In other articles, I intend to speak in depth how 1st wave feminism created an unprecedented form of parental alienation for fathers, their connections with suicides, mass murders (yes, I mean it) and how the now so polemic "gender ideology" – which many believe emerged with the 2nd wave, with the neomarxism (New Left/Frankfurt School/cultural marxism) and/or Simone de Beauvoir (World War 2) – was actually born in the 1st wave.

If you know what I (and others) know about feminism's 1st wave ("that good feminism"?), you will never see it the same way again.

Cheers from Brazil.

> Article fist published on AVFM in Portuguese. Color photos of the Ku Klux Klan: Martin, USA. Historic photos: Pulic Domain, by various authors.

Recent stories shine a light on feminist insanity

Mark Dent · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

During the past two weeks I decided to copy links to a number of articles which appeared online and in our local media, all of which were connected to feminism.

Each one is an example of the utter madness, incoherence and hypocrisy underpinning their ideology.

I must confess that I have lost respect for so many people I once admired in recent years. I suppose that's the price you pay for seeing them unmasked and exposed for what they truly are — craven moral cowards and spiteful, embittered losers.

Sir Michael Caine is a man I have always loved on the big screen and as a person. Whenever I saw him interviewed, he came across as a man with both feet firmly planted on the ground with no hint of the prima donna and no holier than thou lecturing-until this week.

[image]
Michael was commenting on the #MeToo movement and feminism in general.
Michael Caine has hailed the #MeToo movement for tackling predatory Hollywood and ensuring actresses at auditions don't 'have to worry about getting raped'.

The 86-year-old movie legend believes that young actresses are better protected from sexual predators following the Harvey Weinstein scandal.

Fair enough. No-one wants to see any woman being sexually abused by predators like Weinstein.

Michael continues:

'I'm a big admirer of ladies, for their causes and everything.'

Caine worked on several films with Weinstein – who has agreed a £35 million settlement with women who accuse him of sexual misconduct and still faces trial for sexual assault – but says he saw no evidence of any inappropriate behaviour.

'I never saw him do anything wrong with women, but when I read what these girls were saying, it was terrible that he did that,' he says in an interview to mark the release in paperback of his book Blowing The Bloody Doors Off.

In the book, Caine expresses his 'regret and shame' at not realising what some of his male peers were doing in Hollywood in his heyday.

Call me a cynic, but I don't believe Sir Michael. Everyone in Hollywood conceded that Weinstein's predatory behavior was common knowledge for years. Michael lived and worked in that environment for decades. He attended all of the parties and rubbed shoulders with all of the big names in Hollywood and actually made a number of movies which were produced by Weinstein. Does he seriously expect us to believe he never heard the rumours and innuendo?

Why have so many actors suddenly seen the light? These same men and women remained totally blinded by it whilst their careers were taking off and the dollars were rolling in? It's so easy to become a man who tells it like it is when you have one foot in the grave and the power and wealth to make any pushback a minor irritant rather than a threat to your livelihood.

What Caine said next summed up the incredible cognitive dissonance we have all come to associate with feminists and any who support their ideology.

'No one ever did anything in front of me. Because I was very pro-feminist, you know. And they knew that, so they wouldn't do anything in front of me… I've always been a man for women's lib,' he says.

'The thing about me and women is that I loved my mother. Very much. So, every woman to me is about five per cent my mother.

'So, they're always treated very well. I have respect and I'm all for equal pay.

'Mind you, I didn't realise pay was worse for them because I worked with Elizabeth Taylor.

'She got a million dollars, I got £150,000. I thought, 'Wait a minute.' I didn't complain.'

Despite his personal experience and understanding of the fact that this constant demand for equal pay for women in the movie industry is based upon a myth, Caine dutifully genuflects and says he wants to see women in Hollywood receive equal pay.

In the next breath he shatters this notion by informing us that a woman, Elizabeth Taylor, received ten times what he was paid when he appeared in a movie with her.

He tells us, "I didn't complain."

Jane Fonda also received far more than Caine did when they appeared in a movie.

So many decades ago, women who had drawing power were receiving far more money than their less popular male counterparts! Yet this fool still maintains he wants women to get equal pay in the film industry. Moral cowardice is very unattractive. Where was the ballsy old cockney so many have come to love? Why didn't we hear something more like this from Michael?

Equal pay for women in movies? Blimey, Jane Fonda and Elizabeth Taylor were getting paid ten times what I got 'cause they were the box office attraction-and that was fifty years ago! It's all a load of bollocks!

He knows the whole issue is an utterly contrived one which has nothing to do with the mistreatment of women and everything to do with simple economics but he still dances to the feminist tune.

Farewell, Mr. Caine. Another hero bites the dust.

If you are looking for a gold-plated example of the astonishingly shocking double standards employed by feminists then you cannot surpass this one.

[image]
During the recent French Open a male player was being interviewed about his victory post-match when his press conference was brought to an abrupt halt.

Why?

Serena Williams had just lost a match which she was heavily favoured to win and she made it clear that she was in no mood to wait around while some unknown tennis player prattled on about his triumph.

The male in question was, Dominic Thiem.

Thiem accused Williams, the 23-time Grand Slam champion, of having "bad personality" after he was kicked out of a press conference room to accommodate her after a French Open loss.

It has been reported that while Williams did not directly order Thiem out, she made clear to officials that she did not want to wait to speak after bombing out in the third round. An irate Thiem was moved on, asking, "I mean, what the hell? No, but it's a joke, really … I have to leave the room because she's coming?"

Surely Thiem would receive nothing but support for his justifiable irritation? Absolutely not! It appears that it is Thiem who is the fool in this story.

Whoopi Goldberg accused him of "boneheaded" behavior.

Listen, man, don't nobody know who you are! You may be big in the tennis world but this is a big deal that she was out this early. People want to know what's happening, how she doing – and I don't think she actually wanted to talk to anybody about losing. 'Oh yes, let's talk about my loss so early in the French Open'; I don't think that was her plan! Don't blame her! Stop being a bonehead, don't blame her."

Sunny Hostin added:

"I was surprised Roger Federer came out and also was defending Thiem's position and saying this is unfair. He should know better. Serena is the queen."

These same rabid feminists who are the regular hosts of a sickeningly left leaning, feminist show called The View, would have been apoplectic had any male tennis player, no matter how famous and successful, dared to interrupt a young female's press conference because he didn't feel inclined to wait for his turn.

Just imagine the invective which would have been spat out by these rabid females. Toxic masculinity, bullying and intimidation and the utter disregard we have for women in sport would undoubtedly have got a mention.

They have no shame. They literally have two sets of standards and do not even pretend to hide this fact.

Now we turn our attention to Colombia.

A wife decided to humiliate her cheating husband by making him lie naked on a car in a public street in Colombia as locals laughed at him.

Jairo Vargas begged his wife for forgiveness and agreed to participate in the embarrassing stunt in hopes of saving their marriage, The Sun reported.

[image]
Traffic was brought to a halt as motorists stopped and recorded the humiliating event.
Vargas's wife, who has not been named, caught him cheating with another woman at a motel in the Caribbean coastal city of Barranquilla.

Traffic was brought to a halt on a busy road as motorists stopped and recorded the humiliating event.

Footage captured on mobile phones shows the remorseful husband laying across a car's roof while hiding his head in a towel.

He was also seen knocking on the driver's window and scrubbing the front windshield.

Colombian National Police was eventually called to the scene, arresting Vargas and issuing him a summons for causing public nuisance on a street.

Just try to imagine a man tell telling his wife her only road to redemption is climbing naked onto the top of his car which he will drive through busy city streets.

Hilarious.

What's that? I dared to employ the old "flip the genders" argument.

Bloody oath.

Meanwhile, over in England on their popular television program, Good Morning Britain, a female politician promoted her view that women should not have to serve sentences of one year or less as it is too disruptive to their lives and the lives of their children.

One cop tries to argue that women already get a good deal and tried to explain what happens when a husband and wife are found guilty of a crime like drug distribution. He says the man is always arrested and placed behind bars whilst the women get a free pass due to the fact someone has to take care of the kids.

This isn't good enough for the female politician.

According to Sian Berry, jail is far more damaging to women because they have carer responsibilities and this causes great difficulties for those who depend upon them. I would have thought that being the sole breadwinner for your family is also a "carers' responsibility and one most men perform every day. No-one cites this fact as a reason for being lenient with or not jailing male criminals.

Listen to Brenda Birungi who was sentenced to eleven months in prison for a violent assault. She genuinely feels that women lose more than men when they are sent to prison and explains how she had plans to go into child care, plans which were thwarted by her imprisonment!

Please watch the short clip I linked and have your breath taken away by the sheer entitlement of these women. No-one raised the fact that a far more pressing issue might be the fact that men receive 63% longer jail terms for committing the same crime as a woman. We could also throw in the fact that in domestic violence altercations it is the man who is routinely arrested even before the facts are understood.

This female politician is just another example of the way women in politics completely ignore their male constituents and always place the needs of women ahead of men even when statistics clearly demonstrate it is men who are being screwed by the system in almost every measurable area of societal disadvantage.

I came across another astonishing article written by a feminist author, Nikki Gemmell, who regularly writes columns for The Australian.

She wanted to know why male gynaecologists and obstetricians choose their profession. She offered her own insight into what might motivate them.

A female doctor friend had seen many male gynies and obs over her long working life, and had a harsh observation: "They hate women, and like to see them in pain." A brutal assessment, yes, but a fascinating observation from someone who'd spent decades in the profession.

I had four midwife-led births; never an obstetrician in the delivery room. The one time I sought the advice of a male doctor was just prior to the birth of my fourth child; I was 44 and being closely monitored. Yet the feeling I got from this man was that the baby's health and survival was everything in this equation; he made me feel like I was a mere vessel for its safe delivery and not much else. I'd never faced that attitude before, through all the different midwives I'd had. They'd all been big-sisterly, empathetic; and in England I'd only met them in labour.

My conclusion: I just wish there were more women entering this profession. And back to the original question… well, I write to understand, to get us to think. So please enlighten me.

You will be happy to note that every one of the comments beneath the article were unanimous in their condemnation of her disgraceful article.

The very fact this article could be published in one of Australia's leading newspapers is in itself an incomprehensible sideline. At what point does an editor simply say:

This is unacceptable trash- write us something we can publish.

She quite openly infers that one of the biggest motivating factors behind men entering this profession is their desire to humiliate and inflict pain upon their female patients.

I informed her of a little-known fact.

Up until the 16th century. Midwifery was the sole preserve of female midwives. In all of the centuries in which these women had brought life into the world they had seen an incredibly high mortality rate for both mothers and their babies, yet there had been no innovation or change in approach by these women over hundreds of years.

Enter William Chamberlen. He saw there was a tremendous need for something which would reduce the death rate in child birth. William promptly invented the forceps. Apparently, many midwives were most upset by the fact that men began to enter this hitherto female-only occupation.

[image]
This extract says all that needs to be said very succinctly.

The forceps are undoubtedly one of the greatest inventions of all time in medical science, which may seem very weird considering it looks like such a simple piece of equipment.

Before the 1600s, obstructed labor was a huge problem. Many women would get complications due to obstructed labor, and a lot of babies died because physicians just didn't have any suitable means of dealing with such a problem. It was therefore a major cause of death for babies, and it was even deemed to be an "expected tragedy" which is just truly horrific to think of. But after the invention and the eventual use of the forceps, the survival rates of both moms and their babies started increasing.

Women's lives and longevity have been enhanced by countless male inventions throughout history but I am yet to come across any article by any woman acknowledging this and expressing gratitude.

They simply call us "oppressors." Gemmell suggests male gynecologists and obstetricians are motivated by sadism.

Surely a simple thank you is all that is required, Nikki Gemmell.

Perhaps we can finish with a comment from Lynda who echoed the feelings of every one of the 282 people, men and women, who chose to respond to this tosh.

> Lynda
>
> My daughter has just had an emergency cesarean after 10 hours of labour. Her Obstetrician, anaesthetist, assisting Ob's and a theatre nurse were all male. She couldn't have been in more caring, professional, nurturing and better hands – they were simply wonderful. In fact so good, that she will return to that very same team again for further pregnancies. We are not impressed with this article one bit- in fact we find it offensive. You do such a disservice to so many fine men who work crazy hours , often having to leave their own families, to come to the aid of a birthing mother and do everything possible to ensure a safe birth for mother and baby.
>
> Disgraceful.

Two very well-behaved boys left to figure things out on their own: Reflections on being raised 'Blue Pill'

Anwar Y. Dunbar · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

"No one told us about: 'Feminism', 'Gynocentrism', 'Hypergamy', and 'Misandry'."

This is my second submission on A Voice for Men (AVFM) – the first being my 2017 Father's Day post published on my own blog, Big Words. After sharing that I mentioned him in it, Paul Elam saw fit to publish it on AVFM as it discussed my father's money and life lessons – many of them painful. It was also about some of Dad's personal struggles – some of which I've only comprehended as I've become a man myself.

I stumbled across Paul's An Ear for Men (AEFM) YouTube channel in 2017, and in this season of my life as a single man, his words have been like music to my ears, explaining much of what I've experienced dating or 'pair-bonding' as he calls it. They've helped me feel okay about not rushing back into the next relationship. Furthermore, they've affirmed that me and my brother were never alone regarding our lifelong struggles with the opposite sex. There were in fact other boys who were raised by women with minimal quality male mentoring, left to figure things out on their own as they transitioned into manhood.

This essay is not to bash my parents as they did the best they could do. I wrote this essay to speak to what I think a lot of other men from similar backgrounds have experienced. For me it was always reassuring to know that I wasn't alone in my experiences, and there is a power in sharing common experiences.

I think about myself and my brother's upbringing a lot these days – how we were socialized and how we were raised – mostly by my mother and my grandmother – mostly under a female's point of view. My father who remained as visible as possible following my parent's divorce, did the best he could to teach us how to be men, though I would later find that his own knowledge about how to navigate this world as a man was somewhat limited and even flawed in some fundamental ways. Thus me and my older brother, both two very well-behaved boys both have taken our lumps in the adult world in terms of romantic love and pair-bonding. Again as verified on AVFM and AEFM, there are a lot of men like us out there who were let to figure things out on their own, if at all.

* * *

"Your sons are so well-behaved," said many of the women at the Baptist church we attended during my early years. My childhood was anchored in Christian values and teachings – principles which would teach us to be fine and upstanding men. I won't say that the men at our church didn't care, but it was usually the women who commented. Later on, men like auto mechanic Mr. Gray of "Gray's Auto", observed that we were, "different," and that there weren't many boys like us coming out of Buffalo's eastside where most of the black families lived.

Growing up without any consistent strong male figures, I enjoyed being around Mr. Gray and hearing his stories like the time he broke some guy's jaw with one punch. Mr. Gray had rock-like hands and knuckles, and I think the guy came after him at his repair shop over a woman or a repair job. I had never heard such stories in my 20 years, and something about it was cool. Though an older man, Mr. Gray was in excellent shape and enjoyed being around young people who were on positive paths. He exuded the 'masculine energy' Dr. Robert Glover discussed in his book No More Mr. Nice Guy. Unfortunately, we only went to lunch a couple of times, but I soaked up everything I could from him. Throughout my youth and beyond, I was drawn to the stories and wisdom of strong men like Mr. Gray.

Within our home, Mom was an old school, 'throwback' mother and took pride in our behavior. She established discipline and respect early on, and she didn't have to spank or whip us much. I personally recall just the threat of the belt striking fear into me. She did it mostly on her own as Dad was five hours away and wasn't involved in our daily development and socialization. It was a safe home filled with love. It was also a sheltered home – one which kept us isolated from the streets and the darker sides of human nature – the church included.

It was very important for Mom to raise two well-behaved boys. She and my grandmother felt that you raised your children for society. That is, you raise them to be good citizens and to play fair and square. While me my brother however were raised to be two well-behaved boys, we gradually learned that it wasn't a well-behaved world we were going into – particularly in the dating arena which turned out to be more of a 'Darwinian/Survival of the Fittest'-type of place.

"Be attentive to her moods. Be sensitive to her feelings. Be romantic. Be thoughtful and caring. Your father certainly didn't know how to be romantic towards me." These are all things Mom told me in terms of "courting" and dating women as I transitioned from my teens into my twenties. In hindsight, these were probably all of the things that were on her wish list for men – things she didn't always receive. "Relationships are work," is something else Mom told me – words which stayed with me. They were true but without self-love, I discovered that they could lead to staying trapped in toxic situations way too long. From my grandmother, I remember hearing a lot of talk about, "providing," and this was usually in discussions about an aunt's husbands who was, "a good provider but not much a father."

Very early on I gleaned that a man's worth and usefulness were tied directly to his resources and service to women. In hindsight, many of the marital relationships in my immediate family circle were dysfunctional, some violent, and most ended in divorce. After hearing stories about how my mother was physically abused by our father, I think me and my brother both set out to be much better men. But who and what awaited our good, upright and upstanding intentions?

What awaited us was a jungle – a world where two well-behaved boys were easy targets, and prime candidates to be taken advantage of, especially in the dating arena by some of the women we encountered there. What we found was that while we were taught to be nice, attentive, caring, thoughtful and sensitive to the needs of the women we took interest in, we weren't told that we wouldn't necessarily get those same courtesies in return. We weren't told that we could get the exact opposite of what we were giving out. We weren't taught about the darker sides of female nature, and the perils of them. We had to learn those on our own.

Furthermore, while we were taught that a man's role is to provide, we were ill-equipped to reconcile the traditional roles for the sexes in a world that had become very non-traditional. With women now working and generating their own incomes, what were they supposed to do? No one told us about: 'Feminism', 'Gynocentrism', 'Hypergamy', and 'Misandry' – the 'Four Horsewomen of the Apocalypse' which make relationships, dating and marriage utter hell. I knew nothing about the former three words until watching Paul's many 'Red Pill' podcasts on AEFM – prior to which I thought something was wrong with me. I briefly heard about feminism when my brother started college and enrolled in some "Women's Studies" courses.

By the way, this essay originally also looked at my brother's journey, but to keep the family peace, I'm just focusing on myself. I've had three adult relationships, all of which were blood baths – my blood and for a myriad of reasons – the central of which was having low self-esteem and a lack of self-purpose and direction. When I say a lack of self-esteem, I'm grouping a bunch of things together: a lack of self-confidence, a high level of insecurity, and a lack of self-love.

I believe this 'Unholy Trinity' was due to not having consistent strong male figures around, and no one stressing the importance of self-love and boundaries. The understanding that, "relationships are work," compelled me to stay in some situations much too long as well – there can come a point when relationships are too much work, and where the ends don't justify the means. How much work is too much work? It's a very, very important question to ask one's self and to be honest about when that threshold has been crossed.

Without knowing to protect my psyche, being a teachable and malleable person – strengths in some instances, allowed me to fall victim to the psychological warfare waged in the toxic pairings I landed in. It was also the unconditional deference and love for women that I learned growing up. I can't remember my mother or grandmother teaching us to know when to call it quits. Actually to their credit, I do remember hearing the riddle, "You teach people how to treat you," but it was always stated in such a gentle and well-behaved way. By the way gentleman, a key signal to end a relationship is when your personal health is compromised – the emergence of physical indicators of increased stress, a loss of appetite, and a loss of peaceful sleep are all dead giveaways.

* * *

I swear to this day that my brother and myself were fortunate that our father was visible and we could call him whenever we wanted to. This was good early on, but in some ways harmful for us later. Dad and I talked a lot about girls and women throughout the years and he told me many of his horror stories – some about the women he dated, and many stories about his marriage to my mother and his second wife (from his point of view).

Overall when it came to women, he honestly wasn't very successful with them and in hindsight it makes sense why I didn't get much useful 'game' from him. How can you be unsuccessful at something, and then teach someone else to be successful at it? My brother? He never really listened to anyone anyway which in this regard worked out in his favor. Dad recently went through his second divorce and is now back on the market, lonely and hoping to have someone.

What kinds of things did Dad teach me? He was always pretty big on age. In short, younger women were good, and women my age and older were bad. It was a very black and white way of looking at a world full of gray. Women my age and older were in his words, "smarter and more advanced," and would look to take advantage of my inexperience. I can't think of an instance where he stated that the right older woman may have the maturity necessary for something long lasting, and that they weren't all bad. I've certainly left a couple good ones on the table due to his sage wisdom. While the theory was that younger women would look up to us, Dad didn't say anything about many of them being immature, fickle and difficult which I later found was the case. This taught me that you can't always take your parent's words as the gospel.

Dad was always pretty big on horoscopes as well. He always wanted to know how old my love interests were, and when they were born. He knew his astrology so well that he could easily state who was an 'earth', 'air', 'fire', or 'water' sign, and he would give his commentary on how well we would astrologically fit together. And that was the extent of it in addition to women being, "all about the money." In some ways he right about that – again a large percentage of a man's usefulness was his resources. Dad was also accurate about women typically also focusing more on what a man is not doing as opposed to them myriad of things he is doing – a sobering revelation from someone you're loving unconditionally and working hard for.

Much of the advice I got from my father was from a position of powerlessness, anger, fear and despair as it related to women – one where life's glass was consistently half empty. Very little of his teachings discussed self-love and developing my 'Personal Power' – things I had to learn from other men. Self-love is powerful because it helps you to put a certain amount of value on yourself, and it compels you to enforce your own principles and standards – something Paul stresses in both AVFM and AEFM.

Even after earning a Ph.D. in a STEM-field from one of the greatest universities in the world, my self-love was still in the toilet. It was around that time that Dad's telling me, "I'm proud of you," also seemed to stop all altogether. In some ways he became an adversary who didn't celebrate my success, but instead wanted to make sure that I didn't feel too big because of it. Ironically what most women wanted and needed, was a confident and strong man – one of who felt a sense of personal power and confidence – one who could stand up to them and even walk away when necessary. Strangely – and I've seen this a lot in families, Dad also taught me that while your parents should be your biggest cheerleaders, some can become your biggest competitors and adversaries. Ironic isn't it?

* * *

So what's the take away from all of this? Is it to not be nice to women? Is it to be an asshole to women? No. My best friend and others have stated that there was nothing wrong with being raised to respect women. There is however something wrong with being a doormat – a 'Simp' in modern terminology. And that's exactly what you are if you're only told respect women. You also have to protect yourself, your heart and your spirit. There's nothing worse than being nice, and cherishing someone only to be shitted on and pimped because you didn't know that your love would be taken advantage of. It turns out that there are different interpretations of love, and being nice, attentive, romantic and caring are only 10% of the entire playbook when dealing with the opposite sex.

I realized early on that we were missing the other 90% of the playbook, and I actively sought out the rest of that information. If you were raised like us, I would encourage you to ask questions, study and find male figures who actually know what they're doing and have worked their way through this stuff. It's never too late to start filling in the gaps in your knowledge. If you can't find other successful men initially, you can at least watch the abundance of 'Men Go Their Own Way' (MGTOW), and 'Red Pill' podcasts like Paul's library of AEFM podcasts. Being a black man, I also spend a lot of time in the "Negro Manosphere" where these and other topics are discussed daily.

I showed this essay to a mentor as I got the content closer to its final form. He stated that it wasn't surprising that a child of a broken home would struggle in relationships, but also that he was looking for some sort of resolution – a happy ending of sorts. After pondering his words, I realized first that in this world we live in, there isn't always a happy ending no matter how much we want one – something else I learned through experience and observation. Secondly my personal story isn't finished, and there may in fact be a happy ending for me. In any case, I understand my history much better now in addition to what's happening in society overall. I also understand that I've made faulty choices in the past in terms of mating, and one of my challenges is thus not to repeat them going forward.

I want to thank Paul Elam for starting AVFM and AEFM, and for all of the other men's channels for creating their content, and for providing the key information that many of us weren't taught at home. Many of us 'Blue Pill' men left our homes blind, and without this information, we would've never known what was going on or why – this is the essence of the 'Red Pill' movement. As mentioned before I have my own blog titled Big Words which I'm working to grow. There I write about: Education, STEM, Financial Literacy and other topics. Please stop by. You can follow me on Twitter at @BWArePowerful, at the Big Words Blog Site Facebook page, and on Instagram at @anwaryusef76. I'll close this with one of Paul's usual endings and say, "Thank you for reading my essay, and I hope you enjoyed reading it, even if you didn't."

Addressing that additional American rape-culture

Kevin Patten · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Sexual Violence?

With Time magazine's recent naming of the "Silence Breaker" as their "Person of the Year," there's no better time in which to ponder the serious matters of sexual violence. The resultant hashtag – "Me Too" – set off as the other, even costlier California wildfire.

Lesser known headlines derive from a landmark case taking place in Michigan, where three doctors find themselves at the center of the nation's first legal test of that abhorrent practice found in places like Africa, Indonesia, and Egypt. Let's call it by its name: Female Genital Mutilation (FGM). It's estimated that up to 100 young girls were genitally violated at the hands and tools of Dr. Fakhruddin Attar, 53; his wife, Farida Attar, 50; and Detroit emergency room physician Jumana Nagarwala, 44.

There's a detail that I wish to explore here: According to the Detroit News, federal prosecutors want to argue that this was a sex crime. (Yes, I wish to enlarge the discussion of rape culture.) The doctors' defense? Religious freedom. The religion, Islam. (In fact, there is a pretext given in Islamic literature – which is not to say that the majority of Muslim sects practice it.) The deputy director of the ACLU says, rather sanguinely, that the First Amendment "doesn't allow any of us to ignore laws protecting people from harm." We'll see shortly.

However, for Intactivists living in the Land of the Free, that sort of hypocrisy smacks us hard across the…well, at least our face. True: the world has a population in which roughly 30% of men are circumcised. But the problem is that that number includes males who are teenagers and older, accounting for international Islamism. This is because Islam, unlike Jewish and Gentile society, does not circumcise their infants. America remains the sole nation, outside of Israel, that routinely mutilates the genitals of their baby boys.

[image]

A half-hour's worth of Googling and one can accrue a small mountain of articles that chastise any comparison between the two forms of mutilation. Simon Hochhauser, co-chairman of an organization in the UK that protects the rights of the Jewish community, writes that FGM "subjugates women," and that cut men are "very happy!" The famous skeptic Michael Shermer asserts that "motivations matter," and that the "prime motive of FGM is to control women."

Lyndia Smith at IbTimes.com writes that FGM "poses a deep-rooted inequality between the sexes and violates a woman's right to health, physical integrity and security, as well as the right to be free from cruelty and torture – and occasionally, takes away the right to life." An article up at FemMagazine.com repeats the concern for "reasons why they are carried out," arguing that "FGM's main purpose is to keep women 'controlled,' and to diminish their identity as sexual beings." Finally, Leyla Hussein, writing for the Huffington Post, says that "the purpose of FGM is to control a woman's sexuality," and that MGM "is not done to decrease a man's sexual pleasure."

While admitting that I am not as well-read on FGM, I'll accept these premises as given. Also, we should all earnestly agree on the importance of intentions; certainly, those listed would constitute sexual violence. But as I will now demonstrate, these commentators could not be further from the truth. In its long history, Male Genital Mutilation has been used explicitly to control men's sexuality; IE, to reduce sexual pleasure and to curb masturbatory habits. Note: it should be realized that genital mutilation is as old as the pyramids, and because of that, the reasons why are myriad and still theorized upon.

Glick's Gruesome History

The oldest depictions of male penis cutting are to be found in ancient Egyptian artwork. Being obsessed with purity and cleanliness, it is thought that they would excise the foreskin just for good measure. Of course, MGM is usually associated with the Egyptian's absconded captives – the founders and followers of Judaism. Leonard Glick, a Jewish doctor-turned historian, outlined the links between modern circumcision and its most popular practitioners. His 2005 study, Marked in Your Flesh, is a recommended authority.

We all understand the basics: In the Book of Genesis, Yahweh commands his humble servant, Abraham, to circumcise not only himself but also every single male in his family – and all male descendants henceforth! As long as the House of Abraham kept this pact, the forebear would persist as "the father of many nations."

At some point in the first or second century AD, the operation became unspeakably grotesque. Before, it was only the bit of the foreskin that hung below the glans that was to be severed (thus *fore*skin); this was known as milah. But now there were two more steps. The first was peri'ah, whereby the entire tissue was to be separated from the glans of the penis, and then torn off with a sharp fingernail or object (insuring that no penile skin remained). Next and last came metsitsah. Here, the mohel wraps his lips around the infant's wounded member and sucks away at the gushing blood, soon spitting out a mixture of amputated flesh and scarlet salvia. Aside from escaping disease, a sip of sweet wine is the best thing that the week-old victim can hope for.

(I need to make a note here. History is history and facts are facts. A secular humanist, as I myself am, can make a rational criticism about religion without indicting every last person who happens to be born into that religion. And an honest commentator can be ecumenical with regards to the Judaic faith, and its proponents, without believing in the Grand Jewish Conspiracy to Rule the World. In other words, the two concepts can be separated. Furthermore, most Jews gave up metsitsah even back then. The exception today is found in New York, where this disgusting final part has resulted in many infants contracting STD's.)

Rabbinic scholars, pondering this unconditional custom ever since, felt it was their duty to perfect God's creation. Others analogized it with the trimming of a delightful fruit tree. (Christians came to reject all of it. The Apostle Paul offered a clear refutation, as did Saint Thomas Aquinas and Martin Luther many eons afterwards.) Nevertheless, the sacrificial drawing of blood was essential. Another aspect, per the 1st century thinker Philo, was to "suppress[es] the undue impulses" of men, this because men take more pleasure in sex than do women.

One of the most important Jewish scholars in history lived in the 12th century. This was Moses Maimonides. His thoughts on circumcision somewhat echoed Philo's, but there was one difference between his interpretation and that of his predecessors: Maimonides had no reservations about the physical harm. "With regard to circumcision," he wrote, "one of the reasons for it is, in my opinion, the wish to bring about a decrease in sexual intercourse and a weakening of the organ in question, so that this activity be diminished and the organ be in as quiet a state as possible." He added that: "The Sages, may their memory be blessed, have explicitly stated: 'It is hard for a woman with whom an uncircumcised man has had sexual intercourse to separate from him.' In my opinion, this is the strongest of the reasons for circumcision."

Surviving through the centuries, many of which were racked with embargos, circumcision came to the New World. Jews who immigrated to the U.S. wanted to keep their mutilation tradition alive. And that they did.

Sometime around then, the natural act of masturbation became an affront to Victorian sensibilities. Early in the 18th century, an anonymous English publication condemned it as a cause for "impaired growth, physical weakness, impotence, ulcers, epilepsy, and finally, early death," writes Glick. The work appeared in nineteen editions, with some thirty-eight thousand copies sold.

As already stated, the wacky motives for genital cutting are numerous. Doing the research, one almost gets the sense that people were simply making stuff up; IE, "reflex neurosis" was the idea that the foreskin, as a kind of spark plug sending erratic jolts to the rest of the body, had caused everything from stomach aches to paralysis (this was taken very seriously). Then came panic about phimosis, venereal disease, and cancer – with MGM heralded as the needed "prophylactic" procedure. While I will try to list the most influential expounders, it should be said again that the evil of masturbation was somehow always floated into the equation.

In 1855, Jonathan Hutchinson, a distinguished British physician, became the leading advocate for circumcision. He penned numerous articles positing that the operation could, along with other miracles, help stop young men from masturbating. “The circumcised Jew is then very much less liable to contract syphilis than an uncircumcised person,” Hutchinson wrote. Notice how an ancient religious practice came to be conflated with medicine. This theme, a gratitude to Abraham and the Jewish rite, was pivotal in getting MGM accepted into Western medical institutions.

About a decade earlier, the American surgeon Edward H. Dixon argued that circumcision cured phimosis, as well as staved off cancer and STD’s. Christians, Dixon advised, would do well to take up “the ceremony of the Jewish people.” Before continuing onward, I will defer to an observation made by Dr. Glick:

> As for gentile physicians, many believed routine circumcision to be wise medical practice, and some recommended it earnestly. But only a very few became consistent advocates, while a significant number published articles critical of the practice. In contrast, it seems beyond question that Jewish physicians have been disproportionately prominent as advocates. In particular, they were largely responsible for promoting claims for circumcision as a cancer preventative.

In 1871, another respected physician, Montefiore J. Moses, wrote an article for the New York Medical Journal entitled “The Value of Circumcision as a Hygienic and Therapeutic Measure.” He wrote that, unlike Jewish children, uncircumcised Gentiles were “little sufferers,” with their “haggard faces and extreme nervous irritability,” who were constantly falling victim to “the solitary vice” – jerking off. One of Moses’ fans was J. Henry C. Simes, a urologist in Philadelphia, who held that such behavior was induced by an overly-long prepuce (foreskin).

1886: a fashionable book called All About Baby stated that circumcision was “advisable in most cases,” because it helped prevent “the vile habit of masturbation.” A decade later, eminent professor and pediatric expert Luther Emmett Holt also charged the foreskin as the primary culprit for this horrid act. (The findings here are attributed to David Gollaher’s history of the operation.)

And in 1914, the top medical journal in America, the Journal of the American Medical Association, published a pro-cutting article by Abraham Wolbarst. A surgeon by trade, Wolbarst listed seven reasons in favor of universal circumcision – including general cleanliness, a protection against STD’s, and a “diminished tendency to masturbation.” Yet another was C.W. Cockshut, who wrote in a British journal that the “adolescent male shall copulate as often and as promiscuously as possible,” but, as a concern for civilization, it “requires chastity, and the glans of the circumcised rapidly assume a leathery texture less sensitive than skin.” Thus, for the youth, the insensate organ was far less obliging.

The most famous anti-masturbation advocate was Harvey Kellogg. Yes, the cereal guy. Using his fortune and name to further his perversion, Kellogg wrote in an 1887 book that: “A remedy which is almost always successful in small boys is circumcision, especially when there is any degree of phimosis. The operation should be performed without administering an anesthetic, as the pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if connected with the idea of punishment.” Kellogg, a thorough sadist, also thought that female clitorises should be burnt with acid.

Glick reports that around one-third of males were cut in 1910. By 1940, due to the increase in hospital births (fewer than 5% of children were born in hospitals at the turn of the century), where the acceptance of penis cutting was now the institutional norm, the rates were somewhere at 60%. In the 80’s, they peaked at 80%. (Again, anti-masturbation arguments were not the only ones put forth. Just to say that they were often shuffled around with the prevention of STD’s, cancer, and phimosis.) Female mutilation? Now that this has been pointed out, one hopes that people will stop deriding the very valid comparison between the two.

A Cosmetic Rape Culture

“Very well,” the detractor says, “But that has nothing to do with the reasons we do it today.” To this response, I will offer three points of contention. The first argues that infantile circumcision is still widely practiced as a means to control sexuality. Secondly, that MGM very well could meet a legal definition of rape. And the third points out the incongruity of Intersectionalist orthodoxy.

1.) How might a feminist respond if I were to make a statement like this: I need to cut off my infant daughter's clitoris so that men find her attractive when she grows up. Insert emphatical question mark. Let's try a variation: I plan on feeding my daughter lots of dairy products so that she has big tits and a big ass, and so that her future male partners will enjoy them.

If ever such a perversion was overheard, I would hope that others had shared in the combined feelings of anger, repulsion, and queasiness. Would these not also be efforts to control sexuality? It could at least be said that they were meant to augment sexuality. Now subvocalize the question this way: I need to cut off a part of my infant son's penis so that his future female partners will find him attractive. If you wish, add: And so that they're not grossed out by it. But why is this line acceptable? And why do medical doctors get paid money to fulfill this borderline-pedophilic fantasy?

In fact, the misandristic motivation – to have a society full of "pretty penises" – is easily provable by cultural, anecdotal, and statistical evidence.

TV shows and Hollywood movies offer humorous dialogues that demean the natural male body. On the show Seinfeld, Elaine nods depressingly when answering Jerry's query if she had "ever seen one," saying that it "had no face, no personality, very dull." Sex in the City featured a whole episode in which one of the main characters finally coerced her new lover into getting a circumcision. In the 2016 comedy Bad Moms, the girls take the time to think of a contingency plan in case one of them happens to find herself with an intact man. "Run out of the room screaming," says one. Another opines that intact men are better lovers, because they're aware of how "gross" their dicks are.

Anecdotally, intactivists are notorious for spending a fair bit of time on social media, where they argue and share information. It's unbelievable the sort of sadistic and perverted things that pro-cutting females will spew while sitting behind a computer. One memorable registrar was particularly popular on Facebook. In threads and chats where MGM was justified, this unsung hero would screenshot the user, their comments, and then caption it "ButtHurt Bitches." (For a few examples, there is a blog with this title, but the project seems to have been abandoned. I should say that I don't necessarily agree with the heading.) I collected (saved) several dozen of these missives while this person was still doing it.

Among the most disturbing: "My son's wife will thank me one day"; "I hate that people aren't doing [their] boys anymore for my little girl"; "It's best to circumcise the male…they are filthy animals and should be treated as such"; "His was well done…a beautiful circ"; "Both my sons are and my husband is too. Just the way we like it"; and, "You implying that I would be sexually attracted to my son/future son's penis is just disgusting!" (Anybody who wants to see these quotes, or many others like them, can shoot me an email or find me on Facebook.) Remember when George Takei stated (tweeted) that, by merely engaging in "locker room talk," one promulgates a culture that normalizes sexual assault? If my testimony is trusted, one can see women talking about men as if they're getting selected from the meat-locker.

And, of course, some damn website must ask that question directly: Ladies, what kind of penis do you prefer? In 2014, the major conglomerate Adam & Eve had just that curiosity. They then commissioned a third-party surveying company, who asked one-thousand American women via an online survey. Their polling results: 54% of women said they prefer a circumcised penis; 33% had no preference; and only 3% said they preferred an intact partner. 10% refused to answer. At this point in my essay, an imagination is not required when figuring out how the preferable penis is ultimately achieved. (No, Adam & Eve doesn't sell tools for baby mutilation.) I'm not sure about anyone else, but for me, it's not much of a turn-on when a woman tells me how great it was that I was strapped down to a board as an infant so as to have a part of my manhood surgically removed.

There's a name given to this fetish, although I can't prove that it's been established in mainstream medical literature. Still, several websites define Acucullophilia, simply enough, as a "sexual arousal by a circumcised penis." As written by Cathy Reisenwitz: “Rape isn’t men versus women. Rape is an aggressor versus a victim. Anyone can rape, and anyone can be raped. We, as a culture, need to be on the side of the victim, no matter what gender.” Well said. And I am here to warn all baby boys born into the U.S. of A: Beware the acucullophiliacs!

2.) According to an official FBI website, the legal definition of rape is: Penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim. Attempts or assaults to commit rape are also included; however, statutory rape and incest are excluded.

Notice two things here. One, that neither a vagina has to be the organ violated, nor does a penis have to be the object doing the violating. Moreover, the male sex organ is omitted completely, which assumes an immunity against any such criminal act.

But can a penis be penetrated? During infancy, the prepuce stays adhered to the glans of the penis; it’s not supposed to move until sometime around puberty (times vary). Suspending the semantics, one must penetrate the tissue in order for it to be excised.

I am not the first to say this. In 1965, Dr. William Morgan published a renegade article in the Journal of the American Medical Association. The pellucid title: “The Rape of the Phallus.” While also putting the blame on religion and nurses possessed with an “insatiable urge” to cut, Morgan stated that:

> [M}any mothers will express the opinion that the circumcised phallus is more aesthetic, but in general their experience of the uncircumcised organ is limited to memories of a Michelangelo sculpture which appeared as an illustration in one of their college textbooks. Perhaps not least of the reasons why American mothers seem to endorse the operation with such enthusiasm is the fact that it is one way an intensely matriarchal society can permanently influence the physical characteristics of its males.

Obviously, the difference between a colonoscopy, a pap smear, and the violation of either of those crevices, is a combination of consent with intention. Therefore, infantile circumcision doesn’t necessarily mean sexual violence; I’m sure there are a few parents who are genuinely inveigled by medical arguments (disproven as they all are). But as we’ve seen, there are many who harbor these perverse motives.

3.) Finally, I predict that my critics will come largely from the Intersectional Left. For now, I have no space in which to expound on their nonarguments, inanities, or to explain how they continually evade the padded rooms. However, one of their platitudes is interesting for my purpose: people with penises can be women and people with vaginas can be men. For them, biological realities can be dismissed entirely.

So then, we can imagine the Intersectional feminist become flummoxed as she – “they,” whoever – confronts the idea that the penis being mutilated…might belong to a woman. Would this make the act of infantile circumcision any more “rapey”? Anyhow, this should be something that they deal with. Not I.

