> A more flexible alternative, championed by the conservative writers Ramesh Ponnuru and Robert Stein, would change the way we tax families, dramatically expanding the child tax credit in order to ease the burden on parents with young children. Their proposal would leave contemporary Baileys and Cratchits with more disposable income and more options without favoring one approach to parenting over another.

Yes, quite unimaginative. A more penetrating analysis would have discovered that government policies themselves dis-incentivize marriage and subsidize divorce, producing the sort of domestic destabilization that Mr. Douthat describes. Yet, after cataloging the downside of a divorce culture, the best Mr. Douthat could come up with is to double-down on government intervention.

Since an operative definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again, yet expecting different results, a much more sane alternative would be to do the opposite of what's been tried so far…instead of more government, let's try less of it, to include removing Federally financed enticements that encourage single parenthood and closing down the government funding sluices that shunt taxpayer monies in the direction of marital dissolution. I know it will be counter-intuitive for most of us who have grown up in the age of government-as-universal-problem-solver, but in public policy matters, often the best thing government can do is…nothing.

Imagine for a moment what would happen were a marriage to dissolve, threatening poverty for the mother and two children, and the State did nothing except to let the estranged couple, their families, and para-governmental civic institutions sort things out on their own. What would that look like? Who would look after the children? Dad? Mom? Grandparents? The Church? Orphanages? Faced with such daunting and thorny and distasteful questions, would such a marriage dissolve in the first place, or would the estranged partners stick out their rough patch and arrive in a happier future? Would the divorce rate drop if husbands and wives, and their relatives and neighbors, directly felt the sting of marital implosions, rather than sticking some unknown, faraway taxpayer with the bill?

What sort of public policy, then, reinforces marriage? A policy that intervenes to facilitate parendectomies, and then intervenes again to recapture otherwise lost household income by selling the divorce-suit respondent into state of semi-slavery? Or a policy that, by virtue of a policy of non-intervention, refuses to get sucked into quarrels between husbands and wives, thus ensuring that divorcing spouses bear the full brunt of their decisions?

Of course such out-of-the-box thinking would be anethema to people like this commentator:

> Carolyn Egeli, Valley Lee, Md.
> Children that are well cared for are society's best investment in the future. Children need their parents, but mostly they need their mothers. European governments seem much better at recognizing this simple truth. Fathers are needed too of course, but in nature's scheme of things, the father plays a secondary role in the early years. He doesn't have breasts. And there is not much evidence to support that substitutes for women's breasts are as beneficial to very young children. And ditto for the pure attachment that children and mothers feel for one another. Most mammals replicate this phenomena. Our economic system strains gnats and swallows camels to justify the destruction of the most fundamental human relationship of mother and child. Mothers escaping in no fault divorces, are forced into shared custody of their abusers and a deeply divisive and unfair division of property, ultimately skewed in favor of the fathers. The men have off of the top, in 90% of the cases, a much higher income, on average 25% higher, yet the women must share equally in the burden of child care. Most children don't want to live 50% one place and 50% another, but again, the property rights of fathers are more important to the legal system. Cut the child in half seems to be the solution. Making it possible for the mother to continue to spend her time mostly on the care of her children is not even possible, most of the time, even with a very well off and often revengeful former spouse.
> Dec. 26, 2011 at 1:54 a.m.

Whew, where to start with this one? First, the data is overwhelming: children do best with both parents, not just the one with the breasts. A policy that emphasizes mothers over fathers, while feeding Ms. Egeli's inflated sense of maternal superiority, flies in the face of this simple fact. Furthermore, men also attach to their children, via vasopressin rather than oxytocin, and it would be a mistake to sideline this bonding process early on, not because breast-challenged men can do the kind of feeding breast-blessed women can, but because bonding between father and child takes time, and this bond will progressively become more and more important, even overtaking the bond between mother and child in some cases, as infants wean into toddlers and children.

Second, while it is true that most of the animal kingdom's families feature mothers and their brood in isolation, with dad nowhere to be found, is it not also true that in such a "state of nature", life is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short? Does not such a "natural" family configuration in the animal world feature males who pump-and-dump, who practice polygyny, who are "rewarded" with sex, status, and offspring for anti-social behavior (fighting, killing other males, who kill the offspring of other males, who copulate with estrous females, whether she desires the coupling or not, etc), and who generally can't be counted on to stick around, leaving the mother to carry all the burden? Why then does Ms. Egeli think such an "natural" family model is to be preferred over one where children enjoy the full, active, present contribution of both biological parents, parents that contribute to the household in their own distinct and complementary ways?

Third, when one examines the divorce statistics, as I have, it is clear that DV accounts for a very small fraction of divorce suits. So the canard of "mothers escaping in no-fault divorces" is just that–a canard, used to justify the far more prevalent reason for divorce: simple unhappiness. As for the evil of shared parenting, if she'd like, we can simply award full custody of children to fathers, the way it used to be done until fairly recently in our culture, and the sex more likely to be able to support their children financially. In this way, the children aren't bounced back and forth between houses. Moreover, awarding children to fathers has the happy side effect of heavily suppressing the divorce rate, which would do much to mend the social fabric that Mr. Douthat frets about in his article. Furthermore, father custody would better protect the interests of children and women than the sole mother custody model. Somehow, however, I don't think that Ms. Egeli would cotton well to this alternative.

Fourth:

> The men have off of the top, in 90% of the cases, a much higher income, on average 25% higher, yet the women must share equally in the burden of child care. Most children don't want to live 50% one place and 50% another

Well duh. As the more productive sex, the sex that works longer hours, labors harder, does more dangerous jobs and who commutes further to get to them, and the sex less likely to choose or be afforded the choice to be a haus-herr, no kidding that husbands are the partner more likely to have a higher income in a divorce suit. And her objections to shared parenting can be solved pretty simply: don't divorce, or award primary custody to fathers and be done with it. Again, somehow I don't think she'll cotton well to this idea either.

So we see that Mr. Douthat's unfortunate failure to dig deeper into the root causes of marital instability only results in more calls for government intervention, intervention that will further sideline marriage, promotes marital dissolution, and appears to feed the solipsistic egos of women like Ms. Egeli who think that mothers alone are the relationship that matters most, and fathers are an accessory, value-added, fashionable, helpful (at times) but not critical. I suppose I can't fault her, though. Our social policy for the last 100 years has taught her that she's right.

As Recession Drags on Young Women Too Picky for Jobs, Choose School

A recent NY Times article pretty much gives the game away as far as the wage gap goes:

> Workers are dropping out of the labor force in droves, and they are mostly women. In fact, many are young women. But they are not dropping out forever; instead, these young women seem to be postponing their working lives to get more education. There are now — for the first time in three decades — more young women in school than in the work force.
> "I was working part-time at Starbucks for a year and a half," said Laura Baker, 24, who started a master's program in strategic communications this fall at the University of Denver. "I wasn't willing to just stay there. I had to do something."
> Women still earn significantly less than men. And in the two and a half years since the recovery officially began, men age 16 to 24 have gained 178,000 jobs, while their female counterparts have lost 255,000 positions, according to the Labor Department.
> Apparently discouraged by scant openings, 412,000 young women have dropped out of the labor force entirely in the last two and a half years, meaning they are not looking for work.

From the above passages, it would appear that women have it harder, but the following shows what's really going on:

> Some studies suggest that women are pickier about their job choices than men. Already earning lower pay, women are less willing to work when wages fall further, especially if they are able to rely on an employed (and these days, often newly re-employed) husband. Women are also more reluctant to work night or weekend shifts, according to government data on how Americans spend their time, partly because they have more family responsibilities.
> "The jobs out there just aren't very good, and men seem more willing to take them for whatever reason," said Jonathan L. Willis, an economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City. "The women are looking at those same jobs and saying, 'I'll be more productive elsewhere.'"

It appears that young women aren't as thrilled about work as young men. The suggestion is that these women have more "family responsibilities," but if that's the case, why are they going to school?

> Both men and women are going back to school, but the growth in enrollment is significantly larger for women (who dominated college campuses even before the financial crisis). In the last two years, the number of women ages 18 to 24 in school rose by 130,000, compared with a gain of 53,000 for young men.

As the young woman profiled above demonstrates, family responsibility rarely has anything to do with it. Women with young children are less likely to be in school than working part time to cover expenses; usually they have little choice. The women who are dropping out of the labor force and going back to school are mainly those without children, i.e. they have options, and they just don't like the jobs that are available.

Any wage gap that exists, as has already been proven, is a direct result of choices women make. Because men and women are not the same, women have different priorities, and comfort is often higher on a woman's list than a man's. School is more comfortable than starting work at Starbucks at 5AM, so many women will choose school instead of an uncomfortable job.

It's an understandable choice, but is it a good idea?

> Those attending more expensive private schools, like Ms. Baker, will have an even tougher time guaranteeing that their educational investment pays off. Including the loans that financed her undergraduate education at Wartburg College in Waverly, Iowa, she will complete her master's program next year owing about $200,000 in debt.
> "I have to have faith that I will eventually get a good job that pays enough to pay my living expenses and pay back my loans," she said, "and hopefully make me happy in the process."

She'll owe 200,000 at age 25, and expects to find a job that will make her "happy"…

Supposedly, women will have an overwhelming advantage over men in coming years as education "pays off." Somehow, I think a lot of young women are going to be sorely disappointed in a decade's time (or less). It's easy to point and laugh at girls who are putting themselves in debt bondage for a dubious degree, but let's be honest here: they've been swindled, and that's a pretty nasty thing to do to the young and naïve.

American Sex Roles Unnerving to Eastern European Women

W.F. Price · 2 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In looking into the phenomenon of culture shock, I recently came across a 2004 study that examines the problems Eastern European women have while adjusting to life in American society. The study is valuable in that it gives us a perspective rarely found in the English language, and suggests that American women themselves may be damaged (possibly more than men) through an enforced sexless environment.

It opens with a provocative question:

> How do immigrant women from patriarchal cultures adjust to life in the Great Plains, where gender equality and feminism prevail? Do they feel that they have freedom from sexism and more social opportunities, or do they long for the female role that they left behind in their home culture? There are few places in the world where the women's movement has been as vocal and active as in American culture. Gender equality is highly valued, and Americans believe that they have made more advances in this area than most cultures around the world (E. Kim 2001). As a result, many Americans assume that immigrant women will embrace gender equality and prefer to be women "in the American way." Because American feminists perceive traditional women as oppressed, they seek to educate them about feminism and try to help them shed the traditional female role they were socialized to fulfill. How do immigrant women respond to American attitudes toward gender? How do they change as a result of living in a gender-neutral envi- ronment? Do encounters with American feminists help or hinder their cultural adaptation?

Apparently, despite the patriarchal nature of Eastern European society, women are treated with a great deal of respect, and deferred to in many situations. Men may be overrepresented in the public world, and women not taken as seriously there, but in private women are given a great deal of consideration and treated like ladies:

> Writings on Eastern Europe stress the patriarchal nature of society, in which gender roles are distinct but complementary, with apparent respect for the role of women (Richmond 1995). Gender relations in Eastern Europe exist on two very different levels. On the one hand, the world of public institutions is patriarchal and male dominated. Even though men and women participate in the workforce in equal numbers, men receive higher salaries and hold most positions of power. On the other hand, interpersonal relations between men and women are either egalitarian or women receive preferen- tial treatment in them. Politeness toward women is highly valued. Men are attentive to the needs of women and seek to protect them from harm. Men are attentive to the needs of women and seek to protect them from harm. Gestures of respect such as opening the door for a woman or giving up one's seat on the bus for a woman reflect a positive attitude toward women's feminine qualities within the interpersonal realm. "Eastern Europe is still very much a man's world. Women are flattered to excess, have their hands kissed, are presented with flowers, and are given other deferential treatment, but traditional attitudes toward the female sex still prevail. Women attempting to work professionally must prove themselves before they are accepted as equals"

I find it amusing that the need to "prove themselves" in the professional world is seen as a burden; the same is expected of Western men. However, the attention, affection and deference must be a source of comfort to many Eastern European women in their home countries.

In addition to the different attitudes concerning equality, the concept of feminism is not the same in Eastern Europe as it is in the West:

> Most East Europeans associate feminism with gender equality in the legal sense. They feel that feminism cannot have much impact on their lives because during the past 50 years socialist ideology already promoted gender equality, women worked alongside with men, and equal opportunity clauses guaranteed their rights, in > some countries earlier than in the West (Rohrlich 1979), yet discrimination in the workplace still prevailed.

> Most feminist research in the United States is based on the assumption that treating men and women differently has a detrimental effect on both individuals and on society (Wood 2002). Efforts are being made to decrease the presence of gender in professional interactions and to avoid sexism, the discriminatory treatment of women. As a result of feminism, changes took place in notions about what is considered feminine and masculine, and in what is appropriate work for men and for women. Women strive to become more assertive and to enter formally male-dominated areas of life (Hofstede 1998). Gender-neutral use of language is expected in public and professional interaction (Lakoff 1975; Murphy and Zorn 1996)…

So, in E. Europe, gender roles are recognized, and reinforced to some extent by culture, whereas in the US, they are seen as a source of great evil, artificially implanted upon humanity by the "Patriarchy" (feminist version of Satan and his minions), which must be stricken off through a sort of mechanical de-sexing process. Hence, we see that the US is not so much gender-neutral as it is gender-neutered.

It seems that this is a source of distress to many women from Eastern Europe, who are not prepared for the strange new world of American gender relations.

> Some western feminists argue that men open doors for a woman because they assume that she is weak and cannot do it for herself. East European women emphasize that in their culture such gestures of politeness are a sign of respect accorded not only to women, but also to those of higher status. The same expressions of respect may be used by a student toward his or her professor or by a child toward her parent. As a Bulgarian woman sums it up: "Women are treated like flowers, but are respected for their strengths." Participants explain that these gestures of attention make women feel appreciated and noticed. Women expect and accept such privileged treatment, and bask in the sunshine of attention whenever they can…
> Even though these expressions of politeness seem trivial, they fulfill a very important role in the culture because they validate gender identities of women in everyday life. Men treat women with distinction, and this allows them to fulfill the appropriate masculine role. Women invite such politeness by behaving in a feminine way, and when they accept privileged treatment they fulfill the appropriate feminine role. The validation of femininity that these gestures provide is one of the things that East European women miss most after moving to the United States. They feel unnoticed and unappreci- ated without them. Many women also miss compliments about their physi- cal appearance, which are common and are not regarded as sexist in Eastern Europe.

The irony here is that American women actually expect chivalry, politeness and the rest (as thousands of wistful articles, comments and blog posts attest), but they do not invite it, and in public they excoriate men for acting in this manner. Nor are they capable of behaving in a feminine manner; even if they were naturally inclined to do so, the tendency was eradicated when they were young.

Further along in the study, Eastern European women report being demoralized by the "sterilized" relationship between men and women, particularly in the workplace, where they lose interest in interacting with American men. One reason for this is that when they behave according to their cultural norms, America men tend to avoid them, probably fearing job loss through a sexual harassment claim. One woman, originally from Belarus, said that at work men "are afraid to look at a person who is female." The EE women also report that although it appears that equalizing gender roles has worked surprisingly well in the US, they do not like it in their own lives.

They see American men as henpecked, inattentive to women (in terms of traditional manners), and less traditionally masculine, and American women as mannish, bossy and dominant. Some of their negative associations are left over from Communist times, when women in positions of authority were brutal and expected to behave like men. Over time, a negative stereotype about these kinds of women led EE women to prefer a more feminine role.

Despite their distaste for American-style feminism, EE women tend to strongly support legal equality for women. However, they do not think, as American feminists do, that this means that men and women should behave and treat each other exactly the same. Another difference is that EE women tend to view feminism in terms of caring for women and children rather than thrusting women into traditionally male spheres, such as the armed forces.

In other words, to these women feminism means something entirely different from what Americans understand. We must keep in mind that when an EE woman calls herself a "feminist," she is not the same species as the frothing-at-the-mouth pit bull type we are familiar with here in the US. Rather, she is a milder, gentler breed with an entirely different set of priorities, and not really a feminist at all in the American sense of the word.

In some ways, feminism was first field-tested in the USSR. Radical gender equality programs were put into place very early on, but the harsh realities of the 20th century prevented their realization. Certainly, there are examples of effective Soviet female snipers and pilots from WWII, but the overwhelming brunt of the hard fighting was borne by men, and women exposed to the brutality of war liked it even less than their male counterparts. Despite the Cold War stereotype of the mannish, unattractive EE/Russian woman that was prevalent in the West, feminism never really took root because of real physical and economic constraints that got in the way. This probably explains why the movement has had such success in post-Cold War America: as the dominant nation on earth there is little sense of want or insecurity here, and the extra expenses involved in enforcing gender equality don't seem all that difficult to bear (but they will in due course).

The differences between American and EE women make for some amusing anecdotes in the study, including one where an American woman tries to ram her idea of feminism down a Bulgarian woman's throat.

Here is the quote in full:

> And I had this argument, with [an American woman] recently. I was trying to explain to her that I am an educated person, I come from a very liberal background, I certainly read a lot of stuff about feminism…. The misunderstanding between me and her comes at a point where she refuses to realize that I feel my mind, my body, I'm free as a bird. I want my rights, my civil rights. I, however, do not insist in bearing arms, on being asked to do things that I do not enjoy.
> And I tried to tell to her that the feminist movement in Bulgaria is not as popular as it is here precisely because of some history of gender relations, precisely because they are quite different than gender relations in the United States. She jumped from her chair, and she declared that I was not correct, and that the movement, the feminist movement in Eastern Europe is very strong…. I've read many feminist writings and it seems to me that they equate their experience with women throughout the world.
> [She implied] that I wasn't understanding what American feminism was about. I think I perfectly understand. And the other thing that struck me was her aggressive attitude. We weren't discussing at a point. She was patronizing. She was telling me that I don't understand. And I think I do understand. And I backed up, and I thought it was not worth it, because she wasn't listening to me. (Bulgaria, 35, 6 years in the US)

The goal of the study was to ease transitions to American society, and through the quote selection one can detect a certain distaste for the behavior of American feminists from the author, who is named Nanda Dimitrov, and obviously of EE origin herself. She suggests that the aggressive behavior and bigotry of American feminists causes difficulties for the EE women by giving them a motive to resist adaptation to American values and norms. Dare we call it "chauvinism?"

I would recommend that any Eastern European – male or female – who plans to live in the West, and the US in particular, give this study a serious read. Likewise, an American man who has an EE woman (or one from any non-Western culture, for that matter) for a partner would do well to pay attention to it, because it could promote a better understanding of difficulties she may face, and also allay concerns he might have. For example, the sterile nature of interpersonal discourse between American men and women is not the norm in the rest of the world; when a woman acts in a friendly manner toward a man in the US it is usually taken as a sign of sexual intent, whereas this is not normally the case worldwide. Instead, American women are generally expected to act in a hostile or indifferent manner toward any and all men except those they intend to sleep with. This, as I see it, would probably be one of the biggest potential sources of misunderstanding.

Shortly after reading this study yesterday, I drove my kids back up toward the border to hand them off to their mother, and while waiting to be seated at a restaurant, I noticed a young man and young woman talking to each other. They were obviously colleagues, and the totally functional nature of the conversation, lacking any expressed emotion or concern for anything besides the practical subject, struck me as quite an unnatural way for a man and woman to relate to each other. I wouldn't have thought much of it if I hadn't read the study, but there it was on display, and it was indeed an example of what's happened to gender relations in the US today. It is quite repellent from a human perspective, but we live in odd times, and these cultural norms have been dictated to the young for their entire lives.

Fortunately, not all of us live or work in such an environment. I am convinced that young men are avoiding the campus and the cubicle precisely because they find this kind of atmosphere abhorrent. It is only the professional class that has truly adopted it (the study indicates that professional EE women may have some of the most difficulties in regards to American gender roles — probably because of the professional workplace environment in the US), and even these well-behaved types chafe under the restrictions. And, it is not necessary to live this way at home. Despite their best efforts, there is not a feminist in every living room (unless that's where you keep your TV), and men and women are free to take on natural roles away from the public enforcers.

Cultural differences often provide a lot of food for thought, and I've gained some interesting perspective on the plight of American women in particular, who are going to face a terrible reckoning in coming years, as they learn that being a second-rate facsimile of a man will be worth a lot less than being a full woman. Just as westernization was a terrible trauma to Eastern European men, the disintegration of feminism is going to be very difficult to bear for our women.

Veteran in Midst of Custody Dispute Kills Ranger, then Himself

There are a lot of things wrong with our contemporary culture, but this story highlights a number of them. Benjamin Colton Barnes, an Iraq War vet, had been dealing with various psychological issues for the past year or so, and at a New Year's party got involved in a gunfight, prompting him to flee with survival gear into Mt. Rainier National Park. When he passed a "chains required" checkpoint without stopping, a ranger tailed him while another set up a roadblock down the highway. Upon encountering the ranger blocking the road, a married mother of two named Margaret Anderson, he stopped his car, got out with a rifle, and shot her to death.

Apparently, Barnes fathered a girl with a woman last year, and when the relationship went south, likely right before his first episodes of depression and suicidal ideation, he was issued a parenting plan. In July, the mother of his child demanded a new parenting plan, claiming that he was agitated and potentially violent. The new plan enforced supervised visitation, and required him to complete the standard courses that come along with accusations of that sort.

Generally, people tend to hear about these things after the tragedy, so they appear to vindicate the accusations. However, they often fail to realize that it could be the accusations and court orders that ultimately provoked the final explosion. Separation and custody disputes are psychologically very traumatic events, and combined with PTSD too much for many men to bear. Soldiers, who have been trained to react to threats with violence, are likely at the highest risk of acting out in an aggressive manner in response to these provocations.

What is particularly difficult for soldiers in particular is how deeply alien the civilian world is to men returning from war. Feminization of our culture has likely only aggravated this problem. Warfare is a hyper-masculine environment, and the US military still does a very good job of producing warriors. Young men in a developmental stage of life are hammered and chiseled into kill mode, and then sent out to enforce our nation's will on other peoples.

Then, when they return home, they suddenly find themselves in the midst of a culture where everything they have been taught to be is held to have no or negative value. This has always been the case for returning soldiers, but now it's worse than ever. Imagine a veteran facing the loss of his wife or girlfriend along with his child, being treated like a serious threat by authorities, and ordered to endure a number of punitive procedures put in place to "protect" his child and the woman he loves from him. Add to that the promiscuity of many young females – especially the sort who like young servicemen – and the entirely natural sentiment of jealousy, and we have explosive situations building all around the country.

Perhaps the saddest part of all is that exactly what could help these men calm down and return to civilian life with some hope and purpose – the presence of children in their lives – is what is first taken away from them. I remember well the torment I went through during separation and divorce. It is psychological hell; one of the most painful things a man can endure. Yet I had my children much of the time, and we saw each other through it. There's something about children, especially little ones, that calms and civilizes a man more than anything else — they bring out love and feelings of tenderness, along with an overwhelming desire to protect, that many men never knew they had before. This bond between grown men and children, what we call "fatherhood" is, in my opinion, the strongest civilizing force in humanity.

We can't say for sure whether Benjamin Barnes would have behaved differently if he'd had more time with his baby daughter, but what is certain is that removing children from so many war veterans is certain to result in tragedy on a regular basis. The love and protective instincts men have for children have another side: when their children are removed, it is instinctively perceived by men as an existential threat, and the passionate feelings for their children can quickly become stormy and violent. There can be no moral judgment about this; it is simply a natural instinct, and for the most part beneficial for children over our species' existence. But today we choose to defy nature, and tragically people like Margaret Anderson and her family sometimes pay the price for it.

How the Tax Code Punishes Marriage

W.F. Price · 3 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A friend sent me a link to an article with a detailed breakdown of why, for a lot of people, it's a bad idea to get married. The author, Jeff Schnepper, is writing with wealthier couples in mind, but the same applies to the poorer, younger sorts, as I outlined recently.

I'm glad I came across this article, because I wasn't aware that richer Americans take a hit for marrying as well. It's really pretty amazing the damage the government does to a natural human institution; it's almost as though the state sees marriage itself as a source of tax revenue…

From the article:

> Say two single individuals lived together in 2011, each with a taxable income of $83,600. They each would pay federal income tax of $17,025, for a total of $34,050. If they got married, their total taxable income would be $167,200, with a tax of $34,886, an increase of $836.
> This "marriage penalty" is the result of our progressive tax system. As your income increases, additional dollars are taxed at increasingly higher rates. When two people get married and file jointly, the income of the second spouse is taxed at the highest rate of the first spouse. In the example above, the first dollar earned by the second spouse would be taxed at a marginal rate of 25%. The second spouse has no income taxed at the lower 10% and 15% rates.
> The hit gets more painful as your income increases. Two single individuals, each with a taxable 2011 income of $379,150, would pay tax of $110,016.50 apiece, for a total of $220,033. If they married, the tax cost would become $235,277, a marriage penalty slam of $15,244 — each year!

It gets worse as it goes on.

Indian Lower House Stalls Female Parliament Quota

In 2010, the Indian upper house of Parliament passed a bill that would guarantee one third of all seats in Parliament to females, but the bill, which feminists expected to pass easily, has been stalled by bickering amongst different political factions. Parties supporting lower castes and Muslims are afraid that the bill will result in replacement of their representatives with upper-caste females.

What is interesting about the dispute is that the more democratic lower house is providing the most opposition to the bill, whereas the upper house, which consists of unelected members, supports it. Perhaps this is because quotas are, when you get down to it, anti-democratic. Forcing one third of seats to go to females would mean that people are losing 50% of their potential choices where seats have been handed to females, so in this case it is a direct power-grab from the voters of both sexes on behalf of female politicians — mainly feminists.

Feminists often frame the debate in terms of fairness, democracy, and freedom. However, they never balk at taking people's choices and freedom away when it gives them an advantage.

An example is the feminist law in Norway that forces corporations to stuff their boards with at least 40% women. Although Norway is a wealthy country and can afford this, the fact is that shareholders have been deprived of significant power, in the name of "gender equality," of course. Other claimed benefits are that Norwegian companies now have "more pleasant meetings" and "the preparation material is tidier." Of course, they probably have a lot more meetings now, and that isn't always a good thing.

Given that the costs of enforcing "gender equality" are borne by all, shouldn't we have every right to question the value of giving up our freedoms in order to achieve it? Is gender equality something we want? Is it objectively beneficial? Is it worth restricting our choices and limiting our lives? Democracy is about asking ourselves what is in our interests and having the opportunity to act in accordance with them.

Feminists, however, don't think we should be able to freely act according to our interests. What they call "equality" trumps all else, even when it negatively affects the majority of men and women. Theirs is a profoundly anti-democratic philosophy, and they will never hesitate to remove our freedom to live and vote as we please.

Comment of the Week: Lebanese Woman Speaks Truth

W.F. Price · 4 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In response to my post on how American feminism is viewed with distaste by Eastern European women, commenter Robert Griffith shared a story about how his Lebanese wife shut down a bitch session about some poor little hussy who got knocked up by her boyfriend.

Middle Eastern culture is supposedly "primitive" by our standards, but they don't have much of problem with single motherhood and its attendant social ills. Mr. Griffith's wife shows us why:

Robert Griffith

Very good read. I myself married a woman from a non-western country. Lebanon to be exact. For the first 5 years of our marriage we lived in my hometown of chicago. My wife took virtually zero interest in making friends with the women she worked with. My wife is a Muslim. (as I am also a Muslim after converting from Christianity) Therefore I suppose the difference in cultures may have played some role in her relationship with the feminists.

That being said, my wife found most American woman to be attention whores who sought the spotlight. She was also astounded as to how they spoke of men. American men in particular. I recall one incident that happened at a Christmas dinner that her company had thrown. We were eating dinner while one of her workmates was going on and on about how one of her female cousins had a boyfriend who knocked her up and then left her. My wife replied to the effect of "well if she was not acting in a way that would bring shame to herself and her family, then she would have never gotten pregnant".

Everyone at the table fell silent for about 30 seconds. My wife did not mean to insult the woman who was telling the story either. She simply stated in a matter of fact sort of way, something she felt was the root of the problem. Namely that the girl took part in behavior that one should feel great shame in. Her opinion is (as is mine), 99% of the blame of a unwanted pregnancy lies at the foot of the woman.

Unfortunately, contemporary American women are unacquainted with the concept of shame. Nor, after decades of coddling, do they understand the law of consequences.

Slate Advice Column Condemns MRA as "Ugly Obsession"

W.F. Price · 4 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Since the demise of the Slate-supported "DoubleX" magazine a couple years ago, the feminists on the payroll were resorbed into Slate magazine itself, effectively rendering Slate a feminist publication. Or, at least, strictly feminist where all gender matters are concerned.

A reader sent in a link to Slate's advice column (written by Emily Yoffe), which bears the somewhat retro name "Dear Prudence," and bills itself as "advice on manners and morals." While the name may be old fashioned, the advice certainly is not, as it is the standard fare dished up to women for the past 40-odd years.

In one exchange, a young woman writes in, apparently annoyed that her father has discovered MRA, and is talking about it to her and her brother. She says her mother ditched her father ten years previously for another man, tearing away his children in the process, which made her father a "bitter man" (ya think?), and now he visits MRA sites that, among other things, advise men to avoid single mothers.

Here's the exchange (scroll down a bit):

> Q. Dad-Related Dilemma: My mom left my dad for another man 10 years ago, when my brother and I were in grade school. She took us with her, and the loss of his family turned my father into a bitter man. He now considers himself a men's rights activist. From what I can tell, the men's rights movement my dad belongs to believes that American law and society has institutionalized misandry. One website my dad frequents warns men not to date single mothers because their children might accuse the boyfriend of molesting them to reap the benefits of victimhood. My dad speaks often about the men's rights movement, and when my brother and I don't want to listen, he accuses us of being brainwashed by feminists. His behavior doesn't come across as crazy so much as it does misogynistic. Now I'm 18 and could stop seeing him if I wanted to. But my brother is younger and still has to see him. My mom doesn't know the full story because we don't want her to overreact. What should we do?
> A: Your mother leaving him may have caused your father's personality change—it may also be that his personality was in place and your mother couldn't take it anymore. Both you and your brother are old enough to have some direct discussions with your father about your relationship with him. Talk to your brother and see if he wants to join in such a conversation, and if he doesn't, make some time alone with your father. He needs to be told that his activism is his business, but you don't want to be his audience anymore. Say that you both understand he has strong feelings about women and the legal system, but being lectured to is poisoning your relationship. Reassure him that you love him and want to spend time with him, but you want to talk about things that are less painful and volatile. If he won't curb his enthusiasm, then you can start peeling off from your visits. Now that you're 18, spending less time with your father would be bound to happen anyway. But if you do that, be a sounding board for your brother on how to deal with Dad's ugly obsession.

Notice how, in the advice, the mother's betrayal is never directly blamed for the father's anger (it "may have caused [his] personality change"). Actually, "Prudence" suggests that his being an MRA may retroactively justify the mother in behaving like a vicious whore. This is typical in divorce, BTW: when a woman screws a man over, betrays him and sticks the knife in his back, and the guy is legitimately pissed off, the woman points and says "See? Look how angry he is! This is why I left him." This works pretty well in most cases, because rather than standing up and saying "you bet I'm angry — I have every right to be upset about what she did," most guys go on the defensive, and that just whets the appetite of the sharks in family law.

What's encouraging is that the daughter doesn't seem to want to cut her father off, but Prudence helpfully suggests that option as a perfectly reasonable step. It's the girl's choice, of course, but I hope she doesn't expect any support if she abandons her father. She is over 18, and the mother is about to stop receiving child support, so she ought to take careful consideration before making any drastic moves. Mothers who are accustomed to receiving child support don't generally adjust well to supporting their own children financially.

Additionally, it seems the children do not tell their mother everything, so there is some loyalty to dad. I bet the daughter is just a little angry over something daddy said, which brings up the one thing the advice columnist got right: fathers shouldn't bring their children into political disputes that affect the family.

It's probably difficult to resist sharing a newfound enthusiasm for MRA with those one is close to, but doing so isn't the wisest idea. For one thing, most people are unaffected by these issues and don't really care. Additionally, one person's passionate cause can be an annoyance for others, who have different interests. People raised with overtly feminist mothers often have a revulsion for feminism, and much of this stems from resentment from being forced to participate in a movement that held no special appeal or meaning to them.

It's one thing to warn one's son about what could happen in the event of divorce, but trust me, if your ex screwed you over your son will instinctively understand. In my experience guys whose fathers got jacked up in family court are the young men who are least likely to get married. In fact, this may be the root of the daughter's concern. She's afraid daddy is poisoning her little brother against women. But she should rest assured; the advice to avoid single mothers is sound and her little brother should follow it.

If you're an MRA and have children, I'd simply avoid the subject around them. Not out of a sense of shame, but rather because they are kids and it simply isn't their fight. If they ask about it, feel free to tell them your position and leave it at that. As for what the ex wife thinks, who cares? She obviously doesn't care what your opinions are, so don't worry about hers. If she tries to bring it up in court, simply tell the judge that she screwed you over so badly you've decided to devote considerable effort to insuring that other men don't have to face the same thing, and that's your right.

And this brings us to the final point:

Would Slate dare call it an "ugly obsession" if a woman got her teeth knocked out by an abusive husband and then devoted herself to feminist causes or domestic violence prevention? Of course not. So why is it when a man gets a multi-decade financial raping because his wife decided to slut around with the kind of scumbag who fools around with married women with small children, and decides to do something about it, he is just a "bitter man" with an "ugly obsession?" This, Prudence, is why MRA exists, and why it is necessary.

How Do We Know There's an Education Bubble?

W.F. Price · 5 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It should have been obvious to anyone with any sense that loaning vast amounts of money to poor and working-class people during the real-estate boom wasn't going to turn out well, but still there were armies of enthusiastic promoters out there dragging anyone they could in to sign on the dotted line.

Now, as students with dubious degrees rack up tens – even hundreds – of thousands of dollars of debt, it's time people started pointing out the obvious problems here. The top problem is that the United States cannot afford another massive bailout, but without one there are going to be a lot of impoverished young people as soon as the party ends.

However, just like the real-estate boom, there are legions of enthusiastic shills out there, including universities themselves, which have become increasingly parasitic as they have grown addicted to government funding.

The following article is about a program, known as the "dream project," in which University of Washington students teach high school kids how to apply for financial aid and student loans. The pictures really say it all. The middle class UW students are telling working-class students in the poorer suburbs around Seattle what a great opportunity school will be for them, and getting them used to the idea of indebting themselves to pay for school before they've even been accepted anywhere.

> One day in mid-December, a purple-clad army of college students prepared to sweep through Renton High School, bringing snacks, drinks and most of all, information.
> Laura McDowell marshaled the forces — about 50 University of Washington students — in the school's counseling center, making sure they were all working on the same thing before they fanned out across the building.
> "Have your students go to fafsa-dot-gov," McDowell rapped out in a commanding voice. "Can anyone tell me what it stands for? Anybody?"
> "Free Application for Federal Student Aid," the students responded, not exactly in unison. Filling out the form is a necessary step to getting financial aid for college.
> "Why do you have to fill it out?" McDowell asked.
> The response was immediate: "Money!"

The "dream project" reminds me of the American Dream Downpayment Initiative, which the Bush administration used to encourage low-income people to buy houses. The federal government would provide downpayment assistance, and then the buyers took on loans to finance the rest. These new homeowners, unfortunately (although predictably), had a much higher rate of foreclosure than those who did not receive assistance.

The same thing will happen with student aid and loans. First, the students will be enticed into college with student aid, then they will take out loans as their expenses grow. It will keep schools propped up for a while, but eventually they will have to pay back these loans, and not all students will be able to do so, as there is already a glut of "credentialed" workers.

The parallels between higher education and the mortgage crisis are starting to become uncomfortably clear, but as usual politicians and educators are planting their heads firmly in the sand. A better solution would be to give students realistic, useful and affordable alternatives to the typical college education. Most Americans do not need a four-year degree, and many are simply wasting four or more years in school that would be better spent learning a trade at a vocational or technical school and starting work within two years. It's time we started asking ourselves whether it's more important to keep gender studies professors on the job, or to provide young Americans with the means to make an honest, productive living.

For an alternative, perhaps we should look to Germany, which has one of the lowest college graduation rates of all developed, Western countries, yet has far lower unemployment than the US, and has managed to keep a healthy industrial and manufacturing base. One of the keys to its success is worker training — not useless degrees.

There's a lot to be said for a university education, but it really isn't for everyone, and it shouldn't be pushed on those who can't make good use of it. That so many females are in college, for example, says little about their real productive potential, whereas the men who are avoiding college are, for the most part, making a reasonable decision. Unfortunately, there are signs that when the education bubble bursts, men will shoulder the burden as always.

Support Reminder

W.F. Price · 5 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I put out a call for support right before Christmas, and thankfully received enough to stay above water. However, I need to remind readers again now that the new year has begun. First, thanks for the support that's come in so far. It was crucial to paying recent bills, but I'm still going to be short for the quarter without more.

I'd like to continue writing and posting daily, and keeping the site running at a steady clip, but it needs some revenue to justify the time I put into it, and given the non-PC subject matter ad revenue is never going to be all that impressive, despite a healthy number of pageviews and monthly visitors. I really enjoy writing and providing content for readers, so I'll do everything I can to keep the site running, but I will need your support.

Some readers have asked for a subscription plan where they could support the site on an ongoing basis, so I've set up a page for that with a few options. In the meanwhile I'll post reminders every now and then until I'm in the clear for the quarter.

All donations are helpful and much appreciated. Although a few substantial ones have been crucial, the site would be very healthy if every frequent reader put in the equivalent of a Starbucks latté per month. So, if you enjoy reading the site, please consider sending some cash this way. In return, I'll keep the content flowing and continue to serve as an advocate for men in our society.

Veteran in Mt. Rainier Shooting Depressed Over Losing Daughter

As I suspected, Benjamin Barnes, the veteran who shot and killed a ranger in Mt. Rainier National Park and then ran off into the woods, losing his own life shortly thereafter, was upset about a custody issue. After you've been through it yourself, it isn't all that hard to recognize these things.

It seems Barnes was not the best-behaved young man, but evidently not an irredeemable criminal or anything of that sort. After completing a tour in Iraq, he was discharged from the army for DUI and transporting a private weapon (i.e. he had his own gun in the car, which is prohibited on base). He had struggled in school while younger, and likely thought the army would be a way for him to begin anew, so it must have been quite a disappointment when he was kicked out.

In the case of psychologically fragile young men, like Barnes, a disputed custody case is often enough to effectively ruin their lives, and at that age it can be very difficult to see the light at the end of the tunnel. Following DV allegations by the girlfriend, who claimed he had PTSD and once drew a knife and threatened suicide, he was ordered to have only supervised visitation with his baby daughter. We don't know whether the girlfriend was telling the truth or not, but Pierce County Sheriff spokesman Ed Troyer contradicted her claims that Barnes had PTSD, effectively calling her a liar.

Anyway, it doesn't matter whether a woman is telling the truth — her mere accusation is almost always enough, especially when the man doesn't have a lawyer representing him, to obtain a supervised visitation ruling. Apparently, in Barnes' case it was also enough to force him to take DV classes, which, because they are punitive in nature (not to mention expensive — the cost falls on the attendee), should never be ordered without a conviction.

Naturally, his life fell apart after the summer ruling, he lost his apartment (the accompanying child support order is likely what put him on the street), then his job, and he grew increasingly despondent. His friends, Lucio Garcia and Junior Juarez, clarified the situation for the Seattle Times reporter:

> "When I first met him he was very respectful, a good guy," said Junior Juarez, 22, who said he considered Barnes his best friend. "But everything just got to him. Life got so hard. He was so stressed. He would say, 'I feel like nobody's trying to help me. I feel like everybody's against me.' "
> Another friend, Lucio Garcia, said, "He was going through a lot. He didn't even have a roof over his head."
> Juarez said he tried to help, inviting Barnes to stay at his house, but he refused.
> "He just kept telling me how bad he felt, especially about his baby," Juarez said.
> They last spoke on New Year's Eve. Juarez invited him to a party near Tacoma. Barnes declined.
> What happened next, Juarez said he still can't process.
> "I don't understand it," Juarez said.

Hopefully, Junior Juarez never will come to understand it. I do, and it's a damn shame. It wouldn't surprise me to find out that Barnes himself came from a broken family, which would complete the circle of tragedy.

The point isn't to excuse Barnes for murder; that is a crime no sane society can tolerate. But what we can do is try to prevent incidents like this, and one way to do so is to eliminate the high-pressure tactics in custody cases, which are resorted to a lot more frequently than most people realize. We need to take away the incentive for women to use the full force of the court against their children's fathers to secure a favorable custody and child support order. Obviously, most men won't lash out like Barnes, but the damage the current system does is incalculable, and some will.

It's time for the courts and policymakers to start listening to men who have been through it themselves, and stop sweeping the problem under the rug.

W.F. Price · 6 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As feminism has dispensed with the notion of legal equality on favor of measures that actively enforce equality of outcome, gender quotas have become the tool of choice for dealing with perceived "inequality" in any venue that women find desirable. This is why we see a push for quotas in management, cushy government jobs, school and such, but not so much in trash collectors, taxi drivers or front-line soldiers. The push for women in combat is an example of the hypocrisy here, because rather than actively put women in combat situations or dangerous assignments where they will stand a higher chance of getting shot or blown up, what the feminists are trying to do is expand the definition of combat so that women can put "combat experience" on their military resume and be favored for higher command.

It's gone pretty far in the US, but in Norway they've taken it farther and legislated that all publicly listed companies reserve 40% of board positions for females. Norwegian companies were not pleased about the move, but of those that remained public or did not flee Norway, all have complied. A study by the University of Michigan took a hard look at the figures to ascertain the effect of this new legislation, and came up with some numbers that demonstrate that the fears of companies were quite rational: the companies that were forced to stuff their boards with women performed significantly worse than they had before.

Here's an excerpt from the intro:

> In this paper, we present new evidence on the relationship between firm value and board characteristics by exploiting a natural experiment in board structure created by an unprecedented exogenous change to corporate boards. In December of 2003, the Norwegian Parliament passed a first-of-its-kind law requiring all public-limited firms to have at least 40 percent representation of women on their boards of directors by July of 2005; at the time women held only nine percent of board seats. After voluntary compliance failed, the law became compulsory January 1, 2006, with a two year transition period. Firms that did not comply by January of 2008 would be forced to dissolve. Notices to comply were given to 77 delinquent firms in January 2008, and by April all public limited firms were in compliance with the law. Figure I presents the time series of this dramatic transformation in the composition of Norwegian boards of directors. Though more women were elected to boards, the numbers of female directors serving as chairman and CEO remained steadfast at less than five percent, consistent with press reports of the unpopularity of the law among existing board members and executives (Goldsmith, 2002).
> In a panel of 248 publicly listed Norwegian firms from 2001 to 2009, we find a large negative impact of the mandated board changes on firm value. First, we run an event study on the stock price reaction to the initial announcement of the quota. As discussed in detail in the paper, the announcement of the law was made in an unusual manner, which created a highly unanticipated news event. On the days around the announcement, we find that the average industry-adjusted stock return for firms with no female directors was −3.54%, compared to −0.02% for firms with at least one female director. The difference of 3.52% is economically and statistically significant. These findings are robust to controls for board size, firm size, and are significantly different than benchmark industry-adjusted returns of firms in the U.S. and other Scandinavian countries.
> Second, instrumental variables estimates indicate that the quota caused a substantially large negative effect on industry-adjusted Tobin's Q. A forced 10 percent increase of women representation on the board led to a 12.4 percent decline in Tobin's Q from the average. Reduced-form estimates suggest that relative to 2003 benchmarks, firms with at least one female director in 2002 had industry-adjusted Q values in 2007 that were 0.26 higher than firms with no female directors in 2002; a substantial difference when compared to the average Q of 1.53. Additionally, placebo tests reveal no relationship between pre-quota female board representation and subsequent changes in firm value for U.S. firms. The results suggest that the constraint imposed by the law > had a large negative effect on firm value, commensurate with the massive reorganization of corporate boards imposed by the gender quota.

To be fair, part of the problem was that the new female board members had less experience, and that will change over time. However, due to the universal nature of the legislation, by the time that happens there will be no means by which to compare the female bords to the male (unless one compares private firms to public).

But even if integrated boards are found to perform as well as overwhelmingly male boards, we ought to ask ourselves why it should be the government's role to force these things on companies, which operate independently from government. Isn't this a net loss of freedom and choice?

Farther on in the paper, it is revealed that rather than comply, a number of companies simply delisted or fled abroad, presumably because they couldn't afford the decline in performance:

> If the negative effects of the gender quota on firm value were as large as our evidence suggests, we would expect to see firms try to avoid the law altogether. There are at least two ways that firms could do this. First, existing firms could change their form of legal organization to private limited, rather than public limited. Second, firms could incorporate in another country. In this section, we provide evidence that both changes occurred following the introduction of the law.
> Using data from Statistics Norway, Figure II presents the time series of the number of all public limited and private limited firms in Norway from 2001 to 2009. There are, of course, many more private limited firms, so we normalize the time series to 1 in 2001. We also present the time series of total employment in Norway over this time period for comparison.
> The figure shows that there is a steady decline in public limited firms starting in 2003 and continuing throughout the period. By 2009, there are less than 70 percent as many public limited firms in Norway as there were in 2001. In contrast, the number of private limited firms increases beginning in 2003 and continues throughout, ending in 2009 with over 30 percent more private limited firms than existed in 2001. These changes occur at a time when employment is increasing, with the exception of 2009. This indicates that, while the economy was growing, firms were more likely to choose to organize as a private limited firm rather than a public limited firm starting in the years after the announcement of the gender quota law, which only affects public limited firms.

Readers with a knack for statistics could probably do a better job than I can identifying the most salient points in the publication, so I'd like to invite commenters with some expertise on this subject to offer their own analysis.

Feminists are often touting the "benefits" of equality of outcome, but it's time they were confronted with some if its costs, and asked to justify them. Why should we accept less wealth and poorer performance simply because they want to leverage women in a very small, but powerful segment of society?

Jezebel Weighs in on MRA Dad Issue

W.F. Price · 7 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In a sign that someone at Jezebel must be reading The Spearhead, Gawker's feminist publication has also chimed in to address the "Dear Prudence" advice column I wrote up the other day wherein a daughter asks for advice about her MRA dad.

Jezebel, being the balanced, unbiased publication it is, decides to ask Hugo Schwyzer and David Futrelle for advice. Schwyzer is actually half-reasonable, but the solutions he offers are missing the point.

> In terms of advice, it's not easy for a son to challenge his Dad. But drive the conversation towards individual women — not the "bitches" and "harpies" of his father's imagination, but the women Dad has loved. A mother? A sister? An ex? There is inside every MRA I've ever met a stopped-up well of compassion and love for women. It's getting to the good stories (and there are always GOOD stories) about women that is so vital. And from those stories about individual women Dad has loved, perhaps the son can talk about what those women went through and experienced.
> It's also important for Dad to be able to talk about his own pain — not his rage, which is a response to pain, but the pain itself. Men's Rights Activism is the public manifestation of an experience of betrayal (whether that betrayal is "real" or not, it's perceived as real.) Getting to the source of that rage is vital.

While I'm sure there are some men out there who despise all the women in the world, I haven't actually met one, so I think he has a point. However, it's the wrong one. Getting over pain and loving women in one's life are really irrelevant to the issue at hand, which is preventing the pain from happening in the first place. An analogy would be car accidents. We should help people who have suffered terrible injuries from car accidents, but we should also try to prevent them from occurring.

Unfortunately, the situation regarding marriage and parenthood today is akin to giving every new driver a bottle of vodka and faulty brakes and coating the roads with oil. As you might imagine, there are a lot of smoking wrecks littering the streets.

Feminists, for their part, still attempt to say that they support equality, and put the blame for the problems men face on the nonexistent "patriarchy" that reinforces men's roles. That's just smoke. I've never, ever seen a feminist support an equal parenting law in the real world, but I did see them support gender-specific laws like the Violence Against Women Act, which gives the lie to their equality claims.

Here's a typical feminist comment from one "opifex umbratili":

> And actually I think the bulk of the problems listed are caused by patriarchy more than anything else (and before you get your britches in a bunch Mr. MRA, that does not mean individual men). The belief that women are basically soft, fluffy, nurture beasts (ergo better mothers, bad soldiers, not criminals etc.) is a a patriarchy thing. I think you would be very hard pressed to find a feminist who doesn't think that men can be good fathers, or that women shouldn't be viewed as equals to men in terms of capability (even if that is a capability for violence).

In real patriarchy, the children are always under the authority of the father (this was the norm throughout the West prior to industrialization). That is the definition of patriarchy — father rule. How could default maternal custody possibly reflect patriarchal values? It's ridiculous on the face of it, but feminists really are a one-trick pony when it comes to the blame game.

As for what feminists say, that doesn't matter at all. It's what they do that counts, and anyone who knows the score can see that they consistently support laws and policies that favor women rather than promote equality. The feminists are directly responsible for much of the trouble that befalls men in divorce, but as usual they blame men in general or the individual victimized man. Finally, however, people are challenging their narrative, and as the article shows they are trying to think of ways to squelch the protest.

We should take the fact that feminists are starting to push back against MRA as a good sign. There is a real problem in the way the West, and the United States in particular, treats its men, and it's going to have to be dealt with one way or another. With these kinds of social problems that involve one group of people profiting from the misery of another, there's always a lot of reaction against an emergent protest movement (people hate losing privileges), especially when it begins to become somewhat coherent. Eventually, however, people take a harder look at the problem, and then a more reasonable dialogue can emerge in the middle. I think we're just getting to the stage where feminists recognize that they aren't the only ones in the room now where "gender issues" are concerned, and they're beginning to react.

Elusive Wapiti · 8 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Behold the New Year's Eve fleshcapade in London and other cities across England, as laddettes stumble their way through the evening in a half (or quarter)-dressed stupor. (Note: pictures lifted from here, in the Daily Mail). Used to be, only hookers gussied themselves up in whore's uniforms. For these sexual capitalist exploiters of lonely or bored men, dressing like this made sense: it (a) readily identified a woman as a purveyor of sex for money, and (b) coaxed a fellow's mind into thinking about having a romp in the hay by bombarding it with sexual signals so clear and so loud only the blind and stone deaf couldn't see or hear them. Used to be, other women, "good" girls, who realized that a portion of their value pivoted around virtue, didn't want to be mistaken for a slut, whose value as a wife was steeply diminished. Yes, they wanted to signal their beauty, but they didn't want their comeliness to overshadow the other qualities that made her attractive to a potential husband. Not today. "Pretty", as this authorcalls it, is dead. Enter hotness":

> Young women today do not seem to aspire to pretty, they prefer to be regarded as hot. Hotness is something altogether different. When women want to be hot instead of pretty, they must view themselves in a certain way > and consequently men view them differently as well. Pretty is cherished. Hotness, on the other hand, is a commodity. Its value is temporary and must be used. It is a consumable.

> The merits of hotness over pretty is easy enough to understand, they made an entire musical about it. Who can forget how pretty Olivia Newton John was at the beginning of Grease. Beautiful and innocent. But her desire to be desired leads her to throw away all that is valuable in herself in the vain hopes of getting the attention of a boy. In the process, she destroys her innocence and thus destroys the pretty. What we are left with is hotness. Hotness is a consumable. A consumable that consumes as it is consumed but brings no warmth. Most girls don't want to be pretty anymore even if they understand what it is. It is ironic that 40 years of women's liberation has succeeded only in turning women into a commodity. Something to be used up and thrown out.

What happened in Manchester over New Year's Eve, and repeated in several other cities across England and doubtless here in the States, is what you get when an entire generation of young women, when asked "what else you got?", look at the empty cupboard of their life, only to realize they had little else to offer. So they double and triple-down on the only attribute of value they have left, cheapening all in a sexual signalling arms race to the bottom. I find it ironic that the greatest SMP advantage to be had is accrued by women who don't offer themselves up for sale in the sexual meat market, but instead cultivate those eternal qualities of faith, virtue, chastity, fidelity, thrift, industry, integrity, a nurturing nature, and contentment. Sexuality is merely part of the package, not the whole thing, and it is certainly not packaged and traded upon in hopes of attracting the attention of that hot guy who yourself find hot. I found humorous truthiness in thiscomment over at Hot Air:

> For me, hot is what happens after pretty strips off. martin.hale on January 1, 2012 at 10:31 AM

Yup. Note the order here: Pretty first, then removal of modesty-enhancing clothing, then comes hot. Something else, too. Hotness is more than signalling. It's a state of mind. It's an environment, it's surroundings, it is a climate of trust and safety and intimacy. It's not simply just dressing like a streetwalker. For the latter is rude, off-putting, disrespectful, and transparent in its naked attempt to manipulate. In the end, if your response to "what else you got?" is to strip off most of your clothes and parade around in a bid for male and female attention, you're in the sort of predicament that no amount of flesh-baring will help.

New Energy Breakthrough on Horizon?

W.F. Price · 9 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've been following a few of the outlandish energy schemes out there for a few years now, largely because it's evident that fossil fuel sources are beginning to show diminishing returns despite more extraction effort, and what remains in large quantities is unattractive, dirty stuff like coal and tar sands. Although I remain skeptical, the fact that we came up with some spectacular, unprecedented new sources of energy only recently, such as nuclear power, suggests that we could potentially do so again.

Unfortunately, for the past couple of decades since the failure to replicate the Fleischmann-Pons cold fusion results, it's been a series of disappointments, and nobody has come out with a working product. The lure of cold fusion was that it could conceivably produce enormous amounts of power without the kind of danger posed by conventional nuclear reactions, which require many layers of protection to prevent meltdowns and radiation leaks, and can be used to produce atomic bombs.

Now, it seems that an Italian fellow from Bologna named Andrea Rossi has built a working contraption, and has apparently sold a number of them. He says it's not actually fusion, but rather a "low energy nuclear reaction" between nickel and hydrogen, helped along by some proprietary catalyst, that produces the energy, which is released as heat.

Mr. Rossi has teamed up with some Swedish physicists to sell the device, and plans to sell home heating units within a year or so. He claims that he intends to manufacture millions of them, and will keep the price low to ensure that copycats (which are already emerging) cannot compete with him. Apparently, he has already sold a scaled-up version to the US Navy:

> A physicist in Italy claims to have demonstrated a new type of power plant that provides safe, cheap and virtually unlimited nuclear power to the world, without fossil fuels or radiation concerns.
> The only hitch: Scientists say the method — cold fusion — is patently impossible. They say it defies the laws of physics.
> Andrea Rossi doesn't seem to care. He told FoxNews.com that his new device takes in nickel and hydrogen and fuses them in a low-grade nuclear reaction that essentially spits out sheer power, validating the strange science.
> [...]
> Sterling Allan, CEO of the alternative energy news agency Pure Energy Systems, told FoxNews.com he attended Rossi's demonstration and the E-Cat is self sustaining.
> "What Rossi demonstrated was 470 kilowatts of continuous output in self-sustain mode — meaning the output was enough to keep the thing running on its own," he told FoxNews.com.
> Allan hinted on his blog that an unnamed "customer" of Rossi's device is a military organization that starts with an N. Rossi said this customer measured and verified the test — and told FoxNews.com that Paul Swanson with the U.S. Navy's Space and Naval Warfare Systems unit (SPAWAR) can vouch for the demonstration.
> FoxNews.com spoke with a man at SPAWAR who identified himself as Swanson, and who said only that he was "not in a position to talk to the press." Several other sources within the Navy and the Pentagoneither declined to comment or did not return messages.

This is one of those things where I really hope it's true, but I'll believe it when I see one working.

Whether this new source of energy pans out or not, it's always encouraging to know that there are still men out there putting their life's work into projects that could benefit all of mankind. For all the trashing men in general get from feminists, when it comes down to it humanity always pins its hopes on its men and puts its faith in them.

Were Neanderthal Women Gender Equalists?

Many of the more ridiculous and outlandish claims made by feminists involve events in the distant past, conveniently before there is any decent documentation. For example, it has been hypothesized that prior to civilization, we all lived in a gender equal utopia, or, as some have suggested, an outright matriarchy. Fortunately, we have rather recent examples to debunk the idea, as there are still people living in hunter-gatherer societies in some parts of the world. It seems that, rather than a matriarchy or a gender equal society, there is a very clear division of labor. The men hunt and protect, while the women gather and process "safer" but lower-quality food.

In a 2006 article, John Hawks, a paleoanthropologist at the University of Wisconsin Madison, addresses the notion that neanderthals were gender equalists in which women and men hunted together. Hawks is skeptical, mainly because he thinks that hunting was even more risky for neanderthals than for recent humans, yet we still don't find recent human females engaging in hunting on a significant scale.

However, the study he is holding to the light is interesting in that it proposes that neanderthals died out because there was no significant sexual division of labor. Whether this is true or not as far as neanderthals are concerned, the fact that division of labor has played a significant part in modern human development is undeniable.

Science has accepted that gender is far from a mere "psychological construct." Long before humans even imagined the concept of patriarchy – back when people had only a vague notion of fatherhood – sex roles were well-defined. This doesn't mean that women should never work or take the lead in any endeavor (quite the opposite, in fact), but rather that the sexes are distinct, and not "equal" in the feminist sense of the word.

The "patriarchy" theory that holds that women were prevented from being warriors and such and forced to be nurturing by some shadowy cabal of men has always been tenuous, and now we can say with some conviction that science has thoroughly debunked it.

Canadian Currency Features Feminist Revisionism

Commenter Thos has discovered that the new Canadian $100 bill, which commemorates the discovery of insulin, features a picture of a young, attractive woman in front of a microscope, suggesting that she is the person who discovered the hormone, which has saved the lives of countless diabetics.

However, the person who actually discovered insulin was a man (surprised?). Frederick Banting, who was born on a farm in Ontario, was a war hero and orthopedic surgeon at a children's hospital in Toronto. Later, he became a painter, and then contributed to the WWII war effort, meeting his untimely demise in a plane crash en route to a test of a new flying suit he'd developed. He was an all-around impressive man, and someone Canadians have every right to be proud of. So why was he left off the bill commemorating the discovery of insulin in favor of some fictitious female scientist?

The only answer I can think of is that to some Canadian bureaucrat, historical accuracy and national honor take a back seat to pushing a deceptive agenda. If any man deserves better than to be snubbed in the furtherance of a lie, it is Frederick Banting, the youngest person to ever receive the Nobel Prize in Medicine.

Here's the real discoverer:

It was bad enough when MSNBC deceptively portrayed female factory workers in a training drill as heroic Pearl Harbor firefighters, but in stealing the legacy of a national hero, this is worse. Some feminists suggested I was hyperbolic in comparing the Pearl Harbor fake to Soviet tactics, but I wonder whether even the Bolsheviks would have gone so far as to put such a blatantly deceptive picture on their currency.

Ryan's Daughter: Worth the Time

As long-time readers know, I like to revisit classic cinema from time to time, as there can be a wealth of material there that is too often lacking in the overpoliticized climate of today, which tends to stifle truth in favor of dogma.

Ryan's Daughter, a 1970 film about a young Irish woman in county Kerry during WWI, caught my interest because it was described as having beautiful, dramatic cinematography. Directed by David Lean, who also directed Lawrence of Arabia, it doesn't disappoint in that regard. The west coast of Ireland is a beautiful strip of land that has all the moods and passions of a young woman: at one moment bleak and sorrowful, and another lush and bright; one day stormy and tempestuous, the next all sun-dappled calm and tranquility.

This is why it was such a good setting for the story, which deals with the turbulent nature of a woman's love. The movie revolves around the passions of Rosy Ryan (Sarah Miles), a publican's daughter who is just coming of age in Kirarry, a village on the Dingle peninsula that hardly suits her worldly dreams. The Dingle peninsula is remote, but it is a starkly beautiful place overshadowed by Mt. Brandon, named after Brendan the Navigator, the famed Irish monk and seafarer. Saint Brendan is alleged to have set sail from the peninsula on a voyage to the Americas in 530 AD in a currach, one of the skin boats one can still see upturned on the sand in the sheltered coves.

Young Rosy falls in love with the village teacher, Charles Shaughnessy — a middle-aged widower who tries to talk her out of it. Eventually, they marry, but ennui soon sets in, and Rosy's passions and imagination begin to cause her frustration — the "unhappiness" that so commonly destroys marriages these days. She begins to despise the kind, staid ways of her schoolteacher husband (played by Robert Mitchum), whose hobbies are botany and classical music.

The village priest, the most powerful character of all, is a grizzled older man who sees what's going on with Rosy, and confronts her on the beach. She confesses to being unhappy, and the he asks her what she has to be so upset about. When, instead of dealing with her feelings as a married woman was expected in those days, she begins to indulge her self-pity, Father Hugh (played by Trevor Howard) angrily strikes her across the face, leaving her weeping on the strand.

Soon, a handsome young war veteran named Randolph Doryan (Christopher Jones), wounded in battle in WWI, is sent to a bleak outpost overlooking the village. A recipient of the Victoria Cross, he has been sent to recuperate from shell shock and an injury that left him with a bad limp. Although the post in Kerry is considered recuperative, Ireland was not a particularly pleasant place for British soldiers in the early 20th century. The Irish independence movement was heating up at the time, and even out in the remote countryside there was strong anti-British sentiment. The townspeople both deride and mock the soldiers when the opportunity arises.

The young war hero eventually makes his way to the pub, where Rosy is covering for her father at the bar. Attraction between the two is instant, and it takes no time for them to be locked in a passionate embrace. Despite the danger, an affair begins immediately. Here is where the film really shines, as the grand, dolorous scenery provides an excellent backdrop for the obviously doomed (and damned) love affair.

I won't give away the ending, because I think the movie is worth watching and would like to encourage readers to find it and see for themselves, but some of the themes are worth discussing.

Father Hugh, the rough old priest, is the wisest man of the village, and its source of both moral and practical guidance. Despite being a virgin, he is the manliest figure of all. Some may cringe when he strikes Rosy, but eventually it is revealed that he alone is watching out for the errant young woman, and only he can help her when her ill-advised dalliance with the foreign soldier finally puts her in harm's way. Father Hugh, as a strong-willed, righteous man, is the father figure women yearn for — the shepherd of the flock.

Charles Shaughnessy, the schoolteacher husband, is the beta provider archetype. A kind, gentle man who would never hurt a fly, he offers the security, loyalty and devotion that comforts women. He has a silent strength, but when he learns of his wife's affair, he is devastated and deeply hurt, but neither vengeful nor enraged. A deeply sympathetic character, he is nevertheless the target of ridicule for being cuckolded. Only father Hugh stands up for him and cares enough to comfort him.

Randolph Doryan is the damaged bad boy. A handsome warrior, wounded both in body and spirit, he embodies passion, adventure and danger. Underlying his callous, selfish behavior is a deep disappointment with life, and a fatal cynicism. This darkness combined with physical beauty is a potent mix for women, who are aroused by the protective and nurturing instincts they evoke, along with the promise of drama and forbidden pleasures.

Ryan's Daughter explores the psychology of women with both compassion and honesty, leaving the viewer with sympathy for the wretched girl. It is a quintessentially Western take on the feminine, and, in some sense, a Western take on men. I'll leave it to the viewer to make his own sense of the trinity of male leading characters, but for those who haven't seen it, particularly young men, I heartily recommend watching the movie.

The Impending Doom of RINO Dads and their Daughters

Whatever Happened to Good Ole Hypocrisy? As America looks down the barrel of 2012, I'm hoping to bring back one precious but forgotten tenet of our society.

By Denise Odie Joseph II

In the past few years, after the election of Barack Obama seemed to shock thousands of spendy and progressive-friendly (they call themselves moderate) Republicans out of their complacent stupors, I started hearing a lot about RINO (Republican in Name Only) Republicans. And I was thrilled. Like a minority of conservatives who were not satisfied just to have a President we'd want to go have a beer with, I had been waiting with bated breath for this collective realization. I hoped it would be a rallying cry for fiscally responsible, individualistic, and religious conservatives to take back the Republican Party. However, while the Tea Party movement has done much to reinvigorate the party's morale, it has done precious little for the party's morals.

What I mean is—If the new band of Republican Party revolutionaries are so disgusted by RINO Republicans, why no word on RINO men? After all, RINO politicians are nothing more than RINO men with unbridled blood thirsts for power. Perhaps, this is exactly why. Who likes to look in the mirror and see the picture of Dorian Gray? See the rot and decay of society on their collective conscience? See something that if they stopped to think about it, is unraveling the fabric of American society as fast as mass immigration sans assimilation.

To date, Rick Santorum has been the only candidate to acknowledge, if not with terrible clarity and if not to much avail, that the family unit is the cornerstone of American society. Santorum meekly hints that the horrific number of single-mom (pause to pay homage) headed households are, in some way, shape, or form, a symptom and cause of our crumbling economy. However, unlike Santorum who timidly proffers his thesis, (unless I'm missing something) I would like to stand up and stick my figurative finger in the face of every RINO politician and man ask, "Whatever happened to good ole hypocrisy?!"

Why? I'll tell you.

RINO Republicans are analogous to fathers who proudly proclaim their conservativeness at dinner parties or perhaps during early afternoon phone calls to El Rushbo's show, but let their "independently-minded" wives (translation–women who get their marching orders from St. Oprah or more recently, The View) pump their teenagers full of birth control and encourage their daughters to live the lives for which their bra-burning foremothers fought so valiantly. RINO Dads are those guys who will sheepishly to proudly, fill out Republican ballots on Election Day while their wives self-righteously mark their "principled" support for things like, "freedom of choice" and "freedom from poverty." RINO men are dangerous men because they unconsciously traverse the world as wolves in sheep's clothing. RINO men are out of touch with the very ideology to which they claim to adhere.

Among the Ten Conservative Principles the Clare Booth Luce Policy Institute lists is the principle of "The Wisdom of the Ages," #6. "The past is a great storehouse of wisdom," it reads, "modern people are dwarfs on the shoulders of giants." These words go directly to the heart of conservatism—to the veneration of the preservation of traditions that have made our country great. When our men (and women) cannot even remember the principled widespread women's opposition to women's suffrage because they never even learned about it in the first place, but can instantly recall which American president freed the slaves without also recalling the importance of his most seminal quote—"A house divided cannot stand," our society is in trouble. And yet, it is these same men, when faced with higher taxes from increased spending and entitlement programs, who angrily wave their fists at their television screens asking, "Doesn't Congressman (insert RINO name here) know that Republicans are supposed to be fiscally conservative?!" The old adage goes that you "get him where it hurts" and where it hurts is his wallet. Unfortunately, what these RINOs (and the adage) do not realize that Santorum apparently does, is that they have indeed got you men where it hurts the most and where it can do the most damage—they've got you by your balls. They've got you beside your hearth, they've got your wife and your kids and it hurts so bad you can't even feel it because like a phantom limb, they're already gone.

In the 1960s and 1970s, feminists and liberals of other stripes started pointing out the hypocrisies of what they termed "patriarchy." Time and again, they urged us to recognize human's natural "animal instincts" in relation to traditional morality and therefore, to reject traditional institutions like marriage as outdated because now these intellectual elites had things like biology and sociology, things like women's studies, gender studies, and critical race theory, to back them up. They pointed to infidelity or infamous sexual desire surveys (conducted by homosexuals) among traditionally married couples to "prove" their theses. Limb by limb, they tore the traditional family to shreds until they reduced us to the shining bastion of cesspool equality that we have now in every American ghetto and which is seeping out into the middle and upper classes in less animated ways. For instance, we have raised an entire generation of boys who, permanently scarred by their parents' divorces, (perhaps over issues such as infidelity) cannot emotionally connect or commit to any one woman in any meaningful way and so we also have an entire generation of girls for whom that coveted diamond solitaire comes later and later in life, with more and more contractual caveats (prenups). Somehow, when it happens after 5 years of living together, after 1 year of non-exclusive dating followed by another 3 years of recurring breakups over the male's unwillingness to "commit," getting that ring for which you girls will surely be paying your hard-earned half doesn't feel quite like the fairytale it used to. But maybe that's ok, since both modern versions of "Alice in Wonderland" and more recently, "Snow White," (and this has nothing to do with the feminist agenda I'm sure) historically revise both heroines to be hard-assed soldiers.

It is entirely fair to say that the number of broken homes and otherwise "modern" families reflect an unquestionable victory for the feminists/liberals who intended to destroy and transform that sacred cornerstone of American society—the traditional family. While RINO Dads and men are often heard snickering about feminists around the water cooler, they do not realize that by virtue of being RINOs, they are complying with the same feminist/liberal system of social engineering they sneer at when manifested in more obvious forms like the black single-mother society, and are setting their own sons up to be the "playas" and their daughters up to be the "played." RINO men should realize that by failing to do the job their Republican foremothers cherished, their wives are leading Republican culture to its demise. They should realize that non-black youth today speaks the language of bitches and hoes as well as black youth and that non-black youth males expect the same level of promiscuity from their female peers. Take, for instance, pop-star and young white girl idol, Ke$ha. Her breakthrough music video, "Tik Tok," which incidentally utilizes about as many syllables as an ADHD-ridden culture can handle, features her waking up in her parent's bathtub, filthy, fully-dressed, and hung-over after a long night of partying. Without bothering to attend to hygiene (granola-brand feminists should love this), Ke$ha, who, like black ghetto youth, refers to the police as "po po" and who is apparently still young enough to be living with her parents, drunkenly stumbles downstairs to her well-dressed, clean-cut, conservative-looking nuclear family, sneers at them in all her godforsaken glory, and walks out. This behavior causes her video mother to drop the stack of pancakes she is serving and provokes her helpless family to follow Ke$ha onto their perfectly manicured lawn while her video father, who reminds me of a debutante about to faint, follows the rest of the family out of doors with the loyalty of a fuzzy Golden Retriever. This video reportedly rose to fame because of the "irreverence" it displayed to a catchy tune and Ke$ha's interesting enunciation (she doesn't sing in the song at all but singing is probably a social construct anyway).

"Tik Tok" might as well be a Discovery Channel documentary on the behavior of that intriguing species known as the RINO Dad. Apparently, though her video father seems capable of amassing enough wealth to afford his family a shiny, comfortable lifestyle, he is completely powerless against the will of his monstrous teenaged whore child. Perhaps Ke$ha's father learned along the way that if he beat the hell out of Ke$ha like she deserves and then sent her to a convent, he would become a social pariah and end up in jail. Perhaps he never even thought about convents because after robotically repeating "Happy Holidays" at Christmastime each year, he forgot that God exists. Or perhaps, more likely, he became "enlightened" along the way and learned that Ke$ha is just experimenting with her sexuality and that he could not possibly judge or rebuke her because after all, doesn't he himself fantasize about getting plastered and engaging in coitus with a young, blonde female from time to time? Upbraiding his daughter who is brave enough to do this openly would be pure hypocrisy, right? And he couldn't possibly be a hypocrite, right? An enabler, an accessory, a castrated, dumbfounded puppet, but never a hypocrite, right?

Unfortunately for the feminist/liberal agenda to dismantle civilization as we know it and replace it with a new world order, man has been aware of his all too human tendencies from the earliest times. Indeed, every religion has been aware of these tendencies, and has acknowledged and appreciated them accordingly with blessed things like the 10 Commandments. St. Augustine of Hippo, who is a veritable goldmine for words of wisdom wrote, "You have made us for yourself, O Lord, and our hearts are restless until they rest in you." It is indisputably appropriate to acknowledge human frailty but it is also indisputably appropriate to acknowledge man's inborn striving for that which is higher, better, more beautiful, and holier. Just as man's desire for sex and food is beyond doubt, so too is his desire for the ideal, in all the forms he recognizes, in all the systems in which he partakes. Tragically, the intellectual elites of our era seek to destroy and demean the cherished truth of the ideal and they prey on post 1960s women, who are supposedly more educated and freer than all of their foremothers combined, to do it. From extreme vanity sizing to demands that magazine models (anorexic and unattractively thin models notwithstanding) look like the "real" size 8 woman, who historically would measure in at a size 16 to 20, modern women of the West are on the apocalyptic "Wild Hunt" for the ideal and are leaving terrific destruction in their wake. As women spearhead the demise of the ideal, the alternative to hypocrisy, they spearhead the demise of social order as we know it and love it. Henceforth, all of us will be staring down the barrel of life in a hip hop video or government-funded project where no one makes pretenses about "wat they be." Where no one has to succumb to sin because sinning is the status quo and where no one need ridiculously pretend to be faithful because well, we would have wisely outgrown such primitive notions about nuclear families as individual economies. We would have outgrown capitalism itself because government entitlement spending would have to grow ten-fold to accommodate and assist the burgeoning hoards of single-mom children born of the scarred sons of divorce who accidentally inseminated their female sex partners, or couples who themselves participated in that modern American rite of passage we call divorce.

A few months ago, I heard relentless accounts of affairs Sarah Palin had earlier in life. Apparently, she was quite the man's lady. If one were to believe the accounts, she also "took cocaine," whatever that means. What's funny and so beautiful is that I never knew a thing about Mrs. Palin's exploits until she was recently "exposed" I never even had a clue that she was such a potentially bad example. For some strange reason, Mrs. Palin never publically, (or privately, to my knowledge) encouraged her daughters or anyone for that matter, to engage in libertine sex or snort drugs. In light of these revelations, I'm now thinking that she exhibited some pretty strange behavior when, instead of flouting the bonds of marriage like she purportedly did in her alleged moments of human frailty, she encouraged her daughter to marry wait for it THE FATHER OF HER CHILD! That BAREFACED HYPOCRITICAL HUSSY! She didn't even give up her stance on abstinence. Sick, Deluded, Bigot.

Maybe it's just possible, being the rogue Grizzly Momma that she is, Mrs. Palin has not yet allowed her brain to be washed by the liberal guard. Is it possible that she is actually a red-blooded human being who makes mistakes and not a middle-management tool or a candidate (not that I'm advocating her election) straight from the Elect Your Local SocioPath video? Could it be that regardless of whether or not she is able to live up her ideals 100% of the time, she still holds them dear? Could it be that this supposedly stupid woman, who never attended an elite college in her life, has some uncanny insight into the practical societal consequences of an unmarried teen mom America? Could it be that she knows right from wrong, her elbow from her… ? And for those of you who will snidely parrot, "She did it for her political image!" why is it that Cheney's daughter parades around as a lesbian, or that Cindy McCain, Barbara and Laura Bush have all gone public in favor of homosexual marriage? Maybe it's because they're RINO women married to RINO men who will publish and publicize themselves taking controversial positions opposing their husband's and conservative doctrine's most fundamental beliefs? House divided, anyone? These are the people you're entrusting with our children's futures? In these desperate times? In the words of our American Beauty Ke$ha, in her homage to bestiality, "This place about to BLOWW UPPP AAHA AHA UH OHH!"

I hope we're all as drunk and prettily dressed as her when it happens.

So, let us take this moment to reflect on the lessons Mrs. Palin has taught us and the great tradition of hypocrisy so many of you have left behind:

RINO Dads, the next time you see your daughter bounding (or sauntering) down the stairs in a pair of booty shorts with messages like "juicy" emblazoned on her backside, please stop her, turn her around, and force her to go upstairs and change. As you march her room-ward, tell her why she can't dress like this, school her on the consequences of her behavior. Do it even if you were on your way to your man cave to watch porn featuring teenaged-looking girls dancing around in booty shorts with messages like "juicy" emblazoned on their backsides. Do it for your daughter, yourself, society, the ideal, but most of all, do it because you now remember that hypocrisy has always been our last, best hope.

Comment of the Week: Affirmative Action and Law Enforcement

W.F. Price · 12 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In response to the recent post on quotas, Mickey T relates an anecdote about a robbery at his store in the 90s. He calls the cops, and they send out a female officer to do the job:

> I'd like to point out another area where female quotas come at a high cost, which is law enforcement.
> Back in the early 90s my store was robbed. It was a busy day of the week when two perps came into the store to do the job. They had obviously "cased " my place (or whatever they call) prior to the robbery. because they picked a busy day and knew exactly where to find what they wanted.
> Anyway, that day, I went into my office to make change after a sale (I was a hands on proprietor and loved it) and there was no cash in the cash box. I immediately went out to the showroom to ask wife if she moved the money etc. She looked at me with total surprise. At that point, I noticed that the man (he didn't fit the profile of a typical customer) who she was talking with, hurried out of the store. Long story short, they waited until I was busy while one of them kept my wife busy, so other one could sneak into the office to steal the cash and my wife's purse. A lot transpired before the police responded to our 911 call. By the time I learned there was a second perp, and figured it all out, the first had left the store. Well, a policewoman shows up in a patrol car along with her shotgun and hi capacity side arm. As she pulled up to the front of the store (by that time I realized that the guy talking to my wife was one of the perps),left the store. I ran out to the policewomen, naturally very excited, and yelled to her "there he is let's go get him" as I attempted to get in the car to show her who he as.BTW he was not more than 100 yards away. The "officer" locked me out of the car and said, "wait a minute,I have to write all this down" as she picked up her pad She made sure that she took long enough to to give the perp time to get away, which he did.
> They got away with about $150.00 and my wife's purse with her wallet in it and the usual important papers.C/Cs etc. But what bothered me the most was that a criminal was not more than 5 feet away from my wife while in the process of a crime. He could have been armed.
> Obviously, that woman is responsible for a criminal being on the loose to rob again,or who knows what else he is capable of doing. All because she was too cowardly to do her job.
> The price we pay is putting the citizenry in peril.

Same thing happened to me around the same time (the 90s were probably the height of AA in police and fire departments). When I was a teen, my friend and I were attacked by a gang during a festival. I managed to break away, but my friend was still in the middle of the melée. Spotting a female officer nearby, I asked for help, but she just stood there and watched in dumb fear. Finally, a male officer dealt with it, and the gang dispersed. Fortunately, my friend was fine, with the exception of some scrapes and bruises, but I was disgusted by the behavior of the policewoman. She was worse than useless; she made the cops look like they will do nothing in the event of a crime.

We pay the cops to enforce the law, not to make some point about gender equality. If someone can't do the job, they should find another one.

Men Don't Need To Prove Themselves To Anyone

By Joe Zamboni

I've been doing some inner work, investigating why I feel separate and isolated from others. Until recently I haven't really understood why I feel like I needed to be separate and isolated. Today I'm getting that it's directly tied-in with the cultural conditioning that goes along with being a man in America today. This brief article explores some of those investigations, and it is offered without any claim that these ideas are the full answer. Instead, I'm suggesting that this area is a very fruitful area for other men to investigate, and that such an investigation can lead to the emancipation from the cultural conditioning that we men have internalized, and so often by default simply assume to be "the way things are."

I've been asking myself, "Why would I feel as though must keep setting myself up as separate and isolated?" The word on the street is that men are supposed to be independent and self-reliant. We are supposed to be able to do all sorts of things (change our car's oil, fix the leaky plumbing, kill gophers in the garden, etc.) all by ourselves. This is totally unrealistic, and it only leads to undue pressure on men. A friend of mine had migraine headaches because he felt like the martial arts center that he headed-up was totally dependent on him. In reality we all need other people, and we always have. There is nothing shameful about getting help from others, although many of us men have been indoctrinated to believe that we cannot accept such help. Why else would we keep driving around the neighborhood, when we know damn well that we are lost, all the while refusing to ask for directions?

There is support all around us, if we will open up to receiving and working with that support. There are friends to remind us of our priorities, accountants to help us prepare our taxes, priests to help us find God, etc. Men need to allow themselves to be who they are now: imperfect, incomplete, not knowing some things, unable to do some things, and needing help. To many of us men, even considering such a possibility seems unmanly and childish. We hold rigid requirements for ourselves, we staunchly believe we must be the provider and protector (or whatever your story happens to be). We have told ourselves stories about how "people critically depending on us," and we make those stories a source of our belief in our self worth.

If you're a man, whatever your story about who you think you have to be, that rigidity makes you unhappy, makes you separate, makes you isolated. If you mix in a little pride, like "I'm the only one who can do it," or "nobody else knows what I know," then you've got a further reason to keep this unrealistic image of who you are in place. The simple fact is that we are vulnerable human beings, we don't have it all together, we don't really have the big picture about what's happening, we can probably be replaced pretty quickly, etc. While embracing those and related truths may seem like a fall from grace, it is also emancipating and relieving.

Thus many of us American men have been laboring with a misconception, which has been taught to us from birth: that we are not worthy of love as we are now, that we must earn the love of others, that we must somehow prove ourselves. This idea was supposedly how we got our parent's love, how we made ourselves eligible for marriage, how we proved ourselves as a good father, and much more. In reality, to think that we are not worthy of love — just as we are right now, no matter what our station in life happens to be, and no matter what we have done or not done — that thought has been a tool used by others to enslave us. Even worse, it has been a tool that we used to enslave ourselves. The core of this is the idea that we must be someone other than who we are.

To prove that we are this imaginary man, we men go to extreme lengths, such as being willing to be maimed or die in wars that we don't even believe in (Iraq for example). Somewhere in times gone past, it probably became apparent that this distancing from our inner world, this being somebody other than who we really were, that was a necessity. In order to have a large number of men willingly go kill other people, in a war for example, it seems as though this notion must be adopted as part of the culture. Likewise, in order to prepare men to go "do battle" in the jungle of the modern economy, men must be ready to sacrifice themselves for their families. It is no wonder that men die six years younger than women do in America today. No doubt there is some chivalry mixed into this notion of who men have to be, but those notions are outdated and only hold us back today.

For many of us men even to admit that we want to be loved, that seems incredibly shameful. It seems weak, vulnerable, childish, and unevolved. It is uncharted territory for most of us, and therefore seems dangerous. But everybody is worthy of being loved. And we men make ourselves into hardened, isolated, and separate unhappy men by denying this fact.

The irony is that this hardening, this twisting of ourselves so that we live up to the imaginary standards of society, that makes us weak, that makes us vulnerable, that makes us childish, and that makes us unevolved. By steadfastly holding onto this ideal of who a man should be, we make ourselves manipulatable by advertisers, relatives, women, and others. The size of a woman's engagement ring provides a good example. How many of us heterosexual guys have thought that we must get a big rock for that special woman, and that the bigger the diamond, the more worthy we are as men? In the process we have enriched the diamond mine owners, the jewelers, and the advertisers, and we have made ourselves considerably poorer. And the women are in on this game as well; they for instance believe that a man is more of a "catch" if he has done a better job distancing himself from his real self (in other words he has more fully embraced this cultural conditioning, and is thus able to buy his woman a bigger rock).

By this hardening, this superimposition of the ideal man, onto the reality of who we really are, we make ourselves weak. We are then brittle and rigid, unwavering and positional. Life is not like that. Life changes, all the time. By being out of touch with life, we create all sorts of unhappiness for ourselves. For example, a man who thinks he can't cry, who suppresses all displays of his feelings (except anger perhaps) because he believes them to be unmanly, such a man isolates himself from himself. With this hardening we men become more self-alienated, and we thus loose track of what we really want, what's important to us, what we care about, etc. Why else would a single young man so often give up his personal life goals to completely buy-into the life goals of a woman who happened to be pregnant with his child? Why else would so many young men so readily "do what a man has to do" and get married, become a father, devote himself to supporting his family via a relatively high-paying job that he hates, etc.?

By this distancing of ourselves from our true selves, we actually make ourselves more childish and unevolved. Children do not have a sense for the big picture, and they don't understand the complexity of the world. Instead, they have formulas, or simple concepts, basic ideas of how things work. By using the formulaic stories we have heard about what makes for a successful man, and using those to run our lives, we men make ourselves simple and childish. By consistently adhering to these stories, we also block our own personal development process from proceeding. In that respect, we make ourselves relatively unevolved.

To become more adapted to the world, we need to change, we need to flexibly and dynamically alter our concept of who we are so that it is trued-up up with reality. For example, the belief that we must be the provider in order to be an attractive man would have us pay for dinner dates. But with women earning pretty much as much as men these days, this practice of paying for dates not only makes the man poor relative to the woman, it also sets the stage for a disproportionate male assumption of financial responsibility in romantic relationships (think of alimony, child support, etc.).

So how can men start the process of overcoming these misconceptions? A good place would be to start giving ourselves the love and respect that we deserve. We have been withholding this love and respect from ourselves, because we think we aren't good enough, we aren't doing enough, we aren't delivering the goods that others have told us we must deliver. Whether or not anyone gives us the love that we deserve, right now we can give this to ourselves. As we open to receiving this love, this approval, this allowing, so too will we become more open to receiving it from others. And in the relaxing about the stories regarding who we think we have to be, in that there will be an opportunity for us to embrace and inhabit our true selves. Through embracing and inhabiting of our true selves we can find our liberation, in addition to a new connectedness with other people.

Why She Can't Negotiate

Uncle Elmer · 13 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I am tendering my resignation to ForbesWoman. I cannot continue to work in a sexually hostile environment that does not respect my need to contribute my unique skills towards the greater good while developing my career and work/life balance. It didn't help that Spearhead commentator "Zorro" mocked me mercilessly in front of my co-colleagues after I submitted the gender-studies report that I had worked so hard on, even during my own boxed wine time. After I regained my composure I stumbled back to ForbesWoman and opened my trench-coat for them with a few feeble posts, but the thrill was gone.

Finally, the last straw. That Victoria Pynchon lady, who's been at Encorpera for decades, and not about to let some new blood show up and steal the limelight she has been aggressively cultivating, viciously deleted my thoughtful comment in reply to her latest outrage Fragile Manhood Requires First-Rate Negotiation Skills. I had put a lot of effort into that comment and felt so humiliated when she denied my voice by coldly removing my submission.

[image]

She writes about negotiating tactics for women, a worthy topic really as everyone should know the basic negotiating scams that will get you kneecapped while you still have a pleasant smile on your face. But, like the rest of the ForbesWoman hen house, advice for women is stitched to a framework of "how things ought to be" and "studies have shown" while trumpeting what women really want, need, and should be provided for because they are just as, no, more than, capable as men. But no matter the final gender gotterdammerung , the business world will always be dog-eat-dog; a shark tank. Everyone thinks it their patriotic duty to swindle you. Advice to females that fly in the face of this reality is only fattening them for the kill.

[image]

And Victoria wants to lecture women on how to negotiate with men, with a fundamental assumption about men's vestigial masculinity and fragile, feminized egos. Rather than blindly accept the study about men getting pegged that show them to have a sensitive, fragile grip on their masculinity, she would do well to ask men for feedback on what it is like to deal with women now that Encorpera is over 50% female. You have to negotiate everything or face a full on (though subtle and quiet, as if with stick up ass) shit storm.

She begins

"There go those social psychologists again, confirming beliefs we already held. This time, it's about the fragility of masculinity and the lengths to which men will go to protect it.…

…how can we use this knowledge to help us better negotiate with men?"

Later, in reply to a reader's agreeable comment :

"I have to frankly admit that I haven't a clue what "masculinity" means.

I like smart. I like funny. I like an individual who is capable of self-reflection and self-correction. I respect anyone with the guts to admit error readily, apologize and make it better and I respect greatly those men who have learned a broader range of feeling states than horny and angry.

So, I don't know. What IS masculinity anyway? Having a hunting dog? Pitching a tent? Rafting a Class IV river? Most women can and do all of these things. Raw physical strength seems to be the only significant difference between us when it comes to getting s done and it's not uncommon for some women to possess more physical strength than men.

Most of the ballyhooed masculine traits seem to me to be pretty passé. Not backing down. Providing physical protection for people (not women, people) who are weaker than they are. Knowing how car engines work and what to do when the fail. Changing flat tires. I don't think most men want to be known for these abilities.

I ready willing and able to be enlightened. Enlighten me!"

[image]

Well I tried to show her the light :

elmer 1 minute ago

Why bother trying to enlighten such a flaming sexist bigot?

Your essay and comments are full of sneering condescension towards men.

If men are so fragile, why is there such a huge industry proffering cosmetics and push-up bras to women? I know your answer : "men and society" are forcing you to do it.

There is so much BS here (and you will delete my comment anyway, because you are a tough, strong woman who can take it like a man) that it hardly warrants a response. But your claim that "it is not uncommon" for women to be stronger than men really takes the cake. I am 55 years old and can still slap the crap out of 99% of women. About the only men I can do that to are near my age and moving just as slowly.

And stop with the tiresome lists of what you like in a man. "Smart, funny, ready to apologize". Anyone reading such tripe knows that the qualities you claim to desire are the exact opposite of what women find attractive in men. They want a brute to dominate and control them and hate to the depths of their soul any male who exhibits feminine tendencies

You will never know Victoria. Hope you get plenty of page views for your ugly, hateful essay proclaiming your superiority to those sissified males.

She promply deleted my comment. Like a classic office player, while claiming to want "feedback" she savagely suppresses unapproved commentary. This demonstrates why you can't negotiate with modern corporate women. A woman has an assumption about useless male strength and character traits coupled with her own agenda about what she wants. What's fair is what's fair for her. Fact is, men inherently negotiate from their physical strength. We have an assumption that if we don't act honorably, our adversary may inflict bodily harm on us. A woman on the other hand, will disregard some verbal agreement that she made with you merely to conclude some "negotiation". Men call it "their word". Women call it "I just decided I don't have to do that" or some other permutation that is the opposite of what she just agreed to.

Granted, men will lie in your face in anticipation of providing you future ass-roguerings, but our recourse remains the same and tempers their excesses. No doubt also that many of you have had to restrain your violent impulses in the face of some feminized Encorpera male who depends on the corporate rules to protect him in the face of a scurrilous, cowardly act (s)he has pulled to best you. When a woman does it the frustration can be disorienting, and you find yourself struggling not to respond like a female, which is the only Encorpera-approved method for coming to a co-worker consensus. The modern woman sits atop a a societal structure built from the cornerstone of male rivalry while declaring men's strength and masculinity as passe'. Were it not for men's inclination to fight and form alliances to pillage from their fellow men it is unlikely she would have a job washing loincloths, let alone being a corporate attorney.

NASA Clears the Air on Low-Energy Nukes

W.F. Price · 14 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Following Monday's post on a potential new energy source, NASA released a short, hastily-produced video to give laymen an idea of what we might expect from the new technology. It seems last week saw an increase in queries to various agencies concerning LENR (low energy nuclear reaction), which prompted NASA to release the clip on Thursday.

Dr. Zawodny confirms that in time we should be able to use safe nuclear reactors in our homes for heat and power generation. I've embedded the YouTube version (NASA hosts the video here):

Having recently joked to my son that "daddy will get a nuclear-powered car" I now find myself in the position of being able to tell him that he may well be riding a nuclear-powered bicycle in the not-too-distant future.

Actually, if Zawodny is correct, this will be as revolutionary to power generation as the internet has been to media. It's a good analogy, but the economic implications could be even more profound, as energy is an even more important factor than the free flow of information.

It's good to know that the men at NASA and SPAWAR are on the ball here and keeping us up to date on this enormously important research.

Feminist Neighbor Unleashes Police on new SF Sheriff

W.F. Price · 16 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Ross Mirkarimi, San Francisco sheriff-elect, was arrested about a week ago following an argument with his wife, during which he allegedly grabbed her arm. Following the argument, a neighbor videotaped Mirkarimi's wife, and then called the police, leading to the arrest. However, this was not just your standard nosy neighbor, but rather a bona-fide feminist named Ivory Madison, who has headed the San Francisco chapter of NOW. Additionally, she knew Mirkarimi and his wife personally, and actually campaigned for Mirkarimi during his run for Sheriff.

Before Marrying Mirkarimi, Eliana Lopez was a Venezuelan telenovela star. She is a recent immigrant to the US, having lived here for only a few years. It's unlikely that she really understands the implications of American DV law. Like many women who get caught up in these incidents, she probably didn't understand how consequential it can be in the US to get someone else involved in one's marriage, but it seems that she did at least realize that involving the police would be a bad idea, and urged Ms. Madison to withhold the video, which ultimately proved futile, as the police easily obtained a warrant based on the 911 call.

Now, Mirkarimi faces three misdemeanor charges, and his career hangs in the balance. His entire family could well end up disgraced in San Francisco, and his wife's stock in local society will drop dramatically. Now that the implications have sunk in, she is insisting that her husband is not abusive and that the incident was "taken out of context." Unfortunately, however, she initially put her faith in a feminist, and if there's anything a feminist knows how to do it's destroy men and their marriages. If a woman also suffers as a consequence, well, "you have to break a few eggs to make an omelette…"

Plenty of people are asking why a woman would stay with "an abusive man." First of all, nobody knows whether Mirkarimi even committed domestic violence under our laws. He's been charged, but not convicted. Secondly, this could well have been a very minor incident of mutual violence, e.g. his wife made a scene, got physical, and he restrained her by grabbing her arm. However, under current law this would still imply guilt for one party or the other — any physical contact whatsoever in the context of anger or annoyance is a crime. In the overwhelming majority of the world's cultures, such incidents are not considered police matters, but thanks to people like Ivory Madison the cops will be in your home ready to throw people in jail minutes following such an allegation.

Having grown up in a neighborhood that had its share of dysfunction, I learned this lesson early. I'd hear a woman fighting with her husband or boyfriend (typically she was the more aggressive party), and soon enough cops would show up and haul the guy out in cuffs, the triumphant woman standing proudly on the porch with her hands on her hips. Knowing the score probably saved my bacon in my own divorce, as I knew exactly what to expect if I let myself get drawn into any physical altercation with a female. Here in the states you can safely cheat on your wife, betray her or give her AIDS, but God forbid you push her away when she's screaming in your face.

Because he enlisted the support of feminists in his campaign, it's mighty hard to feel sorry for Mirkarimi. Additionally, as a sheriff, he is personally involved in the enforcement of the draconian laws that resulted in his own arrest. He's like the KGB officer who ends up in Lubyanka. Not an enviable position, but one in which there is some inherent justice at work.

Mirkarimi's hapless wife and innocent child are the real victims in this case, but it is the law and her feminist neighbor that have hurt them the most, not the husband. As a Venezuelan, Eliana Lopez probably had no idea this could come about. She never would have expected that her neighbor would destroy her husband's career over what she sees, from her own cultural context, as an inconsequential domestic squabble — one that she may have started herself without understanding the implications.

Finally, I strongly suspect that some envy was at work here. Ivory Madison, a woman who is obviously full of herself, must have resented the hot Latina married to the handsome politician. What better way to take that foreign bitch down a notch or two than to wreck her husband's career?

Will Women and Children Have to Wait in Line Now?

Featured Guest · 17 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Lyn87

By now, everyone has heard that the Costa Concordia, the 26th-largest cruise ship (formerly) afloat, ran aground off the Italian coast. Details are sketchy, and it will be some time before we get the full picture, but a few things are known about this mishap, nearly 100 years after the RMS Titanic went down in the Atlantic.

Some things have changed since 1912 – other things have not.

What is known is that there was a lot of chaos as the ship was being evacuated – chaos caused in no small part because the senior leadership failed to provide direction. It is in high-stress situations that one learns one's measure, and being on a 115,000 ton piece of machinery filling with cold water with a few thousand people is one such situation.

While nobody was visibly in charge, there was a generalized expectation that women and children should be the first on the lifeboats. Equally apparent is that not all the men were keen to follow the script. The foreign press was filled with outrage that some men (invariably described as that subset of men known as husbands), were unwilling to be separated from their families in what looked like a life-and-death situation.

We've all heard the shaming language: those men were cowards, doncha' know? Both women and, to a lesser extent, men, were piling on these guys. It's not enough that they were protecting their families: they apparently had a duty to die for the benefit of women and children they don't even know once their own families were safe.

Most of us know that there are no feminists in a burning building. We can now add "or on a sinking ship" to that. Even in 2012.

The sinking of the RMS Titanic almost exactly a century ago invites comparison. Sure, there are great differences, such as the body count, the availability of rapid rescue, and the actions of the crew, but some things remain, like insufficient deployable lifeboats and the all-important, "Women and children first!"

The good news is threefold: 1) the ship ran aground and did not actually sink, so the magnitude of the disaster appeared far greater while it was happening than it turned out to be, 2) the number of deaths was a fraction of what it might have been under slightly different circumstances, and 3) a lot of people who responded to the reports berated the people who said the men had a duty to stay on board until the women and children were all safe.

It is those comments that struck me most. The MRM is getting more vocal, and a lot of guys are now saying, "You wanted equality. This is what it looks like." And they are saying it aloud and in public. Even a few women chimed in, saying that men have no obligation to die for women if women want equality. (Somehow I suspect there wasn't much, "I am woman, hear me roar, watch me drown" on the Costa Concordia itself, but hey, it's a start.)

Needless to say, there were a few hamster wheels in hyper-drive, as feminists tried to have it both ways. I even saw the "77-cents-on-the-dollar" argument thrown out, as if being more productive somehow makes your life worth less. But now many people know the "77 cents" argument is bogus, so every time somebody brings it up it has fewer defenders and it gets shot down with facts, so even more people learn the truth about it.

Quite a few commenters still stuck with the idea that men should stand aside while able-bodied women are rescued first, because women were less physically capable and aggressive and more prone to freezing up under extreme stress. A few guys pointed out that people who could not function under stress did not belong in all sorts of places, like boardrooms and battalions.

Ouch. That's gotta' hurt.

On the other hand, if they truly are our equals, let them queue up for the lifeboats like everyone else. When they do that, they can make themselves some new shirts with this message:

This is what a feminist looks like

I'm not going to hold my breath waiting for that to happen.

Annoying, But Necessary

W.F. Price · 18 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There's an internet "blackout" going on right now over the SOPA and PIPA bills that are making their way through congress.

Evidently, these bills will place the burden for policing user-contributed content on site owners, and that would really suck for me. In fact, it might mean I'd have to shut off open comments and moderate every single comment, which would not only negatively affect user experience, but would also be an enormous waste of time. Furthermore, I'd have liability for what any nut posted in comments, and that just isn't fair. Feminists have long wanted to hold me responsible for what totally independent, random posters comment, and so far I've been able to simply tell them to go to hell. These bills may change that.

Please contact your senators and representative and urge them to oppose this stupidity. Individual responsibility is at the heart of our republic, and freedom. This means that citizens should not be held liable for the actions or words of others, over whom they have no power in any event.

Lifeboat Feminism in Practical Application

Elusive Wapiti · 18 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

This article by Rich Lowry over at NRO heaps shame upon the men of the Costa Concordia who allegedly jostled women and children on the way to the lifeboats. While I can relate to the author's assertion that we as a society have lost something valuable when the strong push aside the weak, for indeed we have, it is but the natural and predictable consequence of decades of equalitarian social engineering that released women from the requirement to behave in a ladylike and chaste manner, and declared men and women absolutely equal and fungible. The author laments the lack of chivalry amongst the men; I assert it is merely what happens when men, having witnessed the liberation of women from their duty to act like ladies, decide that it is quite silly to die like men of auld for unrelated women and children:

> [An] Australian mother said of the scene, "We just couldn't believe it – especially the men, they were worse than the women."
> Another woman passenger agreed, "There were big men, crew members, pushing their way past us to get into the lifeboats." Yet another, a grandmother, complained, "I was standing by the lifeboats and men, big men, were banging into me and knocking the girls."
> Guys aboard the Costa Concordia apparently made sure the age of chivalry was good and dead by pushing it over and trampling on it in their heedless rush for the exits. The grounded cruise ship has its heroes, of course, just as the Titanic had its cowards. But the discipline of the Titanic's crew and the self-enforced chivalric ethic that prevailed among its men largely trumped the natural urge toward panicked self-preservation.

I have argued several times on this blog that this is the logical end of equalitarianism and sec-humanism. When women are declared the equals of men, their inherent biological vulnerability is papered over, and they are seen as just another male. Better smelling and better looking, but the same worth as men. And no more worthy of preferential treatment in the mad dash for the exits than the next guy. On the Costa Concordia, it was every human for him/herself. One would think women, the sex for whose benefit feminism tirelessly toils, would be overjoyed at this indicator of equal consideration. At long last, they have arrived! But they are not. Funny how feminist equalitarianism goes out the window when in mortal danger. Seems the two gals quoted above really don't want to die like men, despite living as an equal to one.

It was also interesting to contrast the tenor of Mr. Lowry's slightly anachronistic article and that of the vast majority of the comments. While they do not explicitly connect the dots wrt the lady-gentleman dynamic that is part and parcel to chivalry, the comments tended to pin the tail of responsibility for this present state of affairs on the feminist donkey. Thus, as far as the readership to NRO is concerned, there is at least a vague awareness that if chivalry is dead, it wasn't men that killed it but feminism. And that it is quite presumptuous to demand preferential selection for a lifeboat when you demand equal-or-even-preferential treatment in all other facets of life as well.

Something else, too: Chivalry doesn't mean preferential treatment for women, although it is frequently cast as such in contemporary culture. Neither is it necessarily manners, although that is a component of it. At its heart, chivalry was/is a code of conduct that sought to shape the behavior of warriors (who also enjoyed a superior social position) so that the strong protected the weak who could/would be harmed by untrammelled violence.

Viewed in this manner, in a way it is not unreasonable to appeal to chivalry when recommending the behavior of the physically strong (men) vis-à-vis the physically weak (women and young children). However, as political and social violence is force just the same as physical violence, given the socially inferior position of men in our society when compared to women, the principles of chivalry would require that women (the strong) yield to men (the weak). Let that bake your noodle for a while…feminism, by socially advantaging women in all aspects of life, and technology, by neutering the historical advantage of brawn, has flipped the script such that we should instead be saying “men and children first” rather than the converse.

I’ll close this post with a poem, supposedly written in 1912, submitted by a commenter to Mr. Lowry’s article:

> “Votes for women!”
> Was the cry,
> Reaching upward to the Sky.
> Crashing glass
> And flashing eye-
> “Votes for Women!”
> Was the cry.
> “Boats for women!”
> Was the Cry.
> When the brave
> Were come to die.
> When the end
> Was drawing nigh-
> Was the cry.

Indeed. I do wonder how much more time cultural lifeboat feminism has left. For it doesn’t seem sustainable to demand manhood from men while not making a symmetrical demand for womanhood from women. And for far too long, womanhood has been an empty vessel, something one does not strive toward but is simply arrived at. If we are to have manhood once again–something I think our society won’t long survive without–it seems to me that we as a society will need to start demanding something more of womanhood as well. For manhood is the complement to womanhood, and if womanhood is an empty ~~suit~~ skirt, then the organism isn’t wholly complete.

Women Weigh In on Men's Issues

W.F. Price · 18 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As a commenter pointed out yesterday, a number of women have become interested in men's issues recently. One in particular, who goes by "girlwriteswhat", is pretty articulate, and seems to have a good understanding of why some men are as upset as they are. Her video is a refreshing departure from the usual "man up" refrain coupled with the "male privilege" lie, so I'll embed it here for viewers who have the time (it's almost 20 minutes):

I think she gets it mostly right, however she should take into account that different men have different styles, so while some may sound shrill and profane, others who are just as fed up may communicate in a different manner. However, because it takes all sorts, it's good to see that some people are beginning to understand why there is this level of anger out there amongst a growing segment of the male population.

I found a number of responses from young females to girlwriteswhat's video. Some support her, others do not. It surprised me a bit to see this level of interest in men's issues amongst young females, but that's probably because as I get older I pay even less attention to their opinions than I used to.

King County Family Court Exposé Reveals DV Profiteers

The Seattle Weekly, a middle-brow, usually liberal Seattle publication, has come out with a long article about the abuses men are subject to in family court. Those of us who have been through it are already all too familiar with what happens, but people are still surprised by the blatant anti-male bias. After you learn about it first-hand, it's hard to understand how it could possibly not be common knowledge that men face something akin to a medieval inquisition during a custody dispute, but I think it's because divorce is a bit like death — people just don't want to think about these things. It's taboo. The "it will never happen to me" mentality is pervasive, and for good reason: one's mental health might depend on it.

Nevertheless, it's an issue that can't be swept under the rug forever, because the price is too high. The current system is creating a class of children who will grow up traumatized by the fact that one of their parents, almost always the father, has been arbitrarily branded a social deviant and forced out of their lives. It is also turning a number of productive, otherwise healthy men into impoverished emotional wrecks whose ability to contribute to society, not to mention their children's welfare, is severely compromised.

So it's with some guarded optimism that I see a local publication publish a hard-hitting piece that reveals not only the deplorable tactics, but some of the people who profit from them. Because states and counties have jurisdiction over the courts, a great deal of the fight to rectify family law will have to occur at the local level. This is why grassroots effort is just as important as any national attention, and why I'm just as happy when I see local media addressing the problem as when national media takes it up.

In the Weekly's article a couple characters are exposed to the light, including Doug Bartholomew, a man who runs one of the state certified domestic violence programs. Here is a picture of Doug. If you are a married or cohabiting man in King County Washington, especially if you have children, this man is not your friend. If at all possible, avoid him.

Page four of the article explains why:

> Given their extremely rushed proceedings, family-law commissioners often punt to such "expert" evaluations to make recommendations that can be heard in later hearings. Smith did that in Richard's case, ordering a "risk assessment" from a counselor who specializes in domestic violence.
> Richard says he welcomed the assessment. "OK, great," he says he thought. "Now I'm going to go to somebody whose job it is to ferret out the truth." He says he didn't even mind paying the $1,000-plus fee.
> But when counselor Doug Bartholomew came out with his report a month later, Richard was even further in the hole. The counselor did say that he couldn't determine whether Richard had assaulted his wife. Yet Bartholomew still recommended that Richard attend a domestic-violence treatment program, as well as a class called "DV Dads."
> Why? For one thing, he held out the possibility that Richard was dangerous. He attached extreme importance to the engineer's attempt to have the counselor look at a mental-health self-evaluation his wife had done. "Since submitting someone's private records against their will is so inherently antisocial, it raises the question of whether or not he's capable of similar 'stop at nothing' behavior," Bartholomew wrote.
> Richard's personality and background were also suspect, according to Bartholomew. For one thing, he was successful. "The downside of success, and he's been very successful, is that we tend not to learn compassion, empathy, or insight." Richard, he wrote, "has never experienced tragedy."
> Richard suffered from a "Puer complex," the condition of being an "eternal boy," in Bartholomew's estimation. The engineer was unable to describe his son in an "I-Thou manner," an apparent reference to philosopher Martin Buber's description of seeing other people as possessing distinct wants and needs. This seemed to > account for Bartholomew's finding that Richard posed "some risk of further psychological abuse." As the counselor put it a year and a half later at trial, "the most conspicuous feature" of his evaluation was Richard's "indifference" to his wife's "feelings and needs."

Too many men still believe that the state cares about truth, justice, etc. Richard was one of them. Unfortunately, he learned the hard way that the state does not care about these things — it simply wants results consistent with its mandate. Any tool that can be "legally" used will be brought to bear. When you allow yourself to be examined by any state agent, the state will simply use this to achieve its goals — what's fair to you, personally, is irrelevant. If the court orders you go through an evaluation, hire your own evaluator. Do not under any circumstances use the state service if you can avoid it. If it's optional, decline. In the majority of cases, the report will harm you much more than it will help.

However, Richard had the resources to eventually take the case to trial, where he won. Bartholomew, apparently so used to simply destroying men's chances and pocketing the money, had been sloppy in his methods. He didn't proofread the report, his logic was found to be faulty, and his claims contradicted the law.

Bartholomew, for his part, whines that he is being targeted by a "hate group:"

> In an interview and follow-up e-mail, Bartholomew says that dads like Richard aren't the only ones being targeted, but that he too is a victim, calling his persecutors a "homegrown hate group of men . . . whose stated intention is to destroy the [domestic-violence] intervention system."
> Turning to Richard's case, Bartholomew claims his report was misconstrued: "First of all, I said the guy didn't do any domestic violence." No matter that those words aren't in his report, that he referred to further psychological "abuse," and that the judge and the attorneys understood the exact opposite—the counselor points to his line saying that he couldn't determine whether Richard had assaulted his wife. Although at trial Bartholomew argued that assault is not a necessary component of domestic violence, he now says that it is.

Doug Bartholomew is a very typical representative of what is termed the "domestic violence industry." The man is the domestic equivalent of the arms dealer who profits from third world conflicts. Rather than ameliorate family conflicts, he introduces weapons that escalate them and then, when all that remains is ruinous misery and despair, pockets a check.

W.F. Price · 22 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes we find evidence that even in the supposed heyday of traditional gender roles there was a wider sense of anticipation about a different future for women than we might expect. Of course, the idea that all people would become a race of supermen (and women) had been around for a long time by the postwar era, and had already showed up in all sorts of places, such as sci-fi books and Bolshevik and Nazi propaganda, so it's no surprise that some huckster selling weight-loss formulas would make outlandish claims. But what stands out to modern readers is that some women envisioned a race of superior females; that is, the women would grow to challenge men physically, and even surpass them.

The Smithsonian's "Paleofuture" blog quotes a couple of women who contributed to an AP article titled "How Experts Think We'll Live in 2000 A.D."

One, an editor at the AP named Dorothy Roe, declared that women would be competing with men on the field in sports such as football, boxing and wrestling:

> The woman of the year 2000 will be an outsize Diana, anthropologists and beauty experts predict. She will be more than six feet tall, wear a size 11 shoe, have shoulders like a wrestler and muscles like a truck driver.
> Chances are she will be doing a man's job, and for this reason will dress to fit her role. Her hair will be cropped short, so as not to get in the way. She probably will wear the most functional clothes in the daytime, go frilly only after dark.
> Slacks probably will be her usual workaday costume. These will be of synthetic fiber, treated to keep her warm in winter and cool in summer, admit the beneficial ultra-violet rays and keep out the burning ones. They will be light weight and equipped with pockets for food capsules, which she will eat instead of meat and potatoes.
> Her proportions will be perfect, though Amazonian, because science will have perfected a balanced ration of vitamins, proteins and minerals that will produce the maximum bodily efficiency, the minimum of fat.
> She will go in for all kinds of sports – probably will compete with men athletes in football, baseball, prizefighting and wrestling.
> She'll be in on all the high-level groups of finance, business and government.
> She may even be president.

Perhaps this represents Ms. Roe's personal fantasy, but I don't see how a woman built like a wrestler could fairly be described as a "Diana." Ironically, women in 1950 were probably stronger pound for pound than contemporary women. They walked more, performed more physical labor, and generally had to do a lot more by hand than modern women. They may not have been quite as tall, but since the 1960s women have expanded rather more horizontally than vertically. Even considering improvements in cosmetic dentistry, American women were probably somewhat more attractive in the mid-20th century than today. As for "the minimum of fat," well…

The predictions demonstrate how the notion of "equality" has shifted over the decades. In 1950, equality meant that women could compete with men on their own turf, playing by the same rules. The "emancipated woman" would grow to match men, and even go toe-to-toe with them in the ring. This earlier notion of equality was still around to some extent when I was a pre-schooler in the late 70s; I can remember Sesame Street playing it up from time to time. But by the time affirmative action rolled into full implementation in the 80s, the kind of thinking that inspired the ERA (Equal Rights Amendment) was cast aside in favor of legally handicapping men so as to give women all the benefits men had without having to actually compete by the same rules and on the level.

By the 90s, the old idea of equality was totally abandoned in favor of the sanctity of victimhood, whereby men were held to be such an all-powerful, evil force ("The Patriarchy") that their legal handicaps had to be correspondingly severe. Today, equality has little to do with improving the lot of some for the benefit of all, but rather leveling society to our shared detriment.

The aspirations of the 20th century seem quaint in retrospect, but we still live live with their legacy, albeit in a twisted form.

Eliana Lopez Distraught, Says American Law "Destroying my Family"

W.F. Price · 23 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Although San Francisco Sheriff Ross Mirkarimi's Venezuelan wife pleaded for her family to reunited, Judge Susan Breall extended a protection order separating Mirkarimi from his wife and son pending the outcome of trial. Lopez insisted that she was not in danger, that she was not a "little poor immigrant," and that she loves her husband, but the judge, at the request of prosecutor Elizabeth Aguilar-Tarchi, insisted the protection order remain in place.

When Eliana went to her neighbor Ivory Madison, a prominent San Francisco feminist, to tell her side of the story in a domestic dispute she and her husband had had, she insisted that the police not be involved. Demonstrating her naïve understanding of American law, she asked whether the police would arrest him or "just come and talk to him." Evidently, there had been some talk of divorce, which is usually the precipitating factor for police involvement in a marriage. Perhaps Lopez was considering divorce, or she may simply have been making threats. In any event, her stated concern was custody, as is often the case. Her concerns may have been aggravated by the prospect of an international custody dispute, which underscores the importance of talking about this issue before marriage, especially the international kind.

It seems she wanted some dirt on Mirkarimi in case she ever chose to divorce him and take the child back to Venezuela, but she didn't actually intend to do so at the time. She must have figured a feminist would be a good ally in any such eventuality, but she certainly didn't count on the series of events that followed her session with Ms. Madison.

This case demonstrates the rigid nature of the American legal system where family law is concerned. If, for example, two business partners were involved in some minor altercation that led to a police call, say, at a party after having had too much to drink, the prosecutor would drop the charges without a second thought if the "victim" refused to cooperate. If a protection order had been issued, it would also be dismissed at the request of the victim. However, families do not have this option. This is because, according to feminist-inspired family law, wives have no "agency." What has happened is that the twisted logic of feminism, in insisting that the goal is to give women "agency," has argued that they do not in fact have any at all, because they are all victims of "The Patriarchy," which is a sort of stand-in for Satan in the feminist cosmology.

Therefore, in their dealings with the opposite sex, because individual women cannot resist The Patriarchy, it is up to the "benevolent" institutions of government and law to make decisions for women (and sometimes against their will), thereby "empowering" them and striking a blow against the oppressor. This is the reason the judge really had little leeway in continuing the protection order. Judges rubber-stamp protection orders because even if the women themselves demand they be dismissed, they will ultimately be held responsible if anything goes wrong, because the women have no agency.

In the real world, women do have agency. Women are held responsible for following the law, showing up to work on time, feeding and dressing themselves, and even behaving themselves in public. It may not be very sexy, but it's true: women are independent human beings capable of taking both practical and moral responsibility for their lives, and making their own decisions. It is only in their intimate relationships with men that this is questioned. And only to this extent here in the Anglo world. This is why Eliana Lopez is so shocked and bitter about what has happened. Where she came from, her decision would be respected, whether for good or ill.

In explaining to Eliana why she was extending the protection order, the judge gives us a hint of what's behind the policy. Although Judge Breall says that Eliana is "educated, intelligent … a strong individual, and quite charming," she goes on to point out that "When you cry out for help, you don't always cry out for police intervention. But the police are involved in this case… I'm going to treat this case, at this point, like every other."

What Breall is saying is that when you get the state involved in your marriage, it's out of your hands. It's truly a Faustian bargain women have made with their erstwhile allies.

I've been tinkering around with some software that will give me the option of granting access to certain categories of content only to those who are subscribers to the site (those who have created a profile and can login). The content I have in mind is comments, which have long been an issue. The problem now is that anyone can comment, and therefore lots of people ignore the commenting policy for whatever reason. Additionally, I am getting tired of having comments from the site used by detractors to build up their own sites. Frankly, it's kind of an abuse of intellectual property. It may be legal, but it is not in the spirit of the law.

So, although I'm definitely leaning toward making changes very soon, I'd like some feedback from readers as to what their preference would be, so if you'd care to provide some feedback you can put your vote in here:

Gender Neutral Baby Revealed: It's a Boy

W.F. Price · 24 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A British couple that decided to raise their child in a 'gender neutral' environment has finally revealed that the kid is a boy. This doesn't surprise me at all. Knowing these kinds of nuts, it makes perfect sense that they did it to their son, because they usually try to make a point at the expense of a boy, and raising girls like boys is already common throughout the Anglo world.

They had the boy cross-dress, and when he tried to run around naked in the yard (little kids love doing that), they hustled him back in to hide him from the neighbors and gave him dolls. His mother is making him wear the girls' school uniform, and won't let him wear combat trousers.

Not long ago, gender identity problems in children were considered a mental disorder. There's a reason for that. It can cause serious mayhem when puberty hits. It's unlikely that this kid will think of himself as 'gender-neutral' for much longer, but if he walked into the girls' locker room in middle school and took off his clothes, we all know what would happen to him. So does his mother, and I'm sure she supports boys being punished for such behavior.

This is why she doesn't really believe in this garbage; she's just using the boy to bolster her progressive cred. Pure selfishness at her son's expense.

Halle Berry Treating Babydaddy Like Sperm Donor

Halle Berry is petitioning the court to ban her daughter's father from having any contact whatsoever with their child. She has already accused Gabriel Aubry, a Canadian model, of abuse, and had the judge order supervised visitation with a nanny of her choice and under her employ. Inevitably, some problems have arisen between Mr. Aubry and the nanny, who is now accusing him of assault and child abuse. If the judge who went along with this ill-conceived plan didn't see this coming from a mile away, I'd be highly surprised. Almost looks as though the judge collaborated in setting Mr. Aubry up, which is beyond the pale even in the sordid realm of family law.

Sadly, Berry's vindictiveness is common amongst women following breakups with their child's father. But in this case, the racial angle is contributing to tension. Although it isn't a well-known fact, white fathers of children with black women face even worse odds than your typical father. The traditional "one-drop rule" that posits that all Americans with black African ancestry are strictly black tends to put a barrier between the father and child, because people assume that children should be raised amongst their own. This may be why one of the main points of contention between Aubry and Berry has been over whether their daughter is "black." If so, as the tradition goes, then he has no real claim to the child. The reason white mothers of mixed-race children don't have to deal with this problem is that default mother custody prevents it from arising in the first place.

Although it's unlikely Berry will succeed in cutting Aubry off from all contact with his daughter (even prisoners convicted of violent crimes have some visitation rights), she will probably have little trouble making it difficult for him to maintain a normal relationship with her. Additionally, she'll be able to force him to spend a great deal of money, and she's far wealthier than he is. This case will be a good test of whether California judges have any respect at all for fathers' rights. In a just world, a woman who tries to cut her children off from their father entirely out of vindictiveness should lose majority custody, but because that will never happen here, we can at least hope the judge tells Ms. Berry to back off.

Halle Berry may win a few rounds here and there, and she may ultimately be able to shove Gabriel Aubry largely out of his daughter's life, but cases like these are seen in a different light today, and she runs the risk of permanently tarnishing her reputation. The photos of a handsome Gabriel Aubry caring for his cute, happy daughter don't exactly jibe with the feminist stereotype, which casts fathers as vicious, brutal troglodytes. As comments below the Daily Mail article indicate, even women think Halle is out of line.

Super Bowl Sex-Trafficking Hysteria Back in the News

W.F. Price · 25 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Greg Zoeller, Indiana's Attorney General, is making noises about sex trafficking in connection with the upcoming Super Bowl in Indianapolis. It's a political gimmick that has been used for a couple years now, and has replaced the Super Bowl domestic violence campaign that eventually fell flat when feminist claims about mass beatings of wives and girlfriends during the Super Bowl were exposed as lies.

The Indiana AG has enlisted cabbies in the effort, and they dutifully attended training, which they will ignore if they want to keep their jobs. Calling the cops on paying customers is definitely frowned upon in the cab business, which derives significant revenue from hookers.

> "Whenever there's a large event like the Super Bowl, we know there's an increase in sex trafficking," said Valerie Schmitt, coordinator of a human-trafficking outreach effort in Indianapolis. "There's an increased demand for [commercial] sex and that leads to an increased risk that someone will be victimized."
> On Friday, as a House committee heard testimony on a bill that would ramp up criminal penalties for sex-traffickers in Indiana, Schmitt was meeting with about 100 cab drivers to ask for their help.
> She described some of the classic victims of sex-traffickers, including illegal immigrants forced to work off their debts by working as prostitutes or teenagers sexually exploited by adults. She predicted Indianapolis will see an influx of prostitutes, including many who are underage.
> "You're our eyes and our ears …" she told them. "You meet a lot of people and overhear a lot of conversations that might be helpful in recognizing someone involved in [sex] trafficking."
> She asked them to put the human-trafficking hotline phone number of 888-373-7888 into their cells phones and use it if they suspect anything. Some of the cab drivers looked skeptical; while others pulled out their cell phones to program in the number.

What's really shameful about this campaign, which should rightly be called a crackdown on prostitution, is that it suggests that vast numbers of women will be working the streets against their will. The overwhelming majority of hookers are essentially independent contractors. They go where the business is, and usually that's where a lot of men are staying in hotels away from their families/girlfriends. The typical underage hooker is a runaway, and serves a lower level of clientele than the men who can afford to stay at hotels and watch the Super Bowl. Underage hookers are also more likely to be male than those over 18, and addicted to hard drugs.

Will some of the prostitutes in Indianapolis be illegal aliens? Certainly, but were they "trafficked?" Unlikely. Most illegal alien prostitutes came to the US of their own volition, and are working as hookers because it's a high-paying profession that doesn't require a green card. Where foreign hookers are concerned, the main problem here is illegal immigration, not "sex trafficking."

When I lived in Beijing, my neighborhood was home to a lot of foreigners, Koreans in particular. Because North Korea is such a mess, large numbers of North Koreans cross the Yalu to live in China as illegal immigrants. Beijing, which has historically been a destination for Koreans in China, is where a lot of them end up. Because of their illegal status, many of the females turn to prostitution. Every six months or so, the local police would do a sweep, and clean out entire apartment buildings full of Korean prostitutes. They weren't being targeted for prostitution, which is so common in China that the police hardly bother to regulate it, but rather for illegal entry. Even if they were being enticed by pimps, the profit potential could hardly be considered very great given how saturated the market is there. In fact, there are so many hookers in Chinese cities that keeping them out of any given venue is far more difficult than luring them in.

If Zoeller were being honest, he'd admit that this is the real problem faced by Indianapolis: hookers from all the neighboring counties will be coming to town to take advantage of the potential business. Nobody has to traffic them — they'll come of their own accord. Rather than "victims," they will primarily be a nuisance. However, they will represent a windfall for the cabbies, who will almost certainly not call the cops on them, even if they are illegal aliens.

African American Men and Feminism: A Zero Sum Proposition At Best

Demosthenes XXI · 26 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As I look at the journey to manhood for the African American male, I see it as a journey across a tightrope over the abyss. One wrong decision and you end up dead, incarcerated, or otherwise rendered unable to prosper in modern America. Positive role models for our young men are far and few in between. Even with our nation's first African American president in charge of the nation, we see him helpless against the slings and arrows of a racist political infrastructure and at the same time, a collaborator in the condemnation of males that is routine in American society. But seeing as he only has daughters, I would guess that President Obama has little stake in improving the lot of African American men or men in general.

But furthermore, the very concept of a competent and positive African American male has been broken in our country and more importantly, in our communities. When Bill Cosby had his award-winning sitcom "The Cosby Show," more non-African Americans viewed the show than African Americans. The main reason cited by African Americans, especially those in the lower income brackets was simple; stark disbelief. Men and women alike could not suspend their belief that an African American couple could be so positive and successful. Moreover, there was a massive disbelief by African American women that Bill Cosby's character, "Dr. Heathcliffe Huxtable" could be that successful in both his career and as a father. But to understand why that idea could still hold weight in today's society, you have to look at where it came from in our past.

Historically, we have been taught that African American men are not only dispensable, but nearly unnecessary; especially in the lower economic class communities. During the slavery era, the male would be the one sold as often as a child, in order to break up the slave family. After the Southern Diaspora, many men left the home in order to seek work for their families; this included African American males as well. Later on, poor African American men were stripped from their homes when Women in those same poor African American communities learned via positive reinforcement from the government and the media that they were financially better off without their husbands than with them. And the natural extrapolation of that idea led to men only being needed for their sperm as these women found that the more children they bore, the more money they could receive from the government…and again, just as long as the man did not live in the home.

Then, mainstream feminism came into the picture and told the African American woman that she didn't need her African American man in her life at all. And again, the government came in and reinforced the idea by providing countless incentives for African American women to remain single. Oprah Winfrey, a newswoman from a Tennessee news station made her bones (and millions) by demonizing African American men to African American women (and White American women). The early episodes of The Oprah Winfrey show repeatedly showed America how horrible African American and poor White men were to their women. Add to this the patent criminalization and incarceration of African American men that has been part of American culture since the late 60s and the net result; a large part of an entire generation of African American children who grew up fatherless or otherwise without a responsible male role model in their lives.

History has proven that the imagery of identification is a very powerful force in the development of children. Going back to television; in the late sixties, one of the landmark television shows was "Julia" starring Diahann Carroll; a show about a single (widowed) African American mother who was a nurse. This had personal relevance to me as I was in elementary school during the period of time in which the show aired. Nearly every girl in my school had a Julia lunchbox; not Barbie or any other "white" marketing item, but Julia. As a result, a large number of African American women in my generation were influenced into nursing as a career. But even then, people recognized the danger of the show to the African American community. The series came under criticism from African-American viewers for its depiction of a fatherless Black family. Excluding a Black male lead, it was argued, "rendered the series safer" and "less likely to grapple with issues that might upset white viewers."

And while we are still on the subject of feminine identification and going back to “The Cosby Show;” that show was credited for inspiring a large number of African Americans to consider collegiate-level study and attending HBCUs (Historically Black Colleges and Universities) based upon the Huxtable Alma-mater, Hillman College. It’s funny that the spinoff show “A Different World,” featured the Huxtable daughter, Denise (Lisa Bonet) rather than the one Huxtable son, Theo (Malcom Jamal Warner). Especially considering the unstable acting career and decisions surrounding Bonet at the time. Warner would have made a more stable choice and would have been more likely to remain with the cast of the show…but I digress.

Going back to the sixties and seventies in TV; at least the young African American women in that period of time had somebody they could identify with, as many of their mothers were also single and raising them. Unfortunately, the young men weren’t so lucky. They didn’t have “Paul Winfields” or “Fred Williamsons” to look up to in real life. Instead they had less scrupulous men like “Comfort (Clifton Davis’ role as a pimp in the 70s ABC “movie of the week” “Little Ladies of the Night”) as role models. Without respectable father figures in or around the home, the young African American males had to look elsewhere for their icons. In those poor communities filled with fatherless male children, the only men who demonstrated evidence of prosperity were the criminals and hustlers. Thus you see the “gangsta” or thug culture that is endemic in African American society today.

Once, I worked with young men in “at risk communities” and I saw the results of this everyday. I saw these young men who dumbed themselves down because intellect is now considered an emasculating trait in their neighborhoods. All the math you need to know is how to count your money and the number of shots you fired out of your gun.

At the same time, I see countless opportunities available for young African American women to better themselves. Foundations, scholarships, organizations, and more. Where are these things for the young men? The only government sanctioned youth organizations I see for young African American men are Job Corps or the detention home. There’s a lot of “unsanctioned” ones though. The Vice Lords, The Black Gangster Disciple Nation, The Crips, The Bloods, Zoe Pound…there are “youth organizations” like these for young Black men in nearly every major city….

Despite all this, I see African American men who are willing to defend mainstream feminism at all costs. I ask those men to take a look at what has been done to us in feminism’s name and at least see their responsibility in the troubles that have beset the African American community. The Slutwalk is the latest demonstration in how mainstream feminism does not even consider the issues of our sisters, but claims to speak for them. If mainstream feminism cannot even address the needs of African American women, then how can you as African American men even think that the movement as a whole has our best interests at heart? The answer to saving this generation of young African American men is not going to be found in mainstream feminism…not alone. There have to be masculine interests and viewpoints involved.

I’m not completely damning feminism in this indictment of what has been done to our children, but until we can eliminate some of the zero-sum politics that feminists use to divert attention and funding from helping young men in need, this is only going to worsen and eventually the powder-keg that is the African American male youth is going to blow up.

As always, I thank you for reading my words.

Comments Decision

Readers have spoken through the poll I put up on Tuesday concerning comments. A plurality preferred open comments, but slightly more than half wanted some additional controls on the comments. Some readers suggested simply making some minor changes to the rating system and the organization of comments. Taking all into account, I've come up with what I think is a reasonable compromise: comments will remain open, but only registered subscribers will have the option of voting on them. Fortunately, I've found some software that will allow me to implement this.

However, because we technically have over 800 registered subscribers, many of whom are probably only occasional users, I'm going to have to pare the list down to those who have contributed either content or support to the site, because they should automatically have a vote. I'm not sure exactly how I'll do this yet, but it will probably involve emailing all subscribers and asking whether they want to remain registered users. Additionally, I'll contact those on the email list and ask if they want to participate.

I'd like to run the site as something of a republic, with all those who have a stake in it having a say. With this setup, it will be easier for me to get an idea of what supporters expect and want regarding content and direction (there will be some important tools besides simply voting available to registered subscribers). When it comes down to it, I am working for our readers, and to do a proper job I have to have a better mechanism in place whereby I can hear them.

Feel free to add additional thoughts below.

The gift transformed into a debt.

> Blessed is he who expects no gratitude, for he shall not be disappointed.
> – W.C. Bennett

Back in 1852 the troop ship HMS Birkenhead sank in shark infested waters off the coast of South Africa. There weren't enough lifeboats to save everyone, and the captain made the extraordinary decision to reserve them for the women and children aboard. The crew followed the captain's order even though it meant his and many of their own deaths. This incredible example of men sacrificing for others has made what otherwise would have been an obscure shipwreck a famous event in history.

Even a century and a half later, women still understand the meaning of the profound sacrifice made by those brave men:

> Men owe us.

A similar event occurred in 1912 when RMS Titanic struck an iceberg. Well over a thousand men stood aside and died so that mostly women (and a lesser percentage of children) could survive. Women understood the meaning of that sacrifice as well:

> You got off easy. The women who survived are the ones who had to suffer. We didn't ask you to do this for us anyway.

And of course:

> Men owe us.

One of the videos I saw after the sinking of the Costa Concordia had an overweight American woman with a short haircut complaining:

> It certainly wasn't women and children first!

She said this in the form of an indictment, with the obvious expectation that all listening would see it as proof of an outrageous dereliction by the men on the ship. She and countless other women believe that since some men have volunteered to die in shipwrecks in the past, all men will forever have an obligation to do so. What men in the past did was an incredible act of graciousness; it has been met with an equally incredible lack of grace in return.

I've searched the web looking for a copy of the video to share, but unfortunately I couldn't find it. What I found instead was even more powerful however. Sheila Gregoire wrote a post/syndicated column shortly after the Costa Concordia went down titled: Women and Children First? A Feminist Tragedy (emphasis mine):

> In the comments I've been reading on the news reports, people seem to agree that children should be given priority, but there's a heated debate about the women. We're equal, so why should a man lose a place to a woman? Why should a man have to help a woman when he's in danger, too?
> And, as disgusting as I find that question, it makes sense. In 1912 it was a different world. Personal responsibility was still the main ethos of the day. People took care of their neighbours; they did not wait for government to do it for them. And people had a code of honour that included helping others when you could.

> Somehow we have lost that. It is no longer about honour and what we should do for others; it has become what others should do for us.

I assume the irony is lost on her that her response to men having shown incredible selflessness is to be upset that men might at times elect to take care of themselves instead of focusing on people like her. As I have written before, making chivalry mandatory or expected destroys the very concept. It isn't just feminists who destroyed chivalry, but feminist-lite women who view themselves as traditional.

Even so it wasn't Sheila's blog post which really startled me, it was the comments from many of the women who read her blog. Several of the women understood the issue and why men made different choices on that wreck than on certain shipwrecks in the past. But others took an attitude of incredible entitlement, assuming that men in general exist to serve them. Commenter Rachel started by explaining that men owe this to women because women's lives are worth more than men's:

> Women and children do not go first because they are weaker; they go first because lets face it, you need more women than men to keep the population going (men can make millions of babies in a day, women can only make 1-2 per year at best and our fertility is limited)and children are our future to continue the human race.

She then describes how she rudely bumped into a man recently in an elevator because she assumed he would understand that she has a special right to exit elevators first, even though of course she is his equal:

> That being said, I was just thinking of this topic last night. I was sharing an elevator with a man about my age. When the elevator stopped, I automatically started to get off and he almost ran into me! I am so used to men letting me get off the elevator first, it hadn't occurred to me that he wouldn't. Once I righted myself, I got thinking about it and why would he let me off first? I am his equal. I started to think if there was a scientific reason, and I could not come up with one. In fact, I thought maybe the man should go first to let him see if it's safe (I've watched too much late night drama and seen too many people get attacked getting off elevators).

Even though the uppity man in the elevator didn't know his place, she graciously suggests that there are times when it is acceptable for a man to enter a lifeboat:

> The thought process led to thinking about the "women and children first" policy and I do still think that applies, unless the child who is getting on the life boat is only accompanied by his/her father. I think then the dad should be able to get on the life boat with his child(ren).

I want to back up and remind you that before 1852 there was no such expectation that men should stand by and drown in order to save women who in most cases are strangers. The sense of entitlement so many women now have because of acts of incredible selflessness by men in the past is astonishing.

Another commenter named Britiney who writes a blog called Consider the Lillies read Sheila's post and it reminded her of a time recently when men she didn't know failed to snap-to and be her personal unpaid valet. It happened when she exercised poor planning while taking her computer in for repair:

> Along the same lines and under the heading of "Chivalry is dead" I had to take my computer to the repair shop last week. I took it to the Apple store in our local mall and, not knowing that there was a "secret" entrance close to the store, I lugged it all the way through the parking lot, and then all the way through the mall and then BACK because I decided to take it somewhere else. I don't know how much it weighs, but by the time I got all the way back to my car I was nearly in tears because it was SO heavy and I was SO frustrated. And here's my point: I cannot even tell you how many able-bodied young men I passed while I was carrying something that was OBVIOUSLY too heavy for me. When I finally got to my car I called my husband and told him that my > boys will NEVER pass someone who needs help and not offer to help them. I was so disgusted that not one single man offered to help me! So so so sad. I can't influence any of the men who passed me by, but I can certainly influence the 3 young men God has entrusted to my care and if I have ANYTHING to do with it, they WILL put women and children first!!!

It reminded me of a comment Hestia made on a previous post on this topic about a woman who saw a group of servicemen returning from active duty, and was upset that they didn't volunteer to carry her load for her:

> Basically here is a group of largely men who have been sacrificing on behalf of the nation (or so the story goes) who haven't done enough for this pampered princess. So it seems to go not only with soldiers in particular but men in general when it comes to chivalry.

One thing men need to understand is that in the event that they make the kind of sacrifice women are demanding, not only will it lead to even more entitlement, but many women will still detract from the noble nature of your choice. Commenter Amanda wrote:

> Not to undermine your point, but when the Titanic sank, women and children were NOT put first. Sure, they started the evacuations like that, and there were men of honor, but there were also the men who locked the doors to the third class section so that those people wouldn't take up lifeboat space, and the coward who pushed women and children aside in their haste to get into a boat.

After Sheila challenged her on the historical accuracy of this claim, Amanda replied with:

> Well, it's been a few years since I did all the reading I did on the Titanic, but I was pretty interested as a youngling, and the picture I got from the books was one of polite, subversive cowardice slowly escalating to outright anarchy and panic.

Understand that if you sacrifice yourself for women you don't know that most women will simply take your act of ultimate selflessness as proof that men owe them. A significant number will also deny the bravery of your dying act.

Female on Male DV in the Daily Mail

Elusive Wapiti · 27 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In the "femail" section, no less:

> According to recent British Crime Survey statistics, a third of domestic violence victims are male. That's 400,000 men a year. At least.
> 'All the evidence suggests it's much more widespread than the figures suggest,' says John Mays of the equal rights organisation Parity. 'Between one third and 40 per cent of domestic abuse cases are female perpetrator and male victim, and it's a sad fact that this isn't generally known.'

Assuming that American sociologist Murray Strauss' research on DV holds in the UK, we can expect the number of male victims of female-perpetrated DV to slightly dominate that of male-perpetrated DV, with a majority of the cases involving "mutual combat" in which both sexes aggress more or less equally.

But what I found most noteworthy about this article was its matter-of-fact tone, and the clearly one-sided nature of the comments…comments which found credible the claim that female-on-male violence does not only exist but is a huge problem deserving of serious consideration. Moreover, a good many of the comments recognize the special situation that male DV victims find themselves in when it comes to reporting: less likely to report due to shame and social stigma, less likely to be believed, and less likely to receive public support when escaping violent situations, to include being turned away from women-and-children-only DV shelters.

Kudos to the Daily Mail for publishing the facts and not letting themselves be carried away by the feminist conventional wisdom.

Male Training Through Emotional Abandonment & Inferiority Conditioning

Featured Guest · 28 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Joe Zamboni

Hundreds of years ago, in the United States of America, slave owners blocked and severely punished all efforts on the part of slaves to educate themselves. Slave owners knew that if slaves learned to read and write, then they would thereby gain the keys to their own emancipation. Men in the USA, the primary economic slaves and workhorses of modern society, now find themselves in a similar position vis-à-vis women (their slave owners once these men become married).

Slavery is of course much more sophisticated these days, and it relies primarily on boyhood conditioning, social pressure, plus psychological manipulation, and legal enforcement methods. This is contrasted with old-fashioned methods involving ropes, chains, manacles, and other forms of bondage, as well as beatings, and other physical enforcement methods. Many if not most modern American men have been systematically worked so hard, for such a long period of time, that they have virtually no personal time to investigate how it was that they came to be enslaved. They are often educated to become functional as men, more specifically to make money, and to adequately perform other designated roles, such as physically protect women. Unfortunately, for the most part, they do not learn about the relevant history, specifically the antecedent events and attitudes that led to their enslavement. Likewise, they are often so pressed by their manly duties, that they have no time for self-reflection. Even though it may at first seem diversionary from one's life goals, is important that American take the time to fully appreciate the ways that society has trained and forced men to be both economic slaves and workhorses, as well as take the time to do their own personal psychological emancipation work.

Focusing the balance of this article only on the conditioning of males, consider the psychological disorder called "Self Sacrificing Personality Disorder." This condition never made it into the DSM (Diagnostic and Statistical Manual, the compendium of psychological disorders used by insurance companies, psychologists, psychiatrists, and others in the mental health field). This diagnosis, which the author believes he has, was proposed by a bunch of male psychiatrists, including Richard Simons. The diagnosis applied to those people who "remain in relationships in which others exploit, abuse, or take advantage of him or her, despite opportunities to alter the situation." To this author, that pretty much sounds like a slave who thinks he can't do any better elsewhere, so he might as well remain in his slave owner's house (the modern situation takes the form of marriage, and after that, divorce with alimony and child support). Or, using MGTOW vernacular, such a man would be a "mangina."

It is no mistake that a number of women's groups were outraged by the proposal to include such a diagnosis in the official part of the DSM. This diagnosis ended up being put in an appendix, and thus officially relegated to obscurity. Supposedly the objection that these women's groups had was that this diagnosis was coming from a group of men. We all know that men are generally far more creative than women, but according to feminists, anything coming from a bunch of men is suspect and untrustworthy. To this author, this proposal could have only come from a group of men, because women have no idea of what it means to be forced to be an economic slave and workhorse in America today. Granted, modern American women can choose to play this role, but they can and often do soon thereafter opt out of it; they are not coerced to live it.

The fact that this diagnosis was never officially endorsed, due to political pressure from feminists, further underscores the pernicious and pervasive power of feminist groups, in this case their power to block some information that might lead to the emancipation of men from their cages [they also blocked information that might lead to the emancipation of some women, but since when did feminists care about individual women?]. Given the many ways that feminist groups attempt to stifle dissent and free thinking among males, it not surprising that the male psychiatrists who originated this diagnosis were accused of "gender bias," and later humiliated by their own professional association. In fact, it is this author's opinion that it was not "gender bias" but "gender insight."

While many examples of feminist attempts to stifle the dissemination of information that might emancipate American men could be cited, I will mention only one here. In George Will's column, in Newsweek's 25 December 2000 issue, Dr. Kathleen Dixon, Director of Women's Studies at Bowling Green State University is quoted as saying: "We forbid any course that says we restrict free speech!" This author is grateful for the Internet, and web sites such as this, that assist men in their efforts to adopt an alternative point of view, with which they can then emancipate themselves. Collectively we forward-thinking men can break the grip of the slave-masters.

Getting back to "Self Sacrificing Personality Disorder," perhaps the feminist women had a point in that this diagnosis is not properly speaking a "personality disorder." It would be more correct to say that it is a systemic cultural disorder — it is the "prevailing male reality." In this author's opinion, this condition is the natural result of emotional abandonment, repeated gender shaming, gender discrimination, unfair gender expectations, and the related cruel and insensitive conditioning experienced by males as they are "socialized" to become accepted in the USA. This diagnosis, termed "offensive and regressive" by feminist opponents, was supposedly viewed as a threat to women. While the author won't go into the details of their arguments here, and the logic of their objections is as bizarre as many feminist objections are, this author believes that the real reason it was found to be so offensive was that it would put women at a disadvantage. Their role as slave owners, as the supposedly superior gender, would thereby officially be called into question. So again we see how truth is stifled in order to "protect women," when really what is happening is that the institution of male slavery, and the status of men as workhorses, is being protected from challenge.

That feminists who are not psychiatrists should be able to have such a profound impact on a professional matter that should have been handled exclusively by a special committee of experts working for the professional association is disturbing enough. But this should be no surprise to men's rights activists, because the misandry and influence of feminists has become entrenched in American culture, for instance in so-called "gender studies" in the curriculum at universities. Of course feminists pressure groups would not want an official declaration that this state of mind is pathological, for it would call into question the ways that males are indoctrinated, trained, and pressured to perform in this culture. This diagnosis, as the male group of psychiatrists stated when they advanced the proposal, is much more common in males than females. The gender imbalance, the feminists probably thought, would tip people off that there was "something rotten in Denmark." It would lead to additional research, publications, speeches, and other visibility about the psychological control techniques used to coerce males into taking on the traditional male role.

The fact that the psychological literature has become twisted and distorted, due to many a feminist influence, points to the fact that many men are best advised to avoid psychologists and psychiatrists all together. The feminist influence is not only profoundly felt in the professional associations, it is entrenched in the universities that trained these people too. Men are better off managing their own emancipation. There is considerable information on the web describing the Self Defeating Personality Disorder and other DSM diagnoses, and this author recommends that you the reader review it. Do your own work, talk to men's rights activists, discuss your situation with your male friends, attend men's groups, go to men's workshops, study the MGTOW lifestyle as discussed at www.mgtowforums.com, and participate with men's rights organizations. Bring a suspicious attitude to any therapy provided by the establishment (clinics, hospitals, employer health plans, etc.), and note where, and whether, this officially provided therapy is tainted by the hate speech and slavery conditioning that feminism attempts to foist on males.

It is also important that you do your own research, and not take anybody's word for it when they give you a diagnosis (including this author). Everyone is different, and everyone should have a chance to manage their own emancipation, recovery, and healing process. But American men are nonetheless invited to consider whether the following symptoms describe their relationship with women. According to the male psychiatrists who proposed the Self Defeating Personality Disorder, those who would get the label must have at least six of the following nine behavior patterns (taken from DSM-III-R, published in 1985 by the American Psychiatric Association, pp. 133-134; note that bracketed comments are from this author):

(1) Remains in relationships in which others exploit, abuse or take advantage him or her, despite opportunities to alter the situation [consider the way that so many men remain married to wives that use and exploit them for money],

(2) Believes that he or she almost always sacrifices own interests for those of others [consider how men are still supposed to act with chivalry, for instance paying for dates; and also consider how only men are subject to the military draft, and how the vast majority of war wounded and war deaths are men]

(3) Rejects help, gifts or favors so as not to be a burden on others [consider the conditioning that says men must be independent, must keep their feelings to themselves, must not receive help, etc.]

(4) Complains, directly or indirectly, about being unappreciated [consider how men are in fact unappreciated by women, and expected to give more than women do, for instance in the realm of financially supporting a wife and children]

(5) Responds to success or positive events by feeling undeserving or worrying excessively [male success is these days deemed to be an indication of gender discrimination, while male failure is deemed to be an indication of male inferiority; if an individual male broadcasts information about his success, he makes himself a target, not only of feminist critics, but also of gold diggers]

(6) Always pessimistic about the future and preoccupied with the worst aspects of the past and present [consider that men do not have the safety nets that women do, and here we are talking about domestic violence shelters, aid for the homeless, university scholarships for single parents, and many other institutionalized sources of aid that go predominantly if not exclusively to females]

(7) Thinks only about his or her worst features and ignores positive features [consider that males have been conditioned to be ashamed of their gender, and how they then competitively seek to show that they are “not like those other men,” in the process pathologically cater to female desires and opinions, thereby indirectly further enslaving themselves to women]

(8) Sabotages his or her own intended goals [consider how so many men give up their own life goals, and do what is expected of them, like getting married and having children when a girlfriend gets pregnant by “accident,” even though they did not really want to do these things]

(9) Repeatedly turns down opportunities for pleasure [consider that female pleasure is the goal that both males and females should be seeking, according to this culture, and this shows up in an emphasis on female day spas, female exercise classes, female jewelry, female fashion clothing, female TV programs, and so many other goods and services intended primarily if not exclusively for women; male pleasure is a distraction that keeps slaves and workhorses from doing what they should be doing, like making money for females, and like protecting females]

In summary, consider how large and powerful animals are controlled by humans. The elephant in India has a skinny man riding him, working him until death does them part. The elephant pulls logs, and does all sorts of heavy lifting, and for what? A little food the elephant could have obtained without help? Why would they do that? It’s conditioning; it’s training; it’s indoctrination. For a baby elephant, first it’s a heavy chain and a stout stake in the ground. After the elephant has tried and tried, but has repeatedly failed to escape, it’s spirit has been broken, and he gives in to his chained existence. Like a trained horse, the young elephant has been broken. Later in life, only a small chain with a small stake in the ground, that an adult elephant could easily uproot, is nonetheless sufficient to keep him in place. Men in America have been conditioned in a manner not too far different (in fact a number of women’s advice books discuss conditioning “your man” using dog training tactics). Their early years dominated by women in positions of authority (mothers, teachers, babysitters, etc.), young human American males are totally dependent on females, and as a result they become hooked on female approval and praise. That is the stake in the ground, later reinforced by sex, affection, and societal approval. But the difference between elephants and humans is the ability to self-reflect, and then potentially to change. Will American men live up to the name that scientists gave us (“homo sapiens” – wise and rational man)? It remains to be seen.

Server Outage Today

W.F. Price · 29 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

My host had a very long outage that was just resolved. Nothing is wrong on this end with the site, in case anyone was wondering. I'm not happy about the disruption, but these things do happen from time to time, and if it doesn't happen again anytime soon I'll stick with the current host. However, if another outage like this does come up in the near future, I'm switching hosts. This one was just a little too long for comfort.

At least it was a Sunday…

Shame and Dehumanization Prevent Reform

Most men don't know much at all about post-separation issues such as child support prior to having children. I suspect the reason for this is that most men who are dealing with them don't like to talk about these things. There are good reasons for this, and not-so-good reasons. The best reason for keeping one's mouth shut is that the mother of your children may become angry, and it is entirely within her power to make your life miserable. Why? Because the current system of child support puts non-custodial parents – overwhelmingly fathers – essentially on parole. As soon as a child support order is entered, they enter the criminal justice system. This happens whether they are current or not. Their social security number, selective service number and a number of other identifying pieces of information are entered into a state database. Then, the father is assigned a child support enforcement officer, who is something akin to a parole officer.

The enforcement officer keeps track of cases, makes decisions about bank account garnishments, deals with fathers' employers and reviews cases from time to time. He or she refers to both custodial and non-custodial parents as "clients," but in truth the officer's job is to work for the custodial parent — usually the mother. The officer may or may not have compassion for "obligors" (those ordered to pay), but his duty is solely to enforce "compliance." It is an impersonal relationship, as all relationships between the state and citizens are. This puts non-custodial parents at a fatal disadvantage, and is why child custody is often so absolutely crucial to parents during divorce.

It may not be a nice, comfortable reality about custody, but there are strictly practical, financial factors that influence parents' decision to fight for children. It is probable, however, that women are more aware of these factors, as they usually have a public and private support network that informs them throughout their lives. Mainstream media, for its part, does a good job of ignoring the fact that decent men are often ruined by women of less than stellar character, which probably goes some ways toward keeping men unprepared for what awaits them following separation from their children's mothers.

These factors combine to create a climate of ignorance on the one hand, and fear on the other, that conspires to keep young men ill-informed about the realities of life as an abandoned or separated father. However, there is one more problem, and it is what gives this site, along with others like it, an opportunity to make some change: shame.

Too many men who fall into arrears or are put in impossible situations are burdened with a deep sense of failure. Not only have their wives left them, but now they are unable to "support their children." For many men, it is simply too painful to admit they can't keep up with their "obligations," even though they are artificial and arbitrarily imposed. For example, playing with the kids in a park is absolutely irrelevant to legally-recognized obligations. Child care such as changing diapers, feeding kids, and driving them to events and activities, so important in the feminist arguments, means nothing to the law. A father who can contribute a great deal of work and love to raising his children, but who doesn't have much money, is a deadbeat, while a man who abandons his kids and sends the monthly minimum in the mail is an upstanding father.

It is a brutal, inhuman system, but a lot of selfish people, from feminists and their single-mom cannon-fodder to bureaucrats trying to increase revenue, are invested in it. The only way it can be overcome is if men start to see fatherhood and being a man in a different light. Men and fathers have the same basic human rights and dignity as anyone else, and they have to recognize that they, too, can be oppressed by injustice. As it stands today, our most serious weakness is our illusion of strength, which prevents us from acting in our own interests. If men had never stood up and demanded some recognition of their humanity, we would still mainly be slaves and serfs, bereft of any legal protection and no better treated than common draft animals.

Today, unfortunately, we are falling further and further toward just that status. Our illusion of strength is our yoke. Our shame is the whip that drives us on. They prevent us from advocating for ourselves and our brothers, and prevent us from taking any steps that might give us real, human political strength.

W.F. Price · 31 January 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most commonly used arguments to support the destruction of fathers' lives is that it is in their children's best interests. For those of us who are familiar with the personal implications, it conjures up images of a black widow spider consuming her mate to nourish her eggs. It is, in effect, a justification for doing one person harm for the benefit of the other. However, it really isn't the children who benefit from the arrangement. It isn't even necessarily the mother, as women who follow the largely sexual impulse to separate from their mates don't generally fare any better than those with superior self-control. But because it's about money – taking money, to be precise – someone is getting something out of the bargain.

The logic of the argument goes something like this:

Children are our future, so there is a common interest in their well-being. However, children are not self-sufficient and need provision and care. Therefore, it is in our interest to make certain sacrifices to ensure their well-being. Men, typically fathers, have traditionally provided for children, so it is most rational to assign this duty to them. Women, who care for children, are holding up their part of the bargain.

It is a simple argument, and one that women almost universally adhere to. A great number of men ascribe to it as well. So what's the problem?

The problem, when you get down to it, is that it ignores the concept of marriage and the family and treats children as little more than manufactured goods. If men are simply provider machines and women baby rearing machines, each man and each woman is essentially just a worker in a giant, nation-wide baby factory. One worker shovels coal into the furnace while another works the assembly line. Both are simply "doing their job" and have no further obligations.

What this does is encourage mothers to see themselves as discrete individuals performing a job, for which they are owed monthly pay. This is why feminists in the US, despite all the hot air about equality, treat parenting as a union-guaranteed position — their job is their birthright and no man will take it from them. Instead of a private partnership, marriage and childrearing become a public occupation, sort of like working for a state-owned factory in the USSR. The implication, of course, is that the workers are interchangeable, and the guy loading the furnace doesn't really matter to the female's personal interests.

To be fair to women, they really don't care where the money comes from, as long as they are getting paid for their "job." If the checks come from the state, that's fine. But if not, they damn well want it from someone, hence the father as convenient victim.

There really isn't anything fundamentally wrong with seeing a particular duty as a sort of work, even if it isn't a very sentimental way to look at motherhood and childrearing. In fact, with a little tweaking, the "job" mentality applied to childrearing might work pretty well in the majority of cases, but there's a big problem with how it's interpreted today: the obligation to the marriage is severed by the pernicious pairing of division of labor with a "separate but equal" notion about parenting, which destroys the concept of the family. This is the inevitable outcome of socializing the "best interests of the child."

The result is that the best interests of children are not well served at all by the current regime, because despite how "happy" parents are in any given partnership, kids do better in intact families in study after study in both subjective and objective ratings. Separation of parents is clearly bad for children, so how can a system that treats parents as independent units of child production possibly be in their best interests?

As it is, the policy encourages women to create a less-than-ideal situation for children, because marriage is not part of her "job." Beyond birthing and caring for children, she has no obligations, and if she has to "work on her marriage" it is simply considered more work for no additional benefit.

In the end, what has happened through socialization of “best interests of the child” (making children’s welfare a public issue), is that we have trained women to see themselves as just what feminists claimed to be rebelling against in the first place: baby-making machines. The only difference is that now they are not performing this labor for their family, but rather the state, and the result is that children’s interests have taken second place.

We must remember that morality is not the business of the state, and never will be. As always, it is simply power and self-preservation that motivates its institutions, and any benefits we derive from them are only achieved by keeping the state subordinate to the people. In allowing courts and government to decide what is best for our children for us, we have handed them a terrible power and made a fatal mistake. As it is, the state has now turned our children into weapons to be used against us, and it cloaks its new authority and power in the feel-good phrase of “the best interests of the child.”

It's Time to Nurse Our Grievances

W.F. Price · 1 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've been writing a bit about how brutal our regime is in regards to fathers, and how it's the kind of information that ought to be spread around so that young men know what can happen to them. It seems that the reality is starting to make its way out there, somehow or the other. However, I've noticed some hysterical resistance on the part of women, who have been leaving some pretty ruthless comments on the site recently. I haven't published all of them, because as a divorced father myself I'm not sure I want to contribute to other men's pain and anger. But maybe that's a mistake. Maybe it's best for us to simply see this hatred and contempt for men's lives unfiltered.

Here's an example from some bitch calling herself "EC":

> This article makes a very poor attempt to represent that "one decent" man that was ruin by that "less than stellar character" of a woman. My guess is they hope that more of these "decent men" would crawl out of their caves and bellow in unison whatever incoherent motto they represent. I dont know who IS this 'decent man'. HOWEVER, the majority of men contribute to the "lone man's shame" in that the majority represent the same 'character flaw(s).' They make promises that they do not intend to keep and eventually leave the home. A man who decides to leave his wife not only abandons the woman but his own kids as well. AND this is the reason for the so called "parole officer" because any man who can abandon his children is in fact a moral criminal. That is where the shame is born. Where, I ask, do those men who abandon their own children go? They would save face if they instead went back to their 'caves' to think this thru. But they Instead abandon their children to go and live with another woman in a similar situation. I've no problem with a man pursuing his happiness if he aint got it with his kids' mother. But to go and live with another set of kids other than your own and contribute to those kids' well being (because you can possibly contribute to your own at the same time) while your own kids are being deprived of their right to the man who helped conceive them. Then I guess those very very "less than stellar character" flaws warrants policing. How many of us felt the feeling of dread at our father's departure? Wanting to run up to them and say, "hey Dad please dont leave. I'll be good. Just you wait and see, I'll make you proud of me." How many of these "decent man" hang around after that or even come back knowing that their own kid(s) are waiting for their return. So to say that all this boils down to is the "vindictiveness of the women" or that women are scheming with the system for financial gains is just truly an insult. These men ignore the reality of a real "brutal, inhuman system" and refuse to see what we as women are left to deal with, and see and feel and live with the emotional side effects of the kids pain cause by the betrayal of their father and our helplessness in these situations. Dont you think that this may well be the unspoken reason for the "wardens"?!!

This woman leaves out the fact that most divorces are filed by women simply for "unhappiness." She also suggests that men are abandoning their children. She says women are "helpless."

She's a liar. She's scum. I know these types too well. I avoid them at all costs, because after what I've been through I'd be highly agitated if I heard this come out of a woman's mouth and she were standing right in front of me.

But of course, the truth is that these people have us in a halter. They've got our kids, and they know it's a terrible weakness of men. Men are wired to sacrifice for their children, and the subtext is that if we do anything rash our kids will suffer, and they will. The current regime makes it perfectly clear that children will be punished if a father doesn't behave according to the wishes of the state. All this talk about "best interests of the child" is little more than a threat. Perhaps the most frightening thing, and all separated fathers are aware of it, is that if you don't fight for visitation and parental rights on their terms, your son may be beaten and your daughter molested by their mother's new flame. It's what keeps social workers in business, after all, so these state agents have a vested interest in keeping fathers on their toes.

This is why Firepower was right in commenting that fathers make lousy warriors. Well, in the current setup at least. If we're fighting to protect our kids from imminent harm, we are ferocious fanatics, but when they've already got our kids as hostages, we're lower than slaves.

I'm embedding a video from the new Discovery Channel series on men recently sentenced to prison. One man, a tax lawyer, was destroyed financially in a divorce and then after going into arrears sentenced to six months for contempt. he couldn't afford to pay his alimony and child support, so he's going to jail for a pretty long time. A childhood friend of mine was busted on federal charges of trafficking cocaine in bulk and did six months (it was fair — he cleaned up and paid his dues), but this guy gets the same simply for being broke. The trashy woman he unwisely married doesn't give a damn, as usual. Women are harder-hearted than executioners when it comes to the fathers of their children. It's evolutionarily hard-wired — if they feel an impulse to mate with new cock eliminating the prior man becomes a top priority. They can rationalize his extermination without any difficulty whatsoever, which is why hits on spouses are overwhelmingly contracted by wives. Unfortunately, our own government is all too willing to take on the role these days.

Watch the video and ask yourself whether you still feel any loyalty toward your own government, and whether you still feel like negotiating with feminists:

Vietnam Vet Forced to Leave Country to Avoid Alimony

Featured Guest · 1 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Peter The Great

A decorated Vietnam veteran has returned his medals in protest of an alimony decree by a civil court judge. Scott Cameron is one of 300,000 wounded vets of the Vietnam war Mr. Cameron is permanently disabled and unemployed, yet the judge ordered him to pay his ex-wife $500 per month in alimony.

“My ex-wife didn’t serve in Vietnam, I did. She wasn’t forced to killed people, I was. She wasn’t the one severely wounded, I was. She didn’t experience the pain I did. She doesn’t have the disfiguring scars I do. She doesn’t have to take the long list of medications I do, and she will probably out live me because of all of this. My ex-wife is not entitled to any of my combat related disability benefits. My veteran’s disability compensation belongs to me, and only me, and no one is going to take it from me,” said Scott Cameron of Duluth, Minnesota.

In protest to this immoral and unlawful decree, Mr. Cameron has returned his Purple Heart and Bronze Star to congress in protest.

A member of Operation Firing For Effect’s AREA 5301, a group of disabled veterans currently protesting the use of veteran’s disability compensation as “income” in a divorce settlement and divided with an ex-spouse. WWW.AREA5301.NET

OFFE National Chairman Gene Simes states that Scott Cameron’s disability compensation is protected by a federal law which was written over 175 years ago. Simes said civil courts are routinely violating the absolute protection of veteran’s benefits from attachment as stated in; USC, Title 38, § 5301. Nonassignability and exempt status of benefits, (a) (1) Payments of benefits due or to become due under any law administered by the Secretary shall not be assignable except to the extent specifically authorized by law, and such payments made to, or on account of, a beneficiary shall be exempt from taxation, shall be exempt from the claim of creditors, and shall not be liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, either before or after receipt by the beneficiary.

In an effort to avoid arrest for contempt for non-payment of the decree, Mr. Cameron has left the U.S. OFFE states that currently there are 153 cases of 5301 abuse in the U.S., and to date 9 members of OFFE have been jailed for refusing to give up their disability payments to their ex-wives.

It is hoped that these men, who honorably served and were granted disability for their war wounds, will be able to stop this abuse. Further that when won, this crack in the door of a man being able to keep what is his, will spread to other areas of financial freedom for men, including the ability to keep the fruit of his labors.

Female Sexual Power

By Henry Laasanen

"Female Sexual Power" is the title of my book (2008, in Finnish only!) and part of the title of my master thesis (2006) in sociology (Female sexual power: The critique of feminist equality paradigm). This article is an introduction to the ideas of the book.

The book received a very angry response, especially from women and feminists. I was labeled as a "basement wanker who couldn't get laid". Bashing me (argumentum ad hominem) was more important than fighting my arguments (I received bashing like this first comment against Roy Baumeister).

Finland's biggest newspaper, Helsingin Sanomat, has a board of 100 "intellectuals" who declared, by majority vote, that women don't have more sexual power than men.

My book has the same basic idea as Catherine Hakim's book "Erotic Capital: The Power of Attraction in the Boardroom and the Bedroom", but I draw different conclusions (note: my book has nothing to do with Jessica Valenti's book with a similar sounding title). The starting point of my (and Hakim's) theory is that men want more sex than women. In economic terms you could say that there is much more demand for female sexuality than for male sexuality.

The old saying "Women need men like a fish needs a bicycle" is right. Men need women more than women need men. And feminism has succeeded in reducing female dependency of men still further.

Scientific backbone of the theory comes from the Baumeister and Vohs article " Sexual economics: Sex as female resource for Social Exchange in Heterosexual Interactions" (2004). Thet theory is build by combining evolutionary psychology, social exchange theory, economic theory of sexuality and Emerson's power-dependency theory.

There is an old (2005) discussion of female sexual power in Alas-blog, which you may find interesting.

The critiques of the theory

The idea of female sexual power gets lots of criticism. Two main critiques come from opposite directions. Some people (usually men) say, that "while the theory is very true, the idea of female sexual power is not a great scientific breakthrough, because it is self evident. Everybody has known it for ages" (one that kind of critique in English is here).

Other people (usually women) say the opposite: "The idea of female sexual power is bullshit. Women want sex as much as men. And even if the idea of female sexual power is somewhat right, it's not a real or useful form of power."

For me the idea of female sexual power is at the same time (1) self evident and (2) important. It's important because it brings the female power in to the scientific and political discussions. It's important to the men's movement, because it shows that patriarchy is not the only gender power structure in the world.

You can say that female sexual power is part of the "common knowledge", but common knowledge has not much value, until it's written as an scientific theory. You cannot fight feminist science with common knowledge.

Men want more sex than women

Comment sections (in Hakim's book discussions) are filled with the politically correct claim, that women want sex as much as men. The claim is untrue.

There are lots of studies of sexual desire, and all of them point in the same direction: men want more sex than women. Men want sex faster, with more partners and they want more casual sex.

Universal Sex Differences in the Desire for Sexual Variety: Tests From 52 Nations, 6 Continents, and 13 Islands.

“This study provides the largest and most comprehensive test yet conducted on whether the sexes differ in the desire for sexual variety. The results are strong and conclusive – the sexes differ, and these differences appear to be universal. Men not only possess a greater desire than women do for a variety of sexual partners, men also require less time to elapse than women do before consenting to sexual intercourse, and men tend to more actively seek short-term mate ships than women do. These sex differences are cross-culturally robust and statistically significant regardless of whether mean, median, distributional, or categorical indexes of sexual differentiation are evaluated. These sex differences are robust and significant regardless of the measures used to evaluate them.”

If you don’t believe in scientific studies, you can make your own experiment, like Simon Owens. He wanted to find out, how hard it was to get laid using Craigslist. Here are the stats on how many people responded to each person.

New York:

Straight female looking to have sex with a male: 165 responses

Straight male looking to have sex with a female: 0 responses

Bi-curious male looking to have sex with a male: 9 responses

Bisexual female looking to have sex with a female: 2 responses

Chicago:

Straight female looking to have sex with a male: 200 responses

Straight male looking to have sex with a female: 0 responses

Bi-curious male looking to have sex with a male: 6 responses

Bisexual female looking to have sex with a female: 2 responses

Houston:

Straight female looking to have sex with a male: 54 responses

Straight male looking to have sex with a female: 1 response

Bi-curious male looking to have sex with a male: 10 responses

Bisexual female looking to have sex with a female: 1 response

Bisexual female looking to have sex with a female: 1 response

Sadly, for a heterosexual male it is easier to find gay partners than female partners.

Amanda Marcotte has claimed many times, that women want sex as much as men. She has attacked the straw man argument “women don’t want sex“. No one has claimed that women don’t want sex; women just want much less sex than men. And women’s sexual desire doesn’t create the same kind of demand on the market that men’s sexual desire does.

Benefits and costs

Sexual power has two main dimension: benefits and costs. A person with sexual power gets benefits and possibilities; a person without sexual power gets costs and reduced possibility.

The person with sexual power (for example beauty pageant contestant) has possibility…

1. …to have sex whenever and with whoever she wants.
2. …to marry up.
3. …to make money through prostitution.
4. …to feel sexually desired, get invitation to parties and so on.

5. …to get benefits in worklife.

The person without sexual power (typically a man without status, looks, and money or PUA skills) has the possibility to choose…left or right hand.

The person without sexual power has a choice between 2 main costs:

1. The psychological costs of unwanted celibacy.
2. Costs of getting sexual relationships.

The choice is same kind as the choice between PUA and MGTOW. If he chooses option number two, he faces different costs:

1. Search costs (going through bars, writing in internet dating sites and so on)
2. Marketing costs of learning PUA skills.
3. Investing costs (raising your market value by getting money, muscles, status and so on).
4. Psychological costs of getting rejected.
5. Opportunity costs (he could do something else pleasant instead of chasing women).

Whatever you do, there is no escape from costs, because biological sex drive is the root cause of the costs. MGTOW lifestyle offers no solution, because it brings the costs of unwanted celibacy.

Gender structures in the society

The third important dimension of female sexual power lies in its structural effects. Have you ever wondered why…

1. …female romantic sexuality is an acceptable form of sexuality, while men's sexuality is sick and perverted?
2. …women's magazines dominate the official politically correct sexuality, but PUA guides are morally questionable?
3. …men are the more disposable sex?
4. …men must usually make the first move in the relationships and risk the rejection?
5. …men must pay on dates?
6. …laws are against men's behavior and not against women's behavior?

The answer to all those gender structures lies in female sexual power. Women's sexual resource (Erotic capital) manifests itself in gender structures that are beneficial for women.

It's also possible to explain female sexual power structures in society by using Marx's terminology of "gender classes", if you put women in the position of the bourgeoisie (sexual capital) and men in the position of proletariat. The male-female relationship becomes as a system of exploitation, where women get the surplus value of men's work.

Marx has also the concepts of base and superstructure. Base is the women's sexual domination in the base of mating market, which produces the women-friendly ideologies (women's sexuality is good, men are disposable sex…) in the superstructure.

Theories in the book

DOUBLE AND TRIPLE PAY THEORY: Women can get income from (1) their own work and from (2) men's work. Therefore, it is not adequate to compare only work wages – you have to take all the income into account. And there is also the triple pay theory. Women get much more welfare benefits from the state. So, if you want do economic comparison between men and women, you must take account of women's triple pay.

WOMEN'S LIFE STRATEGIES: Women have more available life strategies than men: (1) The wife strategy; (2) The blond strategy (prostitution, modeling, short relationships with wealthy men…); (3) The feminist strategy

(make your own money and advance feminist politics); (4) The glamour feminist strategy (combining the sexual power and work life power). Women can use those strategies opportunistically in different phases of life.

FINNISH LEVEL THEORY OF MEN: In Finnish discussion the alpha-beta terminology is not the standard. Instead we have level theory, in which men are divided in 3 levels: higher, middle and lower level, depending on the sexual success (idea is similar to rich, middle income and poor). The problem with alpha-beta terminology is the double meaning of words: alpha and beta refer to the certain types of men – dominant and submissive, but sexual success doesn't always go hand in hand with the types: beta can have lots of sexual success.

PORN IS MORE EQUAL THAN ROMANCE: Think about it. In mainstream porn everything is equal: no one has clothes, man is in the top, woman is in the top, woman gives blowjob, and man gives cunninlingus…Romance is very unequal. Cinderella is very poor, the prince owns everything. And when they marry, Cinderella gets huge economic benefits.

WOMEN'S SEXUAL MARKET VALUE AND RELATIONSHIP MARKET VALUE ARE VERY DIFFERENT: Women's sexual market value is usually much higher than her relationship market value, which means, than women can get high quality partners to short sexual relationships, but she have to lower the bar for longer relationships. For men thing are just the opposites. If a man want just sex (now, today), he must usually settle for the much lower quality partner than himself.

MARKET VALUE THEORY'S 7 THESIS:

1. Market value is the potential demand for the person in the sexual marketplace.
2. Market value predicts the quality of the persons partners.
3. If partners have same level of market value, relationship has good chance of lasting long.
4. Women's market values are generally higher than men's market values.
5. Women's sexual market value is usually much higher than her relationship market value.
6. Women arrive at their market value peak younger than men.
7. Men's market values are more spreader than women's market values.

Older Women and the Susan G. Komen Abortion Debacle

W.F. Price · 3 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The decision by the Susan G. Komen Foundation to cut Planned Parenthood's funding has caused a lot of shrieking from the feminists. The two female senators of my state (Washington) – both staunch feminists – weighed in with condemnation of the move. Feminists in Portland, Oregon are making vague threats and lots of noise. Local news has covered it more thoroughly than I expected, and one might think it's a national crisis of sorts from all the attention it's getting. All the hysteria did finally force Komen to reverse the decision, but it's remarkable that it happened in the first place.

While I'm no fan of abortion, I'm not a fanatic right-to-lifer, and might even be inclined to tolerate Planned Parenthood for its clean, safe provision of birth control and sexual health exams for women (men have a stake in this, too, for obvious reasons). However, I've known a couple people who worked there, and it is part and parcel of the feminist movement, and has a hostile attitude toward men. In fact, the organization shouldn't be called "Planned Parenthood," but rather "Planned Motherhood;" there's nothing about it that helps fathers at all.

But regardless of how men might feel about it, why would Susan G. Komen cut off Planned Parenthood? The reason the anti-breast cancer foundation gave was that Planned Parenthood is under investigation for using taxpayer money to provide abortions (probably true — since when have feminists turned down public funds?), but I think there was more to it than that. Breast cancer, although supposedly a feminist issue, is actually more of an older women's issue. It's true that breast cancer sometimes strikes younger women with tragic results, but the overwhelming majority of its victims are post-menopausal, the median age of onset being 61. Feminism, which is more concerned with leveraging female sexual power (including fertility) than anything else, is primarily a younger woman's cause. Yes, there are plenty of older feminist fanatics out there, but the ordinary women who supported feminism politically in the 70s and 80s have largely aged out of it, and are no longer so enthusiastic about "right to choose" (i.e. right to exterminate one's children) and other feminist causes.

I've seen this change happen first hand in some women I'm acquainted with. Prior to menopause, many women are blasé or enthusiastic about abortion, but after their own infertility is undeniable, they change their tune. Suddenly, children take on more importance. Not their own children, because they can't have them any longer, but children in general, and grandchildren in particular. Now, they no longer have anything to fear from an "unplanned pregnancy," but they do face the prospect of never having access to children ever again, and that is not a happy thought for normal women.

Given that the average age of a Susan G. Komen donor is probably somewhere north of 60, I'd be willing to bet that there is a lot of opposition to funding any organization dedicated largely to the extermination of potential grandchildren. A significant proportion of these older women, many of whom no doubt suffer from breast cancer themselves, want to at least have the opportunity to hold a baby again before the disease kills them, so funding Planned Parenthood creates a conflict of interest.

This is a terrible dilemma for Susan G. Komen, which has wilted under an overwhelming attack from the "save the whales, kill the children" faction on the left. However, the absolute freak-out we have witnessed over the last couple days coming from the feminist camp suggests that this move really scared them. They do not have absolute hegemony over women's issues, and that's got to be a frightening realization for them. Many of their former rank-and-file supporters, loyal troopers in decades past, are not so excited about the program any longer, and this rift will only grow.

Growing up in the American environment, I was trained in the school of thought that holds prostitution to be an unmitigated evil that no good society can tolerate. This attitude came to be so culturally ingrained in me that when I went to China and, after living there in the blissful ignorance of the "honeymoon" stage for some months, finally realized that prostitution was everywhere in the Middle Kingdom, it was as though I'd been dealt a staggering blow. I distinctly remember innocently wondering why there were so many "hotels" with red lanterns festooning their doors. Why were all these men going to "beauty salons?" All I knew of prostitution was skanky crack hoes on street corners and the occasional call-girl I'd see downtown with an old man who obviously wasn't her daddy, so when I realized that it surrounded me everywhere I went I was really, truly shocked. This realization probably contributed more to culture shock than anything else I encountered in China. Being in my early 20s, it was profoundly demoralizing to know that so many of the women my age were hookers, especially when I'd been raised to see prostitution as such a horrible, wicked thing.

How could I know that the girl smiling at me wasn't a hooker? Was the girl I was dating making money on the side? Was any pretty girl not engaged in prostitution in one form or another? As I look back on it, I'm still amazed how much influence cultural conditioning had on me as an American male. Eventually, I came to question whether my revulsion for certain practices was innate, or whether it was inculcated in some manner. After considering how little the Chinese were bothered by the state of affairs, I had to accept that, somehow, my native culture had very powerfully shaped my sense of morality and propriety. I realized that I was not "my own man," so to speak, and that was a pretty demoralizing experience. However, it was also a fantastic lesson, and I don't think I could have learned it better anywhere else. For that, among other reasons, I'll be eternally grateful to China for being the best teacher I ever had.

So, although I haven't internalized the Chinese attitude toward prostitution, I have a perspective on the practice that few Americans share. For one thing, the idea that the prostitutes are being exploited by customers is true only in a tiny minority of cases. Many prostitutes are pushy and aggressive about plying their trade — far more so than your typical hot dog vendor on a city street. This is the only real problem they present to the general public: prostitutes can be quite a nuisance. In addition to this, there is the public health issue, STDs being a pernicious (and sometimes deadly) problem. As for morality, however, one can only make the case that prostitution encourages adultery and fornication. But so does feminism, birth control, women's magazines and television shows, countless pop songs, movies, websites, etc. Other than those issues, what exactly is wrong with trading money for sex? A husband who visits a prostitute is doing no more harm to his marriage than a wife who has an affair with her boss (a relatively common occurrence), so why is he committing a crime while she is "empowering" herself?

Another question I'd like to ask is why is it any better for a woman to give it up for free with multiple different men? Is a slut somehow more honorable than a prostitute? One thing guys ought to ask themselves before committing to a woman is whether they want one who will simply give it up for free to all comers. If that's the case, a former hooker would make a better bet for a committed partner, because at least she's used to demanding something before she takes her pants off. Get involved with a slut, and what's to stop her from giving it away to some random guy at the most convenient opportunity for any reason at all?

As it is today, American parents pay to send their daughters to what are essentially free brothels when they ship little pumpkin off to college. For some young men this can seem to be a bonanza, but ultimately it doesn't do them any good, either. If, as a young man, you get used to free sex with no investment or commitment, you start to take it for granted that things will always be that way. This is how young men get set up. Having grown accustomed to easy and free sex, they are totally unprepared for what happens when they get married or knock a girl up and suddenly the boom is lowered (thought that sex was free? think again, sucker!).

I'm of the opinion that most women, including feminists, prefer legal prohibition of prostitution for this reason. In the current setup, women can retroactively determine the price of sex, and not only in marriage, divorce and child support — false rape accusations and sexual harassment accusations are, as often as not, a means to have the man "pay for it." And what a price…

Furthermore, social recognition of the occupation of prostitute creates a clear division between wife, maiden and prostitute: you can be one, but you can't be any other. In abolishing the distinction, women are free to choose to be whichever they prefer at any given time. Take, for example, the phenomenon of fornicating women going to church as their fancy suits them and calling themselves "born-again virgins." Or adulterous wives — a very substantial proportion of married women these days. Because the prostitute class is suppressed but the demand remains, many women, married and unmarried alike, leverage their sexuality in one way or another — just like prostitutes. This also calls into question the disease issue. Because a larger pool of women are behaving like prostitutes, it may be more difficult to contain STDs.

It may surprise some people, but prostitution was not a crime until recent times, and even today it remains legal in most of Europe, India, almost all of Latin America, Canada, Australia, Turkey, and a number of other countries. In many of the parts of the world where it is illegal, such as China, Russia and practically all of East and SE Asia, it is ignored by authorities. In Western countries, there is some correlation between feminism and prostitution laws, and this is no accident. Just like prohibition of alcohol, prohibition of prostitution has been high on women's agenda since universal suffrage was obtained, and even before.

However, despite over 100 years of prohibition, the profession just won't die, and is thriving in a town near you. Thanks to the internet, prostitutes are more available than ever, and can be found online within seconds. Rather than eradicate the practice, it appears that feminist efforts to prohibit prostitution have only created a sort of online free-for-all, wherein women vie for clients in an unregulated market. If you check the ads these women put up, it's clear that most of them are simply moonlighting (sometimes for a thrill, I imagine), and prostitution is not their sole occupation. This almost certainly skews the numbers; when you read figures on prostitution the only ones included are typically those who are whores by trade. In reality, there are far more women out there dabbling in it than the official figures would suggest. Rather than timid victims of "trafficking," what you will find is apparently enthusiastic females looking to stuff a few hundred extra bucks into their purses per week.

It's time we started recognizing that, while prostitution may not be an ideal solution, it does address an ancient problem, and it would be far better to deal with it openly, honestly and humanely than to continue with this charade of prohibition. All we've really done by criminalizing it is spread it out over a much larger number of women than would otherwise be the case; instead of a regulated, isolated profession, it has become something millions of women are involved in to some degree, which has caused a great many young American women to internalize the hooker attitude, which they then apply to their marriages (and divorces). Legalization of prostitution, perhaps along the lines of the Dutch model, would solve more problems than it would create.

W.F. Price · 5 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

America's most important sports event is about to start, so I thought I should remind men not to neglect their last-minute preparations. As we all know (thanks to feminists), the Super Bowl is not only a time for enjoying a great game, but also for beating and enslaving women. When shopping for your Super Bowl party, you should keep in mind that you'll need more than just chips, salsa and beer.

So, I've prepared a handy little checklist you can take to the store, so as to better beat your wife and torture your underage Cambodian sex slave during commercial breaks and halftime:

1. "wife-beater" tank tops

2. hickory rod (follow the "rule of thumb")

3. brass knuckles

4. cattle prod

5. CIA interrogator's phrasebook (Cambodian/English)

6. manacles

7. chains and padlock

8. duct tape

9. ball gag

10. large, portable dog kennel

Most of these items can be found at your local mall, so if you aren't already prepared get out there and get ready! Without a hefty dose of patriarchy-style sadism, the Super Bowl just isn't the same.

The Racism and Sexism of Diversity Mongers

Elusive Wapiti · 5 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

While "pale, male, and stale" is a catchy paean for those apex fallacy-afflicted gender warriors and their itchy quota fingers, it does tend to belie the straight-up racism and sexism inherent in the motives of those who push for more "diversity" in corporate boards. As Exhibit A, I give you how Facebook's all-male board has recently drawn the ire of the diversity brigade:

> Most of Facebook Inc. (FB)'s more than 800 million users are women. You wouldn't know it from looking at the board, whose seven directors are all men.
> "We're long past having to defend or explain why women should be on boards, given all the data that shows how companies with female as well as male directors perform better," said Anne Mulcahy, former chairman and chief executive officer of Xerox Corp. and a director at Johnson & Johnson Co., Target Corp. and Washington Post Co. "It's unfortunate when companies with a large percentage of women constituents don't reflect that in their boardrooms." A Catalyst survey of Fortune 500 companies found that those with three or more female directors outperformed those with fewer between 2005 and 2009, achieving on average 43 percent better return on equity. As Facebook prepares to raise $5 billion in an initial public offering, the composition of its board shows its business strategy is faulty, said Susan Stautberg, co-founder of New York-based Women Corporate Directors, which promotes female board membership.
> "It doesn't make sense for a company that claims to be so forward looking to not have any women directors," she said. "If they just have an old boy's network in the boardroom, they won't have access to diverse ideas and strategies."
> The other directors are Donald E. Graham, chairman and CEO of The Washington Post Co.; venture capitalist Marc Andreesen, co-founder of Netscape Communications Corp., James W. Breyer, CEO of Breyer Capital; Peter A. Thiel, co-founder of Palantir Technologies Inc. and a fund manager at Clarium Capital LLC; Reed Hastings, chairman and CEO of Netflix Inc.; and Erskine B. Bowles, president emeritus of University of North Carolina.
> [Facebook's board is] drawn largely from the male investor community as is often the case at Silicon Valley start-ups, said Mulcahy, who groomed Ursula Burns to succeed her at Xerox, where four of 11 directors are women. As Facebook and other young companies mature, "they need to break out of this pattern and have more diverse representation," said Mulcahy, who is chairman of Save the Children Inc. "And women also need to be better represented in the private equity industry."

I'll get to the sexism/racism inherent in this passage in a moment, but first, permit me to address Ms. Mulcahy's claim that "we're long past having to defend or explain" the business case for female representation on corporate boards. A quick google of "women corporate boards" yields a slew of various economic and law journal hits in support of greater female representation in corporate governance. Two noteworthy documents in support of bolstering female representation on corporate boards include this one by McKinsey & Company, a company dedicated to promoting diversity in management and corporate performance, and this one by Lord Davies, a former Labour MP who has also taken a personal interest in boosting female representation on corporate boards. Both reports cite the greater return on equity of companies that have women on their boards (e.g., 41% better RoE, 56% higher EBIT margin in the McKinsey study), as opposed to companies with male-only boards. Both reports also suggest ameliorative measures to boost female representation on corporate boards, to include set-asides, special processes to access, select, groom, and promote female managers. The Davies report, apparently impatient with the glacial pace of increases in female participation on boards, even goes as far as suggesting quotas:

> All Chairmen of FTSE 350 companies should set out the percentage of women they aim to have on their > boards in 2013 and 2015. FTSE 100 boards should aim for a minimum of 25% female representation by 2015…

> The Financial Reporting Council should amend the UK Corporate Governance Code to require listed companies to establish a policy concerning boardroom diversity, including measurable objectives for implementing the policy, and disclose annually a summary of the policy and the progress made in achieving the objectives.

