "leave" the cultural values of their own culture behind. And, what coverage I have seen of the phenomenon gives me the impression that these men are fully aware that they don't really need to explain or justify what they are doing – they are just doing it, and leaving everyone else to figure out how to get the load hauled that these men are now refusing to be the human mules to haul.

Explaining what MGTOW, or what being a Zeta Male or Herbivore, is all about is a bit like Lewis Armstrong responded when someone asked him what "jazz" was – "If you have to ask, it's probably going to be really difficult to explain." But, Paul does an exceptional job of capturing it's essence - "Those men are taking a look at the realities of their lives as it relates to women, and are taking the action of embracing lives of indifference toward women"- and, toward the traditional values of the host culture as well.

Because all this discussion is taking place in the context of the gender war, most discussions about men always circle back to women and how they are affected. The problem is that this obsessive, compulsive, focus on women – their wants and their needs – has blinded people to the reality of what is happening. It is like people are looking out at the ocean and saying "Hey, see that little wave out there? Doesn't it seem to be getting bigger?"

When asked about the herbivore phenomenon, a 22 y/o college dropout describes it as a "diverse group of men who have no real desire to live up to traditional social expectations in their relationships with women, their jobs, or anything else." Simply put, they have stopped going the culture's way for men and defined their own. And worse, for women and the culture, they "… don't care AT ALL, about what people think about how we live."

It is the "anything else" in that sentence which should make the average so/trad/con's blood run cold.

Paul goes on to point out that these Herbivores are leading lives of "Personal Abundance, according to their own tastes." And, Captain Capitalism points out that men here, in the US, are doing it too.

> Once we pay our taxes to subsidize other people and other people's children, we still have the majority of our money to spend on ourselves. More importantly we have the majority of time to spend on ourselves. And better than that, society has advanced to the point there are LIMITLESS intellectual, physical, video, artistic and other pursuits to pursue and enjoy a happy, fulfilling life. We got our pals, we got our friends, we got a life.

> Congratulations! You "won" the battle and men have surrendered! Now leave us alone.

Let's get out a measuring stick and see if we can get a sense of how big this cultural tsunami which has been building for the past 50 or more years is going to turn out to be. Don't worry about the Grass Eaters, Herbivores, Zeta Males, Men Gone Their Own Way, or Free-Range Men – they have figured out in which direction the higher ground lays and have headed for it. It's everyone else standing on the newly-expanded shoreline thinking how convenient it is for them that all these previously hidden treasures of the deep are now lying totally exposed, and are so busy watching their feet that they can't be bothered to look towards the horizon, that need a clue.

So, let's try to give them one, shall we?

All these males, who are part of "the movement which has no name", who have individually decided on the best course of action for THEIR OWN LIVES – women and their own cultures can go hang – are the Phoenix rising from the death throes of their cultures.

And, let us hold a preliminary coroner's inquest, even though the body has not stopped twitching yet.

Everything that men have done for the past 20 years or so has been covered over by the term "backlash", popularized in 1991 by Susan Faludi in her book "Backlash: The Undeclared War Against American Women" This hyperbole, this hysterification, of the fact that social change wasn't occurring as quickly as some women wanted, is totally indicative of the the Solipism of the Female mind – any and all actions of men must only be considered in light of how they affect women. Some people claim that "the movement which has no name" (is "TMWHNN" any better than MGTOW, Paul?) is only a "backlash" against feminism.

Nope, folks, this is not a bug of feminism, it is a feature.

These men, whatever you choose to call them, are EXACTLY the kind of men that feminism set out to create. The fact that women, cultures, and governments don't know how to factor such men into their cultural survival is not those men's problem.

Remember a couple of years ago during the first period of the now on-going "global financial crisis" when Harriet HARM-MEN made the statement that "If Lehman Brothers would have been Lehman Sisters, then none of this would have happened." In other words – all that nasty competition between men is to blame and the world would be a better place if it was gotten rid of.

The Grass Eaters of Japan are the implementation of that theory, and the preliminary indications are that Japanese women don't really like the result all that much. These men are not part of a "backlash" against feminism, but rather the result of the collision between feminism and the traditional cultural values which feminism purports to oppose – while at the same time desperately hopes will continue because they provide both the continued rationale for feminism and for the continued survival of women and their children.

Now, never mind that men who spend their lives as "salary-men" in a culture in which death from overwork is so common that they even have a name for it – "Karōshi" – after retirement became such an annoyance to their wives, now that they were not acting like pack mules supporting wifey's consuming habits, that they were called "wet leaves." And, never mind that the definitions of "sexual assault" and "sexual harassment" have been so broadened that if "the person being convinced instead feels coerced, it's sexual assault" that men are still demanded to engage in pursuing women – if relationships between men and women are going to still continue to be formed – "manning up" as it were.

Except, the Grass Eaters aren't doing it – and they are not the least bit concerned about the bloviations of the likes of Bill-Bennett-San.

Paul went on to ask why there was such an apparent reaction in Japan while the western cultures have swallowed the cultural-poison-pill of feminism with barely a hiccup. While I think what he said was very valid, I think there is a hidden part of the picture that people have to look for if they are going to find it.

OK, Roll Call – sound off.

Who isn't here?

We know who is here, because they just announced themselves. We don't know who isn't here because… well, because they AREN'T here.

Bueller? Bueller?

There are dozens of reasons why a western response, and particularly an American one, will look quite different than a Japanese response. One of the biggest is that Japan is an extremely conformist culture, while the United States in particular was populated mostly by renegades. The American character is fundamentally different than the Japanese character.

Another hugely significant reason is population density. The population/area ratio is more than 10 times for Japan than for the United States – 870/sq mile in Japan, and 82/sq mile in the US.

Putting these two characteristics together – in the US one has to search 10 times as much area to figure out who isn't there. And, if they never signed up in the first place, then their name isn't even on the roster – which makes it that much more difficult to track them down.

Bueller? Bueller?

Now, in Japan, the tradcons used the same attempts at shaming men into following in their traditional mule, or man-bot, role that western cultures have used. They call them “Grass Eaters” with connotations of passivity and lack of effort and “Manning Up” that led older generations of men to work themselves to death.

The biggest problems for the so/trad/cons is that they are eating their own, practicing cannibalism. The persons hurt the worst by the current system are the same ones who follow the so/trad/con way – like Twogunner in this comment.

But, the problem comes in when the cannibals realize that men are practicing free-agency and are not signing up to be cannibalized by the tradcon values. And, when some Bill-Bennett-San or Kay Hymenzipped tells them to “Man Up” – they aren’t around to listen.

I just returned from a 10-day motorcycle trip through Colorado, Utah, and Arizona. Shortly before I left I was talking to a guy about which motorcycle I was going to take – the big one, (Thunderbird – 1700 CC) or the small one, (Bonneville – 865 CC.) He asked my how I got “the wife’s” permission to buy 2 motorcycles. I told him – “no wife, no one who thinks they have the power to give or withhold ‘permission’ from me.”

After 10 days, 2700 miles, 3 rainstorms, and 1 snow storm, I decided that a good name for the US version of “the movement which has no name” might be something more like “Rock Eaters” or “Wind Eaters.” Over the years I have known a lot of men who like putting their faces into the wind and seeing what lies beyond that next hill – or the one after that, or the one after that one. I have a friend who just turned 60 – whose 60th birthday party I made extremely memorable by stroking out in the middle of it – who has never been married and spend most of the past 35 years as an engineer on multiple ships all over the Pacific Ocean. Damn, he has had an interesting and fun life!! And, he never had to ask permission to do that, either.

In the USA, with its “Wild West” history, and its “Don’t Fence Me In” philosophy, there is a type of man known as the “Ramblin’ Man”, or as I tend to think of him, a “Free-Range Man.” They are a fundamentally different type of men than those men who organize school districts or public water supply districts, and the second type of man is often hugely threatened by the first – which is why they do everything they can to get them tied down to a resident “warden” – the only escape from which is the financial devastation of divorce court.

Now, one would think that a culture interested in preserving itself would value the second type of man – a man like

Bill Price – over the other type of man. And yet, we live in a culture which reserves its harshest punishment for the men who would try to be good fathers.

I have come to the conclusion that the Internet was invented in order to give the Chattering Classes a more effective means of chattering. Eventually, it starts to seem that there are only a dozen "conversations" recycled endlessly with different titles.

One of the most tiresome of these is the argument about "activism." There is a significant group of men whose definition of "activism" sounds remarkably close to "why haven't you already taken the action to make the world the way I want it to be, and save me the trouble of doing it?" – in other words, a slightly different permutation of "manning up."

It's as bizarre a conversation as arguing with a compulsive gambler about "manning up", or a compulsive adulterer about being a "Promise Keeper." It seems that most scumbags assume that all men are as big a scumbag as they are, and arguing with them is truly an exercise in arguing with an idiot – they drag you down to their level, and beat you with experience.

A fundamental question which comes to mind when confronting people like this is – why should I spend the time and energy to make your world the way you want it to be, when a fraction of that energy already expended has made my own life the way I want it to be?

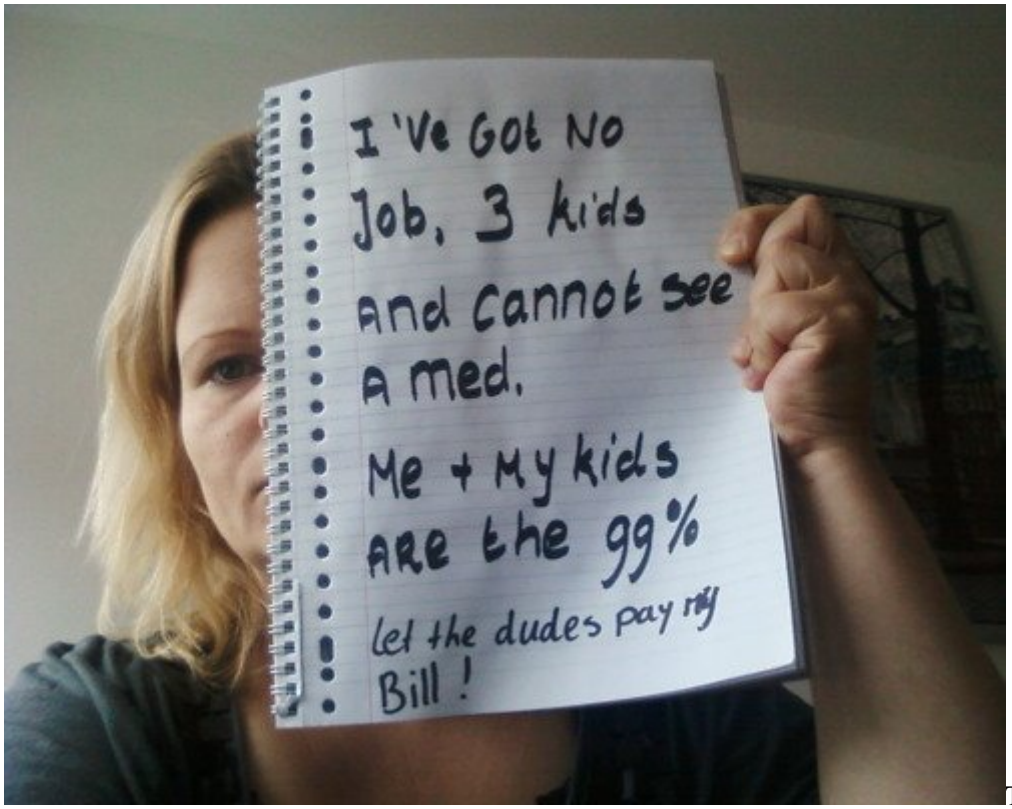
One of my favorite quotes is that no one ever looked back from their death bed and says "Oh no! I wish I had spent more time at the office." When I was lying in a hospital bed 3.5 months ago, unable to make a coherent sentence come out of my mouth and not certain that I would ever wipe my own ass by myself again, it certainly never crossed my mind that I wished I had spent more time at the office; or arguing with pig-headed so/trad/cons, idiotic feminists, or newly minted MRAs whose major contribution is to piss on what everyone who has come before them has tried.

The saddest thing to me to contemplate is that guys like Bill Price are much better people than I am. He "manned up" and fought the good fight in the family courts for the sake of his children. What kind of screwed-up culture punishes him so severely for trying to keep it going, and rewards deadbeat-non-dads like me with visions of complete double rainbows?

Occupy Wall Street Is Just Another Vehicle For Misandry

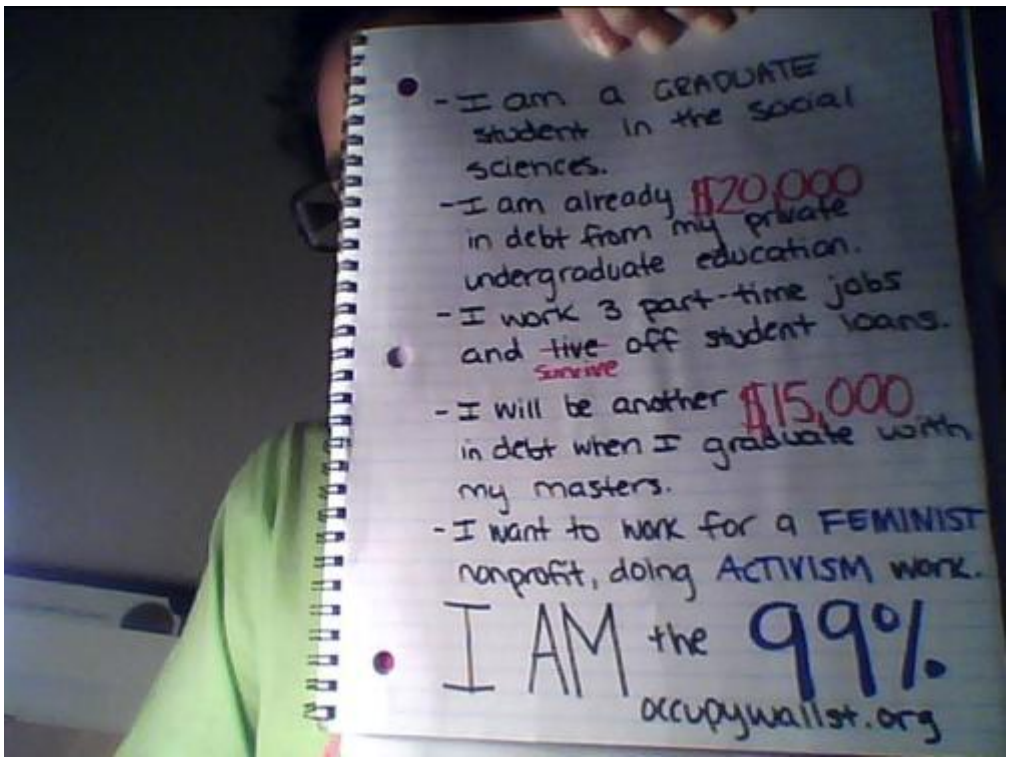
Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 11 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Whatever the other positives and negatives are of the Occupy Wall Street movement, it is another vehicle for misandry. Some examples of misandry in the Occupy Wall Street movement, can be found at its We Are the 99% blog which showcases people who believe they are the victim of the richest 1%. That blog has a high number of single mothers and other women demonstrating high levels of entitlement as can be seen in the following examples:



This woman says, "Let the dudes pay my bill!" In other words, she is demanding men subsidize her, not rich men or billionaires (which would be questionable enough) but men in general. This is a repeated theme that can be seen with this woman who says, "men lied". Again, it's all men she is blaming.

This woman is complaining that she is going heavily into debt in college because she wants to work as an "activist" at a "feminist non-profit":



Single mothers and soon to be single mothers are seen a lot on the We Are The 99% blog. The following examples have a common theme of how the bank bailouts should have been given to single mothers or women in general to subsidize their bad decisions:

I'm a 27 year old Single ♥mom♥ was forced to pay my ex-hubby's back taxes in excess of $10,000.
I get NO Child Support.
Can't afford insurance, Can't qualify for Gov't help. I have $14,000 in Student loan debt + was fraudulently forclosed on by *Chase bank.
The Gov't has told me Serveral times that I don't NEED help.

I am a twenty-five year old
Single mother of a four year old son. I get no child support or almony. After he was born, I got into my dream school on a full scholarship, but less than a year later my funding was cut when they lost their endowment in the crash.
I got straight As until they kicked me out for not paying. They won't even let me transfer my credits.
I donated my eggs to a reproductive clinic to pay my rent and bills. The procedure was painful and led to complications that put me in the hospital - now I have a huge bill as a result my body will never be the same. Every time
I try to apply for state assistance, which they say I am eligible for, some "bureaucratic error" takes place and I am forced to start the process

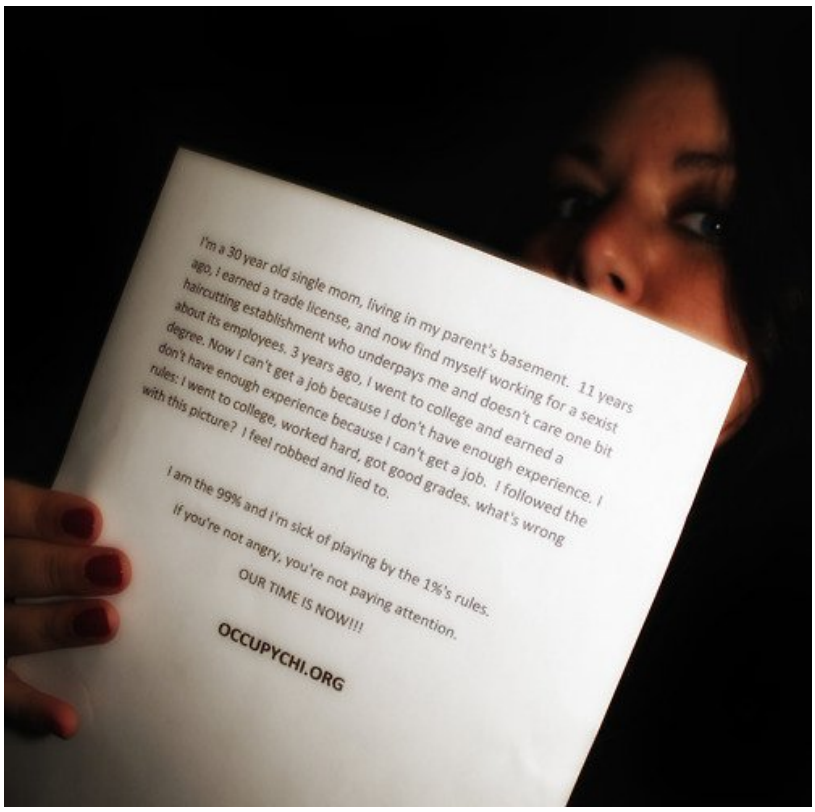
OCCUPY WALL STREET
(PLEASE)



There are many more examples of female entitlement such as women complaining that a degree in fine arts doesn't guarantee a job, women who talk as if they randomly ended up in prison, etc. Some of you may be thinking that this is not representative of Occupy Wall Street because it's easy to cherry pick a few blog entries. The misandry in Occupy Wall Street goes much deeper than this. Their demands include a "gender equal rights amendment", and how they are organized is explicitly anti-male:

> Occupy Wall Street's General Assembly operates under a revolutionary "progressive stack." A normal "stack" means those who wish to speak get in line. A progressive stack encourages women and traditionally marginalized groups speak before men, especially white men. This is something that has been in place since the beginning, it is necessary, and it is important.
> "Step up, step back" was a common phrase of the first week, encouraging white men to acknowledge the privilege they have lived in their entire lives and to step back from continually speaking.

All of this adds up to Occupy Wall Street being another arm of misandry. As far as they are concerned, if you are male, then you are part of the 1%.

Dr. Pepper Ad's Reverse Psychology Working

W.F. Price · 12 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Pepper recently came out with an ad that has been denounced as sexist against men by a number of female commentators, such as Jessica Wakeman of "The Frisky:"

> You're probably expecting an avowed feminist like myself to put a diet soda commercial marketed to men with guns, ATVs and snake attacks on blast. It's true, Dr. Pepper Ten's new ad declaring "It's not for women" is dripping with machismo like beads of sweat pour off a gator hunter in the Florida sun. But the commercial is a lot more sexist towards men than it is towards women. Yes, men are victims of sexism, too. Can Madison Avenue really not sell a 10-calorie soft drink to men without sweeping gender generalizations?

Sure, the ad stereotypes men, and is obviously tongue-in-cheek, but even though it's kind of a lame joke I don't see men getting too upset about it. Men are not programmed to take immediate offense at any joke at their expense, so the ad might actually work on teenage boys who find the idea of being outlandishly masculine both funny and appealing at the same time (why else would so many men watch pro wrestling?)

Here's the ad:

When I first heard about the ad, I wondered whether Dr. Pepper might score a lot of female consumers who wanted to prove "I can drink whatever I want." Reverse psychology works very well on women — tell them they can't have something and they want it all the more. Feminism has thrived off this, a prime example being women in the military: "Are you telling me I can't put on a uniform and get blown to pieces? I do what I want…" Of course, reality sets in as soon as basic training starts, and next thing you know we have pregnant soldiers and army clerks sashaying around base with their blouses half open.

So, I did a little search to see what women are saying about the ad, and came up with a nice little gem, in which a young woman proudly tells Dr. Pepper to "F— Off!" by, of all things, drinking Dr. Pepper:

Perhaps Dr. Pepper's marketing team has discovered the perfect method for manipulating feminism. If nothing else, the company at least gained a lot of attention — it seems baiting feminists is actually profitable these days.

Ryan Gosling as Feminists' Uncle Tom

Ryan Gosling has become something of a feminist icon for portraying a sensitive guy in various movies. Supposedly, he represents the kind of accommodating, nice man who would make a great husband or boyfriend. Gosling is pretty convincing in this role, which is why he was perfect for the film Blue Valentine (2010), the most anti-feminist movie since Dustin Hoffman starred in Kramer vs. Kramer in 1979.

Blue Valentine is the story of a very beta, romantic man who wants nothing more than to be a family man, and falls for a young woman who is about to become a single mother. He marries the girl, accepts the child for his own, and the new family gets on with married life. Not long thereafter, the woman he married begins to tire of her unambitious, sensitive, beta husband, starts picking fights, becomes frustrated, and eventually dumps him. Gosling plays the beta sucker to a T, which leaves one wondering why feminists see him as an icon.

It appears that he represents their utter triumph — their victory in the gender war. Essentially, he is the contemporary equivalent of the harmless, cheerful darkie of antebellum Southern nostalgia — a conquered man who may be taken or left, bought or sold, and yet retains a baffling complacence and innocent trust despite horrendous maltreatment by contemporary women.

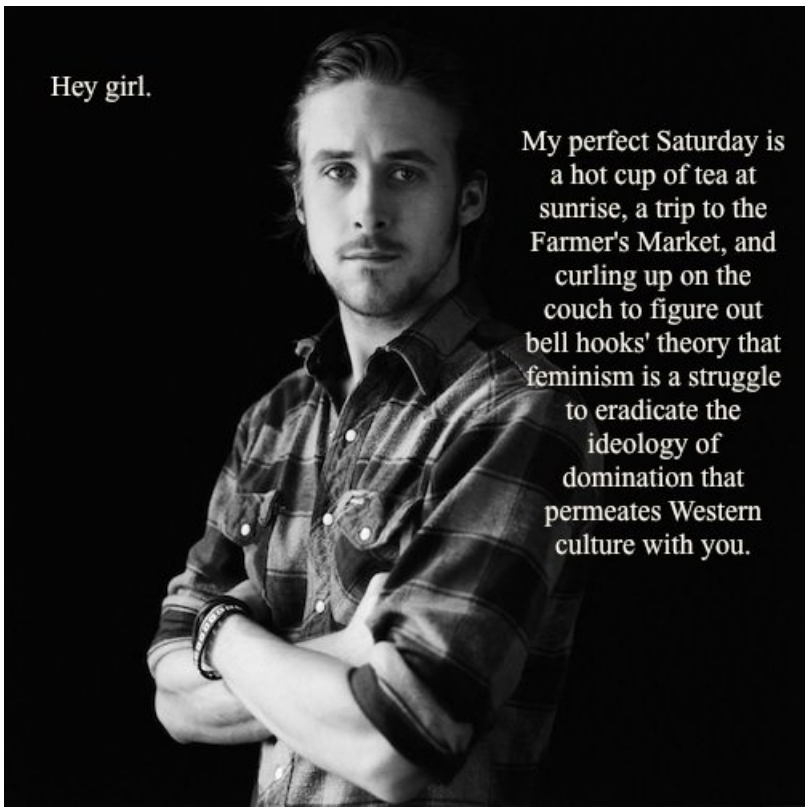
Ryan Gosling meme sites have sprung up highlighting this sentiment, and although they are somewhat amusing in a twisted way, one wonders how they are any different from the campy old advertisements, so thoroughly denounced by feminists, that portray women as willing, docile servants to their husbands.

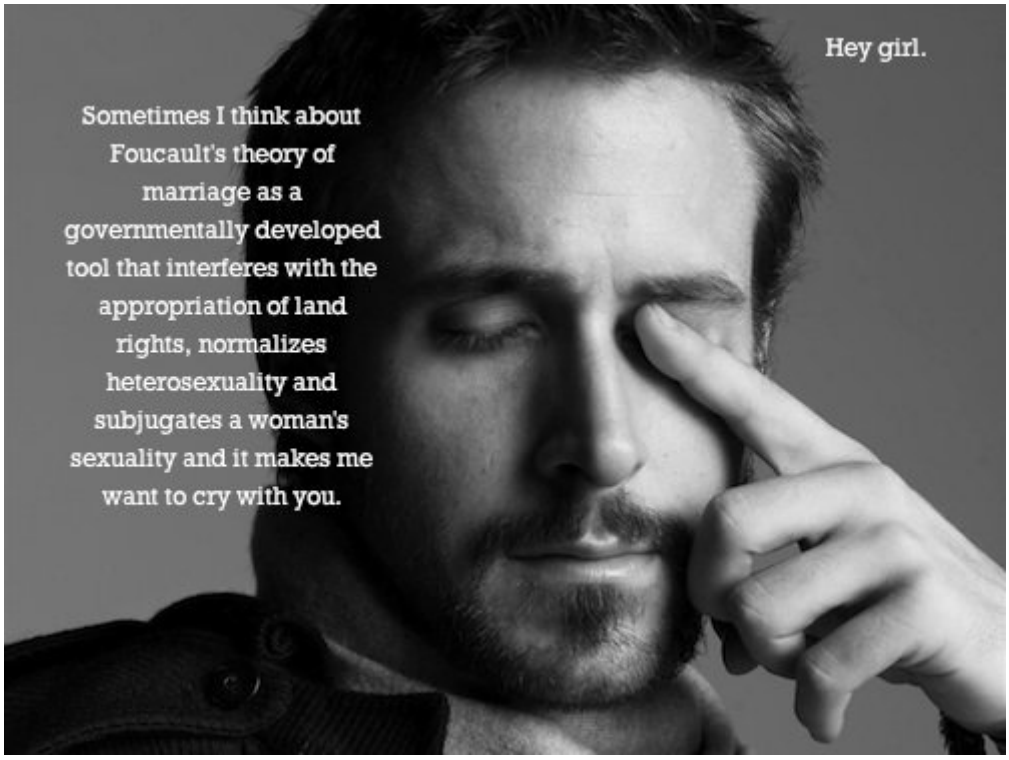
The first meme site is the "F— Yeah! Ryan Gosling" site, which displays pictures of Gosling with various snips of text written to accentuate his sensitive guy appeal.

Follow the thumbnails for examples:

[image]

Next, we have a meme site that is explicitly feminist, "Feminist Ryan Gosling" in which the text goes beyond cute sentimentality and into feminist dogma:





The descent of Ryan Gosling, from a sympathetic, good character who is martyred to the realities of modern feminism – i.e. female supremacy – in Blue Valentine, to campy feminist icon mirrors the journey of another character from American culture: Uncle Tom. First, Tom was a good Christian who is martyred for doing the right thing, then over time he becomes a stock minstrel character; a target of derision for blacks and whites alike.

Although it's a curious progression, perhaps we'll end up having the last laugh, as neither side of the actor reflects all that well on feminism.

Superhero Vigilante Breaks up Fight, Gets Smacked Around by Enraged Female

W.F. Price · 13 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Ben Fodor, who dresses up as superhero “Phoenix Jones” to patrol the streets of Seattle and fight crime at night, was recently arrested after breaking up a drunken fight between some drunken revelers near downtown Seattle’s waterfront.

Fodor, an athletic young man armed with pepper spray and wearing a ballistic vest, has been annoying the Seattle Police Department for some time with his vigilante patrols, and when he intervened in the fight a few days ago police finally arrested him. The “victims” indicated that Fodor attacked them with pepper spray when they were just dancing around in a lighthearted manner. However, video has emerged that tells a different story.

Shortly after Fodor breaks up the fight, a young woman violently attacks him with a shoe, falling flat on her face at one point. After this, there is some more hurly burley involving multiple drunks, brinksmanship, vehicular assault and much excitement:

Phoenix Jones Stops Assault from Ryan McNamee on Vimeo.

For men, there are a few lessons here:

(1) American women – especially drunk ones – have no fear of men and will attack without compunction. They will also incite attacks; it appears that the women in the video were willing spectators of the fight Fodor broke up, and may have been encouraging it, then they subsequently try to incite an attack on Fodor and his companions.

(2) If women are involved in an altercation and you get involved as well, you will likely end up arrested by the police even if you did a good deed.

(3) Trying to do the job of police provokes police anger and will also probably lead to arrest.

So what’s a man to do? Well, if there’s a fight or any kind of crime involving women – even if they are “victims” – it’s best to simply stay out of it. White knighting can easily lead to attack by other men or the woman, and you could well end up in jail.

Waitress Reacts to Insult With Online Lynch Mob

Victoria Liss -- fat shaming avenger

Victoria Liss, a waitress at the ever-classy “Bimbo’s” Cantina (AKA Bimbo’s Bitchin’ Burrito Kitchen) in Seattle, flew into a rage after a customer not only neglected to tip her, but scrawled a note suggesting she drop a few pounds as well. Her response was to reach out to the sisterhood to form an online lynch mob, which quickly coalesced through the efforts of websites such as Jezebel and The Stranger. Soon, a man named Andrew Meyer was being tormented with thousands of nasty emails. However, in one out of the many errors with the mob’s approach, and probably the most egregious, it went after the wrong Andrew Meyer.
For a little background, Bimbo’s is located in the Pike-Pine corridor – the beating heart of Seattle’s freak scene – near the headquarters of The Stranger, across the street from the old dive bar The Comet (AKA The Vomit), directly above the subterranean, cavernous “Cha Cha” lounge, and next to the lesbian Wild Rose bar, where a man was once chased down and beaten with tools for fogging the windows and drawing a picture of a penis as a joke (the lesbians were not amused). I’m not going to say the people involved in that scene are a total loss, because I know a few of them personally, but they have a tendency to get carried away with their own, shall we say, “different,” view of propriety, and this time they went too far.

Ironically, our online gadfly, David Futrelle, recently took our very own Jack Donovan to task for venting about an obnoxious customer. Jack, who speculated that perhaps men may not be as good at dealing with abuse from customers, nevertheless did not name his customer, post her information online, or do anything vengeful at all. That didn’t stop Futrelle and his commenters from denouncing him for daring to write about how unpleasant the experience can be.

However, in the case of Victoria Liss, the insulted waitress, we had legions of feminists assisting her in an entirely disproportionate act of blind vengeance. Of course it’s a woman’s right to smear a man and attempt to destroy his life if he dares insult her! Why, the “fat shaming” alone is grounds for summary castration…

How many men would be so petty, so vindictive, and so morally depraved that they would launch a personal vendetta over a minor slight suffered in the course of a day’s work? Very few, obviously — such men would be instantly fired, and likely castigated by the courts (if not jailed) for harassment.

As for the victim, a man who just happened to have a certain name, we can hope that some compensation for the trouble is forthcoming. Although it is doubtful whether Liss has much in her pockets, according to The Stranger, bar owners may have been involved in the online lynching, and they likely have a little something to lose. Jezebel, likewise.

Holly Grigsby, Race Warrior, Defends Killing Innocent Man

W.F. Price · 16 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Holly Grigsby and David Pederson decided that they would launch a racial vendetta, and started with, of all people, Pederson's father and stepmother. According to David Pederson, who is now in jail in California, this was to avenge alleged molestation of his sister and cousin, an accusation that, if not entirely fabricated, may have come from his mother. Then, the couple decided to kidnap Grigsby's son and kill the father, who had custody. Fortunately, Grigsby had second thoughts and did not carry out this part of the plan.

However, later, on the run and in need of a car, the couple murdered a random young Christian named Cody Myers in Oregon, then, upon searching his wallet and finding his name, retroactively justified the killing by saying he could have been Jewish. Another man, Reginald Clark, a black man who was found dead in his car in Eureka, CA, is also thought to be one of their victims.

Of 19-year-old Cody Myers' death, Grigsby said:

> It's unfortunate he was a white man, but it was to facilitate further action. In every war, there are going to be civilian casualties, and he was one of them.

Unfortunate indeed, but apparently no cause for remorse, according to Ms. Grigsby.

Her estranged husband, considering he was named as a target, has been rather more forgiving than one might expect:

The tragic story illustrates two common trends in contemporary America:

(1) Women's propensity to fall for badboy thugs like David Pederson, who is nothing more than a depraved criminal using the most convenient ideology to justify his crimes

(2) The common refusal on women's part to accept moral responsibility for their misdeeds

Perhaps at some point in the future we will see Grigsby start to defend herself, which will surely involve putting all the responsibility for her actions on Pederson, despite the fact that she carried out at least one killing on her own. She will likely say she felt intimidated by him, was "under his spell," etc.

Finally, the story demonstrates a few of the problems with white nationalism as practiced by the lower sorts of adherents: First, one of the most cherished principles is the sanctity of the white female as the race-bearer; it is no coincidence that Pederson chose to justify his patricide in terms of defense of women. Secondly, the subordination of all other moral principles to the survival of the white race.

Although most white people, myself included, have no problem with efforts to preserve our ethnic and material heritage and culture, I think most would accept the fact that the value of our people is largely dependent upon whether we are good or not: there is nothing worth saving where there is no virtue.

Even Jehova, the God of the Jews, made it clear to his people that if they repeatedly broke the covenant and continued to engage in all forms of evil, He would abandon them.

Therefore, white people who want to preserve their people should start with themselves, and follow the principle from which the Law is derived:

The Golden Rule

David Pederson and Holly Grigsby violated that precept most egregiously, and now they are lost.

Men Batter, Women "Use Force"

W.F. Price · 17 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I followed a link at Reddit the other day that led to a discussion about domestic violence, and came upon yet another sad example of double standards. In fact, this one is so blatant and so removed from reality that it raises the question of whether some of these feminist domestic violence activists are not merely ideologues, but outright liars.

Because October is Domestic Violence Awareness Month, Michigan's public radio network decided to air a program called "Safe at Home," in which the hosts speak with various "experts" on the subject. Sadly, the experts clearly have more than just domestic violence prevention in mind, they have an ideological axe to grind:

> Larance explains that it is important to make the distinction between the ways men and women use violence in their relationships. Even the language is different. Men "batter", women "use force."
> "The term 'batterer' is actually a gender specific term that refers to coercively controlling tactics…That power and control dynamic that really defines domestic violence is often not a power and control dynamic that women are able to access."
> Some might argue that violence is violence—regardless of who throws the blow—and that changing the language around it minimizes the experience of male victims. However, Larance explains that women use physical force differently, often to take short-term control of a chaotic situation with their partner, rather than to maintain long-term power and control.
> Research shows that women are more likely to take responsibility when a violent incident is first reported and less likely to identify as survivors of domestic violence if they have a history of abusive relationships. "They do so because they see themselves as very strong and it's important for them to believe in that sense of agency," Larance says.
> The RENEW program provides support and advocacy for these women.

Read this closely, and it's apparent that Larance sees female domestic violence as, at least in part, a positive thing. It gives women "agency." They are "taking control of a chaotic situation."

And, of course, it's different because women are not "able to access" the "power and control dynamic," except in the "short term," which makes it OK.

If anyone still believes that feminists are dedicated to equality and domestic harmony, the above passage should clearly dispel that notion. In fact, the implication is that women who beat the crap out of their partners should expect "support and advocacy" — hardly an egalitarian sentiment.

Men who strike out, on the other hand, will naturally be treated as criminals. This is clearly the intent of the language distinction: Men are "batterers" because battery is always a crime. Women "use force" because use of force can be justified. It's such a transparent attempt to manipulate language to favor violent women that even a child could see through it, but the feminists shamelessly persist.

Given the disaster domestic law has become, it's high time we reevaluate the programs in place to alleviate domestic violence, particularly when some of them actually condone what they claim to be opposing.

If police are forced to take a zero-tolerance approach to domestic violence, often disregarding the circumstances, then we should expect a similar standard from those who work with the courts and social services, because otherwise taxpayers are funding two groups that are working against each other. It is not only inefficient when government encourages the same crime it prosecutes; it is unconscionable.

Private Investigator Under Investigation for Setting Up Men to Help Wives in Divorce Cases

W.F. Price · 18 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In the latest bit of news highlighting the disgusting nature of American family law, Christopher Butler, a Californian PI, has come under investigation for using honey traps and DUI setups to give wives the edge in custody disputes. Setups are very common in divorce, and are usually aimed at guileless husbands. Manufacturing domestic violence "incidents" is very common, and quite easy when emotions run high. I've spoken with men who have noticed strangers staking out their houses when their wives came over, and I've personally been subject to provocation while being taped by third parties (it didn't work). People get dirty in divorce.

However, in most cases setups are carried out by the individuals involved (and often their friends and family). Where this story is different is that a man was running a business and making good money by setting men up during divorces. Although it sounds shocking, I find it difficult to believe that this is an isolated case. Evidently, Mr. Butler would hire attractive women to ply men with drinks and then encourage them to drive somewhere, upon which he would tip off the police and have the men arrested for DUI.

Butler worked not only with the women, but their attorneys as well. His services proved effective in giving wives the advantages they sought in custody cases, which is where the real money comes into play:

> Reporting from Martinez, Calif.— David Dutcher met Sharon on Match.com in late 2008, a few months after separating from his wife. "We had a lot in common," he recalled. Sharon loved four-wheel-drive trucks and sports.
> They met for coffee, then dinner. Sharon was tall, slender, blond and beautiful. She moaned that she had not had sex in a long time. She told him he had large, strong hands and wondered if that portended other things. She described his kisses as "yummy."
> On their second date, Sharon suggested they join one of her friends "who was partying because she had closed a real estate deal," Dutcher said. They drove to an Italian restaurant in a suburb near San Francisco. Sharon's friend, "Tash," was a loud and raucous brunet who was pounding down shots.
> Sharon had trouble finishing her tequila shots and asked Dutcher to help, he said. When the women went to the bathroom, two men at the other end of the bar peppered Dutcher with questions.
>
> "Are you a celebrity?" they wanted to know.
> The women suggested going to a house with a hot tub that Tash was housesitting, Dutcher said. He followed them in his truck. Within a few minutes, a flashing red light appeared in his rearview mirror. The officer said he had been swerving.
> Three months later, Dutcher's wife filed a motion in their divorce case, telling the court that her soon-to-be former husband had been arrested on suspicion of drunk driving and that she feared for their children's safety. The judge ordered that Dutcher's visits be supervised.

Yes, it is that easy for a man to lose normal access to his children. One mistake during a night out and he will be ordered to have "supervised custody," which means the children are not allowed to be alone with their father, who is judged too dangerous to be around his own children.

Fortunately, a man who had previously worked for Butler cried foul and an investigation was opened. The FBI got involved, and it emerged that some cops had been taking bribes to arrest the hapless husbands. The women Butler hired were often prostitutes, so the cops may have been receiving sexual services as well.

Butler was flying high — even Dr. Phil promoted him:

> In May, the FBI took over the probe, interviewing Dutcher and other ex-husbands arrested on suspicion of drunk driving. A federal grand jury indicted Butler and two of the officers in August and September. The charges included drug dealing, running a prostitution business and illegal possession of a weapon.
> More indictments are expected. A third officer, implicated by Butler in the DUIs, faces state charges of accepting bribes to make arrests.
> Stunned prosecutors combed through pending criminal cases and eventually dismissed charges in at least 20 DUI and vice crimes, tainted by the involvement of the accused officers. Two of them had once worked with Butler on the police force of the East Bay city of Antioch.
> Butler also apparently hoodwinked reporters. His agency received national attention for employing gumshoe "housewives" who juggled soccer games with undercover spying. People magazine and Dr. Phil did stories. An East Bay magazine reporter who went on a ride-along with Butler later discovered that everything he had witnessed had been staged.