Conclusion

Mutilating the genitals of any child – boy, girl, or intersex – is a moral crime. My focus here has been on the male victim. As said by Marilyn Milos, one of the original opponents, circumcision is where sex and violence first meet. I hope to have established that.

A justification that I did not address here (and maybe will at another time) are all those fathers who demand that their son’s penis looks like their own. When I do point out female culpability, I mean to say American women – because the operation is internationally rare outside of religious communities. And when I talk about religion, we shouldn’t forget that many who were born into those cultures have braved the wrath of exile and scorn while trying to get others to yield to modern standards.

Let’s hope for the day in which genital cutting has ceased completely – for all cultures, and for all genders.

A brief history of the feminist revolution (part 3)

Maxwell Light, Ph.D. · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Aftermath: The Feminist Occupation

The war was now over and feminists had become the occupying force. The job of the feminist occupying force—as with any occupying force—was to watch over its dominium, spread it across the world, and make sure that everybody fell in step and kept in step. The next generation of feminists now grew up under feminist mothers and knew just what to do to keep the dominium going. As we looked toward 2020, the third wave became the fourth wave and the future of feminism looked to be pretty well entrenched, but feminists were scared.

When you have made up false reasons and suddenly hit your countrymen with a war and easily won it against a clueless foe (men), who hardly fought back, there is a fear that the enemy will wake up at any moment and wonder, "Hey, what just happened?" There is the fear that all you've grabbed will be taken away from you. Although the feminist revolution was not, for the most part, a bloody revolution—it was fought by an angry mob with poisoned words rather than with swords or guns—it nevertheless took its toll.

Over the course of history feminists had gone on a rampage against men, and many males were left by the wayside. Some view the feminist movement as a mass persecution of men, as I have previously mentioned. As the movement accelerated over the years from the 1900s until today, it had become more extreme and more relentless in its insistence that its way, and only its way, is the right way.

When looked at with open eyes, one clearly sees that men, not women, were the leading victims of the six decades since the beginning of the second wave. People always find excuses for going to war and so the feminists found many male wrongs to right. But war is never the answer to discontent; constructive communication is the only enduring way to resolve dispute. This never entered the minds of the feminists, who were apparently too disturbed to engage in this kind of dialogue. Towards 2020 more and more people were beginning to speak out about the feminist abuse and the undermining of boys and men. A woman named Janet Wilkerson was one of them; she started a petition on Change.org in 2018 entitled, "It's Time to Class[ify] Feminism as a Terrorist Group."

"Over the years feminism has constantly attacked men and women for choosing to live their lives the way they want to," she wrote. "These actions have now progressed to physical violence where we have seen feminists violently attack men who are concerned about men's issues. Repeated attacks in Canada and elsewhere have left many injured and maimed. Another feminist cell activated recently and is planning on attacking another talk for men in the US. Its time we stopped the violence, its time we put a stop to the hatred feminists are constantly generating. Its time we stopped women's studies courses from brainwashing women into thinking they are victims. Its time these misandristic lunatics are stopped"

Before she closed the petition down, she had 14,323 supporters. One comment by Samuel Black pointed out, "Feminism is a hate movement, and if they can try to classify human rights activists as terrorists than it's only fair to do the same to them"

Another person, Erin Pizzey commented, "Because I opened the first shelter refuge in the world in 1971, from the beginning I said it was not a gender issue. I said it's generation issue, it's a family issue, it's a human issue, and then had to watch the emerging feminist movement fraudulently blame men to collect money to fund their political ideology"

Feminists had become an occupying force, but they had not become totally accepted. They had pushed their way into positions of power in all aspects of life. Even if there hadn't yet been a woman President of the United States, they were on the verge. Even if there weren't as many Congresswomen as men, as many governors, as many mayors, as many cops, the males who were in power were not really in power. The men were under the feminist spell and for the most part spoke and acted out the feminist party line. One President, President Donald Trump, was clearly not a feminist man and he suffered the slings and arrows of refusing to fall in step. When a man refuses to fall in step with the feminist value system, feminists dig up all the dirt they can about you and portray you as the worst human being who ever lived, worse than any serial killer, worse than Hitler, worse than Attila the Hun.

The feminist occupying force had to hold on as if their lives depended on it. Its well-being depended on keeping men down. At the same time, feminists could not help but be aware of what they had done to men, and therefore they could never feel at ease. Happiness at the expense of others is not true happiness. Liberation won by outside force will not last; liberation attained by inner contentment, self-acceptance and understanding will long endure.

Men Who Were Trampled by Feminism

Below are some anecdotes about men who suffered abuse at the hands of feminists over the years. In some cases the names have been changed to protect their anonymity. Other men and their stories were publicized and are therefore named.

Dwayne Buckle was in the news in 2007. This is when Buckle, an African-American man, was stabbed by four militant lesbian women after he made a comment, "If I fuck you I'll turn you straight." Admittedly this was rash and uncalled for, but nothing justifies the kind of violence that ensued. He was sitting on a bench in the Village in New York when the four women left a club, and he saw them holding hands and tongue-kissing one another. Upon hearing his comment, the four turned around, rushed him and attacked him. One of them, Renata Hill, had a knife. Later in court she pleaded guilty, along with her three companions, and all four were given jail sentences. However, they later appealed and the three accomplices were set free while Hill's sentence was reduced considerably. No matter what militant women do, they seem to get by with it because of the feminist propaganda to the effect that men are always the victimizers. In this appeal, the judge focused on the man's provocative remark as a form of sexual harassment. If a man had stabbed a woman for making a provocative remark, the judge would have no doubt thrown the book at the man.

Robert was the child of a mother who deeply identified herself as a feminist. He described a reverse double standard in his home. His younger sister (by two years) was encouraged to go to college and become a doctor. She was clearly her mothers favorite, and when the first Bring Your Daughter to Work Day occurred, organized by Ms. Magazine, her mother brought her to her job, but not her older son. He was never brought to work, even though he begged her, nor was he encouraged to go to college or make something out of himself. He heard his mother continually raging about men. "Men cheat. Men lie. Men are the cause of all the problems in the world. Men cause all the wars." His mother looked at men completely from a negative viewpoint, and her son could not help but apply those comments to himself. His father had divorced his mother after two years of marriage, when she had become pregnant with his younger sister. In a rage at the father for "abandoning her and the children," she proceeded to bad-mouth the father and turn the children against him. Robert seemed to receive the brunt of her man-hatred. She continually lashed out at him for trivial reasons. Once he was fondling his penis through his pants as he played with a toy train and she yelled, "Stop that. That's dirty. If you keep doing that it will fall off." She degraded his masculinity and his masculine anatomy. Later, as an adolescent, she found some Playboy magazines in his drawer and took them outside to the backyard and burned them. When he later expressed an interest in going to college she told him if he did he would probably just get in trouble with a girl because he had such a dirty mind. Instead she encouraged him to work in a nearby factory. As an adult, Robert had a lot of anger at women and his mother's negative attitude became a self-fulfilling prophecy; he became an angry, woman-hating man.

Joel was what today would be termed "transgender" but in the 1970s he would have been referred to as a transvestite. He was a man who liked to wear skirts. Even though he wore skirts he nevertheless identified himself as a man, and his sexual relationships were heterosexual. Sympathizing with the women's rights movement, he attempted to join NOW, only to initially be rebuffed by them because he was not a woman. (This was early in the 1970s when NOW had not begun to champion LGBQ people.) Joel had a deep craving to be accepted for who he was, a man who wore skirts; he thought there was nothing wrong with it and that it was just his preference. And he felt he was a feminist man in word and deed (wearing skirts). Eventually they let him in, and he was subjected to constant harassment by the members of NOW, who were by now mostly militant lesbians. They never included him in their discussions about political strategies and when he did make a comment the comment was either ignored or dismissed in a few words. Their attitude, he explained later to his friends, was that men couldn't understand women or feminism so they were never listened to or taken seriously. All men to them were innate sexists and unaware of it. They saw Joel's skirt-wearing as an attempt to pose as a woman and feminist, and found it laughable. One day when they were putting down men as they usually did, Joel finally spoke up. "In case you women haven't noticed, I'm a man. Yes, I wear a skirt, but I'm a man. And I don't appreciate you putting down men. You act like I'm not even here." He was soon expelled from the group.

Martin wrote novels and his novels were always about male-female relationships from a male point of view, often written in the first person. He had a mother who was a feminist, who always complained about the "glass ceiling" that kept women from rising up in companies. When he started writing novels and sending them out to publishing companies, they were always a little autobiographical and usually about a romantic relationship that went awry. His novels portrayed selfish and controlling women who did not care about the man's feelings and often gave ultimatums if he was not willing to see things their way. He never got any of his novels published. When his mother again complained about the "glass ceiling," he retorted that there was also a glass ceiling for male writers. Her reply to him was, "Well, did you ever think maybe your novels aren't good enough. Maybe you should have some professionals read them."

Whether Martin's writing was good enough to be published I can't say. But it appears that today male writers of serious fiction about male-female relations are being shut out. Women writers who write the most superficial stories or the most clearly feminist stories in which men are but peripheral characters get published. Men are not allowed to write about male-female relationships, but are relegated to thrillers and other types of escapist books that do not go near anything to do with relationships between men and women or near feminism. When did you last read a novel by a man that described a feminist character in an objective manner? Feminist editors guard the publishing glass ceiling; they have by now been thoroughly indoctrinated. If Hemingway send in a manuscript, it would be quickly rejected. Likewise Mark Twain, Henry Miller, Dostoyevski, Dickens, Shakespeare, Faulkner, Voltaire or any other serious writer you can name. There is not only a ceiling for men in publishing, but also in education, where feminists now clearly dominate so as to spread their gospel, and in social work and healthcare. They are quickly catching up in other fields as well.

Louis worked as an adjunct professor in a small college and experienced the feminist glass ceiling there on many occasions. In general, he had to keep a low profile. The office that was shared by adjuncts always had a sprinkling of conversation about liberal and feminist politics. Everybody assumed that everybody was in agreement and took the party line. Louis either kept quiet about his view about feminism, which he disagreed with, or he pretended to go along with everybody else and say the right thing. He noticed that entering Freshmen were required to attend seminars to be taught how to treat women. They learned about harassment, date rape and micro-aggressions (unconscious sexist slips of the tongue). His Deputy Chair was, he suspected, a lesbian militant and she looked for any reason to bother him. Once he walked into her office, the door being open, without being invited (which was common among professors) and she started screaming at him, "Don't ever walk into my office without knocking!" Feminists have passed laws about sexual harassment, and he was sure this was sexual harassment as well, but there was nobody to turn to for help because everybody from the Chairperson of the department on down was a feminist or a feminist male.

On another occasion a woman student who had been defying him and making trouble for several weeks, suddenly became enraged when he announced a pop test and shouted at him, "Fuck you!" When he kicked her out of the class she went to the Dean of Student Affairs, making it seem that the professor was an angry teacher who hated women, and that's why she had cursed him. He was forced to take her back into the class and be tortured by her the rest of the semester. The Deputy Chair followed up by requiring him to be observed again even though he had years ago fulfilled his obligation to be observed.

On still another occasion, while the #MeToo Movement was going on and women were popping up everywhere to accuse men of sexual misconduct, a young woman student accused him of coming on to her, when in fact he had done nothing. It started after the second class; she asked to see him in his office to discuss a problem. He thought it was a problem having to do with the theories of the class (Introduction to Sociology), but instead she started talking about her personal problems. She told him she had gone to a therapist and quit after five sessions. She talked about being attracted to men everywhere and staring at them constantly, much to the consternation of her boyfriend. But as soon as a man looked back at her, she was disgusted with him. She said sometimes she only dated women because she was so angry with men, and sometimes she only dated older men. She went on and on for twenty minutes before the professor stopped her, suggesting that she go back into therapy to understand why she was so angry with men, why she dated women and why she sometimes dated older men. She interrupted him with a contemptuous laugh. "I never said I was attracted to older men." He assured her she did say it, but she just chuckled and flashed him a knowing smile, as if to say, "I know what a pervert you are and I caught you." Then she walked out triumphantly.

The professor didn't know what to do. If he went to the Deputy Chair she would believe the woman. He decided to do nothing. The woman began laughing and talking loudly to another woman in his class and pulling other shenanigans, as if daring him to try to stop her. At midterm he called her up and told her she had a C in her class participation grade, hoping that would settle her down. But the next class she raised her hand adamantly and said, "When somebody is aggressive with me, I'm twice as aggressive with them. A week later he saw her standing in the hallway and angrily telling a group of women classmates that the professor had come on to her and asked her if she was interested in older men. Her classmates became furious and half the class wasn't speaking to him (or was sassing him) by the end of the semester.

Bill worked in an office in a large city—an insurance office. He was quite excited when he got the job, but he soon changed his tune. The first thing he had to do was attend a seminar for men on how to treat women. The woman who ran the seminar spoke of office harassment, rape and micro-aggressions (when men were unaware of making sexist remarks or engaging in sexist conduct. Over two-thirds of the workers in the building were women and they were all of the militant variety. Most of the women were African-American, while he was white. He was a mild-mannered man who had grown up being bullied by his mother and older sister so in a sense they had trained him to be bullied by women. Sometimes it seems as though people can read these kinds of things, and before long the women in the office were bullying him. His immediate boss, who sat in the desk next to him, continually addressed him in a condescending tone of voice. If he made any mistakes she would say, "I knew I should have done this myself. Here! Give it to me!" He sensed he was being persecuted because he was male. After taking it on the chin for a few months, he tried complaining to the male supervisor, but to no avail. The supervisor, a tall but effete male, cowered before the women who were working under him, as though they all had some secret hold on him. Whenever he spoke with Bill's boss, a stocky, outspoken African-American woman, he would coat his words with honey. His answer to Bill's complaint: "Try to stay out of her way."

At one point an Asian consultant was hired to investigate destructive communication in the office. She interviewed everybody, including Bill. "Oh, yes," Bill thought. "At last I'll have the chance to talk with somebody who will listen!" Bill spilled his guts to her and she turned out to be very sympathetic. "I think I know exactly what you're talking about. You're being harassed," she said. He saw her go into the supervisor's office and saw her come out a few minutes later looking grim. In a week she disappeared and never returned. She could not breach the feminist curtain.

Professor X, an Associate professor at a small college in Pennsylvania was giving the first lecture of the semester to the students of an undergraduate Experimental Psychology class. During the lecture he saw two female students in the back snickering and chattering as he was trying to explain the difference between valid and invalid experiments. This was a class of over a hundred students and he had a Teaching Assistant, a young woman, to help him teach the class. When he saw the two students disrupting the back of the room, he stopped the class and said, "Excuse me, you girls are disrupting the class. Would you mind?" "Girls?" the two students replied, shaking their heads.

After class, the graduate Teaching Assistant approached the professor and said she felt uncomfortable with the professor using the word “girls” for the two students. A few days later, that professor received correspondence from the Chair of his Department asking for a meeting. The chair would not listen to the Professor’s explanation and demanded that the Professor apologize to his class for using this inappropriate word. The correct word, he was told, was “young woman” or “woman.”

Peter decided to divorce his wife, Catherine when he was 27 years old. He didn’t know it at the time, but he would become embroiled in what had since been written about as a syndrome: Divorce Related, Malicious Mother Syndrome (35). Psychologist Ira Turkat described this syndrome as usually involving mothers who become dead set on vengeance when their husband divorces them. Peter divorced his wife when his daughter was only 3 years old. From the time of the divorce, his wife used his daughter to get back at him. She continually interfered with his visitation rights and yelled at him on the phone for practically any reason. She poisoned his daughter against him, disparaging all the present he gave her as cheap. When he wrote and illustrated a book for her for Christmas, she commented, “He’s too cheap to give you a regular present.” When she was 6, he made plans to take her home to Virginia to see her grandmother and grandfather. He had reserved the airplane and was a week away from leaving with his daughter. Then his wife called and said she couldn’t go because she was too young. Incensed, He took her to Virginia anyway, because it was written in his visitation rights. Upon returning, his ex-wife and her new husband lambasted the daughter, treating her like a traitor, grilling her for hours.

When he tried to take his wife to court, he hired a woman lawyer, who then sided with the mother in court. The judge found him ridiculous, smirking at him, and dismissed the case. After a few years his ex-wife became a devoted feminist and each time he called to make arrangements to pick up his daughter, she would assault him with her newfound feminist terminology. “You’re nothing but a misogynist and that’s all you’ll ever be! I regret that I have to send your daughter to visit you and be contaminated by your sexism. For hundreds of years you men have been using women for sex, objectifying their bodies, and abandoning them!” When his daughter grew up she had become just like her mother, and she became abusive to Peter and laughingly rejected him one day when he visited her school, telling him, “Dad you’re an embarrassment to me.”

Ezekiel Elliot, the noted running back of the Dallas Cowboys of the NFL was suspended for six games in 2017, citing a case of domestic abuse. The NFL starting being involved in feminist politics when feminists began to claim that domestic abuse rose 30% during the Super Bowl. Susan Hoff Sommers, a moderate feminist, looked it up in her book, Who Stole Feminism?—as mentioned earlier—and found that this was a lie. Sommers was quickly dismissed by militants and hence nobody listened to her. Subsequently domestic abuse became an issue in football, and public service announcements about domestic abuse were shown in almost all games, especially the Super Bowl. Henceforth male announcers were replaced with women announcers, and women led panels of men (for the sake of equality). Sometimes the women or men would give impromptu opinions on how bad domestic abuse was for the league. Feminism had now infiltrated the NFL, as it had everything else, and had become like a controlling parent. When Ezekiel Elliot came along the stage was already set. Even though no court ever tried him or found him guilty and the woman who charged him with sexual abuse was said by police to give inconsistent details, the NFL “retried” the case and found him guilty. She claimed he hit her on one occasion, but four witnesses said they did not see Elliott assault the woman and claimed they were present at the time the alleged the incident occurred. The woman posted images of bruises on her body to her private Instagram account, but Elliott claimed the injuries came from a fight she had at a bar. It appears she was angry that she had taken part in a six-day orgy and then felt rejected by Elliott and was seeking revenge. She said to him, according to his account, that she was going to bring him down. It appears to me that Elliott was the one who was abused in this case; because of feminism women are always believed and men are not. In a way, the NFL, pressured by feminism, committed double-jeopardy.

Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty, and David Evans, three members of the Duke University Lacrosse team in 2007 were falsely accused by a woman, by the University, and by the media (35) They were accused of rape by a stripper who was hired for entertainment at a party held by the Lacrosse team. The case evoked varied responses from the media, faculty groups, students, the community, and others. The case’s resolution sparked public discussion of racism, sexism, media bias, and due process on campuses, and ultimately led to the resignation and disbarment of the lead prosecutor, Mike Nifong.

It began in March 2006, when Crystal Gail Mangum, a black student at North Carolina Central University who worked as a stripper, accused three white Duke University students—all members of the men's lacrosse team—of raping her. The rape was alleged to have occurred at a party held at the house of two of the team's captains. District Attorney Nifong suggested that the alleged rape was a hate crime. Duke University suspended the lacrosse team for two games and the men were subject to intense shaming by the media, particularly the feminist media. Feminist blogger Amanda Marcotte declared on her blog that people who defended the wrongly accused Duke students were "rape-loving scum" (37). Duke lacrosse coach Mike Pressler was forced to resign and Duke president Richard Brodhead canceled the remainder of the season. By April, Attorney General Roy Cooper dropped all charges and declared the three lacrosse players innocent. Cooper stated that the players were victims of a "tragic rush to accuse." Ironically, Mangum, the false accuser, faced no penalty as the result of her actions. Before she was found out to be lying, Mangum had been praised as a hero by feminist pundits and applauded for stopping male sexism in its tracks. Feminists were mum when it turned out she was lying.

Tom was not only emasculated but also rendered psychologically paralyzed by his feminist mother. He was a 47-year-old man named who felt imprisoned in his mother's house. From the time he was born, he did not see love in her eyes. "She looked at me with angry, almost gleeful eyes, as though I was not a separate self but a part of her that she was in full possession of and would never let go of," he reported in therapy. She was like a succubus, always on top of him sucking away his soul. Although he had a father, the mother never let the father get near him during most of his childhood. If the father wanted to hold him, she let him know she was the mother, she had given birth to him, and he was to keep away. When he was six and seven years old and gravitated toward his dad, his mother would grab his arm and pull him away. She kept the boy under her surveillance night and day. He was also not allowed to play with neighborhood friends or to have any other attachments.

When he entered school at the age of seven, she got a job as a teacher's assistant in his school. Tom felt as if she wanted to keep her eyes on him at all times. Every time he walked down the hall, she was there as if waiting for him and staring at him with a strange smile. One memory that stood out for him at that time was when his grandmother (his mother's mother) got into a knife fight with his mother. The two women went at it in the kitchen and seemed about to kill one another before the boy's father intervened. The boy was terrorized by that memory. His father had to intervene in the fight or one would have killed the other. His relationship to his father remained distant until he was 31 years old. If he was hugging his father and his mother walked in, he immediately pulled away so as not to upset her. After the age of 31, he began to love his father intensely, and his father, as if to make up for lost time, developed a very close and loving relationship with the boy. When his father was alone with him, he would confide in his son, often expressing the idea, "Any other man would have killed your mother by now." However, when both mom and dad were with him, Dad always yielded to Mom.

Once, when he was in his early twenties, he brought his first girlfriend home. He made out with the girlfriend in his room, and when they came out his mother screamed at the top of her lungs, ordering the girl to go home. The girl was so frightened she broke down and cried. Later, as they were sitting in the kitchen, the son appealed to his father. "Dad, could you please tell Mom it's not all right for her to speak to my girlfriend that way?" His father answered softly, without looking at the mother: "I just want peace in the household."

Many memories were about her emotional incest. One was of her kissing him full on the lips, which horrified him. He had given her a Mother's Day card and was about to peck her on the check when she grabbed his chin with her angry hand and turned it toward her, planting a wet one on the mouth. Another memory was of her calling him by his father's name. This frequently happened after the father passed away. She called her son, "Glen," the father's name, instead of Tom, which was his name. "Mom," he protested angrily, "I'm not your husband!" "Oh, stop being dramatic," she would reply. "I know who you are." "Well," he retorted, "then stop calling me Glen."

He had only two girlfriends, one of whom was married. The other woman was someone he "lusted after," as he put it. He did not take either of them seriously as relationship or marriage material. That would represent a betrayal of his mother. He was only able to have intercourse with them after he had overcome his impotence. In his unconscious, he regarded all women as potential demons who would take over his soul and devour his very manhood. One of his dreams conveys this fear of woman as demon. "I'm in a bedroom with my co-worker, Mandy. We're both naked. I begin to perform oral sex on Mandy. She begins moaning in ecstasy. Her vaginal juices taste bitter to me and I find them disgusting. So much so that I don't want to lick my lips for fear I may swallow her juices and secretions. Yet she wants me to kiss her, but I'm trying to wipe my lips before doing so. I then go down on her again to lick her vagina. As she convulses in orgasm, what looks like some sort of black, dual-pronged insect-like pincers about two inches long emerge from her pussy. These pincers emerge and contract back into her pussy in conjunction with her orgasmic contractions.

His "demon mother" had established such unconscious control of him that he was never able to move out. He once rented an apartment, but never spent a single night there. His mother, sure of her control of him, would taunt him, "Why aren't you sleeping at your apartment?" Stan was still living at home at the age of 47 and still fantasizing about moving out and establishing his independence. By then he had had seven years of psychotherapy but the therapy had remained mostly on an intellectual level. In order for any real change to occur in therapy, there has to be an emotional component. Getting out of the grasp of the terror that lurked in his unconscious was a hard job, and he was making strides towards it. He was hard at work on a novel, and to him each sentence was an act of rebellion and independence.

Conclusion

These are but a few of the multitude of cases of abuse of men by women that occurred during the Feminist Revolution, especially during the third and fourth waves. During a stampede, those who are trampled have a difficult time trying to talk to the cattle that are storming across them. A Revolution is a glorified stampede, a lynch mob borne of an angry consensus of hotheads and fueled by hysteria. When people are under the sway of hysteria, they are no longer in touch with their reasoning ability or any sense of logic. The herd instinct is not only something that belongs to lower animals. It is clearly evident in the vicissitudes of human beings. And most recently it is clearly evident in the actions of feminists.

As we head toward 2020, most of America (and indeed the Western World) shows no sign of waking up from the Revolution or the hypnotic trance the Revolution dropped onto America and the Western World. Democrats are wise to the machinations of Republicans and Republicans are wise to the schemes of Democrats, but neither party understands they are all swooning under feminism. Conservatives understand all about liberal "political correctness" and liberals mock conservative hypocrisy, but neither is aware that feminists have played them for suckers.

The aftermath of feminism is upon us and will last as long as it will last. Everything in the universe is finite, and so will be feminism. Whether it is a sign of America's decline, as Minogue predicts, we can't say. That America is in decline, we can say. As Cassius says, in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, "The fault, dear Brutus is not in our stars, but in ourselves, that we are underlings."

References

- https://www.change.org/p/the-government-its-time-to-class-feminism-as-a-terrorist-group/c/46500770
- http://www.nj.com/news/index.ssf/2009/03/newark_lesbian_who_attacked_ma.html
- http://family.findlaw.com/paternity/what-is-malicious-mother-syndrome.html
- https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Duke_lacrosse_case
- https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Reactions_to_the_Duke_lacrosse_case#cite_note-5

A brief history of the feminist revolution (part 2)

Maxwell Light, Ph.D. · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Third Wave

By the beginning of the 21st century the third wave of feminism had become entrenched in American culture, and also in the cultures of Europe. By now the revolution was over, and feminism had taken over as the predominant belief system. It had installed its own brand of law, feminist law, which might be compared to the Sharia law used in fundamentalist Muslim countries, a law that operated according to the new fundamentalist feminist belief system.

The old belief system, which existed in America before the second wave of feminism, was a combination of classical liberal morality and religious morality. The founders of the constitution stressed religious freedom, pursuit of life, liberty and happiness, freedom of speech, and a kind of live and let live ethos. People were judged as individuals and whether they were open-minded and caring individuals. It was a system devised primarily by males, with the advice of women. The new feminist belief system was modeled after the Marxist system. It saw men as victimizers and women as victims. Feminist slogans became the cornerstone of a new morality, which establishes females as the superior and good sex and men as a bad sex who were responsible for all the wrongs that had happened to the world.

In the early 1990s in the USA, third-wave feminism began as a debate among feminists (men were not allowed in this discussion) as a response to perceived failures of the second wave and to the backlash against initiatives and movements created by the second wave. Wikipedia noted, on the history of the third wave, "Third-wave feminism distinguished itself from the second wave around issues of sexuality, challenging female heterosexuality and celebrating sexuality as a means of female empowerment".[20] In other words, "challenging heterosexuality" means that lesbianism was now seen as the ultimate form of rebellion against men and as the ultimate form of liberation and female empowerment.

When Betty Friedan helped found The National Organization, she wanted it to be an organization run by heterosexual women for heterosexual women. However, as the organization grew, lesbians began to join. Timeline notes, "Friedan and other straight feminists were concerned that the presence of "mannish" or "man-hating" lesbians would hinder the cause." Del Martin, one of the early lesbian members of NOW, wrote about Friedan, "Betty Friedan was such a homophobe. She was so afraid of the stigma lesbians might bring to the organization…As soon as I was on the board [of NOW] she was on the phone to the New York Times saying that lesbians are ruining the movement and that some of them had tried to seduce her".[21] Friedan later resigned from NOW and The National Organization of Women was eventually run taken over by lesbians and, ironically, that meant lesbians now spoke for women in general. Lesbian values became mainstream.

And the lesbian conception of what a woman should be would eventually become the ideal toward which a majority of women aspired. This ideal was all about women doing without men. The ideal woman was independent, quick-witted, and able to compete with any man. She was anything but a damsel in distress. She was all about making sure that there were as many female judges as male judges and as many female senators as male senators and as many female truck drivers as male truck drivers. She could handle a machinegun as well as any man and drive any tank and nuke any city. To hell with being nurturing! To hell with being soft and caring! To hell with being empathetic! She would be hard, harder than any man.

Third-wave feminism debated long and devotedly with second-wave feminists over what it considered the second wave's definitions of femininity, which, they argued, over-emphasized the experiences of upper middle-class white heterosexual women. Third-wave feminists focused on micro-prejudice (prejudicial notions and actions that were beneath awareness). and challenged the second wave's theories about what is, or is not, good for women. New non-white feminist leaders emerged such as Gloria Anzaldúa, bell hooks, Chela Sandoval, Cherríe Moraga, Audre

Lorde, Maxine Hong Kingston, and many others, too many to name. They sought to include within feminist thought race-related issues. Third-wave feminism also had internal debates between "difference feminists," who believed that there are important differences between the sexes, and "equity feminists," who believed that there are no inherent differences between the sexes and contended that gender roles are due entirely to social conditioning.[22]

"Women's empowerment," became the main slogan that began to be heard during this period (never men's empowerment). There was also a distinction between liberal feminists and conservative feminists (conservative feminists seen as second-class feminists who were duped by conservative thinking). "Men have been controlling and exploiting women for thousands of years," became the phrase feminist most repeated, "and now it is women's turn to lead the world to a gentler and kinder kind of place." The movement became less militant, having won its victory and having become the main belief system in America and in the Western world. It not only emphasized the rights of minority women but also began speaking of LGBT rights, which stood for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender people, all of whom were now viewed as victims under the feminist system. Once you were considered a victim, you were accorded special consideration under the feminist belief system as well as special privileges. For example, "hate crimes," were passed as federal laws noting that when any of the designated victims were in some way violated, the punishment was to be even greater.

Now feminists took the battle out of the public arena and into the courts. Roe vs. Wade (1973), was a landmark decision issued in 1973 by the United States Supreme Court on the issue of the constitutionality of laws that criminalized or restricted access to abortions. The Court ruled 7–2 that a right to privacy under the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment extended to a woman's decision to have an abortion, but that this right must be balanced against the state's interests in regulating abortions: protecting women's health and protecting the potentiality of human life. This case was the beginning of feminism's use of the legal system to fight their battles.[23] By now almost all government officials had been converted to the feminist way of thinking.

During the third wave feminists concentrated on consolidating their power, not through demonstrations but through the courts. They looked for and found discrimination against women everywhere and tested their vision and court case after court case. They almost always won, and before long women had in effect established a sort of "divine rule." Below is a partial timeline of feminist court cases, some with merit, many with the intent of overturning the alleged patriarchy.[24]

1978: The Pregnancy Discrimination Act was passed. It banned employment discrimination against pregnant women.

1981: Kirchberg v. Feenstra, overturned state laws designating a husband "head and master" with unilateral control of property owned jointly with his wife.

1984: In Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees was about sex discrimination in membership policies of organizations, such as the Jaycees. Feminists were against men having any private clubs to which women weren't invited. The new law forced the opening of many previously all-male organizations (Jaycees, Kiwanis, Rotary, Lions) to women.

1984: Hishon v. King and Spaulding. The U.S. Supreme Court, cowing to feminist pressure, ruled that law firms were not entitled to discriminate on the basis of sex in promoting lawyers to partnership positions.

1986: In Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson, feminists succeeded in convincing the U.S. Supreme Court to rule that a hostile or abusive work environment could prove discrimination based on sex.

1987: Johnson v. Santa Clara County led the U.S. Supreme Court to hold that it was permissible to take sex and race into account in employment decisions even where there was no proven history of discrimination but when evidence of a manifest imbalance existed in the number of women or minorities holding the position in question. In other words, if a company had more male managers than female managers, that was now considered evidence of discrimination.

1993: Harris v. Forklift Systems, Inc., pushed the U.S. Supreme Court to rule that the victim in cases of sexual harassment did not need to show that she suffered physical or serious psychological injury as a result of the harassment.

1994: Feminists pressured Congress to adopt the Gender Equity in Education Act to train teachers in gender equality, promote math and science learning by girls, counsel pregnant teens, and prevent sexual harassment.

1994: The Violence Against Women Act was passed, funding services for victims of rape and domestic violence, allows women to seek civil rights remedies for gender-related crimes, provides training to increase police and court officials' sensitivity and a national 24-hour hotline for battered women.

1996: United States v. Virginia, affirmed that the male-only admissions policy of the state-supported Virginia Military Institute violateed the Fourteenth Amendment.

1997: Elaborating on Title IX, the Supreme Court ruled that college athletics programs must actively involve roughly equal numbers of men and women to qualify for federal support.

1998: Mitsubishi Motor Manufacturing of America agreed to pay $34 million to settle an E.E.O.C. lawsuit contending that hundreds of women were sexually harassed. Mitsubishi decided to pay this settlement rather than go through a civil suit where women would be believed and they would not.

2000: CBS Broadcasting agreed to pay $8 million to settle a sex discrimination lawsuit by the E.E.O.C. on behalf of 200 women. Like Mitsubishi, CBS had no choice but to settle.

2003: Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs was a suit in which The Supreme Court ruled that states can be sued in federal court for violations of the Family Leave Medical Act.

2005: Hillary Clinton becomes the first First Lady to be elected to public office as a U.S. Senator from New York. Condoleezza Rice becomes the first black female Secretary of State. Feminists keep track of those kinds of things. To feminists, if a woman is the first First Lady to be elected to office, that a victory over male oppression and she is a hero. If a male is elected to office, it's just another entitled male getting into office.

2005: Jackson v. Birmingham Board of Education was a case in which feminists pressured The Supreme Court to rule that Title IX prohibits punishing someone for complaining about sex-based discrimination.

2005: The Reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act allocated federal funds to aid victims, provided housing to prevent victims from becoming homeless, ensured victims have access to the justice system, and created intervention programs to assist children who witnessed domestic violence and to those at risk of domestic violence.

2009: The Lily Ledbetter Fair Pay Restoration Act allowed victims, usually women, of pay discrimination to file a complaint with the government against their employer within 180 days of their last paycheck.

2010: Obama's Affordable Health Care Act was signed into law and contained a clause, influenced by feminists, requiring private health insurance companies to provide birth control without co-pays or deductibles.

2013: The ban against women in military combat positions was removed; this overturned a 1994 Pentagon decision restricting women from combat roles. This law ensures that militant women have the right to get shot in war, and that men will be the targets of rape and harassment cases.

2013: Reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act. The new bill extended coverage to women of Native American tribal lands who are attacked by non-tribal residents, as well as protecting lesbians and immigrants.

2016: A #Me Too movement arose and women across America began accusing men of sexual misconduct. Men who were accused, sometimes by anonymous accusers, were often immediately fired from their jobs without a trial. These were usually men who were high up in the entertainment industry, television industry, or government. Meanwhile, the women who made the accusations were never questioned. Feminists had now succeeded in vigilante justice and no longer needed the court's help.

By 2018, feminism had apparently achieved a complete take-over of our culture. Feminism now strongly influenced government, education, entertainment, television news and other industries. On television, three out of four hosts on new programs were female. Almost two-thirds of students in undergraduate colleges were female.[25] A majority of graduate students in many fields were female. A majority of middle managers in businesses were female. The laws passed over the years and the value system that had been erected had, in essence, put women into an "untouchable" position, and rather than equality between men and women, there was now a system almost entirely in favor of women. This had a far-reaching effect.

For example, it affected parenting and education: There was now a double-standard in favor of girls. Girls were raised to feel entitled because women, according to the new gospel, had historically been victims, and boys were raised to believe they were guilty because they were members of a biased and contaminated sex. Almost all elementary school teachers were now female, and they invariably identify themselves as feminists and therefore fostered a double standard in favor of women. They taught about women's rights and diversity. If there were a feminist Ten Commandments, they would probably go something like this:

1. A man may never say anything negative about a woman. (But women can feel free to say anything they want about men.) If men say anything negative about a woman they must be punished (i.e., lose their jobs).
2. A man may never question any aspect of feminism lest he be seen as a sexist, in which he must be punished (i.e., lose his job).
3. A man may never show any sexual interest in a woman's body (that is, "objectify" her).
4. A man may never make sexual advances toward a woman unless she specifically gives him permission to do so, and if she later changes her mind he must be made to apologize or punished.
5. If a husband has sex with his wife and the wife at first consents to it, but changes her mind later, the sex will be considered rape and the man can be punished in court.
6. Women decide all issues regarding equality, since men are unconscious of their bias toward women.
7. Men are never to question a woman if she accuses a man of sexual misconduct of any kind. The man is considered guilty as soon as the woman makes an accusation against a man.
8. All men must be feminist men, that is, they must agree with all tenants of feminism. Men who disagree (as well as women who disagree) must be punished.
9. All women must be empowered, since they were formerly oppressed by patriarchy, which means women must be allowed to dominate culture and have the final say in all aspects of culture. Men have dominated and exploited women for thousands of years and therefore now have no further say with regard to relations between the sexes.
10. Feminists, and only feminists, will determine the rules and policies with regard to relations between the sexes.

The new radical feminist value system had been firmly established, and it had stunted almost all fields, censoring what could be said, what movies could be produced, what television shows could be shown, what scientists could study and what laws government officials could pass. It was a kind of feminist tyranny, and if one crossed the party line, one would be shown the door.

In 2017 James Damore, a male Engineer of Google circulated a memo criticizing what he called a "cult" that ruled Google. The memo went viral. In the memo he spoke his mind about his disagreement with what he saw as a kind of reverse sexism that was taught in training seminars at the company, training seminars that males were required to take, teaching them to be sensitive to women's issues. "We need to stop assuming that gender gaps imply sexism," he wrote and went on to suggest that the gender gaps may be due to biological differences between males and females. Damore was subsequently fired for, among other things, using gender stereotypes.[26]

In 2016, Tim Hunt, an English biochemist who won a Nobel prize, commented at the World Conference of Science Journalists in Seoul, South Korea, saying: "Let me tell you about my trouble with girls… three things happen when they are in the lab … You fall in love with them, they fall in love with you and when you criticize them, they cry." Because of this statement he was forced to resign from his position as Professor at University College, London. All of his many accomplishments, including his Nobel prize, fell by the wayside and his reputation was ruined, all because of this one tongue-in-cheek statement.[27]

After the revolution of the second wave and the court cases of the third wave, feminists had not only cemented their control of American culture, but also had influenced other countries all over the world. They were constantly thinking up new ways to get people to show support for feminism, and to make them think that if they didn't show support they were, to say the least, "out of it." One of the first instances of getting people to show support was the "Take Your Daughter to Work Day" in 1993, which encouraged all parents to take their daughters (not their sons) to work for a day. Feminists think it was empowering for daughters to be taken to work. Sons weren't included in this day until 2003. Nowadays the event is federally sponsored and takes place in other countries as well. The effect of this was to make daughters value work over domesticity and, in my opinion, pitted them against men and led to a worsening of parenting and family life. Later feminists encouraged everyone to wear pink ribbons in support of breast cancer research for women (whatever happened to support for men's prostate cancer, which is just as prevalent?).

In 2016 we had the #Me Too Movement, in which feminists made heroes of women who called out men in high positions for instances of "sexual misconduct." Some of the accusers revealed their identities, others remained anonymous. Many of the accused, who had often done no more than make advances at a woman in a clumsy way, were punished by getting fired from their jobs, while none of the accusers were ever questioned. Indeed, they were held up as heroes who had courageously stood up for women and empowered themselves and other women. The #Me Too movement led to women and men wearing all white at an awards ceremony and white roses at another ceremony, and eventually this movement appeared in other countries. You either had to wear a white rose or be shamed.

Feminists were all solidly against President Trump when he was elected President in late 2016 and formed a "resistance" against his Presidency, as if he were from a foreign country and had taken over America through a dictatorship. If you didn't put down Trump, you were stigmatized and could no longer be accepted in the "popular group" (i.e. the feminists and liberals). It was similar to what happened during the Nazi era in Germany; if you didn't put down the Jews, you were considered misguided as well as stigmatized and reviled as a "Jew lover."

The Western world and parts of the East were influenced by what was happening in America, and much of the world started following the feminist movement, which gave feminists the power to dictate the values at home and abroad. None of the millions of people who joined the feminist movement realized that they had been terrorized into becoming feminists, they had been terrorized into celebrating "Bring Your Daughter to Work Day" and had been terrorized into wearing pink ribbons and wearing white roses. They all convinced themselves that they were doing "the right thing."

Doing the right not only meant wearing white roses, but punishing anyone who didn't do the right thing, mocking them, smearing them, getting them fired and persecuting them in all kinds of ways. Ultimately feminism gave permission to women to treat men almost anyway they wanted and succeeded in putting a huge wedge between the genders. Ultimately they modeled rude, self-righteous and arrogant behavior and it became common to see such behavior and have it rationalized as justified by male sexism. America became a ruder and more out-of-control country. And as has often happened throughout the history of humankind, a disturbed element of a culture took over that culture.