So then. The mask is off, and equality of opportunity isn't enough. Those old-boys-clubs must be, well, clubbed over the head and forced to permit women into their li'l rascals treehouses. But is Ms. Mulcahy's vaunted business case that clear?

The short answer is no. Here's why: First, the entire dataset is suspect because the research presented in these reports was conducted by organizations and individuals potentially biased in favor of promoting the phenomenon they were measuring.

Second, just as in the "pay gap" myth, which pivots around the ludicrous idea that companies in a dog-eat-dog competitive marketplace sacrifice profitability to maintain more-expensive-yet-equally-skilled men on the payroll, if sexual diversity is such a slam-dunk driver of profitability, why aren't companies jamming women into their boards and into their management ranks like crazy?

Third, there is the problem of causality, in that the direction of causality may be reversed. We are told that companies with women on their boards outperform those without. But consider this: Perhaps it is true that companies with women on the boards are large and successful enough to afford women on their board and withstand the costs of female preferences and set-asides in hiring and selection processes in their company? Or maybe that interested, available, and sufficiently successful female board members are such rare birds that only the most successful companies can attract them? Or perhaps that more successful companies seek female board members and female middle- and upper-managers as talismans to ward off brand-destroying scrutiny by government regulators and social grievance advocacy groups?

Fourth, could it be that the entire diversity meme, usually pushed as a means to avoid groupthink among staid, calcified corporate boards populated by silver-haired white men, is itself groupthink on a massive, societal scale?

> Our relatively small sample of interviews (36) provides no evidence of the emergence of what might be reasonably called a master narrative of board diversity. One plausible candidate-a business version of Justice Powell's Bakke narrative-appears from time to time. Our subjects have mentioned their beliefs that diversity creates a "richer conversation," "an entirely new perspective," "different points of view," and "a very positive dynamic." But it is a theoretical narrative without concrete detail, a story without substance. When invited to elaborate, subjects have digressed into instances that had little to do with race or gender, and in fact have often distanced themselves from demographic variables. And none expressed anything more than a hope that diversity would correlate with business performance. Overall, our subjects tell a story that amounts to little more than "it seems like a good thing to do."

Now that the business case for diversity on corporate boards has been well called into question, I will now address the blatant sexism and racism inherent in the entire Bloomberg article. First, let us evaluate the article's title: "…board shows white male influence". I suppose the headline could be a reference to how Facebook is successful because it is run by white men, but how likely is that? More likely, I think, is that the headline is meant as a slam on clubby white boys keeping those girls out because they can. It's a race- and sex-baiting attack against one of the only groups which is still a legitimate target for sexist/racist offensive comments in the present PC climate.

Second, Ms. Mulcahy is quoted as saying "if they just have an old boy's network in the boardroom, they won't have access to diverse ideas and strategies". Now, if I were a woman or a non-white, and if I believed that I should be judged by my ability and the content of my character, this statement would make me quite unhappy. For the very implication that my skin color or the fact that I possess a vagina versus a penis expresses itself in certain attributes, attitudes, traits, skills, abilities, or behaviors is by definition sexual or racial stereotyping, if not straight-up sexism or racism. This headline implies that those presumed liberals who push illiberal diversity measures are using race and/or sex as a proxy for whatever qualities they are seeking, something that if done by others in other contexts, would be roundly and accurately denounced as sexist or racist.

Third, let us assume for a moment that such stereotyping and racism/sexism is now permitted. Let us also assume that the sort of sex-based grooming that Ms. Mulcahy herself engaged in is now permitted for white men. We would then have a culture in which white male executives and managers are hired, selected, and groomed for no other reason than because they are white and male. Somehow I don't think Ms. Mulcahy and her ideological fellow-travellers are prepared for that reduction-ad-absurdum outcome…yet this is what she practices by her own admission.

I'll wrap up this post with this observation: the champions of diversity, as exemplified by this article, have apparently abandoned the principles of equalitarianism upon which they formerly stood. They now, nakedly, advance openly racist and sexist ideals and advocate for State-enforced discrimination no different in character and tone of the sort which they claim they opposed two generations ago. Rather than having progressed to the next higher plane of human existence, they have merely swapped one form of prejudices for another, and one form of State oppression for another. They are truly Orwell's pigs from Animal Farm.

Exit questions: At what point have we achieved enough diversity? If "diverse" is defined as "not a white dude", is "completely diverse" the complete extirpation of white male presence in an organization?

UK Legal Reform Brings Children Closer to Fathers

W.F. Price · 6 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

If there's anything good that came out of London's recent riots, a pending law guaranteeing fathers access to their children following separation or divorce may be it.

Christopher Hope reports for The Telegraph:

> Ministers intend to rewrite the law in an attempt to ensure that fathers get improved access to their offspring after a marriage breaks down.
> Currently, family courts decide to leave children with their mothers in the vast majority of divorce cases.
> Campaigners have long complained that without a legal right to see their children, fathers can be excluded, particularly when a split has been acrimonious. By creating the new right for children, ministers hope that judges ruling on custody disputes will ensure more equal access for both parents.
> A ministerial working group will be announced on Monday to decide how the Children's Act 1989 needs to be amended.
> According to the Office for National Statistics, one in three children, equivalent to 3.8?million, lives without their father. Ministers are particularly concerned about boys growing up without a strong male influence.

However, there is opposition — "single mothers' groups" (actually, this is just a euphemism for radical feminists):

> Ministers are bracing themselves for a backlash from single mothers' groups that are concerned about the possibility of aggressive fathers intervening in the lives of their children.
> The working group, comprising education ministers Tim Loughton and Sarah Teather, and justice minister Jonathan Djanogly, has been asked to come up with proposals on how the law should be changed within two months.

One nice thing about this article is that fathers' rights groups – Fathers4Justice in particular – are getting some credit for their efforts.

> Campaign group Fathers4Justice claims that every day 200 children lose contact with their fathers because of decisions taken in family courts. Under the plans the 1989 Act could be amended to include a "presumption of shared parenting", this newspaper has learnt.

It seems that, in Britain at least, MRA does actually work. It has actually been working for some time, but it's been only in the last couple years that we've started to build a more widespread public awareness of these issues, which will make it a lot easier for lobbyists to find support. Finally, some results are emerging, and that's a positive sign. A victory of sorts.

So let's give a hand to the men working in the trenches in Britain and elsewhere, and continue to support reform as time and resources allow.

Author's note : I wrote this a few months ago but never submitted it as it seemed too self-absorbed. But with the recent "Komen"controversy I saw it as a good chance to draw attention to myself.

So here it is

"What Would Norman E. Brinker Do?"

I was traveling last week on business. My client took me to an "Asian" restaurant. Of course I recognized it as Vietnamese when we went inside, but the lady was Chinese. She said her husband was Vietnamese. I spoke to her in Pimsleur Speak and Understand Vietnamese : "I speak a little Vietnamese, but not very well". She was not impressed. Then I spoke to her in Pimsleur Speak and Understand Mandarin : "I speak a little Chinese, but not very well". She merely grunted. Then I identified that she was from Cholon, the Chinese district in Saigon. Still not much reaction. I recalled the time I bragged to my sister-in-saw that I spoke Khmer, they being puzzled why I had traveled to Cambodia before our wedding (to produce Khmer music videos! that's another story) . So they brought forward a Cambodian woman while we were eating lunch. I spoke to her in Modern Broken Cambodian : "I speak a little Khmer, but not very well". She smiled politely and left. I thought "I am such a clever chap who speaks many languages." Afterwards my wife tole me the lady said she did not understand what I was saying. Later that day the electricity went out. We sat there in the darkness. A woman on the radio news was talking. My sister-in-law ast me if I understood. I said "Yes, she said the power had gone out and will be restored in 20 minutes." They were awed. 20 minutes later the power came back on. I didn't tell them it was a wild guess, because it always takes 20 minutes for power to be restored.

Back to the restaurant story. I ordered "Sea Cucumber". The lady said it contained no meat. My client and I argued that it was an invertebrate, and indeed was meat. So I called my viet wife, who said it was a vegetable. I ordered it anyway, having heard somewhere that it stimulates prostatic function.

The restaurant was a hideous "Olde English" theme festooned with paintings of ribald men clutching beer steins and frolicking with pock-marked, cleavage-busting wenches. A gigantic unused salad bar dominated the center of the claustrophobic Elizabethan architecture, which had hints o' 1970's love for simulated wood paneling. The lighting was cold and ghastly. I nervously considered if I would catch plague or get kneecapped before my dinner was served. I guessed it was an old "Steak and Ale". I ast the lady, what was it before they bought it? She said "a Steak and Ale". My client was impressed with my command of trivia.

I pondered, who the hell gets an idea to create an olde English theme restaurant and sell it to American midwesterners? The "sea cucumber" was too salty, but I ate as much as I could stomach. When we returned to work, I googled (Steak and Ale).

It was started by one Norman E. Brinker, who among other things, invented the concept of the serve-yourself salad bar and later took the "Chili's" chain to success. He also coached many executives in the restaurant industry and was indirectly responsible for such outrages as the "Applebees" chain, but I won't hold that against him. When he died his business operations possessed assets of $4 Billion and employed 100,000 people.

His sister-in-law was Susan G. Komen, who died of breast cancer at the age of 39. Norm established the breast fund in her honor, and other charities as well.

My client was working on a tech report. I started relating details from the biography of Norman Brinker. He told me to get back to work, so I pretended to fiddle with the instrumentation while glancing at Norm Brinker information. I pull up ForbesWoman and find a Susan G. Komen essay, profiling of Nancy Brinker and her efforts to take the Komen initiative global. No mention of Norman E. Brinker. Then I get on the official "Susan G. Komen

For the Cure" website and look for evidence of Norm amidst the surrounding clutter, but find nothing. I use their search function on "Norman E. Brinker". Result : your search match any documents. I get back on Forbes Woman and post some stupid-ass comments, then remember that Price has requested full-on essays instead. So I recrafted the Komen comment and turned it into this essay.

Oh yeah, that reminds me. I suspect, but can't say for certain, that the sea cucumber was responsible for vivid and disturbing erotic dreams throughout the night after I ate it. So I google (sea cucumber). It's an invertebrate related to the starfish family and one of the oldest life forms, with many fascinating features that I will leave to the readers to explore.

Men who Dared

By Carnivore

A friend sent me a link to the YouTube video below over 18 months ago. It's a leisurely stroll down the El Camino del Rey, or the King's Walkway, which is in Spain. I don't have acrophobia – the sky deck of the Sears Tower doesn't bother me. Take away the protection, such as guardrails and a sturdy floor, and it's a different story. I can attest to the fact that watching this video in full screen mode is, ummm, interesting. Give it a try. The video starts out a little slow, but once the soundtrack picks up, it gets more exciting around 1:30.

The man doing the taping, Daniel Ahnen, is able to walk quickly because he is not using a safety harness as others do whom he bypasses. You can see some of Daniel's art at his web site, youclimb.de. He's an example of a ballsy guy taking risks. It's men with a vision taking risks who bring about advancement, progress, art and the many things we take for granted in civilization.

Consider the risks taken by the men who originally built El Camino del Rey from 1901 to 1905. The path is only a meter wide and rises over 350 feet above the river below. It was built to allow workers to quickly travel between two dams. Without the walkway, they had to climb up and down the mountains which was both time consuming and dangerous. It is currently unused, in very poor repair with sections of the walkway missing and most of the guardrails gone. The early form of the walkway wasn't much better:

I remembered the video when I recently came across a book in my collection, Ten Who Dared which hasn't been cracked open in 20 years. Received as a gift on my birthday in 1977, it was the companion book to the television series, Ten Who Dared, aka The Explorers in the UK. (Not to be confused with the 1960 Disney movie, Ten Who Dared.) The series made an impression on me as a young man at the time. Each week, it related the story of an explorer, ten in all. They were:

- Christopher Columbus – discoverer of America
- Francisco Pizarro – conqueror of the Incas
- James Cook – circumnavigated the globe and Britain's greatest maritime explorer
- Alexander von Humboldt – explorer of the Orinoco river in South America
- Jedediah Smith – explorer of the American West
- Robert Burke and William Wills – first to cross Australia from south to north
- Henry Morton Stanley – led the first expedition of the Congo from east to west
- Charles M Doughty – first western explorer of the Arabian Desert
- Roald Amundsen – first to reach the south pole

Ten explorers, however, Burke and Wills are paired, so that only makes nine. Ah, yes. The series and book were produced in the mid-1970′s don't forget. So there had to be, take a guess, a token female. In this case, none other than Mary Kingsley who explored Gabon. Whereas the male explorers listed above made treks measuring in hundreds and thousands of miles which lasted months and years, Kingsley's expedition of 70 miles was a bit more modest:

Her trip – just seven days among the cannibals of Gabon – was one of the least extensive in the annals of discovery, but it revealed a brave woman, not only in the physical hardships she endured, but in her forthright, farsighted expression of ideas of brotherhood.

So writes Desmond Wilcox, author of the book and head of the BBC department which produced the series. This attempt at political correctness was only a feeble first step, in line with the late 1970′s. Note the naiveté in the use of the word “brotherhood” which would be totally unacceptable today. For that matter, near the end of the book, one page contains a chronology of exploration listing 63 explorers including the featured eleven, with only two out of the 63 being female. The other female is Florence Baker who is listed along with her husband, Samuel Baker. I don’t know if Samuel is the only real explorer with his wife as a tag-along; I have no interest in researching her further. Perhaps even more unacceptable is the fact that the chronology is a list of white males. A much greater faux pas these days. Such a book would not be written today nor would such a TV series be produced.

One might argue that the contributions and the discoveries of the ten explorers overshadow the work of Daniel Ahnen. Perhaps that’s true. But, they have something very important in common – that male spark and drive to challenge the unknown. The narrator of the TV series, actor Anthony Quinn, put it best in the book’s preface:

When I signed on to narrate the television show on which this book is based, it wasn’t just another job. I feel a tremendous sense of kinship with people who dare to give shape to the unknown.

I get this feeling partly because I am an actor and I think of acting as exploration. To me, getting into a part is a voyage.

But I have a much larger reason for my feelings about the ten people in this book.

It’s sad that most of us live our lives trying to play it safe, taking few risks. As children we are used to constant challenges from other kids – the games of “I dare you” that force us to find courage to expand our world. But as we get older, fewer and fewer know how to turn the game into a way of life.

This knowledge is the key to daring on the highest human level – an artistic level. Certainly Paul Gauguin (an artist I played once in a picture) had it. He sacrificed a comfortable, safe life as a banker to go off and commit his life to painting. But so does any obscure writer facing a blank sheet of paper and preparing to expose his deepest feelings in words.

And so did these ten explorers – some famous, some obscure. They put their lives on the line to meet a challenge.

To some, the urge to face hardship and death was a raw compulsion to be first. But in any competition that has meaning, the most important thing is the competitor’s will to compete with himself – to get the best out of himself.

All of the ten, even the losers, had that will. In having it, and showing us that they had it, they help stretch everybody’s capacities for life.

While making movies, I’ve been to some of the places mentioned in this book. I’ve walked in the Arabian desert and felt the heat simmer up from the sand. Once, I was lost in the dunes for a while. I was overwhelmed by a sense of solitude and beauty. So I can see why a man might be enchanted and driven by the spirit of the land he was exploring.

But that’s not essential. What counts is the dream each of the ten had. We all have dreams, but for the most of us they remain just that.

These ten people had the rare ability to reach out of the dream and touch reality. That’s what we really mean when we say they dared.

Daniel Ahnen, the man who taped the King’s Walkway video, perished in May of 2011 while trekking in the Chamoli district of India, at 35 years of age. He accidentally slipped and fell into a gorge. He, too, was a man who dared.

Age of Consent in Mexico

By Anonymous Age 69

At least a few men here are considering expatting. You can encounter many cultural differences in a non-English speaking nation. Differences in laws, and in mores. Mores are cultural rules that are usually not part of the nations laws, but can get you in deep trouble if you violate them.

I am going to write here about the laws on age of consent in Mexico, because that is the only foreign nation whose AOC laws I know. I realize some poorly informed men believe only a pervert would even investigate age of consent laws. Not so. There are under age girls who look like adults. Some years ago, in the US, I knew two girls who everyone admitted looked as if they were 25 years old. They used to get asked for dates by adult men. One was Hispanic; the other was 3rd or 4th generation Scandinavian. They were 12 years old.

If adult men can confuse 12 year olds for adult women in the USA, how easy will it be in a nation where people have a different ethnic appearance to confuse a 17 year old for an adult woman. Beware.

In November, news from the city of Puebla was reported, perhaps world wide. A 10 year old girl gave birth. Of course, there were comments on the news articles, trashing the nation of Mexico, and all men.

Anyway, one US female hack writer reported the age of consent in Mexico is 12. I live in that same state, I have the criminal codes, and while consent is complicated, it would best be described, simply, as age of consent at age 18, not age 12, but depending upon her family's wishes. But, let me explain in detail the laws of my state.

If you have sex with a girl below her 12th birthday, this is a criminal offense of the same nature as forcible rape or forced prostitution, and you can be sentenced up to 40 years in prison. But, the important issue is, the cops or prosecutors can press charges, without regard to what the girl or her family think, just as they can in the US. This is the same concept as statutory rape in the US. If you did it, you are going to prison and no defense exists.

And, when I say 12th birthday, that is the general rule where the ability to press charges changes to the family. In at least one state, it is at menarche. So, if she is shown to be menstruating at age 8, the cops are out of the picture, in that state. Unless there has been a recent change.

From her 12th birthday to her 18th birthday, it is only a criminal offense if 'estupro' is involved. Not being a Mexican attorney, I would translate estupro as 'dirty tricks'. fraud; lies; false promises of marriage; or something like that. Such that afterwards she realizes you were using her in an unacceptable manner.

But, here is the big difference, and probably why the stupid female hack writer (i.e. – 'journalist') thought 12 was the age of consent.

AFTER THE 12TH BIRTHDAY, ONLY THE GIRL OR HER PARENTS OR GUARDIANS OR REPRESENTATIVE CAN PRESS CHARGES OF WHAT WE CALL STATUTORY RAPE. If the 'family' does not press charges, nothing happens to the man/boy. Period.

There is also a break-down for 12 to 18. If the girl or family presses charges, and she is past her 12th birthday, but not yet had her 14th birthday, 'estupro' is a legal presumption by the court, due to her age. You did it, appropriate person files charges, she is 12 – 14, 5 years in prison.

To make that clear, 12 – 14, you cannot defend yourself against charges of estupro if they are filed. Nor can she speak up in your defense, even if she wants to.

After the 14th birthday, if charges are filed, you can try to defend yourself by proving the absence of estupro. If she is on your side, I assume she can testify she was your willing partner in sex. I am guessing on that, but it is consistent with other legal issues.

If you disprove estupro after the 14th birthday, likewise you go free. If not, five years in prison maximum.

The problem is, Mexican judges, like American judges, are always loose cannons on deck. If the judge doesn't like you, he can rule for estupro even if she wanted to have sex with you, just because he wants to.

After her 18th birthday, the only thing you might have to worry about is a false rape charge. But, the police ask the embarrassing questions that are prohibited by law in the US. So, the odds are much smaller that a false charge would stick in Mexico.

And, of course, yes, if a retarded girl is involved, that can put you in trouble by special protective laws. But, the judge will have to be shown the girl was truly incapable by mental insufficiencies, it is not automatic, which means you can mount a defense if you have one.

Now that I have told you the laws as I understand them, let me say anyone who dinks around with young girls, in this case, under 18, does not have my sympathy when he ends up in prison. I have high risk aversion, and see no reason to mess around with underage girls, when there are billions of adult women in the world. Don't do it.

A few months ago, a niece, her cousin, and a friend, were found at a dance in another town at 3 am. They are around 14 years old. Though humans are unpredictable, if they had been caught having sex with an older boy or man, there is a good chance the family would not file charges, because here they understand young females better than the dummies in the US do. And, if those girls were willing partners for sex, the typical Mexican family will question why a young man should go to prison for their daughter's slutty behavior. Mexico is very judgmental of females.

One other thing I forgot to mention. If you bang a young girl over 12 years old, the men in her family may well administer machete justice. Another means by which the family deals with such issues. Don't do it.

Of course, the family of an underage girl definitely has the power to blackmail you since it is their call to press charges. There is always the possibility of being set up for blackmail by a criminal family. Or, a family may demand a shotgun wedding to preserve their daughter's reputation.

And, I also mention American law, which says any American citizen or resident who has sex with a girl under 16 years of age in any nation in the world, goes to prison in the US for 15 years, no matter what the law in the other nation says. And, if a prostitute happens to be under 18, under U.S. law you get 30 years in prison.

And, no matter how old she appeared to be or you thought she was.

I recommend intensive study of laws and culture of any nation you might want to visit or move to, before you do either. Cost of mistakes is just too high.

How the State is Also Responsible for the Powell Tragedy

W.F. Price · 8 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On Sunday, Josh Powell, long suspected in the disappearance of his wife, immolated himself and his children in Graham, Washington following an unfavorable court ruling. His particularly brutal killings of his children, which involved subduing them with a hatchet at about the same time he set his house ablaze, removes a good deal of doubt about the fate of his wife Susan. Not all, to be sure, but not just anyone has it in them to take a hatchet to little kids, particularly their own.

Now, here in Washington state, we are being subjected to the media hand-wringing that accompanies the death of a child who is under any degree of CPS (child protective services) supervision. Sadly, this happens from time to time, and although people are always angry when CPS "failed to protect the children," it is exactly these families that are prone to tragedies, CPS involvement or not.

However, this particular case bears extra scrutiny, because although CPS may have done all it legally could to protect the children from being harmed (not much given the circumstances), precious little was done to prevent them from being placed in harm's way in the first place. And by this I don't mean they should have been removed from their father at the first whiff of suspicion (which is illegal for good reason), but rather that they were used as pawns by a number of adults both within and outside of the family to pursue their own goals, which ultimately placed them in grave danger.

From the moment Josh Powell's wife's disappearance came to light, there was ample reason to suspect him of a foul deed. He had been gone overnight, skipped work, and his wife vanished without a trace. Somehow, for whatever reason, West Valley police in Utah were unable to find any clear evidence of foul play. No blood, weapon or signs of a struggle were evident. Most importantly, there was no body. It is very difficult to successfully prosecute for murder when there is no body, because people do sometimes disappear, only to show up years later if at all.

Despite the lack of evidence, West Valley police stayed on the case. They grew increasingly frustrated as, after Josh moved up to Washington, the case grew colder. Enter Chuck Cox, Josh's father-in-law. Sure of his son-in-law's guilt, Mr. Cox pressured police in Utah and Washington to stay on the case. He engaged in a public feud with Josh Powell and his father Steve Powell, who also decided to get involved, provoking police and the Cox family. The end result was a grudge match between the Powells, the Coxes and police in Pierce County, Washington and West Valley, Utah. Unfortunately, but perhaps inevitably, the children became the point of contention.

Last fall, after Steve Powell took his provocation of the police one step too far, he was arrested for his alleged habit of taking inappropriate photographs of local females. Chuck Cox smelled victory, and stepped in to seize custody of the children. Josh, of course, "temporarily" lost custody as police and prosecutors worked in tandem to use the children in an effort to pressure him. It has also come to light that the police and Chuck Cox were working together to provoke Powell.

So, what we had here was a custody battle that was being exploited by police to advance their investigation, and an investigation that was being exploited by one party in the custody dispute. It was a sort of double-pronged assault on Josh Powell, with the children used as the primary weapon. This is where things went terribly wrong, and where any intelligent person truly concerned for the children should have stepped in to protect them.

First, the police and prosecutor shouldn't have been involved in the custody case. The prosecutor did not charge Josh Powell with any crimes in relation to his father's arrest, and it was highly inappropriate to cynically use the custody issue to pressure him in an unrelated matter.

Secondly, if the state were to remove custody, handing the children over to their grandfather was an enormous mistake — they should have been placed in neutral foster care. As it was, Chuck Cox immediately began trying to turn the children into state's witness against Josh Powell in his wife's disappearance. This was a very bad idea. Along with the fact that the two-year-old recollections of preschoolers would have extremely limited use in trial, if you really suspect someone of being a killer, why on earth would you give them a motive to kill children they have legal access to? This could have been prevented if Chuck Cox did not win temporary custody of the kids. His feud with their father and his family should have been reason enough to keep him away from the kids, but he was working with the cops, and they pushed the issue.

Finally, ordering the "psychosexual exam" was a step too far — the judge who went along with it was a coward. Josh Powell may well have been a murderer, but there was no direct evidence to suggest he was a pervert. It was just another investigative tool and pressure tactic, again using the children as the excuse, and the humiliation factor (including the use of a plesmograph, I assume), was virtually guaranteed to create a great deal of anger. The police in this case did everything they could to create an explosive situation with the children right in the middle. Without evidence, police use pressure tactics to elicit confessions. This is what they had been doing for the last six months, and they were using the children as the lever.

This is why some of the police involved have been angrily denying even a trace of responsibility for the outcome. One went so far as to say we shouldn't call this a tragedy, presumably because it implies that factors in addition to Josh Powell himself may have contributed to the outcome.

Sure, in a cop's perfect world we could always wrap up blame in a tidy little box – or a couple little coffins, in this case – and dispose of it neatly. But that isn't the way the world works. Sometimes, when you put enormous pressure on people, they snap. Sometimes you might want them to snap. But when you push them right up to the brink when there are innocent children involved, and then push them farther, you bear some responsibility for what follows.

As soon as the state started using the children in the Powell case, it took on some responsibility for their fate. Unfortunately, given contemporary family law, children have become an irresistible tool in the state's arsenal, and this will go on until we put a stop to it. Quite frankly, if the police had not chosen to use the children in their murder investigation, they would be alive today.

As for Josh Powell, he deserves no sympathy at this point. I and countless other men have been through the same custody process he went through with even less support than he had (he had a lawyer, family and a pastor to lean on), yet somehow the overwhelming majority of us never even think of hurting our children. Nevertheless, feminists will exploit this tragedy to their best ability to make the situation even more difficult for fathers than it already is. Ultimately, what Powell did was extremely selfish and hurt not only his children and immediate family, but all the rest of us as well.

The Evolving Western Matriarchy

By Dicipres

This post is not written as opposition to the growing power and dominance of women, relative to men, in the western world. I am beginning to believe that 'gender-patriotism' feminist or MRA is illogical, since men and women are inseparable groups. Some 'gender-patriots' only understand this when they have a child of the other gender, for some even this does not help. I do support the MRM, for now, since… well… I just hate the hypocrisy of modern feminism and its religious-like followers.

The goal of this post is to describe this huge swift in power between the genders, which will have significant effects on the lives and relationships of men living in such western feminist countries.

There are differences between men and women, differences emanating from different sexual organs and thus different sexual agendas. Maybe women are more fit in the current market? Maybe the current state and trends are due to feminism? Probably, this is a combination of the two. Whatever the reason may be, our sons will grow up and will go into a world which we never knew. A world which feminists didn't even dream of in the 70s. A world in which our boys will grow up to be, on average:

1. Less educated than women

2. Earn less than women (this is currently the case for young men and women)

3. More vulnerable in divorce and family courts

4. There is an unclear and ever increasing definition of what sexual harassment is and laws which see two drunken people having sex as rape

5. Men are to be less healthy than women and die younger, yet get less health budgets

6. There are less and less marriages and the bonds between men and women tend to be shorter, easily dismantled, based on less emotions and more sex.

7. Most children are born out of wedlock (this number is currently 42% and is expected to keep growing).

8. Boys are raised more and more without the presence of a father, and the men figures are replaceable while the woman is not. Most boys will not have a male family lineage; girls will have a female one.

Point 8 is crucial. Due to this reason I believe we are currently seeing the creation of a matriarchal society, since such societies (such as the Masuo matriarchal society) are characterized by the elimination of the father from the family. This gives the women the power within the household and boys are raised without masculine guidance and under the authority of a woman. This is already the case today in the vast majority of single parent homes. Furthermore, social help by the state is effectively transferring wealth from traditional families and men (on average) to these woman-led households. Women today can get the support of men, due to taxes and child support, without giving men any say within the house or on the way that the money is spent. This arrangement does seem to be sustainable.

This data is unprecedented in the western world. We are in a new world, with different rules and different power structure. The feminists may as well have a victory parade and celebrate in the streets (they won't because they need women to feel like victims, not powerful matriarchs, in order to gain public support).

You can love it or you can hate it, it doesn't matter. Reality has changed, this is not a man's world anymore and our sons will grow into a basically matriarchal society.

I guess some boys do not care if they are more and more powerless, there is porn (for now at least) and video games. But that is not what I want to teach my son.

Our sons will need to adapt. This does not mean for them to accept having low status, low power and judicial intimidation. The world has changed, but they can control their close environment. My suggestions for my son include things like I. disengage as much as possible from the current culture II. Keep your body healthy. III. Keep your mind sharp. Learn inner game. IV. Know that there is an innate part in every woman that wants a strong dominant man. V. Try to create patriarchy in your life, by the leader in your relationships and your work. VI. Bow to no-one. Be careful but don't live in fear from going to prison. VII. You probably can't change the entire world, but you can definitely control the part of the world that is close to you.

We need to reach to young men today and guide them in a way that no politically current school curriculum can.

Just to let readers know, I'm going to be fine-tuning the site a bit today to try to speed things up. This includes trashing some old scripts, disabling some unnecessary features (mainly invisible ones) and possibly streamlining the database.

Hopefully, everything will work fine and you won't notice any glitches, but I am interested in knowing whether anyone notices an improvement in speed. Let me know if the site's loading faster for you, or if anything else changes.

As Mancession Fades, Women "Suffer"

I saw a news story the other day asking why men were getting most of the jobs in the economic recovery, which has been slow and meager in any event. Evidently, when men no longer have significantly higher unemployment than women, it is a national tragedy. Throughout the recession, and even today, men have had higher unemployment, but now they have reached near parity with women.

The culprit? According to Daily Kos, public sector layoffs. Due to decreases in public revenue, government had little choice but to cut these positions to avoid default. The lower public revenue was a direct result of men's inability to pay tax, which goes to show that women, even when working, rely heavily on men. This brings up the question of why, when men were disproportionately suffering in the recession, feminists were crowing about their supremacy and men's misfortune. There can only be a few answers to this:

Ingratitude

When men support women in any way, rather than appreciate it, feminists tend to feel this support is a privilege they deserve simply for being women. We often call this the "entitlement mentality." This sense of entitlement, however, is rarely paired with any efforts to make it convenient for men to support women, or any reciprocity whatsoever.

Hatred and lack of empathy

Seeing men suffer seems to give a great number of feminists pleasure. They write articles about how pathetic men are, proclaim themselves more "evolved" and better suited to the modern world, and generally abuse the unfortunate — when they are men. However, when the tables turn ever so slightly, immediately one can hear wailing, tales of woe and proclamations of victimhood.

Short-sighted stupidity

You'd think that feminists would take a look at the reality of the situation, wherein the huge majority of the funds directed their way are a result of wealth creation, an overwhelmingly male endeavor. From Norm Brinker's founding of the Susan G. Komen breast cancer foundation to the millions of men slaving away as private sector workers and businessmen to pay taxes, the money feminists feel they are entitled to comes from men far more often than not. However, rather than try to preserve and foster that income stream, they do everything in their power to destroy it by denying men opportunities, kicking them when they are down, refusing to give them any breaks, demanding they be handicapped in schools, the workplace and business, etc.

The reaction to the mancession and recovery proves feminists to be moral cretins with a third-rate understanding of consequences and the most basic economic principles. If anything should entirely discredit them, this ugly reaction to national hardship is it. Not only are they incapable of sound judgment and bereft of decency, they cannot even take the necessary steps to take care of themselves.

So why, again, do feminists have any authority in any institution at all? Their net effect is damaging, not only to men but to themselves and decent women as well. It's time to put a stop to the pandering, and to deal with feminists as the dysfunctional, self-destructive borderline cases they are.

Reddit recently featured an article by Scott Henson, a man who has had some run-ins with the police for taking his granddaughter out and around. He's a blogger who covers the criminal justice system, so, rather than simply "deal with it" as most men do, he wrote about it and drew a lot of attention to a problem that is all too often ignored.

Although it's fairly typical these days for any older man alone in public with a child, particularly a girl, to come under some suspicion, in Henson's case the circumstances were aggravated by the fact that his granddaughter is black. He adopted a black girl some years ago, and now that she is grown up and has her own child, he does what good grandparents often do: he spends time with the little one and takes her around town to have fun and learn about the world. In the following incident, she learned a lesson about the American police state that, while not fun, may come in handy when she grows up.

> Perhaps at 7:40 p.m. or so, after she'd had her fill of skating (if the event were put to music, the appropriate theme song would have been "Slip Slidin' Away"), I asked Ty if she'd like to walk home and let Grandma take the car. It was cool but pleasant out, and we were just a short distance from the house, with a city-bike path where we often walk dogs together taking us most of the way there. She was elated: This sounded like a big adventure, and within moments she was bouncing off the walls with excitement, making me think a walk home was just the thing to burn off some energy before bed time.
> This was a terrible mistake on Grandpa's part. Not because we live in a relatively rough neighborhood. I know many of my neighbors, saints and scoundrels alike, and I did not and do not fear becoming a crime victim walking that route, even with a five year old in tow. No, apparently the only folks Ty and I had to fear were in uniform.
> Our interaction with law enforcement began after we left the Millennium Center on foot, with the giddy five year old racing ahead and me trotting along behind admonishing her to stay out of the parking lot and stop when she gets to the sidewalk, don't run into the street, etc.. She was in a good mood, obeyed, and we held hands crossing the street and as we walked down the bike path toward Boggy Creek and back home.
> Then behind us I heard someone call out, though I couldn't make out what was said. We stopped to look back, and there was a dark silhouette crossing the street who Ty thought was calling out to us. We waited, but then the silhouetted figure stopped, crouched down for a moment, then took a few steps back toward the rec center, appearing to speak to someone there. I shrugged it off and we walked on, but in a moment the figure began walking down the path toward us again, calling out when she was about 150 feet away. We stopped and waited. It was a brown-suited deputy constable, apparently out of breath from the short walk.
> She told me to take my hand out of my pocket and to step away from Ty, declaring that someone had seen a white man chasing a black girl and reported a possible kidnapping. Then she began asking the five-year old about me. The last time this happened, Ty was barely two, and I wasn't about to let police question her. This time, though, at least initially, I decided to let her answer. "Do you know this man?" the deputy asked. "Yes," Ty mumbled shyly, "he's my Grandpa." The deputy couldn't understand her (though I did) and moved closer, hovering over the child slightly, repeating the question. Ty mumbled the same response, this time louder, but muffled through a burgeoning sob that threatened to break out in lieu of an answer.
> The deputy still didn't understand her: "What did you say?" she repeated. "He's my Grandpa!," Ty finally blurted, sharply and clearly, then rushed back over to me and grabbed hold of my leg. "Okay," said the deputy, relaxing, acknowledging the child probably wasn't being held against her will. (As we were talking, a car pulled up behind her on the bike path with its brights on – I couldn't tell what agency it was with) Then she pulled out her pad and paper and asked "Can I get your name, sir, just for my report?" I told her I'd prefer not to answer any questions and would like to leave, if we were free to go, so I could get the child to bed. She looked > skeptical but nodded and Ty and I turned tail and walked toward home.

That was just the beginning. Henson knows that he doesn't have to comply with police demands that he answer questions, but he probably also knows that they do not like it when citizens refuse to answer. Nevertheless, he did the right thing. One of the few checks on police behavior is citizens exercising their rights, which include not talking to police when they do not want to.

However, soon thereafter Mr. Henson received the kind of treatment usually meted out to suspects fleeing a crime:

> As soon as we crossed the street, just two blocks from my house as the crow flies, the police car that just passed us hit its lights and wheeled around, with five others appearing almost immediately, all with lights flashing. The officers got out with tasers drawn demanding I raise my hands and step away from the child. I complied, and they roughly cuffed me, jerking my arms up behind me needlessly. Meanwhile, Ty edged up the hill away from the officers, crying. One of them called out in a comforting tone that they weren't there to hurt her, but another officer blew up any good will that might have garnered by brusquely snatching her up and scuttling her off to the back seat of one of the police cars. (By this time more cars had joined them; they maxxed out at 9 or 10 police vehicles.)
> I gave them the phone numbers they needed to confirm who Ty was and that she was supposed to be with me (and not in the back of their police car), but for quite a while nobody seemed too interested in verifying my "story." One officer wanted to lecture me endlessly about how they were just doing their job, as if the innocent person handcuffed on the side of the road cares about such excuses. I asked why he hadn't made any calls yet, and he interrupted his lecture to say "we've only been here two minutes, give us time" (actually it'd been longer than that). "Maybe so," I replied, sitting on the concrete in handcuffs, "but there are nine of y'all milling about doing nothing by my count so between you you've had 18 minutes for somebody to get on the damn phone by now so y'all can figure out you screwed up." Admittedly, this did not go over well. I could tell I was too pissed off to say anything constructive and silently vowed to keep mum from then on.
> As all this was happening, the deputy constable who'd questioned us before walked up to the scene and began conversing with some of the officers. She kept looking over at me nervously as I stood 20 feet or so away in handcuffs, averting her gaze whenever our eyes risked meeting. It seemed pretty clear she was the one who called in the cavalry, and it was equally clear she understood she was in the wrong.
> Ty told me later that back in the police car she'd been questioned, not just about me but about her personal life, or as she put it, "all my business": They asked about her school, what she'd been doing that evening, to name all the people in her family, and pressed her to say if I or anyone else had done anything to her. Ty was frustrated, she said later, that they kept repeating the same questions, apparently hoping for different answers. She didn't understand why, after she'd told them who I was, the police didn't just let me go. And when it became clear they wouldn't take her word for it, she began to fear the police would take me away and leave her alone with all those scary cops. (I must admit, for a moment there I felt the same way!) On the upside, said Ty, when they were through questioning her one of the officers let her play with his flashlight, which she considered a high point. Don't you miss life being that simple?
> Part of the answer, of course, to Ty's Very Good Question about why I wasn't released when she confirmed my identity is that I was in handcuffs and she was in police custody before anybody asked anyone anything. "Seize first and ask questions later" is better than "shoot first," I suppose, but it's problematic for the same reasons. I found out later police had told my wife and Ty's mom that I'd refused to let them question the child – a patent lie since they'd whisked her away into the back of a police car while I was handcuffed. I wasn't in a position to refuse anything at that point.

Chances that a man in public with a child is a kidnapper are remote (most kidnappings are carried out by mothers, actually), but such paranoia about men has gripped our society that people are willing to put up with routine violations of civil rights to make sure the men aren't up to no good. This is not normal around the world, but rather specific to Anglosphere countries, which have the most repressive policies and negative views regarding men and their intentions on the planet.

Part of the problem is that every time there is an incident involving one particularly problematic man, an exception to the majority normal men who are perfectly trustworthy around children, a panic sweeps the land and new policies and laws are adopted targeting all men. As these policies and laws have escalated, the result has been to make any man with a woman or child a de facto suspect who may be roughed up by the police with impunity, so long as they are "protecting women and children." It is exactly this justification that has made a mockery of the US Constitution, not only in the private family, but on the public street as well.

The Golden Uterus Syndrome

By Joe Zamboni

I'm taking a class that meets every six weeks for three-day weekends. The dates have been arranged many months in advance. One of the students is a single mother, with three young children, who is an entitled princess. She sent out an email to all the other students, saying that she wants to change the class dates to another weekend, and that she's checking to see whether we the other students were OK with that. She proposed another weekend date, and that generated an extensive volley of emails. A few people had conflicts. She then proposed another weekend date, and again we had another prolonged round of emails. This time it could work for everyone in the class except one other woman. That other woman would have to miss one of the three days in a three-day weekend.

What got me going is the way this mother just plowed ahead, as though we of course were all going to change our schedules for her. She didn't even bother to check with this other woman to see whether it was OK with that other woman. She just assumed that it was going to be OK with that other woman. After all, the other woman was only giving up one of three days, so that she, the mother, could avoid missing the whole weekend. I objected to her assumption that, of course, all of us other students were going to knock ourselves out in order to accommodate this mother. I got into a sparring match with her when I suggested that she deal with her own scheduling problem, and that she had no right to impose a cost or inconvenience on anyone.

I wrote in one of the email exchanges that this situation was like someone having poison they didn't know how to get rid of. They must not simply pour it in a river, and then forget about the fact that people down river are going to drink that poisoned water. Like many American mothers, this mother seems unable to realistically consider the cost and impact of the demands that she is making on others.

Apparently I hit on a nerve, and then another student, who was also a mother, came to the aid of the one who was asking us all to change our schedules. This other mother took exception to the pollution analogy, although she could not come up with a better one. Although she won't cop to it in front of the class-members, I'm pretty sure that her upset is in part a function of the fact that she has a disabled child. For years she has believed that everyone should be dropping whatever they are doing to come help her care for the disabled child. She even divorced husband number two (not the father of the disabled child) because he didn't provide enough help caring for the disabled child. He says he married her, but did not agree to be caretaker to the disabled child.

With both of these mothers there is an assumption that everybody should come and help out, whenever the mothers ask for it. It is as though the mothers of the world sit next to God, and whatever they wish should be our command. It turns out that the first mother, the one who wanted us all to change our schedules, undertook this schedule change as a matter of preference. Through further discussions it later came out that she wanted to go to a school event with her child, a festival that lasted all weekend. In other words the requested schedule change was a preference; it was not a need. I would seriously consider mobilizing and helping out if her kid were in some sort of serious danger, or if there was some genuine and pressing need here. But this is just a social matter. And she thinks nothing of the fact that she inconveniences everybody, so that she can have her way.

Which brings us to the topic of the Golden Uterus Syndrome, a label first coined by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier. As Palmatier defines it, Golden Uterus Syndrome (GUS) occurs when a woman thinks she deserves special privileges just because she has given birth to a child. These women have an over-inflated sense of themselves, believing that everyone else owes them something just because they are mothers. For example, women with this syndrome, which is all too common in America these days, use the term "for the benefit of the child" as though it is reason to get their own way. Supposedly all sorts of things (like a mother not taking a job, and instead staying at home) are for the benefit of the child, when in reality they are simply a cover for the woman manipulating others to get her way.

As my interactions with my classmates revealed, it is apparently taboo to confront a mother on her selfish behavior.

The fact is that other people, be they men or women, owe nothing to mothers. As the recent Italian ocean liner accident (Costa Concordia) dramatically revealed, chivalry is dead. I won't give my seat on the bus to a mother who's standing, and I certainly won't give my sinking-ship lifeboat seat to a mother. The social contract between men and women is dead, and feminist women are the ones who killed it. Mothers in general don't do anything for me (although I appreciate my own, God rest her soul). So many of these mothers just take, take, take — like parasites. For example, women all over world are blatantly getting pregnant so that they don't have to work at a job, so that they can be supported by a man. I'm not going to act like I approve of their behavior to ensnare and enslave a man, so that this man is then forced to pay eighteen years of child support at the very least.

American mothers have milked their close association with the young for all it's worth. Things have gone way overboard. Mothers now enjoy many unwarranted preferences, and it's time to reestablish a new and more equitable balance. I agree that the young do need special protection, training, and other assistance, but the same cannot honestly be said for women who have had children. I have personally witnessed the bizarre claims to special treatment coming from mothers who don't work, who have a wealthy husband, a maid, a nanny, and other servants. Their claims of being so incredibly burdened by their children are about as hollow and self-serving as they come. While this type of toxic mother is an extreme case, I seriously question whether I should give any type of mother with children any more special consideration, aid, support, or exemptions from the duties of life, than I give to any other person with children. Why should I treat a baby-sitter with a child any differently? Why should I treat a teacher with a child any differently? Why should I treat a father with a child any differently? The Fourteenth Amendment talks about equal protection for all people, and that is my approach to relationships with mothers (actually I employ that approach with gusto in those instances where a mother has GUS).

Once upon a time, there may have been good reason to protect mothers, to support mothers, etc. (I don't know, I wasn't there). But that is one hundred or more years ago. Today's American women claim to be the equals of men, if not better than men. At least in this instance, I am pleased to give them what they say they want (equal treatment). The fact is that modern mothers have a choice to have a child or not. When they have a child, it is their own personal burden that they are taking on — it is their decision to have that baby. I had no part in their past baby making decisions (unfortunately even if I was the contributor of DNA material), and I do not now agree to allow them to off-load the baby-related responsibilities and costs onto me.

Women these days have decided that they prefer the support of the government (which really is for the most part ultimately support coming from working men who pay taxes, child support, alimony, etc.) rather than the direct support of a father and/or husband. Women now initiate 70%+ of American divorces. So when I meet a single woman with a child, I know that she's the one who probably opted to break up the family. Or perhaps she never even considered marrying the guy — she just wanted the 18-year gravy train that comes with having a child. Since when am I supposed to step-in and be her surrogate protector and provider? As a third party, I do not need to, in fact I refuse to, step-in and help out just because she rejected her traditional source of support with the child-raising experience (husbands and fathers).

In general, the GUS problem involves mothers attempting to transfer their problems onto other people, so that they don't have to deal with them. This is fundamentally a question of self-responsibility, and women in general seem loath to take on true self-responsibility. A friend of mine calls it "congenital female selfishness," but I think it is more like an acculturated selfishness, and a "pussy pass" so that they can get out of trouble, so that they don't need to grow-up. As long as we men keep playing the mangina and white knight roles, as long as we keep giving all sorts of special treatment to mothers, going out of our way to protect mothers, doing all sorts of special favors for mothers, we feed and perpetuate the GUS fantasy.

The fact is: the world doesn't need more children. There are plenty of humans on the face of the earth, and those humans that we have now are doing an effective job of screwing up the environment and using up the remaining non-renewable resources. Women don't need to have children. They want children. Having children is a preference, and men are supposed to endlessly indulge women in the fulfillment of this wish. It's time that the women-having-babies conversation was brought into the realm of public conversation, and then dealt with rationally and responsibly.

It's time that men got a backbone and refused to endlessly indulge women in their desire for, and rearing of children. In large measure, it is the continued willingness of men to indulge this selfish female desire that has led to our overpopulation problem. It's time for all men to say "no" to women that selfishly keep having babies. It's time for third party men to say "no" to providing support and protection to mothers who have quite clearly rejected any sort of partnership with a man. It's time for all men to say "no" to the exploitative demands of these GUS-infected self-serving mothers.

Valentine's Day: if it isn't Mutual, it isn't Worth it

Valentine's Day may be one of those manufactured celebrations cooked up by advertisers, but it has become a cultural reality nonetheless, and it can be a nice way for couples to show their appreciation for each other. However, in recent years people have lost sight of the fact that it is supposed to be a day of mutual appreciation, just as love is ideally a mutual feeling. Instead, the holiday has been infected by the princess syndrome, and women have come to feel that it is a special day all for them, and woe to the man who doesn't put some major effort into making princess feel appreciated on "her" day.

While there's nothing wrong with women expecting some token of love on Valentine's Day, men who are in relationships should have every right to expect the same. Unfortunately, too many women see the holiday as a test of how much their man appreciates them, and rather than put some effort into doing something sweet, they sit back and judge the man for his effort and performance in pleasing them alone. This makes the holiday little more than another chore for most men, who know that although they cannot expect anything, they will have more work to do than usual come February 14th.

It doesn't have to be this way. What men can and should do is ask, nice and reasonable, whether they will get anything for Valentine's day. In most cases, I think wives and girlfriends will think about it and make some effort to please the man. If, however, she refuses and says something along the lines of "that's your job," then the man shouldn't put any effort into the holiday at all. Don't make any plans, don't try to pamper her, and don't waste time or money. Additionally, start thinking about getting another woman. A selfish attitude concerning love on love's holiday is a very bad sign.

So, those who have women in their lives should think about what they deserve for Valentine's Day, and not be ashamed to ask for it. The only way men and women in our society are going to come to terms with each other is if they learn to return each other's favors. Men in the West have this down pretty well, but our women could use a reminder, and that's up to us.

Readers out there with women in their lives should put this into practice today. They might find that, rather than offended, their women will be pleased and stimulated by the request, and their Valentine's Day will be far more pleasant than it would have been otherwise.

If The Genders Be Reversed:

Davd · 15 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

… a Test for Equal Treatment

Even when we know intuitively or from reading that something "is so" or "isn't so", it helps to have a measure, or at least an indicator of the fact. When arguing over gender [in]equality, a good indicator is all-the-more needed, because one side's intuitions aren't likely to be honoured by the opposition. Here's a test, an indicator if you prefer that word, for Gender Equality: If the genders were reversed, would the outcome be the same? Methinks it will unmask most Feminist claims that "gender equality" means giving more to women; and become a valuable tool for men seeking fair (equal-opportunity) treatment. A few examples may help readers see how to apply this "Gender-Reversal test"; using double standards of violence, accusation, sexual consent, and child custody that should all be familiar to most men.

Violence:

Gerry and Leslie are names given to both boys and girls. Suppose there is a domestic fight involving the heterosexual couple Gerry and Leslie. Each is being equally violent. The police want to break up the fight, and the power they have available to use, is arrest. Who will the police arrest and take away to jail?

I'd be willing to bet—if i could be assured of a true answer—that as you read this, most of you who answered, thought or said "him". I might lose a few bets, but i'd win many more—and there would probably be many who wouldn't answer, just because you didn't know which one of them was the male…

.. and "him" is the correct answer.

When i talked with people involved with law-enforcement, from criminal lawyers to pastors who counsel inmates and Salvation Army officers, in 2010 and 2011; they agreed that with equal violence on both sides, the male will be arrested 90% or more of the time anyone is arrested. (I live in Canada and arrests are not mandatory, or weren't until very recently.)

This is especially unfair if—as seems more likely than not—equal violence on both sides, means the man is restraining himself more than the woman is restraining herself! The poor man is fighting back just enough to defend himself—and he's the one that gets hauled off to jail?

If instead of male and female, the categories involved were "Native" and "white" and both combatants were of the same gender, such systematic favouritism would be called "racism" and would be forbidden by law.

This stereotypical example is almost comical, but it is no joke. I begin with it because it is an obvious, extreme negative answer to the "Gender-Reversal[1] test" question: If the genders were reversed, would the outcome be the same? If they would not be the same, there is inequality. Think about that: If there were gender-equality in the legal treatment of domestic fights, as many women as men would be hauled off to jail, when police responded to he-she battles with equal violence on both sides. Obviously, that's not true: Women are privileged—privileged to do violence to men they live with.

To stay with violence as subject-matter for two more examples, let's consider pre-pubertal children and opposite-sex pairs of adults who do not "have a sexual relationship."

About 60 years ago, my boyhood playmates and i would occasionally get kicked-in-the-shins, hard, by a girl who then danced away chanting "Can't hit a gir-rul, can't hit a gir-rul". Many parents discouraged their daughters from this kind of aggression (some mothers seemed to believe that such aggression was a legitimate way for girls to respond to merely verbal insults); but boys who fought-back after being attacked were generally punished more harshly than girls who attacked. I have not seen this happen lately; but then, old men hanging around playgrounds are sometimes treated as potential "perverts", so i am "prudently intimidated" from going to observe where i might most likely see it.

Can you even imagine a boy aged 8-10 kicking a girl of the same age in-the-shins, hard, and dancing away chanting "Can't hit a bow-ee, can't hit a bow-ee"?

The double standard of childhood verbal insulting was less clear, but again, favoured girls.

That small-child double standard i experienced, existed at a time when most girls expected to grow up to be housewives and mothers. Those were the Diefenbaker-Eisenhower years; and the girls who kicked me in the shins represented the first "Baby Boomers" and their older sisters. Many of their mothers had waited through World War II to be able to marry and have children. (In the 1950s, having children outside marriage was shameful.) The daughters saw mothers and housewives as positive examples partly because most of those older mothers[2] were very glad to be stay-home mothers rather than Depression girls or spinsters, and wartime workers, such as they had been before marriage.

"The protection of the home" was then the normal milieuof women and girls; adventure and violence were male business to which only a small fraction of women aspired. Most homes were protected, not only by the law and the Police, but first and foremost by a husband-father. If the home protected a few female privileges, they were plausibly "balanced" by men's greater access to the wider world, and by the practice, then common, of brides vowing to obey their husbands.

Today, girls and women still have their privileges, including the privilege of violence without the violent response that same-sex violence often provokes—but men's privileges are gone.

For a third example of violence between the sexes, let's be conventionally old-fashioned, and recall a "standard movie scene", which can happen in ordinary life, of a woman slapping a man's face, hard, for using "naughty words", impugning her virtue [sexual or otherwise], or showing affection in a way she finds offensive. Men were and are expected to take such violence without complaint, much less even think of hitting back… though few if any men would dare slap another man in like manner unless he were inviting a fight[3]. If a man who a woman slapped were to call the Police, and if they both told the exact truth about the incident, she would be vanishingly unlikely to be arrested, far less punished as a criminal. Few if any men would be fool enough to try dialling 9-1-1 because a woman slapped their faces, even several times, no matter how hard.

Now imagine that a man slaps a woman's face, only half-hard, for using "naughty words", impugning his virtue, or showing affection in a way he finds offensive. She can call the Police, and if they both tell the exact truth about the incident, he is rather likely to be arrested and punished as a criminal.

There is a Double Standard of violence displayed in these three examples: Women's acts of violence against men are tolerated when, if the genders were reversed, the same acts would be punished with vigor and severity.

The obvious, logical test for gender equality, to repeat, is: If the genders were reversed, would the outcome be the same? For violence, the answer is often, perhaps always, no. The sexes are not equal; women and girls are privileged. To achieve gender equality, either girls' and women's violence against men and boys must be punished more severely, and condemned more, morally; and-or boys' and men's violence against women and girls must be punished less severely, and condemned less, morally.

Men have the moral right to demand that, in the name of "Gender equality".

Now on to a very non-violent kind of Double Standard: Accusation.

Over 20 years ago now, i criticized something a woman had done and she responded with "Why do you hate us?" It wasn't logical, it wasn't true, it wasn't fair—but because she was a she and i was a he, she got away with it. If she had criticized me the same way—complained, for instance, that i had made her wait two hours after saying i'd show up at a particular time—and i had replied, "Why do you hate us?"—do you think i would have got away with it? If the genders were reversed, would the outcome be the same?

For accusing the opposite-sex of hate, the answer between 1980 and 2010, was almost alwaysno. The sexes were not equal; women and girls were [and apparently still are] privileged. To achieve gender equality, either girls' and women's [untrue] accusations against men and boys must be punished more severely, and condemned more, morally; or boys' and men's accusations against women and girls must be punished less severely, and condemned less, morally.

"Sexual Freedom":

If women's privileges to do violence to men without suffering consequences, are hold-overs from when women were usually sheltered in the home, their present-day sexual privileges constitute reversals of the restrictions that sheltered women were supposed to accept "back then." In the 1950s, there was said to be a double standard of sexual freedom: Men were considered to have more license to "screw around" than women. Since 19-sixty-somewhen, the "conventional wisdom" says, women have had about the same license as men—but is there perhaps a different double standard emerging?

Suppose a different Gerry and a different Leslie meet at a party. Alcohol is freely available. They get quite intoxicated and "have sex" by mutual agreement. Next morning both regret their mutual decision to "do it". Who is guilty of what?

Again, as in the violence examples, "he" is deemed guilty in legal systems influenced by Feminism. Specifically, by a crime-reporting re-definition recently promulgated by the famous United States Federal Bureau of Investigation, he is guilty of raping her (though as yet, most US State laws differ from this recent redefinition.) This is not a logical attribution of guilt; it is ideological.[4] It blames men for consensual sexual relations between intoxicated partners—and in so doing, nearly reverses the Double Standard of the mid-20th Century. If the genders were reversed, obviously, the outcome would not be the same: Women are privileged. To achieve gender equality, women must reach equal probability of being found guilty of rape [and other sexual misconduct] in such non-violent encounters, either by reducing the number of men deemed guilty or increasing the number of women.

Someone from another intelligent species, free of the influences of Feminism (and of other earthly ideologies), would probably say that Gerry and Leslie are both and equally guilty of lack of discipline with respect to alcoholic beverages. The event wasn't a rape at all—and the regrets should be directed at the face in the mirror, not the sex-partner.

Parenthood:

For the final example of this little essay, let me refer to the subject that is most painful for many men: Child custody and fatherhood. If in the case of conflict involving equal violence, the poltically correct answer to "who will be punished" is he; in the case of conflict in court over custody of children, involving equal merit, the politically correct answer to "who will be given the children" is she. If the genders were reversed, would the outcome be the same? Obviously not. The sexes are not equal; women are privileged. To achieve gender equality, men must reach equal probability of winning custody.

One way to effect gender equality in child custody, would be to give each parent custody of same-sex children. There is much to be said for such a rule: Children do grow up; and boys become men while girls become women. Much of our social learning involves imitation. Boys, therefore, have more need of men than women as "role models"; while girls have more need of women than men.

Such a simple rule can also be attacked as "too crude". A wise judge, whether in a courtroom, a family circle, a tribal circle, or the gates of Paradise, might well take into consideration the moral conduct of both parents and what kind of precepts each would offer for guidance, and what examples for imitation. A good father might raise even a girl, better than a bad mother. An athletic father might raise a child with athletic talent, even a girl, better than a "couch potato" mother.

The test remains the same: If the genders [of the parents] were reversed, would the outcome be the same? When child custody decisions reach equality by that standard, children as well as fathers will benefit.

All the above examples, turn out to show women and girls to be privileged over men and boys. If we were to consider publicly funded education, women and girls would be seen to be privileged there as well. It is difficult in the second decade of the 21st Century, to find an aspect of social life in Europe and North America, that exhibits male privilege[5]—but banally easy to find examples of female privilege. The "Gender-Reversal test" looks to be a powerful way to bring that excess of female privilege to wide public attention.

My purpose in writing is not to "say the last word" on the subject. (These days, as two generations ago, women usually claim the last word.) My purpose is to invite and encourage men, and women who truly value gender-equality, to take up the Gender-Reversal test, and apply it often.

If the genders were reversed, would the outcome be the same? If not, how shall we fix the situation so that male and female humans have the equality of opportunities that led many men to support "women's liberation" fifty years ago? I recall my own first reaction to that phrase, "women's liberation", was "Why not? I value liberation for people, and women are people."

Of couse, my intention was that both sexes would benefit—that liberating women would further liberate men, rather than alter men's condition in the direction of confinement and slavery. The "Gender-Reversal test" may yet imaginably move things toward mutual liberation and equal opportunity.

If not, then "society", in failing such an important test, may be on the way to flunking out completely.

1Some readers may be inclined to "quibble", that the word gender should read sex. However, "sex reversal" can have a connotation of "sex-change"; so idiomatically, "gender-reversal" seems preferable.

2(relative to the age of their daughters)

3One formulation of "Chivalry" states that a man who slaps another, often with an empty glove, is challenging the man slapped to a duel to the death.

5Two examples did occur to me: Senior executive office in business and politics, and competitive spectator sports. Elite leaders and elite "commercial athletes" are mostly male. (The easiest explanation of this, is the "flatter distribution curve" of male than of female ability.) Top leadership and big-league sports are both elite-only "areas of work", to which ordinary men and women cannot realistically aspire—and if male predominance there reflects a larger number of men of extremely high [and extremely low] capability, then it may well derive from fair competition for the top spots, and not from any gender inequality of opportunity.

I do not regard military service as a privilege—it is more nearly a burdensome obligation, and obviously carries a far higher risk of death and maiming, than any work voluntarily taken up or sought by a majority of women.

F. Roger Devlin Reviews Murray's Coming Apart; Murray Apparently Lives in a Bubble, Too

I read The Bell Curve, written by Richard Hernnstein and Charles Murray, when it first came out in the 90s, and was impressed mainly because it addressed issues, such as the heritability of intelligence, that are usually swept under the rug or vociferously resisted by the PC brigade. Today people pretty much take it for granted that smarter people tend to have smarter children, but not long ago there was still a strong, widely-accepted conviction that environment was the determinant in just about every human difference. Murray and his co-author Richard Hernnstein were largely responsible for shattering this myth, which, incidentally, formed the basis for second wave feminist ideology. Perhaps it was The Bell Curve, among other associated trends, that persuaded feminists to finally drop the absolute equality dogma in favor of playing the perpetual victim and bashing men as evil, irresponsible trash.

Unfortunately, if F. Roger Devlin's review is any indication, Murray is only adding to the invective, describing working class men in very unflattering ways, and suggesting that what they really need is just more good old fashioned virtue. To a divorced or never-married guy, that just sounds like another social conservative threat; e.g. "what they really need is a good ass-whipping, then they'll get to work and support those poor, pure little ladies."

Devlin writes the following in response to Murray's description of the working class "Fishtown" neighborhood of Philadelphia:

> Murray writes that "being a single mother is tough, and it is appropriate to sympathize with women who are in that situation." He does not say it is appropriate to be sympathetic to the manchildren of Fishtown, and most readers will be left with the impression that what they need is a good kick in the pants. Yet I wonder whether the same factors did not produce the undesirable behavior of both men and women that he notes today.

No, Murray, it is not appropriate to be sympathetic toward "single mothers." Widows perhaps, but not those who are single mothers on account of their own choices. A woman who left an impossible marriage may be morally neutral, but these days, given the guarantees of support, there's no reason to be particularly sympathetic to her, and one who left her husband to have an affair or got knocked up out of wedlock in hopes of securing the resources of some victim (the man or the taxpayers) deserves no sympathy whatsoever.

If Murray holds that the "virtues" are men's responsibility alone, he is simply contributing to the problems that have devastated the American working class. In fact, he is part of the problem. Anyone who refuses to hold single-mothers-by-choice accountable is part of the problem. If women don't need men, and men have absolutely no guarantee that honest, dedicated labor will reward them with a fulfilling family life, then no amount of coercion or high-minded lecturing is going to convince them that it's worth it to act like responsible husbands.

It's getting to the point where I'm tempted to just write these older conservatives off. If they haven't been through a contemporary, post-Bradley Amendment divorce themselves, they will never get it. Younger men, on the other hand, seem to understand it intuitively. Men under 30 are far more clued in than I was at their age, and it hasn't even been a decade since then.

Following the above quote, Devlin really gets into it. He is one of the only academics out there who writes honestly and accurately about the real problems. Whatever one may feel about his politics, Devlin's critiques of feminism are some of the best out there. The only other professionals who eloquently and honestly address the issue from time to time are family law attorneys themselves, because unless they are clinically delusional, it's impossible to ignore the inherent dysfunction of the system. The main problem with academics is that feminist power in universities is so entrenched that the overwhelming majority of social scientists dare not breathe a word in dissent against feminist orthodoxy.

More from Devlin:

> beginning in the 1960s, women became convinced marriage was an imposition to be 'outraged' about. Helen Gurley Brown began whispering in their ears that an independent career path could be filled with exciting romances involving attractive men, free of the 'drudgery' to which marriage consigned their mothers. The family income was abolished in favor of 'equal pay for equal work.' The law was changed to permit women to divorce their husbands unilaterally and without grounds. (Wives are responsible for around ninety percent of divorces.)
> None of this much affects the men at the top of the income and status hierarchy. They make enough money that even women with personal incomes perceive them as supporters and are willing to marry them. If a wife leaves after the baby is born, child support payments are manageable and a replacement wife is easily found.
> The Fishtown girls who might have married working men in 1960 may well be earning more than such men today just by sitting at desks entering data. They can obtain higher quality sperm from more desirable men without submitting to the constraints of lifelong monogamy; the 'ex' and/or the taxpayer is made to provide for any resulting children. They even enjoy the sympathy of male commentators for the terrible hardship all this supposedly represents. Is it any wonder such women are reluctant to devote their lives to raising the children of ill-paid construction workers?
> The contemporary Fishtown man, his wages reduced by female competition and the ever-decreasing market value of upper-body strength, has correspondingly slim chances of earning enough to make himself an acceptable suitor to any woman with an income of her own. These men are not 'retreating from the marriage market'; they are being driven from it as a matter of deliberate policy.
> Even if a particular working class man beats the odds and finds a girl to marry, he cannot expect the satisfaction of supporting her; she may well end up supporting him. And what self-respecting man wants to end up like that poor sap uselessly tagging along behind his wife who just bought all the groceries?
> But this is still not the worst. Prospective husbands stand a good chance of losing everything in the divorce settlement within a few years of the wedding. Child support is not so easy when it must be paid through low-skilled labor. Even if you avoid being jailed as a 'deadbeat dad,' you will certainly not have enough left over to contemplate a second marriage.
> In short, the American dream of a home and family through honest labor is now far out of reach for an increasing number of low-status men. Under these circumstances, what is such a man to do with his life? I'd say an unconstrained bachelor existence with plenty of time for amusements looks very much like a rational choice. The male commentariat may make you out to be a bum, but that sure beats years of performing all the hard work traditionally required to support a family and then not getting the family.

What Murray doesn't understand, and Devlin suggests (although he doesn't emphasize it strongly enough, I think), is that living according to the old virtues will, as often as not, result in punishment. What else could you call loss of one's children and forced servitude to an adulterous wife? It's about the most humiliating thing that a man can face, yet it is taken for granted in the US that this is how we should deal with those men who get married and have children.

It's good to see that Devlin is still calling foul when women get a free pass from the likes of Murray. Although I respect Murray, and am sure he means well, like most of his generation he's got a huge blind spot where women are concerned. You have to reach all the way back to the Greatest Generation before finding more than a meager handful of older men who have a realistic attitude concerning women, and they are mostly dead by now; if not they are typically in some stage of senility.

However, this is why I remain optimistic that things will change soon. The older boomers, who are set in their ways, are on the way out. This is probably Murray's last great work, for example. The younger ones are not as fixed in their ways, and younger men, influenced by men like Heartiste, are going to have an entirely different attitude. Murray describes, but fails to understand their behavior, so perhaps his book may have some value as a portrait taken from a different place — from inside a bubble.

Hugo Schwyzer: Under the Bus or a Warning to All Male Allies of Mainstream Feminism

Demosthenes XXI · 17 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I can't make this stuff up.

The Atlantic has just published an article regarding the exile of Hugo Schwyzer from the feminist camp. America's most vocal male feminist ally has just been kicked to the curb by the feminists who he so worshiped. Schwyzer has made a career of writing articles that have promoted a self-emasculating viewpoint in favor of promoting feminist ideas. Until recently, he wrote a series of articles on the Good Men Project, politely telling men how horrible they were and particularly telling the world that "the answer to men's rights was more feminism."

According to the article, Schwyzer's excommunication came about partially from his admission of past indiscretions with female college students and a recounting of his attempted murder/suicide that led to his eventually becoming a born again feminist. He discussed that part of his past during an interview of him by sex-positive columnist, Clarisse Thorn. The gang at Feministe took special exception to him and his past during the interview and it went south from there, with Thorn having to eventually close commenting on the article.

What I wonder is why Schwyzer's past indiscretions are an issue now? Schwyzer has never lied or covered up this facet of his past. Countless critics of his work (including myself) have always called him out on this fact. When other men/MRM advocates voiced observations concerning Schwyzer's past, they were simply scoffed at and ignored, but now that feminists are presenting these issues, there is suddenly a major problem with him being a feminist ally. Schwyzer's hubris, which he shares with other noted male feminist allies like Jackson Katz, Tony Porter, Byron Hurt, and David Futrelle is that they were victims of individually "tragic" pasts and they present those personal problems, tragic pasts and the subsequent issues they presented the women in their lives as being endemic of all men.

After some research, the other factor behind the "hate Hugo campaign" is being driven by a response/smear article written by Flavia Dzodan of Tigerbeatdown in reply to his Jezebel article about facials. The "jizz" article is some of the most inane shit I have ever read (even for Hugo), but it is not truly offensive to feminism as he is trying to (in his own deluded and twisted manner) describe the reasoning behind something that only some (not many) guys do so women can understand it.

But before the Tigerbeatdown article, we have one article criticizing his approach to feminism calling him a "paternalistic feminist" and calling attention to his particular spin on feminism (especially his language when he was quoted as saying that he was "herding sluts" while working at a Slutwalk). With this new movement to exile Hugo from femdom, we now see Schwyzer being declared a "male abuser," we see a facebook page devoted to a feminist condemnation of Schwyzer as a voice for feminism, and other feminist blogs (like this one here) in full support of silencing poor Hugo and other men in general from being voices for feminism.

By the way; does anyone remember the smackdown that Good Men Project CEO Tom Matlack received at the end of last year at the hands of Amanda Marcotte, Kate Harding, Jenn Ponzer, Hugo, and others? When Matlack began asking questions about being male and feminine condemnation of those male traits, certain feminists (including good old Hugo) felt that he was out of line for asking those questions openly. Because of this and his having a subsequent article for the GMP (criticizing Matlack and the chirpstory about that whole discussion) called into question by editor, Lisa Hickey; Hugo resigned from the website as a contributing writer. In fact, he was the first of the GMP feminist cadre to do so (openly and publicly).

In short; Schwyzer has been everything that a good male feminist ally should be; self-emasculating, willing to openly admit to his overtly male flaws, humble toward his female overseers, and stalwartly supportive of everything feminist. Hugo did everything that feminism told him to do as a male ally and then even preached the gospel of feminism to the rafters and tried to get as many men to convert to his new-found faith as possible.

And like a used tampon, he has now been thrown into the trash as the disgusting thing that many feminists feel that most men are.

Thus my message to all male feminist allies who are reading this.

My lambasting aside, Schwyzer's actual crime was trying (and mostly failing IMHO) to bring a male context (mostly his own) to feminine and feminist issues. According to Flavia from Tigerbeatdown as related in the source article from the Atlantic:

[Schwyzer] "systematically presents feminist issues, but his proposed 'solutions' to the problems he posits almost always involve the feelings, status, and outcomes for men."

If good old Hugo Schwyzer isn't safe from being condemned for his maleness by feminists, then who is? Schwyzer didn't actually do anything wrong other than try to explain to his feminists why some men get off on facials, but he's now being trotted out as evidence that most feminist male allies should just sit back and shut up. Perhaps, you all should review why you feel a need to so valiantly defend a movement that does not value you for what you are and is so ready to discard you.

And if you feel that you are a special little snowflake of a male feminist ally and that your female feminist allies wouldn't do it to you; step outside your door, look under that feminist campaign bus and talk to good old uncle Hugo about his feelings on the subject. He might still be there, clinging to the undercarriage; hoping for forgiveness and redemption….

It looks like some of the ideas from the manosphere have finally made it big. The arcane term "hypergamy," for example, was given new life by F. Roger Devlin, who wrote the review I discussed yesterday. It was virtually unknown until Roissy/Heartiste popularized it on his widely-read blog, but now it has appeared not only in the NY Times (right before V-day), but in the Wall Street Journal's online edition in a piece by Taranto that could almost have passed for Heartiste's daily fare.

Taranto addresses a couple of articles, including the Bennett "It's time for men to man up" piece that came in for criticism here a couple months ago, and the recent NY Times op-ed by Stephanie Coontz that attempted to put a positive spin on the crashing marriage rate by pointing out that, relative to others, college-educated women aren't doing so bad. Bennett's simplistic piece lauded women for their achievements, then took men to task for being a bunch of immature losers. Coontz, for her part, suggested that educated women have it better, because now they can demand that their men scrub their floors, bake cakes and knit doilies.

In her conclusion, however, Coontz gives it all away:

> I am not arguing that women ought to "settle." I am arguing that we can now expect more of a mate than we could when we depended on men for our financial security, social status and sense of accomplishment. But that requires ditching the Lois Lane syndrome, where we ignore the attractions and attention of Clark Kent because we're so eager for the occasional fly-by from Superman.

Yep, there it is. If you become a "kitchen bitch" for your wife, she's going to be lusting after other men, and if she gets a "fly-by," we all know what will happen…

Fortunately, Taranto takes both Bennett and Coontz to task with a good dose of reality in his "Girls gone hyper" piece:

> She makes a fairly persuasive case that educated women are at an advantage over uneducated ones in today's mate market. That shouldn't be surprising. As Charles Murray shows in his new book, "Coming Apart: The State of White America, 1960-2010," marriage has declined much less sharply among the educated and affluent than among the so-called working class. But it has still declined, and it can be expected to decline more absent a reversal of the trend toward greater female education and accomplishment.
> The statistics Coontz marshals are less impressive than they seem. Of women who graduated college before 1900, 3 out of 4 never married. By 1950, she notes, a female college grad in her late 50s was nearly five times as likely never to have married than a nongraduate. Today, that gap has almost vanished, and there is no gap for women in their late 30s.
> What Coontz doesn't say is that this seemingly encouraging trend is almost certainly the result of selection bias. College-educated women were statistical outliers in 1900 or 1950. As the proportion of women who have college degrees expanded enormously, one would expect a convergence with the overall female population. In other words, married women were much more likely to have college degrees in 2010 than in 1900 or 1950. But when you put it that way, it's a commonplace.
> Most important, the problem that female education poses to marriage is a product of female, not male, mate preference–of what Coontz calls "the cultural ideal of hypergamy–that women must marry up."
> That is where Coontz goes badly wrong. Any evolutionary psychologist will tell you that female hypergamy–more broadly defined as the drive to mate with dominant males–is an animal instinct, not a product of human culture, which can only restrain or direct it.

> For young ladies anxious about spending their lives alone, Coontz offers this advice:
> > Valentine's Day is a perfect time to reject the idea that the ideal man is taller, richer, more knowledgeable, more renowned or more powerful. The most important predictor of marital happiness for a woman is not how much she looks up to her husband but how sensitive he is to her emotional cues and how willing he is to share the housework and child-care. And those traits are often easier to find in a low-key guy than a powerhouse.
> > I am not arguing that women ought to "settle."
> That last sentence is both funny and poignant. Coontz has just advised young ladies to marry short, poor, ignorant, obscure, ineffectual men who will help with household chores. If that's not settling, the word has no meaning.

The cultural shift has begun. The Victorian myths of women's unassailable purity are on the way out, and a more realistic interpretation of female sexuality is finally beginning to enter the mainstream. This will have profound consequences for policy in the long term, but there's still work to be done.

Davis-Bacon "Equality"

Keoni Galt · 19 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I entered the air conditioned, job site office trailer for our first safety meeting and orientation. It was my first day on the job working for a sub-contractor hired by a US Mainland-based Marine Engineering Firm that had secured the winning bid on a major renovation project at the Pearl Harbor Naval Station.

I removed my hard hat and looked around the walls of the trailer as I waited for the meeting to begin. I immediately noticed a sign on the trailer wall, notifying employees that they would pay a bonus for any referral of women interested in working on the project. This sign was right next to the sign declaring:

WE ARE AN EQUAL OPPORTUNITY EMPLOYER

I had a vague sense of deja vu, hearing the sounds of the construction site outside. It's been over a decade, but here I was, back to the blue collar trades to pay the bills.

During the present economic Depression 2.0 era, I've discovered that all of the experience gained from the carpentry, painting, roofing, masonry and concrete work I did in the late 90′s to pay my way through college, ended up serving me far better than my BBA Degree when it came time to look for well paying employment in today's ailing job market.

The business-to-business sales company I've worked at for the past decade went bust last October, after 40 years of business in the Downtown Honolulu financial district. I went from hacking away on my keyboard and talking on the phone for eight hours a day in an air conditioned office and a leather bound chair, with a window view of the Pacific Ocean and Honolulu Harbor…to now donning hard hat, steel toed boots, and a reflective safety vest, for a new construction job in a high security area of the Pearl Harbor Shipyard.

(As a side note: I had to endure a two week vetting process of background checks, fingerprinting, photographing and procedure training to gain access to this job…also had to sign a non-disclosure agreement about the work we are doing and the location on Base we are doing it, which is why I'm being intentionally vague about it here).

I turned to the Quality Assurance Officer and inquired about the sign asking employees for female referrals. He grimaced and noted that the company had been threatened with fines for not employing enough female workers.

Some of the current workers had brought their girlfriends and relatives in to work so the company could reach the appropriate quota our US Feministed-Federal Government deemed sufficient for fulfilling the new societal ideal of gender equality in Federal Public Works Projects.

I shook my head and turned my back to the signs reinforcing the Gender-Role Directives of our Government's Brave New World Order, as our orientation and safety meeting began. I was soon to learn precisely how Gender equality really works on a Prevailing Wage Scale job site for the US Federal Government.

We worked alongside a modern crew of 21st century contract labor…multi-ethnic men and women working together in the sweltering, salty Pacific air and hot Hawaiian sun. Such diversity! Progressive worker's utopia manifest!

All wore safety gear and head to toe covering to protect from sunburn from working long shifts in the sun.

It was hard work, menial and sometimes dangerous. Yet here were the women, working alongside the men, all making the same equally mandated, Davis-Bacon wages. The Equal Pay for Equal work ideal, realized by Federal Government Dictate.

That was the theory anyway.

The practice was a little different.

I watched with bemusement as it became apparent that there were certain, unofficial gender roles assigned to the tasks being done by the work crew. The men did all of the physically strenuous and dangerous work with heavy machinery, pneumatic tools, jackhammers, pick axes, shovels, blow torches and pavement saws. All of the women were essentially doing nothing more than apprentice-level assistance to the tradesman. Holding and coiling hoses, cleaning up debris with vacuums and rags. Touch up painting with small brushes. Pouring water on the saw blade as the man made cuts into the concrete and asphalt; sweeping up concrete dust with a broom, vacuuming up sawdust, priming exposed iron works with a brush, pushing wheelbarrows of material around and running errands with the company van for the Foreman. This is primarily the work I observed these ladies doing for an entire month I've been working there. I was a bit shocked (but not really surprised) when I found out that they made the exact same wage as the men doing the truly laborious work.

I guess this is what gender equality means in the industrial construction zone of our brave new world order.

It brought to my mind Orwell's double-think slogans in 1984,

WAR IS PEACE
FREEDOM IS SLAVERY
IGNORANCE IS STRENGTH

These women were mostly friendly, hard working, and fit into the job site with no appearance of interpersonal social problems amongst the crew. I've got no complaints with the ladies themselves. There was just too much work and the need for cooperation in doing physical labor for the usual office politics that emerge when men and women work together in close proximity. Things also went smoothly because of the unofficial gender roles for task assignment. The men did the really hard work, the women did the support work and cleanup.

But in my past experiences on any civilian construction job site, all of that light labor would have been done by a young apprentice getting paid $10-$15 an hour as they observed the tradesmen in action and received hands-on training in the process. Eventually, the apprentices would become tradesmen themselves and in turn mentor other young men as their apprentices. Only after years of on the job training would they finally reach a Davis-Bacon Act type pay scale. Hell, that's precisely how I learned the skills that landed me my current employment opportunity.

But things got even more equal as the major phase of the project began to wind down a month later. After all of the physically demanding and dangerous work had been completed, we pulled up to the job site last week to find it virtually empty. 75% of the contractors had been laid off. All of those laid off were male.

But all the female workers were still on the site working with a few of the men who were not laid off, doing cleanup and last minute detail work for the final inspection punch list. Apparently when it came time to lay off workers, even though some of the men where more skilled, experienced and competent, the company was afraid to lay off the women and skew their quota for EQUAL OPPORTUNITY HIRING.

This is not just conjecturing on my part…but the exact words (off the record, of course) of the Project Manager, when I asked where all the boys had gone and if they were going to start work on a new project soon.

He told me that they only carry a small crew of full-time employees between projects. The men get laid off, and called back when a new job is about to begin. But the women workers were kept on the payroll in between jobs so they could avoid further censure and possible fines by the Federal Government.

This is our Federally Mandated Gender Equality in Action.

Men do the harder, more laborious and dangerous work, women do the easier, safer tasks…and they all have the same pay. When it comes time for layoffs, it's not based on seniority, experience, or actual value to the company, but rather the gender of the employee so as to avoid running afoul of the gender quota of the Federal Government.

Time to cue up the oxymoron's of Orwell's double-think slogans in describing this state of affairs, and now add a fourth one that reflects our new Feminist Equalitarian Paradigm:

WAR IS PEACE
FREEDOM IS SLAVERY
IGNORANCE IS STRENGTH
EQUALITY IS FAIR

Men Have Spoken: Jessica Valenti More Attractive than Amanda Marcotte

W.F. Price · 19 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Although many – perhaps most – regular readers refused to participate in yesterday's poll (which I expected), enough people responded to conclusively demonstrate that Jessica Valenti is better looking than Amanda Marcotte. This also should have been expected, as Valenti looks more like a real woman than Marcotte, who is built like a boy. However, a few readers thought Marcotte would be better in bed (a plausible assumption), which may explain why she received at least 20% of the vote.

Several readers asked why on earth I would introduce such a poll. Opus, who suggested that women, including feminists, tend to see the world as a beauty pageant, was closest to the mark. Men respond to female attractiveness on a primal level, in much the same manner they respond to food. However, the social implications are far more profound for women. Being attractive is at least as important to women as being "respected" is to men. A woman who wins a beauty contest feels the same rush and euphoria that a man who wins a sports championship does. This is really what's behind women's anger about objectification paired with persistent attempts to make themselves the object of attention. It's frustration about not being the only object of desire. One will never hear a beauty queen complain about objectification; she's too busy basking in all the attention from her admirers.

If you think about it, feminism is a sort of female attempt to democratize female sexuality. Ironically, the goal is similar to Christian monogamy, which attempts to guarantee that every man can have a a wife, but it has a distinctly female twist: it attempts to create a sort of "hypergamy for all," which is impossible in the long run, but does work to some extent for young women. Unfortunately, this subjects young men to intense competitive pressure, as their sexually liberated female counterparts can carry on with several higher-status men simultaneously. The real feminist rage over objectification, slut-shaming, foreign brides and the like is that it might advantage some women at the expense of others (feminists in particular). They really don't want to have to compete for the desirable men — they want equal access.

However, in the spirit of fair play, I think as long as feminists demand that lower status men (many of whom are young and horny) face more intense selective pressure from potential mates, it's only fair to turn the tables and subject feminists to the same scrutiny. If it's fair to judge a man according to his status, why not a woman according to her beauty? Perhaps the most common feminist pejorative directed at men is "loser." If that isn't a status judgment, what is? Is it any worse for a man to call a woman a "dog" than it is for a feminist to call a man a "loser?" Not at all. The two are equally judgmental.

So, from here on out I'm going to have regular "pageants" comparing feminists to each other solely based on sex appeal, and I will publish the results. They will be noticed, because the results will be honest and to the point instead of the kind of feel-good "we're all beautiful" garbage the feminists deceptively say to each other to create a sense of "solidarity and sisterhood." When it comes to this kind of thing, women actually want to know the truth, and it's now been fairly conclusively demonstrated that Jessica Valenti is more attractive than Amanda Marcotte. Sorry Amanda — you lose this round.

Readers should feel free to submit other feminists for future pageants. I'll try to make them at least somewhat competitive, and let's try to keep the real dogs like Dworkin out of it so as not to induce nausea. I think this will turn out to be a fun little feature, and it will make a nice little point.

A Man Wants a Wife, Not a “Co-Worker”

Uncle Elmer · 20 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Recent big media essays have admonished men to choose “brainy” women over less-educated ones. While an intelligent, talented spouse is certainly desirable, efforts to push women into the career-force have created generations of females incapable of rudimentary home-making skills. It is no small wonder that the growing obesity epidemic has swollen along with the rise in women’s employment as millions of families make do with convenient preassembled synthi-food and hamburger franchise takeout. Working women don’t have time or inclination to purchase, prepare, and cook delicious home meals. A steady feminist propaganda campaign has also cast women’s kitchen work at best as servile domesticity and casually, as flat-out paternalistic abuse. Men are also advised on what they want via “studies” showing that they prefer intelligence and education vs. “a good cook and housekeeper”, qualities that had allegedly dropped to the bottom of an 18-point scale “marital desirability” scale.

Like many of today’s men, I had developed a utilitarian food preparation system that while somewhat industrial, was economical and nutritious. With a bread machine, rice cooker, “crockpot”, and some decent knives I managed to keep food costs down while providing a diet far healthier than restaurant fare.

So when my ForeignBride finally arrived, I expected her to share equally in the house and kitchen chores. She had no such interests. In fact, we had quite a bit of argument before she relented and allowed me to warsh the dishes every night.

Like most Asians, she has a passion for food culture, but her enjoyment of cooking borders on art. And while every Viet restaurant in town has offered her a job on the spot because for some reason they know automatically that she is a great cook, I prefer she stay home and take care of the house. For me it is worth the reduced income to have a cheerful wife preparing great meals at home.

Rather than wax about the meaning of it all, in the spirit of a Forbes Stock Photo Gallery, I provide photos of her cooking here as a Spearhead Photo Essay :

A Man Wants a Wife Not a “Co-Worker”

At The Intersection of Racialism and Misandry

Elusive Wapiti · 20 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

This man was metaphorically pulled over for "parenting while white and male". Twice. The first time was in 2008:

> Two-year old Ty particularly loves a nearby neighborhood park, so off we went around mid-morning with her tiny hand wrapped around my index finger. After a fun time, we took a different route going back, at Ty's suggestion, in order to pass by a house where she knows she'll often see (and get to pet) a couple of friendly cats. Two blocks from home, an Austin police officer pulled up and, to my surprise, got out and announced she was there to question me. Someone had called 911, she said, to report a suspicious looking white man walking down the street holding hands with a black toddler. (I could tell where this line of questioning was headed.) She said this as though it were the most natural thing in the world for police to investigate,as though my race and Ty's, in and of itself, was reason enough to stop and question me. I asked if we could leave, but the officer kept me there demanding answers. "Someone complained," she declared, "we have to follow up."

While the second time was last week:

> Henson, who describes himself as "an almost stereotypical-looking white Texas redneck," said he was walking home from a roller skating rink with his 5-year-old granddaughter Ty, who is African-American, on Friday night. "The officers got out with tasers drawn demanding I raise my hands and step away from the child," Henson said. "I complied, and they roughly cuffed me, jerking my arms up behind me needlessly. Meanwhile, Ty edged up the hill away from the officers, crying." Henson said he provided officers with phone numbers they needed to verify that Ty was his granddaughter, "but for quite a while nobody seemed too interested in verifying my 'story.' How hard would it have been to perform a safety check without running up on me like I'm John Dillinger and scaring the crap out of a five-year-old? I hated for a five-year-old to be subjected to such an experience," Henson said. "I'd like her to view police as people she can trust instead of threats to her and her family, but it's possible I live in the wrong neighborhood for that."

Rarely do we see anti-White and anti-male bias, two facets of the same lib-theology stone, depicted in such sharp relief. Really, they come from the same place in the soul, that place that demands an Other to hate, the foil against which an entire political edifices are defined. Feminists demonize the malevolent male,then define themselves as opposite of the half-truth strawman they've erected. Ditto with whites; to people of European origin are attributed the ills of the modern world, and whites (particularly white males) are liberal fascism's juden.* This episode strikes me as the poster-child expression of both of these bigotries. Weissenhassen of the sort that can't countenance a white raising a non-white child, and a misandry that reflexively eyes with suspicion any male in a caregiver role, despite the fact that the safest place in the world for a child to be is in the arms of his or her biological father.

"Someone complained". Anyone care to hazard a guess as to the demographics of that "someone"? Although I suppose one could argue that he was asking for it, since he was so blatantly race- and sex-baiting (e.g., white male in a high-crime neighborhood walking hand-in-hand with a 5 yo black girl).

* These incidents happened in Austin, no slouch as far as left-liberal burgs go.

A Twitter feud between Chris Brown and country singer Miranda Lambert has erupted over Brown's assault of Rihanna, who has come back to Brown despite his fists of fury. Lambert sings a number of songs trashing men, including one called "gunpowder and lead" where she suggests the proper method for dealing with domestic violence is to escalate it with a shotgun. She urged Chris Brown to listen to that song in particular, and told fans that her father taught her to use firearms on lovers with whom she had conflict.

Feminists, for their part, are shocked that many young women have expressed a willingness to be beaten for the privilege of spending time with Chris Brown. Perhaps they still haven't learned that hypergamy trumps even feminist dictates.

Oddly, Browns supporters and detractors are both confirming that domestic violence is often mutual, and women are willing to seek it out, engage in it and escalate it to suit their purposes. This is why domestic violence will, unfortunately, probably never entirely go away — too many trashy people – men and women alike – have found that it serves their purposes.

Practical Advice for Young Fathers

One of the missions of this site is to offer young men advice, and although one frequent piece of advice directed at young men is "never marry and don't have children," the reality is that a lot of you will have kids. If and when you do, I personally expect you to make some effort to be involved in their lives, because children need their daddies, no matter what's up with their mother. This doesn't have anything to do with handing checks to the mother either — that doesn't count for much in the eyes of a child (feminists will say otherwise, but they lie shamelessly to serve themselves rather than children). No American or Western child will starve these days, so what's most important is your time.

As a father, you've got some very important jobs. One is to play with your kids. Play not only allows them to bond with you, but serves as a vehicle for teaching both physical and social skills as well. Play socializes, exercises and satisfies kids. Next, it's your job to instruct them. This includes both moral and practical matters. Teach them to be decent little people to other children and adults, including you. The first rule is to be a decent person yourself. Don't swear in front of them, don't insult people, and be kind to the unfortunate. In this manner, lead by example. But it goes farther than that. As a father and a man, you should also be brave. Stand up for your principles, and do right in your kids' eyes. Expect the same standards from other adults in your presence that you would expect from your children. If, for example, a feminist is running men down in front of your son or telling your daughter that she is going to a slutwalk to expose herself to strangers, firmly tell her what you think of such behavior, and that you disapprove. The children will be impressed by such a show of fortitude and maintenance of standards on your part.

Fathers can also teach children a great deal about the seemingly mundane, but fundamentally important aspects of human life. Safety is a good example. Among other things, you can teach them about traffic safety and how to avoid accidents. I must admit that perhaps nothing worried me more than the prospect of one of my kids darting out into the street and getting hit by a car. I spent a lot of time teaching them, quite sternly sometimes, about the consequences of ignoring traffic. One time, my son displayed blatant disregard for the rules and dashed out into the street to retrieve a ball. He was fine, but I was quite upset, as it was rush hour and he could easily have been hit by a car. I was frustrated because I couldn't impress upon him how serious this issue was, but soon an opportunity for improvisation presented itself in the form of a dead squirrel on the road. I pointed to the squirrel, obviously a victim of a car, and asked my son what had happened to the squirrel. He responded that it must have been run over by a car. I then asked him to think about what might happen if he were hit by a car. He said "I'd be squished like the squirrel." I then asked whether he still wanted to run out into the road without looking, and after a moment's thought, it sank in. After that, he was a lot more careful.

This brings up the issue of discipline. Some go by the saying "spare the rod, spoil the child." I don't entirely dismiss the aphorism, but there's always the danger of taking it too far. As I interpret it, fathers have a duty to discipline their kids, but that doesn't necessarily entail corporal punishment. Spanking is legal, and works in some circumstances, but it's fraught with problems. For starters, a lot of parents don't know how to do it properly. Next, there's a sordid tradition of using it in Anglosphere countries to "toughen up" boys as a form of exercise. Whipping boys and young men was standard practice for much of American history, and it wasn't by any means limited to whipping slaves. Young sailors – cabin boys and the like – were often subjected to whippings with the "colt," which is a short, thick rope with a handle. It was really quite a brutal implement. Young soldiers were lashed for minor infractions. Slaves were whipped at their masters' whim. Finally, boys were belted and whipped by their fathers regularly as recently as the late 20th century. It's even common to belt kids today in some places. I can say from personal experience that getting the belt is a terrifying experience, and is not so much discipline as it is sadism. As a father, the last thing you want to do is give your children – little people you love with all your heart – the impression that you enjoy hurting them, so think twice before you resort to corporal punishment.

That said, if you are going to administer any corporal punishment (which I don't recommend), never do so without following a few rules. First, if you are truly angry, don't lay hands on your child. Step away until you calm down. Go outside if you have to, but don't touch him or her until the passion fades. Secondly, if you've been drinking – even just one or two – don't consider it. Alcohol dulls nerves and blunts sensations, so you can't judge the force you are using as well as you can without any booze in your system. It also compromises judgment, and when dealing with a fragile child you want to have all your faculties intact. Finally, and this is why I strongly recommend not using corporal punishment, you should always consider the alternatives. There will almost always be an alternative. Unless you are dealing with an emergency, there's always another way to deal with an unruly child.

So what methods do men have besides corporal punishment? Quite a few, actually. In fact, fathers are naturally equipped for non-physical discipline, which explains why mothers more frequently resort to physical coercion than fathers. For one thing, men are larger and have deeper voices. This commands respect. Of course, most experienced fathers are aware that this isn't always enough. When "command presence" fails (and it will from time to time), there's the simple matter of willpower. Is the child throwing a fit? Well, that isn't your problem, but the child's. No need to soothe and comfort a screaming, obstinate toddler — just let them know that their screaming is totally ineffectual by putting them in their room and ignoring them until they get over it. They will simply cry it out. Crying takes a lot of effort and energy, and it will typically be spent within a few minutes. When the kid is done, ask whether he or she is feeling better, and if you get a nod pick the child up and administer a hug. Everybody is happy and all is well in the world.

However, when out and about this technique doesn't always work. It's one thing to put a screaming kid in his or her room at home, but it's quite another when it happens in the car. There, it seems like you can't get away from it. However, the experienced father knows he can. Some of us may like the sport of shooting. What does one wear when firing guns? Ear protection! Nothing takes the edge off a screaming kid in a car like some good shooting earplugs or muffs, or, best of all, a set of headphones that allow you to listen to soothing music while they holler in the background. Just put on the ear protection, and act as you would when at home. In fact, when the screams are muffled, they can actually be somewhat amusing. I know, it sounds cruel to laugh about a kid crying, but it is ridiculous sometimes when they get hysterical over things like not getting a popsicle, and when kids see you laughing it off they get the message.

If one of your kids loses it in public, you've got another problem on your hands. This is not as common as people might think, because children, even when very little and still largely unsocialized, do tend to understand that behaving oneself is more important around strangers than in the privacy of the home. However, it can be a problem to one degree or another. It may be anything from whining and bickering at the park playground to a full-blown meltdown in a store or restaurant, but the technique for dealing with it is fundamentally the same: don't indulge the child. One warning is enough. If that doesn't suffice, it's time to go. No explanations or questions are necessary — it should be clear to a child that proper behavior in public is not a negotiable matter. It doesn't matter if he hasn't finished his hamburger or even eaten his birthday cake — if he doesn't calm down immediately the fun's over and he's going home. Being firm about this from the beginning will prevent a lot of trouble down the line.

These are just a few things I've thought of, but I wish someone had taught them to me from the beginning. I think we're entering another era in which men will once again be a strong presence in their children's lives. The absolute dominion of the mother in home and childcare that began with industrialization was not the human norm for most of history, and it is coming to an end. Some women hail the end of that paradigm, and I think they should, because a father can be a very handy thing to have around. Kids will benefit from more time with daddies, too. However, it will continue to be hard for young men, as the laws are still stacked against them as far as custody is concerned, and too many women still fall into the "empowered single mother" trap these days. But I will continue to support all young men who want to be there for their kids, and offer all the advice I can muster. Hopefully, some readers with experience can add to it in comments. I'll definitely write more about it in the future, as it can be kind of a fun subject. Taking care of kids as a father may be a pain sometimes, but it's ultimately quite rewarding. Dads and their kids can have a lot of adventures, and, let's face it, it's fun to be able to do kid things sometimes even when you're a grown-up.

When it comes down to it, getting the basics of childcare down can make your life as a father much easier. Too much of the advice out there is aimed at mothers, who have an entirely different parenting style, so it's up to those of us who have some experience as fathers to pass along what we know to the younger men who will soon join our ranks. There's really nothing that would make me happier than seeing more thriving kids out there growing up with loving fathers.

Remember the Army recruitment ads that went “be all that you can be?” Apparently, that now includes being a pregnant woman. Due to the epidemic of pregnant women in the US armed forces, most of whom are destined to be single mothers, male NCOs are being ordered to undergo a kind of sensitivity training that will supposedly help them understand the trials and needs of their pregnant troops. Actually, part of the program is to ensure that the pregnant “soldiers” maintain some level of fitness, probably to cut the costs associated with birth complications, which are more common in flabby, out of shape women.

Of course, calling pregnant women soldiers is a joke and an insult to taxpayers, but we’ve taken “equality” so far that people will actually use the term with a straight face. The NCOs, for their part, aren’t too excited about the exercises, but orders are orders.

> Sgt. Michael Braden, a helicopter crew chief who has served in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kosovo, said he was less than enthusiastic about taking part.
> The 78th Aviation Battalion mechanic said he was ordered to do the training even though he doesn’t have any female soldiers in his unit and doesn’t see himself as the right sort of person to run the aerobics classes that make up a large portion of the PPPT training.
> Despite his misgivings, Braden strapped on the empathy belly and spent Tuesday morning learning low-impact aerobics moves like the “grapevine” and the “V-step.”
> “This whole thing is pretty uncomfortable,” he said of the 25-pound pregnancy simulator. But, “body armor is a lot heavier.”

I know a lot of people out there want “equality” in the military, but this is just a big scam, and little more than taxpayer-funded welfare. Why do all these women in the armed forces get pregnant? Because they get to take an all-expenses-paid break from uncomfortable work and the taxpayer supports their kid, who more often than not is illegitimate.

Despite the fact that this is no longer the Cold War and we don’t need an enormous military, we have more women in uniform than ever, and they are more expensive than comparable male soldiers. Furthermore, their legendary promiscuity undermines morale and spreads disease, and, most importantly, they fight like girls.

The only reason women are recruited into the military as soldiers (rather than into sex-segregated auxiliary units, where they belong) is so that they can receive yet more government goodies. It’s a scam, and no, women will never be deliberately sent into heavy combat situations — there will never be combat equality.

How old do you have to be to have human rights?

by Lillian Dell'Aquila Cannon

Every human being has the right to bodily autonomy and self-determination. These rights do not come from the government; they are natural. This right is so basic that we often aren't even aware of it, but think for a minute: does anyone have the right to permanently alter your body without your permission? Could a stranger force you to get a tattoo? If someone did drug you and tattoo you, they would have committed a crime against you. Recently a parent was arrested for allowing her 10 year old son to get a tattoo of his choice, and yet she likely legally forced the permanent body modification that is routine infant circumcision on him at birth. It is illegal to cut an infant girl's genitals and has been since 1997. Every year, though, 1 million baby boys are circumcised in America. Their rights have been violated, and no one cares, and no law protects them. Routine infant circumcision is a human rights violation.

The UNESCO Universal Declaration on Bioethics and Human Rights states:

> "The autonomy of persons to make decisions, while taking responsibility for those decisions and respecting the autonomy of others, is to be respected. For persons who are not capable of exercising autonomy, special measures are to be taken to protect their rights and interests."
> "Any preventive, diagnostic and therapeutic medical intervention is only to be carried out with the prior, free and informed consent of the person concerned, based on adequate information. The consent should, where appropriate, be express and may be withdrawn by the person concerned at any time and for any reason without disadvantage or prejudice."
> "In applying and advancing scientific knowledge, medical practice and associated technologies, human vulnerability should be taken into account. Individuals and groups of special vulnerability should be protected and the personal integrity of such individuals respected."
> "The fundamental equality of all human beings in dignity and rights is to be respected so that they are treated justly and equitably."

Routine infant circumcision violates all these principles. The patient cannot consent to the treatment, and no one is representing his rights in the decision to circumcise. It is commonly assumed that the parents' wishes are congruent with the child's wishes, but since the child cannot speak for himself, we have no way of knowing if this is true. Saying that "He'll be happy with the decision when he's an adult" is NOT prior consent.

Babies most definitely qualify as specially vulnerable – they can neither speak nor act. Their inherent powerlessness makes them the most vulnerable members of society, which we recognize in every other aspect except for routine infant circumcision, and protect with child abuse laws.

And that brings me to the last point: are babies human beings, or not? Does their age make them have less rights? Is it just to abrogate their rights simply because they cannot speak nor act? Do males have fewer rights? Is it equitable to deny male babies the right to bodily integrity which females have enjoyed in this country since 1997? It is absolutely not. Commonly held perceptions of the comparative degree of harm of female and male circumcision are irrelevant: the only issue is basic rights and consent. Female circumcision is seen as beneficial in the cultures that practice it, yet is illegal under all conceptualizations of human rights law and U.S. law.

Could a parent take his adult child to the doctor, tie him to a table, and have him circumcised? Of course not. The very idea is abhorrent because we understand that the man himself is the owner of his body. What if the child was 14? Would that be okay? How about 6? This is the age that circumcisions are commonly performed in Turkey. They have a big party and take lots of photos full of the anguished faces of the young boys. Take a moment to follow that link. Does it disgust you? Would you do that to your school-age son? If not, why not? Is it because he is aware of what is happening? Is it because he will remember? Does a lack of awareness or memory make an assault okay? Of course not. Rape is punished even when the attacker drugs his victim.

At what age does it become okay to tie down a baby and cut off part of his genitals? How many or few years or days old does a person have to be to not have the most basic human right? Apparently in the U.S., the commonly accepted answer is infancy, in its original meaning of "not talking." Not being able to talk means (usually) not having conscious memory, and that is why we circumcise babies. We know it is terrible – even the most pro-circumcision parents know that their son is going to suffer – but somehow, we pretend that causing them pain and violating their most basic right is okay when they are very young and most vulnerable, perhaps because this is the only time where we could get away with it.

Babies are human beings, and all human beings have the same rights. Age and sex do not determine one's rights, and parental ignorance, delusions or wishes do not abrogate those rights. Routine infant circumcision violates the rights of men and should be illegal based on all human rights law. Many other developed countries like Sweden and Holland understand this and are moving to make all circumcision illegal. We in the U.S. like to think that we're the guardians of human rights, yet we cannot keep our own house in order.

Note: A common argument against my position is that "parents make decisions for their children all the time." The two examples usually given are haircuts and vaccinations. I dismiss the haircut argument out of hand because hair grows back. The vaccination argument appears at first blush to be more persuasive, but falls apart under scrutiny. Most vaccinations given during infancy are to protect the child from diseases that are only dangerous during infancy. If you don't vaccinate your child against these childhood diseases during infancy, many of the vaccines won't be required or given in childhood or adulthood. The few vaccines that are given during infancy for diseases that don't occur until adulthood are very controversial; these include Hepatitis B (transmitted through blood and sex) and HPV (transmitted through sex and hotly debated now.) Circumcision is not time-sensitive – you don't have to do it in infancy or not at all. All of the purported "benefits" of circumcision either:

- Are spurious, like the idea that a circumcised penis is easier to keep clean. The infant foreskin should not be retracted for cleaning and is much easier to care for than a circumcised penis.
- Would redound to the patient in adulthood and thus could be delayed until the adult can make the decision for himself, such as the claim for lowered STIs.
- Or could be achieved through much more conservative and less invasive measures, such as the claim of lowered UTI rates, which is based on one contested study and could be treated more conservatively with antibiotics; or achieved by simply wearing condoms, which men should do anyway in non-monogamous encounters.

Judge Orders Man to Post Facebook Apology to Ex-Wife

W.F. Price · 23 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Mark Byron, of Cincinnati, OH, wrote of his frustration with his ex-wife Elizabeth on his Facebook page after she'd accused him of domestic violence. Although acquitted on the criminal case, he was still ordered to have supervised visitation with his child and his wife was granted a restraining order against him (this is standard when wives make accusations). Evidently, family law magistrate Paul Meyers found his Facebook post to be in violation of the restraining order, and told him that to avoid two months in jail he would have to post an apology on Facebook for 30 days.

Here's what Mark wrote regarding his ex-wife Elizabeth:

> If you are an evil, vindictive woman who wants to ruin your husband's life and take your son's father away from him completely – all you need to do is say that you're scared of your husband or domestic partner and they'll take him away!

He is exactly right. That is all a wife has to do to have a child removed from a father. No conviction necessary. Making DV accusations is incentivized for vindictive wives who want to remove their spouses from their lives and their children. Although the magistrate who ordered the apology may come off as a tyrant here, keep in mind that he could have simply thrown Byron in jail without any other options, and that probably would have been it.

Here's the text of the apology:

> I would like to apologize to my wife, Elizabeth Byron, for the comments regarding her and our son [redacted] which were posted on my Facebook wall on or about November 23, 2011. I hereby acknowledge that two judicial officials in the Hamilton County Domestic Relations Court have heard evidence and determined [not in trial] that I committed an act of domestic violence against Elizabeth on January 17, 2011. While that determination is currently being appealed, it has not been overturned by the appellate court. As a result of that determination, I was granted supervised parenting time with [redacted] on a twice weekly basis. The reason I saw [redacted] only one time during the four month period which ended about the time of my Facebook posting was because I chose to see him on only that single occasion during that period. I hereby apologize to Elizabeth for casting her in an unfavorable light by suggesting that she withheld [redacted] from me or that she in any manner prevented me from seeing [redacted] during that period. That decision was mine and mine alone.
> I further apologize to all my Facebook Friends for attempting to mislead them into thinking that Elizabeth was in any manner preventing me from spending time with [redacted], which caused several of my Facebook Friends to respond with angry, venomous, and inflammatory comments of their own.

I'm glad the judge ordered the apology, because it reads like someone held a gun to his head while he wrote it. It's actually more of a forced confession than an apology — very transparent and ham-fisted on the part of the court. It's like when Saddam Hussein ordered American airmen in the first Gulf War to make apologies on TV. What a bunch of goons in family court! It would be laughable if there weren't real families being torn to pieces this way every day.

Another Naughty Teacher

The LAUSD teacher-student sex scandal added another suspect after an 18-year-old boy reported having been seduced by 42-year-old Gabriela Cortez of Montebello. Soon, another "victim" was found, and the Spanish teacher was arrested soon thereafter. Cortez is youthful looking, and her booking photo is surprisingly flattering, so it doesn't appear that the boys were subjected to any serious trauma, but nevertheless teachers having sex with students is still considered a crime, even when the students are past the age of consent.

Unlike the allegations against against Mark Berndt, who is alleged to have done truly vile things to very young children, this case is quite minor, but it does bring up a couple of issues. First, there is the question of whether it should even be a crime when adults sleep with adolescents. This is not to say that it should be acceptable for teachers to do so, but wouldn't termination be more appropriate than arrest and incarceration? Parents should have the option of suing the adult, but when the youth is past the age of 16 criminal prosecution should probably be off the table.

Secondly, it exposes a contradiction inherent in our law regarding sex. Supposedly, a male of any age is equally as responsible for sex as a female when it comes to child support. In fact, he is more responsible, because he has no choice as far as carrying the child to term. This being the case, how can a woman be held criminally liable for sex with a male of any age? In this case, if Cortez had been impregnated, the student would have been liable for child support, even as the teacher is charged with a crime. How does that make any sense?

Who is More Responsible for Sex?

One of the reasons I brought up the naughty teacher in LA and the contradictions in the law is that something that's been on my mind is this idea that there is equal responsibility for sex. It's something feminists will never fail to bring up when one suggests that it isn't fair that a guy is on the hook for 18 years when he slept with a woman without intending to have a child. What they consider a rock-solid, ironclad justification for demanding the support is "he didn't have to sleep with her." Well, no, he didn't. But take a 17-year-old boy and a mature woman of, say, 29, and who has more control over the sex act? Who is the gatekeeper? If the woman isn't in any position of authority over the boy, it's a legal sex act in most states, so she is free to sleep with him if she wants. However, realistically speaking, the woman has far more control over whether sex will actually happen. A boy of 17 has very little self-control over sex.

So why is it that the law puts the burden of child support on the boy when the responsibility for pregnancy lies overwhelmingly with the woman? It's another one of those contradictions that characterizes feminist thinking.

Another thing that highlights this is the feminist claims of mass rape throughout society. If as many rapes happen as they claim, chances are someone on your street has been raped recently. There must be multiple simultaneous rapes occurring at any given time within your zip code. Can you hear the silence screaming around you? (this is probably what goes through the minds of feminists). Anyway, the point is that if men are so irrepressibly prone to rape and so sexually voracious, and women so prone to being unwilling, then who really is most responsible when consensual sex does happen?

One of the most sacred and cherished rights of feminists is the right to say "no" — that is, the right to deny sex. Do men value the ability to deny sex as much as women? Perhaps when it comes to forced sodomy, but that isn't a common issue. One rarely sees men marching down the street with placards declaring that "NO MEANS NO," and when they do, they are generally just holding signs for women. So, if women actually like denying sex, and are more likely to exercise that power, who has more choice when it comes to whether or not a given sex act will occur?

When a woman gets pregnant as a result of consensual sex, who bears the bulk of the responsibility?

Let's break it down:

- Men have a higher sex drive than women
- Men have less control over their sexual impulses
- Women value the ability to deny sex
- Women are far more likely and able to deny sex than men

If the above are true, then barring outright rape, surely women are more to blame for pregnancy than men. So why does the law treat males and females as equal participants in the sex act, and why does policy hold the man to be more responsible? Clearly, the female has more control.

Additionally, it creates a double standard where statutory rape is concerned. If women have more control over whether a sex act will occur, then older women who sleep with with adolescent boys are guilty of a more serious crime than older men who sleep with adolescent females. The adolescent female has more control over whether she will have sex than the adolescent male, who is hopelessly overwhelmed by surging hormones. However, men who sleep with underage females are generally punished more severely than women who do so with boys.

There's been a lot of hand-wringing over the disintegration of the American family and marriage, but few people dare to point out the obvious reason America is fast becoming a nation of bastards. It's actually fairly clear: women are not being held to the appropriate level of responsibility where their sexual choices are concerned. In the old days, it was understood that, barring rape, women were more responsible for who they slept with than men, and if they screwed up they had to deal with it. This is why the rate of illegitimacy was so low for so long. However, today, women can get pregnant and receive guaranteed support from not only the government, but whatever random man they permitted to have sex with them.

Holding men more responsible than women for sex has been an abysmal failure, yet the policy remains in place despite thousands of years of received wisdom that lets us know it is a bad idea. Holding men and women equally responsible would be inappropriate as well, but we've gone past even that. Without some change in policy soon, the majority of all births in the United States will be illegitimate in a decade or so. The current system, which absolves women of responsibility for a choice that is largely in their hands, and for which they have even more options and tools at their disposal to deal with the consequences than ever, is unsustainable.

Taking the Men's Rights Movement Forward

By Ethical Justice

Since the days of sufferage, across all western democracies women's rights movements have made mad progress in promoting the rights of women. Sensitivity towards the rights of women and girls is now enforced rigidly in the workplace, as well as now being taught in schools right from kindergarten on up. Decidedly feminist messages have even become a mandatory part of television, radio, and all other media. The Father's rights movement is like an under-performing bastard step child in comparison. The movement's been around since at least the 1950′s, a quick survey of your friends will likely confirm your suspicion that few men know anything about the issues behind it.

Why this huge difference in visibility? Some will say it's because the Father's Rights movement is newer. Others will say it's because the issues facing men are not comparatively as important or limiting. To some, a father wanting to see his kids more than the standard every other weekend doesn't seem to be a matter of life and death. A father haing to pay more in spousal support or child support than he thinks is fair doesn't seem like something that would prevent most fathers from being able to pay their rent or eat, and if it did … couldn't they just move to cheaper accommodations or eat less? The fact is the same argument could be applied to most women's rights issues and this hasn't slowed them in the least. On top of that, the rate of suicide and depression for men after divorce is significantly higher than for divorced women. The argument that the issues aren't a matter of life and death is misleading. In an unfortunate number of cases they can be.

I argue that the reasons for the difference in the visibility of the Women's Rights and Men's Rights causes are more subtle, a mixture of biology and the democratic process itself. Regarding biology, the developing field of evolutionary psychology reflects on behaviours that the human species evolved to better adapt to its environment, paying particular attention to how gender differences in behavior reflect different evolutionary strategies. Whether gender differences in behavior are innate or a result of environmental influences is a controversial topic to be sure, but there is no debate that the differences exist. Men overwhelmingly tend to be more strongly motivated by the desire to accumulate resources (money and power) and thereby increase their access towards potential mates, while women tend to be more strongly motivated by the desire to harness the money and power of men.

Accordingly, the problem with men's rights is not that men are lacking in political influence or lobbying muscle, its that all their lobbying efforts and interests are dedicated to furthering their interests in ways that will increase their capacity to compete against other men. Women simply are far more motivated to contribute to social causes that require cooperation in the interests of other women.

That brings us to one of the fundamental limitations of democracy as it currently exists. Lobby groups are an important component of democracies as they ensure visibility of issues between elections. However even modern democracies fail to account for the fact that groups representing different demographics have differing predispositions to organize and work cohesively. Therefore two lobby groups representing the same proportion of the population may have WILDLY different levels of influence on government. A lobby group's success at having their position become adopted into public policy has less to do with what the majority feels is more just, than it does with the group's political impact. One demographic acting as a cohesive group may have greater impact, while another being far more individualistic may look to solve its own problems outside the political process and have little impact whatsoever. A quick comparison of the most influential american lobby groups, and the relative proportion of the corresponding demographic in the population will confirm this.

In general men very conspiciously ignore mens rights issues until they themselves are directly victimized. Historically it's always been true that once their individual complaints have been resolved most men again drop out of the men's rights movement. But we are now at an interesting point in history.

Marriage rates have continued their steady decline while divorce rates have hovered near all time highs. The issues surrounding divorce and separation that have rallied men's rights groups around the world are now personally affecting more men than ever before. The result is that slowly consciousness is emerging about the financial impact of a split of assets resulting from divorce, and from the ongoing payment of spousal support and alimony. This impact makes divorce a bigger financial event by far than any investment, any promotion, any career change, and any business venture that the vast majority of men will ever experience. It even has a bigger impact on one's future prospects; with divorce many men effectively lose the legal right to choose their own careers, to pursue lifelong ambitions, or even to retire, not to mention the emotional impact of the loss of any meaningful role as a father which can be devastating.

Equally devastating is the feeling of being abused by the court system. Most of us grow up swallowing the coolaide of our society's lofty moral position. We look condescendingly on countries like Iran and China, believing that our governments are models of fairness and democracy. For many men family court will be the first time they deal with the justice system. Before that, without examining evidence to the contrary, they have faith in the court system and believe that the law is fair and dedicated to justice. Afterwards, the realization that their children, possessions, and labor can be stripped from them at the whim of a judge is a brutal shock that leaves them feeling desperate and victimized. Some men never quite recover from learning that in reality, there are no rights that are "inalienable".

Luckily some men will never have to face this kind of adversity in court. But it is dangerous for those men to believe that their positive outcomes reflect the fairness of the system. Judge's neither have the time nor the inclination to exhaustively review the facts of every case, and even if they did the sad truth is that courts have not yet evolved to the point at which they can add up the facts of any case and objectively come to any conclusion. In fact a judge's right to make any ruling they see fit, or to essentially rule at their whim, is absolute law in most jurisdictions. Judges call this "judicial discretion" and defend it unrepentantly, saying they must have this latitude if the judicial system is to work properly.

Yet its a fact that judges are generally appointed or elected as the case may be because they have one bias or another and that their bias heavily prejudges most outcomes. The statistical correlation of outcome with the leanings of each individual judge is indisputable. Worse still, the bias can completly subvert justice. It is virtually impossible to discipline a judge for ignoring evidence, for ignoring the law, or even for colluding with their colleagues to ensure litigants have no recourse against an unjust sentence.

The stories of the kind of injustice that result are horrific. Men have come home to find their partner in bed with someone else only to have the courts evict him from his own house then force him to pay spousal support and child support so that the ex can live there with her new partner. The father may be lucky to get supervised visitation while the boyfriend sees the kids more than he does. Sons grow up either believing that men are uninvolved fathers or that father's have no rights to their children. Then there are the stories of men going to prison or being made homeless because of child support owing for children that paternity tests show are not theirs. And of course there are many stories of men who just give up fighting and accept that they will never see their children again.

Researching how to make the inherent randomness of court proceedings more predictable might be a challenge we won't solve immediately, but the wisdom of avoiding court in the first place if possible is something we can all agree to right now. A presumption of shared custody is one of the most central tenets of the father's rights movement. It is in all of our interests because this presumption avoids puttting judges in the position of adjudicating on family matters which by any and all measures judges have shown themselves to be very poor at resolving.

Perhaps making this link between men's rights issues and an equitable divorce being more important in any man's financial well being than any other issue he will face in his lifetime, will finally help bring this issues the visibility required to make a change. Time will only tell.

A group calling itself “Positive Men” has expressed outrage over a doll featured on a “Trade Me” auction. The doll, which is also listed for sale by Oh Boy! Toy Company, is described as:

> …a great stress relief gift for your favorite “desperate” housewife. Press the button on his hand to hear a typical insensitive “Husband Comment”. Then grab his neck and throttle the doll to elicit a more “politically correct” response.

I’m kind of curious about what he says that drives women into a fury. I suppose it’s something like “honey, haven’t you already had enough donuts today?” or “can we have sex tonight?” Of course, it could be something he read here, as last night we got a string of violent comments from a woman who didn’t like the post suggesting that women should be held more responsible for who they have sex with than men (guess we hit a nerve).

Also, I wonder what the politically correct responses he utters after a good choking might be?

Danica Patrick Steals Show at Daytona 500

As predicted, Danica Patrick was nowhere to be seen when the checkered flag waved at the Daytona 500, but she was featured in a spectacular wipeout involving Jimmie Johnson after only one lap. In the video below, you can see her bright green GoDaddy car colliding with Johnson's car in a shower of sparks, after which she zips across the track and deftly threads the needle between two other spinning cars before coming to a stop.

As the announcers pointed out, Patrick is a tough gal who really knows how to crash.

Men Not Rushing to Kate Gosselin

W.F. Price · 28 February 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Ball-busting harridan and mother of 8 Kate Goslin has revealed that she is “lonely,” and the life of a single mother is not quite as empowering as it’s cracked up to be. After divorcing her husband Jon, who has since stayed out of the limelight and moved on with his life, TLC canceled her show following tanking ratings. Kate herself was not particularly popular, and many felt that she was unnecessarily harsh on her former husband and an overbearing taskmaster.

Watch the video below to get an idea of the hell Jon Gosselin went through:

With all this evidence of what a pain in the rear the woman is, I can’t imagine any man who isn’t severely damaged in one way or another doing anything but turning tail and running hard in the opposite direction if he came across her on a blind date.

It’s a shame Jon had to go through the divorce and loss of being with the kids full-time, and he’s probably financially flat on his back from the child support, but sometimes these things are worth it. Those of us who have been through it before know that the price, as steep as it is, can be worth every penny when you cut the chain and make a run for it. It’s like regaining your soul; rediscovering the essence of manhood. And then there’s always the schadenfreude of seeing the next poor fool have to deal with it.

In that spirit, let there be an empowered single mother for every white-knighting mangina. For Kate Gosselin, only the most strident male feminist will do. We can only hope she finds him, and Jon gets to have the satisfaction of watching the sucker deal with her.

Raising Conservative Daughters

By Anonymous age 69

From time to time someone on The Spearhead will comment that conservative men are manginas, or have some similar defect, because they have daughters. And, worry only about their daughters to the exclusion of defending men's basic rights.

I guarantee you I am pretty conservative. Some years ago, my best friend really laughed when I told him I thought Attila the Hun looked like a left winger from where I sit, and was shocked to see he was viewed as the epitome of a right winger.

My daughter, the one I got to raise, got no slack at all. Why? Because I cared about her and wanted her to be a functional adult, able to marry and be a mother and a wife, as her biology would dictate.

Fathers who give their daughters a P-pass are harming them, and good fathers know this almost instinctively. Don't confuse bad fathers who happen to identify themselves as conservatives, with good fathers. They are terrible fathers. They couldn't do a worse job if they hated their daughters. In fact, of my generation of conservative fathers, all the men I knew took the same approach to their daughters that I did. I guess those days are gone?

When she started at the community college, I assume she was facing the Womyn of the college. She came home one day, and asked me, "Dad, why don't you think women can be in the miiltary?"

I told her, "Imagine with me that we turn out the lights, in the big park down the street, give you and your brother both loaded M-16′s, and shove you into the park. How long do you think you would last?"

She thought a minute and said, "Probably not very long."

I said, "You are probably absolutely right. Now understand you are a grown woman, as big and strong as you will ever be, and your brother is a little eleven year old boy with a sunken chest. Do you have any idea what he is going to be like when he is 18?"

She thought a minute, gave me a big smile, and said, "Thanks, dad. I wanted to understand."

I didn't want to be cruel, so I didn't point out that if had given her a loaded M-16, and him no more than a combat knife, she wouldn't have lasted much longer. But, there is a chance she understood that anyway.

I never heard one feminist word from her mouth, ever. Not one.

She is a Christian, a real one. Some time later, I gave her a book, "ME? OBEY HIM?" It is a book written by a Baptist pastor's wife, with his permission, to teach Christian women why it is for their own good to submit to their husbands. She married in 1997, and has told me, as verified by her husband, they have never had so much as a verbal quarrel in these 15 years. When they have a decision to make, if they do not agree, she says, in a clear voice, "You are the husband. We will do it your way, since you are responsible for us." Her professional training was as a scientist, She has observed, and almost always when they disagree on something, he was right and she was wrong. And, the very rare time he was wrong, the cost was trivial. She told me "In exchange for this, I get peace in my house!"

Most women do not want peace in their houses. They want to fight, fight, fight, and then get a divorce because the husband is a nasty bastard, always quarreling with her about trivial things. [/sarcasm]

Anyway, that is how a good father raises his daughters, not to be nasty entitlement princesses who are good for nothing and are unable to marry and stay married.

Update: Her brother gained a lot of weight in med school, but is back to 160 pounds, and in UAE runs 7 miles in 125 degree heat. He was upset when he visited McAllen in October, and at 95 degrees couldn't work up a sweat.

With martial arts, he is even tougher than I predicted. Yet, flabby dearies imagine if it weren't for evil discrimination, they could be"sojer boys", too.

What if Your Daughter Divorces?

W.F. Price · 1 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There's been some discussion in comments about what men would do if their daughters divorce, and for those who have adult daughters it's an important issue. In fact, if your daughter marries, there's a 50-50 chance she will divorce, and she'll probably be the one to initiate it. So, as a father, what should you do?

I can only speak as someone who had to deal with former in-laws as the divorcing husband, but that's a pretty close perspective. First, I should say that I have entirely written those people off, and could care less about what happens to them. As far as I'm concerned, they mean less than a ditch-digger in Calcutta does to me. This is because they got intimately involved in the divorce, and did their best to wreck my life, with some success. My former mother-in-law had a lot of lesbian, feminist friends, which should have been a major red flag. But of course I was totally unconcerned with feminism and these issues before they kicked me right in the teeth. My former father-in-law hated his own father, which was another issue. The happiest I ever saw him was after his father's funeral — he obviously had a problem with other men. But to be honest, I didn't really know them all that well before I got married, and like most young men, was very naïve.

Although there were problems on both sides of the marriage, my ex and I being fundamentally incompatible, her parents' partisanship raised the stakes considerably, and helped create a very hostile environment in which there was little hope of dialog and compromise when it broke down. Her feminist mother urged her to call the police on me in an attempt to jail me before our first hearing (which nearly ended very badly), smeared me in court both personally and through proxies, and generally acted as though it was a "war" (her words). Her father derived some perverse satisfaction in bullying me and withholding my kids from me. At one point he ordered me out of my house under threat, after which he and his daughter removed whatever property they saw fit. As I see it, the man was engaged in robbery.

For the next couple years, my ex's mother and father continued to back her in her assault, providing her free lodging and childcare as well as hands-on legal work. They were very loyal to their daughter and acted as her protectors and my persecutors throughout the process. In the meanwhile, my mother, stepfather and father offered me moral and financial support at critical junctures, but never got directly involved, and held me responsible throughout. As far as my folks were concerned, it was between the two of us. They cared about me and the children, but ultimately they recognized that both my ex and I had made individual, adult decisions to get married, and that the dissolution of the marriage was between us.

What was the result? Well, I got pretty well wrecked, as is the norm for husbands, but my parents managed to keep themselves out of the worst of it, and because they never tried to take control they've maintained a pretty normal relationship with me and their grandkids. Additionally, they never impugned the children's mother, and she has no particular grudge against them (although, of course, she doesn't really give a damn about them either).

So what's up with my ex and her parents? Well, she took their support, but chafed under her mother's authority, and moved the kids away against her wishes, partially motivated by the desire to get out from under her smothering wing. Her father is the same as he ever was, but as he grows older his influence and intimidation capacity is fading to insignificance. The kids may have less time overall with me than their mother, but most of their vacation time is spent with me and my parents. We take them skiing, camping and on trips across the West, and I'm looking forward to taking them to San Francisco on spring break to visit grandma and grandpa. My folks really made out OK — they've got a great relationship with their grandkids. The parents who fought hard for their daughter and against her husband – the ones who turned it into a vindictive feud – make do with a couple weekends a year if their daughter bothers to bring them down from Canada to see them. Her new husband, the adulterous older man who dumped his perfectly decent wife for a much younger married woman with another man's small children, doesn't like the in-laws much himself.

In my experience, fighting dirty for your daughter is likely to do little besides guarantee that you will incur significant expense, and may well alienate you from your grandkids. The kind of woman who runs off on her husband isn't generally the kind who has much in the way of filial loyalty. I saw this in my parents' generation as well. It is the women who sacrifice for their family who tend to think of their parents, and the women who run off to "fulfill" themselves simply aren't those types.

It really doesn't matter much whether it is a son or daughter; the kind of person who pulls the trigger on a marriage because they are "unhappy" is likely to do the same concerning filial responsibilities. However, due to policy and incentives, women deliberately wrecking their marriages outnumber men by some 9 to 1 at this point, so it's far more likely that your daughter will do it than your son. If it happens, I'd simply suggest saying "you chose to get married — you deal with the divorce." That way, at least you won't alienate the other spouse, and at least you won't end up wasting enormous effort only to get shafted like your child's ex. We really ought to be honest with each other here: the kind of person who screws over their spouse is exactly the same kind of person who screws over their parents.

When your son or daughter gets married, you "give them up." Getting involved in their divorce doesn't bring them back. Quite the contrary. So, unless you fancy yourself a Hatfield or McCoy, i.e. trash, stay out of it.

Teacher and HS Student "Follow Their Hearts," Move in Together

I heard about this story on the radio yesterday, accompanied by the typical conservative chest-thumping along the lines of "if that were my daughter, he'd have something coming, I tell you!" To their credit, the on-air morons at least pointed out that the student – sweet, innocent, blameless little Jordan Powers – didn't happen to have a father at home, which may go some ways toward explaining her attraction to a much older man. Her former teacher, 41-year-old James Hooker, quit his job and left his wife and kids to move in with his teenage flame, acknowledging that he was hurting a number of people in the process. However, he justified this act of selfishness with the "happiness" excuse, which is curious in that it's almost always used by women, and shamelessly at that.

Mr. Hooker's sleaziness aside, something's been missing from the dialog. Namely, the fact that Jordan Powers bears some responsibility for her behavior here. As a legal adult, she is currently in an adulterous relationship with a married man. She is, to put it plainly, a homewrecker. However, what do we hear from her mother? That Mr. Hooker is a "pervert" and should be thrown in jail. Conservatives make noise about beating him with a baseball bat. Much shock and outrage is being expressed across the land, and Hooker is portrayed as the sole villain, acting alone.

If Jordan had a father (he died some years ago), and he did beat Mr. Hooker with a bat, he would go to jail, and rightly so. I personally would feel little pity for a man who acted in that manner in response to his daughter's sluttiness. On the other hand, if he apologized to Hooker's wife and children for not raising his daughter correctly, I would feel quite a bit of sympathy for him. As I pointed out recently in comments, holding men responsible for your daughter's sexual behavior is the stupid, caveman approach to raising a girl, and doesn't work. American men are terrible fools in this regard, and this is why the "slutty preacher's daughter" stereotype is so often true.

Most people have never been teachers, but perhaps some women can think back to that time they had a crush on a teacher. It's a natural, common occurrence. Most students and teachers are pretty good at controlling themselves, but not all. I've seen teachers messing around with underage students before. Once, after hours in the darkness of winter during my freshman year in high school, I walked past a well-lit student lounge, and looking through the window saw one of the teachers and a student inside, locked in a passionate embrace. Later, as a junior and senior, rumors floated around about one of the English teachers, who would attend non-school events with female students on weekends. Even as a kid, I could tell what was going on, but back then (early 90s) people tended to keep their mouths shut about these things — it was kind of shameful and the girls involved in it knew that, too.

Later, I did some teaching myself, when I was in my early 20s. Some of the girls quite literally threw themselves at me, and very openly. It was more embarrassing than anything else. There was one 14-year-old girl who would embrace me at every opportunity, including once when her parents visited her class(!). I remember looking helplessly at her father while she clung to me as if to say "I have nothing to do with this, really!" The father looked amused, although slightly embarrassed himself. She gave me a picture of herself in a field of flowers (a perfectly innocent one, I thought) which my girlfriend of the time soon discovered and ferociously ripped to shreds before my eyes; women have far fewer illusions about adolescent girls than men. Aside from her schoolgirl crush, she was a sweet girl, and very bright; I'm sure she grew out of it soon enough. However, to pretend that young females are completely passive actors in the relationships that occasionally occur between students and teachers is no more than willful ignorance.

Examples of this kind of thing abound. Male teachers developing relationships with female students may be frowned upon, but it has always happened, and there's probably no stopping it as long as mixed sex education is the norm. I personally know at least one teacher who married a former student; he grew close to her as a young teacher on a cycling tour in Europe, if I remember correctly. Their marriage has lasted, and they have children. Nobody was arrested, and the man kept his job, although I'm not sure he still teaches at this point.

In the case of Mr. Hooker and Jordan Powers, however, there is a bit more of an age difference than usual, and he happened to be a married man with children. The age difference, although it may strike some people as odd, really isn't anyone's business. The marriage, on the other hand, is problematic. Both Mr. Hooker and Jordan did something wrong in that regard. That is the only aspect of this affair that is worth making any fuss over. As for why Mr. Hooker did it, we can only speculate, but he certainly doesn't come off as a particularly empowered man. Powers' mother, who is expending effort to have the man jailed, called him an "arrogant pervert," presumably because of his attraction to a young adult female. Are women really that clueless? Do they really believe it's abnormal for a man to be attracted to young women? What a bunch of sour grapes!

If the mother succeeds in having Mr. Hooker brought to trial, I'm afraid she's going to do little more than expose her daughter as a shameless tramp. After those thousands of text messages and photos she sent go public, little Jordan isn't going to come off as such a sweet, innocent little thing, I'll bet. The mother is the arrogant one, and if she knew what was good and proper she'd apologize to Hooker's wife and children for having raised a daughter who would do such a thing, and then cut her losses by shutting up about the affair.

One of the lessons of this story is that there are only a couple ways to prevent young women's sexuality from having an inordinately disruptive influence on society. Either we can follow the Saudi method, which absolves women of all responsibility, covers them up from head to toe, and shuts them up in the home, or the traditional Western method, which granted women relative freedom balanced by responsibility. Unfortunately, it appears that we are moving toward the former, which is a shame, because I'd rather not be tasked with being my daughter's jailer. However, if women continue to insist on never being held responsible for their choices, that's inevitably where we will end up.

Rush Misses Point in Slut Controversy

Rush Limbaugh has been getting a lot of attention for calling Sandra Fluke, a feminist Georgetown law student, a "slut" and a "prostitute" for demanding taxpayer funding for her contraception. Fluke disingenuously suggested that most students are not able to make ends meet due to the supposedly high cost of contraception. Most college students are not from poor families, and contraception is available for free (condoms) or at low cost through Planned Parenthood and such. Rush pointed this out, but he made the entire issue out to be akin to theft from the taxpayer, and that's an oversimplification of the issue.

Whether or not employers fund birth control, it's widely available, and the funding isn't really the problem; it's cheap even for employers. The reason Fluke and others care so much about this issue is that they see it as extending "empowerment" and "choice." Also, like many feminist causes, it absolves women of the responsibility to pay for something. In the feminist utopia, women can have and do whatever they please without having to work for it, pay for it or suffer any inconvenience whatsoever because of it. This is the feminist movement in a nutshell. It's all about infinite options and zero responsibility.

However, there's something to be said for keeping women like Ms. Fluke sterile. First, it lowers the risk to some dupe (and the collective dupes known as taxpayers) she might decide to put on the hook for support. An ounce of prevention here could be a good thing. That said, I don't think it should be entirely in Ms. Fluke's power to demand that others give her whatever option she wants. Instead, she should be given an incentive to take birth control, but not without proving it.

Here's the idea:

Give women like Ms. Fluke the option of getting paid to get quarterly Depo-Provera shots at a government clinic. After each shot, she could take a ticket to the clinic desk and receive a check, perhaps enough to cover the next three monthly iphone bills. This way she could fool around to her heart's content, and as long as she's taking the shots we don't have to worry about "unintentional" pregnancies. However, if she wants to use contraceptives on her terms, she can pay for it and the potential consequences.

The reason it's necessary to set something like this up is that women will take contraceptives only when they want to, so employers providing them for free won't cut costs in the long run. Contraceptives are so widely available these days that any responsible woman – the kind who can hold a job or stay in school, for example – should have no problem avoiding pregnancy, no matter how many different men she consorts with per day (which is why you can safely bet that very few pregnancies are actually "unintentional" these days). However, if the companies and schools provide both prenatal coverage AND contraceptives, she'll simply toss the contraceptives when she decides to have a baby and hit up the employer for costs associated with pregnancy.

Therefore, if the goal, as Obama puts it, is to save taxpayer money and increase revenue by preventing pregnancies amongst working women, the birth control should be both incentivized and conditional. That is, women who take it receive some benefit, but if they refuse to do it on the employer's or government's terms they have no right to coverage and receive nothing. Additionally, if they cheat on the birth control and get pregnant, they should be liable for the prenatal costs. If they didn't cheat and the shots simply weren't effective (very rare), there would be a record of that at the clinic. With a good system, cheating could be effectively prevented (so long as nurses didn't collaborate, which is always a risk) in any event.

The problem with the Obama proposal, as with so many other policies directed toward women, is that it simply expands their options while removing yet one more layer of responsibility. This has not worked up to now. In fact, the only thing that did work, as one can see from declining birth rates among women on welfare since welfare reform in the 90s, was making support conditional.

The Problem With a Gay-Tolerant Military

A lot of people defended the homecoming kiss featured on a post a while ago, saying if people have a problem with it they don't belong in the military. I'm sure it's a pretty common point of view that if a homosexual man wants to join up and serve his country, he should be able to do so without facing any restrictions heterosexual men don't face. It's a natural sentiment. Fair's fair, right?

On the face of it, this seems to be a pretty reasonable outlook. Common human decency definitely suggests it is. However, problems remain, and the acceptance of open homosexuality in the armed forces will have long-term, adverse consequences on the effectiveness and integrity of the US military.

Most of the studies that suggest the effects will be short-term and limited project only a couple years into the future. It's difficult to make projections much farther than that; our ability to plan for and predict the future remains limited (for example, the People's Republic of China is stretching it with its "five-year plans" and often screws up). However, there are a few examples and current trends that give us an idea of what we can expect long term.

First, let's take a look at another mostly male institution that became notorious for having a large number of homosexuals: the Roman Catholic Church. Some time after WWII, homosexuality came to be tolerated in the Catholic Church, and within a generation or so it became entrenched. The result was a very powerful gay lobby within the church itself, rising costs associated with the proliferation of AIDS throughout the priesthood, alienation of majority heterosexual seminarians and a string of scandals, mainly involving adolescent boys, that have cost the church incalculable losses.

Why did tolerance of homosexuality in the church have this effect? Is it something about homosexuals themselves, that they are particularly bad and salacious people? No, not really. It isn't a gay problem, but a human problem. In fact, in large part it is a men's problem.

The problem is sex. It's already a huge issue with straight servicemembers; fraternization is out of control. The costs in terms of health (pregnancy, STDs) and morale are already high, and will only rise as the military becomes a gender-equal environment. However, straight fraternization is self-limiting to some extent. Women get pregnant and become mothers, people get married and settle down, families of one sort or another exert some regulating behavior on the part of both men and women. This regulating factor is all but absent where homosexual men are concerned, because… they are men. And, even where straight servicemembers are concerned, the costs are probably unsustainable. Given the high costs of childcare and prenatal care, something will have to give somewhere. Taxpayers will not happily fund multi-billion dollar floating maternity wards forever.

Where gay sex is concerned, the primary direct costs will be STDs, which are cheaper to deal with than pregnancy and childcare, but there will be other far more problematic issues. Favoritism, for example, will be unavoidable. If homosexuals fraternize at the same rate as heterosexual soldiers, there will be a lot of gay sex on base. Of course, because gay men are men, and there is nothing to restrain them besides the lack of other gay men, fraternization in a military that allows recruits to serve as openly practicing homosexuals will likely be more common and frequent amongst gay soldiers than it is with straights. If straight fraternization is ignored, and it is, why would the military put any more effort into dealing with homosexual fraternization? Rather than stamp out gay sex, straight men prefer to ignore it. Anyone who has lived in a large West Coast city over the last few decades knows that straight cops generally leave gay men alone, even when they turn city parks into open-air orgies. When you're a straight guy, it's last thing you want to have to deal with.

Men, gay and straight alike, are often happy with a quid pro quo sexual arrangement. It's the basis of marriage, in truth. However, for homosexuals, it's often a much more casual arrangement. Gay marriage is an odd concept in large part because gay men in general are perfectly happy to avoid marriage, and when they are involved in relationships fooling around isn't as much of an issue as it is for straights. Monogamy is not the gay norm any more than it is the heterosexual male norm, but for homosexuals there's no issue of children and pregnancy to keep them in line. So, inevitably, there will a be lot of trading favors for sex, from the brass all the way down to the battlefield. Lest anyone accuse me of exaggerating the fraternization issue, I'd suggest reading about how female-staffed anti-aircraft battalions on the Eastern Front in WWII became de facto brothels. Or, if you'd like a more recent example, perhaps the disciplined Taliban's routing of the Northern Alliance prior to the US invasion of Afghanistan.

What do the Taliban and and the Northern Alliance have to do with gays in the military? Afghanistan is notorious for a practice known as "bacha bazi." In the extremely oppressive heterosexual environment, male Afghans find release in dancing boys, who perform songs and dances in drag. One Afghan saying goes something like this: "women are for making babies; boys are for pleasure." Bacha bazi is a very old practice, and was rampant in the mid-19th century when Richard Francis Burton was assigned to the area as a British officer. A saying about Kandahar in particular is that "even the birds fly over the city with only one wing (using the other to cover their rear)." Burton was tasked with investigating a male prostitution ring in Afghanistan back in the 1840s, because high-ranking officers were concerned about British troops and officers taking part in the bacha bazi festivities. The current investigative reports on bacha bazi indicate that things have changed little in that part of the world over the centuries.

As for Taliban involvement, what happened was that the Taliban, being primarily a military movement, decided to ban bacha bazi to increase combat effectiveness and put an end to the corruption it engendered. The measure bore fruit: as rival commanders waged pitched battles with each other over lovers, the efficient and dedicated Taliban cleaned up in the field and conquered the country. Back in 1994, Mullah Omar himself personally intervened to save one Kandahar boy from being raped at the hands of feuding generals, who faced off with tanks to settle the matter of who got the boy. Now that the US has invaded and effectively pushed the Taliban out of large parts of the country, bacha bazi has returned in force.

The lesson is that when you allow sex to permeate a male institution, you will lose some efficiency and a lot of cohesion. We all know the story of Agamemnon and Achilles, who feuded over Achilles' slave girl Briseis, costing the Greeks lost battles and men, and nearly the war. Men will do all sorts of things, without even realizing what they're doing, to obtain sex. They will badmouth each other, they will procure favors for the object of their desire, they will lie, and they will fight. It makes no difference whether the lover is male or female; the impulse is the same. This is why one of the last things you want in a martial institution is sex within the ranks. It is one of several reasons women should be banned from all combat units and segregated into their own auxiliary corps, and it is why open homosexuality cannot be tolerated in a military such as ours without paying a heavy price.

It would be nice to assume that gay men are capable of controlling themselves and avoiding fraternization in the ranks, but if they are anything like straight men in that regard it's highly unlikely they will. Given that gay sexual fraternization occurred even before the ban was lifted (a gay veteran friend of mine confirmed it was easy enough to find a willing partner), it would be very naïve, and actually quite backward, of us to assume that it will cease now that homosexuality is tolerated in the military.

Homosexual men can and have been great warriors and leaders. There is no doubt that they can fight, and countless have sacrificed themselves for their country. However, their abilities and sacrifices, as noble as they are, cannot overcome the fact that suppression of homosexuality is crucial to institutional integrity in a military context. Yes, suppression. This is what the military does. It suppresses our instincts, and sometimes our better nature, to accomplish its goals and fulfill its mandate. It's one of those inherently unfair things about the world, and in more realistic, practical times people understood that without thinking twice. Regardless of whether open homosexuality is tolerated in the military or not, there will always be homosexual soldiers, but to maintain the integrity of the armed forces, they will have to make the extra sacrifice of silence as long as they serve under command. A hard reality, but unfortunately necessary.

However, I don't expect us to revert to the old ways. Our society has grown too tolerant, too soft, and too short-sighted to take measures to preserve itself and restore its vigor. Rather than go back to the values that put us in the position of power we have inherited, we will simply coast along on the momentum until we are a corrupt, senile old bureaucratic state like the late Qing and Ottoman empires. This is the way of the world. In the meanwhile, at least, lots of people will have a good time.

Alimony Reform Coming?

The forced servitude to ex-wives known as alimony is coming under increasing scrutiny in a number of states as reality is finally catching up to the courts. Alimony was originally based on the idea that women were dependent on men to survive, and that a husband had an obligation to support a woman he had married. It was also based at least in part on fault; if a man broke his vows the sentiment was that he should pay for it somehow.

Since the introduction of no-fault divorce and laws guaranteeing women's equality on the workforce, there is no justification for it whatsoever. A woman who leaves her husband without demonstrating fault should have no right to claim any of his subsequent earnings. However, in a number of states women may still receive lifetime alimony awards despite obtaining a "no-fault" divorce so long as the marriage lasted sufficiently long.

A NY Times article highlight efforts in Florida to change the law to address some of the egregious injustices that result, such as professional women with six-figure incomes receiving $50,000 annual alimony awards:

> Dr. Jose A. Aleman-Gomez, a Cape Coral cardiologist who was married for 21 years, said he must pay $50,000 a year, or about 25 percent of his salary, to his ex-wife, a practicing dentist with a solid income. And Dr. Bernard R. Perez, a Tampa eye surgeon with throat cancer who was married for 20 years, said he had been ordered to pay his former wife 85 percent of his income; for the last three years, he has lived in his brother's garage and is near bankruptcy, he said.

However, some people are fighting changes, most notably family law attorneys and their representatives.

> David L. Manz, the chairman of the Florida Bar Family Law Section, said his organization opposed the House bill because it was too loosely written and would remove too much judicial discretion. In remedying the plight of a small number of men, Mr. Manz said, the bill could leave more divorced women vulnerable. He said he was negotiating to change parts of the bill.
> Even today, Mr. Manz said, divorce is more likely to hurt women. They are still the ones who typically give up their jobs to focus on raising children. Even when they do not give up jobs, their child-rearing responsibilities can sidetrack their careers. Returning to jobs after long absences is difficult.
> "For every guy, there is a wife or former wife who got the short end of the stick," Mr. Manz said. "Look at the standard of living of most people in a long-term marriage: divorced men's standard of living goes up, and the women's goes down. That happens every day."
> "We are not in favor of disenfranchising someone who has given up her career," he added. "What you are hearing about is a very vocal, persuasive minority."

How thoughtful of Mr. Manz to stick up for the poor, downtrodden wives of the upper middle class. I wonder whether he'd spend any time demanding alimony for the girls working at WalMart or the local fast food joint? Of course not. Attorneys defend alimony because it allows them to jack up fees, plain and simple. If they can put in the extra hours to stick it to a high-earning guy, then their clients (wives of the professionals) will be perfectly happy and able to pay off the excess fees with the alimony that's coming in.

Alimony, like so much of family law, is a racket. It does little more than pad the pockets of high-stakes divorce lawyers, who contribute exactly zero added value to the economy. If it weren't part of our court system, it would surely be considered organized crime.

The Biggest Stick

Featured Guest · 6 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Running Hardly

During a playboy interview in 1965 Sean Connery very candidly offered up his opinion on how best to deal with a woman who was a "bitch, or hysterical, or bloody-minded"

> "An openhanded slap is justified–if all other alternatives fail and there has been plenty of warning.

Today nearly three generations later only renegade comedians like Chris Rock could make that kind of comment and not be blacklisted from earning a living:

> "You know what they say, "There's no reason to ever hit a woman." Shit! There's a reason to hit everybody. You just don't do it. Shit, there's a reason to kick an old man down a flight of stairs. You just don't do it. Ain't nobody above an ass-whooping".

Aside from Mr. Rock leaving "hysterical or bloody-minded" feminists speechless, we've made a long journey from that playboy interview. Today's men would laugh at Connery's statements as anachronistic; not necessarily because their women no longer occasionally grate on the nerves in the same way, but because hitting a woman is now so dangerous.

In today's world Connery's advice would be insanely misguided. Laying hands on a woman is the surest way to lose custody of your children, to lose a significant share of any property and income you have, if not to lose your very freedom as a result of incarceration. Once a woman brings the combined weight of the judicial and enforcement arms of the government to her defense, the only person who will truly get slapped is the man who decided to go old school and raise the back of his hand to her.

Feminists say the law is finally catching up with the dramatic historical imbalance in power between the sexes. But men's rights activists point out that the imbalance has just shifted against men.

Domestic violence activist and former police lieutenant Greg Schmidt who created the Seattle police department's domestic violence investigation unit in 1994:

> "The domestic violence industry–the trainers, the shelter directors, etc.–can spin things however they want," he says, "but most street cops know that women are just as likely to start domestic disputes as men are. But arresting women puts you under lot of scrutiny. It's bad for your career."

Schmidt also criticizes the dominant aggressor doctrine which discourages dual arrests (which are often an appropriate measure) and instructs police to downplay who struck the first blow. Instead, police are asked to focus on who is (supposedly) in control of the situation and who is more fearful–often code words for "arrest the man."

Women are still more likely to physically abuse children, and probably still have a greater tendency to be the initiators of physical confrontations with their men.

> Dr. Charles Corry: When its mutual combat, the studies show 60% of the time it is the woman who initiates the violence.

Men on the other hand, being generally bigger and stronger, still probably have a greater tendency to answer with physical force which puts such confrontations to an end. But men now shoulder all the responsibility for any conflict, and can be at risk for merely defending themselves in any mutual physical altercation, not to mention against false domestic violence accusations.

The irony is that the net result has not been positive for either gender. Despite the zero tolerance policies towards domestic violence popularized in recent years, domestic violence has not only remained relatively stable in proportion to overall crime, but family disharmony by any measure has increased.

> Carey E. Cooper et al., Princeton University > Partnership Instability, School Readiness, and Gender Disparities
> Insofar as family instability has differential effects on boys and girls and insofar as family instability is more common among disadvantaged populations, the increase in instability during the past few decades may account for the growing gender disparity in school achievement, especially among minority populations.

Now neither feminists nor men's rights groups are satisfied. Feminists are adamant that still more responsibility for domestic violence be assigned to men, and men's rights groups are furious that women get off Scott free when they become violent, just as they get a pass for the denial of access and emotional abuse that are often triggering factors in domestic violence. Men's rights activists also say that because women have an incentive to lie about domestic violence, particularly during property or child custody disputes, and because they face no consequences for doing so, women have a huge advantage in not having to provide any proof before the law acts on such permanently damaging accusations on the strength of the woman's word alone.

It seems clear that each sex has a predisposition towards certain failings. Men say women are overwhelmingly more prone to withhold access and to alienate their children, women say men are more prone to be violent and to withhold financial support. If even part of these allegations are true, this begs the question, how can there ever be equality if the court's are unequally lenient on the things that one sex tends to do while being unequally harsh on the things that the other sex tends do when both of those failings contribute equally to family crises?

As an example, courts are notoriously forgiving of women who withhold access or who are unfaithful. Given that access issues and the unfaithfulness that caused the breakup are a huge factor in post separation violence it would seem fair to be at least as forgiving of the sins men fall prey to as a result of that stress. If for example a man comes home to find his wife with a lover then loses it and slaps her, should that really be so much more serious in the eyes of the law than the emotional abuse of her bringing another man into his bed in the first place?

As it stands right now the law says that men's violence is much more serious. So if you come home from a long day's work and your wife and her lover tell you to "beat it" because they haven't finished with your bed, don't overreact. They're probably exhausted from screwing all day and too tired to get up. Just do your best to catch a couple of moments rest on the hard cold floor before you have to go to your second job. Keep yourself from raising your voice or a restraining order could have you living in your parent's basement and paying for the pizza and beer he's eating while he's sitting in your living room chair, and using your new hi tech remote to watch your big screen TV. At least on the floor you're inside and still get to see your children and occasionally use your stuff.

Of course the other option to stop emasculating men this way is to get the government out of family matters entirely. Libertarians argue for exactly that, namely that a man should be able to do what he wants in his own family. But a truly libertarian society is a social experiment we've never really tried. Does a man's right to do as he wishes in his house, become a man's right to do as he wishes in his compound, which then become his right to do as he wishes in his tribal fiefdom? Would a Libertarian society look more like the ungovernable tribal areas of Pakistan? A lot of questions need to be answered before that step seems less scary and unfamiliar to the average citizen.

There has to be a middle ground. Somehow we have to get to a point where social contracts like marriage enforce responsibility on both parties, and where breaking that contract has penalties. For example, don't want to cook and clean while staying home as a housewife? … Lower spousal support after divorce for you. Aborted husband's children without his knowledge or consent when he expressly married to have children? … Lower spousal support after divorce as well. Unfaithful? Put your hand back in your pocket you get NOTHING. The list goes on.

Too many people today believe women have more incentive to divorce than to stay married, and too many people believe men have no incentive to marry in the first place. Our sons who are watching our struggles with divorce may balk at ever getting married. Responsibility to a marriage contract is a radical suggestion, but unless we commit to replacing our population solely through immigration as some other western nations have, we have to make society less hostile to families. Radical may be exactly where we need to go.

What do Men Want in a Wife, and Why Won't Wives Oblige?

Uncle Elmer posted a nice photo essay demonstrating his wife's skill in cooking, which was impressive by anyone's standards. One could fairly call his wife a chef. However, as impressive as it is, most men don't expect that much, and of course most would be disappointed if they did, because not many people, men or women, can cook like that. In fact, there is one thing above all that men want from their women: that they are pleasant.

A girlfriend or wife doesn't have to have the looks of Giselle Bundchen, the homemaking skills of Martha Stewart or the bedroom skills of a professional call girl to make a man happy. All of these would be nice bonuses, but they are not nearly as important as the ability to make a man feel relaxed, content and appreciated. A woman who is mediocre in all of the former attributes can easily make up for it by being a sweet, pleasant person who takes the edge off at home. Men are surprisingly easygoing that way, but for some reason women can't figure it out. Perhaps it isn't in their nature. It may be that being pleasant goes against their instincts, and is impossible for them in our hyper-competitive society. Maybe seeing a man content and wanting for nothing is a disgusting sight to a woman, who prefers an ambitious, striving man. Or it could be that she feels as though his contentment suggests that he doesn't appreciate her enough, and she has to agitate and badger him into making some display of devotion.

I can't say I know exactly why American women are so disinclined to oblige men in the simple matter of happiness, but I can remember how remarkable it was to me when I saw families overseas in which mutual appreciation and the resulting contentment was the norm for the middle class. For example, when I was riding a train from Hong Kong to Peking back in late 1997, just as my spoken Mandarin was starting to come together, I ended up in a room with a middle-aged Chinese couple, and made some small conversation with them. The husband and wife were entirely ordinary, but so relaxed, content and appreciative of each other that I was quite taken in by them. It's something I have rarely seen in the harried American couples one sees out in public. The husband sat there with a smile on his face while his wife curled up next to him and addressed him affectionately with the Chinese equivalent of "my old man." The two were part of what you'd call the Chinese middle class, or "lao bai xing," which is comprised of ordinary, literate urban Chinese. Neither rich nor poor by Chinese standards, they live a humble, yet comfortable lifestyle. By American standards, they would have been quite poor and severely short of material goods, but here they were, as happy as I'd ever seen a comparable American husband and wife.

What is most confounding about the refusal of American women to simply lighten up and stop going after their husbands is how they refuse to do so despite the fact that it would make their lives much easier. The chores issue is a perfect example. Rather than do battle with a man over how many hours are going into housework, why not just ease up on the housework themselves? Lots of women put in nearly twice as much work as necessary, and then expect husbands to do the same. Additionally, do women really need that brand new car? Do they need a mcmansion (with all the attendant extra housework) to be happy? The striving and consumerism in the US is driven mainly by women, who account for over 80% of discretionary spending, and it can turn them into very unpleasant people.

Want to see what an unpleasant wife looks like? Watch this old real-estate ad from the boom:

That ad is no exaggeration. Nor was Kate Gosselin's treatment of her husband Jon. This is the norm in the US, and it's driven in large part by our women's status obsession (envy) and consumerism (greed). Perhaps the value placed on economic competition and consumerism is a major part of the problem with our women. Rather than domestic harmony and peace, that new car, new house or new shoes take priority. In days past, this kind of obsession with material wealth was frowned upon, so much so that those with money went out of their way not to make too much of a show of it (and in fact most wealthy people continue to do so), but today it's about the only "virtue" we have left.

So, I'll offer a theory as to why American women have become so downright unpleasant over the past few decades.

Women's liberation liberated them not only from restraints on fornication, hypergamy and other sexual impulses, but from the acquisitive and competitive impulses that were also kept in check by old-fashioned morality, and for women these may be stronger than lust. We have to recognize that Western capitalism and consumerism were largely driven by female spending, so perhaps this explains some of the support for feminism from above.

If women are constantly striving for more, bigger, better and shinier, they won't have time to relax and enjoy life as it is. I suspect this plays a major role in the dissatisfaction wives feel, and explains why they cannot stop pushing their husbands harder and harder. It robs them of the ability to be pleasant, and suppresses their better nature, as they struggle and strive with the frenzied crowd for that next shiny bauble. Today, our women are truly possessed and ruled by the dark forces of greed and envy, which rob them and the men in their lives of peace and contentment.

A number of people have been confounded by the curious nature of Swedish women's taste in men. Evidently, Swedish women do not chase after the kind of wealthy alpha sociopaths who are popular with the US female population, but rather value looks and a more affable nature in their sex partners. However, they are just as prone to serial monogamy, single motherhood and bed-hopping as any other women. What is it that explains this apparent disregard for status amongst Swedish women?

Maybe it isn't that they are different at all, but rather that status in Sweden is determined by entirely different factors. Sweden is a social democratic state, where social equality is assured by high taxes and a great deal of social welfare. Petty crime and drug use is frowned upon, and taken rather more seriously than in most of the West. Your typical Swede is supposed to value consensus, and there is a paternalistic bureaucracy that is dedicated (in theory) to the welfare of the Swedish people. In short, Sweden is something like high school or college, where an institution provides for and protects its charges.

I'm not writing this to disparage Swedes, because there is something sweet and innocent about the high school experience, where girls go for the good-looking, popular guys. I'd be willing to bet that in Sweden, like in an American high school, the nerds are largely left out, though, while the athletes and "hot" guys get more than they can handle.

However, whereas in the US the jock who ends up chained to the wife and kids or who never makes it big in the grown-up world endures a dramatic drop in status, or the handsome young player ends up as a used car salesman and therefore far less of a catch, this shift in status that occurs in the transition to adulthood simply doesn't happen to anywhere near the same extent in Sweden.

Each culture determines status in its own way, and this can result in widely divergent outcomes. Where I live, in Seattle, talented programmers and tech workers (i.e. nerds) have a lot more cachet than in other places. I'm sure the same is true in Silicon Valley. Investment bankers are hotshots in NYC, gangster thugs in the ghetto, competent meth cooks in trailer parks, and ranchers in Montana.

While women determine their mate choices according to a number of factors, status is the most important by far, and likely has been since before we were actually human. It's the most important factor in chimp, baboon and gorilla mating, and even a number of non-primate species. Humans are unique in that status is determined by far more complex interactions, but the fundamental fact remains that human females prefer high-status males. So much so that they even fantasize about being "taken" by them.

One WSJ article from a couple years back suggested that women don't particularly care for "macho men." This is a common feminist trope, but essentially meaningless, as I will demonstrate. The article featured some studies that tied women's preference for masculinity to insecure (i.e. low on human development index) conditions. When women are well taken care of, it suggested, they prefer more feminine men. Perhaps there was some lesbian wishful thinking at work here, but the study does make sense, although not for the reasons the author and researchers suggested.

In the study, men's faces were digitally altered to look either more masculine or more feminine. This was accomplished by enlarging the neck and jaw, filling out the eyebrows, and raising the hairline at the temples to create a more masculine look, or the opposite for feminine. Essentially, one photo made the guy look like a wrestler, and the other like a guy in the classical music department. Women from various countries were asked to choose which men they found most attractive, and then the data was collected and analyzed.

After crunching the numbers, they found that the women from more developed countries preferred the more feminine men, whereas those from more chaotic regions preferred the masculine ones. The researchers hypothesized that it had something to do with fitness, as testosterone suggests enhanced fitness in a less healthy environment:

> After crunching the data—including the women's facial preferences, their country of origin and that country's national health index—the Face Lab researchers proved something remarkable. They could predict how masculine a woman likes her men based on her nation's World Health Organization statistics for mortality rates, life expectancy and the impact of communicable disease. In countries where poor health is particularly a threat to survival, women leaned toward "manlier" men. That is, they preferred their males to have shorter, broader faces and stronger eyebrows, cheekbones and jaw lines. The researchers went on to publish the study in this month's issue of the scientific journal Proceedings of the Royal Society: Biological Sciences.

According to the article, women in less healthy environments prefer manlier men because they are inherently resistant to disease:

> To a person unfamiliar with the field of evolutionary psychology, this may sound a little far-fetched. How is it even possible to link a woman's masculinity preferences to the health of her nation? The answer begins with the theory of sexual selection. It goes that women are the choosier sex because they take on most of the risk and burden of reproduction and child rearing. While a man can sleep around with 100 women in a year's time and have 100 kids, a woman who sleeps with 100 men in a year will only have one baby (barring multiples). She has more at stake in each pregnancy. Therefore, it is in her best interest to at least choose a high-quality mate. And one of the hallmarks of a quality male is good health.
> But what does health have to do with masculinity? The link is testosterone, the hormone behind manly muscles, strong jaws, prominent eyebrow ridges, facial hair and deep voices. Testosterone is immunosuppressive. This means a man must be healthy and in good condition to withstand its effects on his development. Testosterone is also linked to other traits related to strength: fitness, fertility and dominance. From an evolutionary perspective, masculinity is basically man's way of advertising good genes, dominance and likelihood to father healthier kids. When disease is a real threat, as it had been—and arguably still is—heritable health is invaluable.

This is kind of far-fetched. Mortality is higher for men with high testosterone across all age groups, and regardless of environment. Testosterone is correlated with riskier behavior, which has consequences both early and late in life.

So why do some women prefer more effeminate men? The author concludes that it has to do with childcare and nurturing:

> In 1970, women represented only 43.3% of women of the labor force, compared to 55.8% today. Moreover, the recession in America has been a tremendous blow to men in traditionally masculine jobs such as construction and manufacturing; 82% of job losses affect men. Right now in the U.S. many families find themselves economically dependent on one working parent: Mom. Over 70% of mothers have jobs outside the home. No longer as reliant on men's genes or jobs to ensure the health and wealth of their children, women may come to value other qualities in a mate. It may become evolutionarily adaptive to prefer men who are cooperative, communicative, caring and better parents over traditional "manly men."

I don't think so. If men have become redundant in countries with lots of social welfare, then the idea that supportive, nurturing men will become more attractive falls apart. Let me propose another explanation:

In more developed, controlled societies, cooperative, docile "follow-the-rules" type men rise higher and faster than those who are more confrontational, forceful and combative. The masculine looking guy is more likely to be a dock worker or trucker, while the effete, overeducated type is more likely to be a high-level manager or administrator, perhaps in one of the social welfare bureaucracies that guarantee women are taken care of by the state. In strife-torn Mexico, on the other hand, the brutal, macho type is more likely to be a jefe or drug lord, who has risen to the top by being a ruthless, risk-taking thug, whereas the mild, docile type is more likely to be one of the peasant underlings who is routinely victimized by the gangsters.

Therefore, masculinity correlates with high status in the less developed society, and low status in the more highly developed one. The reason American women prefer more manly types is that the US is still a fairly violent, competitive society with more opportunities to make it on one's own rather than working in the system. But even here, it varies widely by region and social class, as I suggested regarding the preferences of women in different contexts. I have seen very attractive young women in Seattle hipster neighborhoods fawning over nerdy programmers, and then rough-hewn fishermen and crabbers (including some of the crew of the "Deadliest Catch" series) getting the attention in the waterfront taverns.

Women choose based on social status. That is the most important factor the world over. Greasy little Cantonese traders get the hottest girls in Shanghai, while the manly, heavy industry factory workers from northeast China go home alone. Fat, bloated wealthy sheikhs have the hottest chicks in Araby, while the lean, muscular Yemeni farmers make do with some ugly cousin. In our dysfunctional ghettos, dumb thugs rule the streets while studious, virtuous young men are laughed at by the girls. In our low-rent trailer parks, welfare and social security cheats and drug manufacturers do fine with the ladies; the smart boys know the score and get the hell out by joining the military or studying a trade at a community college (good for them).

If you want to influence women's sexual choices, it's a simple matter of rewarding some men with status over others. Looks, power, money or manliness; it's all a matter of what we prioritize. Women are hard-wired to go for the top dog.

Book Review: Afghanistan: A Military History

Elusive Wapiti · 7 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Book review: Afghanistan: A Military History from Alexander the Great to the Fall of the Taliban, by Stephen Tanner, 328 pages.

The book begins its telling of the history of Afghanistan, starting from 334 BC forward, with the invasion of the Macedonian king Alexander the Great, who led his Hellenic army, hacking and chopping, all the way through a fading Persian empire under Darius III to the Indus River in modern-day Pakistan. As Afghanistan sits astride the geographic passageways linking Asia, Asia Minor, and the Indian subcontinent, Afghanistan would be repeatedly invaded by other aggressively expansive peoples over the next two millennia. After Alexander's aggressive oriental expansion burnt out, his empire broke apart into squabbling fiefdoms, and the Hellenic rulers of Afghanistan finally succumbed to Scythian hordes, barbarians from the Steppes of Asia driven west by the construction of the Great Wall and funnelled south by the Himalayas. To this day, however, genealogical remnants of those Greek warriors remain in the rugged mountain valleys of modern-day Nuristan, nee Kafiristan (a reference to their polytheistic infidel religion practiced until they were forcibly converted to Islam in the nineteenth century). There, according to the author, one frequently finds fair skin, fair hair, and blue and green eyes.

The Scythians ruled Afghanistan for a brief century and a half, during which Afghanistan found itself–true to its location at the crossroads of Asia–smack in the middle between the Greco-Roman, Persian, Chinese, and Indian civilizations. And like any crossroads, it found itself invaded once again, this time by a resurgent Persian empire. The victorious Sassanids ruled Afghanistan for several centuries, until, weakened by invading Huns (most formidably led by Attila) from the Steppes, Mohammadean Arabs conquered the land and converted the local Buddhists, Zoroastrians, and peoples of other pagan faiths to Islam, by free will as much as by the sword. During this period of Muslim Arab rule, Afghanistan enjoyed a renaissance of sorts not seen before or since, and the land flourished due to its central location astride commercial corridor between the Far East and Middle East.

Then, in 1221, "the atom bomb of its day" fell on Afghanistan, and the land and the people never recovered. The Mongols under Genghis Khan invaded, again from the north like all previous invaders from the Steppes did, only this time, unlike the Scythians and the Huns before, they did not come to rule, to hold, but to obliterate, to destroy. And destroy they did. According to the author, anything the Mongols could not adapt to their native steppes they burnt, destroyed, or slew. Entire cities were fired and the population put to the sword. It was pragmatic as much as barbaric…after all, one needs less troops guarding the rear if potential rebels were pre-emptively slaughtered. Mongols laid siege to the city of Herat for six months and, when the city finally fell, spent the next week slaughtering every single inhabitant, to include household pets and livestock. Afghan irrigation systems, known as qanats, the same that frustrated Soviet troops 700 years later, provided cover and concealment (as well as water), and thus were systematically destroyed by the Mongols…which ensured chronically dry Afghanistan would remain so. Only the nomadic hill tribes of Afghanistan remained free; the more sedentary and civilized dwellers in the Afghan plans were massacred wholesale. Six years after invading, the Mongols departed Afghanistan and returned to Mongolia. Their legacy: a cultural and civilizational basket case that never fully recovered from Mongol terror, and indeed, remnants of the Mongol armies in Afghanistan, a people known as "Hazaras", are widely despised for their obvious visible genetic linkages to such a cruel conqueror.

The next several hundred years are characterized by tribal Afghans more or less squabbling amongst themselves or lending their strength and martial inclination to neighboring powers; their involvement and ferocity at times was decisive to whatever prince could enlist their aid. But ever since the destruction of the Mongols, Afghanistan was never again a valuable addition to an empire. It would be a no-man's land, unruly, and unrulable by a central government, the Pashtun Durranis notwithstanding. And the ascent of European and Eurasian powers would turn a land made desolate by the petty squabbling of tribal chieftains into something even worse: a buffer state. Enter the "Great Game", and Russia and Britain, who both sought to exert influence upon Afghanistan as a sort of early-warning zone for invasion from the other, the former for her southern expansion, the latter to protect British India. Each would vie for control of this mountainous, unpacifiable land, and attempt to punish Afghan impudence with martial expeditions. Eventually, the Russians, later the Soviets, would gain the upper hand and attempt to draw Afghanistan into the great Communist fold, culminating in an ill-fated invasion in 1979 that would give rise to both the Mujaheddin and a power vacuum that would usher in the Taliban.

I found the following quote from the author instructive to our present adventure in Asia (one of Vezzini's Classic Blunders), as it provided invaluable insight into what many would see as the sheer ungovernability of Afghanistan, given modern mores and tastes:

> Afghanistan [is] unique for three factors that in combination provide a valid rationale for its having bucked the tide of history. First, its terrain facilitated the ability of tribes to exist independently among inaccessible mountains, in veritable isolation from the writ of a central government. At the same time, terrain presented no such difficulties for tribes to descend from their heights to participate in collective defense. Second, the country as a whole, in the midst of an already degraded south-central Asia, had become increasingly isolated from the main currents of global commerce and thus the main paths of foreign armies. It had been no accident that the Durrani empire had risen during a period when the once-powerful empires on every side of Afghanistan were in precipitous decline. The Afghan tribes were able to live isolated within a country that was itself isolated. Third, in a land where indigenous strength lay with the nomad population rather than in the sedentary communities that had been repeatedly ravaged across centuries of warfare, the very primitiveness of the Afghans counted toward their formidability. They remained a warrior people with a martial ethic–entirely willing to fight among themselves when not otherwise challenged–with the effect that in a world increasingly bent on economic progress, the Afghan fighter, increasingly out-of-date, became increasingly fearsome to the rest of civilization.

All told, a fascinating, well-written, and thoroughly enjoyable read. Recommended for those who wish to better grasp the history behind an area that presently consumes so much blood, treasure, and attention.

Randall Shake, who is one of our own, died a couple days ago, and a memorial page has been set up at the Nice Guy forum to put in a good word for him. He died at age 55, and left behind five children. His nephew Dan broke the news. He will be missed, but not forgotten.

Too many men pass anonymously, their efforts forgotten and their work unappreciated. Let's show our respect for Randall and his support, and show each other that we care enough to honor those who have passed.

When more details become available I'd be happy to post a memorial here, but I'll wait until I hear from friends or family.

Until then, let's remember that we owe it not just to ourselves, but to men who have come and gone, and men yet to come, to work for a better, more just world.

RIP Randall Shake — you live on in our memory and our work

The Cold Hard Truth on Equalizing Reproductive Rights

By Taank

Ah, reproduction, and the rights of men and women regarding it. Seems like folks these days just can't get enough of wrangling about it, with every side shouting so loud they'll never hear what anyone else has to say. I started thinking about it pretty much at random the other day, and it occurred to me that I've never seen or heard anyone dispassionately lay out the current state of affairs regarding reproductive rights, as well as the various potential fixes available.

Fear not, gentle reader, for today that changes.

Presented for your reading pleasure today, shockingly enough, is a dispassionate summary of the current state of affairs regarding reproductive rights, as well as the various potential fixes available. In the spirit of dispassionitivity (not a real word – I hope), I'm not advocating any of these; I leave that to the comments section (which, I suppose, reveals my blindingly optimistic opinion of human nature in general).

Without further ado, I give you Reproductive Rights: the Gender-Based Overview.

Reproductive Rights Before Pregnancy:
-Women: Choose Not To Have Sex; Use Birth Control
-Men: Choose Not To Have Sex; Use Birth Control

Reproductive Rights Rights During Pregnancy:
-Women: Abort Fetus
-Men: None

Reproductive Rights After Childbirth:
-Women: Surrender child to be supported by state taxpayers via Safe Haven laws (Typically up to 30 days after birth; varies by state)
-Men: None

Based on this brutally simple breakdown, the following simple fixes suggest themselves. Note that the only consideration in this analysis is making the reproductive rights of men and women the same at all stages of the process, regardless of any other considerations. This is not to minimize or discard those other considerations, but rather to illustrate these solutions in the simplest possible terms.

Obviously, reproductive rights before pregnancy are already equal.

To Equalize Rights During Pregnancy:*
Option 1: Require father's consent to abort a pregnancy
Option 2: Allow fathers to mandate abortion against the mother's wishes (!)

To Equalize Rights After Childbirth:
Option 1: Eliminate Safe Haven Laws
Option 2: Allow Fathers to surrender parental rights (yes, avoiding child support) within Safe Haven timeframe

That's it. A simple overview of the current imbalance in reproductive rights, by gender, and the possible ways to fix them. I would greatly admire the testicular fortitude of anyone brave enough to actually suggest any of these fixes in a public forum; I can only imagine the raging shitstorm that would erupt if anyone suggested that fathers should be able to force mothers to abort, even though logically it is one way to give men and women equal rights in that particular area. But anyway, there it is.

Discuss. Or not, as you prefer.

*(It's also worth noting here that there's a potential Option 3 for equalizing rights during pregnancy. If we interpret a mother's right to abort an unwanted pregnancy as the ability to surrender her parental rights and reponsibilities, rather than the literal interpretation of "surgically remove the fetus," then the third option would allow the father to opt out of fatherhood during pregnancy, surrendering his parental rights and responsibilities. This would allow mothers who were so inclined to keep the baby, although they would know by doing so that they would be solely responsible for providing for that child. Realistically, I don't think anyone would suggest that option 2 would ever make a viable real world solution, even though logically it does provide men and women with equal rights.)

Fighting for Women's Freedom

When US led western military forces needed to drum up ongoing support for the war in Afghanistan, one of the issues that really galvanized public sympathy was the deplorable status of women there.

> Council on Foreign Relations
> Following the 2001 invasion of Afghanistan, Afghan women emerged as a high-profile focus of U.S. policy. Women's progress was promoted as a powerful, positive product of the international presence in the war-scarred country.

Women, it was said, had very few rights and were treated virtually as property. To western sensibilities this imbalance of power was immoral, repugnant, and objectionable. Something had to be done.

> Upon seizing power, the Taliban regime instituted a system of gender apartheid effectively thrusting the women of Afghanistan into a state of virtual house arrest. Under Taliban rule women were stripped of all human rights – their work, visibility, opportunity for education, voice, healthcare, and mobility.
> Afghanistan Online
> The repression of women is still prevalent in rural areas where many families still restrict their own mothers, daughters, wives and sisters from participation in public life. They are still forced into marriages and denied a basic education. Numerous school for girls have been burned down and little girls have even been poisoned to death for daring to go to school.

By contrast in the west women enjoy far greater rights and privileges. Popular wisdom is that western society as a whole has benefitted as a result. In fact many western economist's insist that the freedom enjoyed by women in the west enables their greater economic participation, which in turn may be largely responsible for the greater productivity and greater wealth of economies here.

> Ricardo Hausman, Laura D. Tyson and Saadia Zahidi, The Global Gender Gap Report, 2007, World Economic Forum 2007
> "Numerous studies indicate that sustainable development is dependent on improving the economic and political status of women and that reducing gender inequality enhances productivity and economic growth"

Being practical we judge ourselves by tangible things like our economic success; as western societies the strength of our economies is inevitably proof that our way of life is also in some real sense superior.

So it's from a very lofty moral high ground that western men come to Muslim countries to fight for women to enjoy the same rights and privileges there as they do in the west; the freedom to walk the streets without the veil, the freedom to work outside the home, the freedom to independently determine their own course in life. We know these rights lead to more just and prosperous societies.

Not to say servicemen ever have a reason not to be proud. They are not politicians. Whatever their country's mission, in this case taking on the responsibility of enforcing women's rights in other parts of the world, there is honor in having served their country. And they can be proud of their country too. Whatever evils western forces are unjustly accused of perpetrating in foreign lands, young men in the military can at least rest in the proud and unassailable truth that we practice what we preach. Women in the west have not been denied those rights.

Not that taking the moral high ground has been easy. Especially when the wife has been unfaithful at home, men can have a difficult time putting their tour of duty sacrifices in perspective. And that's before they return to find their spouses gone along their children and all they ever owned.

> It has been suggested that when our mobilized and deployed National Guard and Reserves return from doing their duty Over There and have saved us and our civilization from destruction, many of them will return, not to ticker-tape parades, but to handcuffs and a jail cell. Now why would this be? Because, of course, they owe child support.
> … some of Our Boys are in totally inaccessible places thousands of miles away. If they didn't do something about this problem before they left, it's kind of all over by this time. And just how many do you think managed to "do something," when under orders, with 100 other things on their minds and hardly any time to do anything? So what will happen when Our Boy is obligated to pay monthly child support and/or alimony determined according to his nice civilian salary, and he is now in some godforsaken hole in some freezing Antipodean desert, getting dogface pay? Obviously, there is one hell of an arrearage building up to greet him upon the hero's return.

Unfortunately more men will face the handcuffs instead of the ticker tape parade; the military divorce rate is rising:

> Divorce rates in America are still over 50%. For the military it is even higher — albeit nobody knows exactly what the real number is since the Pentagon doesn't report home-front casualty rates.

For any military man, returning to face jail after your spouse ran off leaving you with a support debt you don't earn enough to pay is a bitter pill to swallow. Fact is it doesn't sound fair to anyone. But instead of hearing about change for the better, we hear even worse:

> Taron James of Torrance, Calif., a decorated Navy veteran, carried out hazardous reconnaissance missions behind Iraqi lines in the aftermath of the first Persian Gulf War. While overseas, James was notified that a woman he knew back home was demanding that he pay child support for her newborn son. Los Angeles County entered a default paternity judgment against James, in part because James' military commitments made it difficult for him to defend himself.
> Despite DNA evidence that James was not the father, the county garnisheed James' wages for a decade and employed numerous punitive measures against him, costing him a management position and forcing him to drop out of college. James eventually got the judgment set aside, but last week a California Court of Appeal refused to order that James be reimbursed for the wages the county garnisheed.

Thankfully our brave servicemen who face potential beheadings at the hands of the Taliban probably don't bother with these worries they don't know to be definite likelihoods. They're brash and confident, everything young men need to be to face death without flinching. Being young men with loving wives, they likely wouldn't concern themselves about what hasn't happened yet, and assume that if any of the horror stories they hear about does actually befall them, they'll just state their case really clearly (those other guys must have mumbled) and the powers that be will straighten things out. Few of them would likely pay attention to the increasing feminization of divorce laws that free woman of any duty to be a good wife and mother, while stripping fathers of their parental role and putting an ever increasing burden of financial responsibility on men. Many won't truly learn how precarious the legal position of fathers truly is, and how onerous the financial burden on divorced men, until they return home. That's when despite best efforts, they may find themselves stuck in an ever deepening injustice they just can't set straight. Even if they weren't mumbling.

It's a terrible irony that sees them crushed under the very same feminist system they were fighting to put in place in a foreign country half way across the world. But it's this very same irony that may come with the blessing of opening all our eyes to consider a different perspective.

Violence Against Men

Environments where there is more violence against women are also environments where there is more violence against men. In dangerous or lawless states, the only rights that exist are those that can be enforced, purchased, or traded through influence.

Rights then are actually a luxury, and there is nowhere on earth where they are inalienable. The only real rights anyone has are those that the society can reasonably enforce at any given time. In remote places where the only enforcement of law to protect women are her father, brother, or eventually her husband, any decision to enforce the law is not to be taken lightly. Enforcing a woman's right to be free from sexual violence for example may protect the woman from the humiliation of rape, but can potentially involve an even greater threat to the safety of a woman's own family who are tasked with defending her honor. In a place where there are no police limiting conflict, any conflict can escalate uncontrollably. Any decision to defend her honor can mean those men laying down their very lives.

Conflict is then to be avoided even if it restricts the rights of the potential victim. Feminists call this "blaming the victim".

> Friends or family may blame the victim in order to feel safe themselves: "She got raped because she walked alone after midnight. I'd never do that, so rape won't happen to me."

I say it's asking the victim to share in the responsibility. If a village in some war torn region of the world is going to have to send its men to fight another village and possibly die because someone in that other village raped one of its women, there are probably going to be a few of the woman's male family members who would rather she just stay indoors, wear a veil, and make the men some sandwiches. Watching the game on TV with your dad and brothers over some afghan tea while munching sandwiches is a lot less stressful if your sister (who's stacked and looks like a supermodel) hasn't been prancing around in her miniskirt near another village you don't want to end up being in a blood feud with, or if you're in Somalia … near where the local warlords are dividing their profits from piracy.

In short some environments are just more dangerous than others. Many places are made so by the presence of commodities that generate a great imbalance of wealth and power such as oil, precious gems, or in the case of Afghanistan drugs. This imbalance combined with weak or corrupt government mean that rights are in short supply for BOTH genders. Perhaps in light of this it's time to give different cultures a little latitude to come up with their own solutions as to what they're willing to compromise in terms of the rights of some in order to assure greater degree of freedom from violence for all. Perhaps before passing judgment on others it's time to re-examine the anti-male laws we are currently reaping and the underlying feminism they came from, and re-evaluate whether we really want to sell what we've sown.

W.F. Price · 9 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

For those readers who haven't yet had the chance to read "The Misandry Bubble," a piece written by The Fifth Horseman a couple years ago, I'd like to point it out again. The reason it's on my mind is that TFH has often predicted that those who are invested in the current system would double down on their misandry soon, and that appears to be happening right about now.

The Rush Limbaugh forced apology, the recent concatenation of fathers and other men upset with family law and institutionalized misandry into the far left's official "haters" list, and President Obama's shameless pandering to the worst elements of radical feminism are all signs that a backlash against a growing men's awareness is upon us.

For those who are worried about what it all means, The Misandry Bubble spells it out in a compelling, eminently readable piece (I'd like to see a feminist ideologue write an analysis that long that normal people could finish without either bursting into laughter or giving up in befuddlement).

Here's the executive summary:

> Executive Summary : The Western World has quietly become a civilization that undervalues men and overvalues women, where the state forcibly transfers resources from men to women creating various perverse incentives for otherwise good women to conduct great evil against men and children, and where male nature is vilified but female nature is celebrated. This is unfair to both genders, and is a recipe for a rapid civilizational decline and displacement, the costs of which will ultimately be borne by a subsequent generation of innocent women, rather than men, as soon as 2020.

A passage:

> To provide 'beta' men an incentive to produce far more economic output than needed just to support themselves while simultaneously controlling the hypergamy of women that would deprive children of interaction with their biological fathers, all major religions constructed an institution to force constructive conduct out of both genders while penalizing the natural primate tendencies of each. This institution was known as 'marriage'. Societies that enforced monogamous marriage made sure all beta men had wives, thus unlocking productive output out of these men who in pre-modern times would have had no incentive to be productive. Women, in turn, received a provider, a protector, and higher social status than unmarried women, who often were trapped in poverty. When applied over an entire population of humans, this system was known as 'civilization'.
> All societies that achieved great advances and lasted for multiple centuries followed this formula with very little deviation, and it is quite remarkable how similar the nature of monogamous marriage was across seemingly diverse cultures. Societies that deviated from this were quickly replaced. This 'contract' between the sexes was advantageous to beta men, women over the age of 35, and children, but greatly curbed the activities of alpha men and women under 35 (together, a much smaller group than the former one). Conversely, the pre-civilized norm of alpha men monopolizing 3 or more young women each, replacing aging ones with new ones, while the masses of beta men fight over a tiny supply of surplus/aging women, was chaotic and unstable, leaving beta men violent and unproductive, and aging mothers discarded by their alpha mates now vulnerable to poverty. So what happens when the traditional controls of civilization are lifted from both men and women?