It would be hard to imagine a sleazier line of work than separating children from their fathers, but amazingly, in today's America one can actually be celebrated for such efforts.

As the evidence is collected in the Butler case, hopefully people will become aware of the deep sickness that has come to characterize American family law.

Risky "Sexual Marketplace": Beware Loathsome STDs

Davd · 21 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Wake Up to Risk:
The Sexual Revolution has Badly Fouled its Nest
by Davd, 2011

To invent a name, let's call her Linda. She's at least half smart, lively, and [as the name Linda implies] good-looking. You and she meet at a public event of some kind, and discover two or three common interests. There is an ambiguous ring on her third finger, left hand, which might or might not indicate that she's married. Accordingly, though you're single and she's attractive, you're merely friendly.

Not so Wally: He is what the Latinos call mujerigo and the Anglos of the 1980s called a lounge lizard. He doesn't care if she's married, he does care that she's good-looking; and so he invites her out that very evening, while you go home to cover the tomato and cucumber plants against a risk of frost.

Three weeks later, you and Linda are in a task group together, working on one of those common interests; and you find out she's widowed. You meet for lunch, and you ask what came of her date[s] with Wally.

"It was a fun weekend but I knew there was no future in it," she replies. "Does that mean you need some STD tests in another five months?" you ask. It isn't the most endearing thing to say-far from it-but it is the most practical. If she had repeated intercourse with a man you estimate to have had 200-500 'partners' in his 20 sexually active years, then to rush into a similar intimacy amounts to nonviolent Russian roulette.* There's no point in pursuing "courtship" until after those STD tests, unless and until you're convinced she either did not become intimate with Wally, or that condoms were rigorously employed if she did… and that what she and Wally "did" was of such nature that condoms constituted adequate prophylaxis.

"It was a fun weekend", since 1980 or earlier, implies intercourse. "But I knew there was no future in it," implies availability. The "epidemiological risk environment" of the 21st Century, implies danger.

My point is not to complain; rather to warn: I've been sexually abstinent for eight years now and i will quite likely remain abstinent for life: I'm not in the game Linda and Wally were playing; and while at my age that's an easier choice, one powerful motivation for abstinence is that it's a far more dangerous game than it was in 1970.

The STD risks that four decades of "the Sexual Revolution" have generated, add up to substantial reason to be monogamous or abstinent. During the same two generations that civil "marriage" has become more of a trap and far less of a promise, promiscuity has become dangerous not just for "pregnancy extortion", but also for risk of ugly, painful, often deadly disease.

If that "fun weekend" was indeed 'sexually active', it has spoiled Linda's legitimate chances for a more-than-fun relationship until she's sat out six months and "passed the tests"-unless, of course, Linda's lifestyle resembles Wally's and she was "dangerous fun" before tangling with him. (In that case she had little or nothing to spoil-and she's still unsafe for sexy-dating unless and until she waits out the months and passes the tests. There are more tests to pass today than there were in 1970, too.)

AIDS, Hepatitis, Herpes, HPV-and even gonorrhea and syphilis, which naughty Aunt Laura told you penicillin would cure-are dividing us into the prudes and the promiscuous. The middle ground is turning to quicksand. The "Venereal Diseases" of 1970, which penicillin could cure back then, have evolved into the "STD"s of 2010, which are resistant to penicillin and which include the carcinogenic "HPV" and an especially insidious viral disease, AIDS, whose existence hadn't even been documented in 1970.

In 1965-75, it may have seemed to many young adults-and even some "experts"-that STD risk was comparable to the risk of catching the 'flu or a mere common cold. Penicillin was standard treatment for syphilis and gonorrhea and usually it worked. Herpes was an annoyance, and not that common; hepatitis and HPV were very rare; HIV was not even known to exist.

“Liberal” sexual habits formed on the basis of what was known then were minimally dangerous then; today they are quite dangerous: It turns out that the sexually “free”, are not and were not free from the processes of epidemiology, and their fun spread STD germs-including drug-resistant strains-raised STD infection rates, and decreased the treatability of those STDs.

The dangers of the “Sexual Market Place” are not all emotional and financial-and they are much greater than they were when sexual “liberation” began-directly because of all that “liberated sex”. “Prudish” attitudes and habits that were ridiculed on the basis of what was known then are wisely prudent now. Devout religious people who held to the old wisdom of faith rather than trust in the medical treatments of the time, have some cause to say that their old wisdom is more trustworthy than the medical assurances. More precisely, the medical assurances turned out to be quite transitory-the treatments mostly worked then, but not now. Monogamy and abstinence still work.

Most revolutions last months or years rather than decades; and the “sexual revolution” was already longer than most political revolutions by 1990. Most revolutions end-up more like they began than like “the height of them”, and the “sexual revolution” – we may hope – is doing the same. To continue the promiscuity of the peak years, will entail a lot more misery and early death.

It’s much more than a mere shame, that Feminism has done monogamy so much damage. There are public health reasons as well as fairness reasons, why the law should support lifetime marriage promises and discourage divorce and adultery.

And those men who “shop in the sexual marketplace” need to keep in mind, that whether they think goods or services are on offer, an unknown percentage-a much higher percentage than two generations ago or even one-are infected with dangerous, loathsome diseases. Becoming infected yourself will not make you a better nor a happier man.

* Russian roulette really existed: During World War II and perhaps earlier, Soviet-Russian soldiers would put one live round in a 6- or 8-chamber revolver, spin the drum, point the muzzle at their heads just above the ear, and pull the trigger. Allied troops who saw this done were flabbergasted.

How the Female Sentencing Discount Works

Elusive Wapiti · 23 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Is starts just like this…with loaded, presumptive language that casts females as weak victims-in-waiting and men as perps:

> A cashier at a McDonald's on West Fourth Street in Manhattan was captured on video savagely beating two female customers with a metal rod on Oct. 13, 2011.
> NEW YORK (CBSNewYork/AP) – A McDonald's cashier jailed for beating two irate customers with a metal rod says he was only trying to defend himself.
> Rayon McIntosh was arrested Oct. 13 after a wild fight inside a McDonald's in the Greenwich Village neighborhood in Manhattan. Video recorded by a customer showed two furious women vaulting a counter to attack McIntosh after some sort of dispute. McIntosh grabbed a metal bar and fought back with savage force, continuing to deliver crushing blows even after the women were incapacitated on the floor. McIntosh, 31, was arrested and charged with two counts of felony assault and criminal possession of a weapon while the two women were charged with menacing, > disorderly conduct and trespassing.

Note the tone and diction of the headline and first line of the story. "Cashier who beat customers claims self defense" and "Cashier…savagely beat…two female customers with a metal rod". If you didn't read any further you might conclude that this fellow started whaling on two (don't forget female…ergo the beat-down was extra-special bad) customers for no reason whatsoever, and is cravenly using the legal refuge of the violent scoundrel: the claim of self-defense.

Only those who bother to read further discover that these two female customers initiated the entire episode by vaulting over the counter and attacking a McDonald's cashier, after which he proceeded to strike them with a metal rod. Even then the loaded language continued: "grabbed a metal bar and fought back with savage force", "deliver crushing blows", etc.

Now perhaps I'm reading into this a little bit, but it sure seems as though the article, the way it is worded, goes out of its way to paint the cashier as the aggressor and the two women as victims, despite their aggressive and threatening behavior (key mitigating facts we do not discover until later).

Now I'll grant you that one's right to self-defense stops as soon as your assailants lack the ability to continue the attack, and this fellow apparently, allegedly, kept whacking away after his two attackers fell to the ground, but as a commenter to the article pointed out, that legal precept has been shown to be a bit flexible as there are many cases where police officers continue to use force after the subject is down cough Rodney King cough, are not effectively resisting, and are let off the hook. Perhaps his actions–allegedly continuing to swing away–after they allegedly fell to the floor and posed no further threat, explains the disparity in charges.

As for me, despite this fellow's prior criminal record which at this moment appears to have no bearing on the present case, these two females had it coming to them. If more hood rats of either sex had their offers of violence matched with equal and/or greater violence, I daresay there would be less of it, for they would suffer the consequences of their breaches of the peace.

It is also interesting to consider how the pass our society grants to female violence only leads them inexorably to greater violence…and this time their violence was met with equal violence by a male mentally and physically prepared to dispense it.

Last, I hope this case goes to a jury trial. For if the comments to this article are representative of the attitude of McIntosh's peers, he'll walk.

Life in the NKVD

W.F. Price · 24 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Feeling a bit lethargic over the last couple days from fasting (hunger does not incline one to prodigious output), I took a little break from writing and focused instead on reading. After finishing up a book on Captain Richard Burton, a famous linguist, spy and adventurer who worked for the British Empire in the 19th century, I found an odd little paperback titled I Was an NKVD Agent (Anatoli Granovsky), and read it in a night.

Although I can't corroborate the man's story, it was a fascinating book published in the early 60s, about 15 years after Granovsky defected to Sweden. In it, Granovsky tells the story of his life as a child and young man in the most oppressive and chaotic era of Soviet history — the great purge of the 30s and WWII.

After his father, a high-ranking bureaucrat, was liquidated in the 1930s, Granovsky tried in frustration to reason with the NKVD, eventually earning himself an extended stay in Lubyanka prison, known to Russians as "the tallest building in Moscow… one can see Siberia from its basement."

Finally, after making an appeal to NKVD head honcho Lavrentiy Beria, a cruel, tyrannical Georgian who presided over mass murder and appalling massacres, notably the Katyn massacre of the Polish elite in 1940, Granovsky was recruited as an NKVD agent to spy on his former elite friends, with whom he had spent his childhood before his family's fall from power.

The NKVD, later to become the KGB, was the Soviet Union's secret police, and was the domestic arm of state control. Due to Stalin's enormous paranoia and lust for power, the NKVD grew into a monstrously powerful organization that permeated every niche of Soviet society. The chekists, as NKVD agents were known, had enormous power and privilege, which they ostensibly used to further the goals of Communism, but also to enrich and enjoy themselves in various manners according to their tastes.

What I found most interesting about the book was the picture it gave of the life of a chekist, and of the organization as a whole. Although it's fairly well-known that brutality and lack of concern for human life characterized the Soviet secret police, I hadn't been aware that the organization was comprised largely of very young men (and some women). Granovsky himself began his career as an agent in his late teens, and ended it in his mid 20s. In some ways, the NKVD resembled a Los Angeles street gang more than a Western-style bureaucracy. Rule of law was essentially nonexistent, and authority rested upon one's ability to liquidate opponents. True friendship and comradery existed to some extent, but ultimately a fatalistic attitude toward all tender human emotions prevailed, and one's ability to get by, indeed, to survive, often depended upon a man's willingness to betray, abandon, and sometimes even destroy, those he cared about.

If the book is an accurate account of a chekist's life, and I have no reason to believe it isn't, there was no matriarchy in the Soviet Union. Feminism played no part in Soviet power politics, and it appears that nobody took it seriously in any event. Women may have had it a little better than men, but this was only because of the unchecked brutality with which men treated each other; where men were ruthlessly beaten and then murdered, women were simply raped or forced into sexual service. And rape was exceedingly common, often used as a tactic to humiliate husbands or intimidate them into confessions. In one anecdote Granovsky relates, a prisoner was forced to watch his pregnant wife beaten until she lost the baby, all while agents were screaming at him to confess.

WWII occupies the latter half of the book, and the picture the author gives us of the Great Patriotic War is one of chaos, deprivation, and barbarism of the highest degree — on both sides. Rather than a front that rolled along neatly to the war's conclusion as in Western Europe, the Soviet march to victory was marked by messy conflagrations that continued for some time after Germany's surrender. Breslau, the site of a prolonged siege lasting months until the city finally surrendered, was evidently defended largely by Soviet POWs who fought the Red Army to the last man, fully aware of what fate awaited those who allowed themselves to be taken prisoner by the enemy. Eastern European nationalists continued to engage in attacks on the Russian rear, which continued for several years after the war.

All in all, it was a good read, and I'd recommend the book to those interested in the history of Communism and the Soviet Union. Although not a comprehensive history by any means, it is a compelling story and lends some insight into Soviet society.

What I took away from the book is that in societies where men do not respect or value each other, everyone suffers. A lack of respect for men's human rights – for their very humanity – does not result in a better society for women or children. Quite the opposite, in fact. Feminists, who would improve women's condition by degrading men's, are doing their sisters a grave disservice. Although men, as always, will bear the brunt of the abuses, women eventually pay a terrible price as well.

Misandry for Profit: Why so much TV was gynocentric

Davd · 24 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There's a powerful, subtle irony when some Feminists attack capitalism. Capitalist funding [and through funding, substantial control] of television, was one of the major 20th Century supporters of feminism and female supremacism, if in a very backhanded way. The first widespread misandric themes in 20th Century mass media were—as best one can estimate—framed, choreographed and broadcast to pander to women's control over—shopping.

Capitalism tends to have a narrow social focus: It pays too much attention to the money and too little to the "side effects".

As television became widespread, programming was soon guided by the Profit Motive: The programs that were broadcast were those that advertisers would pay the most to broadcast. There were some social-policy restrictions, such as "no pornography where and when children might watch", "don't insult people's race or religion"; and some imprecise limitations on violence. These restrictions probably caused more "domestic situation comedy" programs to be shown than would have "aired" without them.

Advertisers pay for television—as they pay for any advertising medium—because they expect to get more profit from increased sales, than they pay out. Most of them aim the advertisements, and choose the programs with which to broadcast them, with shoppers in mind. Excellent television content that does not appeal to shoppers, is a "bad bet" for most advertisers.

"Domestic situation comedies" were perhaps the commonest type of programming. They were mostly free of taboo erotica; they were nominally pro-family, but they were not very respectful of husbands. Why not?—because of the money. As regular comment-poster "Rebel" wrote, T.V. will continue to cater to women unless men start outspending women.

Men shop less than women and have done as long as i've been alive. The TV programming aimed at men—sports, especially—tended to be sponsored by the likes of shaving products and beers. There's a lot less money spent on shaving products and beer, than on all the things women buy, especially food, household supplies, and women's clothing. (Ever go through the print advertisements in "content-analysis mode", counting up the amount of space given to women's vs. men's clothing?)

After World War II, as television was becoming common, came the "Baby Boom". Prosperity enabled men to support nuclear families without their wives having to earn money. Housewives became the chief shoppers and television programming catered to them—because they were the ones who spent the most money.

As a student or junior professor in the 1960s or '70s—i no longer remember just when—i first met the phrase "The Jackass Formula", a scripting type in which husbands were portrayed as bumbling fools and wives as smarter and wiser. It became the conventional structure of "domestic situation comedies", and the obvious reason why television programming followed it, was that the advertisers wanted to please the main household spenders—who were wives.

Since "The Simpsons" is better known to most readers than the television programming of decades past, i'll quote a passage i read recently about that program:

'The Simpsons' follows the middle-class, Springfield-dwelling Simpson family. Homer Simpson is the caring but moronic head of the household, who works at the Springfield nuclear power plant for maniacal Springfield billionaire Montgomery Burns. His wife Marge puts up with his constant hair-brained ploys which have taken the family around the world and in contact with celebrities, famous athletes, and even presidents of the United States. Lisa is a know-it-all who's dream is to become the first woman president and save the world of all its evils. Unlike his idealistic sister, Bart is a troublemaker at Springfield Elementary, always avoiding the bullies with his best friend Milhouse. Maggie is the youngest Simpson, always sucking on her pacifier, and who regularly seems to be forgotten by her family which gives her time to explore and cause her own mischief.

[http://www.chacha.com/topic/the-simpsons; accessed 14 October 2011]

Fair characterization of men vis-a-vis women? Not at all. It might be just silly fun satire, if there were as many programs showing men as wiser and smarter, and women as silly-goofy—but are there?

The sponsors—the marketers and retailers of commercial goods and later, services—were not keen to alienate The Shopper. Most of those silly and goofy women shopped. And so, the frailties of men, especially American men, were much more emphasized on the TV screen than were those of women. The "media image", and especially the television image, of the average man, was inferior to that of the average woman—because men didn't shop much, while women spent most of the discretionary income their husbands earned.

Because television was paid-for by advertising, it was consumer-"driven". Because women shopped more than men, the TV producers and advertising agencies that determined what would be shown, catered to women—including presenting a biased picture of the genders and their relative competence. Men were seldom portrayed as evil, but often as inept. Women were seldom portrayed as inept, often as superior to their menfolk, and as far as i recall, never was an American [or Canadian] woman portrayed as evil.

This was the imagery of regular men-in-general and women-in-general that the first TV generation of children "grew up on". The advertisers did not promote careerism to women*; their interest was in getting money from those women as shoppers. But they did promote a self-image to women of competence and superiority; while to men, they promoted a self-image of relative ineptitude and error-prone-ness—and being much more often, the butt of the jokes. They didn't likely believe what they broadcast about men (a majority of advertising and TV executives were men) but because women shopped, women held power over the broadcasting industry via their buying decisions, and the programming pandered to their egos.

The kind of power women held, the "power of the purse," is most easily influenced by catering to the purse-holder, and not at all easily influenced by rational criticism of that person. Putting the funding of television in the hands of advertising agencies and advertisers, whose goals were money (which money was spent by millions of individual women, much of it on mundane things like laundry soap and coffee), led to a mundane woman-pleasing style of programming. It led to what Feminists later called "gynocentric values" receiving priority over men's values and perspectives.

The first TV generation of children soaked up those implicit, contextual, gynocentric messages. To the extent that parents chaperoned their children's television viewing, nearly all treated "situation comedies" as innocent fare, and were likely to censor the usual, traditionally-not-for-children "sex and violence". (There were more masculine themes, especially Disney's Davy Crockett series and "Westerns", of which "the Lone Ranger" was perhaps the most prominent. However, masculine themed programs were often set in the past [or "Outer Space"], most domestic situation comedies, in the present.)

Television taught the generation that reached adult age between 1960 and 1985 consumerism, self-indulgence, and a gynocentric mindset that included female superiority. They were taught by example, much as the storytellers taught before even radio existed. But the storytellers were usually wiser, more disciplined, more answerable-to and representative of community wisdom as well as their own, than dependence on shopping decisions, made television.

Storytelling is effective: How many hours did you spend in school and how many listening to real live storytellers? How much of value did you learn, from each "medium of communication?" By simple arithmetic, my own experience tells me my time with storytellers was more efficient learning time than my time in compulsory-school classrooms.

It's high time the men's movement took up storytelling and setting examples for boys.

One simple way to work at this, could be to restore the Boy Scouts [which are in trouble in Canada today because of some “bad apples”] to what i remember when i was one. We did the old-fashioned Scout things: Hiking, camping, fishing, learning outdoor skills. I never got past First Class, partly because i entered late, but i do well remember our Scoutmaster, a university student and a fine example of young manhood, taking us camping in the winter as well as the warmer seasons. I remember campfire storytelling—about as good as my grandfather’s storytelling, which means mighty-good—and learning to work with other boys, to recognize that each of us had his own distinctive strengths to contribute, and to organize ourselves accordingly.

I never got that from television. It was in that Scout troop (and from my grandfather) that i learned the “Jackass formula” was cheap biased thinking, or as a fellow student later said at university, “whoring after money with their pants on”.

When Feminism bankrupts the government, or however post-Feminist governance comes into being, part of our reforms should restore to good grandfathers and Scouters, the honour they deserve.

Notes:

* One popular situation-comedy, “Private Secretary”, did have an office setting—but it too, followed the usual formula and portrayed boss Peter Sands as less competent than his secretary [whose name i recall as “Susie”, and who was played by Ann Sothern].

 . The Lone Ranger” was sponsored by Cheerios, a relatively nutritious breakfast cereal and a product abouut which children could influence even their mothers.

False Rape Accusation, Murder Coverup Suspected in Sailor's Death

W.F. Price · 25 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Kyle Antonacci, a Navy sailor who was helping clear another sailor of a conviction for raping a female marine, was found dead last year, supposedly in a self-inflicted hanging. However, he was reportedly injured in other manners inconsistent with a hanging, and questions about what really happened have emerged. The medical examiner found that he had a broken nose and facial contusions, as well as cuts on his hands, and wrote: "I was not 100 percent convinced this was a self-inflicted hanging."

When the fellow sailor was initially charged, Antonacci offered evidence that seemed at first to support the prosecution, and his friend Mike Pineda was duly convicted and given a dishonorable discharge. But when Antonacci revealed the full story, Navy investigators started to suspect that the female marine may have been lying, and he offered to help them clear Pineda by secretly taping conversations with the woman who had made the accusation.

When it emerged that Antonacci was supporting Pineda, the woman's marine corps friends began to threaten him, carving an X on his door and menacing him with a knife. Despite the threats, Antonacci continued to support the investigation, calling the woman to gather evidence. Two hours after the last call he made to her, he was found dead.

When the Navy first contacted his parents to let them know about the death, they told conflicting stories. First, it was a car crash, then an aneurysm. When his parents saw the corpse, they said it "looked like he was tortured." Post mortem photographs mysteriously disappeared and when, months later, they had the body exhumed and paid for another autopsy, it was discovered that his hyoid bone, which could have provided crucial evidence pertaining to whether he was hanged or not, was missing.

Although at this point suicide can't be conclusively ruled out, murder as revenge for rape (or false rape accusations), is not rare. A significant number of young men who are murdered are killed due to a rape accusation. Due to the enormous emotional power of a rape accusation, any man who finds himself so accused is in grave danger. In fact, false rape accusations are often attempts by angry women to commit murder by proxy, as in the biblical story of Potiphar's wife, and many other examples from classical literature. Therefore, there is a distinct possibility, especially given the post mortem evidence, that Antonacci was murdered by men attempting to avenge one of "their women."

This incident further details problems with integrating women in the military. When young men and women are together in intimate settings, such as the military, sexual drama inevitably occurs, and sometimes this can have very messy outcomes. Feminists, in their typically simplistic approach to problems, will say "the solution is for men to stop raping women," but that is to ignore the fact that human sexuality is a powerful force that is often accompanied by extremes of emotion, both positive and negative. To foster an environment that encourages this instability in the military is not only unwise, but reckless, and displays a lack of concern for troops and effectiveness as well. One would hope that our leaders – both military and civilian – could have the courage to stand up to those advocating trendy policy based on puerile notions of "how the world ought to be," but that hope would most likely be in vain.

Ruminations from Seat 22D

Airports are great places to watch people. A few decades ago commercial air travel was the province of the wealthy and the social customs of the upper classes generally applied. That is no longer the case: the culture is coarsening and the TSA has made getting to the gate so abominable that dressing for the occasion just means you have more things to strip off and put back on in the "Security" area. Of course most airline seats are built for the small-of-frame rather than the typical obese Western traveler, but that's the free market at work, so I won't complain about being squashed by fat seat-mates here.

I recently took a long trip for work and spent a lot of hours in the air. One of my fellow passengers really stood out in my mind: a 20-something lass a few rows ahead of me. She is a natural-born beauty in that "launch a thousand ships" kind of way – slim, near-perfect symmetrical features, piercing blue eyes, and a shapely body. She is, simply, stunning. But there's more to this story than a retired soldier admiring an exquisite example of female flesh young enough to be my daughter.

It was actually her tattoo that first caught my attention.

She was wearing a low-slung top that revealed a HUGE eagle inked across her chest and extending down under the front of her shirt. And then I noticed her hair – what little there was of it. I've always kept my hair short, even by military standards, and her hair was shorter than mine. Few things de-feminize a woman more than buzzing off her hair, which is why it is considered to be shameful in many societies. She was wearing ratty, ripped jeans and far too much costume jewelry. And then I noticed the piercings. As I stood six inches behind her for several minutes waiting to de-plane I counted seven, and that was just what was visible. I wondered what else she had done to herself. A tramp-stamp is a given, but who knows what other "body art" was hidden out of my view.

She immediately reminded me of a punk-rocker chick I went on a blind date with in the 1980's: a young woman with a fabulous body with too many holes in her head, deliberately raggedy clothes, and her hair arranged like an angry orange porcupine. She was actually pretty nice, but men like me, the kind of man women say they want – responsible, courteous, masculine, respectable, upwardly mobile – avoided women like her even as long-term girlfriends, let alone wives.

Over the years I've learned that people are not always what they seem at first, but if a person goes to great lengths to project a certain persona, especially in a way designed to attract attention, it says something about him/her. I asked myself what would cause the stunningly-beautiful young woman on my flight – at the height of her Sexual Market Value – to do that to herself? Women dress for us, so what does she intend for us to infer? I'm easy? I'm rebellious? I can drink you under the table?

I can think of no message that her chosen facade would convey that would be in her long-term interest. In a few years after her looks fade she is likely to be just another tatted-up skank wondering where the good men are.

It didn't have to be this way. In a different social environment a woman like her would have learned to be (gasp!) feminine. She would have observed the older women in her surroundings and absorbed benevolent patriarchy in the air she grew up breathing. With her beauty she could have married above her economic station and lived a comfortable life. We can't know if she would have been happy, but she almost certainly would have had stability, security and comfort. But she doesn't live in that society; she lives in a "Slut Walk" society, thanks to feminism. When she chose the "Suicide Girl" look nobody stopped her. Now she has mutilated herself with enough ink and metal trinkets to repel the kind of man most likely to give her the life she wants, because no matter what she does to the outside of her body, she will eventually want what women have always wanted on the inside – stability, security and comfort.

The fruits of feminism: what a waste.

On Becoming a "Deadbeat Dad"

W.F. Price · 26 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's fairly taboo for guys to open up about how they end up in child support arrears, because so many of us still harbor old-fashioned ideas about our duty to provide for our family, whether it's possible or not. In fact, it's a huge source of shame for a lot of men, and there isn't much in the way of pity out there, so the stories aren't often told.

Well, I figure I ought to break the ice in this regard, as I am currently in arrears, and let people – young men in particular – know how it can happen.

I've never been a high earner, nor have I ever been very ambitious about making money, although I've worked for the overwhelming majority of my adult life and can't really imagine not working in some capacity or another. I'm sure my lack of financial motivation had something to do with the breakdown of my marriage (although, actually, it was probably psychologically more of a problem for me than my ex), but before being divorced I wasn't aware that it was a potential crime.

As is often the case, separation and divorce were a shock to me. I saw it coming out of the corner of my eye, and was resigned to it in a way, but like the typical man I was in deep denial and avoidance. When my ex finally ran off to begin her affair with the then-married man she now lives with in British Columbia together with my children, I was pretty much left prostrate. It turns out the event had been planned, and her mother was involved. Unfortunately, I had fostered a friendship between my boss and my ex-wife's family after obtaining a job for my ex's sister, and my ex mother in law used this relationship to my ex's advantage, essentially cutting me off from employment at exactly the point my ex left me. She would later tell my own mother that she felt justified in this tactic, because "it was war." Of course, for me it was more like Pearl Harbor, where you don't know it's war until the bombs are falling right on top of you, but people have all sorts of justifications for whatever they do.

So, I found myself unemployed in the middle of the worst recession since the 1930s, with limited means, and alone facing a hostile wife, my children having been seized by her parents. Shortly after I filed for divorce to obtain a visitation schedule so I could see my children on some legal terms, I was falsely accused of making death threats while armed and had tactical officers approach my house with AR-15s. Mercifully, my ex recanted her lies under police questioning and the officers withdrew before I was shot to pieces in one of those humdrum "domestic disturbance" incidents, but my elderly neighbor nearly had a heart attack from fright and I learned that men armed with automatic rifles had questioned my neighbors about me in the meanwhile, which was humiliating to say the least.

Obviously, this was going to be an expensive divorce, and quite frankly I didn't have the money to last long. After my attorney exhausted my retainer within a few months, I was on my own, and I was outclassed. After first admitting that I had never laid a hand on her in anger, my ex, under the guidance of her mother's lesbian, feminist friends, started claiming abuse. There being no evidence, no corroboration and no arrests, the judge ignored her (this is a pro forma accusation in custody disputes), but I was totally demoralized. About six months after the separation, under the strain of being broke, under accusations from my ex, with a touch of PTSD from the SWAT incident and taking care of two toddlers alone much of the time, I started having severe anxiety attacks. It got to the point where I had episodes of dissociation — all of the sudden I'd feel as though nothing around me was real. I'd hold onto the nearest branch, rail or whatever was convenient just to ground myself in reality. I was a mess, but somehow I persevered and maintained some semblance of functionality. I don't know how I pulled it off, and this is one of the times I've managed to surprise myself, but I was a pretty responsible and competent parent throughout all this, taking care of my children while their mother worked.

During this time, my ex's attorney started working me, and I did my best pro se, but I had no idea about court schedules, rules, deadlines, etc. It was all a mystery to me, and I didn't have the time in any event. Nevertheless, I managed to present some facade of resistance, so my ex decided to administer a killing blow. What she did was call CPS (child protective services) on me and accuse me of assaulting my son. She did this exactly as I was undergoing an evaluation by the Court Appointed Special Advocate (CASA), in what was a calculated move to deep-six me prior to the trial, which was scheduled for a couple months down the line. Like her earlier attempt to have me arrested, the call had little immediate effect — the CPS agent checked my son and talked to him, interviewed me and determined the report "unfounded." I breathed a sigh of relief, but of course I was even more stressed and demoralized than ever. Then, unbelievably, she called CPS again two weeks later, this time accusing me of assaulting my then two-year-old daughter. Again, I had to deal with CPS, and this time they said that, since my daughter was only two, they would be referring the case to the police. I called my former attorney, who told me to relax, but I couldn't. And of course, I didn't have the money to pay him, so he did little besides try to reassure me. Fortunately, once again the CPS agent declared the report unfounded, and the police declined the case, but the damage was done. The CASA worker – a grad school volunteer – decided to err on the side of caution, and before the CPS agent finished the investigation (she had a deadline) recommended I attend a domestic violence course for six months (typically reserved for convicted offenders) which would cost me thousands of dollars, and have supervised visitation of my children until its completion, which meant that I wouldn't see them for all that time in any event, since I had no family to stay with me at the time.

I was shattered, broken, beaten down. An attorney friend suggested I go to trial pro se, since I couldn't get a worse deal either way, and he was probably right, but I simply couldn't handle it — I was spent. About this time my ex's attorney approached me with what looked like a reasonable parenting plan with decent time with the kids and a minimal amount of conditions. I would have to attend a ten-hour parenting class (so would my ex) and sixteen hours of anger management, and there would be no supervised visitation following the parenting class. There was only one catch — I would be imputed with income I didn't have and pay more child support than I could afford. Thinking of the alternative, which could mean six months of an expensive domestic violence program that would mark me as admitting guilt for something I never did and possibly compromise my parenting time permanently, I signed. After all was said and done, in one of the strangest and most unexpected incidents of the entire affair, my ex's attorney actually called and offered something like an apology — she said, in a roundabout way, that the CPS and police calls weren't her idea. I really have no idea what prompted this, but I can only imagine my former attorney must have said something to her about playing dirty.

Of course, being broke and unemployed, it didn't take long for arrears to start to build, and it took me some time before I could start paying in full, by which time I was already months behind. My meager bank accounts were seized in the dead of night, I have been threatened by the child support agency, and my credit was reported to all national agencies. There's a hold on passport renewal with the State Department, my tax returns are subject to seizure, and I could be jailed or have my licenses seized at any time. Given that I am also paying off student loans, becoming "current" will be a rather painful process. Although it's not a pleasant place to be, at least I know that I am merely one of millions in the same situation, and many have it a lot worse than I do.

Yes, it sounds like an awful mistake, but to me, the time with my kids was worth it. They can throw me in jail, make a pariah out of me, or proclaim me a worthless deadbeat to the entire world, but I am not in the least bit ashamed — my conscience is clear.

However, I still want young men to learn from my own travails. Never go into marriage or fatherhood without being fully aware of the risks they entail. Never look at a young, willing woman without a critical eye, and always be prepared for the worst. And, if you should ever find yourself in this position, don't lose faith or despair — they can take all your worldly possessions, your children, and even your freedom, but they can never make it right, and there are such things as honor and goodness in the world. Believe it, for yourself and your kids if for nobody else.

The Extemporaneous Narrative

On occasion, I am asked to speak. I may know what I want to say, but have not a clue exactly how I will end up saying it. If I had it all written down first, I would probably say it with less emotion and stark articulation.

However, I am an emotional person that usually reacts to not only the subject at hand, but also the manner in which it is already being discussed. I don't think this is a bad trait to have; insomuch as an undisciplined one. I have a feel for people. I am a people watcher, and have been for years and years. I know when I am going to be uncomfortable in a room, simply by observing the body language around me.

I am usually very uncomfortable around women. So if you see me speaking to a woman, it is usually in a professional capacity, or a condescending one. I mean no harm by it, but I have 'a past' that gives me an insight that many other women just do not understand. At times, I catch myself 'dumbing down' to some women that are just plain clueless. It puts me in a precarious position. And I don't like myself much when I am doing it. It makes me want to give them a subliminal video reel of my life. Maybe then, they would understand some things. Maybe then, I would not have to speak at all.

This brings me to the issue of, and plights of; men. A topic I have been not only been ostracized for, but alienated by many women because of my passion connected to it. I have women in my family that no longer speak to me because I speak against 'them' simply because I advocate for men's rights.

My active vocal position on the rights of men, has pissed off a lot of women. I aim to please (couldn't help that one)…but would much rather enlighten.

The irony of all of this is, that I have not had many men as mentors in my family. There's just a whole bunch of women in it. Luck of the draw, which I had absolutely nothing to do with. And the funny thing about that statistic, is that the men that don't care for me on some websites seem to think I had something to do with my own personal genealogy….or early deaths of the men that came before me. My father passed away two years ago. My brother is currently ill. I lost the love of my life. I do not have many uncles, and my male cousins and half brothers (most of whom I have never met) live in other parts of the country. One cousin, was shot four times a couple of decades ago, survived, and now runs a program that helps over four hundred men 'get back on their feet'. If only his mother had lived to see it. She would be so proud. But his father has, and I know he is proud, as am I.

I have said it before, and I will say it again; I don't hate women. I just hate what they do to men. It is almost as simple as that. But behind its simplicity is a complex roller coaster of gender biased favoritism and prejudice. Women have outsmarted men. Feminism has influenced which way the wind blows when it comes to passing laws that give women the ultimate entitlement 'loopholes'. Do you know why? I do. And it's not pretty. As a matter of fact, it is almost prehistoric. Men still seek the approval of women. (Emotionally, physically, and politically) Men yearn for that validation that they are indeed men…through the women they think will punch that ticket for them. (Please see the clerk outside, and she will validate your parking for you)

I have voiced my views here many times with expletives that either grab you by the balls, or make you wish I did not speak at all. Either way, I have spoken my mind, and stand by my sometimes emotionally/grammatically flawed narrative…regardless.

But that does not mean I know it all. I still have much to learn. And the more I learn, the more I know I need to be here. I do pay attention. Now you need to make other women pay attention. Or you are doomed to stand in that very long line with so many others…. still waiting to get validated.

The unfortunate thing about that is…
There ain't no free parking in any woman's parking lot.

And they know it.

You know it.

Comment of the Week — “Breaking The Paradigm” in McDonald’s Incident

W.F. Price · 27 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Rocco reminded me of the comment of the week recently, so I thought I ought to make it a more regular feature, as comments are often good enough to be posts of their own. This week, because the comment ratings were down for testing for a few days, I have to do without the benefit of counting votes, but fortunately I found a comment by Keyster that offers a good analysis of the McDonald’s beating incident and meets the criteria:

By Keyster

If a man instigates a violent response from another man, “he had it coming”.

If a woman instigates a violent response from a man, he should have better controlled his emotions and galantly taken the abuse, you know “like a man”.

We have a society that wants to make it illegal for men to exploit their physical advantage to better control women, while allowing women to use any means possible to provoke a reaction. We’re biased against men because of their propensity to “do more damage”, which justifies allowing women to do whatever they want…because they’re weaker and incompetent at fighting (although we won’t admit this).

This young man at McDonalds, just trying to make it, was never conditioned socially (or through our education system) to treat a threat any differently just because it was coming from a woman or women. He had no “feminist prism” or filter to view it through. He was not about to suffer the chivalric mangina’s fool. He was all about equality of the sexes. He is a truly “organic” feminist!

It doesn’t matter who instigated the fight, if an “aggressive, violent and angry man” ends up winning (or controlling hysterical women through physical means), he’ll go down for it. He should have known better; that women aren’t held accountable for violence against men. When men do it to women it’s “a HORRIFIC crime”. When women do it to men, “he probably did something to upset her and therefore deserved it”.

Women have been given carte blanche to ridicule and abuse men without threat of any inkind physical response, and they know it and they use it. The young McDonald’s employee was heroically “breaking the paradigm”, created by our feminist society and chivalric legal system. Either that or he was simply not gonna let himself be “dissed by a coupla nasty lil hoes”.

Ryan Gosling Running with Girly Meme

Ryan Gosling, aware of his popularity with female fans, has decided that androgyny suits him, declaring "I think like a girl" to The Independent:

> "I think like a girl, I think," he says, in answer to a question about growing up with his mother and sister (his parents had divorced). Having been bullied at school thanks to his early TV success, Gosling was home-schooled by his mother for a year, which meant an ever greater female presence in his life. "I was literally raised by my mother and my sister. And I just feel like I wouldn't know how to think any other way. My sister was my best friend and my hero growing up. Because I was home-schooled I didn't have a lot of friends and I did ballet, which was always just girls. All of that had an effect on my brain."
> Though he insists he has "no free time" currently, when he does, he is often found at a Los Angeles ballet studio. "I practise whenever I can," he says, without a modicum of embarrassment.
>
> Have myriad LA mums not spread the word as to exactly where Hollywood's latest heart-throb can be readily observed putting in his pliés? He seems not really to have considered the prospect.
> "A lot of the students are young girls so they're there with their mums but they just kind of watch and tell me to keep it up. They try and be positive but I'm so bad. I don't even know what I like about it but it's like acting, I'm just compelled to do it and I do it to find out why. The not knowing is interesting."

Generally, effeminacy in men is popular with very young women and girls (e.g. boy bands, some pop stars), but it doesn't appeal as much to other demographics, so I'm not sure this is a good career move for an actor past the age of 30. That Gosling practices ballet is not necessarily an indication of anything, as the art is very physically demanding and probably a better means of keeping in shape than, say, yoga, but unfortunately it has less than manly connotations in our culture.

However, it may be that Gosling is actually being sincere here, and not simply trying to play to his fan base. That he ascribes his effeminacy to being raised by a single mother raises a very interesting question:

Is single motherhood and the lack of men around children causing boys to develop effeminate characteristics? Could it be that the lack of "manliness" that women often complain of is a direct result of feminist victories in the war against fathers?

I Gave GMP Permission to Re-post my Deadbeat Dad Piece

W.F. Price · 29 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

After I posted the “Deadbeat Dad” story, a reader suggested to Lisa Hickey that she post these kinds of stories, and she agreed, then asked whether she could post the piece. Thinking that it could be of some benefit to other men out there who might not see it otherwise, I said “go ahead.” It went up shortly afterward.

I didn’t mention it immediately, because I didn’t relish the idea of a comment war, but I thought I ought to ask readers what they think of this. Of course, there have been some angry feminists denouncing GMP for running it, but otherwise no negative fallout.

As I see it, some stories simply must be told, and I’ll use even potentially unfriendly venues to do so. While we may object to a lot of what is posted in the Good Men Project, as so much of it is recycled material from the same paradigm that has put us men in the tough situation we find ourselves in today, it does seem to me that the main point of the site is publishing material that will attract an audience, and I can’t argue with that.

However, I still want to hear thoughts from readers, as it isn’t always easy to come up with answers concerning what to do with our content here, and how to best use it. So, feel free to let me know what you think.

A Unique Sacrificial Manner

Elusive Wapiti · 30 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

From a pop song not long ago:

> I wanna man by my side
> Not a boy who runs and hides
> Are you gonna fight for me?
> Die for me?
> Live and breathe for me?
> Do you care for me?
> 'Cause if you don't then just leave

A fairly common value in our society, particularly inside Christian circles but also without, is the expectation that men, the not-so-expendable expendable sex, are to be ready to risk their lives and sacrifice themselves for others around them, particularly for women and children, even if neither are related to them. So common is this value is that when men sacrifice themselves for others, say, by defending their families, intervening in a street brawl, or dashing into burning buildings to rescue complete strangers, actions such as these are so unremarkable as to maybe merit a brief mention in a news article or a nightly news broadcast. Conversely, the absence of this value is also noteworthy, as is when men elect to not intervene despite a stranger's (usually a woman's) cries for help.