By the start of the fourth wave, feminism had become synonymous with lesbianism (but with a front of pretty women on TV shows and in movies who still gave it a heterosexual feel). All of America and Europe were practicing lesbian values which disparaged men, sought to depict them as sexual miscreants, encouraged women not to depend on men, pressed women to become militant women who could take care of themselves and didn't need men for anything. The new values idealized gay men while demonizing straight men.

"I feel that 'man-hating' is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them," noted Robin Morgan, Editor of Ms. Magazine. "The nuclear family must be destroyed… Whatever its ultimate meaning, the break-up of families now is an objective revolutionary process," stated Linda Gordon back in the second wave. "When a woman reaches orgasm with a man she is only collaborating with the patriarchal system, erotizing her own oppression," said Sheila Jeffreys, noted feminist writer. "I believe that women have a capacity for understanding and compassion which man structurally does not have, does not have it because he cannot have it. He's just incapable of it," wrote Barbara Jordan, former Congresswoman. "Since marriage constitutes slavery for women, it is clear that the women's movement must concentrate on attacking this institution. Freedom for women cannot be won without the abolition of marriage," stated Sheila Cronin, former leader of the National Organization of Women."[28]

As I have more or less stated before, it appears that feminism has now become the bible of the Western World, and is beyond reproach. As a psychoanalyst, if I had a client who regarded himself or herself as beyond reproach, unwilling to discuss or look objectively as himself or herself, with a tendency to punish anybody who disagreed, I would diagnose that person as having some kind of personality disturbance. When I do couples therapy I try to encourage constructive communication, in which each takes responsibility for their contribution to the couple's problems. Feminists do not take any responsibility. They no longer need to.

The Fourth Wave

Feminists are now writing about a Fourth Wave, which apparently started in about 2008. Researcher Diana Diamond defined fourth-wave feminism as a movement that "combines politics, psychology, and spirituality in an overarching vision of change".[29] This definition is vague and is idealistic. When feminists talk about feminism, they invariably speak in glowing terms and describe the leaders of feminists as heroes who dared to speak up about the inequalities between men and women.

My take on the so-called Fourth Wave is that it is an attempt to paint in pretty colors what has in fact been a brutal revolution, lasting several decades, that served the needs of an extreme and militant minority of women while becoming destructive to our culture. Any culture that favors one group (militant women) while demonizing other groups (men, conservatives, Christians, disbelievers of all types) is merely a tyranny under a different name.

If feminists continue to rule our culture, there may be a Fifth Wave and a Sixth Wave and a Seventh Wave and so on and so on. All of these waves will be described by feminists in glowing and heroic terms. Meanwhile, the objective truth of what has happened and what will keep happening has been and will continue to be obscured. Feminists have put parenting and children's rights on a backburner and the result is that our culture has become increasingly disturbed. Our divorce rate is the highest in the civilized world. We have an opioid epidemic. We have an obesity epidemic. Mass killings are on the rise. Democrats hate Republicans and Republicans hate Democrats and divisiveness predominates our culture. Our leaders can no longer lead. We have become a virtual anarchy. I cannot help but believe that the feminist revolution is somehow connected with all these issues. Feminism has ruled with an iron fist and has modeled aggressive behavior. It has shut out the truth and is only willing to hear what it wants to hear. And without the truth, we cannot find a remedy.

The most harmful thing that feminists have done, from the beginning of the first wave, is revolt against playing what was regarded as the woman's role throughout history—bearing and raising children. The question is, why would Betty Friedan and others think that being a slave to a company is better than staying home and being a mother? Looked at psychologically, such a woman would likely have psychological issues about being a mother, which would also suggest she has issues with attachment and intimacy. From the standpoint of society, there is nothing more important than raising healthy, well-adjusted children. The feminist derogatory view of stay-at-home mothers and emphasis on work and careers not only encourages women to compete with men, but it also de-emphasizes parenting. If feminists de-emphasize parenting and look down on women who want to be mothers, it has a negative effect on mothering and influences mothers to point their female children toward careers rather than toward raising healthy children. Hence, the older a civilization becomes, the more perverse its children are.

Hardcore feminists have no personal identity: for them the personal is political. They identify themselves as feminists first, then women, then humans. If they feel angry, their remedy is to force others to do what they want:

political change. But the only real remedy that goes to the core of things is internal, not external change. Feminists are resistant to introspection and hence to psychotherapy unless it is with a feminist therapist, in which case it becomes a collusion of two people who tell each other what they want to hear and who become allies against the enemy—men. Perhaps, as Minogue says, we are a waning civilization and the decline is not in our control. A contributor to Reddit.com, Tomek77, put it this way:

> Based on past history, it appears that a civilization that embraces feminist values will cease to exist in just a few centuries. This is why we have never seen a feminist civilization aside from very short spans at the end of the Roman empire and possibly a few other more ancient civilizations.[30]

If feminism, as Tomek77 states, appears in the waning days of a civilization, are we in fact now in the waning days of our civilization? Have we as a nation become arrogant with power, and is feminism part of this arrogance? Will we decay and will we fall? Where will the fourth wave lead us? Do feminist's know? Do they care? Does anybody care? A friend wryly commented, "The only way the feminist steamroller can be stopped is if men start standing up to feminists. Let them rant, let them rave, let them call the usual names and make the usual guilt-trips, outrage and threats. Let them drop all the usual feminist word bombs. When they run out of energy and the men are still standing there patiently waiting, maybe then feminists will be ready to engage in a meaningful dialogue with men."

References:

[20] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Feminism
[21] https://timeline.com/lesbians-battled-for-their-place-in-1960s-feminism-25082853be90
[22] ibid.
[23] http://landmarkcases.org/en/landmark/cases/roe_v_wade
[24] http://www.nwhp.org/resources/womens-rights-movement/detailed-timeline/
[25] https://www.theatlantic.com/education/archive/2017/08/why-men-are-the-new-college-minority/536103/
[26] https://arstechnica.com/tech-policy/2018/01/lawsuit-goes-after-alleged-anti-conservative-bias-at-google/
[27] https://www.theguardian.com/science/2015/jun/13/tim-hunt-hung-out-to-dry-interview-mary-collins
[28] https://thoughtcatalog.com/jake-fillis/2014/05/23-quotes-from-feminists-that-will-make-you-rethink-feminism/
[29] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Feminism
[30] https://www.reddit.com/r/Equality/comments/cp35h/feminism_of_the_future_relies_on_men_nytimescom/c0u6hw8/

A brief history of the feminist revolution (part 1)

Maxwell Light, Ph.D. · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The word "feminism" was coined by French philosopher, Charles Fourier, in 1837.[1] It is perhaps ironic that the term was coined by a man, but he was in fact a man who was interested in the plight of women. Fournier, therefore, could be called the father of modern feminism and the first feminist man. Feminism existed before Fourier, but it got is name and began its formal history after Fournier.

In one form or another, and under one name or another, feminism has existed in other cultures going back to ancient times. Kenneth Minogue[2] noted the existence of something akin to feminism during the waning periods of both the Roman and Greek empires, when lesbianism and women's rights could be seen in the writings of the Greek poet, Sappho, who came from the island of Lesbos, and in classical Greek plays, as, for example, in the character, Lysistrata, who convinces the women of Greece to withhold sexual privileges from their husbands as a means of forcing the men to negotiate a peace treaty. A form of feminism also existed at the end of the ancient Roman Empire.

Feminist-like movements fluctuated over the centuries, at times seeing women lauded as objects of chivalric devotion and romantic love, or conversely burned at the stake for having "notions" or thinking or acting in ways that were considered dangerous. However, the formal beginning of feminism was a loosely connected movement of women in the nineteenth century, when writers such as Susan B. Anthony began to write of women as second-class citizens to men and advocated for women's suffrage.

Modern feminists have divided feminist history into three waves (and sometimes four), so we will keep to their organization of feminist history, but we will be telling it from a man's (one man's) point of view.

The First Wave

The first wave of feminism was a time of political protests or campaigns that occurred during the 19th century and early twentieth century. Who first used the word "waves" and why they used it, one can only speculate. Perhaps they were referring to the waves of troops in a battle, and so perhaps the waves of feminism were waves of feminist protest and revolt against patriarchy. The assumption of these early feminists, who formed a fringe group of discontented women, was that men were and had been for thousands of years treating women unfairly. This was the core of early feminism (and feminism since then as well): women were marginalized citizens who were treated badly (and sometimes horribly) by men.

Sigmund Freud was around during the first wave; he first became famous at the end of the Nineteenth Century, when his book, The Interpretation of Dreams, was published.[3] The modern feminist movement had started during his time and feminists began bashing him from the beginning. The theory that they took issue with most strongly was his theory of the female castration complex, the essence of which was what he called "penis envy." He posited that when little girls first discovered that little boys (and fathers) had penises and they didn't, they felted cheated. They saw that their brothers and maybe their fathers had a body part they didn't have. It is akin to a brother getting a shiny new toy for Christmas while the sister gets nothing. Freud thought that penis envy was central to the formation of feminism. If unresolved, it remained forever in a woman's unconscious. Women who were most likely to be feminists were those who had the severest case of castration complex and therefore the most penis envy toward men.

Many of the leaders of the first wave were women who had negative feelings toward men and a feeling of unfairness that went back to their childhoods. Gloria Steinem, an early feminist icon of he 1960s, was one of them. Although she never mentioned penis envy as her motivation (it would be unconscious) she did describe her feelings that men were unfair (biased) toward women. She emerged toward the end of the first wave and at the cusp of the second wave. She came from a family in which women's suffrage was prevalent; her paternal grandmother was on the committee of the National Women Suffrage Association. Before Steinem was born, her mother Ruth had a nervous breakdown, which left her an invalid with delusional fantasies and violent fits. Ruth spent long periods in and out of facilities for the mentally ill. Steinem was ten years old when her parents separated in 1944.

These events had a formative effect on her personality: while her father, a traveling salesman, had never provided much financial stability to the family, his departure aggravated their situation. Steinem concluded that her mother's inability to hold on to a job was due to general male hostility towards working women. She also concluded that the general indifference of doctors towards her mother was also evidence of an anti-woman bias. Years later, Steinem described her mother's experiences as having been a leading cause of her understanding of social injustices. These experiences resulted in her focusing outside at politics, rather than looking inside at the inner demons her childhood wrought, and convinced Steinem that women lacked social and political equality.[4]

During the first wave of feminism women campaigned for basic things. In the UK and eventually the US, the movement focused on the promotion of equal rights, marriage rights, parenting, property rights for women and voting rights. By the end of the 19th century, feminists had succeeded in passing of much legislation such as the UK Custody of Infants Act in 1839, which introduced the Tender years doctrine for child custody arrangement and gave British woman the right of custody of their children for the first time. All these new laws were brought about by this fringe group of discontented women, many of whom were not married.[5]

Other legislation such as the Married Women's Property Act, first created in 1870 and then extended in the UK in the 1882 Act also advanced their cause. These acts became models for similar legislation in other British territories. Victoria passed legislation in 1884, New South Wales in 1889, and the remaining Australian colonies passed similar legislation between 1890 and 1897. Therefore, with the turn of the 19th century activism had focused primarily on gaining political power, particularly the right of women's suffrage, though some feminists were active in campaigning for women's sexual, reproductive and economic rights as well.[6] This fringe group of women looked for unfairness and looked to blame men, and they found it. "Seek," goes the biblical saying, "and ye shall find."

This feminist political activity, which remained peaceful, went around the world. During the late Qing period reform movements such as the Hundred Days' Reform, Chinese feminists called for women to be liberated from traditional roles and Neo-Confucian gender segregation. Later, the Chinese Communist Party, led by Mao Zedong, created projects designed to put more women into the workforce, and claimed that the Cultural Revolution had successfully achieved women's liberation. In reality young women were imprisoned by this Cultural Revolution, which ordered them to be sent to the country to become unpaid workers for the Communist party, during which females were exploited and many atrocities occurred to young men and women.[7]

In the Middle East, Arab feminism was closely connected with Arab nationalism. In 1899, Qasim Amin, who was called the "father" of Arab feminism, wrote The Liberation of Women, which led to social and legal reforms for women. He associated what he saw as women's lower position in Egyptian society and nationalism, leading to the development of Cairo University and the National Movement. In 1923 a woman named Hoda Shaarawi founded the Egyptian Feminist Union, the chief women's organization of the period, and became its president and a leader of the Arab women's rights movement.[8]

As previously mentioned, this first wave of feminism was mainly comprised of peaceful protests aimed at attaining equality between men and women. Women then did not, for the most part, voice the bitterness toward men that would come later.

Toward the end of the first wave, in the middle of the twentieth century, women began setting up the core values of what was to become a revolution that would totally change Western culture for the worst and bring about the decline of civilized culture. These feminist writers modeled themselves after Karl Marx, who saw the newly industrialist world as a class struggle between the capitalists (owners) and bourgeoisie (workers). In capitalism, this manifests itself in the conflict between the ruling classes (the bourgeoisie) that control the means of production and working classes (the proletariat), the workers who are exploited by he bourgeoisie. Hence, it was Marx who began the idealization of the victim that encouraged feminists to likewise search for ways to view females as victims.

In addition to previously mentioned issues such as women's suffrage, which galvanized women into forming peaceful protest groups, a few women were now emboldened to begin setting up an actual revolution against men, characterizing men as victimizers who had subjugated women from time immemorial. Simone de Beauvoir, a French feminist of the early Nineteenth Century, wrote a book called, The Second Sex, which cast females as an oppressed gender and viewed marriage as a kind of domestic slavery in which women were like slaves.

> Man in his sovereignty indulges himself in sexual caprices, among others – he fornicates with slaves or courtesans or he practices polygamy. Wherever the local customs make reciprocity at all possible, the wife takes revenge through infidelity – marriage finds its natural fulfillment in adultery. This is woman's sole defense against the domestic slavery in which she is bound; and it is this economic oppression that gives rise to the social oppression to which she is subjected.[9]

Susan B. Anthony is another feminist of the first wave who began to view women as a second class and as victims of male tyranny. She stated, "I shall earnestly and persistently continue to urge all women to the practical recognition of the old Revolutionary maxim. Resistance to tyranny is obedience to God".[10] Anthony, as well as de Beauvoir are viewed as heroes by feminists, as underdogs who fought against the oppression of men. Anthony and de Beauvoir, among many others, set up the framework for the demonizing of men and the revolution that was to occur in the latter half of the twentieth century.

Apart from the mostly peaceful protests that gained voting rights for women, this First Wave of feminism didn't have much impact on mainstream culture. Early feminists were considered extremists and were viewed, for the most part, as strident kooks. They were able to choose obvious disparities such as the fact that men could vote and women could not, and make them the basis of their protests and thereby gain a degree of respect. They were the feminist pioneers and they were the first to talk and write of unfairness of men toward women. They made moral judgments about men, but not themselves.

I often thought that these same women, if they looked at so-called lower animals—or even plants–would make moral judgments about them as well. For example, they might see lions attacking antelopes and would find unfairness in the interaction. They would see a Venus flytrap devouring a helpless insect and judge that as abusive. If feminists looked at the universe, they would view black holes as victimizers and the planets sucked into the black holes as victims. They would impose their moral view on something that was simply a natural event. Lions aren't evil because they chase down antelopes. This is just their natural behavior. History on this planet is not replete with evil men and innocent women. It is an evolutionary process that obeys natural laws. During most of human history, men's superior physical strength led to their being dominant, just as a lion's physical strength led to its eating antelopes.

The Second Wave

In the 1960s, when the second wave of feminism began, America was a happy place. America had just succeeded in becoming known as "the defender of freedom," and was regarded as crucial to winning World War II in 1945. America was somewhat conservative in the1950s (the time of McCarthyism and his Communist witch hunt), then became liberalized in the 1960s. The 1960s were strange and idyllic years when hippies emerged (men growing their hair long and wearing beards; women letting their hair grow longer and wearing flowers in their hair), their motto being, "Make love, not war." At the same time the "sexual revolution" blossomed. Young people began experimenting with drugs and sex and anybody over thirty was considered "out of it." You would see psychedelic posters on light posts weekly calling for a "love-in" in Central Park or a Smoke-In (pot, that is) at the foot of the Golden Gate Bridge.

At such events strangers would gather to have mass sex and/or smoke marijuana. Skirts were short and nudity (skinny dipping) was all the rage. You could attend a concert and someone would pass a vile of acid around. "Tune in, drop out," was a phrase coined by one of the many philosophers of the day. Young people dropped out and joined mystical cults. It was like a dream, and like all dreams it had to end. Feminists were biding their time. It was, in a way, the last hurrah for male sexuality.

All of a sudden, militant feminists emerged at the end of the 1960s, almost as if they had stored up anger while young men and women were making love so freely and the latent feminists and their militancy were left out of the party. They seemed pop out of nowhere, hell-bent on revenge. I was a young man at the time, so I will provide a first-hand account of what happened during this period. Feminists who write about this period view the feminists who led the second wave almost as saints. I do not. I regard them as a group of angry, extremist militants who zeroed in on America's post-war relaxation to begin an uprising built on hysterical and irrational logic that would shake the Western world.

The first task of this new movement was to "raise the consciousness" of women. Minogue notes that such consciousness raising "exploits indignation and cultivates righteousness".[11] Feminists suggested that women were in a prison (actually most of the second-wave feminists were upper class women who lived lives of leisure) and it identified happiness with being able to work for wages, the same as men. They saw domesticity (being housewives and having children) as a form of oppression imposed on them by men. As Freud had suggested, unresolved penis envy seemed to cause them to constantly look negatively at their situation as being disadvantaged compared to men. As Minogue explains, "What radical feminism essentially did was to deny complementarity between the sexes and set men and women up as competing teams playing exactly the same game"[12] Feminists, in their leisure, looked for reasons men had it better and suggested men were exploiting them by making them take care of the home and have babies.

Betty Friedan[13] is credited as sparking the second wave with her book, The Feminine Mystique (1963). In her book, Friedan suggested that women should escape the oppression of domesticity by finding personal fulfillment outside of their traditional roles, that is, but having careers like men. She also helped advance the women's rights movement as one of the founders of the National Organization for Women (NOW). And she advocated for an increased role for women in the political process, starting a caucus that fought for legal abortion, which came later when the Supreme Court ruled in 1973 that abortion was legal. Her book proved highly successful, almost becoming a bible for feminists as well as a spur for political activism. The book's success also meant that Friedan could lecture her views while she was on tour in 1970 and within ten years, after Friedan's successful book, women made up more than half of the total percentage of the workforce. For the first time, careers were more important to women than raising children.

Minogue, writing in The New Criterion, about how cultures fall, refers to the effect of feminism on that decline (as in America):

> Consider a civilization based upon a court in a thriving city— Baghdad, for example. Arts and the intellect flourish. But over several generations, as the great Islamic philosopher of the fourteenth century Ibn Khaldun put it, the civilized become decadent with luxury. They lose their sharpness and think only of the good and the beautiful. And then some tribe of fierce Bedouin, smelling out weakness, come thundering in from the desert and storm the city. As barbarians, they do not understand the usages of civilization. They stable their horses in the libraries and use sculptures as doorstops, pictures for target practice.[14]

Minogue uses this story as an analogy of what has happened during the feminist revolution in the West. There has been a revolution, he notes, but a silent one. "It has taken place with such stealth, and so gradually, that people have become accustomed to it little by little." He is reminded of the famous Chinese executioner whose ambition it was to be able to cut off a head so that the victim would not realize what had happened. For years he worked on his skill, and one day he cut off a head so perfectly that the victim said: 'Well, when are you going to do it?' The executioner gave a beatific smile and said: 'Just kindly nod.'"[15]

The feminist revolution may have seemed subtle and smooth to Minogue, but to me it was brutal. From the late 60s onward I witnessed an almost total assault on males and masculinity. After the first wave had set the stage for viewing men as oppressors, feminists now demonized men with words like "sexist," and "misogynist," and were blamed by Phyllis Chesler in her book, Women and Madness (1972) as the cause of almost all female illnesses.[16]

In the early 1970s The National Organization of Women began to hold women's rap groups. These rap groups soon spread across America and were an essential stage of the feminist revolution. I was not privy to what happened in these groups, but I was a witness to what happened in America afterward. Women had now become revolutionaries, revolting against men at every opportunity. They seemed to have developed an entitled attitude as a result of the rap groups, an attitude and conviction that men were all unconscious sexists and that therefore they needed to be attacked and humiliated until they saw the light. The rap groups were in reality training programs for the revolution. They indoctrinated women on how to revolt, how to handle complaints men threw at them, how to handle complaints by other women, and how to always get in the last word and put men in their place.

Toward the mid-1970s one saw advertisements in local papers like the Village Voice, a weekly forum for increasingly militant liberalism, about coed rap groups. Men came to these groups thinking they'd meet a nice woman and have a relationship. Little did they know that these groups were indoctrination groups designed to entrap men and lecture them about feminism. Any man in the group who expressed honest feelings about wanting to have sex with a woman or who differed with any aspect of the feminist doctrine was quickly shouted down as a "sexist" or a "typical man" or a man who wanted his "male privileges" or "cock privileges." Any woman who said she didn't agree with feminism was likewise shot down. These coed rap groups were held for the sole purpose of spreading the gospel of feminism and training men to either get with it or be scorned.

I attended one of these coed rap groups that, as I said, were held all over the country, and made the mistake of saying I didn't agree with some of the tenets of feminism. I thought that was a perfectly reasonable thing to say, but I was immediately pounced on by all of the women in the group. They all turned to me and began to interrogate me. What did I mean? Which tenets could I possibly find fault with? Why? How come? When? Where? The questioning continued even after we took a break for lunch, lasting three hours in all. Soon my resistance ran out and I couldn't answer any more questions and I broke down and giggled. I expected maybe the other men in the group would come to my aid, but they didn't. The feminists all smiled and turned away, satisfied that they had broken me.

The feminist revolution now had now reached a fever pitch. There were no more peaceful protests. Second-wave feminists saw women's cultural and political inequalities as one and the same and called for all women to understand aspects of their personal lives as deeply politicized and as reflecting the power struggle with the sexist male patriarchy.

The feminist activist and author Carol Hanisch coined the slogan "The Personal is Political", which became synonymous with the second wave. Books such as Alice Echols', Daring to Be Bad: Radical Feminism in America (1967), Alice Walker's In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens: Womanist Prose (1983), and Susan Faludi's Backlash: the undeclared war against women (1992), along with thousands of other books of a similar nature, began to appear.[17] Meanwhile men stood on the side, letting it happen thinking, as one of my acquaintances at the time commented, "Let them vent their anger, it'll pass."

It didn't pass. The second wave became a full-scale war against men. Women appeared everywhere, in scholarly meetings, on TV shows, in crowded restaurants, in the middle of concerts, on subways and buses, in parks, on the street, with the aim of militantly spreading the gospel of feminism and knocking down men who "acted like men." You would go to any gathering—say a string ensemble concert by a group of women. In the middle of the concert the women would stand up and start lambasting the men in the audience. "For thousands of years you men have been running things and doing it badly. All wars are the result of men. Masculinity is a sickness that must be stopped." The audiences would begin fighting among themselves, which is what the militant feminists wanted. Women in the audience were fighting with men, men with women. Some men took the women's side. If the male organizer of the concert stood up and called for order, he was shorted down, "You're being just like an entitled, privileged male!" The men at such events just stared like deer in the headlights. They were confused and overpowered.

These women knew that deep down women are psychologically more powerful then men. Women's hysteria is powerful; mass hysteria is even more powerful. None of the men had ever experienced anything like it. Women and men had always treated each other with some respect. But now came these revolutionaries screaming at them like zombies, with a "my way or the highway" attitude. These women despised men and they were everywhere and they were relentless. Neither the men nor the women of that period knew what to think or do about it. Eventually everyone realized that this was a force that couldn't be stopped, and they just gave in.

I attended a doctoral seminar in the late1970s. Attendees were supposed to meet to discuss their ideas for doctoral theses. Soon after arriving at the seminar I found that there was a group of feminists who had different ideas about the seminar. Before it had even begun, these feminists sat in groups in the cafeteria, putting down men, talking loudly and angrily about sexism here and sexism there, deliberately wanting the men at nearby tables to hear them. When the seminar started and we all took turns describing our ideas for doctoral theses, the women's ideas for theses all turned out to be diatribes against men, delivered in angry voices. A group of us men took exception to what we thought was an inappropriate disruption of the seminar, but the leader of the seminar, an effete feminist man, caved in to the feminists.

The group of men that opposed them began to dwindle as the feminists confronted each man individually and broke each down. I was the only one left who objected to their shenanigans. When it was time to present our final idea for our doctoral thesis, I changed my title to "The Effect of Feminism on Psychology," giving a very derogatory view. The feminists attacked me after my talk and went to pay a visit to the leader of the seminar in his room in the resort where the seminar was held. They objected to my thesis and saw it as a deliberate attack on them, and they demanded a special meeting in which they could air their grievances and force me to apologize. The leader, of course, granted their demand and came to my room to state in no uncertain terms that I was required to come to this meeting. The implication was that I would be kicked out of the program if I didn't. At the meeting the feminists spoke one after another about how "women have been abused for hundreds of years" by men like me. I ended up crying, despite all my efforts to maintain my composure but did not apologize.

The feminist war infiltrated all aspects of life. As I stated before, feminists appeared out of the blue at all kinds of gatherings. Because they were so fierce and shocking, they were always in the news. They were invited on television shows where they would attack the male hosts and any female hosts who were not feminists. Male hosts were called "sexists," and female sympathizers with male hosts were called "sexist dupes." Feminists broke into government committee meetings to shout down the men conducting the meetings; the showed up at lectures at the New School and began shouting down the male lecturer; they showed up at psychological conventions and totally disrupted them and attacked whoever was leading the convention.

At a meeting of a prominent New York psychoanalytic institute there was a seminar on "The Erotic Countertransference." The term "erotic countertransference" is a psychoanalytic phrase for when a therapist has sexual feelings toward a patient. At the beginning of the meeting a male therapist, thinking that this was a scholarly convention in which he could express his honest feelings, admitted having countertransference feelings toward a one of his patients and began discussing his techniques for handling his feelings.

He talked for only a few minutes, seeking help with this problem. Suddenly a woman in the back began to scream, "I can't take this! I had a therapist who raped me and I am still traumatized by it." This woman carried on to he point where the man who had spoken about his patient felt totally humiliated, and the seminar, run by a woman, had to go on to other less controversial subjects. I was thinking that this woman should be asked to leave, as she was obviously not able to tolerate an open and honest discussion of the subject. Instead of throwing out this woman, the leader allowed the woman to disrupt it and carefully guided speakers from then to make sure that they didn't talk about anything personal. "Let's not talk about our personal experiences, let's limit our discussion to broader aspects of the erotic countertransference," she said.

I wrote papers in journals that criticized aspects of the feminist movement and its effect on psychoanalysis, and my papers were totally panned in reviews. The arguments in my papers were simply ignored and I was labeled a sexist, misogynist and white male dinosaur. I was not alone. All male writers from Freud to Tolstoy to Mark Twain to Shakespeare to Dostoyevsky to Hemingway to Tennessee Williams, etc., were now dismissed as sexists. New revised versions of "Streetcar Named Desire," were performed in which Blanch Dubois was portrayed as a victim of sexism. It became clear that the feminist war against men would not be over until the last man standing would be smeared and discredited.

Men and women were either willing to accept feminism as the new religion or their reputations and livelihoods were at risk. This succeeded in preventing any serious scientific experiments, movies, TV shows, or novels that went against feminist doctrine. There were movies that pretended to deal with feminism in an honest way, such as Kramer vs. Kramer (1979), depicting a woman leaving a man after eight years of marriage because she didn't want to be a housewife anymore. She comes back to take her son and they go to court to fight over custody. She wins, but in the end she leaves the son for him to care for, since he has now become a feminist man. This is of course the reversal of roles that feminists have fought for. So the movie, which on the surface tried to be empathetic to both sides, was deep down just more feminist propaganda.

There were periods of almost ridiculous activism, such as the period in the late 1960s when women all over were burning their bras, considering bras as a symbol of female oppression. There were times when feminists were proclaiming that "rape is rape," which eliminated any distinctions about whether it was a brutal and violent rape or consensual sexual intercourse in which a man didn't hear, or didn't want to hear, his girlfriend say "No." They proclaimed that "a woman should be believed," when she complains of rape or any type of sexual misconduct, which led to women being able to say anything they chose about men, sometimes anonymously, sometimes lying, sometimes getting revenge because of feeling rejected by a man, sometimes simply being mentally disturbed and proffering trumped-up charges. This in turn gave rise to incidences such as the Tawana Brawley case in upstate New York in 1987, in which a young black woman covered herself with feces and tied herself in a sack on the side of the road and claimed some local white men, including an attorney, had raped and abused her. Since, according to feminism, women had to be believed, she was immediately believed. A lynch mob atmosphere erupted about this case and the reputations of the men she accused were destroyed before the grand jury realized she had made it all up, and they subsequently dropped the case.[18]

Second-wave feminism was a movement that began in the early 1960s and continued in some ways up to the present; as such, it coexisted with third-wave feminism. Second-wave feminism largely ramped up the war against men and looked for sexism and issues of inequality everywhere. Since this was a revolt against men, men were left out of the discussion. They were only admitted as participants if they had become feminist men and had sworn their allegiance to the feminist cause. Any detractors, any men who were the least bit critical of feminism or the militant, anti-male and dictatorial manner in which feminists communicated, were dismissed as misogynists. At no time was the feminist revolution a democratic endeavor, and at no time was anything that resembled constructive communication or a genuine male-female dialogue in evidence.

By the 1990s radical feminism was mainstream and even moderate feminists were now summarily dismissed. Christina Hoff Sommers,[19] who wrote a critique of radical feminism, Who Stole Feminism (1994), was one of those moderates who were dismissed. In her book Sommers argued that, "American feminism is currently dominated by a group of women who seek to persuade the public that American women are not the free creatures we think we are." She condemns feminists who say "our society is best described as a patriarchy, a 'male hegemony,' a 'sex/gender system' in which the dominant gender works to keep women cowering and submissive." She criticizes feminist authors who repeat the same false claims, citing a claim that was made by several notable feminists who were trying to blame anorexia nervosa on male oppression. They claimed that in the United States 150,000 women die of anorexia each year. The actual figure, she notes, is likely to be somewhere between 100 and 400 deaths per year. Sommers demonstrates again and again how radical feminists stretch the truth through bogus statistics or sometimes through outright lies. For example, she points out how feminists popularized the charge that "incidents of domestic battery tend to rise by 40 percent" on Super Bowl Sunday. Sommers concluded after her own research that the claim, which was widely reported by the American media, was unsupported by any study. Sommers' book was almost universally dismissed by—guess who?—feminist critics. And Super Bowls continued to have government-sponsored messages against domestic abuse.

Eventually almost everybody gave in to the feminist guilt-trip and feminist indoctrination, which meant feminism had now replaced Christianity as the National religion. Male-female relations could only be seen through the feminist lens. Feminism had become sacred. People accepted feminist propaganda as divine truth. Feminism was the law of the land. To understand how this could happen, one must understand how hysteria works. Hysteria is one of the most powerful forces of human nature. Hysteria can be seen in the Crusades, a series of religious wars sanctioned by the Latin Church in the medieval period aimed at recovering the Holy Land from Muslim rule; in the Nazi movement of the 1930s and 1940s, during which eight million people, mainly Jews, were exterminated; and in the ancient Roman Empire when thousands of Christians were thrown to the lions to be eaten while the Romans applauded.

Feminism can also be understood as an aspect of the Stockholm Syndrome, a condition that causes hostages to develop a psychological alliance with their captors as a survival strategy during captivity. These feelings, resulting from a bond formed between captor and captives during intimate times spent together, are generally considered irrational in light of the danger or risk endured by the victims. The Stockholm Syndrome was formally named in 1973 when four hostages were taken during a bank robbery in Stockholm, Sweden. The hostages defended their captors after being released and would refused to testify against them in court. Similarly, the Feminist Revolution held America hostage for several decades and during this time women everywhere, as well as men, developed a hypnotic reverence—a kind of feminist Stockholm Syndrome—toward all things feminist. All women and many men identified themselves as feminists, and those who didn't were demeaned as if they were stupid and beneath contempt.

References:

1. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Charles_Fourier
2. http://ontology.buffalo.edu/smith/courses01/rrtw/Minogue.htm
3. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/The_Interpretation_of_Dreams
4. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gloria_Steinem
5. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Main_Page
6. ibid.
7. ibid.
8. ibid.
9. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Simone_de_Beauvoir
10. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Feminism
11. http://ontology.buffalo.edu/smith/courses01/rrtw/Minogue.htm
12. ibid.
13. https://www.goodreads.com/book/show/17573685-the-feminine-mystique
14. http://ontology.buffalo.edu/smith/courses01/rrtw/Minogue.htm
15. ibid.
16. https://www.amazon.com/Women-Madness-Revised-Phyllis-Chesler/dp/1403968977
17. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Feminism
18. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tawana_Brawley_rape_allegations
19. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Who_Stole_Feminism%3F

To be continued in Part-2….

Gynocentrism and the golden uterus (part two)

Peter Ryan · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The following is part 2 of my article on debunking the bedrock of the female supremacist belief system that drives gynocentrism; the golden uterus. Please read part 1 before continuing.

The Naturalistic Fallacy

Often reproductive reductionists will appeal to nature to justify their bigoted beliefs that we should treat men as a lower class of human being, or even regard men as subhuman on the basis that having a uterus makes an individual more biological valuable to the species. The assertion that having a uterus makes an individual more biologically valuable is wrong, because it assumes that reproduction is the sole determining factor of biological value – and I have explained in part one of this article why this is wrong.

But I want to assume for the moment that reproductive reductionists and female supremacists are right. Should we value human life on its utility? Should we base society and government policy on the survival of the fittest and selectively abort males prior to birth and subjugate the males that are born, as some female supremacists put forward? We have numerous examples of genocides in the 20th century that were the inevitable end result of such ideas.

We have seen what happens when such a society dehumanises a group of people and the destruction it brings for such societies. We have observed the legacy and the guilt such atrocities have on their culture. History is littered with such examples, and there is a reason why societies that dehumanise groups of people remain either undeveloped tribal shitholes or deteriorate into such shitholes given enough time. It never ends well for the society that dehumanises a group within their population, let alone the half of the population responsible for keeping most of the infrastructure going, etc.

If we are concerned about making sure civilisation remains functional enough so that it can sustain itself, then we should consider the reality that dehumanising half the population which keeps the water running and the lights on at night, will invariably lead to its collapse. When enough men are that marginalised they have nothing left to lose, history shows it leads to revolution and war. That is just me citing history, it is not a threat. The United States itself was founded in the wake of marginalised men fighting a tyrannical government. If national security matters to our governments, then they might want to consider what happens when large numbers of men are raised with no father for generations, have little or no employment prospects and are marginalised in society.

For the record, I do not want to see a violent revolution happen. I want to peacefully go about my business. However I am concerned about the growing likelihood of this eventuality occurring, and the steps we should be taking right now to reduce the risk of future national instability in Western countries from large numbers of marginalised men. The solution is not to marginalise men further. The solution is simply to respect men, invest in them, support them, and guide and provide them with an avenue to voluntarily contribute to society in a way that is personally fulfilling and constructive.

Treating men as subhuman, creating a male underclass and demonising and marginalising men and boys on the basis they are male, is a sure-fire way to bankrupt your country, collapse your economy, socially destabilise your society and destroy your country from within through civil unrest, crime, revolution and war. If you treat men and boys with no compassion, then do not be surprised when you create monsters and witness a surge in mass shootings, organised crime, roaming gangs of male thugs and eventually an organised militia and then an army. I do not want to see that future unfold, but that is where society is headed if we don't start treating men as human beings and supporting them.

So on a purely rational level, appealing to nature to subjugate and marginalise men is not sustainable or functional for the long-term prosperity and the continued existence of civilisation. The Nuremburg trials that were organised after World War 2 are a testament to that reality in the aftermath of the atrocities committed by the Nazis against the Jews.

In the words of Justice Jackson[1],

> The privilege of opening the first trial in history for crimes against the peace of the world imposes a grave responsibility. The wrongs which we seek to condemn and punish have been so calculated, so malignant, and so devastating, that civilization cannot tolerate their being ignored, because it cannot survive their being repeated. That four great nations, flushed with victory and stung with injury stay the hand of vengeance and voluntarily submit their captive enemies to the judgment of the law is one of the most significant tributes that Power has ever paid to Reason."

A statement that needs to be etched in stone. When we dehumanise men or any group of people, we undermine the basis of civilisation itself- human dignity. We do not just undermine the dignity of the group that is dehumanised, but our own dignity by participating in the abuse or letting it happen. Once dignity is gone, civilised behaviour quickly goes as well and with it civilisation.

Some people infer from history and from the present day, that dehumanising men and treating them as disposable is natural, normal and okay, as they believe it is required for civilisation. Slave owners used to use similar arguments to justify slavery. Disposability implies that something can be discarded without any consequence and that it can easily be replaced. Civilisations and tribal communities have certainly required a contribution of protection, provision and innovation from men to ensure their continuation. However just as with reproduction and evolutionary success, male contribution to the community is not automatically interchangeable with male disposability. Men can contribute to communities without being disposed of and the less that are lost, the more men are available to contribute in the future.

Any community or civilisation that loses its men or fails to invest in its men, or fails to adequately support them, loses some or all of its manpower and some or all of the contribution men bring to sustaining civilisation and their communities. The loss of male life and the marginalisation of men is something to be minimised and avoided, because it costs communities and it costs civilisation. Any community that exploits and marginalises men and neglects them, squanders and wastes the value men can provide to society. By avoidably undermining the well-being and health of men, communities and civilisations undermine themselves.

Any community that exploits and marginalises men and neglects them, squanders and wastes the value men can provide to society.

It is indeed the case that men have sacrificed their lives in war for their countries countless times, but that does not mean it was ideal for that society that they lost their men. The loss of male life in war was just unavoidable, just as women dying performing their reproductive role in childbirth was unavoidable for centuries. The country that not only won battles but did so with the least amount of male casualties, had the larger army to win the war and the men available to rebuild their societies and occupy and rebuild the societies of the territory they captured.

As with women in childbirth, men have died in performing their role for society. Society has days to recognise the cost of the sacrifice of millions of men in war. Anzac Day, Memorial Day and Remembrance Day come to mind. Disposable utilities do not have days of remembrance. We say, "Lest we forget" on Anzac Day for a reason. Deep down we recognise the loss that society, countless families and the men themselves incurred, from losing men in war. We have days of remembrance in part to remind ourselves of the cost of war and the cost of losing men. It is a solemn warning not to forget the cost of war.

Countries that raised their men and boys properly and invested in them and supported them, had more available men that were equipped to power their economy and participate in a larger and fitter military in times of war. Strong support for men and boys creates strong men and strong men create strong empires. The empires that not only harness the potential of their men, but look after their men and lose as little of their men as possible, prevail and win. These are not an either/or set of priorities for a given civilisation, one priority is dependent on the other.

The simple truth is that civilisations that look after men so they can in turn look after society, prosper and they eventually surpass civilisations that exploit their men and treat them as disposable. Yes societies require men to contribute to their continued existence and prosperity, but with the least amount of loss to male life and well-being. Societies that follow that simple rule thrive over societies that do not.

I am not suggesting that we have never had elements of society and our culture over history and in the present day, that have marginalised men, exploited men and treated men as disposable. We certainly have. The difference between the past and the present though, is that in the past we recognised to a certain extent the need to minimise needless male sacrifice as much as possible, despite the far greater incidence of male sacrifice. The sacrifice of men was not ideal for past society, it was just often unavoidable. Unavoidable male sacrifice is not the same as regarding men as disposable. One perspective recognises the value in men and the other does not. Over the last 250 years and particularly over the last 50 years, this perspective has been lost.

In the present prosperous, safe, well nourished and risk free society we live in, we take men for granted. We have normalised men's marginalisation and exploitation and confused unavoidable male sacrifice in the past as a justification to treat men today as disposable. Society can get away with this temporarily until the safety bubble of prosperity bursts, from its own decadent recklessness and disregard for the men keeping society running.

Current Western society does indeed marginalise men and has increasingly treated men as disposable, as the costs of male sacrifice for society have faded into distant memory since World War 2. However the West does so to its own detriment and eventually given enough time neglecting the men it relies on to sustain itself, will result in the collapse[2] of the West as other societies take its place.