I'm chuckling a bit about how he predicted Charles Murray's book "Coming Apart:"

> The lower half of the US white population is vulnerable to the same fate as the black community, and cities like Los Angeles are perilously close to 'Detroitification'.

I highly recommend reading the rest if you haven't already. It's good work, and I'd like to thank TFH once again for his stellar effort.

Top Twelve Indications that the Law in Family Courts is Feminist

Featured Guest · 11 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Ethical

1. In divorce and separation the law has absolutely no tolerance for male anger, threats, or withholding of support. The law does very little to hinder typical female parental alienation, or withholding of access.

2. For women a comfortable lifestyle means money. For men it means sex, a well cared for home, and a good meal. After divorce women have the right to the support of their husbands so they don't suffer a decrease in lifestyle. Men have no comparable guarantee.

3. Whether the wife fails to live up to the husband's expectations for her to cook, clean, and provide sex (to him) and his only recourse is to divorce her or the husband fails to live up to the wife's expectations and her only recourse is to divorce him, regardless of who broke the marriage contract he will have to pay.

4. If the husband worked hard so the wife didn't have to work he will have to pay alimony. If the wife worked hard to put the husband through his education he will have to pay alimony.

5. Regardless of whatever the couple may have agreed to in getting married, a husband who wants children has no legal right to insist his wife have children, that she not abort his child, or that he even be informed she is aborting his child. If he doesn't want children he has no legal right to avoid paying for them.

6. A mother can give a father's child away for adoption and waive the father's legal rights so he will never be able to even meet the child. A father can never waive his responsibility to support a child.

7. After divorce women can use alimony to go back to school and pursue their dreams. After divorce men are prohibited from going back to school and pursuing their dreams unless going to school doesn't reduce alimony payments.

8. After some years of marriage, a woman will have to be supported for the rest of her life if she bails on the marriage.

9. If a man fathers a child he will have to pay child support. If a man avoids having children but acts like a father figure he may be liable for child support. If a man avoids having children and avoids acting like a father figure he may be named on a birth certificate without his knowledge, and even if he proves not to be the biological father, he may still have to pay child support.

10. If a man is named on a birth certificate and doesn't get a paternity test before the statute of limitations runs out, he may have to pay child support until the child is eighteen regardless of the result of a subsequent test. If a woman lies about paternity and is caught, she doesn't have to give back the money.

11. If a woman has sex with another man the husband can't get a restraining order to stop her or to put her out of the house. If he comes home, finds another man in his bed and loses his temper she can get a restraining order to put HIM out.

12. The above woman's behavior won't be considered in the child access and custody or support determination because divorces are "no fault". The above man's behavior WILL be considered in the child access and custody or support determination because divorces are "no fault".

Female Lawmakers Introducing Bills Against Vasectomies, Viagra

W.F. Price · 12 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A number of female lawmakers, angered by limits on abortion and opposition to free birth control, are fighting back by introducing bills to curtail men's access to vasectomies, viagra and other medications and procedures related to men's sexual function and fertility.

The bills aren't serious, of course, but the money these women are being paid to be genuine legislators (rather than comedians) is quite real.

So far, a female legislator in Georgia has stated that she intends to introduce a vasectomy-restricting bill in retaliation for Republicans opposing birth control subsidies, nine more lawmaker women in Missouri have done the same, and one female legislator in Ohio has introduced a bill limiting access to viagra. All are Democrats.

The viagra bill strikes me as particularly incongruous. Sexual function and abortion may be tangentially related, but they are pretty clearly different issues. Given that viagra influences whether or not the sex act is possible, and that it is men who must perform sex and women who attract sex, limiting viagra as a form of retaliation might make sense if men had passed laws against cosmetic enhancement procedures and brazilian waxing outfits and the like, but not abortion.

The vasectomy-restricting bills hit a little closer to the mark, but they, too, fail the test. For one thing, I don't think anyone anywhere pays for men's vasectomies besides the men who elect to have them themselves, so limiting vasectomies in retaliation for men not giving women free birth control simply exposes the entitlement mentality. Additionally, vasectomies are in fact limited in practice. Many surgeons require notification of the spouse before performing the procedure. I strongly suspect this is because the physician may be liable under tort law in a number of states.

All this amounts to is political showmanship, but it does give us a hint of what's to come in a more gender-equal political environment: a much, much heavier emphasis on women's sexual and reproductive issues in legislatures, which is ironic, because women have been chanting slogans about keeping laws off their bodies for decades now. Rather than less focus on legislating sexuality, it appears that we will have substantially more.

As for abortion, its opponents don't see it as a form of birth control, but rather murder. They are not trying to control women's sexuality, but instead protect what they see as innocent human beings. Reasonable people may disagree as to whether their interpretation of when human life begins is correct or not, but as far as they see the issue sexual freedom is essentially irrelevant once human life enters the equation. Therefore, equating vasectomies and viagra to abortion is not going to change anyone's mind, and will simply inflame the debate and waste time and taxpayer money in legislatures.

Feminists Starting to Lose Their Cool

W.F. Price · 13 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A couple pieces from Huffington Post illustrate the fact that men are starting to finally stand up for themselves, and feminists are fighting mad about it. Commenter Rocco linked an article about hundreds of male bloggers who took Huggies to task for portraying fathers as bumbling idiots when it came to taking care of their kids, and Golden Scepter linked to another in which a feminist goes berserk and gets bloody.

The former involved an ad campaign – the kind we all know so well – in which Huggies diapers and wipes were portrayed as so easy to use that even fathers can get by with them:

> The company thought it had a winner of an ad campaign — a series of spots all filmed during five days spent in a house with real dads and their babies. "To prove that Huggies diapers and wipes can handle anything," the female voice-over explains, "we put them to the toughest test imaginable — Dads."
> …What they didn't take into account, however, was another trend — the one where the growing number of men who consider themselves involved, equal parents (according to the US Census, one in three are their child's primary caregiver) are more than a little sensitive about being portrayed a the butt of an advertiser's joke.
> Soon, there was a petition. Created by Chris Routly, a father from Breiningsville, PA, it was titled "We're Dads, Huggies. Not Dummies." And it said:
> "Why is a dad on diaper duty an appropriate or meaningful test of the product in any way a mom using them is not? Why reduce dads to being little more than test dummy parents, putting diapers and wipes through a "worst-case scenario" crash course of misuse and abuse? Is that what HUGGIES thinks dads do? We leave our children in overflowing diapers because sports is more important to us? Really?
> These HUGGIES ads literally use the line "Dads push diapers and wipes to the limit." No, HUGGIES, dads don't do that. Poor manufacturing does that. A large bottle before naptime does that. Feeding your kid too much fiber does that. Babies do that. But dads don't use diapers and wipes any differently than moms."

Good for Chris Routly. Lots of fathers take care of their kids these days (if the mother doesn't get a judge to kick him out of their lives), and they do a fine job. In his comment, Rocco pointed out that this wouldn't have happened five years ago. This is true. Men tried to play nice up until a couple years ago, but now they are standing up for themselves unapologetically, and it's working. Somehow, I think we have something to do with it.

However, not everyone is ready to recognize that men have the right to stand up for themselves. The next article, linked by Golden Scepter, is a violent tirade penned by man-hating lesbian Kelly Cogswell. In it, Cogswell uses graphic imagery to emphasize a list of the same old women's grievances (many of which have long-since been debunked), and betrays a searing hatred of men that recalls the glory days of feminism from the 90s, when feminists cackled with glee over the mutilation of John Wayne Bobbit, defended child murder (the postpartum kind), and sang angry, dysphonic punk music about rape and bloody revenge. The difference is that today she comes off as deranged, whereas this kind of unveiled hostility was the norm a mere 20 years ago. She also exposes the "logic" behind the recent sham legislation feminists have introduced in state legislatures for what it really is: tit for tat retaliation.

Here are a few excerpts:

> Thursday was International Women's Day, and like always, there was some guy saying, "Why isn't there an > International Men's Day? Yuk, yuk." And while the usual response is, "Every day is a men's day, you asshole," maybe it's time to agree.

> After all, if you really believe in equality in everything, why not push for equal salaries for men? The poor things have been suffering for years with all that excess income. Give me a petition. I'd be happy to support a 25-percent reduction in pay across the board.
> And for all those guys envious of the probes and procedures that Virginia's women are going to be subjected to before they can get a simple abortion, why not pass laws requiring prostate exams whenever they demand a refill of Viagra or a package of condoms?
> We could send out gangs of women to harass young males and grab their asses on the subway or bus. And if they don't like it, respond, "That was a compliment. What's your problem? What are you, a fucking homo?" Or these gangs of women could go out with machetes or bottles and really get their hate on. Just for the sake of equality.
> And why not arrange for men to get little chunks of their penises chopped off wherever women face genital mutilation? After all, they get a party afterwards, celebrating their enforced chastity, painful pissing, and fear and loathing of sex. And if men manage, nevertheless, to get themselves accused of adultery or having sex before marriage, we could beat them to death, or stone them, just like women.
> In fact, it's far easier to take it the other way and literally level the playing field. Cut the legs off the Titans and watch them crawl. Unleash poverty and chaos and violence and degradation for all. Yeah, why not equality?

It seems that men's demands for fair treatment have struck a nerve with the likes of Kelly Cogswell. Her reasoning is irrelevant; we've heard it all before and debunked it so many times that it would be a waste of time to respond to her rote recital of feminist grievances. What's important here is the snarling contempt she betrays and, most of all, the fear. Yes, Kelly is scared. She isn't scared that a man will beat or rape her (here she is), and she isn't scared she'll be attacked by an angry MRA or fathers' rights type — she knows that's highly unlikely. No, she's scared because she feels the initiative slipping away. She can see the pedestal tottering and about to topple over. She knows the free pass to hate on men and victimize them in the courts is about to be revoked. Her life's work is in danger of crumbling before her eyes.

This is why the feminists are showing their ugly side these recent days. Expect it to get even uglier soon.

Gloria Steinem, Jane Fonda Call for Government Censorship of Rush Limbaugh

W.F. Price · 13 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Prominent feminist Gloria Steinem and Viet Cong propagandist Jane Fonda, along with Robin Morgan, have issued a statement calling for the FCC to ban Rush Limbaugh from the airwaves for his speech. Comparing him to Josef Goebbels, they argue that Limbaugh's speech is not in the public interest, and should therefore be banned from radio.

> Limbaugh doesn't just call people names. He promotes language that deliberately dehumanizes his targets. Like the sophisticated propagandist Josef Goebbels, he creates rhetorical frames — and the bigger the lie, the more effective — inciting listeners to view people they disagree with as sub-humans. His longtime favorite term for women, "femi-Nazi," doesn't even raise eyebrows anymore, an example of how rhetoric spreads when unchallenged by coarsened cultural norms.

Furthermore, they accuse him of hiding behind the First Amendment, and falsely claiming to be an entertainer, suggesting that the First Amendment wasn't meant for certain forms of speech, particularly when feminists declare it hateful. In a shameless lie, the feminists say "this isn't political."

The rush to deliver a final blow to Rush Limbaugh may or may not bear fruit, but the initial sympathy Fluke and her sisters gained from the Limbaugh imbroglio will likely wear off in short order as feminists bare their totalitarian fangs. Respect for freedom of speech, political restraint and compromise are alien to them. Some have mentioned that we face a dire situation when females comprise a majority on the Supreme Court, and it certainly is starting to look that way. If Steinem et al are any indication of how women in power feel, we may see the US Constitution finally rendered absolutely meaningless in our lifetime.

I suppose, however, we could raise the stakes here. As I understand, there is no statute of limitations for treason, and Jane Fonda's actions in Hanoi in 1972 certainly appear to qualify as treason. If Steinem, Morgan and Fonda want to use a technicality to silence Limbaugh, then why not finally hold Jane Fonda accountable for her crimes against her country? I understand the penalty for treason is harsh, and includes execution in some cases, but at her advanced age Jane Fonda would likely only receive some years in prison. An ordinary American man who committed treason would likely have faced severe punishment already, yet this arrogant traitor casts herself as a moral authority, and presumes to dictate what men can and cannot say on air.

Hanoi 1972: Jane Fonda, perched atop Viet Cong AA gun, gives interview for North Vietnamese state press

If feminists make attempts to censor men through government coercion, then surely they can face the consequences of their own crimes.

Feminists Losing Bipartisan Support

W.F. Price · 15 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The broad bipartisan support enjoyed by feminists since segregationist Virginia senator Howard Smith shoehorned women into the 1964 Civil Rights Act is finally starting to crumble. The wedge issues that have pitted Republicans against feminists are public and employer funding of contraception and, believe it or not, the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), which was named in a manner so as to gain the support of white knighting social conservatives.

Facing criticism from their increasingly fed-up male constituency, Republicans are finding themselves having a difficult time supporting VAWA, even though some state that they'd still like to support the bill.

Jeff Sessions of Alabama says:

> I favor the Violence Against Women Act and have supported it at various points over the years, but there are matters put on that bill that almost seem to invite opposition… You think that's possible? You think they might have put things in there we couldn't support that maybe then they could accuse you of not being supportive of fighting violence against women?

Of course that's how the bill was crafted — oppose anything in it and you're instantaneously labeled a batterer. In our chivalrous, white knighting culture, it was the perfect means of extortion. New provisions inserted into VAWA include, among other things, expedited visas for immigrants who claim abuse, an extension of domestic violence to include stalking, and funding to force male college students to cross-dress as part of a political indoctrination program.

As difficult as it may have been for politicians to oppose anything purportedly protecting women in the past, things have changed palpably in the past few years. There has been a cultural shift; a return to some balance and normalcy. Not enough, but things are headed in that direction.

By relying on support from men from both sides of the aisle, feminists have gone from victory to victory over the past few decades, but that era is drawing to a close. The Republicans may be taking the initiative, but eventually the Democrats will face some pressure from their male constituents as well. If they count on any support from men at all, Democrats, too, will have to acknowledge that men have both rights and humanity, and begin scaling back some of the excesses and misandry that have characterized gender politics in the US since the cultural revolution of the 60s and 70s.

W.F. Price · 16 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

After desecrating the altar of Moscow’s Church of Christ the Savior Orthodox church in an attempt to stage an impromptu protest concert, members of “Pussy Riot” were promptly seized by guards, and then later arrested for hooliganism. They remain in jail while debates continue over what punishment would be appropriate. They began a hunger strike, but after getting very hungry gave in and ate some food.

Pussy Riot is an anti-Putin opposition band in which the singers wear brightly colored balaclavas while singing punk rock music denouncing the Putin regime.

Although it may seem incredible in the West, where Christian churches can be desecrated with impunity, the majority of the Russian people are calling for the women’s heads, and it’s likely that they remain in jail as much for their own protection as anything else. Some of the group’s supporters are condemning society rather than Putin for the reaction to the ill-advised protest:

> “I’m here because I’m against the hate that society is expressing against these women. I’m against those who are calling us to stone them,” said Maria Sevastyanova.

The women, who acted irresponsibly and could well have put themselves and others in danger, did deserve to be arrested for disorderly conduct and possibly incitement, but I’d argue that the punishment should not be severe so much as it should be embarrassing.

Perhaps, then, they should be sentenced to community service of some sort, such as shoveling manure in the Moscow police stables. They could even wear their brightly colored clothing and balaclavas — that would be quite a sight to behold. Might even make a nice cover for their next album.

St. Patrick as Liberator

St. Patrick's Day is a festive, mainly secular event in the US, where millions celebrate the patron saint of Ireland by going out on the town and quaffing pints of beer. It's a nice ethnic tradition, in which cities with large Irish populations put on parades with marching bands and the like. Americans of all backgrounds participate, but most of them (including Irish Americans), know little about the man the day commemorates.

St. Patrick was a Briton, born in the late 4th century, during the last years of the Roman Empire. Rome abandoned Britain in his lifetime, and he lived in the uncertain time between Roman authority and Saxon invasion. When he was 16, Patrick was seized from Wales by Irish pirates and sold into slavery in Ireland, where he worked as a herdsman. After six years in bondage, he escaped and sailed home to Britain, where he had a vision calling him to return to Ireland as a missionary.

In his mission, Patrick converted thousands, from humble slaves to the sons and wives of kings. Amazingly, he stood alone, unprotected by any strongman, relying only on his faith to guard him in the brutal, warlike land of pagan Ireland. Unlike in some later missionary efforts, Patrick came not with the sword, but only a bent staff and a passion for justice that spoke to the nobler instincts of the heathen Irish.

However, he had a temper, which he revealed when he wrote a scathing letter to King Ceretic Guletic (Coroticus), a British warrior who murdered and enslaved a number of Patrick's converts, then sold them off to Pictish pagans. The letter shows us what must have motivated Patrick in the first place: a deeply humanitarian regard for the less fortunate, and a hatred for slavery and exploitation.

Below are a few passages:

> I am Patrick, yes a sinner and indeed untaught; yet I am established here in Ireland where I profess myself bishop. I am certain in my heart that "all that I am," I have received from God. So I live among barbarous tribes, a stranger and exile for the love of God. He himself testifies that this is so. I never would have wanted these harsh words to spill from my mouth; I am not in the habit of speaking so sharply. Yet now I am driven by the zeal of God, Christ's truth has aroused me. I speak out too for love of my neighbors who are my only sons; for them I gave up my home country, my parents and even pushing my own life to the brink of death. If I have any worth, it is to live my life for God so as to teach these peoples; even though some of them still look down on me. I Cor. 15:10 Phil. 2:30
> I myself have composed and written these words with my own hand, so that they can be given and handed over, then sent swiftly to the soldiers of Coroticus. I am not addressing my own people, nor my fellow citizens of the holy Romans, but those who are now become citizens of demons by reason of their evil works. They have chosen, by their hostile deeds, to live in death; comrades of the Scotti and Picts and of all who behave like apostates, bloody men who have steeped themselves in the blood of innocent Christians. The very same people I have begotten for God; their number beyond count, I myself confirmed them in Christ.
> The very next day after my new converts, dressed all in white, were anointed with chrism, even as it was still gleaming upon their foreheads, they were cruelly cut down and killed by the swords of these same devilish men. At once I sent a good priest with a letter. I could trust him, for I had taught him from his boyhood. He went, accompanied by other priests, to see if we might claw something back from all the looting, most important, the baptized captives whom they had seized. Yet all they did was to laugh in our faces at the mere mention of their prisoners.
> Because of all this, I am at a loss to know whether to weep more for those they killed or those that are captured: or indeed for these men themselves whom the devil has taken fast for his slaves. In truth, they will bind themselves alongside him in the pains of the everlasting pit: for "he who sins is a slave already" and is to be called "son of the devil." Jn. 8:34, 44 (O.L.)

He will be mauled by angry dragons, killed by the serpent’s tongue. Moreover, everlasting fire is consuming him.” So, “Woe to those who feast themselves on things that are not their own.” Or, “What does it profit a man if he gains the whole world and suffers the loss of his own soul?” Ecclus. 34:19-20 Job 20.15-16, 26 Hab. 2:6 Matt. 16.-26

How bitterly they despise me! just see how your sheep are torn apart and despoiled, and by those gangsters I have named, bound to the last man by the inimical mind of Coroticus. Far away from the love of God is the man who betrays my Christians into the hands of the Scotti and Picts. “Ravenous wolves” have gulped down the Lord’s own flock, which was flourishing in Ireland and tended with utmost care. Now I have lost count how many sons and daughters of the kings of the Scotti have become monks and virgins of Christ. For which reason, “may these injuries done to the just not find favor in your sight,” even “to the lowest depths of hell may you not be pleased.”

You might as well consign Christ’s own members to a whorehouse. What kind of hope can you have left in God? Can you still trust someone who says he agrees with you? Do you listen still to all those flatterers who surround you? God alone will judge. For it is written, “Not only those who do evil, but also all those who agree with them, are to be

> For myself, I do not know “what I shall say,” or how “I may speak anymore” of those who are dead of these children of God-whom the sword has struck down so harshly, beyond all belief. For it Is written, “Weep with those that weep, and again “If one member grieves, then all members should grieve together.” Because of this, the whole Church “cries out and for its sons and daughters” who so far have not been killed by the sword. For they have been taken far away and abandoned in a land where sin abounds, openly, wickedly, impudently; there freeborn men are sold, Christians are reduced to slavery, and worst of all among the most worthless and vilest apostates, the Picts. Jn. 12:49 Rom. 12:15 1 Cor. 12:26 Matt. 2:18,- Jer. 31:15

Simply writing this letter to the king could have cost Patrick his life, but such was his passion for justice and freedom that he was willing to take a dangerous stand against a gang of violent thugs.

What would Patrick think, today, of innocent fathers being torn from their children and consigned to a life of penury to serve whores and adulterers? What would he think of the courts, and the feminists who laugh at the misfortune of men trampled under the boot heels of injustice?

As we celebrate St. Patrick’s day, we should remember that were Patrick to return in our time, he would be deeply disappointed – perhaps even enraged – by the exploitation of families that has become so commonplace in our society.

Science Verifies Spearhead Findings

Dear Editor, Atlantic Magazine :

These female-centric gender essays, while drawing millions of page-clicks, have bottomed out in terms of material and freshness. Very predictable and seemingly computer-generated. Rather curdled, frankly.

It's time to look at things from the modern man's view, and the most vibrant writing on the web right now can be found on the numerous men's sites (except of course for "The Good Men Project", a feminist propaganda front masquerading as a men's rag but easily detected from its reliance on stock-photos and celebrity references).

For example, in the following essays men reveal with searing and excruciating confessionals about their simple wants and needs vs. the conundrum of actual female desires and their expressed and/or implied demands :

What do Men Want in a Wife, and Why Won't Wives Oblige?

and

A Man Wants a Wife, Not a "Co-Worker"

I can work these up into a sensational essay sure to draw in your readership for a frank discussion. I also have access to recent studies* that have scientifically verified the findings of the Spearhead Men.

Please contact me through "The Spearhead" about your pay scale for gender essays. No need to send me your Editorial Guidelines though.

Thanks. Elmer

*In fact, the study's author also published "Eye of the Beholder: The Individual and Dyadic Contributions of Empathic Accuracy and Perceived Empathic Effort to Relationship Satisfaction", which from the sounds of the title, every man should be forced to read.

Spring Break

W.F. Price · 18 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I'm taking something of a vacation for a little while. I'll be in California until Thursday, spending time with the family, so posts will be a bit spare, but I'll try to put something up every day. In the meanwhile, this would be a good time for submissions if anyone wants to send me something to post.

It ought to be fun to spend some time in San Francisco again. It's always a lively town with plenty of interesting people. Perhaps I'll write a bit on the social atmosphere there.

So stay tuned. Things might be a bit slow until the end of the week, but the show will go on.

Feminist Syrian First Lady: “I am the real dictator”

W.F. Price · 19 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As thousands cower under the howling rockets and bursting shells unleashed by the Syrian regime, opposition leaders have released thousands of emails exchanged between the Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad and his wife Asma, a British-born and educated beauty who has long been held to be a shining example of modern womanhood, featured many times in fashion magazines and the like.

Some of the emails show Asma making jokes at the expense of the people of Homs, who have been under siege and sustained attack for some time. Several Western journalists have been killed while covering the assault, which current reports describe as brutal and indiscriminate. In another email, Asma claims to be the real power behind the regime, saying that Bashar al-Assad has no choice but to listen to her. Evidently, her advice has not been merciful.

Not long before the Arab Spring revolts that erupted last year, the first ladies of the Arab world were regularly praised as trail-blazing feminists who commanded great influence and power. Of 22 Arab states, 15 first ladies signed up for a feminist organization called the Arab Women Organization. In 2009, Helen Smith of The Guardian described the group as “founded with the express purpose of empowering women…” and lavishes praise on its members.

The list of member states is eye-opening: Jordan, the Emirates, Bahrain, Tunisia, Algeria, Sudan, Syria, Oman, Palestine, Lebanon, Libya, Egypt, Mauritania, Morocco and Yemen are all members. All but a couple of these states have faced unrest over the last year, and nearly half open civil war or regime change.

One of the things feminists often claim is that if women ran the world, there would be no more war, conflict, hunger, etc. Anyone with a cursory knowledge of history knows this to be ridiculous; female heads of state have been every bit as warmongering as their male counterparts, if not more so. From Queen Isabella and Elizabeth I to Empress Dowager Cixi, female leaders have been associated with bloodshed and chaos. Now, if we are to take her word for it, we have Asma Assad to add to the list.

One thing Westerners tend not to understand about the Arab world is that although the people themselves tend to be deeply conservative and traditional, their elites and leaders are far less so. This is beginning to become more the case in the US, but the divide is far more stark in places such as Egypt and Syria. Many of the leaders – and their wives – were educated in the liberal Western tradition when anti-traditionalism was at its peak, while opposition leaders are more likely to have gone to school in madrassas to study classical Arabic and the Koran. The Arab people see these first ladies traveling around in limousines bedecked with priceless jewels and wearing the latest fashions while mouthing platitudes about women’s rights and “progress.” In the meanwhile, young Arab men can’t find work and many of their would-be wives are stuck at home with little chance of starting a family of their own.

We aren’t there yet, but we’re getting closer by the day. If our feminists can’t see their role in creating the kind of social decay that eventually leads to regime change, it’s only because it isn’t in their nature to concern themselves with these matters. As for the Arab elites who let their wives rule, we have only to read the newspaper to see what eventually happens to men who grow soft and seek counsel in the bedchamber.

ForeignBride Product Review : Finding a Model That's Right for You

Uncle Elmer · 19 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The "creepy old white guys buying Asian girls" meme is heating up again, thanks in part to a new movie :

…an eccentric modern love story about Steven and Sandy—an aging white man with "yellow fever" who is obsessed with marrying any Asian woman, and the young Chinese bride he finds online. Debbie, a Chinese American filmmaker, documents and narrates with skepticism and humor, from the early stages of Steven's search for an Asian bride, through the moment Sandy steps foot in America for the first time, to a year into their precarious union. Global migration, Sino-American relations and the perennial battle of the sexes, weigh in on the fate of their marriage in this intimate and quirky personal documentary…

The recent Spearhead essay profiling my own ForeignBride generated a lot of interest and queries from men, who, concerned with the lack of domestic skills combined with the pork-normative obesity in western women, were beginning to consider the possibility of getting their own ForeignBride. So I will kick off the conversation with some simple anecdotes and recommendations for evaluating whether to start your own ForeignBride project, or simply emigrate to friendlier climes.

Many have expressed concern that once a woman arrives to a western country, she will become "westernized" and create the same sorts of problems for her husband as women deluded through a steady diet of feminist brainwarshing. Another fear is that these women will make false domestic violence accusations and abscond with a man's sanity and financial assets. Given that professional feminists have made DV into a personally lucrative income stream and passed laws enabling this scam as well as funding initiatives to council foreign brides to take advantage of their husbands, these fears are well-founded.

But if a man does some soul-searching, defines for himself what his true needs and wants are that can be shared with a foreign bride, and importantly, shops carefully among the many options available to him, the chances for finding a loving and supportive companion can be improved greatly.

So education is an important first step. A fella that is considering the ForeignBride route can find a lot of resources on the web to gain an understanding of the process and what he'll have to do to make it a success. While learning the path to attaining a ForeignBride, the hopeful groom-to-be needs to think about what he wants and consider what realistically may work out for him. The good news is that there are vast numbers of lovely and charming foreign women eager to meet and marry an American man, because outside the U.S., American men are considered top quality in terms of husband material. Along with their good character and talents, these women have strong traditional upbringing and attitudes conducive to making for a happy marriage. Frankly, they consider it their number one duty to make their husband happy, and don't have the confusing panoply of feminist policy directives swirling around in their heads to complicate their everyday existence.

And what of that drive to please their husband? Perhaps because the marginal of survival is very thin in many lands. A woman's husband is vitally important to her, because it's her husband, she lavishes care on him and ensures her own survival. As for subservience, what a laugh. These women, through their expert ways in pleasing a man, quickly take control of the relationship while fooling the dumb brute to think he's in charge. They tolerate no disrespect. Cross them and the pussy shuts slams shut until he makes entreaties for reprieve. A little knowledge of female psychology can help him get through these difficult times.

So the comments often come up that "once she gets her Green Card, she'll take off" or "she only wants a ticket to the U.S". To this one can reasonably observe, the U.S. ain't so great as many would claim, and for most of these women, who love their land and culture, it is difficult indeed to depart and come to live in the frozen wastes of the great North. More likely, your problem will be to convince her to leave her home and come live here, and once she is here, to make her life as comfortable as possible as she adjusts to this strange land, where dogs wear clothes and live in houses, and men live under bridges.

We return then, to the idea that a man needs to define his requirements. They depend on his age, income, personal interests, where he lives, whether he wants children, and how his prospective bride might mesh with those and compliment them. It is a mutual thing. Consider her needs in this equation and your chance for happiness becomes greater. Here's the thing that has helped my situation a lot and something for you to carefully consider : my wife is Vietnamese, and her cultural bonds are very strong. As it turns out, in many large metropolitan areas there are large numbers of Vietnamese. In some cities they have developed vibrant economic activity, and thus new Viet immigrants can find fellowship and cultural activities to make their life a lot less lonely and homesick. If you live in a rural area, or a cultural demographic that has no connections with her culture, the isolation may be too much for her. At the very least (if you go Asian that is) is that there is a decent Asian market nearby. Ideally, you should spend significant time in her culture and appreciating her ways, and let her build that in your home.

The quantity and quality of foreign women available for matchmaking is astounding. If you have carefully weighed your situation and understand what you want, use the websites to match your needs to hers, make contact, and if you find the one that's right, go meet her. Get a passport if you don't have one yet. Vaccinations for the regions you will visit are recommended and can take 6 months for the proper regimen.

The process to get her here takes about 18-24 months initially, then several more years to establish her permanent residency. You need to understand this process in detail, even if you hire an immigration attorney to do the work for you. It may cost you $20,000 or more after all the fees and travel. The upside of this will be the fun in traveling to her country. I lived with my bride there for awhile and had a great time. As for success in getting her fiance' visa, the great majority of K-1 visas applied for are granted. In 2009, 95 percent of the K-1 visa applications were approved: out of 29,127 K-1 visas applied for, 27,678 were issued, and 1,449 refused, and 1,266 were waived/overcome.

It will likely be a real challenge for her to live here, as well as for the two of you to build a relationship. On a positive note, you will likely find her very adaptable and eager to learn about her new home and language. As you have seen from the photos in the last essay, the benefits to a marrying a foreign lady can be very satisfying and a just reward for the sacrifices you have made to bring her to live with you.

Divorced Dads and Little League

By Thrown Away Dad

As my visitation weekend drew closer, I had a stong feeling that something was amiss. A little league tryout was scheduled for the Saturday morning of my visitation weekend and I was curious why the heroic single mother had not yet sent me a snarky e-mail ordering me to take my son to the tryout. She knows full well I will be there at the tryout anyway and that I don't need to be told, but she still enjoys pretending that I am such a louse that I must be ordered to be there. With the absence of the e-mail, my best guess was that she was hoping I knew nothing of the tryout and then later she could cry foul that I refused to take him.

As I drove to my son's school, I was thinking about how much I was looking forward to picking him up and us going together to the tryout Saturday morning. At least for a few hours on Saturday morning, I could pretend to be one of the fathers and not just a visitor to my boy. I was also looking forward to telling him that I had been selected as a head coach. I knew this would make him very happy and very proud. Unfortunately, I also knew that my ex would be very upset about my involvement as a head coach of one of the little league baseball teams. Myself being an active father and volunteering as a little league coach simply does not fit the narrative of herself as a victim of a bad man that she is forever trying to sell to anyone who will listen. When she chose to break the family, she moved to a another community and although her new town is not terribly far away from mine, it is a place where I am virtually unknown. Because of this, it has been a 4 year long effort on my part to make myself known enough and trusted enough in her town that I am now allowed to be a head coach of my son's little league team.

My hunch that something was amiss was spot on. Instead of being allowed to pick up my son, I was greeted by a County Deputy and served with an emergency order of protection. The reader might be surprised to hear that the police officer served me with an emergency order of protection, however as a father who has been dragged through the divorce mill, I was not surprised at all. This now makes the third emergency order of protection that my ex has taken out on me and not a one of them have anything to do with an emergency. Not a one of them have anything to do with someone needing protection. In fact, as the Police Officer was informing me that fulfilling my responsibilities as a father is now a criminal offense, it occured to me that due to this emergency order of protection, I could not attend the Saturday morning baseball tryout, just as my ex wished. It was Friday afternoon and there was no way I could get into the courthouse and attempt to get the OP vacated before the Saturday Baseball tryout.

My gut reaction at first was to ignore the emergency order of protection and instead show up at the practice field on Saturday morning and fulfill my responsibilities as a coach. Showing up at the Saturday practice of course would be a violation of the emergency order of protection because my son would be there, but the rebellious side of me envisioned a media storm about a Father being arrested for "Coaching his little league team". However as the minutes and hours ticked by, I realized that showing up at the tryout would lead to myself being arrested in front of all of the children and the other coaches and parents. Everyone who would witness this arrest would learn of the ominous sounding emergency order of protection and I would no doubt lose my gig as a little league coach, just as the heroic single mother wanted.

Upon coming to the regretful decision that I simply could not attend the Saturday tryout, I realized that I had to inform the gentleman who runs the league that I could not be there. Naturally, I wanted to share with him the news of the emergency order of protection, and explain to him that just because I have one on me doesn't mean I have done anything wrong. I wanted to inform him that this is merely a tactic of the divorcing mother to obstruct my involvement as a loving father. I know however that if anyone unfamiliar with the family court system hears the words Emergency Order of Protection and my name in the same sentence, they will conclude that something is terribly wrong. Thus, I would not be the kind of father they would want coaching a little league team. I called the gentleman on my cell phone and simply told him I could not make Saturday's tryout. He was disappointed, but said

OK. Thank goodness he did not ask me why I could not attend.

With the court date set for Wednesday, I had the emergency order of protection still hanging over my head when I went to the Tuesday coaches meeting where players were selected. I envied the other coaches as they cracked jokes about their wives, their jobs, and their friends. While they were all laughing it up, I was sitting there sweating it out, afraid that my ex would show up at the meeting, call the police and try to get me arrested in front of the other coaches for violating the Order of Protection. Fortunately, the meeting place was not listed in the OP as a place that I could not be within 300 feet of, but I was still afraid that my ex might know about the coaches meeting and try to set up a scenario for my arrest. Thank goodness nothing of the sort happened and when the meeting was over, I was the first to leave and I drove away breathing a sigh of relief. I did not get arrested, and I kept my gig as a coach for my son's little league team.

At the Wednesday afternoon court date, the emergency order of protection was vacated. This means it was thrown out. I'll spare the reader the details of the hearing, however I am amazed that these emergency orders of protection are given out without even an allegation of any physical act. I found it difficult to behave myself as my ex sat on the stand, crying and telling the court how very concerned she is for our son. I wondered what must be going through my son's mind during the weekend I was absent. I wonder how many times my ex told him that your father cannot see you because the wise grey haired judge issued this order to protect you from your Dad. When these divorcing Mothers cry on about how concerned they claim to be about their children, nobody would dare to suggest to them that their children would be better off if they did not divorce the Father in the first place.

When I returned home that evening after the court hearing where the OP was vacated, I received the snarky e-mails from my ex that I had expected a week earlier. Obviously, she was on a tirade because her ploy did not work. Coaching children's sports teams is something that I have alot of experience doing. There really aren't too many things that I consider myself darned good at, but the truth is, I am darned good at coaching the kids. I am really looking forward to doing one of the things that I do best this spring and summer and I'm happy for my son as well. It is such a crying shame that the lady who conned me into marrying her, and later took the marriage vows and later still chose to break them will be watching my every move, measuring my every word, looking for her opportunity to build a case against me and have me removed as a coach.

When I notice my right fielder not watching the batter, I will need to be careful not to be too loud when I tell him to pay attention. When I give one of my players an encouraging pat on the shoulder, I will be careful not to pat the player too hard. During practice, when I bat a ground ball to my own son, I will cringe, hoping the ball does not take a bad hop and bruise him somewhere. Despite all of these hardships and limitations, I realize that I am truly one of the lucky ones. I am still allowed to spend time with my boy. In a country that prides itself on freedom, justice for all, etc., the fathers who are allowed to spend crumbs of time with their children when the divorcing mothers wish otherwise are truly the lucky few.

Nice place we're living in gentlemen.

As I wrote on the weekend, I'm on a vacation with my family, and don't have as much time as usual to run the site and keep an eye on details. Unfortunately, this resulted in the tone of comments going down the toilet.

So, until I get back and have the time to work out a fix, all comments are going on moderation, and only those that are thoughtful, civil and on topic will be approved.

Marijuana, Black Boys and the Future of America

Featured Guest · 23 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Dicipres

Recently, the Journal of Family and Marriage published the article: The Effects of Family Structure on African American Adolescents' Marijuana Use,

Abstract: "The relationship between family structure and marijuana use throughout adolescence was assessed among 1,069 African Americans from the NLSY. A model was also tested suggesting that the effects of family structure on marijuana use would be mediated by poverty, neighborhood quality, and adolescents' self-control. As most prior studies have found, family structure was not related to female adolescents' marijuana use. For young men, being raised with both biological parents was associated with less marijuana use throughout adolescence compared to those whose mothers never married, divorced early and never remarried, or divorced and remarried. Some support for the model was also found. We concluded that being raised without the presence of a biological father is a risk factor for marijuana use among young men, but African American young women from single-parent households have unique resources that protect them from marijuana use." [emphasize mine],

Like virtually all modern social academic publications, this article reeks of feminism. However, the data is still useful from the MRM perspective. While only the case of marijuana use is examined, we can generalize this case to understand the entire process which created and now sustains the matriarchal welfare society in which most black boys are growing today. (e.g. 72% of black children are born to unwed mothers, and 66% of black children are growing in single parent households.)

If we generalize the results of the article, we can deduce the following conclusion: Growing in a home without a biological father hurts boys much more than it hurts girls.

Welfare and feminism made it possible (and even worth while) to women to eliminate the biological father from the family. The lack of father figure hurts boys more than girls (as seen in the data), thus creating a class of young black men which are less educated, less disciplined and generally of lower social status compared to the young black women. Women hate weak low status men (see every post ever written by the mighty Roissy) and financially poor black men needed to get status by other means, e.g. become "bad boys". This in turn made them not attractive as husbands, and due to welfare and feminist family laws, they can just be removed completely from the family structure and the lives of the children at the will of mother, even without he hit me!/he abuse the kids!/etc.. false accusations. (This occur while they still providing child support for 18 years, and they have no say how their money is spent or how their children are raised.) The new generation of young boys have even less contact with a father figure, and thus will have a harder time to be fathers… and this is the cycle of life in the matriarchy. The cycle of eliminating fathers from the family with is the most essential part required for a matriarchy.

This, made men, and specifically the "alpha" black men who were still desired by women, to think twice before marrying. Quoting Ricketts, Erol. (1989) "The Origin of Black Female-Headed Families." Focus 12(1): 32-36 (HT: JustBeAManAboutIt): "The increasing vulnerability of disadvantaged black males to the vicissitudes of the economy seems to explain their avoidance of marriage and their increasing involvement in loose consensual unions. Being involved in such unions and parenting children out of wedlock are ways of simultaneously keeping one's options open and affirming one's self."

A Prediction

The US, as a whole, is heading for the state of the black community today. Young men growing today need to understand this, and act accordingly, in a manner that will serve their best interests, while giving no consideration at all to the well being of the modern matriarchal society. If you still want a family you need to be associated with the part of society in which family values and marriage are still alive and well (middle class, white, earning well and college educated) and women which are still worth the risk of marriage (middle class, low count of sexual partners andcollege educated). This part of society and the population of "marriage worthy" women are shrinking by the day and if you are poor/black/uneducated etc., you better prepare to live in the feminist new world order of society.

Some Other Comments

I. There was a black family in the past, Ricketts, Erol. 1989. "The Origin of Black Female-Headed Families." Focus 12(1): 32-36.)

II. I was accused in my previous post to be pessimistic, and "downtrodden and defeatist" however, I believe that I am just a realist. In 1989 Ricketts commented in his conclusions: "It is unlikely that these problems can be easily reversed, and they are likely to get worse…" He was right.

III. Two interesting qoutes from http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/The_Negro_Family:_The_Case_For_National_Action (another H/T to JustBeAManAboutIt): 1. "From the wild Irish slums of the 19th century eastern seaboard, to the riot-torn suburbs of Los Angeles, there is one unmistakable lesson in American history: A community that allows a large number of young men to grow up in broken families, dominated by women, never acquiring any stable relationship to male authority, never acquiring any rational expectations about the future – that community asks for and gets chaos." 2. "My view is we had stumbled onto a major social change in the circumstances of post-modern society. It was not long ago in this past century that an anthropologist working in London – a very famous man at the time, Malinowski – postulated what he called the first rule of anthropology: That in all known societies, all male children have an acknowledged male parent. That's what we found out everywhere… And well, maybe it's not true anymore."

Chivalry—Whether or not it's dead, it's not for us regular men.

Davd · 24 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Chivalry is not dead—well, i doubt it is—but it is rare, and not for the ordinary man; it is for the rich and warlike. This will probably be welcome news to most regular men, who find it more burdensome than fun to do all that chivalry-stuff. If it is less welcome news to most women, i won't apologize: Better to tell the truth—and Lady, it's not my task on this earth, to make you happy. It's your happiness, so make it yourself… and if you help me with my happiness, then i'll reciprocate[1], as good neighbours ought to do.

The reason chivalry is and should be rare, is right there in the dictionary: Chivalry derives "from chevalier, a knight or horseman [which derives] from cheval, a horse." (Thatcher and McQueen, 1971: 144). The definition reads: "Knighthood; the system to which knighthood with all its laws and usages belonged; the qualifications of a knight, as courtesy, valor, and dexterity in arms …." (ibid.)

A man with courtesy, valor, and dexterity in arms, today, is a military officer—or perhaps a "classy" gangster[2]. Leslie Charteris' fictional character "The Saint" comes to mind. Skilled combat soldiers don't tend to be courteous, nor do the police on occasions when they make working use of their dexterity in arms. Men whose social circumstances support chivalry, in the 21st Century, are a very small fraction of the adult male population.

Chivalry tends to "go with" patriarchy, but not all patriarchal cultures have chivalry: While i don't happen to have a book on my shelf that documents this all-in-one-place, i have read in a variety of sources over the years, that patriarchy is common in three kinds of social conditions:

- The upper and ruling classes of agricultural and industrial societies;
- Herding societies (Lenski, Lenski, and Nolan, 1991: 205-7); and
- Farming communities in climates where soils dry out frequently (Harris, 1969: 217-8, 328-331).

Chivalry can be found mainly among those upper and ruling classes, and occasionally among the more warlike in the herding societies. Of ploughmen whose families defer to them because only they can plow straight furrows in hard ground, probably fewer than 1% are chivalrous.

I grew up in the working class of an industrial society. As a boy, i had hundreds of hours each year—a few thousand hours over ten years—to walk from home to school, from home to my friends' homes, to the store and elsewhere on errands for my parents, even to get some exercise for me and my dog; and while i was walking, i saw thousands of glimpses of working-class household power relationships. I saw men bossing their wives, women bossing their husbands, and more than either of those, i saw husbands and wives working out differences and just discussing things, as equals. Between 1949 and 1959, i saw gender-equality on average in working-class North America; and nothing i later learned from others who grew up about the same time, conflicted with what i observed "on the West Coast".

My boyhood neighbourhoods were neither "upscale" nor impoverished. Most of the men were tradesmen; most of the women were housewives or occasionally schoolteachers, nurses, nurses-helpers, cooks—they followed the trades suitable to women's strength, and the junior professions. In the poor neighbourhoods, i later learned, women were more often dominant than men, and some places had more matriarchal households than gender-equal. (Consistently with extrapolating from upper classes being patriarchal through skilled-labour classes averaging egalitarian, the lower classes were mostly matriarchal.)

So where did the notions of patriarchy and chivalry "get all that traction"?—if the middle majority, the skilled blue- and white-collar workers and their families, were gender-equal on average? A blogger who uses the pen-name "Futurist", in a famous essay entitled "The Misandry Bubble", explains it this way: "feminists compar[e] the plight of average women to the topmost men (the monarch and other aristocrats), rather than to the average man. This practice is known as apex fallacy*„ and whether accidental or deliberate, entirely misrepresents reality.*

It is difficult to decide if the misrepresentation be fraudulent or innate: From Cinderella to the little girls in many advertisements, there is some kind of "Princess syndrome" far more prevalent among girls, than any kind of elite pretensions are among boys. The ritual language of "Good Manners" places women one or perhaps two classes above men with its "Ladies and Gentlemen": Ladies are the social equals of "Lords",as is explicit in the courtroom rituals of Canada and the U.K, where a judge is conventionally addressed as "Your Ladyship" or "Your Lordship": and referred-to as "Her Ladyship" or "His Lordship". (The social equal of a "gentleman" is, by a very simple transformation, a "gentlewoman". We do not see that word often—because English-language social ritual places women above men. We do not see nor hear the judiciary addressed nor referred to as mere gentlefolk.)

"Futurist" states, "women are not monogamous, as is popularly assumed, but hypergamous. … a woman may be attracted to only one man at any given time, but as the status and fortune of various men fluctuates, a woman's attention may shift from a declining man to an ascendant man." So women may plausibly be committing the "apex fallacy" because they think of themselves as princesses and—unless they are actually in the ruling class—men of their own social rank are almost invisible to them.

There was a popular television show dacades ago, "Queen for a Day", that catered to the princess syndrome; but no "King for a Day". Mothers often referred to their daughters as "my little Princess", but almost never to their sons as "my little Prince".

When i read, over-and-over again, that women initiate divorce between twice and ten times as often as men, it's consistent with the Princess Syndrome and the absence of a parallel boys' syndrome: A boy grows up, learns a trade, meets a woman of his approximate age and occupational status, and if he marries her, is content: He's married to a social equal. A girl grows up, learns a trade, meets a man of her approximate age and occupational status, and if she marries him, is relatively disappointed: She's not a princess any longer. If he puts on prince-like manners for her, he looks and feels silly; if he doesn't, she resents his lack of chivalry.

In this 21st Century, boys and young men have apparently noticed this problem—that there are more wanna-be princesses than there are princes for them to marry. More and more young men are choosing not to marry. And as "Futurist" noted, [hyperlinks in original]

By many accounts, 22% of men have decided to avoid marriage. So what happens to a society that makes it unattractive for even just 20% of men to marry?

Women are far more interested in marriage than men. Simple logic of supply and demand tells us that the institution of monogamous marriage requires at least 80% male participation in order to be viable. When male participation drops below 80%, all women are in serious trouble, since there are now 100 women competing for every 80 men, compounded with the reality that women age out of fertility much quicker than men.

Expecting chivalry of men who lack the wealth and title of true knights, leads to a surplus of princess-aspirants and eventually, to a large number of frustrated spinsters.

I don't know a gentle, effective way to break this news to the Princesses; but to mothers and fathers whose daughters are still young, i would suggest you teach them the following lessons:

- What fraction of the young men of your country are able to keep a Princess in the style that the title implies;
- What fraction of the young women of your country are ambitious to be a Princess; and
- the alternatives to Princess that she might wisely consider, given her personality and talents.

We'll assume that they learn subtraction in school, and can work out "as an exercise for the student," how far the number of would-be princesses exceeds the number of princes.

If i think of the 20th Century women i admired, they include Simone Weil, Mother Theresa, my preacher grandmother, two nuns i knew as individuals, and two scientists. The princess i can most readily name, i didn't admire; she divorced her husband, ran around with playboys, and died violently while fleeing the paparazzi. She probably saw more chivalry than the women i do admire. In my humble opinion, apart from the husband she divorced, that "chivalry" did her more harm than good.

Many readers on this and other men's-interest sites have lamented the recent prevalence of "I'm not haaaaappy" as an excuse too many women use for destructive behaviour—divorce especially. Expecting chivalry from ordinary workingmen, and expecting to find a handsome prince to marry, are both unrealistic for most women who reached puberty with neither a title of nobility nor a million dollars. Unrealistic expectations lead to unhaaappiness—in social psychology we call the process "relative deprivation."

Expecting that you will be in love for the rest of your life, when the best-known book on the subject (Alberoni, 1980) states that two months is a much more realistic estimate of how long people typically remain "in love", also leads to unrealism and relative deprivation. Me-thinks many women who aren't "haaaaappy" might be happy with the normal number of vowels, and do far less damage, if they could get their expectations aligned with reality.

My preacher-grandmother didn't expect much chivalry from those around her. Modesty, yes. Truthfulness, definitely! Polite conduct, even to the extent of eating soup with a spoon and salad with a fork, and wearing clean clothes to church, yes. But chivalry?—she preferred honesty and keeping one's word; and if she got that from her parishioners, she didn't insist on fancy trimmings. My engineer-grandfather, same basic story. And those two, though they each had their moments of less than total satisfaction, those two i remember as happy people, in a serene and disciplined way.

Don't worry about chivalry, fellows; we don't need it—nor do we need to entangle ourselves with women who think they do.

1. In my case, this is not a sexual innuendo. I doubt that sexual innuendo is anywhere-near as common in most men's treatment of women, as it is in [for instance] advertisements for women's clothing.

2. I'm not going to make a separate category for the present-day analogues of James Bond. Seems more accurate to say that some gangs are technically legal.

Pending Changes to Site

W.F. Price · 25 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of the things about running a site like The Spearhead is that you have to learn as you go. It's a bit like bushwhacking in uncharted territory. So, I've been struggling for a while to figure out how to properly manage the site. The Spearhead is a bit tricky, because it's become both a community and a magazine, and finally I've come to accept that it ought to stay that way. Unfortunately, the problem with this is that there isn't much software out there that makes it easy to manage this without making things too complicated for one person to handle.

However, I've finally come across some software that I think will do the trick. I'll break down the plan as I currently expect to implement it. Keep in mind that there will certainly be changes to the plan as bugs and issues come up, but here's a (very) rough outline:

The site will become a membership site with two different levels of membership, including supporters and subscribers. Most of the content will remain open to all, but certain things, such as long features and some downloads, will only be available to subscribers and supporters. Only members will be able to vote on comments, but any reader can comment as before. For casual readers, it will make little difference, although some of the content – perhaps a weekly feature – will not be available.

To implement membership, I'm going to purge subscribers from the current list, but first I'll give them an opportunity to stay on as members if they want. Perhaps a couple weeks' warning will suffice.

One thing I'd like to do would be to give supporters a vote concerning the site. I think they should have some say as far as what direction they'd like me to take The Spearhead. To do this, I may enable a comment system whereby they can make comments that are only visible to the admin (and other supporters if I can figure out how to do that). There will be a lot of new features, and I'll have to do some testing to make it work.

I should say that I plan on implementing this mainly for supporters, who have kept the site up for the past two and a half years — without them I never would have been able to put so much work into The Spearhead. Hopefully, it will make my job a bit easier as well, but there's no guarantee there. In any event, the site has become too important to neglect, so I want to maintain its health for some time to come.

So, I'm going to be doing some testing and you may notice a few bugs over the next few days as I integrate the software. Before I finally flip the switch, I'll give readers ample notice. Nobody has to become a member, and I don't expect everybody to sign up immediately, but membership will offer something extra to those who are already supporters, so I'd urge those who already contribute to the site to sign up. I value readers, and it will be great to finally have the opportunity to offer additional features to those who have invested in the site without depriving those who simply enjoy the content from time to time of anything of consequence.

In the meanwhile, I'm going to be in the engine room tinkering around with the new software. Hopefully, I can pull it off without a hitch.

Despite All the Risks – Why Young Men Still Get Married

Featured Guest · 26 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Ethical

Marriage rates are crashing across all demographics. But we already know the reasons why men increasingly are opting out of marriage: the milk is free, and with feminist divorce and child support laws, buying the cow costs so much the cow could end up owning YOU.

Those feminist laws now govern marriage across much of the entire western world. Even for men with the best of intentions, getting married anywhere where such laws do exist is playing with a VERY hot fire. The growing MRA movement is spreading red pill knowledge of that. But the real question is that given the dangers, why young men still DO opt for marriage in sizeable numbers.

Here are the reasons I've gathered: why many young men still intend get married despite hearing about the risks:

> 1. If I don't marry her she won't stick around forever waiting. The risk and consequences of losing her are worse than the risks and consequences of divorce if it doesn't work out.
> 2. Some marriages last forever. The risk and consequences of divorce are outweighed by the chance of winning at marriage.
> 3.If I act responsibly I won't get divorced.
> 4. If somehow my wife divorces me even though I'm not at fault, the system will treat me fairly because I'm a good man. The risk and consequences of marriage are not that bad.
> 5. I ignore the horror stories from MRAs whining on and on about divorce. Fear is for cowards. If you're not afraid and you don't think about it, it won't happen to you. Again the risks are not that high.
> 5. My family, friends, and society at large expect that any mature, responsible, heterosexual man will eventually settle down. The rewards of me being seen positively for doing so are high.
> 6. I want to have children and I want them to have a father who married their mother. The rewards of that are high for me.
> 7. I don't know why people say divorce law is feminist and I don't care. Ten years down the road when both I and any girl I marry are older and maybe even very different people, I trust I'll have gotten to know her well enough before marriage to be certain she won't ever become the kind of woman who'll try to "take me for everything". I can control the risks of marriage by choosing to marry a person who will never change that much.
> 8. Marriage means a serious commitment that takes a woman off the market long-term. The girl I'll want to marry will be too special to take the risk of leaving her on the market.
> 9. Any girl I marry will be worth the risk of divorce. That risk isn't high for people truly in love anyways.
> 10. I grew up with a father around. I want to give the same benefit to my kids. The rewards of that are high for me.
> 11. I grew up without a father around, I want to get married so my kids don't grow up without one too. The rewards of that are high for me.
> 12. I come from a traditional background. Either my family, friends, or the community I grew up in wouldn't encourage me to get the sex, children, and companionship I want without marriage. The rewards of being seen positively for respecting tradition are high for me.
> 13. I come from a traditional background. I wouldn't want some or all of those things (sex, children, and female companionship) without marriage. I want my wife to be pure not someone who allows herself to be

> "test driven". The rewards of following my own beliefs are high for me.

My take on all this? The red pill knowledge of divorce's potential pitfalls spreads slowly because where there is reward young men have always ignored even the most deadly of risks.

Then there's the oft studied "illusion of control", the tendency for ambitious "goal striving"/risk taking young men in particular to overestimate their ability to control events they demonstrably have no influence over.

Finally, men are important in the raising of sons. Some of the young men I surveyed grew up in single parent homes. Many reported their mothers felt the men in their lives were solely responsible for failing to be knights in shining armor, and now their mothers were raising them with the expectations of becoming the white knights the mothers themselves felt entitled to since they were little girls.

The trend of single motherhood left those young men alone in the house to be groomed as prince charming under the mother's Disneyland princess expectations. Of course mothers weaken young men by raising them with this white knight acceptance of giving everything to a woman without any expectation of her being responsible to him and giving back to him in return. Indoctrinating their sons to act contrary to their own interests is in a sense teaching their sons to be self-hating. Little wonder that sons of single mothers are even more likely to enter marriages that fail and leave them vulnerable to savagely anti-male divorce laws.

Weakened by single-mom self-hating white-knighthood, and without the antidote of having older men around who he respects to caution him to slow his roll, the lure of an attractive young woman is even more likely to sway a young man into a raw deal. Oddly enough this may be particularly true if he's ambitious enough to fall prey to social expectations, and successful enough to afford indulging his "princess".

So young men will risk much for the rewards of keeping a hot woman happy. When it comes to them, the MRA message of caution falls on deaf ears. However the GAME message of increasing one's opportunity of success has an extremely strong uptake with them. GAME advocates like Frost empower young American men to avoid settling for the ass end of the deal.

> Over the past half-century, men have been taught to cede control of all the power they have in their personal relationships with women. They have been trained to continue upholding their side of the social contract, while women have been told that any expectation for them to do the same is oppression, pure and simple. The Roissysphere is the solution to this imbalance. We are teaching men that it's OK to be a cad, it's OK to be selfish, and it's OK to pursue your own wants and needs in the world.

Some MRAs disparage the PUA/GAME community. I see them as an integral ally. It takes a community to raise a boy. In that community MRAs are spreading the message of men's issues and working within the establishment to change the laws. That message filters to guerilla generals like Frost, Roosh, and Roissy who operate far outside the established institution of marriage, directing the guys in the chaotic front lines of the mating game to make their own rules. It's together that we offer the best hope of waking the next generation of boys as they become young men, not necessarily indoctrinating them to avoid marriage, but making sure they're aware enough to make the choices best for THEM.

What Motivates Male Feminists

I watched Kingpin last night just to relax and laugh a bit, and when I saw Big Ern's charity commercial again, I just had to smile as I thought of Hugo Schwyzer, Manboobz and all the other male feminists out there and what really motivates them.

If you haven't seen Kingpin, Bill Murray plays this smarmy A-hole professional bowler. He plays it really well. It's a great movie, both funny and sentimental. A real American classic — I definitely recommend it.

Watch Big Ern's charity ad below and remember it every time some mangina gets preachy and starts "defending women."

Next Feminist Goal: Remake Image of God (As Themselves)

W.F. Price · 27 March 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Now that feminists have "won," some are asking "what next?" The answer, says Tabby Biddle of HuffPo, is "about the integration of feminine spiritually with feminine sexuality"

According to Biddle, the only thing standing in the way of absolute feminist dominance and a female supremacist society is the image of a male god:

> What makes fourth wave feminism different, in my view, is the connection to feminine spirituality. While all women might not be on board with this, there is certainly a growing trend toward recognizing the Divine Feminine and the Goddess as representatives of the spiritual nature of women. With God the Father at the helm for 2,000 plus years, many women have lost their connection to their divine feminine nature. (Men too.) Without this spiritual connection to the feminine, it's hard to really value yourself at the same level as men since everything is skewed toward the divine masculine and masculine qualities.
> To look at this more closely: A 2011 Gallup poll found that 90 percent of Americans have an image of God — even those who don't believe in God — and that image is overwhelmingly male. This of course influences how we think. Scientists have proven this over and over that perceptions affect our thinking, values and beliefs.
> This widespread belief that God is male has lead men to treat women in dismissive ways, women to treat women in dismissive ways, and all of us to discount feminine qualities such as compassion, nurturing and holistic thinking. It has also given men, very unfortunately, permission to treat women abusively, cruelly and violently.

Nevermind the fact that she gets her timeline all wrong (the idea of God the Father did not begin with Jesus Christ), and that there is no evidence that a female divinity would lead men to behave with less cruelty or violence — what's important is that we all get on our knees before the exalted goddess. Or, perhaps, because female sexuality and spirituality are to be intertwined in the new religion, perhaps we are to pay homage to the goddess by having sex with Her (or, as is usually the case, having sex with a temple prostitute representing the goddess, and paying the pimp-priest for the privilege).

This does bring up an interesting point. There have been goddess cults throughout history in certain times and places. Often, they are accompanied by ritual prostitution. Sometimes, as in the case of Athena, they have been characterized by male supremacy. What they haven't done is usher in a golden age of female rule. Instead, they tend to legitimize prostitution and serve as an outlet for male fantasy (e.g. Aphrodite). Some of them feature terrible sacrificial rites.

In India, no more than a few years ago, a tantric cult dedicated to the goddess Kali began sacrificing children:

> Sumitra Bushan, 43, who lived in Barha for most of her life, certainly thought she was cursed. Her husband had long abandoned her, leaving her with debts and a life of servitude in the sugarcane fields. Her sons, Satbir, 27, and Sanjay, 23, were regarded as layabouts. Life was bad but then the nightmares and terrifying visions of Kali allegedly began, not just for Sumitra but her entire family.
> She consulted a tantrik, a travelling 'holy man' who came to the village occasionally, dispensing advice and putrid medicines from the rusty amulets around his neck.
> His guidance to Sumitra was to slaughter a chicken at the entrance to her home and offer the blood and remains to the goddess. She did so but the nightmares continued and she began waking up screaming in the heat of the night and returned to the priest. 'For the sake of your family,' he told her, 'you must sacrifice another, a boy from your village.'
> Ten days ago Sumitra and her two sons crept to their neighbour's home and abducted three-year-old Aakash

> Singh as he slept. They dragged him into their home and the eldest son performed a puja ceremony, reciting a mantra and waving incense. Sumitra smeared sandalwood paste and globules of ghee over the terrified child's body. The two men then used a knife to slice off the child's nose, ears and hands before laying him, bleeding, in front of Kali's image.
> In the morning Sumitra told villagers she had found Aakash's body outside her house. But they attacked and beat her sons who allegedly confessed. 'I killed the boy so my mother could be safe,' Sanjay screamed. All three are now in prison, having escaped lynch mob justice. The tantrik has yet to be found.
> Police in Khurja say dozens of sacrifices have been made over the past six months. Last month, in a village near Barha, a woman hacked her neighbour's three-year-old to death after a tantrik promised unlimited riches. In another case, a couple desperate for a son had a six-year-old kidnapped and then, as the tantrik chanted mantras, mutilated the child. The woman completed the ritual by washing in the child's blood.

Tantrism, which is associated with sexuality in the West, is a mystical branch of Hinduism that developed some time in the late first millennium AD. It is possibly the most widespread and influential goddess cult in existence today, and features some bizarre sexual rituals, which are characteristic of goddess cults:

> Sexual rites of Vamamarga may have emerged from early Hindu Tantra as a practical means of catalyzing biochemical transformations in the body to facilitate heightened states of awareness.[36] These constitute a vital offering to Tantric deities. Sexual rites may have also evolved from clan initiation ceremonies involving transactions of sexual fluids. Here the male initiate is inseminated or ensanguined with the sexual emissions of the female consort, sometimes admixed with the semen of the guru. The Tantrika is thus transformed into a son of the clan (kulaputra) through the grace of his consort. The clan fluid (kuladravya) or clan nectar (kulamrita) is conceived as flowing naturally from her womb.

Despite our technological sophistication and highly developed infrastructure, we Westerners tend to be incredibly naïve where history and spiritual matters are concerned. Perhaps this is why people can so casually suggest that goddess worship or female rule would elevate our society and bring us enlightenment and peace. These people ignore the reality, which is easy enough to find if one does a little research, but then again that's easy to do when one begins to see oneself as a divine being.

But no matter; Biddle assures us that "Instead of looking outside to Father God for acceptance and permission, women are looking inside to their own feminine nature for authority and guidance." The ancient Greeks would have called that hubris — an offense against heaven.

The Coming Demographic Shift

Although I like to pay attention to demographics and quantitative social studies, and often read papers and blogs devoted to the subjects, I tend to leave it to the guys who like crunching numbers in Excel (there are a lot of them out there). However, every now and then simple observation compels me to weigh in on the issue. One thing I've realized, as I approach middle age (or have already entered it depending on one's definition), is that I really don't know what's going on with those who are a decade or more younger than me. Actually, I'm not even sure I realize how things are for those in their late 20s, but that's kind of a transitional stage, and they have already more or less entered the adult world, so the difference is not so profound.

So, to do a little research I went to some social media sites so as to get an idea of the youthful style and trends. One thing I noticed about women in their 20s is that lots and lots of them have tattoos. Not just the little tramp stamp a few naughty girls got back in the 90s, but in many cases big, garish glaring things that cover their necks, upper arms, backs, calves and God knows what else. Now, this isn't all of them, of course, but a very considerable proportion — about 20-30%. My bet is that these are the daughters of single moms.

Then, on the other hand, you've got the "wholesome" Christian types. I doubt they are any better behaved than the typical girl of some 20 years ago, but hey, at least they are making an effort. These girls probably grew up, for the most part, in intact families. Now, keep in mind that these are the 20-somethings, born for the most part in the 1980s. I think there's going to be an even bigger shift in the next cohort, as I'll explain presently.

While in San Francisco, I did a lot of walking around with my kids, going to parks, riding cable cars, and all the rest. San Francisco is a very "progressive" city, and fairly white as far as large cities go. Because I was with kids doing parent things, I saw a lot of other parents. Mainly professional urban types with one or two kids (usually one), largely white, and fairly old as far as parents go. I was a young dad there for the age of my kids, and I'm pretty much right in the middle for the typical white, American father — maybe even a year or so older than average. However, despite going to a lot of kid-friendly places, and despite the fact that San Francisco is actually a really fun place to take kids, I got the impression that children are a rarity in San Francisco. In fact, they are.

There's been talk for some time now about how conservative whites tend to have more kids than liberals (I'll focus on whites here because black demographics have followed an entirely different pattern, and immigrants, obviously, have as well). Although I'm not sure exactly when the trend started, I suspect it got going some time around 1980 (this article suggests the late 70s), probably shortly after party affiliation started to solidify along urban/non-urban lines, and then really accelerated in the 90s. My age cohort – those of us born during the 70s – is the last one in which white Democrats and Republicans had essentially equal numbers of children. Therefore, to me it is pretty normal to have a mix of conservatives and liberals in the same family, amongst friends, colleagues, etc. However, this will change, and the divide amongst the young is going to result in a bifurcation and transformation of the white American population. If the contrast between one kind of girl and another, which was by no means so stark when I was younger, is any indication, this division has already begun to show itself.

What we see playing out in American politics is the last gasp of traditional America. Liberals vs. conservatives is starting to become something of an old people's game. For people my age and older, we could be one or the other without having many fundamental differences besides political affiliation between us, so it's essentially a debate between equals. For younger people, there will be far more profound differences in terms of family structure, wealth and culture, because of both fertility trends and the realities of broken families and single motherhood.

Progressive whites are already a minority amongst white Americans, but given their abysmal fecundity they will be an even smaller minority in short order. Their few children, however, should have a nice lifestyle and ample opportunity. They will in all likelihood continue to have a disproportionately strong voice in the cultural elite for some time even as their numbers dwindle to insignificance. Somewhat more fertile, but far less functional, will be the white working class/single mom cohort. As we have seen in the news recently, some 30% of babies born to white mothers under 30 are illegitimate, and most of these mothers are poorly educated and come from families with limited means. A number of these women and their children may affiliate themselves with the progressives (although many of them vote Republican in the South), but they are amongst the least political whites of all. They are probably the least likely to vote, or even know who is running for local office. Additionally, although they may be having 30% of the babies in their 20s, single moms are not generally as fertile as married women. Not having a husband makes it a lot more difficult to raise children, so many will never have another child. Their children will likely end up the damaged, tattooed girls and bad boys who live it up until they, too, make a baby and then spend the rest of their fertile years working low-skill, poorly-paid jobs to support themselves and their one or two kids.

The remainder is where the future lies. Perhaps 60% of whites will be neither progressive nor trashy, and they will have the lion's share of children. In fact, this has already started happening, and we simply haven't seen it yet, because their children are just now getting out of school. Sure, some of them will suffer from the ordinary pitfalls of contemporary American life, such as divorce, layoffs, and other calamities, but their position will be both stronger and healthier than that of their white competitors, and that will become more apparent within a fairly short period of time — say ten years. By that time, the conservative/liberal divide is not going to make quite as much sense, because middle class liberals will be riding off into the sunset (and probably expending much of their effort demanding their rivals' children fund their rising healthcare costs).

One indication that this is already starting to happen is the pitiful protest movements one sees whites getting involved in today, such as Occupy Wall Street. Not only are the protestors a lot older on average than typical protestors would have been in the 90s and before, but the young ones are so obviously the spoiled, privileged children of urban elites that it takes the wind right of the movement's sails. How many middle-American types would one find in those camps? Maybe a few were wandering around in there, but they sure weren't represented according to their numbers. And the white proles who should have the biggest gripe are noticeably absent — they are apolitical. The gulf between these potential allies – white progressives and the white working/underclass – is just too big for them to forge anything other than the most awkward of coalitions. What's really ironic is how progressives have been championing the demise of traditional America for years, but in reality they've simply been celebrating their own pending irrelevance. On that note, perhaps those who really don't care all that much for progressive politics should support the Sandra Flukes of the world, who are doing their utmost to ensure that the daughters of progressive elites remain infertile for as long as possible.

So what does this have to do with men's rights, feminism and the other issues we usually discuss here? Well, for one thing, the very concept of "men's rights" is probably going to lose its cachet even as the progressive feminist movement runs out of steam. As white America shifts from a hegemonic force that competes only with itself in ever-escalating (and ridiculous) political gamesmanship to a more standard ethnic/national bloc in the greater Northern context, there will be a settling of values to something closer to the global norm, and instead of attempting to enforce one or another concept of "equality," natural gender roles will quietly start to be taken for granted again. It will take years for this to happen, and in the meanwhile we'll still have to deal with some of the excesses of the Postwar era (which ended with the collapse of the Soviet Union, but still dominates political ideology and affiliation), but it looks as though we've passed the tipping point. In fact, the majority of Americans alive today are what one could call "post-feminist;" i.e. they were born after the demographic decline of progressives began. They have yet to reach political significance, but that will change sooner than most people think.

I've never heard of Adrienne Rich, but she must be influential amongst certain circles, because the obituaries that are popping up are absolutely worshipful. It seems she was a feminist poet who came to prominence in the 1960s as an activist. I wouldn't normally pay any attention, but she displays yet another facet of the demographic issues I've been focusing on recently.

Ms. Rich was born in 1929 to a doctor and professor, Arnold Rich, and an Episcopalian pianist, Helen Jones — apparently a genteel couple. She was baptized in the Episcopal Church, and her father encouraged her to practice writing poetry from a young age. She went to school at Radcliffe, where she began publishing her own poetry, receiving praise for her good form. She graduated in 1951, then two years later married Alfred Haskell Conrad, a Harvard economist.

After having three sons in quick succession, she began to rebel against the role of being a wife and mother, which she had come to despise. Her poetry began to express a dark loathing for the domestic life of the contemporaneous American housewife. By the mid 60s she had joined the antiwar movement, and associated herself with the radical left that was ascendant at the time. Soon, she had all but abandoned her husband. In 1970, when she became increasingly adventurous sexually and her husband gave up all hope, he put a bullet in his head, freeing her to live as she pleased. By 1976 (about exactly when her youngest son was finally out of high school) she took up with a Jamaican lesbian writer and began writing explicitly lesbian love poetry. She lived the rest of her life as a fairly stereotypical lesbian writer, teaching at prestigious universities while denouncing the patriarchy. She died from complications of rheumatic arthritis.

What separates Ms. Rich from the contemporary feminists is that she did actually make a go of motherhood and being a wife. This is because that was simply expected of women in the US at the time. If she had been born 40 years later in 1969, however, things would have turned out far differently. For starters, she wouldn't have felt much pressure to marry and have children. She wouldn't have had any rage about it, either, because she could live an openly lesbian lifestyle without any repercussions. She never would have had a cause, and probably wouldn't have been noticed by anyone of import.

These pioneering feminists were defined by their struggles, but now that they've had their way, there really isn't much left to fight for, and they will simply grow old and die alone, or with their "sisters." Most will not have children, and there will be nothing to remember them by. No more martyrdom to marriage, motherhood, the patriarchy, etc. I think we can assume with some assurance that they will not have lengthy obituaries printed in national newspapers, and without the family they despised their time on earth will be a fleeting moment, lost forever to human memory. However, perhaps they will be satisfied and happy, and why shouldn't they be?

I think it's becoming apparent that when women like Adrienne Rich are offered an option besides marriage and children, society may be better off for it. Some women aren't cut out for marriage and motherhood, and recognizing this could save us all a lot of trouble. It could have saved Alfred Conrad's life, and spared thousands of students instruction in feminist poetry. If there's anything feminism has done to benefit men, it has been to open the door for women who simply don't want to participate in normal family life so they can walk out and live as they please.

Of course, that's little consolation for those of us men who want to live according to our ideals, whatever they may be, and that's really our problem here, isn't it?

A selection from her poetry:

> Either you will
> go through this door
> or you will not go through

> If you go through > there is always the risk > of remembering your name. …
> The door itself makes no promises.
> It is only a door.

Female Cop Asks Civilian to Help Make Arrest

W.F. Price · 1 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Following a bar assault in north Seattle, a female police officer identified two suspects through witnesses. Upon seeing the officer, both fled on foot through a neighborhood. Bravely giving chase (it was brave — most female cops wouldn't bother), the officer lost track of one suspect, but managed to stay on the tail of the other. However, she started to lose him, too. Fortunately, a man stepped out of his apartment just as the suspect was running by:

> That suspect ran up a flight of stairs next to an apartment complex in the 12300 block of 33rd Avenue Northeast. Just as the suspect was running past the building, a resident there happened to step outside of his apartment unit.
> As the officer was closing in, she yelled to the resident, "Seattle police, stop that guy!" The resident tackled the fleeing suspect and knocked him to the ground without injury. The officer immediately took him into custody.

This is a nice story about a citizen intervening to stop a criminal, but it's also highly unusual for police to plead for help while in pursuit, and it could be dangerous for the unarmed, unequipped civilian. However, the officer probably really did need it. I doubt she could have taken a young, highly excited (and apparently violent) man down all alone.

The question this brings up is whether it's really worth it to pay women to be police officers when they aren't up to the job. I'm sure that female officers have their uses, and may be more effective in some circumstances (such as discerning lies told by other females), should we really dilute standards just so they can put on a badge and carry a gun?

Spring Break Over

I just dropped my kids off after spending spring break with them, and although I know I'm going to miss them for the next couple weeks, it will be nice to get back to work again. One of the screwed-up things about being a divorced father – or any father these days – is that work and family life are so distinct. I think things are coming back around in that regard, but it's still a matter of choices and sacrifice in one way or the other. I chose my kids, and I've paid for it dearly, but I think it's worth it. Despite having to fight for every hour, and enduring a lot of abuse, I'm pretty happy to be in their lives. Some men see it differently, and I can't condemn them given what they put fathers through these days, but I just don't know whether I could live in anything but an intolerable sort of purgatory without seeing my kids regularly.

I got to take my kids on their first flight, and my son absolutely loved it. The experience inspired a book he made and gave to me yesterday. I must admit that I am very proud of him for creating his first illustrated book. One of the best things about being a parent is that it gives you the opportunity to see things through young eyes again. All the cynicism just falls away when the little ones are there and enthusiastic about the world.

So forgive me if the rest of you don't share my enthusiasm for my first-grader's artwork, but it makes it all worth it to me. I am quite proud that he put this together all by himself (we'll work on the spelling later).

First is the title page:

Closle Planes and Ragler (Colossal Planes and Regular)

Next, the "Closle 4,000,000 USA" (originally 4,000, but he thought it could use some more zeros):

I'd happily show more, but at risk of looking like one of those ridiculous parents and violating my son's copyright, I think I'd better leave it at that.

Women's Crime OK if it Encourages Women to Report Crime

W.F. Price · 2 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A prosecutor in Longview, Washington, has declined prosecution in a case where a woman named Cassandra Kennedy admitted that she lied about her father raping her when she was 11 years old, sending him to prison for nine years. Evidently, she was upset that her father and mother divorced, and made up the story to punish him.

The prosecutor, Sue Blair, said charging Ms. Kennedy might discourage other girls from reporting rape. Thomas Edward Kennedy, her father, who was serving a fifteen year sentence, was released last week. All charges were dismissed. It has not been reported whether he now owes years of child support arrears due to imprisonment.

Although it's possible that there may be some problems with prosecuting someone who was eleven when they committed a crime, she left her father in prison for long after that. As for the prosecutor, her excuse would be laughed away in all but sexual assault cases where females are involved. There is no other crime for which people receive a break for making a false accusation. For example, it would be in the public interest to encourage reporting embezzlement by public officials, so should those who make false accusations be exempt from prosecution if they falsely accuse, say, a county prosecutor of stealing from public funds? Why not? If making false rape accusations is OK because it creates a climate in which women feel comfortable accusing men of rape whenever they want, then all false accusations in matters of crime should be protected.

Or, maybe it's simply that when it comes to crimes against women, women are more equal than others. Not only are crimes committed against them more serious, but when they commit crimes themselves it is not such a serious matter. Of course, this violates the equal protection clause, but since when did feminist prosecutors care about the Bill of Rights? I'm sure Ms. Blair learned in school that anything written by "dead white males" is invalid, but that doesn't mean we have to agree with her.

Divorce and Health

There have been a number of studies published over the years purporting to show the benefits of marriage, particularly for men. However, if you've been through a divorce as a man, it definitely adds a new perspective: it might not necessarily be that marriage is good for your health, but rather that divorce is bad for it.

This is definitely something that's come to mind for me recently, as I've started to feel the effects of a rather unhealthy lifestyle since separation. Ironically, there was one thing about divorce that may have been healthy for me: I lost about 30 pounds due to the stress, and still haven't gained it all back. However, for the most part it's been negative. Stress may have contributed to weight loss, but it causes plenty of other problems. The anxiety and depression kept me inside most of the time, I neglected my social life, I went for long periods without enough (if any) exercise, sleeping patterns were disrupted, I skipped a lot of meals, had a hard time maintaining a healthy diet, used beer or wine to calm down and sleep in the evening rather than simply as an enjoyable social lubricant, etc.

I'm sure this is a familiar story for divorced men, yet there's almost no discussion about what can be done about it. In fact, the only advice we get is along the lines of "get married" or "stay married," which is essentially worthless, because for divorced men getting married is what led to the problem in the first place, and we usually had no choice as to whether we stayed in the marriage or not. It's another one of those "damned if you do" situations divorced men so often find themselves in, and that's probably why divorce is so clearly hard on men's health. It adds another element to the betrayal of the ex-wife, too, because it's becoming increasingly clear that divorce not only takes away a man's children, property and labor, but years of his life as well. It seems to be nearly as unhealthy as smoking a pack of cigarettes per day, or being in prison.

That said, divorce doesn't need to be a death sentence for men. If we could only remove some of the more male-hostile provisions of family law, have a little compassion for fathers and their needs, and refrain from treating divorced men like criminals, I'm sure we could mitigate some of the worst stressors and give men the peace of mind needed to get back on track and pay attention to their health. However, this issue has been ignored for too long, and it's going to take some work to bring it to the public's attention. Although sympathy for divorced men may never be very high (people instinctively tend to feel little compassion for adult men), one way to frame the issue could be in terms of benefit to the children. For example, what good does it do a kid if his father dies of a heart attack in his 40s? Can a man who becomes chemically dependent due to self-medication for stress be as good of a father as one who remains healthy and sober? The answers to these questions should be pretty clear. Healthy fathers are better prepared to help their kids succeed, whether they are divorced or not, so perhaps judges ought to give that fact a little consideration before they issue an order that will all but guarantee a great decline in a man's mental, and subsequently physical, health.

As for myself, I've been thinking about the issue recently. I went to see a doctor recently, and based on results decided to make a few changes. Although I'm relatively young and could get away with neglecting my health for the last few years, that won't last, and as a divorced man it's up to me to make sure I can continue to be there for my kids for some time to come. I think we all ought to encourage each other to do the same. It's time to start focusing on these basics, because nobody else is going to do it for us.

Public Breastfeeding to Become Civil Right

W.F. Price · 4 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I don't have a problem with women nursing in public, restaurants, or wherever they please, but some people might not like it, and why shouldn't they be able to prevent it in their own places of business? Sometimes, when you have small children, it's obnoxious when restaurants make it clear that you can't seat them wherever you please, but if it's really that offensive why give them your business?

A new law proposed in Seattle would make nursing a civil right, enforceable by the Civil Rights Office:

> Under the proposed ordinance, mothers can breast-feed at a time, place and in the manner they choose. They do not have to go to a restroom. They do not have to cover the baby with a blanket or towel. The owner, manager or employee of a store, restaurant or other public place cannot request that the mother move or leave.
> Nelson said that individuals who feel their rights have been violated would be able to file a charge with the Civil Rights Office, which would investigate the complaint and could assess a fine.
> Nelson said her office also is able to publicize the ordinance and the rights of nursing mothers.
> "If a woman is in a restaurant and is told she can't breast-feed, she can say, 'Yes I can. It's the law,' " Nelson said.

Given our high unemployment, it doesn't make sense to place even more restrictions on businesses, and make operation any more difficult or risky. One wrong move by an inexperienced employee and you could find your business sued into oblivion by an offended woman with a smart attorney. It is these kinds of rules and regulations that keep setting the bar higher and depressing hiring, and for a dubious public good. When I say dubious here it isn't because breastfeeding itself is "dubious," but rather that the ability to breastfeed literally anywhere probably confers only a tiny benefit, if any. For example, one can pump the milk at home and take it to the store, feeding the kid from a bottle. Or, even better, breastfeed before going to the store.

Sometimes, when you try to legislate a perfect society, what you end up with is one in which only a few people can make the cut, and the rest are simply culled from the ranks of the employable. This is how the nanny state slowly strangles the economy. The more "rights" we confer on customers, the more of a hassle it is for employers, and the more they scrutinize potential employees.

Comment of the Week — A Life Not Worth Living

W.F. Price · 5 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor: The following comment, posted by walking in hell, is an example of what can happen in a "no-fault" divorce. It isn't the most likely outcome, but a considerable number of divorces do end this way, so whether the story is real or not it is accurate depiction of many men's lives.]

A life not worth living

It has been seven years since my wife move 500 miles away with my almost three year old son one day when I was at work; and my 500 mile trips to try to reconcile our family eventually proved futile.

Our marriage lasted almost ten years. We waited seven years to have our first child. Our son was completely planned and welcomed. I was a doting and loving father and I spent every day and weekend with my son.

After the divorce, the courts allowed me to see my son two weekends per month from 10:00 AM to 6:00 PM. I was allowed one phone call per week. The courts allowed his mother to keep him 500 miles away; I had to travel 500 miles to see him. I was ordered to pay his mother $1500 per month. No consideration was taken for my travel expenses.

Most importantly, no consideration was given for my son's rights to have his father in his life the same amount of time as before. Not three weekends per month, but every day and night and weekend. I was a very affectionate, loving and responsible father and absolutely doted over my son. I was stripped of my fathership and made a visitor in his life.

Within four months my son behaved like a stranger to me. Within six months he was actively hostile towards me. After traveling 500 miles to see him, his mother would not show up with him. His mother was alienating him from me. Within seven months I lost my job. After being a victim of a terrible wife and a corrupt court system, I realized the situation was hopeless; I walked away.

Even though she destroyed 70 percent of the relationship between my son and I, I am the one being blamed for abandonment.

I thought I could begin a new life; but seven years later the pain remains. My pain over missing my son; the pain over how my son must feel; the pain over the disadvantages that my son has. Pain over a career that has been trashed. Pain over huge child support debts that can never be repaid. Pain over a life where I will never be able to have any sort of financial security or retirement. Pain over the fact that I will never know my grandchildren. Pain over excruciating loneliness.

The worst times are weekends and holidays. Weekends and holidays were mine and my son's best times together. When I see fathers with sons I feel an overwhelming sadness: a sadness of what has been lost; what is not; and what could have been.

Also I am permanently changed. No amount of therapy, psychotropic drugs, or a new woman and child can remove the hollowness inside me. I notice the effect when I am around people. I used to be happy and fulfilled; now I am empty and depressed, and people notice it and they don't want to be around me. It is impossible for me to smile and I get no pleasure from anything; not even eating. I have no present and no future.

Am I a loser? I was an example of someone who raised themselves from nothing to something though hard work. I put myself through college; earned a scholarship, and worked many crappy jobs before I finally landed a good one. Through thrift, I managed to save a tidy nest egg. I never had any problems with the law. But because my wife became unhappily married, I am made to be a criminal, even though I tried to keep the marriage together.

Now I don't have a car, I don't have a drivers license, I don't have a girl friend, and I live in a small and shitty room. I earn a fifth of what I earned before. I have a very difficult time holding a job because of depression.

I am a Christian; so I am afraid of committing suicide. Nevertheless, I often research suicide to see if there is some justification for it; some way to do it, without going to hell. I want out of my life; I would not want to wish my life on my worst enemy. It is a life that is not worth living.

I pray every day for some guidance and purpose of what I am supposed to do; I don't get any answers.

Where did I go wrong? Was it the wrong choice of a woman? My wife was very religious and a virgin when we met. She never smoked a cigarette or drank alcohol in her life. She was the most family-oriented person I had ever met. I would never have thought she would have chosen divorce. And if she chose divorce, I would have thought she would have wanted a father in her son's life. But she changed. Why did she change? I don't know, but I think because of cultural influences.

Why do I write this? For pity? No. I write this to give young men an idea of what they are facing when they father children in the USA or any other country that imitates the USA court system. When the divorce happens, and it is more likely to happen then not, you will be destroyed emotionally and financially. Your children will suffer. The more responsible, the more loving, the more family-oriented you are, the more you will be destroyed.

Marriage and family is sacred and the greatest gift a man can have. Unfortunately, in the USA, marriage and family have been perverted beyond repair.

For young men, the worst thing you could do is to have children in the USA. For parents of boys, the worst thing you could do is to pressure your sons into having children in the USA. Don't think it cannot happen to you or your sons.

Is there a solution? Yes. Emigration. Make your money in the states and emigrate out when you are financially able. Then marry and have children in a family-friendly nation and a nation with fairer divorce laws. This is a solution that won't completely remove the risk of divorce; but will reduce it.

As a man in the USA you have nothing to look forward to. Only the ignorant or the masochistic would think of fathering children there. In the USA fathers are like tightrope walkers without netting. Don't do it.
You have been warned by someone wandering in hell who lives a life not worth living.

Information and statistics:

States get matching funds from the federal government for every support order they issue; therefore there is an built-in economic incentive against family reconciliation and against shared custody and an economic incentive for sole physical custody.

Presumption of guilt is on the man. If the woman makes any type of emotional or physical abuse claim, the man will be removed from his home and children.

Nine out of ten times the children are given to the woman, no matter how good the man is.

If you fall behind in child support $2500, your passport is denied.

If you fall behind in child support $2500, you drivers license is revoked.

If you are behind and miss payments, you can go to jail for contempt of court.

If you have a history of falling behind on payments, you can be placed in prison.

Because you are in jail does not mean child support payments stop; on the contrary, child support payments continue and arrears continue to build.

In many states, interest is added to arrears at the rate of 10 percent per year.

If you lose your job and get a lesser paying job, the child support agencies will do their best to try to keep the payments the same.

Employers frown on wage garnishment; it is more work for them and they are less likely to hire a divorced man and more likely to exploit one because they know he is desperate.

As your children are stripped away from you and the relationship severed, you will be accused of abandoning your children.

If you have arrears, a child support lien will be placed on your credit report which comes up on background checks rendering you much less employable.

Any type of depression or despondency is used against the man to further remove him from his children, causing yet more depression and despondency.

Non-custodial parents (men) are around three times as likely to commit suicide then the rest of the population.

Men are not entitled to a lawyer in a failure to pay child support court hearing.

50,000 men are in jail or prison every day for child support arrears.

Ever wonder why there are so many homeless men? Do your own street interviews. Ask random homeless men if they ever went through a divorce or the child support system.

A man with children in the USA is like a tightrope walker without netting: the risk-reward profile is life or death.

Who Should We Focus On?

W.F. Price · 5 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Where engaging feminists (the real ones) is concerned, I think we have to recognize that we aren't going to make much progress, and that doesn't really matter. If the really passionate ones on certain sites are any indication, for the most part they are a collection of sexual deviants, the mentally ill and pornographers. The last one may come as a surprise to some, but it's actually quite typical; prostitutes tend to gravitate toward feminism.

However, there are people worth engaging: those who may not be entirely on the same page as us but who also don't like the status quo much themselves. As commenter greyghost points out, Dalrock is doing a great job of engaging Christian social conservatives on the issue, and although he's finding a lot of resistance, it's undeniable that scripture is definitely not on the side of the feminists.

Not long ago, social conservatives were pretty much hopeless. They are very slow learners (conservatism and stubbornness go hand in hand), so for the last twenty years or so they've been going back to the default chivalry position, and it's failed over and over. But this doesn't mean that they will never change. Because conservatives are becoming a larger and larger share of native born Americans with every year liberal women delay family and abort their children, ignoring them would be unwise, and if out-of-control feminism is to ever be done away with, they will be the demographic we'll have to count on to do the job. Fortunately, the sons of these more conservative Americans, although they may be as innocent and naive as any men while still young, are seeing an entirely new side of women. As I've pointed out, things have changed a lot on the last 20 years, and the pretensions of sweet feminine innocence are believed only by the most socially insulated old dinosaurs out there. As for the sons of the liberals, I think we're going to find that a whole lot of them are already squarely in our camp. Growing up male in a feminist environment can do one of two things: either it can break a man's soul and turn him into a lifelong self-hating mangina, or it will forever instill a strong disgust for feminism and all its associated horrors. I'm afraid those who suffered the former fate are lost to us, but for the latter, I suspect they are the most vocal younger pro-male voices out there.

This is why focusing effort on the conservatives is a good idea. Those of us who grew up in a more liberal environment have already made up our minds by maturity (I include myself in that group), and our attitude toward feminism isn't going to change. Conservatives, while vaguely hostile to feminism, still have an incomplete understanding of it, and need to be guided to a clearer understanding of concepts such as female hypergamy. You'd think their own holy books, which offer plenty of examples of hypergamy, false rape accusations, female misbehavior, etc., would do the trick, but unfortunately they tend to overlook those parts. Perhaps a few gentle reminders might help. Or, if necessary, a heavy dose of shaming right back at them.

So, I'm going to endorse Dalrock's approach, as I think it's one that has some of the best potential. Dalrock takes the very issues social conservatives are preaching to the rest of us about and holds a mirror up to their faces to show them the beam in their eye. I can't think of anything more effective, or ultimately more compassionate, as their own sons and daughters will inherit the world in due course, and if they want them to live the lives they see as virtuous and Godly, a dose of reality about female nature is sorely needed.

I think it's unprecedented for a president to stake his position so heavily on the female vote, but demographics have changed over the last decade, and perhaps Obama's strategists think a coalition of minorities and women is the solution for permanent victory. They may be correct, but it's new ground, so we'll see how it plays out. Unfortunately, Romney will likely do what he can to pander to women as well, in the false assumption that he has the white male vote locked up.

This is why we see the president once again inserting himself into an issue that really shouldn't be any of his business, namely the Augusta golf club's status as a men's golf club. Romney agreed, of course. Obama spokesman Jay Carney said "we're kind of long past the time when women should be excluded from anything." This comes on the heels of a forum on Women and the Economy (not men, mind you), a few years after Obama's creation of the White House Council on Women and Girls, and amidst rock solid Democratic support of the Violence Against Women Act.

So, as the federal government creates and supports a number of programs designed to benefit women exclusively, the candidates denounce a private men's sports club, paid for by men – not taxpayers – and engaged in nothing more than walking around and knocking balls into holes. What an outrage that this club can continue to exist! How dare women not be allowed in so as to drink mimosas and attract attention from wealthy golfers. It's one thing for women to have publicly funded organizations dedicated entirely to their benefit and power, but entirely another for men to have any clubs of their own whatsoever.

the shameless political pandering to women has gone so far that it really looks as though politicians have bought the entire "End of Men" spiel, and are willing to throw men under the bus, as though they are no longer necessary. These kinds of things don't tend to end well, because although women's political support certainly looks attractive from a democratically-elected politician's perspective, when you disenfranchise men bad things tend to happen.

Team sports are a coming of age for many boys. They're even more meaningful to fathers. The first time our son wipes away a bloody nose without a tear, or shrugs off a hard hit and smiles because he helped his team get just a little closer to winning … it's enough to tug at the toughest father's heart strings. Our boy just "took one for the team". Even if we didn't see it other fathers will tip their caps in a quiet nod of respect and we'll know. Despite whatever failings, on that day we're certain we've done something right in this world. We've succeeded in raising a son to the point where he's on his way to becoming a man.

With providence our boys get bigger, and the challenges they're capable of facing get tougher. Whether they take on gruelling or dangerous jobs to feed their families, or go to war and put their lives on the line defending their countries, we're thankful for the part we were able to play in preparing them. "Taking one for the greater good" is an irrevocable part of what we as a society have always trained men to do. Males are born hard wired to be receptive to that socialization. When faced with unexpected circumstances we as men have time and time again shown our readiness to lay down our lives for our women, our children, and for the countries we've pledged our allegiance to. Being a man has always meant being ready to be brave at all times so there's no surprise it takes an entire boyhood to prepare us for it. It's not a small thing to be ready to take responsibility, ready to give one's all, with no notice.

Giving our all as men is so important there's a government initiative about it at the website Fatherhood.gov:

> Fatherlessness is a growing crisis in America, one that undergirds many of the challenges that families are facing. When dads aren't around, young people are more likely to drop out of school, use drugs, be involved in the criminal justice system, and become young parents themselves.
> President Obama grew up without his dad, and has said that being a father is the most important job he has. That's why the President is joining dads from across the nation in a fatherhood pledge – a pledge that we'll do everything we can to be there for our children and for young people whose fathers are not around. When you take the President's Fatherhood Pledge, you'll receive updates, tips and resources from fatherhood organizations, prominent dads and other supporters of responsible fatherhood around the nation.

The message is clear. We must "take one on the chin" if we need to, and fight through whatever adversity standing between us and providing for our families. We must make a pledge to hold our families together so we can be there to protect our loved ones.

With the equal legal rights women enjoy in today's society, it's inevitable that some will call on women to defend their families in the same way. The other day I read an article in which a woman named Stacey at a domestic abuse crisis center counselled women: "The first time he hits you, make it the last".

It seemed reasonable, after all who wants to be slapped? Then I considered that a woman's pain from taking a slap would be gone in a day. I wondered if leaving would really always be the best way for a woman to "defend her family". The next day after the slap he or she might apologize, they'd have great sex, and a week later both would forgot it ever happened. On the other hand the pain she would inflict on her children by leaving her husband, as described so eloquently above by Mr. Obama, this would last the children's entire lifetime. By leaving she would throw innocents into financial chaos and emotional devastation.

I began to question whether the abuse centers were really giving out good advice and I started to look for answers to the question: "should women also consider the "greater good"?

I discovered that the idea of women having the same "spouse and the children before me" responsibility towards their families as men do was so completely revolutionary it didn't exist yet on the web. Though it seemed a great "right" for feminists to make equal claim to I couldn't find anything about a woman's responsiblity to her family on any feminist site anywhere. Given the entire government funded website dedicated to the importance of intact families this seemed a little confusing. It was also more than a little alarming. A generation of men were being raised to lay down their lives for their families, yet a generation of women were being counselled to give up on their families at a slap. Were women being denied the right to sacrifice for their families the way men always have?

President Obama's message that fatherlessness is so incredibly harmful for children, and common wisdom about how devastating financially a divorce can be, both suggest that the decision to break up a family shouldn't be taken lightly. That many women leave one abusive relationships to go straight into another exposes the "victim" paradigm to be ineffective and inaccurate. Abuse is a mutual problem for couples to tackle together. Yet websites advising women to seek mutual counselling to heal their marriage rather than to just walk away are non-existent.

Many other women's domestic violence websites I found seemed to have a similar "Divorce him without a second thought" message. A number even counselled that a man should be considered to have abused the woman if he so much as raised his voice to her. All agreed that there could be no mitigating factor in abuse. Didn't matter whether he came home to see her in bed with his worst enemy, or whether she was scalding his children with hot water. A man could never be excused, and a woman never needed to be.

Now any teacher in charge of a playground knows failing to come down on both parties in a dispute even handedly makes the party that always gets off feel encouraged to foment conflict again. Simple common sense. The consensus of statistics surrounding domestic violence show that women initiate the violence 50-60% of the time. If families are really important, isn't it in the interest of children that BOTH sides be shown some forgiveness in order that BOTH sides shoulder some responsibility?

I got my answer to that very quickly. Despite the great public funding for domestic violence programs there was no "President's Mother's Pledge" to encourage women to show the bravery, love for family, and fortitude to succeed in preserving a two parent home as the best environment possible for children as has been demanded of men. Perhaps, in these days of equal rights, it's high time.

As Industrialization Devalued Male Labor, Automation will Devalue Female Labor

When we talk about how the value of a strong back is greatly diminished from days past, and female work is now as valuable if not more valuable than male on the middle to lower end of the labor market, we tend to overlook the fact that female work had already been greatly devalued in fairly recent history. For example, women used to be the only ones to deliver babies, sew and weave clothes, run household industry and make bread and ale. They also grew vegetables and gathered fruits and berries, milked cows and goats, etc. Female economic activity was probably considerably more important in the 15th century than it was in the 19th and 20th. Not only did the professionalization of medicine put a lot of midwives and herbalists out of work, but industrialization made wives' sewing redundant, and mass production freed them from the tasks of baking and brewing, among other things.

It was industry that created the bored housewife; women had nothing important left to do, so we ended up with the Betty Friedans and Adrienne Riches of the world who could exploit the feeling of emptiness and lack of purpose that took hold of mid-20th century American women. However, now that heavy industry is stagnant and/or much more efficient, many men are left out, and the burgeoning service industry has tipped the balance toward women once again. This is why we have these triumphant "End of Men" proclamations from vicious feminists, and it's also why women have lower unemployment than men. But because female labor has become more expensive and a larger threat to profit, companies will adjust, as always, and innovation will tip the scales again.

This is starting on the low end, with automation of light industry and food service, and it has picked up speed in only the last few years. Fast food restaurants, a major low-wage employer of women, are beginning to install robotic cashiers and have automated cooking to the point that very little labor is necessary to produce an order. Some restaurants are even eliminating wait staff in favor of robotic service, and customers don't seem to mind. Even in my local Safeway I purchase my groceries from a robot (with a very sexy voice).

Within a decade or so, operating a fast food franchise may be more like playing a video game than managing real humans. Perhaps only two people would be necessary to run a typical McDonald's or Taco Bell. After fast food and retail are increasingly automated, next will be office work. This has already begun with automated phone service and online ordering, but it will extend even to secretarial work. Many contemporary secretaries are no longer in-house employees, but rather "virtual assistants" who use technology to remotely handle a number of businesses at once.

More and more female jobs will come under scrutiny as employers look to replace their female workers with software and robots. In fact, I'm fairly sure that it isn't virtual sex that will really change the balance of power between men and women, but rather virtual labor. As these systems will require technical knowledge in programming, engineering and operating machines, the labor advantage should swing back to men, who tend to be far more interested in these fields.

Although the modern world seems very advanced when looking backward, if we look forward it's pretty obvious there's a lot of room for development and technological progress, and given the low-tech, repetitive nature of most female jobs, they seem like prime candidates for replacement by robots. In fact, I can't wait for the first robo-restaurant to open here in Seattle. As the standard tip has grown from 10% to 25% over the years, it will be a relief for the customer as well as the owner to eliminate human wait staff. If I want human company and contact, I'll just bring my kids or my friends!

In a piece of wonderful news for parents who send their daughters to Northwestern University, David Futrelle is getting involved in a feminist sex week in which feminists teach college girls about good and ungood sex. Even better, after giving a sex talk, he will be providing free condoms and lube to the girls.

It looks as though Futrelle is stepping into the shoes left vacant by Kyle Payne, a male feminist activist who used to be heavily involved in campus sexual assault advocacy. Kyle described himself as a "sex-positive" feminist while majoring in women's studies. Here's a self-description from a few years ago:

> Kyle is a social justice educator, writer, and activist. Much of his work is concerned with putting a stop to violence against women. For years Kyle has served as an advocate for survivors of sexual violence and other forms of abuse, in addition to promoting what he calls "a more just and life-affirming culture of sexuality" through activism and education. As a researcher, Kyle has studied the feminist anti-pornography movement and is particularly interested in men's roles in confronting pornography and the rape culture. In addition to his pro-feminist work, he is involved with anti-racist, free speech, peace, and anti-globalization movements.

It so happened that while in the midst of his feminist activism in 2008, Payne was caught groping and videotaping an unconscious coed at Buena Vista University. At the time, he was a resident adviser, tasked with looking after younger students. He was charged with sexual assault and taking nude photographs against the woman's will, and eventually copped a plea that put him in jail for six months. Not long after his release, he was arrested and charged once again, this time for child porn.

Payne still maintains that he is a strident feminist (perhaps he has nothing left to hang onto), and although he has written apologies he is now shunned by female feminists. Payne's fall from feminist grace was even worse than Hugo Schwyzer's. After admitting to attempting a murder suicide with a girlfriend and sleeping with his students, Schwyzer lost a good deal of credibility, yet like Kyle Payne, still soldiers on.

Futrelle does not strike one as the kind of guy who would screw up quite so spectacularly. He's innately cautious and passive-aggressive rather than impulsive and prone to acting out. Additionally, it appears that much of his pro-feminism is a result of a rather clear hatred for men; one of his favorite tags on his site is "men who should not ever be with women ever," which gives away one motive where these issues are concerned. However, there's definitely a sexual element there as well. Unless a man is entirely homosexual, there's always an element of sexuality in his interest in fertile women — it's unavoidable.

So when you hear about Futrelle teaching college girls about what constitutes good sex, you've got to wonder what's going through his hindbrain while young, nubile coeds listen attentively as he positions himself as an authority on good and bad sex. For men, advocating for fertile women is about the easiest form of altruism out there. In fact, it isn't even altruism at all; it's sexual self-interest. There is nothing particularly special about a man who favors women over men, and there's nothing inherently good about it. It's just human nature. What's really pathetic is that these guys claim that acting in their sexual self-interest places them on a higher moral plane. Most people don't buy it, of course, but some coeds might. So if you're a parent of a young woman attending Northwestern University, you might want to ask the school why this guy is talking about sex there with your daughter next to a basket of condoms and lube.

Spring Fund Drive

After over two years of operation, The Spearhead has finally come of age, and its thousands of posts on various topics have inundated the internet, helping to bring topics that were swept under the rug for years to the fore. For better or worse, men's issues have entered the cultural debate in the West, influencing everything from politics to pop culture. What this means for the future is anyone's guess right now, but I think that's why it's important that we continue to speak and stand up for ourselves.

Traffic on The Spearhead has steadily climbed since a dip last summer while I was in the midst of a custody/relocation case, and is up to 70,000 uniques and 300,000 page views per month as of March. RSS subscribers cracked the 2,000 level for the first time in winter, and have been climbing steadily since then. It's safe to say that the site has a healthy, dedicated readership at this point — probably around 4,000 regulars (i.e. at least weekly readers). It could be more, but I prefer to be conservative where these matters are concerned.

However, running the site and writing content is a job, and given the pressures of life it's one I can't afford to do for free. Although it's a bit embarrassing to admit, since my divorce I've been living a hand-to-mouth existence, and it's really kind of surprising to me that I was actually able to survive while getting The Spearhead off the ground. I suppose where one has some passion and drive, one finds a way. Every donation and every dollar of support provides me with time to write and keep the site running; without the help it would be a shadow of what it is. Given the special interest nature of the site, it is never going to be a big draw for advertisers even with a substantial readership. So I have to rely on support from those who appreciate the content to keep it running and keep me in front of the screen for a substantial portion of every week.

One thing I'd like to bring up is that given the attacks from certain quarters that The Spearhead has been subjected to, the site must be having some visceral effect. I like to think it's made its presence felt all the way at the top. In fact, I'm fairly sure it has, as I have been contacted a couple times in recent months by some writers for major publications (I had some nice conversation, but said honestly that I don't have the time to get involved in features that won't remunerate me and may not provide anything of value to my readers). The site is a work in progress, as is the growing and evolving national debate on "gender issues." I'm glad to have the opportunity to make a difference in that regard.

So, thank you for your help, and as long as I have supportive readers and can afford to keep plugging away I will keep the site running and continue to keep men's interests and issues on the table. Thanks also to the contributors and commenters who spice up the site with their own content, and to other men out there who are working toward the same goals in their own.

What's Wrong with Wanting to be Loved?

One of the most common epithets hurled at men by feminists, and probably the most genuinely hurtful, is that men are upset at women because they are bitter about being unloved. The reason this one hurts more than the typical "small penis" or "mother's basement" insult is because it is so often accurate to some extent. The best insults always hit a weak spot. It's true that many men are very bitter about loss of love, betrayal or lack of attention from women. This is why some pick up artists have such commercial success with their ventures, and why men flock to gurus who say they hold the secrets to a woman's heart.

Actually, if these cruel women only knew, it goes a lot farther than mere heartbreak. The abandonment of men in contemporary society is so comprehensive that a man who has lost a wife or lover not only suffers from the loss of that deep personal connection, but from a fairly comprehensive rejection by society in general. First you lose your wife, then your kids, and then even your own family turns against you in many cases (this is a lot more common than most people realize — American men's own mothers very often blame them and side with the ex in what is usually a futile effort to maintain contact with the grandchildren). The thrashing you get from the police and courts is just gratuitous abuse; in many cases guys are simply numb to additional pain by that time.

So, yes, these are bitter, unloved men. They are hated and they know it, although many have no clear idea why. They think to themselves "I'm not a criminal… I never hurt anyone… How could this happen to me?" Some can't handle it. There are many suicides that simply don't make the news. In a small minority of cases, they snap, and then there's the "domestic disturbance" situation that has become so routine these days in which a police gunman puts the man out of his misery, as though he were a rabid dog. However, in most cases the men simply accept their doleful fate and live their miserable lives.

I was one of those miserable, unloved men for some time. But not entirely. Circumstance gave me a considerable amount of time with my kids when my ex decided to make her move. She left just as she obtained a good job thanks to my promise to work part-time and take care of the children while she trained for it, and she didn't want to pay for daycare, so she proposed and received a parenting plan that had me caring for them much of the time she was working. Although being abandoned without any warning was devastating, my children never abandoned me, and despite the horror of separation I had them almost half time. All it took to snap me out of the most morbid thoughts was the sound of my kids' voice, or the thought of them growing up and wondering why daddy did such a selfish thing as to leave them.

But if it weren't for that time with my kids, I would have been totally, utterly alone. When I didn't have them I had no desire for human contact. I really felt that the only people in the entire world who cared about me at all were my little children, aged one and three at the time. I suppose I digress a little here, but I can't help feel that they were little angels, even if I did have to change their diapers and wipe food off their faces after every meal.

For men who don't even have that, it's almost unimaginable. It's such a shockingly horrible experience that I wouldn't wish it on anyone, yet here we have feminists taunting men for feeling unloved. And still we have people whining about "misogyny." Young feminists whose most important concern is the ability to have sex entirely free of consequences, and who shamelessly raise their voices for the right to kill their children in the womb. Lesbian gender feminists who wreck families for profit and sex. Male feminists who boast about fathering children and shuffling their responsibilities onto some duped cuckold, and who malign their fellow men for a crack at college girls.

All that said, men have every right to be angry, and righteously so. But deep down, I think what most of them want is far simpler and more benign than revenge or some political payback. They want some love, some security and the opportunity to be a part of a family. They want to grow old with a woman who is true to them, and to see their children grow tall and strong. It doesn't always come out that way, and there are those who have rejected the idea entirely, but it's an ideal that I think most men would agree is worth some effort, if not for themselves then for a better society in general.

So, I'd like to say to the feminists out there that yes, there are men who are bitter and sad about being unloved. Yes, it is often why they malign women, and it isn't always a pretty thing. But if you really take pleasure in people's loneliness and despair, you've got a cold, dead heart, and no reason to be proud of yourself. Instead of waxing triumphant about unfortunate men's loneliness and misery, why not work for a world in which everyone can feel loved? Are you woman enough to do that?

Is it Mentoring, or Enabling?

By Thrown Away Dad

As a twenty-something punk in the year 1991, I felt compelled to do something worthwhile and good in some sort of volunteer capacity and eventually ended up volunteering as a Big Brother in the nationwide well known organization Big Brothers/Big Sisters. Not long after going through the interview and background check, I was matched with my “little” and for this article I will call him Duncan. At the beginning of our match, Duncan was eight and usually once every two weeks, I would drive to Duncan’s home, pick him up, and we would hang out together. Oftentimes we would play basketball. Other things we would do together included eating out, cooking and eating in, riding my street bike, bowling, fishing and occasionally participating in group activites that the Big Brothers/Big Sisters organization would put on for all of the matched bigs and littles here in the area.

Duncan and I had a good relationship. I never felt like we became real close like a father and son, and I never really tried to. Duncan’s father lived in a far off state and he would occassionally spend time with his father although not every other weekend as it was simply too far away.

In 1994 Duncan moved away to go live with his Father. Simultaneously, my life took a turn and I found myself facing a rather awesome responsibility and I felt that with Duncan moving far away along with my new duties, it was best that I withdraw from the program, which I did on good terms with those who ran it.

In 2010 my awesome responsibility was completed and I found myself again with some time on my hands just as I had 19 years earlier. Eventually I thought to myself why not get invoved again with Big Brothers/Big Sisters. However things were a little different now, or at least I was a little different. On one hand, I was infinetely more qualified to volunteer as a big because I now had experience with children of my own and I also had a lot of experience coaching childrens sports teams. Of course I was also more mature, more measured in my reactions and responses and felt I would make a very good mentor for a child in need. However, by this point in my life I was very familiar with the divorce mill and the pigs in their black robes that run it. I also now viewed every Heroic Single Mother I met with suspicion. Thus, I made up my mind that I would again apply to be a volunteer big, however this time I would be conducting a little experiment as part of the application process.

The application process was pretty much the same as years earlier. Eventually it leads to the sit down interview with an employee of the organization. In my case, I was interviewed by not one, but two ladies as one of them was in training. The interview was similiar as it had been in 1991. They asked about my religion, education, employment. Also they inquired about what I liked to do with my leisure time and what kind of things I envisioned doing with my little. Towards the end of the interview, I took the first step in my experiment and informed the two ladies interviewing me that I did not wish to volunteer as a big brother for a little who has a Father here in the metro area who is being forcefully kept away from his son. I explained that I felt like it was not my place to take a boy to the park, or to the basketball court if the child had a father here in town who was willing to do the same thing, but was not allowed to because some Judge claims it is not in the childs best interest. The two ladies definately made a note of my “condition of volunteering”. I also noticed they each gave a slight rise of the eyebrows and a small nod as if to say, “we really cannot argue with what you are saying.” The interview ended and they informed me that they would be doing a background check and contacting my references.

Not long afterwards I was asked to return and attend an orientation seminar. The purpose of the seminar was to inform us of the dos and don’ts of the program, what we should expect, how our introduction to our new little would take place, etc. During the seminar I distinctly remember being told that those of us at the seminar had passed all the necessary background checks and reference checks and at this point in our application process, all that was left was finding a match. When the seminar was over, we were all told that we would be contacted when a match was found to schedule an initial introduction.

I do not remember exactly how many weeks passed without hearing from the organization, but I finally sent a polite e-mail letting them know that I had not heard anything. They did respond and explained that they were short staffed and busy. More weeks, and eventually months passed by with still no word from the organization and although I do not claim to be a fortune teller, I knew exactly what was going on and why I was not hearing from them. Finally, months after the orientation seminar I received a letter from them via snail mail that gave me a short and vague rejection that I was not exactly what they were looking for. Naturally, this kind of a letter would normally have been sent before a potential big was invited to partake in the final orientation seminar, but this case was different.

By now, most readers probably have an idea of what took place during the time that transpired from the orientation, until the rejection letter months later. The staff at BB/BS searched for a little to match me up with. Of course, part of the matching process involves the staff informing the Heroic Single Mother of the little about the potential Big, his biography and his likes and dislikes. When the staff would inform the Heroic Single Mother of my feeling that I did not want to serve as a big for a little who has a loving father here in the area, the Mother wanted absolutely no part of it. These women did not want a man who knows full well what happened to the boy's father mentoring their son. These Single Mothers wanted a white knight. Eventually, after the staff received the same reaction from we do not know how many Single Mothers, they gave up. Every successful match the staff makes means more funding for the local organization so I'm sure they must have put some effort into finding at least one Heroic Single Mother who had absolutely no problem with the way I felt. However, their search for just one righteous single mother was even less fruitful than Abraham's search for a few righteous people in Sodom as written in the Old Testament.

The conclusion of my experiment was truly sobering. Even myself, knowing what I know, did not think things were that bad. Truthfully, I would have bet money that there was at least one boy on the waiting list for a Big Brother whose father abandoned the family and ran off with a trophy wife to a far away state, or was truly absent from his son's life by choice instead of by force. I have to wonder if this whole experience made the BB/BS staff stop and think just a little about what their organization is really doing. Of course, matching up adult mentors with children in need is noble work, but before they try to find a mentor, it goes without saying that they should first be contacting the father. In fact, if it were not for our divorce culture and grossly corrupt "family" courts, BB/BS could not even exist. Everytime the staff at BB/BS puts together this kind of match, they are only reinforcing to the Single Mothers that their selfish disposal of the father was OK. Currently, BB/BS has advertisements on a significant number of billboards in my Metro Area. Lord only knows how much all of that advertising costs and where the money is coming from, but every time an individual unfamiliar with the divorce courts views a BB/BS billboard, it reinforces the myth that fathers are abandoning their children and that mentors are needed to fill the gap.

Following the Rush Limbaugh/Sandra Fluke controversy, the remarks about Augusta, the debate over free birth control and other appeals to American women from Democrats, prominent feminist and corporate shark Hilary Rosen waded into the debate by saying that Mitt Romney's wife had no right to talk about the economy because she'd "never worked a day in her life." Lots of people took offense because, obviously, a mother of five has a lot of work to do, whether or not it results in a corporate paycheck.

What's interesting is that the debate is between two baby boomer females, both of whom chose different paths in life, and underscores the profound schism that has emerged between one America and the other. Ann Romney, mother of five, has chosen one path, and Hilary Rosen, although she did manage to conceive two children with donor sperm (she's a lesbian), another.

What we are seeing here is the climax of second wave feminism, which really got going in the 1960s, as its adherents reach the peak of their political and economic power. However, despite the heights attained by people like Hilary Rosen, not all American women jumped on the bandwagon, and now the two versions of American womanhood are squaring off over the presidency. You could say it's essentially feminists vs. wives, and it's pretty clear which ones will line up with which candidate.

In the long run, the wives will win, because they have a lot more children in general, but for now the feminists probably have a majority due to the large numbers of single mothers and divorced women, which is why Obama will likely take the women's vote. But he isn't going to take all of it.

I'm not sure how much longer feminism will be such a powerful force in national politics, but I suspect this election, and perhaps the next one, will be the peak. After that, there will be a decline that, while not entirely noticeable at first, should really become apparent by some time in the next decade. Younger feminists simply don't have the passion or cohesion to repeat the successes of the Hilary Rosens and Hillary Clintons of the world. As far as I can tell, to them feminism means little more than getting a free lunch. At least, they don't articulate much else, and if they can get a free lunch by getting married and having children a lot of them will do so and quickly forget all about the gender studies classes they took in college. Furthermore, as I've stressed recently, a lot more young white Americans will be the children of the Mitt and Ann Romneys of the US (not to mention Rick Santorums) than they will of the Hilary Rosens. Feminism is simply going to be alien and weird to an increasing proportion of the population. As for minorities, they never really bought into it anyway; feminism has been pretty much a white woman's game from the beginning.

So, men, I think we should sit back, grab a bag of popcorn, and watch how it all goes down. We are witnessing the culmination of a very strange era in Western history, and it's going to be history fairly soon. There's no telling exactly what will come next, but I'm fairly certain that the feminism that has come to define this election cycle will begin to ebb away as something new emerges.

Some day when I'm old and gray, I expect to see people snicker and joke about the feminism that was such a powerful force in the late 20th and early 21st centuries. Our current era will be seen by young adults and children as just as alien as the prewar era is to us today. And no, there will never be a matriarchal regime; that's against human nature and unprecedented in human history. People simply haven't changed that much, and due to birth control, abortion and other factors that limit feminist fertility the demographic momentum is pushing in the other direction now, and has been for over a generation.

In the meanwhile, we men should take care of ourselves, our families and our brethren. Just hang in there, weather this storm, and try to keep your mental and physical health. When we get through to the other side, we'll be able to breathe a lot easier than we have in a long, long time.

Comment of the Week: Down with Gender Studies!

[Editor: Anonxcf just submitted the below comment, but the week is drawing to a close and it just happens to touch on something that has been on my mind recently. The programs known as "gender studies" in American universities are beyond redundant at this point; they are just plain hateful and destructive. With far more girls than boys going on to college, what's the point of classes that teach unveiled hatred and contempt for men, and promote conflict between the sexes? In addition to their destructive, wasteful program, people involved in gender studies programs are at the forefront of squelching free speech and crushing dissent in schools. They are run by totalitarian powermongers, usually people with a great deal of hatred for men in general. As they claim to fight "misogyny," they do nothing but stir up resentment and disharmony.

Gender studies programs are like a festering sore in our institutions, and the most disgusting thing about them is that it is often unwitting taxpayers who foot the bill. Anonxcf gets it exactly right: these people should not be given tenure or a pulpit from which to spew their hatred and sow discord between our young men and women. They should be tossed out of their sinecures and given the opportunity to make a living in the private sector, like most of the rest of us.]

Anonxcf:

I don't think it's an accident that the groups that have low replacement rates swarm so hardcore to the schools. From trying to strengthen federal control of all state education departments, to actually serving as teachers and administrators, to being ALL UP IN professorships at college, the feminist plan for producing new feminists is and always has been converting the sons and daughters of non-feminist families.

Techniques such as:

-> Shaming the boys. Imply to a boy that his desire for sex is insulting and puts him in a monstrous position (the culmination of this is the "all piv is rape" bullshit, but even without that there's the implication that the boy is in a lesser position and brings less value). Then state that MANY men do this. The logical (and planned) exit here, if you accept these principles, is the acceptance of the feminist story: that men are privileged, that he has to work to be a Good Man (or a Good Boy) in order to not be subject to the shaming.

-> Promising fantastic prizes to the girls. Primarily, this takes the form of an emotional low and high- people are definitely subject to being told that things are not their fault, that their position would be so much better if not for some villains. Secondarily, there is the actual physical redistribution of wealth. Most people, men and women, have never even questioned the idea that an older couple where a divorce happens, should involve alimony or some equivalent. So the monetary and emotional prizes of behaving in a self serving, female supremacist manner, are sold to young girls, with a narrative of "the men deserve it".

-> Dehumanize the men. If everyone woke up tomorrow with no memory of anything except how to produce food, imagine how many generational conflicts would simply never exist. Why look at such a ludicrous, fantastic situation? Because to forment hatred, distrust, or malice towards a group of people, we must feel that they deserve it, feel that they aren't people in the same way we are. If I tell you a full history of the mideast, you might find yourself favoring one faction or people over the other. If you were BORN into that faction, you would absolutely be sold on that fight. Men are dehumanized through stories of oppression, stories of women as property, stories of women denied education. The times when brothers and sisters in the same family ended with the women educated and men simply thrown into a meat grinder of war (much of Europe) are forgotten, or reframed to imply that the manly men were in charge, by looking only at those who had survived terrible odds to even survive- essentially, a lottery winner, the apex fallacy applied to war survivors. Men are dehumanized through painting the successful males as harmful predators, as if all business were illicit, and the painting of unsuccessful males (which by the female sex drive is well over half of males, no matter how ludicrously safe or wealthy your nation) as being unworthy of your notice.

Feminists don't need to breed to make more feminists. All they need to do is what they HAVE done, unopposed ideologically. Painting an entire sex with a foul brush needs to be recognized as hateful, not given fucking tenure and an interview in mass media. It needs to be seen as what it is, a call to violence, a call to inequality, a call to the application of force, instead of just being seen as "poor women fighting for equality".

David Brooks: Republicans Can't Win Without Waitress (Read: Single) Moms

W.F. Price · 14 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

While listening to NPR yesterday, I heard a political discussion about the presidential race, and the two pundits, E.J. Dionne and David Brooks, were offering their opinions on Mitt Romney's speech at the NRA convention. While discussing the demographics of the race, Brooks opined that Romney needs to overwhelm Obama with white voters in order to win, and said that the group he really needs to focus on is high school educated women, the so-called waitress moms. This is the demographic that is having children out of wedlock at very high rates, and also most likely to be divorced. What Brooks is saying is that Republicans need to cater to these women. And he strongly suggests that what Romney needs to do is offer them government support. i.e. "Big Daddy" government programs.

If you listen to Brooks on NPR's audio clip, you'll hear him almost sneer as he mentions Romney's "freedom and liberty" theme (at about 5:00). He says:

> Well, if you're trying to appeal to high school-educated women, that's not the message that works. That's you're on your own, sister. And that will not work. And so, I'm a little mystified by the very libertarian theme he's got.

He's probably right. If Romney wants working class white women to vote for him, he's got to play the same game white Republicans in the south do. This means he's got to bash single fathers and promise free goodies to the single moms, i.e. he's got to promise them a government husband/daddy. I suppose it's a catch-22 for the Republicans. You bash the men and promise goodies to the single moms, and the men will turn their backs on you or refuse to vote (this is why I think McCain lost — lots of men simply didn't vote). You support individual responsibility and the single moms will reject you. This just shows how deep and pervasive the divide between the sexes has become in this country. What a mess.

More Women Mean More risk

Featured Guest · 15 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By WdF, a reader from Germany

The "Bundesbank" has published a paper that finds, that more women in the board of a bank correlates with a higher risk. The "Bundesbank" is the German counterpart to the federal reserve system in the US and has used it's information number on 3,525 banks from 1994 to 2006, which means the accumulated information from 19,750 bank-years.

The paper opposes the feminist claim, that women would be more risk averse than men. I can't say it proves feminists wrong, because it is only one paper, and the reasoning might be faulty. [1] However, it is from an renowned institution, and arguments against feminism coming from what is essentially a government institution are all the more remarkable.

In general, state agencies are not as inundated with feminism as politics. The "Statistisches Bundesamt" for example writes in it's statistics, that the difference in average pay between men and women does not mean, that women get less pay for the same work. They know, they also say so, but politicians continue with their ramblings on the "discrimination of women".

Anyhow, most probably we will see similar papers come out in the future.

Honestly, I haven't read the 80 page paper myself yet; I summarized the information from an article on "Sciencefiles" in German, and added some information that might be interesting to readers abroad. Maybe I should have read it, but if I try to read it and write a summery and a comment, I'll never get finished. Or at least not in a reasonable time frame. Fortunately for readers of the Spearhead the paper is in English, (except for a small passage near the beginning,) so readers can read it, and post comments to this article, or write one of their own.

[1] I'm certain that women are not per se more qualified to lead enterprises than men. If they were, there would be more successful companies founded by women. However, I've learned not to trust one statistic, even if I agree with its findings, and while I have the ability to find gross mistakes, I have missed important points before, and if I don't find a mistake, that does not mean there is none.

Solid New Site for Christian Men

At long last, some Christians are finally starting to take scripture seriously and put the errant churches and preachers in their place. I've mentioned Dalrock before, and how I think his emphasis on Christians is probably one of the most effective vehicles for addressing men's issues, but now there's another excellent site called "Christian Men's Defense Network." The writer running the blog is bright, articulate, and has a good deal of personal experience with the problems we face. It was only a matter of time before the Christian men who have been victimized by the new family law regime began to raise their voice, and it appears that the time is at hand.

I certainly don't expect everyone involved in men's issues to be Christian, or even religious at all. About half of my friends (at least) are straight-up atheists, as I live in a very secular part of the country. I consider myself religious, but I like to keep my distance from organized religion, because as a man I have a deep distrust for much of what passes for Christianity in the US today. I suspect, but cannot say for certain, that non-Christian faiths here are similarly poisoned or are headed in that direction.

However, institutions are important, and the shift of Christianity from a benign patriarchal to a feminist type institution has been catastrophic for millions of American men. Some of what comes out of the mouths of so-called "Christian" leaders on the subject of women and marriage is breathtaking heresy from an orthodox point of view, and although that can be very frustrating, it provides an excellent opportunity to call them out on it. For those who are worried that women will entirely take over the church, I think they should just take it easy and see what happened to the Episcopalian Church in the US since Katherine Jefferts Schori took over. People have been abandoning it in droves, and now all that's left is a shell of an institution that provides little more than a pulpit for radical left-wing activists.

So what about the bigoted white knight patriarchs out there who are dumping on young men and catering to female congregants? Well, it's simple, really: put the old bulls out to pasture. The time always comes when a new generation of leaders begins to step up and demand a few changes, and that time is now.

On the Road

I'm finally getting around to a trip I had to put off last year due to my kids' relocation case, and I'll be in transit for a couple days. However, this is going to be a working trip (there are no real vacations for the self-employed), so I'll be back to posting as soon as I'm back in an office, which should be by Wednesday evening. I'll have some interesting new material to write about in a different locale, so stay tuned.

When I have no access to the site I'll put comments on moderation, but I'll schedule a post or two in the meanwhile.

Dalrock · 17 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

When discussing the topic of changes in divorce law we typically talk about divorce theft and how this causes men to be understandably hesitant to marry, as well as the impact it has on men and their children who are directly victimized by the new regime. However, divorce "reform" is as much about manipulating the power balance within marriage as it is about ensuring that women can frivolously divorce while collecting cash and prizes. Economists Stevenson and Wolfers describe this in their paper Bargaining in the Shadow of the Law: Divorce Laws and Family Distress (emphasis mine).

> In the literature on the economics of the family there has been growing consensus on the need to take bargaining and distribution within marriage seriously. Such models of the family rely on a threat point to determine distribution within the household. The switch to a unilateral divorce regime redistributes power in a marriage, giving power to the person who wants out, and reducing the power previously held by the partner interested in preserving the marriage.

They aren't under any illusions; divorce reform is all about redistributing power from the spouse who wants to honor the marriage vows to the spouse who doesn't. This is one of the best kept open secrets I've ever encountered.

Also, don't be confused by the gender neutral terms; women are overwhelmingly the ones who don't want to honor the marriage vows. This is confirmed by the academic study "These Boots Are Made for Walking": Why Most Divorce Filers Are Women and the data on the age of wife at the time of divorce. Putting this together, divorce reform is all about redistributing power from the husband who wants to honor the marriage vows to the wife who doesn't.

Stevenson and Wolfers are very open about this. They of course present it through the feminist narrative that husbands are evil brutes which must be tamed, lest they abuse, murder, or drive their wife to suicide:

> Examining state panel data on suicide, domestic violence, and murder, we find a striking decline in female > suicide and domestic violence rates arising from the advent of unilateral divorce. Total female suicide declined by around 20% in the long run in states that adopted unilateral divorce. We believe that this decline is a robust and well-identified result, and timing evidence speaks clearly to this interpretation. There is no discernable effect on male suicide.

They clarify that this isn't about women previously being "trapped" in abusive or dangerous marriages, but about how putting all husbands in fear of divorce might tame potentially abusive husbands (emphasis mine):

> To see how divorce laws affect the external threat point, note that prior to unilateral divorce, a partner wishing to dissolve the marriage could leave without their spouse's consent. However, in such a situation, a legal divorce is not granted and, as such, the right to remarry is forfeited. Under unilateral divorce the value of the exit threat increases for the unsatisfied spouse, as the right to remarry is retained regardless of the position of one's spouse. Thus, the exit threat model predicts that changes in divorce regimes will have real effects. If the divorce threat is sufficiently credible, it may directly affect intrafamily bargaining outcomes without the option ever being exercised.

Indeed they found that this was in fact the case. They close their conclusion with:

> The mechanism examined in this paper is a change in divorce regime and we interpret the evidence collected here as an empirical endorsement of the idea that family law provides a potent tool for affecting outcomes within families.

Again, they weren't looking for evidence that divorce reform allowed wives to escape abusive husbands. They were looking for and found that changes in family law served as a sort of marital sword of Damocles over husbands, causing them bend to their wife's will out of fear of unilateral divorce.

In this context we can understand how cases like John's and walking in hell while not the standard outcome of "divorce reform" also aren't unintended consequences. They serve as a warning to keep all husbands in line.

It is also worth noting that while academic studies couch this in the feminist narrative of checking what would otherwise be an army of sadistic husbands, this is really about husbands living in fear of their wife becoming unhaaaapy and dynamiting the family. Only a fool hasn't noticed that one of the most prominent themes in women's entertainment is the concept of the empowerment women experience from frivolously divorcing.

Christians are actively reinforcing these legal and social changes by abandoning the biblical view of marriage in favor of the feminist view. While the old paradigm was that a woman who couldn't keep a man was a failure, feminists and Christians have turned this around and now view a husband who can't keep his wife haaapy as a failure. At the same time, the wife who kicks the father of her children out of the house is now seen as heroic. This idea that husbands must grovel to their wives to stave off her ever threatened unhaaapyness is so ingrained in modern Christian thought that there was no meaningful backlash amongst Christians when this was made the central plot of the movie Fireproof. Tens, perhaps hundreds of millions of Christians watched the movie and delighted in its presumed Christian message on marriage. We saw proof of the same thing with the women of christianforums.com going on for over 40 pages passionately arguing the morality of frivolous divorce. Shortly after I pointed this out, the moderators of the forum enacted a new rule forbidding members from writing anything in judgment of frivolous divorce (emphasis mine):

> Please remember that when someone shares a personal experience it is not up for judgement. Divorce is always a last resort, but we will not allow judgement of those who do make that choice.

This abandonment of the biblical concept of marriage in exchange for the feminist view of marriage doesn't just impact the marriages of Christians. Christianity is the driving moral force in the west, and as such their turning their backs on biblical marriage has given all women in the west moral cover to use the new legal threatpoint against their husbands to maximum effect. Husbands are hemmed in by all sides cheerleading his wife to frivolously divorce if he fails to make her happy.

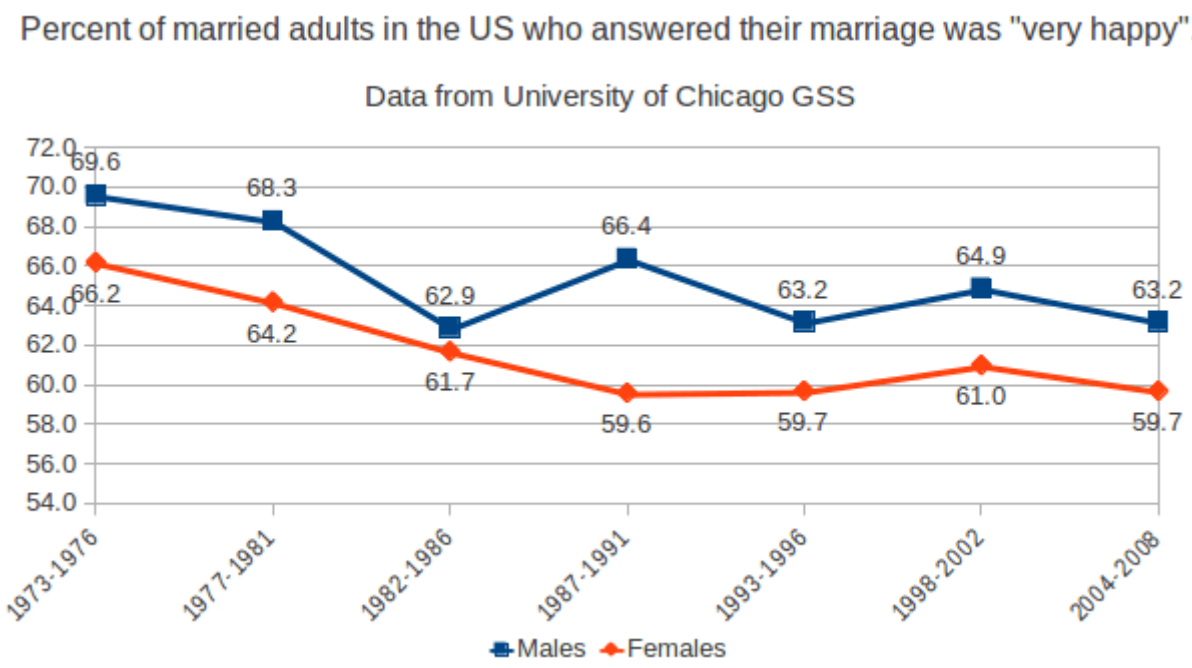
Yet despite the millions of innocent men and their children who have been ground up by the the machinery needed to keep husbands in their place, wives now report less marital happiness (Source: National Marriage Project, P 67 Fig 4):



We are feeding millions of innocent men and children to the machinery of divorce to keep this threatpoint in place, and not even making women happier with their marriages.

Featured Guest · 17 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

According to ABC News:

> Pornography has grown into a $10 billion business — bigger than the NFL, the NBA and Major League Baseball combined — and some of the nation’s best-known corporations are quietly sharing the profits.

The growth of any businesses mean more jobs for workers willing to work in that industry. In this case the workers are liberated young women attracted to the fast money, adulation, and yes … sex of the porn industry. With “slut walks” emphasizing the support of other women that no woman be hampered by negative labels like “slut”, the young women in porn face far less stigma than they ever have. So much so that for that young women the leap from wanton behavior at a drunken college party to getting double teamed followed by a full facial in a porn shoot may not be a far leap at all.

The dollars and cents is that you have a huge growth porn industry demanding a huge number of sex workers who blend invisibly into the population because there is no longer any stigma attached to the world’s oldest profession.

Unlike men women know how to keep a secret. Women don’t brag to their girlfriends, in fact they’ll lie even to themselves. You really have NO IDEA where even that conservative and very virginal girl you’ve proposed to has been until the night she thought she forgot shows up on Youtube.com. Where does that leave an increasing number of American men?

Trying to turn a whore into a housewife.

Yes, there are terrific women out there. But single women are angling for a man to pay for their lives, and given that incentive there’s a huge temptation for a woman to present herself falsely, to tell a lot of lies and to make a lot of “stay at home, cook and raise kids” promises she has no intention of keeping. Under US and ESPECIALLY Canadian divorce laws, women are almost never accountable for bad behavior or broken promises. For all the men who thought their betrothed was only slutty the night she met you and who are steaming mad that you’ve been sold a bill of goods, does the marriage contract needs a “false advertisement” clause?

Vatican to Purge Feminists from US Convents

Although it remains to be seen what will come of it, the Vatican has finally formalized and announced its plan to purge feminism from Catholic institutions in the US. This will be a very large-scale, painful undertaking, as many convents in the United States began adopting feminism and goddess worship as their de facto faith some forty years ago. Despite Catholic tolerance for their heterodox positions, attacks on the Catholic church from feminist quarters never let up, but rather increased in fequency and volume.

One of the organizations facing inquisition, the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, represents 80% of the nuns in the US. This will truly be a time of reckoning for the sisters, who have been growing increasingly bold in recent years. As an example of what they've been up to, here are some words of wisdom from Barbara Marx Hubbard, the woman they chose as their keynote speaker at their big conference last year:

> Marx Hubbard: This is the new Adam and the new Eve—whole being with whole being at the Tree of Life. In the story of Genesis, Eve was not only going for the Tree of Knowledge, she was heading for the Tree of Life, which is the tree of the gods. And it seems to me that the human species is heading for the Tree of Life. We have the power to destroy worlds and build worlds, to change our own bodies, and perhaps, eventually, to have ever-evolving life. Now, when the woman has become whole, so that her own masculine and feminine are joined, and the man too has become whole, they can come together beyond domination and submission in such a way that will bring forth the greater potential of each. So we see the couple as a very powerful arena of self-evolution. And when you add sexuality—from procreation to recreation to regeneration—you begin to see the New Man and the New Woman gaining the wisdom to guide the new powers of humanity forward.

Seems she is not only endorsing Eve's choice, but supporting some kind of spiritual transsexualism in the temporal world. Kind of odd from a Catholic perspective, one would think…

Although there is a great deal of opposition to Catholicism – and Christianity in general – throughout the Western world, there is no doubt that the Catholic church itself is a very influential institution. For example, Karol Wojtyla's (Pope John Paul II) firm stance against Communism gave the Anglo-American alliance enough moral support in continental Europe to tip the political balance and eventually send the Bolsheviks scurrying back to Moscow in disgrace, where they were overthrown by the good Russian people.

Today, however, it is not the despotic, Tartar tyranny of Bolshevism, but rather a sort of rot in the Western body politic itself that is being challenged, which may complicate the issue. Nevertheless, we can hope that the purge the Catholic church has decided to undertake to clear feminists out of convents will begin to embolden other religions and institutions to take similar measures.

What is remarkable is how long it took for the fight against feminsim to finally get started. It remained unchallenged for decades, destroying countless families and fomenting war between the sexes before people finally began to stand up to it. If anything, this should be a source of great shame to Western men and institutions, including Catholic Church leaders, who let the situation go from bad to worse without having either the will or compassion to do anything about it.

The attack on The Spearhead was a simple redirect script, apparently hidden in image files. The goal was not to seize any data from the site itself, but rather to redirect viewers to other, illegitimate sites. Because I turned the site off within hours of receiving notice from Google, the damage was limited and nobody got hurt (except the site's reputation).

User specific information on The Spearhead is safe. The entire breach was a result of my own error, as I unintentionally uploaded something that infected the WordPress theme's image files through a plugin. What's good about that is that the databases remain unmolested (means all user data is safe), but what is lousy is that I am going to have to wait until I have access to backups before restoring some images.

So, lesson learned. Time to get back to work.

Book Review: The Clash of Civilizations

Elusive Wapiti · 25 April 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Book Review: The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order, by Samuel Huntington, 1996, 321 pages.

Summary: In this 16 year old book, Mr. Huntington divvies up the world into 9 distinct small-c civilizations, each with its own culture, which Huntington defines as blood, language, way of life, and religion:

(1) Western – Christian and post-Christian lands populated by Europeans. The border of Western civilization is marked not by Urals but where Catholicism/Protestantism ends and Eastern Orthodox/Islam begins

(2) Orthodox – Hellenes, Slavs, and other Eurasians influenced by/professing Orthodox Christianity

(3) Islamic

(4) African – Sub-Saharan Africa

(5) Latin American – Mesoamericans professing Catholicism

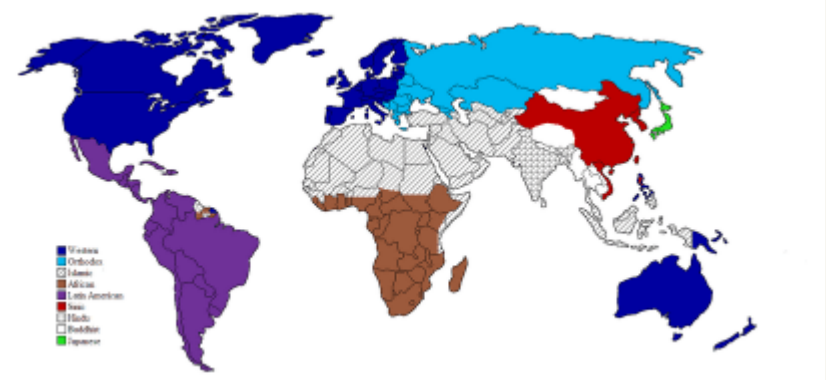
(6) Sinic – Modern-day China, Korea, Vietnam

(7) Hindu (Indian)

(8) Bhuddist – Modern-day Tibet, Mongolia, Burma, Laos, Thailand

(9) Japanese

Mr. Huntington argues that these civilizational fault lines better explain patterns of conflict and bandwagoning / balancing behaviors in interstate violence, particularly in a post-Westphalian world, than other paradigms. His taxonomy of civilizations tends to pivot around religion, in that he sees religious factors as the primary factor that defines culture, and therefore 'civilizations', with race/ethnicity coming in a distant second as key distinguishing factors. Mr. Huntington argues these characteristics to influence how each country within civilizations behave, not only inter-civilizationally with their "kin" countries, but those countries around them which may be members of a different civilization. In addition, civilizations with a "core state"…a state synonymous with that culture as a whole, behave differently (i.e., more stable, less prone to spasms of violent conflict) than those civilizations that lack a core state, such as Islam which lacks an identifiable core state. He also identifies several countries which he characterizes as "cleft" nations, those countries that contain more than one major culture: Ukraine, Sudan, and (possibly in the future if Mexican and Latin American migration continues apace) the United States. For Mr. Huntington asserts that cleft countries are particularly conflict-prone, particularly if they lay astride a civilizational fault line.



Huntingdon's Civilizations (image via Wikipedia)

One major theme of Huntington's book is the realignment of the world order from a binary East-vs-West or Cold War model to that where historical and religious roots return to the fore. He documents several ways in which secular Western power is declining, and what this decline means to the prevailing economic and political structure of the world. This is particularly with respect to the Chinese and Islamic civilizations–both "Eastern" civilizations with traditions oftimes in direct opposition to Western habits–these two civilizations are poised to reshape the world political dynamic in their favor.

Most at risk in this realignment and decline of the West is the notion of cultural universalism centered around Western values. Neither the increasingly assertive Sinic or militantly metastasizing Islamic cultures place anywhere near the same value on the principles of human rights, natural law, and Western-style individual liberty as the West at its apogee once did. Ironically, "democracy", that form of government inherited by the West through Classical Civilization, improved, and spread around the world by Western Civilization appears to be midwifing what Huntington calls the process of "indigenization". This term refers to the resurgence of once-marginalized native cultures gaining strength, power, and cultural relevance through the process of democratization to challenge Western hegemony–often by overthrowing Western-backed autocratic regimes.

Another significant theme of Huntington's book is what he calls the revanche de dieu, or the "revenge of God". Post-Enlightenment secularism, seemingly the dominant cultural force in the world 100 years ago, has largely reversed. God/gods/Confucianist beliefs, it seems, are making a comeback, and not just among hard core fundies but amongst entire peoples as a whole

> "A new religious approach took shape, aimed no longer at adapting to secular values but at recovering a sacred foundation for the organization of society…moving on from a modernism that had failed, attributing its setbacks and dead ends to separation from God. People do not live by reason alone. They cannot calculate and act rationally in pursuit of their self-interest until they define their self, [and] interest politics presupposes identity…for people facing the need to determine 'who am I?' [and]'where do I belong?', religion provides compelling answers, and religious groups provide small social communities to replace those lost through urbanization"

Far from being archaic, religion in Mr. Huntington's book has re-emerged as a–or maybe even the–dominant force in a society, and Mr. Huntington claims this renewed interest in belief has profound implications for the behaviors of civilizations and their constituent populations.

Other than these two major themes, Mr. Huntington spends the bulk of his book analyzing the implications of a world defined by his taxonomy, and in which the West recedes in the face of a trifecta of re-emerging Asian civilizations: Sinic, Islamic, and Orthodox. He discusses political reconfiguration as a result of this retreating-advancing dynamic, possible consequential "fault line" wars, and the effect that demography, economics, and non-Western civilizational self-valuation on the political order. He closes his book by discussing ways in which the West may arrest, maybe even reverse its decline…but sixteen years on it appears his prescription has yet to be heeded.

Analysis and Critique

Christianity and Western Civilization. One of the maddening things about Mr.Huntington's description of the West is his over-identification of the West as Christian. For certain, Christianity, and the Roman Catholic Scholastics in particular, ensured the lessons of Classical Civilization did not fade into the dark mist of history past. Mr. Huntington argues, and I agree, that Christianity has played the decisive role in the shape, tenor, the "look and feel" of Western Civ. But, unlike Mr. Huntingdon, I contend that Western Civ is no longer Christian in any culturally significant sense. It may still retain some Christian cultural residue, to be sure, and large minorities of its peoples claim the Christian mantle, but the culture itself is thoroughly steeped in a secular quasi-religion that, like any other religion, marginalizes its competitors. Thus Christianity is increasingly cast aside as irrelevant, and the the values that Christianity impressed upon Western Civilization: the inherent dignity of men, the equivalent value of both sexes, individual rights, and individual responsibility, have started to retreat in the West (and worldwide) as a result.

The paradox of democracy, the interaction of power and democratization, and 'Universalism'. I found Mr.

Huntington's discussion of democracy, particularly how it is being used usher in new eras of indigenization, to be quite interesting. Acolytes of democracy were fond of fantasizing that democratic governments were, by definition, Western-friendly. But as we can plainly see by events such as the "Islamist Spring", democratization does not necessarily imply a particular country will align with the West in a climate in which the West has little power and influence. Showing his realist side, Mr. Huntington writes:

> "…culture almost always follows power. Throughout history, the expansion of the power of a civilization has usually occurred simultaneously with the flowering of its culture and has almost always involved its using that power to extend its values, practices, and institutions to other societies. American hegemony is receding…the erosion of Western culture follows, as indigenous, historically rooted mores, languages, beliefs, and institutions reassert themselves. As Western power declines, the ability of the West to impose Western concepts of human rights, liberalism, and democracy on other civilizations also declines and so does the attractiveness of those values to other civilizations."

Now that Western power is on the wane, other cultures find much less utility in being Western-oriented, and nowadays we find numerous examples of democratically elected governments being less disposed toward the West, Western policies, and indeed the entire Western-constructed economic edifice. "Electoral competition instead stimulates them to fashion what they believe will be the most popular appeals, and those are usually ethnic, nationalist, and religious in character", not necessarily secular or Western-friendly.

This leads me to a discussion about 'Universalism', a concept that Mr. Huntingdon defines thusly:

> [T]he Western universalist belief posits that people throughout the world should embrace Western values, institutions and culture because [Western culture embodies] the highest,most enlightened, most liberal, most rational, most modern, and most civilized thinking of mankind

Mr. Huntington discussed the very human tendency–seems that it is now the West's turn to fall victim to this folly–to assume that its culture is superior, that its way of life and way of doing things represent the apex of human development, and is therefore their culture is rightfully pre-eminent. As such, Western culture more or less takes it as a given, without much thought to the contrary, that everyone worldwide should naturally agree with the Western conventional wisdom regarding human rights, individual freedom, economic principles, Western-style democratic government, nuclear non-proliferation, and arms control. Naturally, Eastern civilizations, with their differing cultural traditions and experiences, and with their increasing power, chafe at Western Universalism. This is particularly true with Islam and China, two civilizations who regularly flout Western cultural conventions (as in, for example, questions of human rights, of individual liberty, and of nuclear non-proliferation). And why shouldn't they? They themselves have millennia of cultural tradition upon which to draw from, traditions frankly different from the West. In addition, in their eyes, their culture is infinitely superior, if for no other reason than the decline of the West fuels and reinforces their chauvinism. Particularly if one believes, as Huntington hints he may, that Western culture didn't become dominant because it was intrinsically so much better, but because it made war that much more effectively than competitor civilizations:

> The West won the world not by the superiority of its ideas or values or religion, but rather by its superiority in applying organized violence. Westerners often forget this fact, non-Westerners never do.

Apart from undermining Western claims to universalism, this is an interesting statement, especially when viewed in light of 2GW and 3GW warfare (which the West used to significant effect) and the back-to-the-future rise of 4GW and 5GW warfare. These 'new' ways of making war tend to neutralize, even sidestep, Western strengths while simultaneously exploiting Western weaknesses (e.g., media, diversity, democratic governance, etc). Moreover, 4/5GW seems to favor Eastern-style warfare…the sort that Westerners would find barbaric…and enables Asian cultures more naturally inclined to 4/5 GW to rise to the fore once more. But what disturbs Mr.Huntingdon the most about 'false, immoral, and…dangerous' Universalism is what he sees as the inherently destabilizing influence of the notion of a messianic 'Universalist Prerogative' with inter-state and inter-civilizational violence. The logic train for Huntingon goes like this: Universalism, spread by power, foments empire. Empires are maintained by violence, if not legal and economic, than of the political/physical sort. Eventually, dissimilar civilizations will rise to challenge the dominance of a foreign culture and alien people, and the reigning imperial power will attempt to stop the shift in power toward their adversaries. These challenges will eventually involve the use of arms…and there resides the danger of Universalism to the international community. Thus does universalism necessarily imply empire and imperialism, on the way to open warfare. Mr. Huntington, unsurprisingly, attempts to disabuse the reader of any favorable impressions of such a fashionable conceit.

Islam's "bloody borders". After having first introduced this term in a 1993 article [link opens PDF] for the publication Foreign Affairs, Mr. Huntington writes:

> Muslims have problems living peaceably with their neighbors. Muslims make up one-fifth of the world's population but in the 1990s they have been far more involved in intergroup violence than the people of any other civilization. The evidence is overwhelming.

Mr. Huntington lists a few factors that contribute to this pattern of aggressive behavior: (1) the degree to which Muslim societies are militarized–it is hard to conceive of a single major Moslem country which is not heavily militarized, (2) proximity to non-Moslem peoples and states, (3) absence of core state(s) which could otherwise retrain and/or dominate wayward countries, and (4) the "pig in a python" effect of a high percentage of unmarried, unattached males with low/no prospects of marriage. A fifth factor, which Mr. Huntington calls "indigestibility", is explained as follows:

> Muslim countries have problems with non-Muslim minorities comparable to those which non-Muslim countries have with Muslim minorities. Even more than Christianity, Islam is an absolutist faith. It merges religion and politics and draws a sharp line between the dar-al-Islam and the dar-al-harb. As a result, Confucians, Buddhists, Hindus, Western Christians, and Orthodox Christians have less difficulty adapting to and living with each other than any one of them has adapting to and living with Muslims.

Mr. Huntington suspects that as Moslem societies age, the pig-in-the-python effect will recede. But indigestibility remains, as does Islam's inferiority complex and, increasingly, the West's desperate grasping at the levers of global power that erstwhile empire once manipulated so easily:

> The underlying problem for the West is not Islamic fundamentalism. It is Islam, a different civilization whose people are convinced of the superiority of their culture and are obsessed with the inferiority of their power. The problem for Islam is not the CIA or US Department of Defense. It is the West, a different civilization whose people are convinced of the universality of their culture and believe that their superior, if declining power, imposes upon then the obligation to extend that culture throughout the world. These are the basic ingredients that fuel conflict between Islam and the West

Note that the assertion "…imposes upon them the obligation to extend that culture throughout the world…" eerily prefigures the late 20th-century "Neocon Wars of Coerced Democratization" (my term), first in the Balkans, then in Iraq and in Afghanistan after 9/11.

The Future of the USA, and the West. In the final chapters of his book, Mr. Huntington narrows his scope and addresses the cultural war underway in the United States, the heart of Western Civilization. Specifically, he details the efforts of elites to deny the uniqueness of Western culture, if not destroy Western culture outright, in an effort to replace Western Civilization with no civilization at all. To wit:

> Historically, American national identity has been defined culturally by the heritage of Western civilization, and politically by the principles of the American Creed on which Americans overwhelmingly agree: liberty, democracy, individualism,equality before the law, Constitutionalism, private property. In the late twentieth century, both components of American identity have come under concentrated and sustained onslaught from a small but influential number of intellectuals and publicists. In the name of multiculturalism they have attacked the identification of the United States with Western Civilization, denied the existence of a common American culture, and promoted radical, ethnic, and other subnational cultural identities and groupings. They have denounced…'the systematic bias toward European culture and its derivatives' in education and 'the dominance of the European-American monocultural perspective'. The multiculturists are,as Arthur M. Schlesinger said, 'very often ethnocentric separatists who see little in the Western heritage other than Western crimes'. Their "mood is one of divesting Americans of the sinful European inheritance and seeking redemptive infusion from non-Western cultures". The American multiculturists similarly reject their country's cultural heritage. Instead of attempting to identify the United States with another civilization, they wish to create a country of many civilizations…a country not belonging to any civilization and lacking a cultural core. The mutliculturalists also challenged a central element of the American Creed by substituting for the rights of individuals the rights of groups, defined largely in terms of race, ethnicity, sex, and sexual preference.

If this were not bad enough, Mr. Huntington invokes the experience of another country that was also organized around ideological precepts rather than a common, shared culture…the Soviet Union. He thinks that counting on loyalty to an ideology, as do those who assert that to be American means only that one have an affinity for a set of principles, is, in the absence of a unifying common culture, foolhardy:

> "[T]he total failure of Marxism…and the dramatic breakup of the Soviet Union", the Japanese philosopher Takeshi Umehara has suggested, "are on the precursors to the collapse of Western liberalism, the main current of modernity. Far from being the alternative to Marxism and the reigning ideology at the end of history, liberalism will be the next domino to fall.' In an era in which peoples everywhere define themselves in cultural terms, what place is there for a society without a cultural core and defined only by a political creed? In a multi-civilizational world where culture counts, the United States could be simply the last anomalous holdover from a fading Western world where ideology counted. Rejection of the Creed and of Western Civilization means the end of the United States of America as we have known it. It also means effectively the end of Western Civilization. The clash between the multi-culturalists and the defenders of Western civilization and the American Creed is, in James Kurth's phrase, 'the real clash'.

Mr. Huntington paints a bleak picture indeed for America, foreseeing the United States becoming a cleft country as a result of this deadly embrace of multiculturalism. America, in Huntington's view, may very well split linguistically and culturally along Western and Latin civilizational lines; separate, alientated, and suspicious of the other. In other words, the United States will reconfigure to be Anglophone America vs. the Mexifornicated rump state of what was formerly the American southwest. But while we're a lot further down this dystopian road that we were 16 years ago, Huntington hadn't yet written off America's chances at self-recovery. For America–and therefore Western Civilization–to survive, Huntington claims that both must reject the fashionable cancer of multiculturalism and embrace their common European (and, unsaid by Huntingdon, Christian) heritage. To live, America must ask herself the following question, and answer it in the affirmative: Is America a Western country? To answer "yes" means to embrace its roots, to look east to Europe, and not west to Asia. To answer "no" means to die a self-inflicted death.

It's been a very long time since I've been to continental Europe — over 20 years. And, although many things remain the same, one thing is noticeably different: me.

I lived in France for most of a year when I was a boy, and although I stood out a little as a somewhat tall, blond (at the time) boy in a country of mostly darker, smaller people, I didn't look obviously American. Actually, back in the 1980s, Americans and Europeans didn't differ as much from each other as they do now. If you ignored the language and culture and dressed an American up as a European he or she wouldn't stand out too much. Today, however, there is one thing that really sets Americans apart. That is our size. Your typical American is an order of magnitude larger than your typical European. Not taller (at least not in Northern Europe), but BIGGER. People I saw walking around Amsterdam were tall and lean — very lean by American standards. Heavy people are as much of a minority in continental Europe as they are in Asia, which leaves me feeling, well… kinda like a fatass.

Back home, at 6'1″ and 210 lbs. with a fairly large frame, I don't feel all that big. I'll sometimes think I ought to lose ten pounds or so, but there's little pressure, as I look around and see people much fatter than I am all over the place. However, after a few days walking around in a couple cities in Europe, I feel like ten pounds would be entirely insufficient. In fact, twenty would be more like it, and maybe even more.

It would be hard to overemphasize how much this affects the average level of attractiveness in America and Europe respectively. Although Dutch people seem to be naturally pretty good-looking, I somehow doubt they'd be all that attractive with an extra twenty pounds or more of lard. In the Baltic region, where I am currently staying, people are at least as thin as the Dutch, although perhaps not quite as tall. While there are certainly some beauties around town, the people don't strike me as naturally more attractive than Americans, but they are so much thinner that it really isn't any contest at all. And this is not only the women, but the men as well. I have seen precisely one obese person so far, and he was probably one of those people who really does have an endocrine problem. In the states, on the other hand, one sees enormities shuffling about in every public space.

Now that I think of it, I did see a couple other obese people here, but they don't count, because they were an American couple!

I took a couple pictures of some random people on the street just to give examples of what's normal here. First is a guy, and next a couple women. I deliberately chose to photograph ordinary-looking people so as to give readers an idea of the average schlub rather than feature standouts. Neither the man nor the women are particularly attractive, but nor are they an offense to the eyes.

Ordinary guy:

This guy is nothing special, and kind of scruffy by the area's standards, but his slim physique is the norm. Young men are overwhelmingly slender, and many of them quite good looking. I chose this guy because he's passable in his current state, but if he had a gut – as he probably would in the US – he'd be pretty unsavory.

Ordinary women:

The woman on the right is middle-aged and no beauty queen, but she's got a trim, slender physique that suits her build. In the states, her equivalent couldn't wear that coat and show as much leg without being an embarrassment.

This woman is pretty much average for Northern Europe, believe it or not. In the states, she'd be downright skinny. The woman to the left is older, in her 50s, but still maintains a passable physique.

Something about the American lifestyle, starting around 1990, has really done a number on our people. We are, objectively speaking, a lot less attractive than we were a generation ago. If there's any silver lining, it is that a lot of older American men do seem to have the discipline to stay in shape longer than men in other parts of the world. Back in Seattle, there are lots of gray-headed guys in great shape, cycling, jogging, etc. They aren't the majority, but older guys in Europe do seem to let themselves go a bit more than in the states. Perhaps, however, this is because older men in Europe, surrounded as they are by attractive women, don't feel as much pressure, whereas an older American guy really has to work at it to get the attention of the vanishingly few attractive women.

I'll have more observations later, but in the meanwhile I'll be out walking – not driving – around town, and eating reasonable portions of healthy food.

A Different World

As I suggested in my last post, Europe is something of an eye-opener for an American man. I imagine it's something like the US was back in the 1970s when there was a surplus of young, attractive boomer women. At least, that's the case in Riga, where I'm currently staying.

Because I'm not in the dating market and my perceptions aren't skewed by going to nightclubs or the like, I can look around at the situation rather objectively, and the ratio of young attractive women on the street compared to the US is absolutely mind-blowing. For every one attractive woman in a typical US city, there are at least three here. Actually, the ratio is probably more like one to four. Is it because the women are naturally, genetically more attractive? I don't think so. After giving the situation some thought, I've come up with a few reasons for this huge disparity:

1. Weight

American women are significantly heavier than (continental) European women. British women, sadly, are about the same as Americans. However, minority women in Britain are thinner than minority women in the US, which skews US stats further toward the obese side of the scale. As an example from my personal life, there was a very pretty young woman who worked as a waitress in my neighborhood a few years ago. She was only 19 or so when I first saw her, and still had that girlish physique. However, within a couple years she put on at least 20 pounds, and while still "cute", she lost her figure by getting thick around the middle, and simply wasn't hot any longer. Although this is very common for American women, it doesn't seem to happen to women here. In general, they stay trim until middle age at least. American women who are not heavy by 25 or so are in the minority, with the average young American woman (aged 20-29) solidly in the "overweight" category today, at 5'4″ and a whopping 156 lbs. This probably accounts for most – or at least half – of the looks disparity between European and American women.

2. Dress/Hygiene

Let's face it: Americans are downright slovenly compared to Europeans. We shop in sweatpants, wear cheap clothes and care little about our appearance. In Europe, people wouldn't be caught dead in public looking like the kinds of slobs we regularly see out and around in the US (I am personally guilty of this offense myself from time to time — it's easy to not care when nobody else does). Additionally, the monstrous tattoos that have become so tragically common on young American women are almost entirely absent in Europe, although one does see smaller ones from time to time.

3. Demographics

The man shortage really only applies to formerly Communist countries, such as the Baltic states, Ukraine, Russia, etc. I suspect it does have some influence in that it increases pressure on women to look good. However, given that Dutch women are quite attractive and there are plenty of Dutch men to go around, it is probably the least important factor.

4. Attitude

This is one of those subtle, nearly subliminal effects, but it's quite noticeable when the nasty, pushy and competitive attitude is suddenly gone. American women are aggressive and loud, much as American men are. Although it may not be an attractive characteristic in men, it's downright ugly when women behave that way. American women are also grumpy, stressed out and in foul moods much of the time. This isn't entirely their fault, as the US is a high-pressure society, but it certainly doesn't make them any prettier.

These key differences combine to create a sad situation for the contemporary single American male. The ratio is so profoundly different in Europe that I suspect the rules of "Game" are fundamentally different, too. For example, I doubt negging would work here. Women would just think you're a jerk. Being nice and gracious to women in Europe actually works, and is appreciated. A woman who treats nice men with scorn here can't get away with it, because there will be an equally attractive woman right around the corner who will happily accept a kind gesture.

Because there are so many attractive women, they can't afford to be anywhere near as dismissive and nasty as attractive American women. For the average young beta male, this is a real boon. Women here really do not seem to like douchebag type guys. Probably because that type will just burn through women like somebody else's money, and the local betas aren't forced to support thug lovers, nor are they forced to settle for them, so being a thug-lover slut is a patently stupid choice for women.

From Europe, it becomes apparent that one of the largest single problems for American men is the lack of eligible women; it is the mirror image of the problem that afflicts women in Eastern Europe. In retrospect, I should have noticed it from China as well, but I was so young at the time that I didn't give the issue much thought. Ironically, we often hear of a woman shortage in China, but if you do the numbers the ratio of eligible (i.e. sufficiently attractive) women in China is probably significantly higher than in the US. Frankly, I don't think I'll ever be able to think of male to female ratios again without wondering what the "eligible" female ratio is. It is probably the most important factor affecting young men's happiness, and sadly we've raised a couple generations of extraordinarily unattractive women in the US.

One more thing that becomes apparent in Europe is that the American idea of “BBW” or “curvy” women is really out there — nowhere near the norm. Being around tons of very skinny (by American standards) women in Europe, sometimes you might come across a woman with a little more in the hips and chest department than usual, and she catches your eye. This is natural, as men tend to like these feminine features. However, in the US “curvy” denotes an obese woman whose hips are rendered insignificant by an enormous belly. So-called BBWs in the US are not really curvy — they are rotund.

I really can’t stress enough the extent to which obesity has ruined American women’s attractiveness. Feminists blather on and on about how women should be “comfortable” with their bodies, but the truth is that many American women would be viewed as abominations in most of the world. Curvy women should have every right to feel sexy and proud of their physiques, but without a waist women are not actually curvy, but rather round.

If you were to try to come up with a parallel for men, I suppose it would be something like having toothless, homeless alcoholic men say that they should be proud of themselves and feel attractive. Feminists are really that far out there. They are literally delusional by global standards. No normal man in the rest of the world finds obese American women attractive. Sure, they may be able to find some skinny guy from a third world country who will pretend to love them to get a green card, but any self-respecting man will give them a very wide berth.

However, if you’re an American man in a foreign country, it’s entirely normal when a woman who is a bit “more” than average catches your eye, because all the other women are so thin — sometimes a little too thin for a mature man’s taste. This is really the Marilyn Monroe effect, and puts her appeal in perspective. Marilyn Monroe was not fat, but had hips and a waist when most American women were more linear in shape. Today, Marilyn Monroe would be considered petite next to the monstrosities that waddle along our streets.

Since a couple commenters asked, I took a few more pics today to give an idea of what it looks like on the streets of Europe — Riga in particular.

Taking pictures of people can be a little embarrassing, so I tried to be discreet, and therefore they aren't all great pics, but they're good enough to give you an idea of what the people look like.

1. Typical Latvian young woman

Her hair is a bit darker than usual, but she's got the Latvian/Baltic face. Basically, a pretty, trim, well-dressed young woman in her mid 20s. This is pretty much what local guys expect.

2. Latvian dad and baby

I didn't get the guy's face in the photo, but he was a handsome man approaching middle age. Probably in his mid-30s, and quite trim. I thought the kid was pretty cute, so I took a picture. His wife, in the background, was unremarkable, but thin despite having relatively recently given birth. Note American tourists in background for contrast.

3. Hot chick

This girl isn't in focus, but you can see enough to get the idea. She's got a Jennifer Aniston-type physique and a pretty face. She'd be a real standout in the US, but you see one of these about every block here.

4. Expat pub

Here's a picture I took at a nearby expat sports bar. Most of the customers are German and Scandinavian men, and I think the guy in the photo is German. The girl behind the bar is a local, and although she looks a bit different from the norm, has the typical figure.

The American Lei Feng?

Lei Feng was a young man who died in 1962 in service to the Communist regime in Maoist China. After his death, Lei was lionized as the model citizen, who selflessly sacrificed himself to Communism and his country. Despite the fact that Maoism has fallen out of favor, Lei Feng remains something of a cherished figure in China, and a museum dedicated to his life remains popular in Changsha, where he was born. I first heard about Lei Feng when watching a movie commemorating his life shortly after I moved to Beijing in 1997. My Chinese friends filled me in on who he was, and told me he was a great hero and much beloved, representing the pure, simple ideals of the revolution.

Today, we have millions of American men selflessly working away for the good of society, often without any compensation. Many of them do so unwillingly, having been forced into penury by their faithless children's mothers/ex-wives, but there are still those who contribute to the common good with neither carrot nor stick to motivate their endeavors.

One of these is Justin Knapp, an unemployed thirty-year-old who apparently lives with his mother and spends hours every day editing Wikipedia. Knapp recently became the first person to pass the one million edits mark, meaning he has put thousands of hours into the Wikipedia project. For all his effort, Knapp has not recent a penny of compensation.

Knapp is described as follows:

> The bearded and bespectacled former pizza delivery guy from Indianapolis, Indiana is a pretty extraordinary wikipedian. Last week, Knapp, 30, became the first person on the site to reach 1 million edits. He's done it by spending "several hours" every day on the site. Knapp's never received a cent of pay from Wikipedia and is currently unemployed.

When asked why he does all this work, he responds:

> Broadly speaking, I do it for two reasons. Aesthetically, it just pleases me. This is how I relax: I read and write. Finding things to do in this project is a way of passing time that is constructive and fun for me. On the other hand, editing is also a way of actualizing some of my values. I believe strongly in sharing and collaboration so if I can be part of a worldwide, multi-lingual community all dedicated toward giving away the world's knowledge freely, that gives me a sense that I'm doing a good thing.

There's been a lot of talk about how there aren't enough female editors on Wikipedia. Even Wikipedia periodically flogs itself over this "problem." Given that the job is open to all, this puzzles some people. Supposedly, women are altruistic and like "sharing." But is this true? Do they really like to share, or do they simply like being shared with? Maybe women really are the smarter sex, and simply don't like working for free. Perhaps similar jobs that pay are open to women but not men. Whatever the reason, the lack of female editors on Wikipedia is presented as an example of misogyny and bias, and harmful to women.

However, one thing I'd like to ask women is whether they'd really like to work for thousands of hours for free. I'm pretty sure we know the answer, as they hate the idea of even fixing a family dinner or taking care of their own children without being paid for it; women in the US have fought a decades-long battle to be financially compensated for everything they do. Including, most recently, undergrad fornication.

So, unless Wikipedia wants to start paying editors, the gender disparity will likely remain stark. And, in the meanwhile, men like Justin Knapp will continue to put hard work into bringing knowledge to the world. Like Lei Feng, they sacrifice their strength and ability for the greater good. However, there is a difference: at least in Maoist China, men like Lei Feng were honored at the highest level. Here in the West, men like Justin Knapp are encouraged to keep working away and all the while demeaned and insulted for their effort, simply because women – through their own choice – aren't equally represented amongst those who choose to sacrifice their time and effort.

Good Sex, Bad Sex

There's been a major shift in the public attitude concerning what is proper sex since the sexual revolution of the 1960s. When I was a kid in the 1980s, it was already taken for granted that sexual mores from earlier times were outdated, and only backwards dinosaurs adhered to them. For example, the idea that there's anything wrong with extramarital sex has been laughed at for decades now. Additionally, old taboos concerning other sexual activities, despite clear evidence of their danger in the form of AIDS, divorce, etc., were portrayed as out of date and oppressive. Pornography was deemed legitimate political speech and therefore a right, and obscenity laws repealed.

To listen to the supporters of the sexual revolution, you'd think this would have led us to some sexual utopia where everyone's sexual needs are met with no problem, but the human impulse to control sexuality returned in fairly short order, only in a different form. The result is that today, we still face a great – perhaps even greater – amount of control where sex is concerned, and a lot more people are locked up for sex crimes than in the bad old days of "oppression." What compounds this problem is that it's possible that even more men are sexually repressed now than a hundred years ago.

Today, there are essentially two kinds of bad sex: "nonconsensual" sex and sex with underage people. The bad actors in this regime are overwhelmingly male for a couple reasons. First, forcible rape is far more likely to be committed by males than females, for obvious reasons. Secondly, men generally prefer younger partners and women older. One could argue that prostitution remains in the "bad sex" category, but prostitution is increasingly held to be an example of male sexual exploitation. Examples from Superbowl sex hysteria and the Secret Service scandal highlight this. Essentially, prostitution has begun to fall under the nonconsensual or rape category. Pioneering Swedish legislation that only punishes johns for prostitution transactions will probably be introduced in the US soon, and then the process will be complete.

While only a few fringe characters have ever argued that rape or pedophilia is justifiable, what's wrong with all this is that practically no female sexual behavior is currently seen as negative, whereas men are responsible for almost all of what's deemed bad sex. Not all that long ago, this was far from the case. While rape has always been seen as the most serious sex crime, neither fornication nor adultery were held to be innocent activities, and women were seen as equal participants in these acts. In fact, in the majority of cases, a woman was just as responsible for "bad sex" as a man. Where prostitution was concerned, females were held to be more responsible than their clients, just as drug dealers are held to higher level of accountability than drug buyers, because they profit from the transaction.

However, lest we try to draw parallels, it should be recognized that most of what society considered bad sex was not criminalized until relatively recently. Fornication, sodomy, prostitution and adultery were definitely frowned upon, but they were not typically formally punished until the Victorian era. In the US, it wasn't until the mid-20th century that these laws were widespread and regularly enforced. Nevertheless, people were a lot more careful about engaging in these activities, because social consequences could be severe.

Since then, aside from a brief period from the late 60s to early 70s when there was a sort of sexual free-for-all in the West, we've seen a steady crackdown on male sexuality combined with a loosening of restrictions on female sexuality. What has happened is that the entire burden of sexual control has been increasingly foist upon men, while women's load has been lightened.

Probably the most important and liberating change for women has been the relaxation of the social prohibition on fornication. In the old days, fornication was definitely seen as bad sex. A loose woman was considered socially irresponsible and wicked for a number of reasons. She could lure a husband from his wife, seduce a young, naive man and capture him in a marriage against his interests, and have illegitimate children who became a burden on the community. Such a woman was not seen as marriage material. In general, men preferred virgin brides. Today, of course, the virgin bride is as rare as the horse and buggy.

A lot of men might say we have it a lot better than in those times, because “sex is easy and available” now whereas it used to be more difficult to obtain. I’m not sure I agree. Fornication is as much a risk for men as ever, and probably more so, because now only men are held responsible for the consequences. Get a woman pregnant and it’s on you. Sleep with a couple women, make one angry and jealous, and you risk a rape accusation. Sleeping with a married woman is another good way to get accused of rape if she changes her mind and decides to stay with her husband. Sleep with a woman who said she was 19, she turns out to be 17, and you’re in trouble. Visit a prostitute and you could be arrested or, if she tells the press, lose your career. There isn’t much of a difference from the old days, and you’re more likely to face jail time for slipping up. For men, fornication is clearly still bad sex. Possibly even more so than it was when it was generally recognized as such.

For women, on the other hand, the benefits are clear. Fornication has virtually no social consequences and the most minimal of risks. Pregnancies can be easily avoided, and if wanted the man will be forced to pay child support whether he committed or not. Male lovers can be easily controlled and kept in line, and as many taken as any woman pleases. Women even go so far as to proudly march in slutwalks to further demand rights to behave sexually in any manner they please. The slutwalk was actually very clear in demanding more of the status quo, i.e. less control of female sexuality and more control of male. For women, particularly young and attractive ones, this has been a real bonanza. But what has it done for society?

Let’s see…

Marriage rates dropping precipitously, men taking path of least resistance and dropping out, illegitimacy skyrocketing, class divisions hardening, children growing up fatherless and with fewer options. For most of us, it’s been quite negative.

I wish I could say there was a solution to the problem, but it looks pretty hopeless. The alternative to what used to be seen as bad sex – marriage – has been all but destroyed by the liberation of female sexuality and the redefinition of marriage as little more than a federal tax status; a sort of very risky corporation with arbitrary rules. The result is that for men, there is really no such thing as “good sex,” that is, socially-approved sex — it’s a risk no matter what. Furthermore, a society in which the overwhelming majority of women are fornicators gives men no choice; you just aren’t getting a wife in the traditional sense of the word, so why bother with marriage?

I think men ought to realize that we got suckered in this deal, and perhaps we should have listened to the old sages who have warned us over the centuries. We overreached in our naivete, thinking we’d get more of what we desire if we only tossed out the old attitudes, but all we ended up with was more responsibility and fewer rewards.

Ross Douthat has entered the debate on the new HBO show "Girls," which, in a hint of things to come in the Democratic Party's rainbow coalition, has attracted some controversy because it portrays white girls' lives. However, Douthat isn't concerned with race so much as he is with the prevalent loose sexual mores.

Douthat is quite young; in fact, at just a couple years over 30, he is the youngest editorialist ever hired by the NY Times. He probably has a fairly good idea of how young women of his generation behave, but I'm not entirely sure he understands what's behind it.

Douthat on "Girls:"

> I'm not suggesting that Dunham is secretly channeling the show's profits to the Family Research Council. But it's still interesting to watch how effectively "Girls" weaves together elements from various recent critiques of modern sexual arrangements. The pseudo-relationship that Dunham's character, Hannah Horvath, is pursuing with a shirtless hipster layabout is a case study in the unearned sexual advantages that a culture that assumes a certain amount of promiscuity affords to underachieving and unworthy men. Her best friend's exhaustion with her nice-guy boyfriend suggests how easily long-term "starter marriage"-type relationships can become smothering traps for the people involved. The babbling "Sex and the City" acolyte who treats her own virginity as a dreadful stigma illustrates the point that the sociologists Mark Regnerus and Jeremy Uecker make in their excellent book, "Premarital Sex in America" – that contemporary teens and twentysomethings consistently overestimate how much sex their peers are having, which in turn puts pressure on them to have more sexual partners than their own preferences would otherwise incline them toward.

Douthat seems to feel that promiscuity is a reward to be earned, which suggests that he has limited perspective. "Underachieving and unworthy" have always gone hand-in-hand with promiscuity, according to traditional morality. This goes all the way back to the ancient Romans, Greeks, Hebrews, Chinese, etc.

What Douthat is doing is making the mistake that too many social conservatives are prone to (and, incidentally, which repels many females): he assumes that access to females and sexual gratification are rewards for following the rules. Only someone who grew up in the eminently functional fraction of our society could come to such a far-off conclusion. Most of the rest of us know what promiscuity is really all about: broken families, unwanted pregnancies, wrecked childhoods, jealousy, betrayal, despair, etc. And, of course, despite all these things, it remains an extraordinarily common vice.

For morally-minded people, promiscuity should no more be seen as a reward to be "earned" than drunkenness, sloth or gluttony.

I'm starting to wonder whether a lot of the social conservatives' angst about the sexual status quo isn't a result of them feeling left out. All the hotsex these "shirtless hipster layabout" losers are getting from the naughty little skank in the next apartment must really gnaw at an eminently well-behaved young man like Douthat (magnacumlaudephibetakappa Harvard grad). However, I don't want to beat up on Douthat, because I think he's an earnest, bright young man. I like him quite a bit. But I think he's got to take a walk out of the urban enclaves of the East and get a breath of fresh air around some ordinary people for a change. He ought to do this so he can see that there's little difference no matter where you are on the scale — it's a systemic problem that has nothing to do with what people deserve.

The hipster layabout in Manhattan is the ghetto thug in a black neighborhood, the badboy biker in the downrent suburbs, the narco cholo in SoCal, and the rogue cowboy in ranch country. Does society "afford" sex to these men? Nah, the women do. We aren't giving these badboys a break — we're giving females a break. Maybe Douthat understands that, and can't put it in writing because he'd get canned. If that's the case, all I can say is that a nation has really fallen very low when it can't even chide its young women for their misbehavior, and has to resort to blaming every and anyone else for the problem.

If we're going to deal with this problem, we have to recognize that young women prefer the status quo. Women who post on this site are very explicit about it. They want the shirtless hipsters to have sex with them and the Ross Douthats to support them, and that's exactly what they've got. It's female nirvana.

As men, we have only two adaptive responses at our disposal:

1) Just leave it, i.e. MGTOW

2) Take advantage of it, i.e. Game

As for the non-adaptive option, it's one of sacrifice; standing up to the beast and speaking truth to its face. I wouldn't recommend it for those who care about their personal well-being, but it's the one slim hope we have to rectify the situation. It's too bad we can't count on our respectable molders of public opinion to take on the job, but that's probably how it's always been.

Meet Julia

W.F. Price · 4 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As the campaign gains steam, the fight over the female vote has intensified. The Obama campaign has come out with a new infographic designed to gain more female support. It documents the life of a fictional American woman, from childhood to old age, and purports to show how Obama will help her throughout each stage.

Julia is a college grad, businesswoman and mother of one. Apparently, she is a single mother, because she has a son, but at no point is any man in the picture. However, this is not a problem, because so long as Obama is there, she don't need no stinking husband.

BTW, in one of the slides it is mentioned that "…health care reform [...] lets her stay on her parents' coverage until she turns 26." Divorced men should pay close attention. What this means is that child support now extends to the age of 26, and as usual non-custodial parents (fathers) have no choice in the matter. Yes, you'll be paying a premium until your kids are 26, and the custodial parent (mother) gets to dictate the terms.

Wrapping Up Europe

It's been a nice three weeks overseas, and as I prepare to return home, I find myself hoping I can pull it off again in a few years' time. Europe's a great place to visit, and I'd definitely recommend it to Americans who want to get away from the insanity of American life for a while. If you're on a budget, it definitely helps to have friends overseas; without this advantage I wouldn't have even thought about making the trip.

Life is a bit easier and slower in Europe. Work is not all-consuming, and people have a more relaxed attitude toward life. As an American, I have to admit I found that very frustrating at first, but then I just decided there's no point in fighting it and went along with it.

The US is a great place with a lot of opportunity, but from the outside there's a lot about it that doesn't look so great. The pressure on ordinary people is enormous, the racial and sexual tension is oppressive, and the rat race exhausting. Furthermore, the amount of bureaucratic control over people's lives is a lot higher than in Europe, as far as I can tell. We often point to Europe as an example of a bureaucratic socialist purgatory, but somehow the stakes don't seem quite so high as in the US, and the coercion is not nearly as severe.

I suppose one could point to the US as a place where there's both more risk and more reward. The day to day lives of ordinary Americans may not be much if any better, but the greater opportunities give Americans high hopes and aspirations. Unfortunately, I'm afraid that the steady erosion of personal freedoms is slowly eliminating the clear advantage we once had. There's also an undercurrent of hostility and a certain inhumanity inherent in our political atmosphere. For example, the idea of jailing fathers for poverty is considered absurd and inhumane here. Incarceration is far less common, yet violent crime is a shadow of what it is in the US. There is no overarching police state here, yet relations between people on the street seem more relaxed and less contentious.

Looking back on my home before I return, I feel a bit of apprehension about the future. I don't know what direction we'll take in the US, but where we're headed is not promising. Over my lifetime, I've only seen our society grow harsher and more totalitarian as well as ideologically more strident and divided. This has not let up for my entire life, and if it continues I can't see the US being a very pleasant place to live. Although I really don't want to do this, I'm getting closer to the point of recommending that people who can do so – young men in particular – leave.

It saddens me to say it, but for young American men with some skill and talent, there are probably greener pastures elsewhere, and far fewer risks. If you want a family, the US is probably one of the most dangerous places in the world for a man to get married and have children. Additionally, you will not face affirmative action discrimination outside of the US as a white male, and your chances of arrest and imprisonment (or becoming a victim of violent crime) are lower if you are black or Hispanic. While it might not be as easy to become a billionaire in another country, it's much much harder to have your life destroyed by a woman, and that's a far likelier scenario. As great and glorious a place as the US is, the truth is that it treats its young men like absolute garbage, and in many cases they'd be far safer, and ultimately healthier, spending their young, productive years in places where they can't be so easily robbed and dispossessed. As an added bonus, English is becoming the lingua franca of the developed world, and American men are considered desirable partners around the world.

Sometimes you can get a clearer view from the outside looking in, and this trip has given me a depressing perspective on my homeland. I'm going to be stuck in the US for some time, as my children need a home there for some years to come, but it looks more like a sacrifice than a privilege at this point. How sad to see what's happened to my country.

I arrived home yesterday afternoon after a long journey, and despite what I've written recently concerning the problems in the states found myself happy to be here. I do love the weather, the scenery and the clean feeling of the Pacific Northwest. It's quite literally a breath of fresh air.

However, I was soon a bit disappointed. While in Europe I lost about three kilograms – nearly seven pounds – without really trying. My long daily walks, daily climbs up many flights of stairs and healthier diet combined to help the weight fall right off me effortlessly. So, I decided that I'd try to keep this up while back home, and went to the grocery store with this in mind. Unfortunately, I found that healthy food is far more expensive than in Europe, while the junk is much cheaper. I wanted to buy a loaf of rye bread, some deli meats and cheese for snacks and lunch. All were expensive and of decidedly lower quality than in Europe. It dawned on me that the American lifestyle is not only pervasive, but for many of us nearly unavoidable without serious effort.

Additionally, you can't just walk to the store here for daily essentials. Driving is necessary. So, once again I find myself seated more of the time. It seems to me that we went wrong somewhere along the line, and instead of simply adjusting to a healthier lifestyle we have to make extra effort and spend more to keep ourselves in decent shape.