But what about women? Is there not the expectation that they should sacrifice of themselves for others? Even their men? Sometimes not even their children?

Sadly, not much in this day and age.

Thus it is highly unusual to read of stories such as this:

> In July, a CT scan revealed that she had head and neck cancer.
> Now she had to choose between her life and her baby's life. Phillips said she agonized only for a while before deciding against taking potentially lifesaving chemotherapy in hopes that she would soon hold a healthy baby in her arms.
> Crimm collapsed at her home in Ryan and was rushed to OU Medical Center in Oklahoma City on Aug. 16. Doctors said that the invasive tumor had begun wrapping around the brain stem, slowly squeezing the life out of Crimm.
> At noon [2 days later], the baby's heart rate plummeted. Then Crimm's heart stopped 90 minutes later. With "code blue" issued, doctors and nurses rushed to resuscitate her and decided it was best to take the 2-pound, 1-ounce baby, Dottie Mae, by C-section.
> When his sister regained consciousness later that day, Phillips asked what she thought about possibly seeing Dottie. Crimm's eyes popped open and she raised her hands as if to ask where was her child. They placed the baby on her mother's chest. Mother and child gazed into each other's eyes for several minutes. She smiled at the baby who at last lay in her arms.
> Stacie Crimm died three days later.

I suspect the usual response for those situated similarly to Ms. Crimm would be to sacrifice the baby in a last-ditch effort to save her own life. It would be easy, and few would have judge a woman poorly for it. But she didn't take this route; she consciously made the choice to save the life of her child in exchange for sealing her own (very imperiled) fate.

For this act, I commend Ms. Crimm. She displayed an uncommon selflessness and acted positively to assure the life of her child, even when doing so took a probable death and made it all but certain.

Yet I am also troubled by Ms. Crimm's action, not for the act itself, but in wondering why we do not hear of more incidents such as these. Is selflessness and self-sacrifice a virtue largely limited to the male sex? Why do we not hear of more women making exchanges such as these, let alone risking their lives to save strangers, or even their own husbands? Is it hypocritical to demand the ultimate sacrifice from another for one's own benefit, while demurring when the same sort of cup passes by your own lips?

This brings me to my final point, and that is to exhort my fellow men to eschew relationships with unrepentant abortionettes. Let's set aside for a moment issues of suitability for marriage for those women who have had previous abortions. Considering the woman who esteems herself so highly as to take an innocent life so she would not be inconvenienced, how is such a woman likely to treat the sacrifice that, like the musician queried in the quote at the beginning of this post, women routinely demand from men? Will she treat it lightly, or worse, with a sense of entitlement? Or will she treasure it, with all the importance and gravity such a gift deserves? And even more importantly, is it reasonable to expect a woman who esteems herself in such a lofty manner to sacrifice of herself–money, time, her body, or even her life–in favor of her mate or her children if/when faced with dilemmas featuring such hard choices?

Arab Spring Ushers in Polygamy, Shariah — Western Leaders, Press Offer Only Feeble, Feminist Critique

W.F. Price · 31 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Now that Qaddafi has been duly sodomized and lynched by our brave, new Libyan allies, leaders of the new government have said they intend to restore Shariah (Koran-based) law, and noted that "Shariah allows polygamy." The NY Times, which previously offered relatively uncritical support for the Libyan rebels, ominously declared:

> It looked like a sizable step backward for women at a moment when much here — institutions, laws, social relations — is still in play after the end of Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi's 42 years of authoritarian rule.

But is polygamy really as much of a step backward for women as it is for men? No, it isn't. Polygamy ensures that women will always have a place in society as some man's wife, whereas many men will necessarily be left out in the cold. Usually, it is the younger, poorer men who must do without as older, wealthier men marry up the local maidens.

However, French foreign minister Alain Juppé sees the issue in feminist terms, stating:

> This is a problem for us, especially in regard to respect for the dignity of women.

Even from a feminist standpoint, this is an arguable position; women who are married, even those in polygamous marriages, will not be forced into prostitution or other dubious occupations to support themselves. No, as Financial Times columnist Tim Harford pointed out in Slate five years ago, the real losers will be single men:

> …A lot of the knee-jerk reactions against polygyny are from people who can't add up. In a society with equal numbers of men and women, each man with four wives gives women the additional pick of three men—the poor saps whose potential wives decided they'd prefer one-quarter of a billionaire instead. In the Sahel region of Africa, half of all women live in polygynous households. The other half have a good choice of men and a lot more bargaining power.

Much of the power of the so-called "Arab-Spring" revolts that have swept the Arab world derived from dissatisfied young men. Without their passion and outrage the social movement never would have made any headway, but the annihilation of the decrepit, authoritarian regimes of old Araby may not represent "progress" in the contemporary, Western sense of the word. In fact, it's looking more like this is the beginning of another long jihad, the likes of which have periodically swept the world since the introduction of Islam, rather than the move toward "democracy" and modernity that the West foolishly expected.

Shariah is essentially a recipe for jihad, which is a sacred duty in Islam. Polygyny all but assures strife, as young men are forced to compete violently for the resources necessary to secure women. How are these young men to secure wives when the local girls are all married off to wealthy sheikhs? Why, by conquest, of course! Usually this takes the form of raiding a nearby village, but it can also result in massive campaigns, such as those that took the Arabs as far as China to the east and Spain to the West.

Cynics in high places surely knew what was going on in the revolts, and perhaps they are starting to get a bit nervous about the new strongmen in North Africa, but if the only critique our leaders can muster is on the basis of feminism we are going to be in for a rough ride, as that is an entirely insufficient response to the threat of resurgent jihad. Any way you look at it – and you don't have to be a believer to recognize what stirs the hearts of men – God (or Allah, if you prefer) trumps effete Western handwringing over women's equality in the Maghreb or the Pamirs. In fact, if our leaders keep up this pusillanimous finger-wagging over women, even as they provide air cover for Al Qaeda-trained jihadis, they may as well invite these modern-day Umayyads back to Tours for another round.

Herman Cain Breaks Taboo in Accusation Response

W.F. Price · 31 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In days past, when male politicians were accused of sexual misconduct, they would only issue denials, and let others take care of the character attacks on accusers. Bill Clinton, for example, never said much about the women who accused him of using his position as governor of Arkansas to have affairs with numerous women, instead allowing James Carville to make remarks on TV about trolling trailer parks with $20 bills.

Clarence Thomas, for his part, cast his ordeal as part of a "high-tech lynching," and likewise avoided taking Anita Hill on directly, saying:

> This is not an opportunity to talk about difficult matters privately or in a closed environment. This is a circus. It's a national disgrace. And from my standpoint, as a black American, it is a high-tech lynching for uppity blacks who in any way deign to think for themselves, to do for themselves, to have different ideas, and it is a message that unless you kowtow to an old order, this is what will happen to you. You will be lynched, destroyed, caricatured by a committee of the U.S. Senate rather than hung from a tree.

Thomas may have had something of a point, but the truth is that politicians can always be targeted with lurid accusations no matter who they are, and a white politician probably would have been equally vulnerable to a similar charge in that political climate, when feminists were just beginning to flex their muscles on the national stage.

However, like Clinton, he avoided confronting his accuser. Even today, men are reluctant to directly challenge a woman when she makes an accusation, and for a compelling reason — people, including judges, will often take such a stance as an indication that the accused man is a bully, and efforts to defend himself may therefore end up appearing incriminating, but this perception is on the wane.

Cain, on the other hand, has decided to nip this "scandal" in the bud by going on the offensive and labeling the sexual harassment case a "false accusation." It's probably the wisest course of action, and one that is increasingly acceptable given changing views concerning gender and the dawning public awareness that many accusations are in fact deceptive and made with ulterior motives.

Here's an excerpt from Cain's statement:

> while at the restaurant association, I was accused of sexual harassment. Falsely accused, I might add. I was falsely accused of sexual harassment, and when the charges were brought, as the leader of the organization, I recused myself and allowed my general counsel and human resource officer to handle it.

I don't know much about Herman Cain, aside from the fact that he's a good businessman and a conservative. But I do think it's a positive sign to see a man standing up for himself in a direct, open manner, and putting the ball back in his accuser's court rather than avoiding the issue and handing it off to some PR team. Calling the harassment case a "false accusation" may not seem like a big deal at first thought, but it's actually very significant, as it is a departure from the typical evasion and deference to the accuser.

Hopefully, more men will take this example to heart and, no matter what their status or position, finally realize that actively and openly defending themselves from spurious accusations is both acceptable and effective.

It's Not Sex, It's a Legacy

Elusive Wapiti · 31 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In which an otherwise excellent critique of Kate Bolick's hamster-ridden call to write off 49% of the population and set up women-and-their-children communities stumbles a bit on the reason why men seem to be in an irrecoverable nose-dive:

> Women cannot raise expectations for men by retiring into all-female "families." They can do so only by refusing to provide commitment-free sex — by treating sex not as a perk of dating relationships whose destination vis-à-vis marriage is unknown, but as a shared marital reward.
> Bolick's fascination with matriarchal arrangements must be resisted, not explored. It contributes to the lowering of women's expectations of men and men's expectations of themselves. The sexual availability of unmarried women, which can only be exacerbated by a more matriarchal social structure, plays a key role in promoting male decline. Men who begin having sex in their early teens do not effectively absorb the lesson that they will need a job – or any accomplishment besides physical attractiveness or charisma – in order to have sex. By the time they are old enough to learn otherwise, many of them have fathered several children and failed to make themselves employable.
> Respect for the bodies of women, and for their desire for family and commitment, must be accompanied by respect for the dignity of men. This would encourage men not only to commit to women, but to raise their standards for themselves, reversing the very problem leading to the supposed need for female support networks.

Ms. Halim implies that the free-flowing nature of female sexuality inhibits society's ability to make men perform in exchange for access to sex. And this is not an altogether unreasonable conclusion; after all, why marry a cow when milk is (more cheaply) available? With all that cheap/free milk around, why work to buy any?

But I think her conclusion is spoiled by one simple fact…not all single men are having all the sex they can stand; in fact, only a very small minority are, while the majority have much less, and a growing minority aren't having sex at all…witness the conventional wisdom-confounding fact that male virgins now outnumber female ones in college. Yet male performance, as measured by income and/or achievement (two metrics by which women, and therefore our feminized society as a whole, measure male worth), continues to decline. Why?

I think it starts in the womb, where Western women appear to prefer girl babies over boys. From there the lucky-he-escaped-the-womb-alive boy-child is exposed to misandrist messages his whole childhood, from nursery rhymes to clothing and books to television programming and movies (which feature socially approved female-on-male violence and strong female/weak male roles. At school he is educated like a girl by women in a facility that has the look and feel of a prison, and outlets for his masculine energies are "Title IX'ed" in favor of bolstering opportunities for less-interested girls. As an adult, the climate and curricula in college are thoroughgoingly feminist and misandrist, in the workplace women are hired preferentially and paid more for less work, and in society in general, women's health and life choices are subsidized to the exclusion of men, all while men like him pay the bill. These are just a few of the factors that serve to depress modern male performance.

But the one big factor that I think dominates them all is this: our society no longer cares to protect the tie of a man to his children.

Yes, the lack of a meaningful and enduring marriage commitment means that a fellow's ties to his kids, really the only reason outside of religion for a man to pair bond with a woman at all, especially in an age of loose women and commodified female sexuality, are easily dispensed with. Men and the investment of a father in his children are "optional". These optional fellows, guys without legacies, without a reason to produce more than they themselves consume, don't. Guys can exist quite frugally, as a cursory look at any bachelor pad can confirm. Why should they act differently? Can anyone give them a reason?

Once started, the social decline accelerates as the spiral death-dive tightens and self-sustains. Boys raised without their father in the home are at a much higher risk of lowered educational performance, a life of crime, antisocial behavior, and marital disruption. In other words, the sort of low-quality guys that both Ms. Bolick and Ms. Halim find unsuitable for marriage. Girls raised without their father have sex at a younger age, all while internalizing the message that fathers really aren't that important–because theirs wasn't. They go on to have kids out of wedlock, and perpetuate the cycle. See how easy this is to start? And how difficult it is to stop once it gets going?

Viewed in this way, Ms. Halim's call for the sexual trade union to make men jump through more hoops so that men will respect themselves more–and therefore be bedded more frequently by women–just doesn't seem sufficient. More effective I think would be restoring the potency of a fellow's connection to his kids. Instead of disposable, make him indispensable. Give him a legacy to care about. This–not the lame promise of more sex, a "product" which he can get for cheap cheap–gives him a reason to be a better man.

FEMEN Back at it in Naughty Maid DSK Protest

W.F. Price · 1 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, we heard some windy talk from the French foreign minister about "women's dignity" in the Arab world. Perhaps what he has in mind is something like the following video, in which Ukraine feminist group FEMEN shows up in Paris to defend women's dignity — in revealing naughty maid outfits.

After crawling around on all fours for a while, the girls bare their breasts, demonstrating to the world what modern, Western feminism is all about.

I suppose I'd rather have these ones marching around town than our American slutwalkers, but I'd be pretty embarrassed if one of those girls was my daughter.

Assange Appeal Fails, Extradition Imminent

W.F. Price · 2 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Today, Julian Assange lost his appeal of an extradition order for rape and sex charges in Sweden, and now can only hope that the British Supreme Court will hear his appeal. Failing that, Assange could be extradited within the fortnight.

Assange has been wanted for questioning by Swedish authorities since two women he slept with discovered he was two-timing them and then went together to the police to accuse him of sex crimes. He denies rape or any other sex crimes, but Sweden allows for rape prosecution in a wide variety of circumstances, many of which would not be considered crimes anywhere else in the world. In fact, he appealed in part on the basis that whatever he did, it would not be considered a crime in Britain, but the argument was ultimately futile.

Assange maintains a website, swedenversusassange.com, where he provides the details of the case. One alleged rape happened after Assange had already had sex with one of the women, and then proceeded to do so again when she was drowsy. Upon awakening, she let him continue, but because she had not been awake (so she says) at first, it was nonconsensual, despite the fact that she was in bed with him naked and had already been having consensual sex with him that evening:

> Note: For the description of this allegation in the original police interrogation, and an explanation of the definition of rape in Sweden, see Sexual Offences.
> - There are different 'versions' of the state of the complainant at the moment of penetration: 'half asleep' or sleeping (lightly, as opposed to deeply according to the prosecutor).
> - When she awoke to find his penis inside her vagina, she decided to let him continue even though she knew that he was not wearing a condom.
> - Section 75 of the 2003 Act has a 'rebuttable presumption' of non-consent in various situations – including "The complainant was asleep or otherwise unconscious at the time of the relevant act".
> - Even if it was established that the complainant was asleep, complainant SW had previously in the night (before the alleged rape) engaged in several sexual encounters. In one of them, she had seen that Julian Assange had not worn a condom properly but 'let it be'.
> - These surrounding circumstances make it quite plausible that Julian Assange may have reasonable believed she was consenting, even if he did penetrate her when she was asleep (if that is established).

One might think that a grown woman removing her clothes and getting in bed with a man would indicate consent, but apparently this is not so in Sweden, where women are held to be such delicate flowers, such naive, trusting, inviolate children, that they are to be protected by force of law from the vile depredations of the dirty-minded, dastardly men they so innocently jump into bed with.

Herman Cain's Self-Defense Pays Off

W.F. Price · 2 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It looks like Herman Cain's choice to stand his ground and defend himself from sexual harassment allegations has gained the candidate sympathy. After Politico came out with the sexual harassment story, Cain received over $350,000 in campaign donations, mostly online:

> The news media's focus on past accusations of sexual harassment this week hasn't been all bad for Herman Cain. His presidential campaign raised at least $350,000 since Politico published its story Sunday night, a source close the campaign told Yahoo News.
> Mark Block, Cain's chief of staff, said Tuesday that the campaign had raised $250,000 online, but the latest information shows that contributors have given at least $300,000, campaign spokesman J.D. Gordon confirmed.
>
> "It will take a while to determine exactly how much," Gordon told Yahoo News. "It was well over $300,000."
> Fundraising reached an all-time high for the campaign while Cain and his staff were doing damage control over the Politico story, which revealed past allegations of sexual harassment against Cain when he served as head of the National Restaurant Association. At National Journal's 2012 Election Preview in Washington, D.C., Tuesday morning, Block said Monday had been one of the campaign's "best fundraising days ever."

The support for the conservative candidate suggests that the decades-old trend of male helplessness in the face of female accusations may be coming to an end. Although the shift in public attitude may not be immediately apparent on the ground level, it could have profound effects in the workplace and in family law in coming years.

Bill Bennet Responds to Feedback, Ignores Men, Bashes them Again

W.F. Price · 3 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Bennet remarked that he received a fair amount of reader response from his recent piece excoriating young men for failing to "man up." He says that he received responses from both men and women, and then proceeded to ignore what men had to say in favor of listening to the females:

> My first CNN column on this subject identified what I think are the common problems with some men today: deficiencies in work, marriage and faith. The overwhelming response I received, from men and women alike, worries me.
> Many women told me the problems are much worse than I described. They explained to me how they have to lower their standards to find a man. Young women, in particular, complained that men are dragging them down and holding them back. As one woman told me, if 60 is the new 40 for men, then 25 is the new 13…
> etc…

After going on for some time about how bad the poor ladies have it, he lays into men yet again:

> In developed Western countries, man has unprecedented freedom to chose, to a degree heretofore unknown, a life of his own wanting and design. A mere hundred years ago, man couldn't afford to dawdle in limbo between adolescence and manhood; manhood was thrust upon him for survival. Today, more opportunity lies at his feet than ever. Yet with this increased opportunity comes increased confusion, and the response on the part of some men has not been encouraging.
> Take the Occupy Wall Street movement, for instance. While diverse and scattered, some of the mottos and slogans on display are in stark contrast to the traditional and time-tested ideas of manliness. Instead of industriousness, responsibility and entrepreneurship, these men demand free college education, required living wages and greater distribution of someone else's wealth. Rather than look inward and rely on their own self-sufficiency, they look for a handout. A man's livelihood once depended on his hands, back and brain. Today, the government can do all that for him, if he lets it…

Mr. Bennet, if you are not a career government worker, what does the government do for you? Nothing! Young men have less economic opportunity than they had 40 years ago, they are far more likely to be thrown in jail, and they are legally discriminated against in both employment and education. The government has actively oppressed them, not only in the outside world, but in their own homes.

Young men are, objectively speaking, far less privileged than they used to be. This is what bothers women. Their men have been beaten down, and it's always frustrating for women to be with men who occupy a lower social status than they do. It disgusts women, in fact, and Bennett's solution is simply more shaming and blaming, which obviously won't help matters at all.

Bennett is getting old, and will not matter much at all very soon. What's important today is that younger men regain some of the self-respect that characterized the many generations of men who fought for their rights and built our nations. That will involve standing up to men like Bennett, and taking back our patrimony.

We owe nothing to these doddering old fools who sold us out for women's approval and blowjobs from interns. It's high time we shove these old bulls out to pasture, and we must stay vigilant against any younger men who would try to mimic them.

Comment of the Week — Coming of Age, Standing Tall

W.F. Price · 3 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The following comment fits the bill perfectly for "comment of the week" — it is a well-written, well-rated and thoughtful account of a man's spiritual evolution and realization that resolutely standing up for oneself in the face of the unwarranted opprobium often aimed at men is the honorable thing to do, and also the most effective defense. "YoungWiseMan" is an apt moniker in this case.

By YoungWiseMan

I am in my mid-30′s, but have always been at the very frontier of this type of thinking. Perhaps it was due to my own father raising me with a keen understanding and appreciation of masculine values, and no doubt also to my mother, who was hardworking, efficient at all the tasks with which a noble and honorable woman should aspire to (homemaking skills, adept at child rearing, nurturing and loyal to my father).

I have seen and contemplated these issues for over 15 years now, since I was wrongfully accused of rape as an undergrad (thankfully no formal charges were filed) however, the girl in question told many other girls and also male students that I had raped her, I suspect mostly for attention, and the fact was, I wasn't just innocent, I was beyond innocent. She had pursued me physically on the night in question and introduced me to marijuana, which I had never even been in the presence of before.

My response was two fold: first, when confronted by her male friends who made snide remarks to or sought to "tell me off" so to speak, I reacted physically, as I had been taught to do by my father when one's honor is insulted and you are clearly in the right. Secondly, I wrote a passage for the college paper called "a male perspective on date rape" which was published rather surprisingly, albeit with my head shot right beside the title. Needless to say, I caught a significant amount of criticism from the feminist types. Strangers would come up and run their mouth off at the dining hall. It didn't get to me — I knew I was right. As will surprise no one on this site, the number of attractive coeds that approached me at parties, and that I eventually ended up sleeping with only increased.

As men, when confronted with these issues, we must stand up loudly and maintain our innocence. If someone accused you of a robbery that you didn't do, would you just stand there silent?

The PR machines that handled the Kobe Bryant deal, the Duke Lacross deal, and the DSK deal handled it horribly. No common sense. You can never back down or show any weakness. Do not acquiescence and do not supplicate and do not apologize for anything.

Even though I have had a wonderful education and some financial success in life, I know that I have failed in many ways to become the honorable man type of man that my father is. I have been into "game" since the early 2000′s, and have had my share of "strange". I think that most of us here know how enticing that lifestyle can be, but now I am beginning to think how shallow and selfish that is. Whatever it is, it is not that which defines a man. Slowly, I think I have become more activist than gamer, and hopefully, I can contribute something in the future.

Texas Family Court Judge Revealed as Thug

The Honorable William Adams, a Texas family court judge, a man who has likely issued innumerable restraining orders, thrown any number of men in jail for arrears, ordered psychiatric evaluations of allegedly “violent” men and held the fate of many, many families in his hands, is in a great deal of trouble now that his daughter has released a video of him administering a prolonged whipping with a belt.

His daughter was caught illegally downloading music and videos for free, which may have prompted the judge to worry about his own job. Being angry about this is only natural, but putting the belt to a 16-year-old with cerebral palsy (including threatening to whip her on the face) is something I’m sure your average guy would pay for dearly if ever caught, likely with some prison time. Of course, Mr. Adams, being a family court judge, is fully aware of this.

What is truly deplorable about the video is not only the beating, but the fact that so many innocent, gentle fathers are terrorized in courts presided over by the likes of William Adams. The hypocrisy on display is a blazing indictment of American family law. The fact that American men are so often at the mercy of such brutal characters should give any family man chills. If the judge is willing to deal with his daughter in this manner, how could any men in his court expect any mercy?

Is Masculinity a Matter of Money?

Jack Donovan · 4 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a column for National Review, conservative radio talk show host Dennis Prager recently identified four legacies of feminism. His legacies are:

1. The belief that women should have sex like men do, even though it seems to lead to depression and sexual disinterest over the long term.
2. The belief that women should postpone marriage until they have developed careers.
3. The belief that women should work outside the home.
4. The demasculinization of men.

Praeger offered a few reasons for why these legacies were negative, but his assertions were vague and could be expanded substantially.

The postponement of marriage and family is obviously at odds with biological reality. By the time women are financially successful, they have only a short, desperate window to sort through potential mates, build a relationship and have a healthy baby—let alone the two or three children necessary to maintain replacement level population growth.

Feminism valorized careers, but the reality in this global economy is that most jobs suck. For every woman enjoying sex in the city as she pursues an exciting and fulfilling career, there are a bunch of women working the checkout line at Wal Mart or pouring over financial records in some accounting office. Feminism was pushed by a lot of women with designer educations and high career expectations. Betty Sue who stocks shelves at Target would probably rather spend more time at home with her kids, and her kids would probably be better off if she did.

Like Bill Bennett and Kay Hymowitz, Prager was also concerned that men were "demasculinized" because they were no longer interested in working to become husbands. He wrote:

"For all of higher civilization's recorded history, becoming a man was defined overwhelmingly as taking responsibility for a family. That notion — indeed the notion of masculinity itself — is regarded by feminism as the worst of sins: patriarchy."

His qualifier "higher" there is interesting, and I wonder what exactly he meant and where the delineation is between higher and lower civilizations. His assertion that masculinity is defined most conspicuously by becoming the head of a household is both Judeo-Christian and bourgeois.

Manliness — as a way of being and behaving — has very little to do with whether or not one has married and produced children.

Praeger associates "demasculinization" with the loss of the male sex role in the context of family, and believes that men "want to be honored in some way." This is a misuse of the word honor. A better word would have been "valued." Saying that men want to be honored implies that they want some kind of special treatment, that they are by testicular possession entitled to some sort of special treatment or high esteem.

It would be more accurate and less ridiculous to say that men want to be valued. So do women. Women want to be treated as if they are special and irreplaceable in some way. Basically all recognizable romantic gestures involve a man showing a woman that she is special and irreplaceable to him. Romance is telling a woman "of all the vaginas in the world, yours is most magic."

(Though, as a direct statement, I doubt that would go over.)

From an evolutionary standpoint, romance is making a woman feel secure in your commitment to help her through the vulnerable periods of pregnancy and child-rearing. Women needed men, and men wanted women.

Now, women don't need men — at least on paper — because women can work to generate income, because they are protected from other men by police, and because when they fail to generate enough income, the State will invest in their reproductive endeavor. Anthropologist Lionel Tiger refers to State investment in reproduction as "bureaugamy."

Men know that they are replaceable. An "equal partner" is little more than a co-applicant, a business partner — a domestic partner. And when women decide to change partners, men can expect to go through the kind of experience W.F. Price recently wrote about, especially if they don't have a lot of money.

I was talking to a guy the other day who was dating an older, financially successful woman. This young man has been to Africa several times working for humanitarian organizations, he spent seven seasons working on fishing boats, he's been a newspaper photographer, and is searching for an experience to write his first book about. After several dates, the woman told him he was "unambitious." He was completely flabbergasted as to how anyone could say he was unambitious.

I said, "Dude, she means money."

A woman in her late thirties is eyeing up a house in the suburbs and she wants an additional income. She's not a lesbian, so she can't very well shack up with a woman. She has to find a man to buy the house and have the kids with her. Sure, it would be nice if the guy was handsome and interesting and good in bed, but if he's going to be a successful co-applicant, he'd better bring some chips to the table.

It's a persistent theme in this fretting about the decline of the male role. Hymowitz and Bennett and Prager are all worried that fewer and fewer men will have enough money to become suitable husbands for the women of tomorrow. They're concerned that men are too busy hanging out with other men and doing what makes them happy, and too lackadaisical about building careers that will generate sufficient income.

For so many "end of men" writers, masculinity seems to be all about money. For them, "manning up" is about giving up what is best in life to chase dollars and invest in some woman's dream. They are concerned that men are "emasculated." The failure of manhood that concerns them, though, is not a loss of virility. It is not a loss of strength or courage. Their "emasculated" men merely suffer from low net worth.

Is masculinity just a matter of money?

Book Review: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

Elusive Wapiti · 5 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, by Edward Gibbon

The Gist: This was a massive, and I mean massive, set of books that chronicled several centuries of the Roman Empire from immediately before its apogee to the breakup into the short-lived Western empire and comparably longer-lived Eastern Empire. While Gibbon's eighteenth-century prose was somewhat archaic, it was still quite readable as it drew an outstanding and detailed picture of life within the Roman Empire at the time, as well as cataloging the political and cultural forces that contributed to its rise and drove its fall from power. Rather than attempt to poorly encapsulate what Gibbon wrote, I will instead discuss some of the key take-aways I had from the book–takeaways that may speak more to my own preferences and prejudices than to the book itself, but no matter–and some of the other topics that I found interesting.

My first takeaway from Fall was the role that (im)migration and multiculturalism played in the demise of the Roman Empire. Whereas the Romans used their techniques of cultural and ethnic cleansing to great effect during the expansion of the empire, namely insisting that conquered peoples speak Latin (much culture is embedded in a language), utilize a Roman-style civil and military government, and no longer practice their religions, my sense was that Rome grew too large to effectively implement this course of action.* Indeed, if there was anything to conclude from Gibbon's history, it was that, in the end, the far-flung roman empire collapsed under the weight of attempting to implement an e pluribus unum. The Greeks proved too proud to give up their language and culture, the Celts kept theirs due to the difficulty of the terrain they inhabited, the Egyptians too truculent, and the tribes of the Eastern Steppes were too different in skin tone and morphology to assimilate into a Southern European culture. It was diversity, it was multiculturalism that did them in:

> multitudes of secret enemies, insolent from favor, or desperate from oppression, were introduced into the heart of the empire and the sort of chauvinistic tribalism of the sort that we in the West are experiencing today precluded the cultural consensus that sustains a large empire, and ate out the substance of the Roman Empire from within.

* One advantage of Roman-style polytheism was that the Greek, the Roman, and the Barbarian all alike were easily convinced that they worshipped the same deities, just under a different name. This eased integration of conquered tribes and nations into the Roman fold and reduced the need for the sort of forcible conversions so common in Egypt, Celtic Gaul, and in Scythia.

The second take-away from Gibbon's tome was the corrosive effect that "arriving", of achieving what it sought to achieve, has on a culture. At the apogee of their culture, their hunger sated by luxury, Roman citizens had settled back into a comfortable and languid existence, much to their detriment:

> Long peace and uniform government of the Romans introduced a slow and secret poison into the vitals of the Empire. The minds of men were gradually extinguished, and even the military spirit evaporated. Their personal valor remained but they no longer possessed the public courage which is nourished by the love of independence, the sense of national honor, the presence of anger, and the habit of command

This "slow and secret poison" combined with the blessings of luxury, the hardships associated with the colonization of foreign lands, an aversion to marriage, increased acceptance of homosexuality, and what Gibbons called a "depravity of manners that interfered with procreation, birth, and the rearing of children", served to depress birth rates and turn the minds of Romans away from the harder business of patriotism and toward voluptuous dissipation. In a similar manner the inclinations of the populace shifted too, away from the honor of public service to the State and toward more personal and commercial ends. Nowhere was this more obviously felt than in the military, a province which was once dominated by citizens who “had a country to love, property to defend, and some share in enacting the laws” and which it was the interest and duty of the citizen to maintain. Instead, just like today in the West, the upper classes came to shun military service, and as a result the military became more ‘democratized’, more plebian, and more foreign, and thus the former strength of the empire became one of its greatest vulnerabilities:

> The more polished citizens of the internal provinces were alone qualified to act as lawyers and magistrates. The rougher trade of arms was abandoned to the peasants and barbarians of the frontiers, who knew no country but their camp, no science but that of war, no civil laws, and scarcely those of military discipline. With bloody hands, savage manners, and desperate resolutions, they sometimes guarded, but much often subverted the throne of the emperors

Thinking it beneath them or not worth their time, the citizens gradually delegated their collective defense to the mercenary servants of despotic princes. They would come to regret having done so, once their liberties had long departed the land.

Speaking of the collective defense, the relationship of the military to the State and the form of State government is another take-away from Gibbon’s work. For it was Gibbon’s considered opinion that the lack of an orderly mechanism for the transfer of power, coupled with a mercenary army staffed by the ruder classes and by foreigners, opened the door to repeated military coups and the wars of succession that roiled the empire after the golden age of the Antoines. Gibbon again:

> …the temperance of soldiers, habituated at once to violence and to slavery, renders them very unfit guardians of a legal, or even a civil constitution. Justice, humanity, or political wisdom are qualities they are too little acquainted with in themselves to appreciate them in others

It is against this backdrop that the elite Praetorian Guard, an elite cadre of military men who fancied themselves as guardians of the realm, caused much mischief during the Fall. For instance, because they rose through the ranks by merit, they thought themselves–nay, they deserved–to be the “true” representatives of the common people. For certain they were more representative of the Mob than the stuffy and privileged nobility, and this “popular mandate” of sorts led them to adopt the conceit that they alone were the entity best positioned to elect the chief of the Empire

> [T]he meanest of mankind might, without folly, entertain a hope of being raised by valor and fortune to a rank in the army, in which a single crime would enable him to wrest the sceptre of the world from his feeble and unpopular master

Thus, for a people with no tradition of civil control of the military, a weak mechanism for the transfer of State authority from one ruler to the next, and whose upper classes had abandoned the military to proles and to barbaricum, the loss of the Republic quickly resulted in martial despotism.

The fourth take-away is that Roman society succumbed to pressure by more dynamic and vigorous cultures. Rome had the misfortune to peak just before the Volkerwanderung, or the “Great Migration”. Weak, tired, effete, and decadent, Rome was unable to defend her frontier provinces from the virile and martial Nordic and Eurasian hordes that pushed their way into the vacuum created by Rome’s decaying and retrenching political and economic power. That a once powerful and mighty culture would yield to a more masculine, a more martial, and more aggressive culture is a lesson repeated throughout history and we Westerners would do well to consider the application of such a take-away to our present lot.

I now adjust course slightly, and discuss not “take-aways” but rather subjects that I found merely interesting. For instance, many other authors interpret Gibbon’s barely concealed hostility toward Christianity–typical of Enlightenment-era thinkers–as an indicator that he attributes the rise of Christianity as a contributing factor to the Fall. I am not so sure that Gibbon did so. Sure Gibbon extolled the virtues of so-called pagan tolerance of Christianity, a claim easily refuted by considering the cruelties of pagan rulers toward their Christian subjects. But I think that Gibbon located the enfeebling of Roman virtues and corroding of Roman civic institutions prior to the arrival of Christianity; indeed, Rome was already on the downward slide when Christianity began to metastasize through the provinces. For sure, in some ways Christianity gave a teetering pagan Roman society a shove. It degraded the legitimacy of polytheism (Gibbon relays the dilemma of Christian legionnaires prohibited by their faith from participating in pagan prayers and practices prior to battle…doesn't take too much of that to erode unit cohesion), while the ranks of Christians swelled through the generosity of Christian alms "which paid less regard to the merit than to the distress of the object" and through the rescue and adoption of infants abandoned to the elements in the Bronze Age version abortion. Another factor Gibbon cited as contributing to the rapid spread of Christianity was its relatively favorable reputation when compared to another monotheistic religion originating from Palestine…Judaism. In contrast to Jews, Christians were possessed of fewer onerous and strange habits, lacked the Jew's conspicuous ethnic tribalism, and were other-oriented, whereas Judeans were famous for their inwardly focused insularity. In short, I think Gibbon saw the rapid spread of Christianity as a secondary symptom of a spiritually bereft people responding to the evangelistic zeal of the early Christians, rather than a primary cause of the sort of unmanly softness that make Rome so vulnerable to invasion.

I also found Gibbon's description of the Germanic tribes to the north of the Alps to be quite interesting, if nothing for the study in contrasts that such a description provides. The Romans were a complex, hierarchical, agricultural society, and as such were technologically, socially, and culturally advanced. This level of civilizational advance stood in stark relief with the egalitarian primitiveness and rude condition of the barbaric cultures that Rome encountered to the West (Gaul), North (Germans, Danes, and Britons), and East (Scythians and Dacians). Gibbon:

> If we contemplate a savage nation in any part of the globe, supine indolence and a carelessness of futurity will be found to constitute their general character. In a civilized state, every faculty of man is expanded and exercised; and the great chain of mutual dependence connects and embraces the several members of society. The most numerous portion of it is employed in constant and useful labor. The select few, placed by fortune above that necessity, can, however, fill up their time by the pursuits of interest or glory, by the improvement of their estate or of their understanding, but the duties, the pleasures, or even the follies of social life

Indeed, Gibbon characterized the character of Rome's barbaric neighbors, especially that of their Germanic neighbors to the north, thusly:

> The languid soul, oppressed with its own weight, anxiously required some new and powerful sensation; war and danger were the only amusements adequate to its fierce temper

The Germanic tribes to the north were particularly warlike in Gibbons' account. Their system of governance was a sort of tribal democracy, where war chiefs were chosen from the ranks of warriors by popular election. The way to gain influence and power was to fight, and fight well, and the way that the German war chiefs garnered wealth was through the booty captured by raiding and/or subduing neighboring peoples. According to Gibbon, this social inclination, combined with a harsh climate, want of learning, arts, and laws, the Germanic notions of honor, gallantry, religion, fierce independence and sense of freedom, contributed to form a people to whom military heroism was a way of life.

Furthermore, I found the role of women in German society, as described by Gibbon, to be interesting, if not instructive, study in the effects that sex roles have on the prosperity and living standards of the society (or lack thereof). Consistent with the role of women in hunter-gatherer civilizations, Germanic society at the time of the Roman Empire was quite egalitarian and featured a variant of fertility worship that ensured women were held in high esteem by the violent and hard warrior

> The Germans treated their women with esteem and confidence, consulted them on every occasion of importance and fondly believed that in their breasts resided a sanctity and wisdom more than human

Like the German warrior male, the German woman was deeply concerned with honor, such that while male honor came from success on the battlefield, honor for the German woman was tied to her virginity upon marriage and fidelity thereafter. Moreover, prefiguring my contention that women are a civilization's center of gravity, that the state of women in a society determines the direction of the society, Gibbon wrote similarly of German women in the Tribes some 2,000 years ago that > the sentiments and conduct of these high-spirited matrons may at once be considered as a cause, as an effect, and as a proof of the general character of the nation

Thus, similar in effect to the Spartan woman's famous exhortation "return with your shield or on it", did the German woman's own example of honorable conduct, high social stature, and insistence that her man behave similarly, reinforce and sustain the warlike character of the aggressive German tribes. It also stalled civilizational advancement: In societies where women are egalitarian, are equal partners on par with men, and where their sexuality and fertility is an object of worship, persistent material poverty follows. In contrast, when inegalitarian sex role specialization characteristic of agrarian (or more advanced) societies takes root, the sort of wealth and high standard of living that comes with civilization accompanies.

Last, the below quote of Gibbon's was attention-getting for me, as a fellow interested in the power dynamics between clergy, the State, and the people and the interaction of these three with freedom and liberty:

> …so intimate is the connection between the throne and the altar, that the banner of the church has very seldom been seen on the side of the people. A martial nobility and stubborn commons, possessed of arms, tenacious of property, and collected into constitutional assemblies, form the only balance capable of preserving a free constitution against enterprises of an aspiring prince

While this viewpoint probably well reflects the post-Enlightenment, deist-bordering-on-atheist zeitgeist of the time in Britain (Gibbon's work was published in 1776), I highlight it here as a civics lesson, passed down to us moderns from our forefathers. Of course a mere cursory examination of history reveals evidence that Gibbon was correct on the tendency of the church/temple/synagogue/mosque to ally itself with the state in opposition to the people or liberty, rather than protect the people from state abuse. Examples abound, and three that immediately come to mind are (a) the modern church of sec-humanism, where, riffing on Louis XIV, l'etat, c'est Dieu, (b) the nexus of mainline "right hand of God" Protestantism and Progressive statism in late 19th / early 20th century America, and (c) the entangling of the Roman Catholic Church with various princes throughout history, both pre- and post-Reformation, more recently in the Church's comfortability with state force to accomplish "churchy" ends, such as un-Biblical welfare, or most recently in calls for a global, one-world government just last month. Moreover, Gibbon's mention of the natural rights of self-defense ("possessed of arms") and property rights ("tenacious of property") were fundamental, foundational rights upon which American-style Republicanism was founded. Both are under progressively more intense Progressive attack, and both are in decline. In a similar manner, Gibbon would be hard pressed to locate his martial nobility in modern-day America, the elite having long since abandoned military service, and his stubborn commons has mostly melted away into a more pliant mob.

In summary, Gibbon's long tome was a worthwhile read, and my few excerpts here do not do his work justice. Gibbon seemed to attribute the Fall to multiculralism, luxos, to upper class abandonment of service to the State (in favor of presumably commercial ends), and to the feminization of the culture. In addition, I found Gibbon's characterization of the role that Christianity played in the Fall to be interesting, as well as the implications that the organization of barbarian Germanic tribal society have for us moderns, especially as it pertains to religion, to family structure, and to sexual role specialization in a culture. Finally, Gibbon's observations regarding the interaction of the church, the state, the elite, the commons, and natural rights such as the right to self-defense and the right to property remind us all of the fundamental tenets upon which Western civilzation in general, and American society in particular, were founded.