Male disposability proliferating and becoming normalised, is a characteristic of the final stages of a decadent and complacent civilisation on the decline. It is a pathology arising from societal decadence. Some collective pathological behaviour will always be present in a society, regardless as to what stage it is at. However it is in the final stages of civilisation, that pathological behaviours previously minimised and confined to the margins of society, start to spread and become normalised. This is the same pattern that has occurred with male disposability.

In the last 1000 years, male disposability and gynocentrism has slowly grown century after century from the fringes of our culture, to a substantive and enduring level. Much of the proliferation of male disposability within our culture, has occurred in the last 250 years and especially in the last 50 years. We have always had some degree of male disposability in the past, just as we have always had murder and rape. That does not mean we considered it to be normal or acceptable to the point it was pervasive within every aspect of the entire culture, like we see today.

Like I said earlier, regarding men as disposable and society accepting the unavoidable level of male sacrifice required to protect and sustain society, is not the same thing. One perspective recognises the value of male life and the other perspective does not. The difference in the current cultural climate is that now we are rationalising and justifying male disposability, and gynocentric double standards in an effort for our society to convince itself it is "normal", when it is anything but normal.

There are plenty of behaviours that have natural and biological underpinnings that are not optimal for society and are morally repugnant. Rape, murder and infanticide are seen in the wild and in other primate species and are driven in part by hormones, genes and biology. A man that rapes a woman or a young underage girl who is fertile, enhances his reproductive fitness. That does not make it okay to rape them. Plenty of violent, pathological and deviant behaviours have a biological basis to them and improve reproductive fitness. None of these acts are morally right and normalising them on the basis they are natural will not allow a civilisation to prosper and sustain itself over long periods of time. In fact normalising such behaviour is a recipe to turn civilisation into an uncivilised barbaric primitive tribal shithole.

If female supremacists want to argue treating men as disposable and as subhuman is acceptable and right because it is natural, then they should have no problem accepting that rape is acceptable and morally right because it is natural. Both of course are not acceptable or right. If female supremacists are going to rationalise double standards against men on biological grounds, we can argue the same when it comes to race and the biological differences between races. Again both forms of bigotry of course are wrong. However if female supremacists want to remain logically consistent, then they should at least have the honesty to acknowledge they are no different from the KKK and numerous other groups that claim group supremacy and appeal to nature to justify their beliefs. Claims of male supremacy or any other form of group supremacy on the basis of biology, are not morally justifiable either.

Acknowledging biological group differences does not automatically require making value judgements about the value of human life and justifying double standards based on the group an individual belongs to. Advanced society requires an advanced culture that acknowledges biological differences between individuals and groups, but rises above appealing to nature to justify bigoted and irrational beliefs and double standards that are demonstrably dysfunctional and that undermine the long term prosperity, stability and sustainability of civilisation. Societies that invest in men and support men will have the manpower to flourish, and societies that exploit men and marginalise men will not. That is just a fact. Whilst male sacrifice has been unavoidable at times, it came at a great cost to society. Those societies that minimised such sacrifice had enough healthy men available to live and fight another day and they prospered.

I do not think I need to describe the value men provide to civilisation in detail. Men discover, invent, design, build, maintain, repair and improve the bulk of basically every facet of our infrastructure, technology and buildings. Men are responsible for the majority of the leadership, innovation, research and expansion of the intellectual frontiers of civilisation and our political, legal and economic systems. Our military, police and emergency services all heavily rely on men. Men are the bulk of our Nobel laureates, Fields Medallists and inventors. None of this has changed despite 50-60 years of feminist social engineering and affirmative action. Whether or not feminists want to accept it, there are biological underpinnings to these realities and the value men provide to their families, their communities and their civilisation.

If men stopped working for a week, billions would be dead from thirst, starvation and violence before men went back to work, as a result of the lack of basic working utilities and mass unrestrained civil unrest. Men are not easy to replace either. It takes 18 years of parental and societal investment to raise an adult male from scratch and they must be raised properly so they have the required physical health, mental health, skills, knowledge and motivation, in order to productively contribute to society.

This is why our current society is screwed. Even if we started today reforming the education system, marriage, family courts and divorce, the legal system, health system and workplace etc, to attend to the social, medical, psychological, learning and employment needs of men and boys and ensure fathers play a role in raising children, it is going to take at least a generation to see any positive impact on society. This idea we can just disregard men and boys with no consequences to society and treat them as disposable, is an idea that will be unlearned through suffering and death on a scale society has not seen for centuries. Death and suffering on a scale that matches our own collective stupidity and reckless indifference toward male well-being.

Our best hope to stave off this social and economic catastrophe is to take as much redemptive action as quickly as possible, to reduce the long-term consequences of this multidecade indifference toward men and boys, and use the now unavoidable consequences coming our way as a lesson for future generations on what not to do. We need to value men, boys and masculinity again in our culture and we need to do it now.

Society requires men, because men like women have an intrinsic value that society depends on to survive and thrive. An intrinsic value that arises from the unique male biological potential they possess. If society harnesses this male potential and does not squander it by exploiting and marginalising men, society persists and advances. Just as women have the potential to bear children, men have the potential to provide, innovate and protect. If we are going to argue men are human doings because they only have value from what they produce, then why not argue women are human doings that only have value if they produce children? Of course I am not endorsing this, but I want to make a point here.

If we are going to argue men are human doings because they only have value from what they produce, then why not argue women are human doings that only have value if they produce children?

Using the bigoted logic of a reproductive reductionist, women's reproductive utility has no value if women remain barren (as growing numbers of them are). That question and that logic provokes, or at least should provoke scepticism regarding the saying, "men are human doings and women are human beings". If reproductive utility is the basis of the value of human life, then women themselves only have value based on the quantity of children they produce and those that remain barren are of no value at all. This is not my belief, this is just the logical conclusion that one arrives at by employing the reasoning of female supremacists and reproductive reductionists.

Human males and human females must be treated as human beings if they are to contribute anything to society. Like women, men are not machines. Men have personalities, emotions, hopes and dreams. Men and boys have to be raised properly, invested in, supported, nurtured and loved, to express their potential and do so in a constructive way. Dr. Warren Farrell's book[3] on the boy crisis has some good direction that. If the humanity of men is given no consideration, then their psychological and physical condition will reflect that neglect and their contribution to society will be significantly reduced or eliminated entirely. That is the flaw in treating men like they are human doings.

In some cases with abuse and neglect, male biological potential will not be reduced or eliminated, but instead be directed toward highly destructive and violent ends. If you abuse men and boys and neglect their suffering, then do not be surprised if some of them start shooting people and engaging in violent crime. That is not a justification for their actions, they are still responsible for their actions. However society is also partially responsible for such tragedies through our collective indifference toward the well-being of men and boys.

At the very least if we neglect male well-being, we get failure to launch (which is really nowhere to land), men checking out of society and an epidemic of male suicide. We all know what eventually happens if you fail to look after the general maintenance of your car. If we do not look after the basic needs of men and their general well-being and instead exploit them, then like a car that is not properly looked after, men will break down psychologically and physically. The male suicide epidemic, the falling employment and educational attainment of men, the plummeting fertility rate, the dissolution of the family and the slow and gradual social and economic implosion of Western society, is all partly the result of or entirely because we treat men as disposable and have neglected their humanity.

Exploiting men has a use by date for society, which it will either need to abandon or unlearn through unprecedented death and suffering of its own making. Failing that, natural selection itself will remove gynocentrism and male disposability from humanity, as populations that harness male potential but remember to invest and support their men, surpass populations that do not and replace them. I am not supporting social darwinism, I am just stating reality. Treating men as disposable has consequences.

Civilised society requires us to base the value human life on something beyond its simple biological utility. I am not being hyperbolic when I equate female supremacists with Nazis, because they both make the same fundamental mistake of equating the value of human life with its utility and biological characteristics. The mentally and physically disabled were exterminated with the Jews, because they were deemed by the Nazis to be biologically defective. Claiming men are biologically less valuable than women and using that to justify bigotry, leads to the gynocentric double standards we see today, and eventually given enough time it will escalate to the same outcomes as what occurred in Nazi Germany.

Gynocentrism is indefensible and just based on a different flavour of the same general bigoted logic of every other form of group supremacy in history. Like I said earlier in this article, we have numerous examples in the 20th century alone of what eventually happens to such societies and how it culminates in their decline as other countries prosper and often ends in their collapse. When you put half your population down to benefit the other half of the population, they both sink together.

Humans Are Not Mice or Microbes

As I mentioned in part one of this article, every species has a strategy to maximise its own evolutionary success by strategically investing in activities related to not just reproduction, but survival, growth and parental care (etc.) to differing degrees over their lifespan. Life history theory explains this in detail[4]. The species whose life history strategies prioritise reproduction, have fast life history speeds. They exhibit little parental investment, reach sexual maturity quickly and have short lifespans and put minimal investment in their own development and growth. They tend toward reproducing once (semelparity) and produce large numbers of offspring. They have relatively high mortality rates among their young and for the population in general, compared to other species with slower life history speeds. Bacteria, and many insects and small mammals like mice and rats, prioritise reproduction.

Complex lifeforms like elephants and humans have life history strategies that show a more balanced investment in survival in addition to reproduction and have slower life history speeds. They have high parental investment, mature slowly, have long lifespans and show substantial investment in their own development and growth. They tend to reproduce multiple times (iteroparity) and produce fewer numbers of offspring. They have lower mortality rates among their young and for the population in general, relative to species with fast life history speeds.

Human beings have high levels of parental investment, long intensive developmental periods and slow rates of maturation. Humans have long life spans, are iteroparous and produce relatively few offspring. We are not a species that focuses on maximising reproduction. Humans perform very poorly relative to other species when comparing rates of reproduction. Humans have a life history strategy that invests considerably in activities other than reproduction, such as survival, parental investment and development and growth. Human communities and human individuals are driven to optimise their own life history strategy, not to just simply maximise their rate of reproduction. Simply focusing on reproduction alone or overemphasising reproduction in a species like humans, leads to evolutionary failure and not evolutionary success. We are not simple microbes, insects or mice that can just rely on breeding our way to the future.

Human beings are social animals that have developed a large brain and a sophisticated culture, precisely because we are so heavily invested in activities beyond reproduction. Many of these activities are focused on maximising our own survival in often unforgiving and harsh environments that demand a more sophisticated life history strategy than simply maximising reproduction. Just pumping out babies does not cut it for humans. That is why we have civilisation and have landed on the Moon. None of that happens if the priority is reproduction and maximising the quantity of offspring. Such a life history strategy does not allow for the developmental period or the somatic effort to be long enough and great enough for a large brain to develop and make such feats possible. If our lineage evolved on the basis of maximising reproduction, we would resemble small mammals with large litters of offspring. There is a reason why mice, insects and microbes are not building rockets to go to Mars. When a species is on the track to maximise reproduction, there is little time or energy for anything else other than reproduction, aside from doing the bare minimum to subsist.

I have experience in the molecular life sciences and a general understanding of evolutionary biology. Yes I am aware of Bateman's principle, the Trivers-Willard hypothesis etc. None of these evolutionary concepts state women are biologically more valuable than men, or that reproduction alone is the sole determining factor of evolutionary success. That is a twisted inference of evolutionary theory to justify an agenda. It is not science, it is dogma masquerading as science.

Conclusion

What I have described in this article could be mostly arrived at by employing common sense (which is worryingly becoming not so common), that is how simple and basic this is. I find it telling that our culture is so gynocentric that many people are blind to such obvious realities. I find it concerning that even some scientists who should know better, will actually beat a drum claiming female superiority[5] because it fashionable to do so in this man-hating culture and I can cite more than one example of this. This is no better than scientists who claimed male superiority in the past and female supremacists make the same error in basing the value of human life on its utility. They cherry pick data and omit facts that do not support their narrative and make unsubstantiated and oversimplified inferences from the data, as this article discusses[6].

Make no mistake, there are people with a vested interest in framing human evolution along gynocentric lines to justify their own bigotry. It is simply a matter of time before feminism switches from ignoring sex differences, to acknowledging sex differences and then twisting the science to justify their own female supremacist agenda. The manosphere needs to identify this, be prepared for the switch in strategy from feminists and be ready to address it head on when it surfaces.

It is simply a matter of time before feminism switches from ignoring sex differences, to acknowledging sex differences.

What I have described in this two part article is just the beginning of debunking the underserved worship of the golden uterus. This is just the opening salvo, there is much more to come. In closing I have provided a link[7] from evolutionary biologists Dr. Bret Weinstein and Dr. Heather Heying, on why it is neither "better" to be a man or a woman from an evolutionary perspective and why neither sex is more "valuable". I will have more to say regarding this excellent video discussing Fishers principle[8] and other important evolutionary factors at a later date. For now I encourage people to watch it and am glad to see that at least some of academia has not yet been polluted with female supremacist man-hatred.

Men and women are simply two reproductive components in one reproductive system which the genome fabricates to perpetuate itself. The propagation of a lineage has nothing to do with sexual superiority and everything to do with optimising the interdependent relationship between the sexes that best propagates the genome, given the prevailing environmental conditions. Arguing female superiority in the context of genome propagation is like arguing in the superiority of your reproductive system over your circulatory system. It is a meaningless false dichotomy. It is time for society to see the forest through the trees when it comes to men and women. We are all part of a system bigger than ourselves. Astronauts call this awareness the overview effect[9]. It is time for humanity to grow up and move beyond these reductionist perspectives of sexual, racial and group superiority and narrow concepts of value and instead look at the big picture.

I note Dr. Robert Sapolsky from Stanford University shares a similar perspective to my own on the dangers of employing reductionist "categorical thinking", when examining human behavioural biology and I would encourage people to watch his first lecture[10] discussing that very danger (in a brilliant highly recommended lecture series on human behaviour). As he discusses, plenty of monstrous activities have occurred on the basis of bad, bigotry driven science. Female supremacists in the sciences twisting the data to push their narrative, are not an exception.

Men and women might be different, but that does not mean society shouldn't treat men and women with equal dignity (that does not mean equality of outcome). The equal value of human life of all people regardless of race or sex, must be considered sacrosanct for civilisation to remain civil and not descend into tribalism.

References:

1. Wikiquote: Robert H. Jackson
2. The Fempocalypse!!
3. The Boy Crisis: Why Our Boys Are Struggling and What We Can Do About It
4. Life History Theory
5. The Natural Superiority of Women
6. Review of Melvin Konner, Women After All: Sex, Evolution, and the End of Male Supremacy
7. Sex: An Evolutionary Perspective | Bret Weinstein & Heather Heying
8. Fisher's principle
9. The Overview Effect
10. Introduction to Human Behavioral Biology

The slow rise of #MeToo sexual panic

Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The current hysteria surrounding sexual abuse of women, otherwise known as the #MeToo movement, has been a long time in the making. Fantasies of a 'rape culture' were first generated within radical feminist circles in the 1970s, who pressed the idea relentlessly into the imaginations of a wider public. Its zealous promotion led to an increased culture of 'belief,' and the fateful commandment listen and believe.

As with all mass hysterical movements that went before it, such as false memory syndrome of the 1990s, or the Salem Witch Trials, there were people who predicted its rise.

As a matter of historical interest, one of those documenting the rise of the current hysteria was Dr. Gerald Schoenewolf, when in 1991 he delivered a talk titled The Feminist Myth About Sexual Abuse to the Psychohistory Association. When delivering the paper he decided not to take questions after the presentation. Some feminists in the audience, who had only attended the talk to knock the piece down, began yelling their displeasure and treating him like it was sexist to read a presentation and not allow a question and answer or discussion period. Later, during a closing meeting, one of the women jumped up stage and made a shrill objection to the presentation, citing again that the speaker didn't allow a question and answer period, and painting him as a sexist-extraordinaire. The leader of proceedings backed down and allowed her to express her anger for about 20 minutes.

As readers will be aware, that's how it was in those days. The 1990s and early 2000s were a more repressive time when nobody was allowed to express criticism of any aspect of feminism without being demonized and punished, and in that environment the subsequent transcript of Dr. Schoenewolf's paper quickly faded from public circulation – that is until now. Below is an excerpt of the paper discussing the rise of feminist inspired sexual abuse hysteria within feminism, psychoanalysis and the wider culture. – Eds.

The feminist myth about sexual abuse

Whenever one hears the term "sexual abuse" these days – and one hears it fairly often – it is generally meant to mean male sexual abuse of women and children. One comes across references to sexual abuse in newspapers, on television, in public service advertisements, and in various other places, nearly all of which point the finger at men and foster the impression that men cannot be trusted, that make sexuality is something menacing, something dirty, something that must be controlled.

This current attitude toward sexual abuse seems to have emerged out of the feminist movement. It was expressed most succinctly in Brownmiller's (1975) introduction to her popular book on rape, Against Our Will:

> Men's discovery that his genitalia would serve as a weapon to generate fear must rank as one of the most important discoveries of prehistoric times, along with the use of fire and the first crude stone axe. From prehistoric times to the present, I believe rape has played a critical function. It is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear. [p.5, italics are Brownmiller's]

Upon analytic inspection, this statement would seem to be a manifestation of female hysteria ("all men keep all women in a state of fear"), as well as castration complex ("Men's discovery that his genitalia would serve as a weapon…."). Indeed, the "state of fear" of which Brownmiller speaks might be seen as an ontogenetic reference to the infantile discovery of the difference in sexual anatomy. When a little girl first discovers a penis, it probably is a frightening event, due to the talion principle; the immediate desire to pull it off and take it for herself arouses the counterfear that the male will penetrate and destroy her with his penis. Nevertheless, Brownmiller's statement, and similar ones by others, have become keynotes of the feminist movement, and the notion that most men use sexuality to oppress women has become an accepted fact in popular culture.

* * *

THE POLITICS OF SEXUAL ABUSE

Until recently, psychoanalytic writing on incest or sexual abuse was low-keyed and gender-neutral. Describing the Wolf Man's first incestuous experience with his older sister, Freud (1918) sounds more like a novelist than a psychologist: "It was in spring, at a time when his father was away; the children were in one room playing on the floor, while their mother was working in the next. His sister had taken hold of his member and played with it, at the same time telling him incomprehensible stories about his Nanya, as though by way of explanation" (p. 487). Freud did not use the terms "incest" or "sexual abuse," but rather called this incident a "seduction" and left it at that. Whether it was a seduction by a male or female, father or mother, it was simply something to understand and explain. By the time he wrote his case, he had long abandoned the seduction theory, yet he viewed the Wolf Man's seduction (which he was convinced was a real seduction and not a fantasy) as a chief cause of the Wolf Man's later fear of women and perverse tendencies, although not the root cause of his pathology.

Ferenczi (1933) was the first psychoanalyst to question Freud's abandonment of the seduction theory. However, his focus on sexual trauma, like Freud's, was gender-neutral: "The rape of girls who have grown out of the age of infants, the similar sexual acts of mature women with boys, and also enforced homosexual acts, are more frequent occurrences than has hitherto been assumed" (p. 162). Ferenczi focused on all aspects of the problem, not just male-female abuse. He understood that it could just as often be female-male, or female-female, or male-male abuse. He also stressed that victims of sexual abuse often precipitate their molestation, pointing our that children are naturally seductive and curious about sex, as well as desirous of winning parental approval. He did not mean by this, as feminists have interpreted, that children are to blame for their abuse.

Shengold (1979) used the term, "soul murder," to describe the long-term sexual or physical abuse (or deprivation) characterised by "man's inhumanity to man," wherein one uses his power over another to "crush his individuality, his dignity, his capacity to feel deeply" (p. 536). Although this term has a derogatory meaning, Shengold, like Freud and Ferenczi, was gender-neutral, designating both mothers and fathers as soul murderers.

With the advent of feminism, an angry, gender-biased tone crept into discussions of sexual abuse and other aspects of male-female relations. It was heard most strongly among radical feminists. "Are men who rape their daughters a subspecies of brute monster?" Brownmiller asks (p. 311), asserting that the meaning of child sexual abuse is linked to the patriarchal philosophy of "sexual private property."

This feminist penchant for viewing sexuality in terms of male abuse of females sometimes reaches a point of absurdity, as when a feminist reviewer in the New York Times (Heilbrun, 1990) recently reinterpreted Shakespeare's Richard III as a tale about a male abuser of women getting what was coming to him. She saw all men in the play as obsessed by "raw masculine ambition," "extreme machismo," and "male rampage," while the female characters were full of "feminine wisdom and gentleness." She accused Richard of feeling "threatened by women," and therefore blaming them for the world's wrongs, and of regarding then as the "representation of evil," and she asserted that "his behaviour rests on contempt for women," and that he requires that they be abused and suppressed. In truth, Richard was contemptuous of both men and women, and his contempt stemmed not from bias but from deep-rooted characterological rage.

She concluded that the play was about manhood, and sought to prove that Shakespeare was in reality a feminist who was condemning a society in which extreme machismo was raised to an ideal, comparing Richard to the popular macho film actor, Arnold Schwarzenegger. But Richard operated by guile, not by machismo, and society did not idealise him so much as abhor him. She sees all the characters in this play as sexual stereotypes who are espousing a political position, rather than as complex individual men and women.

Feminists have often distorted male-female sexuality with this kind of ideological thinking. Such ideas, when they come from the mouths of female patients, appear to be the narcissistic projective identifications typical of women with multiple pregenital fixations, particularly those who have not resolved the narcissistic blow of lacking a particularly visible organ and who defend against the consequent feelings of inferiority by splitting and projecting. Full of hate and resentment against men, such women need to justify this hatred by finding as much fault and hatred and bias in men as possible. One finds the same process at work in the treatment of many patients, such as borderlines, who habitually split off and projectively identify the psychoanalyst as being a liar, cheat, bigot, letch, murderer, when in fact it is they who harbor these personalities inside them.

To understand how the feminist myth about sexual abuse developed, as well as how it affects society, it is necessary to analyse the wellsprings of feminism. I have written elsewhere (Schoenewolf, 1989) that from a psychodynamic standpoint feminism represents a collective acting out of female narcissism in the societal arena, a rebellion against the primal father. One can discern in the movement rhetoric both a conscious and an unconscious (or preconscious) component. Consciously, feminists proclaim themselves to be fighting for female equality and other seemingly worthwhile causes. Unconsciously, their aim is to vindicate women and castrate (psychologically) men. It is as though they were saying, “Men were given the penises, so now women are going to rule over them.” The theme of “women are innocent and men are guilty” is a direct expression of the female narcissism stemming from such emotional sources as unresolved penis envy.

Collectively, feminism also represents a fixation at the Oedipal stage; the degree of a feminist’s radicalism corresponds to the degree to which she is caught up in the negative oedipal dependence on and erotic pull to the mother (and sisters). There is an identification with the mother-as-victim and with her perspective of the father-as-oppressor by both female and male children which, later in life, is transformed into a crusade to vindicate women and “dethrone” men. The idea is that if they can only make things right for women in general, then mother will be happy, accepting and approving.

Another aspect of female narcissism, associated with the fixation in a negative oedipal situation, is a latent or actual orientation and viewpoint, which was alluded to by Siegel (1989) in her study of eight homosexual women. McDougall (1970) also made note of this, and described in detail how the mothers of homosexual women tend to bind their daughters to them and prohibit their normal turn to the father and other men. Commenting on her treatment of one homosexual woman, whose mother would constantly tell her how men raped and were sexually violent with women, she concluded, “The overall impression was that the mother repudiated heterosexual feelings in herself and forbade them to her daughter” (p. 194).

The castigation of men as sexual abusers of women and children is a way of turning women away from men, and of encouraging then to turn to other women. Feminism is often an attempt to maintain the homosexual bond with the mother (which, if dissolved, means loss of mother’s approval and hence self-annihilation) and with other “sisters,” while excluding the father and rendering him passive, as so often happens in feminist families. The aim is to entice all women away from the envied and hated men (the sexual man) and to lure them into an act or symbolic form of lesbianism. The fact that lesbians can be just as sexually exploitative towards their women sex partners as men, and are just as guilty of date rape (insisting on sex when their partner at first says no), is ignored by feminists. Their focus is solely on the sexual abuses of men, not on sexual abuse.

The hunt for sexual abusers can also be an hysterical phenomenon. Hysteria can bring about individual as well as group emotional contagion. Like all witch hunts, the hunt for sexual abusers is fuelled by a panicky, hysterical fear that feeds on itself. The panic is there because such witch hunts are themselves forms of abuse, generalised accusations hurled at random; deep down, those who hurl such accusations know that they are out of control, and once they start they have to keep upping the ante in order to keep the monster that have created in obeyance. They must keep finding more and more evidence of sexual abuse to justify the feelings of overwhelming rage inside them which they harbor for the male gender and which are not justified by the ordinary events of their daily lives, but are linked to childhood occurrences and fantasies.

This hysteria affects not only women but also men; indeed, it may well affect men even more. Witness the books by male authors, such as those cited in this paper, supporting the feminist anti-male cause. In psychoanalysis there are also many male authors who are quick to champion anti-male feminism, whose critical faculties seem to disappear entirely when they are discussing women's issues. The rage that is the undercurrent of feminism has a terrifying effect in such men. It's desperation and stridency, like that of an individual hysteric, seems unstoppable and relentless. In addition, such men, who invariably suffer from the counterpart of female narcissism – male narcissism and a male castration complex – have a fear of WOMAN (Winnicott, 1965), a fear of being lured back into a state of absolute dependency, a fear of the phallic witch-mother of early infancy, the "mother who had absolute power at the beginning of the infant's existence to provide, or to fail to provide, the essentials for the early establishment of the self as an individual" (p. 164). Women, according to Winnicott, have this fear too, but they can mitigate it somewhat through identification with WOMAN, with the primitive introjected mother within themselves. Men, on the other hand, have historically defended against this fear by bonding together in men's fraternities and by suppressing women.

Indeed, it would appear that a certain amount of male bonding and a certain amount of freedom in voicing complaints about women is a healthy thing for men and society. Conversely, the feminist attempt to intrude on male bonding and muffle men's complaints about women is unhealthy for society, for when man cannot freely verbalise critical feelings about women, they will more readily act them out. On an unconscious level this is what the psychopathological feminist wants. She want men to act out their feelings, wants them to be sexual abusers, in order to have all the more reasons for the rage at the root of her gender narcissism.

The question arises, why did this trend occur now? Why has feminism and its emphasis on male sexual abuse become so predominant in both the popular culture and some aspects of the mental health field at this time in history? Feminism began with the advent of the printing press in the seventeenth century, when women started publishing tracts and letters for other women to read. It became a formal movement in the eighteenth century, when women in England and the United States began asserting women's rights to equal education, suffrage, and equal opportunity. All of these, of course, were just causes. However, somewhere along the way, the movement became obsessed with putting down men and with matters of male-female sexuality, and the theme of male sexual abuse of women and children took wing. It has now reached a point at which some radical feminists consider any form of intercourse with a man to be an act of rape, and advocate celibacy and lesbianism: "Until we say, 'I control my own body and I don't need any insolent make with an overbearing presumptuous prick to come and clean out my pipes' they will always have over us the devastating threat of withdrawing their sexual attentions" (Denamore, 1970, p. 267).

This perverse sexual attitude of radical feminism seems to have become more prominent during the current wave of feminism which sprang up in the late 1960s. It may well be an aspect of the permissive upbringing accorded the baby-boom generation following our triumph in Work War II. Glorying in our victory, American parents gave our children everything. This permissiveness spawned the "me generation," with its constant demands to have its needs instantly gratified, and the sexual revolution, with its anti-family, pro-individual-lifestyle orientation. At first the feminist movement was a part of this general movement towards radical liberalism, but at some point it became a revolt against male sexuality, perhaps in reaction to the sexual revolution of the late Sixties and early Seventies, when women were expected to engage in free love indiscriminately with men.

This growth of narcissism and the revolt against male sexuality merged with the rebellion against male authority that had characterised the feminist movement from the beginning. More and more, any kind of male assertiveness was seen as an aspect of patriarchy, male chauvinism, and sexual abuse. At the same time, female aggressiveness was extolled as an act of liberation. The result was that women became more aggressive and man more passive, which had the effect of giving women increasing power over men in the personal realm as well as in other aspects of society.

Power, as they say, corrupts, and the power that women now have over men has taken the form of the very disparagement of men and male sexuality that feminists say men are guilty of with regard to women. This power has encouraged the acting out of collective hysteria and the castigating of men as sexual abusers. There is no longer a system of checks and balances between the sexes: Men, having retreated into passivity, are afraid to assert themselves against women lest they be viewed as sexists, misogynists, or oppressors. By and large, men are psychologically controlled by women from birth inward, and that control is now so complete that it threatens to create a feminist state with an increasingly perverse value system surrounding male-female sexuality.

The myth that sexual abuse is solely a man-against-woman thing is destructive to society and to the family. It serves to polarise the sexes and create an atmosphere of paranoia and distrust between the sexes, which in turn affects childrearing and the collective character and quality of society. It is part of a general trend by psychopathological feminism that has become increasingly powerful in forming popular cultural values in our era. These popular cultural values (i.e. Women are innocent, men are guilty), when transmitted from parents to children, contribute to a general all-pervasive state of tension and dissatisfaction; for, if an entire gender is constantly under attack and on the defensive, neither gender can be at peace.

Any human being with an immature sexual development may become a sexual abuser – whether man, woman, or child – if in a position to do so. It is important for psychohistorians and mental health professionals to help raise the public's consciousness of this fact and of the feminist myth about sexual abuse.

References:

Brownmiller, S. (1975). Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape. New York, Bantam, 1976.
Denamore. D. (1970). On Celibacy. In Voices From Women's Liberation, L. B. Tanner, Ed. New York: Signet.
Ferenczi, S. (1933). Confusion of tongues between adults and the child. In Final Contributions to the Problems and Methods of Psycho-Analysis. New York. Brunner/Mazel, 1980.
Freud, S. (1918). From the History of an Infantile Neurosis. Collected Papers. Vol. 3, pp. 473-605
McDougall. J. (1970). Homosexuality in Women. In Female Sexuality: New Psychoanalytic Views. J. Chasseguet-Smirgel, ed. London. Maresfield Library, 1985, pp. 171-212.
Shengold. L. L. (1979). Child abuse and deprivation: soul murder. Journal of the American Psychoanalytic Association, 27:533-560.
Schoenewolf. G. (1989). Sexual Animosity Between Men and Women. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson.
Siegel. E. (1988). Female Homosexuality: Choice Without Volition. Hillsdale, NJ: Analytic Press.
Winnicott. D.W. (1965). The Family And Individual Development. London: Tavistock.

The “Scary Black Man”: White women’s misandry used to incite racism

Xavier Jones · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

Anyone who hasn’t spent their life trained in gynocentric dogma knows the bigoted history of women’s movements. The women’s suffrage movement had strong prejudices against men. Even going as far as to join the white feather campaign in order to challenge men’s masculinity for refusing to sign up for the draft. There was also friction between the movements of women’s suffrage and black suffrage. Black women were not seen as deserving of the vote and were even told to stand in the back of the lines for many events. Women’s movements were very heavily focused on white women–as they didn’t see black women as human nor their equals. It was hard to tell who white women despised more, men or black people. It’s too bad they couldn’t have the best of both worlds. Oh wait, they could — black men.

Already seeing black people as inhuman creatures and men as a dangerous species, their hatred for black men was off the charts. This is highlighted by many statements feminists themselves touted. Elizabeth Stanton claimed “it’s better to be the slave of an educated white man than of a degraded black one”. She claimed that black men would be “despotic” if they were to be granted basic voting rights. Susan B. Anthony infamously stated that she would rather cut off her right arm before she ever works for, or votes for a negro–instead of a “woman”. Rebecca Felton, the most prominent feminist in Georgia, was a slave owner and white supremacist. Rebecca routinely referred to black men as “dogs”, “half-civilized gorillas”, and “beasts”. She advocated for more lynchings of black men and less funding towards their education. In fact, many women’s advocates, in the United States, were members of the Klu Klux Klan. Yes, you heard right, the Klan.

The Not-So-Invisible Empire: The fragility of white womanhood

The WKKK (also known as the Invisible Empire) rose to prominence in the 1920s, following the result of women’s suffrage. After white women had gained the right to vote, and turned their backs on the black women who fought with them, they became hubristic and considered themselves to be untouchable. The decorated ladies of the ballot box didn't merely hold white feathers — they wore white robes, organized violent events, and chanted racist rhetoric to slow down the progression of the "uppity negroes". It may have been contradictory for a gender equality movement to (hypocritically) shame anti-war men and look at black men as inferior. But, contradiction and hypocrisy has never been a threat to the feminist movement. The suffragists of the morning were the white feathers of the evening and the klan members of the night. One moment, they wanted society to remove gender roles so that men and women had a political voice. The next moment they believed men should "man up" for war, while considering black men to be the destruction of society. This did nothing to hurt their cause for women's rights. Approximately 500,000 women were proud members of the Invisible Empire.

Klanswomen rationalized their involvement using the philosophy of womanhood. In their opinion, white women were the real women of society. They believed that women were helpless beings with sexual purity. And they needed the klansmen to protect them from the "scary black man" who posed a threat to their safety. Klansmen would have to become chivalrous and put great importance on the safety of their women. It was almost as if these women were seen as infants who could suffer physical damage from too many hurtful words. And if words were enough to cause them damage, imagine how scared they were of black men, who they viewed as the devil. The klanswomen had several influencing factors to get their men on board:

[image]

- 1. Sexuality/beauty — fear of rape was a driving factor.

They put emphasis on just how irresistible they felt white women were. They raised their children to believe that white women were the most beautiful people on earth. They would construct a theory that black men were hypersexual dogs, who couldn't control their hormones. If black men were seen as hypersexual, they would clearly be urgent to have sex with the goddesses of mankind. This only cements the idea that they were in danger of sexual assault from black perverts ready to prey on them.

- 2. Violence/passivity — Another driving force in the movement was black men's aggression and white women's passivity.

They promoted this theory that violence was in a black man's nature and that he could never create a decent society. Black men would eventually murder them in the future — it was inevitable. White women saw themselves as gentle individuals. If white men weren't protective enough, they could be attacked by thugs at any given point. And to make sure black men didn't challenge their theory, they would call for the bombing of churches and peaceful gatherings. Of course this is contradictory. Klanswomen were influencing their husbands to commit violence, while the Civil Rights Movement was calling for non-violent protests. They were organizing lynching events and calling for klansmen to go on killing sprees–not only on black men, but on black children. And, yet, these women saw themselves as harmless toddlers in fear of a violent revolution from black males.

- 3. Education — black men were seen as uneducated.

They would claim that black men were typically dim-witted. They couldn't be seen as intellectuals, leaders, or educators. To make sure this theory had no threatening factors, the klan would attack predominantly black schools. The purpose was to intimidate them from educating themselves and destroying the perception of black intellect.

[image]

This fear of black men was so powerful, that it led men — even outside of the klan — to embrace extreme levels of nobility, in the name of protecting "their women". And so klansmen terrorized schools, lynched citizens, fired guns, and threw fists. One moment, these women portrayed themselves as powerful deities who used their intelligence and courage to keep their country safe. But if they got into any trouble, they were helpless damsels who needed noblemen to save them from the scary black man. It was completely inconsistent and made no sense on any rational scale. But, of course, it didn't have to. The intention wasn't to be consistent. The intention was to destroy the status of the black male in order to build up the status of white women. Bigotry doesn't require common sense, because bigotry itself is irrational

This theory would be used as justification for every discriminatory action taken against black men. America would barely invest any resources into black men's education. Politicians ordered lynchings of black men who were accused of raping a white woman. And they fought, tirelessly, against the Civil Rights movement. Police officers brutalized black men with dogs, tear gas, and batons for daring to argue against their mistreatment. Society looked the other way. They shrugged off all of this violence done to black men, claimed that they "should've stayed in school", and moved on.

[image]
As first world countries adopted the notion of the "scary black man", they all reacted with incredible outrage. Politicians would run campaigns on stopping the dangerous negros and their harmful — dare I say "toxic" — masculinity. The media would portray them as illiterate and aggressive. The National Rifle Association (NRA) would stop black men from holding guns. White women would call for the heads of any black man accused of touching a white woman or even acting in self-defense (Emmett Till & Sam Hose). Jim Crow laws enforced racial segregation. Tulsans burned buildings and massacred black men, in order to maintain the notion that negro males were not responsible business owners. Almost like a disease, this notion spread throughout different countries and society got on board.

Backlash: the fragility of black womanhood

The black community tried to fight back against the klan. But they found themselves desperate for solutions. Even large strands of the black population started to fall for the theory of the scary black man and the fragile white woman. It became increasingly difficult for black activists to get enough people urgent to join their cause. How could you get people to feel empathy for black men when they were seen as horrific villains you would run from in a slasher movie? Eventually, a candle lit up — they had an idea.

In order to get people on board, they shifted the attention away from black men. The attention transferred to black women. A group of black women referring to themselves as "black feminists" emerged after being consistently excluded from the original feminist movement. They recruited black people using forms of gynocentrism to portray black women as helpless victims in need of safety. They would point to the history of black women being sexually violated immensely during the period of slavery. They would point to white men who used them as objects. And they would speak about the intense violence they suffered at the hands of white women, while they were used as house maids. And without the excessive sisterhood of their women and nobility of their men, black women were in danger.

This is oddly similar to the belief of fragile white women. It portrays certain women as helpless toddlers. It puts pressure on men to fight against even the hint of a threat. Women and men would find themselves stuck in this box of persuasion. Black women would be taught to scream for help at even the hint of any danger. Black men would be trained to use their masculine aggression in order to protect them. Without any rationality, black men would get into the face of other men–including black men-for even the slightest reasons. Black activists would make speeches about how much danger black women were in. They would put heavy emphasis on how we have to treat them like queens, protect them from any danger, and remind them how beautiful they are.

The major difference between the theory of fragility of black women and white women is intention. The fragile white woman theory was used as a justification to fight against black men and ultimately the black community. The fragile black woman theory was a self-defense strategy used to gain a sense of urgency for black rights. Even then, the philosophies are incredibly similar.

This philosophy was helpful, yet harmful. This belief was heavily responsible for the recruitment and passion of black activism. This ultimately led to a lot of success in black protest. However, this set a bad precedent for men and started a chain reaction of what we see today. Eventually, large amounts of black women joined the feminist movement (which is an entirely separate conversation) and adopted that theory to get black men on board. Women's fragility and supposed purity, led to society making more irrational decisions. It created a standard of men using their masculinity to mindlessly defend women. It also started to give women unhealthy boosts to their ego, which would lead to them displaying large levels of arrogance and dismissiveness to the very men who lifted them up in the first place.

The Patriarchy: White Women's Slavery

After the success of the Civil Rights Movement, America's attitudes on the black community had shifted, significantly. It was no longer the norm to have prejudiced attitudes towards black people. And society was starting to distance itself from the klan, which became a national embarrassment. What were these women to do? How were they going to continue to uphold the privileges of white women, while degrading black men? Simple Answer: the patriarchy.

The word patriarchy was originally used as a word to describe male leadership, be it in a group, family, business, government, etc. It was word neither good nor bad, but informal. Feminists took this word and turned it into an oppressive system, comparing it to white superiority and corporatism. They desperately displayed the struggle of sexual equality to the struggles of race and class. The purpose of this comparison was to make the feminist agenda seem more important and relatable.

The klanswomen who mourned for the days of slavery, now portrayed themselves as slaves of the patriarchy. The high-class tea sippers were now the dirt poor labor workers, fighting against the establishment. Their participation of hate could be traded in for justice. And, they were finally free to replace their klan robes with pussy hats and cheap picket fences. Using every possible cliché slogan, tactic, and rhetoric that other justice movements use. They considered themselves "one of us".

The patriarchy became a get-out-of-jail-free card for white women to use for their participation in the klan. With little care in the world, they pointed fingers at the "white man" for all of problems in society. They framed justice as "the white man vs women, POC, LGBT, and the poor. This cements the idea that they were free from criticism and free from consequences for their previous actions, while their husbands were the perpetrators who deserved scorn. White women would be portrayed as women who were just going along with their husbands and had no voice in their relationships. This couldn't be further from the truth, as they willingly joined the klan and even organized a lot of the events. But facts and morality were never of any concern to them. These same women (as explained earlier in the article) challenged men's manhood for refusing to join the army. These women turned on black men throughout their struggle for suffrage. And, after using black women to get their voting rights, they brushed them to the side. So, if you think, even for a second, that turning on their men was a difficult thing to do, you would be wrong.