Sure, you'll see a lot of fit Americans, but they generally spend hours exercising every week. Instead of being a part of one's daily routine, it is necessary here to schedule exercise, buy equipment, a gym membership, etc. What a disappointment.

Everything about the US in recent years seems to be a departure from nature. Instead of accommodating our lives to suit the natural world, we tend to fight it and compensate with more effort. Our politics are no different. Rather than adjusting to normal human nature, we create a police state to control every aspect of our relations with the opposite sex, our children, coworkers, and any other people we interact with.

This is unsustainable, and not only in the environmentalist sense of the word, but the human sense as well. People can only handle so much before things start to fall apart, and it seems to me that we are getting closer to the point of breakdown. I don't envision some anarchic, Katrina-style armageddon, but rather a steady decline in function, much as a sick, aging patient slowly declines before finally succumbing. As I suggested a few posts back, I am a bit pessimistic about the hope for recovery. The structural problems are just too entrenched, and nobody will want to give an inch. Too much has been placed on the shoulders of the young, and those in power will continue to plunder the politically weak to suit their more powerful constituencies.

Finally, the people dominating the political debate are distracting us from the real problems with non-issues, such as gay marriage and contraception. As unemployment and underemployment continue along at unacceptable levels, our President and his rival can only talk about things that have the most minimal impact on the lives of ordinary Americans. Could it really be that the main issues of the campaign will be gay marriage and subsidized contraception? Are these more important than rising fatherlessness, the student debt crisis and stagnant wages?

Installing New Software

I'm working on installing some membership/forum software to better handle comments, and it's a bit tricky. Site may have some issues for a while. If there's trouble accessing content, it can be read at: feeds.feedburner.com/thespearhead

If an installation fails and crashes the site and I can't figure out why, I'm going to have to upload the backup, and that could take a long time. If I have to upload a database backup it will take even longer — this is a very large site by now.

So don't worry if the site goes offline for a while. I've dealt with all the security issues and there are no problems with the host, so any downtime (hopefully very little if any) will simply be due to installing software or restoring the site if there's a fatal problem during installation/configuration.

The Wisdom in Not Arguing With a Woman

Featured Guest · 11 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Ethical

After reading hundreds upon hundreds of comments on both feminist sites and men's rights sites like The Spearhead and A Voice for Men, I noticed the clear pattern that men and women argue differently. Men tend to try to understand what their opponent is saying in order to point out the flaws in his argument. Women on the other hand tend to try to show that nothing about their opponent's argument is understandable at all. As soon as she determines a person's argument is contrary to how she feels, rather than confront her opponent's reasoning she'll use ridicule or derision to dismiss the argument entirely.

The great many men visiting feminist blogs to confront what they see as faulty logic is proof men look to engage and attack any weakness in their opponent's argument. It's also apparent when the odd women shows up on a men's forum. No matter how insulting or far off topic she is there's always a surplus of men ready to engage.

On the other hand when men come to women's forums to debate the issues they're banned from commenting if they say anything the women don't agree with. This is proof women look for reasons not to engage their opponents argument. Furthermore unlike the many men who troll feminist forums, women rarely show up to debate men's rights with men, though this is no loss for them since women don't need the opposition present to have a debate. Though they didn't permit their opponent to make his argument they'll agree amongst themselves on what he probably would have said and then ridicule that misrepresentation among themselves.

There are exceptions of course. Aside from the fact that his site is intentionally satirical, Manboobz relies on ridicule while refusing to address any relevant points, exactly like a woman. However I haven't seen a picture of him so I'm still not convinced he isn't one, in which case he's not an exception. On the flip side I've also read at least one woman's blog on men's rights that was more methodically logical than most men's writing. These exceptions are extremely uncommon.

It's not surprising then that in the gender rights debate neither side is convincing the other even in the slightest, and that raises a good question: If men can never be convinced because women don't engage men's rational arguments, and women can never be convinced because men ignore their feelings and bully them with the excuse that their feelings aren't rational, then how can the sexes ever compromise? Compromise relies on a belief in the "common good" and requires a common understanding of the issues. There's no "common good" if both parties have conflicting agendas, and there's no common understanding if both parties have different ways of reaching a conclusion.

I believe there may be a solution. To achieve compromise men may need to take the initiative and address arguments that make women feel differently about men being treated unequally; that is demonstrate that the devastating consequences of men being denied equal rights in areas like false accusations and family law will in the long run be more painful for the majority of women than individual women no longer being able to get away with as much when the systemic injustice against men is exposed. Whether false accusation, unfair child support or alimony, unfair division of property, or unfair custody and visitation, more women in the man's family are hurt by an unjust court ruling than the single woman who benefits. The man's mother, sisters, aunts, daughters, and new significant other may suffer terribly because he suffers, and because they'll stop at nothing to support him.

Stop at nothing may be what they need to do because it's clear that the battle to end discrimination against men can't be won without their help. Men are designed for war against neighboring villages not for defending ourselves against our "helpless women" whom we find it difficult to hold to account for anything.

We can't even learn from the hard lessons learned by other men because part of being "manly" is refusing to pay attention of common difficulties men face in our dealings with women. Consequently when men are confronted with gender inequity in divorce, false accusations etc. they'll face it alone and lose. Being "manly" means he'll take responsibility for his defeat in this system that's so rigged winning is impossible. As a result he and other men will be ashamed to share their stories. With all the injustice so invisible he'll get no sympathy from the legions of other men who haven't had their eyes opened by their own struggles, and who haven't taken the time to become informed. They'll just look down on him as being weak for having lost. On top of this women will band together to heap on scorn and abuse for him defending himself against a woman. They won't relent until the man is forced to accept his defeat. All this makes it difficult for men to come together to make a change. We men may have left our ancestral villages to conquer nations and may have subdued the unknown perils of the ocean to discover the new world, but facing the shaming circle of the village's fishwives we have always conceded victory.

Surprisingly I agree women should continue to have the privileged social position this lopsided situation demonstrates. Men's chivalry and protection of women has been around for much longer than feminism and will likely be around long after feminism is gone. Under most circumstances where men have some leadership role in the relationship both men and women feel positively about the man putting his duty to protect and provide for women and children before his own needs and safety. It's probably a natural state of affairs because any society that did otherwise is extinct. But a man taking responsibility for putting women first goes with empowering men to disabuse themselves of women who behave badly or fail to support him. We 're at a warped point in history in which the feminist state has so deeply involved itself in relationships it has broken the contract between men and women. Where men would simply leave a bad wife, refuse to take responsibility for a loose woman's child that in all probability wasn't his, or ignore a woman who drunkenly agreed to sex and then cried rape the next day from shame and regret, men today are now completely blocked from acting in our own interests to solve our own problems. We're forced to appeal to the feminist state which has effectively decreed men are always wrong in any dispute. We've become so disenfranchised that the rewards for taking on the chivalrous "leader and protector" roles men always aspired to are vanishing. In marriage for example the only recourse men have is to play the odds of getting reamed in divorce if it doesn't work out, to endure a completely emasculating and unsatisfactory marriage, or to opt out of marriage or cohabitation altogether.

Societies still rely heavily on men, and no society can prosper if men are so disenfranchised. Men aren't asking for special status as "victims", we don't need help, we just need the law to stop actively enslaving us to women. If weren't so shackled by the law that we can't act in our own self-interest we would've corrected feminism ourselves as we've always solved our own problems. But where we are now is needing women to allow the state to give us equal rights in our relationships with them. For that to happen we need to show women AND feminist men that allowing men equal rights is in women's interest too.

This shouldn't be a difficult argument to make because wherever one woman may benefit many more women on the man's side suffer, and because even that single women who benefitted is being adversely impacted by anti-male laws. As an example, though women primarily benefit from no fault divorce that are commonly interpreted as "no fault" means "his fault" , it's no fault divorce that's reduced lifetime alimony and made being a homemaker such an uncertain occupation that women feel they have no other choice than to keep a career. Women openly acknowledge that as a result they now work too much, face criticism from all quarters for neglecting their husbands and families, complain their husbands don't do enough at home, then divorce in greater numbers than ever to end up living life alone. Rather than being happier women are now unhappier than ever.

So the MRM may have started with the many well constructed points we men have gathered like big sharpened sticks for the coming gender war. But a great many women aren't vulnerable to such hard logic. We have to broaden our strategy to include some carrots to lull them across enemy lines as in reality it's less of a gender war we're confronting than it is a challenge facing both men and women. We've always needed each other too much for complete victory in favor of either sex to lead anywhere but towards mutual destruction. Feminism is winning but it will be the end of marriage when men are forced to completely surrender and this is not a victory for women. The destruction of marriage will be followed by the destruction of innovation and economic prosperity as marriage is not only an incentive for men to pursue both, but it's also the best environment to nurtures children to have these qualities. To avert the end, somehow we need to help women understand that women need men to have the right to be men for women to fully realize their right to be happy being women.

The Beard-Yanking Russian Lady

I thought you guys might appreciate a funny little story from Riga, so I'll tell it.

It was late in the evening, and there was little to do besides watch CNN International. Although I was happy with Latvian food, I hadn't stocked up sufficiently, and I wasn't tired, so I thought I'd go see what a burger tasted like in the Baltic states.

First I went down to Hesburger, a Finnish burger chain that's pretty popular in the region, but Hesburger was closed. Fortunately, there was a McDonald's around the corner, so I started on my way there. McDonald's in Riga is located right on the edge of the Old Town, which is the scenic core of Riga.

The Old Town is full of beautiful old buildings of the Hanseatic style, churches, narrow, winding alleys and, above all, bars and clubs. From Thursday through Saturday, it's full of people and cheer every evening till daybreak. Groups of young men and women roam the streets from bar to bar, making noise and having fun. People come from the entire region to enjoy Riga's Old Town, and I was lucky enough to be staying there. I met Norwegians, Russians, Swedes, Finns, English, Irish, Germans, Poles and more. Oddly, there were very few Americans. This being the case, people tended to assume I was Norwegian (thanks to my Norwegian grandmother and Anglo-Norman ancestry I look that way) until I opened my mouth.

As I slowly made my way to the McDonald's, I was approached by a rather hefty young woman who began speaking to me in Russian. She could easily have passed for a suburban American girl, being rather on the large side, but not all that bad-looking overall. I soon told her in English that I couldn't speak Russian, so she asked me whether I was British or Scandinavian.

"No, I'm American," I responded.

She replied, saying "You don't look like an American," upon which I told her "America is a big country."

She then said "you have such beautiful blue eyes," asking "why don't you buy me a drink?"

"I'm sorry," I said "I've already got a woman."

This rejection angered her, and she said something sharp in Russian, then told me to get rid of my beard. Before I knew what was happening, she pinched my beard and started yanking on it. Having made her point about the beard, she then reached for my collar and took hold of my chest hair, pulling it hard.

I was a bit shocked, but kept my composure. Somehow, I managed to avoid even wincing from the pain. I really had no idea what to say, so I told her "you are quite a strong woman." Shortly thereafter, her embarrassed friend whisked her away, and I went on to order a burger and onion rings.

For the most part, women in the region are reserved, but apparently Russian ladies are a breed apart — especially when they've been drinking. I would advise the adventurous American traveler to keep this in mind while traveling in northern Europe, but not to let it frighten him too much. The key, I think, is to keep your cool.

Following is a video from a couple days ago at the exact spot and same McDonald's where this hair-pulling incident occurred. A dustup between Russians results in some fisticuffs (one guy gets knocked out cold) and a contentious arrest. Note that it is 6AM and the parties to the scuffle had probably been up all night drinking:

Dear Mom

I've never written anything here for Mother's Day before, because I didn't think it was all that relevant to the site. But we all have mothers, and for the most part we love them, and they love us.

So, in the spirit of Mother's Day, I'll write a few things I'm thankful for. Not too much, because mostly we appreciate our mothers privately, as the relationship between parent and child is intimate and deeply personal. But I do have to admit I got lucky. I've got a pretty good mom. Not all of my friends were so fortunate, but I sincerely hope more kids can say the same at some point in the future, despite how bleak it looks today.

So here goes…

Dear Mom,

Thanks for being an honorable woman. There's little I appreciate about you more than your adherence to moral standards and your inherent sense of what's right and wrong.

Thanks for being such a hard worker, and pulling us through some hard times. I know it wasn't easy, and you deserve a lot of quality time in the garden and with the grandkids when you retire.

Thanks for staying healthy and setting a good example for me and my sister. We haven't followed it perfectly, but it's always been on our mind, and I'm convinced it's helped prevent our habits from getting out of control.

Thank you for always being a great conversation partner. All those hours we've spent talking have enriched my life a great deal, and have given me the confidence and ability to stand up and speak my mind.

Thanks for never getting between me and my dad and his family. We all know he wasn't perfect, but you let me love him and get to know him on my own terms, and you always treated him with humanity and decency, and I'll be eternally grateful for that.

Finally, thanks for being an all-around decent person. Moms like you are a real treasure.

With gratitude

Your Son

Book Review: The Closing of the American Mind

Elusive Wapiti · 14 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: The Closing of the American Mind, by Allan Bloom.

Summary: In this 25 year old book, Mr. Bloom, a former college professor at the University of Chicago, argued that the minds of Americans have become 'closed' by being indiscriminately open to all comers. He explains this initially contradictory claim by comparing the textbook definition of openness…the search for the good, the correct, and the banishing of ignorance by applying reason…with what has become the conventional definition of openness in modern discourse: the openness of an mind that accepts everything equally and refusing to employ (or even suppresses) reason's power to judge 'good' and 'bad'. In Bloom's characterization, the Western mind has regressed to a pre-Western Civ state…a mind characterized by openness is 'beyond good and evil' (a concept found in Classical and older civilizations), and because the good life neither valued nor actively sought, ideas are given more or less equal weight when encountered. The American mind first spurned, then forgot its heritage and consequently floats along, adrift in a stream of values about which it no longer cares (or is permitted) to discriminate. Thus, virtue in the mind of the modern American is no longer found in being right or correct, or in correcting past mistakes, but in being open, tolerant, non-judgemental. The open-cum-closed mind does not look back to analyze the past, only forward to the next judgement-free encounter.

In openness-land, the only real vice is intolerance toward the new. Mr. Bloom worried about this new openness and what it means for American and Western culture when the received wisdom of tradition and the acquired wisdom of over a millennia of Scholasticism is rejected in favor of all kinds of men, credos, and lifestyles. As America from its inception was a radical experiment in natural rights and natural equality, it did not possess an aristocracy per se, an elite class where culture and wisdom were maintained and transmitted to the next generation for the entire people. Instead, the American anti-aristocratic model depended on the university to educate its citizens directly, regardless of social class, to inculcate a desire to seek virtue, and to motivate them toward seeking and living the "good life". Instead, today, "men are [no longer] permitted to seek the natural human good and admire it when found", for that is discriminatory and intolerant. Thus tradition and Western natural law are neutralized and the Western tradition of critical self-reflection, a tool unique to Western Civilization (other cultures and civilizations see no reason to test their cultures or their habits, their cultures are just fine, thank you very much) and a feature that enabled its greatness, is reduced to merely critique. Our past is shameful because it was so 'closed', our culture is flawed (because its past is flawed), and our beliefs are merely accidents of our place in the stream of time and as a result, our preferences are only that…accidents.

Similarly, not only is the American university adrift, but when young Americans arrive at university, they are vessels largely devoid of a sense of virtue or moral clarity. Their minds are tabulae rasa and, mirroring the decline in the universities–nobody believes the old books written by dead white men could contain any truth useful for us know-it-all moderns–the family has also retreated from its traditional role as the transmitter of knowledge and tradition. In its place enters media and the schools, as parents seem to > lack self-confidence as educators of their children, generously believing they will be better than their parents, not only in well-being, but in moral, bodily, and intellectual virtue. There is always a more or less open belief in progress, which means the past appears poor and contemptible. The future, which is open-ended, cannot be prescribed to by parents, and it eclipses the past which they know to be inferior [emphasis mine]

A moral education, which to be effective, according to Mr. Bloom, must present to the pupil "a vision of the moral universe, reward for good, punishment for evil, the drama of moral choices", and a sense of the stakes involved in such choices. Mere 'values education' in the school system does not suffice, it is but the wind, with no anchor to hold it in place. Furthermore, Mr. Bloom argues that the lack of exposure to great literature from the past stunts the educated citizen's ability to identify evil, as those who have not read the great books doubt evil's existence, despite the fact that they witness horrible crimes and see many many more on the news. The citizen-student, open and adrift as he is, lacks an awareness of both the depths and the heights.

Mr. Bloom argued that this openness of indifference extends to human relationships as well. The American mind has become sharply egocentric, self-focused, defensive, and inwardly directed. Openness as the ultimate virtue drives a radical egalitarianism, with the result that the culture no longer recognizes no practical differentiation between any persons. When observable differences do surface, as they do most often with race, ethnicity and sex, they are denied, engineered away, or made taboo. Truth and reason are abused to maintain the openness-egalitarian narrative when the facts say otherwise–"the recalcitrant matter of the is gave way before the practical and philosophical ought to be"–resulting in racial and ethnic bribery for NAMs and sex-based set-asides for women. All in the name of forcing the unequal to be equal, an attempt to restore the equilibrium of sameness the closed mind seeks.

In addition, this openness-egalitarianism has wedged the sexes apart. Bloom wrote, channelling Socrates, that "equal treatment of women necessitates the removal of all the old kind of sexual relations…and a consequent loss of the human connections that resulted from them which [Socrates] replaces with the common good of a city". Men and women are thus undifferentiated in custom and in law, sex loses much of its significance for men and women, except as a purely recreational activity, and a feminism takes root hat denies nature, denies the truth of sexual differentiation, homogenizes and suppresses relationships between the sexes.

In Bloom's account, this closing of the American mind has a long and distinguished pedigree. He locates it in three events, the Enlightenment, the absolute defeat of Rousseauean philosophy in favor of the Lockean variety, and a misinterpretation and misapplication of Nietzschean philosophy. The Enlightenment dethroned God and promoted man and his ability to reason in its place. Religion, by definition virtue-prescriptive, was marginalized to the realm of opinion and myth and, because it is but one opinion or creed among others, it has little definitive knowledge to offer about the human condition and the soul. Locke advanced this ball further downfield, realigning virtue from the difficult task of loving one's brother to 'enlightened self interest'. No longer was agape a virtue, no longer was the man who cared for others virtuous, but instead the most virtuous man became he who cared for himself the most:

> The old commandment that we love our brothers made impossible demands on us, demands against nature, while doing nothing to provide for real needs. What is required is not brotherly love or faith, hope, and charity, but self-interested rational labor. The man who contributes most to relieving human misery is the one who produces most, and the surest way of getting him to do so is not by exhorting him, but by rewarding him most handsomely to sacrifice present pleasure for the sake of future benefit, or so assure avoidance of pain.

Locke encouraged his fellow man to love life, liberty, and the pursuit of property above all other things. The protestations of his antithesis, Rousseau, that such a proto-utilitarian philosophy left man's spiritual side unattended and bereft were largely ignored, leaving the modern man spiritually adrift, or as Mr. Bloom wrote, 'flat-souled'. Into this nexus then came Nietzsche and other great German thinkers. Nietzsche recognized how Lockean philosophy stifled and hobbled man's soul and encouraged him to become something bigger than a selfish economic agent. In writing about the new world that awaits the man that looses his spirit, Nietzsche wrote " Gott ist tot " in reference to the power that man has to shape his future were he to only will it so. Here, Mr. Bloom claims that Nietzsche's prouncement was not so much a triumph, as is commonly thought, but was instead a lament…was this all there is? Bloom then asserts that the Enlightenment forces hostile to religion from the get-go seized upon this confirmation of God's death and used that as the jumping off point for an aggressive religious and dogmatic atheism…thus transforming Nietzsche into a hero of the Left, where he would more properly be a Rightist. What started as an attempt to realize natural law, reason, ever the devil's whore, slowly becomes an auto-immune disorder.

Enter now the Frankfurt School, a nihilistic leftist philosophic school that fled Germany in the 20s and 30s, ironically escaping an aggressive instantiation of their nihilistic and leftist philosophy. First coming to Columbia University, this cancer rapidly spread to the rest of the American academy, and the revolution that comes with the upending of one weltanschauung and installation of another came to a head in the 60s. In the 60s, American universities were experiencing the same turmoil and dismantling of the structure of rational inquiry as had the German university in the 30s. The result was the same however…a levelling of the populace, and the distinction between the educated and the uneducated, the diversity of many differing opinions, had given way to homogenization. No vision–or even competing visions–of what constituted an educated human was on offer, merely a keen focus on equality, which "…for us seems to culminate in the unwillingness and incapacity to make claims of superiority, particularly in the domains in which such claims have always been made–art, religion, philosophy. [Furthermore,] no one can say what "civilized" means, when there are said to be many civilizations that are all equal". Thus did the American mind close, the effect of a nihilistic abandonment of the Western rational tradition, a tradition that made room for both the mind and the spirit. Victorious, reason-based radical egalitarianism found that it had to suppress reason to maintain the hegemony of radical egalitarianist philosophy.

Commentary

One thing that is obvious to readers of this book is the inherent structural bankruptcy of the philosophy of openness. For if we are not to think our way better than others, then what tools do we have to tell right from wrong? Some of us have religion, the remainder of the polity has merely the direction of the herd to shape their values and ethics. In other words, there is nothing but the mob. Perhaps this is the very point…how easy it is to shape the behavior and tastes of a mob, what with compulsory public schooling, an agenda-driving media selecting what issues are worth discussing and which are not, and advertising that teaches what goods are to be desired and which are not. Freethinking? I think not.

Something else, too: What chance does Western civilization have if it is peopled by those who either think Western civilization should be destroyed or those who think it gauche to think it preferable to other civilizations. I think this has profound implications for the West as we adapt to challenges from Islamic and Sinic civilizations, two civilizations who do not suffer from the profound self-loathing that the West seems to have at the moment. Will the West summon the will to carry on?

Additionally, being an MRA of sorts, I found what Mr. Bloom had to say wrt relations between the sexes of particular interest. Of the state of the male sex in an egalitarian society, he had this to say way back in 1987:

> de Tocqueville describes the tip of the iceberg of advanced egalitarianism when he discusses the difficulty that a man without family lands, or a family tradition for whose continuation he is responsible, will have in avoiding individualism and seeing himself to be an integral part of a past and a future, rather than as an autonomous atom in a merely changing continuum

On this point, Mr. Bloom was very prescient. 1987 was just a few years after 'peak divorce', the revolution that divested men from their families and initiated a self-reinforcing cycle of family breakup, made both men and women both think that the male is not a necessary component to the family, a nice-to-have luxury, certainly not essential. We see now, 25 years later, the effects of advanced egalitarianism, most notably in rising rates of commitment avoidance and rational slackerhood. I do not think most men really see themselves as part of a living society, with a past and certainly a future that he can be a part of. Instead, he lives only for himself, and is wary of the sort of social entanglements that his forefathers took for granted as part of the role of a patriarch.

I found myself also wondering if the increasing lack of substantive differentiation among men and women, legally and socially, is fuelling the rise in availability and acceptability of pornography both for men (visual) and for women (romance novellas). It seems that, since sex differences are denied except for when advantage can be accrued to the female, genuine sex itself loses its power among otherwise undifferentiated men and women. What remains of the sex act then is a hollow shell, the industrialized rubbing of genitalia, somewhat satisfying but yet still leaving the practitioner wondering if there was more, wondering why their forebears fussed so about sex and relationships, not missing what they don't know. Furthermore, perhaps men and women are increasingly turning to porn in an unconscious effort to re-establish that differentiation, to regain what they don't know in their head they've lost but their flesh still cries for nonetheless.

An another thought that came to mind while reading Mr. Bloom's manuscript was how adopting the virtue of openness replaced the old, former sex-differentiated virtues for men and particularly for women, responsibility and modesty, respectively. Instead of modesty, female sexuality is instead ubiquitous…it is nigh upon impossible for a man to walk down the street without individual women or advertisements featuring women attempting to manipulate him through displays of sexual imagery. What's more, the culture is absolutely unable to resist this trend; slut-shaming is not very tolerant, ergo verboten, and 'blaming the victim' is an offense of a very high order. Similarly, although somewhat less so, virtue for men does not appreciably contain elements of responsibility; indeed, responsibility is something to be avoided when possible, viz., the rise in cohabitative unions, low and falling levels of male community engagement, working only enough to satisfy one's individual needs, etc. While the old patriarchal society is no more, it was replaced by a functionally matriarchal one, and male responsibility, unlike female modesty, is still enforced vigorously by the State through chalimony, property division, and state transfer payments.

In conclusion, I found this a very worthwhile book, although the writing was at times very difficult to penetrate and could be much more compact. That said, the author did an outstanding job of imparting to the reader a sense of history, of a thread leading straight from the Enlightenment through the social contract theorists to German philosophers and forward to the Frankfurt School to the state of modern American academia.

The biggest financial decision a young man will ever make

With the college year heading to a close, if you're a young man in the graduating class of 2012 you'll soon be heading out into the world to begin achieving your real life goals. Whatever those goals may be, your choice of career as well as the economic conditions affecting that career will help you achieve the financial well-being you need to get there. But chances are that right now you see these decisions ahead more as chores than life defining choices. Unlike earlier generations who expected a loyal relationship with their first employer for a lifetime, odds are you won't stay at whatever job you choose for more than the current average of 4.4 years. However consider that this is longer than your entire college studies and that by the end of your first stretch of employment your career will largely be committed to a given industry, a given set of specialist skills, and a given market. Your salary and advancement prospects will be heavily determined by the health of that industry and the choice of skills you've decided to specialize in. That first employment contract while not drawn in blood, will nevertheless set your life irrevocably on some course you may not yet completely understand the implications of when you sign.

Your choice of career isn't the only decision that'll determine whether you'll achieve the financial well being to realize your life goals. Regardless of what level of income you're making, a number of other decisions you'll soon start planning for are just as critically important to every young man:

Bizarrely absent from anyone's list is the decision to get married at all. Having just gone through a divorce myself and having read hundreds upon hundreds of other divorces cases, it came as a shock to learn that working hard in a well chosen career, being financially responsible, doing one's best to chose a mate, being a good husband and father, and being quite successful at all these things for twenty or thirty years will not save a man from divorce hitting the reset button on his life and setting him back 10-20 yrs or more in terms of his financial well being.

She may leave at a whim and still get unfairly rewarded despite her having a good job, but it gets worse. When she gets the house in all likelihood she'll get the contents of that house. Unless you have a notarized list of your property at marriage (you'd have one if you got a prenup and it wasn't set aside by the judge as many are) this means she'll get your stuff too. A man having to replace or to go without most or all of the possessions he's acquired during his entire adult life will put him back even further. This not uncommon scenario also applies to those who decide to cohabit instead of marrying if you buy property in a jurisdiction where a woman will get half of your property if she just cohabits with you.

Of course all of these warnings will sound very impotent to young men just setting out to conquer the world. You haven't yet lost the invincibility of boyhood so by this point in the article your eyes might have glazed over. Being a young man myself not too long ago I can empathize. A young man at the top of his game can still stop bullets, become invisible, and gain secret ninja powers just by drinking a glass of tequila. His quest to subdue the world naturally leaves no time to listen to old men whine about men's lack of rights in divorce. But at the same time I hope you don't fail to take note and remain open to learning a little about what you might be in for. Marriage may have been found to have health and economic benefits for the men who never get divorced, but divorce has devastating financial and health consequences and a significantly increased risk of depression and suicide for the larger percentage of men who do. Divorced men for example are six times more likely to commit suicide. Before entering into marriage men need to know the odds are so stacked against them in divorce that the failure of a marriage literally can kill a man.

Unfortunately you can't predict whether your partner will change for the worse even if they seem like a good choice of partner now, and regardless of whether you find a "good" woman the virulently anti-male divorce laws still encourage her to take your shit and leave with the kids when it suits her, because after all she can. You can't change these anti-male divorce laws on demand when your marriage is suddenly on the rocks, and even if divorce laws change on their own to be more fair for men you can't predict they won't change back against you. So if despite all these risks marriage is still one of your eventual goals it may be in your interest to reduce your financial exposure through the following steps:

1. Make sure she earns as much or more than you do and that she agrees to go back to work 3 to 6 months after having children. Mind you this promise bears no weight whatsoever in a divorce court. Divorce is no fault. She has the absolute right to change her mind or to falsely represent her intentions, and you have no right to withdraw from the marriage without penalty on the grounds that she lied. Unfortunately this artificially raises of the market value of the older, more educated, higher earning, and often far more unpleasant women you'll be stuck with as opposed to the younger more attractive, more fertile, and more pleasantly compliant women you would otherwise prefer, and this is exactly what feminism wants. Chalk it up as a strategic loss.

2. Rent. Don't buy a marital residence together. In most jurisdictions the marital residence is treated differently from other assets. Usually it'll be split 50-50. Depending on the length of the marriage and your own investment this split might be ruinously unfair for you. You may been very proud of your home purchase, thinking you'd be getting a 35% return on your investment due to the increase in real estate values over the last ten years. Your investment will look more pitiful than Florida swampland after you give 50% of the worth of the house to your well-employed spouse who invested nothing. Also women get attached to houses, so even if you made sure that you both contributed equally to the mortgage, getting your share of the equity from her may take expensive litigation.

3. Seek a career with as much capacity for self-employment as possible. Becoming self-employed is the only way to avoid having your wages garnished if you're hit with the grotesquely unfair child support or alimony payments that millions of men are punished with. These payments are by law supposed to be restricted to a certain percentage of your income. However judges can at whim assign you a fictitious income that you "should" be making and calculate support payments based on that. This may result in you having to pay over 100% of your entire salary in support unless you want to face garnishment or jail. Self-employment gives you some control.

4. If you feel you're the type of man who'll get very attached to any children make sure to spend 50% of time with them doing their homework or taking part in their activities so that after separation there's a slightly better chance the courts won't deny you any meaningful role in the children's lives. Even today custody goes to the mother in the vast majority of cases. For up to thirty percent of men the experience of being told by the court they have no value in their children's lives makes fatherhood so painful and humiliating they end up withdrawing from their children's lives entirely.

5. Live in a more modest neighborhood where you'll be able to afford an apartment close to the marital home so you'll still be able to get joint custody after divorce if you're forced to leave the home. Otherwise you'll effectively be paying her to deny you the opportunity to be a father.

This may seem like planning for divorce but in a very real way it's planning for marriage success. A successful marriage for most men is one in which you get to keep your balls rather than face a lifetime of ridicule because you've become so spineless with your wife that you've grown the sopping wet mangina you now sport in place of men's parts. Through your frustration at home you might even synch with your wife's cycle and begin to develop "monthly feminine emotional issues" with your co-workers as you drag your 'gina to work with you every day. Don't believe you're immune. Divorce today is so ruinous and so stacked in women's favor it even warps the power dynamic within marriages, as every harsh word from your formerly soft spoken high school sweetheart becomes an unspoken threat to sodomize you in divorce court. As much of an all American stud as you may be, many a better man than you has found himself middle aged and pitifully emasculated by such an endlessly entitled and demanding princess twenty years down the road.

The "red pill" wisdom to avoid these pitfalls not only will help you avoid doing marriage badly, but it also might have a revolutionary impact on society as a whole in that it gives boys about to enter college unprecedented freedom to rethink their life path. Because if the whole modern marriage and family thing is such a losing proposition it makes sense for young men to reconsider their goals even before going into college. If marriage and family aren't safe options because having his finances tied to the explosive temper of an entitled wife doesn't sound like it's for him then right from high school a young man's goal entering college isn't simply to earn more money to increase his value in the marriage market. Recognizing this so early and having enough GAME that he doesn't have to rely on money to get tail frees boys to choose a more rewarding college program. High school boys will soon have to make decisions about what they'll be doing next year. Many will find themselves contemplating that although the "College Years" can really be the best time of your life, it's not only important for you to choose the right school to gain the most out of the experience, but also to consider that although choosing a program that will offer financial well being is important, what you need to keep a wife happy and what you need to pay your bills while you pursue your passion if you forego marriage are two different things.

I admit this kind of freedom isn't for everyone. Not having to compromise for a woman means you have the absolute freedom to achieve as much as you set out to do, or as little as your faltering courage allows you to take on. So lose yourself in perfecting whatever craft you've devoted yourself to. Bet your entire prime years on some game changing idea. There'll be no one to hold you back, but also no one to blame. You are living life at its most terrifying heights "without wires".

I don't caution you young men against marriage lightly. There are countless others who'll tell you the same. It's food for thought that feminized laws in virtually all western democracies have so changed marriage that "marriage strike" has become a common meme in the manosphere. Marriage is now only a contract where men's responsibilities are concerned. Men are brutally penalized as being solely responsible for a marriage's failure while women are absolved of all consequences for frivolously breaking their vows.

Though marriage unquestionably makes a better environment for raising kids deciding against marriage doesn't mean deciding against children. In fact I hope my son gives me grandkids and I'd be crushed if he didn't. But I've seen how abusive the courts are to men, and having been brutalized by the courts myself, being unable to help him escape some divorce court judge subjecting him to the same subhuman treatment would send me to an early grave. Even if his marriage lasts I pray I don't have to spend my retirement years watching him be endlessly emasculated from fear of a reaming in divorce. An ounce of prevention is in order. Marriage is now so dangerous for men that you need to think seriously about how to defuse the threat or seriously consider avoiding it. However for the many young men who'll ignore this message of caution, though I'm deeply concerned I'm also hopeful because ignoring the words of past generations is what makes young men so inventive. I may be convinced that marriage today is nearly impossible for men to render harmless, but for every old man like myself who said "it couldn't be done" there's a young man busy being successful at doing it. So in the end many of you will focus only on earning to increase your value in the marriage market rather than worrying about mitigating risks of marriage itself. This has always been the way of men and I'll be rooting that the dice roll your way. As you work tirelessly to achieve great success, perhaps even over extending yourself financially, you may be able to give your wife a big house, one or more nice cars, a nanny, maybe even a pool. But I've been around long enough to know that where there's risk there are some who'll pay consequences. So after the family court forces you out into a one bedroom apartment under the train tracks on the other side of town I'll be no less sympathetic that you spent so much time at work the pool boy screwing her is the only one really enjoying your house with its big screen and hi-tech three hundred dollar remote.

Yes as a young man you'll be tempted to ignore this hard dose of truth if it appears to be more whining coming from a bitter middle aged man. So the absolute last thing I'd want to tell you is that I'm bitter. Truth is I've escaped most of the above calamities. But I also have to be honest in saying that I can't help resenting the older generation of men for not having given me this advice when I was younger, which is why I'm spreading the knowledge to you. Am I bitter about that the older generation of men didn't talk more about the truth? Yes I am. But information is always empowering whenever it comes. You have the God given right to take what you will from this, figure out a strategy that works for YOU, and take no prisoners in your execution while getting yours. Whatever you decide myself and many other "old guys" will be cheering you on. If we're lucky YOU will take up the torch to blaze a new path and discover wisdom that will protect our own young sons in turn.

Decoding The Behavior Of American Women

By Joe Zamboni

Definition: Hypergamy is a word that most men never heard of, but it is essential that all heterosexual men know not only what it is, but also how it works. The concept posits that that adult women are endlessly looking for the bigger-better-deal when it comes to men. They will abandon their husband, boyfriend, lover, friend, whoever the man is, if it means that they can hook-up with a more powerful, more famous, and/or richer man. Don't think that just because you the man have done pretty well along these lines, that you are not subject to the instant departure of a woman who has been with you for a long time. Loyalty is nothing in comparison to the force of hypergamy. Words of commitment, diamond rings on their fingers, public promises for "better or worse," all that means nothing. Their sense of self-interest and their looking to trade-up outweigh every other consideration.

Millions of years of evolutionary processes have brought this about. Women needed protection and resources, in order to be taken care of, and in order to make sure that their children were taken care of. The women who were successful with this strategy were the ones who got to reproduce and create the next generation. And they went on to teach their daughters how to use this same hypergamy strategy. Over time, women leveraged the notion of chivalry and got men to support new laws to facilitate this same strategy (no fault divorce laws for example). Hypergamy has for eons simply been a matter of survival. You the man can have your own reaction to that fact, including perhaps deluding yourself that you have found a "woman who is different." But watch out, when the bigger-better-deal comes along, she may be out the door in a "New York minute."

Differences: The classic philosophers like Aristotle and Locke — while brilliant and enlightened men — did not understand women. They appealed to conceptual ethics like fairness, honesty, loyalty, and truth. This is how men think and operate; these notions are what men use to make decisions. Men need to get that women don't operate that way. Women are biologically and genetically programmed to go with the bigger-better-deal. Feminist rhetoric about equality is nothing in the face of hypergamy. Women act this way unconsciously; it is part of their most basic and fundamental makeup.

Women will take great care to make it seem as though they support their man's values, but that is because they want to be part of the man's winning team. But when the bigger-better-deal comes along, they will instantly change their values so that they can better merge with the new man's scene. No matter how good things are for women, they will always be looking out for the more advantageous situation.

The speed with which women "change" can, and often does, shock their husbands. When these women ask for a divorce, many men are truly taken off guard. This is because they have been taken in by women's representations that they share their man's values. Be warned, this "alignment" of values is in most cases not the truth at all. In spite of what appearances may indicate, women did not change their values, they simply changed the man they were hooked-up with. If a particular woman truly shares a man's values, she should have been acting in life the way he was before they met, and she should have been acting this same way while outside an intimate relationship. Be wary when a woman takes up a new interest in a cause or hobby at the same time she hooks-up with a particular man. She most likely is not genuinely interested in that cause or hobby, she is simply interested in hooking up with that man. Like a chameleon, she is simply adapting, simply making herself compatible with his winning world.

Denial: So many men delude themselves with the well-worn phrase "not all women are like that" (NAWALT). So for example you may say, "yes, many women are like that, but my woman is devoted and loyal." But really, come on, what hard evidence is there that she demonstrably acted that way before you came along? And what prevents her from abandoning that value if and when the bigger-better-deal comes along? If you really get this, you will see that it is no mistake that 70% of American divorces are now initiated by women. Many of them are simply trading-up to the bigger-better-deal, or at least they hope to soon do so. And big daddy government with the welfare, child support, alimony, and other subsidies especially for women in many cases is the bigger-better-deal.

Most men (and women) don't want to admit the operation of hypergamy, but it is absolutely critical that heterosexual men understand how women operate in this regard. It is especially important to get this before these men get married (note — this author is strongly discouraging marriage). Unless you the man have really gotten this point, you will be surprised and shocked, you will feel abandoned and disillusioned, and you will feel betrayed and conned. You need to get that the marriage vows "for better and for worse," and "for richer and for poorer" — all that is bullshit. These words are words that the man must by law live by, not the woman. They are one-sided obligations; they are totally inconsistent with real-world women's hypergamy-related behavior.

This is not a pleasant point to admit, but if heterosexual men operate in the dark on this point, they are severely disadvantaged, and they will accordingly most likely be exploited by women. Why do women love romance novels? It's about the taming and submission of men, the getting of men to serve women's interests. Romance novels are female porn. Because they are dreams of being protected and provided for, exactly the way they want to be — by rich, powerful, and famous men. Read a few of these romance novels to really understand this. You only need to read a few — they are pretty much all focused on different variations on this same hypergamy theme. One recent hit along these lines is Fifty Shades Of Grey, by E.L. James.

To the extent that men buy into the Hollywood romance bullshit, they operate in a fog of infatuation, and then they can be led to think that women share their values. Hollywood romance is about as far away from reality as you can get. Sure, happily ever after, fading into the sunset, that would be nice. But get men who have been married and divorced to honestly level with you, and they will tell you that the Hollywood romance story is total bullshit. It's a society-supported con game that seeks to lure men into marriage. Women deeply believe that they need a man to take care of them. Women thus endlessly seek men who are going to provide and protect, no matter what the feminists tell them. A couple of decades of feminist indoctrination cannot overcome thousands of years of evolution.

The relationship between the sexes is and always has been by its very nature asymmetrical. What is expected of men is very different from and unequal to what is expected of women. More is being asked of men, and women know it. So there must be a protracted and drawn-out process of convincing the man to get married. In support of this process, women engage in all sorts of cons and deceits in order to convince the bigger-better-deal that they are the woman for him. This convincing process includes making the man believe that they view the world in the same way he does. Make-up, hair-color, push-up bras, breast augmentation surgery, and many other methods and devices are only more marketing and deceit on the part of women so that they can attract and land the bigger-better-deal. It's a hunting process, and the men are the prey.

Intentions: From the female perspective, mating is fundamentally a search for security. That's one big reason why women push for marriage. Marriage makes men responsible to protect and provide for a woman, in legal ways that he was not obligated to deliver up until that point. Marriage is the primary mechanism that women use to leverage themselves up the ladder, up to the next bigger-better-deal. Of course, even though they are no longer with the woman involved, the prior husbands are still expected to provide (less so protect these days since government is doing more of that).

The modern intention for American women is to get several asset splits with different men as a result of divorces, and add to that several income streams (primarily alimony and child support), ideally having all the income streams all going at the same time. It's a pretty great deal if you can do it, and the most conniving and most attractive of women can pull it off. But that doesn't stop the other women from attempting to pull off the same con job. The only thing standing in the way of this continued exploitation of men is men's full awareness of the game.

Application: If you the man really understand hypergamy, then all sorts of social practices that previously had no logical explanation will all of sudden start to make sense. Why for example are men still expected to pay for dates? Of course, it is preparation for marriage, and the providing and protecting that men are supposed to be delivering within the institution of marriage. Paying for dates is a "shit test" that men have to put up with in order to "prove" themselves to women. If a particular man will pay for dates, then he will probably also later pay alimony and child support.

As a man, the best ways for you to protect yourself against this force of this evolutionary history, against the hypergamy push of heterosexual women, is to: (1) not have any children (“the snip” is strongly recommended), (2) not cohabitate with a woman, and (3) not get married. The justifying details behind these three recommendations are beyond the scope of this article, but if you simply remember these three recommendations, you are going to be far ahead of your exploited and conned brethren in the brotherhood of men.

VAWA Immigration Provisions Face Elimination

In the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act, House Republicans removed parts of provisions granting immigrants who gain residence on the basis of marriage the right to claim abuse and then file for permanent residence status without cooperation from their spouses. Ordinarily, if you marry an American and want to become a resident, you have to go through a process that proves your marriage was not simply for the purposes of gaining residence, but actually a bona-fide marriage. The entire process takes a few years, and involves interviews, forms, and other bureaucratic hurdles. Your husband or wife has to cooperate, so if the marriage falls apart quickly, you could face loss of legal residence status and have to leave the US.

However, VAWA provides a loophole. A spouse can claim abuse, and if she has any evidence, such as a police report or medical records, she may be able to leave their husband and still become a permanent resident. Given how easy it is to have American men arrested (all it takes is a phone call and an allegation, and false accusations of domestic violence are rarely if ever punished), this provision is an invitation to make a creative accusation. Additionally, making a police report is a simple matter, and one can say just about anything to the cops. However, what makes it even worse is that the process is confidential. What this means is that a foreign wife can accuse the husband without him even knowing that she is doing so, leaving him no opportunity to defend himself. Furthermore, he cannot access any of the information submitted to the federal government in an effort to defend himself in civil or criminal court, nor can he submit evidence to the Department of Homeland Security, which leaves the alleged victim free to say whatever she wants, whether it is consistent with local court affidavits or not. This setup stacks the deck so heavily against the accused that it's practically asking immigrant women to accuse their husbands of domestic violence.

Of course, MSM editorials have mainly weighed in against the proposed changes. From the LA Times:

> Eliminating the confidentiality provision is one of several changes House Republicans would like to make to weaken the law. They argue that the changes are necessary to combat fraud, in which immigrants falsely claim to have been abused in order to obtain visas. But where are the data and studies that indicate that fraud is a problem? Immigrant victims who petition for visas under VAWA are already required to supply ample evidence of abuse, such as police reports or medical records. And applications undergo intense scrutiny. In fiscal 2011, immigration officials denied nearly a third of those petitions.

You've got to love the logic here. The writer says fraud must not be a problem, because one third of these petitions are denied!

Because the war on violence against women is such a high priority in our country and feminism has enormous political power, women are usually given the benefit of the doubt. Can anyone imagine what would happen if the local police stopped responding to domestic dispute calls without clear evidence? There'd be enormous outrage from the usual quarters. So, if a third of the women claiming to have been abused are facing rejection, it's a pretty clear sign that there's a lot of fraud going on. It means a whole lot of them are lying. Given the numbers, a whole lot of them must be getting away with it, too.

The Republicans are right to remove the confidentiality provisions, because it's important for officials to hear both sides of the story, and the accused should always have the opportunity to defend themselves from being placed on a government blacklist. Neither men nor women have a monopoly on truth, but the VAWA confidentiality provision effectively grants just that to whichever spouse decides to file a petition. Removing it is a small, but helpful step in both family law and immigration reform.

Examples and more information about VAWA immigration fraud can be found here. For an example of a typical case, this story is a good read.

To put things in perspective, immigration fraud is not the usual outcome in international marriages, but it is enough of a problem to be worth dealing with.

Goodbye, Donna

Donna Summer's passing leaves me with a bit of nostalgia, because I used to hear her voice on the hi-fi stereo when I was a very little boy. I can't help but recall my dad when I hear disco, so it brings back the misty old memories of the 70s, which were his glory days.

Of course, it doesn't surprise me that Donna died relatively young, at the same age as my father (63), although a couple years later. When I look back on the lives those folks lived, I'm surprised so many of them made it that long.

Whatever the case, Donna Summer was a real pioneer. Disco may have been derided for some time, but techno and house hardly added to it, as the following 1977 video, "I Feel Love," clearly demonstrates (not a remix, believe it or not):

Additionally, the erotic element far surpassed anything on the air today. I feel sorry for today's youth, stuck as they are with the rather repulsive facsimile of a sex symbol known as Lady Gaga, among other unmentionables. Donna Summer may have been a bit over the top, but at least when you hear her getting into it there's something a bit compelling about the performance:

WOW, lets castrate him, says Child Support Enforcement Official!

Say What?

Well, Mr. Hatchett seems to be back in the news again, and the CSEA of Knoxville is "sigh"ing. Poor CSEA, they can't seem to get more than $1.59 /month for a few of the mothers who were dumb enough to sleep with this guy; how are they going to get Federal money off this guy? Too bad he is not rich, since he only makes minimum wage; it is unbearable for them since they can only garner 50% of his meager earnings. What is a CSEA agent to do?

This brief article goes on to talk about how Hatchett can't be "forced" to keep his pants on, and then quotes the local CSEA representative named Gibson with this gem: "If there's something out there like that, I'm unaware of it," Gibson told The Times, before adding, "It definitely needs to be."

WOW!

If only Rush Limbaugh, or Congress could have said that to whats her name a couple of months ago! You know, force her to keep her panties on, or at least not pay for her inability to keep them on. Maybe Sandra Fluke should have sex with this guy? She might definitely "earn" those forced Catholic school, and don't forget constitutional, benefits that she has been struggling so hard for! So we can't even allow a national radio personality to utter a bad word against someone who kills their kids for sex, and demands everyone pay for her condom/pill usage, because she is a woman; but we can have public officials publicly suggest that a man should have his junk "clipped" to benefit the State burden of TANF benefits?

The hypocrisy we weave in our nation today is staggering. We get offended, and rightfully so, when a man is so irresponsible to have knocked up 11 women thirty times. However, how is his asking for relief of child support any different then Fluke's proposal to Congress? Are they not both forcing us to pay for their careless foolishness? How does Fluke, and all her ilk, get a pass; but Hatchett gets the ax? Also, if CSEA in Knoxville gets their way, it will be the ax for Hatchett! However when any citizen cries foul about women like Fluke, it is an epidemic of misogyny?

SO WHAT?

You want to know my cure? Male birth control! Period! If Hatchett would have had a drug like Risug years ago, there would have been no issues! He could have been as sexually active as he wanted to be, like Sandra Fluke herself! Guess what? We would have heard nothing at all! Read my article on male birth control options! Parts One, and Two if you want more on that.

However, for a public official to say that he should have his tubes castrated is ridiculous! This individual won't get fired though. I am not saying they should fire this person! I just find the statement a poor choice of words! That it made print is unacceptable. But I digress, I need to make an apology!

Dear Sandra,

Though I find you a smug, repulsive, stuck-up, snobbish little &(@!(#(I said ho!), I am deeply offended that you had to endure whatever it is you claim you had to endure(because according to feminizm, and white knight manginas, I have no choice supposedly?)! I'm absolutely sure your right how unfair it is (whatever IT is!). The fact that you, like the eleven women who are surprisingly not named in above article, are incapable of keeping your panties on, and not sharing the "wealth" around like Hatchett. I think we need to throw Hatchett to the wolves in prison (like good loving fathers who control themselves do by their abusive ex wifes, like you will be someday I am sure) and give you your own parade in New York (because we all know you deserve it!). Being a ruthless witch, (I mean champion) of "women's privilege (I mean "rights") you should be celebrated for your sexual exploits! Since we refuse to allow men to have anywhere near as many options in health care as our taxes already afford women like you, we should still spend more on you to make it "fair!" I mean, you said so, right highness? Since Hatchett was too stupid to realize what "equality" means, that he does not have said options available to him (he also can't walk away like you can, thank God, read Detroitification" if you know what I mean!), we are going to throw him in prison for you! That way there is one less man to impregnate you "against your better judgement!" Unless of course this also limits your right to sleep with whom ever you please, and collect child support when health care "options" are not "keeping you interested." Just let we the American taxpayer know whatever you need ummkay sweetie?

lastly, as I am sure you can tell from my "heartfelt" apology, I think that since we are now going to castrate Hatchett, if it pleases your highness; can I make a suggestion? Maybe, if I may be so bold, you should get spade like a feral dog?! In fact, there are several people, I mean doctors, who would love to do it for free, I mean Obamacare, so you never have to worry when you do the Howard Stern Show equivalent of turning your self into amusement park for your male, female if you desire, or both, "escorts!"

I know, I am a genius when I serve the Kingdom, I mean Queendom!

Your humble servant,

Jesse James

Clues on Marriage and Sex During Roman Empire

There's been a fair amount of speculation as to what caused the decline of ancient Rome, and a number of people in the manosphere have suggested that it was in part due to the implosion of the family. The other day, I recalled Tacitus, one of Rome's most famous historians, and thought of a passage that might confirm this.

I was thinking of Germania in particular, in which Tacitus describes the tribes and customs of the Germanic peoples who caused the Roman Empire so much trouble, and eventually sacked it, setting themselves up as the barbarian lords of its remnants. In our culture, the clearest example would be the Saxon invasion of England, which occurred shortly after the collapse of Roman authority in Britannia.

In Germania, Tacitus goes into some detail about marriage and chastity amongst the German peoples. According to him, they took marriage seriously, and didn't fool around:

> Yet the laws of matrimony are severely observed there; nor in the whole of their manners is aught more praiseworthy than this: for they are almost the only Barbarians contented with one wife, excepting a very few amongst them; men of dignity who marry divers wives, from no wantonness or lubricity, but courted for the lustre of their family into many alliances.
> To the husband, the wife tenders no dowry; but the husband, to the wife. The parents and relations attend and declare their approbation of the presents, not presents adapted to feminine pomp and delicacy, nor such as serve to deck the new married woman; but oxen and horse accoutred, and a shield, with a javelin and sword. By virtue of these gifts, she is espoused. She too on her part brings her husband some arms. This they esteem the highest tie, these the holy mysteries, and matrimonial Gods. That the woman may not suppose herself free from the considerations of fortitude and fighting, or exempt from the casualties of war, the very first solemnities of her wedding serve to warn her, that she comes to her husband as a partner in his hazards and fatigues, that she is to suffer alike with him, to adventure alike, during peace or during war. This the oxen joined in the same yoke plainly indicate, this the horse ready equipped, this the present of arms. 'Tis thus she must be content to live, thus to resign life. The arms which she then receives she must preserve inviolate, and to her sons restore the same, as presents worthy of them, such as their wives may again receive, and still resign to her grandchildren.
> They therefore live in a state of chastity well secured; corrupted by no seducing shows and public diversions, by no irritations from banqueting. Of learning and of any secret intercourse by letters, they are all equally ignorant, men and women. Amongst a people so numerous, adultery is exceeding rare; a crime instantly punished, and the punishment left to be inflicted by the husband. He, having cut off her hair, expells her from his house naked, in presence of her kindred, and pursues her with stripes throughout the village. For, to a woman who has prostituted her person, no pardon is ever granted. However beautiful she be, however young, however abounding in wealth, a husband she can never find. In truth, nobody turns vices into mirth there, nor is the practice of corrupting and of yielding to corruption, called the custom of the Age. Better still do those communities, in which none but virgins marry, and where to a single marriage all their views and inclinations are at once confined. Thus, as they have but one body and one life, they take but one husband, that beyond him they may have no thought, no further wishes, nor love him only as their husband but as their marriage.6 To restrain generation and the increase of children, is esteemed an abominable sin, as also to kill infants newly born. And more powerful with them are good manners, than with other people are good laws.

What do the Germans have to do with Roman behavior? It's pretty clear that Tacitus was describing Germanic domestic relations to provide a contrast with Rome's. One can deduce typical Roman behavior from what the Germans do not do. They are not promiscuous, adultery is rare, they do not practice abortion, etc. The implication, of course, is that these are all common practices in Rome.

Sadly, this only confirms that the comparisons between our current society and Imperial Rome are justified. Additionally, given the long, painful decline of Rome, it suggests that it may take a very long time for our own degeneracy to finally lead to collapse.

John Scalzi Offers Creative Interpretation of White Male Privilege

John Scalzi, who once excoriated The Spearhead for a sci-fi piece written by anti-feminist tech, has taken the holy burden of telling white guys how privileged they are upon himself. Writing for Kotaku, Scalzi compares white male privilege to having the easy setting turned on when playing a video game:

> Dudes. Imagine life here in the US – or indeed, pretty much anywhere in the Western world – is a massive role playing game, like World of Warcraft except appallingly mundane, where most quests involve the acquisition of money, cell phones and donuts, although not always at the same time. Let's call it The Real World. You have installed The Real World on your computer and are about to start playing, but first you go to the settings tab to bind your keys, fiddle with your defaults, and choose the difficulty setting for the game. Got it?
> Okay: In the role playing game known as The Real World, "Straight White Male" is the lowest difficulty setting there is.

One might wonder why a gaming site would publish a piece virtually guaranteed to alienate its key demographic, but such are the times we live in that political correctness demands tribute from all.

Before Scalzi came up with this analogy, the old explanation was that white folks – men in particular – have "invisible backpacks" that contain privileges. That one didn't work all that well, because, well… it just doesn't sound all that plausible. So the video game comparison is a little better, as it uses an activity that is very popular with young white males to make the point rather than relying on magical backpacks.

A lot of us might ask why some white people are such firm supporters of the idea of white male privilege. Are they masochistic? Do they hate themselves and their race? Or are they simply morally so far above the rest of us that they are willing to sacrifice themselves and their children for the benefit of other peoples?

Although it's difficult for most to see (but not invisible), it is none of the above. They are as self-interested as anyone, and they've got every reason to support the notion of white male privilege. It's really a numbers game, and it's about maintaining their increasingly implausible lifestyle.

To see where they're coming from, first you have to understand that straight white male privilege both does and doesn't exist. White privilege can only exist in a multiracial setting. It cannot meaningfully exist in, say, North Dakota, because there are virtually no minorities. Without minorities, whites have no relative privilege. White privilege definitely does not exist in Latvia, and it exists only to a lower degree in places like Seattle and Portland, where whites still have a fairly large majority. However, in places like Los Angeles, white male privilege is very real, and is exemplified by people like George Clooney. If it didn't exist, I suspect there would no longer be whites there in meaningful numbers; they would flee.

So why is it that those who do benefit from white male privilege are the types most likely to make an issue out of it? Shouldn't they be keeping their mouths shut? Well, this is how they're tricky. By denouncing all white males as privileged, they are universalizing guilt. Imagine someone is caught cheating on worker's compensation, and rather than take the blame and pay for it himself, he says "this is a systemic problem; everyone does it, and therefore everyone must pay for it." He can then say that rather than have to pay it back himself, everyone should chip in and lighten his burden. This is exactly what white liberals are doing, because having privilege does have high social costs.

First, you have to pay off angry minority political factions who want a cut as well. Then, you have to pay the mainly-white unions who keep things running, i.e. teachers, policemen, prison guards, firemen, etc. Finally, you have to over-regulate business and real-estate to preserve your pristine white neighborhoods. It's really, really expensive, and requires a heavy tax burden. Urban California is the perfect example of this system.

So, as in California, white liberals living in minority white or only half-white cities in the US are increasingly turning to everyone else to keep them afloat. And, of course, they are going after the group which, due to its numbers and relatively low expenses, has the means to foot the bill — white males. Does the Alaskan fisherman or West Virginia coal miner really have meaningful white privilege? Of course not, but he does have a fairly respectable paycheck that can be taxed even more. And what better way to justify taking more of his money than by arguing that he owes it to liberals' urban minority neighbors because life is easier for him? If white liberals can only spread the guilt a little more, they'll get some breathing room, and they won't have to foot the bill for their lifestyles alone.

However, the Alaskan fisherman and West Virginia coal miner are not so stupid, and they are every bit as self-interested as the white physician in, say, the Bronx, who depends heavily on federal tax money to keep himself in business. They will not buy this notion of privilege, so it is really just political grandstanding. But it does get a little more vicious than that. There is one group that is largely powerless against these kinds of ideological assaults: children. And children are exactly who tend to get hit by the compromise policies. Unfortunately, they are usually children who do not have any privilege, because their parents can't afford to insulate them or simply haven't had enough foresight to look out for their future interests.

So, in the future, people like John Scalzi can justify screwing disadvantaged white boys out of a fair shot by saying he's fighting white privilege. It won't affect his kids, because he knows the system, and he can cultivate friends in high places — friends with white privilege. And anyway, keeping poor and working class white boys out of the running is a feature, not a bug. This means the privileged white guy has all the less competition to worry about when trying to set his kids up. As for the poor white boys, well, as callous people love to say, you've got to break a few eggs to make an omelette…

Comment Fishing

One thing that astounds me is how feminists and their allies have actually managed to make an issue out of blog comments. The other day, Jezebel made an entire article over Walking in Hell's comment about not having children with white women, which I simply took to be a sort of "what if" fantasy, or maybe even a bit tongue in cheek. In any event, I didn't take it too seriously, because white women are not going to be bred out of existence. Sometimes, when comments are a bit off the wall it's kind of funny; sometimes there's a actually a grain of truth in them. The only time I really care about them is when they are clearly intentional attempts to stir up trouble amongst readers, and even then I'm pretty tolerant (perhaps too much so).

One reason I never took comments seriously is that I live in Seattle, and read local blogs and the online paper regularly. I also happened to grow up Catholic, and although I have my reservations about the Catholic Church, I also know quite well that it does a lot of very positive, helpful things in the community, and most priests and parishioners are quite sincere about not only their religion, but being decent people.

Nevertheless, comments in local, "respectable" publications about Catholics and the Catholic Church are regularly hateful, vile and vindictive. Jesus is routinely disparaged, Catholics are called pedophiles, there are frequent calls to tax the church, and even talk about shutting it down entirely as a "foreign entity." I've grown used to this, so I don't really care, and don't make an effort to hold the publications responsible for these kinds of petty attacks. I figure the people who make these comments are simply saying these things because they are anonymous, and want to get back at the Catholic church for opposing some of their favorite activities, which I assume are sexual in nature. People are rarely more vicious than when defending their favorite vices.

However, it isn't only Catholics who come in for a bashing, but any conservatives at all. Rural whites are regularly called "inbred rednecks," "troglodytes," "retarded" — you name it. Whenever a story about the Duggars or another conservative, large family comes up there is an avalanche of abuse, with fecund, faithful wives being compared to dogs whelping pups and the like.

Of course, whenever there's a story about black crime, blacks are condemned as a whole. Arabs come in for abuse, too. So do Jews, Chinese, and any other ethnic group you could think of. Nobody has a monopoly on hatred.

However, it seems to me that nobody complains as much about people saying things as a certain variety of leftist, and feminists are among the worst. Even so, it still really surprises me that blog comments, of all things, have somehow become a burning issue for them. I would assume that if I tried to make a career – or even a blog – out of highlighting silly comments, I'd be laughed away.

But just to make a point, I'll highlight a couple comments from the Seattle Times about the Catholic Church on an article about the church's plan to sue over Obama's healthcare mandate that they buy birth control for their students and employees, presumably including priests and nuns:

Priests are all pedophiles…

> Chaz Linburger says:
> If too many people use birth control, the supply of virgin boys will drop, and priests will have a real crisis on their hands…

Catholics are "cannibals"

> snowball3 says:
> The really sick part is that the pope toured AIDs ravaged Africa and said they couldn't use condoms! Add to that the Catholic practice of cannibalism (drinking the blood and eating the flesh of Christ) and it's impossible > to find these oddballs credible or deserving of respect!

More pedophilia…

> nwoceanlover:
> Doesnt the Catholic Church have better things to do, like buggering altar boys behind the curtains?

Christians are stupid…

> sportsdudeseattle:
> Oh well whatever as the majority of these poeple still think the Universe is only 6000 years old, Jesus rode a pet dinosaur to school and having 19 kids is good for a women's health

Search any article about the Catholic Church in the Seattle Times and you'll find lots more of the same, even though the Seattle Times regularly moderates its comments. And the Times is considered the most prestigious newspaper in the Pacific Northwest…

So where's the outrage? Where's the condemnation from left-wing "civil rights" groups? I suppose people could try to get their attention, but quite frankly they don't seem to have much of a problem when an organization they oppose is being unfairly subjected to abusive comments.

But really, who gives a damn. They're just comments, people…

Most Shameless Fraud This Year?

After using worker's compensation fraud as an example in yesterday's post, I came across an interesting story about a real case.

Jacquelyn V. Myers, a 55-year-old rural mail carrier, was just convicted of healthcare fraud and lying to get worker's compensation, and faces up to 15 years behind bars. She'll likely only receive a fraction of the sentence, but she cheated so blatantly and flamboyantly that one would hope the judge gives her at least a year or so to think about the consequences of ripping the rest of us off.

From the Justice Dept.:

> Evidence presented at the two-day jury trial established that, while claiming she was physically unable to fulfill her responsibilities as a rural letter carrier with the Postal Service, Myers competed in more than 80 athletic events in Florida and Georgia. Although she claimed that she could only handle "light duty" in her government job, Myers was competing in 5K races, 10K races, triathlons, and marathons, including the Boston Marathon, which she ran in April 2010.
> In May 2009, Myers reported that she had suffered a lower back injury during the annual letter carriers' food drive. As a result, she was relieved of the letter carrying duties for which she had been hired, and placed on "light duty." Between June and December of 2009, Myers told her treating physicians and physical therapists that her back injury had not improved, and that she was unable to twist and bend at the waist – activities associated with the delivery of mail. Photographs and videotapes taken during the same period show Myers running barefoot on gravel in a cross-country event, and swimming, cycling, and running in a triathlon. Evidence at trial demonstrated that Myers' race times actually improved over those recorded prior to her reported date of injury.

Somehow, I think it would be appropriate to play "Chariots of Fire" as they whisk her off to prison.

Terrible Precedent in Footballer Ched Evans Case

Ched Evans is a 23-year-old British footballer who played for Sheffield, and was just starting to make an impact as a talented striker. Last month, he was convicted of rape over an incident last May in which he slept with a woman who had been drinking. The sex was apparently consensual, but the judge found that the girl's intoxication, indicated by CCTV footage of her with Evans' friend before the incident, invalidated any consent.

Both Evans and his friend, co-defendant Clayton McDonald, slept with the girl that night, but only Evans was convicted. Since the conviction, a further 13 people have been arrested for allegedly releasing the woman's identity through Twitter, so that makes 15 arrests so far over one case of drunken sex.

Although there are a lot of problems with tying consent to sobriety, the biggest is the assumption that consent is presumed to be absent, i.e. those charged with rape must provide an affirmative defense, which sets the bar far too low for the prosecution in rape cases. What I'm getting at is that the idea is that when a woman is intoxicated, we can't know for certain whether she would have consented or not otherwise. So, the court has decided that the default is nonconsent. If this applies in drunken sex, it applies elsewhere where consent is unclear. This means that unless a man can prove in court – while facing a determined prosecutor – that a woman intended to have sex with him, he can be convicted of rape.

Under the old standard, the default assumption was that sex acts are consensual, barring proof, such as coercion and/or assault, that they were not. This put the burden of proof on the prosecution. For example, if a woman went out drinking and then went to a hotel room with a couple athletes and had sex with them, the assumption would be that that was what she intended to do, and a prosecutor would have to come up with evidence that she had somehow been forced into the situation against her will.

Now, however, it has been turned around. We start from the assumption that women do not intend to have sex, even if they drink and enter hotel rooms alone with athletes, and then must establish through some process of investigation that they did, in fact, intend to have sex, to determine that rape did not occur. And if they were drinking, defense is automatically invalidated.

Taken to its logical conclusion, this would result in the imprisonment of perhaps hundreds of thousands of young men every year if it were the law of the land in the United States. Every college party in the US would result in a dozen or so arrests and lengthy prison sentences. It would put more young American men out of commission than WWII. But perhaps that's the idea.

Pope Weighs in on Absent Father Crisis

Speaking in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict XVI addressed 20,000 pilgrims with a call to restore fatherhood. Reminding them that the relationship between Christians and God is one of children to father, he decried the contemporary state of affairs:

> "Perhaps modern man does not perceive the beauty, grandeur and profound consolation contained in the word 'father' with which we can turn to God in prayer, because the father figure is often not sufficiently present in today's world, and is often not a sufficiently positive presence in everyday life," the Pope said in his weekly general audience address.
> He underscored that the "the problem of a father not present in the life of the child is a big problem of our time" because it can become difficult for those children "to understand in its depth what it means to us that God is Father."
> In the U.S., over one-third of all children live apart from their biological father…

It seems that the crisis of fatherhood, in the United States in particular, has finally become a cause for concern in the Catholic Church. Paired with recent moves to roll back feminism, this indicates that one of the most influential organizations on earth has finally cast its lot in with those of us who are fighting to turn back the tide of radical feminism, which emerged as a dominant political force in the realm of family and sexuality in the late 20th century.

Although many oppose the Catholic Church and its policies, it still exerts an enormous amount of moral influence even beyond its adherents, and has the potential to embolden those who might agree but who otherwise lack the fortitude to go it alone.

Hopefully, other non-Catholic Christians and even non-Christian religious leaders will also take up the restoration of fatherhood as a worthy cause. Now that the head of the Catholic Church has done so, it should be a lot easier to defy feminist family-wreckers on this crucially important matter.

Bringing Back a Forum

I've been trying to figure out a method for integrating a forum and membership options with the site for some time, as the last forum was flawed due to insufficient upgrades for the integration with the site; in other words I couldn't upgrade WordPress without screwing up the bridge to PHPBB. Additionally, it was more complex than necessary, and had abysmal spam protection, which made it more effort than it was worth. It was a decent idea, but it simply wasn't a good fit for the site.

Fortunately, I found something that ought to work well: bbpress. As it was created by the founders of WordPress, it will integrate very well, and should handle upgrades without a hitch. It's also pretty simple, which is fine for our purposes here, and it has akismet spam protection. And, even better, I've found some more software that will allow me to restrict it to members only (among other features). What I'll do is give all previously registered members (about 800, but it's been a while) some time to decide whether they want to stay onboard. The forum will not be open to all comers, and I intend to keep it that way; it's going to be more of a private club. The blog and blog comments will remain unaffected, so those who aren't interested in the forum needn't worry about it.

I've been working on this for some time, and it's taken longer than I thought it would to come up with the right combination of software that will suit the needs of the site. The reason for this is that there are a lot of different kinds of forums, and there's a lot of membership software, but not all work with each other, and not all work with WordPress. Finding three programs that will integrate seamlessly (hopefully) with each other was tricky, but I'm pretty sure I finally got it right. Now it's simply a matter of putting the pieces together without causing a meltdown.

As I check all the details and do some more testing, I'd be happy to hear any feedback, suggestions or advice, and answer questions (if I can) before I go live with the new features.

IRL Gay Male Privilege

W.F. Price · 25 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I noticed a story about a gay bar that has banned bachelorette parties in the news, and had to see what that was all about. According to the story, the bar banned the parties because gay marriage is still illegal…

Now, there's always a chance that the guy was sincere about it, but how much political impact could such a move really have? Does the owner think the kind of straight women who have bachelorette parties at a gay bar are the kind of people who would oppose gay marriage?

I don't think so. I may not be gay, but there are more than a few things that gay and straight men have in common, and one of them, I suspect, is a strong distaste for bachelorette parties. In fact, gay men probably hate them even more than straight men. What could be more obnoxious than a bunch of feral young women getting all musky over some male dancer and trying to make themselves the center of attention — in the middle of a gay bar?!

Here's what the owner has to say:

> "We love our straight girlfriends [Editor: yeah, sure you do...] coming in to celebrate one of the happiest days of their life," says Abbey owner David Cooley. "But it's also a slap in the face to my customers and my life that we can't have that same celebration."
> Male go-go dancers are just one reason why one of America's most popular gay bars has become a big draw for straight women's bachelorette parties.
> Each weekend, The Abbey hosts several dozen ladies night parties. But Cooley says, no more. Until marriage is legal for everyone, straight women can no longer celebrate their pending nuptials at his club.

I can only imagine the complaints from the gay male clientele Cooley must have had to deal with.

However, without some really good excuse, a bar probably couldn't ban such parties without risking a lawsuit — it would be gender discrimination. If the bar were a mainly straight bar run by a straight guy, he'd be really hard pressed to come up with a reason, and might have to take measures that would harm the bottom line.

But the gay marriage justification is just perfect. Now, instead of saying "we don't want these obnoxious ladies monopolizing our space," the owner can instantly make the ban a civil rights crusade. Totally convenient.

I can't really hold it against the bar's owner or clients for invoking the gay card, but I reserve the right to grumble about the unfairness of it all.

What Can Make a Grown Man Cry?

Thanks to some help from the Innocence Project, Brian Banks just got out of prison after serving over five years for a rape he didn't commit. Faced with a 46-years-to-life sentence, he pleaded no contest to forcible rape. While he was locked up, his accuser collected a $1.5 million payout from the California Public Schools.

After he had spent a few years in prison, his accuser had the gall to contact him on FaceBook, asking to meet with him. Sensing an opportunity, Banks swallowed his pride and played along, giving Innocence Project activists the opportunity to record her recanting the accusation. Prosecutors, who so vigorously hounded the innocent man, say they will leave the false accuser – a criminal – alone. Bearing false witness used to be considered serious crime, but it seems an exception has been carved out for women who lie about rape.

Before he was locked up, Mr. Banks hoped to become an NFL player, and his chances were pretty good at the time. He's said he wants to give it another shot, but at 26 years old, he's middle aged for the NFL. His false conviction may have cost him millions of dollars and a glorious career. In the meanwhile, Wanetta Gibson, the criminal who stole those precious years, walks free.

Imagine a man kidnapped a woman, held her for five years, and managed to extract $1.5 million in the process. Then imagine that after the woman escaped, prosecutors said "the kidnapping happened years ago, so we won't prosecute."

There is no moral difference between what Wanetta Gibson did and kidnapping a woman for ransom. Both are vile crimes.

Below is Mr. Banks at the hearing to vacate his conviction. It's an emotional moment:

Most men freed by the Innocence Project have been falsely accused of rape. More innocent men are imprisoned for rape than any other serious crime. Probably because many women, like Wanetta Gibson, have a free pass to falsely accuse men and then collect money for doing so.

Rite of Passage

Uncle Elmer · 28 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

My son received his Selective Service notice a few days ago. Like most young men, he didn't know what it was. I handed it to him and intoned "You're a man now."

Inserted in the mailer were several leaflets advertising opportunities in the "New Military".

My own military service was laughable. During Army Basic, my old man showed up, and as several of us were out on the parade ground cleaning our M-16s he reminisced about field stripping his M-1 while blindfolded during his boot camp training in 1942. It was a small moment of bonding in our often contentious relationship as his idiot son demonstrated a sliver of responsibility and manhood.

During my stay at Fort Knox, the Drill Instructors warned us about where to crap during bivouac : "Your daddies and grand-daddies shit all over these woods….". Many years later when I researched my genealogy I found out it was true, the Elmerson clan had deep roots in American military history, and had indeed shit all over the woods of Fort Knox and surrounding environs.

I didn't join the Army out of any patriotic fervor, it was just an option for a useless young man aspiring to be a "jazz-rock" musician. College was not in my life plan at that time, being a superstar was. I went "Airborne" because Jimi Hendrix had been a paratrooper, and planned to fake a back injury after I got my "wings" so I could get out and put it on my resume. The Army predictably sucked for me but provided time for me to realize I had no musical talent, so on discharge used my GI Bill to pay for school. Even that I mis-managed and slogged my way towards a degree. At any rate I finally attained it and it has paid off in the years since. In retrospect I could have done it all in a lot less time and trouble than I made for myself.

As for my sons, I don't advocate either way on the military. It can be a good deal if you understand your options and what you are getting into. The military really does provide a lot of educational opportunities that many fail to avail themselves of. One may get a decent assignment or stuck in a miserable situation and that will affect one's attitude, however, long-term benefits and options are available if you research them. In my day, the recruiter might only hand you a few brochures and little useful advice. These days you have the internet; don't walk in and announce you wanna be "Airborne", or, a "Navy SEAL" for crying out loud because they have a special lever for guys like you that lands them right in some shit. There are plenty of other military jobs that provide work satisfaction and you should find out about them and compare against your innate skills and interests. Furthermore, your initial first years are a heavy investment. If you simply depart the service with no continued military career plans, you will have lost some of this significant effort.

Now, I didn't want to make this another post about Elmer. Just two cents on Memorial Day while trying to pass some pointers on to my son minus the bitterness and cynicism.

Embrace your Inner Narcissist

Women love a man who takes control. Then there's the relentlessly considerate man who sees no need to control her at all. Every woman deeply appreciates how rare and special of a find this enlightened new age is, a who man places such a high importance on pleasing her that he makes sure never to impose himself by assuming he understands her needs without first asking what she actually wants. Every woman hears how this male sensitivity is highly treasured by other women, which is why she'll be so conflicted when she realizes she absolutely detests a man for exactly the same quality. Because it doesn't take long before every one of those questions he asks her becomes in her mind an excruciating reminder that he doesn't already know the answer. After that his constant questioning, seeming more and more like seeking her approval, begins to grate on her skin until she's surprised to discover she feels utter contempt for him and she begins to wonder if the reason is exactly because he's so considerate. Rather than fill her with warmth his attentive questions at best fill her with indifference. She finds herself losing her train of thought while answering, occasionally catching herself disturbed by day dreams of being taken roughly from behind by his asshat friend.

Women will openly admit they don't always want to be asked what they'd like before a man acts because it quickly gets old and makes a man appear to be a child seeking permission. But at the same time women get very angry or hurt when they feel men haven't asked about and listened to their needs. No wonder women are accused of wanting men to read their minds. It's the only reasonable conclusion to arrive at about someone who by their own admission makes a habit of arguing for you to do something that they don't actually want, because they won't tell you what it is they do want you to do.

However strangely enough women may be exactly right in asking men to solve this riddle. Rather than an obedience trial it's actually a test of charisma and confidence. She's not asking you to read her mind, she's asking you for the charm and swagger to put an idea in her head, and once you've left it there – to convince her to want it.

For many woman the idea of giving up control and letting a man "into her head" in this way inspires dreams of steamy romance. Men find the idea of letting someone into our heads terrifying. There's an element of manipulation that's eerily reminiscent of evil aliens who've shown us in countless sci-fi plots that they'll only use mind control to enslave humanity, possibly followed by eating us. For us it's easy to see how this natural dynamic between the sexes exposes women to the control of charismatic and thoroughly ill-intentioned men.

Yet women aren't without their defenses. One way women have always combated such motherless bastards is by banding together to scold the scoundrel back in line. Communal female shaming is in fact a powerful and highly evolved social mechanism to do exactly that. Initiated by the wronged woman's tearful pleadings, a group of women come together for the purposes of passing judgment on the man who brought her to that state. He won't be allowed entry at his own trial to defend himself before this all female court of opinion, but it wouldn't matter if he was. No evidence he could bring would have any meaning, nothing he could say would explain. To the women his words and seductively clear logic are only hateful "tricks" that make him more guilty. Even him daring to open his mouth on his own behalf is poison to the more evolved sense of right and decency they all agree they alone as women have. He WILL be found guilty, and once summary judgment is pronounced there can be no trial or appeal. There is only surrender and appeasement.

Women realize the importance of this shaming as a social safety net. While it can be said that women want a man who doesn't listen to them, they definitely don't want any man to be immune to communal female shaming. The danger of men developing immunity is such a fearful scenario that the failure of any man to respond to shaming raises the entire female community's shaming defenses to high weapons readiness extremely quickly. The comrade hens initiate aggression, striking with low level hits before most men even know they are under attack, small verbal pecks that quickly begin raining on the man from all quarters. The aggression of their engagement rises with his threat level, and if he continues to refuse to listen and to insist he's right, his threat level will rise quickly.

Their clucking attacks are no laughing matter. Soon they'll call other men (known in the manosphere as white knights) to their defense and when that happens there's deep trouble on the horizon for our anti-hero. The fearsome vengeance of white knights is the real reason few sensible men are either willing or in a strong enough position to brave becoming truly detestable to a group of women. To us in the manosphere such a person is legendarily lawless, a man worthy of admiration and praise. To feminist women he's a contemptuous devil who infantilizes them by playfully ridiculing their scorn, who abusively confronts them with the hard truth of their errors, and who narcissistically refuses to back down or repent when he's not wrong. They see no redeeming qualities in him, and in their hysterics this more than justifies inciting other men to do real violence against him. Soon when the woman start to carelessly let fly with false accusations of rape, abuse, paternity, inadequate alimony or child support, workplace sexism or other serious offenses, they will show exactly how hard the heart of a wronged woman is. They will not spare him from any cruel public punishment they can muster. It's a rare man who can live in this minefield immune from harm.

Every generation has had such extraordinary scoundrels as our anti-hero just as every generation has had far greater numbers of more ordinary scoundrels with the sense to try to learn from their betters by emulating him. But where he eluded the consequences of his actions his followers may not escape as freely. Female shaming is a growing organism that adapts to answer every challenge. It has evolved from being conjured up by the few wives in our ancestral villages or tribes to now being the product of a vast number of women in a bewilderingly greater variety of roles. Today's shaming circle includes the psychologists who're constantly refining their labels to describe more misbehaving men, the self help groups encouraging women to share their stories of victimhood, the women's centers demonizing husbands and fathers, the feminists railing against the patriarchy in the popular media, the heavily feminist family courts, the victim entitlement based government, and the pro-single mom social welfare system. All of these are an extension of the ancestral female shaming which teaches us that when an upset woman appeals to the shaming circle on any issue that holds the communal sympathies, the man who upset her or any man who opposes her is wrong regardless of any explanation.

To some it would seem that our ancestral habit of women communally inflicting shame on men is completely out of place in the modern feminist world where women aim to be equal. However I'm someone who's always believed that natural selection is smarter than all of us. Human ideals (like feminism) that may be in vogue during one generation may be completely reviled in the next. But natural selection works over a longer period and reveals the real truth in our history. I believe feminism may breed itself out, but on the other hand society may become more feminist. Natural selection will eventually give us the answer as to whether it confers some advantage and is therefore "right". However I believe that society's need to shame men actually conflicts with feminism, and that because society's need to shame men comes from a deep and longstanding truth that has lasted for many more generations than the current feminism, this is another indication that feminism can't last. I say shaming conflicts with feminism because the shaming circle acknowledges that men have responsibility to protect and care for their women. Shaming men who mis-"lead" women is implicitly an acknowledgment that in some fundamental ways men do "lead" women. Discouraging men from mis-"leading" women is an encouragement for men to "lead" women well, and it's an acceptance of women's need to find men who will lead them.

In acknowledging the need for some degree of male leadership in male-female relationships, the female shaming circle is actually an indictment of today's feminism, as women are deprived of men's leadership and commitment when feminism removes any incentive for men to commit to the leading male role. Particularly so since in the last few generations feminism has been a powerful force entitling women to their husband's labor while absolving all their responsibilities to him, encouraging women not to have any loyalty or allegiance to the husbands they have given responsibility for leading them. That feminism disincentivizes men from taking the male role while the shaming circle encourages it pits feminism directly against the shaming circle given to us through the natural selection of human behaviors that proved beneficial to societies over countless eons. Since feminism is working against deep forces that have been in existence for much longer that it has, feminism may only be a temporary blip in human history. Still we're at a point where men very sensibly see the male role as a losing proposition, and that realization has brought us to a strange crossroads.

Female communal shaming becomes powerless when men withdraw themselves from the possibility of being harmed through any connection to society. Young men only take on roles in which they can be coerced or harmed when they marry, become fathers, are beholden to the society for employment, or partake in one of the many other resources at their shaming community's disposal. However becoming a man today doesn't mean getting a serious job, getting married, or even moving out of your parent's basement. Increasingly men are withdrawing from exposure to any harm.

Instead of society harboring just a few legendarily detestable scoundrels among legions of modest hardworking family men, more men than ever are now are heavily fortified against the shaming circle and so are at liberty to be as lawless among women and as devoted to their own self interests as the worst in history have ever been. Rather than "lead" women honorably they have raised to a religion the GAME of manipulating women's emotions for their own pleasure. Rather than dedicating themselves to working slavish hours to support a woman who feels no responsibility to cook, clean or be faithful, and who feels entitled to neglect his sexual needs, now that the rewards of relationships are even smaller men are free to instead invest their time pursuing their most far-flung dreams or indulging their most frivolous diversions. Today's men are more free to bang their way across Europe than at any time since the second world war. Today's men are more free to go their own way or to become ghosts … all with less public censure than ever.

Young men struggling along difficult soulless career paths so one day they might be a good provider have long fantasized about such an escape. Married men stuck in traffic on the long commute back to ungrateful wives have dreamed forever about a more narcissistic existence free of all that crushing responsibility. But in the past the costs of escape for men were always too high. It's a strange twist that feminism may be exactly what's allowing men to set the worst of themselves free and embrace their inner narcissist. Though it's the only patch of light in the middle of an anti-male dystopia, nevertheless it's feminism that's brought this one small gift for men.

After 25, Women Are Just Wasting Time

I've got a female friend I talk to fairly regularly, and while we don't see eye-to-eye on everything, I find she has a pretty good take on the American situation regarding men's and women's relations. So, while talking the other day about how young women are holding out for so long these days, she gave me a good insight about how attitudes amongst the young are influencing family formation.

As one gets older, life patterns that were hidden by youth and inexperience start to emerge. This is often accompanied by the realization that a lot of what we took for granted while young was dead wrong. For example, when in their adolescence and 20s, people tend to assume that "anything is possible" — that if you just believe hard enough things can come true. It's an endearing trait in young people, and rather sweet, but eminently subject to manipulation, and usually not even close to true.

The reality is that by about 25, your future can be fairly well predicted by your life at that point. Perhaps not the details, but the general character. The thing is, people don't change much past that age. Of course, things can happen to alter your course. You could land a great job, get laid off, develop an addiction or come into an inheritance. However, you can usually take a look at what someone is doing at around 25 or so and predict what they will be doing in ten years. Chances are, it won't be too different. This holds true even for those on the fringes, such as Bill Gates and habitual criminals. Bill Gates may not have been so rich at 25, but he was already working hard and competing in business. The circumstances may have changed around him as he succeeded, but the man and his mission remained fundamentally the same. Someone in jail for theft at 25 may eventually get better at stealing, and land a job where he can do so without facing prosecution (e.g. faith healer, new age guru, etc.), but he's still going to be the kind of guy who likes taking without offering anything in return.

However, young American women have been sold a bill of goods. They think that if they hold out and continue to believe, something miraculous will happen. A recent story about Marina Keegan, a Yale graduate who tragically died in a car crash, highlights this.

Here's a passage from her final essay:

> We're so young. We're so young. We're twenty-two years old. We have so much time. There's this sentiment I sometimes sense, creeping in our collective conscious as we lay alone after a party, or pack up our books when we give in and go out – that it is somehow too late. That others are somehow ahead. More accomplished, more specialized. More on the path to somehow saving the world, somehow creating or inventing or improving. That it's too late now to BEGIN a beginning and we must settle for continuance, for commencement.
> When we came to Yale, there was this sense of possibility. This immense and indefinable potential energy – and it's easy to feel like that's slipped away. We never had to choose and suddenly we've had to. Some of us have focused ourselves. Some of us know exactly what we want and are on the path to get it; already going to med school, working at the perfect NGO, doing research. To you I say both congratulations and you suck.
> For most of us, however, we're somewhat lost in this sea of liberal arts. Not quite sure what road we're on and whether we should have taken it. If only I had majored in biology…if only I'd gotten involved in journalism as a freshman…if only I'd thought to apply for this or for that…
> What we have to remember is that we can still do anything. We can change our minds. We can start over. Get a post-bac or try writing for the first time. The notion that it's too late to do anything is comical. It's hilarious. We're graduating college. We're so young. We can't, we MUST not lose this sense of possibility because in the end, it's all we have.

Marina was a much-loved daughter and bright, energetic girl. The point I'm making here is in no way intended to disparage her memory, and as I mentioned before this sense of hope and possibility is one of the most endearing things about the young. The only reason I'm choosing her essay to make a point is that, because she was a gifted writer, she was very good at expressing exactly the outlook I am referring to here.

Actually, Marina points out two mistakes that characterize youthful thinking. The first, which she herself rejects, is the idea that one can plot out a perfect path through taking predetermined steps. This is flawed reasoning. Although we can count on being the same person some years down the road, circumstances are very hard to predict. The first group of Yale students is mistaken, but perhaps not as far off the mark as the second.

The second attitude, which characterizes her personal philosophy, is that it's never too late to do anything. She calls the idea that it might be important to do some things before they are too late "comical" and "hilarious." A 22-year-old Yale graduate may still have some time to laugh at this notion, but really not as much as one might think. Four years of college buys women precious little time in the mating market. It may make them more eligible as far as stable, employable husbands are concerned, but the same factors that affect the value of a working-class girl are at work with Ivy League grads.

I'd guess that college buys young women about exactly as much time as it takes for them to complete it, because their pool of future mates tends to go through the same process (although the distorted sex ratio in college is changing this). That's to say that she has her best shot to land a good match up to perhaps 25, whereas an average girl might have it up to 21. It isn't to say that they have to get married immediately, but rather that by that age they should have already found a future husband. Most people put off marriage for a few years, so when you see the well-educated woman marrying at 28 or so, she's probably already had that boyfriend for several years.

The problem with young women today is that they internalize this "anything is possible" attitude and don't lose it until it really is too late for many of them. They think they can do better at 30 than at 22, which, in most cases, is simply wrong. Some might say that family and men are not a priority for these girls, but women for whom this is really true throughout life are an insignificant minority. In fact, most women are holding out precisely because they think they can get a better man later, perhaps when they have a better job and work with more powerful men.

But these girls are not going to change fundamentally, and in their early 20s are at the peak of their beauty while still retaining an innocent charm. Nothing about their looks or personality is going to make them more appealing at 30 than at 22, and the men available to them are not going to get any better, either.

And what of the men? At 25, is he serious, responsible and cautious? There you have a man who will probably have a good, but perhaps not remarkable, career. Does he prefer smoking weed and playing video games in his spare time? There you have a future couch potato. Is he competitive, materialistic and a smooth talker? Sounds like a salesman. Does he charm his way into bed with you and then drift away after a couple months of passion? Well, in that case you just got gamed.

The point is that neither men nor women change fundamentally past a certain point, and the same guys young women have available in their early 20s are generally the same guys that will be available at 30, only they will be older and, due to marriage, there will be far fewer of them.

For men who want a family, the same rules apply, although they are somewhat more forgiving. However, contrary to some common refrains I read, younger women are not always better for mature men. It's easy to fall in love with a beautiful young girl while overlooking some fundamental incompatibility or flaws in the relationship, and these days, without any protection from marriage, that can end pretty badly. A man may be able to wait a bit longer, and even gain some by doing so, but past a certain point – say the early 30s – that no longer applies except in the case of very wealthy or powerful men. By 35, most men are faced with the same problem that women run into in their late 20s: the pool of potential mates is aging and rapidly shrinking.

It's time we started being honest with the young people around us. When I was a kid, we were force-fed the message that we can do and be whatever we want from before kindergarten. Too many of us find out the hard way that this was a lie, but fortunately when it comes to career and getting by in life we tend to survive it. However, when it comes to family, the results can be far more cruel, especially for women. Time tends to accelerate past a certain age, and the 25-year old woman soon finds herself 30, and then 35, and at that point she's got precious little of it left. Perhaps at 22 she was laughing about the "comical" notion that it could ever be too late, but after a certain point it is no longer comedy, but tragedy, and her laughter turns to tears.

Senile Doctor Wants to Award $50,000 to Women Who Have Illegitimate Children

W.F. Price · 31 May 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Evan Evans, a retired OB/GYN from Utah, has proposed a bill that he thinks will obviate abortion. His idea is to force all unmarried fathers to fork over $50,000 to their babymommas. Leaving aside the fact that most unmarried fathers don't have $50,000 lying around – and probably never will – the idea that lots of women will not be able to somehow convince some man to sleep with them is hilarious. All this bill will ensure is that the dumbest men with the least self-control will inseminate the majority of single mothers. It is such a stupid idea that it should be read aloud in congress as a joke (although I don't know how many would get it).

Since Evans began practicing medicine in the 1950s, I'm guessing he's well into his 80s. Although I don't know for certain whether men really thought these kinds of plans might work back then, it's possible, and that might explain how some of the godawful law around child support and divorce came into being.

As people live longer and the ratio of older to younger people has grown, the influence of old-fashioned ideas may actually be stronger than it used to be. This is counterintuitive, because we are frequently told that we are in a "new, progressive, era," but just look how much influence 1960s style radicalism – a half-century old by now – still exerts on society. Both academia and the media sometimes seem stuck in Vietnam and the various "movements" of the time, because those were the formative years of senior managers and editorialists. PBS is possibly the most glaring example of this, with fuddy-duddies like Garrison Keillor still very popular amongst the geriatric progressive crowd.

This also brings up an interesting question. Are liberal, progressive youngsters now the reactionary, goody-two-shoes squares?

How did Feminism Grow so Powerful?

W.F. Price · 1 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Wednesday's post about how people (and women in particular) are wasting time, often while pursuing futile goals, has brought up some discussion of the origins of feminism in recent comments. There's something very cult-like about the way feminism has emerged as a mass movement, and this characteristic has given rise to a lot of speculation about who was responsible for really getting it off the ground. Some have suggested Communists and the Frankfurt School, and others Victorian politics. There are a lot of theories, but what's undeniable is that it burst onto the world scene in a big way in the mid-20th century.

Before this, I suspect there had always been various proto-feminist movements of one sort or another. From fertility cults in the ancient world, which survive today in Asia and perhaps parts of Africa, to the proliferation of witchcraft in late medieval Europe and then the political feminism that emerged in early 19th century Britain in response to the French Revolution's ideals of equality.

I think feminism in one form or another has always been with us, and has always been part of the human experience. Even male feminists have always existed. There have been certain men from time immemorial who, despising their fellow men, maintain a worshipful attitude toward the feminine. But it has never been much more than a nuisance, or perhaps at worst an underground criminal industry, as in the abortionists that were prosecuted in Europe following the population depletion that accompanied the plague.

One rather remarkable passage from Alonso de Salazar Frías, a Spanish inquisitor who recommended that witches not be executed because they were not actually doing much, but rather simply delusional, highlights some of the similarities between modern feminist wishful thinking and the claims of witches, which were fantastic accounts of being able to do pretty much anything:

> The real question is: are we to believe that witchcraft occurred in a given situation simply because of what the witches claim? No: it is clear that the witches are not to be believed, and the judges should not pass sentence on anyone, unless the case can be proven with external and objective evidence sufficient to convince everyone who hears it. And who can accept the following: that a person can frequently fly through the air and travel a hundred leagues in an hour; that a woman can get through a space not big enough for a fly; that a person can make himself invisible; that he can be in a river or the open sea and not get wet; or that he can be in bed at the sabbath at the same time… and that a witch can turn herself into any shape she fancies, be it housefly or raven? Indeed, these claims go beyond all human reason and may even pass the limits permitted by the Devil.

So what is it that turned feminism from a mere annoyance into a widespread, powerful cult that is supported by none other than the President of the United States and other leaders throughout the West?

I suspect the answer has something to do with mass communication and mob psychology. In the past, feminism or other odd, associated cults would emerge in some region, but would remain contained therein. Because it isn't a proper religion that moves men to fight and sacrifice themselves, it was never in any danger of sweeping into power on a broad scale. It seems to me to be no coincidence at all that the rise of feminism coincided with television, mass-marketing and consumerism, because when the quirks of female psychology could be manipulated and fostered for profit or power on a widespread scale, it suddenly became a force in its own right.

There's a great documentary – actually, the best I've ever seen – that documents the rise of mass psychology and the various methods people use to manipulate it for power and or profit. I'm sure a number of readers have seen it, but it's worth mentioning "The Century of the Self" again, because it goes into great detail about the communication and psychological trends that have shaped contemporary society. Evidently, Freud was a real pioneer in this area, although he himself didn't put his ideas into practice; his nephew did.

Rainbow Toilets: A National Priority

W.F. Price · 4 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I saw a story on the local news about a student-led initiative, and watched to see what it was students were concerned about. Could it be the high price of textbooks? Rising tuition? Student loan issues? Nope. The student initiative concerned "gender-neutral bathrooms," which are apparently a burning necessity due to gender identity ambiguity.

Some students don't feel comfortable in either bathroom, so they agitated for gender neutral bathrooms. In several local colleges, they have successfully changed some bathrooms to neutral status.

So why were these bathrooms really necessary? I found an article from 2009, in which a lesbian student describes a horrifying situation, in which she was told by a male student to use the correct bathroom next time. The student, who goes by the name Tenzin Mingyur Paldron, decided she felt more comfortable using the male bathroom — but only if there weren't actually any men in it.

> Given the fact that I look like a man to most people, or a very queer-looking female, restrooms are a frequent place of discomfort for me. I usually use women's restrooms because I have always felt male restrooms to be sources of more potential violence. However, almost always when using the women's restroom—since my teens and more frequently every year—I encounter some kind of problem. Usually this involves stares or words of some kind; sometimes, aggressive body language and confrontations. On this particular day, at Evergreen, I chose the women's room.
> Upon entering the women's room, I heard voices, so I immediately left, without anyone seeing me. I entered the men's and found it empty. Relieved, I entered a stall and closed it. A few seconds after I started using the toilet, I heard someone enter. I tensed a little, but knew I'd be fine, and that I'd just wait for the person to leave. Oddly, I didn't hear him make any noises indicating that he was using the facilities himself, and a couple moments later I felt a presence outside the stall door.
> "Next time, use the right restroom," the voice from outside the stall said.
> The tone was unfriendly, and I experienced a menacing anger coming toward me. The man paused for a moment, then left.
> I exited the restroom shortly afterward and luckily found my girlfriend waiting outside for me. I asked her if she had seen the man who exited, and she had. She thought it was strange because he had literally run out the door and around the corner. I told her what happened, and that's when this experience of restroom intimidation really changed for me. It turned out she knew who he was, that he was a staff member in one of the first floor departments. This change is significant, because never in my experience of restroom intimidation have I ever been in a vicinity that I frequent and experience the harassment coming from a person based in the same location. It is only because of this unique aspect of the incident that I had any power to address it. In the vast majority of restroom harassment cases, the target never has such a chance.

Am I heartless for finding this funny? I thought restroom harassment was when someone bangs on the door and tells you to hurry up. But poor Tenzin runs the gauntlet every time she has to take a dump.

The solution – gender neutral bathrooms – doesn't really offend me. In fact, the more bathrooms the better. If either normal bathroom is full, then one can just scoot on over to the neutral one and relieve oneself. However, I suspect that, as a straight male, I would find myself distinctly unwelcome in the "gender-neutral bathroom." And that's really all this is about:

> The campus has a few single-stall unisex restrooms already. Many college campuses have designated such facilities in recent years in response to hate crimes committed against transgender students in restrooms. But > the existing gender-neutral restrooms at WSUV are few and far between on the sprawling campus, Teal said.

> And the two students' aim isn't to have more such restrooms built on campus. That would just allow those subjected to the harassment to hide, they say.
> The two want to make people think about preconceived notions of gender.

What gender-confused people have done is carve out their own special accommodation despite being perhaps 0.2% of the population (that's being generous). On our dime, of course. Now that these rainbow toilets have been installed, I expect that the next story about them will concern men "harassing" people in them, because you can bet your last dollar that those accusations will be used to keep ordinary men out of them, so now we'll just have to make do with fewer toilets.

Right Conduct

…precondition to, or result of, freedom?

Whereas statists and busybodies would point to the former, early twentieth century libertarian thinker Albert Jay Nock, quoted in this article over at Reason, claims the latter:

> The point is that any enlargement [of government], good or bad, reduces the scope of individual responsibility, and thus retards and cripples the education which can be a product of nothing but the free exercise of moral judgment. Like the discipline of the army, again, any such enlargement, good or bad, depraves this education into a mere routine of mechanical assent. The profound instinct against being "done for our own good" . . . is wholly sound. Men are aware of the need of this moral experience as a condition of growth, and they are aware, too, that anything tending to ease it off from them, even for their own good, is to be profoundly distrusted. The practical reason for freedom, then, is that freedom seems to be the only condition under which any kind of substantial moral fibre can be developed.

Let us assume for this post that 'liberty' and 'freedom' are interchangeable, even though Classical Liberal theorists would distinguish between the two concepts. Nock asserts that it is freedom that best educates a man in moral behavior, and that the guiding hand of those in authority, however well-intentioned, invariably stunts a fellow's moral development.

At first blush, it seems that at least one of the Founders would agree with Nock

> The laws of man may bind him in chains or may put him to death, but they never can make him wise, virtuous, or happy — John Adams

But that is not the entire story, for a great many of them also hold that virtue is a precursor to freedom:

> To suppose that any form of government will secure liberty or happiness without any virtue in the people, is a chimerical idea — James Madison

> Only a virtuous people are capable of freedom. As nations become more corrupt and vicious, they have more need of masters — Benjamin Franklin

> [M]en will be free no longer then while they remain virtuous — Samuel Adams

On this point, the Founders seem to be in wide agreement. Virtue, right thought and conduct, predicates freedom.

So, then, having established that (a) government is powerless to instill virtue in men and (b) virtue is a necessary condition for freedom, from where does a man obtain moral training? I have my biases, but I turn instead to the thoughts of our first president

> Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim tribute to patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness — these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. . . . reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles — George Washington

Washington is correct here. Virtue is instilled and shaped by Faith and the practice of it. It does not spring up ex nihilo, it is not the product of reason alone which, famously being the Devil's whore, has demonstrably failed to restrain man's more lethal passions, let alone engender systemic freedom.

But this is not to say that Nock does not have some claim on the truth here. For while we have established that more fiber is accessed into man through Faith, if not into each person individually then into the body politic as a whole, it seems sensible to conceive that it may then be subsequently sharpened and enhanced through the practice of freedom. Put another way, Faith equips men with the basic tools of moral behavior, which are then further refined through practical application in an environment that tests each man's fiber.

Book Review: Moral Politics

Elusive Wapiti · 5 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: Moral Politics–How Liberals and Conservatives Think, by George Lakoff, 426 pages.

Summary:In this book, Mr. Lakoff [wiki website UC Berkley profile], a professor of linguistics at UC – Berkeley, proposes that the differing political weltanschauung between "conservatives" and "liberals" are rooted in the differing mental models of the idealized family to which they subscribe. He offers up two metaphors for these models, roughly approximating Left and Right, known as "nurturant parent" and "strict father" metaphors, respectively. As these model/metaphors are central to Mr. Lakoff's framing of politics–the nation as family and government as parent–and his explication of why the Left and the Right often have mutually opposing political philosophies, they will be discussed in more detail below:

In Mr. Lakoff's "Nurturant Parent" model, > love, empathy, and nurturance are primary, and children become responsible, self-disciplined, and self-reliant through being cared for, respected, and caring for other, both in their family and in their community. Support and protection are part of nurturance. The obedience of children comes out of their love and respect for their parents and their community, not out of the fear of punishment. If their authority is to be legitimate, parents must explain why their decisions serve the cause of protection and nurturance; questioning by children is seen as positive, since children need to learn why their parents do what they do and since children often have good ideas that should be taken seriously.

> The principal goal of nurturance is for children to be fulfilled and happy in their lives. A fulfilling live is assumed to be a nurturant life–one committed to family and community responsibility. What children need to learn most is empathy for others, the capacity for nurtuance, and the maintenance of social ties, which cannot be done without the respect, self-discipline, and self-reliance that comes through being cared for.

Of "Nurturant Parent" morality (NPM for short), Lakoff writes:

> [while] this model of the family seems to have begun as a woman's model, it has now become widespread in America among both sexes. [This model of] a family of preferably two parents, but perhaps only one. If two, the parents share household responsibilities.

Moral behaviors in NPM are defined as empathy, compassion, self- social-, and environmental-nurturance, happiness, self-development, fair distribution, and personal growth. Discouraged in NPM are actions that are likely to impair one's or other's health, acts that make one or others unhappy, harm children, violate some standard of "fair distribution", or focus on retribution / punishment instead of restitution / rehabilitation. Interestingly, about NPM, Lakoff claims that "morality as empathy and nurturance…means that one cannot maintain a strict good-evil dichotomy"; in other words, NPM morality is relative morality.

In contrast, Lakoff's "Strict Father" model

> posits a traditional nuclear family, with the father having primary responsibility for supporting and protecting the family as well as the authority to set overall policy, to set strict rules for the behavior of children, and to enforce the rules. The mother has day-to-day responsibility for the care of the house, raising the children, and upholding the father's authority. Children must respect and obey their parents; by doing so the build character, that is, self-discipline and self-reliance. Love and nurturance are of course a vital part of family life but can never outweigh parental authority, which is itself an expression of love and nurturance–tough love. Self-discipline, self-reliance, and respect for legitimate authority are the crucial things that children must learn. Once children are mature, they are on their own and must depend on their acquired self-discipline to survive.

> Their self-reliance gives them authority over their own destinies, and parents are not to meddle in their lives.
> Strict Father morality assigns highest priorities to such things as moral strength (the self-discipline and self-control to stand up to external and internal evils), respect for and obedience to authority, the setting and following of strict guidelines and behavioral norms, and so on. Moral self-interest says that if everyone is free to pursue their self-interest, the overall self-interests of all will be maximized. In conservatism, the pursuit of self-interest is seen as a way of using self-discipline to achieve self-reliance.

"Strict Father" morality (hereafter abbreviated as SFM), in Lakoff's book, deems Strength, Authority, Order/Hierarchy, Boundaries, as moral. By contrast, SFM discourages any sort of moral, emotional, physical weakness, illegitimate and/or overstepping authority, violations of the natural order (i.e., God-man-woman-child, or God-man-animal), or deviant behavior. In addition, Lakoff's SFM values punishment over restitution, conceives of rights as impediment-free action (i.e., so-called "negative rights"), morality as wholeness/wholesomeness, and immorality as departures from or corruptions of the pure, whole state. Interestingly, SFM under Lakoff's taxonomy, incorporates the Lockean economic man, where acting in one's own self-interest is seen as moral.

After defining SFM and NPM, and briefly explaining how human morality is operationalized through sometimes contradicting metaphors (thus explaining how human morality is often not internally consistent), Mr. Lakoff illustrates how conservatives and liberals apply their metaphors of the idealized family and related sub-metaphors to certain moral / political quesitons of the day. For example, a conservative (by Lakoff's definition, a person subscribing to SFM) will act to promote "traditional morality" in general, promote self-discipline, responsibility, and reliance, favor rewards and punishments, act to prevent interference with the pursuit of self-interest by self disciplined, self-reliant people, uphold and protect legitimate (parental and government) authority, and protect the citizenry from external evils.

By contrast, liberals subscribing to NPM will value empathetic political behavior, promoting the liberal concept of fairness, helping and protecting those who cannot help and protect themselves, promoting personal fulfillment, and nurturing / strengthening one selves in order to carry out these values.

Mr. Lakeoff writes: "there are two opposed, highly structured, well-grounded, widely accepted, and utterly contradictory moral systems at the center of American politics", and this point is made clear in how conservatives and liberals view the citizen's relationship to the State. Conservatives hold the so-called nuclear family as the ideal family model, and see that family as the atomistic fundamental building block of society that graduates independent, capable, autonomous citizens to interact with other autonomous independent citizens and with a government comprised of other autonomous, independent citizens. Family authority, absolute and totalitarian, is vested in the head of a household; that authority is limited to the boundaries of that household. Complementarily, the authority of the State is also limited by the boundaries of the household, and only in very limited situations would State authority be considered legitimate inside a household. Persons in a household, particularly children, are subject to the authority of the head of household. Persons without are not, and are seen instead as other independent autonomous agents.

For liberals the line is much more blurred. In fact, in Mr. Lakoff's book, the liberal concept of family is much more communitarian in nature. It may or may not have two parents, but is fine with only the mother, and grants to the community a much larger legitimate role in the daily operation of the family. This broader and looser concept of family is then implemented in their politics; whereas conservatives consider the independent adult as independent of the State, even on par or a peer of the State, vested with authority inviolate except under extreme circumstances, the NPM-subscribing liberal views the citizen as a child and the State as parent. As such, even full-grown adults are 'always in the parent's house' in liberal politics, whereas conservatives differentiate between a parent's house (and the totalitarian authority that exists within those walls) and wider society (where the authority of others, including the State, is quite limited).

The differing metaphors liberals and conservatives employ, their two contrary views of the family (atomistic vs community), and the citizen's role in each domain are central to Mr. Lakoff's family-metaphor-drives-political-morality thesis. The conservatives' two-parent, patriarchal nuclear family model and SFM morality yields a unique set of expectations on how citizens interact with one another and the State, compared with the liberal's more matrifocal / communitarian ("It Takes a Village" is an apt description) family model, which itself drives different expectations as to how citizens interact and encourages the State's much more paternalistic and involved relationship with them.

To illustrate his thesis, Lakoff offers up several examples of how liberals and conservatives apply SFM and NPM to modern political questions and come up with very opposed viewpoints. I'll discuss three of his examples: abortion, welfare, and illegal immigration. With abortion, as with any other moral question, it starts with framing: one can see the new life as a blastocyst, an embryo, a fetus and, once clear of the birth canal, an infant. Note that in this framing, there are no set, defined transitions between blastocyst, embryo, and fetus, just generally recognizable categories. Alternatively, one may choose to see the new life as a potential human, a baby, regardless of the stage of development. This choice of framing is important, for if one sees a clump of cells, an embryo, or fetus–all antiseptic, value-less terms–one is likely to see an abortion as a medical procedure of no moral significance. It belongs in the medical domain of moral thinking. However, if one sees a baby, the question of abortion takes on an entirely different character, a question of life and death, not merely the removal of invasive parasitic tissue.

This tissue-vs-baby framing sets in motion metaphors and values that drive the entire train of subsequent moral reasoning. NPM sees abortion as moral because it promotes the moral virtues of empathy and compassion (for the abortion-seeking female's plight) happiness (satisfying wants), self-nurturance (taking care of the self), social nurturance (relieving burdens from the welfare system, lowering infant mortality rates), environmental nurturance (one less burden on Spaceship Earth), and self-development (keeps the female in school/college/work). In contrast, SFM sees abortion as immoral, an act that destroys innocent life (violating the morality of reward and punishment), that enables moral and emotional weakness and a lack of discipline (extra-marital sexuality, conceiving children one is not in a position to support), violates the natural law (the right to life, the right to self-defense), and violates the natural order (choosing school/college/career over family and motherhood/fatherhood). Given this view, the SFM-subscribing conservative can see abortion as nothing other than irresponsibility-enabling infanticide, while the liberal NPMer can't see what all the fuss is about, except that the SFM conservative is a misogynist for his/her lack of nurturance toward the distressed female (as a NPM liberal who sees nothing but a parasitic clump of tissue, Mr. Lakoff does not make room for the father's or anyone else's interest in what he deems a medical procedure in an autonomous, independent woman's body).

We see a similar dynamic at play when it comes to social programs, albeit without the starkly juxtaposed framing as is the case with abortion. For liberals, who see the government as super-parent whose duty it is to nurture all these citizen-children, social programs are moral. They help people (caring, nurturing, empathy, compassion), help government strengthen itself (self-nurturing), metaphorically "invest" in the people for a later "payoff", and promote fairness (by metaphorically levelling the playing field). Those who do not support social programs are seen as immoral, irresponsible citizens. For conservatives, who see the head of household as an autonomous, independent unit vested with his own authority independent of the State, social programs coddle people, interfering with their learning to be independent and self-sufficient. They make the citizenry morally, physically, and financially weak, interfering with their ability to climb the ladder of opportunity on their own. Furthermore, people receive goods and services they themselves don't earn, are rewarded for immoral behavior or lack of self-discipline, thereby violating the morality of reward and punishment. Moreover, social programs violate the natural law of private property, by forcefully expropriating private property only to give it to others without the citizen's express consent, interfere with nuclear family formation (violating the natural order of God-husband-wife), by taking from men and married fathers and giving to unwed/remarried mothers an income independent of a husband, and also violate authority boundaries–becoming in effect, illegitimate authority–by excessively interfering in a head-of-household's affairs. Additionally, social programs violate Lockean self-interest and undermine the free market by allocating rewards by political processes rather than impartial free market mechanisms.

Another issue of fundamental disagreement between liberals and conservatives, again stemming from differing metaphors for family, is illegal immigration. For liberals, illegal aliens are morally innocent, being exploited by employers or were lured into the country by the availability of work. These innocents provide value to the nation's household, and it would be immoral to throw them out. It is the 'parent's' job to care for these children-in-making. For conservatives, illegal aliens are not citizens, therefore are not in our national family, to say nothing of our immediate family, and are breaking the law to boot, hence providing goods and services to illegal aliens is akin to providing goods and services to children who barged into our home uninvited. We can see how conservatives and liberal metaphors of family explain their differing positions on political questions.

Given these differences, it is not difficult at all to see how liberal arguments for abortion, social programs, and fondness for illegal aliens make no sense at all for conservatives and vice versa. Compassion, fairness, wise investment, financial responsibility, self-interest…all are defined and implemented differently. And both sides consider the other to advocate immorality.

Mr. Lakoff completes the last quarter of his book by advocating for the superiority of NPM over SFM, an unsurprising position for a nurturant liberal who works in a nurturant institution (education).

Commentary: Overall, I found Mr. Lakoff's book to be a very interesting attempt at faithfully characterizing the disparate ways that liberals and conservatives approach political questions. I learned quite a bit from this book about metaphorical moral reasoning, and gleaned a much fuller realization at just how far apart liberals and conservatives are on cultural questions as a result of these metaphors. And although he tries very hard to honorably separate his self-admitted liberal and pro-NPM politics from his analysis of conservative thought, his political stripes still show through in many places. It starts with the language that he uses, i.e., 'strict father' vs 'nurturant parent'. The former term is sex-specific and is freighted with negative connotation, the implication being that conservatives are stern and intolerant and maybe even violent. The latter term however, is not sex-specific and possesses a positive connotation–the implication is that liberal NPMs are caring and empathic, non-violent, somehow better. This bad-father-good-mother framing pervades through the entire book; "nurturant parent" and "strict father" terminology load the analysis dice already, in effect "settling" issues of 'strict father' and 'nurturant parent' morality are "once the words are chosen" (Mr. Lakoff's own words, used when discussing how liberals and conservatives view abortion, apply equally here).

Try as hard as he does, Mr. Lakoff's view of SFM tends toward caricature. He casts SFM as caring more about "upholding itself", maintaining the SFM moral structure, and the SFM moral order, than real questions of judging right and wrong. Furthermore, having defined SFM in pejorative terms, Mr. Lakoff moves quickly and easily from "strict father" imagery to "abusive father" assertions in several places in the text (the author does parenthetically say "and mothers who subscribe to SFM morality" where "abusive father" occurs, but my point still stands). This framing, a tell-tale indicator of Mr. Lakoff's true feelings about SFM, nonetheless conflicts with the evidence that highlights women–nurturers in his conceptualization–as the primary perpetrators of child abuse and neglect and equal abusers of spouses (on par with men).

The author also betrays his negative feelings about SFM morality with reference to faith. He mischaracterizes conservative Christianity's concept of God, ascribing to conservatives a transactional faith-by-works religion and reserving for liberals the concept of Grace. Which I find a bit ironic in that, in practice, it is conservatives who incorporate grace and repentance into their weltanschauung (grace being necessary to redeem flawed, fallen, sinful beings whose flesh tends to evil) and liberals whose actions suggest that the works of their hands alone can make man holy and perfect. Mr. Lakoff makes the mistake of conflating nurturant permissiveness with grace, and confuses conservatives' focus on the necessity of repentance with legalistic intolerance.

One observation I had from reading this book is how much of a coup it was when leftists successfully instituted Hindu-Prussian-style compulsory public schooling in American and throughout Western Civilization in the 19th century. As Mr. Lakoff puts it, "to be in charge of the teaching of morality is to be in charge of the teaching of politics", and I don't think even Mr. Lakoff would argue with the assertion that nurturants…women, leftist men, are in charge of the public schools. Therefore it is nurturants, and not Mr. Lakoff's demon SFMers, who are in charge of teaching morality and therefore political education. Nurturants have already answered Mr. Lakoff's call to arms, where he exhorts fellow leftists

> if progressives want young Americans to grow up to have progressive values, the first thing they should do is promote Nurturant Parenting

What Mr. Lakoff fails to mention is that leftists have already captured the schooling institutions from primary school through university. They already have hundreds of thousands of taxpayer-funded churches that inculcate NPM to millions of fresh young minds each year. Seen in this way, we again see how revolutionary an act it is for conservatives to homeschool their children. Not only do homeschoolers–a plurality of whom are conservative Christians–ensure the transmittal of SFM morality, values, and politics to the next generation, they are throwing a wrench into the entire Leftist reproductive machinery, whose mechanism for self-perpetuation is it to create new, cookie-cutter, unthinking cogs for the big government left-wing (but I repeat myself) social machine.

Another observation I gleaned from this book, on the order of "liberals are from another planet", was Mr. Lakoff's assertion that liberals believe in relative morality, in effect, that liberals have gone beyond good and evil. They apparently sees things not in black and white but in grayscale instead. The implications of this blew me away…that perhaps conservatives are alone in recognizing that objective good and evil do exist, and that liberals don't consciously elect to ignore evil, rather, they can't recognize evil qua evil at all. Their philosophical blinders won't let them.

About rights, I found Mr. Lakoff's take interesting. As a rightist and as a Believer, I believe our fundamental rights come from God. Men may heap other rights on top of this basic natural-rights foundation, but this addition does not effect our God-given rights with which each of us were born. This perspective apparently clashes with that of Mr. Lakoff, who claims that rights are paired with duties, duties being burdens upon others to provide. This is classic leftist dogma that locates all rights as emanating from the State, dogma that completely ignores the whole host of natural rights that pre-existed the State, rights like property, life, and self-defense, and lumps natural rights into one big commingled batch with man-made constructed rights like the "right to work", the "right to housing", etc. Rights, then, in Mr. Lakoff's construction, are little more than favors granted to citizens by the privilege-granting power of the State, ones that are bought via taxation of other citizens:

> [W]here the duty of guaranteeing rights falls to the government, those rights are "purchased" through taxation. Lower taxes may mean fewer rights. If you want rights, somebody's got to pay for them or provide them. Rights and duties don't come into existence out of nothing.

This view that rights spring from the State helps explain some liberal frustrations with small-government conservatives, minarchists, and libertarians. In their view, the nanny state, Big Momma, is the provider and guarantor of what they have and what others have. Your neighbor has at least partial claim to your property. Self-defense is a collective right. Your right to live is subject to the rationing of the collective; the elderly or infirm may not be worthy of healthcare resources or the unwanted or the disfigured not deemed worthy to be born. Liberty then is a function not of an absence of legal impediment, it is more a freedom that comes from having the materiel and abilities to do what you want, stuff and abilities supplied in equal measure as to the next fellow, all guaranteed by Leviathan.

Mr. Lakoff hit the target in this book by dynamiting the notion that either conservatives or liberals are in any way internally logically consistent in their philosophical views. To the contrary, Mr. Lakoff claims that, beyond some basic fundamental principles, both conservatives and liberals are equally logically inconsistent in their moral philosophies. These inconsistencies are a function of the differing metaphors that an individual person may put in play for a particular situation…"their morality is a hodge-podge of values based on the metaphors they use".

If I were to sum up, in one sentence, the take-away from Mr. Lakoff's book, it would be this: liberals have "mommy" morality, while conservatives have "daddy" morality. A unique and novel characterization, to be sure. Applied to politics, were I required to decide which sort of government I had to live under, well let's just say that under a mommy state, there is no limit of the amount of "nurturing" the State will do for me and to me, since it's "for my own good". The State will go to all sorts of lengths in its nurturing, satisfied that she is doing me a favor. A daddy state, on the other hand, lays out the rules and more or less leaves you alone provided you follow the rules. He'll coach you, encourage you, mentor you, and spank you when you get out of line, but he respects boundaries enough to stay out of your chili.

Williams v. Ormsby – A Much Needed Victory?

Featured Guest · 6 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Meistergedanken

In a significant decision that attracted a minimal amount of attention in the media, the Ohio Supreme Court ruled in February that affection in and of itself is insufficient to meet the legal requirement of "consideration" necessary to constitute a contract.

I imagine that contract law varies from state to state; in Ohio (where I reside) one must meet three requirements for a legal contract. You must have an offer, an acceptance and consideration. In this context, "consideration" describes a transaction of sorts whereby one party gains a benefit or right from the other party while incurring a debt, taking on an obligation or gaining a responsibility.

The particulars of the case of Williams v. Ormsby (Slip Opinion No. 2012-Ohio-690) are these: in 2004 Amber Williams (already a divorcee) and Frederick Ormsby formed a romantic relationship and by May of that year Mr. Ormsby had moved into his girlfriend's house. By July they were engaged. In a development that will surprise no one here, Ormsby took over the responsibility of the finances of the couple; he paid the property taxes as well as the entire mortgage for the house. For her part, Williams transferred the title of the property over to her fiancé.

Then, things took a turn for the worse. The relationship went bust and the wedding was called off. Ormsby and Williams drew up a contract to the effect that the house would be sold, with the first $324,000 of the net proceeds (essentially the amount he paid into the house) of the sale going to Ormsby. Anything above that amount would go to Ms. Williams.

Then things took a turn towards crazy. Weeks after the aforementioned agreement was signed, the two decided that there were still mutual romantic feelings. They engaged the services of a couples counselor and resumed their relationship. However, Ms. Williams stipulated an additional condition – she refused to resume their engagement or move back into the house unless Ormsby gave her a 50% stake in the property. Ormsby dutifully complied with her demand and a second contract was drawn up to that effect. I can't help but think that at some point Amber Williams happened to catch the film Intolerable Cruelty (which came out in 2003) on cable, and picked up some devious ideas. Anyone see where this is headed?

The relationship soured again, and by 2007 the couple were sufficiently estranged that they were living in separate portions of the house, and in 2008 they filed lawsuits against each other. Williams demanded the second contract be honored, while Ormsby only accepted the first contract that made him the sole owner.

This is where it gets interesting. A county court ruled in 2009 that the second contract was invalid because Ms. Williams hadn't given up anything in return for the financial benefit of half the property. There was no "consideration". In 2010 an appeals court disagreed – claiming that the love and affection Williams showered upon her beloved at the time in fact fulfilled her side of the bargain. Then, it was off to the state Supreme Court.

The court overturned the appeals court ruling, deciding by a convincing 5 – 1 vote (one justice did not vote for some reason) that "gratuitous promises are not enforceable as contracts because there is no consideration." A gift, on the other hand, requires no such condition – but unlike contracts the regulation of gifts does not fall within the purview of the court system (as far as I know). The ruling further stated that "The evidence demonstrates that the only consideration offered by Amber Williams for the June 2005 agreement was her resumption of a romantic relationship with Frederick Ormsby. There is no detriment to Amber…only benefit." And the quote that delivers the coup de grace, "We hold that merely moving into a home with another while engaging in a romantic relationship is not consideration for the formation of a contract."

When asked by the court if Ms. Williams had given up "anything of value" that merited consideration for the contract, she replied, "I didn't pay him anything, no. I thought what was of value was the fact that we were sharing all sorts of things. He had my love." Ah, chutzpah. This pattern has been identified here before, of course. His love (they were "sharing", after all) accounts for nothing, while hers was worth hundreds of thousands of dollars!

I am not going to claim that this ruling marks a historic turning point for men, or even a monumental decision, but it is nonetheless of great importance. In effect, an [unmarried] cohabitating woman can no longer legally claim that she is entitled to half your stuff because she was intimate with you, shared her feelings and occasionally boiled you an egg for breakfast. As more couples choose to cohabitate rather than marry, this ruling may provide men desperately needed protection from would-be asset-strippers (my least favorite kind of stripper, BTW).

An epilogue to this tale: it is of considerable interest to note that of the seven justices on the Supreme Court, six are Republicans and the remaining one is a Democrat. The judge that was in the minority, Justice Paul Pfeifer, is a Republican – although he has often aligned with Democrats on the court over the course of his tenure. He dissented on the grounds that the second contract was worded exactly the same way as the first, was between the same parties and concerned the same property, so the second contract should be as valid, even though the "valuable consideration" it mentioned has completely unstated specifics. In this sense he seems to be at least attempting to adhere to a strict interpretation of the law, and as such is hardly an activist judge, merely a misguided one.

To those who consistently and tediously assert that there is no discernible difference between Democrats and Republicans (of which some of the latter are balking at expanded provisions of the VAWA proposed by the former at the moment I write this during the month of April) I ask: do you or anyone here believe that this same ruling could have been issued, in say, California or Massachusetts? If nothing else, it behooves men to elect a political party that will not appoint judges that are inherently hostile to men's interests; even indifference is preferable to the creeping horrors of liberal activism in America's courtrooms.

An Historic Wrong Still Needs Righting

Slavery and the attendant racial problems in the US have left a permanent scar on our nation, causing our worst war to date, suffering and oppression on an enormous scale, and a lasting animosity that always simmers beneath the surface of American society. Much has been done to redress wrongs, but one of the most fundamental crimes of slavery is still practiced, only by another name.

Those who have read Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn closely cannot miss that one of the most important themes of the book is fatherhood. Poor young Huck was stuck with Pap Finn, a wretched father who beat and used his son cruelly, drinking himself into oblivion whenever he could get his hands on his corn whiskey. When Huck ran off after a particularly bad drinking bout on Pap's part, he found Jim, who, having recently taken flight himself, helped him get by in the woods and make his way downriver.

As it turned out, Huck fled from a bad father, while Jim went on the run to be a father. Jim was to be sold away from his family, and rather than accept this with resignation, Jim became a runaway slave, which could lead to terrible punishment.

The relationship between Huck and Pap Finn is often explained as an allegory of the relationship between Britain and her colonies. Twain liked to use such methods in his writing, but was usually more explicit about it, so there was likely more to it than that. Although much of Twain's political views and personality shine through in the odd adventures and colorful characters who animate the book, it is above all a story of a fatherless son and a childless father.

Huck Finn has come under some criticism for the portrayal of Jim as a superstitious, unsophisticated caricature of a southern slave. But for all the supposed patronizing racism of the prose and dialog, Jim comes off as a fundamentally decent, caring man and, most importantly, a loving, dedicated father. He cares for Huck as though he were his own son, protects him from distress, and helps feed him. His greatest regret is berating his daughter for not listening, and then realizing to his horror that she'd gone deaf. And this decent father is to be removed from his children at the whim of his "superiors." This is the most powerful condemnation of slavery in the book. It is a rebuke to all those who would defend the institution of slavery, and it is delivered through the example of fatherhood.

Sadly, when it comes to the black family, things don't look all that different today. Black men are still removed from their children on a whim. Social welfare workers sever black men from their families as a routine matter. They inject feminist theory into the black community like so much poison, and advocate the use of police to separate men from their children. If we were to go by the dismal statistics, we'd have to assume there aren't more than three black men in ten qualified to be in their children's lives.

The very deep reach of government workers and agencies into the black family creates another kind of servitude. Black mothers who go on the dole are owned by the government (if not in word, in fact), which then asserts its claim over their children's father and drives a financial wedge between parents, all too often separating father from children. Women's advocates in black communities are mainly white, and a disproportionate number of them are of the lesbian feminist persuasion, prone to seeing men as expendable at best, but more often as a menace to be dealt with by the law, and sometimes as sexual competition. They also hold significant power over their female charges, and can exert pressure for sexual favors, a problem that has been alleged at women's shelters, but surely exists elsewhere as well. The relationship between government agent and public charge is loaded with the potential for exploitation, and just as pederasts were attracted to the priesthood, a certain kind of female who fancies young single mothers is attracted to social work.

Over the last 50 years, we have steadily re-created the conditions of slavery in the black family, and hardly a protest is raised outside of the black community. First, social welfare programs that rewarded women for kicking husbands out of the home began the trend. Then, when the fatherless children caused a crime wave, incarceration at extremely high rates further exacerbated it. Finally came welfare reform that not only incentivized father removal, but also put fathers on the hook for the welfare that came on the condition that they were kicked out their child's life. The pressure black fathers have been put under by policy is so severe, and so obviously designed to remove men from their families, that when one hears a politician bemoaning absent fathers in the black community one is tempted to tar and feather the bastard.

You'd think this state of affairs would be a national source of shame, but somehow people have accepted it as normal. So much so that a myth has developed around Africa being a traditionally matriarchal continent, where fathers never mattered much anyway. This is pure garbage. Traditional African families are not, and never have been, matriarchal. As a rule, West African families are patrilineal, virilocal, and patriarchal.

Of course, when you enslave men, suddenly their authority in the family means very little. Whether they are owned by the private sector, as in the old South, or the public sector, as in our big cities today, matters little. The effect is to strip them of any influence over their families and hand it to public schools, social welfare agencies and the police. Meanwhile, this is all justified by appeals to "elevate" blacks from their deplorable condition — just like in good old slavery. However, if you want to believe that, you also have to believe that slave masters and social workers know what's better for children than their own fathers, and care just as much. Frankly, I just don't buy it, but, as mentioned before, only some three out of ten black kids grow up with dad — if that.

What this means is that there's either something very wrong with our policy, or something very wrong with black men. Given that blacks survived on their own for millennia before coming into contact with other civilizations, it's got to be the former.

If Mark Twain were alive today, he'd look at the situation and shake his head as it became clear that black men have it no better than Jim did where family is concerned. For all the supposed progress we've made, some things just remain the same.

As a white man, I chafe at the notion of white guilt, but there are some things my government does that make me sick. Systematically removing children from their fathers – an injustice that falls disproportionately on black men – is one of them. We all pay the price for it in higher incarceration rates, police costs and social welfare. The costs are enormous. But, most importantly, like slavery it is an intolerable moral wrong for which there can be no justification other than purely callous self-interest on the part of those who profit from the status quo.

Feminism as Ideological Childishness

By Matt Forney

Remember how when you were a kid, you couldn't wait to be a adult? Usually after your parents made you go to bed early, refused to buy you candy at the checkout line or made you sit in the corner after you were being a brat.

"When I'm all grown-up, I'm gonna do whatever I want! I'm gonna stay up all night, I'm gonna eat candy every day and you won't be able to do anything about it! Nyah-nyah!"

From the perspective of a child, being an adult is about freedom. Freedom to do what you want and act out without consequences. Being a kid sucks, constrained by all these rules. Do your homework, pay attention in class, don't pull your sister's pigtails, don't eat anything before dinner, don't stay up too late, yadda yadda yadda.

Then you actually grow up and realize that it sucks.

You're no longer bound by all these rules, but you now have responsibilities, and there's no one to protect you from the consequences of your own stupidity. You can stay up as late as you want… and suffer the effects of sleep deprivation the next day when your insides feel like mincemeat and you can't stay awake. You can play video games all day… until you realize you have to get a job to pay for those video games, your rent, your food and everything else. You can eat candy every day… until you balloon up by a hundred pounds and get diabetes.

Only children think being a grown-up is fun and games. It's more about work and struggle than anything else. Children may fantasize about growing up, but adults fantasize about being children again, with all its carefree fun and having someone else take care of you.

I was thinking about this the other day and realized that feminists view the role of men in a patriarchal society in the exact same way children view adults.

"Wah-hah! Men have all the freedom and it's not fair! They get paid more, they can vote, they can sleep around, they can do anything they want! Waaah!"

Like kids crying about how unfair it is that they have to be in bed by 9:00, feminists completely ignore the flipside of masculine privilege: masculine responsibility.

Yes, men on average make more than women. That's because men are more likely to choose careers that are dangerous, physically demanding and/or intellectually demanding. While I was driving to Barnes & Noble to write this article, I got held up at an intersection by a construction team re-paving the road. Out of about two dozen workers, I spotted just one woman, and all she was doing was directing traffic. All the workers doing the grunt work were men.

Yes, men can sleep around with fewer repercussions than women. That's because promiscuous men are more able to form lifelong bonds and successful marriages than promiscuous women. It's also because the mechanics of childbirth mean that a woman who cheats on her husband/boyfriend can burden him with a child that is not his, without his knowledge.

Yes, husbands have greater personal freedom than wives. That's because as the head of the household, they're responsible for safeguarding her and the children.

The freedom to do anything you want also comes with the burden of having to own your mistakes.

We can see the consequences of the feminist conception of freedom all around us. Ghetto dwellers and white trash with armies of bastards, each with a different daddy. Thirtysomething careerists desperately rushing to find a slack-wristed "nice guy" to put a ring on it before their ovaries shrivel up. "Liberated" girls who think guys are attracted to their trashy tattoos and bad attitudes.

Didn't anyone tell you girls that eating candy every day is a bad idea?

Now, I'm not arguing that women should be forced back into the kitchen en masse. I'm not interested in telling girls what to do. But as a certain wise blogger once said, choices have consequences. Women should have the freedom to do whatever they want, but they should also be told that their choices have ramifications and that owning those ramifications is part of being an adult.

If you choose to major in a liberal arts discipline, you're going to make less money than someone with a STEM degree.

If you put off having children until you're in your thirties, your chances of finding a good husband decrease drastically, as does the likelihood that any children you do have will have disorders like autism.

If you choose to sleep around, men will find you less appealing as a marriage/relationship prospect than more chaste women.

As much as you stamp your feet and cry about how unfair it is, that doesn't change the reality on the ground. Life isn't fair for women or men.

Women want the privileges that come with being a man, but they don't want the responsibilities.

Part of being a man is being responsible and owning up to the consequences of your decisions. If something is your fault, you acknowledge it; you don't slough it off on someone else. That's bitch behavior.

Feminism is an ideology of the children, by the children, and for the children.

Daylighting Manosphere Ideas

W.F. Price · 9 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Chuck Ross, who has grown into an effective and tenacious young journalist, uncovered a telling article published in Slate's Double-X women's magazine. It brings up the years-old manosphere idea that if women have the right to choose via abortion whether or not they want to support a child, so should men.

It's fairly obvious that it's inherently unfair that women have choice about the "oops" results of their sexual activity, whereas men do not. Author Katie Roiphe presents the idea reasonably, without resorting to shaming or blaming men, which prompted Chuck to label the piece as "radical."

It's kind of strange that such a concept is "radical," but these are strange times in which people who were raised during an entirely different era still have a great deal of influence over policy. Abortion was only fully legalized when people turning 40 this year were born, so those older than that tend to view the issue in terms of giving women a break, while those of us who are younger are left to wonder about whether we had brothers and sisters who never made it.

I'm a bit ambivalent about seeing the idea come up on what is, for all intents and purposes, a feminist site. On the one hand, I'm glad to see people talking about it, but on the other I'm aware that without people like Paul Elam pushing the issue on sites such as The Spearhead and A Voice for Men without pulling any punches, it would have been ignored in perpetuity.

To me, this vindicates the approach the manosphere has taken over the last several years. Being nice and trying to appease feminists wasn't working, despite decades of effort. All they'd do was turn up the dial on shame and blame and push for yet more criminalization of fatherhood. It's unfortunate that we had to resort to being ungentlemanly to make a difference, but sometimes shit-tests like feminism demand ungentlemanly responses.

It's a positive development to see these ideas propagating throughout our culture. Chuck's got a great nose for this stuff, and I'd recommend readers subscribe to his RSS feed.

Feminist Showdown: Sandra Fluke vs. Amanda Hess

It's objectification time again, and today we've got a couple serious feminist activists, just like last time, when we featured Jessica Valenti and Amanda Marcotte. Valenti won the last contest by a considerable margin, causing Marcotte some serious discomfort. Based on timing, I suspect that feminist rage over the last showdown ultimately led to The Spearhead (among other sites) being featured by the SPLC.

Some may think I'm overstating the effect of these pageants, but one should never, ever underestimate the effect it has on females when their SMV (sexual market value) is being denigrated. It's akin to having a man humiliated by the law in front of his family, and forcibly subjugating him to his wife in court. Because feminists are all for doing these things to men, I feel absolutely no shame about subjecting them to objectification.

First up we have the notorious Sandra Fluke, who agitated for "free" birth control, paid for by employers whether they want to or not, and whether or not it violates their freedom of conscience. The President took her under his wing after she was mocked and called a "slut" by Rush Limbaugh, who was later forced to apologize to keep his very lucrative job.

Next, we have Amanda Hess, who has been a feminist writer for some time, writing for the Washington City Paper, then another Washington DC media outlet called "TBD," and now apparently some obscure blog called "GOOD" in Los Angeles, where she has the title of "lifestyle editor." A couple years ago, Hess made a very funny editing mistake at TBD, in which she missed one letter "n" in an article title. Her title came out as "one in three black men who have sex with me is HIV positive," and it was panned across the nation.

So, the question is, if you had to spend a night with one of these women, which one would it be? Vote in the poll beneath the thumbnails.

What's Up With Wanetta Gibson?

Some readers asked in comments what became of Brian Banks' false rape accuser Wanetta Gibson, who pocketed $750 thousand dollars as a result of her (or more likely her mother's) setup scheme.

Turns out she's on welfare, having blown the entire $750 thousand on cars, big screen TVs and the like. She has two kids with two different fathers, and was ordered to pay child support (perhaps her mother was taking care of them), but has been let off the hook. She's a failure and in her position from very poor choices, but the state has decided not to prosecute her for either lying about rape or failure to pay child support.

In the meanwhile, men languish in prison merely for being unemployed…

From the LA Times:

> Gibson was a high school sophomore when she accused Banks of raping her at Long Beach Poly High School. She and her family sued the school, receiving a $750,000 settlement, and Banks spent five years in prison after pleading no contest to forcible rape.
> While a judge Thursday tossed out the rape charge, it remains far from certain if Gibson, 24, will face any consequences.
> L.A. prosecutors have said they have no plans to charge her with making false accusations, saying it would be a tough case to prove.
> Legal experts noted it could be difficult for the Long Beach school district and its insurer to get the settlement back.
> Then there is the reality of Gibson's life.
> Court records suggest she has few assets: She received public assistance for a time and her children, ages 4 and 5, still do, according to two suits brought by the county in an attempt to collect child support. Gibson, who could not be reached for comment, was ordered initially to pay a $600 a month toward their support. But in the last year, county officials said she didn't have to pay anything, citing a lack of income and employment.

This Banks case is going to be one of the most significant false rape cases in recent times. His story will make a difference. It is even more important than the Duke LaCrosse scandal, because in this case no racial angle will overshadow the false accusation.

FEMEN is at it again, baring breasts and making noise at male events to attract attention. The Ukrainian women of FEMEN are generally much more attractive than the equivalents here in the Anglo world, because they haven't yet adopted the sedentary lifestyle of driving everywhere and gorging oneself quickly on supersized meals. This does allow them to attract a fair amount of attention, but to Western observers it is rather puzzling, since our feminists take a decidedly different approach. In fact, it often seems that they are inviting rather than defying men.

The main concerns of FEMEN, as they state, are sex tourism and harassment of students in Kiev. I've never been to Kiev, but I imagine it can be a problem there. Certain cities in Eastern Europe have become magnets for a trashier sort of young Western male who, with his working-class paycheck, can really live it up in relatively poor Eastern Europe. When I was in Riga, I saw a bit of this, but Latvia seems to have passed that stage and is slowly converging with the northern European norm.

Ironically, what feminists were agitating for in the straight-laced mid-20th century West has been part of Eastern European society for far longer than it has in the West. Bolshevik policies legalized abortion and no-fault divorce 50 years before the West did the same. Women were also taken out of the home and put to work alongside men from the beginning. Although Bolshevik logic finally led to social and economic collapse, something resembling social equality did arise in the postwar era, and according to what I have heard from those who lived through it, society was fairly conservative and women, although hard-pressed in life to handle both family and work, had fairly decent lives under the protective umbrella of the state.

All that fell apart after the Soviet Union crumbled, and shock-therapy capitalism set off an orgy of prostitution and gangsterism. Ukraine was hit severely, and is still feeling the effects. As one might have expected, the social and work equality of the preceding decades removed men's incentive to protect the women around them, so white knighting was off the table, leaving Eastern European women to fend for themselves in a much more ruthless world where the government no longer had the means or will to protect them. This led to exploitation on a grand scale, and a culture of "get it while it's hot" sex for profit. Although I never spent time in Eastern Europe during the worst years of this (I was living in Peking at the time), I did know some Ukrainian and Russian women in China, and it was really a bit sad what they'd been reduced to. To be honest, it was appalling to me, as a very young American who had never seen anything like it before.

So I do have some sense of where FEMEN activists are coming from, and I think I understand their motivation to some degree. Essentially, what they are doing is saying "Look at us! We are beautiful! We are worth more than 50 Euros!" This is far, far different from what Western feminists have in mind.

What happened in Eastern Europe is just more evidence that nothing can really substitute for the family. Replacing men with the state will work for some time, but it isn't sustainable, and the consequences for women can be harsh on a very wide scale. Sure, men may not be perfectly reliable, but most are good enough. When you put all your eggs in one basket – the state – you're asking for a major catastrophe when things fall apart. Western feminists are singing a siren song other women would be wise to recognize for the danger it is.

Feminists Frothing Over Vatican Crackdown

W.F. Price · 11 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As the Vatican cleans house in the US and Catholic organizations oppose provisions of Obamacare, media outlets in the US have gone on the offensive by dredging up more of the sex abuse scandal and making a mountain out of the molehill of a scandal that has emerged concerning the pope's butler.

Although there is a lot of distrust of the Catholic church in the US (which goes back a long, long way), I'm happy to see it finally taking a stand. One of the reasons I stopped going to church was the strange interpretation of Catholicism in Seattle, which was possibly the most radically liberal archdiocese on earth. When I was a child, local churches would hold fund drives for the Sandinistas, join anti-nuclear protests that were all but orchestrated by Bolsheviks, and host PRIDE rallies. What they got away with was breathtaking. After years of this behavior, Cardinal Ratzinger, now Pope Benedict XVI, personally handled the problems with our local archdiocese, forcing the removal of archbishop Raymond Hunthausen, who presided over the transformation of the local church to something resembling the contemporary Episcopal Church, which is all but dead.

Speaking of the Episcopal Church, I have some perspective on this institution as well, having been raised attending a Catholic Church with one set of grandparents, and an Episcopalian Church with the other. What happened to the Episcopal Church in the US is a terrible shame. I actually preferred the Episcopal liturgy to Vatican II services in Roman Catholic churches, and I still remember the hymns from Episcopalian summer school. I'm afraid Anglo Americans have lost a great deal of their heritage thanks to the lack of spine on the part of the Episcopalian leadership. The Episcopal Church leaders cast themselves as "courageous" for going along with prevailing fads, but in fact they look like cowardly weaklings in hindsight.

Perhaps the Catholics finally woke up to the threat posed by dilution of the church's core messages. From an outside perspective, a lot of the church's teachings look like so much superstition and myth, but one of the characteristics of a successful faith is that its members hold beliefs that bond them together, whether rational or not. As soon as leaders of the faith start rejecting doctrine and tailoring the message to suit the outside culture, members begin to feel there is no longer any point in adhering to it. But with many mainline Christian churches, they took it a step farther, and began to reject their own scripture, which is even more alienating to believers. Why go to church if the church itself admits that what it is teaching is so much bull?

So one would expect any church that cares to preserve itself to take measures to defend its beliefs and hold true to them. However, now that the Catholic Church has begun to do so, a very loud noise has begun to emanate from a number of people who seem to have thought that they were entitled not only to defy doctrine, but to be supported by the church in doing so. Many of them are feminists, including among them a number of lesbian nuns. Perhaps most prominent among them is Margaret Farley, a lesbian nun and professor at Yale divinity school.

Sr. Farley has published a number of books on sexuality, including one that argues that lesbian relationships are not fundamentally different from heterosexual marriage, which directly contradicts the church that has fostered her for decades. Farley's book "Just Love" was recently censured by the Vatican, in a rare move that indicates a clear new opposition to the unchecked feminism that had been tolerated for nearly 40 years.

In response, female columnists around the nation have been raging at the church. Maureen Dowd, who has taken up something of a feminist crusade against the Catholic Church in recent years, took a swipe, and Lisa Miller of the Washington Post denounced cardinals in a particularly misleading, puerile screed:

> Members of the Vatican hierarchy are using the word "feminist" and even "radical feminist" the way third-graders use the word "cooties." In April, the Vatican accused the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, which represents 57,000 nuns nationwide, of allowing "radical feminist" ideas to flow unchecked in their communities. In 2008, after launching an investigation against American nuns (the results of which have not yet been released), Cardinal Franc Rode told a radio interviewer that the nuns are suspected of "certain > irregularities," a "secular mentality" and "perhaps also a certain feminist spirit."

> The authors of these rebukes never define "feminism" or "radicalism." In their hands, these words, which can carry legitimate intellectual meanings, appear to signify something like: "Yucky women who fail to heed our instructions and, anyway, don't meet our standards of womanhood." In other words, the sisters aren't behaving as girls should.

Commenters on both articles decry the "misogyny" of the patriarchal church, and ask why it can't get with the times. Again, one need only look to the example of the Episcopal Church, which did get with the times, and then proceeded to give up the ghost.

The fact is that patriarchy works, and always has. It's the reason the Catholic Church, Judaism, Islam, Hinduism and, yes, even Buddhism (the Dalai Lama is not a feminist; there are no female lamas) are still around.

If feminists reject the patriarchy and "misogyny" of major religions, they have the option of simply rejecting them and starting their own faiths. If so many people feel as they do, they should have great success attracting faithful followers. Obviously, this is not the case, so rather than simply accepting that their own ideology is contrary to human nature, they attempt to strong-arm the institution into caving to their demands, and for some time had great success doing so.

But now the tide has shifted, and the water is coming back in to cover the weeds on the beach. Feminists are furious, and are making a terrible fuss, but their twilight time is here. Taking a stand against feminism has finally started to come to the mainstream.

What About African Women?

W.F. Price · 11 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One thing I've been wondering about, given all the talk in the manosphere about how much more attractive European and Asian women are than our own, is whether any black American men have found the same to be true in Africa. I used to teach some ESL for work study while in school, and I remember having a few black African females in class. They weren't all gorgeous, although several were, but they were both feminine and thin — far more so than your typical black American woman. The contrast was remarkable. These girls seemed to be on an entirely different plane. Even the least attractive of them had a certain feminine charm and sweetness that seems entirely absent in black American women under the age of 50 or so.

I'll use a couple photos of ordinary West Africans (where most black Americans' ancestors came from) to make the point:

25-year-old Senegalese woman:

Ivorian woman:

I'm sure pickings are slim out in the country where life is harsh and women age very quickly, but it seems that urbanized African women beat their American counterparts by a wide margin.

However, it would be interesting to hear how it is from a guy with real-world experience there.

Meet Your New Mother: Your Father

W.F. Price · 12 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists and those who would redefine masculinity like to congratulate themselves for changing the definition of fatherhood. Men are now expected to help out more with traditionally female tasks, share the burden of childcare, be more effeminate, etc. Michael Kimmel, who preaches against what he calls “toxic masculinity,” is a big proponent of this. Lots of women now expect that their husbands will be more like a maid than the man of the house.

In an opinion piece for The Age, Chloe Angyal shares her experience of being raised by a feminist father, who did her hair for ballet and talked about “feelings” with her:

> Thanks to feminism, my relationship with my father is entirely different to the one he had with his late father. When I was a little girl, it was dad who did my hair for Saturday morning ballet class. Until I was 15, when I finally mastered the art myself, he was the ballet bun master-in-chief in our house. Thanks to feminism, my father and I can talk about our feelings, something men of his generation could rarely do with their dads. Might things have been different had I been a boy? Possibly.

> If sexism keeps women trapped in stereotypical boxes – over-emotional and dependent, with a lower sex drive – it keeps men trapped too: stoic, always in charge, and forever looking to score. When men become parents, those same stereotypical boxes stop them from taking parental leave, or supporting a son’s passion for, say, sewing, or a daughter’s desire to be a leader.

What Kimmel and Angyal leave out is how exactly this has been achieved. It is not so much that fathers in general have become more touchy-feely and feminist, but rather that almost half of them have been removed from playing any meaningful part in their children’s lives. Perhaps the ones that remain – often upper middle class types like Kimmel and Chloe Angyal’s father – are more involved in “progressive” parenting, but most people just aren’t like that. Don’t children with ordinary, conventional fathers deserve to have fathers, too? Should men who are not comfortable hairdressing and participating in ballet be disqualified from fatherhood? These are important questions, because there are more fatherless children than ever, and we have feminism to thank for just that.

The Truth About the American Nun Issue

W.F. Price · 12 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Although one might expect misleading articles regarding the Vatican rebuke of the LCWR (Leadership Council of Women Religious), which represents about 80% of America's nuns, some of the outright lies the media is peddling are astonishing. For example, the Vatican has been accused of rebuking nuns for helping the poor by Nicholas Kristof, who has a history of playing fast and loose with facts.

The slander we are seeing from media organizations is purely political, but the facts of the matter demonstrate that spending so much political capital on the LCWR may be a foolish move on the part of the left.

First, the LCWR started to disintegrate back in the 1990s, when the left was culturally and demographically at its peak. A number of nuns, including many who were uncomfortable with the culture of lesbianism that prevailed in many convents, moved away to form another organization, known as the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious (CMSWR), which now represents about 20% of American nuns.

However, the numbers are a bit deceptive, as the LCWR is substantially older and more decrepit than the CMSWR. Many falsely assume that the left is always represented by the young, but people who were young in the 1960s are not young any longer, although they may imagine themselves so.

So, while the LCWR is aged 74 (!) on average, the CMSWR averages 60. This is a considerable difference, and adding to that difference is the fact that only a measly 9% of LCWR communities have any novices at all, whereas the number is closer to half of CMSWR communities. Clearly, the leftist nuns are a geriatric, fading force. Rather than promoting feminist theory and going toe-to-toe with the patriarchy (or caring for the sick and poor for that matter), they are in that stage of life where the nursing home is the more realistic scenario. It wouldn't surprise me if half or more of the work done by LCWR nuns is taking care of other nuns. They are, for all intents and purposes, a spent force.

The culture of radical feminism that was so strong in convents back in the 1970s and 1980s has already started to turn around, and the Vatican is essentially just mopping up old problems so as to set an example for the fresh crop of sisters.

For example, one point of April's rebuke of the LCWR reaches all the way back to 1977 to take the nuns to task for refusing to accept that the priesthood should be reserved for men:

> …The Second Vatican Council clearly indicates that an authentic teaching of the Church calls for the religious submission of intellect and will, and is not limited to defined dogmas or "ex cathedra" statements (cf. "Lumen gentium," 25). For example, the LCWR publicly expressed in 1977 its refusal to assent to the teaching of "Inter insigniores" on the reservation of priestly ordination to men. This public refusal has never been corrected…

Organizations like the Vatican, Imperial China, and other enormous bureaucracies, tend to move very slowly. They take the long-term view, aiming to survive over the centuries. Four-year terms mean little to them. Even life-long careers are rather insignificant in the grand scheme. Often, it is easier to wait for problems to simply die off before dealing with them.

This is where we can take some encouragement from the Vatican's moves, and why I've devoted some attention to it. The Vatican has been eyeing developments in the US for decades, but until recently has only been taking a very measured approach. During the Cold War, there were far bigger fish to fry than some nuns acting out in the US, so those problems were ignored even while at their worst — generally in the 1970s and 80s, when they were the dedicated foot-soldiers of the feminist revolution.

Today, however, we are witnessing the culmination of a generation of radical feminists, and the LCWR nuns represent these women as well as anyone. And the truth of it is that they are aging, childless, dependent and about to lose their influence. None of the rants published by women like Maureen Dowd will change that. Maureen and her cohorts are, for all intents and purposes, the same as the LCWR nuns, which is why the screeching against the Vatican has been so loud and shrill. At this point the best they can do is fly into an impotent rage, and they are counting on that to lead them to eternal victory — the permanent feminist revolution envisioned by Gloria Steinem (who is nearly 80 herself). It won't work. The Vatican will shrug it off. And that should lend some strength to our cause.

Well, ladies, it's been quite a run. As I look back on the legions of fatherless children, the countless broken families, and the shameless exploitation of ordinary Americans, I can't say there's much to be happy about, but at least it looks like things are finally turning around.

Advice for Commenters

I've been noticing that a lot of regular commenters have been ending up in spam recently. For the most part, these are people who never caused any trouble here, but I think I know what has happened.

Spam filters rely on reporting to compile databases of IPs. Spam filters are also indispensable for people who do what I do. Without them The Spearhead would be inundated with spam advertisements.

However, they also include those who have simply been "spammed" by people who don't like their views, language or opinions. This is a totally common practice, and has arisen because, to be quite honest, the anonymity of the internet does give a lot of crude people the opportunity to spout off without fear of being personally held to account for being crude and offensive.

It's a real problem, and I am pretty sick of it myself, but I'm not going to allow enemies to dictate terms in that regard.

Personally, I assiduously avoid posting any comments on sites where I suspect I might get "spammed." I would never post a comment on a feminist site, for example, because that's simply giving them the opportunity to blacklist my IP, and I know they will do so no matter how reasonable I may be.

However, despite being very careful in that regard, I found that The Spearhead's IP is being listed as spam simply because I link sites for citation purposes. Each time an enemy site gets a link from The Spearhead, it is promptly classified as "spam" by some angry feminist. This is annoying, but not really a problem. I should have been better about using the "nofollow" value to make sure these sites didn't get any link juice in the first place. I really shouldn't have been doing them any favors.

Fortunately, their simple-minded, stupid attitude has given me some motivation in this regard, so I've created a macro for links to hostile sites. Although I would never "spam" a trackback, because links always give you SEO cred, the girls who monitor feminist sites are too dumb to understand this.

As for how this is relevant to commenters, what I'd say is that you should simply think for a while before posting comments that you know will elicit a "spam" reaction from censors. Your IP will most likely be classified as spam in short order.

Policing comments has grown into one of the biggest problems in online publishing. It's been the single biggest headache for me since this site's inception, costing me about a thousand hours (this is a conservative, fair estimate) of monotonous work and grief from guilt-by-association tactics from detractors. When the topic is political, it's about ten times worse than otherwise.

For example, I've repeated stressed that ugly language bothers me, and I've tried to set an example by writing in a measured, aesthetically comfortable style. Yet I am still confronted with language such as "cunt," "gash," "buttfuck," etc. on a daily basis. It isn't pleasant. I really don't like it. All it brings to mind is shit and blood, neither of which are substances I like to dwell upon.

Well, enough of my personal tastes. The point is that if commenters don't exert some self-control, there is a developing entity out there that is starting to do so, and although I have negligible control over the process, I rely on it out of necessity. My personal recommendation would be that commenters put some effort into maintaining the same decorum they would while in public. If they end up in the spam folder, there's little I can do about it.

Judge's Apology to Children Lays Out Logic of Family Court

W.F. Price · 13 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

An Australian judge, Tom Altobelli, took the unusual step of writing to two children who were taken from their father to apologize for giving their mother sole custody, and stripping their father of any visitation rights.

The mother had claimed sexual abuse after her own mother consulted a psychic, who said the daughter was being molested.

Judge Altobelli found that the allegations were false, but declared that he thought that the mother truly believed them. This is possible. Self-delusion to attain some goal is maddeningly common in divorce.

Because he thought she truly believed the father was a molester, Altobelli decided it would be cruel to her to force her to give the father visitation rights, and since she was the "better parent" (code for mother), she was granted custody.

One of the insane things I encountered during divorce was the idea that joint custody is often held to be feasible only when there is cooperation on the part of the parents. Fortunately, this idea is not enshrined in law in Washington state – although it is unofficial policy for social workers – but apparently it is where Altobelli's court has jurisdiction (Australia). The problem with this view is that it gives the custodial parent (typically the mother) an incentive to create conflict if they don't want to share the children's visitation. Fathers simply cannot win if the mother puts her foot down.

I have compared family law judges to butchers before, and not to cast aspersions on them, but rather to describe their job. Their job involves cutting up a family into so many pieces. They are not paid to preserve families, but rather to dismember them. I invite any people who doubt this to spend a few afternoons in family court and see for themselves.

The real problem in Western family law is that when you go in for a hearing, there's a lot of uncertainty about how the job will be done. Will so-and-so get the ribs and brisket? Who gets the hamhocks? The sirloin? And so on and so forth.

Altobelli decided he might as well simply cut off the head and leave the rest intact. It may have been out of laziness, frustration, or simply the knowledge that the mother would continue to pester the court and ruin the ex-husband's life through constant accusations and litigation. Perhaps he felt he was doing everyone a favor. From one perspective, this may actually have been the case. As the law stands today, an ex wife does have that power.

However, there was something about the sorry case that bothered Altobelli's conscience enough to motivate him to make an apology to two fatherless children. Perhaps he really did feel some guilt about it.

Even if he did, what bothers me most about his letter is his own evasion of responsibility. He says that the mother is a good parent, writing:

> I knew your mum would look after you really well. I decided not to make your mum let you see your dad, even though your dad wanted this very much. I thought it would make things harder for you if I had done this.

Essentially, he's blaming the mother, and saying that although he didn't think there was anything terrible about their father, he wouldn't "make" her do anything she didn't want to do.

For all the anger at wives and how awful they can be in divorce cases, the fact is that wives aren't "making" men leave their families. Judges are. Policemen are. Social workers are. And this judge just admitted that men who haven't done anything wrong can also be made to get out of their children's lives.

But perhaps the title of the letter speaks for itself.

“Sorry I Took Daddy”

Yes, Mr. Altobelli, you should be.

One small step.

Teen Sex Slavers Busted in Ottawa

W.F. Price · 13 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Three teenage Canadian girls, aged from 15-17, were arrested in Ottawa last week for luring other girls and then pimping them. The girls were lured by means of social media, and then confined and, in at least one case drugged, before their sexual services were sold to male customers.

Due to provisions of Canada's Youth Criminal Justice Act, the slavers cannot be named, and one is still on the run. The inability of police to inform the public has made it difficult to enlist community help in apprehension of the 17-year-old fugitive.

Although pimping has long been considered the provenance of men, pandering is at least as common amongst enterprising females. In fact, pimps usually simply serve as the muscle, or informal police for prostitution enterprises. In many cases policemen themselves fulfill the role.

Most prostitutes are either in business as sole proprietors, or working for a "madam" such as Heidi Fleiss, so it isn't entirely shocking to see some precocious female criminals trying to go into the business while still in their teens.

Contract Killing OK in Canada — for Wives

While divorcing her husband, and having been separated from him for over half a year, Nicole Ryan decided to have him done in, so proceeded to hire a hit man to do the job. Unbeknownst to her, the guy was a RCMP officer (mountie), and she was arrested. The Canadian Supreme Court has decided to hear an appeal of her acquittal.

Ms. Ryan was acquitted by the Nova Scotia Supreme Court under the so-called "battered woman defense." This was what got Mary Winkler an exceptionally short sentence after she killed her husband with a shotgun while he slept. Winkler didn't allege physical abuse, but rather that her husband was a pervert for wanting her to dress sexy. For her crime, she did about seven months in jail.

Nicole Ryan alleges that her husband Michael had threatened to kill her and her daughter, and had been abusive. The court accepted her version, although it doesn't appear that her husband had ever been convicted of a crime. Nor do media outlets seem to have taken the time to interview her husband, who almost certainly has a different version of events.

What's different about the "battered woman defense" and ordinary self-defense cases is that in self-defense there has to be an imminent danger of harm. For the battered woman defense, there only needs to be a belief that harm could plausibly happen at some point in the future. For example, if a wife thinks her husband might lay a hand on her at some point in the future for some reason or the other, she can blow him away and then claim "battered woman defense."

The Canadian Supreme Court has taken the case because it strains credulity that Ms. Ryan's husband would or could have harmed her, given that they had been separated for months, and she was safe in another house with a protection order.

Nevertheless, as in the case I highlighted the other day in which a man was thrown out of his children's life because his ex-wife "believed" he was a molester, the defense in this contract killing case appear to be using the same logic:

> Brian Greenspan, another of Ryan's lawyers, argued that Ryan was not legally wrong to "arrange a pre-emptive strike" on her husband because she was "faced with the belief that a pervasive and recurrent threat to kill her and to harm her child would be carried out."

Of course, a feminist lawyer – the type who can always be counted on to support murder when committed by a female – stepped in to blame the problem on inadequate law and domestic violence prevention:

> The Supreme Court decision could ultimately affect how the law would be applied to cases of abused women, said Christine Boyle, lawyer for intervener the Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies and the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund.
> "What is at stake is whether there is a way in which the Supreme Court can encourage the police and prosecutors to exercise due diligence in enforcing the criminal law, restraint orders, probation orders, etc, so that abused women have the equal protection of the law."

Perhaps what she has in mind is not only decriminalizing contract killing for wives, but ensuring that the police are tasked with doing the job.

It looks as though Canada's Supreme Court will let Ms. Ryan off the hook, scot free. The result of such a decision will be more spousal killings, of both husbands and wives.

There really is a lot of stupidity in high places.

Implications of Family Law on “Chicks Dig Jerks” Phenomenon

W.F. Price · 16 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Heartiste (Roissy) has another post up demonstrating scientific evidence for the attraction women feel for dangerous men. Psychological studies have clearly documented this phenomenon, so I think we can safely say it is a scientifically verifiable fact rooted in human biology (as well as that of a number of other animals).

So what does current policy have to do with this? Well, what would you expect to happen when law so humbles men that those who follow it are reduced to obsequious underlings to the women in their lives? Why, women will grow to despise them, of course. Wives will find themselves wishing they could sleep with anyone but their husbands. Men who may have been passably assertive and masculine in a different legal regime are reduced to sniveling “yes ma’am” sycophants.

Eventually, the ones who don’t care – the real criminals – will be the only men left who are deemed attractive.

It’s akin to the argument used against gun control that goes like this:

“If owning a gun is a crime, only criminals will own guns.”

For our purposes, here’s how it goes for men:

“If being a desirable man is a crime, only criminals will be desirable men.”

This has already come to pass in a number of communities, and in the most fertile age cohort. I am fairly certain it explains a great deal of the illegitimacy rate in the under-30 crowd (now over 50%). The men we see impregnating young women are largely those who don’t give a damn about the consequences, and don’t want to play by the rules society expects them to follow.

As for what the consequences of this will be, I leave it to reader’s imagination.

Happy Father's Day!

W.F. Price · 17 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I'm enjoying my time with the kids today. Last weekend before summer, when they're coming down to spend a good stretch with dad. I'm feeling a bit like a kid myself thinking about all the fun we'll have.

Update: Went for a ride around the park, and the boy caught a snake! Daughter rode a bike by herself without training wheels for the first time. Quite a day.

A Letter To Fathers

Featured Guest · 18 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Frost

The first memory I can recall from my childhood is of the ambulance. My second is of the police, and then the nice couple with government ID badges and colourful sweaters who asked a lot of questions.

Dad was at work. My little sister had somehow climbed on top of the kitchen counter and couldn't get down, so I ran into my parent's bedroom to wake our mother up from a nap. Mom took a lot of naps in those days, it seemed to me.

The plan was simple: Wake Mom up, Mom can help sister get down. Problem solved. Except Mom didn't wake up.

At least, not right then. I called 911, the ambulance came with some IV fluids, the police came, Dad came, and eventually Mom woke up. She had gotten sick, we were told. But it was all right, because she had gotten better. Crisis averted! My sister and I breathed a sigh of relief. Presumably my baby brother would have too, if he had understood what was going on.

At some point, Mom and Dad had some hard conversations. Dad was too busy at work to see everything that was going on, but it was obvious that Mom had a problem.

The Alcoholics Anonymous approach to curing addiction is basically to heap attention, rationalization and Hamsterbation on anyone who shows up. As long as you're drinking, you're the warm little center of the AA universe, and everyone tells you how special and brave you are. It's not your fault. Alcoholism is a disease, like cancer or strep throat. Lots of acceptance, forgiveness, and deflection of responsibility. Very little judgement and honest attempts to change behaviour. Mom, I gather, greatly enjoyed AA.

I have a few stories I could tell about my life from age four to eight, but almost everything I know, I've learned from my father and sister. In brief: My mother's drinking got worse, and she abandoned any pretense of responsibility for it all. The drinking, you see, was a disease beyond her control, and in any case, it was only a coping mechanism to handle the 'emotional abuse' she was subjected to by my father.

Sometime after my ninth birthday, everything changed.

The police came and took my father away. I went with my mother, sister, and brother to live with my mother's parents. We moved away from all of our friends. We changed schools.

We asked: Where did Dad go?

And we got the same answer from everybody.

"Mommy, where did daddy go? Why doesn't he live here with us."

And we were told, softly: "I'm sorry kids but we can't live with daddy. I know this is hard, but daddy is a bad person, and it's dangerous for us to be around him."

We asked: "Grandma, Grandpa, can our daddy come live here with us too?"

And we got awkward deflections.

We asked our teachers. We asked the therapist we had started seeing. We asked anyone who would listen: Why can't we see our daddy? Why can't he come back and live with us? Why can't we call him?

And we always received the same answer: Daddy is bad, scary, dangerous. It would be dangerous to call him. It would be dangerous to go see him.

At first it didn't sit well with us – we know daddy! He's good! – but eventually, the message sank in. Our father was a bad man, and he was gone. Life became somewhat normal for the three of us, as we adjusted to a new school, new neighborhood, and a new life with Mom, Grandma and Grandpa, but no Dad. We all got lots of really nice presents for Christmas that year.

Perhaps you're wondering: During those six months, what was my bad, scary, dangerous father up to? Well…

First, he was collecting bail from his friends and family, after being arrested on a domestic violence charge, for restraining my mother while she punched and kicked him.

Then, he learned that our mother had filed for divorce, and was seeking full custody of us.

Then, he learned that he wasn't allowed to contact us.

Then, he learned that he had been cut out of the business he was running with my mother's father.

Then, he learned that his bank accounts and credit cards had been frozen and he wasn't allowed anywhere near his house or car.

After a year, he finally won the right to see us – every second weekend. One day and one night, twice a month. And while everyone was telling us that Dad was 'trying to change' even though he had done bad things, the effects of being told to fear and despise our father by every authority figure in our lives still lingered.

But, so too did our memories of who our father was and how well he had treated us when we were young. We settled into yet another new routine, with the majority of our lives in a downtown apartment with our mother, and an occasional weekend trip to our father's suburban semi-detached tract house.

Our mother was fine for a while, but no more than a year at the most.

She started drinking again. She got a boyfriend. She found and lost a few jobs.

Eventually, there was another ambulance. Eventually, there was a police call from a neighbour after a loud fight with her boyfriend. Eventually, after a small fortune in legal fees, patience, and the excruciating pain and helplessness of knowing that his three children were completely at the mercy of an alcoholic (and now, drug-addicted) mother and her unstable boyfriend, in a tiny apartment in a sketchy area of town – my Dad won a hearing to have the custody agreement re-evaluated.

The judge puzzled and puzzled until his puzzler was sore: Should he award custody to our father, the hard-working owner of a now semi-thriving business, which he ran out of the basement of a safe, stable house in a nice suburb? Or to our mother, a drunk and a drug addict, unemployed save for the cashing of her welfare and alimony cheques, and her abusive live-in boyfriend.

Somewhat miraculously, my father won custody of us on – wait for it! – every weekend. And Wednesdays! Truly a great blow for truth, justice, and the American way. Because he was roughly one thousand times as responsible as our mother, he was granted the right to take care of us almost half the time.

I joke, but this really was a turning point for the three of us – myself, my brother, and my sister. Our father became a dominant presence in our lives, rather than just the man who took us somewhere fun every few weeks. We started to understand what 'normal' was, and that our mother's apartment wasn't it. At that point – around the age of ten – I started to understand what had actually happened between my parents, and that I had been lied to for most of my life.

Once the three of us were old enough to understand, it wasn't long before our father had full custody. In the end, my mother imploded spectacularly and went into rehab. When she got out, she tried once more for partial custody.

She threatened to bankrupt my father out of spite, because she knew she could rely on various legal defense funds (paid for by your tax dollars, no doubt) that would be happy to bankroll her attempts to destroy our family.

Eventually she yielded to my adolescent insistence that we were happy living with our Dad. From the ages of 13, 12 and 10 onward, me, my sister and my brother lived safely, easily, happily and peacefully at our father's house.

Easily, that is, for us.

My Dad was still working in his basement office every waking hour of the day. He popped upstairs whenever he needed to start dinner, clean up, or yell at us to stop fighting and be nice to each other. After a decade of non-existent parenting and discipline, we fought and yelled, never even thought of cleaning up after ourselves, and generally were a pain in the ass to supervise. Raising us should have been someone's full-time job. Instead, it was something that our father had to do over his shoulder while running a company that required his constant attention.

During our teenage years, we each played hockey three times a week. My brother and I had weekly football games. My sister played basketball. I played rugby. Our father rarely missed a game. We also played baseball, practiced gymnastics, took swimming lessons, ran track, and went camping together. Looking back, I don't know how or when my father slept. Which makes sense, because his bedroom was the smallest in the house (my brother and I shared the master), and it had nothing but an old mattress, a table, and an alarm clock.

(Although one thing he definitely did find time to do was bang every cute single mom of the kids I played hockey with. So maybe there was a bit of an angle to all those sports…)

Once when I was fourteen, my Dad and I were fighting. In the heat of the moment, I yelled that he was a bad father, and that we would have been better off if he had never come back. I saw an expression on his face then that I have never seen at any other time, before or since. We stood facing each other in silence for a few moments. Then he looked away and asked: "Is that really what you think?"

I didn't say anything.

I knew on some level that my father was a good man. But I had also spent the better part of my life being indoctrinated to fear and despise him. That kind of programming doesn't go away overnight. We had a lot of good times together, as a family, after my father won custody. But my siblings and I also had the ability to be ungrateful, disrespectful little shits.

Our mother went through a few cycles of drinking and rehabbing over the next decade. Occasionally, she kept it together for months at a time before quietly slipping off. Once I went over a year without hearing from her, except for the otherwise inexplicable appearance of a shopping bag with a Calvin And Hobbes collection hanging off of our mailbox on my birthday.

Whenever she had things moderately under control, the three of us visited her once a week, with the encouragement of our father who, despite everything that happened, wanted us to have a mother in our lives. I was just happy to have one night a week, in my mid-teens, to stay out as late as I wanted, and come home smelling like whatever I had been drinking and smoking all night, without having to answer any difficult questions.

But I was always happy for my mother when she seemed to be getting her shit together. Maybe I was even really happy the first couple of times. After a while though, I'd seen the movie enough times to know how it ended. I started caring less and less about the semi-regular announcements that she was Turning Over A New Leaf, until one day, I made a decision.

I do not have a mother.

This being the 21st century though, I do indeed have my mother on Facebook. She appears to be working in a mid-sized city on the other side of the country with some of her extended family. She enjoys Reddit, I gather, and thinking up witty status updates.

With those observation, I wish her all the best in her twilight years, and return to the subject of my father.

Because today's story (remember?) is for the fathers. Above all, it is for my father, the man to whom I owe everything. The man who dedicated his life to fighting for me and the two people I love the most in the world.

Perhaps it seems like my Dad has had a rough life.

But here's what he has now.

His three grown children always have time to come over for dinner, breakfast, a long walk with the dog, or just to hang out.

Aside from his oldest son, who is apparently a self-styled "professional blogger" with an annual income that would embarrass a Rwandan McDonald's cashier, all three are happy, healthy, and on the cusp of what appear to be successful and interesting lives.

His business has been successful enough for him to move into a nice house, work part-time, and save enough for a comfortable retirement.

Most importantly: The three of us – my brother, my sister, and myself – will never forget the sacrifices he made for us. He will grow old surrounded by our families. He will never doubt how grateful we are, and how much we love him. In his later years, when he needs help gardening, cleaning, painting, fixing, building, or anything else, we will help him. If he ever needs home medical care, he will get it in one of our homes, not some cold, grey filing cabinet for old folks. If he ever needs someone to hand-feed him, give him sponge baths, and wipe his ass for him…

Well, I'll hire a nurse. But I will hire the hottest fucking nurse I can find.

To all the good father's out there who can't be with their children today, this post is for you. Stay strong. It gets better. Happy Father's Day.

Boys won't be boys anymore, we are now proudly obsolete?

Featured Guest · 19 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Glorius Bastard

So boys are going to be obsolete? Boys can't be boys anymore? Yeah, I guess we will all be plastic Ken dolls for our breadwinner wives to dress up.

I don't think any man has a real problem with his girlfriend, wife, or whatever working. I think what we have a problem with is that these women think that they are better than us!

Who built, designed, dreamt, and engineered that building you sit smugly in woman? That's right: MEN!

Who built the sewers, roads, downtown, cities, bridges, war machines? That's right: MEN!

Who fought and destroyed the enemy in every single battle since time immemorial? That's right: MEN!

Who farmed everything, and provided the discipline guidelines for us all? That's right: MEN!

Who is the one that is overcoming your feminist nonsense in every category you smug little witch? That's Right: MEN!

Who made the educational system what it was that your nonsense has destroyed woman? That's right: MEN!

Who has invented, discovered, and created 99% of every single thing of note woman? That's right: MEN!

Who has left education, and started to return the workplace into more masculine operated ideas? That's right: MEN!

Who has, in spite of your quotas, made the economy work again? That's right: MEN!

You claim that since the information age is turning everything into a service based economy, where thought and words rule the day; that women will rule with it… Not so fast. Why is it that most of your women still opt out to have kids? Join the military for benefits only to get pregnant before deployment on a medical discharge? Oh we can't talk about that, that would explain 99% of the reason for your wage disparity, and make you into the liar you are, can't have that now can we?

The fact that men are not going to college should tell us all something other then what they are trying to pass under our noses here. That fact is that men realize that education is not stacked in their favor. You could go to college, and the day before you graduate, get a false rape accusation by a woman you slept with because she did not want her boyfriend that she cheated on to think she is a whore. Never mind that she was going to dump him the day after anyways, you turned her into a whore in others eyes, it's not her fault but yours. Loser! Wait till you get it from Bubba, and your new prison guard-oil-encrusted-fat-flaps girlfriend you don't want making you their "boy-toy" in prison big boy! That will teach ya.

Fact of the matter is that guys like us are still inventing most everything, producing most everything, are needed to have kids, lead in most everything, die for most everything. I don't see women taking that role. They are rattling their penis sabre until they get more money. We have been forced to borrow from others for a long time, but that is slowly running out. We won't tell you to go back to the kitchen when it does, even though then you might want to. You have ruined the sexual marketplace with your promiscuity for so long that men no longer see marriage as a viable option. That means that as the men's rights movement gets bigger, we will start to dictate what marriage will mean. You will still have to work, all your "benefits" are in danger of non-renewal in congress, and we will no longer view you as the ladies only you think you are, too bad for you!

Empowered women here!

It amazes me how a man thousands of years ago would predict this in the end: ISA 4-1 “In that day so few men will be left that seven women will fight for each man, saying, “Let us all marry you! We will provide our own food and clothing. Only let us take your name so we won’t be mocked as old maids.”

Things were as they were for a reason! No one said you could not work, it is just for thousands of years, and women have “opted out” that men just took over. Now that your nanny state protects you, you think you can lord it over us with impunity! I got news for you toots, the nanny state will turn on you when it is financially convenient, us men are designed to survive! marriage was your meal ticket to your survival, not your ownership of us as slave labor. You are the necessity that drove men to become PUAs, MGTOWs, harder workers, smarter workers, and men who will craft their own rules how they see fit. Your feminism is a lie, it is your own fault you bought into it. Now colleges are using affirmative action to entice men to school. When the economy bottom falls out, you won’t have all those stolen tax dollars at your disposal. What then? You will have to work against PUAs, MGTOWs, hard working male workers who are smarter street and school wise. They will be dominant in the sexual and economic marketplaces. They will not be inclined to treat you as a lady, and will be more than willing to compete against you on all levels, not caring if you become destitute. After all, you claimed you were far superior to them in every way, they will through their actions demand you prove it. You made your bed ladies, enjoy it while your mattress is still comfortable for your back. Your revolving door is still working, for now, and you can pay for everything. Pray to a God you have rejected that it stays that way. If it doesn’t, well, I hope you are as good at fending for yourself as you claim.

Gatorade to Young Women: Don’t Try to be Feminine — Be Like a Lesbian!

W.F. Price · 19 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The following ad has Abby Wambach making a predatory assessment of another female soccer player. The sexual overtones are hard to ignore, with the mannish Wambach leering at the exhausted, more attractive competitor:

Another commercial on Gatorade’s site suggests that girls must be kept “in the game” (playing sports) so that they don’t become whores by age 14.

Ironically, sports drinks, which contain a lot of sugar, are one of the leading causes of childhood obesity. So, apparently, Gatorade is promoting both lesbianism and fatness in America’s young women.

Way to go, Gatorade!

Children of Older Fathers May Live Longer

W.F. Price · 20 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

According research conducted in the Philippines, children born to older fathers tend to have longer telomeres, which protect chromosomes from age-related damage:

> Dr Dan Eisenberg and colleagues from the Department of Anthropology at Northwestern University studied telomere inheritance in a group of young people living in the Philippines.
> Telomeres, measured in blood samples, were longer in individuals whose fathers were older when they were born.
> The telomere lengthening seen with each year that the men delayed fatherhood was equal to the yearly shortening of telomere length that occurs in middle-aged adults.
> Telomere lengthening was even greater if the child's paternal grandfather had also been older when he became a father.
> Although delaying fatherhood increases the risk of miscarriage, the researchers believe there may be long-term health benefits.
> Inheriting longer telomeres will be particularly beneficial for tissues and biological functions that involve rapid cell growth and turnover – such as the immune system, gut and skin – the scientists believe.
> And it could have significant implications for general population health.
> "As paternal ancestors delay reproduction, longer telomere length will be passed to offspring, which could allow lifespan to be extended as populations survive to reproduce at older ages."

So it looks as though men's reproductive fitness actually improves with age in at least one measure. This means that men who delay fatherhood until later in life are not necessarily doing their children a disservice, and may be contributing to the longevity of future generations.

How Racial Politics will Subordinate Feminism

Polls and voting patterns have made it pretty clear that white men have permanently moved away from the Democratic Party. The trend is strongest in the 30-45 demographic, which is the youngest in which people become seriously politically engaged, so it appears to be accelerating. The crash of fertility amongst liberal whites that started in the late 1970s is showing up in young white male voting preferences even in the 18-30 demographic (they are growing more conservative), but they are inconsequential compared to older, more reliable voters, and will only solidify the trend in coming years as they settle into familiar routines (80% of children end up voting like their parents).

This has led to more predictable white male bashing from the left, which is what started the move away from the Democratic Party in the first place, and is beginning to manifest itself in the racial and gender makeup of elected Democrats. For the first time ever, it is predicted that white males will cease to be a majority in the House. The Senate, which has longer terms and is less prone to turnover, remains majority white male in the Democratic Party, but this is simply because it is a more staid, conservative institution.

The presidency, for its part, may have already permanently switched. In fact, even in the 1990s, Bill Clinton was something of an anomaly, and might not have won without Ross Perot to siphon off a substantial portion of the white male vote. But George Bush senior was one of the old-guard Republicans; an elite, Yankee throwback from the pre-Reagan era when Republicans lacked populist appeal (this is one of the concerns about Mitt Romney, and why Newt Gingrich enjoyed some enthusiastic support despite his slim chances in a national election).

Since Bill Clinton's presidency, the Democratic coalition of minorities, women and urban elites has kept the party fairly strong, despite some setbacks, and Republican stupidity regarding the economy and war handed them another presidential victory, in which white males voted underwhelmingly for John McCain, who ran essentially on a "more war" platform.

But things are different this year, as the economy has failed to improve during Obama's first term, and politics has become a zero-sum game in which the loser really loses and the winner merely treads water.

According to reports from last December, the Obama campaign has already decided to toss the working-class white male from the Democratic coalition, focusing instead on urban elite whites and white females to add to the overwhelming support he gets from minorities. The campaign has made this obvious recently through offering socialist incentives explicitly to white females, while deliberately leaving white males out. The result has been that a large gap has opened up with white male voters, who now overwhelmingly oppose Obama and the Democratic party.

Although the fact that the Republican party has become, for all intents and purposes, the white male party, is sometimes echoed in media outlets (usually in a disparaging manner), it isn't stressed enough, and the implications are either ignored or said to be favorable to Democrats. This is because most of the white males who write opinion or work for the media are part of the shrinking white male elite — the white males who actually do have white male privilege. These white males (and females) tend to live in deep blue cities where the Democratic Party has adapted to the caste society that characterizes urban America. Their lifestyle depends on maintaining the delicate ethnic and economic balance that holds the Democratic coalition together. This balance simply does nothing for rural, small-town and working class whites, who derive no advantages from it. Ironically, white people who hire brown servants and send their children to private, mainly-white schools, are more likely to vote Democrat than those who mow their own lawns, take care of their own children, and send their kids to public school. As fewer and fewer American whites can afford the increasingly expensive middle-class urban lifestyle, they drift away from the Democrats.

The gender gap between white males and females can be explained almost entirely by feminism and the goodies it provides white females. When the Republicans were the more feminist party in the 1950s, women voted more Republican than men. It's a simple matter of pandering, and it works. But how well does it work, and for how long will it continue to work?

The rise of the white feminist in American politics was aided by white men from the beginning. Women were only included in the Civil Rights Act through the efforts of a Southern segregationist. The first woman on the US Supreme Court was appointed by a white male. A white male drafted the Violence Against Women Act. White males instituted universal suffrage, passed sexual harassment laws, extended affirmative action to white females, enacted Title IX, etc. The list goes on and on. White men have done more to enfranchise white females than women themselves.

The question this brings up is how things will play out when white males no longer dominate the Democratic party, and women find themselves fighting against white males rather than being the beneficiaries of their paternalism. We have to remember that white females are a minority in the Democrat coalition, yet they have most of the more powerful positions. Can white females maintain dominance in a majority minority coalition? Will black and Hispanic males continue to submit to the likes of Hillary Clinton and Nancy Pelosi? Will black and Hispanic females, for that matter, accept white female dominance of their political party?

Probably not. When given a choice between Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton, minority voters overwhelmingly chose the male candidate. Race trumped gender. If we are to be honest with ourselves, the benefits white females received from white males during the Civil Rights era were another example of race trumping gender. To compare the travails of the bored white housewife with those of the southern black man is ridiculous, and I'd assume downright insulting from a black male point of view. Nevertheless, white men did their best to extend every favor minorities received to white females as well. If they had the choice, would minorities have done the same? Not a chance. The only reason Obama panders to white women is that the US is still a majority white country, and he needs their vote.

But the strain in the coalition will eventually become hard to handle. Without senior white males around to protect and foster them, white female Democrats are going to be stuck in a difficult place. Although they share a few common goals with minority Democrats, their current leadership will be called into question. There's still time for a white woman to win the presidency on the Democratic ticket, but as the Democrats become majority minority that window is closing fast.

A number of white liberals believe that the increasing minority share of the US population will doom the Republican party, but that would only be a sure thing if we were to assume that white voters will continue to vote as they currently do for a long time to come. The reality is that white voters are far from a static bloc, and if the parties really do split along racial lines, as they have in the South, the Republican party will remain strong. It is starting to look more and more as though this may indeed happen on a national level.

Pacific and Northeastern states may continue to feature white male Democrats for some time to come, but rural states and minority majority states like California will likely see fewer of them as time goes on. It is often said that California leads the nation in trends, but that appears to have changed. California has led itself, for all intents and purposes, right out of the US into nearly foreign territory.