The Shifting Perception of Feminine Desire

W.F. Price · 6 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I alluded to Sir Richard Francis Burton recently, as I reread his autobiography a few weeks ago, and this evening, on reading a book on the hedonistic pursuits of classical Athenians, I recalled a particular quote from the Burton book, in which he offers some thoughts on female circumcision:

> Circumcision of both sexes is a very ancient custom among the Arabs … Now, the cause of this practice in a man is cleanliness and health, in a young woman, it seems to be a preventative for unchastity. Asiatic peoples … all consider sexual desire in woman to be ten times greater than in man…

What brought this quote to mind is that the ancient Greeks apparently felt the same way, attributing excessive lust and hedonism to a feminine nature. The Greeks were so convinced of this that an Aristophanes play depicting Athens after a fictional female coup that put women in charge has the society degenerate into a sexual free-for-all in which hideous old hags fight over a handsome young man. There may have been a hint of the idea that excessive lust is an effeminate characteristic even in modern America (I have heard my WWII vet grandfather contemptuously refer to men who sleep around as "oversexed"), but it seems that the dominant view for some time – at least since the Victorian era – has been that women are the purer sex where carnal desire is concerned.

This was not always the case in the English-speaking world. As recently as the 18th century, Henry Fielding's novel Tom Jones has a handsome young man engage in amorous liaisons with several lusty seductresses before he finally settles down with his true love. Additionally, the Puritans who settled New England held women to be more sexually voracious by nature than men. However, by the time Dickens appeared on the scene, the trope of the sexless female, which remains in use even today, had been established.

But it appears that this old stereotype is on its last legs, having been thoroughly discredited by the explosion of women's sexual freedom allowed by efficient contraception, social welfare and no-fault laws that guarantee provision regardless of their behavior.

As I read the views of the ancient Greeks and Muslims, I began to wonder whether their recognition of the reality of female lust and hedonism wouldn't soon filter into our own post-Christian, Anglo society. Certainly, there is a generation coming of age right now for which denial of this fact would take an almost superhuman effort, so it's probably inevitable that within another generation there will be no question as to whether women are governed by their passions at least as much as men.

The really interesting question, then, is how our culture managed to keep up the illusion as long as it did.

Bieber Scandal Demonstrates Absurd Nature of Child Support Laws

W.F. Price · 7 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Mariah Yeater, the 20-year-old tramp who claims to have given birth to Justin Bieber's child, probably has no idea who her baby's father is. Perhaps she had a fantasy that the baby is Bieber's, and has managed to convince herself it's the truth. Given how often women are wrong about the true identity of their child's father, this sort of thing is likely a common occurrence. However, it is conceivable, although highly unlikely, that Justin Bieber is in fact the baby's father.

If this is the case, Yeater will be set for at least the next 18 years. Given Bieber's wealth, she will have an upper-middle-class income without having to do a lick of work — all for seducing a 16-year-old boy. If Bieber's career stalls, as often happens with child pop stars, he will find it very difficult to reduce child support. He may end up in debt, crushed under a burden he cannot afford. Yeater, like most women, will not have an ounce of pity for him. In her mind, she will have earned every penny of the support she receives. "30 seconds," as she claimed, will translate to millions of dollars. She will have hit the jackpot. The common logic is that it's the male party's fault — the stock response from feminists (and almost all women, actually) is that he "had a choice."

A grown woman who seduces an underage boy shouldn't be entitled to anything, but under current law she will receive child support no matter how she got pregnant. Teachers who slept with students have been awarded child support. Vili Fualaau, who impregnated the infamous Mary Kay Letourneau at the age of 12, probably ultimately married his former teacher to avoid having to pay child support. In other words, the working class Samoan kid had no choice (other than grinding poverty, that is) but to marry a woman over twenty years his senior — I wouldn't believe for a minute the ridiculous stories about "eternal love" between the unlikely couple.

Does anyone really believe that women will not abuse the law as it stands today? That they will not try to seduce and entrap hapless men and boys? Because there is absolutely no disincentive, and because of the sham "best interests of the child" doctrine (if this were really the issue, women would be forced to stay in unhappy marriages), it is inevitable that some women will do exactly this. The easier the victim the better. Rich youths, like Bieber, make good targets. Overpaid athletes with questionable intellectual capacity are easy marks, too. As obvious as it is that these women are predators, our courts still place the blame on their prey.

But perhaps something good will come out of this latest tabloid story about Justin Bieber and the woman who claims she caught his sperm — at least Bieber's underage fans will know a little more about the harsh reality of family law than previous generations of children. Better the boys learn early – before it's too late – that they can expect no mercy if and when they father children.

Paint the School Buses PINK!

Davd · 7 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Anyone who thinks that the women of North America were subjugated by some kind of patriarchy back between 50 and 100 years ago, need only look at the traffic on rural roads in the morning, to know better. (If you want further confirmation, look at the sinking of the Titanic.)

Those school buses have been running mornings and afternoons for as long as i can remember—and i'll soon be 70. They are a symbol of women dominating men and boys [and perhaps girls as well, though girls seem more able to wheedle adult women than we are]. A few paragraphs worth of reflection should clarify this for those of you who haven't yet said Aha! Egad! Eureka!, etc.—or known it for years already.

Finland is not a patriarchal state, but men seem to have more freedom of expression there. Finland also values social efficiency—as they have had to do, especially during the years when the USSR imposed "reparations" [which more accurately were the spoils of victory] at the end of World War II. When i was in Finland in the 1980s, i saw rural buses instead of school buses. Schoolchildren received passes to ride them as part of their free public schooling; but they were not limited to children. Because the children provided a large "ridership", the buses were economically viable.
Because there were rural buses, rural people did not need to own cars—which made rural living much less expensive than in North America. It's a very good example of social efficiency as distinct from technological efficiency.

Finnish rural buses did not have big bright flashing lights fore and aft. They did not have STOP signs that stick out from the driver's side. They did not stop all traffic, they acted like non-school buses act in North America. When the schoolchildren got on and off the buses, they needed to know how to deal with the traffic. Of course, rural children need to know how to deal with the traffic on the roads next their homes anyway.

So why do Canadian and US school buses have big bright flashing lights fore and aft, and STOP signs that stick out from the driver's side? I don't remember the children who rode on them, including four of my sons, being all that grateful for the fuss; and i don't remember them being all that frightened of the traffic. (We did not live along major highways, but there were some fast drivers—they just didn't come by every minute.) It was obvious enough to me and my sons, that the School Buses were babying the children.

So who babies children—Mommies or Daddies?

Eureka?

There may be a few Daddies who baby their children, but for every such Daddy there are several to very many, babying Mommies… especially if the children are boys. The School Buses with big bright flashing lights fore and aft and STOP signs that stick out from the driver's side, are the spoils of political victory for babying Mommies, well over half a century ago, not anything remotely patriarchal. Let's give credit to the Mommies who lobbied for them… and paint the school buses pink.

Pink school buses will be truth in packaging: School biases against boys are more important than the babying bus lights and STOP signs, and a larger reason to paint school buses (and school doors) pink. I plan to make those biases, and some thoughts about giving boys schooling better suited to male biology, the topic of one or two separate postings.

Assange and the anti-coalition maxhenrich · 8 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

What is the anti-coalition?

Many people nowadays complain (for quite some time now…) that all the power in the world seems to belong to rich, old, white (Christian, protestant, straight) males. Women, foreigners, racial, religious, sexual and cultural minorities are claimed to be oppressed and discriminated against.

Theoretically, in a democracy there should be an easy solution to this: Half of the population are women, and many men belong to aforesaid minorities. So all they'd have to do is forging a coalition, made up of these diverse groups, against the supposedly highly privileged native males. As said, an anti-coalition.

But in practice, there is more than enough antagonism between these groups to prevent a coalition, even on paper. Many women don't like people of other races, many blacks and latinos don't like gays, many gays don't like women.

That's why you need a charismatic candidate (like Obama) to unite them, even for a moment. And actually, even he almost wouldn't have made it, because of one case of said antagonism: During the primaries in 2008, a group of radical feminists endorsing Hillary Clinton threatened to rather vote Republican than letting Obama "steal" their opportunity to see a female POTUS in their lifetime. "Party Unity My Ass" indeed.

And even if the anti-coalition has a leader like Obama, the problems remain. Whenever there's a major fight where both sides can claim to represent an oppressed sex/race/culture/religion/sexuality, the fault lines of the anti-coalition become visible. And there are enough occasions:

- Example Assange: The hacker genius who fights the unpopular secret services vs. two radical feminists.
- Example Strauss-Kahn: The Socialist European counterweight to the American finance business who was hoping to defeat the conservative Sarkozy (also Jewish) vs. a poor Muslim black African woman.
- Gays vs Muslims

Who is right in such cases? Whichever solution you prefer – for people who have made political correctness their ersatz religion, this is a moral dilemma.

And there's no end of these conflicts in sight. The good will among the members of the anti-coalition won't last forever. It will run out one day. Even worse (for them), the grudges may last and prevent a renewed collaboration for some time. And this will spell the end of the anti-coalition.

No Man's Land — A Brief Treatise on Contemporary Masculinity

W.F. Price · 8 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

My respected colleague Jack Donovan, a writer and a working man, has released a study of masculinity that offers a much-needed counterpoint to the feminist hegemon. The e-book is free for download in both pdf and kindle format (consider a "tip" for the effort), and can be read in about the time it takes to go through a good magazine.

In addition to analyzing feminist positions, Jack quotes from our material, introducing some of the concepts from the manosphere and bringing up the points we strive to make. The book is well-crafted and makes a great addition to our growing source material — it's a great example of the kind of effort it will take to turn things around and provide men with an argument and position in their defense. Of course, there will be points of view other than Jack's, but he wrote a book (not his first), and that's saying something.

Below are a few excerpts:

No Man's Land* on the modern family

> The patriarchal kinship system that demanded paternal investment was dismantled by feminists, technology and the legal system. It was replaced with a system that gave women control over virtually all aspects of reproduction, and where a woman could rest assured that the state would step in and provide for her children in the absence of a husband or father. Divorce, most often initiated by women, offered a way for women to seize control of their families at-will, even when a man had chosen to make a paternal investment. Men had become peripheral players in the lives of their offspring, and they could be cut from the team by coach mom at any time. The managing bureaucrat would then determine what role the father would have in his children's lives—at best he might be offered a co-parenting role, at worst he could be reduced to a mere paycheck.

On MGTOW

> While relatively few men would recognize the MGTOW acronym, it is true that many young men are "going their own way." And that's exactly what feminists like Rosin, Kimmel, Garcia, Romano, Doupkil, Gabler and Hymowitz have been fretting about. While there will always be exceptions— the ascetics and the passive, herbivorous "bonobo" boys—young men who were raised by women, processed through a feminist-friendly educational system, who see that women probably have better prospects than they do, and who have been relieved of the responsibilities associated with patriarchy see no reason to toil to help women get the things they want, especially in a society that aspires to "equality" between the sexes. As Rosin and others trumpet a future where girls are for the first time more desirable than boys, they must see the gall in asking men to get excited about speeding the plow.

On Game

> …young men have discovered that good grooming and the appearance of affluence is not all they need to get laid. Pick up artists and advocates of "game" like the pseudonymous authors of the popular blog Citizen Renegade (now "Heartiste") advise men to take advantage of evolutionary psychology and appear to be "alpha"—a primal group leader—when dealing with women. Game advocates say that a man can run game inside a marriage or a long term relationship, but they generally take a dim view of a married man's chances for well-being and fulfillment—especially financial well- being and sexual fulfillment. Game as a sexual strategy seems to be geared toward providing short term gratification for men and women, but also avoiding long term misery.

Well done!

War Against Boys Continues Apace in Academia

W.F. Price · 9 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Now that boys have fallen well behind girls in college admissions and completion, you'd think they'd give the assault on them a rest, but efforts to shove them out are still going strong. In the 1980s, standardized testing came under attack for favoring boys, because they generally do better on the SAT than girls, especially on the math section. Girls, who are more obedient and detail-oriented, tend to get better grades, but boys still test a little better. The first measure taken to eliminate the male advantage in college admissions was to make grades more important for admission and lower the importance assigned to test scores. Later, the SAT itself was changed, with an essay added and a "renorming" of scores designed to take away boys' advantage.

The results were predictable. Girls began to be favored in college admissions, and overtook boys by the 1990s. The reasons for this are not at all mysterious; there was a concerted effort to give girls an advantage, and it worked. The hand-wringing over "problems" with boys is disingenuous — there was a deliberate policy to handicap them. There really isn't a problem with boys, rather, institutions created problems for them. This is precisely why females dominate today's college campuses.

Now, a new book – SAT Wars – has come out suggesting that the anti-male policy hasn't gone far enough. The author, Joseph Soares, declares "the SAT and ACT are fundamentally discriminatory." The reason? They favor white males (actually, they favor Asians more). Although parts of the book deal with racial disparities, much of the research focuses on male testing advantages. Soares argues that the math in SAT tests is fundamentally sexist:

> In another chapter of "SAT Wars," Jay Rosner, executive director of The Princeton Review Foundation, addresses the gender gap on the SAT. Mr. Rosner asserts that the math portion of the test is "male-leaning," citing data from 1998 and 2000 which found that men performed better than women on 97 percent of math test questions whereas women performed better than men on only .8 percent of them.
> Mr. Rosner suggested that the composition of questions is unfair, and that the percentage of questions skewed toward men versus those skewed toward women is unnatural.

Is it really "unnatural," or is it simply nature that has made boys better at math in general than girls? Of course, in today's academic environment to suggest the latter is career suicide (ask Larry Summers), so perhaps the question is rhetorical.

But how about another question: If girls make up nearly 60% of college grads, why are we fussing over a test that gives boys an advantage, however slight it may be? The only answer can be that it is tolerated – even encouraged – to discriminate unfairly against boys.

Let's be clear about the "problem with boys" — it is a purely manufactured issue, and one for which certain bureaucrats and ideologues are personally responsible. People don't tend to take feminists all that seriously, but they've certainly done a lot of damage over the years, and they still do.

Is Avoiding Fatherhood an Indication of Responsibility?

W.F. Price · 10 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Of course it's always best to rely on statistics rather than your own lying eyes, but amongst my acquaintances, mainly middle-class professional males, fatherhood is quite rare. The ones who do have children have few, and even the married men seem not to be very thrilled about the idea of becoming fathers.

Perhaps it has something to do with the fact that I live in an expensive city, but not all of them live here. It seems that there is a real, palpable wariness about fatherhood amongst professional, educated men under 40.

Interestingly, these are not men who have "dropped out" — for the most part they are productive workers, and many have advanced degrees. They are in the upper quartile of earnings, and perhaps higher where education is concerned. They are adults in every sense of the word, not mere "guys" as feminist academics would paint them.

This is why it seems so surreal to see feminists droning on and on about the refusal of men to take responsibility. The ones who are, objectively speaking, less responsible are those most likely to be fathers (yes, that includes me).

Has anyone else noticed this trend? Am I simply seeing things, or is it true that the more conscientious, responsible men are the ones who are least likely to be fathers today? If so, what does that say about the incentives surrounding fatherhood?

Men who are more responsible tend to be more risk-averse. My take on the situation is that these men have weighed the options, and are declining fatherhood because it is a very risky bet. Hence, the refusal of some men to take on the burdens of family and fatherhood is not an indication of immaturity and irresponsibility, but rather of foresight and clear thinking.

Therefore, the children of the future will be the progeny of us reckless romantics who followed our hearts rather than our brains. The feminists have it all backward. If they really want men to do as they wish, they should pray for a nation of fools, and preach abdication of responsibility. Only then can they hope to find men willing to buy the raw deal that's on offer.

Public University Prof: Stop Taxing Women

W.F. Price · 10 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Gina Barreca, an English professor at the University of Connecticut, proposes that men be taxed more and women not at all in what must be a tongue-in-cheek (but half-serious) piece in Psychology Today. The sentiment is doubtless quite common, and she gives a litany of reasons women shouldn't have to pay the government:

> After all, women are not the ones wrecking the nation's whole infrastructure. We're not the ones shooting at the "No U-turn" signs on rural highways. It's not women who are trying to make our names as graffiti artists. You'll rarely find a bunch of broads gathered together attempting to create weapons of mass destruction or figuring out how to really get ahead in next year's arms race.
> We're not ones running Fortune 500 companies into the ground or manipulating the stock market. As many people have noted, had the firm been called Lehman's Sisters it might not have gone down the fiscal toilet, taking Wall Street's profits with it.

> Rebuilding our public schools? If we need to rebuild our public schools, it's not because of what little girls have done to them. Put it this way: Do we spend $12,846 per school district per annum erasing drawings of male anatomy on desks, walls and bathroom stalls because of little girls? No. Girls just don't do this. You rarely see little girls drawing pictures of their own reproductive organs while, for example, in the elevator. It simply isn't how we mark our territory. It would also take too long.

Barreca is a sterling example of a second wave feminist; the type who has a great deal of contempt and hatred for men and boys and a swollen sense of pride and entitlement. She is a professor, after all (of English), and makes her living off of the people's taxes.

She may be a thoroughly odious human being who uses her publicly funded position to launch attacks on the male sex, but in this instance I'd like to call her bluff and recommend that her proposal to stop taxing women be implemented.

Men may still pay more taxes than women, but as younger men are being purged from the ranks of the middle class, I'm sure the disparity is narrowing, and women probably pay a higher share of taxes today than ever. Were women to be entirely exempt from taxpaying, the government would go bankrupt immediately. Women like Barreca would lose their jobs, police forces would shrink to shadows of what they are today, jails would release hundreds of thousands of prisoners, and courts would be forced to stop prosecuting all but the most serious of crimes. The little money remaining in government coffers would be used to pay off and maintain essential strategic forces and crucial infrastructure, leaving almost nothing for the myriad petty bureaucrats who enforce female supremacy in the United States.

Men, who are already taxed to the hilt, could hardly be expected to make up for shortfalls, and slave labor would be fruitless because slaves themselves cannot pay taxes, and there are cheaper sources of labor abroad anyway.

The thing is, if it weren't for the enormous public expenditure that is currently directed toward women in our society, they wouldn't be on top of things — women like Barreca would be bagging groceries instead of terrorizing college boys. Men, in general, could do without, and in many cases we already are. The tax base is already pushed to the limit, men are increasingly broke, and without taxing women the entire facade would come crashing down in no time. If current trends continue, and men are marginalized even farther, women are going to have to pay the majority of taxes to keep their dominant position in society.

Somehow, I don't think "Dr." Barreca has thought this through, but at least if her proposal is implemented the current system would fail sooner rather than later, and that would likely be for the better.

The Greatest Tragedy of Oscar Wilde's Life

W.F. Price · 10 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Oscar Wilde, a Victorian era Irish playwright, poet and novelist, is well known for the art he bequeathed to posterity and, to a lesser extent, the scandal that sent him to prison and subsequent exile in France. At the height of his career, Wilde made the mistake of entering into an affair with Alfred Douglas, the young, flamboyant son of a brutal Scottish noble, the Marquess of Queensberry, who was distinguished by his godlessness and passion for physical combat. When the affair was brought to light, the enraged Scotsman threatened to "thrash" Wilde, and embarked upon a vendetta, dedicating himself to the artist's destruction.

After a sustained barrage of threats and denunciations from the Marquess, Wilde finally lost his composure and pursued a libel suit against Queensberry, who had publicly called him a "somdomite" [sic]. The suit was particularly ill-advised, as private detectives were able to uncover considerable evidence of Wilde's homosexual dalliances with a variety of male prostitutes, some of whom were hauled into court to testify against him. Confronted with more than he could deny, Wilde lost the suit. Vindicated, the Marquess received substantial compensation from Wilde, leaving the author bankrupt. Even worse, he now faced prosecution for gross indecency, which had been made a crime some ten years earlier in 1885 (as odd as it may sound to modern ears, sexuality was not generally regulated by criminal law before the 19th century). Ironically, the law that prosecuted Wilde was described as "An Act to make further provision for the Protection of Women and Girls…."

Soon, Wilde was arrested, and due to great public interest and the usual, hysterical outrage of crowds, he was prosecuted vigorously. Although the first jury deadlocked, another trial was held, the writer was duly convicted, and he was sentenced to the maximum – two years hard labor – by a properly indignant judge.

The famous author was now just another Irish convict in a London jail. As a convicted homosexual and an aesthete, he must have faced a great deal of abuse from the other inmates, and he was not well suited to the rigors of prison labor. But of all the discomforts and disappointments of confinement, none could have weighed as heavily on him as his separation from his two sons, Cyril and Vyvyan, to whom he was devoted.

For all the contemporary discussion of Wilde – Wilde the author, Wilde the unjustly persecuted homosexual, the aesthete, the dilettante – there is precious little concerning Wilde the father. If his fatherhood had little relevance to his work, this would be understandable, but in fact it suffused his art. Many of his stories were written for children, and some for parents as well. The aesthetic elements of his work do not so much suggest the fancies of a pure hedonist as they do fantasy and fairy tales written to stimulate the imagination of little minds.

In some passages, it is clear that he saw children as a source of redemption, the key to greater joys than any that exist in this mortal world:

> 'Who art thou?' said the Giant, and a strange awe fell on him, and he knelt before the little child.
>
> And the child smiled on the Giant, and said to him, 'You let me play once in your garden, to-day you shall come with me to my garden, which is Paradise.'
> And when the children ran in that afternoon, they found the Giant lying dead under the tree, all covered with white blossoms.
> –From The Selfish Giant

Such sentiments spring from the love inspired by fatherhood, which was apparently a great source of inspiration for Wilde. Were it not for this part of his life, this experience that gave him a connection to the greater part of humanity that dwells in a more conventional world, he may never have made a lasting impact in literature. Without that crucial component of his character – Wilde the father – he may have remained nothing but a queer dilettante, a minor man of letters, an obscure sybarite flitting from one party to the next, today little more than a flickering ghost haunting odd libraries kept by eccentric old men.

Although Wilde may have had fatherhood in common with a great many men, he was clearly of a different type from most of us, and not only for his talents. But his experience as a father, and especially the tragedy that came of it, binds him to us, today perhaps even more than ever.

After he was convicted, Oscar Wilde never saw his sons again. It was a terrible price to pay for his indiscretions, but his wife held firm and, even after she died, her family barred the fallen man from his children.

His sons remembered him fondly, but they were still schoolboys when he died in 1900 at age 46, and they never had the chance to see him of their own accord.

Some years after Wilde's death, his younger son Vyvyan received a letter from a Frenchman who, as a child, had known Wilde when he was in exile in France, following his release from prison and shortly before his death. In his book Time Remembered, Vyvyan published the contents of the letter:

> One Autumn evening, while putting on my overcoat after finishing my meal, I clumsily upset something, perhaps a salt-cellar, on Monsieur Sébastien's [Wilde went by "Sebastien Melmouth" while in France] table. He said nothing, but my mother scolded me and told me to apologize, which I did, distressed by my clumsiness. But Monsieur Sébastien turned to my mother and said: 'Be patient with your little boy. One must always be patient with them. If, one day, you should find yourself separated from him…' I did not give him time to finish his sentence, but asked him: 'Have you got a little boy?' 'I've got two', he said. 'Why don't you bring them here with you?' My mother interrupted … 'It doesn't matter; it doesn't matter at all,' he said with a sad smile. 'They don't come here with me because they are too far away…' Then he took my hand, drew me to him and kissed me on both cheeks. I bade him farewell, and then I saw that he was crying. And we left.
> While kissing me he had said a few words which I didn't understand. But on the following day we arrived before him and a bank employee who used to sit at a table on the other side of us asked us: 'Did you understand what Monsieur Sébastien said last evening?' 'No,' we replied. 'He said, in English: "Oh, my poor dear boys!"'

As we look back across more than a hundred years of "progress" that have elapsed since Oscar Wilde wept over the loss of his children, it is remarkable to see how little some things have changed.

How Did Jerry Sandusky Get Away With It?

W.F. Price · 11 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Now that Jerry Sandusky has finally been arrested for raping boys, details of previous investigations are coming to light. As early as 1998, authorities were already aware that he may have been engaging in inappropriate activity with young boys. Just two years later, a janitor saw him assaulting a boy in the Penn State football locker room. In 2002, Mike McQueary, then a grad student, saw him raping a boy in the locker room, and reported the incident to his father, and then Joe Paterno.

Finally, in 2008, a mother reported Sandusky to police after her son admitted that Sandusky had been abusing him. This is what finally led to an investigation.

Obviously, plenty of people knew what was going on. Why didn't they put a stop to the crimes?

It all comes down to priorities and costs. College football is enormously profitable for schools in terms of both commercial revenue and donations from alumni. For major universities, it has become an essential cash cow, and Sandusky was a central figure in Penn State's football program.

If the higher-ups at Penn State had thought that Sandusky's behavior would cost the school more than what his contribution to the football program brought in, they would have forced him out long ago. However, schools do not have the Justice Department breathing down their neck about homosexual misconduct, but rather heterosexual. If Sandusky had been caught raping an adult coed on campus, he would have lost his job immediately. In fact, if he'd so much as said something inappropriate to a female coed he would have been in trouble. But it turns out his victims were just 10-12-year-old boys, who weren't even students in any event.

Sexual assault on campus is officially tied to explicitly feminist legislation, namely Title IX. Sexual assault is considered, under Title IX, to be "discrimination on the basis of sex." The implication is that rape on campus is essentially a matter of victimization of women; homosexual rape is not covered under federal anti-discrimination law, which can trigger withdrawal of federal funds and federal lawsuits — a very painful proposition for public universities. Rather, in the Sandusky case, it will be an entirely criminal affair as far as the feds are concerned, although the victims may well be able to sue the school in civil court. For the school, this is unfortunate, but ultimately the state of Pennsylvania will pick up the tab, and federal funding to Penn State will remain uninterrupted. Therefore, from a cost-benefit perspective, rape of boys is a far less serious matter than, say, sexual harassment on campus.

Under federal law and school policy, homosexual rape is not a matter of "discrimination," and therefore of far less consequence than any discomforts that may be suffered by females on campus. So, the reason Sandusky was allowed to get away with raping boys on campus for years is that the federal government, the major patron of our universities, doesn't care all that much about rape if the victims are male.

Unfortunately, we may have to conclude that, given the law and incentives, the behavior of higher-ups at Penn State, who ran cover for their boy, was probably rational, and they were, in fact, doing their jobs. We must recognize that we live in a society in which the value assigned to most males is extraordinarily low.

Scars of War

Keoni Galt · 11 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Veterans Day is supposed to be a day of remembrance.

A day in which Americans remember the sacrifices made by our armed service members, both past and present, for the benefit of our country.

The glory…the immortality a man can be achieve on the battlefield is to be recalled and commended on this day.

War heroics are generally lauded.

The bravery and self-sacrifice of US servicemen are lionized.

But far too often, the scars that permanently alter a life are not considered.

The saying “war is hell” may seem to be cliche, but if you get to really know any man unfortunate enough to have lived through one (or more), you realize that the supposed glory and honor afforded them by things such as a National Holiday like today, declared in their honor, is nowhere near the compensation for the horrors they witnessed and participated in…many of them, often too young to even begin to comprehend what they became a part of, let alone contemplate the lifelong impact it would have on them.

As a man who never joined the military nor fought in a war, you may wonder how I would come to this. In short, I’ve known a few men who have been permanently scarred by their war experiences, and I’ve seen the personal devastation such hellish experiences create.

My Grandfather was an infantry machine gunner in World War II. He fought at Guadalcanal and in the Phillipines.

My entire life, I would beg my Grandfather to tell me WWII stories. He refused to. Over and over again.

Until 3 years ago.

He told me in macabre, horrific detail, the horrors he lived through. No sugar coating. No glorifying or self-edifying revisions. The brutal, ugly truth, that reflect the old maxim “war is hell” perfectly.

My Grandfather told me that he waited until I was old enough to understand the realities of his experience. I was 36 years old before he finally sat down and related the worst days of his life to me.

As a young boy, starstruck by the idea of the warrior ideal and the zeitgeist of war heroism as the ultimate manifestation of masculinity, I used to repeatedly request my Grandfather tell me his stories. The horrors of war to my juvenile mind, were nothing but an abstract idea. I was filled with romantic notions of glory and heroism, twisted by Hollywood portrayals of the glories of war.

I’m grateful my Grandfather waited until I was much older before he told me his anecdotes. When I was younger and filled with a sense of the irrational immortality of youth, I would not have appreciated the true gravity of his experience. I think he knew that, which is why he waited until I was a grown man before telling me.

He passed away two years ago, but his words still haunt me.

One particularly memorable story he told me, was of an event when he and his best friend had guard duty in a foxhole in the Phillipines. His best friend was also his ammunition caddy for his BAR (Browning Automatic Rifle – the forerunner to the M60 machine gun). One night, their camp was ambushed by a night attack in the middle of a conversation they were having while on night watch, by Japanese troops.

My Grandfather manned his machine gun until he came close to running out of his belt of ammo. He bellowed for his partner to load up another ammo box. When he got no answer, he looked down and realized his buddies brains were splattered all over his body. His friend had taken a Japanese round in the head.

My Grandfather had to crawl over 100 yards to the next foxhole to get more ammo to continue firing his machine gun at the Japanese ambushers.

He cried when he told me he had to eventually find his buddies young wife and infant son after the war was over to tell her about how her husband had died.

My Grandfather was in his late 80′s when he told me this story.

Yet the horror in his voice, and the tears he shed, indicated that the horrors of his experience were undiminished by the passage of time. While he was calm and matter of fact about it while describing it to me, I could sense that the experience still shook him to the very core of his being.

Despite the old saying, I don't think time really does heal all wounds.

War scarred him for life.

Many times after he told me this story, I wondered how I could have managed to survive such an ordeal at 19 years of age like he was.

I couldn't even handle my liquor at 19…let alone the bloodshed and trauma the likes of what my Grandfather experienced. When I was 19, the first war in Iraq, "Operation Desert Shield" was over and the next war the US was to get involved in (the War on Terrorism in the name of 9-11,) was still 10 years away.

Yet, I've also talked to the veterans of the wars of our generation. Veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. I've come to understand something: no matter the era, no matter the level of war technology employed, nor the locale…war is still hell.

War may be more technologically advanced, but it's still hell for the men forced to fight in it.

So, on this day of remembrance, our national holiday of commemoration for our country's warriors, what war stories of your families, loved ones, or yourselves do you have to share? What sacrifices of the men of your family have made that should be shared and told to future generations so as to ensure their sacrifices were not made in vein?

To all those who have served this country and paid the price in years of torturous nightmares caused by the hellish experiences of modern war, I salute you. I may disagree with the war mongering political decisions of our cowardly, craven politicians…but I certainly respect the sacrifices many individual military personnel have made in the name of the people of this country.

What stories of remembrance of war do you have to share?

Revealing Post on Reddit's "TwoXChromosomes"

W.F. Price · 12 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Every now and then feminists reveal something that's obviously a men's issue, usually when it affects them personally. In a post on Reddit's TwoXChromosomes section, a woman posts "People were asking me about my boyfriend all day. I couldn't figure out why, then I remembered…"

She then links to a picture of her with a black eye that was a result of getting hit in the face with a ball.

Many posters recount similar stories. One man, who goes by "phifty" on the thread, says he has been physically assaulted because his wife is a martial arts instructor and has had similar mild injuries in the course of her work:

> My wife is a martial arts instructor. I am a software engineer. Imagine LaFaunda and Kip from Napoleon Dynamite. Got that picture in your head? Good. Now imagine my wife takes a shiner from one of her students. This happens once or twice a year. In her line of work, it's normal.
> Regardless that my wife is an Amazonian warrior that could pop me like a pimple if she wanted, who do you think gets the stinkeye when we go anywhere when she's wearing the black and blue and yellow eyeshadow?
> I've had everything from old ladies coming up to us and asking if everything is ok to dudes shoving me to the ground at a shopping mall. For the latter incident, my wife of course further confused everyone's idiotic preconceptions by dropping said dudes to the floor with a single jab to the throat.
> Anyway, I guess what I'm saying is that a black eye on a woman is a death sentence for her man, regardless of how she got it.

Some people may laugh about this, but it isn't really very funny when you think about the implications. The same thing happened to me when I first started dating my ex-wife. She was a majorette in the college marching band, and would vigorously spin a baton, checking it with her arm. This showed up as obvious bruises on her fair skin. Naturally, when I wasn't around, people asked whether I was beating her. Neither of us took it seriously, and we laughed it off.

I was quite young and in good shape at the time, and weighed well over 200 pounds, so nobody tried to attack me. But in hindsight having people think about harming you because of this kind of assumption is pretty disturbing. In most cases, when a woman is hurt for some reason or another, it is not because of her lover or husband, but rather some random accident. However, in our society, because of incessant propaganda, the default assumption is that the man is beating her. This surely gives women ideas, and results in a great deal of confidence where making false accusations of abuse is concerned.

Here's another account of a similar situation:

> My young, pretty coworker's 3 year old son, while sitting in her lap, jumped up and accidentally head-butted her in the face. She had to work the cash register for three days with a massive case of raccoon eyes.
> Every single male customer who came in responded with some variation on the same statement: "Who did that to you? Where does he live? He can try giving ME a black eye…" bluster, bluster, bluster, and so on.
> She got so tired of explaining, she finally started answering, "My 3 year old, and he doesn't even know he did it." The guys all calmed right down when it was explained. The lady from local women's shelter, did not. She harassed my coworker to tears with threats of police action and child protective services if she didn't turn in the perpetrator, until two of us who were working with her stepped in and told her off. She was so pre-programmed by her daily activity to believe that there had been abuse that she refused to let the situation go. I really felt that the behavior was more abusive than helpful.

The above account is indicative of how there is an assumption of evildoing on the part of men. Guilty until proven innocent. In the DV industry, there's a political mandate to find any possible hint of physical assault, and assume that it has occurred until it can be proven that it didn't. This is a very nasty intrusion into families, as any little common bruise can justify state intervention. It is also an invitation to make accusations during divorce/custody disputes, because they automatically give the accuser an advantage. Of course, there is absolutely no consequence for making a false accusation.

It's nice to see women calling BS on this paranoia, but I'm afraid they will not go so far as to oppose it, because the advantages they get from the current state of affairs are just too good to give up. Keeping men in line is generally seen as a good thing by women, and if there are a few innocent victims it's justified as a necessary evil for maintaining women's continued supremacy in the family.

Special needs employees

Dalrock · 13 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Spearhead doesn't normally cover business related topics, but I saw an article on this issue recently on Forbes.com and this is too important not to cover. The article covers the special needs of employees suffering from BWV syndrome*. BWV is a genetic condition and those who have it must deal with it their entire lives. In the past many employers avoided hiring people with the condition, or limited them to positions which didn't cause them undue stress.

Now employers know they can and should hire people with BWV for every role within the enterprise. The problem now is that employers are making the mistake of treating employees with BWV as if they were any other employee. This isn't fair to employees with BWV, because they have special needs which the employer needs to consider. Chief among these is the problems those with BWV experience when forced to make trade offs between competing priorities, or when they are forced to make and stand by long term decisions.

For example, someone with BWV syndrome will be caused undue stress if they have responsibilities both inside and outside the workplace. A normal employee could handle say a position as account manager while also performing common tasks at home such as yard work, painting, and basic repairs. However, those with BWV would find such an arrangement unbearable. Employers must take this into account with BWV employees, and work with their caretaker to make sure their combined workload isn't excessive. While a BWV employee may have no trouble handling basic office work, if this is compounded by adding tasks outside of work such as dusting and vacuuming this will often cause them undue stress.

The special needs of BWV employees must also be considered when looking at their motivation for working. BWV employees function best when their employment is purely optional. Unlike your other employees it is important that they not feel compelled to work to meet their financial needs. HR departments need to take this into consideration when devising BWV friendly policies.

Another area where traditional HR policies cause undue stress on BWV employees is in the area of vacation time. Other employees are able to plan ahead and arrange to take their vacation time as needed. However, this kind of policy puts the BWV sufferer in the position they are least able to manage. It forces them to make a decision between two competing priorities, and also forces them to engage in long term planning. In the Forbes article the author (who herself suffers from BWV syndrome) described the stress this caused her when her family moved:

> Years ago, as a corporate VP in a large national marketing firm, I was "put down" by the head of HR for my choice to take a week off to move my family, including my husband and our two small children, to another city. This HR leader said to me, "I moved to another town with my kids last month and only took a half day off."

Clearly the normal policy of having the employee schedule their vacation time in advance was not a BWV friendly policy. This forces someone with BWV to both plan ahead, and to make an excruciating trade off in whether they would rather take their vacation time to relax vs to make their life outside of work go smoothly. This kind of thoughtlessness by employers must stop.

She gave another example of how well intended HR policies can be downright cruel to BWV sufferers. One firm had a policy which allowed those with BWV to take time off when needed to focus on their home life. This would seem to be extremely BWV friendly because it removes the need to make a decision requiring trade-offs. However, those with BWV who took this option found that they weren't given credit for the time they weren't at work when it came to career advancement. So the promised avoidance of making a tradeoff decision was in fact a lie. Only if companies pretend that BWV sufferers were in fact working in the office while actually not working can we offer an equitable solution to BWV sufferers. If you run a business, you need to talk with your HR department immediately about this and the other issues mentioned in the Forbes.com article (H/T Uncle Elmer).

An Idea for Occupiers

W.F. Price · 14 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Occupy Wall Street issue has been of some interest to me, because I actually sympathize with their plight. Young people – young men in particular – have a raw deal today. And young here is fairly inclusive. Those of us who missed out on the booms in the 90s and 00s run from early 20s to around 40. The deck really is stacked against the young, and they have plenty of reasons to be upset about the great swindle.

However, the people running OWS look like naïve tools with their "inclusiveness" and such. It's straight-up 1970s activism, but this is an entirely different era with an entirely different set of problems. These kids' poorly-conceived efforts are straight from some script dictated by a college professor who still lives in the glory days of America's cultural revolution of the 1960s and 70s, and for those of us who came of age under its shadow there's nothing more tiresome than that.

If the OWS kids really want to make an impact, they ought to reach out to veterans. Male combat veterans in particular. It's really hard to get a job these days when your sole work experience consists of fragging people, driving an APC or manning a machine gun. There are tons of pissed off, unemployed vets out there, but all I see at the OWS protests are a bunch of soft-skinned coeds.

You want someone to keep your camp safe? Get a USMC sergeant on board and assign him security duty. Need some men who aren't afraid to stand their ground? Invite some soldiers to come hang out. You can bet they'll keep the camp clean and chase out the degenerates, and that way you can get the message out there without having to call the cops because the occupiers themselves become occupied by street trash.

As for the teenage girls hopping from tent to tent, give them a stern warning about slutty behavior and what it can lead to, and for the most part they'll behave themselves. This cooperation with feminists is just going to cause more problems than it solves, as it encourages license amongst the girls. Being denounced by feminists is really nothing to worry about — women instinctively line up behind whatever men they perceive as being in charge, and feminists tend to go after those they think will be moved by their demands. After a failed attempt or two, they usually give up.

Unfortunately, the men running these "Occupy" camps don't have a clue — they let the women call the shots, and that's what makes it so easy to discredit them. If you want to get a job done, you've got to take a firm stand against the inevitable female whining, and the OWS organizers have failed miserably in this regard.

I'm not going to tell these boys to "man up," because who knows what that means these days. But it does look like they need to "woman down."

OWS Rape Statement Reveals Slutwalker Mentality

W.F. Price · 14 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A couple weeks ago, a woman reported a sexual assault at the New York Occupy Wall Street encampment, prompting a lengthy statement from the OWS "survivor's support team." Despite the rambling statement accompanied by an extensive list of anti-rape groups, it seems that the suspect was dealt with by the NYPD rather than the OWS crew.

The Occupy protests have been in the news out West, as well. The mayors of Portland, Seattle and Oakland have had their hands full with the camps, which, if news accounts are to be believed, have degenerated into filthy drug dens. The characterization may be a bit unfair; in all likelihood the real problem is that a bunch of kids accustomed to living in a bubble have tried to implement the "enlightened" social theory they learned in college, and naturally they can't manage the result.

The alleged NY sexual assault is a sterling example of this. It appears that an 18-year-old female from Massachusetts had a fight with her boyfriend, and another man, one Tonye Iketubosin, offered his tent to her, in what was surely a gracious and altruistic gesture. She accepted the offer, something subsequently happened, and the man was accused of rape. Iketubosin was also accused of repeatedly groping a 17-year-old girl. Following the accusations, he returned, and when confronted by OWS members, he ignored them. Eventually, the OWS organizers had to turn to their nemesis, the NYPD, to deal with the man.

As time goes on, those who might have supported the movement are growing skeptical of the ability of OWS protestors to do anything at all effective, and their statement concerning the sexual assault only reinforces this skepticism.