The Angry White Man is The Scary Black Man

If a black man walks around with a mask of a white person's face, does that make him a white man? No, it makes him a delusional man. That's the largest problem with this "scary white man" rhetoric. Despite all of these statements about lowering the status of white men–and raising the status of everyone else–black men are the ones hurting the most by America's policies. That's the intention of the fragile woman theory. This hatred of men is nothing but a disguised hatred for black men.

Black men still suffer inequalities in incarceration, education, and health funding. They still find themselves in fear of homicide and police brutality. They're still portrayed as violent animals. Nothing has changed. It's the same thing. This entire "stop white men" rhetoric was code word for "stop black men". The "wife beaters", "violent criminals", "deadbeat fathers", "drug abusers", "rapists", "super predators". They were all used as dog whistle to play off of the fears of white women and the hatred against black men.

The "fight against white men" rhetoric is merely a slander against any injustices men go through. It's just a batch of white women pointing the finger at their loved ones, like toddlers saying "he made me do it". It completely ignores their willing participation in the subjugation of black people. It allows the affluent valley girls to wear chains around their neck and call themselves the new n-words (Bette Midler). It allows them to argue that sexism is a larger problem than racism (Women Are Never Front-Runners op-ed). And it gives them the comfortability to compare a kitchen to a ghetto (Gloria Bunker; All In The Family). They could claim that they were the true civil rights fighters, while watching black men suffer.

If anyone attempts to fight against these negative views of men, this could all be dismissed as another angry white man rant. Any fight against due process violations (title IX and #metoo) can be dismissed as white men wanting to rape women. If you want to point out the bias against fathers in a court of law, you're clearly an abusive white man who wants the right to abuse their children. If you're a parent complaining about the lack of educational investment for boys, you must be a white man scared of women advancing in life. Do you feel like getting fair sentencing in the prison system? Then you're most likely a violent white man who wants to commit violence against women. While the prison, education, and healthcare system targets black men and benefits white women, any form of activism against this would just be dismissed as a group of angry white men ranting about their loss of power and privileges-case in point the irrational responses to the men's rights movement.

And, so I come to the conclusion that the "angry white man" is just a substitute for the "scary black man". It's the same irrational theory that ignores logic and reasoning. Black men still being largely targeted and degraded. White women still put on a pedestal. There's no fear of them losing those advantages, as they can use the word "patriarchy" when they run into a bumpy road. It's all the same result with new wording–as it's intended to be. "Women's" empowerment indeed.

Sources:

- Votes for Women means Votes for Black Women
- White feminism isn't feminism. And it's not forgivable
- How the Suffrage Movement Betrayed Black Women
- The Not-So Invisible Empire
- Women of the Ku Klux Klan (WKKK)
- Progressive Values in the Women's Ku Klux Klan
- Women of the Ku Klux Klan

The deification of females

Mark Dent · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The deification of women has never been more evident in our society after a recent uproar over a photo of a female footballer was published online here in Melbourne, Australia.

The photo featured a young woman, Tayla Harris, frozen in action as she kicked a goal during a clash in the AFWL.

[image]

A few trolls online made sexually explicit comments about her open legs and pose.

These comments led to an explosion of outrage rarely seen even in this radically left leaning, feminist society. It was nauseating to be hearing or reading about this issue on a daily basis with no-one, other than a handful of male ex footballers quietly muttering that they too were exposed to endless denigration of their appearance, their ability and even death threats, without so much as a ripple of reaction from the media. But these attempts to change the narrative or cause the mob to pause and consider the utter hypocrisy of those participating in this latest witch hunt fell upon deaf ears.

Once again, the derogatory comments of a handful of individuals (assumed to be males but with no conclusive proof) became another weapon to be used against toxic masculinity and the acceptance of misogyny, rape culture and male privilege.

The young woman claimed the comments about her were, "sexual abuse".

> The comments I saw were sexual abuse, if you can call it that, because it was repulsive and it made me feel uncomfortable. This is what I would consider sexual abuse on social media."

Tayla Harris called for the AFL and possibly police to take action.

She continued:

> These people need to be called out by the AFL, yes, but also taken further-maybe this is the start of domestic violence, maybe this is the start of abuse."

Then the first of what was a tsunami of opinion pieces by mostly female journalists appeared. First in line was the Herald-Sun article, AFLW: This is a kick in the guts for women's sport.

It opened with this very tired and overused canard.

> I don't think anyone would be shocked to learn that female athletes have a long way to go in earning the same respect as their male counterparts.

Tayla Harris had more to say:

> Here's a pic of me at work … think about this before your derogatory comments, animals" she posted on Twitter with the photo. On Facebook, alongside the photo, Harris wrote, "My hamstring is OK but derogatory and sexist comments aren't."

Fiona Bollen (the journalist) finished her piece with these inspiring words:

> Her case should be a pivotal moment for women's sport, a time when a player stood up and called it out and the > people rose also from the benches to say 'enough'. Till my dying breath I will shout from the rooftops-

Where was your fucking concern when men were being mocked, denigrated and vilified in our media? I didn't hear any cries of "enough" when male footballers or athletes were humiliated by mainstream media journalists-not anonymous trolls.

[image]
Swan rubs his "fat" tummy after kicking a goal-his only response to the media barrage.
Dane Swan (now retired) was a champion Collingwood footballer who some believed had gained a little weight. He was called fat by numerous media outlets and his image splashed all over our newspapers. People laughed. People mocked him. No-one raised an eyebrow in his defense. Imagine these headlines were focusing on Serena Williams or any of the less than svelte female footballers running around in the AFWL.

Dane Swan was also involved in a more insidious story when a woman he had been involved with published nude pictures he had texted to her. The reaction to this disgusting betrayal and criminal behavior? Dane Swan was a silly fool for allowing himself to be compromised.

Dane Swan and Travis Cloke were investigated for contravening AFL rules!

> ►EXCLUSIVE! Collingwood stars Dane Swan and Travis Cloke engulfed in nude-photo scandal
>
> ►Explicit photos of Collingwood players Dane Swan and Travis Cloke leaked
>
> ►Woman's Day publishes nude photos of Collingwood footballers Dane Swan and Travis Cloke

Not one of the countless articles about this issue ever condemned the women who broke the trust of these men and sold the images to the media. The players were idiots and fools.

Women's magazines rushed the photos into print for their huge female audience to drool over.

No objectification here. No reducing male footballers to mere meat for the gratification of women.

Another Australian athlete by the name of Matt Shirvington was reduced to nothing more than his well- endowed package. When the first footage of Shirvington sprinting in his lycra was aired on television the public went into meltdown mode.

[image]

> ►'Some would call it a curse': Champion sprinter Matt Shirvington reveals how THAT 1998 Commonwealth Games footage still haunts him
>
> ►We need to talk about the men's rowing uniform

[image]

Dusty Martin, another AFL footballer was subjected to lewd comments from female fans after a photo of him was published.

But a female radio host and another female journalist believed that sexual comments directed at men were not the same as those directed at women.

> However, host Deborah Knight and Sarrah Le Marquand from RendezView were quick to dispute the claim that the two cases were comparable.
>
> 'It's not a level playing field, pun intended, is it?' Le Marquand said. 'Those comments made about a woman play into the misogyny of how we treat female athletes in this country.
>
> 'For a man it's very different … he's not actually feeling violated or fearing for his safety. Most importantly on > this issue he's not worried he's not going to be taken seriously as an athlete and I think that's the whole story here.'

So there we have it. The sexualizing or objectifying of men can never be considered humiliating, embarrassing or invasive for the male because these women simply know that it is different for women.

I would love a statistical analysis of all of the online trolling by strangers of female athletes which has led to any of these women being assaulted or physically threatened. I would suggest it would be close to zero.

As for linking a female athlete being trolled to her talents or skills not being taken seriously- where is the evidence for this? Many attractive female athletes have been accorded the appreciation their skills deserve even if people are equally impressed by their physical appearance.

From female surfers to female tennis players, many women have been the lucky recipients of praise for their sporting prowess and their good looks. It is no different for males. The true chasm emerges when we examine the denigration and mockery of less than attractive male athletes in comparison to their female counterparts.

I mentioned the fact in another article that there is literally no criticism of the female Australian Rules footballers. Whether it be their physical appearance or footballing skills, the commentators could well be calling an under tens match such is the patronizing, "kid gloves" approach they take to the women's game, all the while punctuating the contest with "Girl Power" advertisements and demands for equal treatment.

It is so transparently pathetic even I find it hard to get riled up. A slow headshake will usually suffice. I can't actually watch more than a minute of the women's game so low is the skill level. But if you speak these words aloud, you will have the mob baying for your blood. If you don't enjoy women's football, the reason is quite simple. You are a misogynist.

You probably hate any progress women have made and you are a part of our societal rape culture.

The truth has never been more starkly on show. We simply have nothing but contempt for the hurt, humiliation or sadness men may feel as a result of abuse.

It does not even register as an issue in the eyes of our government and sports administrators.

But women are now an elevated species. There are two sets of standards operating simultaneously in our Family Courts, prisons, streets or in the world of music, writing and sport.

Women are to be lionized, praised, acknowledged, celebrated, glorified, acclaimed, admired, exalted and applauded.

Nothing less than this will be tolerated.

Read the words of Tayla Harris's coach, Daniel Harford:

> "Tayla said it herself this morning that it's become more than about her, it's a bigger picture than that, it's so much bigger than that and we, the mature male population seem to be the problem at the moment, so we need to have more education and more understanding of what these things can do to people and how it affects people.
>
> "It's absolutely unacceptable."

Once again, the words of a handful of late-night trolls is a problem for the mature male population (whatever that means).

Harford played football at the highest level and I am sure he is aware of the abuse which targeted his teammates. He would have seen the depression so many of his fellow players succumbed to, often largely due to the online abuse and scrutiny to which they were subjected. Yet Dan never, to my knowledge, spoke out against trolls or demanded females stop treating players as a notch on their belts.

The most alarming aspect of this endless circus is that once again, the bigoted attitudes of feminists are acted upon.

> The AFL has declared war on trolls after a stunning photo of Carlton superstar Tayla Harris in full flight became fodder for ugly online abuse.
>
> The hunt for those responsible for the cruel invective is set to become a "watershed moment" for Australian sport, as some of the biggest names in football, entertainment and politics have called for tighter online controls to combat abuse.
>
> AFL integrity unit investigators are to join forces with Channel 7's social media platforms in an attempt to identify the perpetrators, who could be banned from games and stripped of their club memberships.

The only time I have seen a similar reaction involving a male was when the male happened to be an indigenous player. For me, this is never about protecting men but simply a virtue signaling exercise and another opportunity to slam "toxic males".

The abuse targeting males is minimized, deflected, or of no consequence, according to the many women who choose to write about the issue. They never provide a convincing argument to explain why this is so.

The stunningly myopic opinions expressed by female journalists on this issue are quite shocking. So many women seem to truly believe that women have exclusive ownership of suffering. They do not see men or boys.

We seem to be physical objects which fill in the background scenery of their lives. Men are simply extras in the movie of their existence. We are cardboard cutouts, devoid of emotion. We exist only as demons to be denounced or villains to be blamed.

It is sad.

I love so many men and boys in my life. My heart aches for them. I have seen so many damaged men in my life. Weeping, shuddering, broken and lost males who have been brutalized by life. They will never be seen by the countless females who carry their entitlement and privilege as the very minimum they should be expected to possess as they live their lives.

References

https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/lauren-wood-obscene-attacks-on-tayla-are-a-problem-for-all-of-us/news-story/e64b93254eac2431995b79e413612456

https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/susie-obrien/susie-obrien-tayla-harris-photo-another-example-of-misogyny/news-story/9895a5c6be68de61586647df09574baf

https://www.msn.com/en-au/sport/afl/tayla-harris-trolls-and-the-long-held-fear-of-powerful-women/ar-BBVaB5D?ocid=spartanntp

Post-separation suicide risk

Dr. Travis Gee · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Suicide is a gendered issue: men are far more likely to complete suicide than are women, and post-separation times are very high risk for them, especially where children are involved.

Why are Men more at Risk of Suicide after Separation?

Culturally, men are relatively unlikely to seek help when the black dog of depression comes nipping at their heels, and even when it is suggested by concerned friends and family, they can be hard to engage. There are estimates that 21 fathers in Australia alone commit suicide every week, and if we consider the forces at work in each of the (de-identified "composite") stories below, the reasons might be a little clearer.

Isolation – Carl had little education, but worked very hard for a paltry wage. When his ex took their children to Melbourne from Queensland, he saved every penny to travel to see them in his very old car. However, the Child Support Agency estimated his income as much higher than it actually was, and seized his car, preventing him not only from working, but from seeing his children at all, because his ex would not bring them up to see him. He saw a psychologist only after he had unsuccessfully tried to hang himself.

Financial hardship – Fathers' rights associations around the world are unified in their condemnation of the power of Child Support administrative bodies to make arbitrary decisions that have little or no basis in reality, and enforce them to the point beyond which payers can cope. The very real case of Warren Gilbert involved the ATO and the CSA together taking nearly 80% of his wages, leaving him with $150/week to live on. His body was later found in a car parked at the Namadgi National Park visitor's centre.I have written six reports in the last 10 months for men who were psychologically unfit for work, but forced to pay up to $3000/month whilst on Newstart (Unemployment) benefit, but their GPs' medical certificates were overruled by bureaucrats with no medical training at all.

Confusion – Mitchell's ex lived a few minutes away by car. One night she stayed over at his new place, but slept in the next day, and demanded that he drive her back home, as she was still too drunk to drive. Unlicensed due to a medical condition (epilepsy), Mitch agreed to drive her back in her car. He dropped her off without getting out of the car, then drove straight home to store the car and protect her from herself, before walking to the bus shelter to get to the shops. He was arrested on the way.

She had been so upset at his not waking her up on time (being asleep himself), that she smashed a window after going in the house, and called the police, accusing him of domestic violence, apparently to avoid the landlord being able to blame her for the damage. He spent the weekend in the watch house and was denied his epilepsy medication. A seizure was misinterpreted by the night shift as aggression (he was in for DV, after all), and he was soundly beaten up. He attempted an overdose the first day out of jail when he was denied legal aid. He said he didn't want to live in a world that made so little sense.

Shame – Gary, too, was accused of domestic violence. When his unmedicated bipolar partner flew into a rage because he did not hear her ask him to turn the TV down and went to smash a frying pan over his head, he grabbed her wrists and held her back. She called police to accuse him of violence, and police accepted the red marks on both of her wrists as proof, putting a DVO in place on her behalf. Being labelledby her to all their friends as a "wife-basher", he was too ashamed to seek help until after his ex invited him back to see the kids, and started screaming at him, again over trivial matters. The neighbours called police about the shouting and he was arrested and charged with breaching the DVO.

Now banned from seeing his children at all, he does not talk to his family or friends because part of him feels that somehow it was his fault. Thoughts of ending it all got in the way of concentration at work, and he was sacked the day before an unsuccessful overdose brought him into therapy. He still feels guilt over domestic violence that he did not commit, but is coming to understand that it is the result of cultural myths that he used to accept, about domestic violence only being something that men do to women.

Anguish – Kevin sought help because he knew that he was at risk of serious depression, because 10 years before he had suffered it, and had made a "cry for help" attempt at suicide during marital difficulties. Anguish had preceded that attempt, and now that his ex had left he was experiencing it again. His ex had used the 10-year-old records of past depression to convince a credulous judge that he was "too depressed to be safe around his children." The judge banned him from seeing the children until a psychologist certified him to be not depressed.

Fortunately for Kevin, taking time off work to volunteer at the kids' school to read stories at story time did not technically breach the wording of the order, and he bounced back without falling back into the abyss.

Hurt – Brian's ex suffered from Borderline Personality Disorder, and seemed to be of the view that if the children loved their father, they would love her less. Brian understood that the more people the children loved, and who loved them, the more love there would be to go around, but to her, love was a zero-sum game.

However, as usually happens in the present system, she ended up with primary care of the children, and began alienating them straight away. She started telling them about how everything he told them was a lie. She would sit beside them on the phone, making sure the conversation was terminated before he could tell them he loved them. When she cut him off completely, she accused his friends of being paedophiles and him of carelessly exposing them to danger.

When he remarried, she falsely accused his new wife of abandoning the children at Big W, fortunately, in a place directly in view of security cameras. When his new daughter was about to be born (to the great excitement of the kids), she called in repeated and abusive police welfare checks in the middle of the night and first thing in the morning, nearly sending the new wife into a dangerous early labour, which resulted in the children going back to the mother until after the birth.

Once the baby was born, more baseless excuses were concocted to bar the children from seeing their little sister on her first day. The joy of his new child's birth and the support of his wife helped hold Brian together – but remove the support, or have him arrested on false charges, or have Child Safety involved with the new child because of lies about the older ones, and you have a recipe for disaster.

Humiliation – Beyond simple hurt, there is humiliation. Terence was a great dad, raising two kids from infancy, putting in time changing nappies, midnight feeds – everything a dad could do. However, as with many men, upon separation, he became the devil incarnate, accused without basis or evidence of a multitude of sins to make him appear to be a threat to his children. A common tactic in post-separation litigation, such allegations resulted in a Terence being limited to an hour a week of "contact" with his children, under the watchful eye of a recently-graduated social worker many years his junior with no children of her own.

His previous confidence destroyed, his faith in his partner's previous appearance of fairness and rationality gone, and the weight of the justice system pressing against him through its unqualified belief in his ex's unproven allegations, he is at present receiving a limited supply of tranquilzing medications from his doctor, who is unwilling to supply enough at one time to enable him to overdose.

Depression, Despair and Anxiety – If we look at isolation, financial hardship, confusion, shame, anguish, hurt and humiliation, it would seem that any one of these would lead to depression, and any two to outright despair. But the examples above are sketches that do not give the complete picture.

Brian's path started with confusion about his ex, and the shame not of having paedophiles as friends, but of having that story told around the neighbourhood, even though it was false, as a result of the presumption of guilt that is now in place around such allegations. Kevin was not without a good deal of confusion about how a judge could use 10-year-old evidence of past successful treatment for depression to make him out to be some kind of threat to his kids, and was hurt that his ex-wife would stoop to such tactics. Gary's anguish at losing his kids only amplifies his shame, and both financial hardship and anguish at losing touch with his kids were clearly large contributors for Carl.

The flow-on effects of a fragile emotional state create other repercussions that produce anxiety. Terence recently lost his job as an electrical linesman over anxiety about the Department of Child Safety becoming involved. There had been allegations that his daughter walked in on him during a bath and saw him naked that were investigated by police and found to be a completely accidental incident typical of many households with small children, entirely unworthy of prosecution. Child Safety, not having to meet a criminal standard of evidence before it can ban parents from seeing their children, has a much lower standard and can act with effectively no evidence at all. An allegation of this type, in this context, can be seen by some case workers as conclusive proof of child abuse and grounds for a two-year order.

To an innocent man, being labelled a child abuser is enough to push him very close to the edge, especially in the current climate of a presumption of guilt, rather than innocence. Some only hold on and stay alive because of their fear that suicide will be misinterpreted as an admission of guilt that will smear their name to their children years down the road.

Supporting Men Following Separation

Men's issues have long been in the background, as men have not traditionally pursued the same kind of help that women are open to. However, there is a growing movement towards fathers demanding equal treatment as parents.

If you are a man who is even starting down the paths that the men above have travelled, I would be happy to put you in touch with like-minded Dads, while helping you through the process of what really should be called Post-Separation Traumatic Stress Disorder. On Facebook there is the Australian Fathers' Rights Movement, as well as The Australian Brotherhood of Fathers also provides emergency consultations for men in crisis.

---

*The above article was originally published at www.drtravisgee.com
*Dr. Travis Gee offers support services to men following separation, and for men suffering depression.

If it's not your penis, shut up and sit down, you have no say – and doctors, drop your weapon

Gary Costanza · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
Intaction's Genital Cutting Exhibit

If circumcision isn't medically necessary, why do we still do it? Examining hygiene, religion, tradition, and ignorance

It's odd to see this level of push-back and animosity.

I got some comments from friends on Facebook about some anti-circumcision posts I put up recently:

"Gary, it's hard to believe you are still stuck on this, when there are so many important …. oh forget it, you're stuck. I don't agree with you. It is for either religious and/or sanitary reasons that baby boys are circumcised. As toddlers & even older, children tend not to be meticulous with hygiene .

Infection can be very painful & dangerous. I do not believe baby boys are traumatized forever because of this. Are you?!?!?"

Another comment:

"The female genital mitigation [sic] should be something people worry about ☹"

Here are my posted responses to the above:

> Right, boys are much lesser humans, why care about their human right to bodily integrity?
>
> Let people, boys and girls, choose what to do with their body. You know, 100's of boys die from complications of this. Too bad we have more protections for animals than baby boys.
> All I have to ask is – why is FGM so bad and MGM OK – answer without being sexist or saying one isn't as bad as the other. MGM also entails sexual abuse. Also, I was cut AND I'M NOT MUSLIM OR JEWISH. When you cut boys you take away their right to a normal sex life and sex organs.
>
> Intactivists fight for the right to bodily integrity for boys AND girls – it's the right and fair thing to do.
>
> Some fight global warming, some fight for the environment, some fight for animal rights, some fight for men's/women's rights, and some fight for boys/girls genital integrity, and some fight for all of these.
>
> Watch this and learn what we are fighting for, a must watch video for expectant parents: An Elephant in the Hospital

The response to my comments:

> You are ridiculous with this!!
>
> [My boyfriend] says that more men at war would have died because of infection due to non-circumcision because of infection that would surely be present when proper hygiene is not possible for extended lengths of time.
>
> You have some displaced anger issues buddy. That first sentence proves that. It is women who were treated like second class citizens until the late 20th century, and are still being discriminated against in employment & salary !!
>
> You behave as if circumcision were mandated !!! You are not 'fighting' for anything! !

Of course it's "mandated," as you are forcing the child to be circumcised, and that's my whole point.

Why does this bother you? Are you feeling guilty, or do you need to justify your actions? Why do you care if babies aren't forcibly circumcised? If you want to circumcise yourself – go ahead – no one's stopping you – but how could it be right to force baby boys and girls to be circumcised, or tattooed, or have eye-rounding surgery, foot-binding, etc.

Why do some of us fight against MGM? Because it's easy – and I don't mean easy to defeat – I mean easy to discern as an issue worthy of fighting. Where else do we see disfiguring and potentially deadly human rights violations going on daily and literally right under our noses?

Some intactivists are men's rights activists (MRAs), many are not. Most MRAs are also intactivists because they recognize that the apathy towards men's and boy's issues is most glaring when we think nothing of abusing boy infants this way while we criminalize and jail those who do the same to baby girls. Frankly, I think MRAs who don't condemn MGM haven't really realized the blatant misandry and human rights abuse involved.

Many MRAs think MGM is easily one of the top most important issues they could take on, easy because it is so lopsidedly sexist, illegal and unethical – and may I remind you that intactivists oppose both MGM and FGM (many also oppose intersex genital mutilation). You say there are more important issues to combat? Would you say that to animal rights activists? If not, you should really think about that: valuing the rights of a baby boy less than you would an animal's – and you should be ashamed and embarrassed of yourself. Much of the public, not even activists, oppose inhumane procedures on animals such as ear docking, tail docking, cat declawing, and debarking, even calling into question testicle replacement and animal breast reduction. How can anyone object to actually treating a baby human boy as humanely as we do animals???

As far as men at war and their hygiene – if you're an adult in a combat zone and somehow you have no soap and you want a circumcision, that's your decision, stupid as it is, but what does that have to do with infant circumcision on Long Island, New York in 2017?

Let's get something straight. Everyone's entitled to their opinion, but that opinion ends where someone else's body begins. You have the right to circumcise your own body and no one else's. And why do you care if a baby boy has an intact penis, even if it's your own son, ESPECIALLY IF IT'S YOUR OWN SON! Why does it bother anyone that a baby boy may not get circumcised, or that many people advocate to prevent those unneeded circumcisions? It's not your penis, your body, or your decision.

You must have compelling and overwhelming reasons to do this to unconsenting babies – and it's just not there.

Here's a quote that explains some of the irrational comments we sometimes hear:

"Sometimes people hold a core belief that is very strong. When they are presented with evidence that works against that belief, the new evidence cannot be accepted. It would create a feeling that is extremely uncomfortable, called cognitive dissonance. And because it is so important to protect the core belief, they will rationalize, ignore and even deny anything that doesn't fit in with the core belief."

— Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks

So, you say it's not an "important" issue.

You couldn't be more wrong.

Aside from the ethics and danger of routinely circumcising infant boys without their consent, it is the most common surgery done in America and over a million baby boys are strapped down, mutilated, traumatized, bloodied and disfigured at the hands of parents and doctors who are supposed to love and protect them. That's thousands of infants screaming out in pain – and some dying – every day!

I recently attended an event hosted by Intaction featuring a Mobile Education Unit (see video below) that elicited some comments, both positive and negative.

Like some of the FB comments above meant to deflect from the issue, one man asked "Why don't you fight against global warming?" I'll tell you why.

As I said above, "some fight global warming, some fight for the environment, some fight for animal rights, some fight for men's/women's rights, and some fight for boys/girls genital integrity, and some fight for all of these."

My point is – and this relates to men's rights activism – that global warming and all these other issues are widely recognized and are being debated in the MSM, the workplace, and at the dinner table, and many people and groups are already doing that work. Neither men's rights issues or the genital integrity of infant boys are being addressed on those levels.

And this issue differs critically in another way from all those others.

There are many current issues that are controversial and are fiercely debated as to what is ethical, equal and legal. Abortion, racism, transgender-ism, sexism, gay and lesbian rights, religion, and atheism are just a few. But thankfully most of the world recognizes these differences of lifestyle and opinion and allow each of us to choose our own paths in life. You may choose one religion and I another; you may abhor abortion, but some others might choose that option if able to. You may be gay and I may be straight; you may be Republican, I a Democrat. The point is, you can choose any of these options and no one can force you to be an atheist, let's say, or a Muslim, or a Democrat, or to get a tattoo, pierced ears, or an abortion. Circumcision of babies is different in that the baby is without choice. Parent's and doctor's 'rights' should stop at the point where they infringe on other's rights – like mutilating their genitals.

Global warming? Like a strapped down baby gives a shit about global warming with a Gomco clamp on his penis and a scalpel coming to tear up his genitals.

Please, I'd love to move on to other causes, but this literally screams out every day! Just leave your baby alone and I'll move on.

Although I've failed to save two family members from circumcision, I figure if I go to intactivist events like these I may be able to help other boys whose parents are on the fence and question this push to circumcise. Why the great push? Hatred and ignorance of normal male genitals? Profits? Blind obedience to out-of-control medical intervention?

Actually, stopping or preventing something harmful is something you can actually achieve directly. It's profound and personal, having immediate, tangible, compassionate and lifelong results for your family and loved ones. You can make a lasting, direct and loving difference in a child's life. It's almost as good as saving (maybe literally) his life – where else can you make such a difference for merely stopping an ignorant medical procedure?

Let's make a deal – if you don't like intact penises, don't have one, don't look at them, don't suck them and don't fuck them, just leave other people's alone (read: newborn babies) and I won't stop you from enjoying your own circumcised vagina or penis, capisce?

How is it OK in some people's minds that anyone has the right to force another to get genitally mutilated and permanently disfigured? If you like pierced ears, or tattoos, or circumcision, go ahead and do it, but leave everyone else alone to choose for themselves! You may think your son a Jew because he was born to your Jewish family, and no harm done as he can later choose to stay or leave that faith, but doesn't it seem stupid – and it is – to say he's a Republican because you are? Then how can you decide for him that his foreskin and normal penis isn't needed or wanted?

Ladies, moms-to-be, you may not like the intact penis, it may be different to you, but the world's penises are intact and beautiful. You're not having sex with it anyway, it's your son's to enjoy, so don't force your prejudices on an innocent, intact baby boy; it's a new world, one that respects the human rights of all persons, big and small, boy or girl.

And dads, get over yourself and your denial that you weren't harmed and you're just fine. Well, you were violated sexually, mentally, and physically, so admit it and don't do that same thing to your son. After all, it's not your penis; you won't be using it for sex, and you won't use it to procreate, orgasm, or please a sexual partner with. It's not your sex life to ruin, and not your choice to make.

Consider the doctors' Hippocratic Oath: "First, do no harm," to which I add this layman's saying, "To each his own."

If you don't have a penis, or it's not YOUR penis, you have no say in the matter. You don't have the right to mutilate it.

Circumcision is the personification of "guilty until proven innocent;" is your baby's penis guilty until someone proves its innocence?

And pregnant women, does this make any sense – you don't drink alcohol, you eat right, you take prenatal vitamins, you don't take harmful drugs or painkillers…but soon after your baby is born you cut, crush, and amputate with excruciating pain and trauma part of your baby's genitals?

And don't forget to put those little mittens on his hands to protect from scratches, just before you let people tear and cut off part of his genitals?

Leaving him intact is so much easier, safer, cheaper, humane, logical, ethical, and better for his future sex life and health. And, after all, he can choose circumcision for himself at some point – although you'll say he probably won't – and I say, EXACTLY.

Your beautiful baby boy needs no surgical correction, no need to touch, retract, or remove the foreskin, just normal soap and water as you do with vaginas and rear ends. Do not allow anyone to try retracting it, as it will retract on its own. It couldn't be more simple or maintenance-free.

Parents and parents-to-be, this is part of what your job entails:

- protect them from harmful things, people, animals, and disease (with vaccinations)
- wash them and keep them clean (and teach them to how to clean themselves)
- brush their teeth (and teach them how to brush themselves)
- teach them to respect, protect and love their body, and never abuse it

What crazy thing are we teaching boys and girls when on one hand we say love your body as it is, yet we show how we despise male anatomy? I, and many others, wish I had a foreskin to keep clean, but I never had the chance. I would cherish the beauty and wonder of my male human body, and I'd have the cleanest package on the planet. It's your job to teach them to clean themselves – how hard is that? – we do it everyday with females. You have no right to literally take away his manhood and a chance at a normal sex life.

Teach both boys and girls to clean 'down there,' and when puberty hits, both boys and girls will want to attract each other, making it a self-correcting non-problem.

Speaking of sex, circumcision was promoted by John Harvey Kellogg (of Corn Flakes fame) to prevent masturbation, as he thought it lessened the pleasure and thought it a good idea to punish the male psyche by associating his penis with pain. Well, he got it right that men who are circumcised have vastly diminished capacity for pleasure, as the foreskin has thousands of sensitive nerve endings built for pleasure. Many people masturbate, and circumcised men, me included, will never know the full pleasure we were meant to have. Don't take that away from your son.

You know, we love vaginas and accept them as they are, (except for those who don't and mutilate infants' vaginas) loose skin and all, and that's because we're used to the natural, intact vagina. NEED I SAY MORE? Those who think an uncircumcised penis isn't normal isn't used to a normal penis, and is just plain wrong. If you think a foreskin is gross, what about all that vaginal skin?

Listen to someone who's been there and been mutilated. Evolution has perfected the two sex's genitals to be matched perfectly. The normal functioning vagina gets lubricated and the intact penis glides smoothly out from under its foreskin, making for pain-free and effortless intercourse. The glans – or head of the penis – is normally an internal organ and not meant to be external and exposed. A circumcised penis is dry and rough, without any lubrication, many times needing a lubricant to help things along. To say nothing of the lost sensation in that penis and foreskin, something circumcised men will never experience. I've even heard of intact men being multi-orgasmic.

Here's a video of a normal dog penis where an ignorant woman thinks "there's something wrong" with a normal dog's penis that has a sheath (foreskin) hiding it till it gets erect – just like the normal human penis. You can see some more normal dog penis here, here, and here.

If we aren't cutting off dog foreskin, does it mean we don't love them as much as baby boys…or is it the other way around?

Here's a video that tells all you need to know about the human foreskin and the amazing intact penis that some think requires surgery (NSFW).

Here's another video (NSFW) with similar information that includes the question and arguments for and against circumcision, and one more (NSFW) debating both the pros and cons.

Most doctors will only circumcise newborns and infants, I guess because the foreskin is so small it's perceived as 'just a snip' to all involved, whereas later on there is more cutting needed, more pain and nerve endings, more autonomy and more chance of the boy fighting back. Infants are also easily strapped down into a medieval device called a Circumstraint like animals, and they can't fight back or sue!

I wrote an article where I called the CEO of Dublin's Temple hospital two-faced because what they say doesn't jibe with what they do. One face says they put the care and welfare of the child front and center, the other face ignores their own Statement of Strategic Intent and forces many of those children to be sexually abused and mutilated. Temple knowingly ignores these facts:

- no medical organization recommends routine circumcision
- there are many risks involved, including a lifetime of pain, disfigurement, and death
- 100% of these babies lose normal sexual function and pleasure

- 100% of these babies have bleeding and scarring
- unequal protection of female babies vs. male babies
- violates your Hippocratic Oath, “First do no harm” (maybe they have this confused with hypocrisy)
- studies have shown this traumatizes the infant and damages his immature nervous system
- permanent elective surgery requires informed consent by the actual patient, especially an amputation of a normal body part (this is not “the repair of a hernia, hydrocele, correction of undescended testis, … or excision of minor lump” see below)
- infant genital mutilation is a human rights violation as outlined by the United Nations, and is most likely illegal in most countries
- Germany and Norway’s recent attempts (among others) to ban MGM for many of the reasons outlined above
- the worldwide intactivist movement to ban all forms of infant genital mutilation

This is one of the items under “Pediatric Surgery” at their website:

> • General pediatric surgery – this refers to the surgery of relatively common conditions that do not usually require a specialist unit. These conditions can either be elective e.g. the repair of a hernia, hydrocele, correction of undescended testis, circumcision, or excision of minor lumps. Alternatively, the operations may be emergency procedures e.g. appendicectomy, or torsion of testis

Notice that ALL of the above procedures seek to correct or treat a disease or condition EXCEPT circumcision. Imagine this amended listing for “general pediatric surgery” above:

> …These conditions can either be elective e.g. the repair of a hernia, hydrocele, correction of undescended testis, circumcision, or excision of minor lumps. You may also chose to excise your daughter’s labia from her vagina here at the centre.

There are many groups who recognize how wrong this is. Breast feeding advocates see the absurdity of advocating for natural childbirth and breast-feeding, only to disrupt the mother-child bond by what amounts to abuse and torture of the infant involved. Anti-FGM activists as well as men’s rights activists also see the hypocrisy of advocating for the human and natural rights of babies while tearing off part of their genitals for no reason and without their consent.

This is SURGERY ON A NEWBORN INFANT, with all it’s attendant risks: any loss of blood is risky to a baby whom has very little to spare; many of the hundreds who have died were the result of blood-loss due to careless procedures as well as undiagnosed cases of hemophilia.

While some boys have died from this surgery, many more are disfigured. Look up the name David Reimer, a boy who had a twin brother and was left without a penis after it was burned off during circumcision. Dr. John Money had a theory that David could be raised as a girl, and that is what they did to David, trying unsuccessfully for many years to convince him and the world he was a girl named Brenda. It ended when he reclaimed his true sexual identity and became David again, only to end in suicide at the age of 38. It goes without saying his twin brother was never circumcised.

[image]As seen here on the consent form, circumcision is worded as the “treatment” of a “diagnosis” of “penile foreskin, cosmetic.” Foreskin is normal tissue and nothing to be “diagnosed.” Notice that the “benefits” listed are “cosmetic” and the risks are “infection, bleeding, need for blood transfusion, damage to surrounding organs (urethra, scrotum), unpleasing cosmetic outcome, need for revision in the future,” while the “alternatives” to circumcision are “no circumcision” and the “risks related to not having the procedure” are “no risk with proper hygiene.”

Remember, this is surgery, with its attendant risks, which mandate (see consent form below) someone's consent to:

- approve that surgery is "not an exact science" and are not "given any guarantees about the results of this procedure"
- "if something unexpected happens" … "agree to any treatment which is necessary" (for surgery that's unnecessary)
- "agree to have transfusions of blood and other blood products"
- "agree to allow this facility to keep, use, or properly dispose of tissue and parts of organs that are removed during this procedure" (your baby's normal sex life and his penis' protective sheath tossed in the garbage can or sold to make face cream)

[image]And of course "If the patient cannot consent for himself/herself," the signature of the patient's "legal guardian" must be obtained, understandable and ethical without question to cure or treat a disease or condition, NOT ethical for permanent and risky elective surgery.

An intactivist who works at a hospital brought to the Intaction event above brought a small tube of lidocaine which she said they use to numb the baby's genitals prior to circumcision, yet the warning label states that it's not for use on children less than 6 months old. Although I haven't found that warning, I did find many other warnings and reasons not to use for infants undergoing circumcision. Read some of those warnings below and wonder why anyone would risk using these drugs on newborn babies to perform major and risky surgery on an infant that doesn't need it. Studies of these drug's effects on newborns are incomplete due to the unethical nature of testing on highly vulnerable infants. The small amounts used are large in comparison to the baby and the methods of testing those amounts in the blood are harmful to the baby in and of itself, as newborns have very little blood to lose or to absorb any drug safely. This is why many circumcisors use no anesthetic – just look at the warnings for lidocaine usage:

> - you are allergic to any ingredient in lidocaine cream or to similar medications (eg, amide-type local anesthetics)
> - if you have allergies to medicines, foods, or other substances
> - if you have had a severe allergic reaction (eg, severe rash, hives, difficulty breathing, dizziness) to any anesthetic medicine
> - if you have heart, liver, or kidney problems

How would we know any of this about a newborn? Further warnings:

> Lidocaine Cream is for external use only. Avoid contact with eyes. If contact occurs, wash out the eye at once with water or saline and protect it until the numbness is gone.
>
> Do not bandage or wrap the affected area, unless directed otherwise by your doctor.
>
> PREGNANCY and BREAST-FEEDING: It is not known if Lidocaine Cream can cause harm to the fetus. If you become pregnant, contact your doctor. You will need to discuss the benefits and risks of using Lidocaine Cream while you are pregnant. It is not known if this medicine is found in breast milk after topical use. If you are or will be breast-feeding while you use Lidocaine Cream, check with your doctor. Discuss any possible risks to your baby.

Of course the penis gets wrapped, along with the lidocaine that possibly gets into the bloodstream.

So, you're putting a strong, numbing drug on a baby's genitals, and then cutting into those genitals, risking fatal blood-loss, harmful drug effects, and infection, scarring, and possible penile amputation – all this for no medical reason.

See this doctor tell a story about a circumcision that went really bad, probably almost killed the baby, due to ignorance about foreskins all being different, and the terrible risk of blood-loss involved in performing surgery on infants due to their already low volume of blood.

From the same video, see the same doctor tell another horror story about circumcision – it makes you wonder if it really is 'rare' to have these complications when one doctor is seeing all this. Watch the full video here – if this doesn't piss you off, I don't know what will. What gives me hope is that some of these doctors realized the horror and stopped circumcising.

Watch this classic anti-MGM video that stars Penn & Teller, the respected Dr. Dean Edell, and nocirc.org founder and nurse Marilyn Milos.

Here's another hard-hitting video about circumcision, and like the others above, it seems there was a time when society and doctors talked candidly about circumcision, now it seems the circumcision camp (doctors and hospitals) will call security before talking to you.

Just like penises, vaginas come in all shapes and sizes, (NSFW) and hopefully men and women are embracing the normal intact bodies of each other and themselves.

It seems that all the aforementioned reasons to circumcise infant boys have some overlap and are reinforced by the others. Ignorance of the foreskin allows you to think it particularly malodorous and expendable, allowing the hygienic, religious, and traditional reasons to trump any thought of a breach of ethics or human rights violation.

For more thought-provoking and informative videos click here and here.

For real love to arise, romantic love must die: Part three

Paul Elam · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

OK guys, here we go. The third and final part of my series on Red Pill Relationships. To recap what I have covered so far, part one was an effort to disabuse you of the notion that romantic, gynocentric love is anything at all but an exploitation of the mental disability that comes with infatuation; that romantic love as a foundation for pair-bonding imposes onerous double standards on men, crazy unrealistic expectations in women and is more likely to result in relationship failure and injury than in a lasting bond of affection.

I also established that allowing the state to regulate this kind of dysfunctional attachment, as we see in any form of marriage, is an invitation to disaster, particularly for men.

In part two I rested on the need to screen out undesirable women, in all their forms, but more than that to see the act of screening as a developmental shift away from gynocentrism and toward a consciousness that gives men's well-being and security absolute primacy.

I also established that the screening cuts the pool of qualified women drastically. Call it extreme vetting. And again, a reminder. We aren't looking for unicorns. Non-gynocentric women are even scarcer than non-gynocentric men, which is to say they pretty much don't exist.