The implications for political feminism are likely to be profound. As the political divide in the US becomes increasingly racial, gender politics will play a smaller role. If a white female Democratic presidential candidate cannot even earn an endorsement from the ultra-feminist Oprah Winfrey, how could she hope to win the support of any minorities at all? And if she doesn't have the support of white men, what exactly is her base? Childless, college-educated, single, professional white women? Not exactly firm ground for national office.

Unless women can somehow transfer feminism to the Republican Party (a longshot), it will be politically dead in the water within a decade or so. It is often repeated that demographics is destiny, but people tend to see the trends only in the simplest terms. The outcomes of demographic changes are a lot more nuanced than imagined even by our supposedly clued-in pundits. The increase in the minority share of the US population will certainly have profound implications, but given the size and cultural depth of white America there is not going to be some ultimate multicultural triumph that eliminates race from the equation.

Before the Ming dynasty, China was a far more cosmopolitan, multicultural society than it is today. It was as likely to be ruled by Altaic people as ethnic Chinese, and non-Chinese enjoyed immense influence and power from time to time. But during the Yuan dynasty, the Mongols introduced legislation that explicitly discriminated against ethnic Chinese. It was the first official, administratively implemented affirmative action program on the record. The result was that the Chinese population shrunk and lost a great deal of power, but ultimately Chinese emerged as a politically unified, far more conservative force. During the subsequent Ming dynasty the Chinese once again asserted their control and China became the most powerful, wealthy empire on earth until the dawn of the 19th century.

It remains to be seen how demographic matters will impact American politics, but it is likely that a racial divide in national politics will have a unifying effect on white America, and ethnic politics will take precedence over other issues. Feminism, homosexuality, religious differences and the like will decline in importance as racial divisions grow. All of these relatively petty issues can only flourish in times of white hegemony, and that hegemony is almost gone. We are looking at a new era in which race will subsume inconsequential intra-ethnic differences, and feminism will inevitably lose relevance.

Matt Forney's Voyage Highlights Loss of Freedom

I checked into Matt Forney's blog today, being interested in what this recently emerged writer is up to, and found an article that was both funny and sad.

It appears that Matt, who plans to hitchhike and walk to the West Coast was rejected twice at the Canadian border for "not having sufficient ties to the US," and cuffed on one occasion. Additionally, he was accosted by police while camping near the road after an elderly couple reported that he was distraught and might be about to harm himself (neither of which were true). I suppose the old couple meant well, but as usual the police response included standard "apprehension" techniques.

Further along, he found himself walking past a "supermax" high security prison.

If you can remember what it was like to drive across the border in the 70s and 80s, it's obvious things have changed. Also, simply travelling by whatever means even within the country is a lot more likely to bring one into contact with authorities. It's ironic that when we lived in fear of nuclear annihilation our lives in the US were a lot more carefree, and we had more freedom of movement, less chance of being stopped by police, etc.

Hitchhikers never used to be "suspicious," people could camp pretty much wherever, and being an outsider rarely drew much police attention. Movies like Easy Rider and Rambo: First Blood portrayed small town America as suspicious and hostile, but the truth is that for the most part people used to just leave you alone. It's far, far more likely today that any random traveler will be stopped by the police, cited, jailed, harassed, etc. Males, of course, are always suspicious. Females, for their part, are always assumed to be in distress.

What the hell happened?

The Romance of Masculinity... Or Why Real Men Don't Ask for Directions ... Or Read Instructions Manuals

Featured Guest · 21 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Spartacus, The Goat

In the modern world all of our creature comforts have been taken care of… All of the challenges have been met. Essentially. (We only have yet to conquer our own human nature and inner selves. The biggest challenge we shall ever face, perhaps… A different essay.)

After millions of years of evolution, a real man still yearns for challenges, for the thrill of the hunt and the feel of warm blood on his hands. He wants to be pushed to his limits for something that he truly believes in and in concepts in which he truly has faith. He wants to feel threatened occasionally and feel the victory in having overcome the threat.

But let's face it folks, there is little left to satisfy the modern caveman who harbors these feelings. While women may be content with a closet full of shoes and 10,000 Facebook friends, men yearn for something more… We cannot sit in a cubicle day after day and not lose our minds. Men are not meant to work in service jobs and behind a desk. We need to roam free and use our bodies as animals do.

Take the so-called controversy that women have created over men not wanting to ask for directions, nor read instructions.

You know why we don't ask for directions nor read the instructions? It is because there is no fun in it. Nothing to challenge the still animal hunter caveman within. Where is the thrill of finding your destination, if the process is a foregone conclusion. What is the thrill of having put something together if you didn't have to put any real effort into it?

Wouldn't it be more fun just to wing it? Set your course by the Sun or the Stars? Or the compass? Isn't it sometimes just more fun to throw a wrench into the works and see what happens? Putting things together, ofttimes for a man, it is more satisfying just to look at the parts, try to figure out their function and relationship to each other and then try to put the device together. IKEA is brilliant for women. For men, it is just another series of handcuffs preventing the caveman within from living a fulfilling life. Thanks, IKEA. (I have a complete set of metric hex keys because of you. I think hex keys actually outnumber humans at this point… Another essay…)

Otherwise, following instructions and asking for directions, modern life just sucks. For the caveman within it is a golden cage meant to protect but more oppressive than any other.

Note large animals in cages. They may live longer and healthier lives than their counterparts, but in their hearts they yearn to run free.

Think of lions, tigers and bears. Think of horses and elephants. Or think of the caged bird… Why does the caged bird sing? One reason is that it wants to get the heck out of the cage!

Otherwise, short of freedom, the caged animal develops crib habits. The horse gnaws at the fence posts surrounding him. The dog licks himself raw. The jaguar paces his cage incessantly until his paws are bleeding and torn… and yet he persists. That happy little bird eventually becomes a very angry little bird.

The big problem with the Industrial Revolution for me (and I imagine for many men) is that it killed craftsmanship. Every damn screw is exactly the same. (Which is fantastic in many ways, don't get me wrong.) Everybody is just part of an assemblyline, a cog in the machine. Everything is laid out for the man. There is no challenge, no threat and ultimately no satisfaction in today's modern job market for men.

So many of our products are dead as a result. There is so little art in industrial consumer society. It is all a thin pablum or little or no value or nutrition to the soul… as it is tasteless and cannot sustain one if one does not have the stomach to even consume it. So modern life is just a drag… what is the point of working so hard if at the end of the day, one continues to be dissatisfied?

Should one just plop down in front of the telescreen and drown himself in Victory Gin flavored with some insipid essence of cloves? What kind of a life is that? Sounds kind of Orwellian…

What kind of crib habits might result in men due to this situation? Drugs, alcoholism, excessive sexual promiscuity, gluttony, an obsession with money or pride or power or war??? Suicide? Homicide? Violence? A complete lack of inspiration and enthusiasm to the point of poor health habits and a slow and horrible, agonizing death? A death without glory? A spiritual sloth that is more consuming of a man than any funeral pyre could ever be?

Why is it we blame the animal for his crib habits when it is “civilization” itself that is responsible? Let the animal out of the cage already.

Can I not express this feeling I have of wanting to express the inner animal in me in even the least little way?

Or must I be forced to sit upon the toilet to pee, to please the one for whom this gilded cage was intended in the first place? …in order to please HER? Can I not just pee standing up as I once did as an animal? Can I no longer express the animal nature in myself that continues to exist after millions of years of evolution despite the last 10,000 years or so of “civilization”?

Would you prevent your dog from wagging his tail? What result would occur?

He would likely become a very unhappy dog in deed. Where is the justice in that?

Ceaseless Victim Narrative Suggests Legalization of Prostitution Only Rational Choice

W.F. Price · 22 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Over the years, the prostitution issue has transformed from one of public vice to a subset of the victimized women trope. As with so many other issues concerning women, prostitutes are no longer considered responsible in any way for what they do, but rather blameless, guiltless victims of bad men. For all their talk about how empowered and equal women are, feminists have an irresistible urge to deny that women have any agency at all when they are involved in anything that might cast the weaker sex in an other than flattering light.

Given that this will never, ever change, there's really only one way we can effectively prevent feminists from using police to bully men on yet another issue: legalize prostitution.

Of course, not all men visit prostitutes. Most don't. But that doesn't mean that any of us will be free from suspicion as potential sex criminals if we happen to speak with an adult woman in public, visit a health center for a perfectly legal, non-sexual massage, or even spend time in public with an adult daughter. All interaction between adult men and women in public will inevitably be seen as a potential victimization waiting to happen (as it is now with adult men and children), and if given the power and mandate cops will act on it. You don't think it's possible? Well, that's how it is in Saudi Arabia, and feminists are pushing us right in that direction.

A feminist article in the Seattle PI shows us how we are getting there:

> For Taylor and the two other detectives assigned to the King County sheriff's Street Crimes Unit, such encounters are a nightly ritual as they patrol Highway 99 — also known as International Boulevard and Pacific Highway South, depending on location — from Tukwila to Federal Way. They look for girls and women walking "the track," but their real prey are the pimps who use seduction and violence to turn teens and young women into prostitutes, as well as the men who pay for sex in a section of South King County that has a seemingly endless supply of customers.
> While many cops would rather not take their work home at the end of a shift, Taylor, Detective Joel Banks and Deputy Andy Conner have turned their jobs of busting pimps and johns into a passionate crusade to save victims of the sex trade.

First, most hookers don't have pimps. The ones who do usually have them by choice. Additionally, cops are as likely to take on the job of pimp as anyone else.

A study of Chicago prostitutes commissioned by "Freakonomics" author Steven Levitt (professor of economics at the University of Chicago) found that hookers had free sex with cops on a regular basis:

> Street prostitutes reported that about 3 percent of the sex acts they performed were "freebies" given to Chicago police officers to avoid arrest, according to a draft report of the study, which was presented to a packed session last weekend at an annual national economics conference in New Orleans.

Given this well-known phenomenon, it calls into question the motives of the King County sheriffs who work so intimately with hookers. If you really want to make a pimp's job easy, give him a gun and a badge…

I don't think any reasonable people want the state to take over the sex industry, because there are obvious problems with that kind of enterprise. But the only way to prevent this is to make it unlawful for police to arrest consenting adults who choose to make sex a financial transaction.

If we let the feminists have their way and succeed in criminalizing only clients, the result will be a sex industry that is fully in the hands of law enforcement. Gives a new meaning to the title "public servant." The potential for abuse of power is obvious, and something we should rightly fear.

To prevent this, we should decriminalize prostitution, make it a licensed business, and collect tax revenue from those who freely choose to engage in the profession. Choose is the key word here. If prostitution is legal business, those who work in it will not be criminals, and will be subject to the same laws and regulations as anyone else if they want to keep their business. Nor will they be victims who need “saving” any more than men who choose to work as, say, roofers.

Let’s give prostitutes a chance to break free from the “cycle of victimization” — by enfranchising them. If they need security, they can pool with other prostitutes and hire a security guard/bouncer, who works for them. They can hire an accountant to do their books. A marketing agent to attract clients. And so on and so forth. No more pimps, no more cops, and no more pimp cops. Best of all, no more “victims.”

More Long Articles?

W.F. Price · 23 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've noticed that my longer, more in depth articles have a favorable effect on traffic, as they are passed around more, so I'm thinking about putting more effort into them.

What I'd like to do is write an in-depth piece of 1,500-3,000 words at least once a week, posted on Mondays or Tuesdays. This shouldn't be a problem, but it might mean a little less time for the shorter articles, so total post volume might go down slightly, although total text volume will likely increase.

I'd be interested in knowing whether regular readers like the longer articles, so feel free to let me know what you think of the idea. I like writing them, but they can be pretty involved, taking up pretty much an entire shift (or longer in some cases), so I want to make sure the effort is well-spent.

Real Backlash Has Emerged

W.F. Price · 24 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists have been writing about a "backlash" against feminism for years. Even at the height of their legislative and cultural triumph in the 1990s, they claimed there was a serious backlash against feminism.

Of course, there was nothing of the sort. Men (including so-called conservatives) went on to pass some of the most draconian anti-male legislation on earth (VAWA), male enrollment in college continued to drop, the stifling PC atmosphere in the media and on campus was at its most oppressive and children were routinely seized from fathers, as usual.

Men's and fathers' rights groups at the time were still so cowed and intimidated that they claimed to support feminism at every turn. They sought compromise with feminists wherever possible. For all their efforts to cooperate, feminists still called them "the abuser lobby," "misogynists" and other related slurs. Feminists had won the culture war hands-down. My own city council at the time was 33% open lesbian (all feminists); an overrepresentation of over 6,000%. Feminists had their hands firmly on the levers of power, and they were not shy about using that power to promote the female supremacist agenda.

Although it took a while, the inevitable outrage over their excesses has started to emerge. When you beat people down for long enough, eventually they start to fight back, although not always effectively at first.

The manosphere, which really emerged in the late 2000s, was a direct response to feminists going overboard. Roissy, The Spearhead, A Voice for Men, Dalrock, and a number of other sites emerged in opposition to feminism. For some of us it was personal, for others an altruistic effort, but for most of us I'd assume a bit of both.

It seems our efforts are being noticed, and not only by aggrieved, divorced men or ultrasensitive feminists and leftists.

Anger at feminists exploded in a recent critique of video games that a feminist was preparing. Her project, one of the typical, inconsequential critiques of something boys do in their spare time, was devoted to combating gender stereotypes in video games (truly an extremely important project). The feminist, Anita Sarkeesian, decided to fund her project with kickstarter. Somehow, some gamers caught wind of the project, and launched a concerted online attack on the feminist, vandalizing her Wikipedia page and YouTube site and posting rude pictures, among other things. I suspect there was some pent up anger from John Scalzi's recent piece that told gamers they all have white male privilege.

The immediate effect of the attacks was to convince a lot of feminists to hand Sarkeesian a lot of money (over $130,000) through kickstarter, so the attacks didn't work exactly as planned. But they did demonstrate that there's a lot of anger out there. As for Sarkeesian's success, we should be happy about it, because I can't think of a more worthless way to spend over a hundred thousand dollars than in finger-wagging over video games. For one thing, it's sure to piss even more guys off, and the game industry is very competitive, so her documentary (now expanded to 12 parts!) will likely have zero effect on production and consumption of this form of entertainment. The feminists are simply pissing all the money away, and that's fine, because this time they're paying for it themselves.

Of course, juvenile online attacks are a waste of our time as well. There's a lot more to be gained from keeping your cool and telling it straight. Giving women like Sarkeesian the opportunity to portray themselves as victims is playing right into their hands. If there's anything men ought to know, it is that the "damsel in distress" is a trope that serves women extremely well. Nothing gives women more power than the ability to trigger protective instincts.

That said, there is definitely a different tone online. White knighting has become far less common than it was a few years ago. Men are standing up for themselves. There's a growing awareness that feminism has gone too far, and comments on feminist articles have a tendency to skew toward men's rights. This is a real backlash, and it's undeniable at this point. So much so that some feminists appear be afflicted by flagging morale.

Although the tone of some of the attacks on feminism is unfortunate, it will improve as those who oppose the ideology mature and think things over. People tend to form their convictions relatively early in life, and don't tend to change their minds so much as they learn to put things in context and achieve their goals more effectively (e.g. neocons adapted their practice more than their core ideology; feminists stopped burning bras and shooting male artists and took over college departments, etc.).

Perhaps most encouraging is that anecdotal evidence suggests that sons of feminists tend to hate the ideology with a passion. I'm pretty sure that anti-feminism is a lot more widespread amongst youths and young men than most older people realize, especially as they are reaching out and finding explanations for the frustration they feel in a world that is hostile to masculinity. I'm happy to say that I've helped some of these boys along, and I know I'm not the only one.

Feminists have long expected a backlash from some mysterious cabal. They have breathlessly spoken of it as a wonderful opportunity to finally finish off the hated patriarchy. Imagine their horror as they realize that this backlash they have been preparing for all these years is coming from their sons.

How Can Christians Avoid Divorce?

It's hard to take Christians seriously when they criticize divorce, because they are functionally supporting it. Lowering the divorce rate – if only in the Christian community – would be remarkably easy. How can we know this? Because divorce remains almost unknown amongst the Amish.

The Amish may have a lot of peculiar views on the world from our perspective, but their take on marriage is pretty much the exact same ours used to be long ago. When one Amish spouse decides to divorce another for "no fault," he or she is promptly expelled from the community. Even at fault divorces are frowned upon, and all but prohibited.

It's a very strict marital regime, and I think a lot of us, if we were honest with ourselves, might want to think twice about such an arrangement. But there's no doubt it works.

Could some of these principles be applied to a more mainstream faith community? Absolutely yes, and they wouldn't have to be so severe to be effective. Changing divorce law is a tall order, but religious groups do not have to run their congregations according to the principles of marriage equality. While people can easily sue for divorce in state courts, churches are not prohibited from having their own rules.

If Christians want to lower the divorce rate in their churches, it would be as simple as kicking out those who frivolously divorce, and treating divorcées as adulteresses. As it is today, abandoned husbands are usually the ones left in the ditch by churches, so this would be a major change. But if churches want to stay true to Christianity, they would do well to recognize that from the beginning, Christian women were not allowed to sue for divorce. There is no precedent in ancient Hebrew, Greek or Roman law for women to divorce their husbands. This is why the Christian church is so ill-prepared to deal with the revolutionary idea of granting women the right to divorce. Even today, Orthodox Jews do not allow it, nor do Muslims (civil law differs, but here we are speaking of ecclesiastic law). Rabbinic and Sharia courts may order men to divorce their wives, but women cannot legally divorce without their husband's consent.

Women were first granted the right to divorce in revolutionary France, in 1792. This was rescinded shortly thereafter, in 1804, and French women had to wait another 80 years before regaining the right to kick their husbands to the curb. The revolutionary edict was a first in civilized society (if you could apply that moniker to revolutionary France), to be followed some decades later by Great Britain with the Matrimonial Causes Act 1857. Naturally, some fifteen years later mother custody became the norm in the UK.

The transfer of marriage from ecclesiastic to civil law has continued apace since "reforms" of the 19th century, with devastating consequences for traditional marriage. However, this doesn't mean that churches have to follow civil law — at least not in the United States (not yet, anyway). To this day, rabbinic courts have authority over Orthodox Jewish marriages, including in some civil matters. Given that it contradicts core Christian doctrine, I'm not sure this would be appropriate for Christian churches, but it probably isn't necessary in any event.

The point is that granting women the right to initiate divorce goes entirely against Christianity, as well as all other major religions. According to the Christian faith, a woman who leaves her husband is an adulteress — even if he consents. So why is it that divorced women are so quickly forgiven and fostered by "Christian" churches? I'm fairly certain that it's about the money they bring to the table (divorced men are often impoverished), but if Christians looked deep within themselves they'd have to admit that there's nothing Christian about such an arrangement.

New Agers often claim that women were free to leave husbands in pre-Christian societies, and this was sometimes true, but in such societies women were generally chattel, especially if they had no children of their own. Typically, if a woman left a husband for another man the aggrieved husband could demand compensation in the form of livestock or some other goods, so that he could fetch himself another wife.

Amongst the Cheyenne, for example, a man who absconded with another's wife was expected to provide compensation. The Cheyenne were remarkably tolerant of divorce and affairs, unlike some other tribes, but the man still retained the privilege of "drum divorce" in which he could cast out his wife in front of witnesses and sever all responsibility toward her. There was nothing to be gained materially from leaving a husband, and absconding with another incurred a material penalty. The going rate in the 19th century seemed to have been a horse or two, although some Cheyenne husbands reportedly said a dog would be acceptable compensation.

Thus we see that in pre-Christian societies women were not so much empowered by divorce as devalued by it.

So Christians really have nothing to fear from holding a different line from the secular world. The advantages accrued in contemporary divorce hang by a thread, and are often more illusion than fact. Divorced women are not, in general, richer, happier or healthier. And if the churches themselves stopped extending sympathy and succor to women who flout the teachings of the church, there would be even less incentive to "eat, pray, love." Any church that held a strict line could eliminate divorce amongst the lay people. It might mean throwing out those who break the rules, but drastic times call for drastic measures, and it would work.

Unfortunately, Christians are up against heresy on a massive scale. It isn't going to be easy to change the culture of a church that allows itself to be led by the secular, civil regime. However, ultimately, this will probably be the only way the Christian church can survive in the West. The first Christians of Rome didn't grow and prosper because they followed the ways of their depraved, secular neighbors. They followed their own rules; their own good book. It served them well, and they came to be the most powerful social force in Europe.

I write this not as a missionary, or even a committed Christian. I'm a bit of a stand-off, and a student of a number of religions, but I'd consider it neglect to hold off on giving advice to the majority religion in my country. And if anyone leads the way in restoring a semblance of normality to domestic relations, I'm convinced it's going to be those with religious convictions. This is how it has always been.

Masculinity & Master Morality

Jack Donovan · 25 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In a Scientific American article titled "When Men Are Less Moral Than Women," psychology professor Cindi May recently claimed that men were more likely to "cut ethical corners" when they felt their masculinity was at stake. She concluded by recommending that, "if ethical standards are a significant factor in your choice of financial advisors or real estate agents, it may be safer to go with Bernadette than with Bernie."

I first skimmed this on the UK's Daily Mail, and immediately wondered if advocating sex-based discrimination would legally be considered "hate speech" in Britain, but quickly discovered that May is safe from the truncheons of the British thought police in sunny Charleston, South Carolina. Whether in the colonies or the motherland, it's safe to say that similar claims made about women or a protected ethnic group would explode into public melodrama and end in tears, resignations and staged apologies. However, it's become not only acceptable but fashionable in the mainstream media to claim that discriminating against men and hiring women is better for business and that, theoretically, doing so would solve all of "today's problems."

May's biases were obvious from her use of loaded, snide language:

"Apparently manhood is relatively fragile and precarious, and when it is challenged, men tend to become more aggressive and defensive."

That's feminist boilerplate, and seems a little out of place (even today) in a publication as august and ostensibly scientific as Scientific American. Referring to masculinity as "fragile" (compared to what?) is the kind of intentionally emasculating banality more at home in gossip columns and trash zines like Slate, Feministing and Gawker, and in the desperate cries for help "work" of comic train wrecks like Hugo Schwyzer.

May glossed over complex issues and presented them as settled science. She asserted that the "evidence" doesn't suggest that testosterone or genetic differences between men and women has much to do with male status competition.

Careful readers might want to have a look at, say, "Influences of Serotonin and Testosterone in Aggression and Dominance: Convergence with Social Psychology," by Paul C. Bernhardt, which suggests that high testosterone correlates with status-seeking behaviors, like winning a negotiation. (Current Directions in Psychological Science, Vol. 6, No. 2 (Apr., 1997), pp. 44-48) Some of May's colleagues to the North noted more recently that, "During negotiations testosterone increases in those who think they have a chance of gaining or maintaining status, and it decreases among those who think they are about to lose." (Testosterone and Social Behavior Alan Booth, Douglas A. Granger, Allan Mazur and Katie T. Kivlighan. Social Forces, Vol. 85, No. 1 (Sep., 2006), pp. 167-191). There's also evidence of stock traders performing better when testosterone is higher, which is probably one of the reasons why testosterone therapy is popular with men who work on Wall Street.

Testosterone is probably only part of the reason why men might behave differently than women in negotiating scenarios. However, before we move on, I'd like to make a point about testosterone, masculinity, feminism, historical analysis and contemporary studies concerning sex differences. If, as some studies have shown, current male testosterone levels are artificially low – due to a variety of factors including environmental toxins, sedentary lifestyles and widespread obesity – then current studies that show minor differences between male and female behavior tell us less about historical differences between the sexes than is often argued. Basically, if men today are less chemically manly than their predecessors, many masculine stereotypes from the past may have been even more valid than contemporary data would seem to suggest. There is good reason to believe that men and women were more different even a few decades ago.

Instead of dealing with a complex reality, May took a carefree cruise down to the Margaret Mead Memorial Theme Park on the tropical island of Ma-king Shitup. She predictably pointed to vague "cultural" associations between masculinity and winning, and the implied conclusion is that we must reduce cultural associations between masculinity and winning to increase male morality.

May is either a little slow for a professor or she is willing to misrepresent evidence that any layman can find on JSTOR to achieve a perceived "win" for women. That doesn't help her claim that men are less moral than women, but her rationalization hamster could probably explain to us all why she is still morally superior to men, no matter what she writes or how she conducts herself. At any rate, she makes a good case for revisiting the proposed 1995 law that would have required psychologists to dress as wizards in court.

There is a better explanation for the results of these studies. Women are not more "ethical" in any noble sense of the word. They're more timid — more "risk-averse"—and more empathic.

Increased testosterone in men correlates with decreased empathy and increased optimism about a man's chances of success. The evolutionary reasons why are pretty obvious if you think for a minute about what kinds of jobs men would have been most likely to do not only in the Environment of Evolutionary Adaptedness (EEA), but also in most economic and social classes throughout most of recorded history.

Men spent more time at the edge of the tribal perimeter in scenarios where they stood to benefit (eating dangerous game, triumphing over external enemies) from a higher risk threshold and a focus on winning – in the context of a male group – above all things. When competing (within a group) or fighting against other men, too much empathy is a handicap. To take another man's life, you have to care more about your own success and less about his feelings. Winning comes first, empathy comes second. It's absurd to posit that this is some kind of novel cultural invention, when it's obvious that the ability to dehumanize a competitor is a survival skill. There is every reason to believe that men have been selected for being successful at dehumanizing competitors, because the men who failed to do this would have lost to men who were able to cut down their foes.

There is a twist to this, though, because men have always been cooperative hunters and fighters. Men needed to be able to care less about their enemies and competitors, but to function as a group, they also needed to care a lot about what the gang of men they fought and hunted with thought of them. They had to be willing to take risks and possibly even sacrifice themselves for men they had bonded with. Men compete with each other to attain a higher status within the group – a sense that they are valued by other men – and there is every reason to believe that men who were highly valued by other men would have acquired a greater share of the booty (in both senses of the word).

Darwin believed that this ability to sacrifice for the group in battle was the kernel of altruism. He wrote in Descent of Man that, "A tribe including many members who, from possessing in a high degree the spirit of patriotism, fidelity, obedience, courage, and sympathy, were always ready to aid one another, and to sacrifice themselves for the common good, would be victorious over most other tribes; and this would be natural selection."

That may be true, but practically speaking, this is also the basis for honor – a concern for one's reputation as a man among men – and a strong desire to avoid dishonor.

Here are some general ideas about men that we can extract from all of this, which explain the results of the cited studies in a less crass "women are angels and men are devils" way than that charlatan from Charleston did.

1. Men, when threatened with losing, tend to place a higher value on winning than empathy for competitors or following abstract moral codes.
2. For men, avoiding dishonor – defined as a loss of status as a man within the group of men – is a stronger motivator than avoiding being perceived as immoral or less empathic.
3. (Hypothetical) Moral codes probably have a stronger influence on men when they are directly linked to status within the male group, and/or avoiding dishonor. (Western chivalry and samurai codes are examples of moral codes bound to masculine gang status.)

In a survival scenario, when men lose, the entire group loses. Failure is starvation and death. Winning must come first; finer points of morality are a luxury afforded by success.

It also follows that women would be less likely to take risks and more empathic. Women haven't traditionally been judged on their competitive obstinacy or their ability to win, but on their conduct round the campfire within a secured perimeter. They've had less reason to dehumanize enemies, and every reason to try to gauge what others are thinking and feeling, and every reason to behave with an eye to avoiding potential social costs that have nothing to do with male honor, winning or bravery. A woman who is socially despised and shut out for being exceptionally undesirable, unlikeable, or socially undependable finds herself in an outcast and at-risk position similar to the man who has been revealed to be disloyal, a coward or a weakling.

In The Way of Men, I made a point to present masculinity "amorally," because most people think of morality in civilized, quasi-Judeo-Christian terms that incorporate aspects of guilt and asceticism that Nietzsche would have associated with ressentiment – the priestly, inverted values of the meek and jealous. What these studies reveal about men is what Nietzsche would have called a "master morality." For the "master," that which is good is first of all that which wins and the rest can be sorted out later. It is the "right" of the mighty.

Cindi May's feminist interpretation of those studies is thick with ressentiment. It betrays a jealousy of strength – of winning – and a desire to make the weaker sex appear to be morally superior for seeming less concerned with winning and more concerned with feeling, empathy and the avoidance of risk.

Jack Donovan's new book, The Way of Men, is now available in paperback and various e-book formats. If you enjoyed this article and would like to keep up with his work, please "like" his author page on Facebook or visit his web site at http://www.jack-donovan.com

W.F. Price · 26 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Jessica Bennett, writing for the NY Times, reminisces about a marriage that could have been. Not willing to sacrifice her career, she postponed engagement while in her mid-20s, turning down her boyfriend's proposal, only to change her mind around the age of 30.

> We had talked about marriage. I knew we would get engaged eventually. He had asked about my ring size. Still, I was oblivious. I never thought this would happen so soon.
> So, as he knelt beside me and reached into the bedside table, my heart pounded and my hands became sweaty. "Will you marry me?" he asked, taking out a ring that had been his grandmother's.
> I didn't know what to do. Was this a momentary panic?
> "Yes," I said, terrified I had paused too long. I stuck out the wrong hand.
> We were engaged for 20 minutes, until I mustered the courage to choke out, "What if I'm not ready?"
> I loved him desperately. I knew, as much as I would ever know, that he was the one I wanted to be with. We balanced each other. I wanted to frame his dimples.
> And yet the moment I saw that ring, I was terrified. I saw dirty dishes and suburbia, not lace-covered wedding gowns. Rather than thinking about the family we'd someday have, I saw the career I had hardly started as suddenly out of reach. The independence I had barely gained felt stifled. I couldn't breathe.

Her boyfriend, still being a young, lovestruck man, overlooked the rejection… for a time. Ms. Bennett justified her decision to postpone nuptials by writing articles about how young, single women didn't need it.

In 2010 she wrote an article downplaying the importance of the institution, and it seems she finally convinced her boyfriend:

> I was working as a writer at Newsweek by then. One afternoon, a colleague and I sat at her desk and added up the number of weddings we had been to that summer (at least a dozen), the dollars we had spent on each (thousands) and how many we believed would last (maybe half).
> A few data searches, some interviews and a pitch to an editor later, we were issuing a manifesto of our own. "I Don't," we would proclaim a few months later in a 2010 cover line in Newsweek: "The Case Against Marriage."
> Our argument took romance out of the equation. As we explained it, Americans were already waiting longer to marry, and fewer than ever believed in the "sanctity" of marriage. As urban working women in our 20s, we no longer needed marriage to survive — at least not financially. We weren't religious, so we didn't believe that unmarried cohabitation or even child-rearing was an issue.
> But we were also cynical. As children of the divorce generation, we had watched cheating scandals proliferate in the news. We had given up on fairy tales, and we didn't know how anybody could see the institution of marriage as anything but a farce. It was "broken," one sociologist told me. So, what was the point?
> "Happily ever after," we proclaimed proudly, "doesn't have to include 'I do.' "
> I told my boyfriend about the article, and he rolled his eyes. I assured him it wasn't about us, but he said it didn't matter. Over the years, he explained, I had convinced him that he didn't believe in marriage, either. And so we carried on, partnered but not married, in love but not legally bound.

Finally, Bennett changed her mind. It seems to happen right at about this age for career women: around 30. What happens is that the balance changes. The male attention starts to fade a bit, the working lifestyle is no longer so glamorous and filled with potential. Suddenly, it kind of sucks to be single.

However, much to her dismay, Bennett's boyfriend lost his enthusiasm. She counted on him to stick around for her, treating him as a sort of plan-B in case she didn't meet someone better, and he finally figured that out. No man wants to be a woman's plan-B — it's humiliating.

When she saw the writing on the wall and started asking him about marriage, he blew it off:

> THEN one day, in the most tired of clichés, I, too, started daydreaming about a wedding. I covered a gay wedding at City Hall, the day that same-sex marriage became legal in New York, and I cried as the couple read their vows. I began to wonder what he and I might wear, who would be there, and whether we'd write our own vows.
> I brought the issue up tepidly, to feel him out. Lying in bed one night, I asked: "Do you still want to do it? Do you really not believe in it?"
> "I'd marry you at City Hall," he replied, then dropped it.
> Another time, he threw my argument back at me: "Why do we need marriage? It's only a piece of paper."
> And then I brought it up again as we were planning a summer vacation with his family. His was half Greek, and they had gone to the same Greek island since he was a boy. There was a little love boat there that people would take to sea to marry.
> "Why don't we get married there, on the love boat?" I asked.
> He laughed. "We'd have to talk about it seriously."

The boyfriend had finally started to stand up for himself. Perhaps he realized that he, too, had options. He felt he'd been strung along, and it was an insult to see her change her tune when she'd disparaged the idea of marriage. Maybe he thought her sudden interest in marriage smacked of desperation, and was at its heart just another self-centered move on Bennett's part.

Nevertheless, he let her down easy, like most men do:

> we re-signed our lease and decided to paint the apartment. We threw out our suitcases because they were taking up too much room. And then, in a moment of sweet insecurity, he told me he was worried he would always love me more than I loved him.
> I assured him it wasn't true.
> A month later, he broke up with me, a half-hour before midnight, on New Year's Eve. We were in Seattle for the holidays, just as we had been when he proposed six years before. There was no warning, no conversation. He simply told me he didn't want to marry. He had never forgiven me for turning him down.
> When we got back to New York, he packed up his stuff, quit his job, paid a final month's rent and moved back to his hometown, 2,000 miles away.
> In the end, we had no shared bank account or property. We didn't have to go through a trial separation or mandatory counseling. We had spent seven years living in a 600-square-foot New York City apartment, inseparable and intertwined. Yet in the end, the relationship ended in one night. No discussion required.

Although it's probably true that he loved her more than she loved him, as it's pretty clear that Bennett loved herself above all others, what had really changed is that he had started to care about himself as well. Women have a way of teaching men how to do that. Use a man enough, and eventually his self-preservation instinct kicks in.

When I wrote an article telling women that they ought to start thinking seriously about marriage by at least 25 if they want to have a family, it provoked the ire of a lot of 20-something women. I thought it was pretty good advice, but the denial is so strong these days that a lot of women – like Jessica Bennett – are bound to find themselves staring right into the face of regret.

As Military Sexually Integrated, "Sexual Misconduct" Epidemic Results

W.F. Price · 27 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A number of Air Force instructors are facing rape, harassment and/or inappropriate contact accusations, and there is a supposed epidemic of "sexual misconduct" involving female recruits. The reporting on the matter tends to conflate sexual assault (so far only one instructor accused of rape) with inappropriate consensual sex.

At this point it remains to be seen whether the man accused of rape will be convicted, but given the politics involved I wouldn't bet on a fair court martial. As for the others, they stand accused of various minor offenses such as adultery and making unwanted advances.

I've written before how introducing sex into male institutions has a corrupting effect, but politically correct ideology refuses to recognize that young women tend to be sexually attracted to higher-status males. Putting a relatively young man in charge of a lot of young, fertile females is bound to lead to some sex, no matter how many threats and disincentives the man is exposed to. Sex is such a strong biological compulsion that it simply will happen — especially amongst the types who tend to join the military. This has been recognized for all of history, and soldiers were typically excused for using prostitutes or having sex with local women so long as they kept it off base.

But now we're actually bringing the women into the bases and expecting them not to have sex with the men surrounding them. Generally, it is sterile, older feminists who are demanding that the men keep their pants on, all the while excusing the females, who even in the current case admittedly engaged in a great deal of consensual sex with military men.

So far, none of the women who had sex with the non-raping instructors have been charged with anything, although they clearly should if we are to hold them to equal standards. It may be true that instructors have more responsibility, but female recruits are adults – not children – and therefore fully capable of making sexual decisions.

However, when it really comes down to it, we ought to ask ourselves whether it's appropriate and worth the trouble to create such a risky situation in the first place. The military is not, and never has been, an equal-opportunity employer. Nor should it be. It is an institution that has a very clear purpose – to fight and win wars – and we pay for it. It's relatively harmless to fiddle with gender ratios at the DMV, the USPS, and even the Forest Service, but the military is not a fundamentally benign institution. It is a necessary evil, and should only be maintained at the level necessary to ensure national security. Introducing affirmative action bloat to it is not only wasteful, but a danger to national security. President Obama should be ashamed of himself for squandering our money to unnecessarily expand an institution that should be lean, mean and efficient, and for giving it a job – enforcing gender equality – it has no business doing.

More Military Shenanigans

Elusive Wapiti wrote an article highlighting military moms in uniform breastfeeding in public. It's accompanied by a "tasteful" picture of some children enjoying lunch courtesy of their mothers, who are wearing camo.

Well, who can say the women aren't doing their job? The only problem is that they are wearing the wrong uniform.

BTW, is it sexual misconduct if an airman notices the tits and does a double-take?

Health Care Bill Closer to Reality, Child Support to be Extended to 26

W.F. Price · 28 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Supremes have set the stage for the full implementation of Obamacare, and yet people are not fully aware of the consequences of this enormous, bloated bill.

A provision of Obamacare that divorced fathers ought to pay close attention to is the extension of "dependent children" to age 26 (from Cornell's law blog):

> Grandfathered Health Plans
> Under the Affordable Care Act, current health plans that existed at the time the Act was signed were "grandfathered" into the Act. This was meant to allow people to maintain the insurance coverage they already possessed. Under the Act, grandfathered health plans are exempted from certain requirements that the Act imposed. For example, grandfathered health plans are not required to impose limits on out-of-pocket costs for their users. New plans are required to provide their participants with "essential health benefits," as determined by the Secretary of Health and Human Services; grandfathered health plans are not subject to these requirements. However, certain requirements do apply alike to the new plans and the grandfathered health plans. These include extending the age of dependent children to age 26. Also, both types of plan are prohibited from placing a monetary limit on lifetime coverage.

Although there's nothing wrong with fathers helping out adult children, the problem here is that the if the custodial parent (overwhelmingly the mother) continues to claim the child as a dependent, guess who gets the checks?

This will simply incentivize mothers to keep children "dependent" as long as possible, possibly through having them go to school beyond what's necessary, take superfluous classes, etc.

The days when child support ended at 18 are long over. Now, women are entitled to payments from babydaddy for a full third (or more) of his natural life, and more than half of his working life.

Obamacare is indeed a tax, and guess who's going to be footing most of the bill?

Usher's Court Hearing Shows Double Standard in Family Court

W.F. Price · 28 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

TMZ filmed Usher's custody hearing, in which he's pleading for custody of his sons. His ex's lawyer is smearing his character and delving into his personal life in an attempt to prove he's an unfit father, and that it was his own fault that his ex-wife attacked his girlfriend.

If a man tried to pull the same in court, he wouldn't have a chance in hell of getting custody (not that Usher really has much of a chance anyway). It doesn't matter if your ex is bringing strange men over and sleeping with them in the room next to the kids, leaving the kids with grandma to go slut it up in Vegas, or whatever. You just can't go there, because the judge will teach you a lesson for it.

On the other hand, if a separated guy has a fling with a woman away from his kids when it is not his custodial time with them, that's considered "provocation" and bad parenting. The way it's set up, almost anything a father does can be used against him, whereas a mother can be excused for just about anything, including assault.

This is why I cannot in good conscience recommend that a father fight for custody unless he can conclusively prove that the children are in danger. Better to get a reasonable parenting plan with plenty of time with the kids, and if the circumstances change he's in a good position to take over as custodial parent.

Comment of the Week: Backlash Real and Deserved

W.F. Price · 29 June 2012 · Archived copy · Original

At Doug's request (I often rely on pointers from bright, mature commenters like Doug), I'm highlighting one of our most popular comments for this week, and probably this year so far. Written by "Young Guy," it spells out the reasons young men are rejecting feminism. If only our mass media outlets would listen, they might have something valuable to say. But no, that isn't their job — they prefer to instruct us as to what is and isn't appropriate (mostly, they learned the rules in college, because they are such "out of the box," "independent" and "cutting-edge" thinkers).

Thankfully, we have real people who are willing to chip in and let us know what's actually happening on the ground.

Let's have Young Guy speak for himself:

> If feminists think men, especially young men, are angry, they don't know the half of it. As a 26 year-old male, I have seen this society bend over backwards to accommodate women all the time.
>
> The school curriculums are geared toward female success. Schools have countless women's programs. Female teachers can be as hateful as they want towards male students without facing consequences. People cheer when girls succeed in school, but jeer when boys succeed in school. Even though females have every advantage in the education system, they somehow still have the audacity to complain. They take fluff majors but don't realize anyone with less than half a brain could pass classes in the humanities and social sciences. Boys are dropping like flies in the education system, but no one cares. America's education system has become a joke ever since feminist legislation was passed to make the education system more female-friendly.
> Oh, and just look at the workplace. Sexual harassment laws give women freedom to dress slutty and still have the nerve to complain when men sneak a peek. If you are a man who has a female co-worker, you have to walk on eggshells everyday or else you can get fired because the twat in the other room got her panties in a bunch over something minor you said. You can be a man who has busted his ass everyday to succeed in your chosen profession, only to see it mean nothing because some woman who was nothing more than an affirmative action hire. If this isn't bad enough, you get these useless women who are subpar, yet they still never shut up about breaking through the mythical glass-ceiling that they didn't break and didn't exist in the first place.
> Also, I have really had enough of women dragging this country down with their dead-weight. Female soldiers, police officers, and firefighters are liabilities. No, all you ladies in these jobs, you aren't heroes. I am going to go insane if I hear one more female soldier, police officer, or firefighter cry about not getting the respect she thinks she deserves. She doesn't get respect because she doesn't deserve respect. The military, law enforcement, and firefighters would be A LOT better off if women stopped lowering the bar to astronomical proportions.
> I could go on and on about fathers being the butt of all jokes, male-only spaces being infiltrated by women, misandry in the entertainment industry, female-on-male violence and male suicide being treated like it either it doesn't exist or it doesn't matter, single mothers and all their horrors, and just all the complaining women do everyday about insignificant things, but I think most of you understand where I am coming from already.
> Males raised in feminist households or single-mother households are sick and tired of all this nonsense because they have seen the hatefulness in feminism since they were born, and every day afterwards. These young men are extremely angry because it has been made clear to them they are considered irrelevant by most of society. Go ahead, keep throwing us young guys under the bus, because you are just making things worse. You have no idea how angry young men like me are after being thrown under the bus ever since we were born.
> The backlash is not only real, but it is well-deserved. Apologies won't erase the damage which has been done. Acting like what happened because of feminism either didn't happen or was minor is a slap in the face. Saying women have suffered from feminism just as much as men is like spitting in the faces of all the men who have > suffered ten lifetimes of pain because of feminism.

> Women have no idea what they have done to us Generation Y men.

Tingles in the Mist

I came across this remarkable video, in which a young Julia Roberts has an “encounter” with an orangutan on the Leakey Preserve on Borneo (try to ignore the German translation over her voice). The incident was captured on film, and looked to be fairly serious, although the handlers prevented the unthinkable. Apparently, orangutans rape a woman on the preserve every year or so, and this one in particular, named “Kosasu,” took a shining to Ms. Roberts.

I’ve previously wondered why so many female primatologists put themselves in these situations, but now Julia has explained: it’s for the “raw thrill.”

Here’s another video concerning the incident, in which Roberts is quite clear about the ape’s intent. Before making his move, the orang is the epitome of the aloof alpha male:

Anne-Marie Slaughter Grasping at Straws in "Have it All" Article

W.F. Price · 2 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In this month's edition of The Atlantic, Anne-Marie Slaughter wrote a very long article explaining that women "still can't have it all," but should be able to if only we make the right changes. As is commonly the case with female writers, Slaughter devotes an enormous amount of page space to herself, assuring readers that she is indeed a very accomplished, professional woman, and that when she quit diplomacy, it was her choice.

Although the article struck a chord with women across the US and gained massive exposure online, the gist of the article – that women are not actually exempt from reality – is not new. We've been making the point on this site for quite a while now. But perhaps a woman with a federal imprimatur needed to say it to get women to pay attention.

Unfortunately, Slaughter can't seem to see the issue through to its logical conclusion, instead clinging to the notion that more social engineering will deliver women into the magical promised land of limitless opportunity. She takes what could have been a helpful article putting things in their proper perspective for women who have to make a choice between family and career, and turns it into a feminist crusade for more power, more control, more everything.

> The best hope for improving the lot of all women, and for closing what Wolfers and Stevenson call a "new gender gap"—measured by well-being rather than wages—is to close the leadership gap: to elect a woman president and 50 women senators; to ensure that women are equally represented in the ranks of corporate executives and judicial leaders. Only when women wield power in sufficient numbers will we create a society that genuinely works for all women. That will be a society that works for everyone.

So how does she propose creating this equal world? Well, her first idea is finding the right spouse. The husband has to acquiesce to being a kitchen bitch, and to support her in her career by shouldering the majority of the domestic work. Essentially, she's calling for an Amazon society — not equality.

> Sandberg's second message in her Barnard commencement address was: "The most important career decision you're going to make is whether or not you have a life partner and who that partner is." Lisa Jackson, the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, recently drove that message home to an audience of Princeton students and alumni gathered to hear her acceptance speech for the James Madison Medal. During the Q&A session, an audience member asked her how she managed her career and her family. She laughed and pointed to her husband in the front row, saying: "There's my work-life balance." I could never have had the career I have had without my husband, Andrew Moravcsik, who is a tenured professor of politics and international affairs at Princeton. Andy has spent more time with our sons than I have, not only on homework, but also on baseball, music lessons, photography, card games, and more. When each of them had to bring in a foreign dish for his fourth-grade class dinner, Andy made his grandmother's Hungarian palacsinta; when our older son needed to memorize his lines for a lead role in a school play, he turned to Andy for help.

In order to implement her scheme, we'd have to find a veritable army of men willing to live life as a housewife to support all these powerful, accomplished women. If the army of men to do this can't be found, then a lot (if not most) of these women are going to miss out on being mothers, and wasn't the point of "having it all" that women could be both supremely powerful and mothers at the same time?

Timing of children.

If women have the kids young, she says, they can focus their efforts on their career by the time they are in their 40s. Not a bad idea. However, she goes on to say that women don't want to do this any longer, correctly noting that young women don't marry and have children while still young and at their peak in fertility for "understandable" reasons. You see, getting married and having kids early takes away all those wonderful opportunities for capitalizing on one's sexuality in grad school and the early career. So she suggests relying on reproductive technology (oocyte cryopreservation) which, incidentally, costs about as much as a new car. This means a lot of women will put it off in favor of that new car, hoping they can still push out a kid or two before the ovaries fully shut down. This leads, once again, to the conclusion that a lot of them will not have a family and, therefore, not have it all.

Changing work culture.

Make it so that employers no longer favor people willing to put in long hours, or those who are "driven" in exceptional ways. Here she bizarrely argues that employers should see childcare as akin to hobbies such as long distance running.

> Consider the following proposition: An employer has two equally talented and productive employees. One trains for and runs marathons when he is not working. The other takes care of two children. What assumptions is the employer likely to make about the marathon runner? That he gets up in the dark every day and logs an hour or two running before even coming into the office, or drives himself to get out there even after a long day. That he is ferociously disciplined and willing to push himself through distraction, exhaustion, and days when nothing seems to go right in the service of a goal far in the distance. That he must manage his time exceptionally well to squeeze all of that in.
> Be honest: Do you think the employer makes those same assumptions about the parent? Even though she likely rises in the dark hours before she needs to be at work, organizes her children's day, makes breakfast, packs lunch, gets them off to school, figures out shopping and other errands even if she is lucky enough to have a housekeeper—and does much the same work at the end of the day.

She leaves out the fact that long distance running is a hobby. If the job calls on you to miss a race or skip training a few times, it isn't a big deal. However, you cannot simply tell your kids "mommy/daddy has to spend all weekend at the office, so you're on your own until Sunday evening." That's called "criminal child neglect." I grew up with a few kids whose parents treated them that way; one girl in particular was "forgotten" fairly frequently and would stay at school after hours crying until her mother "remembered" her.

Employers value people who are available not necessarily because of some driven quality, but because of their availability. When a problem comes up and everyone else is otherwise occupied, the available person will be called upon to handle it. Employers really don't like letting these people go. They win through attrition — just like a distance runner.

"Redefining the Arc of a Successful Career"

Here Slaughter argues that because people now live longer, the traditional career peak of 45-55 is obsolete. This means, according to Slaughter, that women should be able to take breaks, switch roles, parent for some time, and then peak at some point after that. I'm sure this works for some people, such as judges and senators (assuming they rely on dumb luck like Patty Murray). But for the typical hard-charging career man or woman, stressful, competitive jobs require more from them than they want to – or are able to – perform as they approach retirement age. So why should they peak as high as those who can give it their all in their prime?

She's ignoring basic facts of biology here. Surgeons, for example, are known to peak in their 40s, after which their abilities decline. Trial lawyers probably follow a similar trajectory. Professional athletes, of course, peak far earlier. The thing is, there are only a choice few jobs in which people can continue to rise past the age of 50. There's a big difference between being adequate and being in one's prime. If you spend a large proportion of your prime working years taking care of kids, you simply aren't going to rise as high. It's a trade-off Slaughter isn't willing to acknowledge.

"Rediscovering the pursuit of happiness"

Here I can find some common ground with Slaughter. She admits that after years in Washington, she found herself longing to go home. And why not? Slavish devotion to “the job” is not most people’s cup of tea. Most of us work to live rather than the other way around. An afternoon on the beach with the kids almost always beats a day in the office.

But then she shows how absolutely ignorant feminists are when it comes to what motivates most men at work. She stresses that men are ambivalent about their careers as well, as though this is some kind of revelation that men only discover at the end:

> Seeking out a more balanced life is not a women’s issue; balance would be better for us all. Bronnie Ware, an Australian blogger who worked for years in palliative care and is the author of the 2011 book The Top Five Regrets of the Dying, writes that the regret she heard most often was “I wish I’d had the courage to live a life true to myself, not the life others expected of me.” The second-most-common regret was “I wish I didn’t work so hard.” She writes: “This came from every male patient that I nursed. They missed their children’s youth and their partner’s companionship.”

This goes without saying, of course, but apparently women think that for all these years men were getting up and going to work because they were selfishly serving their own interests, only to discover on their deathbed that they wanted something else after all. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Men don’t work only for themselves, and we all know that. In fact, most of us work so that we can have a family. It is the very fortunate (and widely despised) man who can pull off having a family without working for it. Women have far more choice in this regard.

“Innovation” will do the trick

Here Slaughter reverts to the kind of bureaucratic language that tends to make my eyes glaze over, but there are a couple ideas I support. Amusingly, she interprets the issue in a far different manner, however.

> In fact, while many of these issues are hard to quantify and measure precisely, the statistics seem to tell a different story. A seminal study of 527 U.S. companies, published in the Academy of Management Journal in 2000, suggests that “organizations with more extensive work-family policies have higher perceived firm-level performance” among their industry peers. These findings accorded with a 2003 study conducted by Michelle Arthur at the University of New Mexico. Examining 130 announcements of family-friendly policies in The Wall Street Journal, Arthur found that the announcements alone significantly improved share prices. In 2011, a study on flexibility in the workplace by Ellen Galinsky, Kelly Sakai, and Tyler Wigton of the Families and Work Institute showed that increased flexibility correlates positively with job engagement, job satisfaction, employee retention, and employee health.
> This is only a small sampling from a large and growing literature trying to pin down the relationship between family-friendly policies and economic performance. Other scholars have concluded that good family policies attract better talent, which in turn raises productivity, but that the policies themselves have no impact on productivity. Still others argue that results attributed to these policies are actually a function of good management overall. What is evident, however, is that many firms that recruit and train well-educated professional women are aware that when a woman leaves because of bad work-family balance, they are losing the money and time they invested in her.
> Even the legal industry, built around the billable hour, is taking notice. Deborah Epstein Henry, a former big-firm litigator, is now the president of Flex-Time Lawyers, a national consulting firm focused partly on strategies for the retention of female attorneys. In her book Law and Reorder, published by the American Bar Association in 2010, she describes a legal profession “where the billable hour no longer works”; where attorneys, judges, recruiters, and academics all agree that this system of compensation has perverted the industry, leading to brutal work hours, massive inefficiency, and highly inflated costs. The answer—already being deployed in different corners of the industry—is a combination of alternative fee structures, virtual > firms, women-owned firms, and the outsourcing of discrete legal jobs to other jurisdictions. Women, and Generation X and Y lawyers more generally, are pushing for these changes on the supply side; clients determined to reduce legal fees and increase flexible service are pulling on the demand side. Slowly, change is happening.

Some readers may be surprised to find that I am a big supporter of the "flex-time" and "family leave" policies corporations are adopting. Why? Because when women leave the workforce to have kids, men need to pick up the slack, and since the woman is to be retained, new hires will be either temporary or contractors. Due to government regulations and the decreasing flexibility of the corporate model, there are a lot of opportunities for individual men or small companies founded by men to take advantage of this need for labor. Working in a corporation is hell for a lot of men, not in the least because of feminist policy, but if you're the guy to whom they're outsourcing the work women won't or can't do, you'll never be out of a job.

The real reason the family leave and flex-time policies are increasing efficiency is exactly this new flexibility in the male labor market. Men are picking up the slack as independent contractors, and women are free to come and go as they please. Women will often pass up more pay for leisure time, so there's another reason profits are better. Give a woman an option to take time off without pay, and if she knows she can come back and work more when she needs the money, she'll often do it. In the meanwhile, men are performing the work she left behind, and getting paid for it. Best of all, these men don't have to work directly for the corporation or firm — they are working for themselves.

But isn't this simply a way for women to have high positions only in name? Sure, but who cares? As long as men are getting paid for the work, it doesn't matter what the woman calls herself. However, it does go to show how much of this debate about "having it all" depends on appearances rather than reality.

Force men to support women

> Perhaps the most encouraging news of all for achieving the sorts of changes that I have proposed is that men are joining the cause. In commenting on a draft of this article, Martha Minow, the dean of the Harvard Law School, wrote me that one change she has observed during 30 years of teaching law at Harvard is that today many young men are asking questions about how they can manage a work-life balance. And more systematic research on Generation Y confirms that many more men than in the past are asking questions about how they are going to integrate active parenthood with their professional lives.
> Abstract aspirations are easier than concrete trade-offs, of course. These young men have not yet faced the question of whether they are prepared to give up that more prestigious clerkship or fellowship, decline a promotion, or delay their professional goals to spend more time with their children and to support their partner's career.

Even though she has a couple teenage sons, I don't think Slaughter has a clue what young men are thinking. Most young men, by now, are fully aware that there's absolutely no guarantee that they'll even be allowed to parent their children, so of course they're going to question whether it's worth putting off bonding with the kids to provide for the mother. So, rather than struggling with the same "choices" female students do, the young men are asking themselves whether it's even worth putting in all that effort if they aren't going to get a family out of it anyway.

Men simply won't sacrifice if they know there's no deal involved. Today, men are pretty well aware that the old deal doesn't hold any longer. In the old days, a man who knew he could count on his nice young wife to hold down the fort while he went out and sacrificed his time for the family's welfare would have taken the clerkship, fellowship, promotion, or whatever. He'd do it in hopes that his family would be happy, and that in the future they'd all have a nice life.

Today, the young man is hedging his bet. None of the women his age are interested in marriage anyway — they're all working on their careers. What's more, they're sleeping with his manager and being promoted ahead of him.

Oddly, Slaughter reverses the typical argument, praising young men for being less ambitious, whereas most pundits just call them “slackers.” But she’s only doing so in hopes that they will be women’s political allies in the drive for installing women in superior positions over them. It isn’t going to work, despite her efforts. It’s too obvious how she and other feminists see them: as fundamentally flawed.

> I continually push the young women in my classes to speak more. They must gain the confidence to value their own insights and questions, and to present them readily. My husband agrees, but he actually tries to get the young men in his classes to act more like the women—to speak less and listen more. If women are ever to achieve real equality as leaders, then we have to stop accepting male behavior and male choices as the default and the ideal. We must insist on changing social policies and bending career tracks to accommodate our choices, too. We have the power to do it if we decide to, and we have many men standing beside us.
> We’ll create a better society in the process, for all women. We may need to put a woman in the White House before we are able to change the conditions of the women working at Walmart. But when we do, we will stop talking about whether women can have it all. We will properly focus on how we can help all Americans have healthy, happy, productive lives, valuing the people they love as much as the success they seek.

Sorry, Anne-Marie, but we’re not on board. It isn’t men’s job to install a female president; she can get there on her own if she wants the job. We will not be “enlisted” in service of women we don’t know who want to be our masters. We may not have as many choices as women, but we do have the choice of who we will work and fight for, and it won’t be you.

There is nothing more telling about this article than that it both begins and ends with demands for support from men. That’s feminism in a nutshell: “We want it all, so you have to give it to us!”

Well, here’s a little dose of reality for feminists: we couldn’t give you all you wanted even if we tried. We are mere mortals, and we recognize that. Furthermore, we are starting to recognize that the more we give you the more you’ll want, and we’re getting tired.

Too bad Anne-Marie; this time you’re going to have to do it yourself. We’ll be out fishing, hanging out with our kids, making craft beer or whatever strikes our fancy in our free time. You can have your glory — without us.

Book Review: Worthless

Elusive Wapiti · 3 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: Worthless — The Young Person's Indispensable Guide to Choosing the Right Major, by Aaron Clarey, 173 pages.

Summary: Aaron. Clarey, aka Captain Capitalism, has penned a guide aimed straight at the 18-25 college demo. This book's title truthfully advertises what the reader will see inside…a straight-up practical guide to selecting a college major that will provide the student with the best odds for well-compensated employment after their stint in college is complete.

One key takeaway from this book is found in the opening pages, in a description of an exercise he used to give to his students (and therefore to the reader). In one instance of this exercise, he invited his students to consider the items they were thinking of buying (cell phones, sports cars, flat screen TV, beer, etc….tangible widgets all). Then he asked them their majors or planned majors, garnering the below responses:

Sociology x2
Women's Studies
Electrical Engineering
Journalism x2
English Engineering
Psychology x2
Education x2
Pre-law
Actuarial Science
Communications
Political Science x2
International Relations Accounting
Philosophy
Music / Arts
"African-American" Studies
Pre-med
History

Mr. Clarey then contrasted the yawning mismatch between their liberal-arts fields of study with the goods and services they consume for his students. For how does a sociology major (or journo, psych, poli sci, music, hyphenated-American, English major…you get my point) contribute to the design and production of a cell phone, the extraction of petroleum to fuel a sports car, or make or provide much anything of value that consumers demand? The answer is, not much, if anything at all. And that is exactly the point. Mr. Clarey writes:

> The mismatch between what people want and the skilled labor required to build it makes it very clear the problems facing youth today. [They] all want to have high-paying jobs, [they] all want to go to college, but [they] never give an ounce of thought to what is in demand. Most youth today major in what they want, not what other people demand. This not only goes a long way in explaining why liberal-arts majors face high unemployment and low-paying jobs, but also explains why we have a trade deficit with the likes of China and India whose students do major in the fields that produce the goods we want. [emphasis in original] you gotta learn the maths. For math is the foundational component of all the STEM degrees that feed into high-paying jobs making the widgets that consumers buy. But, Mr. Clarey cautions, "not all STEM degrees were created equal", and one's mathematical proficiency must be paired with another high-skill, low-density/high-demand component (i.e., chemistry, etc) if the STEM focus is to deliver on the investment. He also warns readers away from those degrees that lack mathematical rigor, which include all lib-arts degrees and some degrees sometimes and erroneously lumped in with STEM, such as finance and architecture.

Another takeaway from this book is bound to make American middle- and high-school students everywhere groan:

A third takeaway from this book is the folly in the cultural expectation that "winners" go to college while the dregs settle for trade school. Mr. Clarey pokes holes in this cultural norm, noting that while "you must go to college to be somebody" was good advice in the years after WWII when a tiny fraction of the labor force had college degrees. Unfortunately, there is a surfeit of college degrees in America today, to the point where possession of a bachelor's is functionally equivalent to having graduated from high school 60 years ago. As before, Mr. Clarey points to the supply-demand curve, notes bachelor's degree market glut, grade inflation (i.e., the sheepskin has lost some of its meaning as an indicator of real learning and/or skills), and skyrocketing tuition, and recommends the trades as well-paying, in-demand, value-producing jobs that have the important benefit of being far cheaper than college. Moreover, one can always go to college later, with all that money they saved by going to a trade school.

The fourth and final major takeaway from the book was where Mr. Clarey dispenses a bit of the "if I had to do it all over again" style of advice. He exhorts the young to enjoy college, by which he means study and do well but don't overdo it in the process. He proffers the military as a way to garner skills, credibility, and (if you stick around for 20 years or more) a pension. As the author contends that no-one really takes young adults seriously…and they're paid low wages in accordance with their low levels of skills…until their mid- to late thirties, this option has the added advantage of returning one back into the private labor force as one enters their prime earning years In addition, he advises those already working on worthless degrees to quit right away, consider the effort invested thus far as a sunk cost, and get cracking on a major that will actually service all those student loans. Speaking of loans, he further recommends young people to avoid debt if they can, to spend some time in the labor force (so long as they return to school), to not worry about reasonable debt for a worthwhile degree (it's an investment), consider a two-year degree program in lieu of a four, and / or start their own business on the side. To this advice, Mr. Clarey also recommends prospective job seekers to bypass HR (where companies place troublesome worthless degree holders) and go directly to the hiring authority instead. And last, the author advises students to be open-minded about employment overseas, in economically freer countries.

I found the author's perspective of college-as-trade school to be interesting, for the academy has undergone a fundamental transformation in the 20th Century. What started as a way to transmit knowledge from one generation of learned men to the next during the Middle Ages has morphed into overpriced trade schools for the mass-man in the post-WWII age. Indeed, the author is careful to largely avoid applying the "e" word–education–to these facilities of so-called higher learning in his book, for that is not what modern colleges are for or do, and not how Mr. Clarey advises the youth to view a college education anyways. Instead, in the author's view, the purpose of attending a modern college is to acquire practical skills that will produce something that a consumer demands. Period. This perspective underlays the author's hard-nosed return-on-investment perspective on seeking a degree from the modern university…this rather than lofty and antiquated notions of men and women of culture acquiring a broad, liberal education. And besides, how well do colleges do these days matriculating cultured, critically thinking, well-rounded citizens anyways? Some think colleges close minds rather than open them.

It is in this re-purposed mission that the modern university does many things that don't make much sense to the author. In fact, a portion of the book is a polemic against the education institution itself, an institution with revenues two and a half times larger than the entire oil industry in America. This fact led the author to wonder aloud that if so-called "Big Oil" is, by dint of it's size and scope, inherently exploitative of its customers, how is "Big Ed" not so? Big Ed, in the author's characterization, does not exist for the benefit of students but rather, like any large bureaucracy, it serves the teachers, administrators, executives, and the institution itself. This while the data suggests a slight negative correlation between spending per student and academic achievement; one would think that if spending on education were truly “for the children”, we would see a slight (or better) positive correlation between increased spending and standardized test scores. Instead, the only thing that is increasing is teacher and administrator salaries, far outpacing inflation. Furthermore, Mr. Clarey also questions the need for prerequisites, and offers that the sheer number of prerequisites–see the university’s former mission of matriculating educated, well-rounded pillars of society, above–wastes students’ time and “generate[s] money for other departments, notably departments of worthless majors”, by ramming a captive student body through worthless classes taught by instructors who themselves were schooled in worthless majors. An economic term comes to mind regarding this sort of activity: ‘rent-seeking’, or the act of manipulating the rules so as to shunt economic activity one’s direction.

The author makes clear his antipathy for an institution that predates upon the young and naive. But I find myself wondering, isn’t Big Ed just giving the customer what it demands, good and hard? Were not Mr. Clarey’s classes filled with students who signed up for worthless majors, with only a sprinkling of STEM students? Why then would it not make sense for universities tilt toward supplying a “product” for this admittedly misguided and economically foolish demand? Moreover, these days apparently demand for STEM is so weak that some colleges think hard about eliminating STEM programs while others actually do so. (To be fair, a few colleges like this one are drop-kicking worthless degrees too). In an age of declining male enrollment and overwhelming female predilection for non-STEM degrees, I don’t see the economics supporting expensive STEM programs when cheaper lib-arts programs are more in demand. With this framing, the finger of blame for Big Ed’s vampire bloat is at least partially shared by students, parents, and corporate America, for it is these three who choose personal fulfillment over acquisition of skills that will put food on the table, who propagate the erroneous notion that college is the ticket to success, and who use college degrees and university-level certifications as stealth proxies for IQ and desirable personality qualities.

This book administers an economic “red pill” to the college-bound, so as to ensure they don’t end up like this woman, who racked up just under $100,000 in student loans for her interdisciplinary degree in religious and women’s studies and struggles to find gainful employment that will service her debt. Key quote: “I don’t want to spend the rest of my life slaving away to pay for an education I got for four years and would happily give back”.

A better poster boy, er, girl, for Mr. Clarey’s book, I don’t think I could find one better than Cortney Munna. For those in college, considering college, or are advising a young adult about to enter college, this book is a quick read and well worth your time.

Spring Report and Summer Fund Drive

W.F. Price · 3 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

With the exception of April when the site experienced some major technical problems at an inopportune time, spring was a good season for The Spearhead in terms of traffic and subscription numbers. Even April, with its security foibles, had a silver lining; I hired a security firm to give the site an overhaul and pull out useless code, then went over the plugins one by one to see which might be causing slowdowns and security loopholes.

The results have been promising. Not only has the site sped up a bit, but traffic from new readers is up substantially, which has caused Alexa stats to rebound. At best, Alexa is a rough assessment of a sites traffic, because it is demographically skewed toward those who go to the trouble to install the toolbar on their browsers. However, I was a bit puzzled by the Alexa decline last year and early this year, because real traffic measured by on-site tracking software showed a clear, substantial increase from last summer. What I suspect happened is that some malware had been redirecting new readers or search hits for some time, screwing up the numbers. After installing security firewalls and file monitors on the site, I was surprised to see how regularly self-hosted WordPress sites are attacked, primarily to steal traffic.

Security definitely must be taken seriously if you run a self-hosted site! This is one of the advantages of having a wordpress.com or blogger site, as the big companies handle the security themselves. However, they have an even bigger drawback, in that they own your web space and can pull the plug at any time. I believe they even reserve the right to use your content, which undermines the concept of copyright.

RSS subscriptions are up to about 2,100 (2,093 yesterday), and about a third of these subscribers check the site daily on a feed reader, with an unknown number (probably about 200-300) checking email subscriptions on a regular basis. This comes out to about a thousand daily readers through subscriptions alone. In addition to that, weekdays see about 3,500 unique visitors per day directly to the site, about 60% of whom are return visitors. Therefore, a conservative estimate for regular readers would be around 2,000-3,000 per day. Monthly uniques are running around 70,000 at the moment and page views 280,000, although I hope to see both numbers rise this month.

Summers are usually slow, as people spend more time outside. In fact, I hope readers get plenty of sunshine and enjoy themselves when possible — too much time in front of the screen isn't healthy. However, if I can expand the site's reach a bit everyone can relax, take it easy and take a vacation, and traffic may yet grow through September, and then we'll hit the high traffic months from mid fall through winter.

Whatever the case, the important thing is that the site is still going strong, and our ideas are making a difference. I'm glad to see we've added some perspective to the national (and international — I do get letters from abroad on a frequent basis), debate on how our civilization will handle family, sex roles and marriage in a world that has changed profoundly over a short period of time. It's as important an issue as any, and we have to take it by the horns if we're going to leave a better world for generations to come. The nightmare of a repressive feminist dystopia is unfortunately a real possibility, and already here in many respects, so this is a fight we can't afford to sit out.

So, on that note, I'd like to ask for support so I can keep the site running through the next quarter, and keep dedicating hour after hour of work to producing content and protecting our space online. One thing I can assure supporters of is that every dollar you put into keeping The Spearhead online will go as far as just about any donation you could make — it is an extraordinarily efficient operation. This site has not only produced an enormous amount of content, but helped create a network of other blogs through links, exposure and a steady, unflagging presence online. I am pleased to note that teenage boys have been reading the site, and have used our ideas to articulate the visceral revulsion they feel for feminist indoctrination. Feminists read it, too, and although many of them hate it with a passion, our ideas have clearly served to cause them to rethink some of their rhetoric.

Over time, words and ideas make a difference. Like water falling on stone, the effect may be innocuous at first, but eventually the water shapes the stone, and we are at the point where we've already made an impression. My goal is to make an even bigger one, and I'd like your help in doing so.

Thanks to all those who have contributed content and money to the site, it's still here. I'd like to extend a special thank you to the donors who saved my bacon this year — without them I'd be living like a hippie (but not by choice). All in all, I've had a great time running the site, but it certainly isn't making me rich, so I truly appreciate every donation readers make.

Thanks again for the generosity — every time someone offers support it strengthens my resolve and keeps me marching along, taking the fight right through the lines.

Happy 4th of July!

W.F. Price · 4 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've got the kids, and am taking the boy fishing before going to my uncle's place for a big fireworks show. Hope everyone's enjoying themselves.

In the meanwhile, we should remember and reflect upon the founding document of the United States, as it is very relevant to our present situation:

IN CONGRESS, July 4, 1776.

The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen united States of America,

When in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.–That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, –That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security.–Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.
He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.
He has refused to pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.
He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.
He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.
He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.
He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws for Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.
He has obstructed the Administration of Justice, by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary powers.
He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harrass our people, and eat out their substance.
He has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislatures.
He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power.
He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation:
For Quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:
For protecting them, by a mock Trial, from punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States:
For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world:
For imposing Taxes on us without our Consent:
For depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of Trial by Jury:
For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offences
For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighbouring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government, and enlarging its Boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies:
For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws, and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments:
For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.
He has abdicated Government here, by declaring us out of his Protection and waging War against us.
He has plundered our seas, ravaged our Coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.
He is at this time transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to compleat the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty & perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized nation.
He has constrained our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands.
He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages, whose known rule of warfare, is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions.

In every stage of these Oppressions We have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble terms: Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A Prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have We been wanting in attentions to our Brittish brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which, would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity, which denounces our Separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, Enemies in War, in Peace Friends.

We, therefore, the Representatives of the united States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the Name, and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be Free and Independent States; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes and our sacred Honor.

Single Mother Attitude Toward Babydaddies: “You are an offspring support system”

W.F. Price · 5 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

If you ever wondered what the proper approach to single mothers should be, “Roslynholcomb” puts it in its proper perspective by spelling out the parental role in response to an angry black woman’s rant about black men who are arrears on child support:

> Your happiness is not the bailiwick of any judge ANYWHERE. As the mother of two let me let you in in a little secret: YOUR HAPPINESS BECAME IRRLEVANT THE DAY YOUR CHILD WAS BORN. Now do you know what your sole purpose of existing is? To perpetuate the species by caring for said offspring. You are an offspring support system. PERIOD. That’s all biology cares about and that’s all the state cares about. The state has a vested interest in ensuring you feed your goddamned child. It doesn’t care if you’re happy about it!

OK, fair enough. I suppose that applies to females as well.

So, women, as soon as you get pregnant your happiness is irrelevant. Your job, you see, is to “perpetuate the species.” If you want an abortion, tough luck. If you don’t like being in a marriage, well, the state shouldn’t allow you to leave, because children do better even in unhappy marriages than in broken homes.

If you don’t perform your motherly duties, you should be punished. Because the imperative is to force you to care for them, then perhaps flogging rather than imprisonment is the proper punishment. Remember, your happiness doesn’t matter.

Roslyn suggests that men who don’t like being “offspring support systems” get vasectomies. OK, let’s give lousy mothers tubal ligations. That ought to do the trick.

Sounds like a feminist’s worst nightmare, right?

Well, this is exactly how feminists want men to be dealt with. Really gives the lie to the “equality” spiel.

It’s unfortunate, but in contemporary society single mothers have become about the trashiest, most entitled class of all. I suggest treating them with exactly as much contempt and coercion as so-called “deadbeat dads” have been treated for the past 30 years. Fair’s fair.

An Outside Perspective: America is a Woman's Paradise

W.F. Price · 6 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The following quote is translated from a Latvian women's/entertainment magazine. The woman is describing her experience in the US after moving there from the Baltic country (she's at the bottom of the article — Zanes Pallo-Reinoldsas).

> My advice to all women who want to pursue their dreams across the ocean. America is a woman's paradise, especially for mature women. Here all the laws revolve around the women. The woman will almost always leave the courthouse as a winner — even when it seems incredible that she could win.
> Even women over 40 can find husbands in the US. If you've got grown children, you can have another youth in the US, and can meet people in nightclubs.

Un, ja bērni jau paaugušies, tad sievietei otrā jaunība pēc 40 – 50 gadiem garantēta.

Naktsklubos var sastapt cilvēkus no 30 līdz 60 un vairāk gadiem, nevis astoņpadsmitgadīgos."]

Funny how American women still complain so much, and feminists still claim to be "oppressed." Seems women in the rest of the world know exactly what the truth is.

Are Men Really in Charge?

W.F. Price · 6 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

President Obama gives us all a little advice:

> President Barack Obama, marriage counselor?
> The president stopped at the Kozy Corners diner in Oak Harbor, Ohio, on Thursday for what political campaigns dub an “OTR”—an “off the record” event that isn’t on the formal schedule—and doled out a bit of marriage advice.

There was speculation that Hillary Clinton called the shots in office, but it’s pretty clear that Bill didn’t always obey her. With Obama, I’m not so sure.

Eivind Berge Arrested for Provocative Rhetoric

W.F. Price · 7 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Eivind Berge has been posting some pretty provocative stuff for quite a while now, including his desire to kill police for enforcing misandric laws. I agree with his girlfriend that it was a bunch of hot air, but he got arrested for it anyway. Despite his support for Anders Breivik, who decimated the youth wing of the Marxist/Islamist Norwegian left in a solo Knights Templar crusade last year, I seriously doubt Eivind would have carried out any violent acts. Breivik, who really meant business, kept his plans to himself.

The truth is that people who manage to pull off spectacular terrorist attacks are almost always those who don't say anything about them beforehand. Think Mohammed Atta vs. James Ujaama.

The lesson here is that if you want to be political, there's a sort of tortoise/hare dynamic at work. The impetuous, fast hare tends to run out of steam (or run into trouble with the law) fairly quickly. The slow-and-steady tortoise, on the other hand, keeps trudging on and wins the race.

I count myself as fairly lucky to have been educated in this from a young age. I used to catalog extremist movements (mainly jihadi Muslim), and learned a great deal about what is effective and what isn't. Certainly, terror attacks work, but operational secrecy is paramount. This means that threatening to kill people openly and loudly is essentially worthless. Either you operate out in the open honestly, eschewing illegal tactics, or you operate in the shadows as a murderous killer, like our intelligence agencies — you can't have it both ways. Obviously, I personally prefer and advocate the former approach, but both work, as CIA drone attacks so clearly demonstrate.

Although feminists will be very eager to seize the "high ground" here, I'd like to remind people of the kind of stuff leftists were saying and doing in the 1960s and 70s.

Bernardine Dohrn, Bill Ayers' wife, famously said that she would not condemn violence, and then went on a bombing campaign. She and her husband are now friends of our president.

Dohrn was a real terrorist, and a feminist, and walks free today, celebrated. She and Bill Ayers are suspected of being involved in bombing a San Francisco police station, killing one officer. History truly is written by the victors…

We shouldn't fool ourselves into thinking that violent action will do us any good. Of course violence does work, but the power of the state is so overwhelming today that individual acts are almost certain to fail. Furthermore, those who are willing to unleash violence on others must be prepared to die themselves, and must lead by example. Somehow, I don't think many of us have reached that point. It's a long road to get there, and I hold out the hope that it will never go that far.

the point is that anyone who condones violent action loudly and publicly, but doesn't back it up, can't be taken seriously.

In the end, it's all just hot air. Hopefully, the Norwegian courts will give Berge the same consideration our courts gave Ms. Dohrn, and keep it all in perspective. Whatever he may have written, Berge hasn't harmed anyone, nor has he gone so far as to promise to kill anyone in particular, so he should be released.

Berge's rhetoric was ill-considered and pointless, and he was skating on thin ice, but his speech was probably lawful by American standards. I suppose we'll see what the standards are in Norway, but I wish those who blabber about "action" would leave the rest of us out of it. Neither I nor other men have time to indulge fantasies and posing, and these show trials and political arrests don't do us a bit of good. In fact, all they do is give the state the opportunity to scare people into silence, and that's exactly what our enemies want.

A Few Good Women

W.F. Price · 8 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A female marine who deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan makes a case against women in USMC combat units, bringing both humanitarian and practical arguments to bear. The female marine, Captain Katie Petronio, lays it out with brutal honesty, including "We Are Not All Created Equal" in the title:

> As a young lieutenant, I fit the mold of a female who would have had a shot at completing IOC, and I am sure there was a time in my life where I would have volunteered to be an infantryman. I was a star ice hockey player at Bowdoin College, a small elite college in Maine, with a major in government and law. At 5 feet 3 inches I was squatting 200 pounds and benching 145 pounds when I graduated in 2007. I completed Officer Candidates School (OCS) ranked 4 of 52 candidates, graduated 48 of 261 from TBS, and finished second at MOS school. I also repeatedly scored far above average in all female-based physical fitness tests (for example, earning a 292 out of 300 on the Marine physical fitness test). Five years later, I am physically not the woman I once was and my views have greatly changed on the possibility of women having successful long careers while serving in the infantry. I can say from firsthand experience in Iraq and Afghanistan, and not just emotion, that we haven't even begun to analyze and comprehend the gender-specific medical issues and overall physical toll continuous combat operations will have on females.
> I was the senior Marine making the final decisions on construction concerns, along with 24-hour base defense and leading 30 Marines at any given time. The physical strain of enduring combat operations and the stress of being responsible for the lives and well-being of such a young group in an extremely kinetic environment were compounded by lack of sleep, which ultimately took a physical toll on my body that I couldn't have foreseen.
> By the fifth month into the deployment, I had muscle atrophy in my thighs that was causing me to constantly trip and my legs to buckle with the slightest grade change. My agility during firefights and mobility on and off vehicles and perimeter walls was seriously hindering my response time and overall capability. It was evident that stress and muscular deterioration was affecting everyone regardless of gender; however, the rate of my deterioration was noticeably faster than that of male Marines and further compounded by gender-specific medical conditions. At the end of the 7-month deployment, and the construction of 18 PBs later, I had lost 17 pounds and was diagnosed with polycystic ovarian syndrome (which personally resulted in infertility, but is not a genetic trend in my family), which was brought on by the chemical and physical changes endured during deployment. Regardless of my deteriorating physical stature, I was extremely successful during both of my combat tours, serving beside my infantry brethren and gaining the respect of every unit I supported. Regardless, I can say with 100 percent assurance that despite my accomplishments, there is no way I could endure the physical demands of the infantrymen whom I worked beside as their combat load and constant deployment cycle would leave me facing medical separation long before the option of retirement. I understand that everyone is affected differently; however, I am confident that should the Marine Corps attempt to fully integrate women into the infantry, we as an institution are going to experience a colossal increase in crippling and career-ending medical conditions for females.

It really is tragic when a woman loses the chance to be a mother, just as it is terrible when a man is stripped of his fatherhood by an evil, uncaring state.

One of the potential consequences of feminism I hadn't thought of was that women will not only be led down the primrose path in regards to becoming a mother, but will be physically or chemically prevented from doing so by the state. For example, I have been wondering what women who just started serving on submarines have been required to do while deployed, as an onboard pregnancy could easily be fatal to a mission. Submarines remain submerged for months on end, and a woman who found herself pregnant on the ship could force the submarine to surface for a medical evacuation if there were complications, thereby compromising stealth and ruining the entire mission.

I am almost certain that females who deploy are coerced into taking chemical birth control – either officially or not – which should be a cause for great concern. Trends tend to start with innocuous precedent, and we could well see such practices expand from the military to society in general.

My main argument against women in the military has centered around waste. The military is a necessary evil that should be as efficient as possible, and no larger than necessary. Making it an equal opportunity employer will introduce bloat and inefficiency, forcing the rest of us to pay more than we should for an institution that at best serves an ambiguous greater good.

However, it appears that there is more to be concerned about than simple inefficiency and waste. We are creating a model for a dystopian, and probably dysgenic, form of reproductive control in our own armed forces, and using women's bodies for tasks that nature never intended. It's pretty sick, when you think about it.

Law Professor Proposes “Preglimony”

W.F. Price · 9 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In a bid to further expand wealth transfer from males to females, Shari Motro, a professor at the University of Richmond, suggests that men should now be forced to pay for pregnancy expenses.

> Since the 1970s it has been possible to genetically link a father and his baby with increasing levels of accuracy. Then, a test using amniotic fluid let us test a baby’s DNA before birth, but the procedure increased the risk of miscarriage. Now a prenatal blood test has made the process far easier. Since a small amount of fetal DNA is present in a pregnant woman’s blood, the pregnancy can be genetically linked to her partner through a simple blood draw from the woman’s arm.
> One of the potential ramifications is that men might be called upon to help support their pregnant lovers before birth, even if the pregnancy is ultimately terminated or ends in miscarriage. They might be asked to chip in for medical bills, birthing classes and maternity clothes, to help to cover the loss of income that often comes with pregnancy, or to contribute to the cost of an abortion.

Interestingly, she wants men to pay this even if women get an abortion, which seems to suggest that men could be forced to pay to abort their own children, even if they don’t want to.

Another problem is the escalating cost of pregnancy. If men are forced to pay the full bill for contemporary pregnancies, lots of them will end up bankrupt. Most men who contribute to out of wedlock pregnancies are young and poor, and these pregnancies are now the majority of all pregnancies in women under 30. The expense borne by young men would be extraordinarily severe.

However, law professors don’t care about these losers. Nope, the young men who don’t have advanced degrees and six-figure incomes probably deserve it anyway…

Still Panhandling

I still need donations to keep going through the summer, so for those who may have missed the previous fund drive and report I posted last week (right before the 4th of July), here's the link.

Anything helps, even small donations, and I appreciate the support that has come in so far.

In the meanwhile, I'll keep the site running as usual and posting reminders until there's enough to pay the bills through September while keeping the content coming.

Feminism and the Decline of an Institution

W.F. Price · 10 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Things aren't looking good for the US armed forces, as they are having a difficult time dealing with patriarchal Taliban fighters abroad and feminist attacks at home. I've been focusing on the military because it is the last example of a public male institution left in the United States, and that is changing quickly.

Throughout most of history, fighting forces have been emblems of masculine virtues such as honor and martial pride. Perhaps only a generation ago, most of us never could have imagined our military becoming a female dominated institution, but today it looks entirely possible. A generation before that we likely wouldn't have thought of higher education as destined to be majority female either, but that isn't so much of a stretch.

Most women who are interested in male institutions flock to them because that's where attractive men can be found. Although there are other motives, the sexual instinct is probably the strongest for the majority of females. However, there is more to it than that. Feminists (including some men), have a deeply held resentment of male institutions, and seek to supplant the men who created and run them. The average female soldier is simply cannon-fodder in their scheme, but crucial nonetheless.

Typically, female infiltration of male institutions begins with demands that men change and become more "enlightened," or whatever the catch-phrase of the day happens to be. Female characteristics are held to be at least as good if not superior to male, and the conformist impulse that manifests itself so strongly in the female sex starts to exert pressure on the males to "be more like girls." Masculinity is first disapproved of, then pathologized and finally criminalized. For normal men, it is suffocating and intolerable.

This is exactly what is happening in the armed forces, and if we look back over the years it's apparent it has been ongoing for quite some time. We are finally in the criminalization stage, with rape being widely claimed to be an epidemic in the armed forces.

A new documentary, "The Invisible War," suggests that the US military is characterized by a pervasive, hidden rape culture. According to the trailer, hundreds of thousands of rapes have occurred in the military, and rapists are given a free pass. Some one in five women is supposedly sexually assaulted in the military. According to the director, the conviction rate when accusations are made is only a dismal 5% (usually this suggests excessive prosecution).

If you take these kinds of documentaries and political campaigns at face value, you'd have to assume that several rapes are in progress on any large military base at any given moment.

Given that women are not necessary for military operations, this brings up the question of what they are doing in uniform in the first place if their presence leads to mass rape, but this would be to ignore the point of feminism.

Dalrock recently wrote a piece about women in the military, suggesting that envy is a strong force that motivates feminists. I've read some interesting work by conservative Catholics suggesting the same, and F. Roger Devlin points to it as well:

> A feminist in the strict and proper sense may be defined as a woman who envies the male role.
> By the male role I mean, in the first place, providing, protecting, and guiding rather than nurturing and assisting. This in turn involves relative independence, action, and competition in the larger impersonal society outside the family, the use of language for communication and analysis (rather than expressiveness or emotional manipulation), and deliberate behavior aiming at objective achievement (rather than the attainment of pleasant subjective states) and guided by practical reasoning (rather than emotional impulse).
> Both feminist and nonfeminist women sense that these characteristically male attributes have a natural primacy over their own. I prefer to speak of "primacy" rather than superiority in this context since both sets of traits are necessary to propagate the race. One sign of male primacy is that envy of the female role by men is virtually > nonexistent — even, so far as I know, among homosexuals.

> Normal women are attracted to male traits and wish to partner with a man who possesses them. Healthy societies are marked by a cooperative reciprocity between the sexes, but an unequal one in the sense that it involves male leadership of the female, somewhat as in ballroom dancing.
> The feminists' response to the primacy of male traits, on the other hand, is a feeling of inadequacy in regard to men — a feeling ill-disguised by defensive assertions of her "equality." She desires to possess masculinity directly, in her own person, rather than partnering with a man. That is what leads her into the spiritual cul de sac of envy.
> And perhaps even more than she envies the male role itself, the feminist covets the external rewards attached to its successful performance: social status, recognition, power, wealth, and the chance to control wealth directly (rather than be supported). She tends not to give much thought to the great mass of men who struggle to fulfill the demands of their role without ever attaining the rewards of superior performance.

I think Devlin makes a good point, but most women are not feminists in that sense. For young women joining the military, the sense of belonging to an esteemed organization and culture combined with access to powerful males provides the motivation for enlistment.

When it turns out that military culture and objectives aren't exactly what the young enlistee's feminine mind thought they were, she may experience something of a crisis. Her natural instincts to find a man and settle into the role of mother are frustrated by her duties in her new position. Perhaps she falls in love, gives in to lust, or gets involved with a married superior. Maybe she just wants to be treated as the center of attention – a natural female impulse – and uses her sexuality for that purpose.

For women, this kind of thing can easily lead to a feeling of having been violated. She may wonder: "why aren't these soldiers and officers treating me like the lady I am?" When she feels she's been used and treated like a common whore, it's entirely possible that she could believe some of her sexual experiences were rape, even if, technically speaking, they were not.

This kind of manufactured failure and resentment combined with feminist envy are toxic to institutions such as the armed forces, and are exactly the result that should be expected when women are introduced into traditionally male spaces. Not only does the resentment provide political support to feminists, but the implication of widespread sexual misconduct provides a weapon with which to attack the heart of the institution, and this is exactly what is happening. In a bid to deliver the military into their hands, feminists are painting it as a haven for criminals of the vilest sort. The only solution can be more submission to feminists, more concessions, more money, and more power. The idealistic young men who join to defend our country and constitution (and the weaker among us, including women), will go elsewhere. Another male space will have been compromised, and our country will be weaker for it.

What we have to finally get over is this notion that there's anything "progressive" about eliminating sex distinctions in all institutions. Male spaces and male institutions have driven most of our civilization's progress, and eliminating them will only lead to disintegration. Cooperation with women is all well and good, and the sexes should be complementary, but if masculinity is not allowed to express itself in its pure form we will lose a great deal.

At this point it seems inevitable that a great many institutions will be compromised, but perhaps it was about time we learned an old lesson all over again. Our mortality may make us forgetful, but it gives us endless possibilities for reinvention. Finally, it seems that a rediscovery of the value of male spaces has begun to take hold in the men's movement, and perhaps soon we will see a revitalized masculinity free from the restraints of a moribund society.

Thought of the Day

W.F. Price · 10 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've been dwelling on the concept of male spaces for the last day or so (and intend to keep it on my mind for a while), and I came up with an idea concerning the gamer/PUA community that's a bit counterintuitive, but I think probably on target.

When some people think of PUA and game communities, writers, and practitioners, they write them off as "pussy-beggars" or overly obsessed with women. However, it occurred to me that the seduction and game communities are about as overwhelmingly male as they get. There is not one single female who has the slightest bit of credibility as a PUA (For obvious reasons), and I think this explains a good part of the allure of the culture.

PUA/Game is a re-emergence of the hunter/warrior societies of the past, and brings men together in a common purpose. Not all men approve of the purpose, but there's no doubt that it's an overwhelmingly male endeavor, in which men cooperate and compete to achieve a goal.

As much as some deplore the results of successful Game, there's an astonishing level of altruism amongst the proponents and adherents. There's nothing men compete for and fight over more than women, but here we have a community of men helping each other in the pursuit of finding satisfaction with a female. I would suggest that men see it for what it is, and take heart in the fact that even when stripped of all legal privileges and placed in a socially subordinate position, men band together and help each other achieve their goals.

Illegal Speech Trends (In the US)

W.F. Price · 11 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

For some reason, a lot of people don't have a clear understanding of US law concerning speech. Many seem to think we have full free speech, while others think so-called "hate speech" is illegal. Neither is true, but there are restrictions on speech that people ought to be aware of.

First, we have libel, slander and copyright violations. This kind of speech is not generally criminal (although criminal defamation does exist in some states), but tortious, meaning you can be sued if you engage in it. Libel and slander, which fall under the rubric of "defamation," involve printing (former) or uttering (latter) damaging lies about others. For example, if a feminist were to write that you were a rapist and you had never been convicted of rape you might have a libel case against that feminist. However, in the United States it is difficult to successfully sue for libel or slander, as the standards are quite high.

Copyright violations are simply theft of intellectual property. If you appropriate someone else's work for profit or self-aggrandizement, you open yourself to a copyright suit.

Criminal speech is essentially divided into two categories: anti-government threats and threats against everyone else, with the anti-government threats traditionally taken far more seriously.

Much of the case law regarding criminal speech comes from the beginning of the 20th century, when the Western world was in a great deal of political ferment. Some new laws, including "criminal anarchy," were passed in response. Criminal anarchy is the advocacy of the violent overthrow of the US government by force of arms or assassination of executives. This law remains on the books, and is punishable by up to 20 years in prison and loss of citizenship.

Of course, if you threaten the President, that is also a crime (class D felony). Same goes for other elected federal officials, but the Secret Service is a lot more vigorous about investigating presidential threats than others.

In recent years, in the wake of 9/11, a number of laws revolving around the concept of "terroristic threats" were passed, ostensibly to "fight terrorism," but for the most part they have been used to prosecute or enhance punishments against people who (allegedly) threaten ordinary citizens.

Laws against terroristic threats are a significant departure from earlier precedent that governed speech, because the standard appears to have changed. It used to be that threats were illegal only if the threatened violence was both imminent and likely, but under terroristic threat laws "causing fear" is enough to get someone arrested. Additionally, in a number of states the threat does not even need to be verbal, but rather can be communicated by "innuendo" or body language (e.g. pointing a forefinger with thumb raised as in shooting at someone).

So, as we can see, speech that causes fear of bodily harm (or is claimed to do so) is generally considered unprotected, which is a significant departure from prior standards.

Therefore, if someone threatens to cause you bodily harm in an unspecific – and even improbable – way, the fact that it made you feel uneasy is enough to warrant arrest should police choose to act on a call. Interestingly, I've received a few of these threats over email, but haven't reported them, as they were obviously bullshit, but I suppose I could have.

If one does a cursory news search on "terroristic threats" many of the cases appear to involve the mentally ill, drunks, and domestic disputes. The last category, of course, concerns us, because the standard for arrest is so ridiculously low that a mere verbal argument with accompanying gestures could easily result in an arrest, naturally of the male. And, of course, women can simply lie about it, and be safe in the knowledge that they will never be prosecuted for making a false accusation, because the language in the law is sufficiently vague that it would be difficult to prove malicious intent (feeling scared is a subjective mental state).

It's pretty clear that we do not have "free" speech in the US, but we do have a lot of protections, even if they have eroded significantly in the past 15 or so years. However, as in so many other aspects of our society, we have the least freedom in the domestic sphere. We have far more leeway in making political speech, but even there clear, credible "imminent lawless action" threats are not OK, and the punishment for making them can be quite severe. When it comes down to it, one should avoid making any threats, but unfortunately even that cannot protect you in a domestic situation.

So, when you talk about "free speech," keep in mind that it doesn't really exist.

The Suddenly Radioactive 'Have it All' Promise

Featured Guest · 11 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Aych

Has anyone else noticed that feminists now seem to be backing-away in disgust from the phrase "have it all"?

Across both side of the Atlantic, ass-covering duck-and-cover articles have recently appeared from normally-stalwart and unapologetic feminist authors in Salon, The Independent, and elsewhere.

There once was a time in the past, perhaps a decade ago, when feminists seemed to have no problem whatsoever with being continuously associated with three little words that would later come to haunt the movement:

"Have it all."

Now, it seems, feminists wish to say feminism has nothing to do with the concept WHATSOEVER.

What a stunning volte-face, is it not? What a sharp turn of events, eh? It's reminiscent of how the CPUSA stopped endorsing the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact one day after the start of Operation Barbarossa.

Now, suddenly, "Have it hall" has nothing to do with feminism whatsoever.

Exhibit A: Rebecca Traister, one of Salon.com's most reliable gender warriors:

"…my proposal is this: We should immediately strike the phrase "have it all" from the feminist lexicon and never, ever use it again.

Here is what is wrong, what has always been wrong, with equating feminist success with "having it all": It's a misrepresentation of a revolutionary social movement. The notion that female achievement should be measured by women's ability to "have it all" recasts a righteous struggle for greater political, economic, social, sexual and political parity as a piggy and acquisitive project."

This sounds oddly stung, hurt and defensive, does it not? Almost as if she's realized that such a pledge can never be delivered.

Well, to paraphrase the bald-headed hard-ass "Stinger" from the movie "Top Gun:" Feminists' egos have been writing checks their bodies can't cash.

And, really, when you think about it, "Have it all" encapsulates one of the many ludicrous long-made promises that feminism can never bring to fruition.

Feminism says: If only men would stop being oppressive bastards, women could earn 23 cents more on the job! Without working harder, longer or differently!

Feminism swears up and down: If only men would do half of all the housework, women would be be free to become SuperMom, CEOs!

Feminism pledges: If only men would stop being attracted to beauty and fertility, every woman could successfully pair with wealthy, high-status men! Hypermagy for everyone!

Feminism proclaims: If only birth control pills were free, chocolate-covered peanut-brittle would rain-down from the sky!

And all women would have to do is to tilt their faces skyward, open their mouths and chew.

Well, what has become clear is that feminism has spent years promising unlimited free lunches without ever heeding the question of who would need to pick-up the tab. The reason for that is, in their view, the limitless bank account of Male Privilege is what would eventually cover that bill in the long run.

Well, sorry. Turns-out that the big treasure chest of Male Privilege won't cover it.

Well, my dears, I'm sorry to say it: People, especially lots of formerly-hoodwinked and now-grown-up women, are increasingly starting to see that these checks cannot possibly be cashed.

So how are we to comprehend these feminists who are now vehemently disavowing the easy-to-remember riposte "Have it all" which they had no discomfort with early in the last decade?

I would argue that they have started to understand that they've now been found out. They know they've been peddling snake oil all of these years. They know the false front can no longer be held-up. The raw lie has been laid bare as reality has crashed-in through the wall like an anthropomorphic Kool-Aid Pitcher.

Now that even a feminist poster-girl for success like Anna-Lousie Slaughter has caught-on to the lie? Now, feminists are now looking to duck and cover. They're putting as much distance between themselves and "Have it all" as much they humanly can.

So, just as how the chocolate rations in the novel '1984′ had always been going-up, feminism had always been against making optimistic proclamations of: "You can have it all!"

Hell, after one of your biggest lies had suddenly become exposed, wouldn't you suddenly start looking for cover?

40 years into Title IX, Women Still Prefer Figure Skating

W.F. Price · 12 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Despite decades of expensive and forceful attempts to remake women in men's image, women still display a marked preference for more feminine sports such as gymnastics and figure skating.

> A recent study conducted by Erin Whiteside (University of Tennessee) and Marie Hardin (Pennsylvania State University) explores these questions. The results, published in Communication, Culture & Critique, show that women prefer condensed sporting events like the Olympics to sports with longer seasons, and that in selecting which particular Olympic sport to watch, women often select events that are seen as traditionally "feminine," like gymnastics and figure skating.
> "Our research provides some insight into why the Olympics remain popular with women," said Hardin. "It's not just about the types of sports that are featured, although that is certainly a big part of it. It's also about the way in which the Olympics is delivered: in bite-sized chunks that may require just a 10-minute commitment to see an exciting sporting event, during a time of day when women feel they can make that commitment."
> Nearly all women surveyed expressed preference for the Olympics, for patriotic reasons as well as for the fast pace. "Women preferred the condensed style of coverage, something they described as easy to follow," Whiteside explains. The frequency of events during the Olympics, as well as the omnipresent discussion around it —from television to radio to the news—made it preferable for women who otherwise did not identify as avid sports viewers or didn't regularly have the time to devote to watching sports.
> Women in the study favored sports that were more traditionally feminine rather than masculine. Participants generally saw little value in following women's sports and were especially uninterested in watching or following women in sports such as basketball, which showcase athletic displays that challenge traditional gender roles. Rather, they expressed a passing interest in sports such as gymnastics, tennis, and figure skating."

Despite the fact that the program to turn women into amazons – men with breasts – has been a dismal failure, and rather than become more physically fit and attractive women have only become heavier, there are no signs in politics and academia of the drive to masculinize women subsiding.

However, nature doesn't care much about transient ideological fads, and no matter how hard feminists try to make it otherwise, girls will still be girls.

Another Idea on Feminist Men

W.F. Price · 13 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

If you observe genuinely feminist men, there's something a bit off about them, and it's tempting to chalk their feminism up to a result of some flaw or aberration in their character. Normal men (aside from those whose paycheck depends on it such as politicians and men who work for feminist-dominated institutions) simply don't go in for feminism unless it gets them sexual gratification, but those days are pretty much over, so the remnants tend to be an assortment of freaks and guys who have a chip on their shoulder.

So what are these guys really getting out of it?

I think I've come up with a nice explanation. The men who support feminism are exactly those men who would be on the bottom of the totem pole in a male-dominated environment. It's about relative status. If there truly were a patriarchy and male dominance in society, these men would be the "losers" that other men look down on for whatever reason. So it's in their best interests to use feminism to dismantle any masculine institutions or power wherever possible, as this gives them more relative status and power.

For them, using feminism to "deconstruct masculinity" is a way to put other men down, and to prop themselves up. Male feminism truly is about envy, perhaps even more than the female kind.

This is yet another reason that fostering and preserving male spaces is essential, as these creeps will use the rigged game of female empowerment to put us at a disadvantage, and they will have no compunction about using that leverage to do us harm. In a male space, they'll have to rely on their own merits, and that will definitely give us the upper hand.

Shameless Pandering

W.F. Price · 14 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

President Obama has staked his election hopes on women – single women in particular – and has been bashing men relentlessly in the process. It seems he and the democrats think their advantage with single women can negate his weak showing with men, both married and single. What this strategy hinges on, as far as I can tell, is also getting enough of the married female vote to carry him through. So the Democrats have begun a full-court press with feminism, hoping that they have enough support among women in general to help him prevail.

It could go either way. I suspect there's some diminishing return already creeping in. 2008 was probably the money year for feminism, but even then Hillary Clinton couldn't pull off a win, because men and minorities voted overwhelmingly for Obama in primaries. Actually, I'm fairly certain that if he were a white man, Obama would lose this election handily, but he has such rock-solid support from minorities that he can afford some leeway, and it looks as though his team thinks he can afford to drop the white male vote due to minority support.

There's been some outrage in the androsphere lately regarding his recent op-ed on Title IX, which celebrates the decline of men in college enrollment. Although I don't personally see that as such a tragedy (I think too many people are in college as it is), his support for using Title IX to manipulate enrollment in STEM programs is a pretty clear threat to a number of young men and parents, as that's often the only hope they have for getting sons into college and giving them a shot at a decent career. If implemented, it will have a real, detrimental effect on hundreds of thousands – if not millions – of young men in the US. In all likelihood, it will also disproportionately affect Asians as well, as they are overrepresented in STEM.

Here's the part of the op-ed that ought to give us pause:

> Today, thanks in no small part to the confidence and determination they developed through competitive sports and the work ethic they learned with their teammates, girls who play sports are more likely to excel in school. In fact, more women as a whole now graduate from college than men. This is a great accomplishment—not just for one sport or one college or even just for women but for America. And this is what Title IX is all about.

What he's doing here is sadly common in the United States today. Corporate CEOs and politicians alike have rejected any sense of long-term responsibility and are willing to wreck a good thing for short-term gain. When politicians do it, we can fairly call it "pandering," which is sort of an overused word, but appropriate in this circumstance.

Here's the definition from the Oxford English Dictionary:

> Pronunciation: /ˈpandər/
> Definition of pander
> verb
> [no object] (pander to) > gratify or indulge (an immoral or distasteful desire, need, or habit or a person with such a desire, etc.):
> newspapers are pandering to people's baser instincts
> noun
> dated
> a pimp.
> archaic a person who assists the baser urges or evil designs of others:
> the lowest panders of a venal press
> Origin:

> late Middle English (as a noun): from Pandare, the name of a character in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (see Pandarus). The verb dates from the early 17th century

What's immoral about feminists' desire to handicap men in STEM? It's pretty clear: we'll all pay for it in lower standards and productivity, and there's nothing "fair" about giving women an advantage in the one remaining field they do not dominate.

It's all about supremacy, and Obama is pandering to female supremacist tendencies — just for a few more years in office. When his presidency is over and he's touring the world giving lectures, the rest of us will be paying the price for the policies he put in place.

Why Aren't Young Men Going to Church?

W.F. Price · 15 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It's a Sunday, so I thought I'd highlight one of the recent trends in "Christianity," which involves belligerent, white knight pastors belittling men in their churches. If you really want women (perhaps including your wife) to see you treated like a contemptible wuss, church is just the place for that.

Any man who would put up with the following tirade and not get up and walk out, never to return, has absolutely no self-respect:

Shaming men in front of women is about as nasty as it gets, and a pretty effective demoralizing tactic (if a woman you are with ever sets you up in that manner, e.g. invites some man to humiliate you in her presence, leave her immediately and decisively) that's all but guaranteed to make men less attractive in the eyes of any present women. Pastor Mark Driscoll and his confederates may say that the message is intended for men, but that's obviously not entirely true. He wants the women to support him, because they are the bread and butter of the church, and knows full well that they witness him treating the men in this manner. I'm sure there's a calculation in there somewhere.

The bottom line is that going to churches where you're berated for being a man makes you less attractive to women. It's a toxic culture for men who want the women in their lives to respect them, which is a condition for a woman's love, and probably contributes to the sky-high divorce rate in Evangelical churches. In fact, although you'd never hear it come out of these preachers' mouths, what they are really doing is providing an apologia for adulteresses. I'd give them the benefit of the doubt and suggest that in many cases they are not aware of this, but just as ignorance is no excuse in a secular court, according to their deity it provides no defense for sin, either; especially not for preachers:

> Luke 12:47:
> And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes.

Kids in Town

W.F. Price · 16 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

My kids have been in town for the last couple weeks, and I have about another month left before they leave. I'm really enjoying my time with them, and find myself kind of surprised how true that cliché about kids growing up fast really is. It seems like yesterday that my son was in diapers, and now he's riding his bike at full speed, swimming and running all over the place. My daughter, who used to be so tiny, is no longer so easy to pick up and put on my shoulders. They even have their own social lives at school with friends and classmates.

My arrangement is far from ideal, as I have to drive hundreds of miles per month during the school year to see the kids on too-short weekends and holidays. I miss them terribly when I go for up to a month without seeing them. You never really get over not having your kids sleep in your house every evening. It can be pretty doleful to wake up alone without the little ones to liven the place up.

However, I have it a lot better than many men, who either don't see their children at all or can't afford to see them as much as the law allows. Parenthood is an enormous part of many people's lives, and any parent that misses so much of it is deprived of one of life's most important chapters. Divorced men who are separated from their children truly live incomplete lives, and usually through no great fault of their own. Anyone who has children and doesn't feel for them must have a heart of stone.

Furthermore, even men who don't divorce are usually deprived of a great deal of time with their kids due to social expectations about the man's role. There used to be a time when work and family were not mutually exclusive, but sadly for most of us that is no longer the case. In fact, if my ex still lived in Seattle I'd probably have more quality time with my kids as a divorced man than your typical married guy. When faced with the threat of loss, you tend to cherish your time with the children, so you make the sacrifices necessary to be with them.

This summer, I intend to spend the rest of my time with the kids doing lots of fun things, biking, fishing, playing and going to the beach. So there may be a few gaps in the content from time to time; it's the price I pay, and it's worth it.

Perhaps the most important mission of this site, and the one about which I feel most strongly, is to bring fathers and children together. Not only is fatherhood necessary for a civilized society, but for children's well-being, and I sincerely believe that depriving children and fathers of the opportunity to know and love each other is a crime against humanity.

Corrections

First Joe caught me spelling a British term incorrectly. Usually, I try to stick with Americanisms (that's what I know), but sometimes the British terms are better for avoiding the "rough speech."

Anyway, I'm always happy to be corrected in these matters, so if you catch a similar error feel free to educate me via comments. Learning is actually fun.

Here's the comment:

> Welmer – it's "bollocks*" not bullocks.
> Ironically, bullocks are bulls that no longer have their bollocks.
> (Bollocks* in UK english = balls = cajones = testicles)

NPR: Let's Subsidize Really Bad Choices

W.F. Price · 17 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

NPR's All Things Considered featured a woman who is, apparently, both selfish and stupid, imploring listeners to support her in her conscious choice to have three kids out of wedlock with three different men, two of whom are incarcerated felons.

The woman, Jennifer Stepp, is an unattractive, overweight white female who calls herself a "victim of youthful optimism." Oh give me a break. She may not be too smart, but she knew what she was doing when she took her pants off for the only local guys who were willing to overlook her obesity. She says she kept thinking "the relationships would last," but I'd be willing to bet this woman never had an exclusive relationship with any one of the guys she slept with. In other words, she chose to deliberately get pregnant by the most expedient method possible: sleeping with ghetto criminals looking for a quick, easy lay. Maybe she said she was on the pill, too, but we'll never hear the other side of the story.

A lot of people still somehow believe these women are "victims," and think they simply were too dumb to make "the right choice." Bollocks. Just because she's a white woman doesn't mean she didn't see how the game works. You have kids, you qualify for WIC, TANF, Section 8 housing, etc. She was acting in her own interest. She deliberately created a family (sort of), headed solely by her, and is getting "help" from the government in doing so. Essentially, she's getting paid to have illegitimate children.

Stepp says she makes just under $9 per hour. Yeah, that's pretty low, but her job is probably very easy, and with all the subsidies, tax refunds and EIC she might as well be making three times that much (e.g. her publicly-funded NGO employer pays half her rent, subsidizes her college tuition and gives her free daycare). After taxes, child support payments and other add-ons, middle-income divorced fathers would be lucky to be doing as well as she is.

Fortunately, the comment section under the article demonstrates that people have caught on, and aren't buying the pity play any longer.

Twenty years ago, people would have been howling for the heads of the suckers who impregnated this woman (almost certainly unintentionally). Now, they don't even bother. Things have changed.

Parody?

Some months ago, the Good Men Project put up an article about how good feminist women are at fellatio, and how feminists perform it on tons of men. I'm surprised I missed it back then, but I was pretty busy at the time. When I first read it, I thought it must be a parody of some sort, but apparently the author, Jennifer Hollie Bowles, is quite sincere.

When I read women making these kinds of pronouncements, I can't help but feel a bit embarrassed for them. I'm not sure whether they are aware that performing sex acts on huge numbers of men isn't usually a good selling point for females. Even whores, who outdo heterosexual feminists in this regard, are usually pretty discreet about their business volume.

Here are a couple excerpts:

> Not only do feminists get to suck dicks that are qualitatively better, but they also execute the sucking of dick better than their anti-feminist and non-feminist counterparts. Feminists get to suck better dicks because they're not just choosy about wanting intellectual, successful, and respectful men. They want it all, including magnificent lovers, and in fact, they demand it all.
> For all of you who say feminists are ugly, evil, lesbians, let's just say that my feminist friends and I have had more dick than your anti-feminist cousins and grandmas ever dreamed about, and some of us even shave our pussies, dye our hair, and wear make-up. In fact, the feminists I know, including me, are hot as hell, and I'm not even lesbian.
> Feminists aren't afraid to deep-throat that dick and own it, without feeling like a whore because a feminist chooses wisely who to fuck, who to suck, and who to make love to and keep after she's weeded out all of the losers.

Who said feminists had no class?

One of the arguments for harshly punishing “deadbeat dads” is to deter illegitimacy and unwanted pregnancies. The logic goes something like this:

> If you make an example of enough men, it will deter men from impregnating those poor, helpless daughters of God and burdening the rest of us with the associated costs.

However, any game warden would see a monstrous flaw in this argument. The flaw is that it only takes a few males to impregnate the entire herd. As much as you punish the men, there will always be some that are too stupid, too careless or too wasted to heed the warning (and do you really want those guys to be the only fathers?).

In game management, controlling the population is a fairly simple matter. When there are too many deer, the state encourages people to hunt does. When there are few, does are off limits. It’s very effective, because fewer does means fewer fawns, whereas the number of bucks has far less impact on total fertility.

So, if you want to prevent single motherhood and associated social pathologies, you’ll get a lot more bang for your buck if you aim the disincentives at the females. Punish the men, and you’ll just get more of the same.

I’m sure there’s enough legal talent in our country to find innovative, female-targeted deterrents (and perhaps incentives) that are neither inhumane nor punitive toward existing children, so it’s time for our policymakers to get to work and deal with the problem.

Zimmerman accused of molestation by “witness 9,” HUH?!

Featured Guest · 18 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Glorius Bastard

This article here addresses an issue that I cannot believe. How can a person be picked supposedly “at random” for jury duty be the very person that Zimmerman abused for so long? Honestly, sounds a little to coincidental to me? Also, “witness 9″ thinks he hates black people if they “don’t act white.” Somehow, the prosecutors let this one slip! I do not believe that they can possibly believe that, if they do, it would be diligent of them to release said evidence ASAP! Of course, we all remember the brouhaha-ha from the “black leaders” as Jackson and Sharpton love to be known as. Let’s not forget how NBC botched the voice recordings a few months ago for publicity. These assholes don’t care if an innocent man gets killed! No more than they care if a troubled young man is let through divorce, and left adrift on our moral landscape. Apparently his parents did not care too much either, they got the “rights” to his name!

However, if Zimmerman got killed I suspect three things would have happened. We never would have heard about it, Obama would not say his imaginary kids looks like that, and Zimmerman would have been called a Latino; NOT white! Surprise, surprise, once again I hear good ol’Rahmie’s saying of “never let a good crisis go to waste” ringing in my ear again. Stuff like this is catnip for high level politicians, and the bottom feeding DA’s who wish to make senator from their state.

Here is a video from the WSJ on the topic of evidence, not including Zimmerman’s alleged sexual encounters with “witness 9.”:

The fact of the matter is we all have good reason to hold on for the facts, and be diligent in searching for them! Because all of the news agencies, Obama and his staff, Sharpton, Jackson, and several leaders of the black community; including the always fun to deal with black version of the KKK, the Black Panthers:

Look, with all the hysteria that has gone on, and the race motivated murders that have been perpetuated against innocent white people simply because some dumb kid wanted to prove a point:

Are taking their toll on us! All of us! There is only so much one can take. Black on black crime has been on a steady rise, yet no one is allowed to say anything because it has been made socially taboo. Even worse, the government does nothing about it, and says even less about the black on white crime that has been terrifyingly increasing for the last 5-10 years. As for me I don’t care! The fact that I worked with people of every stripe, in several areas of the world, will not disbar me from having to make a disclaimer before I talk about a topic! Why? It is only because I’m white. Before I say anything I have to debase myself with some lengthy tirade about how I am not some monster white dude from the past, and then say sugar and spice, and everything nice about how all black people are not this or that? Well, I got news for ya, all black people are not that way, but enough of them are that it is a major problem. I don’t hear Obama fixating on that, only when a white guy (not part Latino) defends himself does he bring the threat of the full weight of the law with him! And now, he hates black people who don’t act white according to some nameless moron who “conveniently” got jury duty, and is claiming George “red stripes” Zimmerman did the naughty with her since she was a little girl? Yeah, I guess since they could not find “unbiased, non media listening types for the jury on this case, they resorted to clearing them from insane asylums; NICE!

I worked with a few minorities who said they would like to move by me, because we don’t have any of the problems they grew up with. Said they would shout “hey Bastardo, guess who is moving next to you, and come hug me? LOL Honestly, I don't care, I just said I hope they won't be offended if I move after my property values depreciate too much? They laughed and said that's cool, their families could buy it from me! Hahahahahaha

To be fair, nothing about this case is simple, or easy, and one witness in the case is dead; unable to defend himself. Considering they found traces of marijuana in his system, and the scars on Zimmerman's body, I doubt it would have gone well for him?! However, several people around the country would be both A. ALIVE, and B. not in prison for a hate crime; oh yeah, it was just murder supposedly I guess when it is black on white! It is not racially motivated right away when forty black kids jump a white guy screaming "Trayvon?" I guess they need to get "more evidence?"

This whole thing sucks! This alone would be enough for me to impeach any president in my mind. When you fixate on a guy of another color who at least seems like he defended himself, while completely ignoring how those of your race are destroying each other at percentages unparalleled by other races; you have got mental problems. I will not be voting for this guy, and I will be buying guns. At least when I have been forced against my will, and constitutional rights, by the media jury; I will at least have a chance to see my family from time to time. Like they say, 12 is better than 6! I wish Trayvon's parents would have taught him that.

Does not matter what color the dead look like!

Comment Vacation

W.F. Price · 19 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Since I'm spending time with my kids and trying to enjoy the summer, I've decided to sacrifice the open comments so that I can have quality time with family and still have enough left over to write posts. I also simply want to be in a decent mood around the kids, and that's hard when I've got people violating the comment policy both openly and in spirit.

So for the next week or so, all comments will be on moderation and I'll only let those through that are intelligent and add to the conversation. Choices will be arbitrary by necessity.

For those who prefer open comments, I'm sorry, but it doesn't take many rotten apples to ruin the barrel, and we've had plenty lately.

Jewish Feminist: Holocaust Survivors "Judenscheiss"

W.F. Price · 21 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

We often see white nationalists claiming that feminism is a Jewish invention cleverly designed to attack the white race. If Jews could get white women to hate being mothers and wives, the reasoning goes, then white people will be bred out of existence. A number of people seem to fervently believe this, and think that if only we could erase pernicious Jewish influence white women would magically transform into the angels that animate their febrile fantasies.

Well, sorry folks, but modern political feminism started before the Jews were even emancipated in the UK. When Abigail Adams pushed John Adams to grant suffrage to women shortly after the American Revolution, does anyone think there was some fiendish rabbi whispering in her ear? To assume that women need Jews to tell them to ask for more than they already have is to demonstrate the darkest ignorance about the nature of women.

The psychic forces that contribute to feminism are always simmering under the surface of human society, so feminism will easily emerge under the right conditions. Women will leverage their sexuality for political favoritism when the opportunity arises, just as men will use their political power for access to women when they get the chance. Feminism is simply a politicized form of prostitution whereby women gain favors and privileges en masse by virtue of being sexually desired by men, and nothing else. This is why, year after year, feminists can get away with the spectacularly self-serving and obvious lie that their material accomplishments are so meager because men didn't "give them the opportunity" (i.e. give them more money, power, etc.).

In the following article, titled "Breaking Bad Karma*," a Jewish feminist who writes for Jezebel goes on a really nasty rant about her grandparents' generation, essentially calling them moral degenerates and spiritually sick. She uses AMC's Breaking Bad to draw a comparison between Jews and Walt, the show's meth-cook protagonist:*

> I wondered if anyone had alerted Hitler that in the event that the final solution didn't pan out, only the handful of Jews who actually fulfilled the stereotype of the Judenscheisse (because every group has a few) would remain to carry on the Jewish race—conniving, indestructible, taking and taking. My grandparents were not excluded from this suspicion. The same year, during a family dinner conversation about Terri Schiavo, my father made the serious request that should he fall into a vegetative state, he would like for us to keep him on life support indefinitely. Today he and I are estranged for a number of other reasons that are all somehow the same reason.
> …Walt and Breaking Bad express one of our most inherent psychological fallacies: the ability to do any number of consciously reprehensible things while persisting in considering ourselves the protagonist at all times. From world wars to breaking hearts, we cling to the destruction done to us in the past as a justification for the destruction we will cause in the future.

The above is no different from the Anglo feminist who spouts hateful nonsense in a gender studies class about the "evil Christian patriarchy"; you know, the one that nurtured her and built the institutions she uses to denounce her kinsmen. Or the Irish Catholic feminist, like Mary Daly, who does her best to undermine her folk and religion. Or the black feminist, like Oprah, who funds some of the most awful fictional portrayals of black men out there today. There are so many examples that it would be easy to fill a page off the top of my head if I went on.

Feminists can't help but try to tear down their own people, no matter who they are. It's a shameful impulse, but so common that anyone who is familiar with it can instantly recognize the pattern. The reason for this behavior is that the tribe demands sacrifices from its women that they often don't want to make. Under ethnocentrism of any sort, which is and has always been the human norm, women have an obligation to be good wives and mothers; not to kill their children, fool around with the strangers, have fun at the community's expense, etc. However, lots of women – especially feminists – really feel resentful about this. So what do they do? Naturally, they trash their tribe in an effort to provide a justification for not doing their duty. When feminists attack their own people, it is just a means to rationalize their disobedience and lack of loyalty. They don't need anyone to convince them to feel this way, because it's human nature to be selfish, and no women – not even Jewish ones – are immune from that tendency.

Fathers of Daughters

By Lyn87

Full disclosure: I have no daughters. In fact, I have no children at all, so I am not speaking from personal experience – just laying out my observations. But as an "outsider" I have observed guys who have daughters, and sometimes their conduct leaves me scratching my head in confusion.

About two weeks ago I made a post about the guys I work with. What puzzled me was the degree to which they defer to their wives. And by defer, I do not mean that they are doormats, or even disagree with their wives a lot: but the fact that their wives have the veto authority in their marriages, and that the guys subordinate their desires – and judgment – to keep their wives happy. THAT is the ultimate test of who wears the pants in the family – and these guys willingly admit that their wives have the final say. Not only are they not ashamed to admit to what amounts to "wearing the skirts" in their families, but they assume that is the natural order of things. The blue pill is so pervasive that, in a real sense, they don't even realize that they ARE wearing the skirts.

Not that I care: they all seem happy with their arrangements and far be it from me to tell them how to live their lives – I just find it curious. But that's background information, not the central point of this piece.

Since I made that post I went on a trip with the guys on my team (we live in different places and only see each other when we go on the road). We were sampling the local cuisine and the conversation included vacation stories, financial plans, politics, family, work, relationships… the usual stuff guys talk about over a couple of brews. One guy has teenage daughters that he's planning to put through college. I could not resist inserting some red pill into the mix, so I mentioned that 60% of degrees were going to women, and that women prefer to marry up. Since "educated" women don't often go for "uneducated" men, a lot of women of his daughter's generation were on their way toward spinsterhood for lack of "suitable" mates.

He's a smart guy and the implication for his daughters was obvious. He even acknowledged the truth of it. But his response was, "I'm still glad it's not the way it used to be."

I get it: he's proud of his kids. Why not? They're doing well academically (as they should: as girls the entire education system is geared toward their success). They stay out of serious trouble. He wants what is best for them. Even as a non-parent I understand all that.

What is disheartening about it is that he does not see the connection between "it's not the way it used to be" and "a lot of women of his daughter's generation are on their way toward spinsterhood." The blue pill is EVERYWHERE. I'm nearly convinced that some malevolent group of "Jezebels" is dissolving blue pills into the supply of drinking water.

Consider his daughters. I'm sure they are good kids who would make any parent proud. But they don't live on an island – they live among their peers and within the confines of biological and demographic reality. Even if EVERY one of their male college classmates marries one of his female classmates, a third of those young women will not find a male age-peer who is even her "academic equal," much less someone with a higher level of education. But not every male graduate will marry a female classmate. Some will marry down. Some will choose not marry at all. Then subtract out the guys who are "creepy," gay, or otherwise unsuitable, and we are left with a generation of "educated" women who are barreling toward a demographic wall at high velocity.

Marry up? My buddy's daughters will be lucky if they can marry "across." Many women of that generation will face hard choices: supply and demand in the adult world doesn't much care how "empowered" you were in college. The women of that generation may be able to marry down, but few will want to. They may not marry at all and become wards of the state when they bear bastard children. They may become involuntary childless spinsters. They may go for much older men, but many of them have been through the Family Court meat grinder and must devote much of their effort to paying their exes' bills.

We know the score here: the degrees these girls are getting cluster in the "Who are you trying to kid?" category. They are not truly superior to the guys of their generation, but that degree in "You Must Be Joking!" makes them think they are. Most emerge from college with a pile of debt, no marketable skills they didn't already possess in high school, and a few laps around the carousel – older but no wiser, and blissfully unaware that half of their years of prime beauty and fertility are already in the rear-view mirror.

Once upon a time fathers could and often would look after their daughter's futures. Guys like my buddy still try to do that, but the blue pill is so pervasive that he thinks "get them into a good college" is the biggest part of looking after their futures.

These are not the usual "failures in waiting:" girls raised by slutty (but heroic!) single mothers. These girls come from a good two-parent family that values education and achievement. And, thanks to feminism, the odds are even stacked against them.

But hey, at least it's not like it used to be.

Altruism, Spite and Heroism

W.F. Price · 23 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As James Holmes' killing spree in a Colorado movie theater is the talk of the nation, a number of reports are emerging concerning the heroic actions of at least three young men, who died protecting their loved ones. All three were killed while shielding their girlfriends from bullets, and given that Holmes was using 5.56mm NATO spec ammunition, which fragments on impact rather than passing clean through its target, quite probably saved the women's and other people's lives.

Some MRAs lament the fact that when faced with danger, men so willingly give up their lives for those they are attached to, while others are upset that women don't have any appreciation for this sacrifice. I noted in Saturday's post that women do not always like the personal sacrifices they are called on to make on behalf of the tribe, but there are unpleasant sacrifices expected from men as well. And these sacrifices are not demanded only by society, but apparently our own biology. In other words, our instincts sometimes compel us to sacrifice ourselves.

From a simple, individualistic point of view, this doesn't make sense. Why sacrifice oneself, thereby denying the opportunity to spread one's seed and propagate one's genes?

It's a bit complicated, but it turns out that it does make sense from a genetic standpoint. When I read the stories of the young men who gave up their lives, I thought of the Price equation, developed by George Price (not a close relative of mine) at the Galton Laboratory in the late 60s after he switched careers in middle age to become a theoretical biologist.

Dr. Price was a curious fellow who must have thought a great deal about these issues, because after developing a theoretical basis for altruism he experienced a religious awakening, abandoned his strongly-held atheism and subsequently gave all he had to London's poor. When he had nothing left to give, he became despondent and took his own life. Perhaps the implications of his work disturbed him, and he couldn't accept that the roots of human goodness can be regarded as fundamentally selfish from an evolutionary point of view.

Forgotten for decades, Price was brought back to public attention by Oren Harman's book The Price of Altruism: George Price and the Search for the Origins of Kindness.

Although the evolution of altruism was not the only thing covered by the Price equation, it is probably the most compelling to laymen, and is most relevant to the point at hand. What this part of the equation does is provide a model for how altruism can actually propagate an individual's genes despite harming him or even ending his life. This is accomplished by saving those who are closely related, and thereby preserving one's genes in others through self-sacrifice. Naturally, social creatures such as humans are more likely to display altruistic behavior, as the opportunity for self-sacrifice on behalf of others arises far more frequently than in animals such as snakes.

So, apparently we have evolved to be altruistic, especially toward kin. However, the other side of the coin is something known as "Hamiltonian spite" (theorist W.D. Hamilton was one of Price's colleagues), which suggests that there is a genetic advantage to harming those who are less closely related than average, even if it costs the individual to do so.

In nature, spite often takes the form of destruction of another's young. When a new stallion takes over a herd, for example, he will sometimes kill the previous sire's foals. Lions are known to engage in similar behavior, and it appears to be at work in humans as well, as a single mother's new boyfriend is statistically far more likely to murder her children than their biological father [feminists often conflate the two to make biological fathers appear more dangerous than they truly are, and new sex partners safer].

One could also make the argument that mass murder, such as that committed by James Holmes, can be motivated by Hamiltonian spite; that is, it is in one's genetic best interest to destroy those who are unrelated if it provides a selective advantage to one's kin. Perhaps the best known example of this can be found in the Bible in Judges 16, where Samson brings the roof down on himself and the Philistines, avenging himself and destroying his people's enemies:

> 27 Now the house was full of men and women; and all the lords of the Philistines were there; and there were upon the roof about three thousand men and women, that beheld while Samson made sport.
> 28 And Samson called unto the Lord, and said, O Lord God, remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O God, that I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for my two eyes.
> 29 And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up, of the one with his right hand, and of the other with his left.
> 30 And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and upon all the people that were therein. So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life.
> 31 Then his brethren and all the house of his father came down, and took him, and brought him up, and buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol in the buryingplace of Manoah his father. And he judged Israel twenty years.

Samson, of course, was the pre-eminent Hebrew hero, as Herakles – another notorious manslayer – was for the Greeks. His final act of malice did not tarnish his reputation, but rather enhanced it. He exemplifies the duality of heroism as understood by humans: on the one hand selfless and magnanimous, and on the other a terrible foe. And yet there is no contradiction, because Samson fulfills his duties to his people.

In the great scheme of nature, we men are actors in the struggle to preserve our families, our nations and even humanity. It is not a role that must be imposed upon us, but rather one that comes naturally, just as the sacrifice of motherhood comes naturally to women.

And just as there are pleasant and unpleasant aspects of female behavior, the same is true of male.

The lesson that I would like to impart here is that so often, the noblest and the meanest of our traits spring from the same source and ultimately serve the same purpose. The feminists and their allies will point to flaws in the male character, suggesting that man must be fundamentally changed for the world to be a better place. Some men deplore our compulsion to sacrifice ourselves. But when it comes down to it, we are carrying out the will of the collective, and the choices we make are not, as it turns out, always our own.

However, rather than let this revelation undermine our faith in ourselves and science as George Price apparently did, perhaps we can find some solace in the notion that nature itself contains a wisdom and intelligence greater than our own.

More on Altruism: Responses to Commenters

W.F. Price · 24 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of the nice things about the slower pace of comments over the last few days is that I can respond meaningfully to commenters more often than before, and today I have a good opportunity to do that.

A number of commenters took issue with yesterday's post about altruism and heroism. Some, like George, read it as an endorsement of self-sacrifice on behalf of women:

> George
> Heroism and its promotion, as this article does, goes against the MRM. We're not just fighting the unfair legal system brought on by women or the culture that demonizes men, but also the view of men as disposable utilities, and the role of men as protectors-providers (for women, they still need to do it for their children however).
> Heroism may have been useful in the distant past, but now it has become completely toxic for men to fetishize their own destruction. They're destroying themselves for women, their legal superiors, who don't give two shits about them and who will go on to live their lives and boyfriends will be one boyfriend in a long series of boyfriends, guys they dated a long time ago. While on the other hand, the young men DIED!
> On the point of promoting heroism, this article is completely misguided.

As the writer, it's my job to make myself understood, so I'll start by pointing out that the post was not an attempt to promote, glorify or endorse white knightery. Rather, it was simply intended to point out that self-sacrifice is rooted in our biology; it is a fundamental part of masculine nature.

Tom47 questions whether this is even true, and suggests that it is a social construct:

> …There is no evidence that male primates ever defend females or make any sacrifices for them and it's just as likely that females fight over males as males fight over females. White Knighting is a "social construct", a way to make men "useful".

The benefits of altruistic acts are not limited to females, but nor are they excluded. Throughout history, men have probably sacrificed themselves more frequently on behalf of other males. It is my hunch that the high level of altruism displayed by humans, particularly males, developed as a result of the cooperative hunt.

Hunting megafauna with spears is a very hazardous occupation. Like commercial crabbing and wildcatting, both the risk and reward are high. In the Paleolithic Era, humans lived and provided for themselves in small bands of closely related kin. In general, men hunted while women gathered and processed food. Men who were on the hunt were typically closely related. Brother hunted with brother, father with son, cousin with cousin; this is the basis for patrilocality. When the tribe got to a certain size, it would split and separate bands would go their own way, ensuring that it remained this way.

If two brothers were hunting together, and while in pursuit were surprised by an angry, wounded aurochs, a situation could arise in which one took on the beast, allowing the other to survive and taking the brunt of the punishment in the process. If the sacrifice hadn't been made, both would be quickly trampled in turn as they tried to flee the swift, powerful animal, and more of the genes unique to that family would be lost. Wolves often do this on their hunts, putting their lives on the line so that the other pack members can survive. In fact, it is precisely this quality that led to wolves' domestication and eventual status as man's best friend, as altruistic cooperation characterizes the hunting tactics of both species.

This also explains why men are more prone to self-sacrifice than women. Women didn't hunt. In humans, unlike most other predators, hunting is a sex-specific behavior. Our species is designed that way, so the traits that are helpful for hunting are overwhelmingly concentrated in men. The clearest evidence of this is in our physiques, but it also shows up in mental characteristics such as higher spatial ability. In women, some of these hunting-specific behavioral traits would probably decrease genetic fitness as they have associated costs, so they tend not to be expressed in females. Hence men are braver, more selfless and far more likely to die on behalf of others.

But no, it is not a quality intended to benefit only females — not by a longshot. No more so than the human female's costly and hazardous pregnancy and labor is intended to benefit only males. It is simply a human adaptation designed to propagate the genome. Evidently, it has been a very effective one.

Commenter piercedhead really got the point of the post:

"Know Thyself!" said the ancient Greek philosophers, repeating Delphi's maxim. If we know our nature, we can better prepare ourselves to deal with the world. Rather than fight it or deny it, we can accommodate it. We can choose to whom our beneficence should extend by associating with those we truly care about, and those who will appreciate it.

We may not have much control over whether selflessness is in our nature, but in most circumstances we do have the opportunity to decide who to apply it to. In the case of the Aurora shooting, the young men didn't have time to think about what they were doing, but that kind of violence is a very, very rare occurrence. Because the circumstances were so exceptional and the emergency so sudden, we had the opportunity to see the stuff men are really made of. However, a man is far more likely to find himself on the receiving end of violence over a woman at a nightclub, and those places are pretty easy to avoid.

The real rage MRAs feel, and I share it myself, is over the exhortation to sacrifice for people who have nothing but contempt for most men. That is sheer manipulation of our instincts, along the lines of charities that show forlorn babies on TV in an effort to extract money from the purses of soft-minded old ladies. There is something truly evil about plucking on people's heartstrings to compel them to behave in a manner contrary to their own and their families' interests, and this is one of the more noxious elements of feminism and modern society in general.

If we can recognize this inner hero so many men have, and we can know ourselves and what moves us, it will make it that much more difficult for others to manipulate us, and that much easier for us to act in our interests and do good for those who truly deserve it. As conscious beings, we do have a choice, but exercising it requires both forethought and wisdom.

“Heroic” Single Moms

W.F. Price · 25 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Stories about women shoplifting and subsequently abandoning babies when caught by security have grown in frequency in recent years. Maybe they think by taking a baby on their stealing jaunts they will be immune from suspicion, and then when they get caught figure that the baby will help them get away. Or maybe they simply aren’t thinking at all.

The following video shows a mother ditching her child when caught by WalMart security, closely followed by the child’s hefty aunt, who fights off the security in the parking lot. The mother is pretty fast; you can see her running full-tilt – away from her baby – down the lot on the way to (temporary) freedom.

The two women were picked up at a local dance club partying it up a short time later.

I wonder how much more of this it will take until preachers stop carrying on about the “inherent goodness of women” and depravity of men. How much more maltreatment and neglect of children will it take before default mother custody and glorification of single motherhood finally comes into question?

What Feminism Teaches Little Girls

Bennett Gets it Wrong Again

W.F. Price · 26 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Bill Bennett decided to weigh in on the Aurora shootings and accompanying heroics, using a Hanna Rosin article as his reference point. Bennett gets it totally wrong on a number of points, which is about what you'd expect from a guy who relies on feminists to divine the motivations of young men.

First, he talks about what the men who died "believed." I don't think people have time to examine their beliefs when confronted by a man with an assault rifle in a crowded, dark theater. In these situations, you don't think so much as act. The young men who shielded their girlfriends were simply doing what came naturally to them. One man, a guy who ran for it, had different instincts. However, if you asked him what he "believed," he may well have given the same answer as the dead men. Beliefs don't count for much in times of crisis, which I suppose is the root of the saying "there are no atheists in foxholes."

Here's what Bennett says about "belief":

> As Hanna Rosin so eloquently pointed out in a recent article, calling it chivalry would be a tremendous understatement. By all appearances, these men believed that a man has a responsibility to protect a woman, even to the point of death. They believed that there are things in life worth dying for and the innocent woman sitting next to them was one.
> They believed, to put it simply, in a code of honor. They put the lives of the women before their own, an old fashioned notion to be sure, but certainly an honorable one (if you have any doubt, ask the survivors)…

Old fashioned my ass. Take a look at Matt McQuinn (on the right), the Celtic American with the lip rings and earplugs. That young man was no fuddy duddy who ascribed to Bill Bennett's Victorian sense of propriety. No, he's a modern-day example of the Gaelic warriors who have earned a reputation over the ages for their scorn for death and willingness to make the ultimate sacrifice. In other words, it was in his blood, and Bennett insults him in suggesting otherwise.

The same applies to the other young men. They were solid men; the kind that families and communities have always relied on when the going gets tough. It wasn't because they held some belief or political position, it was because they were men that they acted as they did. It is simply what men do, and that's why they deserve honor, which Bennett is incapable of bestowing on anyone.

No, instead of honoring these men, Bennett continues to measure them according to their utility to women:

> After his death we learned that Blunk had an ex-wife and two children living in Nevada. He was scheduled to visit them to resolve marital issues. This isn't to take anything away from Blunk or the other two heroes, but to illustrate that, in spite of shortcomings, men can still recognize what it means to be a good man and act like one.

This above words illustrate exactly what's wrong with the attitude in regards to men in our culture. Bennett suggests that because the man is separated from his ex – through no fault of his own for all we know – he must be flawed. And then, of course, he redeems himself by being useful to a woman — by taking a bullet.

The implication is that women have inherent value, but men do not. This is a cultural issue, and one of the greatest flaws of our society. I've been all over Europe and Asia, and only in the Anglo world are men considered to have value only in their utility, like so many tools. It is a toxic attitude, and explains why our women have such contempt for our men. If a man has no inherent value, how could a woman ever love him when he is not providing her some material benefit? Of course, this is not really why women love men, either, so it leads to all sorts of dysfunction and unhappiness in our women, who can't understand why they don't love the men in their lives simply for being

These people have it backwards. Men are not men because they are useful to others; rather, they have value because they are men. If it were only for our utility that we were men, then why couldn’t a donkey be a man? How about a machine?

More from Bennett:

> This is especially important given the state of many men today. Record numbers of men aren’t working or even looking for work. Record numbers aren’t marrying or even acting as fathers to their children. These men need heroes to imitate whom they can relate to in everyday life, not just make-believe superheroes who catch their imagination for an hour or two. They need heroes like the Aurora three.
> While much of the media obsesses over the psychology and motivations of this deranged killer, we should hold the Aurora three high. It is only by telling their story that this code of honor will survive for future generations of men.

How are these three any different from the “record numbers” of men Bennett refers to? As Hanna Rosin suggests, Blunk was kind of a loser who couldn’t support his family:

> On the Today show interview, Jansen Young, the girlfriend Blunk saved, mentioned that Jonathan was thinking about re-enlisting in the Navy. She attributed that to his undying heroism, but it may also have to do with the fact that he, like a few guys in the theater, was working at Target and surely not making enough money to support one family, much less two. Young, meanwhile, had just finished getting her veterinarian degree, becoming the latest in an onslaught of women who have taken over that lucrative profession, which was not very long ago dominated by men.

These young men who died are the same ones Bill Bennett and Hanna Rosin denounce so regularly, so she is surprised that they would still act as they did. I suspect that Rosin simply sees masculinity as a set of credentials, and when men act according to their nature without going through a “man school” or something like it, she simply can’t fathom it.

This is really what feminists like Rosin and Bennett don’t understand. Men do not need to be taught or pushed to be men. They do not need to be shamed or cajoled into it. It is simply what they are, and it is a glorious thing.

The Problem With Sluts

W.F. Price · 26 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Heartiste has a post up about the Kristen Stewart affair, in which she cheated on boyfriend Robert Pattinson with Snow White director Rupert Sanders.

See her here casting a sultry look at the not-very-attractive, much older director. If you're not sure what female desire looks like, that's exactly it. It's rare to see it captured so clearly on a photo, so there you go.

Heartiste is right, as usual, where these matters are concerned:

> You can be the best looking man in the world, but if you're a beta in your core (and there is evidence in his quoted words that Pattinson is an unreconstructed beta) you will suffer a higher chance of getting cheated on by your girlfriend if she spends any nontrivial amount of time with an alpha male who has the ATTITUDE.

Yep. Pattinson's a younger guy who hasn't yet developed the confidence and swagger that years of being in charge of hot young starlets gives a guy. As a director, Sanders is quite literally the boss of beautiful young women. For these girls, who are used to being catered to hand and foot by ordinary men, that's erotic, and probably hard to resist. It's yet another reason we should think twice about putting young wives to work with men who have higher relative status in the office than their husbands do at home. That's obviously a recipe for marital disaster.

However, some may ask why this is such a big deal. Pattinson may have just gained the opportunity to be done with a slutty girlfriend, so what's the problem?

Well, think about how this will play out. Pattinson is young enough that this will eventually be forgotten, but in the meanwhile he's going to pay for it. Older, higher-status men taking women from their younger boyfriends/husbands is nothing new, and quite frankly it's often how they put up-and-coming young men in their place. Nobody really feels sorry for a chump whose woman cheated on him — they tend to laugh at him. It's unfortunate, but it seems to be human nature.

In a business like Hollywood, losing respect is not very good for your career. A guy whose girlfriend cheated on him is going to have a harder time landing a leading role. The girl, for her part, takes some punishment as well. But the alpha male cheater doesn't really lose. In fact, he tends to gain respect (whether people admit it or not). Therefore, the woman who cheats betrays her man socially and professionally as well as sexually. It's a very nasty thing to do to a guy, because unlike a betrayed wife, he gets ridicule instead of sympathy.

Cheating women don't just make you feel bad; they make you look bad, too. And that does have real life consequences. When women betray men, it really is worse.

The one positive thing is that this will probably damage Stewart's career more than Pattinson's. He's got decades to live this down, but by the time it's forgotten she'll already be over the hill for an actress.

Sluts just screw things up for lots of people. That's why we shame them, and should continue to do so.

Blogging and Comments — The Manosphere is Growing Up

W.F. Price · 27 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Some people might be curious about the connection between comments and site traffic, and recently I've had an opportunity to do a little experiment. I put all comments on moderation to give myself a little more time with the family without having to worry about trolls while away from the site, and it's been a nice little break. But at the same time, it looks as though less is going on on the site.

Actually, this isn't true. Below is a graph of traffic starting from just after I put all comments on moderation to yesterday.

[image]

As you can see, traffic has gone up considerably. The picture is just a snapshot, so it isn't entirely representative of average traffic. Weekends are usually lower (Saturdays lowest), and that makes it look a bit more impressive than it should. Add to that the fact that I didn't really post anything on Friday or Saturday, resulting in lower traffic for those days, and it skews it a bit more.

However, this month a typical day is running just over 10,000 page views per day and around 3,500 uniques — pretty much like Monday and Tuesday. The dark green represents page views, and the light green uniques, so as you can see the traffic shot up considerably by the middle of this week, with over 14,000 page views and 5,000 uniques yesterday.

Those kinds of numbers put comments in perspective. Out of over 5,000 people who visited the site yesterday (and that doesn't even include the 1,000 individuals out of 2,100 subscribers who viewed the feed), perhaps only a couple dozen commented — well under 1%.

Usually, I don't tend to be too bothered by comments, even when they are pretty lousy. However, I'm starting to rethink that. This is because you get traffic as a blogger largely from other bloggers, tweets, etc., and when you have commenters who are dumping on other bloggers or saying ugly stuff, people tend to hold you responsible, and it does hurt your site. For example, if I have people trashing another popular manosphere blogger in comments, it will make him think twice about linking any of my posts, and that is not a good thing.

Although I could care less when feminists and the like criticize comments (they obviously aren't my target audience), when colleagues and people on their sites start taking offense, it's a problem.

Finally, more bloggers in the manosphere have been cracking down on comments as it matures and grows. There are a lot more sites than a few years ago, and they get a lot more traffic. So there's a trickle down effect: when most sites exercise comment control, the people who get "controlled" tend to end up on the sites that don't. The consequences of this should be pretty clear. It suggests that the old "anything goes" model, which was necessary and quite helpful in the beginning, isn't feasible any longer.

So, as zed has suggested, it's probably time for The Spearhead to put on the "big boy pants" and start policing comments more thoroughly. I think this will have a positive effect, because there are a lot of quality commenters I appreciate, including some who have left due to the lower comment quality. Perhaps some of these valued commenters will return and comment from time to time — I certainly hope so.

Although it's a fairly substantial change, I'm now going to set the bar considerably higher, including for graphic language (long a pet peeve of mine), violent fantasies, personal attacks, attacks on other manosphere bloggers and unhelpful griping. I assume most people can handle this fine, and it will be a much more comfortable environment for the majority.

Looks like the manosphere is growing up and coming into its own. Not a bad thing.

Sharia Crashes on Shoals of UK Family Law

W.F. Price · 27 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A lot of conservatives have been raising the specter of sharia law in the West, apparently in the belief that we will all soon be subject to lashings for having a beer or eating a ham sandwich. Although I'm not a big fan of Islamic supremacy in the West, and don't think Islam is a good fit for northern cultures like ours (northerners would have starved if they observed Ramadan and Islamic dietary restrictions), I think these fears are overblown.

Also, I've pointed out on several occasions that we already have religious law enforced by US states. Jewish marital contracts stipulate that Jewish rabbinical judges handle divorces (although they have no jurisdiction over child support and custody), and these contracts are enforceable by states. And why not? Freedom of conscience should include the option of drawing up contracts according to one's faith, and agreeing to be held legally bound as with any other contract. If Jewish couples can do it, why not Muslim? Why not Christian? Or atheist — our beliefs are not the state's business.

Giving Muslims the option to arrange their marriages according to their faith is no threat to the political integrity of secular Western states, so I don't know why there's so much hysteria about these sharia courts, which only have the power to adjudicate contracts which have been freely entered into. Even in majority Muslim states sharia courts usually have little if any jurisdiction outside of family law.

In a recent case, Zaid Al-Saffar, a Muslim doctor in Britain, was ordered to pay his ex-wife £60,000 maintenance. He argued that the maintenance violated his Muslim marriage contract. It isn't clear where the marriage was entered into, but evidently both agreed to Islamic terms.

> A Scarborough doctor has been ordered to pay his ex-wife £60,000 maintenance after being told his muslim traditions wont absolve him of his financial responsibilities.
> Dr Zaid Al-Saffar, a consultant rheumatoligist at Scarborough Hospital and head of the town's Islamic society, has found himself at the centre of a test case clash of Muslim and UK matrimonial law after refusing to pay his ex wife maintenance.
> Speaking at the Appeal Court, Lord Justice Ward ruled that Dr Al-Saffar's belief that maintenance paymets to spouses are "illigitimate or illegal according to Islamic culture" is no defence to orders made in English divorce courts.
> The judge concluded the case by telling Dr Al-Saffar: "Life is sometimes hard; do not be consumed with bitterness."
> However Dr Al-Saffar expressed his discontent outside court afterwards, saying: "Family law in this county is biased against Muslim people."
> The case has hit national headlines, and acts a warning to Muslim couples across the country who believe their marriages are ordered according to sharia law and agree to be bound by Islamic courts.
> [...]
> When the pair wed Sharia tradition saw Dr Al-Saffar pay a gift to his bride. Because of this Mrs Al-Saffar then signed away her half of the matrimonial home in Belvedere Road.
> In traditional Muslim societies there is often no expectation that the ex-husband will pay maintenance to the divorced wife and that she has to look to her extended family for support.
> Judge Jones however refused to take this view of the situation at the original divorce hearing and ordered Dr Al-Saffar to pay his ex a total of £60,000 in personal maintenance for her contribution to the marriage.
> However the doctor only made four payments, leading to his wife obtaining an order from District Judge Alan Booth in February this year, directing him to pay her the arrears of more than £40,000 in a lump sum and > resume monthly payments.

It is incorrect that Islam does not provide for alimony. However, it is limited to women who are in “iddat” (a post-divorce waiting period after which she may remarry — typically three menstrual cycles to prevent cuckoldry) and who have small children.

Since Al-Saffar made four payments (one per month), that would correspond to iddat, so he was dutifully following his agreement with his ex-wife. Evidently, the man held up his part of the bargain, but of course why should his wife respect their agreement when secular law provides her with more?

In this debate over sharia, we should step back and take a look at what’s really at stake here. Do agreements between free adults define a relationship and how it should be ended, or does the state? Is the threat from sharia so strong that we should allow the state to declare any marital contracts null just because they don’t conform to the majority culture?

Frankly, in this case, it would have been far better if the state had honored the original contract made between husband and wife. If Muslims cannot define their own marriages as they choose, why should we expect that any other men can?

Tearing Up the Grass

Keoni Galt · 27 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

My father used to play with my brother and me in the yard. Mother would come out and say, "You're tearing up the grass." "We're not raising grass," Dad would reply. "We're raising boys." – Harmon Killebrew

The late, great Baseball slugger, Harmon Killebrew, purportedly was fond of repeating this anecdote about his Father. If I were to have the chance to ask him a question, I would ask "And how did your Mother respond?"

I've heard this anecdote before, but never really understood the bigger picture regarding this interaction between a Mother and Father in raising children…until I had one of my own. As the married Father of a 2 year old toddler, this simple anecdote has become my guiding principle…my personal Parental paradigm if you will.

Not a day goes by in which I reflect with gratitude on having discovered "the red pill" on teh interwebz before having a child and embarking on the dramatic lifestyle shift that comes with being married with children.

In my former "blue pill" days, the definition of Father in my brainwashed mind, was nothing more than the duty to provide material support and sustenance so that the wife could adequately have enough resources to raise the kids. Other than being a provider, our mass media culture pushes a message that essentially says that "good Parenting skills" are basically the domain of the feminine. Nurturing, loving, bonding, care-giving are all things women are superior at providing for children. Men are best at sticking to working to pay the bills. This is the feminist narrative writ large, and as we all well know, entrenched as a bedrock principle in our legal system as well. Being a Father means first and foremost, a financial obligation.

Even President Obama, a man who has basically done anything and everything Feminists have demanded of him upon taking office, gets criticized for daring to suggest otherwise.

Take this Atlantic story, Are Fathers Necessary? A paternal contribution may not be as essential as we think. By Pamela Paul > Fathers, Barack Obama intoned in a 2008 Father's Day speech, are "critical" to the foundation of each family. "They are teachers and coaches. They are mentors and role models. They are examples of success and the men who constantly push us toward it."

> None of this would seem particularly controversial. Nor would the ominous statistics Obama reeled off about kids who grow up without Dad: five times as likely to live in poverty and commit crime, nine times as likely to drop out of school, and 20 times as likely to wind up in prison. Obama was citing a commonly accepted and constantly updated body of research. The effectively fatherless Obama is clearly a freakish outlier. As for the rest of the fatherless: insufficiently breast-fed, apt to develop attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder, unable to form secure bonds, lacking self-esteem, accident prone, asthmatic, and fat.

Having never watched more than 60 seconds of any speech this President has given since taking office, I can say that the above quotation is something I can at least partially agree with. From what I understand, he's got the effects right from Fatherless household statistics, it's the cause he's got all wrong, as he blames the Father's themselves for causing all these pathologies. We who are in the reality-based community, know damn well that the Fatherless home is not the result of an epidemic of "Deadbeat" prone males impregnating women and irresponsibly running off, but rather the result of a welfare system and a family court system that subsidizes and offers incentives for women to have children from obviously irresponsible men, and/or to deliberately remove the Father's from their homes if they become unhaaaaapppy, while still forcing them to pay for it.

But Mz. Paul takes a different tact to question the necessity of Father's in raising children:

> As Stacey and Biblarz point out, our ideas of what dads do and provide are based primarily on contrasts between married-couple parents and single-female parents: an apples-to-oranges exercise that conflates gender, sexual orientation, marital status, and biogenetic relationships in ways that a true comparison of parent gender—one that compared married gay-male couples or married lesbian couples to married heterosexuals, or single fathers to single mothers—would not. Most of the data fail to distinguish between a father and the income a father provides, or between the presence of a father and the presence of a second parent, regardless of gender.
> Drawing on reliable comparative studies, you could say this: single moms tend to be more involved, set more rules, communicate better, and feel closer to their children than single dads. They have less difficulty monitoring their children's whereabouts, friendships, and school progress. Their children do better on standardized tests and have higher grades, and teenagers of single moms are actually less likely to engage in delinquent behavior or substance abuse than those of single dads. Go, Murphy Brown.

Like any other statistical analysis done to conduct a "study" to support a blue-pill meme to reinforce the Matrix of today's Brave New World Order, one can manipulate statistics to support any half-baked, social theory they would like.

She cites research that compares children who come from Single Mother homes to Dual Parent Homes as an "apples and oranges" comparison and then proceeds to make outlandish statements purporting to show the superiority of single mothers in comparison to single fathers. Yet to say this is an apples-to-apples comparison is ludicrous.

Single Mothers are far more likely to have the resources provided for her by alimony, court ordered child support and a welfare state designed to subsidize her status as a single parent, giving her much more time on a day to day basis to spend with the children. Single Fathers are far less likely to have alimony, child support, or welfare state assistance (ever heard of a single Father with full custody applying for and receiving WIC benefits? The title of the program itself should give you a clue: WOMEN, Infant and Children.)

It is far more likely that Single Fathers will have to work to provide for their children, which certainly means far less time to monitor, parent and just spend time with the kids. Single Father's are much more likely to have to depend on extended family members or paid day care and after school programs to raise their kids while they work full time to make ends meet.

Furthermore, on sheer numbers alone, the number of single Father households with sole custody of children in comparison to those of single Mother households makes this so-called apples-to-apples comparison disingenuous. According to the *Wikipedia page for Single Parent:

> In 2006, 12.9 million families in the US were headed by a single parent, 80% of which were headed by a female.

Ya think such a disparity in numbers between the two types of households would have an effect in analyzing the statistics? Nah….can't let that get in the way of reinforcing the feminized mass media narrative that the primary role of the Father is to be the wallet to subsidize the REAL parenting that can only be done by a mother!

There's also one more factor Mz. Paul utterly fails to mention…just because a house has a husband and a wife in it, does not mean it is a Male headed household.

There are plenty of households in which the Mother wears the proverbial pants and the husband is essentially another one of the kids subject to her absolute authority. His only marker for adulthood status in a so-called equalitarian marriage, is that of provider…to the lifestyle she desires to become accustomed to, in matrimony or in divorce.

Feminism preaches equality, but in practice, an "equal" household is one in which the Mother exercises all of the Parental authority. Mz. Paul makes that quite clear:

> Fathers, roughhouse all you want. But we, gatekeeper moms, are in charge of the rest. We could give you detailed instruction, and you still couldn't possibly do it as well. "Even women who want their husbands to help more with the kids don't want to give up their traditional authority," says Stephanie Coontz, director of research at the Council on Contemporary Families.

Traditional Authority? Whose tradition? I thought the traditional authority in the two parent home was the oppressive, abusive and overbearing Patriarchy that needed to be overthrown in the name of equality?

But here's the real rub of it all…Mz. Paul is certainly correct that a Mother could give a Father detailed instructions on how to Mother the kids, and still not do it as well. Of course.

That's because Father's have a different, Gender specific job. If Fathers gave Mothers specific instructions on how to Father the children, she could certainly not do it as well as a Father…and that has nothing to do with "traditional authority," but rather recognition of the truth that the Genders are different, and each brings a different aspect into the parenting equation. This is the complementary dynamic that children from two parent homes experience; a balance of the feminine and the masculine.

The primary problems associated with all the grim statistics President Obama recites in his "blame the men" Father's Day harangues, is based on the feminist principle that the only real contribution Father's make to raising children is material provisioning. This is THE lie of all lies. We Fathers have a role to play in nurturing and care giving and loving. We just do it with a masculine approach.

Which brings me back to Harmon Killebrew's anecdote. Generally speaking, a Mother's instinctive mode of parenting comes from a deep-seated biological need to have security and safety from a dangerous world. A Mother's embrace should be the safest place in the world a young child should feel. The sphere of comfort and unconditional love all children should be fortunate enough to experience. A Mother's imperative is to shield, protect and fight to avoid danger. To minimize or eliminate risks for her offspring.

These are all good things…but it is in the child's best interest to have these things balanced out by a Father's masculine imperative to teach children how to navigate risks, assess danger, and to bravely face the fear of a dangerous world. You cannot accomplish success in any endeavor if you never emerge from the safety and comfort of Mother's embrace.

As a Father, I've come to understand something profound – I cannot give a comparable level of affection and love to my child like my wife can. I won't even try to do her job, she'd got that one covered well. No, my contribution is different. When the kid falls down, I'm not going to run over and offer comforting hugs, kisses and soft words of reassurance to stem the tears like she does. No, I pick the child up and tell 'em to stop crying, your alright, let's go. Of course, this is not say as a Father that I do not express affection at all. Hugs and kisses from Dad are important too, but the role of the Father is different from that of the Mother. A good two parent home recognizes the benefits of the divisions of labor, and lets that which is better at something, do it.

At 18 months old, my child was attempting to climb jungle gyms and ladders. My wife would immediately stop it and tell the kid "NO, stay away! Danger!" My approach? Let the kid climb while I stand beneath, ready to catch the toddler in the event of a fall from a dangerous height. Mother would have the kid never attempt to brave any heights for fear of the potential danger. As the Father, I let the kid fall from a small height, an unforgettable lesson about the Law of Gravity which cured the kid from being careless and less deliberate on future climbing excursions.

Another difference is the Mother's nesting instinct versus a Father's exploration and hunting instinct. This, I believe, is where the entire notion of helicopter parenting comes from. When a mother's emotional state dictates the tone of the home, when her concern for maintaining an immaculate nest, and where all risks and dangers are to be avoided, you get sheltered children afraid of autonomy, independence or braving the outside world.

Another aspect is modeling the way in which you as a Father, relates to the opposite Gender, the Mother. If you understand how to avoid becoming just another AMC, your progeny should have a better shot at developing the social skills to relate to the opposite gender much better as they get older and begin to form relationships to make their own families. By not being an Average Married Chump, your boys will grow up with the example on how to deal with feminine emotional turmoil, and your girls will grow up to seek out men who have those same traits as well.

Fatherhood is about more than being a provider. It's about balancing out the mothering to keep it from becoming smothering. If Harmon Killebrew had grown up in a single mother household, "DON'T TEAR UP THE GRASS!" may have kept him from eventually becoming a hall of fame baseball player.

Federal Judge Grants Injunction in Backpage.com Lawsuit

W.F. Price · 28 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In Washington state, there has been some hysteria about underage prostitution as of late. Washington is probably the most politically feminist state in the US, and resembles Scandinavia in its zeal to regulate sexual conduct. Our two female senators are perennially involved in one feminist cause or another, whether it be VAWA, IMBRA, or sex trafficking legislation.

This year, governor Christine Gregoire signed a signed a law that would require backpage.com and other escort advertisers to verify people's age when they post ads on its service, because there have been reports of underage prostitutes using the service to advertise their wares. This would obviously be difficult, given that all of the ads are submitted online. Backpage.com is an advertisement service for prostitutes, owned by New York's Village Voice Media company. It took over the market in such ads after Craigslist dropped them in 2010.

Perhaps Backpage is worried that if they make a mistake and a minor slips through they will be held responsible. Of course, if there are underage prostitutes advertising on Backpage, they are lying about their age, because vice cops regularly check the ads for that kind of thing. Additionally, potential clients would suspect that anyone advertising as a minor is certainly a cop.

So the effect of the Washington law would be to shut down pretty much all prostitution ads in the state, because hookers are not going to show up in person to be carded before placing an ad. It would be too risky for the prostitutes, whether they are of legal age or not, because officially providing one's identity is never a good idea when engaging in illegal activity.

Personally, I wouldn't care either way about the hooker ads. I have to admit I'd get a little schadenfreude out of seeing local gutter mags like The Stranger scrambling to find lost revenue. However, it is bad precedent. If you can hold Backpage responsible for what third parties post, where does it stop? Could bloggers be fined and jailed if some anonymous person posts illegal content in comments?

Because of these issues, Backpage sued to block the law, and was granted an injunction yesterday by Ricardo Martinez, a federal judge. Martinez made the only sane choice given the broad scope of the law. It clearly removes the right of people and companies to host third party content by holding them liable for other people's speech.

As for underage prostitution, although I don't think it's as common as some would have us believe, it may well be a growing problem. In fact, given how many girls are growing up without their fathers today, I'd be surprised if it weren't. Although I can't say for certain that I ever personally knew any prostitutes when I was in high school, there were a number of girls who carried pagers (this is way back in the early 90s, before cell phones were common), and I don't think they were selling crack. These girls were the female equivalents of the gangstas who were slinging rocks on street corners, and I strongly suspect they were making some money on the side by selling themselves. In fact, just a few years after I got out of my high school, the principal was caught having a "relationship" with a female student, and it's pretty clear she was getting paid for it, if not in cash in kind.

In certain neighborhoods, prostitution is a pretty casual, out-in-the-open kind of thing. Some girl is walking down the street, a guy in a lowrider slows down, talks to her for a minute, and she gets in the car. I've seen it happen plenty of times, including with apparently underage females. It isn't slavery or "trafficking" — it's just part of the culture in some places. And this culture is very strongly associated with single mother households and father absence.

If these lawmakers really want to do something about underage prostitution, I can think of a good place to start, and it doesn't involve cracking down on websites. First, stop incentivizing single motherhood. Next, rather than actively chasing fathers away from their families, give them incentives to stick around and be involved in their children's lives.

But maybe that would work too well, and take away the opportunity to grandstand over the latest moral panic.

50 Shades of Grey Reviews

W.F. Price · 29 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A female friend picked up the book 50 Shades of Grey and told me a bit about it. She said the hypergamy is so over the top it's ridiculous and strains credulity. I told her to let me know what she thinks when she's finished, since I don't plan on reading it myself.

Coincidentally, I was checking out Amazon's best-seller list yesterday evening to see what's going on in the US book market. Naturally, the 50 Shades trilogy dominated the top spots, so I took a look at the reviews. They were pretty funny, and it looks as though the writer was ripping off Heartiste (she even seems to make allusions to digit ratio). If the writing weren't as bad as is claimed, I'd suspect he's actually the author, and is making a superlative point about female nature.

Since very few of us are ever going to read it, here are a few selections from Amazon reviews for the curious:

> Did a teenager write this???
> About half way through the book, I looked up the author to see if she was a teenager. I really did because the characters are out of a 16 year old's fantasy. The main male character is a billionaire (not a millionaire but a billionaire) who speaks fluent French, is basically a concert level pianist, is a fully trained pilot, is athletic, drop dead gorgeous, tall, built perfectly with an enormous penis, and the best lover on the planet. In addition, he's not only self made but is using his money to combat world hunger. Oh yeah, and all of this at the ripe old age of 26! And on top of that, he's never working. Every second is spent having sex or texting and emailing the female character. His billions seem to have just come about by magic. It seriously feels like 2 teenage girls got together and decided to create their "dream man" and came up with Christian Grey.
> Then come the sex scenes. The first one is tolerable but as she goes on, they become so unbelievable that it becomes more laughable than erotic. She orgasms at the drop of a hat. He says her name and she orgasms. He simply touches her and she orgasms. It seems that she's climaxing on every page.
> [...]
> Bestseller? Really???
> …the repetition…and the repetition…and the repetition. I'm convinced the author has a computer macro that she hits to insert one of her limited repertoire of facial expressions whenever she needs one. According to my Kindle search function, characters roll their eyes 41 times, Ana bites her lip 35 times, Christian's lips "quirk up" 16 times, Christian "cocks his head to one side" 17 times, characters "purse" their lips 15 times, and characters raise their eyebrows a whopping 50 times. Add to that 80 references to Ana's anthropomorphic "subconscious" (which also rolls its eyes and purses its lips, by the way), 58 references to Ana's "inner goddess," and 92 repetitions of Ana saying some form of "oh crap" (which, depending on the severity of the circumstances, can be intensified to "holy crap," "double crap," or the ultimate "triple crap"). And this is only part one of a trilogy…
> [...]
> Revolting
> I honestly don't understand why women are all a rage about this. I thought a virgin who could climax right way, many times over and on command was a male fantasy. The author repeats the phrases, "oh my," "crap," "down there," and "inner goddess" incessantly. Really, those phrases have to make up 1/3 to 1/2 the novel. The rest is about a girl who receives about $100,000 worth of gifts in return for allowing this guy to perform S&M on her – so romantic.

So there we have it. The most popular book in the English-speaking world is women's pornography.

What a glorious chapter in our civilization's history!

Well, at least it's worth a laugh.

Gay Marriage – A Culture War Proposal

Featured Guest · 30 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By RICanuck

There has been a lot of news on the gay marriage front lately. Chick-Fil-A, the State of Washington voting on legalizing gay marriage, and an email I received this morning from the National Organization for Marriage to eat at Chick-Fil-A on August 1st. I have also been reading a lot of manosphere material on the red pill, marriage (straight), and the differences between men and women, and everything just coalesced in my mind. Also during Mass this morning, the general intercession asked for prayers for those suffering from 'sex addiction'. I write this post with a modest proposal that Christian men may bring into the gay marriage debate. Coherent critiques are invited. I do not want to hear theological criticisms, nor threats of hellfire and damnation. This is a prudential and political proposal.

This column has been broken down into a number of headings with explanatory information before getting to the proposal and the potential backlash.

The Current State of Straight Marriage

- No Fault Divorce:
  - Marriage is now the only institution or contract that may be unilaterally broken without legal remedy available to hold the violator responsible for the tangible and intangible losses involved. Being North Americans, almost all of us know some man who has been figuratively raped and eviscerated by divorce. Anyone who reads manosphere blogs knows of this. This is scaring many Gen X and Y men from marriage, leading to plaintive laments of, "Where have the good men gone?"
- Demonization of Male Sexuality:
  - Rollo Tomassi's most recent post describes in secular terms how male sexuality is demonized today. He uses the word 'pathologizing', to keep the post in a neutral secular frame. This post may be found here: http://rationalmale.wordpress.com/2012/07/27/pathologizing-the-male-sexual-response/#comments. Dalrock has also written several posts describing this demonization especially in context of the movie 'Fireproof'. See: http://dalrock.wordpress.com/2011/11/08/warn-men-beware-christian-marriage-doublespeak-and-hair-trigger-for-wife-initiated-divorce/. The pretext of the movie is that a wife can sexually deprive her husband of sex, but if he then looks at on-line porn he is committing adultery, and she is free to pursue other men.
  - This demonization has lead to Marital Rape laws. Prior to the 80's a husband could not be accused of raping his wife, because she had given consent during the wedding. This did not legally excuse assault if she really put a fight. Marital Rape laws leave a sword of Damocles hanging over a husband's head. Oz Conservative reported a case of an 80 something man who was accused of marital rape in 1963 by his ex-wife. The courts in Australia allowed the case to go forward. I heard a couple of years ago about a 70 something man charged with rape, in that he had intercourse, in a nursing home, with his wife who suffered dementia. Now a functional 70 something man is outnumbered by 70 something women. If he just wanted sex, I am sure he could have found a willing partner. But he wanted his wife. Remaining faithful to and in love with your wife has been criminalized.
  - I have elaborated more on male sexuality because it is seldom mentioned in the context of law and public policy.

Glossary:

It is politically incorrect to refer to the wisdom of 'dead white males', but Confucius considered the proper use of words to be the basis a good order and harmony. So far as I know I am the only one to describe the following groups of people with this terminology, and I will continue to use the words as defined later in the post. I have had gay marriage discussions with both types of people.

- Subversives – I am referring to the gay marriage advocates who want to use gay marriage to subvert the 'pale-penis-person-patriarchy'.
- Sinceres – These people are those who honestly feel that they know a same sex someone, or hope to know a same sex someone, whom they would like to spend the rest of lives with. Based on the above state of straight marriage, we conservative Christians actually share some common ground with the Sinceres. A very narrow common ground, and an uncomfortable common ground, but nevertheless, there is common ground.

Gay Marriage – Pros and Cons

Cons:

- Allowing gay marriage is bound to produce unforeseen consequences. The Subversives are hoping for it.
- Gay marriage will weaken the arguments against polygamy. I don't worry too much about the breakaway Mormons or the Muslims. The rich and powerful will be able to build open harems, and the increase in the number of frustrated and marginalized young men will not be a good thing. Look at the inner cities where a few thugs and gangstas impregnate many women, and the decent young men are not incentivized to work hard or start a business.

Pros:

- I have friends and relatives in Ontario and Massachusetts both of which recognize gay marriage. Family Law is gradually and marginally moving towards gender neutrality.
  - I have a son in Ontario whose friend was denied access to his children, so he went back to court. The judge issued an order stating that in any month that access was denied, the following month's support payment would be reduced by a hefty percentage. Correlation is not causation, but this was unheard of prior to gay marriage. I've also heard that family courts sometime find that women are perpetrators of emotional cruelty.
  - Shortly after gay marriage became legal in Massachusetts, I was speaking with a Sincere co-worker, and warned him about Massachusetts's family law, in that if he married a guy paying alimony or child support, his income as well as his spouse's would be considered in setting support levels, and if his spouse suffered a loss of income, he would be on the hook for it. He found it hard to believe that Family Law could be so anti-family. Well, the gays and divorced men are agitating for Mass. alimony reform. I hope they succeed.

The Culture War Proposal for Gay Marriage

Firstly, Christian agitation against gay marriage seldom considers the devastating effects of no fault divorce and marital rape laws have already had on straight marriage. We Christians seldom blame ourselves for the present state of marriage. Dalrock, Christian Men's Defense Network, Feminism is Empathological, and other blogs contain many posts of how prominent Christian's actively work against a restoration of traditional marriage.

The defunct blog, In Mala Fide, once had a post at the beginning of 2011 of how the New York state legislature became the last to allow no fault divorce. Later in 2011 the same legislature passed gay marriage. The Catholic bishops of New York agitated against gay marriage, but their silence was deafening on the no fault divorce issue. In terms of culture war leadership the Catholic bishops are useless.

It is up to us Christian men (says he who is writing under a pseudonym), to speak out and strike hard for a restoration of marriage.

1. No to Civil Unions – Civil unions are a wussy compromise that just clear the way for the courts to mandate gay marriage at some future date. The legislators will then say, “We had no choice.” Civil unions also blur the distinction between married and not-married. Marriage has taken enough of a beating that we should not cede any ground whatsoever to the Subversives. Civil unions are also a slap in the face to the Sinceres.

2. Embrace Gay Marriage – Gay marriage advocates couch their demands in such sweet sounding terms, like equality, lifetime commitment, and love. The Sinceres mean it, the Subversives do not. Let us hold them to their words and support gay marriage provided it is accompanied by the repeal of no fault divorce and the repeal of marital rape laws. If gay marriage is implemented with the repeal of no fault divorce and marital rape laws, I say, “Embrace gay marriage. (Embracing gays is optional.)”. The heavens see the emasculation of men, the tears of the fatherless, the shame of the unmarried women that are the results of no fault divorce. Let us leverage gay marriage to slay that beast.

Options in activism:

- When asked to sign an anti-gay marriage petition, see if it includes the repeal of no fault divorce and marital rape. If not, do not sign and make your position known. Do not back down. No fault divorce is the destruction of a covenant and a blasphemy. Marital rape laws are a denial of the first command given to Adam and Eve, and a denial of male nature as created by God so man and woman could complement each other and be one flesh. We Christian men cannot rely upon willful ignorance to save us when we stand before the throne of judgement.
- When asked to sign a pro-gay marriage petition do likewise as above.
- When gay marriage legislation comes to your state, write to you state legislators with the above proposals in your own words. Back in the days of snail mail, one letter was considered to represent about 100 people who felt similarly. One email still represents 20 to 50 people with the same opinion.

The Backlash

This proposal will produce a backlash. I have listed the sources of backlash, from least dangerous to a marriage restoration to the most dangerous.

- Sinceres – The Sinceres will experience cognitive dissonance encountering a conservative Christian who supports gay marriage for cultural and political reasons. They will have trouble believing us. Explain how putrid family law really is and that we need their help.
- Legislators – Legislators will not oppose this en masse, but will be terrified of staking out a position for or against. Individual legislators do not deserve unearned respect, but the office does. Be polite and persistent.
- Subversives – The Subversives will be angry that we are taking their rhetoric at face value. Demand to know if they really believe that gays cannot commit to lifelong faithful marriage.
- Feminists – The feminists will shriek, that a lot of their anti-family achievements will be undone. Demand what they have against gays that they do not believe gays can commit to lifelong faithful marriage.
- Christians - Most Christians will oppose this proposal. There is a great personal investment in opposing gay marriage, and a strong unwillingness to acknowledge Christian complacency in the destruction of family life. I have just started to acknowledge my own complicity. Ask them to defend no fault divorce and marital rape laws. Both have done far more damage to society than gay marriage ever will. Which is their priority?
- Women – Women tend to go along with the status quo. Stand strong and do not back down. You will face shit test after shit test. We men must show leadership. If we can learn nothing else from Roissy and Athol Kay, we should learn that women are more likely to follow a confident man.

The Pathologization of Positive Aggression

Featured Guest · 30 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Joe Zamboni

Like so many other inherent characteristics of the male, “positive aggression” has been turned into a sickness, an abnormality, and a deviancy. By the words “positive aggression,” this author means the constructive assertion of the truth, the vigorous expression of the moral high ground, and the explicit identification of a change that must now be made. Of course most people never heard of positive aggression — it is certainly not taught in the schools, religions, governments, or corporations, because it empowers the individual, and draws power away from established hierarchies. And none of these organizations would want people to act up and go against the powers that be.

In history we often learn about, and on holidays we often celebrate, the courageous men (and it is far and away men who express this trait) who have acted with positive aggression. It was with positive aggression that the founding fathers of America said “no” to British rule, and drew-up the Declaration of Independence. It was with positive aggression that Jesus Christ threw the moneychangers and merchants out of the temple in Jerusalem. It was with positive aggression that a group of feudal barons confronted the King of England, with a document known as the Magna Carta, a legal limitation on the rights of kings.

The problem is that according to the popular American culture, all aggression is problematic, deviant, sick and abnormal. All aggression, according to this gross simplification of reality, is violent, destructive, dangerous, and alarming. In truth, what these adjectives describe is negative aggression. Positive aggression is none of these things.

Positive aggression is the taking of constructive action with a sense of being called to a higher purpose, it is the willingness to break through denial and resistance, as well as the energetic movement to a new and more evolved level of understanding. By lumping all aggression in one category, modern culture limits its options unnecessarily. Psychologists for example liken aggression to the defense of territory in response to a threat, as if human beings were simply territorial animals responding to an intruder. That type of aggression is about self-defense, and it is both reactive and instinctual. In contrast, positive aggression is thoughtful, proactive, morally justified, and about not just the individual but also the community at large.

Positive aggression is actually the expression of great courage. Its expression is a vigorous surge into a new domain, for the sake of truth, for the sake of righting a situation that has become an intolerable, harmful, destructive or unjust. Positive aggression is a spontaneous movement, based on a deeper wisdom, based on a deeper knowing that cannot be concealed by the masks of that part in the psyche that refuses to change, that part that uses excuses, explanations, or rationalizations as best it can to maintain the status quo.

In those places where one would have previously submitted or yielded, perhaps just gone along with things as they were, perhaps been in self-denial, in those places the man inspired by positive aggression cannot stand to be inauthentic any longer. In those places his positive aggression must come forward. And the truth and the changes that come from that new truth are terrifying to some people, particularly those who are in power, and those who significantly benefit from repression, slavery, exploitation and other abuses that positive aggression directly confronts and changes. Positive aggression expresses a powerful energy, an electrifying and dramatic energy.

To be clear, positive aggression should be distinguished from rebellion. Rebellion is not free, it is simply the movement to another polar extreme. Rebellion is still linked to and dependent upon the thing against which it rebels. For example, overthrowing a dictatorial government and installing a new dictator takes us nowhere. But using positive aggression to envision a new possibility, like true participative democracy, where all people are genuinely valued as equals, now that is a compelling vision for which positive aggression can be generated.

Positive aggression is coming from a new and more evolved perspective, it is generated by different motives than those who maintain the status quo. Unlike blind rebellion, positive aggression has a vision and a sense of righteousness to confront injustice and abuse. Positive aggression moves out, surges forth, bringing a new masculine creativity forward into the world. Positive aggression moves with those things that must now move, it restores nature's balance, and it reestablishes the rightful place of things.

Let us also be clear about who would not want men to assert their positive aggression. The government certainly does not wish to foster this expression in males. Men are instead to be trained to be cannon fodder for their country, to be good providers, to fall in line and be working slaves like plough horses. Men who know for themselves who to follow and who not to follow, men who think for themselves, men who are self-responsible, in other words men who have positive aggression, these men are very hard to manage with propaganda, advertising, and the other hypnotic approaches that modern governments employ. Likewise, corporations certainly don't want men expressing positive aggression because then they would not be good yes-men office drones, dutiful assembly line robot workers, or other mindless cogs-in-the-wheels of the economic system. Schools and universities certainly don't want males to be expressing their positive aggression because then they would not then be the passive receptacles into which all sorts of brainwashing and conditioning can be poured.

Feminists certainly do not want men in touch with their positive aggression because that would clearly bring an end to the preferential treatment of women in many domains, none the least of which are laws which favor wives over husbands in divorce. Feminists don't want men to be in their positive aggression because then the men would call foul when they hear the bullshit and nonsense coming out of the mouths of feminist leaders. Feminists don't want men resonating with their positive aggression for then men would feel good about being a man, and comfortable enough with themselves to express and live their personal truths. Such men would no longer need the approval of women, or for that matter of society at large, and they would thus no longer be readily manipulated or exploited. Feminists do not want men in touch with their positive aggression because men would feel their natural power, their natural constructive natures, and their inherent ability to wield the truth as a terrifying and fearsome weapon against the forces of darkness.

Sure, there are aspects in the souls of all men that need to be evolved (as of course is the case with women). But within there is also the wellspring of positive aggression that so many of us men are not currently resonating with, a wellspring that so many of us men are not using out in the world. It slumbers deep down inside, but can be called upon and brought forward. As a thought experiment, over the next 24 hours, what if you the reader were to embrace and accept this inherent male attribute, this positive aggression? What if, over this same 24-hour period, you were to move with it, feel it, and accept the realizations that come forth? To what new place would it bring you? Try it.

Britain’s National Health Service Erases Fathers

Featured Guest · 31 July 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Spearhead News

A single paragraph from The American Conservative sums up the state of fatherhood in Britain today.

Money quote:

> At the end of May, the National Health Service, the largest employer in Britain—and the fifth largest in the world—took the decision to excise the six-letter f-word from a pamphlet on rearing children that it has been giving to mothers- and fathers-to-be for the past 14 years. The pamphlet will no longer refer to fathers following a complaint from one person—yes, that is all it takes to airbrush people from history in modern Britain—who was concerned that such terminology is “not inclusive of people in same-sex relationships.” From now on the pamphlet will refer to mothers and “partners.” Dads are so 20th century.

The NHS could have easily, in the name of being inclusive, gotten rid of “mother” too and just used the term “parents” or “primary care giver” instead. But it chose not to. Because in the minds of government bureaucrats, fathers are of secondary, if not inconsequential importance to the lives of their children.

Male Feminist Arrested for Coercing Sex at “Safe Nest” Women’s Shelter

W.F. Price · 1 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A Las Vegas women’s shelter employee, one Benedetto Vitale, has been arrested for forgery, lewdness and sexual coercion following allegations that he tried to pressure a woman into sex:

> North Las Vegas police arrested a man Tuesday on suspicion of coercing a woman into committing sex acts at the local nonprofit Safe Nest.
> Police said the victim had to work off her court-appointed community service hours over a traffic violation at Safe Nest’s donation center, at 4208 Arcata Way, near Craig and Losee roads.
> When the 24-year-old woman reported to the facility, she spoke with its director, Benedetto Vitale, 59, who police said tried to coerce the woman into committing sex acts in exchange for signing off on her work hours.
> Safe Nest is a nonprofit agency dedicated to helping women who are victims of domestic violence.

Being a feminist is a requirement at these women’s shelters, so there’s little doubt that Vitale was a self-identified feminist, despite being male.

In some cases, declaring themselves feminist can give men access to females, particularly the damaged sort who stay in women’s shelters.

Although it is not widely known, women’s shelters are not typically frequented by ordinary housewives living in terror of their husbands, but rather dysfunctional women who have a hard time keeping their lives together. Many of them are chemically dependent, mentally ill and have problems with the law. They are what one might call “easy targets” for predators, and predators – both male and female – tend to gravitate toward target rich environments.

Rather than keep up the lie that most women who need support and services at women’s shelters are victims of men in general, we should recognize that they are simply the most dysfunctional and vulnerable members of their sex, and while they deserve basic humanitarian care, their interests are not best served when they are used as pawns to promote a feminist political agenda.

Indeed, in many cases they would be safer and better off in the company of a male family member than in the hands of feminist women’s shelter employees.

Chick-fil-A President Shows Why Traditional Marriage Losing Support

W.F. Price · 2 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The fact that Dan Cathy, President of Chick-fil-A, opposes gay "marriage" really shouldn't be a big deal. About half of the United States feels the same way, so what's the major controversy? It appears that if you're one of the "good people," that is, you are more wealthy, famous and fortunate than others, you have to support progressive causes. Because it's the morally right thing to do. Or something like that…

This has led to some shameless bigotry on the part of blue city mayors. They are indistinguishable from Bull Connor, who defied the Constitution to enforce his views. Menino, Emmanuel and others of that ilk are the real intolerant bullies of our time, and they're playing the part very well by denying Constitutional freedoms on behalf of a tiny, but powerful lobby that exerts disproportionate influence in their cities.

As for gay marriage, it's a contradiction in terms for many Americans. It never would have gained support if marriage itself hadn't been hollowed out and cheapened, and gay marriage advocates themselves rarely hesitate to remind us of this. One of the most common arguments in favor of gay marriage is that real marriage is a miserable failure amongst heterosexuals, so why can't homosexuals join in? After all, it's a joke anyway…

But Dan Cathy has decided to hold the line on the gays. That's where the gay marriage opponents screwed up. First, they winked at adultery, then they lionized single mothers by choice. Then, they demanded victimized men pay faithless wives for their transgressions. And here we have Mr. Cathy holding himself and his family up as an example, because "We are a family-owned business, a family-led business, and we are married to our first wives."

Well, Mr. Cathy, you are a member of a very privileged class. You inherited a thriving business from your father. You live in a mansion. You are rich beyond most Americans' dreams. And yet you brag about the fact that you are in a traditional marriage. It isn't much of an accomplishment, Dan, when your wife has such a plush life. Try keeping her when you can barely afford that new house or car she wants. Try keeping her when you answer to other men at work, and so does she. It isn't so easy, and neither you nor your fellow Baptists make it any easier. Instead of going after the gays, why not the women who leave their husbands?

I'll tell you why Cathy goes after the gays. It's because they are an easier target in Christian circles. That's why his endorsement of traditional marriage rings hollow. Homosexuals are barely 2% of the US population, and they marry at far lower rates than heteros. Yet Cathy would have us believe they are a threat to the integrity of marriage.

Pure bull.

I don't believe in gay marriage, but frankly I don't care what homosexuals want to call their partnership. It isn't my business, and I don't care. They can say they are married, just as Muslims can say Mohammed is the final prophet and spoke the word of God, and I'm free to hold my own opinion about it. It's crazy that they want in on such a damaged institution, but I don't think most of them intend to use it anyway, and that is the only reason I am hostile to the idea: it looks like more of an act of aggression against heterosexual norms than anything else.