Here's an excerpt:

> On the morning of October 29, a woman participating in OWS was sexually assaulted at Liberty Square. The person who she identified as having assaulted her was arrested on November 1 for a previous assault and is currently incarcerated.
> On the morning of the assault, the survivor was accompanied to the hospital by a group of women from OWS, including a social worker, to support her and act as advocates. From the moment the incident was discovered to the present time, the survivor has been surrounded by a network of allies and trained advocates offering resources to provide emotional, medical, and legal support. At every step of the process, and in line with the core principles of survivor support, her wishes as to how she wanted to proceed have been honored, and information from a range of sources has been provided to her about her options.
> We have been saddened and angered to observe some members of the media and the public blame the survivor for the assault. A survivor is never at fault. It is unacceptable to criticize a survivor for the course of action they chose to take or their community for supporting them in that choice. Additionally, we were troubled at the time of her report that responding police officers appeared to be more concerned by her political involvement in OWS than her need for support after a traumatic incident of sexual violence. A survivor is not at fault for being assaulted while peacefully participating in a public protest to express their political opinions. We are aware that this is one of several known cases of sexual assault that have occurred at OWS. We are dismayed by these appalling acts and distressed by the fear among many Occupiers that they have caused, as well as their negative impact on our ability to safely participate in public protests. We have the right to participate in peaceful protests without fear of violence.

For one thing, if the protestors have to spend all their time chaperoning teenage girls in the camps, they are not going to have much time for anything else. Additionally, while the alleged victim may not be at fault in a strictly legal sense, it sure was stupid of her to jump in a strange man's tent at night, but all the "Occupiers" can do is bleat on about victim-blaming, all while they denounce the very police who are dealing with the problems they invited and can't handle. Slutwalkers in a nutshell…

If the OWS protests are run according to the principle that women have "rights" to safety and such, but no responsibilities and no obligation to exercise discretion, and it appears they are, the movement is going to fall apart in short order. Running a camp based on feminist principles is very expensive and requires a great deal of policing, and these kids just aren't up to the job.

If OWS really wants to be effective, it has to be militant and organized. Having adolescent females traipsing around will not contribute to this, and will only invite the kind of trouble demonstrated above. Women like to believe that we live in an "equal" society, but for all of feminism's accomplishments, men still rule the street. The NYPD, an overwhelmingly male force, showed that quite clearly — without the boys in blue women are at the mercy of any thug who wants to take advantage of them. If the men running the OWS protests cannot demonstrate some real authority and take control, they will fail miserably. Of course, if they tried, in all likelihood the female protestors would call the police on them.

It's a catch-22. Occupy Wall Street will fizzle out because the ideology underlying their movement is a sham. Hopefully a few of the men involved will learn a lesson from this, and next time they'll forget about what they learned in gender studies class.

Mounties face Harassment Accusations

W.F. Price · 15 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A rash of sexual harassment accusations has erupted in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force as one woman after another claims victimization at the hands of Mounties. Catherine Galliford, who first broke the story, was the British Columbia RCMP's official spokesperson for years. She claims unwanted sexual advances drove her to drink and gave her a case of PTSD. She describes the harassment as very common, saying "If I had a dime for every time one of my bosses asked me to sit on his knee, I'd be on a yacht in the Bahamas right now."

Following Galliford's accusations, more female mounties followed with similar stories, painting a picture of an out-of-control force filled with sex fiends.

However, on a closer read it appears that what's going on isn't necessarily sexual harassment, but rather the typical workplace dynamic in a mostly male environment, which women tend to perceive as "bullying."

> The officers, who have more than 100 years of combined experience on the force, all say they worked under corrupt supervisors at one time or another who bullied their way to promotions.
> "They will do anything to get that next promotion on the backs of whoever. To me, that's where the force is sick," one officer said.
> "Because a supervisor wants to be noticed by boss, they've got to find somebody to pick on, and really it's bullying to the extreme," another Mountie said….

Yes, it's true. Men are competitive and not always very nice in work environments. Some can be mean – even abusive – and most men understand that this is just part of the job. Sure, it would be nice if everyone could just be friendly and easy to work with, but such a tame environment does not usually characterize any workforce that is under pressure to perform.

Take the recently departed Steve Jobs for example. He was not a nice boss. In fact, he could be a real asshole. Bill Gates was a brutal taskmaster when he was building Microsoft. General Patton was not a "nice guy." The list of nasty, but effective bosses goes on and on.

Men are generally more productive than women because they are more competitive, and being competitive is very nearly the opposite of being nice. Sometimes, male colleagues or employers use sexual innuendo to jibe other men at work. Athletes do it to each other on the field. Men do not generally behave this way around women, but when they work together it's bound to happen from time to time.

When men face this kind of treatment, it's just one of the things you have to deal with to get the job done. However, when women are exposed to it, it's sexual harassment.

As a society, we have to ask ourselves what kind of compromises we have to make where efficiency and effectiveness are concerned in order to accommodate women. Should police forces be held to the standards of Estée Lauder's HR department? Should we expect cops to act like perfect gentlemen despite the ugly reality of their job?

There are always going to be compromises and tradeoffs in the real world, and choosing which ones we make is a matter of priorities. To put it to women, I'd ask "would you rather see fewer women treated rudely on the job in the RCMP, or fewer women robbed, beaten and raped on the streets in Canada?" Sure, feminists will argue that you don't have to be rough and mean to do effective police work, but that just isn't true.

Why is Gabby Giffords Still in Congress?

W.F. Price · 15 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Many of us have probably had jobs that weren't all that important, that didn't require a great deal of ability, or that were fairly mundane. How many could say that we could have kept them after taking a bullet through the brain?

Obviously, very few of us have that kind of job security. For the overwhelming majority of Americans, our ability to perform on the job is crucial — no employer is obliged to keep us if we can't.

So why is it that a woman who has one of our nation's most important jobs retains her duties despite having severely impaired mental abilities?

Now, before anyone accuses me of callous disregard for those who've been dealt a bad hand, I should say that I spent a year teaching adult basic education as part of a work-study program in college. I've got hands-on experience with brain-damaged people, and I admire their courage and perseverance in the face of their misfortunes. These were people who had been involved in some tragedy, and they were struggling to become functional again. Helping them was something I really enjoyed doing — these folks were committed to becoming productive and self-sufficient despite terrible setbacks. In some cases their efforts were heroic. One man was a former race car driver, and another a bartender who'd taken a bullet to the head when some moron pulled a gun and let loose in a bar fight.

Gabby Giffords is not too different from the people I worked with, but her impairment is worse than theirs. She took a 9mm through the head front to back, and her wound was devastating. No matter what the feel-good reports proclaim, she'll never be the same again. And she's a US representative who casts votes of crucial importance…

The House and Senate may have cheered Gabby Giffords' vote out of solidarity, but the rest of America shouldn't have been too thrilled about it. How could the woman have adequately understood what she was voting for if she can hardly string together a sentence?

Watch the following video and contrast Giffords before being shot and after:

Gabby Giffords has done a lot better than could normally be expected. She's obviously an exceptional woman. But she's been left with the mentality of a child, and she's got a job that requires a great deal more than that.

Sentimentality should be the last consideration when the fates of so many souls are in one person's hands. Unfortunately, priorities have been inverted in the new America, and now it is those with the most responsibilities who are held to the lowest standards. There's really nothing that can predict collapse better than this. Chinese dynasties fell when children were placed on the imperial throne. As Gabby Giffords struggles to understand a world shattered by a bullet through her brain, we, the people, are obliged to struggle with her.

Saddest of all is that nobody dares point out the obvious.

Fortunately, Mrs. Giffords and her husband see the issue more rationally than the press, which has never openly questioned the decision to finish her term, and speculated in August that she would run again.

When asked whether she would return to congress, Gabrielle, indicating she needed more time, responded "No. Better."

She really is a remarkable woman. Not to sound trite, but it takes a valiant spirit to recover from her devastating injury, and she and her husband deserve better than to be used as props in a political game.

Beware Christian marriage doublespeak and hair trigger for wife initiated divorce.

Dalrock · 16 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of the more dangerous assumptions I see men making is that if they marry a Christian woman they will be somehow shielded from the epidemic of divorce. I've stated in the past that most churches talk like Christ but act like Oprah on the issue of divorce. I've also shown how Christians like Glenn Stanton from Focus on the Family are actually proud that devout Christians only divorce 38% of the time. More recently I've shown that the movie Christians cherish for representing their values on marriage is actually barely dressed up divorce porn for women.

Yet with all of this even I was stunned by comments left on my blog yesterday by a respected Christian author and speaker on the topic of marriage. In my post Promiscuity is good, so long as it is done on the woman's terms I pointed out that there is no backing for the popular belief that the female preferred form of promiscuity (serial monogamy/ serial polyandry) is more moral than the male preferred form of promiscuity. I used the example of Christians arguing that the wife in Fireproof was justified in her attempt to swing from marriage to marriage:

> This is similar to the argument by the Christian women that the wife in Fireproof wasn't being whorish because she planned on divorcing her husband and marrying the other man she was after before having sex with him.

Sheila Gregoire is one of the Christian women I had in mind when I made that statement, and she noticed the post and defended her position:

> But I just want to clarify: I do believe that she had grounds for divorce because of his pornography addiction. I think that's where the fundamental disagreement comes in. I don't think she SHOULD have divorced him, anymore than I think a woman should leave a guy because of a one-night stand. Jesus never said that we SHOULD divorce. He only said that in cases of affairs, divorce is permitted.
> And so in the movie Fireproof, she was in a relationship where divorce was permitted, and she was planning on divorcing, and planning on remarrying. Thus, I wouldn't say that's whorish. He's the one who cheated.
> I'm just uncomfortable with you saying that Christians are allowing people to "whore" around because we're permitting divorce, when I don't think that's the case. I believe there are very narrow grounds for divorce: abuse, affairs, and in some cases, addictions. In many of those cases, I'd argue that they should separate and not remarry, such as the case of addictions.

Note that she states that there should be only a few very defined reasons for divorce, and then proceeds to expand the definition to the point where nearly every wife initiated divorce is justified. Adultery is expanded to the point where a man watching porn qualifies: He's the one who cheated.

While Sheila uses the term pornography addiction in her comment, this is outside her primary justification (porn as adultery) for the wife's plan to line up husband number two while still married to the first one. She states that addiction would be grounds for separation without remarriage, not to divorce and find another man. Based on her own standard even if the husband had indeed been shown as a porn addict, the wife's actions would not have been justified on those grounds. Her justification is that watching pornography is adultery. This may be why the creators of the movie Fireproof were so murky on exactly what the husband's transgression regarding porn really was. They didn't feel the need to make a solid case for porn addiction before they showed the wife shutting off entirely towards her husband and actively pursuing another man. As I pointed out in my review the wife didn't even accuse the husband of being a porn addict, and while the term was used later in the movie there was nothing which showed the husband as being an addict. Here is the exchange from the movie where we are told the husband is viewing porn:

> Catherine: If looking at that trash is how you get fulfilled, then that is fine. But I will not compete with it.
> Caleb: Well, I sure don't get it from you!
> Catherine: And you won't. Because you care more about saving for your stupid boat and pleasing yourself than you ever did about me.

The fundamental problem is that Christian women are being given get out of marriage free cards while Christian men are being told man up and marry these Christian women. This selective moral softness from Christians combines with our legal system which rewards women who commit divorce theft and creates millions of fatherless children. Your husband looked at porn? Dump him and find another man! Keep in mind this isn't some corner case example I've made up. This is from the movie Christians profess shows their views on marriage. Moreover, Sheila isn't just another commenter on the internet, she is a respected author and speaker on the topic of marriage for Christian women. All men need to understand this; if your wife decides to divorce you for another man, there will be well respected Christians lining up to justify her decision and place all of the blame on you. If that means conflating viewing pornography with actual adultery, so be it. This is true even in cases where the wife was withholding sex in an effort to control the husband. She even excuses the wife lining up the other man while still married.

It isn't just men viewing porn which gives women a get out of marriage free card though. Sheila also listed abuse as the other fundamental justification for divorce. In one of Sheila's video blogs she reminded women that they shouldn't assume husbands are the only ones with obligations. This brought her a chorus of emails from angry Christian women complaining that she was telling them not to be true to themselves. That Christian women would feel comfortable spouting such nonsense to her should be proof enough of what is so terribly broken in Christian culture. To Sheila's credit, she did a follow on video blog post where she gently reminded these women that being true to yourself is not actually a biblical value. One of the youtube commenters on the original video countered with the following:

> Your advice is nice, in thought, but unrealistic in practice. I did that exact thing for 7 years, as a married Christian woman. It got rough after the first year. I doubted my marriage. But I stuck it out. I convinced myself it was ME who needed to change. So I did. I completely revamped my entire being. And I did it several times over the next 6 years.
> I will say, I was extremely emotionally abused. What do you suggest in those circumstances? I got out. And my life is happier than ever.

What exactly is emotional abuse? I'm not sure, but ladies you will be excited to learn it also counts as a get out of marriage free card! Sheila responded with the following:

> Of course, if there is abuse going on, that is a totally different story. But changing yourself doesn't mean that you change who you fundamentally are. It just means that you change your expectations and go to God to help you be the person He wants you to be. That's a good kind of change. Changing so that you tolerate abuse is something else entirely. But abuse was not the issue in this woman's letter; she just felt like she didn't love him.

So now we know emotional abuse fits in her definition of abuse. Again, she states that only two very specific reasons justify divorce and then proceeds to expand the terms to the point where nearly every wife initiated divorce is justified.

Sheila also had the following criticism for my approach in this blog:

> I find that you talk a lot on this blog about how people should never divorce (which I more or less agree with), and that women shouldn't expect so much from their husbands (which I also agree with), and that women are > asking their husbands to be both betas and alphas at the same time (which I also agree with), and that women leave their husbands too much (again, in agreement). But what I don't find is you dealing honestly with genuine problems that couples have with communication, with distance, with betrayal of trust, with porn, etc. I agree with everything you're saying, but I don't think marriages can be fixed with a simple "suck it up and put on your big girl panties". That might make someone STAY in the marriage, but it won't make the marriage thrive, and what I'd like to see is couples who are genuinely attached and intimate.

Sheila misunderstands me. I don't believe people should never divorce. My concern is that the definition of justified divorce has been so expanded as to make a mockery of the concept of marriage. She is also missing a fundamental point; putting on your big girl panties really does lead to happy marriages, at least in the majority of cases. Moreover, if Christians were serious about holding men and women to their vows they would then have the moral authority to try to assist these couples in good faith. While religious leaders may disagree, secular scientists have studied the issue and found that brute force willpower to stay married actually solves surprisingly difficult marital problems. It's almost as if God designed marriage that way. I've covered this in detail here, but here is one of the key quotes from one paper which studied this:

> Many currently happily married spouses have had extended periods of marital unhappiness, often for quite serious reasons, including alcoholism, infidelity, verbal abuse, emotional neglect, depression, illness, and work reversals. Why did these marriages survive where other marriages did not? The marital endurance ethic appears to play a big role. Many spouses said that their marriages got happier, not because they and their partner resolved problems but because they stubbornly outlasted them. With time, they told us, many sources of conflict and distress eased.

One factor which undoubtedly plays a role here is the widespread adoption of feminism by Christian and secular women alike. The knee jerk blame the husband tendency which I have described above shows how immersed modern Christianity is in modern feminism. Fellow blogger Laura Grace Robbins captured my own thoughts when she wrote:

> I'm starting to think the feminism in Christianity cuts much, much deeper than I originally thought.

This is relevant both because a general sense of unhappiness is the philosophical foundation for modern feminism, and because we know that women who try to be the leaders in their marriage are very likely to be unhappy as a result. As I mentioned earlier, Christian women hold some truly outrageous beliefs when it comes to marriage and being "true to themselves". It is no wonder that millions of these women are unhappy. Like the wife in Fireproof, many have decided that their husbands should submit to their leadership. Christians could of course address this if they weren't deeply mired in the very feminism at the source of the problem.

I'll close with a brief defense of both Sheila Gregoire and Christian women in general. Sheila is actually one of the stronger pro marriage voices in modern Christian culture. This is what makes her fundamental weakness on the issue so deeply troubling. She isn't on the pro divorce fringe, she is one of the speakers churches bring in to strengthen marriage. She writes some of the books Christian wives read on the topic of marriage. I have focused on her arguments because she is proof of how incredibly soft on marriage Christians in general have become. If this weren't the case, she wouldn't be seen as pro marriage by mainstream Christians. As for defending Christian women, there are many women who comment on my blog who do not believe that a woman is justified in divorcing one man and marrying another because the first husband viewed pornography. Single men looking to marry shouldn't write off all Christian women. Just like there are atheist women who truly believe in marriage there still are Christian women who feel the same, and the statistics bear this out. What a man looking to marry needs to do is test for this trait in the woman herself, and not assume it comes with regular church attendance or even a seeming deep devotion to Christianity. More difficult is the question of church attendance itself. Studies have shown that divorce tends to spread like disease. Attending a church which is soft on divorce puts a man's marriage (and therefore his children) at risk. Unfortunately no one has yet been able to identify a congregation for me which isn't soft on marriage. I have seen one so I do know they exist. Christianity doesn't have to be soft on marriage, the vast majority of Christians have merely chosen to be.

Teen Boys Pose as Girls to Lure Men, Film Confrontations

W.F. Price · 16 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Vancouver BC — three teens went online to lure men into liaisons with fictitious teen girls, then met with them dressed as superheroes and denounced them on camera.

Of course, it's a bad idea to meet underage girls online, but in most of these stings it is the "girls" who are taking the initiative, which is entrapment. It really isn't very hard to find men willing to take the bait when sexually mature (i.e. post-pubescent) females offer sex, so there's nothing heroic about luring guys in such a manner. It's actually a pretty lousy thing to do, and likely only encourages those who are not caught to make a go of it. It's akin to offering drinks to former alcoholics.

The boys who filmed the encounters must have thought it was funny, and a good way to get some positive attention, but if they'd pulled this stunt on the wrong man they could well have ended up dead. If I ever caught my son doing that as a teen, I'd be pretty angry about it, mainly because I'd be worried about him. Unfortunately, the message a lot of young men are getting these days is that this kind of dangerous, amateur white knighting is acceptable and to be commended.

Here's a video of a confrontation the boys filmed:

In my opinion, the best (and most humane) way to cut down on older male/teen girl sex is to discourage sexual precocity and promiscuity amongst unmarried young females. Having a society in which teen sexuality is blared from every TV screen (e.g. Miley Cyrus) is only going to encourage men to see girls as sexually available. Today, the solution is draconian statutory rape laws to discourage people from acting on impulses, but this is akin to flooding the country with cocaine and threatening people with very stiff sentences if they buy a rock of crack.

Professional Women "Burning Out" By 30

W.F. Price · 17 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

According to yet another Forbes article about working women, "millennial" females are having a rough time in the corporate world, flaming out early, unhappy, stalling, etc. That women comprise the majority of entry-level workers yet grow progressively rarer as the ranks rise is cited as evidence for this supposed trend, but of course that could simply be because they are younger.

The fact that men allegedly take more breaks is also held to be a contributing factor, but don't men work more overtime, too? The girls are also said to have spent themselves in school, where they "worked like crazy" (all those drunken flings must have been terribly taxing, too).

However, there's at least one good quote in the article. Says PR company president Kelly Cutrone:

> College is nothing more than a baby-sitting service. These students are totally unprepared for the real world. The reality for women who want to work in PR is that they are going to be working with 24 catty [women] who will backstab and compete with them. No one will say thank you. You will eat lunch at 5 p.m. It sucks and it's hard work…

I guess the daydreams of Don Draper romancing them in his office aren't panning out, and the reality is rather disappointing… Could it be that these professional millennial women really just don't like spending all day with a bunch of other professional women?

If that's the case, I guess they're out of luck:

> Simply quitting or changing careers isn't an option because the education for their professional jobs has burdened them with substantial student debt. Also, while earlier generations may have opted out of the workforce through marriage or motherhood, these paths aren't viable for these self-sufficient women, who either are still single or unwilling to be fully supported by men.

That last part about "unwilling to be fully supported by men" is a real howler. Most men their age couldn't support them if they wanted to, and in general they don't.

Women are burning out because they got what they asked for, and a lot of them are finding out (too late) that it wasn't what they really wanted.

The Bachelor Aesthetic

A Single Man's Only Refuge of Sanity

By Ken Knight

No need to write about how to properly beef up one's "man-cave" domicile or basement chamber of freedom here, entire volumes have been penned on the subject elsewhere and with good content to boot. If one is single and living alone, then he has sole prerogative to customize the interior of his dwelling as he sees fit (but for those whom want to house exotic pets such as King Cobras in your den I suggest checking local ordinances).
Of course, I have known numerous single guys who just had to do the opposite and decorate their home according to what they "thought" visiting women might prefer to see on the walls, in the kitchen, bathroom and bedroom, which was something I had to chide them about whenever I saw such pandering to female aesthetic tastes by bachelors.

I recommend a total interior environment that is pleasing to only ONE man alone, the occupant whose signature is on the lease or mortgage! The prevailing idea of pleasing the visual and mediocre tastes of some femmes who happen to stroll through your domicile is about as stupid as buying a gas-grill you'll never use to put out on your patio just because your neighbors all have one! A bachelor's pad is just that….the home of a BACHELOR, also known as a single man living alone, a concept that is not seen as ideal these days because the Single Happy Bachelor is viewed as "suspect" by misandrists and mangina white-knighters alike whose rebuke of such a lifestyle is loudly trumpeted in the form of shaming rhetoric deriding the single bachelor as "irresponsible", "loser", "weirdo", etc.

Living alone requires one to surround himself with a pleasing aesthetic interior specific to the man who lives there and has to enjoy what he sees every morning and night while he is inside his lawful domain: sports-memorabilia, baseball cards, autographed photos, work-related awards or past accolades, movie posters, framed photos of family, friends, and past glories, shadowboxes filled with the accomplishments of military or police service, a gun rack and maybe even custom furniture comfortable solely to the owner.

Married men….you know, those smug "I got mine" yahoos who like to insist upon walking you through their oversized cookie-cutter households to show you what you're "missing out" on? Yeah, those indentured servants….surrender is the norm there, mostly the cupcake bride getting to pick what goes where, what queer color scheme is slapped on the walls and her hubby's "man cave" possessions all delegated to either a dark and damp basement floor, a rental-storage unit out in Kansas somewhere, or the nearest dumpster!
Whatever you are "in o" fits in your bachelor pad domicile, and absolutely no one else should be allowed to convince you otherwise just for what "others" may "think" if and when they traipse through your man-cave, who cares who they are! Think about it, if someone is "offended" by something you have on your wall or in your living room which pleases you and is there for your enjoyment, then kick them the hell out and call it a day.

A couple of years ago I had a professional photographer and a female model in my home taking photos I wanted for use on the cover and back cover of a book I was getting published that year. The model saw the autographed 24×36 framed poster of Playboy's 1987 Playmate of the Year I had on my bedroom wall and questioned me about it, saying she didn't like it, asking what other women I had over thought about the signed nude poster framed inside my home like that. I just laughed and told her that I didn't care what visitors thought about it, I was the one living there and that I enjoyed looking at such a pleasant female shape every day when such a "fit" lady is not so commonly found on the streets of America today. Truth be told, I am an avid celebrity-autograph collector and have many signed photos framed on the walls of my home as part of my 'aesthetic' so it falls under the category of "hobby" and not just pornography!

Regardless of what others may think of your bachelor pad's interior and your own personal enjoyments, displays, and entertainment items spread throughout your domicile, ENJOY and keep a thick skin when it comes to any nay-sayers who think your “motif” isn’t female-acceptable! Gentlemen, we are currently deployed in a world fast on its way to formally becoming a Dystopia, with Feminism and its pink-bellied enforcers trying to goad free men in general into a more “pliable” form for their slave-labor tax base, and clearly the “culture” we are enduring is increasingly hostile to free expression of OTHER IDEAS, entertainment and personal aesthetics included. In order to remain free, all a single man really has to do is keep his personal tastes and ideals intact; the first boundary no one else should be invading is his household and what he has inside it.

I dare say we’ve all experienced the Indentured Servant mantra of placating women‘s tastes to the detriment of all you enjoy (just so your buddies will think that you’re “getting some”) and that is stir-fried bullsh*t with the kitchen knife in your back.

With all that is going on around us (as many of our brethren polish brass on the Titanic) shouldn’t we hold our tastes sacrosanct, allowing no outside interference to force us to give up such a personally-pleasing refuge so as to be devoured by the soul-draining insanity that stands outside our doors?

Report From Occupy Protest

W.F. Price · 18 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, I thought I'd head down to check out an "Occupy Seattle" protest scheduled for the late afternoon to see what it was about. I drove to the Montlake neighborhood, making sure to stay on my side of the Montlake Bridge in case it was "occupied," which would have obliged me to take an inconvenient route home. There were a couple dozen cops suiting up in riot gear at a nearby grocery store, which confirmed that I was close to the occupiers, so I stopped near there and walked across the bridge toward the protestors on the other side.

It was one of those typical November days in Seattle, with temperatures just above freezing and driving rain, and I wondered whether anyone would show up at all, but when I arrived at the protest site a couple hundred people were milling about. There were some tents, signs and representatives from various unions. However, despite the fact that the protest was being held on the University of Washington's campus, precious few students.

The crowd was actually quite old. Although there were a few of the usual younger, radical types, there were more who were middle-aged and above. Speakers had been set up, and they were playing Bob Dylan; a 50-something woman was toting a "Save Medicare" sign, one woman was pushing around an oxygen tank and grey-haired old hippies were walking around in ponchos. There were only two or three young guys with the "anonymous" masks, and they were outnumbered, believe it or not, by Somali women in chadors. I overheard a young woman saying something about how attending the protest was part of her gender/women's studies class.

It was a motley, uninspired crew, and I wondered why the cops even bothered with the riot gear. For an idea of what the protesters looked like, check out the photos accompanying this article. Geriatric…

After spending some time in the crowd and getting quite wet, I decided there was not much more to see and walked back to the car. I passed a group of easygoing, polite cops on the way back, who, despite their menacing gear, acted as though they were tasked with protecting rather than confronting the fragile demonstrators.

After seeing yesterday's occupy protest, I realized that there's really nothing revolutionary about the movement — it's actually more of a plea for charity from the folks who have grown accustomed to being taken care of by a government that is losing the ability to be generous. Political demonstrations in the US used to be characterized by youth and vigor, but if Occupy Seattle is any indication, they are now little more than beggars' armies, extending their hands for alms from a nation that has been looted penniless.

Occupy Opportunity?

W.F. Price · 20 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Some readers may be tiring a bit from the focus on “Occupy” movement, but I find the phenomenon interesting for a few reasons, including the fact that it has some parallels to the Arab Spring revolutions (although the outcome is not likely to be similar at all), and it offers us some potential lessons.

The new style of social protest is fueled largely by online material and social media. The protests against Arab regimes were organized with blogs, twitter and text messages. Social media allowed protests to be coordinated almost spontaneously, as local events became international within minutes rather than days or weeks. This started with the WTO protests over ten years ago, but as handheld devices have become ubiquitous, it is no longer a few people keeping close track of their PCs who can participate in coordinating protests online, but also ordinary people on the street with cell phones/smartphones.

The mainstream media has lost control of the street where the under-30s are concerned. Local and international news outlets are doing all they can to keep up with what’s going on, and have lost the ability to shape opinions and reactions to news. In some of the Arab regimes, the response was to try to shut down the internet, which turned out to be an exercise in futility.

So how can this help men? I think it’s pretty clear. We should have our own demonstration alerts, and get involved in the protests with our own messages. The feminists have been doing what they can to insert themselves into these protests, and they’ve had some success, despite the fact that outrage at banks has nothing to do with feminist concerns, and feminists themselves have been relying on government bailouts for half a century.

A lot of men may be reluctant to take time off to get involved in these protests, but it takes precious few to get one’s message across. A dozen men in one demonstration would be entirely adequate to get some attention, and if the message is well-conceived and suited to the general protest it may well be adopted by other attendees. I, for one, think a message such as “Men (or Fathers) Against Debt Slavery” would be perfectly appropriate. There’s plenty of material to work with.

So, I’ve been thinking about starting some protest network for those who would be interested in showing up at demonstrations to get our issues addressed. Perhaps a number of twitter feeds in various locales that all follow each other would work, but despite my predilection for blogging, I am a bit of a luddite where handheld media is concerned, so I’d appreciate any suggestions from readers as to what the most effective platform would be.

Is Christianity Salvageable?

W.F. Price · 21 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's probably confusing for a lot of people to hear that Christianity has essentially become a female sect, because for years we've been hearing about how awfully patriarchal and sexist Christian denominations (and other Abrahamic religions) are, and how the religion is a tool used to subjugate women. Given that churches are now about as female as college campuses (about 60%), folks must be scratching their heads and wondering what happened.

Many of the men writing on this issue, including Dalrock and Elusive Wapiti, are Christians themselves, and they've done a great job exposing the rampant man-bashing in contemporary Christianity. Dalrock recently pointed out how Christians even go so far as to excuse female-initiated divorce for trivial reasons, and cannot boast any more success in keeping families together than secular society.

So what's the deal here? Why have Christians failed so miserably across the board in their sacred duty to uphold the sanctity of matrimony and prevent dissolution?

What's happening is that Christianity has become an industry of sorts, and it caters to its consumers, who are overwhelmingly female. As wealth has transferred to women, who are the biggest discretionary spenders in the US by a wide margin, churches and preachers have turned to supplication to earn their daily bread. Supplication for women is probably the defining service performed by Evangelicals, who make a tidy profit from the practice, the basis for which can be found in James 5:

> 13 Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms.
> 14 Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord:
> 15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.
> 16 Confess [your] faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

The tipping point for Christianity in the US likely occurred when supplication became the church's most profitable enterprise (as opposed to a backwoods hustler's game), or at least when aspiring young preachers realized what success it could bring them. From there on out, a more female-oriented faith was inevitable.

If preachers had merely stopped there, it would be bad enough, but in their eagerness to please female congregants they've taken things a step farther, and many have progressed to the kind of outright man-bashing and shaming one would normally expect from a lesbian apostate such as Mary Daly.

They've gone from forgiving women's sins, faith healing and praying for money to playing the part of a drill sergeant for husbands, who, as we all know, will never be quite good enough for wives, guaranteeing plenty of work for the energetic preacher.

Pro-Male Anti-Feminist Tech, one of my favorite bloggers (he wrote the infamous "War on Science Fiction and Marvin Minsky" article that helped launch The Spearhead into some renown), has been doing some investigation into contemporary churches, finding that church is fertile grounds for women seeking a particular kind of husband. Of course, PMAFT's mission will likely upset more than a few Christians, but what he has found should be of considerable interest to Christian men, even if it may not be music to their ears.

As Christ Himself said:

> 15 Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that > are in the house.

> Matthew 5:15

So, it would be rather foolish for believing Christians to snuff out the light of truth that exposes what's going on in houses of God, even if what they see does not please them. With that in mind, let's see what exactly is happening in church today (excerpt from "The (Not) Virgin From The Sunday Morning Nightclub"):

> Many of you have been waiting to hear about my Sunday Morning Nightclub (aka church) exploits. Your wait is over. I have been investigating various Sunday morning nightclubs here in the DC area, many of which are Sunday afternoon nightclubs, since the latest mass on Sunday is the best for this which is often technically in the afternoon.
> At one of the Sunday Morning Nightclubs, I picked up a hot chick. Let's call her Molly. She's in her mid to late 20s and obviously one of those women who decided to go back to church to look for a husband chump to marry. Thus picking her up was not difficult. We were having coffee (technically I don't drink coffee, but that's beside the point), and Molly tells me that she is a virgin and waiting to have sex until she is married. She wanted to be clear upfront so there's no miscommunication down the line. I could tell Molly was full of BS on being a virgin, so I called her on it. She admitted I was right. What she's really trying to do was "makeover" her life by taking morality "more seriously" so she's going to wait until marriage for sex now.
> I told her I was fine with this for several reasons. Many of you are wondering why because doesn't this mean she won't put out? She will put out, and it won't be long before she does. I'm not even going to push the issue of sex. I am going to wait for her to beg me for it. I will not be waiting long. This way I will be able to show you how women who go to church in their late 20s/early 30s haven't changed. They are just desperate for a chump before their looks fade…

Clearly, Molly has decided it's time to find a proper husband, who she intended to deceive regarding her chastity. Why church? Because she knows that church is where men receive training regarding how to behave as husbands. Additionally, she knows that churches no longer treat marriage as a contract between those who enter into it and God, but rather a contract between the parties themselves, with God (whose advocate is the preacher) as the judge. And, as in family law, women will push the contract in their favor at every opportunity, resulting in ever more excuses for breaking it if she so chooses. As Dalrock has demonstrated, many Christian leaders will oblige her.

Given that most Western churches are funded mainly by women today, the situation is probably insoluble in the foreseeable future. As long as preachers are working for their mainly female congregants, they will inevitably begin to support the instinctive female tendency toward serial monogamy, and offer excuses for women who decide to leave their marriages for whatever reason. This isn't really Christianity, but even preachers need to make a living, so there's little that can be done.

If true Christianity is to survive, it may need to reintroduce some of the characteristics of the early church, including segregation by gender. Male-only services may be of some value, as would removal of women from the altar. Supplication for profit must be eschewed, too. It's a tall order, and probably more than Western Christians are willing to take on. The future of Christianity in the Western world looks tenuous at best.

Mediation on Wednesday

W.F. Price · 21 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm going to be mediating a finalized parenting plan for the post-relocation custody arrangement on Wednesday afternoon. Although I'm not terribly optimistic, at least I have some decent guidelines handed down from the court commissioner in my August hearing. Most importantly, he ruled that I should keep the same amount of parenting time with my kids, which means, practically speaking, that I should have them for the overwhelming majority of holiday time.

However, I'm not sure my ex will honor this ruling, as she's been doing her best to limit my time and conversation with the kids since they moved to the Vancouver area.

In the meanwhile, I'll be getting my papers in order and preparing to address whatever might come up in mediation. As I think it's important to enlighten men who haven't been through this, I'll write up the experience and try to explain what happened. At this point, I have no idea how it will turn out, but I tried mediation once before, and it didn't turn out very well. In that case, the mediator, an attorney named Barry Rose, seemed to think the proper method was to bully and threaten the father while white knighting for the mother, which only had the effect of giving me a fatalistic attitude toward the process.

Hopefully, this time the mediator will be more reasonable, but they each have their own technique, and I don't know the man. We shall see.

How the sin of addiction can lead to seduction and abandonment

Dalrock · 22 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The topic of pornography addiction in Fireproof has me thinking about the issue of addiction in general. Addiction is serious business. The addict loses all sense of perspective, and will do anything to get their next fix. This profoundly corrupts their sense of morals, and therefore makes them untrustworthy. Very often the thing which the addict craves is something which would be healthy in the right context. The power of their addiction however can turn what should be wholesome and beautiful into something dark and shameful.

There is one kind of addict which we have discussed but haven't given enough attention to in this space. This addict is on an obsessive search to secure as many notches as they can. They are fueled by the high they receive when they convince their victim to go all the way. Taking what they want by force wouldn't have the same impact; the rush comes from the victim's willing consent. In their amoral attempt to get their next fix, they will say or do anything to seduce their mark. The mark for their own part typically never sees this coming. They think if they offer themselves in good faith they will be loved and accepted as a result. But while the addict isn't acting out of malice, once the mark has gone all the way the addict has no more use for them. The mark is left bewildered, hurt, and rejected. This experience can be absolutely devastating and life altering. What did they do wrong? Why did the addict drop them as soon as the deed was done, only to pursue fresh meat? Did the discarded mark never really mean anything to them after all? Was all of the wooing and effort to make them feel at ease only a ruse to get them to consent? Unfortunately, often the answer is yes.

We've all known the victims of this kind of cruel use of the innocent. We've seen the life long pain this can inflict. I must stress that there is nothing inherently dirty or wrong with the victim's choice to consent. They were merely offering their most precious gift, hoping to be loved and accepted in return. Their only fault is having been too trusting of those who said all of the right words but never really meant them. Had the addict not discarded them once it was done it could have been something of great beauty.

I assume everyone reading this knows exactly what I'm talking about. The Church's addiction for grooms is a not well kept secret. They most often woo the young, promising acceptance if he only does this one thing for them. While innocent the young mark still might sense something is amiss with the seducer. Many will offer to give up something lesser instead, keeping their one true gift for when they are certain their love will be returned. What if I call her my girlfriend, maybe even live together with her? I promise to remain faithful. But the seducer is adamant; he must go all the way, and it must be done in public. Once you do this, they tell him, you will be loved as one of us. But the mark is suspicious, he's heard of other men who went all the way only to be treated with contempt afterward. This is all part of the game for the seducer, who knows the conquest is near. This time it's different. Those other grooms meant nothing to me. The mark still isn't sure, but the seducer knows all of the right words. I'm not that kind of church. I'm the kind which actually values marriage. You can trust me.

How can they ever trust again?

Ad Companies Trash Boys in Pro-daughter Campaign

W.F. Price · 26 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Fast Company, a marketing company that runs an online design magazine, asked ad agencies to run what they describe as “mock campaigns” to re-brand girls. In the process, the companies dump on males, and male children in particular. A few of the ads are targeted at China in particular, where more boys are born than girls (particularly in the countryside), but others are simply gratuitous man-bashing, and imply that boys are dangerous and unhealthy and lack compassion, loyalty and self-control.

Sometimes I wonder whether we have reached the height of misandry, only to find that corporate America and politicians are all too willing to dive to new lows.

If companies created campaigns trashing baby girls, we would never hear the end of it, but when boys are the target nobody bats an eyelid. Furthermore, it’s considered bad form for men to flaunt their advantages, but when women do it somehow it is acceptable. However, these campaigns will probably backfire, as they make women look like very poor sports, and quite arrogant to boot.

One company even set up a website called “Hope it’s a Girl” that features anecdotes and pictures of boys behaving badly. Ironically, it makes boys look like more fun, and girls like insufferable bores, but perhaps the guys tasked with creating the site did that on purpose.

Internet erupts on news of Spearhead and Forbes Woman alliance

Uncle Elmer · 27 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Thanks to a recent Spearhead essay that helped send the Forbes Woman Millennial Burnout meme viral, the men of Forbes have stood up and taken notice and are asking, what's behind this amazing success story?

I could not help but feel a sense of pride in finally seeing a payoff from my tireless efforts to promote a discussion between the two seemingly disparate yet mirror image web sites of Forbes Woman and The Spearhead. Not a day passes without the Women of Forbes posting a thoughtful essay seeking answers to fundamental life issues that the commentators of the Spearhead can so adroitly explain to them. The service the Spearhead Men are providing is immeasurable; very often in the Forbes essays and readership comments, a plaintive whine goes out that "we were brought up to…" and "no one ever told us…" that can only men of patriarchy can puncture towards epiphany.

And there's big money in it, as the Forbes Men examine the entrails of the phenomena and calculate the payouts. Naturally enough I want my cut, so posted a quick comment and am awaiting further instructions :

What was responsible for the astonishing success of the Millennial Burnout essay?

Why Elmer's provocative comments, which helped fuel an internet firestorm. After I passed the link to the editor of the Spearhead, the blog world exploded with controversy.

I am seeing a real synergy developing between Forbes Woman and The Spearhead. The complimentary attitudes are forging a new creative paradigm, and I have been personally been taken aside by both Forbes Women and other blog luminaries who have informed me that my name has come up in numerous discussions on the future of this alliance.

Kindly have your people contact my people regarding remuneration for my prior comments as well as establishing a dialogue on future essay ideas.

Death of Marine Highlights Questionable SWAT Tactics

W.F. Price · 28 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There's an uproar in Pima County Arizona over the SWAT killing of a USMC vet who may or may not have been involved in marijuana dealing. Jose Guereno Ortiz, a copper miner who served a couple tours in Iraq, was riddled with 22 bullets (out of 71 fired) seconds after SWAT officers battered down his door. According to the police, he confronted officers with a gun after the heavily armed SWAT team broke into his house.