We are simply talking about being able to spot the minority of women who are trainable; women who have the capacity to adapt to a non-gynocentric path. And those women do exist, even if they aren't falling out of trees.

I stumbled on a comment recently by a woman on one of my videos. She said she did not agree with everything I said, but that she followed my content closely and found it useful in being a better girlfriend. I take that as a high compliment. Women need to hear this as much as men do, especially women with the capacity to listen, just as I am pointing to in this series.

That said, these talks are not intended to be a recommendation to any man to pursue committed relationships. I am not even holding this stuff out as being better or preferable to monk mode. It is simply meant as some practical suggestions to men who identify as red pill but who have already decided they are not swearing off the possibility of pair-bonding.

And that brings us to step three, which is ABT. Always be training.

Always.

The reason for that is simple. Let's say you have performed due diligence in screening. You have found a candidate. She has a job and doesn't mind paying her own way. Let's say in fact that she insists on carrying her own weight financially in the relationship. She is personally secure. She doesn't whine and she doesn't damsel or manipulate with sex or emotions.

That alone is a rare find, like plucking a gemstone out of a gravel pit. And it is a great place to start, but what you will find at the end of the day is that she is still just as conditioned to gynocentric privilege as every other woman you have known. And in all likelihood she will walk the relationship to a gynocentric crossroads.

She will be subtler about it. Her displays of childish womanhood will be less garish than most of her counterparts, but you can bet your ass it will happen. There is no such thing as a woman in this culture who does not have "me, me, me," in her vocabulary, even if she self-regulates with unusual skill. It's in their DNA, and in ours to accept it.

Once that dialect finds a receptive home in a relationship with a man, it will expand and intensify. Eventually, if you allow it to, it will take over.

You must remember that this culture and arguably this species hardwires gynocentric expectations in women. We train them to measure their worth in terms of sexual power over men. Generally, the degree of sexual power over men that women have is inversely proportional to their happiness. Even women raised by good fathers, with appreciable humility and otherwise sound values are included in that proposition. Sooner or later, that tendency will fuel her quest for dominance and control in the relationship.

Of course, there are other factors, like the rules we all bring with us from the family of origin, that will foment a struggle for control from both partners – each person in the relationship vying with the other to recreate the familial. Such is the lot of all relationships but that is a blue pill power struggle. If the relationship survives long enough, that struggle will might be resolved with years of practiced compromise marked by sometimes heaping amounts of friction and angst. Or, and more likely, it might be resolved with a broken man, living the life of a house cat.

It is important to mention this because the traditional power struggles that couples engage in are at once separate from the struggle against gynocentrism, and a game-changing part it. Gynocentrism gives her the absolute edge in the traditional power struggle. She will use damseling, sexual blackmail, threats of abandonment and challenges to your manhood to prevail in the traditional struggles. That manipulative gynocentrism, unchecked, is a trump card against which you have no defense but red pills.

And the point here is not for you to use anti-gynocentrism to gain an upper hand in typical relationship power struggles. After all, if your aim is to win at every turn regardless of what is fair or proper, then how much different are you than the women you've grown wary of? Creating a gynocentric boogeyman every time you feel potential conflict isn't going to serve you or the relationship. It's just going to turn you into the monster you are trying to fight. That monster is real enough without help or embellishment from you.

Consider this, though. We coined the term "When Momma ain't happy, ain't nobody happy," to describe how women typically win control. The term radiates gynocentrism. It's serve or suffer. That includes everyone. Children are no more exempt than men. You either make a woman happy, or you pay. And it passes for normal in this world.

That diamond in the rough you found? The one who cheerfully pays her way and takes the occasional no with some grace and dignity? Well, she is more than capable of the exact same behavior if the relationship has room for her latent gynocentrism to blossom. Whether its conscious on her part makes no difference at all. Sooner or later it will emerge, and if you are not prepared to train her out of it, it will consume the relationship and possibly you with it.

And this brings me to an unavoidable part of this series, and a pivotal point on training. When you are going up against gynocentrism in a woman, or a man for that matter, you are the only adult in the room. Get that into your head and let it steep there indefinitely. In her gynocentric mode, she is not an adult in waiting. She isn't one pithy line from you away from instant maturity. She's a child, and a petulant, incredibly destructive one at that.

That's the point. Gynocentrism is the enabling credo of an indulgent childhood. It is not rational. It is not healthy. It does not know limits, or propriety or even common sense – and very, very importantly, it doesn't want to. Ever. It is a child screeching for something it wants without regard to fairness or consequence, and it will only react to your bargaining and reasoning with more childishness.

This is where you can do some good with the right approach. And it is where we need to remember one of the key lessons from part one. Much of this work is about an evolution in your self-perception. You don't buy into romantic love and you don't invest yourself in attracting women near as much as you do in your ability to screen out the wrong ones. Those two changes are not just in behavior, but in identity. It's not just what you do, it's who you are. If you are trying to fake it you are going to fail.

The same kind of shift in identity is essential to take on the task of training. It means surrendering the days when you were a frustrated guy trying to reason with his sweetheart so her can feel like he won the fight, or even to just get back into her good graces. In the face of gynocentric control, you shift into the role of dispassionate disciplinarian. Your lessons from screening kick in and you take on the task of dispensing sufficient pain to send the message that you won't bargain with a child.

I imagine that some of the snowflakes who scour my material just started melting at that one but there is really no other way to put it. Training is about punishment and reward.

Think of it this way, if you are a male supporter of my work, you've probably been trained by women, with the use of pain, to be exactly where you are now. By using abusive forms of control, most women train men to either become lapdogs, or to say fuck that and fuck you. Sometimes it takes years. Sometimes decades. But there is no arguing that it is training.

And as I have said before, even in more healthy circumstances, we all train each other in how we are treated. You will either train a woman in how to treat you with boundaries and solid values, or by being a doormat. Either way, she will get the picture of who you are and act accordingly.

To get more to the purpose of what I am talking about here, I will give you a fictional circumstance. And in that I am not trying to teach you technique, but the ongoing effect of your attitude on her.

Imagine that you are at a social gathering with a group mostly comprised of her friends. And now imagine, as proof to her friends that she is large and in charge, she says something personally belittling to you in front of the crowd. And let's say it is not typical for her to do anything like that. After all, she is your diamond in the rough. She's the one that legitimately passed screening, and this is the first time you've seen her act this way.

Now imagine the look on her face as you get up and walk out on her in front of all her friends.

Next, imagine that she comes home later and demands to talk about what happened, because you know, women like to talk about things. Now imagine her hearing you say calmly that the only thing you are interested in is a sincere apology, an explanation for her behavior and some reasonable assurances that there won't be a repeat.

Imagine her face again when she realizes you're dead serious, because you walked out the door again the moment she tested your resolve.

Now imagine again that you stay completely and totally unplugged till she wakes up and smells the coffee. You stay that way as she claims you're manipulating her, as she claims that you are pouting and acting like a child. And she will. Women are perfectly capable of acting like three-year old's and then telling you that you are childish if you disapprove. Gynocentrism is always on the ready to add two and two to get five.

At any rate, you hold your ground till she caves to the truth or goes away. You refuse to participate in life with her. You don't kiss, fuck, talk, sleep or even share a meal with her till she grows up and faces the problem like an adult.

And that is this whole series in a nutshell. The entire enchilada. By cultivating non-gynocentric attachment with women, by refusing to put yourself in the role of a vassal for love and by practicing a healthy boundary — that you don't ever try to reason or bargain with children in grown up bodies — you do two key things on your own behalf.

One, you quietly, and without any need for drama, force her hand to either change or leave. As long as you are willing to live with either choice over tolerating her abuse, then you can't lose. That is why I keep saying you can't fake this stuff. If you are a man that will tolerate abusive gynocentrism, abusive gynocentrism is what you will get, for which, of course, you only have yourself to blame.

This applies to almost any scenario you can imagine. Gynocentrism takes on many faces in a relationship. Most often it is the pressure to do everything her way, which is to say that what she needs and wants comes first. Or, more directly, you come in last, every time.

Sometimes it can be a bit challenging. After all, what is the difference between just wanting your way in a particular instance vs wanting your way because of gynocentric privilege? I can't tell for sure in every case, but I look at gynocentrism like pornography. It's can be very hard to define, but I damn well know it when I see it. I recommend trusting your eyes and your instincts way over any doubts. You are still, even at your red pill best, more likely to overlook gynocentrism than create it where it does not exist.

Finally, for you to succeed at training, the first and every other encounter with her bald gynocentrism is that it results in her being reminded that you don't have any tolerance for it, and that the one and only way she can move forward with you is by suiting up in her big girl panties and being a responsible adult. After all, when it gets down to brass tacks, refusing to be controlled by gynocentrism is exactly analogous to refusing to be bullied. There are very few unhealthy ways to put an end to that.

It's a necessarily painful strategy, but while the pain is intentional, it is not inflicted maliciously. The point is, if you have adequately screened, you are dealing with a woman who has some kind of moral compass. She is not trying to be a bully, even if she is doing a good job of it.

The problem with gynocentrism, and its proxy romantic love, is that it separates people, men and women alike, from their capacity for reason. It removes the direct pathway from a presenting problem to a values-based solution.

The purpose of the withdrawal, and the subsequent pain, is to reconnect her to her values. Her defensiveness will invariably slow that process down, but sooner or later, in dealing with the brick wall that you have become, she will either reconnect with her values, or get a connecting flight. There is literally nowhere else to go. Your job, in the event she opts to change course and do the right thing, is not to be a gloating asshole and rub her nose in it.

Remember, if she is opting for good values for the sake of your relationship, she is literally defying as much pre-programming as you did in swallowing red pills. Treating her supportively for doing that isn't gynocentric, it's basic human decency. And if you can't do it, it's because she didn't screen well enough.

If you have payed attention to this series, that disappointing end game where she leaves is pretty much as bad as it will get. By not getting married, sharing finances, or cohabitating in a way that gives her legal reach into your life, you have insulated yourself from most of the consequences except for the grief you will feel when she leaves.

The only other possibility is an attack by damseling; faking a DV or sexual assault claim, or trashing you with lies to your friends or family. Then again, if you screened out all of the many varieties of garbage very early in the game, your chances of that are significantly less.

I wish you the best of luck in your efforts.

Perversions of gynocentrism

Peter Ryan · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Chivalry And Feminism Go Hand In Hand

Gynocentrism perverts everything it comes into contact with and the first casualty is the standard of behaviour between men and women. Sydney Watson recently did a great video[1] on men helping women and the ridiculous feminist concept of benevolent sexism. In this article I will be discussing her video and exploring the connection between chivalry and the success of feminism. I will also be discussing benevolent sexism further and what is missing for men in our gynocentric society, as part of my series on exploring the nature of gynocentrism. Chivalry has been around in Western culture for far longer than feminism and is one of the major contributing factors to the rise of feminism in society and its successful and rapid spread through our institutions, corporations, politics, academia, media, law and policy etc.

The chivalrous deference that men in power have shown toward women and their eagerness to prioritise female well-being, often at the expense of everything else, has been absolutely critical to the rise, spread and success of feminism in Western culture. The willingness of men and boys as a group to not just tolerate, but actively support feminist measures that prioritise female well-being over their own well-being, without any reciprocity, is a product of the gynocentric tradition of chivalry that has been ingrained in our culture for centuries and passed down from generation to generation. Without men in power and men as a group deferring to the demands of feminists and women as a group and feminists deliberately exploiting the gynocentric tradition of chivalry, feminism would have never been able to gain traction.

Chivalry[2] is what gynocentric traditionalists (not all traditionalists are gynocentric) do not want men and boys to unlearn. What they fail to understand, or perhaps do not want to understand, is that it is chivalry that allowed feminism to emerge, grow and quickly spread throughout society like a virus and gain a stranglehold in our institutions etc. Feminism was a power grab by a substantial fraction of the female population, to enshrine gynocentric double standards into law, policy, media, academia, businesses and our institutions and normalise those double standards in the culture.

Chivalry was what gave feminism the opportunity to successfully execute a bloodless coup of our societies. Chivalry was the accelerant that facilitated the rapid spread of the feminist firestorm through every branch of society, without any resistance from the men supposedly in power. We could eliminate feminism tomorrow, but as long as chivalry remains in our culture, it will simply re-emerge a few decades later under a different name. I would actually go further and argue that as long as chivalry remains in our culture, feminism will never be defeated.

As long as men defer to women and men in power and in men general are prepared to prioritise female well-being over male well-being, without any reciprocity for men and boys, feminism will keep succeeding on every front with their agenda until society collapses. Calls by gynocentric traditionalists for men to be more chivalrous, are nothing less than calls for more gasoline to be thrown into a burning building. Doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result, is called insanity. It is gynocentric insanity to be promoting chivalry in the modern feminist society we live in.

Feminists are of course all too happy to keep exploiting chivalry to their advantage and like gynocentric traditionalists, they also encourage and promote chivalry when it suits them. HeForShe and White Ribbon for example, are nothing less than an attempt by feminists to blatantly exploit chivalry for their own benefit. We could go through example, after example, after example, of this same strategy being employed by feminists- Set a victim narrative or damsel in distress narrative where women and girls are in need of male assistance, instill guilt and shame in men and then engender a sense of duty in men to save the day, be the white knight and redeem themselves (of course even when men do what feminists say, they are never forgiven for their sin of being male), then ostracise any man or woman that questions your narrative and label them a misogynist. Wash, rinse, repeat. It is the same feminist strategy every time and on every occasion our male politicians fall for it and so does most of the rest of society. Exploiting chivalry from men and boys, has always been a core element of feminism's success. It is the fuel that keeps the feminist fire burning.

The prime distinction between gynocentric traditionalists and feminists, is they exploit chivalry to fit an agenda that is different. Both exploit chivalry, just for different ends. Both are different sides of the same gynocentric coin and are in conflict over the male resources they want to exploit. It is a gynocentric tug of war between two gynocentric factions of society that want to exploit men for different goals. Neither group has an ounce of concern for male well-being, except to the extent it serves female interests.

So why is it exactly that feminism has been able to rely so heavily on chivalry to gain traction in society? Chivalry in its modern form is one-sided. There is no reciprocal set of responsibilities and duties expected from women and girls, in relation to how they treat men and boys. It is all one-way traffic, which makes chivalry the perfect fuel to drive a one-sided and bigoted agenda of female supremacy under the banner of feminism. Whilst chivalry has diminished somewhat in the culture over the last several decades, it still remains socially enforced to a substantial degree in modern society. Indeed a number of women in the media[3] have been doing their very best to promote chivalry.

This is about women wanting to have their cake and eat it too. They want the rights and opportunities of men, but not the responsibilities, obligations and sacrifices expected of men and they want to keep the traditional privileges women have enjoyed for centuries. They want to be treated as equals when it suits them, but they want special treatment like they are aristocracy when equality does not suit them. This is female entitlement mentality. The same women arguing men should act like gentlemen from the 19th century, bristle at the very mention of women acting like ladies from the 19th century. That right there is the problem- Lack of reciprocity. The one-sided gynocentric face of chivalry in the modern era.

To Defeat Feminism Chivalry Has Got To Go

Chivalry in its modern form is gynocentric bigotry. It is a one-sided code of socially enforced behaviour for men and boys to treat women and girls as a group with a special level of care and respect, simply because they are a female, with no equivalent efforts expected to be made by women and girls toward men and boys in return. Men and boys are expected to act like gentlemen and women and girls can act in any manner they please toward men and boys. Like other forms of bigotry, chivalry has no place in a society that claims it is against discrimination and for equality.

If we are ever going to defeat feminism, then chivalry will need to go. Men in power have to start saying "no" to the demands of feminists and putting their principles ahead of the approval of feminists, female voters and female media commentators. Men in general are going to have to learn to set boundaries with women and stand their ground and not cater to the demand's women make that conflict with their values. Men in general need to learn to say "no"[4] to unreasonable demands by women and feminists. This might sound simple and yet for many men they cannot bring themselves to say that simple word when it really matters. What would we call a relationship when you cannot say no to a group or individual? Slavery and dictatorships come to mind.

Society is not a patriarchy, that is feminist projection (so much of feminist ideology in general is projection). Modern Western society more accurately resembles a matriarchy by proxy, with feminists ruling from behind the throne and the men in power acting as feminist servants. These men in positions of authority, regularly and eagerly implement the feminist female supremacist agenda on feminists behalf, without a whimper of resistance and throw men and boys under the bus for approval from feminists and female voters.

All that is required for this to stop, is for men (and particularly men in positions of authority) to stop kowtowing to women, find their balls and say the word "no" to the next unreasonable demand made by a screeching feminist harpy. Men place far too much value in concerning themselves about winning and maintaining the social approval of women and far too little value in striving to be the best version of their authentic themselves and winning the approval of others on authentic grounds that are true to themselves. That is the distinction between a man with integrity and a man on a leash that follows the social whims of women and feminists. That needs to change and if we want to begin that change, then we need to stop teaching young boys a one-sided chivalrous code of behaviour. We need to stop teaching boys that deferring to women and prioritising female well-being at the expense of male well-being, without any reciprocity, makes them a "man".

Of course men are not the only group that need to change if we want an end to chivalry and to defeat feminism. There will also have to be a big shift in the attitude of women as a group toward men. We live in a culture that fosters female entitlement mentality[5], as Miranda Devine termed it. Women to a significant degree are raised from childhood to expect chivalry and a one-sided set of obligations men have toward women. There is no reciprocal set of obligations given to girls on how to treat men and boys. Boys and girls learn from a young age that boys do not hit girls, but rarely if ever are girls told not to hit boys. This is despite boys and girls reporting similar levels of intimate partner violence when they date[6]. That is just one example of many that I can give of the lopsided gynocentric messages children get as they develop into adults.

Paul Elam has recently done a video[7] examining the link between how we raise girls in modern society and how that then fuels the culture of female entitlement that leads to feminism. Children are not stupid. If girls are taught and see the adults around them expecting men to treat women specially simply because they are women and the reverse is not expected for women on how they treat men, then of course it will foster a sense of female entitlement and female superiority they will carry through to adulthood.

Both men and women are involved in perpetuating the cycle of gynocentrism from one generation to the next and teaching girls this sense of entitlement. The result of this cycle is an epidemic of female narcissism. Dr. Tara Palmatier spoke about this social trend of female narcissism[8] in her talk at the first international men's conference in Detroit in 2014. Peter Wright has recently discussed[9] how gynocentrism in women is a form of situational narcissism in women's relations with men and compares the characteristics of gynocentrism in women with narcissistic personality disorder.

Female entitlement mentality is indeed a pathology and it is narcissistic, but in this feminist culture we glorify it as a sign of female empowerment. That will also need to change if we want to see an end to chivalry and by extension, an end to feminism. Female entitlement mentality is not something to be proud of or something we should be normalising in the culture as a sign of female empowerment. All it does in the long term is foster resentment and bitterness between the sexes and drives them further apart, which in turn hastens the social breakdown and collapse of society. Neither sex benefits from female entitlement mentality in the long term.

Sex Differences And Limitations

In Sydney's video she discusses the reality that males and females are different and each sex has their own unique set of limitations and vulnerabilities and that there is nothing necessarily wrong about men helping women in that context. I would absolutely agree. The sexes have co-evolved over millions of years of natural and sexual selection, to develop unique and complementary sets of traits to perpetuate the lineage. This has been a feature of not just human evolution, but also the evolution of our ancestors. It is certainly correct to state that men helping women based on real limitations, is not immoral and it is not gynocentrism. Where it becomes gynocentric bigotry, is when men help women based solely or partly on the fact they are female and not because of some real limitation and where no reciprocal efforts are expected or made by women in return.

There is a distinction between being kind, compassionate, respectful and generous toward your fellow human being and applying such principles selectively based on the sex of the individual. This is why I developed a diagnostic definition[10] of gynocentrism to delineate between being authentically generous and compassionate and gynocentric bigotry. If you are a man that sees a woman that clearly needs help with her shopping bags and you want to assist them, so be it. Good on you! However, if you are the sort of man that sees a man clearly needing help moving a fridge onto a truck and won't help them simply because he is not female, don't ask me to respect that. Imagine for a moment if this double standard was reversed or based on racial grounds. What would we call it? Make no mistake chivalry in the modern era is bigotry, gynocentric bigotry to be exact.

Feigning Female Vulnerability

Dr. Warren Farrell in the Myth of Male Power[11] wrote that, "Men's greatest weakness is their facade of strength, and women's greatest strength is their facade of weakness." In our gynocentric culture it is often the case that female vulnerability and limitations are exaggerated and in some instances just made up, as a means to garner special treatment for women and girls. As mentioned, the feminist victim narrative is critical to their standard strategy of getting their agenda implemented. In sharp contrast, it is often the case in our gynocentric culture that male vulnerability and limitations are dismissed. So whilst I agree with Sydney that real limitations between men and women exist and that men helping women where these limitations is exist is not automatically a bad thing, we need to look at those limitations in an honest way and without the gynocentric glasses on. We should seriously look at male vulnerabilities and limitations as well and not just glaze over them.

We also need to take an honest look at how we react to those limitations of women and men and make sure we react in fair and balanced manner. For example, if we are going to lower physical entry standards for the military, then we should be basing that decision on solid evidence that it will make our military more lethal by allowing higher quality recruits to be retained. Furthermore, we should be applying those standards across every recruit and not just female recruits. If the reasoning for lowering entry standards is to increase the number of women serving in the military to appease feminists and win female votes at the expense of national security and such standards will be selectively applied to female recruits only, then we are not reacting honestly or fairly to the physical limitations of women.

Benevolent Sexism Doublethink

I discussed benevolent sexism in my earlier article on diagnosing gynocentrism and how we need to look at the intent that is driving the behaviour before we make claims men helping women is sexist against women or conversely that it is gynocentric. Indeed that was precisely the same point Sydney raised in her video discussing benevolent sexism. Using feminist logic, it can be successfully argued that numerous feminist initiatives where men are helping women, like White Ribbon, HeForShe and others, actually hurt women and are examples of benevolent sexism. It could even be argued that feminism itself is benevolent sexism. Such claims are clearly false obviously.

To claim men helping women is sexism against women, implies that the intent driving that behaviour is malicious and that such acts are done with the intent to harm women rather than help them. If that was indeed the case, then we would expect the attitude that such men express toward women would be negative and that their stated reasons behind their actions would betray a similar negative view of women and a clear intent to do them harm. Yet we do not see this, we see the opposite. Instead we often see such men talking about women (undeservingly I might add), as if they are some superior or special class of human being. We often see such men arguing women are kinder, gentler, morally superior or should rule the world etc. The goals or reasoning behind the actions of such men is often explicitly and emphatically stated to be to benefit women and not to harm them. Only someone that has a deep-seated mistrust and hatred of men, would assign negative motives in such a context and in light of these facts.

Benevolent sexism contradicts itself and is gynocentric doublethink. If it is sexism, then by definition it is not benevolent. Such terms exist because feminism cannot tolerate men being viewed in a positive light by society, if men are to accept their own exploitation. If men are doing things to benefit women, then that clearly runs against the feminist narrative of male oppression of women and against the feminist propaganda to instill perpetual guilt in men and boys. It is hard to demonise men and boys in the eyes of society, when they are trying to help the people they are accused by feminists of oppressing!

What Is Missing For Men

Sydney points out in her video that men are in a no-win scenario, where any action they take will lead to shaming and ostracism by feminists. I addressed this in my article on normalising gynocentrism[12], where I discussed learned helplessness in men. Feminism seeks to dehumanise men and encourage men to give up on themselves, so that gynocentric bigotry can be normalised in the culture and men will accept it. This is precisely why pleasing feminists and women in general, should not be the core priority of any man. You cannot win by kowtowing to feminists or women, you just make things worse for yourself and also worse for society by pandering to female entitlement. Living life in your own way, in an authentic manner, according to your own principles and forming your own identity and setting your own direction in life, is the only path left for men to take and that is a good thing. What I have just described is men going their own way (MGTOW)[13]. MGTOW is a good thing, because perhaps now men will finally start taking care of themselves, standing up for themselves in their relations with women and demanding fair treatment from society and from women and not just rolling over and allowing their own exploitation.

Sydney is correct that men need a purpose or something to do and I would argue this is also true for women. People need a direction in life to give it meaning. For much of human history men have been assigned their purpose by society, just as women have been. Only recently has society become technologically advanced enough and by extension prosperous and safe enough, for the sexes to have the opportunity to assign their own purpose based on individual interests (As Dr. Warren Farrell has pointed out, men were not the oppressor, the harsh environmental pressures on human survival for most of human history and prehistory was the oppressor). Everyone needs a direction in life and that is important for men in particular, because men get their primary sense of fulfillment from taking action, undertaking challenges and accomplishing things. Men need an outlet to actively express their natural masculine talents.

However men must be given the right as women have been given, to assign their own purpose and not be lectured to on what a “real man” is by women or by other men. Yes men have an innate tendency to protect and provide, but that does not translate to men having an innate tendency to be a disposable workhorse for women and society (I am not implying that is what Sydney meant, but often in this gynocentric culture those innate drives in men can be deliberately twisted to mean that).

It is not that men need to be needed either, it is deeper than that. This is about respect. Men need to be respected for what they do for themselves, for others and for society as a whole. That includes men being respected for what they do for women and reciprocal compassion, help, respect and generosity being shown toward men by the supposedly fairer female sex. The feminist message that men have been receiving for the last 50 years and in particular the last 20 years, is that there is nothing men do that is respectable and nothing that women should do for men in return for what men do for women. Masculinity is framed as toxic and as a disorder.

We live in a world where panels of women can have televised debates about whether or not the male half of the human race is obsolete and get support from the mostly female audience for the absurd claim men are obsolete. You can listen to Karen Straughan’s critique on that disgusting bigotry here[14]. Women can even write books, articles and be interviewed about such bigoted opinions and have such ideas promoted and celebrated by the mainstream media. Women can write hateful articles titled, “Why Can’t We Hate Men?”[15] and get it published in mainstream newspapers. Boys are now being told by society that the future is female[16] and are being indoctrinated to feel inferior because they are male. The list is endless. Imagine for a moment if this was happening to women and girls. Men and boys are not suffering from a purpose void. This is a void of respect. This society has no respect for men and boys. Masculinity is continuously attacked and men and boys are constantly demonised and disrespected, despite all the amazing things they do for women and society on a daily basis.

Men and boys are internalising the message that they are not worthy of respect and nothing they do or contribute is worthy of respect. The large drops we are seeing in boy’s academic achievement and motivation in education, the claim young men are failing to launch (which is really nowhere to land) and the male suicide epidemic etc, are all symptoms of the widespread reality men and boys are being starved of respect. Men going their own way is simply that and nothing more (despite what some disingenuous people claim, it has nothing to do with hating women). MGTOW are men taking a stand to value and respect themselves, in the face of a society that encourages them to hate themselves.

MGTOW is about going your own way in life, by having the self-respect to live life according to your own principles and identity and with no regard to what this hate filled society has to say about it. Men have the right to set their own direction and find their own purpose in life, pursue their own happiness and decide for themselves how to live their own lives. Men are going their own way in increasing numbers and it is about time! If gynocentric traditonalists, feminists or men or women want to complain about MGTOW choosing to avoid marriage and to a lesser extent relationships, then they might want to look at what they can do to make marriage and relationships less toxic and healthier for men.

Marriage is no longer marriage, it is a slave contract for men. That is what feminism has done to marriage. If you think I am being hyperbolic I am not. Just ask the tens of thousands of men in US prisons that cannot make alimony and child support payments to their ex-wives, because the alimony or child support that is set by the courts exceeds their actual income. Just ask the tens of thousands of fathers that kill themselves after being alienated from their children and losing everything from divorce. Here are just two disgusting examples linked here[17] and here[18], illustrating how perverted marriage has become. There are so many other stories that can be shared and I would encourage men to leave their story in the comments section below this article if they like. The institution of marriage is rotten to the core. The bias men experience in divorce and family court and during the course of marriage itself is systemic and deeply tipped against men.

We all know roughly half of marriages will end in divorce and that most divorces are initiated by women and it is little wonder why when the scales are tipped so heavily in women's favour. Whilst the nature of the misandry of marriage varies from country to country and from state to state, the common theme is one of male servitude to women and female entitlement. The sayings, "Happy Wife Happy Life" and "The Ball And Chain" did not emerge from nowhere. Marriage in the modern era is a gynocentric perversion of the original marital contract between the sexes, which feminists happily tore up and rewrote to unilaterally benefit women at the expense of men (no fault divorce, family courts, VAWA etc).

Relationships have gone down a similar path of gynocentric perversion of catering to female entitlement, which has been accelerated with the metoo movement. MGTOW is not the problem, the degradation of marriage and relationships is the problem. MGTOW is about choosing your own path in life and not kowtowing to what society or women demand men do with their own lives. Perhaps if marriage was reformed, relationships became more balanced and respect was shown again to men, fathers and masculinity, more MGTOW would freely choose to get married and have relationships on their own accord without social coercion and shaming.

Something tells me though that the gynocentric traditionalists and feminists will continue to double down and shame men for going their own way and daring to passively resist their own exploitation. Newsflash- These men stopped caring about what society thinks of what they should do with their own lives long ago and indeed for many of them the shaming was what drove them to discover MGTOW, or was the last straw that drove them to adopt a MGTOW pathway. MGTOW are the men that are prepared to say no to feminists and women, set boundaries with women, reject chivalry and stand up for themselves. They are the sort of men that can help bring about the end of feminism and that scares the shit out of the feminist mainstream media, because these men are not getting back in line and bowing their heads.

Society needs to get over its reluctance to honestly examine the actual reasons why MGTOW are avoiding marriage and relationships. Society needs to start making serious efforts to correct the numerous systemic imbalances and double standards that feminism has enshrined into our legal system and culture and address the pervasive culture of female entitlement. Until that happens, shaming MGTOW will just help increase the social phenomenon and contribute to its growth. MGTOW is now the only pathway for men to follow. Once men become aware there is no way to please women and society by pandering to female entitlement, they go red pill and then MGTOW in rapid succession.

Like I said, society has a void for respect for men and boys. Men walking away from a gynocentric society that hates them and disrespects them at every turn, is that predictable even a six-year-old could have told us this would be the result 20 years ago. This has nothing to do with men wanting women back in the kitchen or under the thumb of men and everything to do with respecting men and restoring fairness and reciprocity to the social contract between the sexes.

This gynocentric society will reap what it has sown until the imbalance between the sexes is corrected and society is prepared to confront the elephant in the room- its own gynocentrism.

References:

[1] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Un09DRXZt2U

[2] https://gynocentrism.com/2013/07/14/the-birth-of-chivalric-love/

[3] https://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/rita-panahi/equality-is-essential-but-so-is-chivalry/news-story/8bbcfae72c86ea6325818377b7ff3990

[4] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2F0kNTMSTKU

[5] https://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/news/opinion/miranda-devine-women-believe-they-live-in-the-age-of-entitlement/news-story/e4a1b901c0e55baa2517887ff8bbb072

[6] https://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-6216015/New-study-finds-boys-report-physical-violence-girls-young-peoples-relationships.html

[7] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SUZXLUaICH8

[8] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zxSTwlOz4P4

[9] https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/why-is-it-always-about-her-gynocentrism-as-a-narcissistic-pathology/

[10] https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/diagnosing-gynocentrism/

[11] https://www.amazon.com.au/Myth-Male-Power-Warren-Farrell-ebook/dp/B076HVLZGH

[12] https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/the-normalisation-of-gynocentrism/

[13] https://www.mgtow.com/

[14] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gaO3THnOHhA

[15] https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/why-cant-we-hate-men/2018/06/08/f1a3a8e0-6451-11e8-a69c-b944de66d9e7_story.html?noredirect=on&utm_term=.534074468575

[16] https://www.psychologytoday.com/au/blog/real-men-dont-write-blogs/201703/memo-our-sons-and-grandsons-the-future-is-female?page=1

[17] https://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/i-am-chris-mackney-and-i-have-something-to-say-from-the-grave/

[18] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=WAs8S0LxNRE

Mattress girl saga a warning to unis on sexual assault cases

Bettina Arndt · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Last week the long saga over the Columbia University mattress girl came to an end. It was a costly lesson for the New York university and a sign that buying into the notion of a "campus rape culture" can prove a big mistake for esteemed centres of higher learning. Australian universities take note.

In 2015 the mattress girl, Emma Sulkowicz, became a global celebrity by turning what was found to be a false rape allegation into performance art by carrying her mattress with her everywhere on campus. She was protesting against Columbia's decision not to take action against a young German student, Paul Nungesser, whom she'd accused of choking and anally raping her.

Columbia has now reached a confidential settlement with Nungesser following his lawsuit claiming the university supported "an outrageous display of harassment and defamation" by allowing Sulkowicz for three years to use her mattress to hold campus protests where people openly called him a rapist. Sulkowicz was given academic credit for the performance as part of her visual arts major and was allowed to carry the mattress in her graduation ceremony.

It's most unlikely any jury would have convicted Nungesser given the facts of the case. There's a Facebook message from Sulkowicz to Nungesser two days after the alleged rape saying she was keen to join in a party in his room. A month later she sought more contact: "I want to see youyououoyou". The following month she messaged: "I love you Paul. Where are you?" Hardly surprising that the university's investigation found Nungesser not guilty of -assault.

Similarly murky facts emerged in accusations made by two other women about Nungesser. Investigations were held. The man was found not guilty.

Yet the university chose to pander to extremists who believed the accuser was always right by allowing the mattress pantomime to continue for three whole years. Columbia is rightly out of pocket and forced to grovel, promising to update its policies to ensure "every student — accuser and accused, including those like Paul who are found not responsible — is treated respectfully".

Universities across the US are being sued for their failure to offer basic legal protections for the many young men who are being accused of such crimes on college campuses. False accusations in the quasi-judicial campus tribunals, forced on the universities by the Obama administration, have led to endless Federal Court lawsuits against the universities, which have lost most cases involving students, 53 cases to 37, according to Brooklyn College history professor KC Johnson, co-author of The Campus Rape Frenzy: The Attack on Due Process at America's Universities. Many colleges pay out six-figure settlements, says Johnson, who is monitoring the 170 similar cases working their way through the court system.

[image]
Students demonstrate at Columbia University.
Many in the US university system are having second thoughts about their adoption of the rape culture narrative that even may have encouraged false accusations. Suddenly they find themselves on the wrong side of the political debate as US President Donald Trump has promised to wind back the tribunal system because it lacks due process.

With women already comprising almost 60 per cent of student graduates, many are concerned males will be discouraged even further from entering university.

"American universities have allowed feminist ideologues to set up such a strong anti-male environment that it is hardly surprising that many young men are now reluctant to put themselves at risk," says Janice Fiamengo, a University of Ottawa English professor who has long been speaking out about the feminist takeover of the US university system.

She's soon to publish a book, Sons of Feminism, documenting the nightmare of false allegations, covert aggression and hostility young men face on campuses, particularly males who don't fit readily into the prevailing culture.

"Men seen as outsiders, nerdy, shy young men who don't relate easily to women are quickly branded 'creepy' and are particularly at risk of false allegations," says Fiamengo.

In March a federal judge in Massachusetts ruled against Amherst College following legal action against the university by a young Chinese student, Michael Cheng, who was wrongly accused of sexual assault two years after a female performed oral sex on him when he was passed out drunk.

That's just one of many cases involving international students. In 2014 Colgate College in New York reported half of all students expelled for sexual misconduct were international students, yet these young men comprised only 6 per cent of the student body.

The vulnerability of young men who may be culturally less familiar with the prevailing social language should have Australian university administrations worried. Our cash-strapped university system are dependent on full fees paid by overseas students so it is natural that administrators quake at the knees at any threat to that lucrative market.

Remember all those vice-chancellors who went scurrying over to India to reassure potential students when racist attacks on Indian students in Melbourne hit the headlines? Pandering to feminist ideologues propagating scare stories will risk the reputation of Australian universities as a safe place for international students. Why would affluent families in India, China or Malaysia consider sending their daughters to study at such campuses, let alone their sons?

Next week we'll see the release of a million-dollar Australian Human Rights Commission survey, funded mainly by the university commission, an exercise in advocacy research, where stories of "survivors" will be used to illustrate the survey results.

Statistics pertaining to rape on campus will include behaviours such as staring and sexy comments, which will artificially inflate the statistics. Survey responders were self-selected and include those who were not students at the time of the alleged event. Universities are falling over each other already in responding to the anticipated frightening statistics, setting up a 24-hour hotline for rape survivors, sexual assault counsellors and compulsory sexual consent training for staff and students.

We are also seeing the first moves towards on-campus adjudication of such cases.

The US campus "rape frenzy" started with a survey showing one in four female students were sexually assaulted. Numerous books and articles have since shown the survey in question was totally flawed.

A 2014 Bureau of Justice Statistics survey revealed about one in 40 US college students had been victims of rape or sexual assault and the rate had dropped by more than 50 per cent since 1997.

Next, the movie The Hunting Ground was shown on US campuses, which amplified the scare campaign. The movie was denounced by 11 Harvard law professors as "biased propaganda" for its misleading presentation of key campus rape cases in which the accused males later were exonerated in criminal courts. Its own producers have acknowledged the spin in the movie, saying it was intended as an exercise in "advocacy for victims".

[image]
A still from the The Hunting Ground, which Harvard University law professors have described as 'biased propaganda'.

We've had our own dubious survey, from the National Union of Students, claiming 73 per cent of female students in Australia say they have experienced some form of sexual assault, harassment or unwanted sexual experience.

And here, too, The Hunting Ground has been shown on campuses across the country as well as on the ABC. Hunting Ground Australia, the local organisation promoting the movie, provided $150,000 in seed funding for the HRCA survey. It boasts on its website that University of Sydney vice-chancellor Michael Spence was part of a group that included former sex discrimination commissioner Elizabeth Broderick and worked to orchestrate university screenings.

Australian universities seem to be engaged in a virtue-signalling contest to show they are all on board and have announced they expect a flood of “victims” to come forth following the AHRC findings. Next we’ll see pressure for the universities to deal with these cases themselves rather than rely on the criminal justice system to handle them. That’s the whole point: feminists don’t believe the police and the courts can handle these cases because not enough men are convicted.

Last week, The Chicago Tribune published an editorial entitled “Campus Rape? Call the police”. It made the simple point that criminal law systems — civil authorities with no agenda to protect a university’s reputation or to short-change an alleged victim or perpetrator — are best suited to mete out justice.

That’s obviously true. Yet we find that in these “he says, she says” sexual consent cases involving alcohol-fuelled young men and women it is rare that juries convict young men, especially if there’s a stream of text messages showing she was still keen on him after the alleged rape.

Margaret Cunneen SC is one of NSW’s most senior crown prosecutors, best known for securing convictions in the Bilal Skaf-led gang rape cases in Sydney. She believes juries usually make sound decisions when they convict or decline to convict in date rape cases.

“Juries won’t find an accused man guilty in situations where the evidence discloses substantial gaps in a complainant’s memory during which consent may well have been conveyed,” she says. “It is a fundamental human right that a person accused of a crime, especially one as serious as sexual assault, can only be found guilty upon proof beyond reasonable doubt.”

Cunneen takes issue with the view being promoted by the campus rape campaigners that sexual activity between two intoxicated young people must invariably be regarded as assault on the woman and totally the man’s responsibility, as is apparently being taught in compulsory sexual consent courses being established on most Australian campuses.

A 2015 study published in The New England Journal of Medicine found teaching women to recognise dangerous situations and resist sexual coercion reduces the incidence of date rapes by almost 50 per cent. The study’s author, University of Windsor psychologist Charlene Senn, said her program “increased women’s ability to detect and interrupt men’s behaviour at an early stage”, hence avoiding the prolonged pressure that can result in sexual assault. Naturally any notion of female agency is totally lacking from our campuses’ feminist-driven consent courses.

According to the police reports collected by the NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics, university campuses are about 100 times safer than the rest of the community. There were 14 campus sexual assault reports to police between 2012 and last year compared with 24,498 across the state. So comparing NSW university populations (students and staff) with total numbers in the state, this means people are 108 times likelier to be sexually assaulted across NSW than on one of the state’s university campuses.

National data is not available but there seems no reason states would show much variation.

Cunneen says this data is readily available yet the campus rape campaigners are determined to play down official statistics by claiming students are reluctant to report sexual assault to the police.

“While it is certainly true that prosecuting authorities and the courts, in the past, have not always dealt with these cases properly, now the entire criminal justice system is geared towards giving young complainants a compassionate and complete hearing,” she says. “Why would highly educated, confident and privileged young women be less inclined to report sexual assault than women elsewhere? It doesn’t make sense.”