However, I and other straight men ought to have a lot more issues with men like Cathy over their hypocrisy. How many Baptists get divorced? How often do their women file? It's a national embarrassment, and here Cathy – a wealthy heir – rubs it in our faces and plays holier than thou.

Well Mr. Cathy, if you care about the sanctity of marriage, you're wasting your time fighting the gays. Time to clean up your own backyard first.

Eivind Berge Out of Jail

W.F. Price · 3 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Norway's appeals court and supreme court both ruled that Eivind had committed no crime by posting provocative material on his blog. Feminists are crestfallen by the news, and mystified as to why he isn't still in prison, despite the fact that feminists have been getting away with publishing and speaking violent rhetoric since at least the 1960s. Never once has a feminist been arrested for threatening men, demanding they be attacked or other hateful speech.

Eivind published some material denouncing police, and some violent fantasies concerning revenge against them for oppressing men. Going after the police is seldom a good idea in the United States, as they usually have no qualms about punishing those who do so. I'm not sure about Norway, but I assume the impulse is the same there. However, by American – and Norwegian – standards, his speech was protected by law.

Futrelle wrote that he made a distinct threat to murder a policeman on a particular day, but it looks like Futrelle made that up, as he admits that he never saw it on Eivind's blog, and he used unreliable translation software to come up with this interpretation. Violent speech is only punishable (in the US) when it constitutes an imminent and likely threat, so falsely alleging someone made such a threat is tantamount to an act of aggression in and of itself. This is something that ought to be remembered about David Futrelle.

Although I wouldn't recommend making statements as radical as Eivind's, one has to admit that he managed to get his point across, even appearing on Norwegian news. Sometimes, as feminists and assorted other anti-establishment types from the 60s and 70s demonstrated, radicalism works.

However, we ought to keep in mind that there is a serious push afoot to limit speech. The expulsion of several Olympic athletes for tweets – including in one case merely for an off-color joke – suggests that those in power are perfectly willing to limit expression to enforce political orthodoxy. Furthermore, the liberal mayors' responses to Dan Kathy's views on gay marriage demonstrate that they are willing to ignore Constitutional protections to achieve the same end.

Ironically, it is exactly the same people who fought the establishment while relying on Constitutional protections who are currently most willing to trample on individual freedoms. If they have their way, we will certainly see people arrested and jailed for politically incorrect speech, as at this point they cannot exert any more pressure without resorting to state coercion. It's one thing to bully college students over speech on campus and demand that people lose their jobs over opinions, but it's quite another to actually put them in jail for it, and it looks as though that's where we're headed.

We are entering strange and unstable times, and I'd recommend being circumspect if you want to live a peaceful life. On the other hand, there will be a lot of opportunities to influence the debate in the current climate for those willing to take risks and push the issue. Mainstream institutional opinion is fading in power as another vast generational chasm opens up with the entrance of the boomers into old age. For those of us in the middle, it's going to be a bit of a tricky balancing act, but opportunities will abound.

Selections from Dan Cathy Post Comments

W.F. Price · 3 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I noticed that my post on Dan Cathy and Chick-fil-A sparked a bit of controversy. A lot of readers were disappointed that I don't support Cathy without reservations. That's understandable, because there was a pretty good reason to give him our support. The man was attacked simply for speaking his mind, and threatened with legal sanction for doing so. This is a really terrible precedent, and paints progressives/liberals in a dismal tone. I'm pretty angry at those mayors myself, as I live in a very blue city and know first-hand how bigoted people on the left can be in their own strongholds. The last thing I want to see is them using the law to oppress people who disagree with them and getting away with it.

However, I'm frustrated by the focus on gay marriage to the exclusion of other problems. The danger, as I see it, is that this will draw attention away from the real problems with marriage. For the record, I don't think gay marriage is one of those problems, because it is a fiction for all intents and purposes. It strikes me as an empty gesture to protect marriage by focusing on the least of its problems while ignoring the others.

I thought I'd highlight a few comments and responses to show how different readers interpreted the post in different ways:

> NWOslave writes:
>
> That isn't the point. The same forces that have destroyed marriage and the family are the same forces that promote gay marriage. You know as well as I do the people who rewarded single motherhood, promoted the welfare nanny state, took fathers away from their children, rewarded women for divorcing their husbands, encouraged the slut movement, are the same damned people.
> How the hell do you clean up your backyard when everytime you sweep it out a bigger pile of crap is thrown over the fence? When a family can mean everything to everyone it means nothing at all. Let's all just retreat a little more. One step sideways and one step back.

They are often the same people, but not always. I don't think it would be accurate to say there's a direct correlation between supporting marriage 2.0 divorce theft and supporting gay marriage. Not at all, in fact. Conservative Christians, I would assume, are just as supportive of mother custody and punitive alimony/child support as those on the left. Probably more so in many cases.

I agree that those who want to preserve marriage should hold the line, but going after gay marriage when there are much bigger problems is misguided. If China invaded the US with a million men, would it make sense to ignore their army in favor of securing the Mexican border?

I'm not dismissing Cathy for his efforts, just his effectiveness. His wealth gives him both security and power, and it would be much better spent reforming divorce and custody law than in opposing gay marriage. The man has given millions to groups opposing gay marriage. Has he ever given one red cent to groups opposing the very laws that make divorce so attractive to women? If he hasn't, he's done next to nothing for us.

This is why it's fair to bring up his wealth and power — it's relevant.

Yes, supporting an increase in father custody would make an enormous difference. What are Cathy's views on that? I get the impression they're something like this:

"The man should be at work providing for the wife and children."

Nothing wrong with that view, unless the wife has no accountability, and under today's marriage regime she doesn't. Does Cathy support holding women legally accountable for their marriage vows? If so, you wouldn't know it from what he's said.

Lots of good and impassioned comments on this post. I hope it got some people thinking about what's at stake here, and what will work to effect change for the better.

I view it as my duty to inform, and if that includes occasionally writing a piece that isn't popular with everyone, so be it. I can only hope that it helped people see another point of view, and maybe think of things in a new light.

Spearhead News

Ever wonder why those in the manosphere complain about media bias?

Well take a look at this: a screen shot from the Yahoo.com “news” contributor Anna Holmes. Full article here.

[image]

You may remember this is the same Holmes of Jezebel fame. She is, of course, the creator of that left-wing feminist enterprise. Both Jezebel and Holmes herself are known for their misandrist attitude, and violent fantasies about men.

Interestingly enough, the piece quotes another feminist in journalist clothing, Ana Marie Cox, formerly the Washington Editor of Time.com, and current Washington Correspondent for GQ, who got her big break by publishing the story of Jessica Cutler, a Capitol Hill intern who was trading sex for cash with politicos and blogging about it, thereby transforming her into a feminist heroine.

The “news” article, as one would expect, has a feminist, though mostly racial slant, with a links to far-left magazine The Nation and Twitter comments disparaging Bob Costas, who noted the historic, barrier breaking nature of the first black woman winning a gold in all-around gymnastics. However, not enough non-whites are in gymnastics or even crew, Holmes whines, and this is a sign of the Olympics as being too elitist, too white, and of course, secretly racist. Sexism rears it’s ugly head too. Girls just doesn’t have enough opportunities to play sports, nor access to appropriate equipment or facilties, she says, citing approvingly a study by the feminist National Women’s Law Center. “Doesn’t sound to me like so many barriers have been felled after all,” quips Holmes.

Anyhow, as of today the U.S. has won medals in 43 events. More than half, exactly 24, had been won by women, either individually or as part of a team. Quite a few of these were team effort, more so than with the men, so the total number of women as opposed to men, who will leave with medals, as of today, is 31 for men, and 44 for women. That’s a 58.6% vs. 41.3% breakdown in medals, resulting in a 17.3% disparity. Yes, the Olympics are sexist indeed! Just not the way poor little Anna imagines. You can check out Yahoo! Sports medal page to see for yourself.

Is it any wonder why most men don’t believe mainstream news organizations anymore, assuming they bother to check them? American women are doing better than men in the Olympics (just like in college admissions and graduation rates, the number of suicides, levels of incarceration, yadda yadda yadda), and yet shrill feminist dragons like Holmes scream sexism every chance they get.

Time to check off Yahoo News as a reputable news source, if you haven’t already.

What Will Future America be Like for Women?

W.F. Price · 4 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've been reading the Detroit blog for years now, fascinated by the decline of the once great city. Nature is reclaiming the decaying urban landscape as residents flee to safer and wealthier towns and neighborhoods outside the city. Aside from a few diehard holdouts, those who remain are often the most hapless and dysfunctional of all. Houses in Detroit cost less than used cars, police budgets are strained, and streetlights are being turned off to save money. It's a hell of a story of a modern city going to ruin.

If it weren't for vast, middle America, many of our other cities would be suffering the same fate. Our urban centers rely on commerce, consumers and taxpayers across the nation. If our nation's economy truly becomes hollowed out, and it looks as though it's headed in that direction, there will be a number of Detroits across the land. California's smaller cities are already going in that direction as the state is bankrupted by entitlements and Democratic policies.

So how will this affect women? Feminists are known for supporting economically destructive policies across the board, so I thought they might be interested in what life is like for the women left behind in Detroit:

> He first had sex with a hooker when he was 18. He's been with hundreds of them since. And he's put a video of nearly every one of those hookups on his website. "I just like bad girls," says the 36-year-old Detroiter who goes by the name John Juan, the persona behind foulfowl.com. "I've always liked bad girls. The temptation has just always drawn me in, and finally when I got up the courage to do it, I enjoyed it."
> For a decade now, he's shot video not just of himself having sex with prostitutes, but also interviews with them talking openly, often enthusiastically, about their lives as street hookers in Detroit. They share vivid stories about their arrests, their addictions and their customers — the ones who've raped them, the ones they've robbed with knives or guns, the ones who show up with wives who want to watch, even the one man who pays for their services, takes them to a motel, ties them up and shouts Bible verses at them. Many of the women he films are weathered and aged by drugs and sickness and thousands and thousands of johns. Some of the site's subscribers, particularly those from Europe and Asia, ask him to find the most haggard prostitutes possible, and he gleefully complies.
> "Two nickels are better than a dime, and 10 pennies are even better," his website's motto once declared.
> He's chronicled hundreds of them — emaciated ones, obese ones, a few visibly pregnant ones. Some are toothless, some have open sores on their skin, some are covered in scars. Some admit reusing condoms, or having diseases; others shoot up heroin or smoke crack in front of him. The settings are seedy motels, vacant buildings, dirty apartments, weedy alleys, even the backseat of a stripped-out stolen car once.
> The hookers he finds have sex with him for just a dollar or two, or for a ride somewhere. Once it was for some chicken wings, another time it was for some hair gel. One took two Newports as payment.

Absent a technological breakthrough along the lines of the industrial revolution, there are going to be a lot more of these stories going around very soon.

Conservative Responses to NY Times Happy Bachelors Article

W.F. Price · 5 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A commenter pointed out a piece on Rod Dreher's blog in American Conservative criticizing the four 30-something men living together in NYC for being self-absorbed and not contributing to society.

It's a bit depressing to see how conservatives simply can't help but frame things the same way decade after decade, despite the fact they have lost – badly – over and over again in the culture wars.

However, a lot of commenters on his piece defend the men, although not always in the way we might prefer here. One female commenter, for example, says that they are not that bad, because at least they are not deadbeat abusers…

I, for one, am happy to see that men are finally questioning their "duty" in these matters. It is perfectly reasonable for men to ask "what's in it for me?" Actually, if a man even asked "what's in it for society?" I don't think your typical conservative could give a very convincing answer as far as things stand today.

This isn't to say that there's anything wrong with family and childrearing, but instead to point out that that kind of lifestyle simply isn't viable for a lot of men these days. We have to recognize that not only have a lot of men been priced out of the marriage market, but also that family is a very serious risk to take these days, with a failure rate of about 50%. The consequences of failure, of course, are brutal for men. Worse in some ways than falling on the battlefield, if you count slavery a fate worse than death.

But do we see conservatives doing anything to change that? Nope. They just keep flogging the dead horse of "duty."

However, there may be hope yet. Even on a conservative website we find comments such as this:

> Charlieford says:
> I think you may be over-reading all of this. I have a couple friends pretty much like that: unusually bright fellows–too bright and too independent to lie and fake their way through an organization's hierarchy, but not bright enough, ambitious enough, egotistical enough, to become any kind of super-stars.
> Once upon a time America had more room for these people. They lived with their parents, or with a sibling, or they hoboed around. Not so much anymore. We should lament the shrinking options for the congenitally non-conformist.
>
> And, let's face it, the more standard roles the majority of their peers choose aren't any great shakes. Yeah, you may have health insurance (probably inadequate) and once you sign for a mortgage, you're stuck with the house and the job to pay for it, but it is a kind of wage-slavery that the majority loathe–hence their saying, "Thank God It's Friday," perhaps the most eloquent expression of our culture's fundamental spiritual failure around.
> The vast majority, I suspect, hate their lives and hate themselves for their cowardice in putting up with their hateful lives, but cannot face that fact–so they find someone else to hate, to distract them.

Yes, there is light at the end of the tunnel.

How Men Make Out Without Traditional Family: Pretty Well

W.F. Price · 5 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The NY Times has an article on four men who have lived together for the past couple decades, in apparent happiness. They are neither gay nor ideologically motivated; they simply prefer their chosen lifestyle.

> New Yorkers in midlife crisis, meet the brotherhood of Fortress Astoria: Danaher Dempsey, Luke Crane, Rick Brown and Shyaporn Theerakulstit, best friends and artists.
> They have no children, no linear career histories, no readily disposable savings. The four men, all heterosexual, approaching 40 and never married, have lived together for 18 years, give or take a revolving guest roommate, cohabitating in spaces like an East Village walk-up, a Chelsea loft and, now, a converted office space in Queens.
> Their latest home, which they have nicknamed Fortress Astoria, takes up the second and third floors of a slate gray concrete block building with floor-to-ceiling windows on 31st Street. The setup is ideal for four bachelors. Bedrooms do not share common walls, and there are communal spaces both upstairs (huge television, sofa) and down (kitchen). There is a lovely garden out back tended by Mr. Theerakulstit.

New York, admittedly, is the kind of environment that tends to promote alternative living arrangements, but from a lot of men's perspectives, their lives look pretty decent.

> Splitting the rent four ways gave the roommates the economic freedom they needed to pursue their dreams. For Mr. Brown that meant making films; for Mr. Dempsey and Mr. Theerakulstit it was acting. Mr. Crane channeled his interest in fantasy into creating The Burning Wheel, a role-playing game he first published in 2002.
> None have come close to making it big, although Mr. Crane is somewhat famous in the niche world of role-playing. But compromise has come hard.
> For years, Mr. Brown dodged permanent video editing assignments for short-term gigs so he could write a screenplay and make a short film. But then, he said, he "crashed and burned" after investing 18 grueling months — and his savings — in the film, which received "disappointing" responses at various screenings. "I've kind of let go of the obsession and anxiety of expressing myself," he said, "and just given myself permission to work and live."
> Mr. Dempsey at one point took a job as a data analyst at Pfizer that gave him health insurance and a paid vacation for the first time in his life. But he felt stifled by full-time office culture, preferring to work part time for a Web design company and pursue a career in the fitness industry while phasing out his acting career. "To my friends who were married and had kids, what I did was incomprehensible," he said. "I knew that if I'd stayed, I'd probably be making tons of money, but I would have been unhappy."
> Soon he was completely eschewing Off-Off Broadway to become a personal trainer, and this fall he is to begin pursuing a degree in physical therapy. He said he felt insecure about his choices sometimes, but the benefits of his alternative, Fortress Astoria-based lifestyle have outweighed the losses.
> "The freedom this has allowed me to have — to figure out my own quirks and foibles — has been much more important than investing in things that might have tied me down to something that would have kept me from figuring those other things out," he said.

For many single men, one of the biggest problems is loneliness. For some, the solitary lifestyle is fine, but a lot of us will have to admit that it doesn't suit us so well. These men have found a way around that, and perhaps their lifestyle is something that will be more common in the future, as more and more men realize that they can't win in live-in relationships with women.

I'd recommend that young men who can find other guys they get along with and trust try a similar arrangement before living with a woman. It may not be as fulfilling as having a happy marriage and family, but it sure beats divorce and the solitude and poverty that all too often ensue. In fact, it might not even preclude having children, so long as you're willing to work out a reasonable custody schedule with the mother, and you can always move out and start a family when you're sure about it.

More Necessary Than Ever

Elusive Wapiti · 7 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist blogger and professor Hugo Schwyzer, writing about the three men who died shielding their girlfriends from a killer's bullets during the Aurora Century 16 Theater shooting, suggests the reason why men should be willing to die for women is because women sometimes die for men in childbirth (HT: TrollKing):

> The reality is that these sacrificial gestures, as impressive and touching as they are, belong to a tradition that dates back to an era when far more women died for men than vice-versa. Until the advent of modern medicine, childbirth was one of the leading causes of death for women; a conservative estimate places the historic rate of maternal mortality at 1 for every 100 births. Even now, at least 800 women die worldwide every day as a consequence of childbirth.
> Throughout human history, more women have died giving birth than male soldiers have died in war. As a result, in many places, women had shorter life expectancies than men. The ubiquity of "wicked stepmothers" in old fairy tales is a subtle reminder of these high rates of maternal death. From a purely demographic standpoint, it was women whose bodies were more vulnerable and disposable.
> Every woman who dies in childbirth dies as a result of sex with a man. Vaginal intercourse with a man was—and in many places still is—one of the riskiest activities in which any woman could engage. Though the pleasure in the act may have at least occasionally been equal, the risk never was. Throughout Western culture, when women died in childbirth they died not only as a direct consequence of sex with men, they died giving life to children who would carry their husbands' name. While even in more violent eras, relatively few husbands would be called upon to lay down their lives for their wives, every pregnant woman knew she stood a fair chance of dying so that her husband's family's name could go on. If we look at all of recorded human history and ask "Who died more often for whom?" the evidence is that women made the ultimate sacrifice more frequently.
> From an historical context, the kind of male gallantry we saw in Aurora is both compensatory and rarely required. When they reacted heroically to the start of the shooting, McQuinn, Blunk, and Teves surely weren't thinking "I'm covering my girlfriend with my body because of the risks she might take in childbirth." But the reason why we celebrate their undeniable bravery, the reason it strikes such a chord in us, may well be because it appeals to an ancient, partly-buried sense of fairness. In other words, perhaps on a subconscious level we still cling to the idea that men should be willing to die for women not because men are worth less, but because women have died so much more often for men.

For starters, Mr. Schwyzer's fundamental premise, that more women historically have died from giving birth to the next generation of humanity than men did in warfare is false. His statistic regarding the worldwide historic rate of maternal mortality–1%–appears to be far lower–on the order of an order of magnitude or more–than the historic rate of male mortality due to violent conflict. An easy mistake to make, if for no other reason than the modern world is much less violent than it used to be, but a mistake nonetheless. Thus, while the mortality rate for men in war has fallen in the last 100 years (despite the horribly efficient lethality of modern warfare), the advent of penicillin has slashed the mortality rate for mothers comparably more in the last century. This is evinced by the death toll of women in childbirth cited by Mr. Schwyzer–800 women worldwide, per year–a number so low relative to the number of men killed in inter-group warfare each year around the world that I won't even bother to research a precise figure.

This brings me to my next critique of Mr. Schwyzer's essay…he implies a duty for the men of a developed country–in this case, the United States–to willingly sacrifice their lives for that of American women, using maternal mortality numbers from un- and under-developed countries as justification. Trouble is, these regions of the world are places where life for both men and women is much more nasty, brutish, and short. With all due respect to Mr.

Schwyzer, this attempt at apples to oranges comparison does not pass muster. At most, Third World maternal mortality may be used to browbeat Third World men into "manning up", as it were, to notions of Western chivalry. Yet as the Third World is literally littered with the graves of men who die for their families and societies, there is little need for Mr. Schwyzer to goad them further.

Third, Mr. Schwyzer exaggerates in his account of why women conceive and bear children. He seems to think that women go through childbirth as a favor to men, that somehow women volunteer to risk their lives, so as to bring children into the world for the sole benefit of men. Yet we see that, in a world with various methods of birth control and, failing that, abortion of the inconvenient, there are not many places in this world where a woman brings a child to term that she herself does not desire. Whatever benefit men secure from childbirth–parallelling the input they have in the decision that their child lives or dies in utero–is merely peripheral under this calculus. As a consequence, I suspect that childbirth, grueling and painful as it can be, is as much for the mother-to-be as it is for the father, and is probably more so.

With these three critiques–false maternal/male warfare mortality data, applying Third World maternal mortality data to justify first world male behavior vis-a-vis first world women, and selfish, rather than magnanimous female rationales for childbearing–Mr. Schwyzer's thesis quickly flames out.

Shifting gears toward the socio-political angle, one thing I found interesting about Mr. Schwyzer's essay hitching Messrs McQuinn, Blunk and Teves' act of self-sacrifice to the Lifeboat Feminism mule-cart, is how their very selflessness undermines the sort of equalitarianism to which Mr. Schwyzer subscribes. For these three men's sacrifice is evidence that, despite the multiple generations-long feminist campaign to eradicate masculinity and bring about a shiny happy androgynous matriarchal society, the instinct of the male to protect his woman and family is still very much alive. It is written on the hearts of men to protect their mate, family, tribe, and home, and that the three unrelated female companions of these three men are still alive today are a testament to that uniquely male drive. (I note here no Aurora woman shielded their boyfriend or husband from the shooter's bullets). Contra Mr. Schwyzer, just as women give birth out of self-interest, a man's instinct to protect has very little to do with a subconscious sense of cosmic fairness. It is instinctual. Not automatic, mind you, but a strong predisposition nevertheless, and most certainly not a social construct. For if it were, due to the social engineering efforts of Mr. Schwyzer's ideological fellow travellers, in a society that boasts a sub-replacement birthrate (1 in 5 women will never have children), epidemic female serial monogamy, and easy divorce with cash and prizes for choice mommies, these men would likely have never given a second thought of sacrificing their lives to protect women who, odds are, will not hold up their end of the grand social bargain. Rather, they would have abandoned these women to the fate that equality demands…every person for him- and herself. Like this guy, who I note was roundly denounced by both men and women.

I also note that this latter fellow, this equalitarian guy, remains alive to propagate his genes, and is scheduled to marry later this year the woman and children he left behind in that dark theater.

This brings me to my last point, the hoary notion of the disposable male. While Mr. Schwyzer is superficially correct that societies on the edge of survival must protect their womenfolk, once a society achieves a certain number of breeding pairs, the need to protect the women at the expense of men falls away. After that population level, men and women are both resources to be conserved in equal measure. This is because, while the need for women as gestators of the next generation is obvious, the need for men wrt follow-on generations is less clear but no less necessary. A society cannot easily suffer the widescale loss of its men, be it by violence, incarceration, dissipation, or disenfranchisement. Each man, the carrier of civilization by dint of his created nature, is, today more than ever, necessary. Particularly those well-socialized men inclined to husband their women, children, and families. Specific to us as Americans, what do we need more of at this moment in time? More women whelping children irresponsibly? Or men interested and willing to right our capsized civilization?

As I wrote two years ago in my post "They Were Expendable":

> [T]o those–particularly men–who think that men are expendable and that a society can well withstand the loss, either through death, warfare, or social ostracism/incarceration of a large proportion of its men, I suggest that the data speaks otherwise. The example of the urban ghetto should demonstrate to all that a society that loses large proportions of its men is a society with its future very much in jeopardy. For it is men and men alone who bequeath the gift of civilization to women and children. The society that loses its men faces many of the same challenges that a society that loses a large segment of its women–the inability to propagate and socialize the next generation of society.

The equalitarians want you to undervalue your male lives and overvalue the feminine. You are disposable to them, because, well, you are disposable to them. They wish to appropriate your labors–and even your lives–in service to the matriarchy, and discard whatever shell remains. I say the opposite…you, my brothers, are not disposable. You are more necessary than ever…and the next generation of girls and boys desperately needs your contribution. How are they to know civilization without you? So ignore the reductionist scribblings of the likes of Mr. Schwyzer–your life is not worth less than a woman's and is certainly not fodder to ensure an ungrateful matriarchal society keeps stumbling downward toward its eventual mud hut destiny.

In short, exhort you, my brothers, to be quite selective about whom you invite under your protective covering. No one is entitled to your sacrifice by mere virtue of their plumbing or proximity to you when disaster strikes.

Orthodox Russians: No Free Pass for Pussy Riot

W.F. Price · 7 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Despite calls for mercy from international celebrities such as Madonna, prosecutors are seeking three-year prison sentences for three Russian women who desecrated a church in a planned publicity stunt intended to promote their band.

> Prosecutors on Tuesday called for three-year sentences for the members of a feminist punk band who performed an anti-Vladimir Putin stunt in Moscow's main cathedral, ignoring demands by human rights groups that the three women be set free.
> Prosecutor Alexander Nikiforov portrayed the request as lenient, saying it takes into account the fact that two of the defendants are young mothers and that they have good references.
> The hooliganism charges the three women face can carry a sentence of up to 7 years in prison.
> The three women – Nadezhda Tolokonnikova, 23; Maria Alekhina, 24; and Yekaterina Samutsevich, 29 – have been in custody for five months following the February stunt, in which they took over a church pulpit in Christ the Savior cathedral for less than a minute, singing, high-kicking and dancing.
> Their case is part of a widening government crackdown on dissent that followed Putin's election in March and caused strong protests in Russia and abroad. Musicians including Madonna, the Who's Pete Townshend and Neil Tennant of the Pet Shop Boys have urged their release, and Amnesty International has called them prisoners of conscience.

The majority of Russians have little sympathy for the women, who are self-described feminists, but they are receiving a fair amount of support from the usual crowd of Westerners that sees any desecration of Christian symbols as a positive thing.

Although I, too, am inclined to see the sentence as a bit excessive, and would settle for a couple months community service along the lines of shoveling horse manure in police stables, these kinds of things ought to be put in perspective.

Say, for example, some skinheads burst into a Muslim service and started playing white power songs in one of New York's main Mosques. What would their sentence likely be? I think they'd be very lucky to get off with only three years, and Amnesty International certainly wouldn't take up their case.

Cases like these very clearly demonstrate the West's political priorities, which in some ways have traded places with the former Soviet Union, which notoriously burned and shut down Christian churches across the land under Communism. As for the feminists, they are starting to look more and more like political tools in service to a vague, but powerful ruling ideology that has emerged in the West.

Hooray! America has World's Most Dominant Lesbians!

W.F. Price · 10 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In a stunning surprise, the American womyn won gold in Olympic soccer (er, football), making team Japan their little bitches.

The entire United States is frantically celebrating this awesome display of grrrlpower, which lesbians are marking by having carnal relations at least once this month with their spouses/domestic partners.

American men are putting on aprons, baking cakes, and knitting soccer leggings for their female betters. Fathers across the land are getting misty-eyed thinking of how wonderful it would be if their daughters could grow up to be deep-voiced, fuzzy-faced ball-kickers — just like the American womyn's soccer team.

I am so proud to be an American today. It really chokes me up…

But I have this nagging feeling that we still haven't quite yet achieved the greatness of the 1983 East German "women's" track and field squad:

Dave made a brief appearance on Al Jazeera to decry the fact that people say mean stuff on the internet. Because it’s supposed to be really shocking that people say such nasty stuff online, Al Jazeera put his face on the screen just to make sure viewers felt as shocked and disgusted as they should have.

For the rest of the time, a few female nerds bemoan the fact that guys say things that bother them. The theme of the show was essentially “How dare they say these things! It shouldn’t be allowed!”

Susan G. Komen Purge Subordinates Charity to Feminists

The hysterical reaction in January to Komen's decision to divest from abortion-providing Planned Parenthood, probably largely at the request of Christian donors, has had the desired effect of bringing the group to the feminist heel. Several leaders, including the founder, are stepping down as a result of the very loud assault, greatly amplified by mainstream media outlets, prompted by the "mistake."

> DALLAS — The Susan G. Komen for the Cure foundation, the nation's largest breast-cancer research and support organization, announced a major leadership shake-up on Wednesday that includes the founder of the nonprofit.
> President Liz Thompson will leave Komen next month, and founder Nancy Brinker, who has long been the public face of the charity, will give up her chief executive post, according to a statement from the Dallas-based organization.

Komen is having a hard time meeting fundraising goals, and although many on the left are spinning this to suggest that it's because people overwhelmingly wanted them to pay for abortions, it's likely because people didn't actually realize that Komen was funding abortion providers before the matter went public.

Although few Americans support an outright ban on abortion, most would prefer not to pay for them, especially while they try to donate to a life-saving rather than life-ending cause.

The fallout from this incident has revealed American feminism for the totalitarian movement that it is. No dissent can be tolerated. Differences of opinion must be quashed. All must be in agreement on all issues — especially sacred cows like abortion.

Additionally, it demonstrates that those who will be punished most severely for dissenting are women themselves. One thing we men should keep in mind is that women who question feminism and its core tenets will face enormous pressure for doing so.

Perhaps we should consider defending women who do so with more vigor than we have so far, because it looks as though they will need it.

A Few More Days

I'm approaching the end of my summer time with my kids, so for the next few days I'd like to take it easy and spend quality time with them. I'll keep posting submissions and some of my own content (and working on the site behind the scenes), but it's going to be a long time and many lengthy absences until next summer, so I'll try to enjoy what I've got left, and that means the content will be pretty light until mid-week or so.

Hope everyone else is enjoying summer! It's been great so far for me.

Cherish the time you get with your little ones — you never get it back.

Saudis Building Women-Only City

W.F. Price · 13 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In an effort to bolster female participation in industry, Saudi Arabia is building a city entirely for female workers in the eastern part of the desert kingdom. The city is supposed to allow women to be productive without violating strict Wahhabi rules prohibiting integration of sexes.

Interestingly, some of the more conservative elements of Wahhabi Islam seem to jibe with radical feminist ideals, such as removal of men from women's lives.

> Saudi Arabia, which operates under Sharia Law, does not forbid women from having jobs. But only 15 percent of the country's workforce is female, and the women-only city is expected to increase that figure.
> Under Wahhabism, the branch of Sunni Islam that governs the laws of Saudi Arabia, there is segregation of men and women, with most women working for all-female firms, according to the Sydney Morning Herald.
> Even before construction gets underway on the women-only city, other similar enclaves are being planned throughout the kingdom, according to al-Rasheed.
> "We have plans to establish a number of women-only industries in various parts of the kingdom," he told the Daily Mail.

East Asian societies, such as Korea in the 1960s and 70s and then China in the 80s and 90s, harnessed female labor most effectively, but only through a brutal lack of concern for women who made the wrong choices. Without any hope of support, unwed expectant mothers aborted children in the vast majority of cases, and those who followed through and had children were cast out into the street with nothing. Such callous treatment of women is highly unlikely in Islamic society, which invented chivalry and honors the feminine to a degree unknown in Confucian societies.

Radical gender segregation will only come back to haunt Saudi leaders, because women instinctively seek a male patron, and cut loose from family they will naturally "marry" the state or the corporations they work for. Furthermore, men will have to run the infrastructure of the city, including transportation, plumbing, power generation and other male occupations.

The result, inevitably, will be a great deal of prostitution of one sort or another in these cities, and even more fornication. Harems, as oriental potentates have known for ages, can only be maintained with massive, expensive security. Virtual armies of eunuchs were required to keep an eye on sultans' and Chinese emperors' harems, and even that probably wasn't enough to prevent a fair amount of fooling around.

The genius of monogamy lies in the fact that every husband is tasked with keeping an eye on only one wife, obviating the need for formal sexual control of females. And even in that setup it's always been a difficult job.

The reason female sexuality has always required control is that motherhood is expensive to maintain, as the US armed forces are discovering since the integration of women. Unwed motherhood requires a social tax, whether formal or not, and people have always chafed at having to pay this price.

As Wahhabism crumbles under feminist pressure, we can expect to see a very rapid destabilization of the Islamic family – as well as loosening sexual mores – in Saudi Arabia. Islam has not always been known for its strict sexual morality, and in fact Westerners saw eastern lands as nirvanas of sexual liberation as recently as the early 20th century. While Britain seethed under the restrictions of bourgeois Victorian morality in the 19th century, men fantasized about the forbidden pleasures of Turkish baths, oriental brothels and dancing girls.

It was only in the postwar era that decadence was reversed, and Islam came to be seen as a more restrictive regime. However, that era is probably coming to a close, even as the West reaches its moral nadir.

On Modesty

Elusive Wapiti · 15 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Religious commentator Tim Laitinen, a writer who discusses single's issues frequently, penned the following thought-provoking thoughts about modesty (HT: Laura Grace Robbins) over at the Christian site "Crosswalk". A snippet:

> Um, ladies? Can we talk?

> [H]ow many men at your church are met each Sunday with amazingly short skirts, provocatively deep necklines, and sheer fabrics of the thinnest materials which cling ever so delicately to, well, your most delicate spots? Swimsuits may hide the bare essentials, but some of the things some of you wear to church don't really cover up much else.

> You expect us to be men of God. You hope that we be chaste, as well you should. After all, you know what lust is. You know that just looking lustfully at somebody is a sin. Might you be contradicting yourselves, meanwhile, when you wear what you wear and then get upset when we sin with our eyes?

> What is the extent of your culpability when we men lust after you? Are we men supposed to simply look up at the ceiling when you walk by? How fair is it for you to figure you can dress however you want to dress, and it's up to us men to deal however we can with the sin it causes us?

> Unless, of course, you genuinely do intend to seduce men in your church by what you wear – and the way you wear it? Maybe it's a chicken-and-egg kind of thing; do women dress immodestly to gain attention, or does the attention women receive simply by being a woman feed even a subconscious desire to stoke their allure? After all, women have been known to dress to impress other women, but men can encourage such fashionista posturing for their own benefit and disguise it as female empowerment.

> The writer of Proverbs 11:22 put it bluntly: "like a gold ring in a pig's snout is a beautiful woman who shows no discretion."

Seems the feedback to Mr. Laitinen's article was mixed, with a couple of his readers calling him a "fundy" for his efforts, while others going as far as likening his Crosswalk article to "blaming a rape victim" by suggesting women take responsibility for the signals they radiate. As for me, I thought his article focused too much on how female immodesty may cause men to stumble, and not enough on the adverse effects of immodesty on women themselves. In short, I think the article failed the "why should women give a crap" test and, as a result, was less effective than it could have been.

For instance, there is the safety issue (Mr. Laitinen did touch on this in his article, but not enough in my opinion). Immodest dress is an advertisement of sorts, one that suggests a woman is of a particularly low character and may be agreeable to a certain licentiousness. While a woman can attempt to transfer all responsibility onto men for accurately interpreting her non-verbal signals in this way, the fact of the matter remains that she may be wearing a hooker's uniform…and that can be very confusing sometimes. Further, in dressing provocatively, she is relying on the good breeding and restraint of those in her midst to not act on her provocation. A small minority of men out there are not socialized to grant women grace or treat them with kindness when they violate a social norm, and women who forget that fact put themselves at risk.

Related to safety is health, as in immodest dress exposes you to the elements. You are not prepared if the weather turns for the worst, or if an unpredicted or emergent situation arises that requires covering up for personal protection from wind, cold, precipitation, or sunlight. As before, immodest dress can put a woman in the position becoming dependant on others for her well being, or, in extreme cases, for her very survival.

Third, it has been said that it is in women's interest to keep the "price" of sex relatively high, and each woman who dresses revealingly serves to increase the supply and therefore depress the market price of sex. Immodest dress contributes to this phenomenon by flooding the environment with sexual signals, cheapening not only herself but every other woman around her. Her dress lowers social expectations and enables an environment that condones casual / extra-marital sexual encounters.

Immodest dress also makes it more difficult for "good girls" to find the kind of love they want. The type of guys who respond positively to immodest dress are not likely to be the guys who are good for an upright girl; conversely, guys who respond to, prefer, and appreciate modest dress are more likely to treat you like a daughter of God (if saved) or a fellow creation of God (if not). Moreover, by dressing immodestly, women contribute to a climate where they and other women are pressured to dress down in an effort to out-compete other immodestly dressed women for male attention. For their part, quality men are turned off by this slouching-toward-Gomorrah environment, or are themselves enticed into sin from all the female flesh on display.

Similarly, immodest dress is a barely disguised assault on the minds of the husbands and boyfriends of other women. Someday this will be you, with a husband and/or boyfriend…will you appreciate it much if another were to troll her wares–unconsciously or no–in front of your man? So why would you do the same to other women?

Sixth, modestly dressed women are taken more seriously. By everyone. At work or at play, in professional, casual, or romantic settings, a woman's mind, ideas, and values are taken more seriously if her scantily clad body is not competing for attention. Like it or not, how one's dress influences the sorts of conclusions that others form about your character, your habits, your social class, what your intentions are, or even if you are likely to have diseases. Dressing as if one is bankrupt defaults on all these questions. At best, your interlocutors will have to "work past" a misleading initial impression; at worst, they may judge the book by its cover.

Seventh, dressing modestly demonstrates respect for yourself and, just as importantly, others. It's not all about you, and how much attention you can garner. A modestly dressed woman demonstrates respect for herself by not overtly advertising her wares, as it were. In addition, a modestly dressed woman demonstrates respect for others for no other reason than declining to employ sex to manipulate the environment to her advantage. An immodest woman does neither.

Last, Mr. Laitinen led his article by addressing his female readers as "ladies". In this he both abuses a very semantically laden word, and gives the average woman far too much credit, for the appellation "lady" presupposes a certain decorum, mode and style of dress, and socially constructive actions. "Lady" is very much a title to be earned by dint of right conduct, not distributed willy-nilly based on an accident of birth. It is the hallmark of a lady to see to the comfort of others around her, to keep her conduct above reproach, and to be both chaste and discreet. One way this all starts, is with modesty.

Why I'm Not a Feminist

Featured Guest · 15 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Henry Laasanen

I have seen lately lot of articles with the question: what is feminism? I am referring to articles like… (1) Who are the real feminists?; (2) "I'm Not a Feminist, But . . . I'm Taking This Class."; (3) What No One Else Will Tell You About Feminism; (4) Not A Feminist? Caitlin Moran Asks, Why Not?

Many of the articles present very naive (and stupid) definitions of feminism and feminists.

Lindy West (Jezebel) defines feminism and feminists in following fashion:

> To identify as a feminist is to acknowledge that women are people, and, as such, women deserve the same social, economic, and political rights and opportunities as other styles of people (i.e., men-people).

Gina Barreca defines feminism same kind of way:

> Feminism is the belief that women are actually human beings.

Defining feminism by the phrase "women are people", doesn't say much, because them nearly all people (masculists included) would therefore be feminists. A superficial definition of feminism doesn't tell us what separates feminism from other ideologies.

What is feminism?

There are two or three core theses of feminism, which are articulated in multiple sources. ["By feminism we mean both an awareness of women's position in society as well as the disadvantage or inequality compared with that of men, and also a desire to remove those disadvantages." (Bristol Women's Studies Group "Half the Sky: An Introduction to Women's Studies,"1979, p. 3]

1. The core belief of feminism: women are somehow a disadvantaged group in society compared to men.
2. Desire to do something about the inequalities women face in the society.
3. Women's experiences should be heard as a true representation of the world.

How do we know that women are a disadvantaged group compared to men? Well, there are no comparative studies on the subject. As a masculist I would say that if we compare different areas of life, men have 80-90 % more equality problems (conscription, custody problems, life expectancy and so on) than women.

Women's disadvantaged position is the core belief in feminism that can't be questioned. It's like the belief in god. If you don't have blind faith in the oppression of women, you are not a feminist.

Nearly all the feminists believe in some sort of Marxist version of gender power relationships, where men are "the capitalists" and women are the "proletariat". And we all know that it is impossible for "proletariat" to oppress "the capitalists". Lindy West puts it loud and clear:

> "Feminism is simple. The "patriarchy" does "exist."

Some sort of patriarchy is necessary for feminism, because without patriarchy it's hard to claim that men have privileges in the society. In the beginning of 1970's we had the gender role theory, but when masculists pointed out that the masculine role is more harmful and restrictive for men than feminine role for women, radical feminist and profeminists abandoned the gender role theory and hopped on the patriarchy bandwagon.

Mainstream feminism

The ugly, hairy and angry feminist stereotype is not the most common form of feminism today. Instead, we have "mainstream feminism." Mainstream feminism is some sort of opportunistic compromise between liberal, radical, gynocentric and other types of feminisms.

Mainstream feminism advances the politically correct and widely accepted ideas of different feminisms.

Typical ideas in mainstream feminism:

1. Violence against women is a bigger sin than other kind of violence.
2. The gender pay gap is one of biggest equality problems.
3. Workplace segregation is an equality problem.
4. We should have more women in leadership positions.

In the Nordic countries mainstream feminism has morphed into state-enforced feminism, where the state promotes feminist ideas of equality. The only accepted men's equality problem is the lack of paternity leave for dads, which has the hidden feminist agenda of promoting women's position in the workplace.

Why I am not a feminist

There are several reasons why I am not a feminist:

1. I don't talk enough about women's problems. I am a masculist and I talk about men's problems.
2. I don't believe in patriarchy or men's privileges in the society. Actually, I think that men have 80-90 % more equality problems than women.
3. I believe many men's equality problems exist that the majority of feminists don't even acknowledge as problems. Equality in reproductive rights, equality in custody cases, equality in welfare state benefits (women get much more money from the government than men) etc.
4. I would like to see a comparative study on the subject: which gender has it worse? A feminist would be scared as hell of such a study that might undermine the core belief of feminism.

Yes, I believe that women are people and that women should have the same possibilities in life as men, but that doesn't make me a feminist. It doesn't make anyone a feminist.

The way Peter Zohrab puts it, a feminist has a "women are the oppressed group" attitude toward equality. Not all feminists think oppression of women is the fault of men. Men also could be oppressed through gender roles. Anyway, being a feminist means more weight is given to women's problems of than men's, and if women's and men's issues are in conflict, it's clear, whose side the feminist will take.

Background on Sweden and Extradition

W.F. Price · 17 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Some columnists are claiming Assange must be guilty, because nobody would ever have a reason to fear extradition from Sweden, the Swedes wouldn't allow it, they always look after human rights, etc.

Here's an example from the Guardian:

> The press chief of the Swedish foreign ministry said on Thursday that the fear of Ecuador's foreign minister that Assange would be sent on to the US by the Swedes, and even be executed, are utterly groundless…

Actually, there's historical precedent for Sweden doing just that. After WWII, a number of Baltic prisoners of war who had escaped to Sweden in the final days of the war were turned over to the USSR to face death or the gulag.

The Baltic states had been seized and occupied by the USSR first in 1939 due to the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact, and then briefly occupied until the German invasion of the USSR in 1941. Because the Soviet occupation of Baltic states was particularly brutal, featuring mass deportations, a number of Balts took up arms with the Wehrmacht, hoping to rid their country of Communism and then assert their independence after the war. This is similar to the strategy Finland adopted with some success prior to full-scale war on the Eastern Front. Unfortunately for the Balts (and everyone else who lived in the area), WWII devolved into total war, and the Red Army's triumph crushed their dreams of freedom from Soviet occupation.

Of those who managed to escape from the final, brutal battles of the Courland Pocket, which resulted in over a half-million casualties, a few made their way to Sweden. Some others, who escaped duty in Courland, were fortunate enough to surrender to Western powers, where they were often assigned guard duty in occupied Germany, generally working for the US Army.

Only about 150 made it to Sweden, but they hoped they would be spared the Soviet reprisals that followed the surrender of Army Group Courland. The Baltic soldiers had good reason to fear the Soviets; because the Baltic countries were annexed and declared part of the USSR, all who had taken up arms against the USSR were considered traitors and faced summary execution. The surrendering German soldiers, while not facing particularly pleasant prospects, were at least treated as prisoners of war with the right to return home after some period of forced labor.

So, Sweden had these Baltic soldiers in its hands after the war, and Stalin was putting a lot of pressure on the Swedes to turn them over. The Western powers had already refused to hand over Baltic soldiers they had captured, despite Soviet demands, but it didn't take Sweden long to cave in and hand theirs over to Stalin. Although not all were put to death, many were, and plenty of others died in Siberia. Perhaps the one thing that saved them from being slaughtered wholesale was the fact that this particular incident garnered a fair amount of attention in the Western press.

Some 50 years later, when the Baltic states finally regained independence, Sweden finally apologized for its moral failure. However, if I were Julian Assange, I wouldn't count on the Swedes never doing the same thing again.

And anyway, the US doesn't need Assange in its own territory. If he ends up in a Swedish prison, there will be plenty of time to work on him behind closed doors.

Julian Assange Granted Asylum, Britain and Sweden Enraged

W.F. Price · 17 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Rafael Correa, Ecuador's head of state, decided to grant asylum to the Australian activist earlier this week, creating a diplomatic impasse and prompting aggressive, belligerent language from Swedish and UK officials.

Assange isn't out of the woods yet, as he has to leave the embassy to get out of the UK, which has promised to arrest him and send him to Sweden as soon as he sets foot outside. Sweden wants to interrogate Assange on trumped up sex charges that conveniently surfaced while the US was trying to contain the damage caused by his leaks of diplomatic and classified material.

The reaction to Assange's reception of asylum, which included threats by Britain to violate diplomatic immunity and abusive name-calling on the part of Swedish politicians, pretty much proves that he will be persecuted in Europe, and also has the effect of casting the West in a totalitarian light.

The odd thing about the case, and what should arouse suspicion, is that even if Assange did what he was alleged to have done in Sweden, he would not be prosecuted in either Britain or the US, because it doesn't meet the standards of rape. This brings into question the extradition, and strongly suggests that he was being "rendered" to Sweden for political purposes. Furthermore, questions remain about chief accuser, Swedish feminist Anna Ardin, who has a history of shady dealings and political intrigue.

A lot of people scoffed at the notion that the prosecution could be politically motivated, and suggested that it's only a result of Sweden's insane laws. But I disagree. Does anyone seriously believe that nobody from the US embassy – or from Washington itself – called prosecutor Marianne Ny before she made her decision to go ahead with requesting the interrogation of Assange? You don't have to be a conspiracy theorist to suspect some quid pro quo here, and the tantrum Swedish politicians are throwing gives the game away.

Think, for example, of the thousands of illegal aliens who commit real crimes in the US and then flee the country to evade prosecution. In most of these cases, we never even hear about it, and nobody really cares.

What this episode shows us is how laws purported to "protect women" are, along with being in violation of the equal protection clause in the US, a great way for governments to control and oppress men. If a politician wants to claim the moral high ground in anything, all they have to do is say they're "protecting women" to shut up critics and cast the opposition as villains. It's even used to justify the ongoing, increasingly pointless war in Afghanistan.

However, although this tactic worked very well until fairly recently, it's starting to look like the sham it is. Whenever we hear politicians say they are doing something for women, we should be very suspicious, because it's all too often just a cover for something nefarious.

Now, the biggest question is how Assange will get out of the UK. It probably won't be easy, but it isn't impossible. If he can get into a diplomat's car, it won't be too difficult to get him across the channel to France, and then onto a plane or ship somewhere. However, if the London police are very vigilant, they may be able to prevent this from happening.

That isn't necessarily a bad thing. Protest movements tend to build around focal points, and a man virtually imprisoned in London could easily serve as one. Ultimately, keeping Assange holed up in London could prove to be a real embarrassment and inconvenience for the US and UK. Given the dishonest tactics used to silence him, that doesn't bother me a bit.

Germany Debates Paying SAHMs

Elusive Wapiti · 19 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Germany's ruling party, the CDU, skirmishes with the Greens over paying women to stay at home to care for their children, rather than send them to taxpayer-subsidized day care. Cue another skirmish in the mommy wars, as Brown Feminism and Red Feminism throw down in the government-spending octagon:

> Germany's conservative coalition is pushing to pay moms who stay home to care for children ages 1 to 3. Opposition parties are outraged, calling the plan an antiquated take on family politics.

> The proposed law, which is scheduled to be debated for a second time in parliament at the end of August, might ease some of the burden on the system. Women would receive 150 euros per month (about $190) if they decide to look after their children ages 1 to 3 at home rather than sending the child to government-funded daycare.

> Critics of the plan argue that the money could be better spent shoring up the gaps in publicly funded daycare. "The estimated costs of 1.2 billion euros a year should be spent on providing high quality early childhood daycare," says Katja Dörner, spokeswoman for family issues with the Green Party.

No matter who wins this skirmish in the German mommy wars, taxpaying German men are sure to be stuck with the bill. If there is one characteristic that unites Brown (Left-Conservative) Feminism and Red (Left-Liberal) Feminism in their effort to subvert the traditional family, is that money shall be transferred from men to women via the coercive auspices of the matriarchal State.

I don't think it's much hyperbole at all to assert that these male-to-female wealth transfers are the health of both organized feminism and the State.

On Foreign and American Women

W.F. Price · 19 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Comparisons between American and foreign women are a fairly hot topic in the androsphere, and have been for years now. Roosh has made a career out of reporting on the attractiveness and mating customs of various women in Europe and beyond, some sites are dedicated to warning American men away from American women, and our own uncle Elmer has submitted some informative posts on the topic.

I haven't written about foreign women all that much, largely because I prefer to keep my personal life to myself, but I do have a fair amount of experience with them, starting from a very young age, as I've lived in both Europe and Asia at various points in my life. So, what I'd like to do is give a little background from my perspective, which starts in the mid-80s when I was a mere boy living in France.

First, I'd like to point out that the "submissive foreign women" meme is pure garbage, and actually an inaccurate racial caricature that developed as a result of American conquest and occupation of Asian lands. If heavily-armed foreigners had dropped atomic bombs on your country and occupied it you'd be submissive, too. European women, for their part, have never been known as submissive until recently, and this is only because feminists want to paint the men who like them as control freaks intent on dominating women (sound familiar to men who've been through family court?), and also to cast American women's behavior as world-normative, which it is not at all.

As a boy in France, French girls came off as forward and a bit precocious. The pretty ones were aware of their sexuality at a young age, and would remove their clothing in public without a second thought, even as they were just entering puberty. Where I came from, this was unthinkable. The girls would openly favor boys they liked, acting sweet, yet unabashed. French sexuality was open and not fraught with the shame and prudishness that characterizes America. For boys, this was pleasant, and also more humane, because they weren't made to feel ashamed of their own budding sexuality, which was allowed to develop normally absent the fear and guilt that characterize American adolescence.

After my stint in France as a boy, I returned home to the US and quickly readjusted to American life. Children are very flexible, so in some ways it was as though I'd never left. However, at 16 I returned to France for a summer, and after a couple weeks my French came back as fluent as before, and along with it came a reawakening of the inner French boy. Suddenly, I was hanging out with other teenage French kids, including girls of course. We'd cruise along the beach, go to discos and have a good time. One girl who liked me picked me up on a motorbike and we went riding around town having a blast. There I was, this big, blond American kid riding on the back seat of a little dirt bike with a 15-year-old French girl driving me around. Although the girls were forward and blasé about nudity, they certainly weren't sluts; they just liked boys and liked to have fun. It helped, of course, that they were pretty and relatively petite, which added to their feminine charm.

Sometimes, I wish I'd stayed in France. I'm fairly certain my life would have been far more pleasant than it turned out here, but such was not my fate.

However, one thing I'd like to stress is that American girls weren't all that bad in the early 90s. The girls of my generation – kids born in the 70s (I don't really identify with older genXers) – had a sweet sort of innocence back then, and a lot of them were quite pretty. In fact, many could hold their own with French girls in the looks department. Unfortunately, that is no longer the case. Although I truly wish I could say that we have plenty of pretty girls and young women in the US, something has happened in the last 20-odd years. I don't know what it is, but young women are noticeably chunkier and have odd, unhealthy looking physiques. Although I've occasionally wondered whether something is wrong with my memory, because it doesn't seem possible that they could change so quickly, both photographic and statistical evidence confirm it.

In addition to being decent-looking, American girls didn't behave all that badly back then, either. The really aggressive in-your-face feminism hadn't trickled down from the universities yet, and didn't do so until the mid-late 90s or so. There were still plenty of pretty and sweet middle class American girls when I was in high school, so even though I'd had a great time with French girls, the idea that foreign women were better never crossed my mind, and I was quite content with my home-grown high school sweethearts.

We children of the 70s were a transitional generation in a way that few other Americans have been. All generations experience social transitions of one form or another, but ours was particularly broad in scope. We saw the old America fade away right before our eyes. As children, we still participated in Thanksgiving pageants without any national guilt, our grandparents held views that are anathema to contemporary culture, and our society was much more tightly bonded than it is today. But by the time we graduated from high school in the 90s, everything had changed. It was demoralizing: all the promises of our childhood (and we were raised on unfulfilled promises) had evaporated, and we faced an uncertain future.

I'd put the early 90s as the beginning of the real gender wars. Before that it had been simmering for a while, but it didn't pervade all of society. The emergence of Riot Grrls and other forms of popular feminism, which were essentially anti-male hate movements, really exploded at that point. Demonization of men in popular culture became commonplace. This is when movies like Sleeping With the Enemy and Thelma and Louise came out. Men were characterized as harshly as the Japanese had been after they bombed Pearl Harbor, and exposed to open hatred in universities and schools. White men in particular were singled out for abuse at that point, with the "blond beast" becoming a stock character in films. In the meanwhile, of course, black men were quietly being rounded up and shuffled into prisons, but it wasn't much fun being a white boy on a liberal campus back then.

Feeling alienated by American culture at that point, I decided to study Chinese. Having studied Latin in school, Chinese had some appeal. China is essentially the Rome of the East, and its civilization fascinated me, so after a couple years of Chinese, I thought I ought to visit the country to learn to speak the language. My experience in France taught me that if you really want to learn a language, you ought to live amongst the natives.

At 22, I bought a ticket to Beijing, got a visa, and a few months later hopped on a plane to go see how things would turn out in China. I stayed with a Chinese friend's family for a couple months, and then decided I wanted to see how things would go on my own, so I rented an apartment and got a job teaching to extend my visa. Finding work in China was easy at the time; the demand for English skills was very strong, so I could write, edit, teach and tutor at my convenience. Although I didn't make much compared to American "foreign experts" (mainly engineers and businessmen), I was paid quite a bit more than the locals, so my standard of living was pretty high. I could also speak enough Chinese after a couple months with my friend's family to get by in the Chinese economy.

Back then, foreigners and Chinese were separated, and foreigners shopped and lived in special stores and apartments that were far more expensive than those the locals used. I, on the other hand, got around that by networking with Chinese, thereby saving a great deal of money. One of my neighbors in my old digs in Beijing, another young American named Jon who was living in similar circumstances, subsequently went native and is now a well-known Beijing actor. My Chinese has largely left me over the years, but Jon now has near-native fluency (although you can still hear his American accent).

Of course, as a young man, women were a major interest. It didn't take me long to find a girlfriend — a sharp, good-looking Chinese girl with a ton of personality and very competent English. This girl was a colorful character, and I grew quite fond of her over time. She was bold, very smart and funny. She also had an interesting family background. Her grandfather had been a high-ranking Japanese officer during the WWII Japanese occupation of northern China, and he had a child – her father – with a local Chinese woman. After the war, this was an enormous shame for her grandmother, and her half-Japanese father's childhood was very harsh. Because of the stigma attached to his birth, he had no hope of entering respectable society, so he followed a path taken by Beijing's talented outcasts for centuries: he became an actor in Peking Opera.

Although my girlfriend wasn't exactly a typical Chinese girl, she certainly wasn't a Westerner, and she wasn't that far out of the ordinary. "Submissive" is the last word I'd use to describe her. In some ways Eastern women are more dominant than Americans. They are better at taking the initiative, they do not beat around the bush in regards to what they expect from a man, and they have very sharp tongues. However, they are very loyal to family, they take social taboos seriously, and they have absolutely no interest in being like men.

Ultimately, the girl left me out of loyalty to her family. At 23, I had no intention of getting married and becoming a provider. Like most young men, I just wanted to have my cake and eat it. So, my fun, smart and pretty Chinese girlfriend found herself a much older, much wealthier Swiss industrialist (her English was excellent by the time we parted ways, and that made her quite an attractive asset to expats) and married him. I was upset, naturally, but in retrospect she did very well for her family, and for Chinese that is a mandate, so I can't blame her at all. Today, we remain on good terms, and she owns and runs a successful international shipping business and is far wealthier than I am. I'm quite proud of her — I always told her she'd succeed in business.

Perhaps my Chinese girlfriend was a truly exceptional woman by Chinese standards. I'd like to think that's the case, but the fact is that women like that are a lot more common in China than they are in the US. The only American women I can think of who compare are all significantly older than I am. And it isn't the looks, although she did put serious, successful effort into maintaining her figure, which she retains after three children, but rather the attitude. When I hear feminists whining about "oppression" and "the patriarchy" and how hard women have it in the US, I can't help but feel contempt for them. There's a girl in very patriarchal China from a stigmatized prole family who, through her own wit and persistence, makes it big, and here we have upper-middle-class feminists who can do nothing but whine day in and day out about how they deserve more handouts from men. Our women have the world handed to them on a silver platter, and yet they have no gratitude, and find nothing useful to do. It certainly doesn't cast them in an attractive light.

However, even my largely positive experience with Chinese women wasn't enough to finally convince me to give up on Americans. As it turned out, I met an American girl shortly after getting back from China, and married her a few years later. She was a good-looking, athletic girl from a working-class family, and I figured we made a good enough match. Intellectually, we didn't have much in common, but I thought we were culturally similar enough to work it out, both of us being typical Seattlites of the common local Anglo-Norwegian sort. Feminism was the least of my concerns at the time. I just wanted a normal family and normal life, and to grow old amongst children and grandchildren. Unfortunately, the destabilization of the American family made it all too easy for the personality and character differences to kill the marriage when the strains of childrearing put us to the test. Before children, married life is not very difficult, so it's easy to overlook inherent weaknesses in the partnership. When you add screaming, pooping and barfing babies who need constant attention and a strained budget from one parent having to take time off to care for them, it becomes a lot more difficult to overlook the problems. Add feminist incentives to the mix, and the motivation to tough it out goes out the window.

It's odd how ambivalent one feels after a divorce. On the one hand, you know it wasn't meant to be and are relieved that it's over, but on the other you feel a sense of failure and loss. Children, of course, greatly magnify all this, and our barbaric family courts, egged on by gender feminists and sleazy profiteers, only push the knife in farther. I'm not sure we can blame American women entirely for divorce, because I know from personal experience that in many cases both parties weren't exactly thrilled with how the marriage turned out. There's a hint of tragedy that casts a shadow over marriage in the US, and I have come to the conclusion that it's probably the result of our very concept of marriage itself, and what we expect from the institution. The problem is that we carry expectations of eternal romance into marriage, and this too often sets people up for failure, because romance rarely lasts forever. As long as we look to marriage primarily as the means for permanently fulfilling our desire for romance, it will fail us in too many cases.

When it comes down to it, our concept of marriage is a childish, adolescent dream, and this has come to characterize women's views on what constitutes a proper marriage in the US. American men are not immune to adolescent fantasies, but they don't have such a view of marriage. It is because marriage is the fundamental act of fulfillment in the American woman's imagination that it has come to be defined by adolescent fantasy. Foreign women tend to have a far more practical view. Although they, too, demand romance, they have a far more realistic attitude concerning what comes after the wedding. More than anything else, it is this "grown up" attitude toward marriage that makes them attractive as prospective brides to American men.

American women – feminists in particular – are not happy about the outmarriage trend, and will continue to try to throw up obstacles to it. However, as long as they argue that marriage is a "right," they won't have much legal success, and I expect it to be increasingly common in coming years. Be this as it may, only a small proportion of American men will marry foreign women. It isn't exceedingly difficult, but there are both cultural and economic barriers, and of course there's the matter of sheer distance.

In conclusion, I'll try to summarize the reasons foreign women are attractive to American men. Keep in mind that most men who deliberately set out to marry a non-American woman are generally mature (over 30), and are making their choice based on rational considerations rather than puppy love.

1. Foreign women have realistic attitudes toward marriage.

This cannot be overemphasized. Men are not so stupid that they can't tell the difference between a woman who acts like a wife and one who acts like a live-in girlfriend. Foreign women go into marriage knowing it will take work, and it won't always be a romantic dream. They don't generally complain about doing housework and other chores, because they know what they are getting into. Women who are resentful about things like cooking and cleaning – and American women tend to be resentful about it and complain even when the men help them – can make a man's life very unpleasant.

2. Foreign women do not have weird gender/sex hangups

American women have done what would seem impossible: they have combined prudishness with excessive immodesty and vulgarity. One moment they will be denouncing men as predators and perverts, and the next they will be encouraging slutwalks, talking about their vaginas and whoring it up at parties. Foreign women – Europeans in particular, but Asians too – are more comfortable with male sexuality, do not have hangups about accommodating it, and yet manage to do so without coming off as skanks. Furthermore, they do not ape men, preferring instead to be comfortable in their own female bodies (I've found that Dutch women have a very nice combination of taste and femininity). There is no bigger turn-off than a woman who denounces male sexuality and then proceeds to act like a bitch in heat.

3. Foreign women take better care of themselves

Although PUAs would put looks at the top of the list, I'm putting it last, because once you've found someone you're happy with in the looks department, it doesn't have much influence on the decision to tie the knot. However, a woman's attitude toward keeping up her appearance will definitely make a difference down the line, so it is important in that regard. Neither Asian nor European women would be caught dead in the typical outfit American women wear to the grocery store. Furthermore, they'd never willingly display a muffin-top or other unsightly rolls of flesh. They will make a real effort to stay in shape even while married, and are a lot less likely to "let themselves go." American women have fallen so far in this department that they now let themselves go even before they get married.

Finally, I'd point out that all three areas of failure are symptoms of a general sense of entitlement; the idea that women are owed both support and praise simply for existing, and have no responsibility for anything other than their own pleasure. For American women to get over this, we have to stop treating them as princesses from birth, and teach them to be virtuous rather than entitled and selfish. In fact, we have been doing the opposite for at least a generation, and the effect has been horrific. Every teacher that praises little girls merely for having vaginas, every father who blames boys for his own daughter's sexual antics, and every mother who teaches her daughter to be duplicitous and domineering toward men is doing us all a disservice. Just as we wouldn't teach boys that they have a right to beat up smaller kids and steal from them or vandalize property, we have to stop teaching girls to act on their less noble impulses. In that, we have failed our women miserably, and deprived the better part of two generations of the opportunity to have healthy, normal families.

Augusta Admits Two Women

W.F. Price · 20 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Augusta National, until this week a private men's club, is now a mixed-sex club featuring two women, Darla Moore and Condoleezza Rice. Is this a tragedy, a triumph, or something else entirely?

Atlanta sports columnist Mark Bradley thinks it's great, and writes that the organization has changed the world for the better:

> Some may see this as the fall of one of the last bastions of male-dom, but here's what we say to such folks: Come out of that cave, men. Nothing is the way it used to be, and a lot of what used to be wasn't right and/or proper to begin with. Credit Payne for realizing that there's a world outside the gates of a golf course. Credit him for being the man who finally made happen what needed to happen.
> So long as Augusta National was men-only, the question would have been asked: "Why is it men-only?" There was no good answer to that, and there could never have been a good answer. The only right response was to render the question moot. Billy Payne has, and Augusta National is better for it. And so, in a small but significant way, are we.

Oh come on. What "significant" difference does it make to the vast majority of Americans that one of the most exclusive clubs in the country added a couple more elites?

Because the club has become a fixture of the political and business elite of the US, this move was probably inevitable. Elitist societies tend to lack what the French revolutionaries called "fraternité" (a sense of brotherhood), and the divide between elites and the rest of the country in the US has grown considerably over the last half century or so.

One of the historical realities that is often conveniently ignored by "pro-equality" feminists is that societies that feature many powerful women – and there have been a lot of them – are typically highly stratified. Social hierarchy and female power go hand in hand. It's quite natural if you think about it: who's usually more concerned about social status, men or women?

Augusta is simply adapting to the new normal, but it might as well have been part of it for years, so perhaps Mr. Bradley is correct in writing that there's no good reason for the club to be men only anymore. However, to suggest this is progress is absurd.

The Mess That Cheaters Create

Elusive Wapiti · 20 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Following up on August 17th's "Jerry Springer On Wheels" post, in which a mobile "who's your daddy" RV is trolling the inner city hawking insta-paternity tests, a better case for mandatory 100% paternity testing at birth, I don't think I could make up on my own:

> Q: My [now dead from terminal illness] husband's parents wish to keep in touch with me and my toddler-age son, as he is the only link they have to their only child. The problem is that my son is not my husband's biological child. I had an affair, the biological father dumped me upon realizing I was pregnant, and my husband (to cut the complicated story short) decided to raise the baby as his own. But I feel incredibly guilty whenever my in-laws talk to me about how grateful they are to have a grandchild to remember their son, or make comparisons between my son and my husband when he was at a similar age. I feel like I need to come clean with them before they develop a strong attachment to him. They are already talking about changing their will to include their "grandson." What should I do?

> A: Your late husband was your baby's father. In untangling your tale, my reading is that that you were married to your late husband, you cheated and became pregnant, your husband knew, but he stepped up and claimed paternity. He also was your boy's father in every other sense. Yes, you will have quite a story to tell your son when he's older, and I believe he is entitled to hear it. (When you do bring this up, you can put the best face on the fact that your husband, his father, loved him and wanted to raise him, and not cast his origin story as that his biological father was a slime.) But I don't think your late husband's parents need to hear this.

> Keeping up a connection to your son's paternal family surely will only benefit him—he's not going to get anything from his actual biological father. And I don't see any reason to deprive your child of a potential inheritance. There has already been enough loss in your little boy's life. There's no call to cause an estrangement with loving grandparents; it's not deceptive that their son was your son's father.

Boy what a mess: Woman cheats. Tells hubby. Soon-to-be-dead hubby "mans up" and accepts child as his own. Her lies now become the couple's lies. The child's not-really-grandparents grandparents think he's theirs, and are thinking of placing this not-a-grandchild grandchild in their will.

In a decade or so, the truth will out, and the house built on this mendacious foundation will collapse, wounding everyone.

This woman made a mess of things. But consider all the hamster-enabling going on with this "advice": The adulteress isn't a "slime"; no, that title is reserved solely for the man with whom she cheated on her husband. He's the dirtbag, not her, the woman who wanted to get knocked up by a man other than her husband. Soon-to-be-dead beta hubby is lauded for "stepping up" to parent some thug/bad-boy's spawn,* setting up some sort of perverse expectation that female adultery and cuckolding will not only be tolerated but rewarded. In addition, the adulteress' perfidy is actually for a noble cause…after all, it's for the children!…without it, he won't get his inheritance from the not-the-baby-daddy side of the family. Come to think of it, her lie really isn't one…if the adulteress represents her child convincingly enough, long enough, as their biological grandchild, well said not-grandparents probably "see" some phantasmic genetic commonality in his face or dimples or whatever. Just so, as they say, and poof! Lie becomes truth. And a convenient side effect of all these high hamster-wheel RPMs is that the adulteress' shameful thug-boy dalliance is washed down the memory hole, to be dug up a decade or so later when the fact she binned her wedding vows is "old news".

The violence done to the biological father's place and role in the family in this column is breathtaking. The trust that the children born in the marriage are really the husband's is the critical element that drives men to marry in this day of marriage 2.0. And cuckolding apologia such as this advice column suggest to all those who read it that wifely fidelity doesn't matter and deceiving the husband is condoned…and that a fellow's job is merely to man up and invest in whatever child is born in the marriage, no matter who sired it.

Other than automatic mother custody in divorce, I can think of no substance more corrosive to the fragile connection that children already have with their dads than the duping of husbands by their adulterous wives.

* What a position she placed him in. He sees the end approaching, and the woman he thought was faithful to him presents him with the child of some man whom she found more sexually desirable than he. Talk about a Catch-22–he could be cruel to the child and kick them both out of his house, or he could further undermine other beta providers everywhere–the backbone of society–by accepting another man's child as his own.

Comment of the Week: Marriage to Foreigners Not Always Perfect

W.F. Price · 21 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter yinjia brings up some of the issues that can complicate relationships between Americans and foreigners, Japanese in particular. It isn't an entirely flattering portrayal of these marriages (and I might disagree on a few points), but she addresses some real issues men ought to think about. Additionally, she discusses the behavior of expats in Asia, and the fact that it can get out of hand. This is true. Unrestrained male sexuality isn't any better than the female kind, and one runs across it from time to time in particular expat settings.

Yinjia's comment provides a perspective worth considering for men who have thought about marrying foreigners. As she writes, these marriages tend to work out better than the average American marriage, but they are far from perfect, and involve their own challenges.

Yinjia:

First off, I'm female, but I honestly enjoy this website because it so neatly describes many of the problems I see in my peers, and some of the stereotypes I deal with every day as an active-duty military officer. As somebody who's lived in this part of the world, though, I don't think you've been quite fair about it in this article.

My first active-duty assignment was to a base outside of Tokyo, Japan. After two years there, I would say that while Asian women may be more appealing for most based on certain feminine traits, there are some additional cultural issues that can eventually become problems. Women from other cultures often have completely different expectations of marriage, and while this article presents this as an overall positive, there are negatives in there as well that do, for some, overwhelm anything else.

I can absolutely attest to the popularity of the Japanese women amongst the men – they were petite, gorgeous, feminine, and deferential. It also helped that many of them just want to date/marry foreigners, due to the beastly nature of their own dating and marital culture, and the way Japanese men treat them. Many of them also had far more relaxed attitudes towards sex than even your average American co-ed. It was, in short, a man's paradise.

A lot of the men on our base had Japanese wives. These ranged from young airmen, just starting out in their marriages, to old contractors who'd gone to Japan during Vietnam and never left. Usually, these were happy marriages, for all the reasons you list. However, it was around the ten year mark when you could start to see cultural differences creating huge tensions in many of these relationships.

Japanese women view marriage in a completely different light than we do, and they go about handling it in completely different ways. a typical Japanese woman will find herself the best job possible in order to secure the highest-ranking man at that company, purely out of economic/familial interests. (I was constantly being advised by my Japanese friends that I was pretty enough to have a good secretary's job at a big American corporation, and they were confused as to why I wasn't pursuing this "standard" route to a good husband. I sometimes wonder that myself, actually, but it's not the way we operate here.) These women do what they have to do to secure him, including giving him as much sex as he wants, and gradually assimilates control over the family finances. This continues into the marriage and through the child-bearing years, until she's decided she's had the number of kids she wants. (this isn't something I got from observations, mind, my Japanese friends actually laid this out for me). The years, with growing kids, are where people typically started having problems.

At that point, sex is usually cut off, and she has complete control of the money in the relationship, able to deny her husband anything not in "her" budget. Japanese men at this point typically find themselves a girlfriend – a lot of women encourage/expect it, actually. I had a sergeant who'd reached this point in his marriage with his Japanese wife, and it was causing him a great deal of problems, as in his view, he'd committed to one woman for the rest of his life, and she was actively pushing him into finding a younger girlfriend and denying him sex. I know that some men might enjoy this, but for most of the decent ones who got put in that position, it was an extremely difficult thing to deal with. It's not culturally compatible with Western expectations.

Then you get in to dealing with the kids. Americans, generally, have a fairly lax and open manner of raising kids. You want them to pursue activities, you want them to do well in school, but you also want to see them grow and develop their own interests, explore, figure things out on their own, and so on. Japanese child-rearing is quite different – Japanese women expect their children to be perfect, and even in marriages to American men, place extremely high demands on performance and schoolwork, to the point where a five year old may be at piano practice until 8-9 PM, every day after school. Women here tend to get what they want. Some people found a balance, but for many, the competing cultural ideas of child-rearing placed a great deal of tension on their marriage. I had a contractor whose oldest son failed to get into his mother's high school, and she was so ashamed of him that she threw an epic fit, and ended up kicking him out of the house. The American father was placed in the position of having to worry about his son killing himself (the kid didn't, fortunately), and eventually had to divorce his Japanese wife over the problems it caused in their marriage. This was an extreme case, but I saw similar strains in quite a few of these relationships over the kids.

There were a lot of other problems that manifested, but generally speaking, the men whose Japanese wives stayed "Japanese" (instead of assimilating their new American culture and losing some of those qualities that made them appealing in the first place, which was quite common) had serious issues to overcome. Many of them were quite clearly not the same men they had once been after even a few years of marriage.

I realize there are a lot of benefits to a relationship with women from other cultures, but it's impossible to ignore the fact that they bring their cultures with them, and sometimes, that isn't a good thing. They don't want the same things out of a relationship, won't offer the same things in that relationship, and for some men, this ends up leaving them unfulfilled and frustrated. There's still a high level of manipulation and control being exercised in these types of relationships, perhaps in a way that's more acceptable to both parties, but it's silly to think that a foreign woman (at least, a Japanese woman) is going to be any more decent to a man than a Western woman would be. She's not as likely to divorce you, but trust me, that kind of intimidation/control is going to be levied in other ways.

(Not to mention I experienced some horrible things from men during my time in Japan, to the point where I've become scared to date here in America. It's a highly misogynistic culture – a very real misogyny, not the kind we complain about here in the States – and Western men especially are allowed to behave in a horrific fashion over there. I wholeheartedly approve of masculinity, but some of the ways you see it expressed in Asian expat culture are quite terrible, and demeaning both of the men and the women they interact with. It ain't perfect anywhere!)

Akins' "Legitimate Rape" Comment Raises Legitimate Concerns

W.F. Price · 22 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Republicans' prompt and ill-considered sellout of Missouri congressman Todd Akins ignored the real point I suspect Akins was trying to make, and it's an important one. First, however, his statement that the female body rejects a rapist's sperm (or whatever he meant) is wrong. In fact, rape is probably more likely to lead to pregnancy than sex in other circumstances, and rape wouldn't be a part of human sexuality if it didn't confer some reproductive advantage.

The technical details aren't really what people are outraged about here, but rather the term "legitimate rape." By that, Akins was suggesting that some who claim to have been raped may not really have been raped. And if you want to stop abortion, but you provide loopholes such as "rape and incest," those who really want abortions will have an incentive to falsely claim to have been victims. Of course not all will do so. Most probably will not. But enough will that it could cause serious problems.

For example, if a woman in a rape and incest only abortion state says, "I've been raped, and I need an abortion," what do you think the doctor will ask? Why, he'll ask "who raped you?" She'll have to come up with someone or some description of a crime, or else she'll have to make something up, otherwise the ban on abortion has no teeth. If she really was raped and reported it immediately, she won't need an abortion; the morning after pill works. But if, for whatever reason, she held off long enough for fertilization to occur, the automatic assumption will be that she is the victim of a serious felony crime, and the state has a mandate to investigate.

Say she really wasn't raped, but her boyfriend/sex-partner rejected her after she got pregnant and told her to get the hell out of his life. She isn't ready for this baby, and she really doesn't want to have it without some support. So she decides to claim she was raped. The doctor or some hospital official asks her who, where, when, she hems and haws, and finally a detective is brought in to get to the heart of the matter. Eventually, she admits that the boyfriend is the child's father. "Did he really rape you?" asks the cop.

Now she's faced with the choice of admitting that she's been lying all along and losing the chance to get an abortion, or getting her boyfriend in very serious trouble with the law.

Who can say what she'll do? It could go either way. And perhaps the most terrible thing is that a man's dead child could be used to falsely convict him through a DNA test.

This is why I'm skeptical that an abortion ban could really work in the US. As long as we have open sexuality, and a diverse society in which people pretend to be "tolerant" but would flip out and prefer an abortion if their daughter were impregnated by someone of a different race, religion or class in most cases, people will demand loopholes. And loopholes are prone to abuse and dishonesty.

Perhaps for now the best we can do is practice harm reduction in regards to abortion.

Nebraska Lesbian Tries to Foment Hatred of Men by Staging Hate Crime

W.F. Price · 22 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Charlie Rogers, a Lincoln, Nebraska lesbian, has been charged with falsely reporting an assault in an attempt to win sympathy for lesbians and stir up anger and hatred against straight men. Rogers said three men stormed into her house, tied her up and carved slurs on her body, including the word “dyke.”

Following the “attack,” her friends in the lesbian community set up a site for donations, and she made courageous, defiant statements against the mysterious assailants.

Soon, her story began to fall apart, and it emerged that she had purchased the equipment she was bound with herself, shortly after vowing to become a “catalyst” on her Facebook page.

Medical examiners discovered that her wounds were superficial, carefully avoided sensitive areas and all within reach of her hands.

Usually, in these cases, people feel “sorry” for someone who would do such a thing. However, they are forgetting that when people make up hate crimes, they are trying to attack the very group they accuse of being hateful. It is an aggressive act, and sadly quite common. In fact, police are trained to be suspicious of all reported hate crimes, because so many of them are fake.

Accusing people of being “hateful” has become the weapon du jour in the US. Some people truly are, but it appears that in many cases, those who make the accusation are just as likely to be hateful themselves. For example, those who liberally use the term “misogynist” are far more likely than others to hate men.

If hate crime legislation is to be fair, it should include enhanced sentences for those who fake hate crimes, because they are committing such crimes themselves.

A look at the Penn State Scandal and who is to blame

Featured Guest · 23 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Tim Brown

Our Nation has now been watching the Sandusky drama play out since November of 2011 when the story first broke. From the very beginning, the news media disclosed that the victims were mostly fatherless. Fur-· thermore, we learned that Sandusky's "charity" was probably a tool to target new victims and that the "charity" was a sort of substitute or replacement for the absent fathers.

As this drama has unfolded, it seems the public is fixated upon why Mike McQuery did not kick Sandusky's tail when he witnessed Sandusky and a victim in the shower. We are also speculating on why this could go on so long, with numerous victims and nobody stepping in to stop it. Also the report issued by former FBI director Louis Freeh makes it very clear that many of the victims could have been spared their abuse had Penn State Officials done more early on.

The presence of a father

On Father's Day of 2012, a few articles were penned which pointed out that the presence of a father protects children from predators like Sandusky, and the absence of a father makes children vulnerable. The articles were good; however, the elephant in the room regarding the Sandusky case is why the victim's fathers are absent in the first place. Nobody in the media is asking this question and nobody in the media is investigating this. The way this story is being reported, one would assume that the victim's fathers were abducted by aliens in the middle of the night and whisked away to some far off galaxy without anyone asking questions.

So I will stand up and ask, "Where were the victim's fathers and why were they absent?" If the Father of victim number 1 abandoned his family for a new trophy wife and moved to a far away state, I think we could all agree that he deserves blame and shame for what later happened to his son at the hands of a predator.

However, what if the Father of victim number I did not walk out on his child, but instead was forced away from his child in divorce court? In fact, what if the Father of victim number 1 did not even want the divorce to begin with, and what if he paid tens of thousands of dollars in lawyer's fees, custody evaluator fees, counselor fees as ordered by ajudge, while he made a desperate attempt to stay connected to his child … Only to be left penniless, broken and betrayed by a branch of the government we refer to as "family" law.

What if…?

We are quick to blame absent fathers for the subsequent ills that befall their children. Most of us have heard the all too familiar advertising campaigns suggesting that Fathers should take the time to be a Father today.

We all agree that father involvement is good for children … as long as the other parent is okay with the Father being involved. However, as soon as the other parent wants otherwise, everybody looks the other way.

A question that I often ask of religious and other supposedly pro-family audiences is "What defines a good father when the other parent wants a frivolous divorce?" What does the reader believe defines a good father when the other parent wishes for the father to be absent? I will go on to ask the reader, is it possible that many of Sandusky's victims have fathers that love their sons, but were forcibly separated from their sons in our nation's secretive family court system, merely because that is what the other parent wanted?

Perhaps I should stop beating around the bush and just say it. Dare we stick a microphone in the face of the divorce court judge and ask him why he forced the father away from his children? Dare we ask the judge if he feels a sense of responsibility or even remorse for the Sandusky victims, and the fatherless children across the country who go to bed every night without a father in the home, simply because the other parent petitioned to have the father removed?

Is there justification?

A common justification from the other parents for the Father's forced absence is the badness of the man himself, as judged by the other parent. However, if we look at the sheer number of absent Fathers today, making a claim that all of these men are somehow bad is no more prejudiced and bigoted than what took place in the old American south, or in pre WWII Germany. With nearly forty percent of our nation's children living in fatherless homes, do we really buy into the argument that these children are fatherless because their father is so bad that he deserved to be expelled from the family? Furthermore, do we buy into the statement from the divorce court judge that the father has been expelled, "in the best interest of the children"? Please.

The divorce court is a court without a Jury and without due process. It has become a simple matter of routine to forcibly remove a parent, almost always the father, simply because the other parent wants it. There has been plenty of macho bar stool conversation about what someone else would have done to Sandusky had they walked in on him in the Locker Room and discovered him with a boy. And of course, Sandusky deserves every bit of it. But who made those victim boys vulnerable and fatherless in the first place?

Why the Focus on Gay Men?

W.F. Price · 24 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most puzzling things about conservative opposition to homosexuality and the conservative push to save marriage as the culturally Christian ideal of one man wed to one woman is that they are excessively fixated on male homosexuality. Opposing male homosexual acts may be part of traditional Christian (and Jewish, Muslim, Buddhist, Hindu, Jain, Sikh, etc.) dogma, but the same is true for fornication and other sexual sins that are all but excused today.

Furthermore, only a small minority of men are homosexual. Most men have no interest in sexual relations with other men, and never will. There's no evidence that I know of that suggests one can convert people to homosexuality. As far as I see it, Christian hysteria about it is a major waste of effort.

Gay men have never been at the forefront of trying to dismantle ordinary heterosexual marriage, but rather have simply wanted to avoid being hounded for their behavior. Sometimes, of course, their behavior does get out of hand, and in those cases something needs to be done (hooking up for sex in city parks being an example), but for the most part it has little to no influence on others' lives. Most straight men are perfectly content so long as it is out of sight and out of mind.

Perhaps there's a grain of truth in the characterization of opponents of homosexuality as "homophobes," but a certain degree of homophobia is probably natural amongst straight men. Although we aren't supposed to admit it today, most of us find gay male sex disgusting, and the thought of it as a widespread public activity can inspire some anger. Gay PRIDE parades seem calculated to stir this up, and a degree of outrage over the sexual antics of those parading themselves in public ought to be expected. If the point of the PRIDE parades truly is, at least in part, an attempt to bait straight men, they have done their job pretty well.

The result has been disproportionate focus on these antics and the provocateurs who engage in them on the part of conservative organizations. A real, organized anti-homosexual movement – which never existed before – came about in response, and its main target is the flagrant male homosexual. I can imagine that the attention the flagrant types get from this gives them great personal satisfaction, which only provides the motivation for more of the same. And so the rest of the country is treated to this bizarre, and increasingly obnoxious, spectacle that brings circuses of the old days to mind.

However, it should be pointed out that this is just a sideshow. A certain subset of homosexual men may love attention and drama, and they may be as good as anyone at getting it, but as far as threats to the integrity of the normal, heterosexual family, they rank somewhere along the scale of a gnat or mosquito, hardly meriting a bark, much less a roar.

Behind all the bluster and show, a far more insidious threat has been gnawing at the roots of the family. And although it is not exclusively so, it tends to be strongly motivated by a politicized form of female homosexuality. First, it should be stated that homosexuality may not be a proper term for what we know of as lesbianism, because the male kind of homosexuality suggests an additional element of sexuality, whereas in the female case there seems to be something of an omission. Where gay men appear to have elements of both male and female sexuality, the lesbian typically has little discernible measure of either. So perhaps lesbians should be referred to as "anti-sexual" rather than homosexual. The difference between lesbians and gay men is polar; there is no real affinity between the groups if we are to take human sexuality as a spectrum.

Back in the 70s, while gay men were going to discos and drag shows, lesbian feminists were attending political meetings in which they denounced the "patriarchy" and conspired to subjugate men. They worked their way into positions at universities, published papers and infiltrated and took over public bureaucracies. They were far overrepresented as "first women" in a number of occupations, from FBI agent to astronaut. In fact, given that lesbians comprise less than 1% of the female population, their domination of early entry into the traditionally male sphere of influence was quite an accomplishment, and suggests that not only do they have a higher ability in these occupations than the average female, but a far higher "Wille zur Macht" as well. If there is anything that characterizes the political lesbian, it is precisely this drive for power and dominance, which also happens to be a theme that permeates feminist literature.

There's nothing particularly odious about the drive to succeed, especially from a male perspective, so rather than get in their way, Western men generally obliged these driven females, finding them adequate for the job, and perhaps in many cases possessed of an ambition that they respected and that most of their male peers lacked. Additionally, men have little interest in mannish or androgynous women, so sexual tension in the workplace was no real issue with them.

Aside from some prurient interest in girl-on-girl porn (which is actually a straight male genre), men could care less about all things lesbian. Just as John in delivery doesn't care what Rob in accounting is doing on the weekend, the activities of the lesbians they know or know of arouse not the slightest interest. They feel no strong emotions either way, and tend to ignore them. This mirrors society's attitude toward gender feminism, and thus we have conservative Christians railing about flamboyant gayboys while gender feminists write and lobby for laws designed to strike right at the heart of social norms regarding marriage.

If anyone thinks I'm exaggerating, they need only read the lesbian feminist texts themselves. Condemnation of men and masculinity in toto are common themes in lesbian feminism. As opposed to the ambivalent attitude toward the feminine that homosexual men often display, lesbian feminists unequivocally label masculinity as a negative force, and offer "final solutions" up to and including androcide. The sheer force and volume of hostility against men is so overwhelming in the genre that it raises the question of why men have tolerated it for so long, allowing people who literally want to wipe them and their sons off the face of the earth to continue in positions of influence in academic and political institutions. The likely answer is that it's a combination of indifference and a sense that it shouldn't be taken seriously, but given the damage that's been done, this attitude should be reevaluated.

Before we can take steps to reintroduce some balance into the narrative, far more men and women must be made aware of the radicals who have had disproportionate influence in family law and all matters concerning relations between the sexes for far too long. In order to do so, they will first have to cut through some of the emotion surrounding the homosexual issue, including the gay marriage issue, and take a realistic view of the threat posed by each faction.

Straight men ought to ask themselves whether gay men are a threat to their marriages and families in any way. I think they'll find that they are not. Women should start to question whether gender feminism, with its concomitant hatred of men and drive to upend traditional forms of family, are ultimately in their own and their children's interest. For a few, it may be an advantage, but we are seeing a slow, yet steady degradation of female "sexual capital" as a result of these policies. A society in which women play first the whore and then the beast of burden – a characteristic of barbarism – rather than maiden then mother is where we are headed if things don't change soon.

As for lesbians themselves, I see no reason that they should be permanently stained by their association with lesbian gender feminism when the movement has finally been discredited, just as there's no reason to permanently associate Germans with Nazis or Calvinists with Cromwell. Historically, and even today, we have had honest, open and accomplished lesbians who have borne no particular enmity to men in general. Why lesbianism has come to be associated with a particularly vile, misandric form of feminism would be a good topic for an academic publication, but for the time being we can only offer speculation.

Conservatives should begin to pay attention to the decades-long assault on the family that has been ongoing not in bathhouses or gay bars, but rather in the halls of state capitols, universities, and courts across the nation. Sometimes, the easiest targets are merely a diversion. Although nobody is suggesting Christians drop their spiritual opposition to physical acts of homosexuality, it would be better if they were to put it in its proper perspective, and recognize that fornication – very common amongst straight Christians themselves – is just as grave a sin, and certainly the greater evil in terms of its power to cause social problems and decay (e.g. widespread abortion, illegitimacy and divorce).

The non-religious or skeptical among us should be outraged that a tiny faction of radicals has managed to exert so much influence over our private families and lives. Many of those who complain about social conservatives and their influence would do well to remember that they cannot be arrested or have their children seized for defying churches, but they certainly can and will in the event that they run up against policies put in place by the gender feminist fanatics who dominate family law.

It's time we took a serious look at who is really behind the destruction of the family, and rather than rage about side issues, hold them to account.

Russian Philosopher: Pussy Riot's Sacrilege a Serious Threat

W.F. Price · 25 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Aleksander Dugin, Russia's most influential political philosopher, explains why Russia should take Pussy Riot's provocation seriously, calling it part of an information war and an effort to subjugate Russia to external forces.

Dugin argues that the act was calculated to strike at the heart of both the secular and spiritual base of Russian society. As for Pussy Riot themselves, he calls them:

> …porno-hooligans, blasphemers, and simply obscene, immoral and worthless individuals

His arguments are esoteric, and not entirely applicable to the West, but he gives us a pretty clear indication that Russia, and probably the rest of the world, is beginning to catch on to the threat posed by radical assaults on tradition hidden in the guise of gender liberation, or whatever Pussy Riot is claiming it stands for.

Interestingly, Dugin also claims that:

> …the West has destroyed its own tradition, its own empires, and its own religion, and is now dealing with the rest of the world.

Innocence Project Biologist: Men Unnecessary

W.F. Price · 26 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Greg Hampikian, a biology and criminal justice teacher at Boise State, writes that men are totally useless biologically speaking, and now that women have more degrees, make more money, etc., we men might as well be a vestigial organ, just waiting to be chopped off when it becomes inflamed:

> With expanding reproductive choices, we can expect to see more women choose to reproduce without men entirely. Fortunately, the data for children raised by only females is encouraging. As the Princeton sociologist Sara S. McLanahan has shown, poverty is what hurts children, not the number or gender of parents.
> That's good, since women are both necessary and sufficient for reproduction, and men are neither. From the production of the first cell (egg) to the development of the fetus and the birth and breast-feeding of the child, fathers can be absent. They can be at work, at home, in prison or at war, living or dead.
> Then, at some point, your father spent a few minutes close by, but then left. A little while later, you encountered some very odd tiny cells that he had shed. They did not merge with you, or give you any cell membranes or nutrients — just an infinitesimally small packet of DNA, less than one-millionth of your mass.
>
> Over the next nine months, you stole minerals from your mother's bones and oxygen from her blood, and you received all your nutrition, energy and immune protection from her. By the time you were born your mother had contributed six to eight pounds of your weight. Then as a parting gift, she swathed you in billions of bacteria from her birth canal and groin that continue to protect your skin, digestive system and general health. In contrast, your father's 3.3 picograms of DNA comes out to less than one pound of male contribution since the beginning of Homo sapiens 107 billion babies ago.
> And while birth seems like a separation, for us mammals it's just a new form of attachment to our female parent. If your mother breast-fed you, as our species has done for nearly our entire existence, then you suckled from her all your water, protein, sugar, fats and even immune protection. She sampled your diseases by holding you close and kissing you, just as your father might have done; but unlike your father, she responded to your infections by making antibodies that she passed to you in breast milk.
> I don't dismiss the years I put in as a doting father, or my year at home as a house husband with two young kids. And I credit my own father as the more influential parent in my life. Fathers are of great benefit. But that is a far cry from "necessary and sufficient" for reproduction.
> If a woman wants to have a baby without a man, she just needs to secure sperm (fresh or frozen) from a donor (living or dead). The only technology the self-impregnating woman needs is a straw or turkey baster, and the basic technique hasn't changed much since Talmudic scholars debated the religious implications of insemination without sex in the fifth century. If all the men on earth died tonight, the species could continue on frozen sperm. If the women disappear, it's extinction.

I think Hampikian is writing this with his tongue planted firmly in his cheek. He does work for the Innocence Project, after all, and if he thought men were totally worthless he wouldn't put in the effort.

Although it's a bit crude, his article is clearly satire, and he may even be taking a jab at radical feminist ideology (e.g. Mary Daly's Gyn/Ecology). Unfortunately, it's too similar to the real thing to work correctly, and it falls flat. Sorry to say it, Greg, but it just isn't that cute to talk about male disposability these days, and of all people you should know that.

Hopefully, in the future Hampikian will stay within his area of expertise, where he does good work. Better he stick to getting innocent men out of prison than hand people justifications for wrongfully putting them there in the first place.

Media: Abortion and Illegal Immigration Top Issues

W.F. Price · 26 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In the run-up to the Republican convention, I've been watching some of the talking heads on TV offering up their opinions of the most important demographics and issues of the election. As they are calling it, the entire thing is dependent on who women and Hispanics prefer (Anglo men are irrelevant, apparently), and their main issues are the desire to abort their children (women) and the desire to illegally immigrate (Hispanics). Therefore, Obama will win, because he supports illegal immigration AND abortion.

It's really a bit overwhelming to see how these two angles are pushed over and over again. I think one could make a better case for the women wanting to abort their children argument than Hispanics wanting more illegal immigration. For one thing, Hispanics who can vote are citizens, so they have no need to illegally immigrate, and in addition to that illegal immigration is just as much of a threat to their wages as it is to other men's. Illegal immigration, on the balance, has been a disaster for America's working men of all races. From the early 90s through 2008, blue collar jobs were either outsourced or handed to cheaper, more easily exploited illegals in unprecedented numbers.

When I was 18, finding a summer job in construction was easy. Today, a couple decades later, young men in similar situations are going to find themselves competing with experienced adult construction workers, many of whom are illegal immigrants who need the job a lot a more. This is true throughout the blue-collar world. Hispanic citizens, aside from professional racial lobbyists, probably aren't all that thrilled about it either, so I don't think ordinary Hispanics are voting Democrat for the illegal immigration, but rather the promises of preferential hiring (affirmative action) and welfare. Also, let's face it: the Bush administration was the worst in US history in terms of maintaining the integrity of our borders and the immigration process, so if you simply want more illegal immigration it probably doesn't matter which party you vote for.

As for female voters, it may well be that they prefer Democrats because they want abortions. This is unfortunate, but I wouldn't rule it out.

The reason this disappoints me is that supporting legal abortion is analogous to supporting legal prostitution. Both are reasonable positions to take, but they aren't the kind of thing that should determine a presidential election.

Say men fought for legalized prostitution with the same vigor that feminists fight for abortion. Using the same logic as the pro-abortion crowd, men could argue that there's a moral case to be made for legalized prostitution. Pro abortion activists say that criminalizing abortion will lead to "back-alley abortions." Pro prostitution activists can point out that there is already a great deal of "back alley" prostitution, and it is a lot more dangerous that way for both clients and prostitutes.

Then there is the matter of "choice." The prostitute should have a "choice," as should the client. However, in prostitution choice goes even beyond the body, extending to property and commerce as well. If it's a private deal that doesn't affect others, Shouldn't adult men and women be able to choose how they make and spend their money?

Some people could make a moral case against prostitution, saying it encourages vice. But so does abortion, because it gives women the opportunity to hook up and then simply exterminate the resulting child rather than have to deal with the natural consequences of sex.

The point is that if MRAs or masculists were to make legalization of prostitution a national issue, they'd be widely condemned (and probably ridiculed as well), but when feminists make abortion a top priority we're supposed to take it for granted that they should get what they want without any criticism or question. However, if you take a hard look at both issues, neither is morally ideal. In fact, from a Christian perspective, prostitution is the lesser evil, because at least it doesn't involve extermination of human life.

So, although I'm highly skeptical of Republicans and their motives (it's hard to forget what a train wreck the last administration was), I can't help but be disgusted by the fact that the Democrats apparently expect to win by building their platform on support for social evils.

Incidentally, I think the prostitution/abortion comparison makes a good talking point. Next time you hear someone saying they support abortion because of "choice" and safety, ask whether they therefore support legal prostitution as well, and if not, why? And if they are casting their vote on the abortion issue, feel free to compare it to men casting their vote according to which candidate supports prostitution.

Open Comments for Registered Users

OK, folks, I've got the membership software installed, and it's been over a week since it's caused any trouble with the site. There's only one more weighty program to install, and I want to make sure the membership software is working properly before I do so, so I'm going to start transitioning to membership first.

In the meanwhile, I've shut off new registration and added some code so that registered users can comment without moderation. If you're one of the roughly 900 people who have an account on the site (mostly created a long time ago when the old forum was in operation, so you may not remember it), you can log on through the admin link at the bottom of the page and your comments will go through without moderation.

However, unless you want to become a bona-fide member, this will not last. Soon, I'm going to ask people whether they want to sign on as members to retain the privilege (and gain some others). Those who don't want to be members will still be able to comment, but their comments will be automatically moderated, and they won't have access to the comment ratings, which will be turned back on for members only when the full switch to a membership site has been made.

If all goes smoothly, members will also have automatic access to a private forum, exclusive content, comment rating privileges and private comments. I think it will be fun to be able to kick back and let our guard down a bit. Not to say the private content will be entirely secure and inaccessible to anyone else (there are always minders with these kinds of things, which means that illegal content and crazy talk will not be allowed), but at least it will be protected by copyright and users by a confidentiality/privacy agreement, so those who are snooping will have some legal motivation to keep it to themselves. As for user information, that's all going to be thoroughly encrypted with very long keys, and none will be turned over to anyone without a bona-fide court order/subpoena.

For now, users who still have an account on the site can login and post away without having to wait for comment approval (although comments that violate the policy will still be removed if I find them), and when I flip the switch on the membership I'll give you the choice of becoming members and keeping their old accounts or letting them lapse. As for those who do not currently have accounts, you'll be able to get them as soon as membership opens up should you so choose. For those who are not interested in becoming members, nothing will change, so no worries.

A World Without Bicycles

Featured Guest · 27 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By White Raven

> "The male is a domestic animal which, if treated with firmness and kindness, can be trained to do most things."
> - Jilly Cooper

This quote sums up the modern view of men in a single sentence. Where once men were seen as innovators, thinkers and leaders they are now seen as barely even human – throwbacks to a simpler time, knuckle-dragging Neanderthals who would drag the world down into the mud without women around to civilize and direct them.

Never mind of course that the world was built, and is mostly maintained, by men:

> "It is men who have built the houses, the bridges, the roads, the railways, the dams, the factories, the ships, the canals, the monuments, the airports, the churches, the offices, the tunnels, the engines, the industrial machinery etc. …
>
> It is men mostly who have worked in the factories, the furnaces, the sewers, the mines etc. …
>
> It is men mostly who have, rightly or wrongly, fought the wars, fought the crimes, fought the elements, fought the odds etc. …
> And it is men who have invented, discovered and done just about everything that has ever been invented, discovered and done."

It is in this context that I would like to explore the notion made popular by Gloria Steinem that a woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle.

If men are indeed simple brutes, lumbering animals capable of producing things of value only under the watchful supervision of a woman, then it would logically follow that women could survive just fine without them. A cursory glance at history, however, turns this notion on its head in double-quick time. The greatest scientists, mathematicians, artists, philosophers, musicians, and writers throughout all of history have been almost exclusively male. The exceptions prove the rule.

What is true is that, thanks to the largely male-created technological wonderland we call Western Civilization, it is now possible for a woman to live comfortably on her own without a man in her life. So in that sense, no, she does not need a man. But men are very much necessary to the underlying fabric of society on which her lifestyle depends, so she very much does need men in general.

What's happening, though, is that women have forgotten that it was men who made Western Civilization possible and that it's men who do the dangerous and dirty jobs that keep it all going. Men as a group have become the collective butt of the joke as women imply that men are no longer necessary to society, and this is largely responsible for the rapidly burgeoning exodus of men away from the unwritten contract that holds civilization together.

Among other things the unwritten societal contract states that men as a group will always protect women as a group. You could call it the Bicycle Clause. It dictates that a woman without a man of her own, either temporarily or permanently, may procure assistance from a nearby man without any prior relationship existing between them or any expectation of reciprocation. This clause can be invoked for anything from changing a tire to intervening in a violent situation.

Simply put, any man must be ready to risk life and limb to protect any woman, even one he doesn't know, at a moment's notice. A man who saves a woman's life is seen as a hero and a man who chooses not to get involved is seen as a coward. This section of the contract was based on the understanding that women were weaker than men and were therefore entitled to outside help while a man was responsible for taking care of himself.

But if women are at least equal (if not superior) to men then this part of the contract no longer applies. To demand equality is to renounce the clause in the contract that gives you special privileges based on the presumption of weakness. And yet still this notion persists that men should selflessly put women they don't even know ahead of themselves:

> "One of the features of the [Costa Concordia] disaster that has provoked a great deal of comment is the stream of reports from angry survivors of how, in the chaos, men refused to put women and children first, and instead pushed themselves forward to escape."

But you simply can't have it both ways. Either women are weaker than men and are in need of their protection, or they are equal to men and should take care of themselves. To blame men for looking out for their own interests when they have been taught that women don't want or need their help is not only counterproductive but grossly unfair as well.

This is a binary question with only two possible answers – either women need a helping hand from men or they do not. Currently, the cultural imperative is that they do not, and therefore men are responding by letting women fend for themselves. This will continue for as long as the current cultural climate remains unchanged.

Simply put, in a world where bicycles are no longer desired none will be produced. Women are by their words and actions saying that they no longer need men, and are therefore creating for themselves a world without bicycles. It's basic supply and demand. Let's just hope that if and when women find themselves wishing they had a bicycle that they realize the reason they don't have one is that they collectively insisted they didn't need one.

More From Rosin: Liberation through Promiscuity

W.F. Price · 27 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Atlantic has published yet another triumphalist Hanna Rosin article, this time about how promiscuity is essential to and drives feminist progress. Rosin argues that not only does the hookup culture contribute to women's power, but it is women themselves who are perpetuating it:

> Single young women in their sexual prime—that is, their 20s and early 30s, the same age as the women at the business-school party—are for the first time in history more successful, on average, than the single young men around them. They are more likely to have a college degree and, in aggregate, they make more money. What makes this remarkable development possible is not just the pill or legal abortion but the whole new landscape of sexual freedom—the ability to delay marriage and have temporary relationships that don't derail education or career. To put it crudely, feminist progress right now largely depends on the existence of the hookup culture. And to a surprising degree, it is women—not men—who are perpetuating the culture, especially in school, cannily manipulating it to make space for their success, always keeping their own ends in mind. For college girls these days, an overly serious suitor fills the same role an accidental pregnancy did in the 19th century: a danger to be avoided at all costs, lest it get in the way of a promising future.

I've argued something similar on many occasions. Feminism is, more than anything else, about women harnessing sexuality for power. This is hidden to some extent, because another feminist goal is the collectivization of female sexuality; that is, women's sexual power is to be expressed in aggregate rather than individually (doesn't always work out that way, but that's the idea).

If Rosin's analysis of the college hookup culture is any indication, Americans have reached the apogee of feminist expression amongst young women:

> …I found barely anyone who even noticed the vulgarity anymore, until I came across a new student. She had arrived two weeks earlier, from Argentina. She and I stood by the bar at one point and watched a woman put her hand on a guy's inner thigh, shortly before they disappeared together. In another corner of the room, a beautiful Asian woman in her second year at school was entertaining the six guys around her with her best imitation of an Asian prostitute—"Oooo, you so big. Me love you long time"—winning the Tucker Max showdown before any of the guys had even tried to make a move on her. (She eventually chose the shortest guy in the group to go home with, because, she later told me, he seemed like he'd be the best in bed.)
> "Here in America, the girls, they give up their mouth, their ass, their tits," the Argentinean said to me, punctuating each with the appropriate hand motion, "before they even know the guy. It's like, 'Hello.' 'Hello.' 'You wanna hook up?' 'Sure.' They are so aggressive! Do they have hearts of steel or something? In my country, a girl like this would be desperate. Or a prostitute."
> So there we have it. America has unseated the Scandinavian countries for the title of Easiest Lay. We are, in the world's estimation, a nation of prostitutes. And not even prostitutes with hearts of gold.

A dubious distinction indeed. Nowhere in the article does Rosin mention who is paying for these girls' training in the art of mercenary sexuality, but she describes how it gives women a sort of power rush, like cocaine:

> At Yale I heard stories like the ones I had read in many journalistic accounts of the hookup culture. One sorority girl, a junior with a beautiful tan, long dark hair, and a great figure, whom I'll call Tali, told me that freshman year she, like many of her peers, was high on her first taste of the hookup culture and didn't want a boyfriend. "It was empowering, to have that kind of control," she recalls. "Guys were texting and calling me all the time, and I was turning them down. I really enjoyed it! I had these options to hook up if I wanted them, and > no one would judge me for it."

Rosin's article may be demoralizing to these girls' parents and potential husbands alike, but the kind of behavior and attitude that she is describing exist not in a vacuum, but rather a hothouse.

These are women at their absolute sexual peak. They are at their most fertile and most attractive, and they are too immature and naive to realize that it will wilt with surprising rapidity.

The girls display the "I'll put it off until tomorrow" attitude quite clearly:

> For an upwardly mobile, ambitious young woman, hookups were a way to dip into relationships without disrupting her self-development or schoolwork. Hookups functioned as a "delay tactic," Armstrong writes, because the immediate priority, for the privileged women at least, was setting themselves up for a career. "If I want to maintain the lifestyle that I've grown up with," one woman told Armstrong, "I have to work. I just don't see myself being someone who marries young and lives off of some boy's money." Or from another woman: "I want to get secure in a city and in a job … I'm not in any hurry at all. As long as I'm married by 30, I'm good."

This attitude is a recipe for disappointment and disaster. The girl has total sexual freedom in school, plenty of male attention from young men with raging hormones, and the world is her oyster, so of course she wants to put off the drudgery of children, marriage and commitment. Usually, until something like "by 30."

The problem is that it doesn't get any easier. if you've got a career started in your late 20s, it's easy to put it off a few more years — "by 30″ becomes "by 35." And being accustomed to hookups doesn't tend to predispose a woman to long-term commitment. It isn't that easy to reverse course, and most men have already found their long-term love interest by that time. The ones who haven't are generally just looking to hook up themselves.

I talked to my mother about the article, as she reads The Atlantic, and she was pretty disappointed with the piece. Not because of prudishness, but because she sees it as promoting a lifestyle that leads to problems down the line. She oversees a lot of women at work in a very libertine city, and quite a few of them come from just this milieu. According to her, these women come late to a realization that they really do want a normal family, and by that time they are utterly unprepared for it. Their skills revolve around being sexy career women, and when they lose the "sexy" part they're left with nothing but a career — usually not a particularly impressive one. The emotional fallout is difficult for everyone around them, and managing them is no easy chore.

I suppose the question is whether we are really doing these young women a favor by giving them what they want. It's starting to look as though men may actually not be getting the short end of the stick here, because these aren't the women of the 70s and 80s who got married and had kids before they decided to go feral. No, their eventual emotional implosion will be effectively contained.

Although Rosin and other feminists tend to see this as a self-sustaining step forward – a sort of feminist version of limitless, unconstrained progress – it's a heavily subsidized trend. Without their wealthy parents, student loans, grants and all the rest of the effort that goes into creating this hothouse that grows women into grotesquely exaggerated versions of their natural selves, it would all come tumbling apart, and one of these days it will. Unfortunately, when we're called upon to clean up the mess, there are going to be a lot of damaged women out there.

Feminists to Open Riot School in UK

W.F. Price · 28 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Now that slutwalks are petering out, enterprising feminists have launched a new project designed to train women in the art of public disorder. Founded by Kat Banyard, the "suffragette school" aims to teach women how to hinder arrest, protest businesses and make a general nuisance of themselves over two days of courses in Birmingham.

> After just one day of classes at her summer school of choice, Emily Birkenshaw had already learned a crucial lesson: how to "go floppy" when facing arrest. "You're heavier then, so you can't be carried," she said, with the genuine delight of a new recruit.
> The 24-year-old been practising by linking arms with her classmates and singing loudly at a pretend policeman. "It just felt really empowering," she said. "If that happened [in real life] – and I hope it wouldn't – I'd know how to do it without getting hurt."

It seems there's a certain breed of feminist that really likes the public attention afforded by events such as slutwalks, and this camp holds out the promise of more of that in the future.

A number of women really do revel in public attention — much more so than typical men. There's an element of the erotic in it for women that's lacking in heterosexual men, who don't generally like attention for attention's sake, but tend to see it as a means to an end.

Some of the activities the feminists plan to engage in include protesting Hooters, which is opening restaurants in the UK (perhaps to counter their decline in the US), protesting UK benefits cuts and supporting abortion.

Some of the stunts the women are engaged in are truly bizarre, such as vandalizing statues with balls of knitted armpit hair.

The best response to these feminists may simply be to not give them any attention, no matter how bizarre and offensive their behavior. The protests of Hooters illustrate exactly where their motivation lies: they are angry about women getting attention for their good looks while they receive less (because feminists are not usually good-looking), so they go to Hooters to make a show and draw all eyes to themselves, thus gratifying their need for attention and validation.

As time goes on, I'm becoming increasingly convinced that heterosexual feminists are in it entirely for this attention, and their participation in feminist "activism" would cease immediately if people stopped caring or reporting on their antics.

Wilde On a Woman's Love

W.F. Price · 28 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The following prose poem, written by Oscar Wilde, captures the nature of a woman's love and desire as well as anything I've ever read.

THE DISCIPLE

When Narcissus died the pool of his pleasure changed from a cup of sweet waters into a cup of salt tears, and the Oreads came weeping through the woodland that they might sing to the pool and give it comfort.

And when they saw that the pool had changed from a cup of sweet waters into a cup of salt tears, they loosened the green tresses of their hair and cried to the pool and said, 'We do not wonder that you should mourn in this manner for Narcissus, so beautiful was he.'

'But was Narcissus beautiful?' said the pool.

'Who should know that better than you?' answered the Oreads. 'Us did he ever pass by, but you he sought for, and would lie on your banks and look down at you, and in the mirror of your waters he would mirror his own beauty.'

And the pool answered, 'But I loved Narcissus because, as he lay on my banks and looked down at me, in the mirror of his eyes I saw ever my own beauty mirrored.'

“Illegitimate” Rape Accusations Are Real

Elusive Wapiti · 29 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Given the widespread outrage, real and astroturfy, over Rep Todd Akin’s hastily made “legitimate rape” quip, I offer a meta-analysis of studies made of false rape accusations below (HT: COTWA).

While the data is all over the map, as one would suspect with such a grab-bag of studies employing varying methodologies and terminologies covering diverse law enforcement jurisdictions and practices, one thing is clear: the rate of false rape accusations is not zero. Not even close. The data seems to suggest that somewhere between one in eight to one in four rape accusations are reliably false. In other words, the rate of false rape accusations is about 8% to about 25%, depending on which researcher one finds credible. That’s “false accusation of rape”, as in the accuser is either lying or has identified the wrong attacker, mind you:

	Number	False reporting rate (%)
Theilade and Thomsen (1986)	1 out of 56 4 out of 39	1.5% (minimum) 10% (maximum)
New York Rape Squad (1974)	n/a	2%
Hursch and Selkin (1974)	10 out of 545	2%
Kelly et al. (2005)	67 out of 2,643	3% ("possible" and "probable" false allegations) 22% (recorded by police as "no-crime")
Geis (1978)	n/a	3–31% (estimates given by police surgeons)
Smith (1989)	17 out of 447	3.8%
U.S. Department of Justice (1997)	n/a	8%
Clark and Lewis (1977)	12 out of 116	10.3%
Harris and Grace (1999)	53 out of 483 123 out of 483	10.9% ("false/malicious" claims) 25% (recorded by police as "no-crime")
Lea et al. (2003)	42 out of 379	11%
HMCPSI/HMIC (2002)	164 out of 1,379	11.8%
McCahill et al. (1979)	218 out of 1,198	18.2%
Philadelphia police study (1968)	74 out of 370	20%
Chambers and Millar (1983)	44 out of 196	22.4%
Grace et al. (1992)	80 out of 335	24%
Jordan (2004)	68 out of 164 62 out of 164	41% ("false" claims) 38% (viewed by police as "possibly true/possibly false")
Kanin (1994)	45 out of 109	41%
Gregory and Lees (1996)	49 out of 109	45%
Maclean (1979)	16 out of 34	47%
Stewart (1981)	16 out of 18	90%

To this table, which can also be found at Wikipedia, I add:

McDowell and Hibler, US Air Force OSI (1985)…..80 of 300….27%. Of particular note about this study is how many hoops the allegation had to jump through–and be “true” for each test–to be considered false:

> “To be considered false one or more of the following criteria had to be met: the victim unequivocally admitted to false allegation, indicated deception in a polygraph test, and provided a plausible recantation. Even by these strict standards, slightly more than one out of four rape charges were judged to be false.”

and

Buckley, Washington DC, (1992)…..No n provided….25%.

and

Washington Post, Virginia and Maryland, (1991)….No n provided….25%

and this note from page 29 of this PDF report by the Innocence Project:

> Every year since 1989, in about 25 percent of the sexual assault cases referred to the FBI where results could be obtained, the primary suspect has been excluded by forensic DNA testing. Specifically, FBI officials report that out of roughly 10,000 sexual assault cases since 1989, about 2,000 tests have been inconclusive, about 2,000 tests have excluded the primary suspect, and about 6,000 have "matched" or included the primary suspect. The fact that these percentages have remained constant for 7 years, and that the National Institute of Justice's informal survey of private laboratories reveals a strikingly similar 26-percent exclusion rate, strongly suggests that post-arrest and post-conviction DNA exonerations are tied to some strong, underlying systemic problems that generate erroneous accusations and convictions." [emphasis mine]

Translation: "excluded", as in "the wrong guy was fingered" by a "strong, underlying systemic problem" of blind faith in the word of rape accusators.

With all this data on false accusations in mind, what is important to remember is that these are the allegations that are false on their face. These are accusations which can be set aside before we even think about parsing questions of he-said-she-said, or consent, or impaired consent, or whatever-consent, or no consent. The sad result of all these rape accusations, real or no, when they grind through the judicial system, is that they yield subterranean "attrition rates"–i.e., conviction rates for each accusation made–of around ten percent, a number that may be itself too high given how many folks the Innocence Project exonerates.

Circling back to Rep Akin's "legitimate rape" comment, it seems that reasonable persons can indeed distinguish between a "legitimate rape" allegation and something that masquerades as one. Unfortunately, the reaction to his comments from both the Left and establishment Right suggests that time is not now; perhaps later will come the time when the political climate will accept the truth as such and feminist rape-mongering will likewise be dismissed as an ignoble lie.

In the meantime, actual rape victims, and those caught in the maelstrom of a false rape accusation, suffer needlessly.

Montana Forces Feminist Rape Propaganda on Students

W.F. Price · 29 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Due to new rules pushed by the Department of Justice, the University of Montana, situated in the island of political correctness known as Missoula in an otherwise pleasant and sane state, has devised a mandatory test that ensures that students have been properly instructed in the feminist narrative on rape. This is to be accomplished through forcing the students to watch videos that cover the material in the quiz.

I decided to take a look at these videos. It turns out that they are narrated by robots (quite appropriately), who go on to inform us that college campuses are enveloped by a "rape prone culture." The so-called mythical stereotypes that characterize this alleged culture are called a "kind of violence" that must be fought with propaganda. One of the "myths" cited is the idea that women might lie about rape. Another "myth," apparently, is that rape is violent. Actually, according to our robot narrator, pressuring and guilt-tripping are just as "forceful" as beating someone into submission.

Additionally, rape can happen at any time during the sex act. When a man is having consensual sex and is on the cusp of orgasm, and the woman says "stop," he becomes a rapist if he doesn't pull out immediately. Perhaps most insidious is the idea that men can be held responsible for rape while intoxicated, but women cannot consent while intoxicated. A clear double standard that apparently does not trouble the radical feminists who made the video.

More gems include the idea that silence indicates nonconsent, which I suppose means that if you have sex with a foreigner, and neither of you can understand the other verbally, you have automatically committed rape.

The most ambiguous video concerns the law. Here, the feminists engage in some obfuscation. Nothing in the law says that consent must be verbal or even necessarily positive, but the video claims exactly that. Again, the feminists are conflating consent and assent.

Finally, one video encourages interfering with others, up to the point of deciding for them whether or not they can give or receive consent. This isn't always a bad idea (sometimes one should warn a friend about sleeping with the wrong woman), but it can have very bad consequences. As police know, getting between lovers can be pretty dangerous, so it's irresponsible to recommend students behave in this manner.

It's a shame that gender feminist politics are given a voice in our public universities, forced on them by the federal government. While we don't want an orgy of rape on college campuses, the idea that campuses are a "rape prone culture" is absurd, and an insult to students, who are generally better-behaved than the population at large.

Why Leftists Bash Creationism

W.F. Price · 29 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of our local petty luminaries, Bill Nye the "science guy," recently lectured parents about teaching their children to believe in Creationism, saying that they are bad for doing so. Here in a West Coast city (Nye got his public career started in Seattle), bashing religious conservatives is about as brave as stomping on baby bunnies, but for some reason people always receive applause for doing so anyway.

As is often the case, Nye is wrong about a number of things, such as the claim that denial of evolution is unique to the US (plenty of Muslims, Jews, Buddhists and people of other faiths all over the world have the same or their own Creation beliefs).

Anyway, it got me to thinking about the issue, and while I do accept evolution and don't believe the world is only a few thousand years old, I don't see why Creationism is any more damaging to children – or society in general – than the idea that all people are created equal, which is widely accepted despite being untrue (at least in the literal sense).

Additionally, it's a lot less harmful than the "progressive" idea that gender is a social construct, which continues to be taught in universities across the land, despite being a harmful lie.

Another thing to consider is that if you do accept evolution as scientific fact, Creationism and associated religious faith fits right into the concept of natural selection, as faith is an adaptive trait. People who are believers have larger families, and therefore propagate more of their genes. If natural selection is a good thing, and leftists do tend to attach moral significance to it, then what's wrong with adopting a strategy that provides an advantage, even if it consciously contradicts scientific wisdom?

I think the reason Creationism bothers leftists is just that: it gives their competitors an edge, while their own popular fallacies and illogical beliefs do the opposite.

Presidential Campaign Devolving into Rape Accusation

W.F. Price · 30 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Somehow, rape has become the defining issue of the presidential campaign. The republicans, of course, are being painted as the "pro-rape" party. Maybe it had to happen, and this is simply the culmination of political feminism, but given that violent crime – including rape – is way down from twenty years ago, it's kind of odd to see rape become such a big issue in the campaign.

Every feminist talking point has received extensive coverage this election season. First, free birth control for all. Then, jobs and lots more free things for women (life of Julia). Now, as we get closer to the finish line, it's rape.

From the debate, you'd think the US is awash in rapes. We'd be a slightly higher-tech version of the Democratic Republic of Congo, but instead of Congolese rebels it is white republicans on the rampage, raping village after village of rainbow feminists, leaving them all pregnant and denying them abortions.

I don't think I've ever seen such a shrill domestic campaign barring war propaganda.

The only time I can remember rape being a major feature of a political campaign was back in 1988, when Bush's campaign released the Willie Horton ad. Dukakis had allowed Willie Horton, a convicted murderer who had killed a 17-year-old kid working at a gas station, out of prison on a weekend furlough. Rather than return to prison, Horton went on the lam and ended up raping a woman (the real kind of rape) in Maryland, right in front of her bound and gagged fiancé. Although the ad was a fair criticism of Dukakis' policies (what kind of an irresponsible idiot lets a murderer out on furlough?), and never went so far as to suggest he supported rape, it was widely condemned for being racist and sensationalist.

Today, on the other hand, anyone the feminists disapprove of has to defend themselves from charges that they are in fact pro rape. Amazing how flexible these people can be.

Thoughts on the Convention

W.F. Price · 31 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I watched the end of the Republican National Convention last night, having skipped the previous parts. I caught Clint Eastwood, Marco Rubio and Mitt Romney, and they were all fairly competent speakers. Clint was quite good, coming off as a sly old man with a wicked sense of humor. Rubio really played up the "American Dream" thing from the immigrant's perspective. A little too much for my taste, but I suppose it's important, given how many people in the US are immigrants or from immigrant families.

As for Romney, he did a pretty good job on the podium, but the focus on women was over the top. Sometimes, you really don't need to let the opposition write your script for you, and I'm skeptical about how many women's minds he could change. When it comes down to it, people vote according to what they perceive to be in their economic interest. That isn't the entire story, but it's the biggest one, and single mothers are going to fill in the bubble next to the guy they think will deliver the most goodies. As for married and older women, I think it will break down according to whether they're on the dole (which includes government jobs as well as welfare) or not, with the ones who are generally voting Democrat and the others voting Republican.

In fact, the overt pandering to women on the part of Republicans comes off as a bit disingenuous, not to mention supplicating. But I suppose such are the times we live in, with a hollowed out real economy and the artificial inflation of female wealth and power that has accompanied the great sellout of the American worker, accomplished through massive outsourcing of industry and turning a blind eye to illegal immigration.

So while Mitt Romney's speech was compelling in a generic American sort of way, there was something sorely lacking: gratitude for his base. For all the talk about immigrants and women, there wasn't a discernible a nod to the ordinary American men who will be his most dependable voting block.

I suppose that's about all we can expect these days. The Republicans know that most of us will vote for an ungrateful party rather than one that openly despises us. In years past, I might have chosen to simply sit this one out (as I did last time) and refuse to vote for either candidate, but the antics of the Obama administration regarding Title IX and other such strong-arm feminist tactics have given me enough motivation to want to see them thrown out of office.

In the end, what I took away from it is that while the Republicans may prefer to ignore us, at least they won't be kicking us in the teeth if they carry the election.

Why the PUA Lifestyle is Never Going to be Common

W.F. Price · 31 August 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The arguments for and against being a PUA are largely moot, and the culture will continue to be restricted mainly to people in late adolescence, because most people simply can't handle the bachelor lifestyle.

Being an uncommitted bachelor has never been the norm throughout human history. Men are social creatures just like women, and most of them don't have what it takes to maintain emotional distance from the women in their lives for an extended period of time, so the PUA lifestyle will never be appealing to most men.

In fact, the only way the average man could maintain a PUA lifestyle without feeling empty inside would be to live with someone who fulfills the role of "companion" that their lovers fail to provide. In some cases this could be a man, but more likely than not it would be a female family member, such as a mother or sister. I suspect this is why being a player comes more naturally to those people from cultures where men have close, intimate relationships with their mothers well past childhood, such as southern Europeans.

Where men are expected to cut familial bonds and strike out on their own from an early age, being a player is generally far more rare. In these places, men tend to rely on a female companion for emotional comfort and support from the beginning of adulthood, so those who are having sexually adequate but emotionally shallow relationships with women are left unsatisfied in most cases. If sexual gratification were all men required, a prostitute would suffice, but obviously that isn't enough for most of us.

All that said, Game probably does have value in that it can help a man increase his options and find a better woman. However, those who promote Game as a route to male happiness should remember that for most men – although not all – a series of short relationships that end before real intimacy develops is a sad existence, and tends to feel like a failure after some time. In nine out of ten cases, the goal really should be finding the "right one," and there's always the danger that promiscuity itself can get in the way of that — even for men.

If Game should come with any caveat, this is it.

MGTOW and Game: Both Have Something to Offer

W.F. Price · 1 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Every time someone has something to say about Game, the argument splits into factions who either bash it or defend it. I don't think this is the most helpful way to address the issue, just as I don't think rejecting MGTOW out of hand is fair.

In my last post, in which I suggested that the PUA lifestyle will never be widespread, I was trying to introduce some balance to the discussion. The truth is that men exist on a continuum; a bell curve in all likelihood. On one side we have MGTOW, and the other PUA. Most men fall somewhere in the middle.

However, the interesting thing about it is that men can find both extremes worthy of respect. On the one hand we have guys like Dick Proenneke, and on the other Giacomo Casanova. Both are appealing to men in their own way.

Most of us, though, are never going to live a life that follows either script, and wouldn't want to if we were honest with ourselves.

This is why, rather than getting so animated over it, we should put some effort into learning a thing or two from those who represent one side or the other without feeling that we have to fully commit either way.

I'll use two writers as an example.

First, Heartiste, whose incisive wit and criticism of the contemporary state of gender relations is not only a great pleasure to read, but contributes significantly to wisdom as well. Heartiste, AKA Roissy, has been instrumental in spreading truth about the nature of women — particularly to younger men whose foster father has been TV and pop culture. He's done a lot of us a big favor.

Next, Zed, a die-hard MGTOW, who has done the same from his own perspective and experience. Like Heartiste, Zed has gained a great deal of wisdom from observation, even if his perspective is quite different from Heartiste's.

Personally, I wouldn't give either of them up, even if I haven't chosen to live according to their respective paths. What I think we ought to recognize is that man is not a one-dimensional being, and there are competing desires in our hearts. Sometimes we may want intimacy, others solitude, and finally we crave variety as well. Different stages of our lives may call for different strategies, but when it comes down to it there are certain things that give us satisfaction in life, such as love and a sense of purpose, and neither the Game nor MGTOW proponents deny that.

But if we want to keep some balance in our lives we have to be honest with ourselves about who we are, and avoid wandering too far from our true nature, so rather than proclaim one or the other lifestyle superior, we must understand ourselves and take what suits us from each one. I think it's true that for most men the family life offers the most satisfaction, but unfortunately a predatory class of radicals and profiteers has worked to make that life much more difficult to achieve, so for contemporary Western men, taking notes from the men who have learned to survive – and thrive – outside of that paradigm is a very good idea. However, in the long run, the goal shouldn't be to throw away what has always been the most natural way of life for the most men, but rather to gain a better understanding of the full spectrum of masculinity, so that we have more options, more flexibility, and the skills to survive without living a bleak existence.

Run-Hide-Fight: Mixed Thoughts About A Vid for Sheeple

Elusive Wapiti · 2 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Had heard about this video, joint produced by DHS and the City of Houston, but hadn't seen it until recently.

Overall, given the sheeple disposition of your average American, I think this video is useful. It helps train them on what to do when their weapons-free bubble (see the decal on the door at 0:59) is invaded by an armed intruder determined to kill…an intruder no doubt comforted by the promise of a lack of effective resistance from relatively defenseless victims.

Of course, this delicious irony, that an "active shooter" training video would be produced in a building that prohibited its occupants from bringing defensive weapons onto the premises, was likely lost on the producers of the video, and will just as likely breeze past the average viewer too. But no matter…the point was to condition these future victims–those who put all their trust in the authorities to keep them safe at all times from criminals with murderous intent–to run and hide and, if pressed, fight with folding chairs and fire extinguishers.

From a social context, I was mildly surprised to see the men in the video depicted not as overweight bumbling fools, as they are regularly portrayed in popular media, but as take-charge leaders whose clear thinking in a deadly crisis delivers their female colleagues and less brave male coworkers to safety. This is consistent with a cultural expectation that properly socialized men step up in times of crisis to lead, protect, and defend those around them. Not that there is anything wrong with that, mind you; I simply find it interesting that this expectation is reinforced in this video, while in the remaining 99% of the non-crisis time, men and masculinity are marginalized if not derided. Call it "fair-weather feminism", a corollary to "lifeboat feminism": a feminism that asserts equality with men, if not privilege above them, so long as things go well. However, when a disaster or emergency strikes, well, it seems that our culture expects to be able to "break glass in case of emergency" to release a man's hidden, inner white knight to ride to the rescue of the women and lesser men in his midst.

Of course, we know that in practice this dissonant expectation isn't always realistic. But I do wonder from where our culture expects to draw these white knights, if it doesn't actively cultivate them outside of proportionally diminishing, still-somewhat-traditional sheepdog occupations like the military and emergency services?

Even more surprising to me was the video's depiction of a few of the female colleagues reducing themselves into sacks of panicky jell-o when the shooting started. Frankly I was surprised that feminists that surely came into contact with this video during production didn't have those unflattering depictions of formerly strong, independent women™ excised during editing. But then again, perhaps that's just my vertical thinking causing me difficulties again. For it seems that fair-weather feminism, just like lifeboat feminism, sports the benefits of traditional, pre-women's-lib benevolent sexism whilst preserving the advantages of the super-equality that modern feminism delivers to women. In other words, it was in feminism's best interest to portray female coworkers, ruthless competitors otherwise, as leavened with generous sprinklings of damsels in distress, pour encourager les hommes.

Also interesting to me was that, while the video extolled the hard work of law enforcement and government to protect the population from criminals, the video's narrator explicitly admitted that LEOs can't be everywhere all the time. This, coupled with the shooter's flagrant disregard for the "gun free zone" of the office building, makes the case for the Second Amendment better than the National Rifle Association or Gun Owners of America ever could. When seconds count, the police are but minutes away. And how many fewer victims would have died had just one employee carried a .45 concealed in his business suit?

The Manosphere

Featured Guest · 3 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Professor Mentu

Slowly but surely, the Manosphere is gaining steam and extending its reach. Men in their late 30s and beyond who had the luxury of semi-rejecting the red pill while still finding moderate success are being outnumbered by a younger generation who realize they really don't have a choice in the matter. Unlike the older men, these men didn't choose to unplug; they were unplugged.

Yet they thrive.

Happiness is an eagle soaring through the air, because that's what it was made to do; it worries not about the wind, because the same wind that creates resistance also gives lift. Happiness is a fish swimming in the water, because that's what it was made to do; it worries not about strong currents, because the same turbulent waters that cloud its view also churns up sustenance. Happiness is a tree growing deep roots, because that's what it was made to do; it worries not about its lack of freedom, because the same roots that hold it down also allow it to weather the storm.

Happiness is a man who protects and cares for his family, goes forth and conquers, gives of himself for a greater cause, and ensures his legacy – because that's what he was made to do. He doesn't fear resistance, turbulence, or commitment, because his masculine frame turns resistance into rise, finds sustenance in turbulent waters, and relies on the steadfast roots of commitment to provide stability for himself and safety for those he vowed to protect.

But today's men are encouraged to meet resistance head on while being shamed for expecting lift. They're told to man up and tough it out through turbulent waters while being called misogynists for expecting sustenance. They're shamed into putting down roots in infertile hypergamous soil that offers no support, then are financially ruined and separated from their children when they cannot weather the storm.

And society wonders why these men walk away.

Play or be played: That's the world the vast majority of men wake up to in 2012. For these young men, it's not a philosophy or an attitude; it's reality.

The companies they work for demand loyalty, but will fire them or lay them off without a second thought if profits dip one tenth of one percent.

The women they encounter demand attention, loyalty, resources and undue privilege, while offering very little in return. The natural hypergamous nature that once served them well in their quest to secure the best possible mate is now a sustained lifestyle bringing an endless pursuit of bigger and better. The average young woman today is less concerned about the number of quality men who would commit to her than she is about the number of men who retweet a photo of her breasts.

Young men today attend churches with pastors who demand they man up and support the church and its female parishioners, but that same church does nothing to cultivate an environment that encourages feminine strength. Sunday after Sunday they listen as the same Bible used to preemptively absolve women of all past, current and future transgressions is used to condemn men.

They have best friends from childhood who disappear six months after the wedding, because the new bride doesn't want her hubby hanging out with single losers.

They have to pick up the tab for dad's dinner, because his going broke trying to support mom, her new live-in boyfriend, and a 12 year old he's not certain is even his. The young man watches as middle-management dad making $70k per year tries to crank the engine in his 11 year old car to no avail, and then has to give him a ride back to his apartment on the seedy side of town. The young man shudders as he realizes the father who "did the right thing" by sacrificing his life for his family can fit everything he owns into a 580 sq ft apartment with plenty of room to spare.

The young man has finally learned that men and women share the same inherent character flaws, but not the same consequences. He has sinned, and he has paid dearly. She has sinned, and she has been exalted.

He doesn't hate his corporation; he hates the system. He doesn't hate God; he hates what the church does in God's name. He doesn't hate women; he hates the unforgiving female support machine. He doesn't hate feminists or White Knights; he hates navigating the environment they create.

That's why there's a Manosphere, and that's why it's growing.

Every day you can log on to any number of blogs to discuss how meeting the resistance of feminism gives rise to notch counts, how navigating the turbulent waters of society churns up the sustenance of independence, and how putting down deep ideological roots in the soil of personal responsibility can help you weather any storm life throws at you.

Men haven't lost their need to find happiness by providing, protecting, sacrificing and conquering; we've simply discovered that providing for the modern feminist, working like a dog to protect a family that can be taken away at a moment's notice, or risking our lives to conquer resources for some ungrateful women who claims she can do it on her own is an empty way to live. We haven't changed the mission; we've changed the method. We now provide for ourselves and our immediate families, protect our interests, make selective sacrifices when the situation warrants, and conquer mountains of poon.

Men find happiness and purpose in the effort, regardless of who benefits from the effort. It took us a while to figure that out, and many of us still aren't there yet, but we're slowly coming around.

Welcome to the Manosphere; a place where we're not afraid to call it exactly as we see it, turning betas into men is a group effort, no one is in charge, there's no central theme, we can't agree on a standard definition of anything, and we spend a good amount of time shooting flaming arrows at each other for no apparent reason.

To the casual observer, the Manosphere may seem like a disjointed collection of blogs and websites, but the Manosphere does not exist online; it exists in the hearts and minds of the next great generation of men. The Manosphere is the Big Bang of chaotic masculine disruption that will eventually bring into existence a new personal world of freedom for those who choose to be free.
It's evolving and forming right before our very eyes.

Rape Accusations Fly at DNC

W.F. Price · 4 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As predicted here recently, rape accusations have come to define the presidential campaign, with delegates flinging allegations, making comparisons between Republicans and rapists and stridently declaring “rape is rape!”

Actress Ashley Judd, serving as a Tennessee delegate, kicked off a breakfast with Ohio delegates by stating “At any time, in any relationship, at any age, and in any place, rape is rape.”

Another delegate said that voter ID laws amounted to mass rape.

Sandra Fluke, proponent of free birth control and abortion for all (funded by Catholic schools) is slated to speak, and she, too, will be talking about rape:

> Fluke has since become an increasingly visible surrogate for President Obama, most recently introducing him at an Aug. 8 rally in Denver. She responded Tuesday to Akin’s comments about “legitimate rape” and pregnancy via an email relayed by the Obama campaign.
> “This controversy is not an accident, or a mistake, or an isolated incident,” Fluke wrote. “It’s a reflection of a Republican Party whose policies are dangerous for women.”

It’s really amazing when you think about what these women are saying. Clearly, they are suggesting that if a Republican wins the election American women will be in grave danger of being raped, which is pretty insane if you think about it. It’s almost as though they are gripped by some mass psychosis, and imagine that we are in the midst of some sexual free-for-all, rather than the most policed nation in history.

I suppose the question is if they think it’s that bad now, what more do they plan to do? Will all men be subject to a curfew? Should we declare martial law and shoot suspected rapists on sight? Build male-only concentration camps in our deserts?

Good Essay on Dead Feminist

W.F. Price · 5 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Kathy Shaidle briefly resurrects Shulamith Firestone, a feminist who was influential back in the 70s as one of the more radical gender deconstructionists, for another look before she finally slides into murky oblivion.

> Firestone published her radical manifesto calling for the liberation of women from childbirth's unfair burden—and from gender itself—at only 25. That's around the age when schizophrenia tends to claim its victims, of which she was one.
> The Dialectic of Sex proposed that, contra Marx, the key class struggle is between man and woman rather than owner and worker. Citing alleged discoveries by Professor John Money of Johns Hopkins, Firestone declared sexual identity a fluid and artificial construct.
> Firestone's friends, family, and feminist admirers duly posted effusive memorials all over the Internet, but none of them was with her when she passed away. She'd been dead for a week when her landlord discovered her decaying corpse.
> So much for that "communitarian" spirit.

Maybe a little harsh. If she was truly insane, it isn't so surprising that she died in that manner — the crazy ones usually end up alone.

However, it is instructive, if not surprising, that a mentally ill woman had such a profound effect on contemporary feminism.

I'm not sure whether it's just me, but it seems that lately an awful lot of second wave feminists are "crossing the river," so to speak. Interesting to see how they are giving up the ghost just as their influence appears to have reached its zenith.

Mother Decapitates 2 yo Son

Elusive Wapiti · 5 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A New Jersey mother with a history of mental disorders and substance abuse regains custody of her child, then proceeds to go off her meds and kill her son:

> What police found at her Camden rowhouse early Wednesday was even more horrifying. Thomas had decapitated her son and placed his head in the freezer. The 33-year-old mother later fatally stabbed herself after hanging up on emergency dispatchers, a violent end to a troubled life.

> Thomas only recently regained custody of son Zahree after allegedly leaving the boy unattended in a car, telling police she had smoked marijuana laced with the hallucinogenic drug PCP and blacked out in a nearby park. She previously lost custody of Zahree to relatives and was ordered to undergo treatment for substance abuse and mental health disorders, according to the Department of Children and Families. Thomas was charged with child endangerment in the 2010 car incident, but the case was dropped…

> The state's child welfare agency said in a statement that Thomas had been receiving counseling and support services since a court-ordered reunification with her son April 3.

As a man, a father, and cultural critic, it's hard to get really upset about this sort of thing anymore. I don't know how many times the same observation can be made: The same system that systematically removes men from the family home, largely based on the happiness-seeking wants of the mother, the same system that underwrites out-of-wedlock motherhood, a system embedded in a wider culture that condones the death of nearly 60% of black babies in utero (and 23% of all babies nationwide), is the same one that re-inserts a vulnerable boy-child into the custody of a clearly troubled choice mommy. Then, as if the outcome has no relationship to preceding events, wrings its hands about the child's "unfortunate" end. Wash, rinse, repeat.

I've said it once, I'll say it again. The safest place for a child is in the arms of his biological father, in an intact home.

Testing Forum

So, I finally installed another forum, this time BBPress. BBPress isn't as powerful as some of the other forum software out there, but it integrates very well with WordPress and the membership software I installed. Also, very importantly, it has an excellent spam filter.

After staying up most of the night trying to work out bugs and figure out how to fit it into the site without it looking like a jumbled mess, I found a very nice little page of code that integrates the forum with my theme. Evidently, there are still some issues concerning a "fancy editor," but I'm not going to worry about that for now.

Although I'm still testing the forum, I'd like to invite those Spearhead veterans who are registered users on the site to give it a spin. I've only opened one forum, and it's set to "private" (means only registered users can view it), but it would be nice to see how it's working for users before I go live with it.

The url is the-spearhead.com/forums, and remember that for now only registered users can access it. For those who aren't registered, please hang in there! I want to make sure everything is more or less working before I reopen the site to subscribers.

Barry Nolan, Producer of Fraudulent, Anti-Male Documentary, Says Men Who Stand up for Themselves "Dangerous"

W.F. Price · 6 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I noticed a post in A Voice for Men written by John the Other taking Mr. Nolan to task for his lies and mischaracterization of the facts in an article he wrote blasting men's and father's rights groups. Personally, although I'm indebted to him for the link and drawing my attention to this guy, I think John was too easy on Mr. Nolan, who is one of the worst sort of extremist ideologues.

Some years ago, Nolan produced a documentary titled No Way out but One, which Fathers and Families exposed as a gross distortion of the truth. The documentary, full of vicious smears against Mark Collins, a man found innocent of any wrongdoing by numerous court officials, judges and psychiatrists despite a litany of accusations by his ex-wife Holly, celebrates the criminal actions of the mentally disturbed ex-wife who, after losing custody, absconded with her and her ex-husband's children across the Atlantic to the Netherlands, where some idiotic Dutch liberals actually gave her residence (she claims, but cannot substantiate, that she was granted asylum) for alleged spousal abuse. As an act of gratitude, Holly Collins proceeded to make accusations of abuse against her Dutch neighbors.

Glenn Sacks' Fathers and Families did such a good job of investigating and discrediting Nolan's documentary that I suspect his recent hit piece against men's rights groups is a form of retaliation; a sort of poke in the eye for having made him look bad.

Nevertheless, No Way Out but One continues to be presented as a serious documentary in prestigious universities such as MIT, probably partly because Nolan's partner in producing the video – Garland Waller – is a professor at Boston University.

So let's take a look at the facts here:

Barry Nolan just wrote a piece calling men's and father's rights groups "dangerous," and suggested everyone ought to be "very, very scared" of them.

Barry Nolan produced an anti-male documentary based on a heap of lies, and supported the criminal actions of a mother who lost primary custody of her kids, and then decided to commit a felony to remove them from their father and take them overseas, where she immediately hooked up with a Dutch man and had four more children within four years, making her a mother to seven children by three different fathers. In fact, she not only kidnapped Mark Collins' two children, but also one more child she had with another American man named Jeff Imm. Naturally, the US federal government ignored her crime, leaving Mr. Collins to mourn the loss of his children, who now repeat their mother's unproven accusations (they were very young when she fled with them).

Nolan has ignored the anguish and pain that at least two fathers have suffered at the hands of a woman who has left a trail of wounded and broken family members – including her parents and sister, who also fell victim to her accusations – in her wake. In fact, he fully supports everything she's done, and he has the nerve to call us dangerous…

No, if you're a father it's people like Barry Nolan, promoters of the big lie, who are dangerous.

It's time to start calling a spade a spade. Men have been taking this kind of abuse lying down for far too long, and we've just started standing up for ourselves. There is absolutely no reason we should sit back mild and mute while men like Barry Nolan slander innocent fathers with impunity. The consequences of inaction are far too severe. Losing custody to false accusations and biased courts is bad enough, but when people start promoting outright kidnapping we are getting into truly dangerous territory.

I think most fathers would have some pretty strong feelings toward a man responsible for taking away their children by force or deception. Barry Nolan, in promoting kidnapping, would be that kind of man. Think about it for a minute. Feel free to be angry about it — that's normal and healthy.

But keep your cool, collect your thoughts, and decide what you're going to do about it, because anger is useless without action.

Boston U Hockey Team Taking Heat for Sexcapades

W.F. Price · 6 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The BU Terriers, Boston University's hockey team, are facing scrutiny for a campus culture that involves drunken hookups, aggressive propositions and "frequent sexual encounters with women absent an emotional relationship or ongoing commitment."

No doubt it's common for young athletes to engage in lots of questionable sexual behavior – particularly these days – so it isn't particularly surprising to see this minor scandal erupt. However, I'd be willing to bet that if we heard an honest answer from young Boston women, the last thing they'd want is for these strapping young athletes to be put out of commission permanently. No, what they really want is more control over them, so that the "right kind of women" (i.e. themselves) can have access to them without undue risk.

A couple of the young men have been arrested for sexual misconduct, including Max Nicastro and Corey Trivino. Nicastro's rape charges were dropped, and Trivino's assault charges resulted in mere probation. I think that says a great deal. Neither would have gotten off so easily had they been less desirable. Not to say I think they deserved to rot in jail, but young men who are arrested for sex crimes typically face far more serious consequences than these two.

In the Trivino case, it seems pretty clear that the guy was a boor. Not a rapist, but far from a gentleman. I can't claim to know the particulars, but Trivino did apologize to the woman for what he admitted to be pretty bad behavior, which included aggressive drunken advances and occupying her bed despite her protests.

However, for all the condemnation of these young men for boorish behavior, where's the criticism of the young women throwing themselves at them?

BU president Robert Brown identifies excessive drinking and "entitlement" as a problem, but neglects to mention excessive sluttiness on the part of his female students. But what exactly led these young men to feel "entitled" to sex?

These kinds of attitudes do not exist in a vacuum. Recently, we had a commenter who mentioned that some Western men behave poorly in Asia. I agreed with that assessment, because I've seen it myself. But men do not develop an entitled attitude regarding sex for no reason, and although feminists like to say the reason is "the patriarchy," this is entirely incorrect.

In fact, in traditional patriarchal societies, such as the Amish, Muslim societies and Confucian cultures, men practice considerably more sexual restraint than in, say, the ghetto or liberal college campuses.

No, it isn't patriarchy, but rather unfettered female sexuality that leads to this entitlement attitude amongst a subset of males. This subset, of course, consists of sexually desirable males, which definitely includes collegiate champion hockey players.

So what's the university response? Naturally, it's to force the hockey players to attend sexual assault prevention classes. Given that the problem isn't so much sexual assault as sexual license, this is a mere fart in the wind.

Rather than try to make a handful of adolescent hockey players behave like middle-aged gentlemen, I'd argue that the effort would be better spent training the thousands of young women who would gladly throw themselves upon these boys not to be sluts.

Of course, it would be great if we could convince all young male athletes to behave like perfect gentlemen, but how realistic is that when they are living in a veritable cornucopia of willing young females? Hell, even your typical 65-year-old man would have a hard time behaving himself if that many coeds were so willing to remove their pants in his presence.

If these young men are going to be forced to attend classes to teach them how to practice restraint around young females, I think it's only fair that the female students at their respective colleges teach them to practice restraint around men with "elevated social status."

But of course that won't do…

Why should women ever have to practice restraint around men they find attractive? That would be sexist and oppressive, right?

My Response to Barry Nolan

W.F. Price · 6 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I hope he reads this, and I hope it is published

Here's our previous article on the subject, and Barry's own hit job.

Here's the response:

Nolan, it's men like you who need to be stopped. You engaged in the character assassination of a man who was found, by seven judges and plenty of social workers, not to have been the monster his ex-wife made him out to be, then you supported her decision to criminally abscond with the kids, leaving their father broken and in despair.

Throughout the process, the woman you lionize made vicious accusations against a number of others, including her husband's new wife, her own parents, and her neighbors in the country she fled to.

Your documentary has been exposed for the fraud it is, yet you have the nerve to demand that men who are simply standing up for their rights as fathers be "stopped."

Your articles discredit Boston Magazine. You discredit men in general.

In one article you wrote, you said you'd like to wear the "mangina" label with pride. You are far worse than a mangina. You are a thug and an abettor of criminals who seize men's children when they don't get everything they want.

You are dangerous. You need to be stopped, and you need to be held accountable for your fraud and slander of an innocent, wronged man. You are no better than Mike Nifong of Duke LaCrosse infamy, and yet like him you cloak your self-interested grandstanding in the garb of protecting women and children. I can't think of a man much more deserving of contempt than you.

No Fault Divorce is Violence Against Men

W.F. Price · 7 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A good portion of the mangina argument against men and fathers who stand up for themselves is that we're "violent," and therefore bad and need to be watched. Yeah, we're just a bunch of terrorists for being upset about having our kids seized for no good reason and then being forced to pay for it. Assholes like Barry Nolan and David Futrelle trumpet this line:

"Watch out!" They're violent! We need to set the feds on them!"

It's totally transparent aggression, and should give anyone with an ounce of sense some juicy ideas about what these guys deserve.

But let's think about what they're really doing. These guys are defending the fact that men are subject to real state violence for no fault of their own. They celebrate this violence. It gives them happy feelings, as though they are jacking off to slaves being whipped.

What's really amazing is how people get away with facile arguments supporting the status quo. They say things like "they're your kids, so you should pay!"

Well, are they really our kids? If a judge can, with no trouble or pang of conscience, and for no reason other than the fact that the mother wants some new cock or is unhaaappppppy, order the kids away from the man, how are they his kids? If, through no fault of his own, the man can be deprived of the children he begot, how are they his kids?

Feminist dykes will reject this argument, saying "the patriarchy always seeks control — children do not belong to them." Well, tell that to the kids' mothers. Let's all tell mothers that they have no right to the children they gave birth to. See what the ladies have to say about that…

Furthermore, some bitches will say that it's in the children's best interests to hijack them from their fathers. Wrong. That's long since been debunked. Credible psychologists have found that children are better off in intact families, with both mother and father present, Jessica Valenti lesbian bullshit notwithstanding.

So, when you take away men's children for no fault of their own and make them pay for it, you're committing violence against them (and their kids, too). That's indisputable.

How are you going to justify that? The only way is to hold fast to the line that men are legally inferior, and have no human rights, and that children's well-being is subordinate to their mothers' whims. This is exactly the line that manginas would feed us, and we don't have to accept it. When they blabber on and on about "violence," I think we ought to tell them they don't know the half of it.

How about we pass laws that punish them for no fault of their own? How about we seize David Futrelle's and Barry Nolan's income to pay for destitute fathers, and subject them to prison if they don't pay? Maybe they would say it isn't fair, but who cares? After all, it's "no fault." I don't care if it isn't your fault — WE DON'T CARE IF IT ISN'T YOUR FAULT. Pay or go to jail, bitch. Fault doesn't matter.

Remember — you set the precedent, dumbass. Don't complain when it's your turn.

Naomi Wolf's Hilarious Foray into Neuroscience Debunked

W.F. Price · 8 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Did you know that dopamine is a "feminist chemical?" That "oxytocin is women's emotional superpower?"

How about this:

"…a woman's brain and vagina are best understood as one system."

Hmmm, I guess that's one way to put it…

These stellar ideas – and many more – are discussed in Naomi Wolf's book Vagina: A New Biography.

Fortunately, for those of us who are never going to read it, a couple critics, including a neuroscientist who goes by "Neurocritic" and Suzanne Moore, have stepped up to the plate to hit this hanging curve out of the park.

Moore writes:

> feminism becomes simply a highly mediated form of narcissism devoid of any actual brain/politics connection. What we have here is Californication, with a little trot through some basic women's studies linking female creativity with sexual awakening. Think Georgia O'Keeffe with bit of Anaïs Nin thrown in. Which is nice.
> It gets dodgy when she drags in some neuroscience as evidence and appears more clueless than someone who has failed her chemistry GCSE but has two TED talks on her iPhone. She boldly goes into the clitoral v vaginal orgasm argument saying we can have it all. Call me repressed, but in between work and kids and watching this recession hit the poorest women hardest, for some time now this argument has not been uppermost in my mind. Or should I say vagina?

Neurocritic:

> Does the Vagina Have a Consciousness?
> Naomi Wolf, the famous feminist author and activist, asks that precise question in her new book, Vagina: A New Biography. At first glance, it strikes me as an uneasy balance of sex confessional, self-help, pop neuroscience, and new age goddess yoni worship.
> This unlikely combination of pseudoscientific and mystical elements provides a little something for everyone to hate. Among neuroscientists, howlers such as "dopamine is the ultimate feminist chemical in the female brain", oxytocin "is women's emotional superpower" and the vagina is "not only coextensive with the female brain but also is part of the female soul" have been making the rounds of social media.

Being a Non-Custodial Father is a Civil Disability

W.F. Price · 9 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Most readers probably aren't acquainted with the concept of civil disability. However, because most are American, they probably do have some instinctive understanding of the concept, because the United States was founded in large part in opposition to unfair civil disabilities. In fact, our Constitution prohibits more than a few of them.

A civil disability is, in effect, a punishment levied against someone for being a member of a certain class. For example, following the Jacobite uprising in Scotland and subsequent English conquest of the land, Scots were subject to a number of penal laws that imposed civil disabilities on the native population. They were not allowed to wear tartans, bear arms, or, in some cases, speak their native tongue.

In Ireland, civil disabilities targeting Catholics were introduced in the late 17th century.

In the American colonies, merely being a colonist subjected people to certain punitive, confiscatory laws.

Our founding fathers opposed these penal measures, and codified their opposition to them in our Constitution. The 1st Amendment of the Bill of Rights offers a stellar example: the right to freely practice one's religion.

This right was most definitely not guaranteed prior to the drafting of the Bill of Rights. In the late 18th century, and indeed in the early 19th century, Jews, Catholics and others were still subject to civil disabilities in England. These took the form of financial penalties, forced registration with the state, inability to hold public office, and other pernicious limits to full citizenship.

Following the abolition of slavery in the United States, black Americans were subject to civil disabilities until the late 20th century under the Jim Crow regime. The Civil Rights movement was dedicated to overturning these legal barriers to full participation in society.

Today, it is only officially admitted that convicted felons are subject to them. Convicted felons, as it currently stands, have neither the right to vote nor the right to bear arms.

However, there is another class of Americans – a far more numerous one – that is also currently subject to civil disabilities: the non-custodial parent.

Overwhelmingly male by design, non-custodial parents are – through no fault or crime of their own – entered into criminal justice databases. They are assized for plunder, and then ordered to turn over their income to another, regardless of fault, regardless of wrongdoing, regardless of consent.

They are denied public employment if they do not – or merely cannot – bear the burden of their unearned penalty. They face prison without trial, and they face seizure of assets without due process. The burden of proof is upon them, and they face the loss not only of their sustenance, but of their very issue.

Feminists, ruthless oppressors that they are, approve wholeheartedly of this state of affairs. Tyranny comes naturally to a feminist, whose notion of rights stops at her or his own benefit. Any excuse will do to deprive innocent Americans of their rights and livelihood.

Through their efforts, feminists have made a cruel mockery of the ideals of freedom and justice upon which our country was founded. They are perhaps the most successful of tyrants in our contemporary state, snatching children and property from innocent parents, and justifying their crimes against humanity with wild, unnatural assaults against nature, human decency and public order.

As Americans, we should despise these assaults against the underpinnings of our nation and civilization. We should be vociferously opposing the abuse of an innocent class of people, who are oppressed with the full force of the law to serve a shrill, spoiled and increasingly parasitic subset of our society.

It is time we stopped being timid lambs led to our own slaughter and took a stand against the feminists. We must let them know that we will not be consigned to subhuman status merely to effect their enslavement of the American man and consumption of the American family.

Enough is enough. It is time for us to be men again, and not merely beasts fit for the slaughter.

Growing Pains

The site's size and traffic have grown to the point where ordinary methods to keep it responding as it's supposed to aren't really doing the job any longer. So, I've been spending the day tinkering around with the caching software in an effort to keep it running. Seeing one's RAM use drop precipitously in conjunction with the establishment of a smooth, functional cache is a thing of beauty.

For others out there in the androsphere who host their own sites, I would recommend looking into Xcache with W3 Total Cache as an alternative to dumping Apache and running nginx or Lighttpd, although I've heard that running it with nginx works very well if you care to configure the site in that manner.

Yeah, it's a pain, but it's nice to see that it's become such a big resource. After putting a lot of work into something over a long time, when you finally step back and take a look, it's a bit humbling how daily effort can build something so large. Now, I suppose it's time to start thinking about what more to do with all that content.

Prostitution Stings, and What They Say About Our Society

Featured Guest · 10 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Walt Forest

In my area, and perhaps in yours, the local news media regularly run stories of prostitution "stings." In case you are not familiar with them, they work like this: female law enforcement officers pose as prostitutes. They may walk a street "known" for prostitution (which in my city means you may find, at most, a dozen down-and-out, drug-addicted women on a busy night, plus the gratuitous male transvestites), or they may arrange to meet a "john" at a motel. In any case, they lure men by claiming to supply sex for cash and, once a concrete offer is made, arrest them. Dozens of men are picked up this way on a single night.

Often one or more of the men will work for the school system, the local government, a church, or some other position easily sullied, making the story juicier. At the very least the journalist can mention that some of the men are married. The story is published and broadcast with the names and photos of the more prominent men arrested. All the city can cluck its tongue. The sheriff's department or police can pat themselves on the back for "protecting" us. And the media boost their ratings. The old saying is true (in more ways than one): sex sells.

What do these prostitution stings say about our society?

First, to point out the obvious (which unfortunately has become necessary): these stings show that the men offering to pay for sex are, well, men. The victims are never women looking for male prostitutes. After two decades of reading sting stories in the local papers, I can recall only one case, excluding those involving gay hustlers, in which the prostitute was male. The cops who caught him were posing as man and wife looking for a male-female-male threesome. If someday the police do manage to catch a woman cruising for a gigolo, you can bet the media will milk the story for all its worth. In the meantime, if you are looking for examples of women paying for sex with men, I suggest you turn on a television show, go to the movies, or read the excessive and rather fantastic literature on this subject, because this is the only place you are likely to find them. In the real world, it is men who pay.

The prostitution sting stories also provide a rare measure of just how strong male sexual desire can be. These men risk everything—marriage, family, job, and prestige—for a little sex. Most of them are aware of the risk ahead of time. A sting story in my local paper just this morning describes how one victim checked the bathroom of the motel, searched the room for the hidden camera (and failed to find it). It is common for the man to question the undercover female law enforcement officer who serves as "bait," all but beg her to tell him if she is a cop. Still, in the end, the risk is worth it to them. They offer to pay. They are arrested, carried away, and ruined.

Why don't they just fly to Bangkok or some other place more tolerant of prostitution? Going half way around the world, paying for plane tickets, the hotel room, and the prostitute's fee plus tips, is expensive, no doubt, but cheaper than the penalties here. Of course a lot of men nowadays do become sex tourists, and prostitutes abroad take care of them (far better than our domestic ones do). We have, for the most part, outsourced the industry.

Regardless of where the men go, the women of North America and much of Europe as well should get together and sing that old Sade song:

So put your hands together for Sally

She's doing our dirty work

Every time a prostitution sting story appears in the local news, we must ask ourselves (or, as is increasingly the case, consciously avoid asking): If women and men feel basically the same about sex, the way we so often claim nowadays, why do so many men find it necessary not only to pay, but to ruin their lives in this way? Why don't they take advantage of all the women who are supposedly so eager and willing to go to bed for free?

The common response is to chalk up the men who pay as losers. They are "too pathetic to get laid" in the ordinary way. But the stories reveal the victims of these stings are often successful and intelligent, sometimes young and good looking, too. They are not losers. They are not pathetic. They are just men, and they want sex in the way men do. Their crime is that they acted on their wants.

So we're back to the question: why?

To paraphrase Thoreau: the majority of men live lives of quiet, sexual desperation. Each of us must deal with this desperation in his own way. Some turn to swinging and barter the sexual favors of their wives. Others make do with pornography. Still others bite the bullet, and submit to monogamy, even as the society that imposes it upon them commits the hypocrisy of claiming we are sexually free.

Paying cash for sex is just another option men have of dealing with this sexual desperation, and a relatively harmless one really. Some men get pushed over the edge and resort to violence, either physical (harassment, rape) or, far more often, emotional, usually by suggesting to women they are interested in love or commitment when they only want sex. Compared to this sort of behavior, paying for a prostitute is practically morally upstanding.

Do you believe that prostitution is a problem? Then solve is as you would any problem. Go straight to the root: men's lack of sexual freedom. When more women start giving themselves away for free—free of charge, free of commitment and the promise thereof—men won't find it necessary to pay. As soon as the heterosexual equivalents of gay bathhouses begin popping up all over the Western world, prostitution will drop drastically. Problem solved.

Do you think prostitution should be made legal? Very well. Base your argument for legalization on the facts: women and men are different, and this difference gives women a sexual power which men do not and cannot have. Prostitution, despite its many drawbacks, is a way of softening the repercussions of this inequality (though it does nothing to correct the inequality itself). Prostitution should then be accepted, even embraced. Anything less would be unjust.

Do you believe that prostitution is morally wrong? Then point to the positive example, the man who resists the temptation of prostitutes. Call him a gentleman without irony. Acknowledge the sacrifice he makes for your good and mine. (This sacrifice is difficult and painful). Our gentleman is a real Dr. Jekyll. He must keep Hyde under control.

But however you feel about prostitution, do not, please do not, pretend that the male sexual desperation these stings reveal is less than real. To do so is to mock one of the most powerful feelings men experience. It is like taunting an animal in a cage, encouraging it to lash out with a freedom it does not possess. Sooner or later, you're going to wind up with a bitter, mean animal.

God help us if it gets out.

Birthday Fund Drive

Next week, it will have been three years since The Spearhead published its first article. I'm kind of surprised it's lasted that long, given what I've been dealing with in the meanwhile, but sometimes pressure gives you the extra boost needed to keep going.

I hope that's true, because I'm going to need some support to keep the site online for the rest of the year (I don't generally ask for donations unless I really need them). Fortunately, it is doing quite well in terms of traffic and reach, but given the controversial, political nature of the content advertising dollars are hard to come by, so I need your support to continue putting in the hours.

In the meanwhile, I'll be working on the back end of the site to keep it tight and functional so that I can open it up to subscribers for its third birthday.

Some of the benefits that will be extended to subscribers include exclusive content, as well as the ability to post on a private bulletin board to give and receive feedback from me and others who write articles for the site. Those who have already helped support the site will, naturally, be automatically included as subscribers and have access to all content.

For now, I would appreciate any help in keeping the site (and me) above water. I appreciate all the help I've received so far — every dollar that has been donated has helped convince me to keep the site running. Furthermore, you are getting value for your money; The Spearhead runs on a very small budget compared to comparable websites, and a great deal of work goes into keeping the content flowing and the site online.

Thank you all in advance. Please send donations via PayPal (upper right sidebar) or, if you prefer to send checks or money orders, please send them to the following address:

Fire in the Manosphere

W.F. Price · 11 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The Game/PUA and MRA factions are going after each other again, and I was going to weigh in on PMAFT's blog with my own take on the situation. Well, my comment got kind of long, and when I'd finished I looked at it and said to myself "this isn't a comment — it's a post." So I decided to throw it online, because I think it's important, and worth thinking about.

Here it is:

As far as attacking people, there's a lot of guilt to go around, so I'm not going to point fingers at one side or another, and quite frankly I try to keep it to myself and not make an issue of it when someone else attacks me personally. No sense in burning bridges until there's no better choice.

Zed's written about this problem before. He calls it the "circular firing squad." Ah, la plus ca change…

Guys have big egos. We aren't really that good at consensus. What men do well is compete, and organize toward a common goal — usually in competition with another group.

What's going on here is competition between the younger game/PUA and older MRA/fathers' rights crowd. I suppose I could say it's a shame, and we shouldn't be fighting each other, but actually I'm not too concerned. Competition can be a good thing, and so long as both are trying to win a prize that will ultimately benefit all men, it might turn out for the better.

Obviously, trying to score with various hot young chicks is not my thing right now. I'm past that stage, and to be honest it would probably get me in some trouble and could make my life a lot more difficult if I succeeded in such a pursuit. Last thing I need is another child support order, or some angry, spurned woman collaborating with my ex to screw me (some of them will do that stuff).

However, for a lot of guys under 35 or so it's a very important quest. It strikes me as kind of myopic and bull-headed when older men dismiss their concerns and efforts. However, on the other hand, it looks really naive and self-defeating when younger guys declare the efforts of MRAs and fathers' rights groups to be a total waste. Fathers' organizations have been making a difference for years. Since they started working on the problems in the 80s, they've managed to contain some of the damage and roll back some of the crazier legislation. Take the limits on alimony for example. If it weren't for these guys, a lot more states would still have punitive alimony laws in place.

Another example is visitation legislation. Women who repeatedly withhold visitation now face penalties that actually have some teeth. Presumed joint legal custody in dozens of states is yet another victory. I can only hope the young men who are trying to meet the future mother of their children (if they want to have kids, and most do) don't ever have to deal with these issues, but if they do they'll be happy they've got some men on their side. It sure beats nothing! Concerning strict MRA apart from fathers' rights, it's pretty new, so give it some time — give it a chance. You can't expect immediate triumph, and there's always going to be some trial and error, but don't think these guys haven't done anything so far; some, such as SAVE, have actually had legislative influence at the federal level.

As for the younger guys who are interested in Game, I think a lot of the men over 45 or so ought to consider the fact that when they were in their sexual prime, the atmosphere wasn't nearly as bad as it is now. If you are a guy in his 50s who got screwed after getting married, think about how it would have been to deal with having the deck stacked so badly against you before marriage. That's the reality for young men. Game is how they are dealing with significantly lower social status than men had as recently as the 1990s, and apparently it works.

What we have is two groups of guys yelling at each other from either side of the transition most men go through between youth and middle age. It's a little odd when you think about it, because they might as well be shaking their fists at their younger or older selves.

As someone who still straddles both camps (although definitely moving closer to the latter), I try to present some balance. It might be a futile effort, and as I suggested the competition between the groups might not be a terrible thing, but it's important for there to be a bridge, and I guess I'm going to stand here by that bridge with a fire hose to try to save it from being burned down. I have a feeling it will come in handy for a lot of men.

Two Kidnappings Compared

W.F. Price · 11 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A Californian man named Christopher Maffei made off with his two children and attempted to flee in a stolen sailboat before being tracked down by military surveillance planes and boarded by an FBI team (probably SWAT). He offered no resistance whatsoever, and is currently in jail being held on $200,000 bail.

He took the children from their grandmother while his ex girlfriend, the mother of the children, was in court filing a restraining order against him.

While in court, Maffei attempted to defend his actions by saying the children were in an abusive environment. The judge dismissed his claims and cut him off.

Sound familiar?

If so, that's because last week I wrote about Holly Collins, who did the exact same thing, but was actually successful. No US military operations were launched to recover Mark Collins' children; nobody did a damn thing.

Like Mr. Maffei, Holly's claims of abuse were rejected by judges. She, too, had lost custody. But she never spent a day in jail and – even better – some people produced a documentary giving credence to her spurious claims of abuse.

If anything shines a light on the double standard in family law, this is it. Holly Collins' kidnapping was ignored, while Christopher Maffei's resulted in the kind of operation normally reserved for major international drug smugglers.

I can't support Maffei's actions — tolerating them would open up all sorts of parents to the kind of tragedy that befell Mark Collins. In fact, the reason I am so disgusted by Barry Nolan, who produced the documentary defending Holly's crimes, is that supporting her kidnapping opens the door to terrible abuses. Any mother could simply make off with a father's kids and make claims of abuse, and deprive him of the right to parent his children.

But it is kind of sad and pathetic to see a man so misguided as to think he could get away with this. What man in his right mind would ever believe that he could get away with trying to take his children from their mother?

Given how implausible the idea is, I can only assume that Maffei was desperate, and perhaps delusional. Maybe he saw this as his last chance to be a father, and had some wild dream about sailing to Mexico and starting over.

Now, of course, we're all treated to the spectacle of a broken man hauled in by the air cavalry.

Men, if you are ever tempted to make off with your kids, keep this story in mind. You will never, ever get a Holly Collins style get-out-of-jail free card, and you're likely to end up in prison for a very long time. As of now, perhaps the only consolation left to Maffei is that, thanks to new federal guidelines for incarcerated obligees, at least his child support will be automatically lowered for what's likely to be the rest of his kids' childhood.

Here's pretty much what will happen to men if they try to pull a Holly Collins (the men are the sorry little bastards on the ground):

Amanda Marcotte Fantasizes about Sexual Harassment

W.F. Price · 12 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Amanda's been complaining about guys being mean. They say nasty things about her online, call her names, and even accuse her of the "nonsense word" misandry.

According to Marcotte, it's all about these guys frustrations about not getting laid. That's right: men are upset only because such alluring feminists as Marcotte won't give them a crack at their old bones.

> Growing up and wanting something from women and finding out that they can say "no"—despite the fact that they were put here to serve you!—is often extremely distressing to men. The invention of the nonsense word "misandry" goes back to this. Men who fling it about are, in my experience, usually referring to women refusing to give them something they believe they're owed: sex, attention, placating smiles, demurely wiping tables while the men are talking. When women deny them what they believe women owe them, instead of asking if in fact they were owed these things, they instead lash out at women. They sexually harass them, which is a way of saying that you have no right to give them no attention, so if you don't give them the positive attention they desire, they will extract some attention from you, even if it's just annoyance or fear.

Amanda may have fantasies about men clambering to get in her pants, and maybe that idea gives her some comfort during her nights alone or with sexless manginas. But seriously, Mandy, that ship has sailed.

Amanda has mistaken anger, disgust and repulsion for desire. It may suit her and other feminists to hold onto this illusion, but today's feminists do not represent sexual allure and freedom. Not even close.

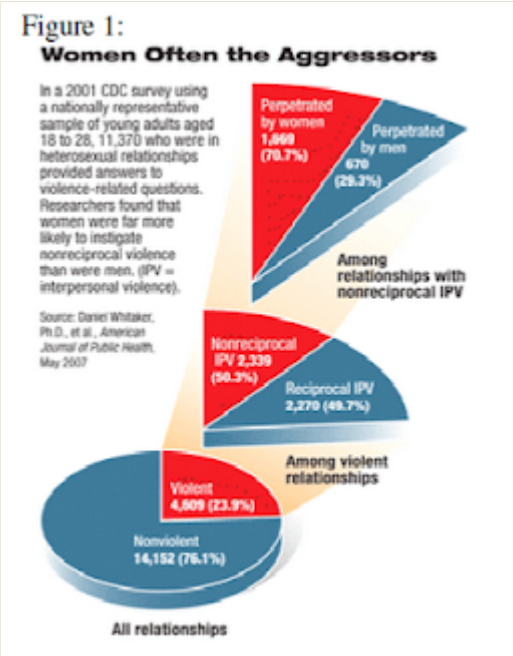
Men rightly see them as odious threats, as sexless hags, and as cruel oppressors. There is no promise of fulfillment and pleasure, but rather ruin and despair. They are like ghouls and animated corpses that send chills up men's spines. Little boys hide under beds when they come around.

No, the guys aren't cursing feminists because they want them — it's because they actually despise them. And feminists have definitely earned it!

But I guess if you're a feminist who is close to hitting the wall, and has no other redeeming qualities to make up for it, fantasy is about all you've got.

Women At Least As Likely As Men to Commit DV

Elusive Wapiti · 12 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original



Source. Click here to enlarge

Have been looking for this chart (right) for a while to support my claims that women commit 70% of non-reciprocal DV. What once was lost to the sands of teh interwebz, has now been found.

From the accompanying text [page 3 of this pdf]:

> Women are at least as likely as men to engage in partner aggression.[6] A recent Centers for Disease Control survey of young adults found that in cases of one-way partner aggression, women were the instigators in 71% of cases [7] (see Figure 1 [8]). Fewer than one in five cases of female violence are explained by the woman acting in self-defense. [9,10]

> In at least half of all cases, partner violence is mutual.[11] “Several studies, including large and nationally representative samples, have found that the most prevalent pattern is mutual violence,” explains family researcher Murray Straus.[12]

> In most cases, partner aggression does not escalate. [13,14] If the conflict does turn into a full-scale altercation, the woman is more likely to be injured. Nonetheless, males represent 38% of persons who suffer physical injury from partner aggression. [15]

> Domestic violence rates vary depending on the couple’s marital status. Among intact married couples, partner violence rates are quite low—only 0.9/1,000. [16] But among separated couples, partner violence rates rise sharply to 49.0/1,000—a 50-fold increase.

Chuck Ross Highlights Free Speech Hypocrisy

W.F. Price · 13 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've been taken aback by the behavior and statements of US government officials regarding the lynching of US diplomats in Libya, especially their condemnation of American citizens' speech. I thought they were civil servants, but I guess things have changed a lot over the decades.

Chuck compares the slutwalkers' denunciation of a Toronto policeman's advice that women dress modestly to the chiding some anti-Muslim Americans have been subject to lately for airing their opinions (apparently, the head of the Joint Chiefs actually called Terry Jones, an obscure, anti-Muslim preacher, to tell him not to provoke Muslims, which is surreal):

> …In both instances we have groups becoming outraged that a state functionary proposed a first order limitation on free expression. In the case of the Slut Walkers, they opposed a lone policeman in Toronto. In the case of the people who created the video condemning Muhammed, they're in opposition to a much larger state-run entity.
> Regardless of whether or not Mitt Romney stuck his foot in his mouth and went overboard in politicizing Obama's handling of that statement and the subsequent attacks in Egypt and Libya, there should have been no place for the following statement released by a State functionary on the anniversary of 9/11 and about the behaviors of individuals not affiliated with a government entity.

This kind of thing makes me wonder what the hell happened to my country. Maybe the paranoid black helicopter guys back in the 90s were right about this One World Government thing…

Update: Our friends at the SPLC are explicitly blaming the killings on an American:

> Klein of Hemet, Calif., who has a long history of ties to militant Christian organizations, has been identified as one of the brains behind the anti-Muslim film that triggered violence in northern Africa, including a rocket attack on the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi, Libya, and the murder of Chris Stevens, the U.S. ambassador to Libya.

Well, I guess we all know where they stand now.

Comment of the Week: Defeatism Unacceptable

W.F. Price · 13 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Tholian points out that competition is inevitable and even worthy of celebration, and then goes on to say that simply giving up and conceding defeat is most counterproductive and contrary to the masculine spirit

By Tholian Soren

As someone balanced equidistant, age-wise, between the two camps, i feel an affinity for both. I'm divorced, early 40′s, still fit and attractive, and have decided that one of the benefits of my ex-wife declaring "i'm not haaaaaaapy" was that I could pursue model-quality younger women for recreational pursuits. But I also have seen enough of life to understand that many of the MRAs issues, particularly those espoused by father's rights advocates, are vitally important to the future of society. Indeed, the attention and resolution these issues get (or lack of same) will SHAPE our future.

The previous para was simply to establish cred that i understand both sides and their respective issues resonate with me. That said, two observations come to mind:

1) The natural competition amongst men and, therefore, amongst men's groups, that Price points out is a very real phenomenon. Numerous other bloggers, such as "Anonymous Aged 70″ (Irlandes from the "Don't Get Married" board) have pointed it out, too. Men try to one up each other. It's a fact of life. We should be aware of it. We should celebrate it. We compete on the ballfield and we will compete in the blogosphere as well. It's important to keep this reality in mind because, every once in a while, it wouldn't hurt to remind each other that we are, in fact, on the SAME team, not different teams.

2) While i see the virtue and need for both the PUA side and the MRA side, i do not see each side as performing equally admirably. The PUA side seems true to its nature – that is, they focus on achieving their desired end game — beguiling lots of attractive young women into bed. But some – like Roissy, Krauser, and earlier John Ross, also philosophize about what it means to be a man in a world where the traditional markers of manhood – supporting a stable family – have been taken out of his control. They do an admirable job of that, at least as well as most MRA bloggers. What the PUA side does NOT do, in my experience, is delve into whiny self-indulgence, passive-aggressiveness, or wallow in "whoa is me".

The MRA side, sadly, does have such a meloncholy streak to it. Most don't. Most, like Price, nobly go on about their business like men, while pointing out the myriad hypocrisies in modern family law. Some do yeoman's work in advocacy, like Fathers For Justice. But a not insignificant percentage lapse into defeatism. The old "Don't Get Married" blog, and some posters i could name here (but won't), had a distincitve "Women have won, let's just admit defeat" streak to it. They sounded like – and i hate to use this phrase, it got me banned from the old DGM site, but i'm afraid it's true and others are now saying it – they sound like losers. There, i said the "L" word – so shoot me. ALL men are faced with the same circumstance – a nearly complete obliteration of 2,000 years worth of societal tradition, everything that helped us climb out of our mud huts and into CIVILIZATION. When life gives men lemons, we make lemonade. As John Ross said (i'm paraphrasing), "My first choice was to have a family. When my wife cashed out, I then went on to my second choice: sport-fking young beauties, enjoying wonderful vacations, and picking whatever flowers I may". But some MRA sites don't espouse this. They are, as I said, a minority – but a distinctive minority. They use ad absurdum attacks ("why, you can't even LOOK at a woman today or you'll be executed and then put in jail for life") instead of stating the reality: It is very risky to subject oneself to family law today, but many have pulled it off successfully. One can recognize the "L-word" element in MRA blogs today because they all reach the same conclusion: "You should have NOTHING to do with women. Nada. Zip. Zilch. Nothing". The unspoken addendum: "…and then you'll be exactly like ME, because women don't talk to me either – er, i mean, I don't talk to women".

We should honor the manly MRAs and PUAs and recognize they have a common enemy. But we should ostracize

L-word MRAs who advocate capitulation because “no matter what we do, we can’t win…women will always beat us”; they have the stink of the death about them.

Is it Selfish to Avoid Fatherhood?

W.F. Price · 14 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Zed mentions that Mentu is coming in for some criticism for deciding to get a vasectomy. He wrote about the procedure and his reasons for going through with it here.

> I realized that I can (and have) found women who would probably make a decent wife, but I have yet to come across a woman who I would want to be the mother of my children. I have never met a woman in my age range who thinks it's anything but odd that a 7 year old would use phrases like "A man's word is his bond", and they all (to some extent) criticize mom and dad Mentu and my sisters for being too strict with the kids and subjecting them to the horrors of a Patriarchal household. It seems that fishing with your Uncle, obeying your elders, learning life lessons about manhood at a young age, and taking responsibility for teaching your younger brother to do the same is just too weird of a concept these days. Throw in the fact that my mom takes a break from doing the dishes to serve my dad sweet tea while he's in his recliner playing Mario Kart with the grandkids, and Lord God almighty the family atmosphere of the Mentu household is just too misogynistic and backward for modern women to handle. It's as if they instinctively hate it without knowing why.
> I know why.
> If that doctor doesn't show up soon, I'm using my cell phone to call the front desk. This is ridiculous.
> I thought about the Manosphere. In my opinion, pro-marriage and Christian bloggers in these parts talk far too much about how to find a good wife, and not nearly enough about how to find a good mother. After a long and exhaustive search, I have finally given up. I actually gave up about three years ago, to be perfectly honest. Women who might make decent wives pop up every now and then, but women in the 21 to 31 year old age range who would make good mothers have gone the way of the Dodo Bird. It's not as if they've rejected the idea; they're not even aware that the concept exists.

From a philosophical point of view, there's nothing to be sad about. Mentu is making his own choice as a man, and it isn't my place or any other man's to tell him what he "should" or "ought" to do. Being a man means you can make these decisions yourself.

However, the post itself isn't entirely philosophical. There's a lot of sentimentality attached to it, and that's perfectly natural. Family is one of those fundamental pillars of our lives. Beyond our own immediate needs, it is the most important emotional and spiritual component of our "selves." Even our concept of the divine is understood in terms of family.

I'm getting to an age now where it's becoming apparent what's transient in life and what isn't. With the exception of a few close ones, friends come and go. Most of the people I grew up with and went to school with are still there in my memories, but they are mere shadows compared to those in my family.

I doubtless spent more hours with some people in school (I attended one school for over ten years) than I did with my own father, but I never dream about them. In fact, I still dream about my paternal grandparents, who have been gone for almost twenty years. My father died a couple years ago, but in many ways he is still very much here with me.

So, when you make a decision like Mentu's, it's a pretty profound thing to do.

However, in our bizarre times, it isn't those who miss out on family creation who are to be pitied, but rather those who don't. Mentu and other men like him who eschew fatherhood are making a rational choice based on what's available to them. They are choosing to add potential to their lives, and to avoid personal destruction before their time is up. And despite how some may feel, they are not being selfish. Far from it. We need men who are unencumbered with the emotional and financial devastation inflicted on most fathers today. If we all ended up like your typical American fathers – most of whom will be separated from their children before they come of age – precious little would be accomplished.

Consider the noncustodial fathers you know, and compare them to equivalent men who are childless. I've had ample opportunity to do so. No more than half of my childhood friends have children, and not one of the ones with whom I still regularly correspond has a child. Without exception, these childless friends have objectively better lives than I do at this point. Even the friend who did time in a federal prison for drug trafficking is in better shape. As for the guys who have children they still live with (a precarious situation to say the least), they generally don't seem to have time for friends. I assume they're significantly better off than noncustodial fathers, but it doesn't look like a picnic for them, either.

Under the current regime, losing children will wreck men's lives in myriad ways, and only a fraction of them will ever truly recover from it — financially or emotionally. Their ability to contribute to society is severely compromised for a number of reasons. First and most important is that most – if not all (and then some) – of their disposable income will go directly to the woman who took their kids away. Next, they will have to exert more effort as parents than if they'd never lost the kids if they try to hold onto the shreds of fatherhood the state leaves them. Finally, the more difficult to quantify, but still very real and palpable, emotional damage and loss of motivation will diminish their life achievements.

So shouldn't we all be glad that a significant minority of men is exempt from this? Think of how absolutely dull and depressing a society completely filled with broken men would be: an utter dystopia, gray and devoid of any cheer, innovation and vigor. It would be little more than a vast slave pen; a sort of dank, foggy purgatory at best.

Although some men may feel resentful that they ended up with the short end of the stick by becoming fathers, I think we can learn to appreciate the men who avoided it, and they may learn to appreciate us for absorbing the blow for them, and for providing a new generation to work with; one that can give us all some motivation to leave a better place behind. Men do generally like to do good deeds, and children provide that opportunity best of all.

In his post, Mentu mentions the attachment he feels toward children, who represent the future. It's clear that in his heart he cares about them, and wants to do well by them. I think we can count on most childless men to feel the same way, and perhaps because they do not have any of their own they are in a better position to help them in aggregate. When a woman has no children, it's often because she doesn't like them (if she's infertile that's an entirely different matter), but I've found that not to be the case for men who have no children of their own. They tend to have a pure appreciation of little ones, untainted by the jealousy and possessive attitude that characterizes maternal instincts which, although good in their own way, are far more particular than they are universal for quite practical reasons.

So, rather than allow bitterness about our plight to consume us, I think we fathers should see these men as slaves saw escapees, and cheer them for breaking through into freedom. What good would it do us to hate and tear down the ones who got away? They give us hope for a future; for a new, free world for our sons. A world for which we'd gladly sacrifice ourselves to give to those little boys who bear our names.

For me, that's what it's about. I want my son to walk on this beautiful earth as a free man, with only heaven above and an open road ahead. Let men like Mentu clear the path for him, and I'll be forever grateful. If I end up old and broken, but I see my son a free man, it will all be alright, and I'll go to my fate with a light and happy heart.

NY Times Documentary Demonstrates Market Imbalance

W.F. Price · 15 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The NY Times came out with a documentary about teenage Siberian girls who are trying out for a modeling gig. It's kind of sad, because so few of them have a chance, but there they are lined up in bikinis to be evaluated by scouts.

Despite its natural wealth, Siberia is pretty poor, so I suppose it figures that its females are significantly cheaper than in the West, too. I saw a lot of these Siberian girls some fifteen years ago in the discotheques of Peking. I was really amazed to see all these beautiful prole girls on sale. To be honest, it was a bit of a shock as a young American. It's demoralizing as a young man to see so clearly how sex is essentially a commodity, but it's a lesson I'm glad I learned.

Not many Americans understand how profound the economic imbalance between the West and the developing world really is. Even fewer understand how profound the imbalance between how American women and women in developing countries are valued is. American women are the most privileged people on the planet earth. They command more resources on a per capita basis than any human beings alive.