> An ordinary morning was unfolding in the middle-class Tucson neighborhood – until an armored vehicle pulled into the family's driveway and men wearing heavy body armor and helmets climbed out, weapons ready.
> They were a sheriff's department SWAT team who had come to execute a search warrant. But Vanessa Guerena insisted she had no idea, when she heard a "boom" and saw a dark-suited man pass by a window, that it was police outside her home. She shook her husband awake and told him someone was firing a gun outside.
> A U.S. Marine veteran of the Iraq war, he was only trying to defend his family, she said, when he grabbed his own gun – an AR-15 assault rifle.
> What happened next was captured on video after a member of the SWAT team activated a helmet-mounted camera.
> The officers – four of whom carried .40-caliber handguns while another had an AR-15 – moved to the door, briefly sounding a siren, then shouting "Police!" in English and Spanish. With a thrust of a battering ram, they broke the door open. Eight seconds passed before they opened fire into the house.
> And 10 seconds later, Guerena lay dying in a hallway 20-feet from the front door. The SWAT team fired 71 rounds, riddling his body 22 times, while his wife and child cowered in a closet…

SWAT tactics have become increasingly common since the 1980s, when they were used in minority "ghettoes" to deal with populations that were resistant to ordinary policing. They were a feature of the "War on Drugs," and accompanied the rise of the American police state that saw extremely high rates of incarceration and heavy handed tactics become a feature of American law enforcement.

By the 1990s, SWAT tactics began to be used in the context of domestic disputes, and then in school incidents. Some of the enthusiasm for SWAT operations has been scaled back in cities, but SWAT teams continue to be a common feature of policing.

In another era, such routine state incursions into citizens' homes would have been unthinkable, but something has changed a great deal in the American character. Years of vilification of the American male, ideologically-driven campaigns to equalize people, and the idea that family business is also state business have opened the door to the strongarm tactics that resulted in Jose Ortiz being shot to death in front of his four-year-old child.

Whether Ortiz was a marijuana dealer or not is not really the point here. Even if he were, why couldn't the police have arrested him at work and simultaneously served a search warrant on his house? That may have been difficult for his wife and child, too, but it wouldn't have involved traumatizing the boy for life. Serving a warrant with a battering ram and heavily armed SWAT team shows the judicial process to be a farce, and a very dangerous one at that.

We ought to ask those who support unlimited state intrusion into people's private lives whether they think these kinds of incidents are acceptable "collateral damage." Do feminists, for example, believe that police should be allowed to invade Americans' private homes as though they were raiding insurgents in Afghanistan to investigate a domestic disturbance? Do anti-drug crusaders think suspicion of marijuana smuggling justifies it? What is worth suspending our constitutional rights to security in our persons and property?

Action That's Not Activism:

Davd · 29 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One Man's Meat is Another Man's Hot Sauce

I honour Men's Rights Activists, but i'm not really that kind of man myself. In different—especially, in more urban circumstances—i might be; but i think i'd still give my main time, attention and sweat to action that many activists wouldn't see as their calling. I suppose that goes back to my grandfather, my Dad, my boyhood Scoutmaster, and the joy of gardening and building. I really like to produce results that can be seen and enjoyed by the locals.

Instead of calling myself "MRA", i call myself "Men's Interest Worker" (because "Advocate" would produce the same acronym as "Missing in Action", which i ain't.) I believe that the way up and out of the hole Feminism has dug for men, includes activism but is even more a matter of teamwork achieving practical tasks, mentoring boys and supporting wounded boys and men, designing and confirming by trial, social patterns that will define the post-Feminist world.* My guess is that thousands and perhaps millions of men would [like me] give more time to such action than to activism, just as we put more meat, salad and bread [or rice] on the plate than we do hot-sauce.

Let me honour a little specific activism: The "outing and shaming" that A Voice for Men has done with "Vliet Tiptree" and the Swedish SCUM organization, is, methinks, valuable work. If i were the sort of old man who sits home, plays classic-flick videos and Mozart CDs, and sends money for others to do the actual work [and lived in the US banking system], then i'd send check for a few hundred dollars to AVfM, a larger check to the Spearhead—and a few thousand to shovels-in-the-ground, hammer-and-nails, men-and-boys-around-the-campfire action efforts.

As it is, i intend to spend a few hundred hours each year writing and working with other men "on the ground" (and in rural life, that really means with my boots on the dirt, in the snow—and, come spring breakup, in the mud.) I plan to put most of the money i spend on men's-interest work—and i plan to spend 10% of my after-tax income, maybe more—in support of my work and the work of men i know personally.

If enough local men get together to have a "Motherhood Is Serious Work—Not All Women Qualify" protest come Mother's Day, i might well be there carrying a sign (and if the language is English, perhaps making a short speech.) Along with that day or two of work on activism, i expect to spend a week or two that same May, on practical action. And because there are fewer than 10,000 Anglophone men within an hour's drive of my home [and about the same number of Francophone men], the likelihood of such a protest isn't what it would be if i lived in Halifax or Winnipeg—never mind Toronto, Houston, Seattle or WDC.

As a rural man, i'm not so much averse to activism, as located in the wrong place for it, and even more fond of practical action. You might say, if action is my meat, then activism is more like hot sauce with more jalapeño than tomato in it; and writing is the good stuff from the garden—Cardinal lettuce, Scotia tomatoes, homegrown arugula and chives, Honeycrisp apples, chocolate mint tisane, and dandelion wine. (The apple trees are still too young to produce enough for cider.)

I'm glad there are activists; i'm glad there are Greek oregano and jalapeños and even [in very small amounts] habañero and cayenne and Scotch-Bonnet peppers. I wouldn't fill my salad bowl with any of them, nor make them more than a wee fraction of the total volume of my next batch of salsa-picante.

* The sinking of the Titanic is a classic example of pre- or early-Feminist gender relations: At least 90% of the men passengers, 24% of the women passengers, and 51% of the children died. (Many men of the crew were saved because their work included "manning the lifeboats". One lesson is, if you travel by ship, know how to sail; sadly, it doesn't work for air travel.)

At that time, a century ago, men had their privileges and women had theirs—the privileges of the sheltered gender. Feminism has brought women out of the shelter of the home; but has not accepted the costs that "going where the hot action is" implies. The result: Where there was a balance in 1912, there is substantial overall female privilege and male disadvantage in 2011.

Still in Negotiation

W.F. Price · 29 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm still occupied with working out a new parenting plan for my kids' relocation to Vancouver, but hopefully I'll have that out of the way within the week (trial is scheduled for early December). It is not an easy process, and takes up a significant amount of time and energy. Dealing with exes is often slow, painful and expensive. The costs of divorce to our nation's productivity must be absolutely staggering.

However, I'm optimistic that we can work this out soon, and then get on with life. As for mediation, which I attended last week, I'll tentatively recommend it. It's much more effective than ordinary litigation, which too often is characterized by threats, brinksmanship and communication breakdown.

The main problem with mediation is the cost, which is prohibitive. However, if you can use it to cut future costs it's probably worth it. I'd be happy to explain further, but it's confidential at this point, so that will have to wait until the papers are signed.

Why is Anglo Feminism so Virulent?

W.F. Price · 30 November 2011 · Archived copy · Original

There's been some controversy over what exactly is going on with Swedish/Scandinavian feminism, with some claiming that it's worse than the Anglo version and others claiming that, actually, men have it better over there than in Anglo countries. I tend to favor the latter position, possibly because I'm a father and I know that Scandinavian countries are not nearly so punitive toward fathers as the legal regimes in the Anglosphere. However, due to the extremely broad definition of rape in Sweden, some claim that it is akin to fundamentalist Muslim regimes.

I'm not sure the rape hysteria in Sweden is entirely a feminist creation, however. It's more likely that it's a reaction to a trend that has been ongoing since the Swedes, in their infinite wisdom, imported a very large Muslim community, which has, to put it mildly, very different sexual norms from the native Swedes. In Islamic countries, a woman who sleeps around, bares her skin, dances at clubs, etc., is a whore. According to Islamic (and earlier Christian) custom, rape does not apply to whores, ergo Swedish women are free for the taking. When one combines this attitude with extreme cultural relativism as practiced by Swedish "enlightened" liberals, there are bound to be some misunderstandings.

My take on it is that Swedes have attempted to legislate Swedish cultural norms surrounding sex as a response to this problem. For example, a typical Swedish man would not assume that because a woman shows some skin and acts in a sexually provocative manner she is consenting to sex. In Muslim countries, men assume exactly that. Therefore, the rape laws are instructive in nature, designed to "civilize" the Muslims into the norms of a sexually libertine society. Feminists may have supported these laws, but the impetus for their passage likely derived from outrage native Swedes felt about their women being used by foreigners. This is an entirely normal feeling, but naturally Swedes don't want to seem xenophobic or restrictive, so they dress the laws up in feminist language and thereby retain their progressive aura.

However, child support and custody in Sweden are handled far differently than in Anglo countries. Joint custody is much more common, and men are never thrown in prison for inability to pay child support. In fact, if a man can't afford child support, the state will actually help him. Fathers' rights are taken seriously, and fathers are given leave to spend time with children along with mothers. Men are almost never killed by the police for their wives or girlfriends, divorces are less expensive and usually not very acrimonious, and marriage is neither demanded nor punished as it is in the Anglosphere.

Evidently, the situation is even better in Finland. The national government in Finland takes men's rights seriously, and fathers are given a great deal of consideration.

So although we see that feminism is real, and sometimes annoying, in Scandinavia, it isn't as much of a threat to the average man as it is in Anglo countries.

Why not?

I think it has something to do with the Anglo form of government, which is based on an adversarial relationship between the government and the people. From the Magna Carta onward, English speaking people have sought to define themselves apart from their rulers. Americans enshrined distrust of government into our Constitution, and to this day we remain extraordinarily suspicious of government power.

In Scandinavia, the people – including men – feel that their government is for their benefit rather than opposed to their interests. They are not only less suspicious of it, but less inclined to see themselves as at odds with it. Their government is also less inclined to view the people as a threat.

Our governments, on the other hand, have a tendency to exist in an uneasy state of truce with the people. This creates a lot of opportunities for special interest groups to ally themselves with the government against the people. Feminists instinctively understood that they had a willing ally in the state against the men the state taxes and rules.

As women entered the political world, they began to see the state as a very powerful tool for extracting concessions from men. The result was a very aggressive form of feminism that has proven over and over again its willingness to support the most punitive confiscatory regime the United States has ever had, under the guise of protecting women and children of course. Additionally, feminist family law has provided a great many constitutional loopholes, rendering any man who lives or works with a woman – that is, the vast majority of men – defenseless against civil rights abuses.

The question this raises is whether Anglo-style democracy can long survive following women's empowerment. I'd argue that it probably cannot, and that our democracies will degenerate into something closer to Latin regimes, where votes are simply bought and sold and rule of law is tenuous at best. In such a scenario, women's status will necessarily decline, as tax revenues will shrink to levels that can no longer support the police state required to keep them "equal." Companies that don't want to pay women higher wages will simply grease the palm of some official, and women's complaints will be in vain. Police will stop regularly responding to DV calls, as the money to arrest, prosecute and incarcerate women's lovers over domestic fights simply won't be there any longer. Child support will be reduced as more and more men, the elderly in particular, end up on welfare (when many divorced men, made poor by their ex-wives, are old and unemployed they will be an enormous social burden).

When seen in the context of the traditional Anglo antagonism toward government, it's pretty clear that feminists are, for all intents and purposes, allies of the state against the people. It is akin to a symbiotic relationship between two parasites feeding off the same host; something like the relationship between the mosquito, the plasmodium parasite (malaria) and the human being.

Perhaps we'll have to accept that the very structure of our society and the nature of our ideals contained all the elements necessary for their eventual collapse. If the adversarial relationship between ruler and ruled – the state and The People – becomes a characteristic of the relationship between our men and women, and our brand of feminism gives us every indication that it has, our society in its current incarnation is doomed.

Outrage mounts as Forbes Woman tries to export Millennial Burnout Syndrome (MBS) globally

Uncle Elmer · 1 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

After my first day on the staff at Forbes Woman, I am exhausted. The editors thought that bringing a man's voice to the conversation would boost their viewership while positing Forbes as a progressive media outlet appealing to the new gender-neutral Millennials.

I have to admit, the gals all perked up when I walked into the office in my gabardines and projecting my trademark swagger. They certainly weren't used to having a ballsy Alpha man strutting around the halls of Encorpera like a spring chicken. Hey, I'm used to female attention, but when the boss dumped a pile of their essays in my cublicle and tole me to "add a masculine voice" to their writing, I quickly remembered why I never lasted more than 6 months at a corporation.

I really was trying to help those ladies, but shit hit the fan when I made a few suggestions on improving their grammar and narratives. Then the inevitable lusting from the younger hotties towards my robust, hairy-armed presence. The older, single, successful gals did not like it one bit. I knew when they headed out together after work (late in the evening, as usual) to chug boxed wine over food component assemblies, that there would be a self-emergent conspiracy to get me ousted. I've been through it so many times before that I merely shrugged off the implications and drove my Monte Carlo home to my wife for some Pho and hot sex.

Well, it didn't take long for them to realize their plan. After I arrived in the morning I saw their diabolical handiwork on my desk :

Success And The Single Asian Woman

Obviously a nefarious plot to "get" Uncle Elmer so they can smirk as security walks him to the door. Sorry gals, I don't back down. I promptly fired off an inter-office memo expressing my outrage over this innapproriate sexist, racist "joke".

From the desk of Elmer E. Elmerson, III :

Typical feminist shaming to imply that men are insecure or threatened by a "successful" woman. A man wants a wife, not a co-worker. Better to be poor with a humble, traditional wife than shackled to a haughty female who thinks her job fashioning paper clip sculptures at Encorpera is more important than taking care of her home and family.

I traveled abroad and found a beautiful, successful vietnamese woman for matrimony. Now she stays home and takes care of my needs, and she is happy. To hell with the extra money. I want a woman who enjoys cooking and sex.

As for unmarried mothers, it's still a major social disgrace in Asia. Typical feminist writing to try to sugar-coat this cultural atrocity by implying that "wonderful, high-power women in New York" are raising bastard children and lovin' it.

Let's face it. Western women hate Asian women, and are eager to export feminism to their countries so those hot Asian chicks can be equally miserable as liberated, successful, single, Millennial Burnout American women.

Guys, we know how this will play out. Rather than wait for the axe I will take a proactive approach and send some feelers to another publication to scrounge up some work.

In the meantime, you may enjoy some of my editorial suggestions to the Forbes Woman staff, all in a day's work :

Getting more women in the boardroom — should the U.S. use mandatory quotas like Europe?

Elmer offer his timeless wisdom :

Women are not excluded by a "good old boys network". The numbers of women who can compete for executive level positions dwindles precipitously each year because of their own choices to focus on their children rather than spend every waking moment clawing their way to the top of Encorpera.

And the Economoist warning that padding corporate boards with diversity quotas will have poor results is exactly correct. Of course feminist mandates to ensure high-flying corporate jobs to women may backfire when the growing legions of stay-at-home husbands, who have been jerking off to porn and shooting hoops for 20 years, return to the workforce after the kids have grown and demand that they too, get those top slots in recognition for life-long experience. As you are advocating legislation to ensure that those who take the mommy-track have a seat on the corporate board, you will, in the name of equality and gender fairness, have to provide a chair to those men as well.

The Financial Benefits of Babies at Work

Elmer brings his work-life experience to the discussion :

The point of work is to provide goods and services to sell in a competitive marketplace, not to provide “work-life balance” to privileged females who are obsessed with their pointless careers fashioning paper-clip sculptures at Encorpera.

I got laid off from my corporate job soon after they had spent 6 months and tens of thousands of dollars renovating the ladies restroom near my cubicle to provide a “breast pumping” station for working moms. Can’t say I agree that turning the factory into a nursery will help Encorpera meet its shareholder expectations.

And as if workplace women do not already spend too much time throwing parties for some gal transferring to a new position in the next department or hosting stupid-ass holiday gift exchanges, allowing them to bring in their nose-pickers is sure to demolish what productivity still exists. It won’t be the men causing the loss in profit, but women and their ceaseless fawning over babies as well their inherent competitiveness towards each other. The childless women will hate your guts over this.

Busting the Myth That Women Aren’t As Ambitious as Men

Elmer busts… well, never mind :

Now you want to legislate “likeability” to ensure that society has nicer feelings towards aggressive, ambitious women.

And there's a "Center for Work-Life Policy" providing "facts" that employers should listen to?

Ladies, listen up. Nobody gives you work-life balance. You take it. Stop pleading for this nebulous "society" to provide it and a portfolio of career comforts for you. If you want to reach the top you will make some difficult trade-offs whether you are a man or woman. When you get there, no one will like you.

Your advice for women to approach their Encorpera overlords for executive grooming support as well as to instigate "change" is laughable. Anyone who pulls that stunt will get quickly shunted into a position of high diversity and low relevance.

An Encorpera CoWorker, "womanable", provides her insight :

Great article, thanks for this contribution. I agree with your points, but I also believe that the way that ambition, climbing the corporate ladder and entrepreneurial growth are discussed are put in very testosterone-charged terms, and posited as an either-or, zero-sum game. Women lead, manage, and grow differently from men, and talk about ambition and business goals using different terminology. In addition to your excellent suggestions, I think we need a new lexicon that is more inclusive, and an acknowledgement that there are multiple paths to greater business success.

Elmer likes her attempt to retool the King's English, but warns :

Good luck with that. I tried and tried to get my colleagues at The Spearhead to adopt the word "rogure" (which, roughly translated, means to fornicate rudely, though not unpleasantly) but to no avail!

"hydee", who works in Encorpera's Data Processing Center, has an unusual perspective. I will have to find a reason to drop by and discuss personally. Maybe bring a stack of punchcards or something :

I'm embarrassed to be a woman in Corporate America based on this article. Let me apply this logic to another issue:

Many women are overweight even though they want to be skinny. Why aren't they skinny? It's the cost of being skinny that gets to them. If you work out a lot you got sweaty and people don't like sweaty women. Also if you get too many muscles you'll look like a man and people don't like manly woman. Another way to be skinny is for women to watch what they eat. If they watch what they eat then they can't eat chocolate and everyone knows women love chocolate so it's not an option to give that up. So you see woman really want to be skinny but it's the cost of being skinny that they struggle with.

You cannot have ambition if you are lazy and don't want to put the effort. Ambition requires sacrifice. In fact, I'm pretty sure anything that requires hard work requires sacrifice.

Science Proves That Women Are Mean (Again). Thanks Science!

Elmer, can you proof this for me? Thx, Meghan

Last night, while having drinks with some ForbesWoman friends, one made a statement that stuck with me. While describing a falling out she had had with a cofounder of a recent startup and the subsequent attention it received in the press, she said, “If it had been men, it would have been all business. But because we’re women, it’s always portrayed as a catfight.”…

———————————-

Elmer inquires :

While quaffing boxed wine at dinner did you feel a flush of anger and resentment when one of your Encorpera co-workers mentioned her recent private correspondences with Elmer?

The Bargain Hunter’s Guide to Great Wine

Elmer observes :

Boxed whine : the drug of choice for treating Millennial Burnout Syndrome (MBS).

Mom Models Represent On The Runway For Victoria's Secret

Elmer gives them the Man's view :

Victoria's Secret is in the business of covering up flaws, so it's just good marketing to include some fatties and moms on the runway to appeal to their demographic. While I applaud their inclusiveness it can be a little irritating for men to have this shoved in our face along with demands that we perceive it as "sexy" while being shamed and vilified for enjoying to look at what we truly find appealing (cheerful naked young women who have not borne children). We sure as hell don't care to hear about some former model's great postpartum body. And if I see another graphic with a self-satisfied pregnant woman with her hand on her belly I'm gonna puke.

I'm serious. Runway models and their cold robotic stares are complete boner-killers.

The Rise Of The Female CEO And The Folly Of Men Who Just Don't Get It

Elmer is outraged! :

Typical feminist essay, even in the title using phallic double-entenders ("rise") to shame men ("who just don't get it") as if our entire worth as human beings rests on whether or not we are successful with females. It's a subtle, insidious form of power abuse against men, reducing them to mere sexual objects, and wholly innappropriate to the culture of inclusiveness and valuing of each coworker's individual diversity that we are striving to create at Encorpera.

True Tales Of Love And Startups: When Things Get Complicated With A Co-Founder

Elmer shares his experiences :

My head spins now…stay calm, focus, try to beat the stampede of commentary.

Hot Asian chick (well she's Asian, that' for certain), beta male "friend", business partnership. Did she really have to ponder so hard to figure out what went wrong?

Let's hope after numbnuts recovers emotionally he travels abroad and finds a lovely Asian bride that will satisfy his needs and empower him towards business success!

Close Your Eyes: How Meditation Can Help Your Career

Elmer questions :

How come the stock photos never show a sweathog meditating?

Same for "massage" photos. Always the attractive lady gettin a massage while hubby is out on the links swinging a Large Marge.

Just once I would like to see the middle-aged guy gettin a rubdown from the hot Asian chick while his wife is shopping at the boutique.

Criminy. You know what? I have seen that guy :

http://www.the-spearhead.com/2011/09/15/dear-salon-letters/

And he does the "meditation" thing too :

http://www.the-spearhead.com/2011/09/05/employment-game-part-iii-prospecting/

The Psychological Warfare of Women: Are We Our Own Worst Enemy?

Elmer helps out :

Baloney. If you try to change the world by making an example of yourself as a "nice" girl, the mean girls are gonna walk all over you like you're a piece of moldy carpet.

If you want to survive at Encorpera you need to hunker down and hone your skills at feminine infighting. You got many decades of this ahead of you so you better get used to it and learn to fight like a woman.

Why Being Successful And Independent Will Ruin Your Marriage Prospects (And Why The Media Love To Tell You This)

Elmer simplifies it for her :

It's not hard to figure out.

A man wants a wife, not a coworker.

Frieda Klotz, Contributor

Hi Elmer,

That is intriguing — could you elaborate?

She is intrigued, Elmer provides more detail :

Man, who once toiled alone in field and factory. sought in woman the exact opposite to soothe his wounded soul. He was willing to commit his paltry wages to her upkeep in exchange for a few simple rewards such as cooked food and a backrub.

Now that legions of women have eagerly sought out Paper Clip Sculptor positions at Pan-Encorpera and have been poisoned by a constant diet of diversity-based inspirational programming, modern woman has become just another Co-Worker.

For many men it's a waking nightmare. Like when you work on the burger-flipping line and you finally lay down to sleep exhausted you dream you are back on the job cranking out squirt burgers. It's no wonder they would rather jerk off to porn rather than expend the energy embroiled in a tug-of-war with a female that is just like the angry, competitive gals back at the office.

Absent Fathers — Whose Fault?

W.F. Price · 3 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Having just finished up a parenting plan for my kids' relocation, I'm feeling pretty drained. The process is slow, painful, expensive, emotionally draining and time-consuming. As a father, it was almost entirely up to me to put the effort into keeping my time with my children. In Washington state, there is a "presumption" that the custodial parent (i.e. the mother) can have her way, and whatever parenting plan she submits upon a relocation, even one that removes the father entirely from the children's lives, becomes law if the father does not oppose it within 30 days. Previous custody agreements are irrelevant.

This law gives women the ability to erase fathers from their children's lives as easily as submitting a new parenting plan and moving to the next school district. If the father is too poor or too busy to show up and fight it in court, he's out of luck. If he already lives elsewhere, he's pretty much screwed. And even if he can fight it the first time, the mother can simply repeat the process until he gives up.

For all the talk of progress in father's rights and equality, the brutal reality is that a determined woman can still remove her children from their father's life simply with some persistence and knowledge of the law. Men have the option to fight it, but realistically speaking, most men don't have the means. The typical separation and/or divorce happen when both parents are young. All the young single mothers clogging up the hookup/dating sites are clear evidence of how common this is. In most cases, they left their children's father; they were not abandoned.

Young men in particular, especially these days, do not generally have the wherewithal to fight for their children, and I've learned from personal experience that if you don't fight for them you will lose them. I count myself one of the lucky ones. I was tenacious, and would have been no matter what the circumstances, but friends and family, which I have an abundance of here in my hometown, were essential to my ability to persevere. I really feel for young men without this advantage — there's often nothing they can do. This is why I will always give the benefit of the doubt to men who are estranged from their children.

And yet we still have politicians, pundits and producers bemoaning the plight of the poor, abandoned single mother and fatherless child, pointing the finger of blame at men, despite the fact that women are given options all along the way. They have the option to leave their children's father, they have the option to continue to demand support from him, and they have the option to cut him off from his children. Not one of these options results in a penalty, so a great many women pursue them.

The unspoken truth about fatherlessness is that in most cases a woman chose to remove the father from his children's lives. Fatherlessness is not, when it comes down to it, about a problem with men, but rather a problem with women. There may be some men who willingly abandon their children, but these are a small minority compared to those who have been disposed of by the mother.

Our society needs to stop asking "what's wrong with men?" and start inquiring into what's gone wrong with women. Fatherlessness is a major crisis in our civilization, and the blame for it lies almost entirely at the feet of our women.

Northern Europe: The Ideological Front Line?

W.F. Price · 4 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The critical response to my article on Anglo Feminism, which suggested that feminism is nastier in Anglo societies than Scandinavia, was pleasantly instructive. Although I was aware that there was some dissent against the state feminism of Northern Europe, I did not know that it was so strongly felt. More importantly, I didn't realize that feminism was such a crucial component of state ideology.

The picture that is emerging is one of a bureaucratically-entrenched soft totalitarianism in Scandinavia, as compared to a more lawless, rapacious and violent form of feminism in Anglo countries. Perhaps this is because in Scandinavia the state has been more successful in efforts to socialize feminism, thereby drawing support from society at large, whereas in the Anglosphere the burden falls most heavily on individual men who have exposed themselves to the risk of marriage or cohabitation.

Whatever the reasons, according to Henry Laasanen and other Finnish commenters, with a few exceptions, dissent against feminism is notably absent from the mainstream Scandinavian discourse.

Henry Laasanen:

> In the USA you may grind teeth with radical "feminazi" writings. We have no feminazis (maybe one or two), which is – paradoxically – a catastrophe for the Finnish MRM: there are no critical discussions of equlity in the media, only feminist propaganda.
> There are no feminist blogs (one inactive) or feminist columnists (other than official propaganda) in Finland. In the British newspapers Guardian and Daily Mail there are gender debates every week – we have no gender debates, because feminism holds the absolute "truth".

Vortac:

> …I think Finland is one of the world's hardest countries to talk about men's rights. In USA, it seems to be much easier, because there are so many more people, which means there are so many more MRA's, and there is so much variance with all kinds of different states, different environments from mountainy places to plains and many things inbetween, that even men's rights can be discussed seriously. Even when there is the expected ridicule, there are more people to rise against the ridicules, and challenge their viewpoints. In the little Finland, it's a very difficult thing to do, and the consequences are less challenged – especially in the 'real life'.

Finndistan, an (American?) expat living in Finland:

> As a foreigner in Finland, following the finnish news in english, the media attack is impossible to avoid.
> Articles on how the recession forces women back into the kitchen, articles on comparing all women and all men's salaries not divided by occupation etc, articles on how men have more free time when the data clearly showed that men work more (from a survey spanning the ages 10-65), the president saying that the real victims of war and conflict are women and children, etc… In a small country, in the main news outlet, when these kinds of articles appear multiple times a week, its can get overwhelming, and with what Henri says, the consensus politics, it is impossible to show people that "Look, the survey showed men worked more. It is in the data". Talking to a brick wall gets more response.

The atmosphere described in the above comments sounds like what one might find in an American gender studies classroom, but nowhere else. Family court may be hell for men in the US, but for the most part people have stopped cooking up ideological justifications to defend the strong-arm robbery that passes for “justice” in our courthouses. Instead, they simply say something like “bend over and take it like a man.” However, this is recent development, so perhaps Scandinavia is simply a few steps behind in this regard.

Because Scandinavia has traditionally been the testing ground for progressive policies, its societies have had a disproportionate impact on the Western world’s political discourse. This suggests that if men’s rights advocates gain some political traction in the Nordic nations, it could significantly raise the profile of the movement throughout the West.

Despite the awful political climate for MRAs in Finland, it looks as though there’s actually a lot of potential there. The frustration is palpable, and the thing about a consensus, we humans being what we are, is that it is made to be broken. Paradoxically, one of the advantages we Americans have in regards to speaking out about these issues is that so many of us men have very little to lose. When you’ve already been destroyed by your ex, denounced as an “abuser” or “monster,” and had your children and property seized, what more can they do?

Although it may not be that bad in Finland now, if the feminists continue to get their way, it will get worse. If I were a Finn, this is something I’d tell my fellow men. Point out how American law metastasized in the 90s with the passage of VAWA and the unholy feminist/conservative alliance. Stress the need to fight feminism before it takes things that far. I’m sure plenty of Anglo men would be willing to tell their own personal horror stories to Finnish MRAs, who could use them as an example of what feminism has the potential to do.

Given the remarkably strong position feminism has in Scandinavia, it looks like the perfect place to take a stand against the ideology which, despite its claims, is supremacist rather than egalitarian. In fact, this may be the single best argument for the egalitarian Scandinavians: feminism ultimately leads to a society that is anything but just and equal. Through its pursuit of radical equality of outcome, it undermines legal equality, and eventually will replace rule of law with rule by law, which would erase the distinction between Scandinavia and its eastern neighbors, and thereby destroy the distinct civilization of the North.

Bringing The Manosphere Closer To You

Delusion Damage · 5 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

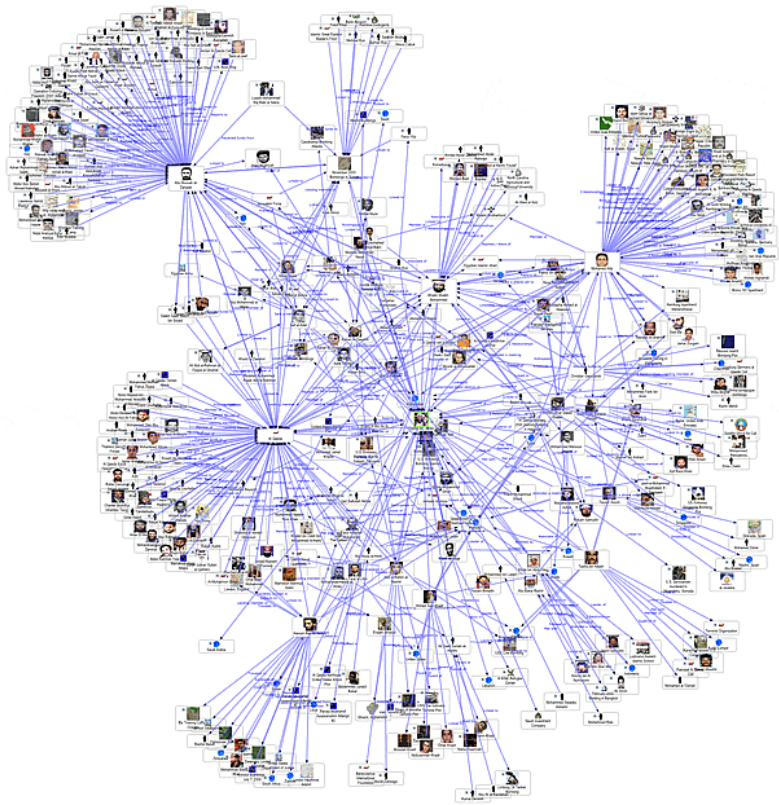
What exactly is the “manosphere”?

We all know the stock answer: it’s “a loosely connected web of blogs dealing with men’s issues”… but that failed to satisfy me, so in an effort to find a more scientific answer to this question, I just spent something like 4 hours plowing through some 200 or more blogs – starting with the blogs I (at least occasionally) read, then looking at everyone those blogs link to, then everyone those blogs link to…

I bottomed out about two and a half hours into it, seemingly free-falling into an ever-expanding ocean of blogs, but then… somehow, the threads I was following started coming together again. You’d expect that if there is such a thing as “the manosphere” then going through the blogs you’d eventually find most of the ever-increasing number of links pointing back to each other in a somewhat circular fashion – and that is indeed what happened. The final quarter hour of my adventure on the open seas of blog was the strangest part – I would run across a new blog I’d never seen or even heard of before, and every link in its sidebar (save one or two of the blogger’s personal picks) would already show the purple “previously visited link” color. And this happened a lot, even with blogrolls several tens of blogs long.

So there you go, the active “manosphere” is, according to my calculations, comprised of around 120-140 blogs, with several tens of old, abandoned blogs still lying around as well. It’s somewhat divided into smaller and quite heavily overlapping spheres (centered around Game, marriage issues, legal issues and MRA, antifeminism, whining, MGTOW, cultural commentary, self-improvement, etc.) and bleeds rather profusely into a distinct alt-right blogosphere through both spheres’ shared interest in the ongoing cultural decay of the Western world and how to live with that.

It basically looks a lot like one of these:



A realization I had in the process that, although not really logically surprising, still felt counter-intuitive was that a lot of the uncharted blogs I usually never ventured anywhere close to were not bad at all. I suppose we all imagine that we've personally picked the good ones to follow, but the truth seems much more likely to be that we simply picked those which seemed the closest, judging by whatever virtual social connections brought us into the "manosphere" in the first place. It's the "friend of a friend" phenomenon transferring from real life onto our blog reading habits. Depending on which blogs they've found first, bloggers and readers both cluster into smaller groups even within one manospheric subgroup – I found at least two, or depending on how you count, possibly three distinct "Game" subgroups of blogs, all writing about the exact same stuff, but mostly separately from each other, not linking to or discussing posts from the other groups. Probably not even reading them. Maybe not even knowing they exist.

Fascinating stuff… so what do I intend to do with this information? The only thing a man possessed of his natural male instincts and drives can do in a situation like this: build the biggest auto-updating manosphere blogroll ever.

… now it's two weeks later and I've done it. It was no easy task in either the labor or the technical sense, and I crashed the server at least twice, but I finally found a way to make it work: I am now linking to updates from over 140 blogs in real time.

I'm fairly confident that all the "major" manosphere blogs are covered, but that said, if some obscure blog isn't on the list that doesn't mean I decided not to include it. The more likely explanation is that I've never heard of it and didn't find it even when I went three layers of links deep from the blogs that I usually read. That's exactly what inspired the point of this whole exercise – to gather together the currently pretty loose web of the "manosphere" and let readers find all those good writers they don't even know are out there, and let those writers find new readers. This is what needs to happen if the manosphere is to grow and flourish.

I'm donating the most valuable piece of internet real-estate I have – the home page of my blog – to this cause, and that's where you can now find between 50-100 new links to freshly pressed blog posts every day. I'm betting quite a few of those will be stuff you'll want to read, especially since many of the writers contributing to this very site write their own blogs as well, and a lot of those are featured.

Having been a bit out of the loop lately, I'm going to be using it myself to better stay on top of what's going on in the 'sphere, and to discover the valuable offerings of blogs that I haven't much been exposed to before. I hope you have a great time doing the same.

Happy reading!

Comment of the Week: Parental Alienation Syndrome on Display

W.F. Price · 5 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Most of the "comment of the week" entries are chosen due to their popularity, but some unpleasant ones are worth a second look, too. Especially when they are instructive.

The following comment, posted by "JG," is shrill, angry and confrontational. The post she was responding to – my recent post on absent fathers – must have hit some nerve. One might see some humor in the over-the-top response, but for divorced fathers it's pretty depressing.

Here's the text:

> You guys are so wrong, wrong, wrong!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!! Shut the fk up with your f*cking lies about women!
> My father was in my life until I was eight and then got remarried. Then, poof! Gone from my life completely. No explanation, nothing. He had a drinking problem and was averse to regular working hours; thus, he was out of a job quite a bit. My mother held a full-time job the whole time they were married (seven years, and she's never been out of a job), while his back would magically go 'out' every time he got a new job and he would go on several day 'benders,' come home drunk and beat the hell out of my mother. And no, that is not a figment of her imagination; I recall a couple of instances from when I was about five.
> My mother did not FORCE him out of my life; he just couldn't be bothered to be in my life later. Oh, and before he got remarried, he blew off several weekends where he was supposed to have me. So no, he didn't make much of an effort at all.
> And not that I give a sh*t what your opinion is of me, but I'm married to a great guy (no he's not a wimp). We've been married for seven years, and have been together for 10. Not that you archaic trogs care, but I thought I would leave my two cents on your crap site, since many of you see fit to go where you're not welcome a lot.
> I'm sure you'll find a way of blaming my mother, as ALL WOMENZ IS BAD, even the ones who purr and curl up at your nasty, fungi-infested feet and do whatever you want. I'm sure if my mother had just been a 'good' woman and made pies while my father brought home the bacon (we would have been out on the street), everything would have jake. Or you'll blame me because I'm not a boy and don't have the golden penis between my legs. Enjoy them boys ('cause you're definitely not men). Hope you will be happy together as no woman with a working brain stem would ever want to be with you. And if by some grace of divine providence you are involved or married, then I really pity your S.O.s How often do you beat them? Did they have a lobotomy before or after they met you? Pieces of sh*t! All of you! Go ahead, bring on your frothy, foaming hate into my e-mail, mad dogs! Bring it on, losers!

JG states that she's seen nothing of her father since she was eight. She's been married seven years, so I'm going to assume she's 30 or above. This means it's been over twenty years since she saw him, and she only had a short window of time between infancy and pre-adolescence to get to know him. In all likelihood, she can't really remember what it was like to live with her father, and doesn't know him from personal experience.

So how does she know what a piece of garbage the man is? Why, her mother told her, of course. He was a drunk, he went on benders, and he blew off weekends with his daughter after his wife ditched him. He was also a wife-beater and lazy bum. We've all heard a similar story at one point or another. It's so common it's cliché. Sometimes it's even true, but what always makes me suspicious is when the child never got the chance to see for herself.

My parents divorced when I was very small, and I heard some nasty things about my dad, some of which were true, and some exaggerated. I think it's unrealistic to expect women not to trash their exes — the compulsion to do so is probably too strong to fight. It's also unrealistic to expect women not to portray themselves as blameless saints. I have yet to meet a woman who will willingly take the blame for anything serious. This being the case, some degree of Parental Alienation Syndrome (PAS) is probably inevitable in the typical, mother-custody divorce.

PAS is described as follows:

> PAS is characterized by a cluster of eight symptoms that appear in the child. These include a campaign of denigration and hatred against the targeted parent; weak, absurd, or frivolous rationalizations for this deprecation and hatred; lack of the usual ambivalence about the targeted parent; strong assertions that the decision to reject the parent is theirs alone (the “independent-thinker phenomenon”); reflexive support of the favored parent in the conflict; lack of guilt over the treatment of the alienated parent; use of borrowed scenarios and phrases from the alienating parent; and the denigration not just of the targeted parent but also to that parent’s extended family and friends

There is one way to limit the damage: let children get to know their fathers themselves. I’ll be eternally grateful to my own mother for never getting between me and my father. I learned the truth myself, and it wasn’t all easy to swallow, but it was enormously important to me. Without it, I think I’d have some serious issues, like JG, who flies into a fury when discussing the subject. It’s almost as though she has a Pavlovian response where her father is concerned.

To avoid psychologically damaging children, significant and ongoing paternal custody should be mandated by law. People who grow up hating their fathers suffer from psychological damage as adults and, as JG demonstrated, their hatred and anger are sometimes turned on others. Sometimes, they turn the negative emotions on themselves.

We all know that fathers aren’t perfect, but it is tragic to encounter someone who is unable to feel any compassion for a parent. My own father was far from ideal, but having an ongoing relationship with him gave me the opportunity to both love him and learn from his mistakes. To deprive children of this advantage is cruel, and to deprive fathers of the opportunity to tell their own stories and redeem themselves is inhumane.

Rayon McIntosh Freed Following Outpouring of Support

W.F. Price · 5 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Rayon McIntosh, the McDonald's cashier who beat down two women who attacked him while he was doing his job, has been cleared by a NY grand jury, and will spend Christmas at home with his family.

After hearing evidence from witnesses, the grand jury declined to prosecute Rayon, prompting cries of "Hallelujah!" from family members.

In addition to his family, much of the public was relieved to see Mr. McIntosh released from custody. Because the attack and subsequent beating were caught on video, the case drew widespread attention, most of which was sympathetic to Rayon. As the news spread, supporters set up a "Free Rayon McIntosh" Facebook page, and numerous people weighed in with their opinions on YouTube. Most defended Rayon, and had harsh words for the women who attacked him without provocation.

As the general public tires of the entitlement mentality of women who think they can assault men with impunity, officials are beginning to catch on, and are no longer parroting the line that it is "never OK to hit a woman." While using force is always a solution of last resort, self-defense is a fundamental human right, and should not be denied to men simply because their attackers happen to be female.

A higher-quality version of the video has been posted by the Free Rayon folks, and it gives a better idea of what was going on. For one thing, it's clear that the "extra" licks he got in were actually to prevent his assailants from getting back up. This is exactly what the police do in a similar situation — as long as the subject shows any resistance force is applied.