She’s concerned that the AHRC and our universities are participating in a deliberate effort to beat up the risk to young women on campuses by conflating the real incidence of rape or sexual assault with issues such as harassment, an unwanted stare, a sexual joke.

“These things may in certain circumstances be confronting to a young woman but they do not constitute the serious crime of sexual assault,” she says.

Cunneen believes it is not in our universities’ interest to take on the burden of adjudicating such cases, as happened in the US with such damaging results to the colleges’ reputations and budgets. “Even worse, it risks stripping citizens of the fundamental protections to which we are all entitled under the rule of law,” she says.

Yet already we see moves in that direction. RMIT University has proudly announced a system of “restorative justice” for rape victims that is expected to come forth in the following weeks.

Normally, restorative justice programs bring together victims with perpetrators who have acknowledged their guilt but RMIT is not intending to involve the accused in the conciliation process but, rather, will make “some assessment of whether the allegation was plausible” before allowing victims to give voice to their experience of abuse and its impacts, according to Rob Hulls, director of the program.

And what of the accused young men? Says Fiamengo: “Even if these events are held in private, people talk. Imagine what it’s like for a young man to discover his name is being blackened. Many young men emerge deeply scarred from being accused of such serious crimes without being given the opportunity to defend themselves.”

But that’s exactly what the campaigners are seeking.

Nina Funnell, a key figure in End Rape on Campus Australia, a lobby group promoting the campus rape campaign, makes it clear the goal is a “formal compliance mechanism” for sexual assault victims. Last week she wrote on the news.com.au website of the need for universities to “discipline offenders (including staff who have raped students)”.

Some of Fiamengo’s powerful video blogs, The Fiamengo Files, document the risks to due process: “The resulting system of kangaroo courts is outrageously tilted in the accuser’s favour with a far lower standard of proof than in the criminal system, the accused often not given details of accusations or allowed a lawyer or permitted to cross-examine his accuser, or able to provide evidence from email and text messages sent before or after the alleged encounter. It’s a shocking abuse of power.”

George Washington University law school professor John Banzhaf estimates the tribunal system is costing US universities more than $US700 million ($880m) a year, plus substantial costs from legal cases.

Office of Civil Rights data shows across a five-year period the number of sex-related complaints increased sixfold, from 391 in 2010 to 2354 in 2014. This month campus administrators have been meeting Trump officials complaining they cannot afford to maintain this costly exercise.

And still the feminist campaigners are not satisfied. Although accused students are likeliest to sue universities, - almost a quarter of the most recent cases were alleged victims who felt they weren’t given a fair hearing, according to Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, which monitors all such cases.

This month feminists have been meeting with Trump’s people complaining the system doesn’t go far enough in supporting victims.

Last week we saw campus “rape survivors” demonstrating outside federal parliament, claiming there was an epidemic of rape on Australian campuses and carrying mattresses to make their point.

Whoops, not such a smart move after Columbia University received its costly rap over the knuckles for pandering to its mattress girl.

There’s no better example of the risks our university system is taking in playing to the hands of insatiable extremists.

Nihilism and Beyond for the Zeta Male

Andy Thomas · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Foreword

This essay originates, in part, from an AVfM article by Jewel Eldora and a discussion in its comment section [1]. The theme of Eldora's article is that men do not have a mechanism for "in-group bias" and, as such, men as a group are "idiots".

You may have realised yourself, for example, that whereas women have no compunction about using the word "we" to refer to all women or women in general, men only ever refer to other men as "men", and never "we". This seems to be as true in the MRM as it is in the wider world.

While I appreciated that men do not self-identify as a group, I originally took issue with Eldora's assertion that men are idiots. For me, however, the focus of interest was not just the article itself but a discussion in the comments section with two posters, "JackABond" and "Factsseeker", on the wider question of what it all means for guys like us — men who regard themselves as MGTOW or Zeta Male [2]. I began by disagreeing somewhat with JackABond, but later came to appreciate his comments. In fact, both Eldora and JackABond caused me to re-evaluate my own beliefs and this essay is the result. I'd like to thank them both.

Jewel Eldora was dead right, of course.

We, as a group, are fools who are partly to blame for the sea of prejudice we now find ourselves swimming in. This article is not going to be a form of self-flagellation however, but an exercise in self-empowerment.

A Question of Sanity

For some time, I've been pondering a question. It is this:

If we accept that the cultural changes we are witnessing with regard the family and our place in society are not, as some may assume, a straightforward result of feminism, but are in fact part of some natural process of creative destruction and are unstoppable, then what is there to prevent us from succumbing to nihilism when we face what this may mean*?*

Why on earth would I suggest that the cultural changes of recent decades are part of some natural process or cycle? This seems a strange thing to say. Why can't we simply attribute the changes to a bunch of crackpot feminists who had a lucky break somewhere between the 1960s and 1980s? Surely, this would be the simpler and more logical explanation of events?

Perhaps many of us thought, as I once did, that once all the prejudices and disadvantages faced by men are explained in a rational way, people will wake up and realise the truth. Sanity must return.

In the end, I had to realise the truth myself — that no one cares and no matter how earnestly the case is presented, the majority of people never ever will.

Something much deeper has always been at play behind the scenes.

A Natural Process

The Industrial Revolution of the 1800s was never simply about manufacturing. It had massive social implications, not only because it took people out of the countryside and put them into the city, but because it took men out of the family and put us into the factory.

The way of life for many craftsfolk were wiped out over a generation or so. The things in their lives which held value for them were lost.

Few, indeed, would have foresaw the true implications ushered in by the industrial age for what they were at the time. And just what could anyone have done at the time to hold back such a tide? Moreover, assuming you agree that the quality of human life in the developed world today is, on balance, better than that of medieval times, should anyone have tried?

The rise of feminism would never have been possible without the Industrial Revolution and the dividends it brought to women during the 20th century, namely the availability of food, labour saving devices in the home, healthcare and the pill. For us, however, it brought mechanical slaughter on the battlefield as well as our increased productivity in the factory without actually granting us the freedom from it. Is it any wonder that as women became free to cast off traditional perspectives of womanhood, we were still shackled to outdated notions of chivalry?

> In working class communities — notably in steel-making and coal mining areas — the husband handed over his pay packet to his wife for her to have full control over. Steve Moxon.

With hindsight, profound social upheaval with regard to traditional gender roles was always inevitable. What's more, I posit that technological development is a natural and unstoppable process rather than anything we can actually control. Human beings are part of the Universe, not separate from it, and what we do and build is part of its nature.

Rather than the driver of change, feminism is a disease of affluence — a parasite — which has infected other movements and domains of influence by exploiting our biological instincts. The areas of domestic violence [3], the gay rights movement [4] and academia [5] have all succumbed to and been re-purposed to serve a feminist agenda. Feminism is currently sweeping into politics and business while chivalrous men cannot step aside quickly enough. Today, feminist ideologues walk the corridors of power while the media obsesses over false rape panics.

Nevertheless, feminism was never the true harbinger of change. It does not deserve such credit.

No Sanctuary

I was raised in a working class traditionalist culture. As such, I was crippled with an extremely naive perspective on gender and my place in society, namely: a. chivalry was synonymous with virtue, b. that women, at least those of sexual interest to me, were somehow purer in nature than men, and c. women must be taken care of no matter what. That was about the sum total of such things.

It was what just felt right.

No wonder, years later, I felt so dirty and ashamed to find myself looking at deplorable websites such as A Voice for Men. I felt like I was addicted to porn — I was so afraid that I would be found out but just couldn't stop myself from reading the stuff. Looking back, it was if what I need was a woman's permission to think for myself. Karen Straughan, aka Girl Writes What, gave me that permission [6].

My reading list of the time included Steve Moxon's The Woman Racket and Esther Villar's The Manipulated Man. Such cultural shockers as these can be just too much to take for us poor fools still anchored in traditionalism. Moreover, I was also dealing with an awful lot of tragedy and trauma back then. In fact, I would suspect this is what typically brings most of us into the MRM.

As my value system and emotional framework collapsed, everything that I held true, righteous and worthwhile became a sickening lie. It made me ill in the end, and there seemed nothing left to do except to watch, with a strange detachment, as my soul seemed to leak away into the vacuum of space.

Nietzsche wrote, "if you gaze long into an abyss, the abyss also gazes into you." [7]

He knew what he was talking about.

It is not surprising that so many of us cling so forlornly to the mental image of a pendulum swinging back and forth through time. At some point, the pendulum must surely swing back to a time, the 1950s perhaps, of traditional bliss prior to mainstream feminism. Such times were hard in ways, yes perhaps, but at least it could be said that life was "real" in the past.

I'm not the only one to romanticise about the 1950s. Shelagh Delaney, the British playwright, focused extensively on 1950s working class culture in her work. She knew it was dying back then [8], before the age of mainstream feminism. So what killed it?

And there begs a question: why the 1950s? Why this time?

Well, if it were any later we'd be into the era of mainstream feminism. But, as it was pointed out to me recently, why don't we romanticise about, say, 1939? Or perhaps 1914? Or perhaps earlier? How about the mid-1600s, the English Civil War, in which one in ten of the adult male population died?

While feminism may one day fall out of fashion, we must come to terms with the realisation that the world will have been irrevocably changed, and we can be certain that children growing up in 2050 will have profoundly different social perspectives than those of one hundred years earlier.

Given that biological reality, not patriarchy, dictated the gender roles of the past, it is tempting to argue that out of sheer necessity, at some point, the pendulum must swing back to some form of traditionalism nevertheless. If birth rates continue to fall, we may say, surely it would mean the end of human society?

The problem of falling birth rates in western nations has been "solved" in the short term, at least as far as capitalism is concerned, with migration from underdeveloped countries. In the longer term, technological solutions to the problem of reproduction can be employed when such things become necessary. This may not bode well for human happiness and well-being, but that in itself will not prevent such things.

There is not a shred of scientific evidence that the Universe operates on the principle of a swinging pendulum. There is no sanctuary in the past.

I had known in my heart that, for me, there would be no going back in any case. I had known this from quite early on and I can pinpoint the hour. It was the moment I internalised the fact that politically powerful women, such as Harriet Harman, had deemed men like my father were no longer to have a valid place in the family [9]. This was when I grasped that, despite all my chivalrous virtue, society revered a subset of ideologically motivated women who actively sought my subjugation and, ultimately, the destruction of my kind.

For me, everything changed that day.

> I want to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig. Andrea Dworkin
>
> If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males. Mary Daly

Such things are not forgivable. There should be no going back.

A Cupful of Meaning

Just what is it that makes life meaningful? And, conversely, what makes it meaningless? I've been thinking a lot about this lately. I know that I'm not the first to ponder on such things.

I recall an episode of The Twilight Zone which was loosely based, I suspect, on the 1950 film Sunset Boulevard. Both feature an ageing has-been movie star who desperately longs to return to the golden era of film and that of her youth. In the movie version she fails in her quest, but in the The Twilight Zone, by force of will and an adequate supply of gin, she somehow succeeds [10].

In recent years, I too have yearned over mementos of my youth — a paw print left in the cement by the dog of my childhood, the bar where I first saw the girl whom I loved for so long, and the working club I used to frequent with my dad as a young man. Like the faded film star, I have so longed to go back to, relive and stay in the past.

Unfortunately, my own reality was closer to the movie version of things rather than that of The Twilight Zone. Force of will proved insufficient to truly relive the past in any meaningful way, but why was this so?

Why couldn't I extract some essence of the past simply by revisiting and touching the very same walls, cement, ground and furniture that were present in youth? Why, when I reached back to touch these things, nothing remained of the past save the ghost of a memory?

I knew, of course, the answer. It was because the people were gone.

In a metaphysical sense, interaction is necessary to derive meaning from existence. This Universe ascribes meaning, on all scales, from the interaction of things rather than the stuff of things. On an atomic scale, it is difficult to detect particles when they interact only weakly with other particles and, consequently, it is hard for us to know they are there. In the limiting case, something which does not interact in anyway with anything, simply put as a statement of the obvious, can have no existence.

On the human scale, a man who retreats from the world by ceasing to engage with others will become invisible. As his domain of influence shrinks to that of his living room, his life will lose meaning as he fails to create new interactions. Many men "exist" like this and, as far as much of the world is concerned, they do not. In fact, when men like this die, their corpses often remain undiscovered for months and no one cares.

Now, bear with me here as I switch gear and ask that you engage in a thought experiment for a moment. As I type, I am reaching for a mug of coffee. What I am holding in my left hand is a mug — a cup — a drinking vessel. Surely a ridiculously banal statement! But what if, we suppose for a moment, all humans are to be wiped out later today due to some biological weapon or dreadful disease? What then?

With an empty planet, with no human left to drink from any kind of vessel ever again, what would the object left on my desk actually be? Would it still have any existence as a cup? Or would it lose all such meaning and become something else? Something less?

Would my desk still be a desk, or would it be no more than a pile of wood? Likewise, with all humanity dead and gone, would a painting left hanging in my local art gallery still have any aesthetic value? Would the paint on it still depict a face? Or would it be no more than a meaningless smear on a canvas?

Is not the action of drinking necessary to define the purpose of a cup? Is not the action of sitting at a desk necessary to define its very essence? Does not a work of art require a beholder for it to be a work of art?

These objects will continue to exist physically in a world suddenly deprived of people because they will continue to interact on other levels in the Universe. However, they will lose the meaning that was generated through our interaction with them — they will exist but as something less than they were.

So what of us disposable men who are no longer deemed to have a valid role in society?

What meaning is left for us? Do we need women to behold us in order to retain the very essence of what it means to be a man? Are we still men or are we to become something less?

Or perhaps, through a new reality, could we become something more?

God is Dead?

Zeta males are not men who refuse all relations with women. Rather, we refuse to be anchored in the dominance hierarchy and, thus, we reject the traditional roles of alpha, beta and omega. To be anchored in the traditionalist value system is to look to women to ascribe meaning and purpose for us which, in the modern age, no longer serves us or humanity.

But if we do not anchor ourselves in the prevailing culture, just what do we anchor ourselves to? In a world without any solid ground, how can we not be overwhelmed by the sense of being lost at sea?

Such a question brings us back to where we started — the question of nihilism.

Writing in the 1800s, Friedrich Nietzsche recognised that science and enlightenment were profoundly transforming humanity's understanding of the Universe. Without a universal perspective in the form traditional belief system, without an anchor, he believed social collapse inevitable.

"God is dead. God remains dead. And we have killed him," he proclaimed in The Gay Science in 1882. In Thus Spoke Zarathustra, he offers us an alternative to the nihilistic abandonment of all moral values in a vision he referred to as the Übermensch, or the "Beyond-Man".

During the mid-twentieth century, the ideological left smeared Nietzsche as a fascist. They were aided in this, undoubtedly, by Nietzsche's delinquent sister who, living into the 1930s, falsified parts of his work to suit the aims of the early Nazi party. Nietzsche, however, was no nationalist and his vision of the Übermensch, originating in the 1880s, had nothing to do with race.

Put simply, the Übermensch were human beings who would have the ability to go beyond nihilism and find new meaning in existence after the collapse of religious belief. They were a vision of humanity's grown up descendants and, as such, were to be anchored in concepts of this Universe rather than in notions of divine miracles and holy supernaturalism.

If you are noticing that I seem to use the word "Universe" a lot, I can assure you that it's quite deliberate. The reason is that I do not entirely subscribe to Nietzsche's nineteenth century assertion that God is dead.

Perhaps, just perhaps, there is another way to look at things.

Some years ago, I faced the realisation that I would be destroyed if I refused to be anchored in some form of axiomatic belief system that was not centred on myself. So I chose to believe in one that made sense to me and, being a student of physics, it was this:

Modern science offers the prospect that the Universe not only creates order from chaos, but has a built-in propensity to bring into being novel and dynamic — the word is living — things [11]. Now, I'm not claiming any absolute or revolutionary truth here. Rather, it was necessary to anchor myself in a belief that there is rhyme and reason to the process of creation and destruction that this Universe exhibits, and of which we are all part.

> We are a way for the Cosmos to know itself. Carl Sagan

For Nietzsche, the science of his age killed God. For me, the science of my own time does not kill God, but re-invents it. The terms "God" and "Universe" are synonymous [12]! I need neither proof nor a holy miracle for this to work because, at this axiomatic level, it simply makes sense to choose to believe. I once never thought I would say such a thing, but I guess this is what it means to have faith.

Now, I've been somewhat careful here to explain what it is that I believe, and not what you should believe. I have no wish to be some kind of preacher on this. Nevertheless, I am trying communicate an important point — it is vital for our psychological health to be anchored somewhere and somehow, so that in times of strife, we do not lose ourselves at sea. We cannot anchor ourselves in human affairs because such things are shifting sands and human beings are fallible. At some point, our trust will always be betrayed and the rug pulled from under our feet.

That is why I choose an axiomatic interpretation of God, one in which I accept the Universe as it is, and not as the way I think it should be.

With such a definition, and by definition, the Universe can never let me down.

The Beyond

I propose that we take inspiration from Nietzsche's work and seek to go beyond the prevailing culture using whatever tools we have available to us. We should not go back even if we could. We should push through into new territory and discover new realms.

Isn't this what men are made to do?

For too long, we have languished in a culture that has shamed and denigrated us. It is time now to find affirmation in ourselves. In the industrial age, we surrendered our independence and ability to think for ourselves to women. In this modern age, we must take these things back.

In rejecting the prevailing culture, however, we must never accept isolation as an alternative. When we isolate, we cease engaging with the world, and the world simply discards us because we no longer exist for it.

Therefore, we must prioritise making connections and friends amongst ourselves and we must do so without regard to women. If we keep women on their pedestal by continuing to look to them for meaning in life, we allow women to continue to make everything about themselves. In the new age, women must get off their pedestal and embrace equality, not in terms of rights, but in terms of responsibility.

For traditionalist men to deny women responsibility was always to deny them their full humanity. Feminists, in this way at least, actually had a point.

It is possibly true that, for reasons of biology, men have throughout history competed with each other for access to women. We should not surrender ourselves to such dogmatic notions of biology, however, but we should seek to go beyond it.

Whereas nature allows women to readily find solidarity amongst themselves, we have qualities they typically lack — the capacity for abstract thought, outward looking perspectives, resourcefulness and adaptability. Our working assumption must be that we are biologically adaptable, and not that biology means our nature is fixed.

Now, women readily use the word "we" to refer to each other in their use of language and this is something we can take for ourselves. I propose that in order to foster a culture of self-identification, we men should intentionally adopt the word "we" to refer to all men and to men in general. We should make a deliberate effort to begin to use this language in all walks of life!

White knights who object be damned!

Feminists destroyed meaning in life for so many through their selfishly cruel attempts to deconstruct the family and wider culture. We should create new meaning by building our own culture. This Universe brought us into existence because it has purpose for us. We are creatures of this Universe and we belong to it. We should embrace its cycle of destructive creation in order to go beyond and become something more than we currently are.

This should be our purpose.

References

[1] Jewel Eldora. Scott Adams, Tucker Carlson, and the automatic out-group derogation of men. Link: https://www.avoiceformen.com/men/mens-issues/scott-adams-tucker-carlson-and-the-automatic-outgroup-derogation-of-men/

[2a] Peter Wright. Bye bye Alpha Male, and hello Zeta Male! Link: https://www.avoiceformen.com/sexual-politics/bye-bye-alpha-male-and-hello-zeta-male/

[2b] I am a Zeta Male. Link: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=040K1lolcIs

[3] Erin Pizzey. This Way to the Revolution.

[4] Mathew Lye. The New Gay Liberation: Escaping the Fag End of Feminism.

[5] Christina Hoff Sommers. The War Against Boys: How Misguided Feminism Is Harming Our Young Men.

[6] I am Girl Writes What. Link: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=h97RsyEAPk0

[7] Friedrich Nietzsche. Beyond Good and Evil.

[8] Shelagh Delaney's Salford. Ken Russell, BBC. From The Monitor No. 56, 25th September 1960. Link: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iXmMsOBrx9g

[9] Harriet Harman, Anna Coote and Patricia Hewitt. The Family Way, The Institute for Public Policy Research (IPPR). 1990. Link: https://hitchensblog.mailonsunday.co.uk/2014/04/why-ideas-matter.html

[10] The Sixteen Millimeter Shrine, The Twilight Zone, S01E04.

[11] I am referring to chaos theory and, in particular, the mathematical concept of complexity. For introduction, Wikipedia is as good as a place as any. See also: Emergence: from Chaos to Order, John H. Holland.

[12] I believe the word for this is "pantheism". See: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pantheism

Dogs: setting the bar for humans for 30,000 years

Paul Elam · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

"A dog is the only thing on earth that loves you more than he loves himself." ~ Josh Billings

Recently I saw a tweet by MRA Dan Perrins. It contained a video he made of his new dog, Charger. Dan and Charger were visiting the grave of Jeb, Dan's longtime canine companion who passed away a year ago last week. I had the pleasure of going to Dan's home and meeting Jeb. The bond between them was obvious and absolute, eclipsing, as it often does with dogs, the visible connection between most human beings. And when he died, Dan was devastated.

> I'm not crying, your crying.
> Gotta love the poochers.
> Charger & Jeb both incredible animals. pic.twitter.com/6OO9kuBtv0
>
> — Dan Perrins (@BlackBeard20096) April 10, 2017

I am no stranger to the bond, or to the pain. I have had dogs most of my life and suppose that I will till it is my turn to leave the land of the living. In each of them I have found a friend, and an example of what humanity should look like, but usually doesn't.

Back in April of 2013, I had the task of saying farewell to Rocky, a faithful mate of 11 all-too-short years.

All of this, remembering Dan's loss, enjoying the fact that he has a new companion, thinking about Rocky and my other canine friends, past and present, reminds me of just how important dogs can be to mental health, and yes, especially for men. As the coined phrases go, diamonds are a girl's best friend. For men, its dogs.

No doubt, we got the better deal.

That fact is something so well known, so universal, that it is difficult to talk about it without resorting to cliché. The reputation of the dog as fiercely loyal and unconditionally loving has been woven directly and indelibly into the human story. There are some different theories on how and when this bond came to be. In fact, there are scholars as we speak engaged in a dogfight with each other over whether there were two geographically separated incidences of domestication in our history that eventually merged, or just one.

Whatever is revealed when and if that dust settles, some things about our history with dogs are generally agreed upon. A long time ago, some 20 or 30 thousand years, a small number of gray wolves found humans willing to share scraps of food from their animal kills. These wolves, which were genetically less predisposed to being fearful and nervous than others in their pack, came to see humans as a food source. That magic spark of a moment, when a wolf stepped forward bravely to take food from the hand of a human, triggered a watershed moment in human history, and in what would become the history of dogs.

From that point forward our futures were irrevocably bound together. We fed and cared for them, they protected our homes and our lives and became our partners in hunting. In exchange for our scraps, they remained at our side, tirelessly alert for food or danger. Dogs were the first animal domesticated by humans. They preceded cats and livestock by a long shot. They were guarding our homes even before we cultivated crops like rice.

And, as the wolves who formed an alliance with humans flourished, the process of evolution took over. The wolves began to change, both physically and in disposition. They became more docile and less threatening. Their fangs shortened and their paws got smaller. They quit hunting in packs and adapted to humans being their providers of nutrition.

Something else happened that is quite remarkable. Their external features changed drastically. Their snouts became shorter and their coats more varied in color. Their eyes became more rounded and larger. Their fangs shortened. Larger eyes, more symmetric, less intimidating features. In other words, dogs got cuter. And they found, as one would predict, that the more appealing they were physically, the more prone we were to taking care of them.

We have another word for this that comes up in the men's mental health movement on occasion. Neoteny. As the features of dogs became more neotenic, more childlike, we became more attracted to them, just as we are with human females. So, in short, we take care of dogs driven by the same fundamental instinct that drives us to take care of women.

Unlike a lot of women, though, dogs are much more predictably prone to take care of us. One of the skill sets that emerged in dogs that is not present in other species, including other primates, is the ability to read complexities on the human face, to judge our emotional state. To, in a sense, even judge human character.

For example, when humans study each other's faces, our eyes tend to wander left, to the right-hand side of the face of the person we are studying. This is called a "left gaze bias," with the theory being that the right side of the human face is more likely to convey the emotional state of the subject.

And we don't demonstrate left gaze bias when looking at anything other than human faces. It is reserved strictly for assessing the psychological and emotional state of other people. It is no doubt a tool in assessing potential threats. No other species on earth exhibits this left gaze bias…. except dogs. They have evolved not just to recognize us as a food source, but to know how we are feeling, to respond to us on an emotional level.

And this is where it becomes difficult to assess dogs as a mental health asset without devolving into a schmaltzy, taster's choice moment commentary about man's best friend. Like I said, I have dogs, have nearly always had dogs, and will always have them. I can't imagine life without them. But rather than gush aimlessly about my love of all things canine, let me share with you some scientific information that points empirically to one inescapable fact.

Dogs are good for you.

Research shows that when you pet a dog, your blood pressure goes down. So does the dog's, by the way. So yes, you are good for your canine friend, too. Your pulse will lower just from talking to your dog. When you make physical contact with your dog, oxytocin, a bonding hormone that also assists with weight loss, is released. It not only lowers your blood pressure and decreases stress, but it combats depression and boosts immunities. Research shows that even making eye contact with your dog releases oxytocin. Dog owners are likely to get more exercise, which reduces the probability of heart disease.

All that is reason enough to consider a four-legged comrade as a part of better mental and physical health. There are other factors that make dogs, especially for red-pill men, a lifestyle winner. Some of the side effects of a red pill awakening are less than appealing. There is the isolation of living in a world where 99 out of 100 people, to be generous, will think ill of you and judge you harshly, if you dare to say what you really think or feel.

There is the fickleness, caprice and hypergamy of women, which you will likely avoid commensurate with your dosage of red pills. And that isolation occurs with other men as well. It is risky and largely unappealing to connect with white knights and gynocentric clones once you establish how brainwashed they are and how untrustworthy they are as friends. There is nothing more off-putting to red pill men than blue pill men who will sell their brothers out at the drop of a skirt.

While dogs can't make the whole world magically change into a better place, they can really make your corner of it a lot more tolerable. Why? Because dogs can reliably provide something in painfully short supply for men. Actual loyalty and unconditional acceptance. They don't care what your ex or your boss thinks of you, and for that matter, they could really give a flip about the rest of the world.

For a daily feeding and a few pats on the head, they will display superhuman loyalty and will literally face death to protect you. Some food and your companionship are literally all they will ever expect of you. In return, they will teach you pretty much all you need to know about your own humanity, reminding you constantly of your capacity to love. Find me a human like that and I will change my views on marriage.

I have recently been trading messages back and forth with Dan Perrins, who is now preparing for his next walk for mental health week in Canada. He makes a 38-mile trek from Hamilton to Toronto to raise awareness of male suicide and other men's mental health issues. Walking alongside him won't be another human being, but his dog, Charger. Just like the last time Dan took this walk, with his buddy Jeb. Together they will form the classic duo, man and dog, a combination stretching back some thirty thousand years. How fitting is that for a men's mental health awareness initiative?

I have to wonder just how many people will get it.

ICMI’18 Anil Kumar

AVFM · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Gynocentrism and the value of men (part two)

Peter Ryan · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Please read part one[1] of this article before continuing.

Bateman's Principle, Male Competition And The Intrinsic Value Of Men

Bateman's principle[2] and male competition are sometimes considered to be indicative that men have little or no intrinsic value relative to women and must compete with other men to earn value. Bateman's principle simply describes that there will be a greater variance in reproductive success among males, as a result of females being the rate limiting factor of reproduction and higher male intrasexual competition. There are a number of problems with the argument. Bateman's principle and male competition mean that men are less valuable than women and must compete to earn any value.

Firstly this argument ignores the basic requirement to compete- An individual must have the traits to compete successfully and derive some measure of success from competing (that does not necessarily mean being at the very top). These traits have biological value because they lead to evolutionary success. Competition is merely a strategy employed to harness value that already lies within men. A man that truly has no biological value whatsoever, lacks the traits to successfully compete or any traits that lead to evolutionary success. There is a reason why testosterone in men drives status-seeking behaviour and why men are generally more behaviourally active (especially physically) than women on average and boys cannot sit still and be docile like girls in classrooms.

Testosterone drives men to harness the value they possess within themselves through engaging in some type of activity and often that is through some form of rule-based competition. A society without competition is an economically and socially stagnant society on the decline. Modern civilisation simply would not have emerged without competition and the progress it drives. Evolution itself is based on some form of competition, whether it is between two alleles of a gene facing some selection pressure or two individuals. Our species would not exist without competition and women also compete. Feminists may want to think about those realities before they consider labelling male competition, the "patriarchy" (also known as the economy), testosterone and masculinity as toxic, dangerous and bad.

The notion that men must compete to earn value, is analogous to suggesting a Ferrari must be driven to have value or that women must fall pregnant to have value. Some relevant form of value from possessing useful traits that are intrinsic to the individual male, is required for that male to successfully compete in the first place. Competition is not something men do to earn value, it is something men do to harness their intrinsic value and earn resources and status from using it. A talented athlete or business professional competes on the field or in the economy, to make use of their abilities and acquire resources and status in exchange for their efforts. Status and resources are downstream from the intrinsic value within men and are a product of the intrinsic value men possess.

Men generally on average gain more from competition than women do in an evolutionary sense. Males can produce far greater numbers of offspring with far greater numbers of opposite sex partners than females can. Men gain far more from competition than women do, for the simple reason they do not have to gestate for nine months and can consequently reap the mating opportunities arising from successful competition to a much higher degree. Bateman's principle is not about men being less valuable than women, it is about recognising the inverse relationship between intrasexual competition and the level of reproductive investment. The sex that can reproduce at the lowest cost, gains the most from competition. Bateman's principle reflects two different forms of value- Value that is harnessed in higher efforts made in reproductive investment and value that is harnessed in higher efforts made in investment in competition. They are inversely related because there is a trade-off between investment in reproduction and engaging in activities related to competition. Females on average invest more in reproduction and males on average invest more in competition (of course there is overlap and these are just average differences).

Whilst there is certainly some empirical support for Bateman's principle in the scientific community, the research and data is not entirely supportive of it (see this link[3] and this link[4] for more information), including when it comes to humans[5]. It is also worth noting that female intrasexual competition does exist and so does male mate choice and paternal investment in children (fatherhood). All three are often underestimated or forgotten entirely in such discussions about intrasexual competition and male and female mating dynamics. Just because female intrasexual competition exhibits lower levels of physical aggression than male intrasexual competition, does not automatically mean that it is then far less intense. Female intrasexual competition exhibits considerably more social and psychological aggression than male intrasexual competition. Women do compete with each other and they can be just as vicious as men in doing so, but they go about it socially and psychologically and thus it can fly right under the radar of society and even researchers.

Male competition is also not entirely under the control of female mate choice either and a considerable degree it is shaped by males themselves (the same is true for female competition). This reality is much to the chagrin of feminists no doubt, control freaks that they are and is most likely the real basis of their problem with the "patriarchy". It is also worth pointing out that competition is not the only strategy that men employ to harness their value and fulfil their lives. Innovation and creativity are other methods men utilise and they do not always have to involve competition. Some of our greatest inventions have come from men that developed technology completely outside of the scope of the competitive marketplace and often these male inventions create entirely new marketplaces and new arenas for competition.

As with most aspects of human biology, Bateman's principle and male competition is just one factor among many that drive human behaviour. This explains why the data and research is not entirely supportive of the premise these factors alone explain human mating behaviour. Bateman's principle and male competition are not the all-encompassing phenomena they are made out to be, by those that want to spin and twist these evolutionary concepts to mean men have less value and must compete for women to earn value. Such sophistry is certainly useful though to our gynocentric society to try to rationalise and justify blatant bigotry, when men dare to question their concept of self-worth and challenge the gynocentric zeitgeist. It is a blue pill that is painted red, to try and get the red pill men plugged back into the matrix while they think they are awake.

Such ideas are present in the manosphere to some degree unfortunately and must be confronted because it is a subversive way to get men to accept gynocentrism as a fact of life that cannot be challenged and keep men boxed in. Even Roosh V[6] can see the folly in pedestalising the female, harping on like a simp about "male disposability" as if it is biologically set and fixed like the cosmological constant and the stupidity in reducing the biological value of men and women down solely to reproduction. Even the pickup artist community can see how the mantra about "male disposability" as if men are actually biologically disposable, is a trap that holds men back. There are subversive people who will claim to be red pilled or antifeminist, that will use such gynocentric sophistry to keep men from seeing the whole truth. The truth about the value of men is very dangerous in our gynocentric culture, because gynocentrism requires lies and deception to be constantly reinforced and protected (more on that later).

Rare Eggs And Plentiful Sperm

Associated with the appeal to Bateman's principle by reproductive reductionists, is the mantra of "plentiful sperm and rare eggs" and that sperm is "cheap" and eggs are "expensive". Like Bateman's principle, the research[3] does not entirely support this argument. Men must produce millions of sperm for one round of fertilisation. So really a proper comparison of relative reproductive investment in gametes between males and females, is the female investment in one egg versus the male investment in millions of sperm per fertilisation event. Adding to that, is the reality that semen has components that are expensive to produce as the linked article on the research discusses.

However let us assume even with all of that considered, that females still invest more in producing gametes than males. The underlying assumption is that this is indicative of males having lower biological value than females and that males are easily replaceable. These differences in the number and expenditure in gametes between males and females, are the result of differences in reproductive function rather than biological value. Males produce large numbers of individually cheap sperm, because there is a competitive advantage gained in doing so and this is especially the case when considering phenomena like sperm competition[7]. Females simply cannot gain from doing the same, because they have a much higher reproductive investment in producing offspring thanks to gestation and have a much lower ceiling on their total reproductive output. Consequently females focus on producing fewer and more individually expensive gametes. The differences in reproductive function drives different sexual selection pressures on males and females and this drives the differences we see in the form and number of gametes. The differences in the gametes or anisogamy[8], does not reflect differences in biological value.

Reproduction Is Not The Rate Limiting Factor For Existence

This notion men are replaceable because sperm is plentiful, assumes that the only thing males contribute to their offspring and community is sperm and that the biological value of males and females is solely derived from reproduction. I have debunked this ridiculously narrow view at length in my previous writings linked here[9], here[10] and here[11]. Try running civilisation or even a primitive tribal community solely off maximising reproduction and ignore the numerous activities related to survival and caring for offspring and your society will perish. As previously discussed, females might be the rate limiting factor of reproduction, but males are the rate limiting factor of survival.

Some argue that societies can get by without any male contribution to community survival. This is may indeed be the case in some specific instances (and not the case in many other instances) where you have abundant resources, relative safety, no real male advantage in provision and protection in the given environment relative to females and male contribution is not required etc. However there is a difference though between barely surviving or just reasonably subsisting and the community thriving. A community in a particular environment may indeed survive without any help from men, but it certainly will have a far greater chance of thriving, prospering and surviving, if both halves of the population are contributing. There is a massive selective advantage for a society to harness both sexes and not just rely on one sex. The reality is that even in instances where men are not required for community survival, women get pregnant, lactate and care for small infants. This reality does mean that men will invariably be in the unique position of being fully available to support society in ways women are not able to. This fact will apply regardless as to what environment society finds itself in and whether or not any natural male advantage exists to survive in that environment.

Feminists can howl and moan about this biological reality all they like, but until there is artificial uteri I do not see that changing. Even if we take away every natural male advantage we know of (all of their physical strength, spatial ability, mechanical aptitude, mathematical reasoning, willingness to take risks/lower risk aversion etc), males are always going to be in a better position to support society outside of producing children, because they do not get pregnant. We can keep ignoring this reality to our own detriment, but ultimately any society that ignores reality pays the price. I think it also worth noting that there are many environments on this planet that are scarce, hazardous and where societies are heavily dependent on men for their survival and would cease to exist without men, even if men were not required for reproduction. Our own Western societies would fall apart in days without men and possibly descend into anarchy in hours.

The same logic behind arguing society can survive without men provided a minimum amount are retained for reproductive purposes, can be employed to say the same about women. Society can get by with lower numbers of women as well. Society can get by without the female contribution to survival and with the bare minimum number of women required to replace itself (No I am not suggesting getting rid women for the neurotic feminist gotcha brigade that may read this and likewise men should not be gotten rid of either. We are human beings that have a right to exist.). We can theoretically run society off the bare minimum number of males and females required to replace the population and ensure there is sufficient genetic diversity and provision and protection available. In some environments that may require more males than females and in other environments more females than males. That does not mean such numbers would be optimal to sustain the community though, they would just reflect the bare minimum required for continuation of the community.

The actual numbers of males and females that are optimal for allowing a community to sustain itself and thrive, is also going to vary from environment to environment and those numbers will likely vary over time with changing conditions. In many environments and time periods it may be more advantageous to have greater numbers of males around and in other environments the opposite may hold true. However over time and in general, neither sex can be more crucial to the species than the other. As discussed in part one of this article, across evolutionary timescales and overall, males and females contribute equally to evolutionary success and all of the activities required to sustaining their communities that are associated with that (not necessarily in each activity, but in totality). This is because Fishers principle ensures equal investment in males and females and consequently a roughly 1:1 ratio in the population.

Over time any over-reliance on one sex over the other for community reproduction and survival and by extension evolutionary success, will be counterbalanced by sexual selection on the sex that is least required. There will be a sexual selective pressure on the least required sex, to develop traits useful to the continuation of the community and genome. Eventually such a selection pressure would equalise the reliance on the two sexes for continuation of the genome and the community. Any asymmetry is temporary and simply is not sustainable in the long term over evolutionary timescales, for the reasons I discussed in the previous part of this article. Depending on one sex more than the other puts the genes, the community and the species at a disadvantage when Fishers principle prevails. There is a clear selective advantage to ensuring both sexes pull their weight when the genome is forced to invest in them equally and that neither sex is overly depended on. It is less costly and less risky.

The mistake that is often made in failing to understand the reality of the consequences of Fisherian dynamics, is conflating biological sameness with biological equivalence in value. The two sexes can be different, but still biologically equal in evolutionary terms. If females really were more biologically valuable than men because of their uterus and men really were biologically disposable, then there would be no manosphere and society would not even resemble what we have today. We may even still be small mammals living in forests producing large litters of offspring.

Such a fundamental aspect of human biology would simply prevent any drive to question gynocentrism from surfacing in men and this bias would lie too deep in our biology for any exception to the rule to emerge. In fact such as an aspect of biology would have halted human evolution long before we developed language and civilisation. It has been the selection of traits outside of the female reproductive role that are related to survival (such as tool making), combined with paternal investment in offspring (something that distinguishes human males from many of their primate counterparts) that has led to the development of modern humans. Every year the manosphere increases in size and so does MGTOW, despite the enormous levels of gynocentric indoctrination in the schools and the censorship. This is not a fluke of nature, this is an awakening that is in its early stages. As with all awakenings in their infancy, they take time to become a mass awakening.

If Only Women Ran The World We Could Live In Huts

There is almost a cult like devotion to the myths that past human society was matriarchal and peaceful, rather than egalitarian and that men conspired to establish the “patriarchy” and it was all downhill from there. Often female fertility and motherhood form the centrepiece of these “theories” of a peaceful prehistoric matriarchal utopia. I am using the term “theory” very loosely because they resemble ideology more than proper scientific theory. Such claims are highly questionable based on the current state of knowledge about prehistory and are over reliant on inferences and assumptions and lacking in solid incontrovertible evidence (Read this book linked here[12] critiquing goddess ideology by Nathanson and Young) .

The feminist saturated field of anthropology like so many of the softer sciences in academia, has a major problem with separating ideological agenda from rigorous empiricism and the scientific method. This is only made worse by trying to make sense of a forensic puzzle on what human society tens of thousands of years ago was like and is missing many jigsaw pieces. Sophists thrive in such environments, where they can spin fragmented evidence to justify their ideology and give it an air of legitimacy. Facts and evidence are one thing, inferences made from facts and evidence are not factual. They are at best a hypothesis which is difficult to test in anthropology, or at worst such inferences are just junk science.

But let us assume those that wish to pedestalise the female sex are right on all points about our supposedly and highly questionable matriarchal past. So what? Human prehistory is one of relative stagnation and little progress. We had tens of thousands of years of nomadic existence before civilisation. Modern civilisation has been cultivated by harnessing male potential. In the words of dissident feminist Camille Paglia, "If civilization had been left in female hands, we would still be living in grass huts"[13]. It has been a patrilineal and patriarchal cultures that have given rise to modern civilisation. There is a reason why the most successful, developed, safe and prosperous societies on Earth have all arisen from cultures that practice monogamy and value fatherhood and men. Once male potential was fully harnessed, the health and life expectancy for the average human being dramatically rose from our hunter-gatherer existence and we went from painting pictures on caves to walking on the moon.