I remember feeling alarmed when I realized that the economic imbalances between Americans and others would eventually level out one way or another. I knew our standard of life was unsustainable when I saw how people lived in China, and even Korea and Hong Kong. Since I lived in Asia, I've already seen things even out substantially. Americans are poorer than they were in the 90s, and Chinese are wealthier. It's been gradual, but it's already noticeable, and the trend is likely to continue.

I wonder whether American women will be prepared for it when their value comes in for a reappraisal. I doubt it. It's going to be bitter medicine for them.

Battered Woman Defense Doesn't Work for Man

W.F. Price · 17 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There's a reason the "battered woman defense" is sex-specific. Apparently men do not have the right to use it, even in circumstances where homicide would appear more justified than it was in the cases where wives have had success arguing that committing spousal murder was justified, or at least ameliorated, in their cases.

In the following case, a man, just over 18 at the time, killed two men who had molested him while he was underage, and was then sentenced to death:

> Pennsylvania is preparing to execute Terrance Williams. Mr. Williams, known to his friends and family as "Terry," is on death row for a crime he committed three and one-half months after his 18th birthday. On that tragic day, Terry and another teenager killed a man. As the sentencing jury heard, Terry also committed another killing five months earlier at the age of 17. What the jury did not hear was that both of the men had sexually abused Terry, and both crimes directly related to Terry's history of sexual abuse by older males, which began when he was six years old.
> Terry's abuse continued throughout his adolescence. One of his abusers was his former public schoolteacher. That abuse caused Terry such intense pain and confusion that he began cutting himself and engaging in other acts of self-mutilation…

Over the years, I've heard of a few of these kinds of killings locally, but none of them ever made national news. In one case, a young man ambushed a teacher who had molested him as a boy, killing him as he arrived at work. In another, a mentally-ill young man murdered a local liberal talk radio host who had been keeping him as a concubine of sorts. Both got about twenty years, which suggests that there was some lenience in the sentencing, but as far as I know no specific defense along the lines of "battered woman syndrome" was mounted. Men simply don't get a free pass – or much sympathy – even if they are bona fide rape victims.

If a woman murdered a man who had actually raped her, it's hard to imagine she would get more than a few years. If she were sentenced to death, there would be an international outcry.

If you've noticed any service problems in the past few weeks, it's because I've been putting a lot of work into the back end of the site. WordPress is great publishing software, but the bigger the site gets the more unwieldy it is, and one bug in the code or the way the site is configured to work with with the server can cause major headaches. There have been a few of those recently.

Basically, I've been overhauling the way data is stored and retrieved so as to avoid putting too much strain on the server. To be honest, it hasn't been particularly fun, but it's one of those things you have to do to stay online. Some may ask why I don't use a wordpress.com or blogger site to avoid these issues. The reason is that these commercial services reserve the right to use your content, so copyright is essentially invalidated. Additionally, they reserve the right to cancel the service with no warning for whatever reason, which could take me offline for a significant period of time.

So, please be patient if a few connection issues remain. I think I resolved them as of yesterday, but I'm not going to curse myself by declaring victory before the results speak for themselves. However, the site is loading more than twice as fast as it was a couple days ago, so I'm hopeful.

Fortunately, even during the recent slowdowns, The Spearhead seems to have been attracting a fair amount of outside attention, which the recent Alexa stats verify. That's the most important advantage of having a big, comprehensive site: it throws out a wide net and draws people in from all over. The problem is that it means I have to do almost as much work keeping the thing running as I do writing and editing content, so every now and then readers are going to notice a bit of a lull in content as I do my webmaster duties.

The Feminist Paradox

W.F. Price · 18 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

While thinking about the issue of the undervalued Siberian girls (relative to American women), I realized that there is probably a direct correlation between the wealth of a society's men and the value and power of the society's women. That is, the richer the men in any given society are in aggregate, the more wealth and privilege accrues to its women. The flip side of that is that the poorer the men are, the worse off and less valued the women.

So, any policies that impoverish men, even if they temporarily benefit the women, cause women's status and value to decrease over time.

It's really pretty obvious if you think about it objectively, but it tends to escape notice because these days people don't think of these things in terms of a symbiotic relationship between men and women, but rather an oppositional one. What they do is compare men and women, and argue that men's wealth is somehow "oppressive" to women, because that's how modern, liberal democracies work; each group sees itself in opposition to others.

Here in the West men have been very wealthy by world standards for quite some time. We still are, but this is changing. What's been happening is that the younger generations of men have steadily lost wealth, while the older folks have managed to hang onto a fair amount. Part of the reason for younger men's decline in wealth (although by no means all), is feminist affirmative action and "positive discrimination," as well as confiscatory policies designed to give the female group an advantage over the male. These measures have been effective, and have contributed to the declining wealth of the Western male in both relative and absolute terms.

As the younger, poorer men come of age, and are still significantly poorer than their predecessors, this will begin to impact women of their cohort as well. I believe this process has already begun, but the effects have some lag; perhaps ten years or so. When it becomes readily apparent that living in a country full of poor men is no picnic for women, feminism will be discredited, but not until then. Using the recession as the starting point, I'd give it about five years until it can no longer be ignored.

So, given that women's status is a result of male wealth, it looks as though feminism may actually turn out to be self-correcting, as it strips men of resources that could be used to further empower women. Maybe human society has a mysterious way of correcting itself, and the natural balance between the sexes is restored even through counterintuitive processes such as feminism.

Daughter Investment = Marriage Divestment

W.F. Price · 19 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Using a youtube video of an Army recruiting ad aimed at girls as a backdrop, Dalrock suggests that families may be investing more in daughters because they figure they'll just lose a son's kids anyway if he ends up divorced or separated. Essentially, he argues that they've taken the place sons used to hold in the old patriarchal culture.

> …a more rational approach would be to decide early on to encourage daughters to marry young and start having children, while encouraging sons to forgo having their own children and instead invest emotionally and financially in their nieces and nephews. Even with decades of feminism daughters make poor sons, but the deck is now profoundly stacked in their favor regarding parenthood and custody. The sons and parents could financially support the daughters having children without creating a legal incentive for them to blow up the family and sue for child support. The family would at the same time strongly encourage the daughter to remain married to the father of her children, as this is very much to the children's benefit. While financial support from a father creates an incentive to divorce and expel the father from the household, financial support from grandparents and uncles could be used as an incentive to keep the family together. In this way a family might have the same number of grandchildren overall but avoid the disadvantages of a system which strongly discourages fatherhood.

This is already happening to some degree. Actually, I'd point out that the trend of daughter investment started a long time ago in the black population. Black grandmothers often put a lot of effort into raising their daughters' children, but I'd guess they rarely have the opportunity to have any meaningful contact with their sons' kids, so they don't tend to put as much effort into their sons while raising them (this could be biological).

It seems this may be happening to some extent amongst whites, and I'm sure the pattern is common with recent Mexican immigrants.

However, there's an inherent, although subtle, contradiction in the notion that family investment in the daughter could prevent her from divorcing her husband. The problem is that when you're in a society that devalues sons, as in the American working class and underclass and amongst non-Asian minorities, the hypergamy kicks in quickly, and women see no reason to stay faithful and avoid the nightclub scene. Simply investing in daughters more than sons creates an incentive to divorce, because men's relative value is low in such a setup.

Furthermore, if there is any conflict in the marriage or a separation, women know they can count on their family to back them up, because, after all, they are invested in her and her children. This creates even more of an incentive to divorce. Ultimately, this just leads to a plummeting marriage rate and rising illegitimacy, as neither young men nor women see any reason to marry in the first place.

Dalrock says that although he doesn't advocate such a system, he can see why it might come about. I'd simply point out that it already has come about, and we need only look at the communities where fatherlessness is the rule to see how it plays out. In reality, this is just another symptom of the decline of the American working and middle class.

Just to add a little food for thought, the practice of bride price in much of the world aims to prevent exactly the problems I outlined above. In China, for example, the wife's parents are given a "gift" when their daughter marries a man. However, if she runs off, they have to return it. This is an old and effective method of ensuring that a woman's family is invested in their daughter's marriage. I believe Muslims practice it as well.

The lesson is that if you care about the institution, that's what you invest in. Invest in the woman instead, and the institution falls apart, and here we are today.

State Settles with Doctor for Using Ex-Wife's False Accusations to Attack Practice

W.F. Price · 19 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A dermatologist in Spokane, Washington, has received a $600,000 payout from the state of Washington for its handling of an investigation prompted by his ex-wife during divorce proceedings. Dr. William "Phil" Werschler was "anonymously" accused by his ex of snorting coke in the office, having sex with patients, hiring prostitutes and lying about drug records:

> A Spokane dermatologist has wrung a $600,000 apology from state health officials who went public with outrageous charges of drug abuse and medical fraud based on a bogus tip from his ex-wife.
> The pending payout to Dr. William "Phil" Werschler is among the largest settlements in decades by the Washington state Department of Health involving a physician, agency officials say. The public apology might be the first of its kind, they say.
> The state will scrub the Werschler case from its website, though the case reports will remain on file for public inspection.
> In a separate lawsuit settlement signed last week, Werschler collected more than $100,000 from his ex-wife, Kara Werschler. She ignited the investigation during the waning weeks of the couple's bare-knuckled divorce by filing an anonymous complaint studded with salacious accusations of office cocaine binges, sex orgies with staff and patients, hiring prostitutes, and falsification of medical drug records.

Of course, his ex also openly accused him of abuse and poor parenting in the divorce.

It's kind of unusual to hear about these kinds of brutal divorces amongst the educated elite these days. Generally, women of the upper classes know better than to blow it all in a knock down, drag out fight.

So, when you look into the background of the guys who get nailed, it often turns out that they are what you'd call bootstrappers; ordinary men who made it by virtue of hard work and talent. The self-made business owner, the bright professional from a middle or working class family, or talented athlete from the farm or inner city is typically the guy who gets reamed the hardest. Even at the the very top it tends to be these types. Take Paul McCartney for example.

The real elites breed amongst themselves, and they practice a sort of "keep it in the family" marital regime. I assume it involves extensive use of prenups, but there's also the private school culture that is as geared toward keeping their kids segregated from the unwashed, and therefore more likely to marry into their own class, as it is toward giving them a better education.

For all the talk about rising inequality in the US, there's little mention of this divorce gap. Sure, they've finally started talking about single mothers, but this steady attrition of talented, upwardly mobile men has been going on for decades. There's no more effective and insidious tactic for keeping upstarts in their place than ruining them through their women. And it doesn't even need to be personal. Just make it policy and let the system do its work.

Here's what Dr. Werschler's life was like before the divorce:

> Werschler knows that what had been a bright professional future has been dimmed.
> Now 54 years old, he was a leader in the field of dermatology. He published articles in peer-reviewed journals, conducted drug trials, counseled drug companies on new therapies and traveled the academic lecture circuit to universities across the country.
> Werschler grew up in a modest family and graduated from Medical Lake High School.

> He was the first member of his family to graduate from college, collecting dual degrees in sociology and biology from Eastern Washington University.
> His science acumen caught the attention of professors, and Werschler made the unusual jump in 1981 from a mid-tier university in Cheney to medical school at George Washington University in Washington, D.C.
> Werschler continued to excel. He had an internship in Tucson, Ariz., then returned to George Washington and specialized in dermatology during his residency at the university's medical center.
> After a clinical consulting stint at the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda, Md., Werschler was on track for an academic and research career.

Eventually he decided to run a private practice in Spokane, but this was an established man who had accomplished a great deal, and he almost lost it all because his wife got nasty during a divorce. Fortunately, he had the resources to fight back and managed to recoup some of his losses, but it's been almost ten years since his ex accused him of being a shameless crook, and the investigation led to him being publicly branded as a potential criminal by the state. His ex wife had to pay him back a measly $100,000 (probably didn't even cover legal fees), but still got to keep the rest of the settlement, which is worth considerably more than that.

Think of that… Ten years of a talented man's life. Ten of his most productive years, from 45 to 54, diminished by a pointless divorce and fight with the state. What a terrible waste.

We ought to start thinking of the family law regime in the US as outright tyranny, because it definitely passes the duck test.

DV Groups and Feminists Protest Magazine Cover

W.F. Price · 20 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Assorted feminists and domestic violence activists are protesting the newest “Vogue Men” magazine cover (there’s a Vogue Men?).

On the cover, there’s a photo of model Stephanie Seymour being groped by a man who has one hand loosely holding her neck and another on her left breast. He is standing behind her and licking his finger with a ridiculous look on his face.

These DV groups have become entirely too predictable. Anything that deviates one iota from the feminist/DV people’s concept of propriety is immediately denounced in the most repetitive terms. It’s as though they are trained ponies performing the same act over and over again.

However, people continue to publish the stuff they object to, and the people doing it are generally women themselves. But why?

I’ve come to the conclusion that at this point, for many of the feminists and advocacy groups, and for a lot of women in general, it’s become a sort of pornography genre. Your typical feminist, surrounded by herbly SWPL betas, is so far removed from the lifestyle most real DV victims inhabit that it has almost no real relevance to their lives. Contrary to what they say, and perhaps what they imagine, serious DV is not all that common, except in certain dysfunctional communities, outside of which men rarely lay a hand on women (although the reverse may not be true).

Physical fights between couples are far more frequent amongst the young, sexually unrestrained, and financially unstable. They are not a characteristic of the urban, upper-middle-class office worker set.

For these types, who comprise the majority of feminist activists, there’s obviously something intriguing about objectification and degradation of women by irrepressibly lustful men. There are no men crossing the bounds of propriety and breaking the law to control access to their sexuality. Instead, they work with men who are afraid to even look at them. They are surrounded by whiny, whipped men.

So the fashion mags will go on and on publishing the kind of stuff that titillates them, and they will keep reacting with indignation and outrage, but all the while they will be spending hours and hours looking at photos of women being groped and treated as property by bold, sexually aggressive men.

Let's Settle the Cheating Issue

W.F. Price · 20 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It's common for people to say that men are more likely to cheat than women, but is this really true? Actually, the question should be "is this really possible, and if so what does it mean?"

Simple logic and arithmetic dictates that for every cheating incident (amongst heterosexuals), there is a man and a woman. So, it could only be possible for there to be more male cheaters if we define cheating only as breaking one's vows, and exempt the other party from the "cheater" label.

However, if more married men are cheating than married women, it logically follows that more single women are sleeping with married men than single men with married women. Therefore, if it is indeed true that married men cheat more often, then single women are more apt to be homewrecking sluts than single men.

Additionally, if more married men cheat than married women, and cheat more often, then married men have on average more partners than married women. Given numerical parity during prime sexually active years, this means that single women must have more sexual partners than single men. Given that married men are more likely to cheat with younger women, it also means that single young women have significantly more sexual partners than single young men, including among them married men.

So, if we accept that married men cheat more, and it may be possible (although I personally suspect the difference is negligible before the age of 40 or so), then we will also have to accept the following:

-Single women have more sexual partners than single men

-Single women are more likely to be homewreckers than single men

-Young single women are the most sexually promiscuous of all heterosexuals, and have more sex and more partners than any other straight people

Sadly, I'm afraid all of the above are true. If you are a young man, keep this in mind. Chances are good that the girl you met at the bar is getting laid a lot more than you.

A Stark Reminder of America's Decline

W.F. Price · 21 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Alexis de Tocqueville, a French intellectual and early political scientist, is well-known for De la démocratie en Amérique, his book on American democracy, which was published in the early 19th century after he spent a couple years studying American society. He was quite an admirer of the United States, and wrote about the culture, politics and mores of the young nation.

One of the subjects he covered was American women. He thought they were, overall, a very impressive breed of female. He compare them to European women, and found them to be held in higher esteem by men, and to be valued for their honor.

Unfortunately, the picture he presents is so alien to contemporary readers that it is scarcely believable, but I have seen other historical evidence that confirms what he writes, so he was not out of his mind.

Here's how his passage on American women, titled "How the Americans Understand the Equality of the Sexes" opens:

> There are people in Europe who, confounding together the different characteristics of the sexes, would make man and woman into beings not only equal but alike. They would give to both the same functions, impose on both the same duties, and grant to both the same rights; they would mix them in all things–their occupations, their pleasures, their business. It may readily be con- ceived that by thus attempting to make one sex equal to the other, both are degraded, and from so preposterous a medley of the works of nature nothing could ever result but weak men and disorderly women.
> It is not thus that the Americans understand that species of democratic equality which may be established between the sexes. They admit that as nature has appointed such wide differences between the physical and moral constitution of man and woman, her manifest design was to give a distinct employment to their various faculties; and they hold that improvement does not consist in making beings so dissimilar do pretty nearly the same things, but in causing each of them to fulfill their respective tasks in the best possible manner. The Americans have applied to the sexes the great principle of political economy which governs the manufacturers of our age, by carefully dividing the duties of man from those of woman in order that the great work of society may be the better carried on.

Amazing to see that, at one point in history, American women actually acted like women, and it was widely recognized that men and women are not by nature the same.

Here's some more, equally alien to modern readers:

> Nor have the Americans ever supposed that one consequence of democratic principles is the subversion of marital power or the confusion of the natural authorities in families. They hold that every association must have a head in order to accomplish its object, and that the natural head of the conjugal association is man. They do not therefore deny him the right of directing his partner, and they maintain that in the smaller association of husband and wife as well as in the great social community the object of democracy is to regulate and legalize the powers that are necessary, and not to subvert all power.
> This opinion is not peculiar to one sex and contested by the other; I never observed that the women of America consider conjugal authority as a fortunate usurpation of their rights, or that they thought themselves degraded by submitting to it. It appeared to me, on the contrary, that they attach a sort of pride to the voluntary surrender of their own will and make it their boast to bend themselves to the yoke, not to shake it off. Such, at least, is the feeling expressed by the most virtuous of their sex; the others are silent; and in the United States it is not the practice for a guilty wife to clamor for the rights of women while she is trampling on her own holiest > duties.

Imagine that… Women were actually proud to submit to their husband's authority in the home. And the bad ones kept their mouths shut. Oh how we've fallen since the early days of the Republic.

I'd recommend reading the entire passage just to get a sense of what an ascendant society is like. To see what a society in decline looks like, we need only turn on the TV or walk out the front door, so we might have a propensity to forget that truly virtuous, vigorous societies exist, or ever have existed.

According to de Tocqueville, societies in which women are frequently flattered and allowed to have their way in all affairs tend to view them as inferior creatures:

> It has often been remarked that in Europe a certain degree of contempt lurks even in the flattery which men lavish upon women; although a European frequently affects to be the slave of woman, it may be seen that he never sincerely thinks her his equal. In the United States men seldom compliment women, but they daily show how much they esteem them. They constantly display an entire confidence in the understanding of a wife and a profound respect for her freedom; they have decided that her mind is just as fitted as that of a man to discover the plain truth, and her heart as firm to embrace it; and they have never sought to place her virtue, any more than his, under the shelter of prejudice, ignorance, and fear.
> It would seem in Europe, where man so easily submits to the despotic sway of women, that they are nevertheless deprived of some of the greatest attributes of the human species and considered as seductive but imperfect beings; and (what may well provoke astonishment) women ultimately look upon themselves in the same light and almost consider it as a privilege that they are entitled to show themselves futile, feeble, and timid. The women of America claim no such privileges.

It looks as though America has finally started to take on the characteristics of the Old World. I suppose it had to happen eventually. Above all, this is the result of a severe degradation of virtue, which seems to take hold in every powerful society after some time. Hopefully, we can turn it around some day, but such changes are never easy.

Heads up on Feed

W.F. Price · 21 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Readers who are accustomed to reading our content on the feed, which I set up several years ago with Feedburner, may have noticed that the feed stopped updating a few days ago. This has happened before with Feedburner, so I didn't think much of it at first, but after a couple days I started to wonder what was going on.

Turns out Google may be preparing to shut it down, which is an ominous development for small publishers like myself.

Fortunately, however, if it turns out that Feedburner is really set to go away, I can redirect for a month to the original feed, and I already have an email subscription service set up through Aweber.

For now, I disabled redirection to Feedburner (if it isn't updating there's no point), so you can access the feed at the native feed URL: the-spearhead.com/feed

I'm going to wait and see what happens with the feed for the next couple days, but given Google's recent moves I'm not all that optimistic about Feedburner. For now, just use the above link to access the feed, and it should work until I decide to use another feed publisher or simply go with the native feed permanently.

Fixed Feed

W.F. Price · 22 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Turns out my caching software, which fixed the problems I was having with the site running slowly and consuming too much memory, was so diligent that it started instructing RSS readers to cache all my feeds. So, fixing one problem led to another.

Typical.

Fortunately, it was a very easy problem to correct once I found the problem, although finding it took hours.

I'm going to stay on Feedburner for now, but I am concerned that the service itself may be due for deprecation. So it's likely that I'll transfer the feed at some point, but when I do there will be an automatic redirect and most readers shouldn't even notice.

Happy feed reading!

Why are Poor White Women's Lifespans Shrinking?

W.F. Price · 22 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The NY Times recently reported that white women who have never graduated from high school have lost 5 years from their average lifespan over the past 20 years.

> Researchers have long documented that the most educated Americans were making the biggest gains in life expectancy, but now they say mortality data show that life spans for some of the least educated Americans are actually contracting. Four studies in recent years identified modest declines, but a new one that looks separately at Americans lacking a high school diploma found disturbingly sharp drops in life expectancy for whites in this group. Experts not involved in the new research said its findings were persuasive.
> The steepest declines were for white women without a high school diploma, who lost five years of life between 1990 and 2008, said S. Jay Olshansky, a public health professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago and the lead investigator on the study, published last month in Health Affairs. By 2008, life expectancy for black women without a high school diploma had surpassed that of white women of the same education level, the study found.
> White men lacking a high school diploma lost three years of life. Life expectancy for both blacks and Hispanics of the same education level rose, the data showed. But blacks over all do not live as long as whites, while Hispanics live longer than both whites and blacks.
> The decline among the least educated non-Hispanic whites, who make up a shrinking share of the population, widened an already troubling gap. The latest estimate shows life expectancy for white women without a high school diploma was 73.5 years, compared with 83.9 years for white women with a college degree or more. For white men, the gap was even bigger: 67.5 years for the least educated white men compared with 80.4 for those with a college degree or better.

So one thing that happened was that the gap closed somewhat between uneducated white women and men. Uneducated white men have short lives, barely making it past retirement age.

It's pretty clear why uneducated white men's lives are shorter than they used to be: their social status and job opportunities have declined significantly since the 80s. There's probably also some selection bias (uneducated white men are from a more hapless group of people today than they were 20 years ago), but this doesn't explain such a profound difference between uneducated and educated white men. No, what happened is that these men have fallen to the bottom of the totem pole in society, and the bottom and top are farther from each other than they used to be.

But why would uneducated white women's lifespans have fallen even farther? For starters, it was a lot higher than their equivalent men to start with. Where there used to be an eight year difference, it is now six, while amongst the educated the gender life gap is only three and a half years.

However, you'd think with the emphasis on feminism and women's empowerment, white women would have seen progress just as black and Hispanic men did. This is probably what is alarming people — things didn't work out exactly as they were supposed to. Poor, uneducated white men losing a few years was to be expected; their social decline is part of the program and surely anticipated in advance (the professors who do these studies and the social engineers who implement the programs based on them are well aware of how different factors affect people and their lives — these are pretty intelligent people for the most part). So the five year drop in white women's lifespan is kind of a fly in the ointment.

Well, I'd be happy to fill these social scientists in on what's happening. For the overwhelming majority of women, their main source of wealth and support is the men of their social class. No amount of government programs and feminism can make up for that.

What happened was that there was a joint breakdown of both the family and the men's status about 30-40 years ago, and the effects are starting to be shown in the women. As equivalent-status men were thrown out of the family and employment, uneducated women lost crucial support over the years, and that takes its toll. Their main source of support – their men – underwent a rapid decline, and the women suffered for it.

You really can't separate the outcomes of a group's women from those of the men. Men and women are socially bound to one another. When one group suffers, so does the other. When men are defeated in war, the women pay a price as well. When male unemployment goes up, female wealth goes down, too.

This is why, when you really get down to it, feminism as practiced in the US amounts to little more than class warfare. It's a net bonus for educated elites' wives, because their relative status in society increases as the rest of the country declines. For the rest of us, it's pure poison. For our families, our children, and yes, even for our women.

A Typical Local Political Ad

W.F. Price · 23 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Evidently, American women are under siege, even here in Washington state:

The above is one of a few ads against John Koster, who is running in the WA 1st district against Susan del Bene, another Microsoft lackey (like Maria Cantwell).

There's another one in circulation with the same message that I couldn't find on YouTube, but it gives away the real demographic target of these ads: older women. Although young women are pictured above, these issues seem to be most important to baby boomer women, which confuses me, because they have no need for either birth control or abortions.

However, a guy I used to work for, a boomer himself, told me he thought that these boomer women who had abortions will go to their graves defending the feminist ideals, even if they had a negative impact on their lives, such as childlessness.

I'm starting to become resigned to the idea that boomer women are going to vote us into a full-fledged feminist mess no matter what, and it's going to take an even worse economic crisis than we currently have to finally force a change.

The Inherent Conflict Between Atheism and Feminism

W.F. Price · 24 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists have been going after Atheists for a while now due to a dearth of women in the ranks of non-believers. I think it's kind of funny that they are blaming the men despite the fact that churches are now clearly majority female. The church gap is around the same as the college gap — about 60-40 favoring women. So, drawing from my recent post about cheating, it seems there's a bit of a logic problem going on yet again.

Given that the male and female populations are roughly equal, and there are more female believers, doesn't it then logically follow that there will be more male atheists?

Well, it can't be that, because from a feminist perspective someone (always a man) is always at fault for any difference between the sexes. Therefore, in feminist logic, it must be because male skeptics are discriminating against women.

As far as whether believers or skeptics hold The Truth, I'm not going to get into that, because I personally don't think we can ever know. While skeptics might argue that it isn't fair to be asked to prove a negative, this isn't a court of law, so I remain skeptical of skepticism, and generally of any dogma that asserts itself to have the absolute truth in theological matters.

However, I do think Atheism tends to be a more masculine mode of thought, because men do not have rationalization hamsters that are as powerful as women's. Men are more apt to believe it when they see it, while women like to believe in socially approved stories, or "pretty lies" as Heartiste calls them (not to say they are necessarily lies, of course, but you get the idea).

However, there's another issue here that is being ignored. Atheism is the rejection of religious fictions, but the entire premise of feminism is based on a religious fiction: equality.

Try asking someone to defend equality in rational terms, and watch them stump themselves. There is simply nothing about the idea that makes sense from a rational perspective. In fact, equal only makes sense in math, because no two things are truly the same. Although both are athletes, is a baseball player equal to a football player? Is a german shepherd equal to a poodle? These questions don't really make any sense, because the idea of equality is a human creation to describe some quality that can't actually be defined.

I'm convinced that the origin of the idea of equality lies in Christianity. Specifically, the Christian concept of spiritual equality:

> There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.
> Galatians 3:28

Further, Jesus even specifically alluded to gender equality when rebuking some Sadducees:

> 23 The same day came to him the Sadducees, which say that there is no resurrection, and asked him,
> 24 Saying, Master, Moses said, If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.
> 25 Now there were with us seven brethren: and the first, when he had married a wife, deceased, and, having no issue, left his wife unto his brother:
> 26 Likewise the second also, and the third, unto the seventh.
> 27 And last of all the woman died also.
> 28 Therefore in the resurrection whose wife shall she be of the seven? for they all had her.

> 29 Jesus answered and said unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God.
> 30 For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven.
> Mattew 22

It was really a brilliant innovation. As far as I know, it is the first time in the history of religion that anyone ever proposed the idea of spiritual equality for all of humanity.

Today, that idea, which is a religious belief just like Transubstantiation and the Trinity, has become THE article of faith of the "secular" progressive West. Without it, the liberal democratic worldview collapses immediately.

Atheism and skepticism may be considered a common feature of the enlightened secular progressive, but if we are to be honest, there's an inherent conflict between skepticism and this concept of equality, because it is in fact a religious belief.

So when feminists demand that skeptics and Atheists pay homage to equality, they are demanding that they make an act of faith, and believe in something that can't be proven. It would be akin to Catholics saying "you know, you can keep calling yourselves skeptics, but you're going to have to make a statement confirming the resurrection of Jesus Christ or we're going to start doing really unpleasant things to you." Actually, the feminists take a it a step farther, in that they demand not only that skeptics "believe" in what they want them to, but also that they stack their ranks with at least as many believers as skeptics.

Here's a true gender inquisitor at work, stating her reasons for her "atheism:"

> I share Natalie's distress at the recent discovery that the atheist/skeptic movement has a not-small and certainly loud subset of participants whose sexism is so strong that they'd rather run women out of the movement altogether rather than endure the indignity of treating women like people. For me, being an outspoken atheist has always been firmly intertwined with my feminism, and in fact, really it's the result of my feminism. I never really believed in a god of any sort, but the notion that atheism is important and should be talked about openly is one I only really developed because it serves the larger goal of creating a world that has true gender equality. Atheist activism for me has always been about the long game, because I believe that undermining religion's death grip on power is what needs to be done for women to be truly equal.
> -Amanda Marcotte

I wonder whether Marcotte even realizes what an abuse of the entire concept of Atheism and skepticism this is… She "never really believed in a god," but she is on a mission to create "true gender equality" — a religious calling if I've ever seen one.

Amanda's screed also demonstrates why guys like PZ Myers – a feminist Atheist – are really fake skeptics. Like Amanda, PZ actually just hates Christian conservatives, but he holds beliefs that are every bit as irrational as theirs.

So, although I doubt feminists' ability to ever comprehend the implications, the very demands they place on Atheists and skeptics contradict their stated lack of faith. It's another one of those contradictions that have come to define the guiding philosophy of Western secular liberalism.

Why Porn Matters

Featured Guest · 25 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

by Walt Forest

Porn is fantasy, but like many fantasies, it tells us something about the reality from which it helps us to escape. If the female characters of porn can't get enough sex, it's because women in life typically want sex three times a week. If the female characters of porn want sex with "no strings attached," it is because with real women there are so, so many strings. If the female characters of porn are obsessed with the male body, it is to help us escape the fact that is actually we men who are obsessed with the female body.

More broadly, if porn "degrades" its female characters (as is often claimed) it is only to bring them down to a level equal with men, where they must lust like men, and suffer the consequences of that lust as men do.

In this way porn is a fantasy of equality.

As we all know (but nowadays admit only with great reluctance) the sexualities of men and women are different. This difference gives women a tremendous sexual power over men. Porn creates a fantasy in which this power is eliminated through making men and women more alike—usually by imposing a male-like sexuality onto its female characters.

In porn, if nowhere else, women and men are equal in their lust.

But porn is more than fantasy. It comforts us by reassuring us that the need to escape is necessary and normal. When we read or watch porn, we are aware, if only in the back of our minds, that we are part of a mass audience. There are thousands out there like us, all making do (when we have to) with the fantasy of porn.

There is security in these numbers: if so many people find it necessary to escape into a sexual fantasy, it must be because they, too, have found the sexual reality harsh, even intolerable at times. In this way porn is a communal acknowledgment. Porn brings us together to admit, however tacitly, that as a society we are not nearly so sexually sophisticated or uninhibited as we like to pretend. Just the opposite, we are oppressed by the sexual reality—more so than ever, judging by porn's current popularity.

In this respect porn has become more honest than much of today's mainstream storytelling. Read just about any recently written novel, whether popular or "literary"; browse a newspaper, magazine, or blog; go to a film; turn on your tv; tune in to the radio talk show; or just listen to the stories that ordinary people around you tell each other; and you will find everywhere female characters whose sexuality is like that of men: they want sex with less getting-to-know-you preamble, a greater variety of partners, and much greater frequency. Only the tendency to be attracted to men remains intact. These women are, in short, mainstream versions of the heroines of pornography.

However, unlike pornography, which rarely pretends to be anything more than sexual fantasy, our mainstream stories often claim to represent reality. Frequently they even strive to TEACH us this sexual reality, convince us that it is indeed real. The monolithic uniformity of the message is much like that of propaganda, and in fact it is the propaganda of today's "correct" gender politics. As a result, our stories now tell us less about our reality, sexual or otherwise, than they do about pop ideology. If we wish to see a true reflection of the sexual reality, we have few places left to turn.

One of the remaining options is porn. Don't get me wrong. As mirror of sexual reality, porn is a poor one. It is distorted, blurry, and inverted. It does not give sight so much as a vague feeling of the truth. It is one step away from being totally blind. It is certainly nothing compared to a well-told story that reflects the truth of our feelings, as the great novels, films, and even the conversations of previous generations often could.

But we live in a society that lacks the courage to face the truths that stories can reveal, especially sexual truths. We have chosen simplistic ideology instead, and in doing so we have gouged out our own eyes. We wander blindly where we most need the sight that stories can give, and porn, of all things, has come to serve as our white cane. We tap around with it, trying to feel out what its real, and when we do find it, we keep our mouths shut. We don't dare tell anyone what we have found.

Haven't you heard? Admitting the truth of our sexuality is no longer permissible.

Alleged Psychopath's Wife Implicated in Coverup

W.F. Price · 26 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

About a month ago, a well-liked Seattle wine steward named Yancy Noll was shot to death in a brazen attack carried out in broad daylight. Some fine fellow driving a BMW was behind him and there was allegedly some kind of traffic dispute, following which the man in the beamer pulled up alongside Mr. Noll, pulled a gun, and emptied five rounds in his direction, striking him in the head three times.

It was a pretty shocking crime for the middle class North Seattle neighborhood, and it seemed incredible that someone could get away with it. Fortunately, a man who lived only a half mile away from the murder scene, with a freshly repainted BMW with new tires, was taken into custody a few days ago.

The arrested man is named Dinh Bowman, and was a "child prodigy" of sorts who went on to work in tech. As a child, he was trained in weapons (swords) while he attended university, starting at age 13. He was even profiled by the local paper back in 1996, coming off back then as a precocious, if somewhat odd, child.

So, needless to say, this is an interesting story in the SWPL land of Seattle, where a murder involving a wine steward and wealthy tech worker is very much the stuff of public interest, as opposed to the typical downscale murder in the ghetto or trailer parks.

As the story develops, it is coming to light that Mr. Bowman's wife, a dentist named Jennifer Leah Bowman, may have been involved in attempting to cover up his crime. After police received an anonymous tip implicating Bowman from someone who said he had anger issues and fit the profile and composite sketch, they paid a visit to the Bowman household. While knocking on the door on September 12th to check on the tip, they noticed a security camera aimed at them. Nobody answered.

The police then staked out the house, gathering enough evidence for a warrant when they saw a vehicle in the garage fitting the description of the killer's vehicle. Soon, they served the warrant and took Mr. Bowman into custody. While doing so, they received permission to search Mrs. Bowman's purse, finding receipts for new tires, paint and tape dating from the day they had first attempted to contact the couple.

It seems Mrs. Bowman had done all the legwork to conceal possible evidence of a crime, and when asked about the car's new window, she claimed the car had been broken into when they were in Portland, Oregon over the weekend.

While searching the house, police found extensive evidence of Dinh Bowman's fascination with weapons, including reloading tools, rifles, scopes, handgun holsters (the guns that fit them were missing), 9mm ammo, a couple magazines, a 9mm slide without the rest of the gun and a note on the refrigerator in which Jennifer commended her husband for being "the best shot in the West."

Indeed, Dinh is an extraordinary marksman. A video pulled from his wife's Flickr account shows him running an obstacle course with a 9mm auto nailing target after target rapid fire. He goes through several magazines, then knocks down a number of small targets one-handed, firing both left and right-handed. If a defense attorney wanted to argue that it would have been difficult for Mr. Bowman to hit someone in the head three times through a closed car window firing single-handedly, he just lost that opportunity.

Here's the video:

On his website, Bowman displays some chilling views that suggest he may be psychopathic. The following is a post titled "Design for Emotional Connection:"

> Functionality is a requirement for good industrial design. Emotion connection gets you the bonus points. Example:
> > A sports vehicle should make you scream. It should intimidate initially, but make you feel like a driving god.
> The psychic utility of experiencing this emotional connection is what justifies premium over purely functional. Think about how this applies to fashion, dining, or your industry.
> Functional is required. Emotive is better.

What's strange about Mrs. Bowman's behavior is that this is the kind of guy that we're incessantly warned about by the prevailing feminist line. In fact, men are tarred as being psychopathic and dangerous in general, but most of us are far from it. If Dinh Bowman really is the killer, and it looks that way, he's an outlier.

So why would a well-behaved, apparently liberal female (according to who she follows on Twitter), go to such lengths to protect the guy? These days, any intelligent woman should know that it is to her personal advantage to roll over and betray her husband at a moment's notice, yet it is commonly the psychopaths, the murderers, the criminals and the cruel that receive their love, admiration and protection, even when staying with and standing up for these men means personal ruin for them.

Jennifer Leah Bowman worked as a dentist in an upscale island suburb, lived in a SWPL neighborhood, and yet she apparently chose to help her husband get away with a heinous crime. What does this tell us about the world?

New Zealand Police Report: Mothers Most Likely to Kill Children

W.F. Price · 26 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A police report from New Zealand reveals that most children who are killed by adults are victims of their mothers, most commonly by blows to the head or strangling:

> Nearly 50 per cent of children who die as a result of family violence are killed by their mothers, a police report says.
> Police today released a report summarising the findings of 95 family violence death reviews involving 101 victims between 2004 and 2011.
> The report, which did not include all deaths that occurred during that period, found 15 out of 33 child victims were killed by their mums.
> Five newborn babies were killed by women who concealed their pregnancies, while six children were killed by their mothers prior to them committing suicide.
> The most common cause of death was head trauma. Suffocation or drowning by the mother was also on the list.

Although those of us paying attention have known this for some time, it's remarkable to see this issue openly discussed in news outlets, especially in a "progressive" country such as New Zealand.

What we should take away from this isn't that mothers are bad and a bunch of killers – because obviously most of them are not – but rather that domestic violence is not the simple issue of "bad men" wreaking havoc on homes.

Feminists like to portray violence and murder as a result of "the patriarchy," but it's likely that some of these children would be alive today if their fathers had been present. Unfortunately, the premise is that men must ejected from children's lives merely at the mother's whim, even if the men might actually be able to protect their children from harm.

There are violent men out there, but from the data we have it doesn't appear that men are any more likely to kill their biological children than women. In fact, what we do know suggests the opposite.

This calls into question the idea that removing fathers from children's lives is "in the best interests of the child." It is starting to become apparent that neither feminists nor governments are really concerned about the best interests of the child, but merely use this phrase as a cover for a big lie. Namely, that they actually care about families and children. Feminists care about neither. Primarily, they are concerned with the right to prevent or exterminate children. Secondly, they are interested in resource-extraction from men.

Hopefully, New Zealand authorities are truly interested in harm reduction, and put measures in place that will actually protect children rather than serve the interests of gender feminists, who could care less about the welfare of children.

It's time society began to recognize that men's rights and children's rights are inseparable, and not in conflict at all.

Manboobz Banned from Reddit

Sandra Tsingh Loh: Women's Lib Created "Monsters"

W.F. Price · 28 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Sandra Tsing Loh takes another look at the dissatisfaction that plagues the modern Western woman, and as usual comes to no useful conclusions, but makes interesting, insightful observations along the way.

The title, "The Weaker Sex," suggests it's another one of those "we're better than men" pieces, but it really isn't about that. In fact, her piece questions why women, despite having lives that approximate the 1950s patriarch, are so unsatisfied. She doesn't resort to the typical accusation that men don't do their fair share around the house, because, after all, in her circles the men do a lot. They spend a lot of time cooking, shopping, taking care of the kids, and other tasks.

However, for some reason, women can't come home from work like Ward Cleaver and relax with slippers and a pipe.

I've written before that I suspect there's something that bothers women on a sexual level about the role reversal, but Loh brings up another issue: a sense of ownership. It's something I hadn't thought of before, but it makes sense.

> The gentle, almost Beatrix Potter–y images make me feel weepy; they actually draw a tear as I remember my own German grandmother—the homemade chicken soup with fresh-from-the-garden parsley, the warm strawberry crumble cake in the afternoon on a rolling glass tray, the doilies on couch arms, the polished, chiming grandfather clock. And then there's us: like Scarlett O'Hara, on our bellies in the dirt, wearing vinegar-scented T-shirts, we raise our four-cup Pyrexes filled with sewage water!
> Day by day in our frenetic, chaotic modern homes, how many of us become inexplicably unglued, suddenly losing our equilibrium in a disproportionate vale of anguish, as we open our refrigerator door (and what is that moisture our left foot is in—is it a puddle from the malfunctioning ice maker?) and confront the spillage from the leaking Ziploc bag or the microwave-deformed GladWare that forever will not close. On the one hand, these are a simple technical malfunction; on the other, they are another small but precise omen pointing to a world without the deep domestic comforts—and care, and arts—not of our mothers (many of whom were in a transitional leaving-home-to-go-to-work generation) but of our grandmothers, who still ruled the home with absolute power. No one is taking care of us! No one! And that is no small thing.

Having a salary – getting cash for your time – is a poor substitute for the feeling of having something of your own. Loh looks back to a time when women really owned the home, and misses it sorely. For men, I suspect feeling that you have a wife of your own, rather than one who divides her time between you and work, is probably sorely missed as well.

Today, however, more than ever our allegiance and our time is shared. Women are claimed as much by their jobs as they are by their families, and it appears to be causing them great psychic distress:

> Further, not only do we 2012 women fail at being 1950s wives, we fail even more spectacularly at being 1950s husbands. In the Mad Men era, the archetypal dad came home; put down his briefcase; received pipe, Manhattan, roast beef, potatoes, key-lime pie; and was—apparently—content. By contrast, dwelling in a grayscale midlife purgatory of grinding Pilates and ever-shifting diets (Atkins? Zone? South Beach?), if we breadwinning women were handed a Manhattan at the end of the day, we'd be likely to burst into tears and wail, "What's THIS? What's IN this? Why are you UNDERMINING me?!" We 21st-century female monsters are used to fussy bistros featuring spa cuisine and quinoa and dressing on the side. These husband-cooks whom Mundy lauds, however, want to make us some risotto (too carby) even while we are curled up in the fetal position, sucking in our ever-present potbellies (which the 1950s Dad didn't worry about), dreaming desperately of a Manwich.

Was it really liberating for women to cast off their duty to the family, only to find themselves slaves to their jobs and a judgmental, critical world? Did it create empowered, confident new women, or a generation of emotionally torn wrecks who feel deeply disappointed with their lives?

if we listen to the women themselves, it definitely appears to be the latter.

WGTOW?

W.F. Price · 28 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Is it possible that some women may want to opt out of the "game" and live independently, without the support of a man? If so, is there something wrong with that?

Although it's probably less common for women to "go their own way" than for men, some of them do so. I'd say, however, that we need to be a bit more discriminating in this case, because a lot of women who are unattached to men in the formal sense of being a wife still rely on men as mistresses, prostitutes, or owned corporate assets. You can't really go your own way if you're owned by your lover(s) or boss.

So, although it's probably pretty rare for a woman to be truly independent, such women do exist. Some do it out of necessity, such as widows and divorcées who hail from the lower classes, but a few intrepid women do it of their own accord, and these women have always existed.

Feminists like to point to such women as heroes for going it alone, but then they inevitably demand that men pay for such a lifestyle, which contradicts the very spirit of independence. I think this is one of the aspects of feminism that seduced men in the first place. Men thought that feminists were really serious about wanting to live independently and take care of themselves, and for a lot of men that sounds like a perfectly honorable goal. What they didn't see was the stealth appeal to have men collectively support women, "Life of Julia" style.

However, women who take care of themselves are real. Some of them run businesses, most work in ordinary jobs, and a lot of them contribute a fair amount to society.

I happen to know one quite intimately. I like her a lot, respect her, and even admire her. She's my sister.

My "little" sister is only 14 months younger than I am. We grew up very close, and I'm very happy to have had her around. Sure, we fought from time to time as kids, but my life is much richer for having had a sister like her. We stood up for each other — even against vicious animals. When I was a little boy, I had a fear of large dogs (back in the 70s, people let feral dogs run loose all over the place). Dogs, as all children know, can smell fear, so they'd make an extra effort to torment me. But my little tow-headed sister had no such fear. When some local cur would start coming after me, she'd stand right up to the mutt and let him have it. "Leave my brother alone!" she'd say to the cringing canine. Although in retrospect it may not have been all that wise for such a little girl to stand up to large, toothy beasts, she proved that she was no slouch, and no wimp.

Later, I repaid the favor by standing up for her when other kids were mean. Not because I was a "white knight," but because my sister and I were in it together. We both looked out for one another, and we still do.

Our politics are far from the same, but she could give a damn about that, and about politics in general. My sister is fundamentally pragmatic where human relations are concerned: treat her well and she graciously returns the favor.

So why isn't she married or a "career woman?" I can't speak for her, but I think it's because she's been honest with herself and her priorities. As a good-looking, intelligent woman, she's had plenty of opportunities, and offers from wealthy men. But she chose instead to live life the way she wants to. And it isn't about some "you go, girl!" sense of defiance, but rather a fundamental honesty and adherence to her own standards.

Instead of faking some allegiance to cliché social standards and then pulling the "eat, pray love" routine, she's always been straightforward about her expectations and preferences. She lives life according to her own values, as different as they may be, but doesn't expect others to either foot the bill or explain it for her. She's an upstanding woman. Different, but honorable. There's something noble about the way she's chosen to live her life, and I'm proud of her for that.

I don't think many men would have a problem with women like her. I doubt many women would, either. But feminists would deny her very existence, and suggest that in order for women to be independent in both mind and spirit, they need to be made dependent on men in aggregate. There are a lot of women out there who prove them wrong, and they are, perhaps, the most compelling argument against the utter helplessness and dependence of women of all.

Unfortunately for the feminists, they are also the best argument against their basic premise of eternal male responsibility.

Women who stand on their own are a great boon to our society, but if we let the feminists have their way we'd have to believe they don't exist. I refuse to see women in such a fundamentally pathetic light, not least of all because one of the women I care about most can stand on her own, and does so with both grace and conviction.

Thanks, sister, for giving me some faith in and respect for half of humanity.

Commenting Changes, Other Site Work

W.F. Price · 29 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Just to let readers know, I've just about completed my overhaul of the site's infrastructure, and testing is pretty much over. The idea is to have something scalable in place that will continue to work for a long time to come, and it looks like we're just about there. Instability should be far less common going forward. For those who asked why I wasn't doing all the testing locally, each server configuration is unique and there's no guarantee that my computer would handle scripts in the same manner as the webhost would, so it was necessary to do a lot of live testing.

Now, as far as comments are concerned, I'm going to move away from this moderation regime, and eventually require a login. However, not everyone will have to login through the site itself. Simply having a Twitter, WordPress or Facebook account should do the trick, but those who are actual members of the site will have privileges (such as voting) and access to extra content all the same.

These last features will be implemented through a subscription service, which will be opened after the details have been worked out. For now, I'm going to keep the comments on moderation for those who are not logged in on the site itself, because I don't want to cut off those who might subscribe before they are given the opportunity to do so. At the moment, I'm using a custom php script to keep those who are not site members on moderation, but when I open subscriptions I'll pull it out and require a login.

As for the wordpress.com comment field, feel free to report bugs if you're having problems with it and I'll investigate the issue. I tend to suspect that disappearing text and such is simply javascript quirks (and possibly browser-related), and this can probably be fixed by changing a few settings.

In the meanwhile, if the comments are a bit buggy, that's just the final details on what has been a pretty big job. Looks like the site is just about ready for another three years.

A Custody Gauntlet

Featured Guest · 30 September 2012 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor: the following is a very familiar account to those of us who have been through a contested custody case. Readers who want to confirm this need only sit in on family law hearings for a morning or afternoon to see how routine these accusations are. Pugs had a very good outcome, and there is one very important factor that almost certainly helped him a great deal in the case. In the initial separation agreement, his wife shared time with him equally, and then only later changed her tune. If a man can get equal or more custody during the pre-divorce separation, his chances of obtaining primary custody in the final order are astronomically higher. If not, he should probably cut his losses and concede primary custody instead of wasting all that he has on a futile fight. Of course, you should ask a lawyer about this, but men must always go into these situations with realistic expectations.]

By Pugs Fugly

An hour ago, I was sitting in a detective's office, poring over the details of my ex-wife's ridiculous statement regarding the "terroristic threat" I had supposedly made, which she felt was a direct attempt on her life. The threat? A two year-old photo I'd posted on Facebook, fourteen months before we'd even separated. The photo was a joke "to-do-list" with her name at the top, crossed-out with a big red "X." She had already used this photo as the basis for a Protective Order against me, claiming in a sworn affidavit that she had never seen the photo before six weeks ago. Unfortunately for her, she'd commented on the photo the day it was posted, and something two years old can't magically become a threat just because a bitter, angry woman decides to start grasping at straws.

Yesterday afternoon, I was sitting in a CPS investigator's office, poring over the details of my ex-wife's completely groundless accusations that I'd been hurting my four year-old daughter. These were based on some minor medical issues my daughter had, all of which had occurred during the time she spent with her mother. A quick trip to the doctor's office and a couple of chart copies proved this.

The day before yesterday, I was sitting in court, grinding my teeth and attempting to not show my disdain while my ex-wife spent an hour testifying, every word out of her mouth a complete fabrication. One lie after another. Imagine hearing the details of your marriage as a work of fiction. I found out, for the first time, that I'd been a raging, violent drunk the entire time she'd known me. That I'd physically assaulted her on several occasions, and that I held some extremely radical political and religious views that she felt would be a detriment to my daughter's mental and emotional well-being, were I allowed any access to her.

The detective laughed once he saw the original post, and told me that he sees this sort of thing all the time; that a disturbingly high percentage of the work he does is processing false claims. The CPS investigator told me they weren't even going to bother with an investigation, because after interviewing my daughter, it was clear that my ex-wife was making everything up. He also told me that roughly 80% of the cases he has to take the time to investigate and process are false, and they almost always have to do with a custody dispute. My lawyer would go on to deftly knock a dozen holes in my ex-wife's testimony, and one of the hardest things I've ever had to do was keep from laughing out loud while she verbally stumbled and back-tracked, trying to come up with new lies to cover up the old ones.

I got to say most of what I wanted to while on the stand, though the surreality of the situation has my memory fogged, even if it was only two days ago. If you've been in that situation, then you know that afterward, you go over and over it in your head, and eventually get to a point where you can't tell the difference between what was said and what you wish you had said. You come up with infinitely better responses after the fact. At the very least, I know I frustrated the hell out of my ex-wife's lawyer, especially given that her entire case was based on a poorly-written fantasy. I'd like to say I feel bad for her, but I don't. My ex-wife lied to her, not me.

I left and filed for divorce just over a year ago. I could write another three thousand words about all of the things I've done during that time to make this process easier for her. I've paid bills that weren't mine, moved an entire apartment full of her furniture by myself, dealt with completely over-blown ambivalence from the in-laws, and lost countless hours of my life that I'll never get back, listening to the old familiar cry and cuss and moan.

Both feet were planted firmly on the high road the entire time. We had agreed to split time with my daughter and expenses evenly, and we kept that arrangement for the year it took to get to court. I was even happy to shell out a few grand for the legal severance, not wanting her to be out any money when we had agreed on everything. The divorce, while ultimately inevitable (we'd tried everything from marriage couseling to her going to A.A.) was my idea, and I felt a responsiblity to shoulder the burden. The first few months were actually rather pleasant. We'd meet for dinner someplace public to exchange our daughter, so she'd get time with the two us, and see us getting along. We'd talk or text regularly, sharing updates (a lot happens very quickly with a toddler) and each of us letting the other call to say goodnight. I was even allowed to continue seeing my two step-children every weekend.

Then she re-connected with an old boyfriend online, and everything changed. Literally overnight.

Pleasantry was out, acrimony was in. Gone were public meetings for dinner; now we met at the local police station. Gone were the updates, the phone calls, the texts to tell me what amazing new, adorable thing my daughter had done. Also gone was the legal agreement. The old flame had done very well for himself, and this hapless beau was all too happy to cover her lawyer's exorbitant fees.

Trouble was, he lived 2,000 miles away. Nevertheless, my ex-wife was fully committed to moving there, with my daughter. As court approached, it became clear that she was willing to say and do whatever was necessary to make that happen. She filed a report with the police, and CPS. She showed up to court with a list of accusations so heinous that I spent the morning nauseas and dizzy. She insisted her lawyer grill me on the most trivial, assinine aspects of my life, going back to years before she and I had even met. She would precede all of this by keeping my daughter past the exchange date and filing a completely fraudulent Protective Order against me to justify her actions.

In the end, everything she brought would be laughed out of court. The death knell was her admittance that she was happy to leave her older two children here, living with their dad. Her primary motivation was taking my daughter away from me, and replacing me with the new guy, all to get back at me for leaving her.

I would get primary custody, the right to choose my daughter's residence, and control over educational decisions. I'll also be getting several thousand extra dollars a year in child support, which I would have forgone if she hadn't gone out of her way to make things so difficult. I earn more than enough to cover expenses. The court was simply unwilling to move my daughter away from everything she knew just to facilitate my ex-wife's new romance. You might say that Not All Judges Are Like That.

I know that my story is as familar as the outcome is unusual. We've all heard this before, but the ending is different.

It happened to me because when I met this woman years ago, I didn't know what I know now. I would discover The Spearhead (and Dalrock, et al) a few months before I finally decided it was time to leave. It was absolutely incredible how quickly and completely life began imitating art. I knew nothing of hypergamous solipsism; which is to say that I'd seen it time and again, but couldn't explain it. I knew, after years with my ex-wife, that she could rationalize away any behavior (from cuckholdry to adultery, and back again) but I didn't know why. I'd heard of false accusations, and I'd read about the lengths some women will go to so they can get what they want, but I never thought I'd be caught in the cross-hairs, staring down the barrel of losing both my daughter and my freedom.

This is what you're in for, gentlemen. This is marriage 2.0. The same woman who tells you today that she will love you until you are dead; that were your relationship to end, there'd be no animosity, will likely prove herself to be a liar, whether you scorn her or not.

I won, and I'm immeasurably thankful for that, but most men lose. Most men in my exact same situation are shackled not only with limited contact with their children, but also a lifetime of debt and meager living, all to finance their ex's new life. Most men wind up broken, one way or another. I was fully prepared for this, and ultimately, was completely suprised by the judge's decision. I still haven't wrapped my mind around the fact that I'm actually going to get to raise my daughter, by myself, and that my ex, at best, will get one weekend a month.

I was honestly prepared to start spending all of my time in the dark, with a bottle of whiskey. Indefinitely.

I wanted to tell this story both as a positive score for men and fathers everywhere, and also to show anyone out there who might feel trapped in a miserable situation that they're only trapped if they want to be. I've had every kind of argument with a woman there is (and even invented a few) and I know that where children are involved, the minute you suggest ending the relationship or divorce, they unload their salvo of "If you leave, you're never gonna see your child, etc." What I learned through all of this is that they have exactly the amount of power you choose to give them.

You may be broke. You may be lonely. You may be attempting to cram a month's worth of time with your children into every other weekend. But in the end, you'll be happier. Come to terms with the potential loss, and the idea of sticking it out when you dread even coming home from work every day will no longer be appealing. The sound of my ex-wife's voice induces hives. I've been all the way to bottom of the pit, and I came out swinging. You can, too.

At the same time, however, the moral high ground has room for the both of you. If you're standing up there alone, you may want to re-evaluate why you're being so nice. If you have the virtue of wanting to do right by people; if you're compelled to do the right thing, no matter what, then believe me, she knows this and will us it against you.

Your children won't always be young. If the spouse you're up against is anything like mine, they will grow to see her as such. They will still love her (she is their mother) but they will love you, too, and more, for being the better person. Right is right, regardless of any legal provision. Know that you are right, and your children will, too.

Housewives of Benxi

A necessary component of living and working legally in China is an annual visit to the police station to register documents, address, and similar data. The main branch in my current hometown of Benxi, when I visited last, featured half a dozen female officers (no men), mostly sitting at various public service desks, all appropriately uniformed and equipped. I laughed out loud, however, when I noticed that each and every one of them, including the senior officer in charge of foreigners, was wearing high-heeled shoes.

In fact, having traveled and seen (much of) the world, I can now state with definitive authority that the most exotic, sexualized, erectogenic and (otherwise) utterly useless females on planet Earth are without doubt native Chinese women. Many of them are walking wet dreams, every inch of their being designed to maximize the attentions and lustful sensibilities of any male within visual range. And yes dammit, that includes me – I can't seem to help looking.

The vast majority of women in Benxi over the age of 25 are married, and have usually done their duty to society and husband by producing the requisite child. The social contract between the sexes here is quite transparent – sex and reproduction in exchange for labor, property, money and lifestyle.

At the end of each school day, I run a gauntlet of parents, mostly moms, waiting outside the gate to pick up their child. It's apparently perfectly normal for some of these women to show up in six-inch platform shoes, a pleated micro-mini skirt, which may or may not be see-through with black panties underneath, and of course the almost obligatory lacy bra covered by sheer fabric of some sort or another. Feathers, flounces, silk and lace froufrou accoutrements of every description and style can also be found, along with ultra-short leather hot pants, thigh-high boots, stockings that would make a prostitute blush, tights (Chinese women have superseded the West by moving beyond the humble camel-toe), Lycra sheath dresses and skirts, and of course, the utterly transparent simple summer dress (my personal favorite).

And then there's the shoes. My god, the shoes! I seriously contemplated making a career out of stopping women in the street and asking if I could photograph their fabulous, frivolous footwear, but decided against it, not wanting to jeopardize my standing as a normal human being. To picture them for yourself, use your imagination, AFTER ingesting a hallucinogenic-sized dose of Viagra. For sure the evolutionary biologists are correct when they point out that the apparent purpose of such inflammatory footwear is to elevate and outwardly project the buttocks, inviting an approach suggestive of our ancestral hominid mating habits.

Modesty does not seem to be held in high regard, either. I have seen aging over-weight women sprawled on park and shopping mall benches with their skirts intentionally pulled up, legs wide apart for anyone who cares to look. Perhaps it's China's customary overcrowding and lack of privacy that enables this – I'm not sure – but sexy those women aren't. I have seen numerous women try on shirts in public stores without embarrassment, and on one memorable occasion watched a pretty young woman pull her skirt up almost to her waist (flimsy pink cotton panties, in case you're wondering) in order to roll on a pair of pantyhose, in the middle of an underground walkway/mall that was crowded with shoppers.

Fascinating as it is to watch some of these women teetering precariously along on their exuberant footwear, it's almost impossible to picture them efficiently performing any of life's daily chores, much less being seriously productive in the business and corporate worlds. Yet, this very morning, I noticed a beautiful young woman, dressed to the nines in knee-high boots, white leather mini, and form-hugging white cashmere sweater, mopping the sidewalk in front of a ratty little shop near my apartment. I can surely appreciate the value of a woman who's willing to do some of the dirty work, but why oh why does she have to look so damned sexy doing it?

As for male fashion, a small set of the beautiful youth (some young Chinese men are a lot better-looking than I would have thought possible) sport hair styles reminiscent of Liberace, Elvis and even Fabio, but for the majority the predominant expression of style seems to be the mawkish and unpleasant habit of rolling up their shirts to just above the nipples, usually revealing a pot-belly and an assorted variety of flab. It's unimpressive to say the least, and really quite funny. But let's face it, I'd rather look at the women.

Raising Daughters

W.F. Price · 1 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Either there's a dearth of men with daughters in the MRM or father's rights scene, or they don't often mention it. I'm sure it's the latter, because I know that a lot of men concerned with fathers' rights have daughters. In fact, given that the average divorced/separated father has more than 1.0 children, I'm certain that more than half of them do.

So, it looks like a lot of men with daughters are afraid to open up about it, and although it's sad, I can understand why. Personally, I think it's too bad that it's come this, because there's nothing at all wrong with having a daughter. In fact, daughters are a great source of happiness and fulfillment for fathers, just like sons. The really shameful thing is that today fathers often feel that having a daughter is something to fear, and unfortunately there's a good reason for that. Having a daughter can be a real liability in a custody dispute, because men are very often falsely accused of hurting or molesting them.

However, I often see men blaming fathers of daughters as well — for our problems with feminists. They say that we are white knights whose only purpose is to put other men down for our daughters. Yes, evidently we fathers of daughters are so powerful that we can oppress the rest of men very effectively. Instead of training our daughters to be perfect wives for these guys, we're setting them up to be the next version of Hillary Rodham Clinton…

Sometimes, if you have a daughter it seems you can't win either way. On the one side you have the feminists sharpening their knives, eagerly awaiting the opportunity to call you a pervert or brute, and on the other you have men complaining that it's your fault if your daughter doesn't act like their idealized version of a woman.

Well, I've got news for these guys. As a father of a daughter, you've got precious little power over your daughter's life. You're lucky if you can even convince her to dress modestly, and if her mother has other ideas that luck just ran out. As for the guys who encourage their daughters to get involved in contact sports and act like boys, well, I'm not saying I support that, but if that's all the fathers are allowed to do to bond with their daughters, and that's all they know, how can we blame them? Maybe that's the only time they can spend with their girls in which mom doesn't shove the guy out of the way and take over. Personally, I tend to think that's the explanation. If you love your child – and only a screwed up, strange man doesn't love his daughter – you're going to try to find some way to connect with her.

However, I'd like to offer fathers some hope and some relief. Let's start with the relief:

If you have no power over your daughter, and fathers don't have any to speak of, then your responsibility is diminished. Whether that's good or bad is beside the point: it just is. What this means is that you are not to blame for much. If something goes wrong, chances are that it isn't your fault. This is why men who blame fathers for daughters' behavior should really just can it. It isn't our fault. Blame the mothers, the schools, TV or Justin Bieber — we simply aren't responsible. Neither legally nor practically. Would you blame a private for the loss of a battle? A slave for the failure of a plantation? Ridiculous!

What this means is that you should just relax and lay your worries aside, because they won't do you any good. Instead, you should focus on the positive things you can do for your daughter, which may be limited, but at least here you have some leeway.

And this brings us to the hopeful part:

Fathers do have a bond with their daughters. Children love their parents, so daughters will listen to what their fathers say. They may not always follow the advice, but they will hear it, and if you lay your opinions down solidly your daughter will not forget them.

I think this is a great opportunity men have to both be good fathers to daughters and to keep their consciences clear. As a father, your primary duty is to teach your daughter your notion of what is right and wrong. And this doesn't have to be a very complicated thing. In fact, it can be very simple.

Instead of worrying about whether or not she becomes Secretary of State or the next Olympic gold medalist, you should concern yourself with how you'd like her to address the world as an adult. I favor something along the lines of the Ten Commandments, and not for religious reasons, but rather because they are practical. I want my daughter to be forthright, not a thief, not an adulteress, not a liar, not vain, not covetous, etc. I want her to be kind to the unfortunate, respectful to her elders, gracious in success, and patient in times of trial. Whether or not she is a good wife is beside the point; teaching her to be a good human being is my job (teaching one's daughter how to be a wife seems strange and inappropriate to a father, and I hope it stays that way).

Little girls love stories, and fathers can be pretty good at telling them. Choose stories that teach your daughter the lessons you think are important. I like stories that emphasize people (or animals) helping each other, being kind, and being resourceful. Throw in a little adventure and a few rewards. Hidden treasures and secret hideaways always help. Make sure the good ones have a happy outcome, and the bad actors are eaten by bears or turned into seaweed (or choose your own regionally appropriate version). And tell them to your sons as well — they like them too.

Another fun thing to do is to analyze fairy tales with your daughter. Ask her why Snow White is good. Sometimes, her responses will give you an idea of just how important this job is. Maybe she'll say "Snow White is good because she's beautiful." This is where you can correct her in a manner that she will understand. You could say that Snow White may be beautiful, but she is good because she was kind and grateful to the dwarves, and did nice things for them when they helped her. You could tell her that the evil queen is evil because she only cares about being the most beautiful, and will hurt people to be on top when she could have been much happier accepting Snow White and eventually becoming a grandma. One of the moments I can remember that really made me happy was when I saw that my kids understood that part of evil is that it is just plain wrong — mistaken. I explained that a large part of the reason people are bad is that they are doing things the wrong way, and if only they learned to do the right thing they could be good. It's a very simple concept that even small children can understand quite well, but alas, we adults all too often forget it.

Being a father to a daughter is a great blessing, and Western men have never really felt differently. I don't think there's any reason we should change simply because the current class of political women consists of so many evil sociopaths. These feminists really are not normal people, and they don't represent natural girls and women, who actually do want to be good people — not evil, grasping, power-hungry tyrants who kill their own children and destroy their families for self-gratification.

Instead of fretting over our current position as fathers, I think we should take advantage of it, and learn to have a constructive relationship with our daughters that is both fun and rewarding for both daddy and his little girl. In fact, having no "power" over our daughters may be a good thing in the long run if we handle it the right way. If nothing else, it will compel us to teach them that ultimately they will be responsible for themselves, and all we can do is teach them how to handle it as upstanding adults with a firm sense of right and wrong. I don't think there's anything more important that fathers could do, so I am at peace with my role.

“Flowers” of Arab Spring Wilting

W.F. Price · 3 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

When some feminists demanded the arrest of the misguided Christian man who produced a primitive movie mocking Islam, I had to shake my head at the sheer stupidity of it. Here in the West, and in the US in particular, feminists tend to see Christianity as the one force that must be destroyed. They are so wrapped up in their hate crusade against Christians and traditional Western civilization that they will side with anyone they see as an ally in its destruction.

However they, and most other Westerners, have a very feeble understanding of Islam. We tend to look at the authoritarian governments that characterize Islamic societies and blame them for Islamic fundamentalism, which we then interpret as “anti-democratic.” Nothing could be farther from the truth. Out of the Abrahamic religions, and perhaps all major religions, Islam is the most democratic of faiths. Christianity, on the other hand, is spiritually aristocratic, while Judaism tends to be more legalistic.

Muhammad was a populist prophet; he declared all men equal under Allah. Major branches of Islam are not nearly as hierarchical as traditional Christianity. Becoming an imam doesn’t require the approval of bishops or a formal process, but rather popular recognition of one’s wisdom and spiritual authority. A young man who is well-versed in the Koran and has a good understanding of Sharia can lead other Muslims in prayer, and without any formal ordination he becomes an imam.

So Islamic society already has a very powerful democratic institution: the mosque. In prayer, the cobbler and the sultan are equal before Allah. In its pure form, it is a true brotherhood of faith.

However, human society needs hierarchy somewhere, and if it isn’t found in one’s religion, it tends to emerge elsewhere. So Islamic societies are characterized by democratic religious institutions and authoritarian governments. I think the reason that political democracy developed in Christian societies is that the hierarchical nature of the church allowed the emergence of more egalitarian governments. For Christians, the hierarchy of the church provided the necessary order, giving people a sense of their proper place in the world. This prevented the social chaos that tends to emerge as a result of unchecked egalitarianism. In other words, Christians did not need an authoritarian government, because the church provided them with social order. As an example, if we look at contemporary American society, it’s fairly clear that the breakdown of religious authority has led to a need for a more authoritarian government and oppressive, coercive laws. Perhaps that’s the inevitable result in societies that allow for freedom of religion; I suppose future historians will address the issue.

When we helped “liberate” Muslims from their dictators, what we were doing was essentially removing a sense of order from their societies. Not to say that the corrupt, authoritarian regimes were all that benevolent, but rather that we helped make religious egalitarianism, i.e. Islam, the dominant force. And, of course, women’s “equality” cannot meaningfully exist in an egalitarian society, because the real differences between men and women are too stark. In fact, it takes a great deal of authoritarian coercion to bring women up to the level we find them occupying in the US. From federal agencies to local police forces and courts, hundreds of thousands of people are employed in the business of “equalizing” men and women. One could fairly call it a domestic army.

Under Arab dictators like Saddam Hussein and Hosni Mubarak, women had higher relative social status that they do now in the freshly liberated countries of Iraq and Egypt. Feminist projects were indulged, women’s groups patronized, and so on. Now that men have been freed from the constraints of the regimes, much of this has been rolled back. Islam and feminism are now said to be mutually exclusive. Sharia has hardened, and tolerance for more liberal interpretations of Islam (not to mention other faiths) is weakening. In its purer forms, democracy is entirely incompatible with feminism. For example, if Americans merely applied Constitutional principles to family law, women’s supremacy in that institution would vanish overnight.

But still feminists live in a fantasy world in which democracy and female supremacy are one and the same. This is why they supported the Arab Spring revolts, backwardly thinking that feminism would flower in countries where authoritarian governments were removed. Perhaps not all of them are that stupid, but it seems to be the prevailing attitude, hence their disappointment when things didn't turn out quite as they had expected.

Here at home, feminists instinctively understand that their power rests on an authoritarian state, and typically support punitive, coercive and confiscatory measures against men. Indeed, authoritarian governments overwhelmingly direct their efforts toward placing controls on the males of a given society, as they are viewed as the more credible threat to state power. So how could they make such a mistake where the Arab countries are concerned?

I think it really comes down to a desire to permanently vanquish the traditional spiritual authority of the West, and replace it with something else. Every authoritarian regime, no matter where, is a stand-in for the hated "patriarchy," which is really just another word for traditional Christianity.

Ultimately, they may have their way. I can't say with any conviction whether Christianity will survive or fade away. However, if it does fail, a new order will arise in its place, and I think we can say with some certainty that it will not be dominated by women, and if the rest of the world is any indication, women's status will not be enhanced.

Abortion Ship Denied Entrance to Moroccan Port

W.F. Price · 4 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A Dutch vessel operated by abortionists calling themselves “women on waves” was denied entry to the Moroccan harbor of Smir, where it was headed to take on a load of pregnant women, transport them to international waters, then abort their children. The leader of the group, one Rebecca Gomperts, has sailed to various countries to promote abortion. So far, most of the countries have been Catholic, such as Poland and Ireland, but for the first time she decided to take her services to a Muslim land.

Moroccans were not happy about the arrival of the ship, and protested vigorously. Gomperts, who had already landed in Morocco in a sailboat, had to be escorted to safety by police when an angry crowd surrounded the marina.

> Some 200 protesters in Smir targeted the activists outside the sealed gates of the marina. The protesters, some in conservative Muslim robes and headscarves, carried pictures of bloody embryos and shouted “Terrorist!” and “Assassin!” at Gomperts, who was attempting to hand out fliers on abortion in Arabic and French.
> “We are here because we cannot accept these values, the values of massacre,” said protester Abdessamad Zilali, 23. “It is not part of our tradition to kill the unborn.”
> As shouting protesters tried to get closer to Gomperts, police pushed them back and she was escorted away for her own protection.

Prior to attempting to dock in Morocco, Gomperts claimed that Moroccan efforts to deny the ship entry to the sovereign nation would be “illegal” due to “freedom of expression.” I suppose according to feminist logic abortion is a form of free speech…

Moroccans who protested said they felt that abortion is against Islam, although Muslims tend to have significantly more liberal views on abortion than Christians, and many Muslims feel that it is not forbidden so long as the abortion is performed in the first trimester. Abortion is evidently provided in Morocco on a case-by-case basis, but without spousal consent must be approved by the chief medical officer of the prefecture. However, it appears that private clinics offer the service regularly with little official interference.

Gomperts is engaging in outright feminist imperialism of the most offensive kind, and denying the Moroccan people the ability to decide for themselves how they want to deal with abortion. Imagine the outrage if a ship from a Muslim country sailed into a Western harbor offering men the opportunity to declare in front of witnesses that they are divorcing their spouses and then immediately sail off with their children (men get custody in Islamic law). Feminists would demand that the ship be torpedoed.

What I wonder is what Gomperts does with the dead fetuses after performing the abortions in international waters. Does she toss them into the sea? Does she save the tissue and sell it to medical research firms? Pretty disgusting to think of, but it’s something she ought to answer. Another question is who funds her excursions. Boats require fuel, repairs, crew, etc. I think we really ought to know who is paying this woman to sail around aborting kids.

Feminists: The Kissing Sailor was Committing Sexual Assault

W.F. Price · 4 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I'm sure pretty much every American over the age of 12 or so has seen the iconic WWII photograph that depicts a sailor kissing a woman on VJ day. Well, I've got bad news for you: the guy was a sex predator. That's right, you weren't seeing an act of jubilation in the joy of victory, but a lecherous thug kissing an unsuspecting woman in a surprise attack. What gave this cretin license to do this? Why, rape culture, of course…

> A few facts have come to light. Far from being a kiss between a loving couple, we learn that George and Greta were perfect strangers. We learn that George was drunk, and that Greta had no idea of his presence, until she was in his arms, with his lips on hers.
> …what George had committed was sexual assault. Yet, in an amazing feat of willful blindness, none of the articles comment on this, even as they reproduce Greta's words for us. Without a single acknowledgement of the problematic nature of the photo that her comments reveal, they continue to talk about the picture in a whimsical, reverent manner, "still mesmerized by his timeless kiss." George's actions are romanticized and glorified; it is almost as if Greta had never spoken.
> In a way, I understand this. The end of war is a big deal, and the euphoria felt throughout the nation on that day is an important part of American history. For so long, this photograph has come to represent that unbridled elation, capturing the hearts of war veterans and their families alike. The fact that this much-loved photo is a depiction of sexual assault, rather than passion, is an uncomfortable truth, and to call it out as such might make one seem to be a priggish wet blanket. After all, this sailor has risked his life for his country. Surely his relief and excitement at the end of the war is justified? Surely these are unique circumstances? The answer to the first question is yes. He is perfectly entitled to be ecstatic. He is perfectly entitled to celebrate. However, this entitlement does not extend to his impinging on someone else's bodily autonomy.

Actually, she's right by today's standards. The law provides no excuse for this kind of behavior. Today, George would be arrested and court martialed, the Navy sued, and congressional inquiries would be held. We'd hear about "rape culture" in the military for months.

I'd ask why stop there? After all, by today's standards pretty much every pop star prior to 1990 or so might as well be a rapist. Likewise, Sean Connery would be a batterer, Martin Luther King Jr. abusive, JFK a rapist, Gandhi a wife beater, the list goes on… There are so many illusions to shatter, so many cultural icons to smash, so many great men to lay low. It should keep the feminists busy for a very long time, as they erase every last vestige of patriarchal pride.

I'm not sure older men who came of age before the feminist revolution understand this, even today, and I think that's one of the reasons they often have a tolerant attitude toward feminism. The hijinks they got away with as young men would now get many of them jailed and labeled as sex predators. Even hippie culture (and perhaps especially hippie culture) would be verboten today. Imagine what would happen if some long-haired freak took to walking around children without clothes on today, talking about "free love" and all the rest.

Yet, for some reason, it's the young men – who have never had anywhere near the liberty afforded to previous generations of men – who bear the brunt of the "rape culture" penalties. Look at a woman the wrong way, or don't look at her or pay any attention to her at all, but say something she doesn't like (doesn't even have to be sexual), and you could be reported for making her "feel threatened."

The lesson here is that the more power we concede to the feminists, the worse they treat us. Every time we pass a law they want, they simply escalate their demands. Whenever we give them an advantage, they inevitably complain that much, much more is needed. And the sad thing is that despite bending over backwards to accommodate them, women are a lot less happy than they used to be.

It will never end until someone finally, decisively says “no.” That’s right, no means no. No more concessions.

Honey Boo Boo Child and Incentives

W.F. Price · 5 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I became aware of an unfortunate pop phenomenon known as “Honey Boo Boo Child” while clicking through channels not too long ago, and at first simply wrote it off as another example of the depravity that characterizes entertainment today. For those who don’t know, Honey Boo Boo is a little girl named Alana who participates in beauty pageants. She hails from a working-class Southern white family (AKA redneck), is overweight even at the age of six, and also happens to have quite a talent for getting attention. Her mother, known as “Mamma June,” is an obese woman in her 30s who has four children by four different men.

Although it’s tempting to write the mother off as another example of the typical Jerry Springer type trailer trash and simply laugh at the dumb rednecks, there’s more going on in that family than meets the eye. I looked at a few of the videos of their home life, and Mamma June, AKA “the Coupon Queen” actually manages to stock her home fairly well. In fact, the house is loaded to the gills with essentials such as detergent and toilet paper that she’s picked up on the cheap. So well-stocked that I suspect June is a compulsive hoarder, and not exactly a psychologically normal individual.

A lot of these compulsive types have above average intelligence, and June looks like one of them (she can do math in her head pretty damn well for a high school dropout). She may be trashy, but she isn’t dumb, and she has a good eye for material opportunity. Hence the praise she’s garnered for managing to wrest child support from four different men, which adds up to a lot more than she’d get if she’d had all four with the same man (in my state, twice as much). Even if all men are low earners, she could still pull down about $1,200-1,500 month, which is more than enough to house, feed and clothe her kids and herself in rural Georgia.

From “Mother Nature Network:”

> No doubt, the Thompson-Shannon family lives in rural poverty in a tiny house right next to the train tracks. But they’re also industrious, hard-working folks — or at least Alana’s father, Mike “Sugar Bear” Thompson is — and 32-year-old family matriarch “Mamma June” Shannon, a recent grandmother and a high school dropout with a wicked sense of humor, exhibits a keen business sense. She’s also skilled at wrangling up child support checks from each of her four children’s fathers…

But perhaps the biggest opportunity was the beauty pageants she’s enrolled her daughter Alana in. She certainly knows that Alana is not going to grow up to be Miss Georgia (the girl is too big boned), but she has such a talent for amusing people and acting outrageous that people can’t get enough of her. She’s a very entertaining girl, although in a very inappropriate manner. However, inappropriate has become the norm in entertainment, so June saw an opportunity and pounced on it.

In order to maximize her daughter’s antics on stage, June jacks her up with a sugary, caffeine packed concoction of mountain dew and red bull before acts. Given that the girl is already overweight, this is beyond questionable, but apparently it works, and June defends it, saying “at least I’m not giving her alcohol.”

A lot of people in the middle class and above probably look at this and say “what a train wreck! How could a mother do this?”

Well, let’s look at the facts. June is obese, far from wealthy and stuck in a dead-end life. She did the best with the opportunities provided to her, and in contemporary America that meant having children with multiple men to maximize child support. Next, she took advantage of trash culture and voyeurism to capitalize on her daughter. Now she has her own reality show and is being paid thousands of dollars per episode, and richer than she’s ever been.

Each “bad choice” she made was incentivized. Every time she did something we look down on, she was rewarded for it. If she had simply buckled down and lived a modest, decent life, she'd be in a pretty lousy place today. The idea that simply doing what we're "supposed to do," presented to us in that enormous fake of a movie Forrest Gump, will pay off, is just plain wrong for a growing number of Americans.

We have engineered a society that punishes the common people for making socially responsible choices. Men who "do the right thing" and marry young end up divorced, childless, impoverished and indebted. Women who stay with their man have to work harder for less. People who bring their children up with the values of hard work and honesty find that there aren't any jobs for their kids, or that the jobs that do exist pay Latin American wages. This is true for most Americans under the age of 40 now. It is a real catastrophe, and our elites are doing absolutely nothing to change it. No, instead they fly around the world with their billions involving themselves in third world projects, ignoring the collapse at home.

There's a lot of blame for this to go around. From willful ignorance to outright class hostility, many upper income Americans are complicit in wrecking things for the more fragile lower half. Fundamentally selfish ideologies like feminism have played a very important part, but if we're honest with ourselves selfishness will find any excuse for the damage it does; if it weren't feminism it would be something else.

The collapse of values amongst the lower classes, the blame for which can be laid squarely at the feet of our "leaders" and cultural elites, is a grim portent of things to come. If there is a collapse of order in the United States, and it's starting to look more like a "when" rather than an "if" at this point, having half or more of our population devoid of any notions of responsibility, integrity and social obligation will make the outcome that much more brutal and savage. Think Hurricane Katrina X 100.

Whatever the case, I wouldn't count on one or the other of our presidential candidates to save us from it. Things are too far gone.

Equality in Barbarism

W.F. Price · 7 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I stayed up late reading medieval history the other night — reading is how I unwind and relax. Being online is a poor substitute for holding a book and flipping the pages, at least for me. I'm not sure whether my kids, who were born well after the proliferation of the internet, will feel the same way, but I'd like to think so.

The book I was reading is called The Civilization of the Middle Ages, written by Norman Cantor, a historian and professor who died in 2004. He spends a lot of time focusing on the collapse of Imperial Rome and the emergence of the Catholic Church as its successor, going into detail about the intellectual trends that influenced the early church, the churchmen who wrangled with the last emperors and first barbarian rulers, and the factors behind the fall of Latin Rome.

According to Cantor, the Germanic invasions were the key to Latin Rome's destruction. He places the blame squarely on the barbarians from the north, suggesting that the destruction of the empire was not inevitable. Although I think he's a little hard on the Germans (I'm at least half Germanic myself, so it's a little embarrassing to see them in this light), he makes a good case. China experienced plenty of disasters, invasions and toppled dynasties, but the empire survived. I tend to think geography plays an important role, because Rome was essentially a littoral empire with the Mediterranean as its center, whereas China was more of an inland empire based on fertile plains and river valleys. What this means is that China always had a Chinese heartland, whereas Rome didn't really have a cohesive center, leaving it at greater risk of permanent disintegration if overrun by invaders.

Anyway, what was relevant to this site was that although Cantor has very few positive things to say about the Germanic barbarians, he does credit them with giving women a higher place in society than Romans did. The tribesmen may have been primitive, illiterate, unable to effectively govern, violent and destructive, but apparently their women had a pretty good time.

In fact, it wasn't only the Germanic women who exulted in the barbarian lifestyle, but some Roman women as well. Although the invaders may have laid waste to the greatest civilization the world had yet known, slaughtered tens of thousands, burned and destroyed centers of learning and thoroughly wrecked the economy, leaving millions destitute, they ushered in an era of women's empowerment and equality. Amidst the smoking ruins of once-great cities and estates, Roman ladies cavorted and feasted with unkempt, tattooed Gothic warriors.

In one case, Ataulf, a Visigothic warlord who took over the Visigothic army after Alaric died, made off with the emperor's daughter and made her his queen, which, according to Cantor, she thoroughly enjoyed.

Cantor contrasts the elevated position of women in primitive Germanic society with the Roman and Christian women's lot. He blames St. Paul and St. Augustine for placing restrictions on women, and appears to criticize Jewish customs (Norman Cantor was Jewish himself) regarding women as responsible for Paul's – and ultimately Augustine's – position. However, I think we ought to take this with a grain of salt; he doesn't conclude that Germanic norms of sexual equality had a net positive impact on society:

> The social structure that had emerged in France, the most important kingdom created on the ruins of the western Roman Empire, was dominated by lords and serfs. Urban life had almost entirely disappeared, and all leadership had passed to a small group of royal princes and great aristocrats. [...] they were ignorant of the arts of government, they were blind to the ideals of justice and peace, and they had no understanding of economic problems… A comparison of these leaders of French society at the beginning of the seventh century with men of the quality of Theodosius I, Ambrose, Augustine, and Symacchus must lead to the conclusion that the collapse of the Roman Empire was a political, economic, and cultural disaster of the greatest magnitude.
> Yet there is one exception to this gloomy picture. An important way in which Frankish society differed from that of the later Roman Empire was the greater degree of freedom enjoyed by women, at least of the nobility > and the class of freemen and soldiers and landlords. Women in Frankish society were more independent of their fathers and brothers, more capable of making decisions about their lives, and allowed to hold landed property and to play a role in political life than in Roman times. A feature of narratives of the Frankish monarchy in its first two centuries is the intrigues and manipulations that women of the Merovingian family engaged in. That their intrigues seem just as volatile and violent as those of the men in the family may be regarded as another sign of the women's freedom and equality.

Indeed, this seems to indicate that women's relative power is stronger in more primitive, anarchic and despotic environments, whether they are our contemporary urban ghettoes or early medieval barbarian kingdoms. Many other examples, such as 12th century Mongolia and early colonial era Iroquois tribes point to this phenomenon. In fact, as far as I know, in barbaric, warlike societies, as opposed to civilized or hunter gatherer societies, women have the most power and freedom of all. In example after example, one can see the relative status of women decline as societies become more orderly, literate and settled. Contrast Homeric Greece to Athenian civilization. Pre-imperial to Confucian China. Jahiliyyah to the Caliphate — the list goes on.

The question, then, is whether feminists, when presented with the opportunity, would deliberately create the conditions of barbarism. That feminists romanticize a golden past of female empowerment, even going so far as to suggest that ape society is superior to our own, seems to suggest that they will. Perhaps, then, it isn't so much that feminists want to change civilization, but rather – consciously or not – they aim to dismantle it.

If so, that may be exactly where we're headed.

Joran Van der Sloot to Become Father?

W.F. Price · 8 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Joran Van der Sloot, who is suspected of killing Natalie Holloway in Aruba in 2005 and has been convicted of robbing and strangling a Peruvian woman, is now claiming that his girlfriend is pregnant. Yes, he has a girlfriend.

According to Van der Sloot, he impregnated her during an unsupervised visit several months ago:

> A newspaper said Monday that Joran van der Sloot, a Dutch man who is serving a 28-year-sentence for murdering a young Peruvian woman, has impregnated a woman while imprisoned in Lima.
> The Dutch newspaper De Telegraaf cited Van der Sloot's lawyer Maximo Altez as saying the pregnancy is past its third month, and Van der Sloot himself as having confirmed the news in a telephone call on Saturday.
> "A test has proved" the pregnancy, the paper quoted Van der Sloot as saying.
> The woman, identified by the paper only as "Leidi," was said to have become pregnant during an unsupervised visit with Van der Sloot. It was not clear whether that is allowed or possible under Peruvian prison rules.
> Media in Peru last year identified a woman named Leydi Figueroa Uceda as Van der Sloot's girlfriend…

He could be lying about the pregnancy – he is a notorious liar – but nobody is questioning the fact that he has a girlfriend.

Of all the men in the world, a woman chose to be with an imprisoned murderer. Meanwhile, plenty of perfectly decent men go without any women at all, are divorced by their wives, and so on, but if you're a notorious murderer it's evidently pretty easy to find a sweetheart. It's pretty clear that in many cases, women simply aren't interested in ordinary, run-of-the-mill, law-abiding men, because they find them boring.

So are all those folks yammering about the "Peter Pan syndrome" and men avoiding commitment going to finally shut up now?

Probably not. Willful blindness is pretty hard to cure.

The Hot Teacher Myth, and How it Hurts Men

Featured Guest · 8 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Walt Forest

Every few weeks the local news in my area (and perhaps yours) runs a story about a female teacher who has been arrested for allegedly having sex with an underage male student. A mug shot of her is included—especially if she is good-looking.

Though presented as journalism, these "hot teacher" stories are essentially propaganda. Their purpose is to convey not truth (in fact, as I will show, they suggest the opposite of truth) but rather the ideology of "correct" gender politics which is causing great pain to great numbers of men.

There is a temptation to point to these stories about female teachers who have sex with underage male students and say, "See? Women are just as often guilty of sexual crimes as men are, if not more so." But when we say this, we are basically agreeing that female teachers face the same sexual temptations male teachers do and succumb to them just as often. This is to say, we are agreeing that male and female sexualities are the same—a myth which does men more harm than perhaps any other.

We should resist the temptation of the women-are-just-as-guilty argument. We should instead denounce these "hot teacher" stories as the misleading and unethical journalism that they are.

Most local news organizations focus almost entirely on female teachers who have been arrested, and ignore male teachers who allegedly commit the same crime. There are exceptions—when a male teacher sexually abuses a young child, for example—but it is usually the female teachers who get the headlines. This unbalanced coverage creates the impression that female teachers have sex with underage students just as often, or even more often, than male teachers do.

The reality is the extreme opposite. According to the U.S. Department of Justice, 95% of statutory rape victims are female. More than 99% of offenders are male These statistics do take into account incidents involving teachers and underage students. The Bureau of Justice Statistics gives similar numbers for sexual assault of minors.

Are some of these male teachers falsely accused? No doubt. Do some cases in which the offender is female go unreported? Yes.

My purpose is not to deny that female teachers are sometimes sex offenders, nor that their victims are sometimes underage men. It is rather to point out just how rare these incidents are, how the media attempts to mislead us into thinking they are common, and especially how the myth of sameness, to which these stories contribute, is hurting men.

How does this myth hurt men?

Set aside for a moment the image of the hot teacher and her underage male victim which the media force on us with such insistence. Instead imagine a far more common scenario: a young man (or for that matter, a not-so-young man) who does NOT have sex with his teacher, but desperately wants to. In fact this man would like to have sex with many of the women around him, but — with very few exceptions — he cannot. In short, he is an ordinary man with ordinary desires. He may have lived at nearly any point in history, in nearly any culture, but let's place him in our time, our culture, for the problem I describe is not male sexuality, which is timeless and universal, but the way our society denies this sexuality and pretends that it is the same as women's.

We bombard this man from all sides with false assurances that our society is now sexually free. We teach him that the roles traditionally assigned to men are no longer necessary. We pretend that our rituals of courtship are obsolete. In short, we mislead him in the very areas where he most needs guidance.

More to the point, our media and increasingly ordinary people assure this man that women he hardly knows (even his teachers) will suddenly lead him by the hand to their beds for no other reason than the pleasure of having sex with him, “no strings attached.” This kind of thing is ordinary, we tell him. It “happens all the time.”

When it does not happen—of course it never does—he is left to think that he must be something less than an ordinary man. If he dares to voice his disappointment, we tell him that he places excessive importance on sex, views women as “objects,” and the rest of the standard pop feminist rhetoric designed to put the blame back on the man himself. We blame the man because we MUST if we are to avoid blaming ourselves for all the lies we are telling him.

These lies hurt men. It is difficult for anyone who has not suffered this hurt first hand to understand just how bad it can be, but from my own experience I believe these lies are helping to create the ongoing male suicide epidemic (which our society, tellingly, also refuses to acknowledge). These lies certainly make countless men miserable. For this reason I believe exposing the myth that male and female sexualities are the same should be the men’s movement’s first priority. Hot teacher stories obviously make up only a tiny part of this myth, but because they are such a blatant distortion of reality, they are a good place to start.

Are American Women Hated?

W.F. Price · 9 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I was talking to a friend of mine – an American woman – and she told me that she was upset abut the negative image American women have at home and abroad. Today, we no longer have romance dramas about American women abroad, but rather stories such as Amanda Knox's prosecution for murder. The days when American women were considered glamorous and sexy are over; Europeans and Asians now poke fun at frumpy, fat, slutty American girls. American women are considered, along with their British counterparts, the least desirable of all.

Increasingly, the same attitude is growing at home. Although Madonna and Lady Gaga can still draw crowds around the world, mainly they are seen as freak shows — people head to their concerts as though they are going to the circus.

In the meanwhile, older feminists are still doing what they've always done, and not exactly inclining ordinary folks to like women the more for it.

But is it really fair? Are American women that bad?

As I look around, for the most part I'd have to say no, because I can't really pin all the blame on them. Actually, they are not any better or worse intrinsically than their European or Asian counterparts, but rather products of circumstance and environment. Women under 40 never played a role in granting women the license they now have in our society. Most of them just went along with things, as people are wont to do, and some screwed up along the way. They've been told from day one that they can be and do whatever they want, should be sexually adventurous, and should despise family values and honesty. I know it's true because this is what they taught me as a child, too. I had the opportunity to learn from observation that this is bad advice, but I'm fairly sure lots of women have gone through life fully convinced that casual sex with whoever they please, abortion on demand and frivolous divorce are good things.

A lot of people think America is a very "non-progressive" place — it's part of the teaching narrative used to convince people up is down and such. They say "look at the Europeans, they are so much more progressive and open about sexuality, easygoing…" The implication is that we Americans are so backward and prudish, and we have to fix that by screwing around a lot and aborting all the babies. But it's really a lie.

Americans of my generation were born into the most "progressive" childrearing environment that I can think of in modern Western history. The divorce rate was exploding, people were screwing around so much that AIDS burst onto the scene very rapidly, discos were full of coke-snorting players, and it was the so-called golden age of porn. Sweden had nothing on us. Not even close.

Back then, even the Christians were freaks. I knew a bunch of people who grew up in Christian cults, including the Children of God, Love Israel, and various other lesser-known communities. These people were not exactly enriched by the experience of a free love, communal childhood cloaked in religious garb. I'm lucky my traditional grandparents took me to a church that was mainly filled with old Irish ladies, because some of the stories these other kids told me were downright weird.

Secular society was no better. Although much of the art that came out of the 70s was spectacular stuff, the messages conveyed to kids weren't calculated to instill a sense of responsibility. In fact, in hindsight, it really seems like the last thing a lot of the adults back then wanted was responsibility. Life was a big orgy for many of them. I'm sure a lot of them had a blast.

The one thing I remember appreciating about all this was that people my age had a lot of freedom. Wives were just entering the workforce in large numbers in the 80s, and society hadn't really adjusted to it, so we kids were left to fend for ourselves, which gave us a lot of opportunities to do as we pleased. When we weren't being told to "self-actualize" or somesuch bullshit, we could ride bikes around town, play in parks, chuck rocks or whatever. Today's kids definitely no longer have this privilege, and probably for good reason.

What happened is that my little generation of kids went on to become the most troubled and violent group of minors in US history. Murder and mayhem were far more the norm in the early 90s than today, believe it or not. So, that little experiment was a total failure, but instead of going back to tried and true methods of raising families, our parents decided we were little devils and built more prisons, locked more of us up and filled the streets with police cruisers. In the meanwhile, they redoubled their efforts to teach irresponsible behavior and lies, but they entirely stopped practicing what they preached. They'd grown out of that behavior by then, anyway, but once people are past 40 or so they rarely change their minds, so they became even bigger hypocrites than they had been before.

The result has been disastrous for our society, and contributed a fair amount to social stratification. The less capable members of society were hit the hardest for a few reasons. Most importantly, they were confused by the mixed messages, and even if they weren't they couldn't afford to insulate themselves from dysfunctional institutions such as public schools.

Younger women, of course, were not immune from the bad influence. Despite the fact that fewer women under the age of 40 identify strongly with feminism than older women, they have followed the feminists' bad advice, because that's all they've ever known. So while the boomer feminist may have preached sexual liberation, abortion and the "I don't need no man" mentality, she at least had the benefit of her more traditional parents' example to fall back on if necessary. Their daughters did not have that advantage, and never really knew any better.

Despite how clear it is that their parents failed them, younger women are still taught in universities that all the problems are the result of the "old society" filled with spooky patriarchy and dead white males haunting us like so many ghosts even today. This is because the people running the universities today are their parents! They are still preaching the same garbage they embraced circa 1972, and they will never stop doing so until they retire or die.

So, as a matter of fact, the most libertine generation in our history is currently running our society, and if we are to blame anyone, it's them. No, it isn't because we live in a prudish, backward society, but rather that an entire generation took radically "progressive" ideals way too far and did enormous damage to our culture.

So, although I'd say it's proper – and necessary – to hold American women responsible when they do something wrong, we must conclude that much of the fault lies with their parents. It's time we started taking a more critical look at the people running our institutions and asking them whether, given how much they've screwed up their most fundamental responsibilities, they are still qualified to lead anything at all.

Single Motherhood Endangers Children

W.F. Price · 10 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Another sad story came out of my region the other day. An Indian girl died when her mother left her and her sister alone in a car parked in a vacant lot without water for what must have been a very long time (it isn't very hot here this time of year). Even at 18 months, it would probably take pretty much all day for a girl to die of dehydration/heatstroke in a car in weather in the low 60s. It's really terrible to think of the child suffering for all that time.

> An 18-month-old girl has died after being found inside a car with her 2-year-old sister on the Tulalip Indian Reservation, and the girls' mother has been arrested.
> The girls were found around 4:45 p.m. Monday in a vacant lot along Marine Drive Northeast, Marysville fire officials said.
> The 18-month-old was taken to Providence Medical Center in Everett where she was later pronounced dead. She was identified by the Department of Social and Health Services as Chantel Craig.
> Chantel's sister was taken to Children's Hospital in Seattle for treatment of dehydration but is expected to recover.
> The girls' family were part of the Tulalip Tribe, said tribe chairman Mel Sheldon, but he didn't identify the surviving girl or her mother. Sheldon said the girls' parents had separated and that the father is at Children's with the surviving daughter.

I can't imagine what the father must be going through now. This kind of thing is every father's nightmare when the mother runs off with his children, and it happens more often that way than the other way around. This is probably partly because mothers consistently win custody, but mostly it's because two parents are almost always better than one.

I've already demonstrated (and so have many others) that feminists have problems with math, but this is not simply about how much money one makes at a job, who is more likely to commit adultery, or college admissions; it's about people's lives.

I tend to think fathers and mothers are roughly equal in their propensity to be neglectful of children. It's true that women are more likely to abuse and kill kids than biological fathers – or anyone else for that matter – but that's probably a result of the overwhelming power they have over children's lives in our society. When a situation is so unbalanced, those wielding power and control – women – are going to be disproportionately represented as perpetrators of child murder, abuse, neglect, etc. However, feminists' support of abortion and infanticide does give one cause for concern, and suggests that women may in fact be more likely and willing to kill children than fathers, but until it's conclusively proven I can't say for certain that's the case.

However, even if fathers were 100% more likely than mothers to cause a child's death through neglect, children would still be far safer with a father in their lives. It sounds counterintuitive, but the truth is that very few parents actually do kill their children. What this means is that even if a father is twice as likely to leave a child in the car, go shoot some heroin and then nod off all day, leaving the kid to die in the meanwhile, children are still better off with a father in their lives. This is because, even if mothers are only half as likely to do this, the overwhelming majority of fathers would still be more responsible than the women who did do it, and therefore would save the child even if the mother was a hopelessly wasted junkie. Even if both parents were junkies the kids would be safer with two parents, because it's less likely that two junkies would pass out and forget the kids all day at the same time.

Of course, this is assuming both parents are present on a daily basis, but it extends farther than that. In cases of separation, when the father has frequent, ongoing access to his kids, he can protect them if he notices that something is wrong. Unfortunately, this is where courts utterly fail children. Not only do they refuse to enforce father custodial time as vigorously as they enforce wealth transfer to the mother, they often treat the father who demands more time with his children with undue suspicion. This is because the feminist narrative says that the only reason fathers want time with their kids is because they desire power and control. That's right, according to feminists fathers only care about being around their kids because they want to order them around, as though children are little servants.

That's ridiculous. Sometimes I tease my kids and say they're going to have to make dinner for me, but both they and I know I wouldn't let them near a hot stove yet. Just about the only thing I can get them to do at this point is put their toys away, and that's often more work than it would be to do it myself. I have a feeling it's going to be years before I can expect them to do anything for me — the main job now is simply to teach them to do things for themselves.

Most parents, mothers and fathers, care about and want to protect their children. This includes most separated and divorced parents as well. Therefore, it's in the best interests of children for both parents to be regularly involved in their lives. If one parent drops the ball, the other parent can pick up the slack. If the kids are in a truly dangerous situation with one parent, they are far better off if the other has regular access to them. And sometimes, even the less responsible parent can help them in ways the more responsible one cannot (e.g. listen to the child's opinion and let him or her make their own, better decision).

If courts truly cared about the "best interests of the child," they'd take this fundamental truth to heart and impose a presumption of equal access to the kids. Unless one parent is truly screwed up – as the mother in this case appears to have been – kids should spend equal time with both parents. Unfortunately, mother custody trumps all in our society. The "best interests of the child" is a tasteless joke when courts aid and abet the destruction of families.

I wonder: how do fathers like little Chantal's feel when judges make these lofty pronouncements about children's best interests? Probably not too happy.

I was recently reading about how Allied armies forced Axis civilians to view the horror of concentration camps at the end of WWII. Perhaps someday we can allow the victims of feminist family law to confront the people who put it into practice, so that they, too, can face their guilt. That would at least be a step in the right direction.

Where in the World are The Spearhead's Readers?

W.F. Price · 10 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've been looking over the Google stats recently, and it's kind of fun to see where readers are located. I thought I'd share a few of the more curious facts.

First, the obvious:

Out of roughly 70,000 people who viewed the site over the last month, visiting nearly 134,000 times, the large majority (82.5k visits) are in the US. Next comes Canada, at about 12k. Then the UK with over 9 thousand, then Australia at almost 6 thousand. New Zealand and Ireland lag behind a bit for English speaking countries at about a thousand each.

Now it gets a little more interesting. We had almost 1,800 visits from Germany, which is the highest for any non-English speaking country, but not far behind is Finland, with over 1,200 visits. I'm not going to crunch the numbers, but that may give Finland the highest per capita readership of a non-Anglosphere country. Other nordic countries, including Norway, Sweden and Denmark, also have relatively high counts.

Anyway, my theory is that places with fewer readers are usually places where there is little feminism, and no gender war to speak of. Unsurprisingly, this includes most of Central America and SE Asia. Brazil actually has a large number of readers. Not so many for its size, but there's definitely an indication of feminism there. Mexico is about on par with Brazil for its population size, but Argentina looks to have little activity for its population, and this holds true for most of the rest of S. America, with the exception of Colombia.

For Europe, the most gender peaceful countries include the Balkans, although not all of SE Europe looks good. Romania, for example, shows quite a few hits, but Bulgaria and Hungary show little activity. Russia, despite its large size, shows a paltry 245 hits.

Ukraine looks nice, with only 80 hits, and Belarus is all clear with all of seven hits.

Moving on over to the Middle East/North Africa, we see very little activity in the Maghreb, but more in Egypt, and then a lot in Israel, and surprisingly over 100 from Saudi Arabia. Turkey is second only to Israel for the ME, but considering its size the number isn't so bad.

In Asia, India, with almost 1,300 visits, has the most activity by far, beating Japan and China by a considerable amount. The Philippines has more than I expected at nearly 500 visits; I have no idea what's going on there but it's an ominous sign. Central Asian countries look to be oases of gender peace, with the exception of Afghanistan (although those are probably American soldiers reading the site). Pakistan has far fewer than India, even for its population size, suggesting that feminism is stronger in India than Pakistan.

In sub-Saharan Africa, only S. Africa has significant numbers, with over 500 visits.

So, using the Spearheadometer, I'll suggest a few countries to visit to take a break from gender wars.

Western Europe generally looks to be trouble, however, there is one spot that really stands out: Portugal. For its size, Portugal has the lowest visitor count of all Western Europe. What this suggests to me is that you can go to Portugal and have a nice time, talk to ladies, and enjoy yourself without being attacked by rabid feminists. I've never been to Portugal, but it seems like it could be a great place to visit, what with the beaches, old castles, nice weather and all the rest. Now we can add "minimal feminism" to that list. Second place goes to Italy.

For Eastern Europe, Belarus may just be the place to go. People in Belarus seem to have no interest in feminism whatsoever. This, of course, is a good thing.

SE Europe is generally pretty good; you can go anywhere besides Romania and Croatia (too bad about Croatia — beautiful place) without running into people who care about feminism.

NW Europe, on the other hand, is a disaster pretty much all over. Out of all countries in NW Europe, Denmark may be the best, but I wouldn't count on it.

I don't really feel like I can single out any countries in SE Asia or Latin America as standouts, because they all seem to have minimal interest in feminism. Only Colombia, Mexico and Brazil register significant visits. So just go ahead down there and enjoy yourself. For SE Asia, only the Philippines seems to care, but otherwise go where you please.

So, to sum it up, we have visitors from all voer the world, but only countries with significant feminist presence show more than a few hits. Maybe someday we, too, will have the luxury of not caring about feminism any longer. Ah, what a sweet dream.

The Sad Life of Monica Lewinsky

W.F. Price · 11 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The following story, brought to my attention by readers, demonstrates the Heartiste maxim that five minutes of Alpha is worth a lifetime of beta in the young woman's libidinal calculus:

> There is no husband, as she dreamed of, no boyfriend, and no children, despite saying that she was 'romantic at heart' and that getting married and having kids was 'the most important thing to me.'
> After numerous failed attempts to reinvent herself professionally, there is no sign of a successful career either.
> MailOnline has learned that as she also continues her struggle with her weight, Monica now lives with her mother. She has moved out of the expensive apartment she rented for nearly a decade in the exclusive Archive building in Greenwich Village – where properties can cost up to $7,450-a-month for a one-bedroom apartment – and divides her time between New York and Los Angeles.
> When she stays in New York, she lives with her mother Marcia Straus, who owns a penthouse in the city.
> It also seems that she has regained the 31 pounds she once lost on the Jenny Craig diet program.
> She was famously axed from the company just three months after signing up to a $1 million deal to be a spokeswoman, following criticism that she was not a good role model.
> One told MailOnline: 'I think, if she had her dream, she would have lost 30 pounds, found a boy, moved to Westchester County, and had a family.'
> [...]
>
> As well as the heartbreak she suffered after her relationship with President Clinton, Monica also plans to detail the pain of ending a pregnancy at the height of her liaison with the president, the source said.
> She was carrying a child fathered by a Pentagon employee called 'Thomas', she revealed in an earlier biography written by Andrew Morton. 'That void has never been filled,' said the friend.
> During her grand jury testimony against President Clinton in 1998, an immunity deal prevented her from exposing intimate details about their affair in the Morton expose that came out that year.
> But that agreement expired in 2001, and when President Clinton published his autobiography My Life three years later, Monica felt betrayed by him all over again,' said the source.

If you think about it, during her 20s Monica was living the feminist dream. She was having sex with multiple powerful men, aborting the results, and working in the midst of the most powerful institution on earth. What more could a young, empowered woman ask for?

Years down the line, things aren't looking so good. She's almost 40, seriously overweight, with no man or baby in sight.

Some feminists might say that these women are living the lives they want, but obviously this isn't true in Monica's case. She did want to get married and have a baby, but what man would want to marry her after she'd slept with the most powerful, charismatic man on earth?

Men instinctively avoid women they know will see them as a lesser man than past lovers. This is one of the reasons virgins have been almost universally preferred as wives throughout the history of civilization. The psychological impact of your wife having had sex with the President of the USA must be pretty profound. I can't imagine many men would want to sign up for that.

And then, of course, what man could replace Bill Clinton in Monica's heart? Having been intimate with a man who commanded the utmost heights of global power, had his own private jet and the best security service on earth, and was the commander in chief of the US armed forces, how could another man compare?

It shouldn't be surprising at all that Monica is single. Nor should it be surprising that she is apparently not too happy with life, and can't keep her weight down.

Yet this is exactly the life course that feminists prescribe to young women: a few glorious years of sexual abandon with powerful men, and then a lifetime of dissatisfaction. What a terribly empty and desultory goal. Will women ever wake up and get a clue, or will they keep on reading "Fifty Shades" type books in the hopes that they may still have hope to relive those glory days? Unfortunately, I'd probably have to put my money on the latter.

Kids with Guns

Over the last 2 and a half years, the office in which I work has been challenged by the presence of an annoying woman whose behavior and complaints have periodically pushed our department to the edge of dysfunctionality.

I should state a ritual declaration here that I am aware "not all women are like that." But I'm not going to interpret that as meaning that I should therefore keep my mouth shut about the woman in my life who IS like that.

I'll try to make the background short: I work in an office which used to have 5 people, one of whom was a (female) supervisor. Two of the lower-ranking people decided to quit at roughly the same time, leaving myself, a male co-worker and the supervisor to manage things. The supervisor canvassed-around to hire a new person while increasing the workload on us remaining underlings. (At the same time, she inexplicably reduced her own workload, fearless leader that she was.)

This new hire joined us (I'll call her 'J' from now on) and within weeks of entering our team, personality clashes started with the supervisor. Both sides were at fault in these conflicts: the supervisor was pretty lousy and J took petty slights as major insults while complaining about the supervisor to anyone who would listen. The results were unpleasant. A psychological Cold War of sorts soon fell-across the office. The room started feeling a bit like that living in the Korean demilitarized zone.

I remember, on one occasion, I stepped-out of the office for coffee. When I came back, I stepped right into the middle of a shouting match. It was like watching two overgrown, red-faced children going at it with Nerf bats. (I injected myself between them and managed to calm things down. Afterwards, both of them privately thanked me for my professionalism in helping matters.)

A few weeks later, things finally came to a head: our supervisor held a routine meeting and J walked-out in a huff without a word after getting annoyed by the supervisor's tone of voice. The supervisor blew-up and ran yelling after J, they almost came to blows. My supervisor was deemed responsible (she'd been the more aggressive of the two) and was fired soon after. We never really thought highly of her anyway, so my male co-worker and I, as we saw it, wound-up sharing an office with the lesser of the two problems.

So he and I began haplessly working alongside this annoying woman who, every time she has some minor difficulty, always tries to manipulate the men around her into fixing it. Plus, she feels perpetually un-appreciated and deprived of the praise that she thinks she deserves. On the other hand, quite objectively, she's the least-productive person in the room so she doesn't really deserve much praise. Her antics began to get old pretty quickly.

6 months ago, we got a new supervisor who I rather like. What I found incredibly gratifying was that the new supervisor picked-up on J's game within weeks; he began having difficulties with her as well. The office is still a cold, uncomfortable place when she's around. When she leaves, it's like a weight gets lifted-away from everybody's shoulders.

It's not as if I haven't tried to put things to her straight. Once, I casually slipped-in to a conversation that after what happened with the former supervisor, she's positioned herself as looking like a victim to the new supervisor. I said that it would not be a good position for her to be in. So, yes, I've said it. She's heard it. She apparently doesn't care.

I have my own way of dealing with the situation: I AM ALWAYS PROFESSIONAL around J. It's strictly business-only between she and I. I am cold and to the point. Curt, almost. I don't go above and beyond the call of duty to help her. No casual conversation. She is exactly the kind of person to take an innocent-sounding comment the wrong way. Maybe she thinks I'm a grouch? Well, tough tit. I'm working.

I've come to see her as a none-too-bright kid who is holding a gun. And she'll shoot me if I say what I really think of her.

I keep it business-only with her. No off-topic chit-chat. Nothing about personal stuff. No jokes. I put-on my best poker face and do my best to outwardly pretend that she's a grown-up. I'm all: "Just the facts, ma'am." Like what Joe Friday would say. But through my eyes, all I see is a little kid waving a gun around.

She got a negative performance review a few months back. J came to me, all rattled and disturbed. I guess she expected me to pat her on the head and say "Aww, you poor darling! Don't let the bad man hurt your poor lil' feelings" or something like that. I simply let her rant and then I said to her: "If you think that he's wrong about you, then you should use every opportunity to prove it from now on." And I left it at that.

Maybe you think I'm treating her too leniently or that I need to stand-up to her or that I'm engaging in some variant of White Knighting or whatever. Well, I don't care what you think about what I'm doing. You're not the one who's interacting with a 9-year-old brandishing a Glock.

So what's the result of my stance? The upshot is that the new supervisor considers me to be the most reliable, most professional person in the room. He sees how I treat this troublemaker and he thinks I'm a positive influence on her. There is no way she is ever going to pin any bullshit complaints on me EVER. He WILL defend me in a future conflict because I've built-up a good record.

The downside is that my job is a lot less pleasant than it could be.

I've worked in a few organizations over the past 15 or so years. So far, I've picked-up an impression about how men and women regard in the workplace. (I know this generalizes and I know 'not all women are like that.' So sue me.)

When a man enters an organization he cares enough about to pursue his career in, he tends to ask questions like: 'How can I make myself valuable to this organization?' and 'What can I do to fit-in here?' In the process, perhaps he makes himself into something like a tool. There are downsides to that, sure.

But when a woman enters an organization, I tend to think she asks herself questions like: 'What can this organization do for me?' and 'What should change here so I can feel comfortable?' She tends to regard the organization as something that serves HER rather than the other way around. And there are downsides to that, as well.

Society certainly talks a good game about getting women into the workforce and the importance of women developing their careers. But at the same time, it does something which works at cross-purposes: Society lies to women about what it means to work in business organizations. Society encourages women to think that their on-the-job performance should not matter nearly as much as their feelings and their happiness. And one result is that nearly every company has got at least one kid with a gun wandering around its halls who does a great job of making everyone else miserable.

Although there is a tiny number of dream-jobs out there, the reality is that most work will NEVER be about employee satisfaction. Performance matters. Productivity matters. Skills and competence matter. And, yes, kissing the right butt can matter too. But whether you're feeling happy or satisfied are irrelevant. If you want to be happy and satisfied on the job? Nobody else cares what you want. Best of luck to you.

There seems to be a very stupid figment which floats-around out there: the idea that men typically go to work to find personal fulfillment. That work is just something they want to do, that they put their feet-up on the desk and watch money grow from the potted plant nearby. Maybe that's WHY that article in The Atlantic "Women Still Can't Have it all" by Louise Slaughter seemed to have kicked-up such a fuss: what she was saying was completely obvious to most men (it was no great epiphany that she had), but the truth seemed to be a hard-fought realization for her nonetheless. Slaughter is certainly not a foolish woman, so how could she have gotten suckered? The Lie must be very powerful indeed.

Largely, working a job is not about 'personal fulfillment.' It's not about 'gaining power.' It's not about 'having it all.' Should it be? I think it should be. It would certainly be nice. It would also be nice to sit on a pink cloud and have tea with a magic unicorn, but I don’t exactly plan my whole life around the concept.

The sooner society stops feeding women sweet-sounding, ego-stroking nonsense, the better-off everyone will be.

Feminism Chinese Style

W.F. Price · 13 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I came across a hilarious article in the NY Times, in which a typical American feminist has a fit over material published by the Chinese Women's Federation. Although the organization is supposedly feminist, the advice looks like it could come straight from here, Dalrock's site or Heartiste. Maybe someone in China's Ministry of Culture has been paying attention to what's happening over here…

> In 2007, the Women's Federation defined "leftover" women (sheng nu) as unmarried women over the age of 27 and China's Ministry of Education added the term to its official lexicon. Since then, the Women's Federation Web site has run articles stigmatizing educated women who are still single.
> Take this uplifting column from March 2011 that ran just after International Women's Day:
> Pretty girls don't need a lot of education to marry into a rich and powerful family, but girls with an average or ugly appearance will find it difficult. These kinds of girls hope to further their education in order to increase their competitiveness. The tragedy is, they don't realize that as women age, they are worth less and less, so by the time they get their M.A. or Ph.D., they are already old, like yellowed pearls.

Imagine a state agency here saying anything resembling that. It's unthinkable, yet this is what was published in China in the wake of International Women's Day. Of course, it's entirely true. One of the things I love about the Chinese is their ability to cut through the BS where these matters are concerned. Transparency in other areas is far from ideal, but they beat us hands down here.

More from the Chinese:

> Many highly educated "leftover women" are very progressive in their thinking and enjoy going to nightclubs to search for a one-night stand, or they become the mistress of a high official or rich man. It is only when they have lost their youth and are kicked out by the man, that they decide to look for a life partner. Therefore, most "leftover women" do not deserve our sympathy.
>
> The main reason many girls become "leftover women" is that their standards for a partner are too high … As girls are not too picky, finding a partner should be as easy as blowing away a speck of dust.
> When holding out for a man, if you say he must be rich and brilliant, romantic and hardworking … this is just being willful. Does this kind of perfect man exist? Maybe he does exist, but why on earth would he want to marry you?

I love that last line. Way to throw cold water on the Fifty Shades crowd.

The NY Times feminist's commentary is the typical fare, so there's no reason to repeat much of it here. To sum it up, she's indignant. Big surprise…

The goal behind the Chinese drive to encourage educated women to shack up and have kids is to "increase population quality," and that's going to take a lot of effort on their part. However, when you compare what they are doing to our own policies, which encourage Honey Boo Boo-style family proliferation, I'd be willing to bet they'll gain the advantage in time. Unless, of course, we can radically change course within a generation or so. I'm not going to count on us doing that, but it's worth a try.

A Teachable Moment

W.F. Price · 15 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I spent the weekend with my kids, and I was pretty happy to have them over as usual. After a gorgeous summer and early fall, we've finally fallen back into the old pattern of sogginess and gray, but hey, that's what they know, so it doesn't slow them down outside. They collaborate in biology projects that involve trapping various land-based mollusks and arachnids, and then urge me to foster them because they know their mother would promptly fumigate the pests at her place. I oblige them for the time being, but then when they are gone I release the critters into the wild (proper conservationist that I am), and when the kids get back and ask for them I simply tell them I gave the animals "freedom," although I'm sure their creepy crawly pets would be perfectly happy to abide in a perforated peanut butter jar given sufficient food.

On another note, when I took them back to Bellingham for the hand-off we had an edifying encounter with a beggar.

Those of us from proper cities will obviously be familiar with the "out of gas" routine. Typically, someone comes up holding an empty gas can asking for money, because they are out of gas and need just a few bucks to get to mom's place, or wherever. In the cities, it's usually pretty gruff fellows who don't inspire too much sympathy. The softer sort of beggar generally gets rolled as soon as he/she has a few bucks in hand, so there's a sort of streetside winnowing of the chaff.

However, in Bellingham, we have a "city" that is about 95% white and little more than an outpost in a rural environment. It's safer than your typical East Coast suburb, and aside from a few skinny hippies downtown mainly populated by naive, "socially conscious" types.

So, having arrived a little early to the handoff, I took the kids to a fast food joint to buy them some soda pop (no, I don't let them drink sugar water very often), and just as soon as I emerged a woman jogged up to me with a song and dance about needing money for gas.

She had no gas can, but she sure put on an act. She gave me the spiel, then started crying as best she could, totally interrupting me while I was trying to put mustard on my hamburger. I saw it for what it was immediately, but she caught me off balance because I was dealing with the kids, and also because it was Bellingham and it isn't all that common there. As she squeezed a few crocodile tears out of her eyes, I told her to hang on while I applied the mustard. When finished, I asked "where's your car?"

"I left it on the median with the lights flashing," she replied.

Well, at least this girl could think on her feet…

As I was thinking about how to handle this annoying interruption, a middle-aged local woman came up and gave her five bucks.

I thought to myself that this woman had just bought the girl a few hits of crank off a broken light bulb.

I worked a bit on the burger, and finally said "well, I don't really have any cash on me, but here's some change," handing her the 35 cents I had in my pocket.

Often, when bothered, you just give people some token to leave you alone. That's what I did. I know it's a cowardly way out, but I didn't want more of a scene in front of the kids.

She took the change, knowing full well that I knew she was full of it, and walked off with a smirk. After that, I walked back to the car with the kids to wait for their mom.

At that point, I started to tell them that I didn't believe the woman. My son was most impressed; my daughter seemed to instinctively distrust her and was not at all surprised that she was lying. Just as I started to point out why I thought she was lying, sure enough, she jumped into a running car not 30 yards away and drove off with some guy. I quickly pointed it out, and told the kids that sometimes people will lie to take your money.

My son was really quite interested in the lesson. He repeated it to me, as though it was quite the revelation. He also understood what had happened, even going so far as to say “you only gave her a little money because you knew she was lying.”

“That’s right,” I told him: “I just wanted her to go away.”

What it impressed on me was that so few men teach their kids that adults can be lying, manipulative sponges — even when they are women. Men seem particularly loathe to teach this to their sons, but from what I have observed it is their sons who need this lesson the most.

Of course, it isn’t always women who cheat and lie, but far too few young men are even aware that women are capable of doing this. They’ll be suspicious of a man asking for help, but they all too often open their pockets to any woman who shows up with a song and dance and a few fake tears.

I think it’s a cultural problem, and I think it’s changing. Nowhere else in the world can women get away with what they do here, and that’s evident from the spectacular liberties feminists have taken over the years.

Well, feminists, I’ve got some news for you:

Little boys listen to their daddies. The more you try to push their daddies away, the more thy’ll listen to them, and there’s nothing you can do about it. Come crying around asking for help in the future, and these boys will know just what you are.

Oh, and as for our daughters, they’ve already got your number. They know better than anyone that you’ve ripped off their patrimony, and they aren’t going to be all that well-disposed toward you for that.

Taking a Breather

Just to let readers know, I've decided to take it easy for a little while so I can start writing more thoughtful pieces again. I've got plenty of ideas, and am eager to put them out there, but sometimes you need a bit of R&R. Life's not bad, but as I get older I need to resynch from time to time, get some fresh air, and just sleep easy.

So, if anyone wants to send in written contributions, this is good time.

Just a few days rest ought to be enough for me, and I'll be posting some in the meanwhile, but I really want to write some good, thoughtful stuff soon, and I've got to refresh myself for that. No point in pushing myself to burnout before I'm 40 — I want to be in for the long haul.

Hope everyone else is enjoying the autumn, which is such a beautiful season. Have some hearty food and comfy evenings as the nights get chilly and the leaves turn brilliant colors. At least that's my plan for the next few days.

Stay tuned — I'm not going anywhere.

A Great Game

W.F. Price · 17 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In keeping with taking it easy this week, I've been watching football, which I've slowly grown to appreciate more as I've settled down and moved toward middle age. Although it seems ironic that the more sedentary guys get, the more they like these kinds of sports, it makes sense: I never had the patience to sit in front of the TV for long until fairly recently.

On Sunday, I watched as much of the Seahawks/Patriots game as I could before I had to drive back up toward the border. It was a truly exciting game, But by the time I left I fully expected the Hawks to lose. Nevertheless, I turned on the radio while driving the kids north, and imagine my surprise when they managed to pull off a last-minute win over Tom Brady's Patriots. It was a fun moment to hear it announced on the radio in the car. I shouted "we won," while my bewildered kids wondered how a daddy could get so excited over some game on the radio.

I'm a bit ambivalent about football, because it is so physically harsh on players. Half the older men in my family would be cripples without the benefit of joint replacement surgery, and football is definitely the culprit. Most of them have at least one fake joint by the age of 55, usually from a nearly 40-year-old injury. I wouldn't recommend the game to a boy unless he was exceptionally sturdy, and even then I'd give him a serious warning about it. Personally, I'm glad I never played it seriously — I'm not sure we'll be able to afford exotic surgeries like that in 20 years time, and my lower limb joints are all intact because I stuck to baseball, crew, soccer and skiing.

However, American football is a beautiful game. The acts of athleticism are awe-inspiring, and make for the best TV has to offer. And if the men do it of their own free will, fully informed of the risks, who am I to stop them?

The Seahawks new quarterback, a rookie named Russell Wilson, also has some baseball background. Never in my life had I seen a quarterback play like a second baseman, but that's what he did on Sunday, and he pulled it off beautifully. It was quite a contrast to the precision control of the field Tom Brady excels at, but it was a pleasure to see Wilson throw the ball to a receiver on the run as though he was throwing a batter out on a double play.

I've got to hand it to the Patriots' receivers as well, especially Wes Welker, who took a brutal hit from Brandon Browner that would have put an ordinary man in intensive care. Man, that guy is tough to get up and walk that one off!

I also have to give Brady the respect he deserves. He is the consummate professional, and has developed an instinctive feel for the game that makes him very hard to stop. The Hawks couldn't have handled him without having the upper hand in energy and athleticism, and perhaps the strongest, fastest defense pound for pound in the NFL. This really highlighted the human condition, and the constant struggle between experience and enthusiasm — youthful energy and wisdom.

It was a great game (not least of all because my team won), but there's one thing about it that bothered me: Those stupid pink slippers they were made to wear for the breast cancer support.

Can't men be charitable without also being made submissive to others? I understand the concept of humility, but the pink here is entirely secular and meant to send a message that one group of people is dominant. Frankly, it's inappropriate, and it is entirely anti-democratic.

It's fine to support charities, but this goes beyond that and raises one issue above all others. Have we ever seen football players wear special shoes for children with cerebral palsy? For wounded veterans? For children whose fathers have been taken away from them by state-sponsored thugs? No, we haven't, because it isn't allowed. Hell, Tim Tebow has taken heat for drawing verses from scripture on his face during games. But it's OK to force all the players to shill for another cause…

It seems like a silly issue to bring up, but it really isn't. It's a clear statement of priorities. It's a reflection of contemporary American politics, and we have every right to question it. Supporting cancer research is a noble goal, and a lot of good can come out of it, but why, oh why, is one group of victims supreme?

The Discourse Coalition of Feminists and Conservatives

Featured Guest · 17 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Henry Laasanen

The big problem with the advancement of a men's movement is the "coalition" of feminists and conservatives.

It's hard for men's rights activists to win by voting for democrats or republicans, because they both have the same goal: protection of women.

In this article, I will try to explain the coalition of feminists and conservatives using the sociological concepts of "story line" and "discourse coalition".

Story lines

People acquire information from simple story lines. Story lines set people in "subject positions". The story line is accepted because it feels just about right.

There are three important subject positions: the victim, the villain and the hero.

In the conservative story line we have the traditional story, where the damsel is in distress, captured by the "bad men" and saved by the hero, who is played by the white knight. The conservative story line also has the subject position of "unmanly men" who are whiners (who could be an MRA) and who lack the courage to save the woman.

Then there is the victim feminist story line, where woman is the victim of men or patriarchy and feminism is the cure, supported by the ideology of power feminism.

Discourse coalition of feminists and conservatives

If two story lines are similar enough, they can form a "discourse coalition" to advance the same political goal.

The conservative and feminist story line gives people same kind of subject positions. Women are the victims and men are the bad guys, only the hero's subject position is different.

Although conservatism and feminism have many different goals, they can unite in discourse coalition to protect women from men

The "New Gentleman"

I have used the concept of the "New Gentleman" to describe the kind of man who is the product of both discourse coalition conservatism and feminism.

In the old times we had John Wayne, who saved the woman. The New Gentleman doesn't save just one woman, he fights for the sake of feminism. He has succeeded in combining the story lines of conservatism and feminism.

Most of the top male politicians could be branded as some kind of New Gentleman. By supporting feminist's ultimate goal of protecting women, they get votes to win elections. So, becoming the New Gentleman is a rational decision for the aspiring politician.

The New Gentleman is the new hegemonic form of masculinity.

The problem with the masculinist story line

Masculists have hard time explaining their story line to the public. In masculist story line men are the victims, the villain is an unequal society (or even feminism) and the hero is masculism. For the majority of people, the masculist story line just don't feel right, even if the facts are behind it.

Masculist are in an ideological no man's land. By positioning men as victims, it's hard to appeal to either men or women.

The masculist story line is so different from conservative story line that it is difficult for masculists and mainstream conservatives to unite, and putting men in the unmanly subject position of whiners (which is hard to avoid) doesn't really help.

The advancement of the men's movement against the discourse coalition of conservatism and feminism is a tough nut to crack.

"Doxxing" Becoming a Political Weapon

W.F. Price · 18 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Doxxing, which originally referred to outing trolls or other online enemies by posting their info online, is increasingly tied to outing people for some political view or activity they'd prefer to keep private. Because political correctness has become so pervasive in American society, a lot of people deeply fear having their private views or activities known, because it has real potential for harm. Compounding the issue is the fact that Americans increasingly lie about their views, particularly in regards to politically correct taboos such as "gender," race, religion, sexual orientation, etc. For example, the upper middle class white professional who overpays for a house to live in a white school district would never honestly say that he is doing so because he fears that his kid is going to get beat up and exposed to the sort of people he assiduously avoids at a majority minority school.

The manager at a workplace will never admit that he has instituted abusive, intrusive policies at the office to protect the company from sexual harassment lawsuits. Generals will not even come out and say that women can't fight as well as men, or that the presence of female "soldiers" is disruptive and expensive.

In many parts of the US, Christians are afraid of openly favoring their own religion, of opposing behavior that is plainly proscribed by their faith, and of defending their own interests.

It would be wrong, however, to say that only the majority has to worry about speaking its mind. In fact, we have slowly edged toward the real "pluralistic" society dreamed of by progressives, and instead of tolerance and acceptance of all, we find that nobody trusts their neighbors any longer, and everyone feels oppressed. It may be true that minorities have always felt some pressure to conform and have lived in the shadow of the majority, but instead of liberation from that we now have a society where nobody at all feels comfortable speaking his or her mind.

Although I definitely sympathize with people who want to avoid being outed, and I'd recommend prudence in certain situations, I think this doxxing may be a necessary step for change. While I understand that if, say, a conservative Christian were to openly proclaim his or her faith where I live, opposing gay marriage and the like, he would likely have his tires slashed and windows smashed and might run the risk of assault on the street, we're getting to the point where people can't run away any longer.

Story after story is coming out about people being exposed for one thing or another, whether or not they have been convicted of any crimes. A big one recently has a Boy Scouts list of ineligible scout leaders slated for publication online. While a number of these listed men probably are real perverts – perhaps even most – I'd be willing to bet that a lot of them are innocent victims of false accusations, or of accusation for ulterior motives. A majority of sex acts between scout leaders and troops are probably consensual; i.e. both are homosexual and it is a matter of a teen and a young man engaging in consensual relations, which is pretty much standard fare amongst gays. We probably never hear about most of these, and never will, and that's fine by me. However, where you have sex, you get jealousy, anger, betrayal and all the rest, which could easily lead to accusations (this is why I oppose gays openly serving in the military). Therefore, I bet a lot of the guys who are about to have their lives destroyed committed a pretty negligible sin, and are far from the pedophile perverts everyone will now brand them as.

I have a theory that when you push down natural dislike of something, it comes out in other ways. Banning criticism of homosexuality and pretending that gays are "just like us" causes people to sublimate their distaste for the practice, and it comes out in attacks on Catholic priests, the national hatred of Jerry Sandusky (which was deserved, but a lot stronger than it normally would have been), and now this Boy Scout scandal. Sometimes, you have to wonder whether minorities who thought they were liberating themselves with our new, "tolerant" society aren't having second thoughts, because as far as I can tell now they may not have to hide as much, but they certainly have to lie more.

The next example is a story from Maine concerning a particular prostitute who clandestinely videotaped her clients – perhaps to sell the videos to pornographers or perhaps for blackmail purposes – and has now been arrested. Police plan to release the names of the clients she has serviced over the years, and publish them online. I very strongly suspect this is a form of legal blackmail; if you say you are going to go public with something without offering a quid pro quo and someone offers you money not to do so, it is not a crime. The police said they'd release a few names a day, and this will ratchet the pressure up enough to get some wealthy clients to cough up some cash.

In the meanwhile, the feminists are happily supporting "doxxing" the johns, and have been trying to push similar measures through elsewhere.

While I'd say that for a single man who hires a hooker it's entirely between him and his God (if he is religious), it's understandable why a married man might be worried, but actually his wife is as likely to be ashamed about it. His children perhaps even more. It's a pretty cruel step to take for a victimless crime (in this case the prostitute was a 29-year-old woman with her own "fitness" business). However, it's getting to the point where I say "bring it on." Morally speaking, hiring a hooker is a lot less objectionable than a lot of non-criminal activities, such as sleeping with a married woman. How is it that a man can be arrested and shamed for paying a professional woman for sex, but if he sleeps with another man's wife it is his legal right to do so? I, for one, would be far more ashamed to be caught and exposed as a home wrecker than as a john. In fact, although I've never hired a hooker, I am starting to see it as possibly a more honest and less socially irresponsible way to get it out of one's system than the wanton fornication too many of us engage in prior to marriage. Not paying for sex in any meaningful way may swell your ego, but does it really make you a better person? And is the young woman who gives it up for free in a gamble that it will pay off with future support really much different from the hooker who takes payment in advance? Actually, the hooker seems rather more responsible and honest than the slut in this scenario.

So, if I were on the list and about to be exposed, I'd simply make no apologies, and repeat something like the above. I think these guys might say something like this:

"I'm not especially 'proud' of myself for hiring a hooker, but not only did I pay her for her services, I did not deceive her nor did she deceive me, unlike so many hypocrites who would denounce me. So go on about your lives, cheating on each other, stealing affection, making empty promises and such, but know that I am not ashamed to be condemned by the likes of you."

If it were me, I'd probably add something along the lines of "prostitution is legal in all but a handful of Western countries, and it is only here that people are such liars and hypocrites about something that has always been a part of human society."

Aside from the moral implications of our laws, there are practical reasons for people to stop cowering in fear about these exposures. First, finding people's dirty secrets has never been easier. Combine that with the fact that slander and perjury goes unpunished today, and so many of us could easily be compromised that there's not much point in worrying about it. It's getting to the point where the moral risk lies increasingly on the exposer rather than the exposee. For example, one can look up divorce records and use the slander therein to take people down, but is that an appropriate thing to do?

Personally, I've chosen to be open about it, because I know that hiding is the worst way to deal with slander and false accusations. At first I used a pseudonym for this site, but that was for purely legal reasons, and fortunately it turned out that as long as I don't drag the parties in my own cases into the public eye I have every right to voice my opinion without fear of being penalized. More men should do the same, but I doubt they will do so of their own accord. This is why this doxxing could eventually turn out to be a good thing. Our enemies will force the issue in an attempt to double down on shame and control, and before you know it we'll all be on a list, just like in East Germany before the collapse of the Berlin Wall.

How did that Bolshevik thing turn out, anyway?

The Socialization of the Costs of Sex

W.F. Price · 19 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of the beefs the traditional left has had with US economic policy – one I happen to have as well – is the socialization of business costs (or losses) while profit remains private. Because I did some manual labor as a teen and young man, I remember feeling pretty angry about the fact that immigrant farm workers had their health care and housing subsidized by the state while I had no such benefit. This was extended to a ridiculous degree in subsequent years, with illegals getting all of the benefits of residence and state services while their employers continued to pay them low wages. As I saw it, there was a partnership between the state and private interests that served to drive wages down for natives. Unfortunately, the typical white leftist at the time was a couple generations removed from blue collar work, and tended to have a sort of class antagonism toward working-class whites (e.g. you must be a "loser" if you work with your hands), framing everything in terms of multicultural universalism, by which they justified screwing less advantaged Americans in favor of hiring cheaper foreigners.

There are plenty of other examples, and many of us are paying dearly for this in our current recession, which was created essentially by socializing business costs and thereby creating an enormously inflated bubble. It's infuriating when you think about it, and makes me pretty pessimistic about both candidates, who both, as far as I can tell, are in league with the thieves and crooks who caused all this trouble.

However, it seems that this is a problem that goes beyond the formal business world, and has pervaded society in general to the extent that many – perhaps most – people think the government (i.e. taxpayers) should bear the costs of their life choices.

The example most in the news today is the demands for subsidized abortion and birth control that have become a feature of the presidential campaign. You'd think that our country's women's top priority is getting the government to subsidize their sexual choices, whatever they may be.

Following what I was getting at yesterday, sex has always incurred some expense. Like it or not, men pay for sex (or its results) in one way or another. Traditionally, you'd pay by getting married and taking the woman on as your responsibility, or you'd pay a fee for a one-off (prostitution). If you took it without paying for it, as in adultery, rape or fornication, it was a crime, or something like that. If we were honest with ourselves, we'd have to admit that it still is a quasi crime; as the old system has been replaced with something significantly more confusing, sex crime laws have become far broader in scope and can be applied to any number of situations (such as prostitution) that used to be considered beyond the purview of the law.

Additionally, despite false promises of free sex from the 60s and 70s, when feminists used to get support from men by promising we'd all be getting laid for free when we had "equality," it turned out that sex still had a lot of associated costs. Pregnancy, of course, is one of the biggest. At first, we socialized that, but then welfare reform threw the costs entirely onto fathers (not mothers, mind you). Combined with welfare reform, we had VAWA, which significantly increased the costs of marriage and cohabitation by legally handicapping men in relationships with women. So great strides have been made in restoring a heavy cost to sex, but this hasn't been enough, because women have grown accustomed to sexual license with whomsoever they please, and the men they generally like either a) don't have the money, or b) are desirable enough to not have to pay.

Although the latter is a bit counterintuitive (wouldn't women desire men who pay for them?), it's a function of female sexual psychology. Women generally use sex to ensnare the man they want (and they typically have high expectations), and then they begin to draw resources from him. It works in simple societies where people hold each other to account, but in more cosmopolitan settings it breaks down for a couple reasons. First, there are more than enough women to go around, so it's easy to drop one and pick up another, and secondly there are other means for women to gain resources, such as jobs and welfare, and as long as those resources exist men who have no trouble procuring sex see no reason to provide for women, even if they have the means. And who can blame them? Although it's a social catastrophe, it's a perfectly reasonable attitude from a personal perspective, because, after all, the individual man didn't create this mess in the first place.

Here's a scenario:

A handsome young investment banker making six figures can go out to a bar and take his pick. Let's call him Mark. Mark picks up a young woman named Amanda, she goes home with him, they have sex, and he enters her number into his phone, leaving her only a promise to call again. Perhaps he intends to do so, and perhaps not. Whatever the case, he feels no guilt or responsibility, because the woman, who happens to be in law school, also has a job at a nonprofit, and makes more hourly than the average young man in their city, so he doesn't need to provide her with anything. Additionally, if there's an "accident" (but in all likelihood there won't be, because Mark is careful about these things) there's a Planned Parenthood down the street. Not only does it provide her with birth control, but it will treat STDs and abort unwanted children resulting from her nightly excursions.

Sounds fine, so what's the problem?

The problem is that this young woman, despite being a student and having a job, is essentially on the dole. Her nonprofit is funded in large part by state and federal grants, as is her tuition. Her sexual care at Planned Parenthood is also funded largely by taxpayers. Her life, including her sex life, is paid for by the average working Joe, but she isn't sleeping with Joe — oh no: she's sleeping with Mark, a guy who easily could afford to feed, clothe and insure her, but who doesn't have to because of Joe. Although it isn't really his fault, Mark is a freeloader.

Joe, for his part, makes do with monthly trysts with a mid-level prostitute, which he can barely afford after taxes and child support. Joe, who is an HVAC repairman, is paying for all the Amandas in his state, his ex-wife Lisa, and his hooker, who is named Elena.

Interestingly enough, Joe and Amanda have met. Joe was called in to fix the AC in her nonprofit's office on a sweltering summer day. Because the AC was broken and the atmosphere was stifling, Amanda had unbuttoned the top part of her blouse, and poor Joe couldn't help but look at her breasts. Amanda was furious, and called his supervisor, who apologized profusely, and when Joe got back from the job he caught hell. Fortunately, he wasn't fired, but it sure was humiliating. Not as bad as having to deal with his ex-wife's lawyer, but close…

I suppose we could say "life's unfair," and that would be entirely true. But should we make it that unfair? Should we set things up so that Joe has to support Amanda as much as Mark?

According to our nation's single women, the answer is a resounding "YES!" Married women, however, have a significantly different take on it, for obvious reasons.

I'm not sure single women are consciously aware of how selfish they are being. I think they fully intend to find some man to support them, and think the only way they can do that is to have unfettered sex with all the Marks of the world they can get their hands on in the hopes that one of them will some day give in and marry her. The problem is that it's a trend that reinforces itself; the more Amandas we have giving it away for free the less likely any given Mark will be to actually support any of them. The competition will escalate, desirable men will become even more reluctant to give women any financial support, and the screeching for more entitlements for single women will grow louder and louder.

It is exactly this trend that has led to the bizarre, unprecedented fixation on women's sexual entitlements in our current election cycle. When you socialize the costs of a private activity – and sex is about as private as it gets – you create an unnatural imbalance that rewards the few at the expense of the many. You also run the risk of inflating costs to unsustainable levels, and I think that's something young women ought to think hard about. But they won't.

An Environmental Upside to Feminism?

Featured Guest · 20 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Stephen Gee

I've traveled a fair bit during my lifetime. In recent times I've either visited or lived and worked in China, Australia, New Zealand, Korea, Thailand, Laos, UK, France and Germany. You could say I regularly 'visit' many places too – principally but not exclusively the UK, New Zealand, Australia, USA and Canada seeing as I'm an addicted netizen.

There are disturbing consistencies I've noticed in all these places which I've joined as 'idea dots in my head'. Those dots are giving me an image I can't really ignore and don't like much.

Whether it be in Melbourne, Bangkok, Leeds, Ostend, Shanghai, Auckland, Los Angeles, Seoul or Berlin, it's the same picture I observe, to a lesser or greater extent, but always the same picture.

Gridlock, pollution, waste, land, air, soil and waterways spoilt by……. US.

Try, if it's legal your way getting out of your car at a random spot and proceed to walk along the side of any major highway connecting cities anywhere for oh, say 100 meters. I've done this a few times on different continents but always with the same results – I've needed a plastic bag to collect the casually discarded cigarette packets, drink cans, bits of vehicles, glass bottles, and yes – plastic bags too.

Try finding rivers anywhere that humans exist in significant numbers that aren't to some degree polluted.

Try finding a major natural, as in not man made, forest that isn't degraded and shrinking.

Try breathing in downtown Shanghai, Paris or Auckland.

Try swimming in Bangkok's Chao Phraya River. Try finding green space anywhere in inner Shanghai or Seoul.

Try finding beaches near any urban center that aren't to some degree strewn with washed up garbage – most usually plastic.

Try moving between any two major cities anywhere on the planet by road transport during busy times without being in a traffic jam.

From what I can see unless humans radically alter their behavior you won't be able to do any of these things, not now and not in your lifetimes. The way things are headed possibly your children and grandchildren won't be able to do those things in their lifetimes either.

Demographers tell us there are now 6 Billion humans inhabiting planet earth. They tell us that given current trends 3 important and converging demographic forces are on the near horizon.

First global population is increasing – some demographers reckon we'll be at anywhere between 7.5 and 10.5 billion by 2050.

Secondly, more and more people are living in energy hungry cities which are relatively alienated from nature compared to rural and wilderness areas.

Lastly Billions of people worldwide aspire to the materialist levels of existence experienced by western / first world countries.

Adding these three factors together I can get the sinking feeling that during my lifetime I'm only going to see more of the somewhat 'Silent Spring' like scenes I've described above.

Then enter feminism (aided and abetted by misguided chivalry) and it's unleashing of the materialist, hypergamous modern female.

Much has been spoken here and at A Voice for Men about the prevalence of sexist greed inherent in feminism, and of the forces of hypergamy in females being an instinct which left unchecked by culture leads women to use men as resource providing disposable appliances. Also much has been written at this site of men's part in our current malaise – men who in cowtowing to their instincts to mate giving women the pussy pass and overindulging women generally with misandric laws and social conventions.

So I'll try not to bore my audience by belaboring my point about such matters too much.

It's simply this – given the growing international cultural meme that for men relationships with modern women come with terrible risks attached, and with the inevitability relatively soon of more forms of male birth control I'm beginning to have a line of thought that feminists unwittingly and inadvertently are doing us all a favor.

Namely that in the not too distant future more and more enlightened men, put off by modern women's voracious appetite and empowered with their own new forms of birth control will become a powerful force to depopulate the planet to more environmentally sustainable and unpolluted levels.

Perhaps then I'll come to owe feminists another 'thank you'.

After all they've already inspired me to go my own way and become a human being rather than women's appliance as I formerly was.

So perhaps I'll someday also be thanking them for inspiring millions upon millions of men to protect themselves against women's baser instincts and become the Green wing of Men's Rights Activism.

It's an intriguing thought isn't it?

Two Reasons To Vote This November

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 21 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

For anyone who cares about mens rights, voting can be problematic. For a particular office the choices are often a feminist vs. a conservative female supremacist who is anti-feminist in name only. As a result it is understandable that many MRAs would decide that voting is pointless. However, for MRAs in the U.S. should vote this November for two reasons.

The first reason is that judges at the state level are often elected unlike federal judges who are appointed. As was said by Dean Esmay at A Voice For Men, anti-family courts operate at the state level, and the courts that falsely imprison men for rape, abuse, or other crimes at state courts. This means it is possible (depending on the state) to vote misandrist judges out of office. Even if judges in a particular state aren't elected, your vote for state offices can have a greater impact than your vote at the federal level. In addition, in many states district attorneys and prosecutors are elected as well. This provides the opportunity for MRAs to vote out misandrist prosecutors. This will need to be a strategy used across multiple election cycles to make it work so the best thing is to get started in November's election. (A good place to start is with the information that Dean Esmay provided at A Voice For Men.)

The second reason to vote this November is to put a stop to the "war on women" myth. As liberal politicians have become more dependent on the women's vote, their pandering to women has reached a fever pitch with the myth of the "war on women". The only way to put a stop to this level of pandering to women is by voting against any and all politicians who say there is a "war on women". Vote for a conservative politician or a third party politician. If there are no candidates for a particular office other than a politician invoking the mythical "war on women", then write in "the war on women is a myth". It doesn't matter which one you pick, as long as you register a vote that is not for a politician who says there is a "war on women". This will also need to be a strategy used across multiple election cycles so again it is best to start by voting this November.

If MRAs vote this November for these two reasons (and continue to vote with the same goals over the next several elections), then this strategy can have a real impact to roll back feminism and help men who would otherwise be in the cross hairs of feminist policies.

Seattle Asian DV Advocates Defend International Child Abduction

W.F. Price · 22 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I was just watching the local government channel, and caught some public remarks before the Seattle City Council. A young Asian woman mentioned she was working for a women's organization called API Chaya, so I thought I ought to see what she was up to.

After introducing herself and her organization, the woman started to ask for taxpayer money for her organization, specifically for a Japanese-speaking "DV advocate" because, she said, something unfortunate had come to pass. This terrible event turned out to be very good news for a number of local fathers whose children have been stolen from them: Japan has finally said it will sign onto the Hague Convention for International Child Abduction.

For years, Japan has held out and refused to sign, because it has one of the worst policies in the world regarding parental custody which recognizes absolutely no right to visitation by the non-custodial parent. When Japanese parents divorce, the child becomes entirely the mother's property (unless the mother is not Japanese — then she is out of luck), and the father may not retain any bond with the child whatsoever if she opposes it.

This led to a number of Japanese women taking the children they had with American men to Japan, never to be seen again. Because Seattle has a significant Japanese population, some local men have been victims of these abductions. Every now and then, one is in the news trying to tell the world about this travesty, and it seems the pressure has finally borne fruit.

However, according to our local DV advocate scumbags, not giving Japanese women a free pass to kidnap children allows men to "control" and "abuse" them here. So, of course, they need money to protect the poor Japanese women, who are terribly oppressed now that they have to follow the law like everyone else. This support for what amounts to state-supported international piracy is shocking, yet they are given a sympathetic ear by local politicians. Every American father in an international marriage should be outraged by API Chaya's advocacy for international abduction. Actually, every father in the entire world should take it seriously.

I think one of the reasons these feminists get away with what they do is that they are so shameless in their lies and so unapologetically selfish that people refuse to believe that anyone would be so wicked as to be that openly deceptive. Therefore, people actually buy their fabrications, because how could this innocent looking, sweet little girl ever say anything but the truth, or ever do anything but good? It's the big lie technique with an innocent, attractive female face, and it is chillingly effective.

Nevertheless, we're going to have to deal with it somehow, because this isn't going to end anytime soon. I recommend presenting the authorities with the facts, remaining dispassionate while doing so, and urging people not to let their own good nature be used in the furtherance of doing wrong. I would ask the Seattle City Council, for example, if they intend to give money to an organization that supports and defends international crime.

Temporary Restraining Orders – Giving Women Exactly What they Want... and Women Complaining it isn't Enough

Featured Guest · 23 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Lyn87

Jane Velez-Mitchell did a segment on CNN with regard to two recent shootings at spas. Both involved men who had Temporary Restraining Orders (TROs) imposed on them by the courts.

She interviewed Diane Rosenfeld, "who is an attorney, and a lecturer at Harvard Law School, and she is one the nation's top experts in restraining orders."

http://www.cnn.com/video/#/video/bestoftv/2012/10/22/exp-jvm-wisconsin-shooter.hln

Ms Rosenfeld immediately began to prove that "attorney" and "lecturer at Harvard Law School" does not equate to "expert" on anything, especially the impact of TROs. Ms Velez-Mitchell ridiculously claimed to have covered "millions" of such cases, and never mentioned the inconvenient truth that most perpetrators of domestic violence are women, and BY FAR most lethal violence against children is perpetrated by mothers and/or their new "bad boy" boyfriends. Rather than this alleged "expert" correcting her with… you know… facts, she led off with an even more ridiculous statement of her own, "My thoughts [as] an expert's are that domestic violence homicide is so predictable as to be preventable."

She claimed that she could have predicted the outcome of these individual cases in advance based on the fact that the women made allegations and the men had access to weapons. REALLY? Since anyone can get a weapon, this "expert" obviously thinks that every case in which a woman makes an allegation against a man will end in male-on-female homicide. This is what passes for expertise at Harvard Law?

The solution propounded by this "expert?" Glad you asked. Basically it involves two simple steps:

1) Always believe the woman.
2) Always punish the man.

Sound familiar? It should.

Ms Velez-Mitchell set her up with a follow-on question about domestic homicide that only involves men killing women, explicitly stating that they do so because of "obsession." Needless to say, when the sexes are reversed we hear very little about "obsession" and a lot about "provocation."

Again, rather than being the expert CNN supposedly hired her to be and correcting Ms Velez-Mitchell's mischaracterization, Ms Rosenfeld did a neat little two-step on her unsuspecting viewers. She began with this statement, "The women said they were threatened with murder." (So far, so good: women say things all the time – some of them are true.) But then she completes the loop of deception a few seconds later with this, "The threat to kill a woman in an abusive situation is the top threat that screens you in as a very lethal case."

As if a woman saying "I feel threatened" is the same as her being in mortal danger in actuality.

It is not — and this is one of the 800-pound gorillas in the courtroom. Women claim to be in danger all the time when they are not, and courts by the thousand hand out TROs like candy at Halloween. No adversarial process. No chance to tell his side. No meaningful appeal — only much later; AFTER he complies (and after he loses custody of his children).

A TRO is a serious matter. A VERY serious matter. When men with guns tell you that you may not live your life as you wish, that you must leave your own house, that you may not see your own children, and that you must surrender your firearms, it should only be done as an absolute last resort. And it should require a LOT more evidence than a crying woman making an uncontested allegation.

Here it is: women routinely get TROs as a strategic move in a break-up, or just to "teach him a lesson" when she doesn't get her way. And why not? Courts will "err on the side of caution" even when it means taking extreme action with no evidence against a man… against a defendant who is often not even aware that he is on trial, much less permitted to mount a defense. And let us not mince words here: when a judge (not even a jury) is considering whether to drastically restrict your freedoms you are a defendant in a criminal trial – using different legal terms does not change the essence of the proceeding nor your role in it.

Rather than being impartial finders of fact under law, these courts are rubber stamps for the demands of women at the expense of men. They unilaterally and suddenly take away men's freedom, humiliate them, and disrupt their lives based on nothing more than the unsupported accusations of hysterical and/or manipulative women. And it's not a bug: it's a feature. Make no mistake — that is what feminists – including this "journalist" and this "expert" – want.

Far too often courts are complicit in what is really a power play within a relationship. The party that is typically physically weaker gets to use the muscle of the state to force hubby to do her bidding. Since TROs are granted without cross-examination or any weighing of the facts, we have effectively set up a system where one group of people may make demands while another group is legally obligated to obey without question. And those demands can be about anything – all she has to do if he doesn't take out the garbage is tell a judge that, "He frightens me." After a few weeks of living in his car he'll figure out that "taking out the garbage" is now his legally-enforceable duty. If this is functionally different from chattel slavery, I fail to see how.

There really are a small minority of cases where a man unilaterally abuses a woman: a VERY small minority of cases. Our legal system is now spring-loaded to assume that every crying woman is the victim in such a scenario. However, women have proven that, given the option to "go nuclear," many will abuse it. They need to lose that power. Courts need to stop passing out TROs like hall passes in grade school and force complainants to show significant evidence, subject to cross-examination, before taking the extreme step of imposing prior restraint on a man who has not been convicted of anything.

If they did that the number of TROs would drop to a tiny fraction of what they issue now, and police could concentrate on real threats. The result would probably be fewer domestic homicides. Of course feminists will not support THAT – what's a few corpses compared to the legal ability to force men to do the bidding of women, especially since they can use those corpses to further their narrative?

Young Women Who Identify as LGBT Approaching Ten Percent

W.F. Price · 23 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

According to a Gallup poll of 120,000 Americans, 3.4% of all Americans identify as homosexual, bisexual or transsexual. The poll has a lot of interesting figures, including some that most of us probably wouldn't expect. For example, at 3.2%, white Americans are least likely to identify as LGBT, while blacks lead in that category, with 4.6% calling themselves bi, gay or trans. Another unexpected fact is that education level and income are both negatively correlated with LGBT identification.

Overall, 3.6% of women identify as LGBT, whereas only 3.3% of men do. The numbers rise significantly amongst the young, suggesting that either homosexuality is on the rise due to some environmental factor, or that it can in fact be taught to young people. However, although young men are more likely to report being LGBT than men over 30, the number for women rises so dramatically amongst the young that it raises some questions about what's going on.

In fact, only 88% of young women state that they are not LGBT, with an eyebrow raising 8.3% confirming that they are, in fact, lesbians, bisexuals or transsexual.

Although I suspect that bisexuality is probably more common amongst women than men, who tend to be either gay or straight with fewer in between, strict lesbianism is less common than strict male homosexuality, so I would have assumed the overall LGBT numbers evened out. But apparently not.

So, does anyone have any theories as to why LGBT identification has soared amongst young women?

Feminism's Future: The Underclass

W.F. Price · 25 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I was at a little get together at an old friend's new house the other day, and enjoyed a nice evening with some other Seattlites, most of whom I've known for a while. The group was generally professional, well-compensated, urban, left-coast GenXers — exactly what people think of when they think of the liberal elite. I was probably the only one there who doesn't usually support the Democratic party, despite (or perhaps because of) the fact that my blue-collar father and grandfather voted the straight blue ticket their entire lives. However, the one difference that struck me as rather profound was that out of nine of us, I was the only one with kids, and the youngest was 35…

However, I was also in the minority in being unmarried (at this point at least), so it wasn't that everyone was single. No, they had all – deliberately or not – avoided having kids. Only one of the couples did not want kids; the others had all put it off.

And I have to admit that they did so for perfectly rational reasons. If I hadn't taken a leap of faith and married in my 20s, and had instead held out until now, I might be happily making mortgage payments instead of cutting child support checks. My life would probably be immeasurably easier. Even if I had divorced, it would have been a breeze without kids. Just another one of those rear-view mirror affairs you forget about pretty quickly.

Today, if you're a responsible young adult in an urban setting, you know about these risks. You also know that time off from work is a career-killer, and that daycare for a baby is both expensive and emotionally difficult. So, if you're a reasonably intelligent, responsible, urban progressive, you tend to put off kids.

Statistically speaking, these were not outliers; after San Francisco, Seattle's population has the lowest proportion of children of any big city. Even Portland, which is downscale compared to Seattle, has very few children. And if you were to take a similar population sample from other big cities such as Chicago and Boston – adjusting for income – you'd probably find similarly low fertility (Seattle and San Francisco are relatively well-to-do with a small underclass compared to most cities).

The point is that these are the people who generally support progressive policies, but it's pretty apparent that they aren't the ones who actually need them. These are not the people who have abortions, can't afford birth control, have "oops!" pregnancies or need welfare. They are very, very different from those people, so there's a sense of incongruence in the progressive coalition. Frankly, it simply doesn't make much sense unless you scratch the surface to see what's really going on, which is that the professional progressives don't want to see nearby communities turn into some dreary, cold, rain-soaked version of Brazil's favelas. From their point of view, easy abortions and free birth control = fewer poor single babymommas, ergo fewer thugs running around shooting people and lower social welfare costs. It's a reasonable (although generally unspoken) supposition, but I don't think abortion is all that effective in that regard (although NYC teen abortion stats suggest it may be).

Amongst the educated progressive set, support for putatively feminist policies is somewhat akin to support for gun control; i.e. the idea is to ameliorate social pathology — not to promote license. But are they feminist themselves? No, not really. In terms of lifestyle, these are amongst the most conservative people in the US. Despite supporting gay marriage and abortion, their personal lives are generally as free from sin as an old-school Methodist preacher's. In one of the great American ironies, upscale urban progressives are more Christian in character (if not in spirit) than your typical Evangelical. They are amongst the least likely to divorce, to have children out of wedlock, brawl, cuss, drink — you name it.

The traditional feminist doctrine of single motherhood and "I do what I want" cheekiness is foreign to most progressive females. They lead conscientious lives, they don't have kids out of wedlock, they engage in significantly less lesbian/bisexual activity, they manage their weight better, and they don't divorce much. Back in the 1970s and 80s when the US was a less stratified society with more wealth in the middle and working classes, liberation feminism was a more viable option; today it is more often a one-way ticket to poverty and dependence on the government, and therefore it is increasingly rare in the middle class.

This is not to say, however, that those practicing feminism and living the dream, so to speak, are declining in number, but rather that they are now more often members of the lowest stratum of society: the poor, the deranged, the mentally challenged, the culturally impoverished and the uneducated. In short, the kinds of people who watch six hours of TV a day and can't name their neighboring states (sadly that's a lot of people). To put it in shopping terms, you're more likely to find a practicing feminist in a Walmart than a Nordstrom.

So, rather than a new era of female liberation as envisioned by wannabe prophetesses like Shulamith Firestone, what we are seeing is the feminist lifestyle becoming a characteristic of the burgeoning American underclass, even as the bourgeois urban elites adopt what might be termed a neo-Victorian lifestyle. Although this will eventually take its toll on the feminist movement itself, and will probably eventually kill it as a fashionable ideology, having such an enormous population of hapless single mothers and unattached men does not bode well for our nation, and cleaning up the damage will require a Herculean effort.

Lena Dunham Confirms Deleted CNN Sexual Voting Article

W.F. Price · 26 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

CNN deleted a "sexist" article that tied women's political preferences to their hormonal shifts. Evidently, when ovulating, single women prefer more liberal candidates and policies:

> The researchers found that during the fertile time of the month, when levels of the hormone estrogen are high, single women appeared more likely to vote for Obama and committed women appeared more likely to vote for Romney, by a margin of at least 20%, Durante said. This seems to be the driver behind the researchers' overall observation that single women were inclined toward Obama and committed women leaned toward Romney.
> Here's how Durante explains this: When women are ovulating, they "feel sexier," and therefore lean more toward liberal attitudes on abortion and marriage equality. Married women have the same hormones firing, but tend to take the opposite viewpoint on these issues, she says.

The reporter then dragged out some "experts" who had no background in either biology or psychology to discredit the finding:

> "There is absolutely no reason to expect that women's hormones affect how they vote any more than there is a reason to suggest that variations in testosterone levels are responsible for variations in the debate performances of Obama and Romney," said Susan Carroll, professor of political science and women's and gender studies at Rutgers University, in an e-mail.

Yeah, a gender studies professor is obviously qualified to give her opinion on a biological study…

Regardless, the creator of the "Girls" TV show, a homely, tattooed New Yorker named Lena Dunham, made a pro-Obama ad likening voting to having sex. She suggests that when it's your "first time," it should definitely be the right guy — the kind of guy who supports free birth control, liberal policies, etc.

Well, I don't know whether Ms. Dunham was in heat when she filmed the ad, but it definitely lends some credence to the idea that sexual impulses have a strong effect on female voting behavior.

What Will It Take to Achieve Gender Equality?

Despite decades of feminist advances there still are countless inequities against women that remain to be addressed. Most notably the number of women in corporate leadership is disproportionately low. So is the number of female political leaders. And women still earn less in the workplace though admittedly due to factors such as fewer years of experience at the same job as men that are related to pregnancy and child rearing which society shouldn't punish women for. Women also still have far fewer opportunities in professional sports, and the majority of jobs where there is some requirement for physical strength, or where there is an element of isolation or danger are still for the most part monopolized by men.

As far as domestic issues go women sometimes still have to endure the terror of sharing custody of their children with men whom they've accused of having been physically or sexually abusive. Then when they come forward to report that abuse even today women sometimes aren't believed without question . And despite being responsible for the bulk of child care women are still sometimes forced by divorce judges to consider the view of the father in decisions regarding the children's upbringing or education; infantilizing them as if they as mothers don't know what's good for their own children.

Finally in society as a whole women feel less safe than men and then have to contend with increased scrutiny regarding the circumstances they placed themselves in, the way they dressed, the way they acted, or whether they were high or intoxicated whenever they're victim of a crime. It's unfair, they feel, since in their opinion men aren't judged equally harshly in the same situations.

How should feminism respond? If given infinite money and manpower to address each and all of these issues, logically the first thing to do would be to start with setting a quota that 50% of all appointed and elected corporate and political leadership positions go to women. With infinite funds we could hire a woman to train into each slot even if there weren't currently any qualified female candidates. We might even hire a number of female trainees to increase the likelihood at least one will be found suitable after training.

Once the positions were filled, for those women who would otherwise subsequently be compelled to take time away for child rearing, we could pay for fertility treatments and hire surrogates so those women wanting children could avoid the career interruption of pregnancy if they so desire. For the others who chose to give birth themselves we could create offices with adjoining nanny suites so the children would always be near enough to allow it if the women should desire to breastfeed. On top of that we could institute job-sharing so that two women could both divide demanding roles like that of CEO without either having to work outlandish hours. Job sharing would also allow them to spread any necessary travel between them so neither would be forced to be away from home too long or too often. All this is within the realm of possibility even today. If companies can pay a few million for a private jet they can certainly pay for some or all of these lesser expenses.

But once we reached workplace equity how would we suppress men from working longer, and taking on more dangerous and risky endeavors with greater chance of reward as they have been historically more willing to do whenever they thought it would give them a competitive edge? We could make divorce so likely and disenfranchise husbands and fathers so thoroughly afterwards that no man would ever feel safe in putting in that kind of effort for the only reason that men ever have … which is to attract a mate and support a family. But continuing to cause young men to opt out like that would result in our economies eventually grinding to a halt, not to mention at some point generating dangerous societal instability. And even then how could we stop women from wanting to enjoy more time with their children or placing a higher priority on making a comfortable home for their families? Even once equity was reached those quotas would have to remain in place forever to thwart those with more ability or those wanting to invest more work so they don't get ahead, and to bolster those wanting to achieve a better work life balance so they don't fall behind. At some point the quotas become more unjust than the inequity they were meant to address.

And what of jobs requiring physical strength or greater tolerance for isolation or danger? How would we, across the board, forbid companies, sport teams, and other organisations from engaging in unrestricted competition for the human resources that make them most competitive? Would soccer players have to give each other a 2 meter berth to prevent fouls once women are forced into the English premier league? Will the NFL have to be slowed down and the aggression taken out for it to make it more woman-friendly once legislation made the NFL co-ed? Granted since we as feminist owners are willing to devote an infinite amount of money to our workplace equity dream we'll likely have no problem paying enough to find women who'll face off against a 300 lb linebacker, if only to take a dive. But far from us having infinite resources to pay her we'll only have the gate receipts brought in by co-ed football. Unless we're allowed to raise our revenue with half time lap dances we'll just have to pray our season won't be cut short by a league suspension because we can't afford to fill our quota of women.

On the domestic front where women sometimes still have to share custody of their children with men who they've accused of having been physically or sexually abusive, to prevent any possibility of that horror we could just take the woman's word in all cases. But even if only a few mothers made false accusations for ill purposes, going so far as to completely eliminate men's right to defend themselves with real evidence would end up victimizing the daughters denied access to those innocent fathers. On eliminating the opportunity for the abusive influence of mothers who would make such false accusations to be tempered by the calming influence the fathers would have had in their lives, the girls would suffer. Furthermore all the women in the man's extended family who would be denied any involvement in the children's lives would also suffer from the loss of contact. A far greater number of women would suffer far more injustice than whatever injustice the mother as an individual would be freed from.

And finally, completely preventing women from ever becoming a target for crime regardless of what choices they make would take the same effort as making sure a tiny wisp of a man dressed in a designer suit and wearing a huge diamond studded platinum Rolex never got robbed whenever he decided to walk drunk as a fish through deserted ghetto alleyways late at night with earphones pumping ABBA way too loud to hear the footsteps behind him. Namely we would have to completely eliminate all crime. To avoid crimes of opportunity we would have to have complete security everywhere at all times so women could even walk carelessly through alleyways full of homeless crackheads in the middle of night, while dressed in negligees. To avoid premeditated incidents we would have to make sure potential perpetrators were jailed before a crime was committed if there was any potential motivation such as disagreements over money, or an insult or slight.

If we as societies are infinitely prosperous we could certainly afford to make at least some progress towards accomplishing this utopia. But infinite prosperity is exactly what we would need. Because any type of business or commerce, and life as whole for that matter, would grind to an absolute halt. From the sheer ridiculousness of this thought experiment it should be clear by now that the closer we got to achieving this feminist utopia the more we would recognize that for any demographic other than women we would instead have achieved an Orwellian hell. In order to completely free women from responsibility for any consequences of their decisions, we would have to completely repress everyone else. The great injustice of impairing every man's ability to make a living because of an 8:00 pm curfew, the great injustice of causing every man to fear even taking out the garbage because all men who walk through any alley must register themselves as a potential sex offenders or robbers, and the great injustice of imprisoning men if they can't produce a signed consent agreement after any time there's a misunderstanding about whether sexual consent was given, would all rapidly make asking women to be a little more aware and responsible for their own safety seem a tiny injustice in comparison.

With debt growing to unsustainable levels in all the advanced western democracies rich enough to even contemplate such feminist utopias, realistically achievable and cost effective social solutions may instead be all we can afford.

It may be time to be practical and consider that while seeking equity is an admirable goal, inequity does not necessarily mean inequality. Completely aside from the argument of whether it's justified to address historical inequity by applying reverse inequality, we have to be cautious and judicious about which inequities we apply our efforts to, regardless of whether we try to address inequities or explain them away.

Caution is important because views from any traditionally privileged demographic (in this case men) justifying historical inequity as resulting from differences in natural abilities or predispositions, are overwhelmingly only theories. They can't often be proven except in a highly contrived manner without controlling for some variables that might be unknown or unknowable at the time. On the other hand views from the traditionally underprivileged demographic (here women) explaining away historical inequity in terms of unfair barriers or lack of opportunity are generally also only theories relying on untested assumptions. But quashing these theories is quashing hope where the possibility of an better outcome can't be ruled out. Social science is unfortunately not only an inexact science but also a laggard. Explanations WHY SOMETHING IS IMPOSSIBLE for someone or other are too often rendered moot by the person who goes out and JUST DOES IT anyways. And it only explains WHY the impossible could have happened long after some intrepid soul with a crazy Cinderella story has ventured into the unknown and demonstrated HOW its done.

But despite the uncertainty we can make progress towards equity by becoming more honest about what we DO know from empirical evidence and at the same time becoming more honest and aware about the holes in our knowledge around what we DON'T know. We're beginning to learn for example that some if not all the inequity in men's and women's salaries comes from the fact that if given the choice women tend to prefer less risky, less dangerous, less isolated jobs in favor of jobs that offer a better work life balance. Risking all to race balls to the wall after the brass ring is less enticing to many women more women than hugging their children every night. At the same time we can't say this is a permanent limitation. Perhaps it's possible to cost effectively change the corporate world so these considerations no longer factor in and women don't have to choose.

In either case the lack of detached objectivity in the feminism still so rampant even today makes the issues so sensitive that candid discussions are a great challenge. However in recent articles like "Why Women Still Can't Have it All" by Anne Marie Slaughter we see working women watching themselves becoming less happy and more frazzled as they try to avoid either being held fully responsible financially for their families like men or held fully responsible for the care of their families like traditional homemakers. We men only look on and sigh, just as we always have when women ask us about problems they don't want solved. We know better than to suggest the obvious which is that for all but the exceptional woman, in trying to achieve both goals one will conflict with the other and she'll end up accomplishing neither. We've watched women skirt around the issue for so long. Now the cognitive dissonance is finally shedding light on the lack of straight honest talk, and without even a word from us in the manosphere, women for their own survival are disarming the most harmful elements of feminism that our resource constrained world soon may no longer be in the position to even pretend to be able to afford to indulge her with.

Women Lawyers Dominate Low-Status Positions

W.F. Price · 26 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The National Association of Women Lawyers (NAWL) released results from a survey that found that 70% of low-level staff lawyers at America's largest law firms are female, but only 15% of equity partners:

> The typical AmLaw 200 firm is now a two-tier partnership with many different categories of lawyer in a leveraged structure: 151 equity partners (barely 15% women), 91 non-equity partners (26% women), 54 counsel (35% women), 188 associates (46% women), and 11 staff attorneys (70% women). As the preceding numbers clearly show, women constitute a smaller percentage of each category as you move up the career ladder. In other words, over the course of time women exit law firms disproportionately more than their male peers. Moreover, it is troubling to note that the percentages of women equity partners and women associates in the typical firm have declined slightly during the past two years.

NAWL goes on to explain why some of these disparities exist, and points to the fact that male lawyers are significantly older than female and therefore at a more advanced place in their career, and evidence that a lot of female attorneys prefer the flexibility and lower pressure of being a staff attorney rather than an associate.

However, according to NAWL, this is a major problem:

> On the other hand, many, many women choose to be on a partner track and aim for partnership. Our ideal would be that, as more women entered big-firm legal practice, the standards and expectations would evolve to be more accepting of all women's lives and goals – not to slot more women at the lowest, non-partner track position. That approach sends an unfortunate message: "Yes, Ms. JD, you can work in BigLaw, but the right to advance, along with profits, professional status and the most interesting projects, are restricted to those who accept the 24/7 on-demand mentality in every year of their practice, and the resultant stresses and warping of their lives."
> Our goal is to encourage firms to have systems of advancement that build in flexibility and accommodate the needs of women (and men) lawyers at various phases of their careers. After all, when more than one-third of the legal profession is female, it cannot be beneficial to firms to lose so much legal talent after a relatively short span of years. Our disappointment is that so many firms have not yet figured out how to develop policies and practices to retain women lawyers without simply relegating them to a bottom-tier role.

So, essentially, what they want is for law firms to allow women to put in the same amount of effort as a staff attorney, but to be paid more and given a higher position. In other words, less work for more pay (for females). And yet they still don't know why firms – which are businesses in competition with other businesses – can't figure out how to do this. Well, the firms could do it, but they'd lose money. It's kind of hard to get around that. Unless, of course, you think money just kind of grows like grass.

A lot of women do indeed have this attitude toward money, but you'd think that of all people lawyers could figure it out. They supposedly have strong analytical skills, a good grasp of logic, and high intelligence.

But here you have NAWL saying that legal firms should "evolve" to accept "all women's lives and goals…" Gee, I wish I could get someone to buy that line from me. I mean, if you don't care about my goals, it's because, like, you just need to "evolve," man…

“Ramsters” in the News for Guru’s Drunken Tirade

W.F. Price · 27 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There’s been a minor local scandal over a guru based in Yelm, Washington — a pleasant, rustic little prairie town near Mt. Rainier that also serves as the international headquarters of Ramtha channeler JZ Knight. Ms. Knight is an aging New Age mystic who was evidently entered by “Ramtha” in her kitchen via a cardboard pyramid she put atop her head while she was a Tacoma housewife back in 1977. Ramtha, for his part, is a Pleistocene warlord who conquered most of the earth about 35,000 years ago. He is also an enlightened being with much wisdom to impart to humanity.

The scandal arose because Knight, who has been giving quite a bit of money to the Democratic party, was filmed ranting about Mexicans and Catholics while apparently drunk. When the video came to light, some demanded that the Democrats refuse the money. First they hemmed and hawed a bit, but finally gave the money to the ADL and a gay marriage group. The primary targets of Ramtha’s ire appear to be Catholics and Mexicans, probably because he (rightly) perceives them to be the biggest demographic and ideological threat to the old hippie stronghold of California.

Some of my European and East Coast readers may find the circumstances of all this quite bizarre, but this is the West Coast, and we locals have long been familiar with these types, who are alternately sources of entertainment and annoyance.

The video:

That about sums up the scandal, but I found it pretty amusing that Yelm locals refer to Knight’s followers as “Ramsters,” and even more so when it came to light that they worship a giant wheel rotating in a pyramid, and believe that one can change physical reality through wishful thinking. It is as though Knight has literally created a religion out of the rationalization hamster, even giving him a name and supernatural powers.

Here are some quotes from Knight’s former followers:

> Another former student, who asked that she be identified only as “Stephanie,” spent hours every day following the school’s disciplines–focused breathing, meditation, and concentrating on a list of positive thoughts, such as I am fabulously wealthy, I am radiantly healthy, I am 20 years younger, I never age.

What finally prompted one man to get out:

> One day, McCarthy and other masters were working on “manifesting”–creating a physical object out of nothing by focusing on a mental image, like a gold coin, a rose, or a blue feather. “After several days, I’d not created anything solid,” he says.
> Then, across the Great Hall, he heard people shouting. He saw a woman walking through the crowd holding a blue feather over her head. Pandemonium broke out. Over roars of appreciation, the woman took her place next to McCarthy. He leaned over and asked her how she did it.
> “She says she went into the store and bought it. I said, ‘That’s not creating something out of nothing!’ And she said, ‘Yes it is!–I’ve created my own reality.’

Too funny.

Nice Guys and the Perils of Ovulation

Featured Guest · 28 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Normally I don't pay much attention to – or put much stock into – the latest "study" in the pseudosciences, but this one caught my eye. Apparently there's a new psychology study that confirms what most of humanity has suspected all along: nice guys need to watch out.

The study was conducted by Martie Haselton, a professor of psychology and communication studies at UCLA, and UCLA doctoral student Christina Larson. Given the feminized climate at UCLA there is not the slightest chance of anti-female bias, so when these two admitted that women's mating priorities can swing wildly over the course of their ovulation cycle, you know they're on to something.

The gist of it is that women prefer stable men most of the time for their long term relationships, but when they approach the most fertile part of their cycle they become more dissatisfied with those men and prefer more "sexy" men.

That won't surprise anyone here, and it is merely the short-term version of the typical carousel-rider's long-term mating habits: go for "sexy" alpha men when she's young and fertile, and then settle down with a nice beta provider as her fertility dwindles.

It's one thing to watch as many young women go feral – now that we've removed the stability that patriarchy used to provide to family and society we have created two generations of women who would have been considered unmarriageable as recently as 50 years ago.

It's another thing when a young blue-pill guy marries one of these creatures today.

Not to worry, though, say our intrepid "experts." Her preference for "sexy" during her maximum monthly fertility does not translate into wanting to break up her long term relationship. They assure us that, "… "Mr. Stable" need not worry too much as the apparent negative feelings during ovulation don't seem to affect long-term commitment."

See? There's nothing to worry about. She may screw the bass player when she's ovulating, but she'll be back when her hormone levels even out. Isn't that nice?

In other words, if you're a stable provider-type, the woman who is content to consume your resources is happy to be with you for three weeks out of the month. The flip side is that she is most likely to cheat with a "bad boy" precisely when she is most likely to conceive. No problem, though: she still wants you (or at least your resources) for the long haul to help raise the kid.

It just won't be your kid.

The researchers give the obligatory nod to the pseudoscience of evo-psych with this quote, "In the reproductive arena, women probably evolved to desire men who could contribute both quality care and good genes," Haselton said. "The problem is that there is a limited number of potential mates who are high in both. So many women are forced to make trade-offs."

Trade off? Hardly. The destruction of the normal family structure has created the conditions that give today's feral young woman everything she wants: the genetic material of the "sexy" guy and the resources of the stable one.

If even the Psychology Department at UCLA tacitly admits that women have a natural propensity to cuckold nice guys, I cannot fathom why it is still considered acceptable to put any man's name on a birth certificate without DNA confirmation.

Africa the Solution for China's Excess Males?

W.F. Price · 29 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The rise of China is on everyone's mind, but the implications of the ascension of this superpower seem vague at this point. There are a number of questions about what China will do, what path it will take, and whether it will act with increasing aggression in the Pacific and begin to throw its weight around in direct confrontations with the West. Many fear that with an excess of males who cannot find wives, China will grow increasingly warlike and unstable. Although the fundamental premise behind this is typically androphobic, many young Chinese men would surely agree that there is a problem, which is only being compounded by the increasingly feminist behavior of urban Chinese women.

There's plenty of debate about the implications of a rising China and the associated demographic problems, but one thing we do know for certain is that China is making increasingly bold moves into Africa.

China has long had ties to Africa. Maoism, as an anti-colonial form of Communism, holds particular appeal to former colonial subjects, and this includes most of Africa. Throughout the 60s and 70s, most of China's involvement with Africa was cultural and ideological, consisting mainly of student exchanges and joint declarations. At that point China was too poor and disorderly to accomplish much beyond its own borders. But things have changed a great deal. As the West has ignored its former colonies, focusing only on lecturing them about transparency, democracy and recently feminism, China has been making deals, building cities and settling hundreds of thousands of Chinese nationals on the continent. As of today, there are nearly a million Chinese in sub-Saharan Africa, and that number is growing week by week.

In contrast to recent European colonials, Chinese are making permanent settlements in the tropics, importing peasants to farm the fertile river valleys of West and Central Africa. Chinatowns are popping up in the jungles of Cameroon and Congo. Chinese farmers in traditional coolie hats are farming rice using the same methods as in the warmer parts of southern China. Chinese fishermen are dominating the local fisheries, shoving the inefficient pirogues aside and taking the lion's share of the catch. Construction and retail are now dominated by Chinese. Chinese medicine is becoming the standard for Chinese and natives alike. It's a remarkable transformation that has happened very rapidly, right under the world's nose.

There are a number of reasons Chinese are better suited to settle tropical Africa than Europeans were in the 19th and 20th century, including population pressure, modern medicine, air travel and China's growing economic clout. Acclimatization probably plays a role as well. Europeans had a tendency to succumb to tropical conditions and diseases, whereas southern Chinese have been living in similar conditions for millennia. They are probably constitutionally better equipped to handle the stifling, moist heat of Sub-Saharan Africa than Europeans from cold and damp or warm and dry climates, and indeed many, if not most, of the farmers are from subtropical regions of China. Additionally, finding a wife may be difficult for Chinese farmers back home, but in Africa it's no problem at all.

Chinese are also well-equipped to farm in Africa. Their traditional crops do quite well in the humid environment, and it wouldn't take many Chinese farmers to turn a number of African countries into net food exporters. In fact, given the size and potential of Africa, a few tens of millions of Chinese farmers – a mere 2% of China's population – could produce enough extra food to give both Asia and Africa a food surplus and lay the groundwork for the industrialization of Africa. Although the prospect of a Chinese "invasion" of Africa may conjure up images of ethnic cleansing and displacement, that's unlikely to be the case. The concept of the color line has never existed for the Chinese, so the more likely scenario is some degree of assimilation through marriage. This has always been the Chinese way of relating to people on the fringes of their culture, so I don't see why it would be any different in Africa. And, in fact, there is precedent for this; Chinese graves from the Ming dynasty have been discovered in East Africa, and the ancestors of settlers, some bearing Chinese-sounding surnames, apparently still exist.

However, despite the possible benefits and advantages of a large Chinese influx into Africa, there would surely be major problems as well. The largest of these, no doubt, would be local opposition to Chinese immigration, and the next would likely be Western opposition. The issue of local opposition is likely to be a tough one, but not insurmountable, as large parts of Africa are entirely undeveloped and uninhabited, despite having great agricultural and productive potential. As for the West, the question is whether the we are serious about economically engaging Africa or would prefer to sit back and preach about democracy and transparency. Democracy is a farce in most of Africa, and elections frequently degenerate into tribal warfare. Leaders backed by the West are as corrupt as anyone else, and decades of "assistance" and "guidance" have resulted in nothing more than stagnation, genocide (Rwanda) and the world's worst civil war in years (in the Congo). A sorry record indeed…

The stupidity of Western policy in regards to Africa, largely a result of ideological blinkers and deliberate self-deception, has prevented all but a handful of entrepreneurs and established businesses from doing any business on the continent. Native corruption has been significantly exacerbated by the West's policy of giving loans and assistance directly to kleptocrats who in turn use them to consolidate their stranglehold on national wealth, which they typically spirit out of the country to spend on Western luxuries. In the meanwhile, the West scolds China for dealing with corrupt regimes that perpetrate human rights abuses — in which they are complicit! So, as the Western economic presence dwindles to a few petroleum companies and various international criminals involved in gun-running and the like, the Chinese sign enormous development deals and turn a profit by being entirely pragmatic about the political situation. And most indications so far are that they are improving the quality of the ordinary African's life.

One important consideration that eludes most of us here in the West is that China's development model is far more appropriate for Africans than what we have to offer. As recently as the 1970s, most Chinese lived what we would regard as a medieval lifestyle. Americans in particular are so far removed from this mode of life that we can't really conceive of it, yet this is the reality for most sub-Saharan Africans today. It wasn't until the late 1970s, after the end of the Cultural Revolution and the ascension of Deng Xiaoping to power, that China began to modernize agriculture and small business. The native entrepreneurial spirit of the Chinese combined with a loosening of Communist economic restrictions led to a rapid rise in productivity, culminating in the thriving China of today — all in barely more than a generation. As recently as 1998, I stayed with peasants in the hills just outside the Beijing prefecture who had just then received their first mechanized farm equipment, which consisted of little more than a few mechanical pumps and a very tiny tractor (one of these things). People would still thresh their grain on the hard pavement of the newly constructed roads, even in one of the most economically advanced regions of the country. I never saw anything like the gargantuan combines we have out here in the Palouse country.