Additionally, one can see an apparent feminist enter the scene near the end (the blonde woman) and have a meltdown, then scream for McIntosh's arrest. Tellingly, she demands the police rather than an ambulance, which demonstrates that her main concern was that a man was defending himself from women rather than the fact that the women were in immediate need of medical attention.

How many guys do you know who have deliberately thrust themselves into very compromising circumstances just to try and “save” someone who didn’t deserve the attention and life-risk (on his part) in the first place? As a Bachelor for the past 20 years myself, I have seen buddies, associates, and a few vaguely-known denizens around me throw an arm around some feckless parasite just because it happened to be female and the tune of going to bed with her played in the dude’s head like a harp. Anyone with an IQ above Forrest Gump-level knows there are hustlers of the opposite sex out there, but it seems that untold numbers of men tend to want to “rescue” women in “trouble” in order to win their hearts, and man I gotta say I’ve seen some really decent lives turned upside down by this sort of thing playing out. My Friends…the “damsel in distress” thing is only a win in an Edgar Rice Burroughs novel, because in reality Susie Sucksalot is not the shapely and honorable “Dejah Thoris” of Burroughs’ sci-fi novels!

My buddy Davis was married twice and divorced twice in just ten years, his $130,000 a year salary and $500,000 worth of real estate divvied up between the two ex-wives in the subsequent divorce settlements and he is living on only half of his previous net income thanks to court-imposed wealth redistribution. Trick was, he should have seen the second one coming, having met her in his Church’s “Divorce Care” class while he was on the horns of his first divorce but NO…..Davis had to “rescue” the soon-to-be-divorced woman because he couldn’t stand to be single for five minutes and she poured on the honey-mustard with her sob story of woe-is-me, her two bed-wetting kids, mountain of debt, etc. etc. and well, since she was a “looker” (in Davis’ eyes) he absorbed her debt, married her within a year of his last divorce, bought a house with her and paid $35,000 for her kids’ benefit….and she repaid him with physical violence and having a motel room sex romp with a Bail Bondsman. Yep, good job “saving the day” there Davis!

My buddy Chris was what we call a “smug married” guy who dropped his single pals after marrying a gorgeous member of the female species who was so damn fine she could’ve posed in Playboy® and Chris found himself content with just having her around, all of his buddies banished from his sight by him and his new cupcake, who he accepted despite her severe gambling debt and penchant for spending the rent money on lottery tickets. But hey, Chris “saved” her from her gambling debt before and he was proud to have such a “hot” wife on his arm, proud to have “saved” her from herself and her gambling addiction. Thing of it was, such addiction is not so easily cured by the act of getting married and wiping the slate clean finances-wise like Chris did. He woke up one day with a team of thugs banging on his door demanding money owed them by his wifey whose gambling addiction launched into a darker corner of illegality. Needless to say, Chris ended up giving away half of what was in his house that day to stave off further beatings once the thugs got through his door.

Another associate of mine named Jeffrey “rescued” a woman from an abusive boyfriend by getting the boyfriend arrested, testifying against him in court, and moving the femme in with him for she had no other place to go since she couldn’t live with her slap-a-ho boyfriend any longer. I remember Jeffrey telling me that he was smitten with this chick “at first glance” (and my only regret is that I didn’t kick him in the cajones right then and there for being so goddamn stupid). Needless to say, poor Jeffrey found out how his loyal effort was to be re-paid by his new girlfriend when he was stopped from going inside his own home by a couple of guys who were friends of his girlfriend’s abusive ex-boyfriend. As it turned out, the two men were keeping him from entering his own house because cupcake was inside “making up” (in the bedroom no less) with her abusive ex-boyfriend!

These stories are not embellished for they need no embellishment…they are simple examples of observations seen from the position of a third party (me) and I am 100% confident that readers here at The Spearhead have seen eerily-similar situations take place amongst the denizens in their own town! Now I am sure I will hear ravenous tales from women about male parasites and hustlers galore in response but that’s not my point here.

It is a sad phenomenon I think that natural human altruism is so easily usurped and taken advantage of by people who are more endangered by their own bad conduct and habits than by any other “ogre” life throws them into the pit with. Weighing the pros and cons of entering into a relationship with someone is not taken seriously these days or stories like these would be delegated to pulp fiction novels instead of Maple Street USA. Taking on a woman with severe financial problems, reckless behavior patterns, an “ex” boyfriend who they can’t give up, a felony criminal record and/or a talent for conning men out of their money is not worth the short-lived “companionship” and sexual congress the guy typically sees as the net pay-off for his effort. “Saving” someone is not an easy thing considering the fact that you may end up on the chopping block in their place!

Some older more traditional folks might call you “selfish” for being discerning and skeptical to the sad and tragic (sales-pitch) tales of a member of the opposite sex in their attempt to win you over and “help them out”. It’s not being selfish guys, its self-defense!

Back to Vancouver

W.F. Price · 6 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm headed up to Vancouver in a minute here, and should have my new parenting plan signed off and ready to submit tomorrow. I am already feeling relieved, and once it's finalized I'll write a more detailed explanation of the process.

Hopefully my border experience will be less troublesome than the last one, but if anything comes up I'll be sure to write about it.

In the meanwhile, if any Vancouver readers have any suggestions for downtown establishments (pubs, museums, etc.), I'll check comments once I get there. I haven't been to downtown Vancouver in some ten years, so I'm out of touch with the scene.

Be back tomorrow.

Inequality in Canada

W.F. Price · 8 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

While in Vancouver, I noticed something that surprised me a bit: there is more poverty on display than I'd expected. Perhaps it was just the part of town I walked through (Chinatown and East Downtown), but I saw a lot of poor old men, and the churches that served the homeless/poor were packed full. Needless to say, the overwhelming majority of these people were men, many of them old.

In the evening, when I watched TV back in my room, I saw a report on house prices in the Vancouver area and was shocked to learn that the average cost of a house in Vancouver is well over $700,000 — more than twice what an average house costs in Seattle. The only thing I could think of that might account for the inflated price of real estate in the area is the recent wave of immigration from Hong Kong, which brought tens of thousands of wealthy Chinese to Vancouver. Perhaps the geography has something to do with it, but Vancouver is no San Francisco, and it looks like there is plenty of space available for development in the near suburbs.

Here in this extraordinarily wealthy city (on paper), there were many obviously poor old men. For all I've heard about Canadian socialism, it certainly didn't seem as though all the people were thriving, and the inflated real estate market bears the hallmark of speculative capitalism.

In Vancouver's defense, I should point out that poverty there does not appear to be accompanied by the same level of social dysfunction and mayhem that one finds in the poorer parts of the US, and the city felt remarkably safe even in the seedier areas. I'll be headed back from time to time, so I'll get a clearer picture over the months, but despite the fact that I enjoyed the visit, it was disconcerting to see so many abandoned old men.

“Microaggression” and Free Speech on Campus

W.F. Price · 9 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Vassar college, a liberal arts school originally founded for women, recently hosted a sexism teach-in in which the concept of “microaggressions” was discussed, prompting a couple opinion pieces in the school newspaper. Apparently, microaggression has something to do with power, privilege, patriarchy — you get the drift…

From themicroaggression.com FAQ:

> What is a microaggression?
> Microaggressions are the subtle ways in which body and verbal language convey oppressive ideology about power or privilege against marginalized identities…

One student, a young man named Josh Solomon, took issue with the teach-in for squelching free speech. Josh indicates that he supports politically correct causes, but writes in a very apologetic tone that he thinks free speech is also important:

> For me, the Sexism Teach-in—hosted by Vassar’s Feminist Alliance Nov. 3—was an extremely strange event. I completely agree with the sentiment that sexism is a problem on campus and that recent occurrences such as the Davison graffiti are extremely troubling and not acceptable. Yet, after listening to the panel’s articulate discussion of a wide variety of related topics, I felt I had to express a slight dissenting point in a respectful manner. I thought that they had neglected to take into account the importance of free speech in their comments on the power of language. However, my comment was dismissed as trivial by most of the respondents of the panel. Of course language has power, but I don’t think it excuses the silencing of thought that emerges from the strong emphasis on political correctness at Vassar.

In response, a feminist named Alexandra Deane wrote an article titled “Feminists must monitor free speech content.” The article argues that in order to have true free speech, what people say must be closely monitored by feminists so that “marginalized groups” can feel free to say what they want:

> His suggestion that we as a marginalized group stop talking about microaggressions in order to encourage discourse basically means that our discourse is less important than the male discourse, which shouldn’t have to examine itself because “excessive self-regulation…potentially limits campus-wide discussion about controversial topics.”
> An emphasis on political correctness does require people to examine the things that they say and how those words affect other people; it requires us to check our own privilege and encourage people to speak up about their experiences of discrimination so that we can try to build a better community in which no one feels silenced…

Given Josh’s very apologetic – almost whipped – tone in his article, one might wonder how feminists could possibly be considered “marginalized” at Vassar. The short answer is that they are not. Feminism is “mainstream” on campuses across the US, thanks in large part to federal laws such as Title IX. In fact, males are becoming a marginalized minority on campus, particularly in liberal arts schools, and in liberal arts disciplines in general. However, this doesn’t stop feminists from flexing their muscle when and where they can, and doing what they can to force men to shut up.

Of course, they can’t really force men to shut up, but they can give them lower grades, intimidate them with veiled threats, and appeal to authorities by saying they feel “threatened” and the like. When these techniques are used against young, naïve men – mere boys, actually – they are quite effective. Even outspoken young men can easily be cowed by the threat of failure or official disapproval. This is how feminists rule on campus. If they were dealing with grown men who have faced the world and all it throws at them, they wouldn't get far, but they can still boss the boys around.

Vassar is probably worse than your typical school, as it was an all-girls school until 1969. As part of the "Seven Sisters," it was one of the schools where lesbianism was essentially the campus religion in the 90s. But radical feminism is alive and well throughout US colleges, including the Ivy Leagues, state schools, and even religious schools. Yet despite the emphasis on female equality, it appears that women are not actually performing any better in hard science disciplines than they did in the bad old days (although they are better represented in medicine). Instead, they are wasting their time in expensive schools arguing about what people may and may not say.

Perhaps making an effort to educate women really wasn't worth it, after all. If the final result is less freedom on campus, a volatile combination of sexual hysteria and promiscuity, and alienation of the men in our society, what's the point?

Dick Proenneke — Ultimate MGTOW

W.F. Price · 10 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

PBS is doing another fundraiser, and therefore airing the content that people actually like as opposed to the pedantic, offensive stuff that characterizes their ideologically-driven programming. So, as usual, they are showing some of the footage that Dick Proenneke filmed while living alone in Alaska in the late 60s and 70s. They've recently come out with a sequel to the original "Alone in the Wilderness," which features Dick building his cabin at the remote Twin Lakes site, near the root of the Aleutians.

Proenneke was an extraordinarily resourceful man from an era in which men, out of necessity, were generally more resourceful and independent than today. He was formally educated only in trade school, and made his living working as a skilled laborer, first in carpentry, then as a mechanic, a rancher and fisherman.

For some reason, he never settled down to domestic life like the vast majority of men of his generation. Instead, he preferred to live alone in remote corners of the world. Perhaps something happened during the Pacific war, where he contracted a very serious illness, or perhaps some relationship left him with a sour taste in his mouth. There is some evidence for the latter; at one point in the original documentary Proenneke refers to women as fickle and capricious, like the weather in Alaska.

Having decided to live the solitary life, he saved up enough for a modest retirement, and in 1967, at the age of 51, had his friend Babe Allsworth, a bush pilot, fly him and his supplies up to Twin Lakes, where he set about building his cabin and documenting life in Lake Clark National Park.

What's remarkable about Dick Proenneke, and what sets him apart, is that despite his life away from the crowd, he left a treasure behind. Here was a true MGTOW – a man who left it all behind – but he ended up leaving more to posterity than the average family man. His cabin, his photography and his detailed journals provided artistic, scientific and practical material of great value.

Although it isn't for everyone, such a lifestyle is, and has always been, a perfectly honorable option for men. Many of the greatest contributions to humanity have come directly from these types of men, but for some reason, rather than respect men who make the choice to go their own way, society all too often shames them.

However, as the popularity of the documentaries of Dick's life demonstrates, there is something powerfully appealing about what the man did. The real shame isn't that a man decided to make his way alone, but that so few of us will ever know the peace and satisfaction such freedom affords.

Here's a clip from the first documentary:

Fourth Wave Feminism

Jack Donovan · 11 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When Cynthia Cockburn and Ann Oakley wrote about the International Day for the Elimination of Violence Against Women this year, they decided to skip writing about violence against women. Instead, they criticized the "culture of masculinity"—and men, generally—for perpetuating all forms of violence.

Feminists have nursed a perverse obsession with what men think and do for decades. They've had to, because the success of the feminist program has always been completely dependent on what bell hooks called "the will to change." The female strategy has always been to nag and manipulate until men stop doing what men want to do and start doing what women want them to do. Men caving and giving women what they want is as natural as salmon swimming upstream. It's painful to watch but almost everyone does it eventually.

Industrialization, birth control, globalism and a First World shift to managerial and service economies allowed women to push past old boundaries and upend the balance between the sexes.

First Wave Feminists marched for the vote and property rights. Feminists love marches, walks, and long candlelight vigils on the beach. Second Wave Feminists shouted "I am Woman" and stomped around for more exciting employment opportunities and the Gaia-given right to kill their babies. Third Wave feminists stripped off the polyester pantsuits of yesteryear, got painted up like trash and went genderqueer.

Forth Wave feminism, already well underway, is a female coalitionary effort to control male behavior through public policy while wielding the threat of state-sponsored violence.

Feminists have long dreamed of a gender-neutral world of peaceful security, pleasure and plenty. For years, they held to the idea that men and women were essentially the same and that traditional ideas about gender were as "lightly linked to sex as are the clothing, the manners, and the form of head-dress that a society at a given period assigns to either sex." Patriarchal male culture could be blamed for all of the evil in the world, and our ancestors were all peaceful goddess-worshipping pansies.

Now that St. Margaret Mead has been all but discredited, only pink-haired stoners believe in peaceful prehistory, and "SCIENCE" keeps validating both tradition and common sense, feminist gender theory has run aground on the rocky shores of reality and punctured the hull of her Big-Boned Barbie cruise ship.

Feminists have needed to change directions to stay afloat, so they have slowly been conceding that men and women are, in fact, different. Today's feminists brag about the things women do better than men. The traveling sisterhood of the New Girl Order is proud that women have the kinds of traits that 21st century employers say they want.

Cynthia Cockburn and Ann Oakley want to you to understand that women are more peaceful than men, and men are more violent than women.

Men aren't always content to march with candles; men are more likely to riot and loot. Oakley and Cockburn noted that 92% of the UK rioters this summer were male, and all of the rioters charged with violent offences were male. Cockburn and colleague then reported that men were responsible for 87% of traffic offences and 81% of speeding offenses. Citing prison statistics, they suggested that if men committed crimes leading to custodial sentences at the rate women did, their nation could save about £3.4 billion every year.

Cockburn and Oakley concluded with some conflicting commentary about testosterone and violence.

First, Cockburn and Oakley explained that, according to SCIENCE, testosterone is associated with status-seeking, but not necessarily with violence.

I've read the same studies and this may in fact be true. They failed to address the logical progression of status competition. As I've written, violence is golden because while it may not be the only way to resolve a given conflict, it is a definitive way to resolve a conflict. Violence beckons from the end of a path of escalation. You can beat me at checkers 30 times in a row, but somewhere in my frustrated gut I know that if I stand up and shoot you in the face, I win. Game over. Violence is "the nuclear option."

Violence is not merely a criminal or "anti-social" action. The use of force against criminals is merely the violence of the many against the one, disguised by the pretense of "justice."

The same logic of escalation plays out in state vs. citizen conflicts. Even the most soft-spoken regime must carry a big stick. For instance, a gay liberal mayor can ask some protesters nicely again and again to stop camping in the park, but if they refuse again and again, eventually some kind of physical action—however "non lethal"—will be required to restore order. Likewise, if kids are going to sit in the road and block traffic, eventually you have to break out the pepper spray and "negotiate" more aggressively.

There may be more chemical links between maleness and violence, but since Cockburn and Oakley are willing to accept that testosterone increases status competition, one could simply say that:

Male violence is the continuation of status competition by other means. (h/t Clausewitz)

After saying that testosterone doesn't have to increase violence, for good measure Cockburn and Oakley suggest ways that male testosterone can be influenced.

Here's the whole quote:

Testosterone, the male hormone, the "metaphor of manhood", is portrayed as driving men inexorably towards aggressive behaviour. Yet studies show that testosterone is related to status-seeking but not directly to aggression. Many other factors are influential. Testosterone levels are increased or diminished in both males and females by diet, activity and circumstance. The opportunity to interact with guns, for instance, appears to increase testosterone, while men's testosterone levels fall when they are involved with the care of children.

The case we are making is that certain widespread masculine traits and behaviours are dangerous and costly both to individuals and society. They are amenable to purposeful change. The culture of masculinity can be, and should be, addressed as a policy issue.

Some researchers believe that the average man's testosterone level has plummeted over the past 20 years. According to the MAYO clinic, normal testosterone levels help men maintain healthy bone density, fat distribution, muscle strength and mass, red blood cell production, sex drive and sperm produc tion. Testosterone can be increased naturally through weight training, and while most men experience a gradual decline in testosterone after age thirty, evidence suggests that weight training can help men can keep their levels higher for longer and possibly stave off some of the negative effects of aging. Unusually low testosterone levels in men are associated with coronary artery disease, aortic atherosclerosis, metabolic syndrome, obesity, diabetes, and depression.

Policy initiatives aimed at pacifying men by lowering male testosterone are a kindler, gentler alternative to castration, with the same net effect. Men will have lower sex drives, lower sperm counts, and they will more often be fat, depressed and diabetic. Feminist dreams of sleek, gender-neutral utopias will inevitably lead to more doughy bonobos and chunky Chaz Bonos playing out their endless manic-depressive melodramas in a big bean-flicking circle of sterility, sickness and desperation.

As far as I can tell, we're half way there already.

It is true that Cockburn and Oakley did not state outright that male testosterone should be reduced as a matter of public policy. After addressing sex differences and testosterone, Cockburn and comrade slid back to the safety of Second and Third Wave feminism and recycled, blank slate rhetoric about changing the "culture of masculinity."

However, if feminists recommend policy-based cultural and behavioral changes that lead to reduced testosterone, they achieve the same sickening, emasculating end. Fourth Wave feminism is about wielding the principal's paddle—state power—as women attempt to mother males into helpless and obedient second class women. The feminists of the 1970s made moralistic arguments and pleaded for fairness and equality, but as women came to power their impatience with maleness and the reality of sex differences was evident.

The changes Cockburn and Oakley seem to recommend have already been made. The average man in the UK is not armed, and has probably never fired a handgun. In America, any hint of male interest in violence is frowned upon in the classroom. Christina Hoff Sommers brought an institutionalized anti-male bias in education to national attention over a decade ago, but little has changed. Males who show what in Mark Twain's day would have been seen as a normal interest in fighting and combat are recommended for counseling or flagged as problem children. Boys with high energy are routinely diagnosed with "ADHD" and drugged. 8 year-old boys are suspended from school for possessing 4-inch toy guns made for action figures. A 7-year old was recently accused of sexual harassment for kicking a bully in the nuts. Professional feminists like Cockburn and Oakley are paid to advise schools and speak to young people about sexism and sexual harassment. Public and private universities run "My Strength is Not For Hurting" campaigns and seminars. Feminist Jackson Katz is even paid to teach the freaking Marines about "toxic masculinity."

If men already have far lower average testosterone levels than they did a few decades ago, and males still act like males, how much more enforced cultural retraining will be necessary for feminists to be satisfied?

In light of obvious and persistent differences between the sexes, will feminists simply give up on their dream of a gender neutral world, and work towards a cultural harmony of the sexes instead of an artificially imposed "equality" of apples and oranges?

Not likely.

If men and women are different, the new feminism will simply conclude that men must be "fixed."

For feminists, the answer to any problem with feminism is always more feminism.

Nightmare Mother-in-Law Shoots Man in Custody Dispute

W.F. Price · 13 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Although typically the butt of jokes and a source of sitcom comedy, mothers-in-law can cause real problems for their children's spouses, and these problems aren't always a laughing matter. They can wreck marriages by undermining their daughters' confidence in their husbands, spreading gossip, belittling spouses, behaving in an abusive manner toward sons' wives, etc. In traditional society, the potential for damage was clearly recognized, and malicious behavior was kept in check by religious indoctrination and guidance from moral authorities. However, now that we've thrown tradition aside, a number of older women are acting on their worst instincts and contributing to the problems that beset the modern family.

However, Cheryl Hepner, a 66-year-old Florida woman, stands out as particularly vicious. Not only did she get involved in her daughter's custody dispute, she brazenly tried to murder her son in law when he showed up to pick up his child. Brandishing a Beretta, she fired three shots at Salvatore Miglino, striking him twice. Fortunately, the pistol was only a .22 caliber, and he was not hit in the head.

Mr. Miglino, who knew there might be some trouble, recorded the shooting with his iPhone, which may have saved him from being arrested himself. Immediately following the shooting, Hepner called the police and claimed that he had tried to shoot her. The contrast between her voice while yelling at him after the shooting and her tone with the 911 operator is instructive (the 911 calls can be heard at the original article).

The following video shows the shooting itself:

Men who have never been through a divorce should pay close attention to this story. A mother-in-law who has been pleasant and apparently helpful during a marriage can quickly become a formidable enemy, especially when children are involved. In the old days, in-laws were prevented from involvement in divorce due to the disgrace divorce brought to the family, but that sense of shame has vanished, and now they will often deliberately turn a divorce into clan warfare.

Cheryl Hepner is an extreme example, but not as far from the norm as one might think. Although in-laws usually refrain from outright brutality, they will often resort to very nasty tactics in an effort to destroy the husbands their daughters have decided to dump.

Women Surpassing Men, Poor Women Suffering For It

W.F. Price · 14 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for the NY Times, Luisa Lopez Torregorosa points to statistics that show the ascent of women relative to men, which is evidently now called "the reverse gender gap." Women are better-educated, better-paid, have better jobs, etc. (we've heard it all before). Of course, this is all great (go team woman!), but there's still a problem: the poor ladies are having a hard time dating.

According to the article, some women have taken to lying about their jobs to attract men:

> This reversal of roles, evolving over the past decade or so, too often comes with a certain stigma. "Many couples are perfectly content and well adjusted, but for the stigmatizing opposition of friends, family, in-laws and even religious traditions," said Liza Mundy, a fellow at the New America Foundation and author of a new book, "The Richer Sex: How the New Majority of Female Breadwinners Is Transforming Sex, Love and Family," due out in March.
> The stigma, sometimes subtle, sometimes blatant, undermines relationships between high-earning women and the husbands or boyfriends who are secondary earners or "househusbands," and it is playing havoc with the dating game, Ms. Mundy told me.
> She met high-achieving women who, afraid to put men off, devise strategies to play down their affluence. One woman carries small bills to pay for tips, drinks, parking and other dating expenses rather than whipping out her high-limit credit card.
> "Some of these women had learned the hard way that when they went to bars, they were better off lying about what they did — saying that they were a cosmetologist or music teacher rather than a software consultant or lawyer," Ms. Mundy said.

Other women are forced to "marry down:"

> Faced with a shrinking pool of men on their level, some young women are settling and marrying "down," but others will jump on planes for "dating excursions" to cities like New York, San Francisco and Boston where the male market is more promising.
> What is to come out of this new world? "I think women are going to have to abandon the traditional 50-50 everything-must-be-equal feminist mind-set," Ms. Mundy said, "and learn to value husbands and partners who are becoming more domesticated and supportive."

And after the women have consolidated their careers, Prince Charming is out of the picture:

> "As women have climbed ever higher, men have been falling behind," she said in an article, "What, Me Marry?," in the November issue of The Atlantic. "We've arrived at the top of the staircase, finally ready to start our lives, only to discover a cavernous room at the tail end of the party, most of the men gone already, some having never shown up — and those who remain are leering by the cheese table, or are, you know, the ones you don't want to go out with."

Oh, the horror… Women got what they wanted, how dare men allow this to happen!

One can only imagine millions of women diligently obtaining degrees in communications, marketing, etc., all believing that after they slept their way into a high-paying job some handsome, independently wealthy man would choose them for a bride. At this point, it's increasingly difficult to feel sorry for them, but from a female perspective this does pose a real problem.

The problem, of course, is that “settling” always makes women miserable, and these girls have no other choice. For the corporate, careerist types, it’s especially problematic, because they have been trained to equate status to earnings and job title, and the kinds of guys who have status but less money (e.g. professors, classical musicians, some artists, junior officers) generally won’t touch them with a barge pole. The high-status males in their own milieu have access to sweeter types who work in childcare and the like — far more attractive women they can’t hope to compete with.

The article ends on an equivocal note:

> Ms. Bolick laid it out, saying, “If, in all sectors of society, women are on the ascent, and if gender parity is actually within reach, this means that a marriage regime based on men’s overwhelming economic dominance may be passing into extinction.”
> A cause to rejoice? Only future years will tell.

Marriage has never really been based simply on men’s “overwhelming economic dominance.” As long as men were economically dominant (a period that only lasted a few generations in any event) they were not allowed to divorce without very stiff penalties. However, marriage has always been based on male dominance in general, because it is the only setup in which women feel secure, happy and content to stay with their men. As soon as women are made dominant – or even equal – in their marriages, marriage self-destructs.

As the awful truth about human nature begins to reveal itself, an entire generation of women find themselves crying into their chablis as the credits of the latest episode of Mad Men roll by. It is becoming apparent that what we are witnessing is not so much “The End of Men” as it is the desolation of the feminist dream.

“Beeswax”

Featured Guest · 15 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Not mine to know, thank you!

By Ken Knight

Remember the old schoolyard remark: “None of your beeswax!” when some kid asks another about something personal? (maybe it was just a 1970s saying haha). Anyhow, I think this is a good word that makes my point here about the familiar yarn between men regarding the women in their personal lives or (assumed) lack thereof! How many times have you heard brothers comment about another guy’s gal or lack of a gal and/or confront another man about whether or not he’s dating Susie Sucksalot? You know what I’m getting at here: that often-shaming ribbing between guys about whether or not the other is “getting any”. I’ve been guilty of it myself in the past, teasing a pal about him not having dates or bugging some other single friend about who he is screwing or not screwing. Of course married men are exempt from this kind of social one-upmanship because they’re assumed to be “getting it” at home with the wife or as in most cases ~ married men are no longer allowed to hang around their single comrades once their brides place them in “lock-down”. I was wrong back then and recognize it now as a social habit of “shaming” other men about their personal lives by chiding them into chasing women who are likely to be trouble. The solution to this old habit of teasing buddies about their personal life?

Simple: just mark it up as “none of my friggin’ business” when it comes to the dating habits of buddies and male accomplices. Nowadays if my friends want to mention their personal dating lives I’ll listen but I won’t goad them into making foolish mistakes getting hooked by the wrong women who later ruin them (unwanted children, divorce).

There are two things a man should never…and I repeat…NEVER assist another man with no matter what: 1) choosing a career 2) getting a woman.

Both of these are the end-all recipe of disaster and usually ruin the friendship post haste.

Some things in life should irrevocably remain behind the wall of none-of-my-business for obvious reasons, with the business of friends and their sex lives being one of them!

Why should I care who my buddies are screwing (unless it’s my girlfriend! haha) and why the hell should I have the slightest damn thought as to why a buddy, partner, cousin, or friend is not frivolously getting laid out there in Suckersville USA?
A friend of mine remarked the other day about the grocery clerk we paid when we did a beer-run for a party that night (the clerk was rail-thin at about age 30, braces on his teeth and a revenge-of-the-nerds look about him) laughing “I bet you that guy never gets any!”

The comment made me wonder how many young men have fallen into horrible goddamn relationships just because they don’t want other men seeing them as “not getting any”??

I told my cohort that the geek in the grocery store might not have “getting laid” as a priority in his life but he still prattled on about how “guys like that don’t get any”.

Yeah, that means a lot coming from a guy who has been divorced three times and uses Match.com as often as an old lady uses suppositories. Shaming other guys into “getting some” (no matter the female they may end up with!) is what they refer to in the US Army as being a “buddy-f*cker”. So how is this phenomenon avoided in the best kind of way?

By not giving one squirt of piss who other guys are going horizontal with (or without).

Next Steps for The Spearhead

W.F. Price · 15 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Now that I've finally finished up the latest (and hopefully last for a while — these things never end) round of my custody saga, it's time to get on with things, so I thought I should let readers and potential contributors know what's in store.

By now, The Spearhead has become well established online. As long as posting remains consistent, daily visitors run in the mid 3000s range, and RSS subscribers around 2,000. Page views are directly tied to the amount of content on any given day, and articles have reach that goes significantly beyond the site and occasionally influence larger, mainstream sites. Given the stability The Spearhead has achieved, I think it's an institution worth keeping.

However, that doesn't mean it can be neglected; it is a content-driven site that needs fresh material on a regular basis. So, having signed off on a new parenting plan last week and ended the recent uncertainty over my custody arrangement, which will allow me a great deal more time for editing work, I'd like to once again start putting effort into bringing new content to the site.

The Spearhead was founded to be an open platform for ideas, opinions and thoughts that are not commonly voiced in the mainstream. Aside from the focus on men's issues and interests, it did not have a strict agenda or ideology — the point was to give men the opportunity to be heard. Conflicting points of view were perfectly acceptable, and with few exceptions were published.

This has bothered some people, who were frustrated that the site did not have a particular line or narrower focus, but from the beginning I've seen it as my job to provide readers not with indoctrination, or even ideological guidance, but rather engaging content. The value in the site is not in forging a consensus or political movement so much as in that it provides food for thought — mental fuel so to speak. Those who take issue with any particular article are always invited to write a cogent, civil response. I believe that progress is best made through dialogue and the open comparison of ideas.

The site succeeded in this effort for quite a while, but editing can be painstaking and time-consuming, and over the past months I've spent much of my time and effort drafting and editing court documents, negotiating and dealing with attorneys. Fortunately, this process is finally over, and now it's time to start bringing more new content online again.

Thanks to previous effort, The Spearhead has a significant web presence now, and we won't have to start from scratch, as in the beginning. Aspiring authors have a guaranteed daily audience in the thousands, and contributors with their own blogs can make a name for themselves and draw readers to their own sites with articles here. And, in addition to readers, the site offers editorial assistance and a significant SEO advantage.

So I'd like to invite more submissions and new contributors to enrich our content and provide readers with more thought-provoking material. The Spearhead offers a platform, and I can now provide much more assistance with editing and formatting (which often makes a crucial difference). If traffic stats are any indication, any renewed effort can only increase the site's stature and lead to more readers, so I'm perfectly willing to put the work into it.

In the meanwhile, I'll trim the list of contributors to streamline workflow, and start reviewing new submissions. Anyone interested in contributing may contact me and I will provide details and guidelines. I'm looking forward to getting the ball rolling again, and taking the site to new heights, starting immediately.

Christopher Hitchens Dead at 62

W.F. Price · 16 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The pugnacious British author, scholar and atheist finally succumbed to cancer Friday, dying at the University of Texas MD Anderson Cancer Center in Houston.

Hitchens was a man who was not afraid to make his views known, and he fought tenaciously on behalf of his favored causes as well as against those he deplored. Despite (or perhaps due to) being an atheist, he was passionate in his beliefs, and supported them with a missionary zeal.

Although Hitchens had a tendency to ruffle feathers, his intellectual power and outspoken, engaging style won him many admirers. He tended to focus his most scathing attacks on fundamentalists of various religions, but no dogma was immune to his criticism, and nothing holy.

The following video is an amusing example of Hitchens at his irreverent best, arguing that women aren't very funny:

I do not by any means agree with all Christopher Hitchens has said and written over the years, but that's never stopped me from reading one of his articles or watching him argue his point on TV. There's something about a man who takes on all comers and stands his ground that is worthy of respect and admiration — especially when he does so with such skill.

Additionally, and although it may be something of a cultural conceit, I like to think that Hitchens embodied the true spirit of our Anglo-American civilization. He was never afraid to speak his mind, he was a fierce defender of liberty, and he knelt before no man.

Famous Pearl Harbor Female Firefighter Photo a Fraud

Having adopted the tactics of Communist regimes, well-known for fake propaganda, retouched photos and outright lies, feminists and their progressive allies have been caught slipping misleading photos into history books in an effort to portray women as heroic in the face of battle and mayhem.

The above photo, suitably multicultural with a touch of the lesbian aesthetic, is an example of how feminists like to see themselves: taking charge, wearing work clothes, bravely looking forward and up, and straining together with her sisters, turgid, gushing hose in hand. Supposedly, the girls were fighting fires set off by Japanese bombs, braving enemy attacks in a stalwart effort to stanch the fires of imperialist aggression.

However, it seems the photo was simply taken at a training exercise, and had nothing to do with the attack on Pearl Harbor. The women were workers at a pineapple factory, and they were training with equipment in case of a warehouse fire.

If you rub off the feminist sheen and look at the picture for what it is, it's actually a pretty good photo. Just a few Hawaiian girls on the job, perhaps having a bit of fun (The hefty one on the right – Hilda Van Gieson – may be having a little too much fun), doing some routine training in case they have to cover for young men sent off to war.

Turns out one of the girls in the photo, Katherine Lowe, is still alive. She's the second from right in the photo, and looks to be enjoying herself. According to Katherine, who is now 96 years old, the girls were having a good time, and horsed around while practicing, sometimes spraying each other with the hoses. Mrs. Lowe insists that she was not fighting fires at Pearl Harbor, but rather attending a church service when the attack happened.

Many will probably say it was simply a mistake, but there is a pattern here, and mistakes don't happen nearly as consistently as feminists lie. In fact, feminists have relied on lies from the beginning. Famous feminist/Marxist anthropologist Margaret Meade, for example, told countless whoppers about the poor, simple Pacific islanders who had the misfortune to host her. After she was done with these defenseless people, the world thought they behaved like bonobo chimpanzees.

After one has been exposed to enough of these lies they are easy enough to identify, but the problem is that they are often inserted into textbooks specifically to influence young, impressionable minds. My generation in particular (those of us born in the 1970s) was subject to an immense amount of false propaganda about absolute gender equality, and as I look around at the women my age the unfortunate results are obvious: the weaker minded sorts ended up as single mothers, while the more competent ones took on a masculine lifestyle and are often childless careerists.

Misleading children in an attempt to advance one's political cause is questionable at best, and has the potential to do long-term damage. These are not white lies, but rather have consequences, and those who perpetuate them are doing us all a disservice.

The Expat Test

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 17 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In this part of the internet there are many traditionalists and others who attack the idea of going ghost and try to promote marriage. They will repeatedly say that they are "defending marriage". For those of us who know the score about marriage 2.0 and how marriage 1.0 is already dead in Western countries, these "defenders of marriage" are either intentionally or unintentionally pushing men into the feminist institution of marriage 2.0. Many of these "defenders of marriage" will claim that they are just trying to protect "traditional marriage" (i.e. marriage 1.0) from those who are trying to "destroy marriage" (which typically means MRAs to them, even though MRAs aren't trying to "destroy marriage," but warn men of the dangers of marriage 2.0). How do we know whether these "defenders of marriage" are legitimate in their defense of marriage, or are just trying to force men to submit to a conservative/traditional form of feminism? The answer is the expat test.

In these arguments for and against marriage, the debate is presented as getting married vs. not getting married. This is an inaccurate way to frame how men are dealing with the current situation regarding marriage. There are more than just those two answers — there are actually three options:

1. Get married in a marriage 2.0 (feminist) country
2. Get married in a marriage 1.0 country (which by definition involves expating, because bringing a woman to a marriage 2.0 country ends up being option 1)
3. Don't get married whether you expat or not

Anyone who claims to defend "traditional marriage" should love option 2. They should love the idea of a man making sure that he gets a traditional marriage by expating to a marriage 1.0 county. It shouldn't matter to them where a traditional marriage happens as long as it happens. This objectively does more to preserve "traditional marriage" – by any definition that the "defenders of marriage" would use – than getting married in a marriage 2.0 country, which does nothing to preserve traditional marriage.

If you confront "defenders of marriage" with the expat test, what will their response be? Typically, they will be against the idea of a man expating to another country to enjoy a traditional marriage. They will come up with all sorts of nonsense to argue against expating to contract a marriage 1.0 arrangement. The arguments range from culture to, in extreme cases, white nationalism/racial obligations. In other words, in nearly all cases, a "defender of marriage" will fail the expat test, proving that their real goal has nothing to do with "traditional marriage;" instead, it is about placating the women in their churches and producing more babies. Their push for marriage is really about white knighting for women and/or their fear that their group or race is not having enough babies.

If you're reading this, it's likely none of this is is new to you. However, the expat test still has value because it can be used as a tool to prove objectively that nearly all "defenders of marriage" aren't actually defending marriage, but have other goals, none of which take men's interests into consideration.

Passing the Hat

Another quarter has rolled by, and once again the bills are coming in. Running The Spearhead is a labor of love, but it incurs expenses in both time and money, and I am not in a position to support the site without help from readers. Advertising revenue helps, but due to the politically sensitive nature of our content, it is difficult to rely on the standard sources, such as Google Adsense, which pulled the plug over a year ago.

As I pointed out in the "Next Steps" piece a couple days ago, the site has stabilized and has a solid reader base in the thousands. With almost 1,700 articles published, it has become an online institution, and has significantly influenced the debate on feminism and gender issues. In just the last couple years, we have helped smash a number of taboos and given more and more people the courage to stand up to and challenge politically correct dictates. Some of our articles have had a lasting impact and remain widely read long after they were published.

It is deeply satisfying to see how so many people's eyes have been opened by our commitment to disseminating the truth. For too long, unconscionable abuses have been swept under the rug, but people are finally starting to recognize that men are human beings, fathers mean more than a monthly check, and even men who have been accused of crimes by women have civil rights. The changes are subtle from day to day, but in looking back over a few short years they are obvious.

I am committed to keeping the site going as long as it has loyal readers and a purpose, but I'll need your help. Compared to feminist sites of similar size and reach, many of which are supported by corporate foundations and government grants, The Spearhead runs on a very small budget. In fact, it's pretty amazing how much it's achieved with so few resources, and this speaks to the power and truth of our message. Every donation goes a long way here. For example, when I first made a call for support two years ago, I was at a real crossroads, and the support the site received is what convinced me to stick with it and build it to what it is today. I can't thank the generous people who have helped out enough, but I can promise to stick with it and keep writing, publishing and promoting content that defends our interests.

One thing I've learned running this site is that we are in this together, and that's a great source of faith in mankind — I've become a great deal more optimistic about what we can accomplish.

Thanks to our authors, readers and benefactors, The Spearhead has done an admirable job over its two years of existence.

Gender Violence Campaigns Violate Men's Rights

Featured Guest · 19 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

by Alphabeta Supe

Gender violence campaigns like White Ribbon Day and the 16 Days of Activism Against Gender Violence by the Centre for Global Womens Leadership are two examples of campaigns that attempt to shame men into acknowledging that they're all violent criminals by the fact of their birth. Like Josh Jasper's baby ad campaign and Verizon's recent Monster campaign, they present ideas in such a way that provide men with no other response but those society is already primed to see as disingenuous. This view blinds society to the fact that men are also victims of violence and that perpetrators are just as often women. It's frustrating that no matter how easily and how often this fraud is exposed, most women prefer to keep their delusion.

In Australia, according to the organisers of White Ribbon Day, the data source behind the campaign is the Australian Bureau of Statistics in their Personal Safety Survey 2005 (reissued 2006), which states that 39.9% of women over 15 have experienced at least one incidence of violence in their lifetime. It is supported by an Australian Institute of Criminology national survey (Mouzos and Makkai, 2004). These studies are publicly available here and here.

When one studies these documents, however, it becomes clear very quickly that the statistic is part of a broader picture about violence in which men are the greater victims. One can't blame female victims for ignoring the forest for the trees in the aftermath of a traumatic experience but organisers of campaigns have no excuse. Using these statistics only in reference to women makes it easy to forget that violence affects everyone, especially men. It's also easy to forget that women are violent too, and often excessively. This social blindness makes it easy for feminist ideologues to emotionally manipulate the public, which is exactly what the gender violence campaigns are intended to do.