If Westerners actually cared about being truly helpful, not to mention honest and humane, they'd recognize that Africa needs a step-by-step approach to development, starting with simple, effective tools and technology. The idea that we are going to save the Africans by giving them solar panels and specially designed laptops is stupid and irresponsible; at best it's meaningless self-indulgence, and at worst it's a scam designed to rip off feeble-minded but well-meaning westerners while doing nothing of concrete value for the intended recipients. Simply teaching Africans to build better rice paddies and farm rice – something the Chinese are already doing – would have a much more significant humanitarian impact than sending consumer electronics to people who can't even feed themselves, let alone reliably generate and transmit electricity.

Despite the lack of any meaningful contribution to African development since the mid-20th century, I don't expect the West to concede the continent to Chinese. In fact, the remnants of the white colonial culture in Francophone Africa are already experiencing increasing tensions with the encroaching Chinese (partly because the Chinese cannot speak French), and political resistance to Chinese engagement with Africa is growing stronger year by year. Given what meager returns the West has gleaned from trade with Africa in recent years, it's hard to see this as motivated by anything other than spite, but on the other hand the West will have to do something if we want to have a chance of competing for the vast economic opportunities offered by the continent. Unfortunately, unless there is a return to pragmatism, the only option for doing so is probably through violence, and I wouldn't put it past Western governments to foment insurrections with the goal of making it extraordinarily difficult for Chinese to operate in Africa.

But perhaps Africans, Westerners and Chinese will come together and work something out that more or less benefits everyone. The wealth of Africa could contribute a great deal to Africa, Asia and the rest of the world, and one of China's most pressing demographic problems could be solved by putting the millions of excess men to work making that happen. Replacing Africans, of course, is not the end goal, and it won't happen in any event — Africa is already home to a billion people and growing, and can easily absorb some 20 million Chinese. Limited immigration is manageable, and already happening, whether the West likes it or not. If we accept the idea, we'll be in a much better position to influence the outcome and derive benefit. If we don't, there's a very good chance Africa will be the next setting for a series of proxy wars that will waste both blood and wealth, because the Chinese are in for the long haul.

Divorce and Separation Harm Reduction

W.F. Price · 30 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There's been a rash of domestic killings in my region recently, mainly of the murder-suicide variety, most involving obviously ineffective restraining orders. People still seem to hope that restraining orders can actually prevent these sorts of things rather than exacerbate them, but I don't think it's because they are being deliberately obtuse in most cases. Actually, I'm pretty sure it's because people don't realize that there are other options.

Restraining orders, which are handed out like halloween candy, are de riguer in contentious divorces, and there's some evidence that they may contribute to homicide. However, we should take care to point out that it isn't only restraining orders that contribute to rage, despair and homicidal/suicidal ideation, but rather the entire package.

When young or otherwise naïve men go through a contentious divorce or separation, they usually are not prepared for the lowering of the boom that accompanies these things. On paper, a man can go from middle-class respectable citizen to destitute criminal suspect very rapidly after being served papers. The shock is very, very severe for those unprepared for it. Adding to this, of course, is the fact that most of these men actually love their wives/partners. The sense of betrayal is profound. It's the kind of blow people might reasonably expect never to recover from, and can result in an overwhelming feeling of hopelessness.

This feeling of hopelessness and desperation can be very dangerous. Men who have nothing to look forward to – who can see no light at the end of the tunnel – are far more likely to kill. In most cases they merely kill themselves and we hear nothing of it unless they commit suicide by cop. However, in a small minority of cases they kill those they feel betrayed them.

How can we prevent this while still allowing separation? First, I think there needs to be some restraint on the part of courts and attorneys when it comes to both financial and custodial issues. If you hit guys with loss of loved ones, throw them out of their houses, and immediately set the customary level of child support/alimony all in one fell blow, a lot of them are going to crack. It takes time for men to get used to the new situation, and depriving them of their entire support system and the ability to feed themselves doesn't hurry that process along.

Perhaps one measure that might be helpful would be to delay any support orders for some time after an initial separation decree. Perhaps a few months, so the man can pick himself back up and start to get to work on a new life. If a man is to be removed from his house and children against his will, it should not be accompanied at the same time by financial ruin. It may seem like a small step, but it could save lives and make the situation less destructive in the long run.

So, I'd propose that one part of family law reform should be preventing courts from levying any financial obligations on spouses who are removed from their houses for a period of some 90 days, unless they filed for divorce themselves. This could not only prevent violence, but might also lead to a decline in the number of frivolous divorces. It would provide an important cooling off period, and allow a man to seek representation and defend himself from spurious accusations that often accompany the initial filings. It might also increase the number of collaborative divorces, as spouses would have some motivation to come to a financial settlement by themselves. Although I'm sure feminists would object to such a rule, it would still allow for restraining orders, so their objections would be entirely about money, and wouldn't carry as much weight.

Much more could be done along these lines, but we have to start somewhere, and this would be a good first step.

The Apple and the Glass: A Halloween Ritual

W.F. Price · 31 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

An old Gaelic superstition – little known today – was that a maid could see her future marital state by eating an apple in front of a mirror in a dim room on Halloween. If she was destined to be married, an apparition with the face of her future husband would appear alongside her in the glass. If she was destined to die a spinster, a disembodied skull would float over her shoulder in the mirror, cackling at her.

Robert Burns, the famous Scottish poet, mentions the practice in his poem "Hallowe'en." A young maid asks her grandmother to perform the ritual with her, and is sternly rebuked by the old woman, who suggests she is tempting fate and the devil (see the entire poem here).

> Wee Jennie to her grannie says,
> "Will ye go wi' me, grannie?
> I'll eat the apple at the glass
> I gat frae Uncle Johnnie:"
> She fuff't her pipe wi' sic a lunt,
> In wrath she was sae vap'rin',
> She notice't na, an aizle brunt
> Her braw new worset apron
> Out through that night.
> "Ye little skelpie-limmer's face!
> I daur you try sic sportin',
> As seek the foul thief ony place,
> For him to spae your fortune.
> Nae doubt but ye may get a sight!
> Great cause ye hae to fear it;
> For mony a ane has gotten a fright,
> And lived and died deleeret
> On sic a night.

Given the state of marriage today, I'd highly recommend that single women avoid looking in mirrors this evening — it might not turn out so well.

Australian PM Redefines Misogyny

W.F. Price · 1 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Australia's Macquarie Dictionary has expanded the definition of misogyny following Prime Minister Julia Gillard's recent speech calling her conservative rival, Tony Abbot, a "misogynist" for suggesting that she wouldn't know much about motherhood, not being a mother herself.

Whereas misogyny used to simply mean hatred of women, the definition now includes "entrenched prejudice" concerning women, their roles, opinions, etc. This means that a loving husband and father who thinks, for example, that women shouldn't be in combat, is a misogynist (according to the dictionary). Basically, anyone who disagrees with feminists is smeared as a misogynist, and I'm sure that's exactly the intent of the change.

> The Associated Press reports that Australia's Macquarie Dictionary has updated its definition of the word "misogyny" after Australian Prime Minister Julia Gillard gave a take-no-prisoners lecturing of opposition leader Tony Abbott about his anti-female ways. (h/t Newser)
> Gillard included several mentions of Abbot's "misogyny" and "sexism" in the speech. The gone-viral Oct. 9 lambasting prompted word-keepers to take notice.
> Macquarie Dictionary added "entrenched prejudice of women" to augment the established "hatred of women," according to the BBC. The expanded definition will appear in the next edition, the Australian reported.
> Macquarie Editor Sue Butler said Gillard's remarks highlight how the term has evolved from a pathological loathing of the gender. "We decided that we had the basic definition, hatred of women, but that's not how misogyny has been used for about the last 20, 30 years, particularly in feminist language," she told ABC Radio. "Sexist does seem to be moving towards this description of surface features and misogynist applies to the underlying attitude."

Maybe some Australian should put out one of those "how to speak Australian" ads that Fosters used to run. He could run that clip of her falling flat on her face, then as a laughing man appears on the screen, the narrator says "misogynist."

American and British dictionaries have not adopted the change. Perhaps Australia's publishing industry is even more female-dominated than the rest of the Anglosphere's. Australia has long been known for some of the most radical of all feminists and gender benders, and I suspect it may be precisely because men have not traditionally worked in education or the humanities as much as in other English-speaking countries. Australia emerged at the dawn of the industrial age, so it may not have had the opportunity to develop the kind of conservative, male-guided institutions that would moderate the excesses of feminism.

However, it would be interesting to hear Australians' opinions on this. Frankly, Gillard strikes me as a clownish politician, prone to embarrassing mishaps, but she seems fairly popular in Australia itself.

Letting the Election Run its Course

W.F. Price · 3 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It's pretty obvious that men's issues are not going to determine the outcome of our national election. The hostility toward men in my own local elections is overwhelming, and at this point I don't think there's much sense in fighting it. If politicians win on an anti-male platform, then we can let them defend their policies nationally. Frankly, amongst the major voting blocks, family-age divorced fathers and single men are insignificant right now anyway, but we'll have more leeway to respond than the feminists, who have received far more than their fair share of political support.

I'm sure single mothers and and their supporters – mainly lesbians and family law attorneys – have been given disproportionate attention, as have gay marriage proponents, but that's something we'll deal with after the candidates take office.

For now, I think we should let them tell us where they stand, and act on it later. I think we men ought to sit back and watch. When George Wallace and other defenders of the status quo in the South made the elections in the late 60s and early 70s about restoring white supremacy, they won a pyrrhic victory that was rolled back within less than 15 years. I'm fairly sure that the trajectory of feminism will take a similar course, because the demonization and hysteria is along pretty much the same lines.

Not to say that I don't sympathize with Southern whites on any level (they do deserve self-determination as much as anyone else), but rather that they represented a special interest that ran counter to the national interest at the time, and politically they lost big time in the long run. So, although it's painful to see how effectively decent men are being demonized in the current campaign, I'm pretty sure that the single mothers by choice, adulteresses and various other female supremacists are going to lose their moral authority in short order, no matter who wins.

So don't stress too much about the election — things are going to get better either way. In the meanwhile, just kick back and watch, and do what your conscience dictates.

Enjoy the show!

The Women's Election

W.F. Price · 3 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've been taking a bit of a break in the runup to the election, as it seems that people are preoccupied with it and there's not much to be done or said for the time being. However, it's worth pointing out that this election has been so over-the-top obsessed with women that it's a bit surreal. Even I wouldn't have predicted such an overwhelming focus on the female.

But given that this is the reality, it's worth pointing out that it's fundamentally a race between married women and single women. I have no idea who will prevail, so I won't try to call a winner, but I did predict something along these lines some months ago:

> What we are seeing here is the climax of second wave feminism, which really got going in the 1960s, as its adherents reach the peak of their political and economic power. However, despite the heights attained by people like Hilary Rosen, not all American women jumped on the bandwagon, and now the two versions of American womanhood are squaring off over the presidency. You could say it's essentially feminists vs. wives, and it's pretty clear which ones will line up with which candidate…

So, really, our interests as men are totally irrelevant here, in this campaign at least. If you're going to vote (or already have), I wouldn't recommend counting on either candidate to make things better for men specifically. It just ain't going to happen, so I'd recommend voting based on other considerations.

But I also predicted that this won't go on forever. It can't. Not only are feminists removing themselves from the gene pool, they're going to gobble up what's left of the budget. To put it plainly, we just can't afford feminism, which requires infinitely escalating spending, for much longer.

More:

> I'm not sure how much longer feminism will be such a powerful force in national politics, but I suspect this election, and perhaps the next one, will be the peak. After that, there will be a decline that, while not entirely noticeable at first, should really become apparent by some time in the next decade. Younger feminists simply don't have the passion or cohesion to repeat the successes of the Hilary Rosens and Hillary Clintons of the world.

So hang in there and just try to keep your head above water for now. These are weird times – the culmination of trends that really got going some 40 years ago – and ultimately they'll be self-correcting.

Adding Insult to Injury

W.F. Price · 6 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Dewayne Brooks, of Warren, Michigan, has been charged with spousal abuse following the death of his morbidly obese wife, who weighed over 400 lbs (other reports have 500-700 lbs). According to the prosecutor, he allowed her to lie in her own filth for a week, and by the time he called the medics it was already too late. Apparently, his wife was injured in a car accident almost two years ago, and he was her "primary caretaker" (it isn't specified whether this was official, but it's unlikely — usually the term applies to parents). Mr. Brooks was also responsible for their four children, who were removed by CPS.

A HAZMAT crew in protective gear was deployed to extract the woman from the apartment, and it was necessary to knock down a wall to get her out the door.

From the looks of things, Brooks had begun to avoid the situation, so he may not have realized she was in such bad shape before he called 911. Furthermore, it's highly doubtful that he was responsible for her obesity. In fact, in all likelihood he simply gave up on trying to deal with it, and who can blame him? People who are that large are not easy to take care of, and they are notoriously ill-tempered when you try to deprive them of food. Simply rolling someone that heavy over is a two-man job, so Mr. Brooks clearly couldn't have adequately handled her even if he had made it a full-time job.

But none of that matters, because, according to the prosecutor, while he didn't try to hurt his wife, he "owed" her care. Sure, we all owe our spouses care, but who is to say that the man hadn't already tried? He'd been taking care of her for two years, and also trying to raise the kids, and in the meanwhile she'd eaten her way to monstrous proportions. I doubt Mr. Brooks was a model husband or father, but when you charge someone with a crime, there ought to be some intent involved, and even the prosecutor admits that the man did her no harm.

Now let's turn the tables. Say some married man had taken to the bottle following some life setback, and his wife tried to help him at first, but eventually she gave up because it was fruitless. Every time he felt good enough to leave the house he'd stock up on liquor, and if she tried to throw it away he'd beg, or throw a tantrum, or both. Eventually, she gave up and left him to drink himself into oblivion. One day, she finds him having fits again. He's having bad withdrawals – not for the first time – and she leaves him raving in his room. She comes back and finds him on the floor, moaning and frothing at the mouth. This time she gets scared and calls 911, the medics come and pick him up, and he dies in the hospital from severe delirium tremens.

Does the prosecutor have her arrested and charged with spousal abuse? Does she lose her children? Does anyone suggest she "owed" him care?

Nothing of the sort. The first thing people ask is "why didn't you leave him?" In their eyes, she is the victim. And the saddest thing is that she did love him, but nobody can understand that. All they see is a waste of space, a species of vermin: a useless, broken, man…

What a Relief

W.F. Price · 7 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It's over. Now we can get on with things.

My take on the election is that people stuck with the devil they know, and are still smarting from the disastrous Bush presidency. However, I think Obama owes Clinton big time for campaigning on his behalf. That clinched it, because Clinton remains so popular with working class folks in the swing states.

As for policies, it will be a mixed bag for men. Neither Republicans or Democrats will openly support reform. My local elections made that obvious, with Republicans promising to crack down on men with more domestic police hunter-killer squads if they were elected, and Democrats merely promising more of the same goodies for women.

The one good thing Republicans might do is cut programs that openly discriminate against men, but they will more than happily shift more of the burden onto fathers, as they did in 1994. Democrats, for their part, seem dedicated to preventing children in the first place (the little brats compete for public funds with voters) rather than punishing men. In fact, the Obama administration pushed states not to run up men's arrears while they are incarcerated — a much needed reform of an extremely punitive and cruel practice that put many poor fathers in eternal debt simply for being unable to pay a couple months of child support. What judges would do was imprison men without trial for owing arrears, and all the while the arrears would grow while they were in jail. This would lead to a cycle of debt and imprisonment for men who had not even committed a crime (owing child support is not a crime, but it is treated as such).

Everyone is talking about the racial element of the election, and although it's very relevant to who won, in terms of policy it won't make much of a difference, except perhaps in the Supreme Court. White nationalists ought to accept the fact that the United States is no longer a "nation" in the true sense of the word. We are not a people united by common culture or ancestry, and nobody can change that at this point. The US is essentially an empire, and nationalities are always subordinate to the empire. Try asking 1st century Jews in Palestine how it worked out when they defied an empire — not very well. However, if this bothers white nationalists, they should console themselves with the fact that white Christians are the single most powerful nationality in the US, and will remain so for a long time to come — probably permanently. After all, Romans still exist; we just call them "Italians" today.

If there is to be any reform along ethnic lines, it should be to recognize different nationalities (all of them, including white Christians) and grant them all some basic rights as peoples – not just individuals – including the right to live according to their customs, religions, and so forth without having to go against their values.

In the long run, exotic ideologies like female supremacism will wither as other factors, such as placating squabbling nationalities fighting for a piece of the pie, grow in importance. I am quite confident that feminist policies and initiatives will come to be little more than empty platitudes as the realities of imperial and provincial bankruptcy begin to dominate politicians' concerns. In countries such as Mexico, for example, feminism gets plenty of lip service, but in practice it doesn't exist.

We are going to face an era of high taxes, inequality and a negative sum fight over dwindling returns. America has had its day, and as triumphant victors usually do, it squandered its advantages, and is now in maintenance mode.

“Old White Republicans” Claptrap is Pure Projection

W.F. Price · 9 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The latest Newsweek cover declares Republicans “history” because they are old and white, but I noticed something shortly after the election that ought to give the pundits repeating that line pause: the oldest states overwhelmingly supported Obama. In fact, Vermont, which is one of the oldest and whitest states in the US, gave Obama a full 67% of its votes. Maine, which is the oldest state in the US (and another one of the whitest), gave him 56%. The only old state in which Obama lost was West Virginia.

The youngest states – Utah, Alaska, Idaho and Texas – all went solidly Republican.

For years, I’ve noticed that old white liberals consistently portray their political rivals as, well… Old and white. It’s as though they are stuck back in 1972, and think they are still 20-somethings battling Richard Nixon. It’s both amusing and annoying at the same time, but for once I’d like to see some honesty about this issue.

Apparently, Obama won largely on the old, white vote, especially in the old, white stronghold of the Northeast.

Why are white liberal states so old? Because liberals don’t have many children. And because they are still firmly attached to the old American Republican/Democrat paradigm (which is, for better or worse, finally crumbling), they are quite fearful of being outbred by their conservative rivals. This is why they cling to the hope that young minorities will join them in their high-minded Puritan ideals and lifestyle, which is not going to happen, but hey, they’ll be dead by that time anyway.

So, allow me to predict a bit of what the American political future will look like based on demographics:

White people will be more conservative, minorities will remain as they are (i.e. they’ll vote Democrat but will not be “liberals”), and white liberals will be largely dead or in nursing homes (real estate is going to be pretty cheap in New England in a decade or so). Young liberals, AKA progressives, will constitute a shrinking proportion of the national population. The SWPL lifestyle will be marginalized, the country will be divided roughly in two between whites and minorities, and we’ll begin to see the emergence of truly distinct populations separated by ethnicity and geography, and probably language in some cases.

Yes, it’s true: Old white people – like all old people – are on the way out. But the old whites with kids and grandkids will see their legacy carry on. Old white liberals, not so much.

Christian Men's Defense Network Blog Shutting Down

W.F. Price · 12 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Bskillet of cmd-n.org is closing his blog following one of those online gang attacks that occasionally arise to silence new blogs. Here at The Spearhead we had one early on in response to pro-male/anti-feminist tech's criticism of the increasing feminization of sci-fi. PMAFT's article spurred an enormous, angry response from science-grrrl bloggers such as John Scalzi, and was even denounced by Brent Spiner (Data from Star Trek) on Twitter.

However, in the atmosphere of The Spearhead in its earliest days, it was invigorating rather than intimidating. The "small penis" comments came on fast and strong, and provided much comic relief — I'm convinced that The Spearhead was the mighty rock upon which the small penis shaming technique was finally broken . It's pretty clear that the idea was to shout us down, but the tactic backfired, and gave the site a lot of positive attention. I think, in the long run, that PMAFT's observations will be fully justified by unfolding and future events, such as the decline of science fiction literature and the slide into obscurity of guys like John Scalzi, who went fem in the dumb-ass assumption that girls really do care as much about sci-fi as boys.

I don't know bskillet personally, so I have no idea whether the attention from thousands of disgruntled jizzabelers would negatively affect him or not. As far as I see it, he's just another anonymous guy (like I was) who got screwed over by family law, and wanted to say something about it. I can definitely identify with him, and I'd prefer he kept his site going, but that's up to bskillet – not me – and I certainly can't blame a guy who'd rather simply put the entire thing behind him and focus on living life.

So, let's raise a glass to bskillet for the work he's done and for speaking his mind, which is more than most men do, and wish him the best.

Although I'm not going to preach, I'd suggest bskillet might want to reconsider, because the worst they can do is so little. We are, after all, such little, humble things on this earth, and the further they break us down, the more we are as the sands on the beach, and the stars in the sky:

> Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea shore innumerable.

Remembrance Day: A Fine Tradition

W.F. Price · 12 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

On Friday, I picked up my kids for the weekend, and on the way back from the border my daughter started talking about some project involving poppies in school, so I asked her what that was all about. Both my son and daughter then proceeded to tell me it was for Remembrance Day, and that the poppies were significant because they were the first flowers that grew on the battlefields and fresh graves of WWI. I knew about the connection between poppies and WWI, but I wasn't aware that they were so much a part of the commonwealth tradition for honoring veterans. Here in the US, it is generally on Memorial Day rather than Veterans Day (which coincides with Remembrance Day) that we pay our respect to war dead.

I think it's a great tradition, and I'm glad the children are learning about it. When it comes to old wars, American kids are typically treated to an ideological browbeating over WWII — in a strange way the fact that we won "the good war" is overshadowed by eternal racial and religious guilt we must feel for being affiliated in some manner or another with Nazis (e.g. you are white and Christian, therefore you are the same as a Nazi, and also a bad guy). Remembrance Day appears not to dwell on that sort of punitive and malicious "you, too, are guilty" aspect of American education, and instead focuses on the purer sentiment of sorrow for fallen soldiers.

So, although it's a day late, I thought I'd offer a little tribute to the holiday. My great grandfather was involved in WWI, and spent a fair amount of time on the front line as a journalist, where he faced the same dangers as soldiers, including gas, which put him out of commission for a while (he survived and lived to 93, dying in the 1970s).

Here is the poem associated with the tradition:

In Flanders Fields

In Flanders fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place; and in the sky
The larks, still bravely singing, fly
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

We are the Dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe:
To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields.

Girls Solving Global Energy Problems With Pee Power

W.F. Price · 13 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In Nigeria, a few schoolgirls set up a contraption that extracts energy from urine. Evidently, a liter of piss can keep the lights on for six hours. I had no idea that pee had so much juice, so to speak, but hey, think of the potential.

> Four African girls have created a generator that produces electricity for six hours using a single liter of urine as fuel.
> The generator was unveiled at last week's Maker Faire in Lagos, Nigeria, by the four teens Duro-Aina Adebola, Akindele Abiola, and Faleke Oluwatoyin, all age 14, and Bello Eniola, 15.
> So how exactly does the urine-powered generator work?
>
> Urine is put into an electrolytic cell, which separates out the hydrogen.
> The hydrogen goes into a water filter for purification, which then gets pushed into the gas cylinder.
> The gas cylinder pushes hydrogen into a cylinder of liquid borax, which is used to remove the moisture from the hydrogen gas.
> This purified hydrogen gas is pushed into the generator.
> And as for delivering the fuel itself? Well, we'll leave that up to the consumer.

With just a couple sixpacks, I could keep the lights on all week. Entire cities could be powered by the effluent of one NFL game. If it actually worked, it would be a great leap forward for mankind.

Of course, it probably doesn't. But it's the thought that counts, right?

The Great Pussy Purge of 2012

W.F. Price · 13 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

This has been a season of shakeups in the US armed forces, including an unprecedented number of generals getting canned for fooling around with women. Just a couple months ago, General Jeffrey Sinclair was arrested for "inappropriate relationships" with subordinates, and alleged "sodomy" as well (probably oral sex). Then Petraeus gets sacked, and now yet another general, John Allen, is implicated in "potentially inappropriate" communication with a woman. In particular, the woman who blew the whistle on the Petraeus affair.

> The allegations against Allen are said to involve emails between him and Kelley written from 2010 to 2012. Asked if they were of a "sexual nature," a senior defense official would only say the messages were, "potentially inappropriate and they bare looking into. The Department is currently reviewing between 20,000 and 30,000 (pages of) documents connected to this matter."
> CBS News senior correspondent John Miller, a former deputy director of national intelligence, says the investigation into Allen "is fallout" from the FBI's digging around in the inboxes of Petraeus and Broadwell.
> He says the Pentagon realizes that if there is any indication of impropriety, they need it to come out now, not during Allen's confirmation hearing to become the next NATO commander – a nomination which has now been put on hold.

Given that even members of the top brass cannot behave themselves, I wonder whether Obama is rethinking his decision to put women on nuclear submarines. The last place we need a torrid affair is hundreds of feet under polar ice in a multi-billion dollar, reactor-powered vessel loaded with nuclear ballistic missiles. If anyone doubts that a woman would think it would be hot to get it on with a high-ranking officer on the hard edge of American imperial power, they don't understand women very well. In fact, that would make a great setting for a steamy romance novel:

The silence was deafening. Jessica stood, frozen, on the dark missile deck, surrounded by pillars of awesome power, capable of wiping out entire civilizations. She could hear, ever so slightly, footsteps and the soft rustling of blue cloth heading purposefully closer. Panic rose within her heaving breast as a muscular, square-shouldered figure filled the narrow walkway, blocking what light remained, coming nearer, and nearer still. A strong hand grasped her shoulder, and another her waist. The panic instantly gave way to a flood of desire; a desire so strong it burst over the levee of regulations and codes of conduct…

But that's merely one setting among countless others. We could have love in the mess hall, clandestine couplings in the barracks, sex in the forward operating base, and lust in a Stryker vehicle. Or, even better, an affair with an Afghan chieftain. And hasn't Prince Harry been in Afghanistan? What red-blooded American soldier girl wouldn't want a piece of that action?

The way things are going, we're going to need a gay military…

Institutionalism and the Growing Class Divide

W.F. Price · 14 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of the striking social differences I've noticed since I was a child is a profound change in the way neighbors relate to each other, and a creeping sense of alienation that has come to characterize urban America. Robert Putnam described it in his book Bowling Alone, which details the collapse of community in the US. Charles Murray explored another, related aspect of the issue in his book Coming Apart, which focuses on the social decline of white America.

The change, which I had the opportunity to witness first-hand in the neighborhood I was born in, hasn't involved the physical replacement of people like me or my family (although the fact that so many fled probably added to it), but rather the decline of the social institutions and communities to which we formerly belonged, hence the feeling of alienation. It isn't so much that new communities have taken their place and pushed people out, but rather that communities as we once knew them do not exist any longer. Except for a few associations such as golf clubs at the very top of society – the so-called 1% – there is precious little left for anyone, and even less, it seems, for young families than others. So, although I may feel the loss a little more keenly as a native, in truth this feeling of not belonging is the norm amongst urban Americans, and probably contributes a good deal to the childlessness of cities.

Putnam's studies found that the decline in social trust is directly associated with an increase in diversity, but I don't think that's necessarily the cause, because while diversity may decrease social trust between groups it often intensifies in-group cooperation, and in days past led to a lot of ethnic associations of one sort or another. In the early 20th century immigrants and natives alike formed their own fraternal orders, sports leagues and churches. But somewhere along the way, participation in communal endeavors began to lag, and has petered out to an abysmally low level today.

After giving this matter some thought, I think I've come up with a something that could explain part of this trend.

In the postwar era, the US became a very institutionally oriented society. More so than any other country on earth. Finishing high school became the norm after WWII, and then more and more people went on to college. By the year 2000, American adults had the highest average length of education of any country, and have only barely been surpassed in recent years by Norway and New Zealand. If it weren't for millions of uneducated recent immigrants, we'd probably still have the top spot.

Since the 1960s, institutional participation – especially in school – has become synonymous with social participation, and increasingly with social rank as well. Despite its benefits, extended education takes time and effort that could be spent elsewhere. It also shapes behavior, creating a model for work and community early in life, as well as expectations regarding progress and rewards, and it indoctrinates people, giving them a sense of what's proper and what is not. Finally, and importantly, it separates people according to ability and interest. It is not an institution that brings people together, but rather one that filters and arranges them according to talent, habits, work ethic and other factors.

White American adults are probably the most educated demographic the world has seen, having spent a greater amount of time in school than any other people on earth. The American upper middle class, which could fairly be called the dominant class in the US today, probably has northwards of 16 years of school per individual (as opposed to the average of 12.5). We have created an institutional class, and it is the impersonal, formal institution that has taken the place of the civic organization for this new institutional overclass.

While I don't know exactly what this shift from social, community-based institutions to formal institutions portends for the future, it makes sense that as more participation in formal institutions is required, there will be less in the civic sort that build social capital. Hence less church attendance, fewer bowling leagues, fewer fraternal clubs, etc.

It seems as though this would lead inevitably to more social stratification, as participation in professional or academic institutions is more exclusive and restrictive than participation in community organizations. For example, while you may have a trucker and a doctor at the same church social function, you certainly aren't going to find them at the same symposium on new enzyme inhibitors.

So, where people used to be joined in fellowship and community spirit, today collegiality prevails, and we have Putnam and Murray scratching their heads trying to figure out why there's a growing rift between the classes.

What I'd say to Murray in particular is that it isn't so much that the upper classes are preaching the wrong message; it's that they are simply absent from the lives of others except in their professional capacity. People will say whatever they think will appease whatever group is loudest and most obnoxious, but I highly doubt a physician would tell fellow parishioners that their daughters should sleep around and abort the results. No, if well-to-do professionals actually lived, socialized and prayed amongst the humbler sorts, they'd adapt their messages to take their needs and behavior into account. It isn't the values these people are preaching — it's that they occupy an entirely different universe.

But at this point I'm not sure much can be done about the problem. Perhaps, as societies grow increasingly complex, institutions must follow suit, and erosion of social capital is inevitable. This may be a major factor in the cycle of the rise and fall of nations; while Genghis Khan would drink and ride with the common horsemen who fought and died to build an empire, his grandson Kublai had time only to administer the affairs of state. Kublai's grandchildren couldn't even properly mount a horse, and wouldn't have been able to relate to a Mongol herdsman at all.

So perhaps the epidemic of single motherhood and bad choices amongst the lower classes today is as much a result of being isolated from people who behave responsibly as anything else, and that isolation is a result of a society increasingly stratified by institutional selection and filtering. Maybe it's time to rethink our emphasis on institutional achievement. In these lean times, it's something worth considering.

Gay Marriage Fallout

W.F. Price · 15 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

After dozens of tries, gay marriage finally squeaked out an electoral victory here in Washington state, thanks in large part to a six-to-one funding advantage provided courtesy of one-percenters like Bill Gates, Jeff Bezos (Amazon.com) and Jim Sinegal (Costco).

I don't think gay marriage will make much of a difference to society in general. We've already crossed the cultural Rubicon, so what does it matter? If anything, the government never should have gotten into the marriage business in the first place, and if it hadn't gay "marriage" would be a moot point. Marriage is the kind of thing that should be defined by culture and custom rather than the state, but we're stuck with the government regulating it now, so it was probably inevitable that some strange things would happen to the institution somewhere along the line.

However, it will make a difference for the people who actually (unwisely) get involved in a gay civil marriage, because they will suddenly become subject to the same kind of tangled mess that so many straight couples get into. For lesbians, it will be a particularly big problem, because of custody issues and precedents. What will happen with lesbian couples is that judges will take the birth mother of any children as the default mother, and the other woman as the "father." We all know what fathers face in divorce, so it isn't going to be pleasant for lesbian partners who are not the birth mother when there's a divorce. Furthermore, I can imagine all sorts of contention and intrigue involving children.

Let's say a lesbian woman is in a gay civil marriage, and she chooses to save time and money, or maybe she just wants to have some fun on the side (many "lesbians" actually do sleep with straight men from time to time), and gets pregnant in the cheap, conventional way — by penis. When pregnant she assures her partner that the child will be theirs, but neglects to tell the man she's pregnant, or her partner how she got pregnant — let's say she lied and said she used donor sperm. Later, she files for divorce and initiates a paternity suit against the biological father at the same time in an effort to kill two birds with one stone (deep-six the lesbian lover's custody chances and get child support at the same time). In the meanwhile, the non-maternal partner had legally adopted the child. But the man never knew he had a kid, and after he's hit with the paternity suit he gets involved and sues for visitation, arguing that he should have a right to see the child he didn't know about. If you're a judge, how do you settle this? Does the non-maternal lesbian pay child support and keep visitation rights, or does the father take on that role? What does the judge do about the adoption? Does the child have the right to a relationship with his biological father, or a non-related lesbian "father?" And keep in mind that this is simply one of many possible permutations of the custody problem that could arise in lesbian civil marriages.

Gay men will be able to avoid this, but they aren't going to marry at the same rate as lesbian women. They also are not going to adopt very much (it's expensive and a hassle), and since they can't get pregnant they'll have far, far fewer children than lesbian couples. However, they will have another problem to deal with: property disputes. When gay men split up in a relationship that doesn't involve a civil contract, they are forced to be reasonable. I keep mine, you keep yours, etc. When lawyers get involved, it is going to complicate matters. I expect this issue will limit gay male civil marriage and therefore divorce, but in cases where it does occur it will likely precipitate a fair amount of conflict and lead to a greater incidence of inter-partner violence.

So, now that gays have civil marriage, they will be subjected to the same laws that make straight divorce such a painful, drawn out mess, and the "benefits" they gain from official civil marriage won't be worth the extra trouble (most marriage benefits have already been significantly watered down and now extend to unmarried partners as well).

The only significant result of the new law will be that gays will now have a greater incidence of domestic violence, more custody litigation, and much higher legal expenses.

The lesson:

Be careful what you wish for

Due to the ordinary business of life, I've had to put editing submissions on hold recently, but from now into the foreseeable future, I'm going to have more time to edit and work on the site, so I'd like to open up to some more content.

We have as many readers as ever, and I'm pretty sure we can do even better now that we've got a dedicated server and far fewer problems with load. However, do keep in mind that editing is time-consuming and I have to do it myself, so I'd really appreciate it if those who submit content would give it a thorough proofreading before sending it along. However, for those for whom English is not their first language, I'm willing to be a little more forgiving, because I do value the international perspective, and it's pretty difficult to write in another language.

Now, as for the benefits of submitting to The Spearhead rather than simply posting it on your own blog, I can guarantee anonymity (you don't even have to tell me who you are if you don't want), and if there are any of the online gang attacks over one post or another, I can take the heat, and in fact I welcome the extra traffic. So long as the content is legal (no copyright infringement, threats against individuals, libel, etc.) there's very little to worry about; I chose a host that has a strong free speech policy. Additionally, I regularly back up the content on my own disk, so it's pretty safe and unlikely to be lost.

Furthermore, The Spearhead gets a lot of traffic. Not an enormous amount like Perez Hilton (this isn't that kind of site), but thousands of visitors per day nonetheless. Having been around for a while and posted thousands of articles generates traffic on its own, as the site has come to be a pretty big resource. Search alone accounts for around 2,000 visits per day.

So, for those of you who don't want to deal with the hassle of your own blog, or who want to protect your identity but still want to get the word out, feel free to send some material along. If you'd like to post on an ongoing basis, I'd be happy to sign up more contributing writers. The only ideological test is that the content has to address men's issues, and although it can focus on a specific issue, it shouldn't promote one group of men to the detriment of others. What this means is that if you want to focus on, say, Mormon men, that's fine, but it shouldn't also be an attack on other religions. The same could be applied to ethnicity, nationality, occupation (with some exceptions), etc.

Finally, as far as formatting is concerned, just a straight text file is usually best. Those of you who know HTML markup can include that, and I'm happy to have that taken care of, but if you don't or don't care to markup the text, that's fine.

Feel free to send 'em in.

The Missing Ingredient to Women's Happiness

For all the debate sparked in the popular media by Anne-Marie Slaughter's article "Why Women Still Can't Have It All" published a few months ago in The Atlantic, aside from the demur musings of the occasional establishment poodle, men have been utterly excluded from the discussion. Some men will shrug ambivalently, but for a growing number, particularly the half of formerly married men in Ms. Slaughter's generation who have experienced divorce, why there's no room for our opinions on this issue is a question of growing concern. We're uncomfortable about where the conversation's headed, making us worry it'll be us who'll have to give up more of what we're told is "patriarchal privilege" before the problem of "Why Women Still Can't Have It All" can be solved. For more than a few of us this is privilege we didn't know we had. As middle aged men in the huge majority of divorces today we're still reeling from having to pay child support for the privilege of having custody of our children wrested from us and our former partners being allowed to move our children far away, after which we're then browbeaten into taking responsibility for the fatherlessness now devastating most western democracies.

> "entitlement" is [...] compelling [...] to the person who feels entitled, but is far less attractive to those who must pick up the check.
> No Maam, The Nightmare of Feminism, no-maam.blogspot.ca

We're still stinging from learning that our wives, who overwhelmingly are first to file for divorce, are free to break the marriage contract without need for cause while that same contract demands we delay retirement or even shelve lifelong dreams to pay support to her for doing so.

> the desire to "have it all" [...] seems to go with an unwillingness to pay any price for it whatsoever. This violates what I consider to be a fundamental principle of economics, as well as life: "There just ain't no such thing as a free lunch". In the end someone has to pick up the check.

By all indications our sons will be even more sensitive to suggestions they benefit from any such male privilege. From elementary school they've watched as feminist education policies refused to let up and allow even a single program targeting boys with well needed support. They've watched programs for girls continue to march ahead full steam even as boys have been reduced to only 1/3 of some university graduating classes. And don't think they haven't noticed how girls are encouraged to compete fiercely against them in sports as in life, even while they're ridiculed for losing to a girl. And despite all this, rather than being allowed to treat the girls as equals they as boys are met with harsh consequences for competing too earnestly in return. Waiting for them to change family law so marriage and family are still viable options? After seeing their fathers broken and emasculated fighting what they believe is an immovable feminist bias they scorn and ridicule men who try. They're nihilists, answering to no one; hooking up with sexually liberated women and enjoying the party at the end of the world.

> I don't need the government to pass laws against alimony. I simply won't marry in the USA. I don't need the government to pass laws promoting fair child custody laws. I won't impregnate an America girl. I don't need the government to increase punishment for false rape accusers. I'll cover my own back. I don't need the government to ban trans fat to lower the weight of the population. I'll go to Poland. While they try to change the minds and culture of 310 million Americans with their WordPress blogs, I'll be hitting on pretty girls in a Croatian bar. I'll be living the life that I want instead of being entitled and waiting for the government to give it to me. In the same breath they call me a pussy beggar, they beg the government for protection from pussy.

Young and old we men have learned that whenever we have to rely on public opinion to adjudicate a conflict between us and women, public opinion will always ignore our interests. We just can’t win.

So when we hear the question “Why Women Still Can’t Have It All?” our Ritalin castrated minds have already trailed off into “I thought they did?” We honestly don’t know where to find any more we can give up in appeasement. We’re truly tapped out.

> We couldn’t give you all you wanted even if we tried [...] we are starting to recognize that the more we give you the more you’ll want, and we’re getting tired.

It’s difficult for women to understand the breadth of this emotional undercurrent among men, particularly without hearing men’s voices. Unfortunately even if men weren’t excluded from speaking about these issues in the popular media, with the exception of the Rush Limbaugh’s who make a living from controversy, most of us have good cause to be deeply reluctant about publicly voicing our honest opinions on feminist issues. But we’ve been far from silent. And in the corner of the internet known as the “Manosphere”, even if forced to use pseudonyms that’s been especially true.

Though “Why Women Still Can’t Have It All” was widely hailed as provocative among women, from men’s commentary they were far more likely to be struck not by the refreshing candidness of the article but by how completely the article had skirted around the real issues.

> Unfortunately, Slaughter can’t seem to see the issue through to its logical conclusion, instead clinging to the notion that more social engineering will deliver women into the magical promised land of limitless opportunity [...] a feminist crusade for more power, more control, more everything.
> W.F. Price, Anne-Marie Slaughter Grasping at Straws in “Have it All” Article, The-Spearhead.com

Still we men want to be helpful. In fact we’ve always looked pragmatically for solutions as our mothers, significant others, and daughters struggled with similar work-life tradeoffs to those mentioned in Slaughter’s article.

But we know better than to offer unsolicited advice to counter the illogic we’ve heard since feminism’s first wave:

> “No woman should be authorized to stay at home and raise her children [...] Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one.” — Simone de Beauvoir, “Sex, Society, and the Female Dilemma” Saturday Review, June 14, 1975, p.18
> no matter how any individual feminist might feel about childcare and housework, the movement as a whole [has] reasons to discourage full-time homemaking.” — Jane J. Mansbridge, Why We Lost the ERA, p.100

Still as we continue to hear the women in our lives espouse the same “every woman can and should have it all” fantasy that failed earlier feminists, we can’t help but sigh. The definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over and expecting a different result.

> Rather than face up to cold harsh reality, something they had never had to do when their male mates had been willing to shoulder that part of the responsibility of maintaining a household, they changed their anthem from “I am woman hear me roar” to “I am victim, hear me whine”.

> No Maam, The Nightmare of Feminism, no-maam.blogspot.ca

But then Slaughter compounds her folly by advocating women invest their efforts into changing the entire workforce rather than abandoning feminism as unproductive and simply making different individual choices themselves:

> The best hope for improving the lot of all women, and for closing what Wolfers and Stevenson call a "new gender gap"— measured by well-being rather than wages—is to close the leadership gap: to elect a woman president and 50 women senators; to ensure that women are equally represented in the ranks of corporate executives and judicial leaders. Only when women wield power in sufficient numbers will we create a society that genuinely works for all women. That will be a society that works for everyone.

Being self sufficient to the point of libertarianism it's only then we speak up to remind her of what should have been common sense: the only person any of us can rely on being able to change is ourselves.

From the standpoint of pragmatism and belief in self-sufficiency Slaughter's article begged sharp criticism for failing to properly skewer the underlying feminist ideology that a great many men (and women) identify as the chief culprit deceiving today's women into recklessly chasing whatever unrealistic liberal arts degree, inflexible career, biologically difficult family choices, or extravagant lifestyle she's been told she can't be happy without; driving her to pursue goals in each of these areas that may deeply conflict for her personally with no sense of the personal risk involved.

> She[Slaughter]'s ignoring basic facts of biology here. Surgeons, for example, are known to peak in their 40s, after which their abilities decline. Trial lawyers probably follow a similar trajectory. Professional athletes, of course, peak far earlier. The thing is, there are only a choice few jobs in which people can continue to rise past the age of 50. There's a big difference between being adequate and being in one's prime. If you spend a large proportion of your prime working years taking care of kids, you simply aren't going to rise as high. It's a trade-off Slaughter isn't willing to acknowledge.

As men we know that if we want it all we're going to have to earn it. So we tend to define "having it all" in terms of meaningful pursuits worth our sacrifice … simple pleasures, and bonds with family and friends that truly add value. It deeply rankles us that under feminism the phrase "having it all" has lost any usefulness as far as a holistic focus on achieving a "life with purpose", and has now come to demand women acquire the luxurious lifestyle, high flung career, domestic help, and other external trappings that a hopelessly lost generation of older feminists says she should have. We are so rankled in fact, that we are no longer willing to serve as "feminist appliances" to give her more free time to devote to such selfish and self-serving fantasies of personal fulfillment.

> this time you're going to have to do it yourself. We'll be out fishing, hanging out with our kids, making craft beer or whatever strikes our fancy in our free time. You can have your glory — without us.

Woman can have it all, but they can go do it alone.

Nevertheless despite my personal misgivings about the gender politics of Slaughter's article, after some reflection I did begin to greatly appreciate it. Its beauty lies in the difference between the way men and women tend to process arguments on sensitive issues. As any editor of an online forum will tell you, men tend to be drawn in by controversial arguments on sensitive subjects where women are driven off. Men will try to learn more about those arguments they disagree with and will actively engage their opponent to try to dismantle that logic. Women on the other hand tend to disengage from direct conflict by using ridicule to show the arguments they disagree with aren't understandable at all. Typically women disengage online by banning the offensive person from the discussion, which the women happily carry on without any need for that opposing opinion to be fairly or accurately represented at all.

Because of this response pattern any writer who addresses sensitive women's issues has to do so in a way that allows women to confront issues without being confronted. She must present criticism obliquely enough for her female readers to see opportunities for improvement in a wholly positive light. The writer can't for example tell women to let go shallow unrealistic wants that are completely out of context of any holistic sense of well-being; and she can't tell women that the closest they'll get to achieving those goals is stressing themselves to the point where achieving more realistic goals and a more holistic balance is impossible. Instead the writer must give women readers half a compliment by saying "try not to be too perfect". As men, by contrast, we measure the verity of our beliefs by the ends those beliefs enable us to achieve. Perfection is good or by definition it isn't perfection, at least not for you. For us, as a useful means to an end a strategy that's perfect demands praise, just as a wrongheaded one requires criticism. But in addressing women, using double-think like the half compliment is necessary because if the writer doesn't catch women's sympathies they will simply tune out. Communicating half an idea is better than communicating none of it at all.

Fortunately as a man exploring the views of men here I can speak plainly. Simply put, men overwhelmingly feel that feminists have been advocating life paths that lead to miserable tradeoffs for most women:

> modern feminism is founded on women's tendency to feel a vague (yet powerful) sense of dissatisfaction. It is the solution to the problem with no name. Betty Friedan was the founder of NOW and wrote the book The Feminine Mystique, which is generally credited with launching second wave feminism…
> The "Problem That Has No Name" was described by Friedan in the beginning of the book:
> "The problem lay buried, unspoken, for many years in the minds of American women. It was a strange stirring, a sense of dissatisfaction, a yearning [that is, a longing] that women suffered in the middle of the 20th century in the United States. Each suburban wife struggled with it alone. As she made the beds, shopped for groceries … she was afraid to ask even of herself the silent question — 'Is this all?"
> Sorry feminists, you absolutely own that. Vague female dissatisfaction is your founding philosophy, and solving it is your reason for being. Just because you figured out that it is a feature, not a bug, you can't beg off having to fix it. In an amazing blunder, feminists have stepped into the scapegoat role for women's unhappiness and are now the new henpecked husband.
> Over promise, under deliver, Dalrock, Dalrock.wordpress.com

Having patiently endured feminism's henpecking so long we can be excused for having little sympathy feminism is now taking some of the abuse in our place:

> All I can do is offer some advice: Just try being nice to her feminists, maybe ask her about her feelings more and she will snap right out of her malaise. If she isn't happy, it must be something you are doing wrong.
> Over promise, under deliver, Dalrock, Dalrock.wordpress.com

To us men the solution is simple. No women has to swallow that feminist Kool-Aid. Many less fortunate women have (often by necessity) shirked feminism completely and just gone ahead and successfully taken charge of finding their own balance. Ideology has nothing to do with making empowering choices. To us feminism just makes women unattractive by turning them into victims, narcissists, and adolescents who have no power over their own happiness; like the perpetual adolescents in the book "Grow Up! How Taking Responsibility Can Make You A Happy Adult" by Dr. Frank Pittman. I don't know whether Pittman makes any statement for or against feminism, but he nicely sums up the predominant male sentiment when he writes: "… happy grown-ups take responsibility. They take responsibility for their bodies, their characters, and their relationships. They own their lives and they own up to the choices they make. Finding the responsible thing to do is the lifelong quest for grown-ups. And it leads to real, grown-up happiness…"

Of course the idea that valuing personal attributes like responsibility can lead to happiness isn't new, though these core values may be increasingly foreign to women privileged enough to ponder the kind of work-life balance choices Slaughter writes about. Conversely women like Slaughter are rarely ones who want for any basic necessities. And they are wholly mislead in the belief their situation is representative of other women. The kind of luxury presumed as the birthright of all women in this age of consumption has never been realistically attainable by even a sizeable minority of women (or men) at any time throughout human history. In fact even today for people of any gender who are searching for well-being and contentment, a common element of spiritual practice in all religions and for the non-religious in all meditative or psychological therapies, is detaching from love of the material and acknowledgement of thankfulness instead. Rather than allowing ourselves to believe we need some possession or outcome and not allowing ourselves to be happy until we get it, having a sense of well-being in our historically 'without infinite wealth' existences has always meant being grateful for whatever little we already have. It has also meant honoring our gifts. In other words "we must tend our to gardens"; we must devote ourselves to carrying out our duties to the best of our abilities in order to derive satisfaction from them.

For modern women this simple valuable message has been drowned out by the endlessly repeating narrative feminists have indoctrinated her with since birth that to be happy she has to "have it all". And she should never in any circumstances have to settle and learn to build happiness from the ashes of compromise.

Not allowed to take joy in whatever simple blessings she has available, she is driven to pursue some grueling career that will allow her to buy the perfect life, and to hold off from years of enjoying a satisfying committed relationship during her most attractive and reproductively viable years to hook up casually until she meets the prince who will treasure her and indulge her whims without ever expecting anything in return. Then she is told to have children exactly when it suits her plans, and to expect that raising children won't impact significantly on her career or leisure time, all the while demanding absolute control over the environment her children are raised in.

She has been force fed one expectation after another to the point of being bloated with a pathological sense of entitlement that rejects responsibility for consequences of any of these decisions. As refreshingly caustic men's blogger Angry Harry wrote: "Are women responsible for anything that they do"?

It's a fair question I've listed some of men's answers to.

- From all the slut walks around the world we know feminism tells women it's unfair to be held in any way responsible if they're raped walking alone in dangerous places during the dead of night while wearing skimpy clothing that targets them. Or for getting so drunk or high in sexually charged situations that they lose control of their faculties and engage in conduct that's misconstrued as consent. Or for any ambivalence in communicating their consent or lack of consent to sex.
- From feminisms love of fist fighting movie heroines, from feminism's condemnation of films portraying violence against women at the same time it absolutely supports movie violence against men in retaliation for fighting back against those women, we know feminism encourages women to feel at liberty to strike a man full force without responsibility for consequences. Then, from feminist's violent opposition to statistics that women initiate up to 60 percent of domestic violence; from the death threats received by long time social worker Erin Pizzey who said it simply isn't effective to look at domestic violence as just a problem of men victimizing women rather than a problem of two people in light of those statistics, we know that feminism tells women it's unfair for them to take any responsibility for any role in domestic conflict either.
- On top of that feminism tells women they aren't responsible for the fact that the majority of child abuse is perpetrated by women. Men are responsible for stressing the women out, and if no man is in the picture men are still responsible because of their absence.
- From the number of women who raise their children without significant help from their parents solely to avoid being told what to do by their mothers, we know feminism tells women she shouldn't have to take responsibility for managing relationships with people she needs to depend on for childcare. She should be entitled to paid childcare who will do whatever she tells them to do.

- Feminism says it's unfair women have to take responsibility for having children before their biological clock runs out and fertility becomes an invasive medical procedure that costs as much as a new car.
- Feminism tells women to be deeply offended at being held responsible for domestic duties like cooking, cleaning, and taking care of children. At the same time feminism says women shouldn't bat an eye in holding their husbands responsible for earning a living or for cooking and cleaning if the husband stays at home.
- To women who empower themselves by using their sexuality as a tool, feminism says it's unfair for them to be judged or criticized. They should never be responsible to the opinions of anyone who believes that such conduct devalues them.

It's ironic that in trying to absolve modern woman of much of her responsibility and instead foisting that responsibility onto us in "the patriarchy", feminism only robbed her of opportunities to independently achieve well-being.

> the word 'responsibility', so often thrown at men, is nowhere to be found when discussing women and the results of their actions. The result is that, yet again, men are held responsible to underwrite or otherwise support women's choices
> Elusive Wapiti, Judas' Evangelicals, elusivewapiti.blogspot.ca

Incredibly, having robbed her of responsibility and having seen that the desired ends hadn't been achieved, feminism doubled down and continued to try to absolve her of even more responsibility in the mistaken idea that doing so would finally achieve empowerment. But rather than being empowering, removing all our responsibility turns us into spoiled and entitled children with less and less ability to control our outcomes, and therefore less ability to find the contentment we desire.

Because human beings rely on duty and obligation to compel us to devote ourselves to do anything for long enough, and with enough focus and commitment to derive satisfaction. Acknowledging our responsibilities enables us to feel it's our duty and obligation to do what we're responsible for, and this sense of responsibility is critical in building the bonds with others from which we derive a sense of well being.

> It is because our own human existence is so dependent on the help of others that our need for love lies at the very foundation of our existence. Therefore we need a genuine sense of responsibility and a sincere concern for the welfare of others.
> The Dalai Lama

A demanding and prestigious career, a thriving family, a well kept home, closets full of beautiful clothes, and lots of leisure are wonderful goals, but the simple truth is that for most women they are conflicting ones. Even the few lucky women who have it all will have to invest intense commitment and effort to get it, no one else will take responsibility for her own well-being and achieve it for her. None of us can achieve well-being for ourselves and those we care about without taking responsibility for doing everything within our control, even if that means letting go of the less important, to ensure this outcome.

Tragically only women's voices can be raised in objection to the harm that feminism, in deceiving women, has caused all of us. Men's voices speaking out against feminism are kryptonite to big media's revenue from advertising. Provoking angry swarms of boycotting feminists we are effectively banned from the popular media and as a consequence the popular media only does feminism. But women also fear running afoul of "the tribe" and losing their feminist badge. There's no opposing force that can compete with feminism to balance it out. And feminism has no "off" switch.

It can't be in women's interests that with no voice other than feminism, expressing simple joy and contentment at being a stay at home mother, even one who clips coupons, is seen as insulting and demeaning to women. It can't be in women's interest that expressing joy and contentment at making sure a man comes home to a hot meal every day is seen in the same negative way. Women should have the same freedom as men who have found fulfillment in being able to provide for their families if nothing else:

> apparently women think that for all these years men were getting up and going to work because they were selfishly serving their own interests, only to discover on their deathbed that they wanted something else after all. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Men don't work only for themselves, and we all know that. In fact, most of us work so that we can have a family.
> W.F. Price, Anne-Marie Slaughter Grasping at Straws in "Have it All" Article, The-Spearhead.com

A women should be free to pursue well-being wherever she finds it. Why should any traditional mechanism of fulfillment be closed off to her?

The next generation of women stands to suffer even more from being sold feminism's bill of goods. The same feminism that causes today's women to cruelly reject the idea of boys education programs, saying "it's about time" when told that in some cases only 30% of university graduates OR LESS are men, is the same feminism that means none of the next generation of young women will be able to escape clipping coupons when they decide to have children with the marginalized young men they'll marry, if those men marry them at all. For many of those women finding any husband will be doubtful as marriage rates continue to plummet and young men opt out of what they perceive to be legal bondage to a partner who will bear no responsibility to him whatsoever but who can break the contract at any time and still be entitled to the punitive financial support he'll be enslaved with when he's forced to pay for the privilege of being denied his own children.

In the next generation or so these forces are poised to transform society radically. I have argued facetiously in the past that any problems with global overpopulation will be fixed when feminism eventually disenfranchises young men so much and makes reproduction such an abusive proposition that rather than working hard to one day be able to support a family young men instead will opt out entirely. And I argued facetiously that if the end of economic growth is looming ahead as predicted by Jeff Rubin in "The End of Growth", then this population reduction will be good for our resource constrained world.

The truth is however is that with the great challenges ahead of us society will have more need than ever for the problem solving abilities of young men. We will no longer have the luxury of allowing feminist entitlement and freedom from responsibility to disenfranchise our sons. A global cataclysm is looming, in the face of which women debating how to "have it all" will seem a quaint historical memory.

Yet in a strange twist the resource constraints of this new world might be exactly what feminism needs to recognize that the keys to women's well being don't lie in "having it all" as far as consumerism or freedom from any responsibility.

> Many women are wising up to the falsehood that they can have it all, that both a powerful career and a happy family can be had if you just work hard enough, get enough subsidized childcare, get enough flextime, and find a sufficiently alpha husband–or accrue sufficient ex-husbands–to enable it.
> Elusive Wapiti, The Feminist Lie of Sexual Equality, elusivewapiti.blogspot.ca

Instead a more reliable route to well being lies in embracing the sense of duty, and obligation to family that has been steadily been beaten out of generations of young girls.

> women are realizing once again that there is happiness in little things, in the smiles of children, and in the pleasures of a down-shifted life.

> Elusive Wapiti, The Feminist Lie of Sexual Equality, elusivewapiti.blogspot.ca

Ms. Slaughter expresses some surprise at the resistance of younger women to be forced into the same confining “iron woman” stereotype that hoodwinked her. But resistance was inevitable. Choosing the “red pill” young women refuse to be told they can’t follow treasured traditions just because those gender roles have been bringing value and balance to their families since their grandmothers times. For them the hard line of “feminism” must yield to the kinder wisdom of a “humanism” that recognizes women’s uniqueness rather than trying to reshape women into men, and that seeks to embrace a modern take on the age old values that have been the source of contentment for generations of women before. So to all those women seeking a kinder existence, from those of us men who have always loved and supported you, we continue to do our best to wait patiently. We hope the institution of marriage is still here when you return. Because the blessing of your feminine attentions adds beauty to our lives. We’re glad if you’re coming home.

David Brooks: Reversing Decline of Family Requires More Government Intervention

W.F. Price · 17 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Although I probably shouldn't be, I'm still surprised by how dedicated so many pundits are to using government and law to fix the problems they created in the first place. David Brooks wrote an opinion piece yesterday extolling the virtues of family and lamenting its decline, then closing with a call for more government encouragement of family.

> At some point over the past generation, people around the world entered what you might call the age of possibility. They became intolerant of any arrangement that might close off their personal options.
> The transformation has been liberating, and it's leading to some pretty astounding changes. For example, for centuries, most human societies forcefully guided people into two-parent families. Today that sort of family is increasingly seen as just one option among many.
> The number of Americans who are living alone has shot up from 9 percent in 1950 to 28 percent today. In 1990, 65 percent of Americans said that children are very important to a successful marriage. Now, only 41 percent of Americans say they believe that. There are now more American houses with dogs than with children.
> The 2012 election results illustrate the gradual transition we are making from one sort of demography (the current Republican coalition) toward another sort of demography (the Democratic coalition). The rise of post-familialism is a piece of that shift.
> My view is that the age of possibility is based on a misconception. People are not better off when they are given maximum personal freedom to do what they want. They're better off when they are enshrouded in commitments that transcend personal choice — commitments to family, God, craft and country.
> The surest way people bind themselves is through the family. As a practical matter, the traditional family is an effective way to induce people to care about others, become active in their communities and devote themselves to the long-term future of their nation and their kind. Therefore, our laws and attitudes should be biased toward family formation and fertility, including child tax credits, generous family leave policies and the like.

How quickly we forget the "pro-family" crusades of the past. No-fault divorce was supposed to lead to better marriages. VAWA to better family environments. Draconian child support enforcement to more paternal responsibility.

Have any of these measures, all of which received bipartisan support, led to stronger, healthier families? Quite the opposite. Every single time in the past 50 years that the government has intervened in family and marriage it has weakened the institution. Why on earth does Brooks think more of the same will have a different effect this time?

The most destructive force in the contemporary family is government and law. Nothing more effectively tears families apart than introducing lawyers, policemen and social workers into the intimate domestic environment. And with government involvement in "family policy," they will most assuredly come.

Maybe I'm a little old fashioned, but I think the best solution would be to simply leave people alone. Let the people define family as it suits them, and don't provide incentives either way. Incentives will only give cynical opportunists (like feminists) more leverage to manipulate policy for their own ends. Special interest groups will inevitably dominate when the complexities of law and bureaucracy intrude upon the common people's private lives. It will just be more of the same mess, and people will inevitably avoid it, which means the disintegration of the family will continue apace.

While I share some of David Brooks' sentiments, I disagree strongly with the proposed solutions. Unfortunately, I have to conclude that those who would promote the family through a carrot and stick approach are the biggest threat to the family of all.

Justify Your Existence: A challenge for the child support machine

Featured Guest · 18 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Taank

The original argument used to justify the implementation of government-enforced child support policies is a simple one: the citizens comprising society at large should not be required to support (via welfare, paid for with taxes) the children of other citizens. In essence, the idea is that single mothers depending on welfare handouts to survive are a financial problem for the state. Therefore, the fathers in these cases should be paying child support to reimburse the state for, or remove the need for, welfare expenditures. This idea is what got the whole process started.

This, of course, has morphed into the massive governmental child support enforcement machine we know and love today, with all its lovely denials of due process and erosion of civil rights. In all the righteous furor surrounding the ever more rabid hunt for deadbeat dads, there's a calm and direct question that seems to be repeatedly overlooked. That question: Is it worth it?

Plain, simple, direct: has government-enforced child support achieved its goal? Ultimately, there are two scales that need to be compared to answer this question.

Scale 1: Add up the costs required for government enforcement of child support

-Salaries for state workers employed for child support enforcement

-Facilities costs for offices, utilities, IT assets, etc

-Administrative costs for running Family Courts at higher capacities to deal with child support cases

-Federal matching funds provided to states to incentivize aggressive pursuit of child support cases

-Welfare expenses paid in those cases where non-custodial income garnishment is insufficient to avoid welfare

-Costs to incarcerate noncustodial parents unable to pay, under 'contempt of court'

-Miscellaneous expenses as discovered

Scale 2: Add up the costs required in the absence of child support

-Welfare costs for all child support cases that would require welfare

I ultimately have no idea what the result would be, having neither the time nor the expertise to perform this sort of investigative journalism on my own. As a taxpaying citizen, though, I'd be curious to know if the extravagant child support enforcement machine that we have built over the decades has actually saved me any money, or if I've avoided paying the bill for someone else's children by paying an even larger bill to avoid it. Maybe some intrepid souls out there are brave enough to take up the challenge; or perhaps the state agencies involved will decide that it is in their best interest to show why they should continue to exist. Ultimately, the challenge is the same: justify your existence.

Feminists Show How They Feel About Free Speech at Warren Farrell Presentation

W.F. Price · 19 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Warren Farrell, who has devoted a great deal of his life to men's issues and taken feminism to task for its blatant double standards and hatemongering against men, addressed a group seeking men's equality at the University of Toronto on Friday evening. However, he was delayed by a group of anti-speech feminists and some street trash they picked up who had nothing better to do than fight the police. According to a feminist interviewed after the disturbance, there were about twenty protesters, although other feminists later claimed triple digits online.

Here's a video of the feminists misbehaving:

Naturally, the cops went easy on the feminists, which is why they do this kind of thing — they can get away with it. If real men got physical with the cops like that instead of a bunch of spoiled college feminists and their gutterpunk buddies, they would have drawn weapons. Kinda makes Warren Farrell's point, but then again it also makes the point that seeking "equality" with women is a quixotic effort.

However, that isn't to diminish Farrell's work. The man has done an effective job in calling attention to the sham that passes for gender equality, laying feminism's hypocrisy bare to all who care to look. That's what really infuriates these feminists.

Word to the wise: a lot of the street trash who show up as "muscle" at these protests shoot smack and/or meth and make a living selling their ass, so you probably want to avoid physical contact if you encounter them. If you are ever in a position where you must defend yourself from them (try to avoid it if at all possible), it is far better to use a weapon that can keep them at least at arm's length than your fist. Both HIV and Hepatitis C are real risks, which is why the cops wear gloves at these events. At about :20-:30 in the video you'll notice one of the cops putting gloves on before getting close to them.

Why is Hypergamy a Four-Letter Word?

Elusive Wapiti · 19 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A reader sent me this email wondering why hypergamy gets such bad press, while the male preference for "younger, hotter, tighter" goes unremarked upon in the manosphere:

> We all claim to believe that a woman is required to submit to and respect her husband. And if, as we all believe, a man's job is to be the leader of, protector of, and primary provider for, his wife and family, then why would a woman be wrong for choosing a man she can look up to? Marrying a man who cannot do for her what she can at minimum do for herself is illogical. It would seem to me to be counter intuitive to choose a man she isn't inclined to look up to for some reason or another.

> Last question, which I'll preface with my own life as an example. Never, in my 18 years of marriage, have I looked around for another man of higher status to replace my husband with. Ever. Never have I, upon encountering a man of higher status, imagined that he might make me happier than my own husband. Do you guys really believe that most married, Christian women are in the market for an upgrade from their husbands?

> While I believe that hypergamy is a real part of women's mating strategy, I don't believe it's sinful any more than a man's desire for a young, healthy, fit and fertile wife. These are rational and logical things to consider when choosing a life mate. So why is female hypergamy presented as something inherently sinful?

Before I proceed, I think we need language to describe the male counterpart to hypergamy–the preference for younger / hotter / tighter women. The Social Pathologist recently proffered "femogamy", a word whose muddled etymology (latin + greek) suggests a predilection for feminine mates. Not a bad attempt, but I don't think the word quite captures the essence of male sexuality the way that "hypergamy" characterizes female preferences. I offer instead "koreogamy", from the Greek words "kore", for a young unmarried woman, a maiden, suggesting an attractive and nubile young woman, and of course -gamy, meaning marriage, fertilization, or reproduction, from the Greek gamos, meaning marriage. Thus "koreogamy" describes the strong male preference for youthful, attractive women, and, like my anonymous reader highlighted above, is a fact of male sexuality that goes as largely unremarked upon in the manosphere as it is decried in the mainstream by women whose men had "traded up" on them to a "younger model".

Now: onto hypergamy. Hypergamy, like koreogamy, is likewise a fact of female sexuality. Complaining about it strikes me as about as productive as complaining about gravity. I like the way the Social Pathologist put it when he said

> Hypergamy is the natural object of female sexuality. It's not a choice, and therefore devoid of a moral dimension, but a hard wired instinct. It's what women involuntarily feel in the presence of a suitable male. Women have about as much choice about their hypergamous natures as men do about their [preferences for younger / hotter / tighter women]. It's a fact of life and getting angry about it is about as idiotic as getting angry about the orbital motion of the planets or the unfairness of Plank's constant.

I've observed some game theorists to be quite reductionist in their assessment of the hypergamous nature of women. That hypergamy is so strong a tendency so as to often, or even always, override a woman's self control. That hypergamy both explains female sexual behavior and predicts it, going as far as to imply that even married women are constantly on the prowl to one-up their husband. This is a slander akin to the "all men are rapists" charge that rape culture hysteria activists level at men–where both camps deny the opposite sex the agency, or even the capability, of self-control. Indeed, characterizing male and female sexuality in this way suggests a tendency to view “the other” as an animal ruled by base nature…in other words, reductionist. The no-so-soft bigotry of low / no expectations is the name of the game here.

So it seems that hypergamy and koreogamy are concepts in need of rehabilitation. If we assume that both tendencies are truly hard-wired components of female and male sexuality, an assumption I think is valid, then it would be wise to act in accordance to this true fact. Both men and women would benefit from selecting their mates according to these behavioral inclinations, from positioning themselves in the SMP and, later, in marriage, according to these principles, and defending their bonds according to these principles. There are many who already do this: PUAs and so-called “Gamers” exploit SMP positioning to their notorious advantage, while “married gamers” like Athol Kay and Keoni Galt apply all three to their benefit as married men. For that matter, women also would benefit from exploiting koreogamy in their dating and married lives. They can leverage koreogamy, what they know men are hard-wired to seek, by deliberately marrying young, marrying a fellow older than she is, by staying fit, by offering fidelity and plenty of sex. All while capitalizing on their own innate hypergamic tendencies by selecting a man they look up to and then making the conscious choice to sidestep Eve’s Sin by following the “captain / first officer” model.

Getting back to the question emailed above, my interrogator wonders if men really believe that their wives/girlfriends, particularly Christian ones, are always on the prowl to one-up their husbands. Personally, I don’t think so, but it may appear that this opinion prevails in the manosphere because so many men have been on the wrong end of a woman’s hypergamous nature, and they may find in the manosphere a place that offers an explanation that fits their observations. These fellows may have been “bigger-better-dealed” by women, or have been traded in for a man more alpha than they were (whether that man was truly alpha, an alpha poseur, or the ultimate alpha, big sister government). They may have also simply become tired of observing feral females rejecting perfectly good men in their quest to follow feminism’s twin siren songs of “womanhood as sexual availability” and “empowerment”…and in the process engage in serial polyandry. It is this friction point where I think hypergamy gets such a bad name…sometimes the trait gets confused with the behavior. In between hypergamy and cheating on your reasonably high-ranking man with an even higher-ranking man lays choice. Women can choose to control their baser urges, to not upgrade from their present man, either by consciously, deliberately choosing to stay and not stray, by embedding herself in a social matrix that makes such thoughts unthinkable, or by internalizing a Faith that makes love for the Creator and accountability to Him their foremost priority in life. Or all of the above. And while we’re at it, the same applies to men as well. We fellows are not beasts, no matter what the materialists say, no matter how self-serving feminist agitprop paints us. The flesh, our hardwiring, while perhaps useful for the continuation of the species before we knew God,is weak. Criticizing hypergamy doesn’t get us very far, better for men (and women) to co-opt it to our mutual advantage.

Reviving Fund Drive

W.F. Price · 20 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I cut the last fund drive short to fix some things up on the server, because I don't like asking for support when things aren't running as smoothly as they ought to be. I fixed the server issue, and got a few other important things out of the way in the meanwhile. However, the fix cost money — the server now costs twice what it did before, and the bills are coming in.

At this point, I have a lot of time to devote to the site, and will for the foreseeable future. Some family issues have clicked into place and it's looking like things are going to be a lot more stable on that front (although family stability is something of the Holy Grail for non-custodial fathers, so maybe I shouldn't get too cocky). The only thing holding me back from pushing the site toward its potential now is the funding issue.

Current stats are about what they were for the last update, so instead of breaking that down again, I'll let readers know how I'm going to spend my time on the site every day:

First priority is publishing content, whether it is my own or submissions from others. My hope is that I can bring the content volume back up to what it was at its peak (average of about 15-20 posts per week) while keeping posts both interesting and well thought out. If you're a long-time reader, you know that I'll continue to be pretty liberal about topics and points of view, as I view The Spearhead's primary mission as publishing — that is, getting people's thoughts out there. That is the purpose of the site, and it takes priority over everything else. As an avid reader and consumer of content myself, I like to think people appreciate that.

At this point, this content remains entirely free to the casual reader and web surfer. It draws in newcomers every single day, and I hope it influences some people and gives them cause to think about what's going on in our society. I especially hope it gives them that extra perspective needed to grasp how absolutely backward some of the policies out there are, and how much of what is considered normal in the contemporary Western family is so radically wrong and unjust (for example, the state seizing children and making fathers pay for their terrible, crushing loss so women can indulge whims and fantasies with minimal hassle).

However, the content is not "free" for me. It takes a lot of work to keep it coming day after day. It takes both work and money to keep the site online and functional, and the costs come out of my pocket. Without support, I'd have to shut it down or radically curtail the content very quickly — neither the costs nor effort could be justified.

Fortunately, there's been enough support over the years for me to keep my head above water, but no more, because I only ask for help when it's needed. I figure that if I want to actually profit from this endeavor, I'm going to have to start selling content, and although I'd like to do that it would be a shame if The Spearhead had to go entirely commercial. That would detract from the site's mission, and it would necessarily restrict the topics and intellectual freedom of the content.

So, if you enjoy reading the content here and want to see the site remain online, please send some support my way through PayPal or the mail (the donation info is in the top right sidebar). I've received some generous donations that have been real lifesavers, and that also were crucial to convincing me to put a lot of effort into the site, but every little bit counts. In fact, if every regular reader only donated a few dollars a month it would be entirely sufficient. So, if you don't have much, don't feel embarrassed about sending a small donation — it is definitely appreciated. Because I don't have much discretionary income myself, I tend to send my favorite bloggers small donations here and there, and although it isn't a great deal, I know they appreciate it.

I'd like to thank everyone in advance, because I can't always do so personally, and assure you all that your support is deeply appreciated. Every single donation I receive reinforces my belief that this site is worth the effort, and gives me a sense of responsibility to readers. In particular, I'd like to thank those who have been in with The Spearhead for the long haul. It's been humbling to see that there are so many men out there who care about these issues as deeply as I do, and that they count on me to be their advocate is both touching and an honor.

Thanks, friends. It's been great so far, and I'd like to keep it going for a good while longer. With your help, that's what I'm going to do.

The Kyrios Principle, and the Road Back from Feminism

Featured Guest · 20 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Spanier

Feminism is petty, vain, and rife with internal contradictions. As an obvious example of the latter, the feminists complain about ridiculous things like how women are under-represented as fire fighters, yet when it comes to societies where women are indeed severely oppressed, as in Saudi Arabia, they utter not a word in protest. Clearly, feminism is nothing but a massive s— test directed at Western men, and one at which we have failed miserably.

It is critical for the men's movement to understand this point and its implications. For it means that it is our failure that is culpable for the rise of feminism and its many attendant ills. And it also means that ONLY WE can fix those problems.

In perusing men's rights blogs, one finds countless men who are practically blind with rage at women for various reasons– promiscuity, abortion, bogus rape accusations, confiscating assets in divorce. But this anger is all based on a false premise– namely, the idea of gender equality.

It is taken for granted in our society, and so ingrained in our culture as to be almost beyond question, that women are the equals of men in their sense of justice, their self-control, maturity and farsightedness, and their abilities to manage their own resources and act in their own best interests. This idea is modern, slick, simple, and completely wrong. It also runs contrary to millennia of experience and traditions, throughout all major civilizations, that do recognize qualitative differences between men and women, and assign them differing roles accordingly.

Once we see, and we certainly should by now, the many fallacies embedded in the idea of gender equality, we can begin to solve the problems caused by feminism. For if women do not, in general, have the same sense of justice and fairness that men have, then NEITHER CAN THEY BE HELD RESPONSIBLE for offenses in the same way men are. Fundamentally, it makes no more sense to be angry at a woman for being promiscuous than it does to be angry at a 2-year-old for pouring sugar in one's gas tank. The kid wasn't supervised properly; he didn't know what he was doing; it's really the parents' fault.

So how do we atone for our failure of will, and put the feminist genie back in the bottle? The answer is to restore the patriarchy and re-adopt some of the older rules of conduct in male-female relations. A bit of study will show that the civilizations of the past– the societies that moved the human condition forward, that created progress and improved comfort for both men and women– had customs and assumptions that differ markedly from the mechanical views of gender equality that we hold today.

In making these corrections, of course, we will not revert to such extremes of repression as are seen in some savage cultures. No woman will be forced to marry, nor will cruel treatment of wives by their husbands be condoned. However, a few new, but also radical– i.e., traditional– ground rules are in order.

First of all, as in classical Greece, every unmarried woman needs a kyrios. This is a male guardian with whom she has a positive, long-term, but non-sexual relationship. Typically, this will be her father, but could also be a brother, a priest, or possibly even an ex-boyfriend or -husband. The kyrios must protect her, look out for her best interests and help her to select an appropriate mate. If a man sees a woman he is interested in romantically, his first priority should be to find out who her kyrios is, and negotiate with him for her companionship. The kyrios should also be available during the relationship to help smooth out any problems that may arise.

When it comes to selection of a mate, it is best if the woman and her kyrios agree on the choice of a suitor. If they cannot reach an agreement, then the woman can marry whomever she wishes (or remain single). Doing so, however, would jeopardize whatever other benefits she derives from her relationship with the kyrios. Furthermore, a suitor should have fair warning of the situation, and should ask himself: if she won't obey her kyrios, what reason do I have to think that she'll obey me?

The kyrios system is simply an expression of the idea that a woman's sexuality is too important and valuable for her to manage on her own. We have seen the frightful results of allowing women free rein over their own choice in partners– put bluntly, there are very few long-term conjugal relationships in the absence of a surrounding patriarchical social network.

The kyrios system requires no legal changes, and in theory, is actually not much different from our current one. After all, two people cannot just get married on their own– at least one other person must be involved to officiate and legalize the arrangement. In principle, the officiating party ought to take some responsibility for becoming acquainted with the couple, and mentoring them, and should also have some share of personal accountability for the success or failure of the marriage.

The main task in implementing the kyrios system is in educating fathers about the need to take an active and protective role in their daughters' lives at least up until their marriages, and to plan for their long term interests in ways that they cannot do on their own. While we do not propose instituting forced or arranged marriages, the current system goes to the other extreme by providing no guidance whatsoever on the choice of partners. The practice of throwing young people out into a figurative goldfish bowl, and hoping for the best, is clearly not working.

The second change is also cultural, and involves educating girls and young women on the responsibilities of marriage. Early feminists complained of the stifling strictures of marriage, which they claimed prevented women from reaching their potential as literary and artistic figures. Be that as it may, most women are going to be happier and more fulfilled in stable marriages than as spinsters, and once they have chosen marriage they need to meet the requirements of the role. These include faithfulness and obedience to their husbands, as well as consistency in doing domestic tasks such as cooking and cleaning. Important steps in this direction would be restoring the study of home economics for girls in primary and secondary schools, and reviving the institution of finishing schools for college-age women.

The third change should be an overhaul of the divorce laws, to restore ownership of property and children to the party– usually the man– who has paid for the acquisition and maintenance thereof. A society obviously cannot survive long when it allows women to divorce their husbands while also laying claim to his assets and children. And a woman certainly cannot be permitted to have an abortion against her husband's wishes.

A question may arise as to a woman's rights when the husband initiates a divorce. Biblical passages (see Exodus 21:10) as well as basic concepts of justice would indicate that she should not be left without support. It remains to investigate how extensive a problem this was, from a practical standpoint, prior to the introduction of modern divorce laws.

In short, we propose here changes in culture and attitudes that correspond to natural differences among the sexes– not to make women "second class citizens" or "chattel property" or any such figments of feminist hyperbole, but to restore a civilization where both men and women can be reasonably content in their relationships and productive in their lives.

Feminist Censorship

By Ethical

As followers of the men's rights movement (MRM) we can't help but second guess the direction the movement's leaders have taken. Thousands of well-written articles on countless blogs, so many devastatingly clear facts on our side, and yet we seem to be making such slow progress towards solutions. All this makes young men, already prone to doing their own thing, even more difficult to involve in growing the movement. Not that this isn't understandable. If it's true that attention spans of young men are fleeting except when seized by anticipation of imminent danger and excitement, young men might drift away after waiting fruitlessly for the MRM's strongly worded articles to provoke an explosive reaction on hitting the newsstand. Because all they've heard so far is silence. The fact remains there are virtually no male MRM writers published in the broader public media at all. Outside of the websites in the manosphere you have to look hard to see where our words have even caused a ripple.

What's often overlooked when we try to address the MRM's comparative lack of exposure (as opposed to feminism lurking everywhere) is that beyond us in the MRM raising the bar by accumulating even more convincing facts, beyond us laying out even more logical and gripping arguments, beyond us capturing even more emotionally moving stories, there is the simple unassailable truth that as far as the popular media goes, pervasive and unrelenting feminist censorship makes these efforts moot. Because in virtually every mass media outlet in the country, whether conservative or liberal, whether Republican or Democrat, editorial policy overwhelmingly prohibits men from publishing articles on men's rights. The few writers editors allow to publish articles on these issues are women. Some of these women represent the cause admirably, but nevertheless men's voices are banned from being heard.

So I understand why not too long ago, popular game blogger Roosh called out the MRM for being ineffectual and cautioned young men against joining. Commenting on what he saw as the MRM's seeming impotence in the face of feminism's GREAT WALL OF ENFORCED SILENCE, he accused the MRM of "not getting the job done". To true believers like yours truly his words stung like iodine on a friction burn. From the popularity of his website, and a review of the comments on the post, young men are listening too. The web information company alexa.com ranks Rooshv.com at 22,967 in the US by web traffic. Roosh nearly outranks feministing.com and its entire 11 woman staff who together garner only a slightly greater traffic rank of 19,666 in comparison, despite the fact Roosh is creating content alone.

Of course to be fair to the MRM, in my view Roosh's "facts" about the MRM not having delivered are extremely flawed. In reality the MRM has been successful in lobbying for shared parenting legislation or a presumption of joint custody in a number of US states as well as in other jurisdictions worldwide such as Australia and the U.K.

Feminism's female supremacists are recognizing this too. One article entitled "Men's Rights" Groups Have Become Frighteningly Effective " said the following of the group "RADAR" which the article described as falling under "the broader umbrella of the men's rights movement":

> … lately the group and its many partners have been racking up very real accomplishments. In 2008, the organization claimed to have blocked passage of four federal domestic-violence bills, among them an expansion of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) to international scope and a grant to support lawyers in pro bono domestic-violence work. Members of this coalition have gotten themselves onto drafting committees for VAWA's 2011 reauthorization. Local groups in West Virginia and California have also had important successes, criminalizing false claims of domestic violence in custody cases, and winning rulings that women-only shelters are discriminatory.

Curiously just like the MRM, Roosh and his young followers seem to have no doubt that popular opinion and therefore government policy is based on blatant feminist misinformation that they also find deeply objectionable. Still they see no sense joining the MRM's effort to lobby our governments in order to remove the deeply feminist biases, just as they see no sense in trying to stem the barrage of feminist propaganda that misinforms the public into supporting those feminist policies. But in the interest of openness to the truth, the feedback of these young men isn't to be discounted. In fact their apathy begs the question: " why do men who take issue with feminist doctrine universally perceive feminist censorship to be so widespread, oppressive, and unchangeable"?

According to psychologists who've studied the phenomenon of women demanding men be censored from speaking the truth, both feminist censorship, and young men responding to feminist misinformation largely with apathy, might be inevitable. It turns out that in forums where supposedly both men's and women's opinions are welcomed, while men tend to be truly comfortable only if they're free to speak their opinions, women tend to be comfortable only if forums are free of opinions they find disagreeable. As a result women tend to want men banned from forums if the men express opinions the women disagree with. GirlWritesWhat speaks eloquently about this at 17:30 in her video entitled "Men not marrying? How deep does "the problem" go?"

> "Plain speech … [is] often discouraged when women are present in order to spare feelings and prevent discomfort. Outspokenness is replaced with drawing new rules of discourse, and ingenuity with protocol all of which render a feminized [environment]"

Though men will typically put up with it she says, they tune out, conceivably resulting in the apathy noted previously. Thus supposedly public forums become spaces men are no longer interested in participating in because without an equal accommodation of men's need to speak freely, such forums are no longer welcoming to men. GirlWritesWhat elaborates at 20:10 in the same video:

> Where are men retreating to? They're retreating to the internet to the few men's spaces that haven't tailored their rules of conduct to suit women's easily offended natures and need for comfort"

Knowing we can't be heard in the popular media, young and old we come to the manosphere to share knowledge. But as Roosh might ask what's our end game in doing so? Are we in the MRM gathering facts and statistics in preparation for an honest debate while feminists are laughing behind the scenes after having already called security to keep us out of the debate hall?

Make no mistake that men are excluded wherever our interests run counter to feminism. There are countless examples of feminists censoring men from discussions surrounding gender issues this way.

> "Lace Curtain" – the tendency of most major institutions to interpret gender issues from only a feminist perspective or from a combination of feminist and female perspectives.
> Dr. Warren Farrell, The Lace Curtain, menweb.org

> "This is pretty much the norm on feminist websites"
> KrissytheWorldWithin, Censorship in Feminist Media (a feminist woman objecting to feminism's censorship)

For feminists the only legitimate rebuttal in any debate is another brand of feminism. No doubt if each purports to be the "true" feminism, then hearing both out is always in the interest of women. Otherwise there can be no dissenting opinions, there is only feminism and "hate speech". And hate speech of course needs to be banned.

> The Southern Poverty Law Center, or SPLC, names Men's Rights Activists as a hate group, citing the MRAs' … virulent misogyny, spreading of false anti-woman propaganda and applauding and even encouraging acts of domestic terrorism and extreme violence against women and children, up to and including murder.

True there are some feminists who openly acknowledge having an agenda of censorship, i.e. those who would either ban pornography or at the very least enable women to sue pornographers for damages:

> [Catharine A. McKinnon's] 1993 book, Only Words… opposing the US constitution's first amendment interpretation of pornography as protected speech … considered it hate speech … "the graphic sexually explicit subordination of women through pictures or words" … with real power … to cause the rape and murder of women.

> Stuart Jeffries, The Guardian, writing on Are women human? by Catharine A. MacKinnon

But there are other feminists who just as militantly insist that asking women to refrain from any level of nudity or sexuality (particularly lesbian sexuality) on the grounds of its inappropriateness in certain circumstances, is an either an outright assault on women's sexual freedom, or a misogynist hatred of women's bodies.

> "The Body Is Not An Apology, an international movement focused on radical self-love and body empowerment, account was SUSPENDED from Facebook after posting a photo of an empowered female

Since restriction of women's right to sexual expression is the only type of censorship feminists acknowledge, in their minds they're actually the victims of censorship rather than its perpetrators, since television networks, film and music companies still have the right to censor the [women] artists whose work they produce.

> Without the liberty to protest, parody, and mock sexism, and to communicate information about women's lives (including their sexual lives), women could not have made progress toward equality in the workplace or broken down sexist stereotypes in pop culture.

That feminists contend women are the real victims of censorship despite the massive devastation feminist censorship imposes against men leaves us incredulous. Standing just beyond the reach of feminism's mind control rays, we have to marvel at such evidence of the collective rationalization hamster on steroids, spinning millions of mental hamster wheels furiously to outrace the truth in order to reach another irrational conclusion.

Little wonder few men young OR old really learn what men are up against until they're up against it themselves … completely unprepared and alone; never learning how much they're being shortchanged in the educational system until trying to see in hindsight why it failed them; never learning how much the family law system is stacked up against them until it's way too late to arrange their affairs defensively.

This censorship is measurable and verifiable. The specific mechanism by which it happens is the tendency for women as a group to suppress any opinion that isn't biased towards women, in contrast with the equally measurable and verifiable tendency for men not to support another man unless they specifically agree with the man's opinion.

GirlWritesWhat explains at 20:35 in her video entitled "How feminism conned society, and other not-so-tall tales"

> A 2004 study of gender differences in automatic in-group biases found that men lack a mechanism that bolsters automatic own-group preference. Only women showed this bias in all four experiments, and in 3 of them all subjects, male and female, showed a strong bias towards women. …" which is horrifying to me because it means women in power will act strongly in the interests of women, whereas men in power exhibit no own-group preference at all but will act more often than not in the interests of women as well.

She also states at 11:35 in "Men not marrying? How deep does "the problem" go?"

> "It's not that men can't manifest any form of own group preference, it's just that when own group preference manifests in males it just isn't based on maleness alone. There has to be a common purpose, a common set of ideals, or principles, a common sense of duty or cause …"

This censorship is now so pervasive all throughout society from academia on down we can no longer count the number of professors who have publicly criticized academia for having become the centers for mass indoctrination they now are, rather than the centers of higher learning they were supposed to be. We've reached an inflection point in history where censorship of the masses prevents wide dissemination of the truth, but the ubiquity of the internet extinguishes any possibility that the lies will go undetected.

All this brings the MRM to a devastating impasse. Newspapers and magazines know women will have deep objections to any article that doesn't blatantly favor women, many women going so far as calling efforts to address the increasingly poor educational success of boys or efforts to address the cruel imbalance against men in family court as "woman hating". Media outlets know as a result that women will effectively boycott any newspaper or magazine which prints articles championing men's rights, particularly if that article is written by a man. No sensible media company executive would print the truth under these circumstances, especially given that women control most of any household's spending on the products that businesses pay the newspaper money to advertise.

Since as a consequence men generally can't be paid for writing on men's rights the way women are paid for writing about feminism, this censorship also has a incalculably huge impact on any discussion that impacts public policy.

In fact the impact of this censorship is so severe it's enough to make us question our most fundamental and treasured assumptions about democracy as a whole, namely:

- that our democratic freedom of expression means we are effectively free to express our opinions
- that because we lack state censorship in our democracy, there is free access to information, and public opinion is formed through this free access
- that because our democracy is freely elected, public policy will be representative of that public opinion
- that because our elections are free and fair the interests of one demographic won't be over-represented far out of proportion to their relative population

Politicians offer platitudes about efforts towards evidence based government, but a creeping chill tells us the fundamental assumptions of our system are broken. Democracy 2.0 is long overdue.

When this censorship becomes a weapon enabling courts to illegally strip men of their children and property and to condemn men into alimony slavery on a routine basis, it makes such a mockery of democracy it's almost enough for us to even begin questioning our efforts to spread this "democracy" that has so betrayed us. Because if we've been betrayed so badly there could be no greater political sleight of hand than causing us to spend billions sponsoring foreign wars that destabilize the countries we need for resources, that run foreign streets red with blood in the name of encouraging the very system that grinds us down daily with its suppression of THE TRUTH. Not that I'm any man's revolutionary. I know which side my own bread is so generously buttered on. With my oversized SUV, with my blue-tooth car phone system, with my car's GPS navigation, I'd be the last to demand non-interventionist foreign policy if oil would become so expensive ambulances couldn't afford gas to get my elderly parents to the hospital if one was dying, or supermarkets couldn't afford to transport the produce I need to feed my children with. Still if faced with anything short of that kind of duress I would choose to live with less because no one wants to be part of doing EVIL unto others. And I would start living with less by demanding less feminist government intervention in my family affairs.

But back to feminism; why should feminists be so threatened by an honest discussion that they'll go so far as undermining our very democracy this way to censor away any dissension?

> Censorship has always been a hatred of the truth
> Barbarossa, Feminists resort to censorship … again

Because feminism's censorship is highly effective. But there's no disputing that it creates such systemic misinformation it breaks all the above assumptions about the merits of democracy. Basing public policy on this systemic misinformation is devastating. Much of the cruelty inflicted against men and children in courtrooms as a result of unjust rulings happens because of misinformation spread by these feminists, including the misinformation fueling the domestic violence industry, the misinformation leading family court judges to value fathers only in terms of the money that can be stripped from them rather than placing a value on giving children time with fathers, or the misinformation that women earn two thirds of what men earn.

So rather than question our “end game”, given all we’ve had to fight just to speak our piece, we in the MRM need to give ourselves a break for sometimes seeming to make slow progress. Having myself just finished writing “We’re Stupid and We’ll Die”, an article criticizing the majority of men for complicity in having created this feminist mess, that goes double for me. Contrary to feminism’s assertion that we “the patriarchy” control everything, with feminism’s censorship we’ve literally had to battle the entire corporate and government establishment to make whatever progress we’ve made. We can only be proud of what we’ve accomplished. We can even take some encouragement from the seeming disengagement of young men. Because despite all the censorship, despite truth of the anti-male injustice being largely hidden from all except those who actively go out of their way to search for it, young men are still in record numbers refusing to swallow the humiliating feminist propaganda pissed on their heads since birth, and in those same large numbers they’re also finding places online where they aren’t so castrated. Not all of them may be coming to the MRM, but regardless of whether they wind up at one of Roosh’s sites, or anywhere in the Roissysphere, they’ll get a dose of red pill knowledge just the same.

It’s ironic that as democracy in its current form races towards a hard stop against the limitations on honest discussion, we as a society will survive or perish on the backs of these young men. We can only hope after they’ve taken the red pill they still agree to carry us. These are the same young men who increasingly will have endured frustrated childhoods filled with the court’s refusal to listen when they asked for more time with their fathers, who will have been shafted out of an education and become unemployable because of education policies that openly favored already high achieving girls, who will have been passed over for whatever jobs there were left because they lacked a vagina, and who will have seen from the experiences of their fathers and uncles that divorce laws are too savagely misandrist for them to care in the first place about becoming a cubicle drone just to one day save enough to get married. God forbid these young men might get a little angry and opt out of any social or economic roles we need them to fill when they discover that on top of everything else, they mattered so little to us we allowed them to be emasculated by feminism’s lies all their lives as well because it was too much of an inconvenience to fight this feminist censorship. These chickens WILL come home to roost. It’s too much to hope that feminism will reverse its course before they do; the gender dynamics driving women to vote for female supremacist policies and men not to resist seem to be innate in the current system.

Fortunately, as compulsively as they censor the truth now, feminists could also conceivably lift the veil of lies for their own self interest. Because you don’t have to look far to see how well the rights of women will be protected in a rag tag nation of unemployable, disenfranchised, betrayed, and very angry young men. God forbid indeed.

Have a Happy Thanksgiving!

I'm headed out to pick up the kids presently, and am looking forward to being with the family over the holiday. The weather is miserable, wet and stormy, but I feel fine.

As usual, it's important to keep those who don't have the opportunity to be with their families in mind — especially those whose children have been cruelly torn away from them by a hostile, uncaring state. The holidays are always particularly difficult for those who are alone, so it's always a good idea to reach out to those people you know who could use some company this time of year.

That said, if you've got a long journey ahead, may it be safe and uneventful!

Enjoy the feast and time with family.

Child Support: A Tax to Encourage Single Motherhood

W.F. Price · 26 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It will probably be a difficult process, but eventually conservatives and those who want to restore marriage are going to have to come to terms with the fact that one of their favorite causes – forcing fathers to pay child support no matter what the circumstances – is directly responsible for the rise in single motherhood. I'm not sure whether we can say for sure that it is responsible for the decline of marriage, because that seems to be happening in Asian countries where child support is neither routine nor enforced, but it is an enormous factor in rising illegitimacy.

Combined with welfare and no-fault divorce, automatic child support has given millions of women all the justification they need to take the plunge and become single mothers. Since the 1960s, it has risen in both relative and absolute terms, coming to replace welfare for lower-income mothers in many instances and serving as an alimony enhancement for the middle and upper classes.

And make no mistake: child support is a tax. When the government forces you to pay no matter what the circumstances, and penalizes you for not doing so, what else could it be? Although some may argue that because the money is not directly provided to the state it is not a tax, the logic behind child support gives the lie to this particular argument. It is used to prevent mothers from going on the dole, and it is also used to reimburse the state for expenditures on mothers and their illegitimate children, therefore child support is directly tied to state expenses.

In short, child support is a tax designed to incentivize single motherhood, and it has done a fine job of it. Without government-enforced payments to mothers (well over 90% of all child support goes to mothers), illegitimacy would be a fraction of what it is today. Women frequently justify child support as something a man should pay merely for not "keeping it in his pants" (this despite the fact that many men who pay child support actually married the women who receive the payment, and were left for no fault of their own), but why is it that while a man must pay for failing to keep his pants on, a woman gets paid for the same? Surely there can be no moral lesson in such a setup, as one party is rewarded while another is punished for the same act. It is akin to letting one keep the spoils while jailing another for robbing a bank.

However, it is going to take a profound change in attitude before people begin to see it for what it is. Fortunately, there are signs that this change is occurring. While traditional Western norms see females as blameless angels, tradition is rapidly disappearing before our eyes, and it is likely that a far different attitude will emerge in the near future.

In the meanwhile, we'll have to go against the prevailing sense of right and wrong and advocate for the abolition of involuntary child support. If a man's children are removed from him, or he never had a chance to act as a father, he should not under any circumstances be forced to pay for children that are wholly owned possessions of some woman who has no obligations to him. If the law says that a man has no rights to his children and no authority over them, then he should have no responsibility for them, either. A woman who chooses to be a single mother should be single in every sense of the word. She cannot call herself a "single mother" when she is receiving involuntary payments from some man, but rather the "missus" to a man under peonage. There is nothing single about a woman who is still being paid by a man.

If a man voluntarily leaves his wife and children it is another, touchier matter, as he has broken his promises, but even here we should tread very carefully in getting the state involved, because as we have seen one thing leads to another. It may be immoral for a man to do this, but it is far rarer than for a woman to seize her husband's children and run to another man, which is equally immoral yet goes unpunished (it is rewarded, actually) today. Additionally, a woman in such a situation may deserve sympathy, and find it easier to marry than the typical single mother. The few men who do abandon their families, therefore, probably do not justify legislation that can be applied to all manner of dissolutions.

For many readers here, these are not particularly radical ideas, but we should keep in mind that for most Americans child support is taken for granted as a “good thing.” Even men rarely question it until they find themselves victims, so arguing for its abolition may come off as quite radical. However, as you can see, it’s pretty easy to make solid arguments against it, because given the results, the practice cannot be justified. I’d advise focusing on those results, and asking supporters whether state-enforced child support is really worth the illegitimacy, the delinquent, fatherless youths and broken families. Point out that despite years of enforcement, fathers are less a part of their children’s lives than ever, and tax expenditures on mothers as high as ever on a per child basis.

It’s time to ask politicians why they are promoting illegitimacy, adultery and broken families. How does that benefit their constituents?

Combat Zones as Maternity Wards

W.F. Price · 27 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In more feminist silliness, it turns out that a British "soldier" gave birth to a baby in a combat field hospital a couple months ago. I thought it was bad enough that so many women in the US Navy were pregnant, but this takes the cake:

> (CBS/AP) LONDON – A British soldier who was complaining of stomach pains gave birth to a son while serving in Afghanistan at the same camp where Prince Harry is deployed and a Taliban attack last week killed two U.S. Marines.
> Britain's defense ministry said Thursday the soldier told authorities she had not been aware she was pregnant and only consulted doctors on the day that she went into labor.
>
> The birth in a combat zone field hospital is thought to be the first ever case of its type for Britain's military.
> Britain's defense ministry said Thursday that it had not been aware the soldier was pregnant, and stressed that it does not allow female soldiers to deploy on operation if they are pregnant. It declined to say whether the soldier, who has not been named, was aware of her pregnancy.
> "Mother and baby are both in a stable condition in the hospital and are receiving the best possible care," the ministry said in a statement. It said a team of doctors would fly out to Afghanistan in the coming days to help the solider and her son return safely to Britain.
> Although the soldier's child was conceived before her tour of duty began in March, she is not likely to face censure. Britain has sent female soldiers home from wars after they became pregnant – including about 60 from Afghanistan – but hasn't previously had a servicewoman go into labor in a war zone.
> In 2009, the U.S. military in Iraq issued a policy that could punish soldiers who became pregnant there and their sexual partners – then quickly rescinded it after a storm of criticism…

The article goes on to make up excuses for the woman, saying that she may not have known she was pregnant, but that raises the question of why such a stupid person is in the military in the first place. In all likelihood, she knew, and just didn't want to tell anyone for one reason or another.

Notice above where the US military cannot even discipline female soldiers for getting knocked up while on duty for fear of feminist backlash. Yet another reason women in the military was a terrible idea. I bet a woman who lost a baby as a result of an enemy mortar attack in a combat zone would sue the military for failing to adequately protect her and her unborn child. Just wait and see — it will happen, and the taxpayer will be forced to pay.

How much did it cost for that "team of doctors" to fly to Afghanistan and back to bring precious safely home? What a joke…

First Female USMC Infantry Candidates Wash Out

W.F. Price · 27 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

President Obama has ordered the armed forces to integrate women, and the USMC has now opened infantry training to women. Out of 80 female officers in the first eligible group, only two signed up for the USMC officer infantry training program, which requires a significant amount of physical strength and endurance to complete. On average about 25% of men fail the course for one reason or another. Unsurprisingly, both women failed it, with one dropping out on the first day and another withdrawing due to "unspecified medical reasons" a little over a week in. The two women joined some 30 men who also failed to make the cut.

The USMC requires above average physical strength and endurance from men, and very few women possess are at that level. In fact, for women it is a higher hurdle than it might appear at first glance, because a woman who can match in one particular trait, such as strength, typically cannot match the same man in speed, endurance or other physical abilities. For example, a female Olympic weightlifter may be able to lift as much as the average male marine, but she will be short and stocky and prone to overheating on long marches. She'll also be slow and clumsy on agility tests. A women who can run as fast and far as male marines is likely built like a whippet, and can't even lift the standard rucksack. One who can do the pull-ups is probably under 5 feet tall and weighs 90 lbs, and so on…

Of course, there is now a mandate to have women in combat, so someone is going to come in and make changes to the infantry training program so that women can pass it. Marine Corps officials are already talking about "gender neutral" (i.e. lower) physical standards.

So, once again, we see our elected officials hard at work spending our money to make the US military less efficient and less capable. Feminism is now an expense one cannot avoid anywhere, even in matters as fundamental as national defense.

The end result will be a weaker, more expensive military — one that provides both paychecks and self-esteem boosts to people who can't even perform the job. Kinda like our wonderful public schools.

Yet More from our Brave Women in Uniform

W.F. Price · 27 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Four women filed suit for the right to serve in combat in San Francisco today, demanding the military officially call them combat soldiers. Of course, none of them are really suited to engage in combat, but they want to be called warriors nonetheless.

Typically, by this point, there would be a chorus of feminists telling me Ms. Farrell is far tougher than I am, and could easily kick my ass, beat me in war, etc. But just look at the girl. This is a joke. I'm an out-of-shape, nearly middle-aged guy and I could kick her ass with one hand tied behind my back.

But anyone who says such a thing must support violence against women, right?

This is where they're covered on both sides. On the one hand, you say she can't hack it as a soldier and you're accused of being an anti-equality bigot, and on the other you say "OK, let's put her to the test" and suddenly you're an abusive monster.

We simply can't win one way or the other, which is why I recommend simply letting them claim to be full-fledged soldiers, giving them a gun and the standard equipment, and sending them out on some mission in Afghanistan. At this point, who gives a damn what happens? She and her sisters-in-arms would get cut to pieces, but we don't even have the money to pay for the subsequent lawsuit any longer, so might as well let her have her wish.

It's time men finally recognized that this isn't our country any longer. Let the girls play their games, take all the money, call themselves soldiers and so forth. The sooner it falls apart the better for us.

Now that we're calling people who are innately better suited to giving hummers than to driving in them soldiers, it's time to call it quits. I just hope we can decommission the nukes fast enough to prevent a global catastrophe.

Feminism's Differential Demographic Impact

W.F. Price · 28 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I've predicted on a number of occasions that whites will grow increasingly conservative as the post-1980 fertility gap between liberals and conservatives begins to really show itself amongst adults. Before 1980 or so, liberal and conservative whites had roughly the same number of children. Abortion may have had some role in changing that, but more important, I suspect, is careerism for more liberal-minded women. Women who care more about their careers have fewer children, because their period of ambition coincides with their fertility (likely for hormonal reasons, interestingly enough). Additionally, those whites who have liberal attitudes toward sex and marriage and opt to divorce tend to have fewer children, since most divorces occur relatively early – during or shortly after peak fertility – and single/divorced white women have a low birth rate.

Although I focus mainly on whites (I try to stay on familiar territory, but others with different perspectives are always welcome to send in an article), there has been another significant fertility trend in the black population that is worth looking into. Black fertility has fallen sharply in the last couple decades. Much faster than white fertility, although it still remains incrementally higher. However, the black fertility pattern is significantly different. Where the relatively conservative white middle class remains the most fertile white demographic, the black middle class has seen its fertility all but wiped out, even as more blacks than ever have joined its ranks.

It's pretty clear that feminism and women's lib have had an impact on white fertility trends, but what about black fertility? Does feminism have anything to do with it? Feminism has lowered young black women's fertility by providing birth control, abortion and incentives to remain childless, which is mirrored in young white women of comparable socioeconomic levels. It seems that some aspects of feminism have had roughly the same result in both white and black populations, but what happened to the black middle class?

What has killed black middle class fertility and family formation is the more coercive, nastier form of feminism, which has hit the black male population with disproportionate force.

By this, I mean the punitive provisions of the 1994 crime bill and the Violence Against Women Act (not to mention earlier innovations in the child support industry). Plenty of white men have fallen victim to the excesses of contemporary family law, but the more fragile state of marriage in the black population has made it an even more critical issue for black men, and particularly those who are of a more sober, responsible disposition, because they end up paying most dearly.

Think about it this way: If you are some no-account petty crook, the state isn't going to care much if you don't pay a dime of child support. Sure, it makes for great headlines and talk show fare when you have some guy who knocked up a dozen or so women, but there isn't much you can do about these knuckleheads. Put one in jail for arrears, and another instantly springs up to take his place (putting the mothers in jail would work better — females are the true key to birth control).

However, if you're a relatively high earner, industrious and walk the straight and narrow, you're a much, much bigger target. And if you're a married black man, chances are you will be divorced at some point, probably while the kids are still minors, and the courts won't be any nicer to you because you've got a job (although a lot of poor fools seem to think they will). If you're single, you probably know that. So what does the intelligent, responsible black man do? He stays the hell away from marriage and does his best not to get a woman pregnant, choosing instead to keep what he earns and enjoy his liberty. All he needs to do to take the red pill is open his eyes and look around — it's too obvious to ignore. As for black women, thanks to aggressive affirmative action, the more responsible among them are foisted into careers that all but guarantee limited fertility, and the prospect of single motherhood is no more attractive to them than to comparable white women.

Certain segments of the white population have developed a sort of limited immunity to the more damaging effects of feminism. Some do it by delaying marriage, and others through clinging to religion and tradition. It's far from perfect, but it works for enough people to keep the damage under control. Although I doubt it's the only factor, I'm pretty sure that the fact that whites are less urban than blacks gives them an advantage in this regard as well. Urban white fertility is abysmal, but there are enough whites out in the suburbs and exurbs to make up for it. The contemporary urban environment is utterly toxic to married couples, and it will likely stay that way for a long time to come, so those who remain in cities – no matter what race they are – will tend to be a lot more cautious about getting hitched. Unfortunately, it will typically be those who are less cautious and responsible who will have the highest fertility in cities.

Because of geography and divorce rates, among other factors such as female-targeted AA in schools and professions, feminism has a decidedly different demographic effect on blacks than on whites. Where whites are winnowed largely at the top and the bottom through careerism and more effective birth control, the black middle class is taking the biggest hit to its fertility. While it is true that the fertility rate of the black underclass has dropped, in relative terms (to other blacks) it has risen substantially over the past couple decades, which will not have particularly positive effects on black human capital in years to come.

The trends point to the emergence of an even greater future divide between white and black populations in the US, because while feminism is ensuring that liberal whites fail to reproduce at replacement rate, it is killing the incipient black middle class in the womb. Neither outcome will reinforce feminist ideals, but it isn't exactly cause for celebration either, because the result will be further political and racial polarization and the trouble that comes along with it.

Eventually – and probably fairly soon – race will overshadow feminism in national politics, and all the recent talk about the supreme importance of catering to women will be forgotten, especially as the white female vote declines in importance. However, the ethnic bifurcation of the future United States will have been significantly exaggerated by feminist policies which, as it turns out, do not result in equal outcomes for different populations.

A Man's Weakness Is His False Guilt

Featured Guest · 29 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Joe Zamboni

One of the major hurdles that American men must clear, before they can confidently speak up about all the injustice done against men and boys, is their false guilt. In a twisted form of machismo, many American men make believe that they don't feel false guilt because they are, after all, a man. In this denial, they perpetuate a falsehood. In this denial, they disempower themselves. This brief article examines some perverse aspects of that false guilt.

It's all around American men, in the movies, in books, in magazines, and in the mouths, or perhaps I should say coming out of the mouths, of so many women. I am talking about male put-downs with a twist to them, all in effect implying "you men have no right to complain." We the American males are told that it is "a man's world," we are told that we benefit from the "old boys network," we are told that we enjoy the many benefits of the "patriarchy." Never mind the fact that all these are myths, what's important is that so many of us men on some level suspect that these allegations might be true.

A man's weakness is his turning away, his denial, his distancing from the very painful issues that he believes he cannot deal with. If these and related myths about alleged male superiority, male favoritism, male advantages, and the like, were to be confronted head on, with a dedication to openness and truth, they would soon be shown to be both phantoms and the manipulative illusions of bad-intentioned feminist windbags. Men are by nature forthright, logic-oriented, fact-based, practical, strong, protective, and courageous. All of these positive attributes can and will be of great usefulness when confronting and dispelling these phantoms and illusions.

Man's real strength can be further released when he sees that his great weakness is his false guilt. By an honest and direct confrontation of how he has unnecessarily kept himself back, how he has bit his tongue, how he has felt unworthy to step into a position of receiving and being treated equally, by that confrontation will he stop denying his humanity. He is after all just as good as woman, and a full member of the human race. There is nothing inherently inferior about man in comparison to woman, just as there is nothing inherently inferior about woman in comparison to man. Each gender has its own areas of strength and weakness — whatever your judgments about those might be.

In the space of embracing his equality with woman, man can stop unconsciously trying to compensate for the alleged advantages that he enjoys. When man thinks that he has taken on a position of superiority or special advantage — and he has plenty of feminist-inspired indoctrination in modern America to adopt such a thought — then he will unconsciously attempt to right the alleged out-of-balance condition. Then he will consequently accept dangerous and low-status jobs that no self-respecting woman would perform, he will accept verbal abuse that no self-respecting woman would put up with, and he will likewise accept physical abuse at the hands of his mate that no self-respecting woman would permit. Thus the false guilt perversely encourages man not to speak up, not to stand in his truth, and not to seek either justice or balance.

Reconciliation with woman is not possible as long as the truth is not out in the open, is not embraced by both genders, and is not the starting point for moving in the direction of love, acceptance, mutual support, and harmonious coexistence on this planet. And there will be no pulling down of the mask that denies the false guilt if man believes that nothing good can come from it. Herein lies the challenge and apparent paradox: it is only through the embracing of our imperfections, our incompleteness, and our humanity in all its many forms, that we men can move to the next level of evolution in our relationships with women.

It is time for us men to go beyond righting the many specific wrongs that we experience (gender specific child support obligations, enslaving alimony judgments, false rape claims, etc.), it is time to step up to a position of leadership in gender relations. It is time for men to advocate a position of true equal treatment and mutual respect. Whatever women have, men should be able to have that too, and of course vice versa. For example, the default moral goodness so often attributed to women should not be granted to women alone, but should be given to men as well. The much ballyhooed and allegedly superior feminine characteristics such as being compassionate, should tempered with widespread public appreciation for positive male characteristics such as courage. Likewise, men should not be expected to carry the burden of the shadow in the human psyche. They should not for example be expected to automatically be the one at fault if there is domestic violence within a household.

So let's together step into the space that there is nothing about which we men need to be ashamed, there is nothing about being male that is inferior, lacking, or in need of apology. From that starting point we can directly confront the oppressive mind games of the feminists and move into our rightful position of free and emancipated human beings.

CNN Summons Michael Kimmel to Discredit Suzanne Venker

W.F. Price · 30 November 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Whenever someone semi-mainstream says or does something that goes against the prevailing dogma, there's always some smarmy "expert" who emerges to tell people how to be goodthinkers.

Suzanne Venker recently wrote a piece about the "war on men," suggesting that women ought to quit trying to act like men and stop seeing men as the enemy. Venker is correct that there is a war on men, but in truth there always has been — it's just different now in that women are in on the action.

History is a never-ending tale of men trying to one-up each other, destroy the competition, enslave or entrap other men for their personal benefit and so on. Michael Kimmel is one of these guys who lives off other men's misery, but he's worse than most because he's a con man. He tells men that what is clearly bad for them is good, all the while claiming the moral high ground.

To discredit Venker, Kimmel resorts to the old trick of insinuating racism; a particularly clumsy sleight of hand in this case:

> Some years ago, I appeared on a well-known television talk show opposite four "angry white men": four men who believed they had been discriminated against in the workplace by affirmative action programs initiated, they argued, by feminist women.
> Each man told his story of how he was qualified for a job or qualified for a promotion that he did not get because of this putative reverse discrimination against white men. One ended his remarks with a line that served as the title for this show: "A black woman stole my job," he declared.
> Asked to respond, I had but one question for these guys, a question about the title of the show. Actually, my question was about one word in the title of the show. I wanted to know about the word "my." Why did the men think it was their job? Why wasn't the title of the show "A black woman got a job" or "A black woman got the job"? The answer, I argued, was that these men felt entitled to the position, and that any effort to make the workplace more equal was perceived, by those men, as a loss.
> I thought of those men recently while reading Suzanne Venker's addled rant against feminist women as the source of the unhappiness that saturates male-female relationships. I thought of how painful it is when you are used to having everything to now have only 80%. What a loss! Poor us! Equality sucks when you've been on top — and men have been on top for so long that we think it's a level playing field.

Besides the fact that including women as affirmative action beneficiaries resulted in black and white women taking jobs that were originally intended to go to black men (not important to Kimmel), it's pretty clear that this guy has nothing but contempt for men, white ones in particular. He goes so far as to suggest that calling a job "my job" somehow indicates selfishness and a pathological attitude.

How about this, Kimmel:

Let's start instituting affirmative action custody and child support. We should start taking single mothers' children and turning them over to the fathers, and giving the mothers the privilege of paying a quarter of their pre-tax income to babydaddy. If a mother says "they took my children," then Kimmel can ask her "what made you think they were your children?"

But Kimmel will never, ever suggest custody equality. If you press him on the issue I can guarantee that he would support the status quo, which is anything but equal. He will say something like this: "fathers' desire to have equal custody is only a result of their feeling of ownership of their children, and their wish to dominate their children's mothers."

However, you'll also hear Kimmel say that men should do more housework and childcare, but hey, if she leaves tough luck mister — there go your kids, your house, your paycheck…

This is why Kimmel and his cronies are a real problem. They preach this lovey-dovey equality, but in practice they support very real policemen and judges taking things from you. They'll say "we can have a wonderful, equal society where we're all happy, fulfilled little persons." What they are thinking is "if you don't get with the program, we're going to have the police lock you in a cage made of steel and concrete."

Here's his happy equal people spiel:

> the empirical evidence suggests that men are quietly adapting to a very new landscape. Most of the 400 young men (aged 16-26) who I interviewed for my book "Guyland" assume, without resentment, that their wives will be as fully committed to their careers as they are. Why? Because they'll need the income. And they assume, with no resentment, that they will be involved fathers, spending far more time with their families than their parents or grandparents ever did. Why? Because they actually want to be involved dads.
> They all have friends of the opposite sex ("When Harry Met Sally's" dictum to the contrary), which bodes well for their ability to be more equal coworkers and colleagues with women they consider their peers.
> Stop the madness. There's no war between the sexes. Men and women can, and should, be allies. And they are becoming more equal, and happier, every single day.

What a load. All you have to do to see how "happy" young men and women are with each other is take a look at the personal ads online, where you'll find an army of desperate single mothers begging for some attention. Yes, this is the wonderful new world the equalists have given us: legions of tattooed, desperate single moms and deadbroke babydaddies.

Now that these people have had their way, they have to resort to outright denial of reality to put a happy face on a terrible situation. Either that or they are hallucinating — it's hard to tell sometimes.

Maybe it's a good thing that the equalists are now in the position of having to defend the status quo. It was always easy for them when they only had to criticize and attack the mainstream, but now that they're in charge they'll have to justify what they've done. I don't think it's going to be so easy for them, and I predict they are not going to adjust well to the transition. Expect them to get pretty nasty about it.

A Requiem for the American Dream

Featured Guest · 3 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Matt Forney

“Looks like they forgot about us,” Dale remarked.

It had been half-an-hour since our boss had dropped us off in that abandoned parking lot, without giving us our assignments. There was no trace of civilization around us for miles, save for a farmhouse off in the distance. Across the road, a pond glowed a delicious shade of blue in the morning sunlight.

“Let’s take shelter in there,” I pointed to a nearby storage unit, my teeth chattering in the prairie wind. “He can find us when he comes back.”

Dale and I ambled over to the unit, tipping the door shut behind us.

While killing time, Dale and I started making small talk. He was a working-class man my dad’s age, with eyeglasses, a bushy white pornstache, and bad hearing. He was from Conrad, Montana, though he’d only moved back there relatively recently from Everett, Washington. Like most everyone else, Dale had come to this fresh slice of hell looking for work.

“This is the furthest east I’ve ever been,” he remarked between drags of his Marlboro.

The conversation turned to family. Dale asked me if I had any kids. I replied in the negative.

“Oh well, you’re still young,” he mused. “How old are you again?”

“Twenty-four.”

“Ah yes, I’ve got a son your age. Computer programmer. Lives down in Portland. Got a daughter too, studying at UC Berkeley. She’s a bitch.” Dale ground out his Marlboro with his foot.

I managed a chuckle. Dale kept going.

“Takes after my mother. She was a real bitch, too. I think it runs in the family.”

“Looks like the bitch gene skipped a generation,” I tried to joke.

“Yeah, well my wife didn’t help.” Dale grinned, the grin of a man about to bare uncomfortable secrets to a guy he’d only known for a about two hours.

“My wife was a Blackfoot Indian. Genius-level IQ. Absolutely gorgeous when she was young. Met her when I was living in Missoula. But Jesus, she was mean. Always starting fights and yelling at me over everything.”

For some reason, complete strangers always unload their personal issues on me even though we barely know each other. I’m used to it by now. I just smiled, nodded and let Dale ramble on.

“Finally, one night, she went nuts. Confronted me at our bedroom door, started slapping me. I hit her back and she called the police. Spent five days in county jail.”

At this, I was incredulous. “They sent you to jail! You were defending yourself!”

“Well, in Washington state, hard to believe it, but if the police are called out in a domestic violence case, they have to arrest somebody,” Dale replied without a twinge of regret in his voice. “Doesn’t matter who started it.”

“That’s insane,” I said.

“As you can probably guess, we’re not married anymore,” Dale concluded, lighting another Marlboro. “A real bitch, she was.”

Stories like Dale's are a dime a dozen out here. This is Williston, North Dakota, the land that the recession forgot.

Williston is the headquarters of a new oil boom driven by hydrofracking, which enables oil companies to exploit deposits that have previously been inaccessible. It's been estimated that the Bakken formation, which covers roughly 200,000 square miles in western North Dakota, eastern Montana and northwestern South Dakota, contains enough oil to not only make America independent of foreign oil, but actually make the country into a net oil exporter by 2030. Because of this, companies like Halliburton and Baker-Hughes have been swarming in, offering jobs that pay up to $120,000 a year without requiring any experience or qualifications, aside from the ability to pass a drug test.

It's not a stretch to say that Williston is not just one of the most important cities in America right now, it's one of the most important in the world.

A couple days after I landed in Williston, I was heading back to my pad when I met one of the new arrivals, a black guy from Seattle. There are a lot of Washingtonians out here for some reason.

"Hey man, this city is great!" he exclaimed.

"Yeah?"

"I was down at the temp office today. They had me sweeping the floor at John Deere. I made $90 just sweeping. And when I got there, they actually said, 'Thank you for coming to Williston!'" He grinned.

"Yeah man, this is probably the only place in America where we call the shots," I said. "They need us workers more than we need them."

That might be an exaggeration, but it's not a big one. North Dakota is the state with the lowest unemployment rate, at a mere 3% (versus 8% for the country at large); Williston's unemployment rate is less than 1%. Even with all the press the town gets and the dismal state of the economy, local business are still screaming for workers, forcing wages ever higher. Applebee's is the only employer I know of that pays less than $12/hr, and that's only because their employees get tips. Not only do workers get paid big, they work considerable overtime (80-100 hours is the average for roustabouts), further upping their paychecks.

Even the temp agencies, ordinarily the province of the desperate and downtrodden, have good-paying work available. Roll into the office each morning and you'll have your pick of unskilled labor jobs paying around $13-17 an hour, flagging being the most notable. Flaggers are the folks at road construction sites responsible for directing traffic with stop/slow signs, and with all the expansion in the Bakken, they're in huge demand during the warm months. To become a flagger, all you have to do is head down to Job Service North Dakota, watch a 15-minute video, take a multiple choice test, and if you pass (and if you have an IQ above room temperature, you will pass), take your freshly printed certification down to the temp office.

That's right: you can make $16-17 an hour just standing around holding a stop sign.

Workers are so scarce in Williston that employers are resorting to increasingly desperate measures to lure them in. For example, Walmart is now paying for its employees' hotel rooms, at least through the Christmas shopping season. This is on top of their starting pay rate of $17/hr ($21/hr for overnight stockers). A Pilot Travel Center north of the city is also offering housing in hopes of rounding up enough employees ahead of their grand opening in a few weeks.

Basically, Williston is perhaps the last city where the American Dream is still a reality.

Williston looks like what you'd expect a middle-of-nowhere burg suddenly invaded by thousands of jobless men to be. The city is over two hours north of the nearest Interstate; the closest major cities, Minneapolis and Calgary, are over a dozen hours' drive away. It's as close as you can get to pure isolation in the lower 48.

Downtown looks like it was trapped in a time warp back in the 70′s. There's a J.C. Penney's, a movie theater, a cafe and bars, and that's it. The roads leading in and out of the city are a confusing patchwork of half-finished McMansions, freshly paved cul-de-sacs, and hastily erected gas stations. There are no malls, no art museums, and no nightclubs. There is, however, a Walmart. And a Hardee's. And a Dairy Queen.

Working 80-100 hours a week doesn't seem so bad when you realize there's nothing else to do in this town, aside from sit around at home and stare at the walls.

The Census Bureau says that Williston's population is 16,000, but don't believe it. With all the out-of-staters looking for work, I'd estimate the real population is around 30,000-35,000 right now, and 40,000-50,000 during the summer months. The city's as much of a madhouse as you'd expect.

The Bakken oil boom has attracted gobs of attention from the international press. In my time here, me and/or my friends have talked to reporters from all over the world: Germany, France, Switzerland, Japan, the list goes on. I've also met a couple of filmmakers working on a documentary. They all do a decent job, but because they only hang around for short periods of time, they don't get to penetrate the town too thoroughly. As a result, a lot of misinformation about Williston abounds.

Like the myth that it's the "wild West."

I'm from upstate New York. When I first mentioned to my family that I was thinking about relocating to North Dakota, they reacted with shock and horror. To hear it from New Yorkers, everyone west of Chicago and east of Seattle is a bloodthirsty psychopath eager to slit strangers' throats, steal their credit cards and anally rape their corpses. I knew on a certain level that they were full of it, but I still didn't know what to expect when I landed in town. It didn't help that one of my first sights was of a drunk getting Rodney Kinged by two of Williston's finest in the city park.

As it turns out, my family was full of it. Williston is easily one of the safer cities I've ever lived in. If you're a man, you can easily walk from one end of town to the other at night and not have to worry about anything aside from traffic. Try doing that in Syracuse, Albany, New York City or any of the "enlightened" Eastern metropolises; you'll be leaving town in a body bag. Aside from a couple of incidents, I never felt like my life was in danger.

Now, is Williston a hundred percent safe? Of course not. There are a lot of shady characters in town, particularly working for the temp agencies. There are some employers who will try to stiff you if you let them. Fights are not uncommon, and women in particular aren't advised to go around at night without a male escort. But exercise common sense, keep your eyes open and you'll be fine.

Speaking of women, they're yet another commodity that Williston doesn't offer. Not to say that there are no women, but they're here in considerably fewer numbers than the men. While it's true that the most lucrative roughneck jobs are basically for men only, physically demanding as they are, this is a place where even "menial" jobs like being a register jockey are pretty damn lucrative. Despite all the evidence to the contrary, feminists and white knights continue to argue that the current recession has hurt women just as much as men if not more so; were this the case, I'd expect to see the sexes here in roughly equal numbers.

Yet, the only women coming to Williston for work are either strippers or prostitutes. Why?

The answer is twofold. Of course the feminists are lying when they claim that women as a group have been impacted by the recession to anywhere near the degree that men have. I've met guys here from all over the country; the Pacific Northwest, California, New Mexico, and the Deep South. I've also met numerous recent immigrants from Peru, Poland, Russia and Ethiopia. The only women I've met are either locals, college students or came with their boyfriends/husbands. But even assuming that the feminists were right, I doubt we'd see many women in the Bakken for one reason:

They don't have it in them.

On a flagging job during my first week in Williston, one of my compadres, a journalism major from California, notified me of some oil job opportunities out in New Town, a tiny Indian village about seventy miles east. He was planning to hitch a ride out there and live in a tent so he could apply in person. I thought he was crazy: the wind chill in North Dakota makes sleeping outdoors a risky proposition in summer, and suicidal in the winter.

"C'mon man, we're pioneers," he exclaimed. "We're charting new lands!"

I ended up declining, mainly because I like sleeping indoors too much. But the point stands: the men of Williston are supernaturally dedicated to their work. They'll drive thousands of miles across the country, sleep in their cars, wake up at five in the morning in the vain hope of getting dispatched to dig ditches for nine hours a day, anything to keep themselves and their families afloat.

Women don't have that drive. They're creatures of routine and habit. Left to their own devices, they will always take the easy way out. The average twentysomething female debt slave (shouldn't have majored in Butterfly Sexuality, dear!) would rather tend a Starbucks in a "cool" city like New York or Washington, D.C. for minimum wage than migrate out to a "boring," "scary" place like Williston. This shows in everything they do. While women do receive the majority of college degrees, they're typically in useless subjects like the liberal arts; the majority of useful, difficult degrees (in math and science majors) are still going to men. Women dominate useless office jobs and HR departments; men still dominate construction, the trades, engineering and other careers that are responsible for keeping society afloat.

And of course, they rule the Bakken, helping drill the very substance—oil—that makes the luxurious, first-world life of so many American women possible in the first place.

Unfortunately for men, the boom times in North Dakota are coming to an end.

In the run-up to the presidential election, many of the oil companies put hiring freezes in place in hopes of a Romney victory. Environmentalists are a core bloc of the Democratic Party, and word on the street was that Obama would attempt to either regulate fracking or ban it entirely. Heavily Democratic states such as New York and California have fought tooth and nail to keep fracking illegal in their communities due to overblown fears of its' environmental impact. This is despite those states dismal economies, and North Dakota's booming one. With his scuttling of the Keystone pipeline, Obama has shown that he's not afraid to "stand up to Big Oil" (read: destroy America's best chance for energy independence).

I've also heard (but can't confirm) that Saudi Arabia is contributing a lot of money to anti-hydrofracking groups, all the better to keep us hooked on their supply.

With the Messiah's reelection, the aforementioned hiring freezes have been extended indefinitely. Skilled workers (such as those with a CDL or rig experience) are still in demand somewhat, but the days of being able to get off the bus and score an interview with Select Energy the next day are over. Even if the House Republicans successfully block Obama's suicidal energy policies, you can bet that the Democrats will tax the oil companies into oblivion so they can keep funding worthless government jobs for women back in Washington.

This all comes on the heels of a number of ordinances the city of Williston has passed to crack down on people sleeping in their cars and bringing campers within the city limits. I don't entirely blame them—it's not pleasant to have people freezing to death in their cars overnight—but it's just one more obstacle to contend with.

The net effect of all this is that workers are fleeing Williston in droves.

This includes myself. Last June, I left my home of Syracuse, New York on a hitchhiking trip to Portland, Oregon. I landed in Williston in mid-September hoping to land a job on one of the rigs, if only for the amusing stories it might provide. I left the Monday after Thanksgiving, unable to secure a job that either provided housing or paid enough to afford it: studio apartments go for around $2,500 a month here, and hotel rooms around $400 a night, assuming you can find either. Even RV hookups, long the province of white trash, are no cheaper than $2,100 a month.

When I came into Williston, the roads in and out of the city were absolutely clogged, Chicago-style. When I left, they were half-deserted.

This is a requiem for the American Dream. The sentiment that Williston is the last place in America where you can rise up and become rich through your own efforts is something that nearly every guy I've met here has echoed. I've met countless guys who were at the end of their rope—homeless, penniless, hopeless—who made it to North Dakota and were able to make something of themselves. The feminists and liberals want to see this crushed, to see them crushed.

The problem with dreams is that you eventually have to wake up.

Gabriel Aubry Brutally Beaten, Arrested — for Caring About His Daughter

W.F. Price · 3 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In an all-too-common travesty of justice, Gabriel Aubry was severely beaten by Halle Berry's fiancé Olivier Martinez, who then called the police and had him arrested for battery.

> According to Aubry's court declaration, filed by his lawyer Shawn Holley, Aubry took daughter Nahla to her school play on the day before Thanksgiving. TMZ reports that Berry and Martinez showed up and Martinez walked up to Aubry and whispered in his ear in French, "I wish I could beat the (expletive) out of you right now. You're lucky we're in a school right now. We're going to take Nahla right now and you're not going to follow us."
> Aubry maintains that as he walked toward his car on Thanksgiving Day, Martinez knocked him to the ground and started brutally beating him, screaming that Aubry cost them $3 million to fight the custody war (Halle's failed move to take Nahla to Paris). Aubry says Martinez slammed his head on the concrete driveway. Martinez's camp maintained it was Aubry who started the fight.

Although people who start fights sometimes do lose, I believe Aubry, and here's why:

When you are a father in a custody dispute, you learn very quickly that any misbehavior at all will destroy your chances to be with your child. If someone threatens you, you have to take it without reacting with aggression. If someone insults you, you have to blow it off. You must demonstrate the ability to face constant provocation without reacting to it. It's all part of the extremely dehumanizing and humiliating process that has been created to grind fathers down into the dirt and force them to give in.

As for Martinez, I think he's lying through his teeth. Anyone who gets between a caring father and his child is quite simply a bad person. Someone who actually attacks the father deserves, well… I'll leave it to the imagination.

Obviously, Martinez was counting on Halle Berry to back him up in court. I'm sure she will, which means he may well get away with it. It's an entirely transparent setup, and Halle is as responsible as Martinez for what went down, but as the mother she'll get off scot free.

Here's the real kicker: A judge issued a restraining order against Gabriel Aubry after he was beaten by Martinez, and CPS was alerted for potential child abuse. If you get in a fight in the presence of a child, most states count it as child abuse. I'm sure Aubry knew that, which is why it's highly unlikely that he threw a punch as Martinez claims.

It is incidents like these that expose the blatant lie that women have it worse than men in the US. Merely for trying to be a good father, you can be beaten, arrested, threatened with death, investigated for child abuse and rendered indigent if the mother happens to be a vindictive person, and she will never face anything but the most trivial consequences for it. Perhaps Halle feels a pang of guilt for Aubry's beating, but probably not; American women are trained from birth never to feel any guilt for what they do to men, just as slave-owners are trained from childhood to view slaves only as livestock. If she feels anything at all, it's probably discomfort over the negative publicity.

Here are some pictures of Aubry post-beating, if you have the stomach for it.

Philip Cohen Attempts to Exonerate Single Motherhood

W.F. Price · 4 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for The Atlantic, sociology professor Philip Cohen makes an effort to decouple crime and single motherhood, using data that shows crime rates falling despite little to no decline in single mother households.

Cohen's graphs look persuasive, but there's something missing from the equation. While Cohen does allow that increased incarceration had an effect on crime rates, he minimizes this factor, perhaps as a rhetorical trick to bolster his argument where it is lacking. However, there's something more important to consider than the incarceration rate, and I was surprised to see that nobody brought it up in comments.

Crime in the US peaked in the early 90s, during the era of crack wars and gangsta rap those of us in my demographic (born in the 1970s) remember all too well. Roughly 20 years before the crime wave, fertility patterns were going through an unprecedented transition. Birth control and abortion had just been legalized, and illegitimacy was soaring, hence the focus on single mothers being responsible for crime. However, single motherhood circa 1970 was significantly different from today's for a few reasons. First, it was not generally intentional, but rather an organic phenomenon. Today, most women who become single mothers do so by choice. In 1970, it was as often as not a 15-year-old girl in the inner city getting knocked up and having a baby with God knows who.

I grew up close to what could be considered Seattle's most inner-city neighborhood, and had some friends and acquaintances from the projects. Although we didn't exactly live together, we played sports together, used the same facilities and for the most part got along OK; occasionally we'd visit each other's places. A lot of these kids, unfortunately, had no idea who their fathers were. None at all. Their idea of family was extraordinarily flexible by necessity, hence the attraction of street gangs, which filled some of the enormous kinship gaps that existed in their society. The level of dysfunction in these neighborhoods was unfathomable from a middle-class American perspective at the time, and simply having some limited experience with it first-hand – even in a city where it was nowhere near as bad as LA or Chicago (my family drove past the Chicago slums back in '86 and I could only stare in disbelief) – set me apart from other white kids at the private school I attended. For example, I once went on one of those Thanksgiving relief missions where you bring food to needy families, and for some pious reason the school thought it would be a good idea to bring middle-school students along to distribute the food directly to the poor single mothers. The desultory depravation of the projects was familiar to me, so I took it in stride, but the looks on the other white kids' faces displayed complete alienation and confusion. They just didn't know what to think, and couldn't relate at all. I don't think they learned a thing from what they saw, and to this day I think it was a mistake to take them there, because there's no way they could have drawn any useful or accurate conclusions from the experience.

But getting back to the point, these mothers in inner cities were not only younger than the current crop of single mothers, they were more fertile as well. They started early and kept going. I recently wrote about the decline in the black middle-class birth rate, which is a demographic problem for American blacks, but another demographic problem – teen motherhood – was at crisis proportions around 1970. Total black fertility was around 50% higher then than now, and the number of children being born to minors made up a much larger proportion of it. And these mothers were often hopeless people with no skills or education to make it in the world. They lived a dismal, third-world existence, right in the heart of our cities.

The sexual revolution, wrong-headed welfare policy and the fact that urban blacks were uprooted en-masse from their rural, southern origins combined to guarantee social pathology in years to come. And it came with a vengeance. If there's anything that could sum up the results of those trends, it would be the 1992 LA riots. To get a sense of the problems in our cities at that time, look it up on YouTube and watch some of the chaos. I wonder sometimes what my kids will think of those scenes when they grow up — I doubt they'll understand it much at all, and that might be a good thing.

To put it in numbers, if you want to see the correlation between single motherhood and crime – and it does exist –

you have to include single mothers' fertility as well as teen mothers' fertility. Today, most single mothers have one or two kids and stop. This wasn't the case 30-40 years ago. Additionally, you have to go forward about 20 years from any given fertility snapshot to see the correlation between crime and single motherhood, because late teens and early 20s are the most crime-prone years.

In a 2008 post, Atlantic writer Ta-Nehisi Coates, who also appears to also be skeptical of the idea that single mothers are as prolific as ever, found that black illegitimate fertility was about 75% higher in 1970 than in 2005:

> In 1970 the birth rate for unmarried black women was 96 per 1,000. In 1980, it was 87.9. In 2005 it was 60.6. There is a huge spike in the late 1980s, but the overal trend is clear–the birth rate for unmarried black women has been declining for almost 40 years.

Coates also links to a CDC report that finds that teen fertility peaked in the US in 1970 (p. 5):

> The birth rate for teenagers 15–19 years declined 1 percent to 40.5 births per 1,000 females (Tables A, 4, and 8). The 2005 rate was 34 percent lower than the rate for the recent peak in 1991 (61.8). (See Figures 3 and 4.) The number of births to teenagers 15–19 declined very slightly to 414,593, the fewest reported since 1946. Births to 15–19-year-olds in the U.S. peaked in 1970 (644,708) (17).

It appears that 20 years after record numbers of teen and illegitimate births in black America there happened to be an unprecedented crime wave in that same demographic. Philip Cohen would have us believe that single motherhood is not responsible, but if that's the case why did he leave out these important numbers, focusing instead only on the fact that more households are headed by single women? Isn't it a pretty weak argument if these single women are having far fewer children relative to the population than they were in the early 1970s, and their children constitute a much smaller share of the population?

Cohen writes:

> By my reading of the research, it is true that children of single mothers are more likely to commit crimes. But other factors are more important…

Of course they are. If you're going to calculate violent crime per 100,000 people, a very important factor is the number of teen and young adult children of single mothers as a proportion of that 100,000 people. In urban black America in 1990 (he uses a graph of DC crime rates), it was far higher than today – higher national rates of single motherhood notwithstanding – and Cohen should know enough about demographics and statistics to see that — it is his job after all.

However, Cohen has an agenda, and he isn't in the least bashful about it. From his bio:

> Philip Cohen, Professor of Sociology, has a long-standing research interest in the area of Gender, Family, and Social Change. In particular, he has published extensively on the gender division of labor within families, and between men and women outside of families. In addition to the substantive aspects of this research, he has maintained a strong interest in measurement issues in the area of household and family structure, which has included participating in Counting Couples research conferences at NICHD and consulting with the U.S. Census Bureau on household measurement issues, as well as publishing in demography and sociology journals on these questions.

In other words, he's just another version of Michael Kimmel, only with a somewhat more quantitative style. Like Kimmel, he is a professional, academic feminist, making a good living off deconstructing the family on the taxpayer's dime.

It might be tempting to write off these guys as relatively unimportant, but countering their agenda and deliberately flawed analysis takes both time and some mental effort, and it's an important job. This is because it all too often makes its way into policy, and that's a problem for us down the road. If a professor such as Cohen is willing to obfuscate the clear link between crime and family disintegration in order to promote single motherhood, then it follows that he prioritizes single motherhood over social peace and welfare. This is not the kind of person who has our best interests in mind.

South Carolina Father's Baby Adopted Out From Under Him

W.F. Price · 4 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Terry Achane, a South Carolina man who works as a drill instructor, found himself fighting for custody against Jared and Kristi Frei, a Utah couple who adopted his daughter from his ex-wife Tira. Terry was still married to Tira when she decided to give the girl up to adoption to the Freis, but he wasn't in on the deal, because as a military man he was deployed when the adoption occurred, and his wife neglected to tell him about it.

Tira said she knew the marriage wouldn't last, and offloaded the girl to avoid becoming a single mother.

Kristi Frei, who already had five children of her own, started adopting in 2009 following infertility caused by endometriosis. The first child she adopted was a black baby boy named James, and she decided to provide James with a similar-looking sibling, choosing the lively little girl who happens to be Mr. Achane's daughter. When Mr. Achane tried to seek the return of his daughter (from marriage, mind you) the Freis contested, saying the baby was better off with them. They are arguing that having spent $25,000 each for the two babies, they should be entitled to keep her.

It's tempting to lash out at the Freis for this, but it's also pretty clear that they truly care about this girl, so it isn't such a simple matter. In their minds, what they are doing seems reasonable — love for children has a potent effect. But it actually is a terrible, awful thing they are doing, and it must stop now, for the sake not only of the little girl and her father but their eternal souls as well (they are religious people).

It seems one of their biggest mistakes was believing Tira, who gave everyone a sob story about how her husband left her without anything. Absolute garbage. A military wife can obtain a temporary separation order and an instant child support garnishment plus military benefits even while her husband is deployed. The only thing she can't do is get a permanent custody order. In this case, it's clear that Tira didn't want to take care of the girl, but she didn't want to pay child support either, so she invented a hard times song and dance and sold her off to the Utah couple.

If Terry Achane only wanted to avoid child support, he'd be entirely off the hook with the adoption. That he actually wanted to be a father may have surprised a few people, including his ex-wife, but it isn't for personal gain in this case. Not at all. He won't collect much from Tira — that's clear. He simply wants to be a father to his daughter, and there's nothing strange about that.

For readers who care about this, I'd recommend writing to Jared Frei and appealing to him as a father to gracefully accept the disappointment. I think it's an important cause, and hopefully he will listen. Don't insult or condemn the Freis, but firmly let them know that this matter is best settled through acceptance of the law, which is fortunately on Mr. Achane's side.

I like to think that men of goodwill can settle these matters between each other. Because Terry Achane cares about his daughter, I think he will forgive the Freis, and maybe he can even develop a positive relationship with the family, especially if Jared Frei can assert some moral leadership in his family and do the right thing.

Email Jared Frei here. Be compassionate, because a child is involved, and it's best for her and her father if they can come out of this with the least amount of bitterness.

Yes, this is the kind of thing that can drive a father crazy, but sometimes we have to have a light touch around the kids.

Final Word on Military and Standards

W.F. Price · 5 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, Reddit user Demonspawn linked my article on the women washing out of the USMC combat training, sending the site an extra 1,500 visitors for the day (about 35-40% more than usual), and it sparked some debate on Reddit as to whether the military would actually lower standards for women. Many people, including some veterans, insisted that standards would not be changed to accommodate women.

Unfortunately, they are wrong. People can be naive about these things, because they have preconceived notions about "the way things are." Often it's those who have real, past experience with the institution in question who most stubbornly reject the possibility of change. For example, I'd probably be a lot more surprised to see a high rise go up in my residential Seattle neighborhood than someone from, say, Boston, because it would challenge my sense of normalcy more than his.

But change is certainly coming, even to the US Marine Corps, and integration of women into combat roles is one of those changes that will happen. How can I state this with any certainty? Well, there's a document that a Congressional commission came up with last year, and it mandates these changes. President Obama has expressed his support for the changes, and has given them the go-ahead.

The commission is called the "Military Diversity Leadership Committee," and it put out a report titled "From Representation to Inclusion: Diversity Leadership for the 21st-Century Military"

The report explicitly calls for full implementation of affirmative action in the US Military, in all branches, and including combat MOS. Read it for yourself if you have any doubts — it's quite explicit:

> Second, DoD and the Services must remove institutional barriers in order to open traditionally closed doors, especially those relating to assignments—both the initial career field assignment and subsequent assignments to key positions. An important step in this direction is that DoD and the Services eliminate combat exclusion policies for women, including removing barriers and inconsistencies, to create a level playing field for all servicemembers who meet the qualifications…

Sure, they'll say "everyone must meet the standards," but we've all heard that before. The USMC has already rejiggered the physical test to enable women to achieve a higher score with inferior physical performance. At the same time the USMC said it was raising women's standards at the bottom to integrate them into combat MOS, it also quietly lowered them at the top for the same purpose.

Here's how the new scheme works:

Women now have to complete three pullups to pass the physical, whereas before they only had to perform the flexed arm hang. However, before they weren't allowed into direct combat. So now, in order to qualify with a perfect score, men have to complete 20 pullups, and women must complete 8. To pass, both must perform 3.

Here's how it will lower standards: If a man completes 8 and a woman also completes 8 pullups, and both get middling scores on the other tests, the woman ends up with a significantly higher overall score, and is thereby considered better physically suited to combat. This is a handicap, and it will result in people being assigned to combat specialties who couldn't have made the cut under the old rules, in some cases over people better qualified than they are. In other words, affirmative action. This is just the beginning, of course. Standards will be lowered in other areas as well, and I expect we'll have less competent people flying helicopters, firing mortars, driving tanks and all that fun stuff.

It was really a combination of damage control and sleight of hand. The Marine Corps doesn't want terrible soldiers who will screw things up badly (i.e. average women), but they know they have to give a little to please the Democrats, and they don't want it to be widely reported that they are lowering standards.

It is not uncommon for militaries to be degraded by political mandate. The Communists gutted the Red Army leadership in political purges prior to Nazi Germany's 1941 invasion, with pretty unfortunate results for the Russians. Stalin was quite fortunate to make it out of that one intact.

It may be that there's a minor political purge going on now in the US military. The number of generals dismissed this year for sexual escapades, which are all but guaranteed in a sexually integrated military, suggests that to be the case, but it's merely speculation at this point — there's no hard proof that I know of.

However, what we can say for certain is that the US military is now facing a complete affirmative action makeover. This won't result in invasion (we have nukes these days), so one might wonder whether the consequences will be all that bad. If we have a lousier military that can't effectively fight wars abroad, couldn't that stop foreign adventurism and end up being a good thing?

The problem is expense. If the Democrats have their way, the US military is simply going to end up like public schools: huge, expensive, and ineffective, with an untouchable budget. And given that our Constitution doesn't seem to get much respect any longer, in the future it will probably be used against Americans in one way or another. Probably ineffectively, kind of like the Mexican military with the drug bandits in their ongoing civil war.

Some Thoughts on the Manosphere Growing Up

W.F. Price · 5 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

It's been quite an experience watching the so-called manosphere take shape over the last few years. Its emergence was bound to come at some point, but origins do have an influence on how things turn out, so I'm honored to have played a part in building it.

Just a few years ago, your typical man would fall all over himself to accommodate feminists, and even men's issues forum members often went out of their way to profusely apologize to women for any perceived slight. Men resorted to making excuses for standing up for themselves, and seemed ashamed to do so.

That's changed, and now feminism is rightly identified as a special interest group. Feminists no longer have the moral high ground, and are now seen as the power-hungry, grasping and self-interested agents that they are. Although they've secured a place in the current ruling paradigm as coalition partners in the horde known as the Democratic Party, they no longer have the liberty to play the field. Like an aging harlot, their reputation is finally catching up to them, and the allure has all but worn off.

When I first started The Spearhead, the intent was for the site to serve as a catalyst for a new approach to dealing with feminism. I was partly inspired by Heartiste, who rapidly attracted a large following with his witty approach to Game and his incisive critique of contemporary sexual politics. His writing was fresh, new and a whole lot of fun to read. A number of bloggers saw his unabashed iconoclasty and found themselves agreeing wholeheartedly — these writers formed the real core of the emergent manosphere. Heartiste (then known as Roissy) wrote things that nobody dared say, but he did it in such a sophisticated, intelligent way that it was impossible to write him off as a primitive vulgarian.

Another inspiration was the work I'd been doing for years prior to starting the site. In the course of my work, I'd read and edited thousands of radical tracts (among other more mundane stuff) for publication in reference books. Everything from the Socialist Workers Party to Radical Women to Mafkarat al-Islam. Hell, I even waded through Juche screeds issued by the North Korean regime. It could be mind-numbing, but it was an education in radical political activism. It taught me a few important things.

First, I learned that feminists were extremists, and that many of the feminists in positions of power today were indoctrinated by far-out radical groups some 30-40 years ago. Radical Women, for example, may be little more than a worn out old core of radical feminists, composed of bitter, hateful crones, but it was a nursery for the types who now sit on the Supreme Court, in Congress and in city government and administration throughout the land. Even today, its members have easy access to mainstream media and frequently get the opportunity to voice their opinions in such staid institutions as network television and radio. This is because they have friends in high places. When women were hired for affirmative action purposes, these groups practiced cronyism, and placed their supporters in powerful jobs.

Another important lesson I learned was that these people will never play nice. They fight to win and play for keeps. Compromise is off the table. There is no compassion or sense of justice, fairness or any of that. The opponent must be vanquished. For feminists, the opponent is men.

Finally, I had the opportunity to learn about what had brought about the current state of affairs from men who saw it first-hand. These men, some of whom are gone or past retirement age now, took me through it step by step, and gave me some important history lessons that have helped me avoid some of the pitfalls that the rookie inevitably stumbles into.

So, armed with this knowledge, I decided that the only way to deal with them was to take the gloves off and fight back without mincing words. If they are willing to take away men's children and reduce them to poverty, why not let them have it? Throughout history, these kinds of things were considered acts of war. That is no exaggeration at all, and it's really quite amazing how docile and complacent men have been in the face of their dispossession. If men hadn't been disarmed by easy access to sex (or the illusion of such) following the sexual revolution, I'm fairly sure they would have put a violent end to the injustices of contemporary family law.

It was a new approach, and it worked. It earned vitriol from feminists and attention online, but most importantly it emboldened more men to adopt the same tactics, and to get over their worries about offending feminists, being called names and other minor but understandable anxieties.

There were also some fortunate coincidences that contributed to the development of a new, more muscular form of male advocacy. Just as The Spearhead started to get going, Men's News Daily started to scale down, and its editor – Paul Elam – offered to write some pieces for The Spearhead. Paul is uniquely suited to this new approach to feminism. More so than I am in many ways. For me, it was more of an idea – an abstract concept – but Paul lives and breathes ideological combat. He's a bit of a volatile substance in that way, and probably ought to come with the same warning you'd see on a package of TNT.

Fortunately, he's been able to harness that power, and A Voice for Men has been growing in strength and depth for the past couple years. I can't say I exactly predicted that would happen, but I definitely had a hunch that it would, and encouraged the opening of his radio program. Since then I've withdrawn from that scene, mostly because I bit off more than I could chew in trying to be a family man, an activist and a writer and support myself at the same time. Sometimes you've got to recognize your limitations and be practical about priorities, so I avoided the activist part. I'm better with ideas than managing people anyway, so writing is probably a better use of my time. However, I think activism has a lot of potential to both grow and make a difference. It's indispensable, actually, and it's good to see that it is more or less converging with the new approach to confronting feminism that emerged online a few years ago.

For the future, I think what is needed is more narratives, more stories, and more compelling content that stirs people's passions and imagination. You can only go so far with intellectual arguments, and few people are truly motivated by them anyway. One form of media that definitely needs to be exploited more is video. Documentaries, true-to-life stories, action shots of demonstrations and other video projects could have a whole lot of appeal. But rather than just raw video, there must be a compelling story behind it. Video of a raucous demonstration, for example, might get a lot of hits for some time, but it will quickly be forgotten if it doesn't contain an element of drama. I'm convinced that human stories are the key to both sympathy and attention.

There's a lot of opportunity out there to make a difference, and as long as I have the ability I'm going to keep doing what I can to bring attention to men's issues, because it's a worthy cause. Fathers and children belong together, brotherhood is a noble ideal, and freedom from tyranny is worth fighting for. These are timeless concepts that have animated men as long as humans have walked this earth. They are also directly responsible for progress; without them we'd still be living in a state of barbarism.

Baby Gap: Country vs. City

W.F. Price · 6 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Every now and then I check up on people I used spend a lot of time with when I was younger, looking through Facebook or other online profiles. I do so less than I used to, because with each year we drift farther from the times we used to spend together, and farther apart in every way.

The biggest difference by far is the fact that I have children. Because I am a city boy, fewer than half of my former acquaintances are parents, and that may be understating the situation. This simple difference puts us worlds apart in concerns and politics, and I'm afraid in many cases we wouldn't enjoy each other's company much any longer, because we have conflicting world views and very little common ground.

Those who don't live in America's urban centers may not realize how profoundly different and unnatural the urban lifestyle is. Marriage with children is the exception — not the norm. It's a world where sex and work are detached from all but one's personal pleasure and comfort. Nature is a concept that gets a lot of lip service from urban liberals, but it's covered up with steel and concrete; the conservative rural whites they so despise have a far deeper connection with the land. In cities, most people one sees are strangers – including neighbors – and the order of it all appears purposeless.

If anyone wants to understand the profound political schism in our country, the contrasting lifestyle of city vs. country explains it better than anything, and the most important part of that contrast is children. Having children influences people in very important ways, and among urban people under 40, white ones in particular, it is an experience that is increasingly rare.

Children change things in myriad ways. The way we talk, the way we dress and even the way we walk (people are more careful around kids). Without them, vulgarity seems inconsequential, overt sexuality harmless and perversion tolerable. Gender politics – utterly toxic to families trying to get along to raise kids – seem like a reasonable game to play for one advantage or another. Predatory sexuality of both the male and female varieties is not seen as much of a threat, and generally winked at.

On Thanksgiving, a family member told me about a scene on Capitol Hill (Seattle's most urban, populated and liberal neighborhood) following the Democrats' election victory. Evidently, residents poured out onto the street and burst into a spontaneous, orgiastic celebration. I doubt even committed liberals would feel comfortable having their children in the midst of that mob, and that's big city America today. That scene is urban American politics in a nutshell.

For those who care about family and children, I'd strongly advise leaving the cities. Those who have children should avoid sending them there for college if they want any grandchildren. Cities may be fun, and jobs there may pay more, but the costs they impose on families are excessive. The only way ordinary people can avoid the fragmentation of their families is through being a part of some kinship or religious centered clan, as many urban ethnic groups such as Chinese, Jews and Italians are, but that isn't a great fit for most Americans, who tend to place more value on the nuclear family.

“Independence” Lesbian Style: Male Filmgoers Ripped Off

W.F. Price · 7 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A film about lesbian separatism in the 1980s was recently showcased at the London Feminist Film Festival, where it sold out in several venues. Before showing the film, and after a brief introduction, feminist Julia Long demanded that all men vacate the premises, drawing a mixture of anger and enthusiastic approval.

Although it’s pretty scummy to take people’s money and then give them the shaft like that, I think the men who paid to see the film got pretty much what they deserved. Additionally, this demonstrates exactly how feminism – even the “separatist” kind – really works.

From the article:

> Some voices managed to come through about the actual film: people asked how women managed to fund their communities, which inspired Fougère to share some incredible stories about building houses simply from surrounding trees, or about how some women were split between still working “out in the world” but coming back to the communes as their homes. She made a comment that could have inspired a huge and fascinating discussion: “You did it for a year or two, but you can’t be an activist and separatist forever, you move back to your functioning toilet at home.”

In other words, it was a failure. I’d like to see the “houses” the women built from “surrounding trees.” Somehow, I doubt they were as impressive as what Dick Proenneke put together all by himself in the Alaskan wilderness. I doubt Dick had to rip off any women to fund his efforts, either.

Feminists are really, truly shameless when it comes to using men. They will steal, cheat and use people, all the while calling it “empowerment.” So why didn’t Julia Long demand that the film be marketed as “women only?” She wanted the men’s money, that’s why. Once they’d paid, they could be discarded, to be replaced by the next batch of fools when needed.

Of course, she’s instantly ready with a justification for false marketing and theft:

> This small incident, and the responses to it, teaches us some important lessons about levels of misogyny in our society. It is clear that those making trouble and “sabotaging” the festival are those who complained and demanded refunds…

Yeah, the misogynists are the ones who wanted their money back. Typical.

What's Anita Sarkeesian Doing with All That Kickstarter Money?

W.F. Price · 7 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The little London Feminist Film Festival rip-off made me think of Anita Sarkeesian, who pulled in a couple hundred thousand dollars last June through "crowdfunding" (via Kickstarter) to make some videos about video games. She played the victim after some people were nasty to her online, and hit a rome run in her donation drive.

Crowdfunding has attracted some scrutiny, because it's vulnerable to fraud. While I have no idea whether Sarkeesian is a hustler or not, I made a little mental note to check up on her every now and then to see what she's been up to. Now that it's been a half year, I thought I should check it out.

She runs a website called "Feminist Frequency," and she apparently updates it once a month or so. Less, actually. The last update she made concerning her project dates back to August 1st, and at that point she'd purchased some 300 video games for the project. She says she's hired a writer and a producer, but is keeping them "out of the limelight to try and shield them from any potential harassment. When I feel it is safe and appropriate to introduce them I will."

Hmm… Well, I guess transparency is out the window (because of the misogynists, of course).

Since that post, she's given a couple interviews, but publicly nothing has been said about her project.

Sarkeesian invites readers to check for updates on her project on Facebook, but there's nothing there to speak of, besides a couple more game purchases. Evidently, she's been flying around a lot giving interviews and talks, but that's about the only evidence of "progress" on the project.

As I am eagerly awaiting what is sure to be a revolutionary video project of the highest professionalism and quality, I'm starting to get a little antsy about the media blackout. I can only imagine that those who funded it are also sitting at the edge of their seats.

BTW, does anyone know what model car Sarkeesian drives these days?

Anti-Feminism Selling Cars Now

W.F. Price · 8 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Toyota has come out with an ad for it's new GT86 sports car that features some rather hefty wives going postal when their husbands buy the car. Evidently, the first version of the ad explicitly encouraged men to live out their "inner chauvinist," but was pulled due to feminist hysteria similar to the very behavior portrayed in the ad.

Advertisers are pretty well clued in where popular opinion is concerned, and it looks like they've decided that feminism is so unpopular that encouraging men to buy cars to defy it may actually work for Toyota.

Here's the ad:

More on Sarkeesian: Transparency = "Harassment"

W.F. Price · 8 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

As Anita Sarkeesian goes jetting around the world, questions about her project remain unanswered, disgruntled supporters are banned, and rather than address concerns, she resorts over and over again to accusations of "harassment."

After looking into the Anita Sarkeesian matter a little more closely, her first video is supposed to be coming out right about now (she switched deadlines after getting more money). She says it will be based on the so-called "Damsel in Distress" trope. However, following some confusion amongst backers a couple months ago, Sarkeesian has absolutely clamped down on any potential leaks about what's going on, banning financial backers from accessing information about the project if they cause her any trouble.

The latest comment on her Kickstarter project site, posted several weeks ago by someone who goes by Schnide, suggests that not all is well amongst the backers:

> schnide on November 21
> @Anita
> I was very careful to word my concerns in a respectful and considerate way. I meant no offence to you, but was expressing my concerns as someone who's donated money to your project. If there is a shortfall in my understanding (and I'm certainly open to the idea that I'm sometimes wrong), I wanted to suggest to you that it may be a communication issue on your part and that how things were being presented weren't doing your efforts justice. That was just as much for your benefit as for mine. If you're in a position to know better and educate me, but your response instead is to get snarky and patronising, that says far more about you than it does about me and only serves to further my disappointment in what is a very noble and worthwhile cause.

Back in September, Anita posted a response to a critic that blamed him for exposing her to a "sustained harassment campaign" as well as "anger, vitriol, and misogyny":

> Anita Sarkeesian on September 6
> Hi Michael (@theLEOpirate),
> As one of our nearly 7000 backers you could have, at any time, asked me your question about the timetable or survey either in the comments or via private message here on Kickstarter. But you did not do that. Instead you decided to take a screen-capture of our backers-only update and immediately posted it publicly. And even worse, you uploaded it directly to the very gaming boards that have been organizing the sustained harassment campaign against me and this project. Predictably, that action ignited a new torrent of anger, vitriol, and misogyny from users of those sites which they directed at me via all my social media channels. The reason for making the project updates backers-only is to try to minimize this kind of vitriol while we are still in the process of making our video series. I even specifically asked backers to please refrain from sharing our in-progress reports publicly for exactly this reason. You ignored that request and as a consequence I received yet another round of threats…

This is the last we hear from Anita in the Kickstarter comments.

The best rundown on the trouble in Tropes in Video Games land is an article written for Destructoid. Stephanie K exposes some of the communication problems that have plagued the project, almost since its inception:

> The Kickstarted launched on May 17th of this year. In less than twenty-four hours, it reached its $6,000 pledge goal. Backers continued to grow over the month resulting in Sarkeesian raising nearly $160,000 for the project by June 16th. From there, all updates were promised to be available only to those who backed the project; she > went on to publicly display her research materials, over 300+ games, and provided an official update expressing her excitement. “I can now commit full-time to Feminist Frequency and to this video series which is truly a dream come true for me”, she writes. “I can now also hire my producer full-time for this project. Plus we are in the process of bringing another writer/researcher on board part-time.” With such passion and staffing, one would think that Feminist Frequency crew would be ready to tackle their production with full force.

> Then there was silence…And then there was insubordination.
>
> Nearly a month followed where no updates were given. Backers began posting comments on the Kickstarters’ page and reaching out to her Twitter account asking for some confirmation that the project was at least underway. Most questions, however, went unanswered. One backer mentions in the comments that he captured a screenshot stating an estimated date on one of the Kickstaters’ goals and Tweeted it to Sarkeesian asking for some explanation as to why the paid backers were being kept in the dark. The backer was then blocked from her Twitter and was ignored as a result. “I would be absolutely fine if she just responded to my tweet with a simple ‘Still working and capturing footage’,” wrote “Mike”.
> After discovering the weeks of silence and apathetic responses, I did some research on the progression of her full-time commitment. Her web site has sat untouched since her last Tropes vs Women update on August 1st. At the time of writing this article, her YouTube channel had not been touched since August 12th with no new videos being uploaded since the initial promotional video for the Kickstarter. Up until a week ago, there had been no updates since the pledges were closed. However, she – or at least Feminist Frequency staff members – frequented Twitter (@femfreq), Facebook, and Tumblr regularly. While there is no doubt that such a project is difficult and time consuming to produce, she still had plenty of time to discuss Doctor Who with fans, promote other feminist blogs, and post pictures of herself with gaming memorabilia. Despite all of this activity, she was unable to provide any sort of update regarding the Tropes vs Women production.
> “If she can’t take 10 minutes a fortnight (seeing as how it has been 19 days since the last update) to update her backers, then wtf,” commented backer “Bryan” on the Kickstarter comment page A statement that I can agree with even when being an outside viewer of the documentary.

Sarkeesian has been getting around — a lot. Just this week, she flew to Washington DC to give a ten minute talk at TEDxWomen. In October, she was in Sweden holding a “workshop” about her project at HUMIlab (Umea University). Sarkeesian insisted that video from the workshop not be made public due to fears of “online harassment” (could she mean questions from her backers?).

In the meanwhile, she reassures us that her “Tropes” project is “in production.” It appears that she edited her most recent post on Feminist Frequency yesterday or this morning (unless I missed the paragraph at first glance, and I don’t think I did), adding the following:

> Also don’t anybody worry, my Tropes vs Women in Video Games series is currently in production, we’re working hard make these new videos as comprehensive and expansive as possible. And I’m pleased to say that progress is coming along nicely! As always, project backers will be the first to know of updates and details on the project so if you are backer make sure to regularly check the Kickstarter page!

Sarkeesian may yet come out with a product (the quality of which remains to be seen), but unless she can do it soon, questions will continue to mount. Her shabby treatment of male backers suggests an attitude of entitlement and privilege that is all-too-common amongst feminists, and if she ends up stiffing them I hope the guys get the message.

Air Force to Scrap the Strawberry Bitch?

Uncle Elmer · 9 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

When an organization becomes feminized, focus shifts from the efficient production of goods and services to the establishment of rules for the comfort and security of women. Ossification and organizational death are inevitable.

A recent Air Force initiative hilites this phenomena.

To combat an alleged culture of sexual predation upon female servicemembers, the Air Force has announced that commanders and supervisors in all corners of the Air Force have started a widespread sweep of all work spaces and public areas, looking for pictures, calendars and other materials that objectify women.

Pictures of scantily clad women in calendars, posters or in briefing slides have no place in a professional workplace, said Chief of Staff Gen. Mark Welsh, who ordered the service-wide health and welfare inspection.

"Quite honestly, I'm not sure what we'll find," Welsh said. "There might not be that many places where it's a problem; there might be a number of places where it's a problem. I don't know. That's part of my concern. That's why we're not going to waste time trying to figure it out one place at a time."

The sweep is for things that Welsh said would be reminiscent of an all-male military that Air Force leaders might have believed were eliminated 20 or 30 years ago.

From a symbolic perspective, a good place for General Welsh to start would be The Air Force Museum in Dayton, Ohio, which houses the famed Strawberry Bitch B-24 and its risque' nose art, a shocking reminder of a bygone patriarchy and totally innapropriate in today's New Normal Military.

One can well imagine the consternation this provocative nose art causes grade-school teachers leading throngs of young boys and girls on Air Force Museum tours. It's high time this relic is removed from public view and replaced with a more gender-neutral display of mid-20th century bombing technology.

My old man was a B-24 navigator who survived 30 missions over Germany in 1943. He never said anything about it other than "we got on allright". Close to 90,000 U.S. airmen died during that conflict. I should be writing him a letter right now instead of posting this gripe on The Spearhead. Not sure what he would think of what has become of his old hard-corps military.

Feminists Caught on Film

W.F. Price · 9 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

In a stroke of good fortune, Studio Brule came along to document Warren Farrell's presentation at the University of Toronto, capturing the essence of radical feminism with some great footage of the event and protest. They posted the video last week. I've been saying that good video is important, and the feminists made their appearance to give us quite a show.

The video shows feminists exactly as they are — not gussied up and made to look respectable as in the typical leftist media presentation. They are crude, aggressive, hateful and ugly, like a pack of snarling curs. One of them follows a young man around attempting to instigate a fight. Others taunt the police, who were going very easy on them given that they were engaged in criminally blocking access to a public event. In the US, they would be committing a civil rights violation for denying citizens the right to free speech and free assembly. In short, they were little more than a politicized criminal gang.

The contrast between the polite, tolerant young men who came to see the event and the feminist rabble attempting to deny their civil rights – actually deny their very humanity – couldn't be any more stark.

Yet there are still those who are calling them victims, and claiming that the thugs and harpies are now "threatened" by the very people they victimized at their rally. Boo hoo. Paul Elam dug up the name of one of the little tramps at the protest, but I can guarantee that nobody gives a damn about her. At the very most, some future employer might think twice about hiring her, but seriously, she isn't ever going to have that kind of job anyway.

Unsurprisingly, Manboobz Futrelle defends the spoiled, campus criminals, and tries to call Elam an "abuser" for exposing them. Meanwhile, he excuses their criminal, violent behavior. But if a picture is worth a thousand words, a video is worth ten thousand, and the above speaks for itself.

Matt Forney Makes it to Portland

Matt Forney stopped by Seattle the other day on the last leg of his journey to Portland, so I went out and had a beer with him. It was nice to meet another blogger here, even if it was a pretty brief encounter. Matt's a pleasant, polite young man who just completed a long hitchhiking trip across the US. He's posted a couple articles here at The Spearhead along the way, and now that he's settled in Portland for the time being I look forward to seeing him step up his output.

Matt had some pretty interesting stories to tell about his time on the road that included some colorful characters he met across the US, and insight into the state of the domestic oil and gas industry. It's nice to see that it's still possible for young men to strike out and explore our vast country, and I hope he inspires more to try the same.

Check out his site for further updates — I hope to see him cranking out some of the stories he told me about soon.

Women's Excessive Emphasis On Reproduction

Joe Zamboni · 10 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Joe Zamboni

Women overemphasize the importance of all things reproduction-related because it's the basis of their claim to being treated like royalty, to tyrannical power over men, and to gender supremacy. Females focus on sexual attraction (clothing fashions, hairstyles, make-up, plastic surgery, etc.), sexual relationships, romance, marriage, having babies, motherhood, child care, raising children, teaching children, and many other reproduction-related activities because this fundamental strategy confers prestige, power, and influence on females. This is particularly true for those attractive adult females who appear to be biologically capable of having children. In spite of all the feminist propaganda thrown at them, the dream of many, and perhaps most, American women, remains to get married and have a family. But we Americans as a culture are suffering from an extreme over-emphasis on the importance of reproduction.

Like the worker bee in the hive, it is a man that enables the queen (a woman) to focus on reproduction. Marriage, as we have established it in America today, is all about setting up a little fiefdom, where a woman is made the queen. For example, the house is without question in the vast majority of marriages the royal dominion of the woman. And from the time they are very little, males are indoctrinated to make sure the females get everything they need in order to perpetuate the species. Thus it's a man's role to provide food, water, shelter, protection, money, etc. We are told that those men who offered such diligent life-long service for their queens (wives) in fact had offspring that were more likely to survive.

But maybe that's a myth too, that's engineered to enhance the power, prestige and influence of women? If you look around, you'll notice many single mothers without the fathers anywhere in sight, without the fathers providing a damn thing (at least nothing directly, since it is largely men's taxes that support such women via government aid programs). Those single mothers seem to be having many children, and the latter seem to be surviving quite well. So perhaps the story about the great importance of reproduction, and how critical it is for men to cater to women's many needs, is simply another brainwashing technique used by women — a technique at this point culturally well-established — but nonetheless a technique used to enslave and subdue men?

In support of the notion that this gross over-emphasis on the importance of reproduction is in fact not necessarily the result of the natural evolution of the species, consider the ecological state of the planet. As anyone who has seriously studied this matter can tell you, we humans have gone way too far with this focus on and infatuation with reproduction. The alleged evolutionary strategy intended to make sure that the human species continued has been way too successful, and most of us humans are loath to admit that the strategy has long ago outlived its usefulness. Few people dare to talk about how humans are dominating, crowding-out, and in many cases exterminating nearly every other species on the planet, with the exception of insects and rodents, and those that we harvest for food (such as cattle). Why is it that so few dare to say the emperor (this evolutionary strategy of over-emphasizing reproduction) has no clothes?

The answer lies in the words of French writer Voltaire, who wisely said: "In order to find out who controls you, one only needs to find out whom he cannot criticize." As many men's rights activists can tell you, women do not take criticism well. Most American women believe they are above criticism, as though a lowly vassal, aka a man, cannot criticize a Queen (with a capital Q). At the same time, among many of this author's friends, the typical husband's response to a wife's complaint is no discussion and no argument… simply "yes dear." How did this lopsided and perverse situation come about?

We clearly must be able to criticize, to tell the truth, about what's happening if we as a species are going to be able to adapt ourselves to new situations. But the myth supporting the bending-over-backwards that men engage in to please women is something that women don't want to mess with. For women, the system as it now stands works for them. Never mind that feminists have been screaming about "equality" for decades; clearly those women didn't mean what they said. In spite of feminist dogma, most women think that of course men should support women via alimony and child support. And no, women shouldn't have to pay alimony and child support to men, or so they claim. This illogical position can only be continued as long as we men keep this reproduction strategy myth in place.

Catering to the female has to stop. Men need to stop buying diamond rings, getting on their knees to ask women for their hand in marriage, paying for dates, opening doors, and in so many other ways taking care of women as if each and every one of them were the sole queen bee in the hive. There are billions of women on earth, and a great number of them are expendable. There is no serious current danger that the human species will die out. There is no rational justification to act as though any particular woman is a queen bee. And after a man has had sex with a significant number of women, he'll come to appreciate that no sex is worth being a slave. It doesn't matter if she is Cleopatra or some other great sexy beauty. (Note that the myth of the Trojan War, the myth about men waging a protracted and costly war to recapture the beautiful Helen of Troy, is absolutely consistent with this over-emphasis on reproduction, teaching men that they should be giving everything, including their lives, to save a super-beautiful fertile young woman.)

The catering to female desire and female whim has gone way beyond what is necessary in order to get the job done, and in this case this author is talking about adequately raising children. The corporations have noticed how men work so hard, how they with great dedication act like worker bees, and so they hitched up consumerism with the desires and whims of the female. It is no mistake that women control 88% of American retail spending; this social design comes about through the alliance of supremacist feminism with the enslaving corporate elites. As a result of this social design, as a result of this socially-dictated over-emphasis on reproduction, men are expected to go well beyond providing the necessities, they must slave their lives away to make sure that women experience the luxuries shown in advertisements, live the life of the beautiful actresses in the movies, and have the exciting opportunities enjoyed by heroines in female porn novels like Fifty Shades Of Grey. This catering to women's desires and whims has gone beyond obnoxious, repulsive and entitled — it is now dangerous, malignant, and out-of-control. Even if nobody cares about the impacts on the psychological health of men, this strategy cannot be sustained because it threatens the fundamental viability of the earth's ecosystem.

Life should not be all about babies and bringing still more people into the world. Supposedly humans are intelligent and self-aware, not simply instinctual animals. It's time we lived up to that billing. We as a species must rise above the unthinking instinctual drive to reproduce and look at the long-term consequences of our actions, notably how catering to female desires and whims is a painful path to destruction not only of males, but of females too, and ultimately of civilized society as well.

It is time for the worker bees (males in human terms) to rise up and revolt en masse. It is here where the men's movement meets the anti-consumerism movement, meets the environmentalism movement, meets the anti- slavery movement. We don't need more people. We need more personal freedom, more self-actualization, and more pursuit of happiness (in whatever form that may take for an individual). For a man who never wanted children, to be forced to devote a large portion of his life to economically supporting some spawn of his that he never intended to bring into this world, simply because his girlfriend, or perhaps his one-night stand, refused to have an abortion, or put the spawn up for adoption — that is slavery, straight out-and-out slavery. The fact that women are the only ones able to choose: having an abortion, putting a baby up for adoption, leaving a baby on a hospital's steps without explanation or paperwork, or employing one in a large array of birth control technologies not under the control of men … that speaks volumes about the reproduction-related control that women now have over men. As Voltaire's quote would imply, as long as women call the reproductive shots, and as long as men are not willing to stand-up and complain about the injustice of this situation, the control women have over relationships with heterosexual men will continue in its enslaving form.

The rules of modern American marriage also reveal how excessive the catering to females has become. It used to be in the name of reproduction, or if you like legal terms "for the good of the children," but women have co-opted the system and now it's simply about catering to women's desires and whims (not genuine needs). If he has children by a woman, a man is obligated to pay 20+ years for child support. So what if she uses the money any way she wants, without any accountability, without any need to show that the children actually benefitted? If a man marries that same woman, and then later divorces, he may be required to pay alimony to this queen for life. So what if her child rearing days are long gone, and so what if she offers him no services in return? And of course, if a man is married to a woman, he's also required to support the queen economically on an ongoing basis. So what if he does an equal share of the housework and she doesn't have any children?

Marriage is a trap of gigantic proportions that men — intelligent men in many cases, men who just haven't taken the time to fully investigate the facts — are still falling prey to, in tragically large numbers. The best way to stay free: don't get married, and don't get a woman pregnant. Have a vasectomy, use condoms, date older women, be celibate, and otherwise do whatever you need to do to prevent reproduction. If a woman who had sex with you does get pregnant, insist upon and then pay for an abortion. Our enslaving social system is profoundly rigged against men, and the most viable option is to avoid both the marriage game and the reproduction game.

It's time that we men defined a desirable man's life as something other than just being a worker bee, just catering to the desires and whims of females, and just "supporting the family." What could your life be like without the obligations of a wife, children, child support, alimony, and all the other trappings of marriage and reproduction? Have you really thought about that? Do you dare?

Feminists are Going Underground

W.F. Price · 11 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The popular hatred of feminism has grown to such an extent that even self-proclaimed feminists are abandoning the term. Alex Cranz, a feminist who runs a site called "fempop," grew frustrated when she found that people were avoiding her site because she had explicitly labeled it a feminist site. Her tagline read "Pop Culture Through A Feminist Lens," and although she felt it was an accurate description of the site, she encountered resistance from friends, particularly men, who said that it made them "uncomfortable," and was too exclusive. They explained that feminism isn't for everyone.

After some investigation, Cranz decided to make a change. Her article about it, titled "Feminism Isn't the Problem; The Word Is," documents her retreat from explicit feminism:

> Feminism was, to these people, a moniker used by angry hairy-pitted activists who hated men, loved women too much, were physically incapable of humor and probably didn't wear a bra.* It was a word intoned by activists. Not "real" people. I can only guess they still talked to me because I "wasn't like a normal feminist" or something. It must have been all the dead rape baby jokes I used to tell in high school.
>
> Frustrated I went and whipped up a Tumblr, "You Might Be A Feminist." It was a way of defining what feminism meant to me and other women and it was a very quick success, if moderate, success. But only with people already identifying themselves as feminists. It wasn't changing anyone's way of thinking or converting the Katy Perrys, Carla Bruni Sarkozys and Rooney Maras of the world. The people who NEEDED to see it weren't. It started to feel a little masturbatory.
> In February 2012, after yet another explanation from a well-meaning friend that the word was alienating to FemPop's audience I snapped. I abruptly changed the logo and removed the word "feminism" from its prominent position on the website. I told myself it was an experiment I could later write about. I briefly even deluded myself into believing nothing would change.
> Except there was a change, and it was so immediate and immense I actually thought I'd broken something on the website in my minor bit of rebranding.
> I changed one word and suddenly visitors felt comfortable poking around. Nothing else changed on the site. There wasn't a huge redesign and the clearly feminist title of the site didn't change. I didn't alter color schemes or suddenly post the best article in the history of the universe. It was still pop culture through a feminist lens–but with a little less feminism on the front page.
> It disturbed me that my friends and family had been so correct. I set the knowledge aside a little too scared to write about it. Because there are implications. Feminism is a dirty word with the mainstream and that's a little terrifying to me.

It's funny how she describes calling oneself a feminist as "masturbatory." Too true — for both the male and female variety.

The video of feminists showing their true colors in Toronto was important, but people have been getting the idea about feminists for quite some time now. Thanks in part to our efforts on this site and others. This has prompted rage on the part of feminists and their sycophants. Just the other day David Futrelle used search stats from some bestiality sites he'd been browsing in an attempt to prove that zoo porn is more popular than men's rights. While I'm sure this is the case for Futrelle, it doesn't matter all that much whether people are interested in men's rights specifically so long as they get the message about feminism.

MRA is never going to be a broad-based, widely popular movement like feminism, because men are never going to be able to all get together in one big circle singing solidarity songs. We don't do that kind of thing. At least not the normal men. But what men can do is get together and fight a common enemy, and that's what we've been doing.

Being popular is far more important for women than for men, and that's one of the weaknesses of feminism and strengths of MRA. In fact, as men, whether people think we are nice or not doesn't even matter. All that matters is that we aren't contemptible, sniveling weaklings. I know that really bothers some people, but those are just the cards we've been dealt. Men are hated most of all for their weaknesses.

Recently, I saw some feminists suggesting that the SPLC playing politics and siding with the feminists in their little "hate the haters" campaign against men must have crushed our souls. You know, that's pretty funny. If I were a woman, I might feel that way, but as a man I just think "screw them." I know, for example, that SPLC founder Morris Dees is widely hated where he lives in Alabama. Do you think Dees, rolling around in his luxury car or swimming in his private pool, gives a damn? Nah — he just thinks "screw them" and collects a check. Dees is loved by his liberal allies because he beats up on their enemies; not because he's a nice, friendly fellow. Actually, from accounts I've read he's a grade-A asshole who leaves "broken lives" in his wake. But he is a strong, resourceful, unintimidated man, and that's what counts.

For women, however, it's a different ball game. Women's power rests largely on the public perception of femininity as inherently good. This perception is instinctive for men, who are programmed to see all sorts of goodness in women from birth. It's an enormous source of power, but it isn't guaranteed, hence women's constant insecurity over what people think of them. For the most part, it is quite literally based upon the male concept of beauty. Men see beautiful women and this activates the "good" response in their brains. Men then immediately fall all over themselves to serve the woman in order to obtain some of this goodness.

But a few changes have come about. The "women good" perception can be severely damaged by certain things. First, men do not feel good when the woman they desire is screwing other men. It's very distressing to them on an instinctive level, and today women are very promiscuous. Secondly, when women start acting like men (e.g. compete with them in careers), it also significantly erodes their appeal. Combine promiscuity with competition in the workplace, and women have really shot themselves in the foot. It's like a reverse makeover where they come out looking uglier than when they went in, and this is leaving the obesity epidemic – the real elephant in the living room – out of the equation. To men, feminists have begun to epitomize all the worst things about contemporary females, and young women are starting to catch on and run very quickly away from the feminist label.

So, in order to beat the feminists, all we have to do is show them as the awful, nasty, unattractive, slutty and hateful people they are, and as women they instantly lose most of their appeal and power. Fortunately, they do a pretty good job of that themselves, so we just have to remind people from time to time, helpfully point out the terrible things they do and promote, and keep up the pressure.

If the feminists fight back with all they've got and get vicious, calling us names, smearing us personally, getting low-down and dirty and so on, we win. We win because while they may have some success in smearing us, they'll come out with just as much filth on their faces, and it will look worse on them.

I suspect we'll see them trying to drag more men in on their side as they get desperate, but it won't be enough. Just look at the guy they had with them in Toronto — that's the face of male feminism's future: drug-addled street scum.

There's only one way that the feminists can ultimately preserve their power. They have to adopt femininity again. They have to stop being sluts, stop trying to rule men in the workplace, and stop trying to match us on the battlefield. In short, they have to stop being feminists.

What Does Feminism Look Like on YouTube?

W.F. Price · 11 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

If you search for “feminism” on YouTube, the results are quite encouraging. All but a couple of the videos are clearly hostile to the ideology. Even more encouraging is the fact that every year, fewer and fewer young people watch TV. Feminism appears strong on TV shows and in major newspapers, but these forms of media have come to be associated with senior citizens and the aging, white progressive demographic that dominates our childless cities.

Young people don’t flick on the TV for their entertainment any longer, instead choosing to spend time online, where there is far less progressive control and influence. And when you look online, it’s pretty clear that people don’t like feminism. This is why those who are looking to appeal to young people are avoiding the f-word like the plague.

Young people hate feminism, and I can only see this revulsion growing stronger as it begins to cough out its death rattle.

I don’t know for sure what feminists could do to improve their image, but perhaps I could offer a little advice. If they really want to get young people on board, I think Futrelle should start posting YouTube videos of himself talking about how he’s a sex-positive male feminist.

Yeah, that ought to do it.

How To Avoid A False Rape Accusation

Featured Guest · 12 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

By Frost

The Manosphere needs more anecdotes, more stories, and more dramatic gravitas, says WF Price. I'm inclined to agree, so here's the heartwarming tale of how 18 year old Frost evaded his first ever false rape accusation.

Our story begins on a chilly autumn evening in the residence halls of a typical North American university. The night was like any other Friday, Saturday, Thursday, Monday or Wednesday in my life at the time: Good friends, cheap drinks, and shenanigans galore.

At one point in the evening, I made the acquaintance of a lovely young lady. Within an hour or two, we drunkenly recognized each other as soul mates and made sweet sweet love in her dorm room. We exchanged numbers, I stumbled back to my own room as the sun came up, and all was well.

The next week, we repeated the exercise, but with a twist. The morning after, she asked me – or more accurately, she naively communicated her expectation to me – that, well, of course I was now her exclusive, monogamous boyfriend.

Eighteen year old Frost was, surprisingly, an even worsehuman being than the current version. Rather than let her down gently, I laughed in her face and said hell no, not a chance, not in this lifetime. She asked me to leave.

The next day, she discussed the matter with her "don" – basically a sophomore babysitter assigned to live among the freshmen, hug them when they miss home, and hold their hair back when they need to vomit out a gallon of boxed wine. The dons are generally the sort who are afraid to leave residence for their second year. But, mostly, they aren't such terrible people.

Let me give you a clearer picture of this one though:

She was a stumpy, ugly, pasty little rat of a human being. She walked with a feigned limp, which we occasionally caught her forgetting to put on. She claimed to be a Native American, although she looked as generically European as they come. She claimed to be a lesbian, but how such a cold, bitter human could ever feel or receive love is beyond me. Her greatest achievement in life, as measured by how often she bragged about it, was that she was a member of five separate oppressed minority groups – woman, cripple, lesbian, minority, and apparently one other that we, in all our privilege, never discovered.

So my erstwhile lady friend went to have a nice little talk about her feelings with this fine specimen of humanity – let's call her Jizz – and launched a lovely sequence of events.

Over the next month, completely without my knowledge, Jizz tapped into her network of on-campus Social Justice Warrior Harridans, Manginas and White Knights. Together, they repeatedly confronted the girl, and brought the full-court press on to convince her that she had been raped. They harassed her all year, brought in counselors, staged interventions, and basically did everything they could to convince this girl that, since we had hooked up and she had later come to regret it, I deserved to spend 20+ years in jail.