The feminist narrative is loaded with all kinds of discussion-ending, ironclad "arguments" that use cherry-picked statistics that "prove" men are solely at fault. This makes it easy to justify wildly disproportionate public funding for women's programs at the expense of that for men in all areas of public spending. Disturbingly, it also allows feminist ideologues to press forward with man-hating legislation such as the Australian Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Bill 2011 which seems to endorse the idea that all men are guilty of violence merely if a woman fears it.

Let's look more closely at the ABS report:

> "An estimated 35% (5,275,400) of men and women have experienced physical assault since the age of 15."

In other words, one-in-three people (men and women) experience violence in their lifetimes.

> "In the 12 months prior to the survey, there were an estimated 443,800 (5.8%) women who experienced an incident of violence compared to 808,300 (11%) men."

In other words, twice as many men than women experienced violence in the previous 12 months.

> "Since the age of 15, there were an estimated 3,065,800 (39.9%) women who experienced violence compared with 3,744,900 (50.1%) men."

In other words, more men than women experience violence. This is no doubt a primary source of violent behaviour in men, yet there are no mainstream anti-violence programs aimed at helping male victims. Public spending on anti-violence programs for women is an order of magnitude higher than those for men in most western countries.

> "29% (2,243,600) of women experienced physical assault compared to 41% (3,031,800) of men."

Yet violence against women is increasingly labelled a crisis, while violence against men is increasingly mocked – e.g. "man up", "don't be a wuss" etc.

> "11% (833,200) of women experienced physical threat compared to 22% (1,675,300) of men."

In other words, more men than women face violence, yet a man is expected to simply deal with it or face ridicule and revulsion, while a woman's mere fear of violence is sufficient for the Family Court to undermine the very foundations of a civilised justice system (the presumption of innocence for men accused of violence).

> "17% (1,293,100) of women experienced sexual assault compared to 4.8% (362,400) of men."

> "4.6% (353,700) of women experienced sexual threat compared to 0.9% (69,500) of men."

> "Since the age of 15, 5.5% (408,100) of men reported experiencing sexual violence compared to 19% (1,469,500) of women."

One-in-five women and one-in-twenty men experience sexual violence or threat in their lifetimes. Clearly, sexual assualt centres for women are necessary, yet there are twenty times as many government subsidised centres for women as there are for men despite the fact that men are sexually assaulted only four times less.
The second source (Mouzos/Makkai, 2004) used by the White Ribbon people is more sociological in nature, but the figure it cites – i.e. that 57% of women suffer abuse in their lifetime, is too broad to apply only to violence and is clearly stated as an inference only. There also appears to be no evidence that the population samples used in the analysis were independent or unbiased. This information must therefore be treated with caution.

The conclusions I draw from this very brief analysis are threefold:

1. There is nothing to suggest women are special victims of violence, although sexual violence is four times more likely to be against women than men. The opposite is, in fact, true – men are victims of violence in greater numbers than women, and more often.

2. Men are severely neglected in all areas of public discussion and spending when it comes to violence, sexual or otherwise. While there are a few agencies that help men who have been assaulted in terms of legal recourse, there are very few programs that adequately assist men psychologically and emotionally. There are no government programs in Australia to assist men who have been raped. NB. The average man is no better equipped to deal with violence than the average woman – the feelings of anger, fear, neglect, low self-esteem and acute sense of social injustice are the same, possibly more since society tends to feel revulsion towards victimised men.

Read about how rape affects men here.

3. Violence is not just a women's issue nor can it be said to just be caused by men. The feminist narrative avoids describing the extent to which female victims of violence might have initiated, contributed to, or exacerbated it. Feminists encourage such misnomers as "victim shaming" in an attempt to discredit any evidence that might point to a woman's guilt, while disavowing any responsibility by the woman, exhorting even when such evidence is irrefutable that "a man must have made her do it".

Read a list of 275 scholarly articles that indicate violence is committed as often, if not more, by women than men, here.

The Myth of Equal Suffering

When someone is talking about mens' rights issues or anything that only affects or disproportionately affects men, a common response is some derivative of "women have it just as bad." This response will be used no matter how absurd it is when applied to the issue or issues being discussed. For example, if an MRA is discussing what happens to men during and after divorce, someone will respond that women suffer just as much from divorce. Obviously, this is not the case, because women wouldn't disproportionately initiate divorce proceedings otherwise. What these people are doing is promoting a myth of equal suffering.

Why do we have a myth of equal suffering? It is because feminists – and even many anti-feminists (who are really anti-feminist in name only, or AFINOs) – don't want to admit that there are certain issues (such as divorce) where men bear the overwhelming brunt of the negative impact. Feminists will use this myth in an attempt to shut down any effort to show that their policies and actions are attacking men. AFINOs will also use the myth to hide the fact that women who don't claim to be feminists are still benefiting from feminism. For them, it's an attempt to pretend that the benefits of feminism are going to some far away group of feminist women instead of both feminist women and AFINO women. This can be seen with divorce where women who don't claim to be feminists divorce as often as self-admitted feminist women do. It can also be seen when someone says, "But feminism hurts women too".

The myth of equal suffering is not used in the opposite direction. If something were to disproportionately affect women, these people will not talk about how men are suffering just as much from the same problem. This is because the true purpose of the myth of equal suffering is not to demonstrate that men and women suffer equally: it is to diminish problems experienced by men so that women can be shown to be suffering more. This serves the purpose of adding more power to women via victimhood. It is similar to how feminism in general claims to support equality when in reality it is promoting an agenda of female supremacism.

Firing On All Cylinders

Featured Guest · 20 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Nemo

"Firing on all cylinders" is a metaphor of the machine age that means that everything is working at its optimum capacity. It refers to the cylinders of an internal combustion engine in a gasoline-powered automobile, which provide maximum power when all of them are firing in perfect synchronization. This requires the vehicle to be well-maintained and finely tuned to near perfection.
It has been observed that most great scientists, who are almost exclusively men, make their greatest discoveries when they are unmarried and in romantic relationships with young women. There seems to be something about young love that simultaneously energizes a man's creativity and relaxes his anxieties. He then can focus his mind almost exclusively upon his work, for his body and his spirit are at ease. He labors to experience the joy of creation and wastes no thought upon the avoidance of pain.

This phenomenon is not unique to science. The ancient Greeks went so far as to deify ideal young women in the nine Muses of antiquity, who were held to inspire men and women to create in the fields of poetry, history, astronomy, song, dance, and drama.

Older and wiser cultures once exerted pressure upon young women to marry young men with promising talents in useful fields of human endeavor. Wealth was often more desirable than talent, but a young man with "prospects" was often a close second to a young "man of leisure" in the esteem of society. It was assumed that his success would create enough wealth to satisfy the needs of his bride. Even a casual survey of Victorian literature reveals this as a recurrent theme.

Sadly, this ancient wisdom has been discarded by modern society. Today women are "empowered" to choose their own mates as soon as they reach legal adulthood. In practice, it's next to impossible to rein them in after they reach puberty. By and large, they choose the young men with the highest status in adolescent subculture rather than adult society.

Athletes, movie actors, rap artists, and above all else "bad boys" are desired by young women. Poets, historians, astronomers, and playwrights are not even on the radar of the modern young lady. Engineers and computer geeks are actively avoided. Purely rational men of science and technology have the same level of appeal to nubile women that garlic has to vampires. Emotional and unstable men have "passion" and are a hot commodity among women who have no constraints upon their own desires. Like seeks like.

As a result, we have a chronic shortage of muses. Young men who are inclined to be an asset to society rather than a liability are, by and large, shunned at precisely the age when they should be making their greatest discoveries. Albert Einstein was 26 when he invented the theory of special relativity. Can anyone imagine a hip young urban lady in modern America dating a patent clerk with bright ideas?

At the same time that we have a shortage of muses, we have a superabundance of banshees. Some women who are nearing their reproductive expiration date will hold their noses long enough to marry a rational man, but only if there's enough money in it. Few of these marriages are happy or durable, because women who crave passion and have sampled it from dozens of men are rarely content to settle down and stay faithful to one boring, tediously logical man. Some will fake it just long enough to become "fully vested" and cash out in a divorce with the maximum alimony and child support.

In the meantime, life for their husbands is fraught with strife and turmoil. Almost every man has, at some point, put in a bad day's work because a woman has added stress and strain to his psyche that exceeds even the most stoic man's limits of endurance. On a personal note, I once donated blood a few hours after an argument with a female and was shocked to discover that my pulse was still racing at 100 beats a minute rather than the usual range of 56 to 84. Men who are badly stressed before they arrive at work are poorer performers. They also age faster – most married men turn gray years before their bachelor counterparts.

There is a price to be paid for this. Innovation seems to be slowing in most fields of science and technology, and the West is slipping backwards in some areas. The “Next Big Thing” seems elusive, and the current candidates are a scrawny lot. Facebook is valued at twice the market capitalization of Boeing, which appears to violate common sense and is an indication of the distortion of not only our financial values but also our societal norms. NASA needs to bum rides from the Russians to get astronauts into orbit. We are even having trouble maintaining existing technology, such as the electrical grid that is the skeleton of the information age.

Failure to inspire the creativity of our young men, which is the prime impetus for progress in a technological society, causes our entire civilization to fail to fire on all cylinders. Economic malaise leads to social crises and civil unrest. Other nations such as China seem to have their act together better than Europe and America, and we are falling behind them in a relative sense and may soon fall behind them in an absolute sense. Their economies and societies are firing on all cylinders and catching up to us. In ten or fifteen years, the West may be passed by as our engines of innovation and growth sputter and blow clouds of smoke.

Perhaps, someday, a generation of women will be re-taught the ancient wisdom of the Greeks and the more modern customs of the Victorians and rediscover the charming attributes that elevate a mere female into a celestial muse. Until then, our young men will be forced to endure the scorn of the banshees and must persevere to advance society in spite of the opposite sex rather than in the cause of our womenfolk.

North Korea and Dynastic Decline

Now that Kim Jong-il is dead and his son installed on the throne, we have the third generation of the hermit kingdom's Juche-inspired dynasty to deal with. I knew some North Koreans in China, and saw first-hand what the regime did to its people. North Korean refugees of about my age and younger were much shorter than they should have been. North Koreans are ordinarily quite tall for Asians, but many of the young men and women I saw working in Beijing's Korean restaurants as servers were severely stunted from malnutrition during adolescence (Beijing has the largest population of Koreans outside of Korea, and many North Korean refugees go there to find work). Hopefully the regime will pay for its crimes some day, but now that the Kims have nukes we may have to wait a while for that.

Nevertheless, the Kim family provides us with a modern example of how hereditary rulers tend to decline over the generations. Typically, the founder is a very energetic, masculine warlord who comes as a conqueror, sword in hand. As his reward, he has his choice of the most feminine, beautiful ladies of the land, but usually has the sense to breed an heir with a woman of some substance. If all goes well, the successor is a responsible type who is content to follow in his father's footsteps and complete his father's work. However, the corrupting influence of power starts its work immediately, and the young heir grows up accustomed to beautiful women, fine food, liquor and all the other trappings of wealth and power.

He has children with a delicate beauty (in Kim Jong-il's case a dancer named Ko Young Hee), and produces effeminate sons that further dilute the masculine vigor of the founding patriarch. If things go well, the next generation at least has the savvy to rule the realm, but as courtesans and their bastards multiply, intrigue, corruption and incompetence eventually overwhelm the regime, paving the way for another stern, disciplined warlord to march in and seize power.

The following pictures demonstrate a clear progression from manly alpha conqueror to effete omega descendant. One can see something of the family resemblance down the line, but Kim Jong-un, the latest scion of the Kim dynasty, is a sorry specimen compared to grandfather Kim Il-sung:

Kim Il-sung (alpha):

Kim Jong-il (beta):

Kim Jong-un (omega):

It has been suggested that sexual reproduction provides balance to the species, preventing either sex from becoming too distinct and risking the health of the population. It appears that here we have a living example of an infusion of feminine characteristics – from the women preferred by powerful men – sapping the vigor of the ruling caste. Perhaps sex is the great equalizer, forever churning humanity from top to bottom.

A whole new “Just Say No”

Featured Guest · 21 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Ken Knight

A lot has been discussed about the ever-increasing push for “domestic violence” awareness and tighter and tighter laws to handcuff those who police are called in to investigate for such. No need to get into the semantics of navigating through the channel of that dynamic once it happens to you, plenty on the subject has already been covered.

What I’d like to touch on is a “rule” that I have been steadfastly holding on to during the past few years of my single life in the dating pool only because it is working out in regards to keeping Police from coming to visit me face-to-face. I call it a “Just Say No” self-defense technique that I apply to women I date and that is I just say NO to those whom exhibit quick-tempered, violent, and/or aggressively demeaning behaviors toward me or other men throughout the course of dating and putting it gently, I don’t return their calls, ever! I have to admit it was a lady friend of mine who applied it to her own dating life who gave me the idea, having never really thought about it myself since I had put up with a lot of crap over the years dating some slap-happy cursing femmes to get some tail.

Dating as you all know is that time spent “getting to know” someone else and finding out if that grinning member of the opposite sex is worth continuing a rapport with or not.

Simply put sports-fans, here is what I am talking about:

She curses at you for little or easily-aggravated reasons

She berates men in general in your presence

She prefers one-liners she thinks are humorous such as “You’re so stupid!”

Raising-of-the-voice is easily achieved for little to no reason

She instantly calls you profane names during any disagreement

She pushes or slaps at you without provocation

Any of these six (this is my personal list, so bear with me) displayed by a date, don’t drive to Peyton Place or the friggin’ wedding chapel….RUN!!

Don’t return her calls, don’t go out with her ever again, and maintain the force of will to keep this standard (or something similar according to your own personal threshold).

Me personally, I tell women whom I date that I will not push, slap, raise my voice, or call her out-of-her-name even if there is a disagreement…and I expect the same in return.

I consider a woman calling me an “@sshole” so frivolously as a BREAK-UP (on the spot) and conduct myself accordingly….no matter how smokin’ hot she looks.

Cursing is the key, because consistent and increasingly demeaning verbal abuse inevitably leads to physical abuse (i.e. domestic violence) and of course a white-knighting Policeman tapping his baton on your front door approximately 5 minutes later.

As you guys are already aware, one can spot many of another individual’s proclivities and peccadilloes during the dating process (some even right away!) and you should have your list of “just-say-no” reasons to hold fast to in order to avoid problems with the person in the not-so-distant future. Can you tolerate a violent chick who likes to get drunk and throw utensils across the room in order to get her into bed and walk proudly through the mall with that shapely physique of hers strolling alongside you? Its your call brother, but you may lament not holding to a list of “deal-breakers” from the very beginning and never being afraid to go without a girlfriend for a few weeks (Oh my god, can Davis do that? Nope, he's working on his third match.com wife!).

Feminists Take Up Arms in War on Christmas

W.F. Price · 22 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists have recently adopted the tactic of exhuming relics from the past to look for new material to criticize, perhaps because complaining about how awful women have it today has begun to result in incredulity on the part of normal people.

In the following video, a feminist criticizes songs, most of which are from a half-century ago, for their "sexist" content. The songs are old Christmas classics, such as Dean Martin's "Baby it's cold outside," ("date rape song") and Bing Crosby's "It's beginning to look a lot like Christmas," (stereotypes toys by gender).

There is an associated twitter discussion of the Dean Martin song where some feminists are discussing the lyrics and offering their own versions. One suggests the following: "you've got to go home" "but baby its cold outside" "get out of my house" "but baby its cold outside" "I'm calling the cops…"

Oh, what a knee-slapper! Feminists are soooo funny…

The feminist narrating the video gives away her Christmas wish list, which includes a Buffy the Vampire Slayer doll with what appears to be a pole-axe. In this case, a lump of coal might be more appropriate.

Leftists like to claim that there has never been a war on Christmas, but in their unending criticism of how people choose to celebrate it, it's pretty obvious that a lot of them hate the holiday with a passion.

Why must they do everything their mothers do?

Title from a Henry Higgins quote in My Fair Lady

By Matt K

Sometimes on our travels across the far reaches of cyberspace, we chance upon a story that encapsulates the very essence of what we are trying to say. Here is such a story. It is, perhaps, the single best possible rebuttal against feminist claims that the reason that almost everything around us was invented by men is due to women having been discriminated against:

According to a study* by AC Nielsen, 70% of women in India just can't afford sanitary napkins and resort to using dirty rags, newspapers, dried leaves, and even ashes during their periods. Now you would have thought that there were few areas of life, if any, where women had a stronger incentive to invent a solution, of a problem common so many women and having existed for so long as to provide a huge pool of potential inventors, or which, except in the most indirect way, men could, if they chose, ignore, or where women's direct and recurrent experience, and their ability to talk to other 'sufferers' about such a sensitive matter gave them a greater headstart over men, and yet despite all these advantages, it took not a women but a man to solve the problem. A man, I might add, whose sisters refused to help him, whose wife abandoned him (…until he became successful/famous of course), and even whose own mother left him, but who still persevered. This story really does have it all.

ForbesWomen Ask : Why?

Uncle Elmer · 23 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

You gotta hand it to those ForbesWomen. They never stop asking : Why?

[image]

Such as “Why can’t I have a career and a Co-Equal Partner?”, “Why aren’t women, who are 50% of the workforce, be at least 50% of corporate boards?”, “Why Aren’t There More Women in Tech?”, and the ultimate “Why can’t employers provide better Work/Life Balance?”. These questions are usually followed by a flourish of “until society makes massive changes in its gender structure women will continue to be suffer unfair…”. It’s this kind of inquisitiveness and search for solutions that drives the culture forward and stokes the engines of innovation and job creation.

For the male reader however, it can be disorienting. As R.Don Steele advises men in his seminal classic “How to Date Young Women for Men Over 35, Volumes I and II” : Don’t answer “Why” questions. You may not have verbalized this concept but most likely have experienced some female demanding “Why?” to some unanswerable question. It’s a way to put you on the defensive while demanding that you explain yourself. If you comply to their demand you enter the passive apologetic beta zone from which you will not likely emerge. Just a tip from the Elmer Files.

Let’s talk about what’s in today’s ForbesWoman :

I Hate My Teenage Daughter: Comedy at the Expense of Women and Girls

Sabrina writes :

The moms are portrayed as the dumbest, most insecure, petty, women. They are terrible parents, and even worse, incompetent women. They apparently can’t dress themselves (in the first few minutes of the pilot one of the moms is unaware she is wearing a pajama top to work), and certainly can’t parent or even support themselves. The teenage daughters are also dumb, dress like sluts, and don’t do anything but be mean to other kids, skip school, and plot how to be horrible to their mothers.

She asks, Why?

By why is there not more of an outcry from women to get this show that demeans women and girls off the air? Why are advertisers so concerned about whether they advertise on a reality show about Muslim Americans (that actually tries to depict the experiences that Muslim Americans have every day here in the US) but not one word about advertising on this horrendous show that depicts women as stupid, silly creatures?

Elmer drops his guard and tries to help her understand :

Why, why, why? ForbesWomen ast : Why?

I tell you why.

This show is of women, by women, for women.

It's women exploiting women.

Get used to it.

———————

Elmer asks : Why?

I am not above asking, "Why?".

[image]

Such as "Why do all the massage ads only show the young babe getting a massage. Why don't they ever show the middle-aged dude getting a rubdown?"

[image]

Of course, long time Spearhead readers know the answer; just another opportunity for Elmer to slip in his famous Elmer Massage photo. But this time with a funny twist. Of course the "massage" sign grabbed my attention as I hurtled past the strip mall while commuting to the ForbesWomen office. Did it really say that or was I filling in the blank with my own puerile thoughts? I went back for a second look. It really does say "Massage My Jewels"!

And I'm askin : Why Not?

Why the Marriage Rate Will Continue to Decline

W.F. Price · 23 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Unless some fundamental changes are made to family law, (legal) marriage will continue to lose popularity for one fundamental reason: it is financially disadvantageous for most people of prime marrying age. Although we've spilled plenty of ink on the topic of divorce and its costs to men, one fact that is often overlooked is that marriage itself is not a financially sound decision for many young people, including women, for a variety of reasons.

It was the black American community that first began to reject marriage, and for a practical reason: married mothers received less state support than those who remained unwed. As soon as providing welfare to unwed mothers became the norm, black women began to see having children out of wedlock as a better alternative to the traditional family. In many cases, married black families were poorer than those who avoided marriage, because women with husbands were not eligible to receive state aid. This prompted great numbers of black women to leave their husbands, and eventually led to the contemporary state of the black family, in which only a minority of black parents ever bother getting married.

The same process eventually filtered into the white working class, and now it is beginning to affect young whites from middle-class families, as youth employment and wages have dropped precipitously over the past couple decades, and companies no longer provide the same level of benefits they once did.

The result is that younger people are avoiding marriage in order to take advantage of the tax breaks and benefits afforded to single mothers, or avoiding parenthood altogether. A poor young couple can qualify for state subsidies for healthcare, but a two-income household usually cannot, and the majority of young women now work just like the men. However, if a woman can claim to be a single mother and show only half the household income she'd have if married, she and the children will be eligible for much more support, thereby removing a significant burden from the family.

This also applies to student aid. A young couple in which one partner is contemplating going back to school for another degree or some training would be well-advised to avoid marriage, because the other partner's income will be used against the prospective student, and grants/student aid will be much less generous. Additionally, before having children there is no tax benefit to being married.

We often discuss the drawbacks of marriage for men, but it's clear that women – particularly young women, including mothers – also have financial incentives to remain single, especially if they won't be able to reap a windfall through divorce, and when young they usually can't.

Given the state assault on the institution, what is truly astonishing is that marriage survives at all today. Perhaps this is evidence that marriage is actually rooted in human nature, and will survive in one form or another despite feminist and government depredations.

Feminists vs. Good Men Project: Matlack Makes a Stand, Then Disappoints

W.F. Price · 24 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Tom Matlack, who founded the Good Men Project in part with the well-meaning, if naïve, idea that a process of self-improvement, introspection and mutual respect between the sexes could solve many of the problems that beset men and bring about some resolution of the gender wars, has sailed directly into a feminist broadside unleashed by the usual suspects.

Matlack, apparently frustrated by pervasive man-bashing, wrote an article in defense of men titled "Being a Dude is a Good Thing." It's actually quite reasonable, and could only be interpreted as provocative by those who ascribe to radical feminism.

A few quotes:

> Why do men get blamed for everything? Well, the cynical response is, "because we can really be assholes sometimes." I'm going to set aside gross acts of what I would call evil: rape, sex trafficking, murder, and felonies of pretty much any kind. I'm more interested in the petty shit that fills our day-to-day and ends up defining us normally imperfect human beings.
> Here's my theory, and it's nothing but a theory. Men and women are different. Quite different in fact. But women would really like men to be more like them.
> In the locker room, in the bathroom, on the walk out of the board room, in my conversations with men of all kinds, that's what I hear more than anything. The resignation that to be a man is to be unacceptable at some level to the woman in your life.
> My unscientific theory is from a fundamental disconnect between men and women at the micro level. Men know women are different. They think differently, they express emotion differently, they are motivated by different things, they think about sex differently, and they use a very different vocabulary.
> Why can't women accept men for who they really are? Is a good man more like a woman or more truly masculine?

While I don't really believe women want men to be more like women, it's no mystery why many men, like Tom Matlack, would come to that conclusion. The problem is that they are listening to what women say, and not watching what they do. Additionally, they are conflating feminist demands with the desires of real women, whereas what feminists say women want is often the exact opposite of the truth.

Take, for example, the unending complaints about "objectification." Feminists have long been complaining about the objectification of women. One theory I have is that much of this angst is simply due to the fact that other women are being objectified — it's demoralizing for women to see other females soaking up attention from males. Being the "object" of sexual attention is both psychologically gratifying and sexually arousing for women, so when feminists complain about women being objectified, what they are really saying is "it is a terrible injustice that it is not me who is the object of universal desire" (see Sailer's Law of Female Journalism).

So, having written a piece in which he admits to being frustrated and a bit confused by mixed messages – in other words, an entirely normal male reaction to women's conflicting demands – but not going after women or feminists in any direct manner, Tom is promptly attacked by all manner of feminists for not being the kind of "Good Man" they expect him to be.

For our benefit, Amanda Marcotte, in responding to and attacking Mr. Matlack, lets us know what she thinks qualifies men as good. In a piece titled "The Good Men Project I used to Know," she calls his article "a risible, sexist piece of garbage," advocates censorship and throws around a few slurs.

Here's Amanda at her feminist best:

> It's a real shame to see that a steady campaign of misogynist blather from so-called "men's rights activists" in the comments at Good Men Project has poisoned founder Tom Matlack's mind. Personally, I'm a big fan of just banning MRAs. They have nothing of value to add to a conversation, and exist online solely to disrupt any conversation they fear might lead others towards reaching the conclusion that women are people. The whole mission behind the Good Men Project is presumably to advocate for good men, and while they do publish writings by actual good men, they also publish writings by overt misogynists like Paul Elam, who by definition cannot be good men, any more than members of white supremacist groups can be called "good men". Differing viewpoints is one thing, but promoting the work of open bigots is just fucked up.

One thing about Amanda is that she can be remarkably candid. Her Chekist tendencies are on display as she demands that one subset of men be banhammered from any discussion about good men, because "by definition [they] cannot be good men."

As much as I dislike them, I don't even ban feminists from The Spearhead comments, and I wouldn't even think of demanding they be banned from a women's forum/website. In fact, it strikes me that anyone who would make such demands – especially a member of an outgroup – must have an enormously entitled attitude and a huge sense of superiority. It would be as though I were to walk into a mosque and demand certain Muslims be excluded because I, personally, despite not being Muslim, didn't agree with their views on Islam. It is this kind of behavior that really snatches the "equality" veil off the feminist face, and Marcotte does us all an unintentional favor by putting it out there for all the world to see.

Futrelle, over at his Manboobz online feminist peanut gallery, inveighs against Matlack as well, but as usual he is too lazy to rise above his signature snark, and fails to produce any worthwhile quotes.

However, there is an element of humor to this story, as a clearly clueless Roseanne Barr rises from the morass to take poorly-aimed potshots at men through Twitter.

A few of Roseanne's tweets (T. Matlack exposes himself a bit here as well):

> TheRealRoseanne 8 days ago

Whew, Roseanne is a real specimen, isn’t she?

As for Matlack’s comment – that he essentially agrees that MRAs are “closet case whiners” – I’m going to give him the benefit of the doubt and assume that he reflexively tries to ingratiate those he perceives as famous. However, given the whipping he’s getting from the likes of Marcotte and various other feminists, you’d think he would have learned the lesson that you can’t satisfy them until you’ve so debased yourself that you are at the level of Hugo Schwyzer.

As for the rest of us, we should just let Roseanne’s hatred sink in a bit. This is feminism. Anyone who wants to confirm that men are in fact blamed simply for being men can do so simply by reading the twitter exchange linked above. Too bad Tom couldn’t resist the impulse to join in.

Feminist Concerns With Male Self-Evaluation or Brothers Gonna Work It Out

Demosthenes XXI · 27 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of the major "hot-button" topics in the gender dialogs is how men are changing in the 21st Century or what some people refer to as "the New Masculinity." This can be defined as an alternative or future set of male or masculine values in Western society that are meant to deviate or separate themselves from historical and/or traditional male or masculine values. The "old or traditional masculinity" is often defined by feminists as one that has been destructive and/or harmful toward modern society in general and women and children in particular. The one facet of this discussion that has been in particular focus is how men are rejecting the traditional gender roles and dropping out of the societal expectations that have "defined" masculinity.

As many people who follow MRA dialogs may have noticed, social discussions of gender roles and "so-called" masculine values are secondary to the mainstream MRA debates of legal inequality. However, it stands to reason that we take up that angle of discussion, especially because of the recent attacks against men based on many of us (especially our younger brothers) rejecting their traditional roles as family providers and even rejecting the concept of the traditional family. In light of the current economic and social changes in the western (US in particular) gender arena, the fate of the "New Masculinity" is of major interest to feminists of all stripes and if we wish to remain relevant in our own future, it should be of major interest to us as well.

When women began to reject their historical roles in the "traditional family," it was lauded as a progressive step forward for women and equality. But when men began to do likewise, suddenly it is being framed as another way that men are hurting women. Feminism is touting itself as being the gatekeeper of gender re-examination for both sexes and quite a bit of evidence demonstrates that there is a significant opposition against men taking the same steps toward rediscovery that women did — especially without feminist supervision. You always read about feminists seeking to eliminate the gender roles that bind both men and women. You would probably expect that they would celebrate that men are seeking paths beyond traditional gender roles. But as the two articles show, that is anything but the case.

I posit that the above articles illustrate and typify a significant feminist viewpoint about men reexamining and redefining their idea of masculinity, as well as rejecting the traditional feminine expectations. And what these articles and others like them show is that feminists like Hymowitz, Marcotte, and others (including male feminists like Jackson Katz and Hugo Schwyzer) don't like it one bit. And thus the true motivations of a significant number of feminists (second wave and beyond) are revealed. Their "feminism" was a movement meant to redefine the conventions of gender in favor of women. According to their feminism, the political and social changes that were being implemented were meant for women to better themselves.

However, the needs of men were not considered with those broadly-wrought changes in Western society and even now, male concerns and needs are an afterthought by those who continue to advance and maintain those changes. Furthermore, as these two and many, many, other similar articles by like-minded feminist thinkers suggest, the considerations and needs of men are still only second to the considerations and needs of women. But now that men are doing the same thing, it is a huge problem…for women. Like the women in the 70s, men do not want to become "family providers" or even engage in the act of creating families. Furthermore, they do not wish to embrace the historical roles that men have held in human society. They seek to look to their own interests and learn to enjoy life outside of the occupational "rat race" which has been the traditional direction of western men. But worse yet, those men who still choose to follow that traditional path have found more and more economic, legal, and social roadblocks preventing them from doing so. Despite the issues regarding the changes that men have lately experienced with economics, mental, physical, and social health, the primary motivation for these recent articles which examine these problems with men "dropping out" of society and becoming unemployed and uneducated, is how these issues affect women.

Still don't believe me about feminists getting riled up when men start asking the "wrong questions?" Scoot on over to the Good Men Project and holler at founder, Tom Matlack. His former feminist "allies" have collectively like a wounded piranha because of a conversation he had with them (Marcotte, Harding, Ponzer, Schwyzer, among others…including the culturally irrelevant Rosanne Barr) regarding a simple question he asked: "Why can't women accept men for who they really are? Is a good man more like a woman or more truly masculine?"

This whole situation is telling of one truism: male feminist allies are welcome as long as they are useful and they know their place. Tom Matlack got a little too cozy with his so-called equity feminist friends, forgot himself, and the result has been an ugly mess over on the GMP. Matlack and his CEO, Lisa Hickey have been doing everything they can to try to salvage the incessant slamming that GMP has been getting by the feminist sphere. If they would listen to me, I would tell them to grab their collective cojones, weather the storm, and stand by their convictions. But I expect that they will do anything but….

More and more of the public perception of men is colored in a far less favorable light than in the past. Commercials show men as hopeless buffoons or cruel-hearted hecklers. Fewer and fewer "relationship movies" paint males in an equally elegant light as their female co-stars. However, some directors are breaking away from that stereotype and showing more realistic men. Men like Judd Apatow (who Ms Hymowicz also mentions in her above article), Greg Mottola, and Seth Rogen, have made a career of lampooning the "new masculinity." But these movies make a point of showing their male foils moving past their personal flaws and at the same time, embracing their own maleness in a manner that eventually showcases in good faith the men that they truly are. In short, these filmmakers are using their movies to examine masculine values and viewpoints outside of feminist oversight and therefore, certain feminists (like the ones I mentioned) choose to take issue with these movies.

What this all reveals is that there is a problem within feminism with men trying to achieve awareness and transcend the historical limitations placed upon our gender. While there are feminists out there who probably do not agree with what is being done to men in their movement's name, until they finally gain the courage to speak up and do something about their misandrist colleagues, they are equally complicit in this act of blatant marginalization.

However there is something else that all of this is saying: we are becoming effective enough to worry many of these feminists to the point where they are actively working to try to deter us from seeking our own enlightenment outside of the feminist paradigm. More and more men are seeking out their own paths to transcending the traditional bindings that have been placed upon us and that many of these feminists are trying to keep on us.

And finally we get to the title of this article. With the coming of the New Year, men need to find a way to sort out the mess that masculinity has become. And the first step is putting paid to the quaint notion that the answer to men's rights is "more feminism." That's like saying the answer to lung cancer are more cigarettes. All of us as "brothers" need to work it out; we need to get ourselves together and solve the problems surrounding our gender. We need to seek out those people who are asking those questions and work with them to find the answers. We need to support each other as men and males. We need to be mentors to our boys, brothers to our fellow men of all creeds and colors, and most importantly, we need to be willing to embrace the newly emerging modes of masculine life. And more importantly, we need to do it before the feminists do it for us.

We can do this…as men and as brothers.

Like the song by the late Willie Hutch says: "Brothers gonna work it out! Brothers gonna work it out!"

The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo: Hate Porn for Feminists

W.F. Price · 29 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo, known in Swedish as Män som hatar kvinnor, or "men who hate women," was recently released in an English language version, starring renowned drag queen and James Bond actor Daniel Craig. So far, despite the success of the original in Sweden, the film has been doing poorly in the US, perhaps because most Americans don't care much about Sweden.

However, it is possible that the theme has been overplayed in recent years, and people are no longer willing to buy into the conspiratorial premise. A Steve Sailer review in Takimag calls it "The Da Vinci Code of the 2010s, only with more anal rape," and in describing the heroine suggests the film is a bit dated:

> The second is his young research assistant, Lisbeth Salander, who comes equipped with every add-on that turned on geeky former sci-fi fanzine editors such as Larsson in female fantasy figures back in the 1990s.
> Think Trinity in The Matrix, but with even more attitude. Lisbeth has genius computer-hacking skills, a black wardrobe and a black motorcycle, hand-to-hand combat techniques that let her deal out cruel vengeance upon men twice her 100 pounds, piercings, a mohawk, and lesbianism (until she's exposed to the journalist hero's recessive charm).
> But this isn't the 1990s anymore, so the appeal of such dusty clichés has drifted up the age range.

Due to the hubbub over the movie, I watched the original (Swedish) version to see what it was all about, and found it even worse than I'd anticipated.

Although Swedish professionalism is evident in the execution, the story itself is such pure fantasy that it's difficult to suspend disbelief, and it quickly degenerates into a Nazi exploitation porn flick, in which monstrous Swedish, Christian, white-supremacist, racist, capitalist, billionaire Nazi misogynists murder and rape with impunity for some seven decades, mainly targeting religious and ethnic minority females.

The book the film is based on was written by Stieg Larsson, a Communist graphic designer with a persecution complex who devoted much of his life to attacking the Swedish right wing, hence the obsession with the postwar left's usual bogeymen. But Larsson takes it to a new level, reviving the Bolshevik propaganda he thrived on as a young man, when he spent time arming and training African female soldiers (i.e. cannon fodder) for the Marxist-feminist Eritrean People's Liberation Front.

In Larsson's fantasy, Sweden is a dangerous place, especially for women. Heroine Lisbeth Salander, a techno-punk type who could have come straight out of The Matrix, is attacked in the beginning of the film by right-wing hooligans in a subway station, and despite being outnumbered and underweight, fights them off. She is then sexually abused by her "guardian" (she is apparently under state supervision for being a head case), who forces her to perform oral sex in return for access to her own money, and then anally rapes her when she comes back for more. In addition to being tough and sexy (and lesbian!), Lisbeth is a genius computer hacker. Her character, as Sailer pointed out, is essentially a cliché of the typical computer geek fantasy girl.

The hero, Mikael Blomqvist, is a left-wing journalist (a stand-in for Stieg Larsson himself) who has been set up by a wealthy capitalist pig and subsequently convicted of libel. Following his conviction, he is hired by Henrik Vanger, a wealthy, elderly man, to solve the 40-year-old murder of his niece. Lisbeth, who was tasked with checking out Blomqvist for Vanger, hacks into his computer. When she sees what he is doing she helps him with the case, and soon the two are both working and sleeping together.

Together, the duo uncover a serial murder spree stretching over decades. The murders are tied together by a Christian theme, which is uncovered by Lisbeth, who has a phenomenal memory and recognizes the Bible verses jotted down by the victim they are investigating. Soon, they learn that the Vanger family has Nazi connections, and that some of the victims were Jewish, and were sacrificed according to Deuteronomy's codes. The film goes on along these lines until the end, portraying Sweden as a dark, bigoted place, plagued with incest, drunkenness, rape and murder.

Despite the Nazi background, The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo is above all a feminist work. The original Swedish title – Men who hate women – makes that clear, and the overriding concern is with victimization, penetration, power — all the usual feminist tropes. There is plenty of symbolism, as well as a bit of gender-bending; the sex scene when Lisbeth first sleeps with Blomqvist has her on top, and she is the tough, confident partner in the relationship. Lisbeth also lacks Blomqvist's compassion, and has little compunction about despatching villainous men. In one scene, which may have inspired Tiger Woods' ex Elin Nordegren, she smashes the windows of a fleeing villain's car with a golf club. Her tattoo, from which the English title is derived, is a grotesque, hideous affair that covers her entire back, and her face is festooned with metal hoops and trinkets in the techno savage chic that was popular until some ten years ago. She looks, to put it bluntly, like the kind of dyke junkie one might have found in some basement punk club on the West Coast circa 1997.

One might ask why, given the fact that Sweden may well be under the most feminist regime on the planet, a lefty author would go to such great lengths to depict the place as a hotbed of rape and misogyny. You'd think that since gender equality is the law of the land in Sweden, and women have become the more equal of the two sexes there, there would be little need to frighten people with fairy tales about sadistic Nazi misogynists. But this would be to assume that feminists are rational, reasonable people rather than paranoid, power-hungry zealots. Without a burning hatred for and fear of men, feminism would burn out in short order. The only way to keep the movement alive is to stoke the fires of this hatred, and The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo is meant to do exactly that. With its blend of pornography, vengeance and victimization, it stirs the passions that have long fueled feminism in the West.

Why It's Worth It

W.F. Price · 29 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I've been spending time with my kids over the Christmas break, and it vindicates all the effort I've put into keeping them. I feel blessed, happy and fortunate. All the practical problems of life pale in comparison when a man has this kind of love and family in his life, and the sacrifices he makes are not in vain.

On that note, I think we should offer our prayers and best wishes for all the men out there who have been deprived of the opportunity to be with their children by the injustices that have unfortunately become the norm in family law.

Because this is a religious holiday, I'd like to offer a passage from Psalm 34 for the broken-hearted men out there who are alone, torn apart from their children by the wickedness of the feminists:

> 15The eyes of the LORD are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry.
> 16The face of the LORD is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth.
> 17The righteous* cry, and the LORD heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles.
> 18The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit.
> 19Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the LORD delivereth him out of them all.

Hang in there.

So Close, Yet So Far

Elusive Wapiti · 30 December 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Ross Douthat accurately characterizes the connection between the decline of marriage and the increasingly threadbare American social fabric, then badly lapses into utter statist banality on what should be done about it:

> At Christmastime, we like to tell stories about resilient families. The Cratchits of "A Christmas Carol," for instance, who subsist on love, hope and 15 shillings a week. The Baileys of Bedford Falls, who survive wars, bank runs and bankruptcies because they have friends, one another, and a guardian angel watching out for them. The first couple of the New Testament, who manage to cope with a supernatural pregnancy, a murderous king and the necessity of delivering a child in the bleak midwinter, half-out-of-doors and far from home.
> In 21st-century America, the well-off and well-educated have the best odds of enjoying the domestic stability that the Yuletide stories celebrate, while the very people who most need resilient families – the Cratchits and Baileys, the working poor and the hard-pressed middle class – are less and less likely to have them. This domestic dissolution plays a role in a host of socioeconomic ills: stagnating blue-collar wages, weakening upward mobility, stalling high school graduation rates, even the increase in juvenile obesity and diabetes. But it isn't an issue that politicians of either party are particularly comfortable addressing. Liberals worry about seeming paternalistic and judgmental; conservatives recoil from the idea of increasing the government's role in the most intimate of spheres. Thus America has a crisis of family life, but no family policy to speak of.

> [T]here are costs to the European approach. Government-guaranteed leave often gives less financial relief to a mother or father who is already at home full time. And Europe's overall web of regulations and job protections makes the labor market more rigid and less accommodating to part-time work – which is the kind of work that mothers, especially, tend to want. (A recent survey of American parents found that 58 percent of married women with children preferred part-time to full-time work, compared with 20 percent of husbands.)