Our current feminist establishment seems to think returning back to primitive tribalism and destroying marriage and attacking men and fathers is progress. The statistics on fatherlessness[14] and the boy crisis[15] are alarming and those two problems will eventually collapse our once prosperous societies economically and socially. My own prediction is that the Fempocalypse[16] will begin in about 20 years and I anticipate society to begin unravelling in fundamental ways by 2040. The initial slow decline before the great collapse has already begun and it takes time for civilisation to decline to critical levels hence the timespan I provided. Society cannot last in it's present form by marginalising the male half of the population that is mostly responsible for running, maintaining, building and sustaining it financially, economically and otherwise.

What remains of fallen Western society may be able to live in a third world environment (Think Venezuela in 2019 only much much worse), with extreme poverty and deprivation where men are marginalised. However it will be the societies that value men that will invariably end up surpassing the remnants of our society and running the global economy, colonising the solar system and eventually travelling to the stars. Perhaps they will record the fall of the West in their history books, as we do the fall of Rome. To put it in terms reproductive reductionists can understand, cultures that value men will give rise to societies that will replace those that do not. Putting men down to lift women up destroys the fertility rate of a society and destroys the conditions required to support large scale civilisations. Once you throw men under the bus, advanced civilisation will go with them.

Male Self-Worth And The Big Lie

"I am not the first to suggest, and I am sure I shall not be the last, that the male's drive in work and achievement may actually be the consequence of his recognition of his biological inferiority with respect to the female's creative capacity to conceive and create human beings. One of the ways in which the male may compensate for this biological inferiority is by work and achievement." -Page 53, from "The Natural Superiority Of Women"[17] by anthropologist Ashley Montagu.

The simple truth that men have intrinsic value has been deliberately quashed and any recognition of men's humanity has been silenced, so that our predatory gynocentric system can exploit men. Men are regularly demonised and any attempt to discuss men having unique strengths and value, is a social taboo in society. Misandry is normalised to the point that even cutting off a man's penis is a source of laughter for people[18]. Exposing men to an environment that encourages them to think of themselves as inherently valuable as human beings, is toxic to this gynocentric society. The climate of misandry and denigration of men and masculinity must be maintained, because gynocentric elements of our society rely upon it to exploit men. Men that know their worth are dangerous to the exploitative gynocentric institutions and culture in our society and men must therefore be convinced by the gynocentric culture to believe they are disposable.

Men and boys are consistently bombarded in our gynocentric culture with the messages that imply what is quoted above by Ashley Montagu (I would have to actually write a book to cover how much is wrong in that Montagu's book). Notice there is no recognition of the male creative capacity to create life in that quote and that women have no capacity to create life without men. Notice there is no recognition of the role of fatherhood in nurturing life, or the role men play in society in making sure everyone stays alive and the creative process that entails in building and running civilisation. Notice there is no recognition that perhaps men might actually be driven to work and achieve to pursue interests they find personally fulfilling and to look after others they care for. There is no recognition that the male athlete, researcher or business professional, might be putting in the hours to fulfil personal goals and ambitions, or that the male soldier might be protecting his country for his family.

Such messages like what is reflected in Ashley Montagu's quote, attempt to warp men's sense of themselves and instil in their minds the ridiculous assertion that men do these things to compensate for some supposed inferiority, because they can't get pregnant. The bottom line is there is no recognition in that quote by Montagu, that men have their own intrinsic value and have the right to decide for themselves who they are and what they do with their own lives, irrespective of whether women approve of it. That lack of recognition of the intrinsic value of men, is the fundamental basis of gynocentrism.

The exploitation of men requires that you dehumanise men and rob them of their own sense of self-worth. A man that is raised from birth to believe he has no intrinsic self-worth and must acquire his sense of self-worth as a human doing and by performing like a workhorse for the wishes of this gynocentric society and winning its approval, is a useful slave. He is the best slave because his very identity is based on being a slave and he can easily be controlled through social approval and disapproval by women and the gynocentric culture. He knows no other way to live and has no desire to. In our gynocentric system, the male slave strives to win the approval of a gynocentric social system that has no regard for his well-being beyond what is good for women and it increasingly has no regard for his well-being at all and tells him he is obsolete[19]. The gynocentric society tells men to frame deferring to women and serving women like they are their superiors, as "taking responsibility" and being a "man" and "manning up". In reality it is highly irresponsible and turns men into slaves.

As I discussed in a previous article[20], our gynocentric system feeds off male chivalry and cannot exist without it. When I refer to chivalry I am not just talking about buying dinner and opening doors for women without reciprocity, I am talking about something much broader that is illustrated in this video example[21]. Male chivalry in the gynocentric realm, is the practice of men sacrificing their own well-being and the well-being of other men for a woman or women, partially or entirely because they are women and with no commensurate benefit given in exchange from women. Male chivalry is alive and well in this society. Despite reports to the contrary, there is no shortage of men willing to throw themselves and other men under the bus for women. That is especially the case in the realm of politics, the law and the mainstream media.

Male chivalry is based on convincing men of the big lie- That men are less valuable than women and must earn the approval of women and this gynocentric culture to have self-worth and by serving female well-being. Men are swamped in this lie and indoctrinated in it from birth. The glorification of the female uterus, pregnancy and motherhood and the denigration of the importance of fatherhood and men in general, are the central axioms that this lie is based upon if you probe its foundations. If you ask people to qualify their gynocentric belief's, they ultimately end up relying on women giving birth and being the rate limiting factor of reproduction as their excuse and rationalisation. Men must protect women, prioritise female well-being and sacrifice themselves, because women give birth etcetera, etcetera, rinse and repeat. That is the one-track thinking of gynocentrism- To not consider the multitude of other factors required to sustain society and to not recognise that reproducing children is merely one requirement that must be met and is not automatically the most pressing factor.

The male suicide rate, fatherlessness, the gynocentric corruption of our institutions and the decline of relationships, all can be traced to men being culturally indoctrinated into thinking that deference to women as if they are men's betters and chivalrous subservience to women, is being a man and being respectful. A man demonstrates the responsibility to set and enforce personal boundaries and values with women and not just with other men. A man treats women as his equal, not his superior or inferior. A man expects responsibility from women and has the strength to hold women accountable. He does not just hold men accountable and then put his hands up when he encounters women behaving irresponsibly, inappropriately, wrongly, violently and dangerously. A man does what is right and speaks the truth, even when women do not approve of it. A man respects himself and knows his own intrinsic self-worth and value as a human being.

Manning up is not about slaving up to women, but that is precisely what it is in this gynocentric culture. Being a man is having the strength to stand by what you believe and value and it is about standing up for yourself. Kowtowing to gynocentrism and calling that responsibility, is a mask to hide weakness and immaturity around women. It is not a strength or adult behaviour. It is the gynocentric white knights from traditionalism and feminism, that need to grow up out of their fairy tale and stop being man children living in fairy tale fantasy world.

Conclusion

I could easily go further with more and more arguments, debunking each and every facet of reproductive reductionists and why men are equally biologically valuable to women, but at some stage people need to start thinking. For some people what I have written thus far would seem obvious, but worryingly when I look at this gynocentric culture and even some pockets of the manosphere, I see a gynocentric stupor. It is truly amazing the scale of people that can be fooled by appealing to women being the rate limiting factor of reproduction to justify gynocentrism. If you have one man and ten women blah blah, rare eggs and plentiful sperm blah blah and the eyes glaze over and people nod without questioning what they are being told. People will adamantly defend the most ridiculous and absurd arguments about why gynocentrism is a biologically immutable facet of human nature and how it all comes down to the golden uterus and rare eggs and plentiful sperm. In the end it is emotion, bigotry and entitlement driving such thinking. There is not much actual thinking going on, except what is required to rationalise their pre-existing bigoted beliefs or perpetuate their own learned helplessness and fatalistic worldview.

It is time for men to think, to get off their knees and seriously consider their own intrinsic value to themselves and society. That is the first step to winning the war against gynocentrism and ensuring our society and species has a future. Later on in my articles on gynocentrism, I will discuss the nature of male value further in relation to our gynocentric culture.

References:

1. https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-one/
2. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bateman%27s_principle
3. http://theconversation.com/data-should-smash-the-biological-myth-of-promiscuous-males-and-sexually-coy-females-59665
4. https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC3406825/
5. https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC3096780/
6. https://www.rooshv.com/stop-saying-men-are-disposable
7. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sperm_competition#targetText=Sperm%20competition%20is%20the%20competitive,have%20multiple%20potential%20mating%20partners
8. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anisogamy
9. https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-golden-uterus-part-one/
10. https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-golden-uterus-part-two/
11. https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-one/
12. https://www.amazon.com/Sanctifying-Misandry-Goddess-Ideology-Fall-ebook/dp/B00CS5BQG2
13. https://en.wikiquote.org/wiki/Camille_Paglia
14. https://www.fatherhood.org/father-absence-statistic?hsCtaTracking=6013fa0e-dcde-4ce0-92da-afabf6c53493%7C7168b8ab-aeba-4e14-bb34-c9fc0740b46e
15. https://www.amazon.com/Boy-Crisis-Boys-Struggling-About/dp/1942952716
16. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=w__PJ8ymliw
17. https://www.amazon.com/Natural-Superiority-Women-5th/dp/076198982X

18. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=lDjUjhexTQk
19. https://www.amazon.com/End-Men-Rise-Women/dp/1594488045
20. https://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/perversions-of-gynocentrism/
21. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=yJIQE5WSCls

Mike Buchanan’s talk at Cambridge University (video and transcript)

AVFM · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

With respect and appreciation from everyone at AVFM for a job well done. PE

Read the transcript here.

Out of the closet – again

andybob · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

This article is mainly directed at those MHRAs who are still in the closet – no, not that one. I am referring to the closet in which many of us conceal the true extent of our involvement in the MHRM from some – perhaps even all – of our family, friends and colleagues. There are a variety of reasons, some more valid and compelling than others, why MHRA closet cases have chosen to keep their affiliations with A Voice for Men on the down-low, so to speak.

While those close to me couldn't possibly have failed to notice that I am not feminism's number one fan, for many years, only my family, my partner and a select number of friends actually knew that I had written articles for A Voice for Men and that my level of commitment to the rights and welfare of men and boys ran deep.

I have lived and worked overseas for more than twenty years and only return to Australia for one month every year. I spend this time with my family and the ever-dwindling handful of true friends whose loyalty and support I value more than they will ever know. Needless to say, discussing social issues and gender politics is not how I have chosen to spend what little time I have each year to catch up face-to-face with these cherished people.

Towards the end of my visit last August, my decision to speak at the Second International Conference on Men's Issues in Houston made it necessary for me to inform these friends that I was, in fact, a MHRA. Reactions were mixed. Let's just say that the main difference between coming out as a gay man and coming out as a MHRA, is that when you come out as a MHRA, no-one gives you a hug and tells you that they'll always love you anyway.

The guys invariably thought it was great – especially the ones who have had their guts ripped out in family court. The women, however, have largely been a very different matter. Most of them asked, "What's a MHRA?" Upon being informed, their open-mouthed silence indicated that they simply didn't know what to say. I didn't read too much into their reactions, as I've been doing this long enough to know that the notion that men are human beings whose rights and welfare matter just as much as everyone else's is a novel concept for many people. They probably just needed a little time to get used to the idea, then, they'd be absolutely fine with it.

Yeah, right.

This is the point at which more experienced MHRAs will be rolling their eyes wondering if Andy Bob may have accidentally smacked himself upside the head with the stupid stick. I prefer to call it a mixture of naivety, optimism and wishful thinking – which, I suppose, is just a polite description of the stupid stick.

Andrew DiKaiomata's article, "Feminists have their heads up their cant" http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminists-have-their-heads-up-their-cant/ reminded me of a recent telephone conversation I had with one of these women, a dear friend whom I shall call Debra – because that's her name and I want her to read this. It is a conversation which left me disappointed, frustrated and more than a little bit angry. This is partly due to the fact that it was so painfully typical of the kind of phenomenon which Mr DiKaiomata discussed in his article, and partly due to the fact that I did not expect Debra to engage in the kind of nonsense she pulled throughout our conversation.

The conversation, and my response to it, can be summed up in the following letter to Debra:

Dear Debra,

We have been friends for thirty years, during which you have given me nothing but love, loyalty and lots of laughs – but I wasn't laughing after our recent conversation. We hadn't spoken since I told you last August about my involvement in the MHRM. It was pretty obvious to me that you didn't know what to say, probably because you weren't sure what it actually was.

I suspect that sometime in the past five months, you have done some reading up on the MHRM and formed a negative impression of it, which is hardly surprising considering the amount of lies and misinformation that feminists have spread about the MHRM and the people involved in it. The reason I suspect this is because when you asked me to tell you something about the MHRM, you were prepared with what can only be described as a grab bag of tired old feminist slogans which you fired off in the misguided belief that they actually formed some kind of argument.

Silly me thought you really wanted to discuss some of the key issues which are having a devastating impact on the rights and welfare of men and boys, but all you wanted to talk about was the oppression of women. When I told you that one of the MHRM's key issues was refuting a gendered approach to domestic violence because such an approach ignored both male victims and female perpetrators, you responded by saying that men were becoming more violent and society had to do something about it. When I told you all about Erin Pizzey and her research findings, you responded by saying that men had always had more power in society than women.

In fact, you responded to nearly every point that I was trying to make, by interrupting in order to spew feminist dogma at me, all of which was clearly intended to convey the deeply offensive, shockingly bigoted and provably wrong idea that only women can be ever victims because blah, blah, blah patriarchy. In my not inconsiderable experience as a MHRA, this is the roundabout way that feminists use to justify their belief that the MHRM has no reason – or right – to exist.

You asked me if I had seen the ABC's Q&A programme about domestic violence, and told me how wonderful it was that such an issue was being publicly discussed. I pointed out that it wasn't an honest discussion about domestic violence because it only addressed part of the story by presenting all victims as women and all perpetrators as men. An honest discussion would have presented domestic violence as something some men and women do to some other men and women. You tried to refute this by mentioning that, five minutes before the end of the programme, 'Steve' was allowed to talk about his experience as a DV victim of his former female partner.

When I pointed out that the feminists on the panel told 'Steve' that most victims of domestic violence were women, so his experience didn't matter, you made some comment about how important it was to bring men in on the conversation. Why? So male victims of female-perpetrated violence can be told by a government representative on national television to basically shut up because there are more female victims than male victims? That is beyond disgusting. Imagine someone suggesting that suicidal women should be ignored and deprived of support services because 80% of suicide victims are men. After all, it's the same reasoning, is it not?

The Q&A panelists didn't have a conversation about male victims of DV. They shut it down, which is exactly what you tried to do by hurling tidbits of Feminist Sacred Babble at me in order deflect attention away from what must have been some uncomfortable truths about the sanctity of female victimhood. When I gave an accurate description of the Duluth Model, which has heavily influenced Australian DV laws and social policy, you accused me of making it up. I have to admit, I've never heard that one before. I even spelt it for you so that you could Google it. Did you? If not, why not?

When I began to throw more bricks of logic than you could handle, you uttered the following four words: "I am a woman." This was obviously intended to shut me up. It did momentarily, but not for the reasons you probably assumed. I was gob- smacked by the sheer arrogance and entitlement implied by making this completely irrelevant comment. What exactly did you mean by "I am a woman"? Do you believe that being a woman gives you some kind of ownership of the topic of domestic violence? Was it an assertion of some kind of moral superiority over me because I'm 'just a man' and should shut up when a woman is talking? It takes some gall for you, a person who has never even heard of the Duluth Model, to talk down to someone who has been researching, discussing and writing about the issue of domestic violence for years – and justifies it on the basis that you have a vagina and I don't.

What annoys me the most is that you claimed to want to have a conversation about men's issues, but we didn't really have one, did we? I attempted to talk about them, but you kept diverting the focus back to women. You see Debra, that's the problem: women's issues, both real and imagined, are the only ones society ever wants to talk about – it's all about women, all the time. Society doesn't want to talk about men's issues any more than you do, and you didn't really want me to talk about them either – especially when they veered so dangerously away from feminist-approved narratives. I had no idea you were so fond of them.

This is exactly why there needs to be a MHRM, and why it needs platforms like the International Conference on Men's Issues, in which I will be proudly participating. Serious men's rights issues, domestic violence being but one of them, can be discussed openly and honestly, without being constantly disrupted by feminists and their enablers. The real reason why you derailed our conversation at every opportunity is probably because it somehow frightened you. For someone who has always described herself as an equalist, you certainly have all of those wheezy old feminist memes and tropes down pat. It was a deeply disturbing eye-opener for me to discover that you find such comfort in embracing ideological myths that I have long considered to be bigoted and dishonest.

I have no intention of apologizing for believing that men's rights are human rights, and that they should be regarded as equally valid and important as women's rights. My only hope is that one day, you will believe the same thing, and we can actually have a real conversation about the human rights of all. To put it as succinctly as possible, the MHRM is an egalitarian movement and feminism is not. This is why I am a MHRA instead of a feminist. It really is as simple as that. I am a MHRA, and I will not be silenced. You're just going to have to learn to deal with it.

Love,

Andybob

For me, the most challenging part of coming out as a MHRA hasn't been putting up with people altering their perceptions about me – it has been discovering things about those people that I'd rather not have known. It can be a quite a shock to realize just how many otherwise decent and intelligent people, who ought to know better, bleed radical feminist bile – even when they've only been lightly grazed by a brick of logic.

Coming out as a MHRA, like coming out as a gay man, is easier for some than for others. Both can be traumatic steps rife with obstacles and risks, but they are also very liberating steps, and have the priceless advantage of leaving you in no doubt about where you truly stand with people. It's just a matter of asking yourself whether or not you really want to find out.

I sincerely hope that Debra responds favorably to this letter. Ouch! That stupid stick really hurts.

Canaries in the coal mine

Elizabeth Hobson · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Gynocentrism and the golden uterus (part one)

Peter Ryan · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Pedestalisation Of Female Fertility:

The value of masculinity to society and to the species is rarely acknowledged in our modern gynocentric culture. Masculinity is frequently portrayed as toxic and destructive and in need of reform or removal. At the same time, we are told that women "create life" and that if only women ran the world there would be peace. This culture has an embedded belief that women are superior and men are inferior. Everything wrong in the world is masculine and everything good in the world is feminine. Gynocentrism is based on a belief system in female superiority and so it becomes essential to debunk this belief system if gynocentrism is to be overcome. This article will be the first in one of a number of articles, that will focus on debunking the core foundational premise of female superiority.

The foundation of this belief system in female superiority is that the value of human life is primarily or exclusively based on its reproductive utility. Women have a uterus, women invest more in reproduction, women are the rate limiting factor of reproduction, so therefore women are biologically more valuable than men.

This is the core foundation of the belief structure in female superiority. Does this sound familiar? It should. Even in the manosphere this line of reasoning is promoted by some as an unquestioned truth and the moment you make any step to challenge this belief, you are labelled a denier of biology. In reality, the real deniers of biology are those that deliberately ignore areas of biology that do not fit their gynocentric narrative that the golden uterus is all that counts. These are the reproductive reductionists.

I knew even when I was writing my article "The Normalisation of Gynocentrism"[1], and before it was even published, that there would be one specific area of that article that would trigger the reproductive reductionists and that was when I wrote about reductionism. They came out of the woodwork like clockwork as I predicted they would. I know their own arguments and the underlying biology better than they do, from my own experience in molecular genetics and general understanding of evolutionary biology and also most importantly because I have actually listened to what they have had to say for the last ten years. Their arguments have essentially become a form of unquestioned dogma and it is not just a problem I observed in the wider gynocentric culture, but also within the manosphere itself.

Reproductive reductionism is not just a problem I observed in the wider gynocentric culture, but also within the manosphere itself.

Their entire argument rests on an assumption that successful reproduction and evolutionary success are interchangeable. It is important to define terms to avoid confusion. Evolutionary success is the number of copies of the genome of a lineage left behind after a specific period of time has elapsed. If we take a set time period of two centuries for example, an unbroken cyclical chain of investment in survival, development, reproduction and parental investment must take place for copies of the genome of a lineage to be preserved after that passage of time.

Evolutionary success is far more complicated than just asserting that it all comes down to reproduction. Reproduction is merely one step in the cyclical and unbroken chain of events that must successfully take place to perpetuate the genome over time. Reproduction is certainly essential, but so are a multitude of other activities which must occur to ensure preservation of the genome of a lineage. Reproduction itself is often dependent on those activities successfully occurring as well. For example, an organism must survive to mate and reproduce, as it cannot find a mate and then reproduce when it is dead. This sounds obvious and yet some people will persist in maintaining reproduction is all that matters.

Before I debunk reproductive reductionism further, I want to discuss the groups of people I have noticed subscribe to reproductive reductionism. Reproductive reductionists come in three general flavours from my observation, some of which can overlap:

1. Female supremacists who believe women are superior and that gynocentric double standards are justified on the basis they reflect the natural order (as they see it). Biology essentially becomes a way of rationalising their own bigotry and persuading others to accept gynocentrism as something normal and good for society. Female supremacists operate on a naturalistic fallacy that what is natural is proper, right and just, and what is natural ought to be good for society.

2. Fatalists who subscribe to the view gynocentrism is an immutable aspect of biology based on women being the rate limiting factor of reproduction. They dogmatically refute any argument to the contrary, or that anything can be done to reduce gynocentrism. Fatalists like to live in a world that is certain and where they can excuse themselves and others from taking responsibility for their actions. They generally like to ridicule those that dare to challenge the status quo as being delusional and not realists.

3. Ideologues who support a worldview of absolute biological determinism and that anyone who disagrees with them is deluded or irrational. These individuals often hold themselves out as authority figures on evolutionary psychology and biology, often with little or no formal education in the subject. They cultivate an image of intellectual superiority over others who do not support their worldview. They exhibit a naïve realism bias, that objective reality fits their worldview and so people that disagree with their worldview must be deluded, irrational or biased. There is generally a high level of narcissism, combativeness and a lack of humility exhibited by such individuals when challenged.

All three groups are generally impervious to reason, facts and evidence that runs contrary to their assertion that how many uteri you have in a community is primarily what counts to the continued existence of that community. Disagreement with this article does not automatically assign you to one of these groups. Wilfully ignoring facts, evidence and reason that does not support your worldview does.

All three groups make the error in reducing evolutionary success to reproductive success. There are individuals who do not want men to realise their own value, because if they did the powerbase that women rely on to control men would be challenged. As I mentioned in my article "The Gynocentric Mob And Female Superiority"[2], the gynocentric social power of women is based on cultivating an image of female superiority. Women only have power in society to the degree that men value what they have to say and what they do. The moment men question female superiority and in particular the moral superiority of women, suddenly women can be held accountable for their own behaviour.

The overvaluing of the female reproductive role and the pedestalisation of the "golden uterus", is central to female superiority because the female reproductive function is not only essential to the continuation of society, but distinctly female. Challenging the importance of the "golden uterus" in our gynocentric culture is tantamount to questioning the existence of God in fundamentalist communities. You get the same reaction questioning the "golden uterus", as questioning the basis of a religion. Even some people in the manosphere refuse to question the overvaluing of the female reproductive function, often through omission and ignoring the subject. They will discuss its importance, but never critique its overvaluing in the culture.

Questioning the basis of the gynocentric religion that women are divine beings or more biologically valuable by virtue of having a uterus, is exactly what I am going to do in this series of articles. Functioning as an incubator for nine months does not make someone a mother any more than depositing sperm makes someone a father. Having a uterus does not make you a more valuable human being and like men, women's value as human beings biologically and otherwise, is not solely dependent on their reproductive functions either.

Maintaining the social fixation on sex and reproduction is key to maintaining female social power that is beyond reproach. In other words, glorifying the female role in reproduction is central to maintaining a belief in female superiority in society and by extension maintaining gynocentrism. Despite what some people in the manosphere think, feminism does not argue that men and women are the same. Feminism argues that women are superior. If men are better at something, then feminists argue this must be due to socialisation and the oppressive patriarchy. If women are better at something, then feminists argue it must be an innate female advantage. If men excel in STEM relative to women, then it is because women are being discriminated against. If girls are excelling in school relative to boys, then it is because girls are smarter than boys. If you want a clear example that feminists do not regard men and women as identical, look at their response to transgenderism and allowing transgender women into female spaces. Feminism is about female supremacy, not gender equality.

What Reproductive Reductionists Miss

So why are reproductive reductionists wrong? I could literally write a book on why they are wrong and I will be going into further and further detail in future articles. However at some point people need to think for themselves and critically evaluate facts by themselves instead of relying on other people's argumentation. Beliefs like female superiority flourish in societies where people have lost the ability to think and critically evaluate information by themselves. People in such societies essentially become sponges that absorb whatever sets of ideas they find most emotionally appealing and useful pawns to manipulate to further an agenda.

There are three main flaws in the thinking of reproductive reductionists: 1. An ignorance of basic life history theory and that evolutionary success is reliant on a number of activities other than reproduction. 2. A lack of recognition and understanding of biological systems and systems in general. 3. Falling victim to the naturalistic fallacy.

The Optimisation Problem Of Life

Evolutionary success requires a whole sequence of activities to occur in optimum proportion and reproduction is just one of them. Life history theory[3] describes the strategic investment that organisms make in their own survival, development, growth, reproduction and in the parental care of offspring over their lifespan to optimise evolutionary success. Maximising evolutionary success in a given environment is an optimisation problem that requires the strategic investment of resources by an organism in numerous activities over their lifespan and reproduction is merely one of them. These often involve trade-offs between investing in activities with limited resources available. For example, a species can invest in maximising the quantity of offspring produced over the quality of offspring they produce, but both cannot be maximised at the same time.

Of course the common retort is that survival leads to nowhere without reproduction. Yes reproduction is essential, but it is not the only essential activity required to propagate the genome. These same reductionists seem completely unaware that reproduction does not happen without survival. An organism or a population has to survive long enough to reproduce and even that alone is not enough. An organism must reproduce an optimal number of times and then raise the offspring to sexual maturity, whom also have to then survive, mate and then raise their offspring. If this does not occur to a sufficient degree then any reproduction that does occur is insufficient to perpetuate the lineage and it dies out.

Simply pumping out babies is not sufficient to ensure the lineage is preserved. Offspring that do not survive to sexual maturity or do not reproduce, are evolutionary dead ends. Organisms that do not invest in their own survival do not reproduce at all, or do not live long enough to reproduce a number of offspring sufficient to guarantee continuation of their lineage (as some of their offspring will die or fail to produce offspring themselves). Parents who do not provide sufficient parental care to their offspring fail to become grandparents because their children either die before adulthood or are in an underdeveloped condition where they are either infertile, cannot carry a child to term, or are unable to attract a mate. Consequently their lineage terminates despite producing children and there is evolutionary failure.

The role that men play in contributing to the perpetuation of their lineage is not just simply based on their contribution to reproduction either. Men make an enormous contribution to the survival of their families and their wider community and that does impact the evolutionary success of their lineage and the community they reside in. The reality is that just as women contribute a disproportionate amount of investment in reproduction, men contribute a disproportionate amount of investment in the survival of their partner, progeny and their community. This investment in survival does contribute to the evolutionary success of the lineage, by allowing more offspring to survive, by enhancing the physical and mental health and development of offspring, by better equipping offspring materially and intellectually for adulthood and by allowing more reproduction to occur etc.

Men make an enormous contribution to the survival of their families and their wider community and that does impact the evolutionary success.

This contribution to survival has been partly what men have been sexually selected for. Men have been shaped by female mate choice to carry the part of the load of perpetuating the species that women cannot, whilst women are temporarily disabled or partly limited by pregnancy and preoccupied with caring for infants and toddlers. Males in our species even directly invest in the raising of their offspring as fathers because of the cost of childhood and juvenile development in our species, unlike males from some of our primate relatives.

The selective advantage of a larger brain and the extension of our developmental period to allow for that larger brain, had a ratchet effect on our evolution. It put long term selective pressures in place that drove mate choice and sexual selection to select for traits and re-task existing traits in men and in women, that enabled a complementary division of labour to emerge. This complementary division of labour and the paternal investment of fatherhood in offspring, played substantial roles in providing the necessary support for the longer and far more costly developmental period of offspring.

The underlying evolutionary processes and the sex differences behind what I have described in the last two paragraphs is discussed in evolutionary psychologist Dr. David Geary's brilliant book, "Male, Female: The Evolution of Human Sex Differences, Second Edition"[4]. I am not suggesting that the traditional division of labour as we know it today is biological, I am saying it has biological underpinnings. These biological underpinnings are reflected in the sex differences in interests that feminists refuse to acknowledge[5], because it does not suit their underlying agenda of female supremacy.

These sex differences in interests, traits and biological roles, do not make either sex superior to the other. Each sex is an interdependent component in a system that the genome encodes to perpetuate itself. That is the evolutionary context through which these differences emerged and that is the context through which we should be interpreting these differences. It has nothing to do with superiority or supremacy and everything to do with a dynamic adaptive system optimising the propagation of the genome that encoded it over time and across environments, by developing complementary components with complementary strengths and roles, that functionally serve a purpose greater than either component on their own.

Before modern technology and birth control, some gendered division of labour in one form or another was more or less an inevitability of historic and prehistoric populations. Oh and if female supremacists want to argue technology makes men obsolete, they might want to reflect on precisely which sex overwhelmingly develops, maintains and runs the technology first and then reflect on the reality that technology can replace all female functions and jobs, including gestation, and that the dignity of men and women is worth more than just their utility, but I digress. Men have had their space and role in the community and women had theirs. Even indigenous tribes of today have some segregation between the sexes and sites, customs and roles for men and sites, customs and roles for women. They might not have the same gendered traditions and social norms as in the West, but they have them nonetheless.

The fact technology and birth control which men have overwhelmingly been responsible for, has given each sex the personal freedom to expand beyond their past roles, does not negate the reality that biological sex differences remain. It does not negate the reality that there are going to be sex differences in interests and in the roles men and women undertake in society, when we consider males and females as a whole and look at the averages, regardless as to how much feminist social engineering is undertaken. It is not sexism, or entirely cultural, there are biological underpinnings to the differences in the roles males and females adopt in society. The mistake reproductive reductionists make, is ignoring the value of roles outside of the female reproductive function when it comes to their contribution to evolutionary success, or deliberately ignoring or downplaying innate male advantages that contribute to evolutionary success, usually by claiming they are the result of sexism rather than the result of a true male strength.

What I have just described is a very basic overview of biology that reproductive reductionists wilfully ignore or downplay, because it does not conform to their narrative in female superiority, or their narrow and fatalistic worldview. The real deniers of biology are the reproductive reductionists that cherry pick facts that suit their narrative and ignore the multitude of biological facts that don't.

Systems

Biology is comprised of systems. Your cells are compromised of numerous molecular and subcellular systems. Your body is compromised of numerous systems- the nervous system, the reproductive system, the circulatory system etc. Numerous species live in ecosystems. Reproductive reductionists are incapable of acknowledging the complexity and interdependent nature of human biology. They are incapable of recognising gene culture coevolution and that biology and culture feedback on each other in a continuous loop. They will recognise that biology restricts and shapes culture (which I agree it does), but will ignore the facts and the evidence[6] that culture itself introduces novel environments, alters selection pressures on genes and shapes biology. They will recognise that culture is a function of biology, but fail to acknowledge the influence of the environment and that biology expresses itself differently across different environments and timescales.

The human reproductive system requires other body systems to function properly. If the circulatory system fails, or the nervous system fails and the body dies, the reproductive system will fail and die with it. This is an example illustrating the interdependent nature of biological systems that reductionists fail to appreciate. The same interdependence can be observed with ecosystems. Just like the reproductive system in the human body is dependent on the proper functioning of other bodily systems, so is the successful reproduction of a population dependent on numerous other activities aside from reproduction, that are related to the survival, nourishment and growth of that population. Systems thinking is the kryptonite of reductionist thinking, because it forces people to think outside of the categories and the walls they throw up around their own thinking.

Systems thinking is the kryptonite of reductionist thinking, because it forces people to think outside of the categories and the walls they throw up around their own thinking.

A common example that is used by reproductive reductionists is the argument that a tribe decimated by some calamity with a handful of men remaining and the majority remaining being women, will fare better than a tribe with the sex ratios reversed. The argument being that one man can fertilise the uteri of dozens of women and that as there are more women, there are more uteri and thus more offspring can be produced to replace the population in the immediate aftermath. The implied assumption to this scenario, is that all of the women in a tribe (or most of them) will be making full use of their uterus and maximising their reproductive output in the immediate aftermath.

There is no consideration given though for the food, water, resources, protection from predators and shelter that the community and these offspring will require to survive and develop and who will provide those necessities and protect the community, whilst substantial numbers of or all the women in the community are pregnant and/or caring for young helpless infants and toddlers and consequently less able to contribute to these activities.

There is no consideration given to the environmental conditions the population faces and the stresses they impose and the impact a loss of men would have on the community surviving in those conditions. There is no consideration given to the loss of genetic diversity in losing most of the men in a tribe and the impact that increased inbreeding and the subsequent accumulation of deleterious mutations will have on the fitness and fertility of future offspring. There is no consideration given as to whether the environment has the carrying capacity or the community has the adults to provide the shelter, protection and resources, to support such an intensive reproductive effort in the immediate aftermath and all of the offspring and the women raising and giving birth to them.

There is no consideration given to the possibility that a population that produces fewer but healthier, better developed, better equipped and more fertile offspring, with higher parental and alloparental investment and a lower mortality rate, might actually be a more efficient and effective investment of resources in certain environments and have greater evolutionary success, than a population that produces large numbers of offspring with few men around to provide and protect for the community.

Yes there is a minimum number of uteri required to sustain a community, but there is also a minimum level of investment in survival required to sustain a community and a minimum number of males required to achieve that investment through provision and protection and also produce sufficient numbers of offspring with an adequate level of genetic diversity. The minimum thresholds of investment in reproduction, survival and genetic diversity required to sustain a community, will vary across environmental conditions and habitat carrying capacities and the minimum number of males and females required to achieve those thresholds will also vary. In some environmental conditions, more males may be required than females to meet those minimum thresholds. A harsh geoclimatic environment for example may have completely different requirements to a lush jungle with an abundant food supply.

Little thought is given as to how the relative value of the contribution of males and females to sustaining a community may shift, once a community is above the minimum numbers of males and females required to sustain itself and how the relative value of those contributions may vary as a result of population size, environmental conditions and carrying capacity. A population with uteri above the minimum number required to sustain itself, may actually suffer more from losing men than women in certain contexts (provided the number of women lost does not drop below the minimum threshold required to sustain the community).

Little consideration is given to this duality in sustaining a community by reproductive reductionists. I can go on further with a list of omissions reproductive reductionists make when they use this scenario of a decimated tribe, however it should be relatively obvious by now that things are not as simple as they make them out to be. The point that I am trying to make is that human communities are systems and like any system it has components that are interdependent. Reproduction itself is not just dependent on how many uteri you have. The value in producing offspring is only realised if those offspring survive and reproduce viable and fertile offspring themselves. A tribe can produce as many infants as it wants, but if they all die from starvation, predation or a harsh winter before reaching sexual maturity, the tribe is gone.

The male contribution to providing the food, water, resources, habitation and protection to sustain a community, whilst a number of women are temporarily disabled or limited from pregnancy and preoccupied with caring for young infants and children, has a value to the community. This is particularly the case in harsh, hazardous and resource scarce geoclimatic environments, with high levels of predation, brutal winters and summers, rugged terrain and a heavy reliance on physical labour to hunt food, find water, get resources, defend against predators and build shelter. Such environments require high levels of parental investment, which means someone must devote most of their time to directly caring for the young. They also require high levels of investment in survival and high degrees of physical exertion, risk taking, exposure to hazards and a heavy reliance on spatial ability, tool marking and hunting. Simply breeding in such environments is a recipe for death and evolutionary failure.

The ecology of human communities is extraordinarily complex and cannot simply just be reduced down to how many uteri you have. The somewhat amusing thing about this scenario that a tribe with the greatest number of uteri is automatically better off, is that you can put the comments of someone in the MGTOW or MRA community promoting this, right next to the comments of a female supremacist and you would not be able to tell the difference. All radical feminists have to do is point to the same reductive arguments some MRA's and MGTOWs are putting forward to justify the righteousness and inevitably of their own gynocentric double standards to marginalise men. How long do you think you will be going your own way, before female supremacists use your own reasoning to justify your own subjugation? Just something for certain individuals (but certainly not all) in the manosphere to think about.

Let me finish off part one of this article by pointing to the reality that pedestalising women and pandering to female narcissism reduces your fertility rate. Women are naturally hypergamous and marginalising men to elevate women reduces your fertility rate. This is something both Stardusk and Paul Elam and Peter Wright have both discussed in videos linked here[7] and here[8], for the “reproduction enthusiasts”. The reality is that even if we just focus on reproductive success alone, treating women as superior and giving them undeserved respect for simply having a uterus and marginalising men, undermines the reproductive success of a community.

The remaining failings of reproductive reductionists will be discussed in part 2 of this article.

References:

1. The Normalisation Of Gynocentrism
2. The gynocentric mob and female superiority
3. Life History Theory
4. Male, Female: The Evolution of Human Sex Differences
5. Direct evidence that feminists HATE facts
6. CARTA: Culture-Gene Interactions: Peter Richerson-Culture-led Gene-culture Coevolution
7. Chasing the Dragon
8. The So Called Demographic Winter The Hypergamy Factor

Brother K and the Uncut Truth

AVfM Video Source · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How to destroy a man

AVfM Video Source · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Worth watching. PE

Ilan Srulovicz: There’s plenty to celebrate

AVfM Video Source · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Ilan Srulovicz, CEO of Egard Watch Company, demonstrates that there are better ways to capture the hearts and minds of men than by resorting to shaming narratives. Celebrating all that’s good in men and boys does great things for their wellbeing and motivation….. not to mention it can do more for the bottom line of running a business.

Egard watches available here

What really happened at the March for Men Australia

AVfM Video Source · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

International Men’s Day: Bangalore Protest

AVFM · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Once again Indian men and women lead the way in raising men’s issues on IMD. Note the excellent use of banners and their contents to spread the message.

Why Salon is wrong about The Conceptual Penis

Janice Fiamengo · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

To read the original article click here: The Conceptual Penis as a Social Construct: A Sokal-Style Hoax on Gender Studies

Twitter suspends me for ridiculing circumcision with satire

Gary Costanza · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Circumcision protest – Brother K’s story

Gary Costanza · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Baltimore Museum of Art: Mike Buchanan and Maria Beatrice Giovanardi discuss for RT International

Mike Buchanan · 10 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The following discussion (video, 11:05) took place yesterday evening. I was expecting a discussion concerning International Men's Day. We – or at least I – had no notice of what the subject matter was going to be, until it was revealed seconds before we went live. That's my excuse, and I'm sticking with it…

The War On Men

AVfM Video Source · 11 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The nature of male value and our gynocentric culture (part one)

Peter Ryan · 11 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

This article is dedicated to the multiple men that I have known who have committed suicide or attempted to commit suicide. Men always have value and something to live for, even when they think they don't, or how they are treated by society convinces them they don't.

Introduction:

The value of a human life is something that is not truly quantifiable. There is no one answer to the question on how much a human life is worth. It is a reality though, that each human life cannot be replaced and is in a sense priceless. The consciousness of a human being is unique to each individual human life. This article will be focusing on the biological value of men, but it is important to remember that all human life transcends biological value. We do not treat the disabled with less dignity or with no dignity because they are disabled. We understand that the value of human life that really has the ultimate meaning to us, does not come from the utility of the human body.

Every man and woman regardless of their abilities, has a unique a mind and a personality that conveys a unique contribution to the world. That is what we really miss when people die and that is what really forms the basis of human love. We acknowledge the real basis of the value of human life, when we consider brain death to be the death of a person. It is consciousness and not the utility of the body that ultimately matters to us. There will not be another person like you again. Our consciousness and the essence of who we are cannot be replaced.

We often do not realise the value of what we have until it is gone. Death can clarify the relative importance of many things for people (including me). A number of years ago, I watched two parents bury both their two sons. It was the saddest thing I have ever witnessed and understandably the parents were inconsolable. The sons died in an accident on their holiday in their mid-20s in the prime of their life. All of the hopes and dreams that their parents had for them, died that day. I can still remember the horrible wailing of the mother and the father, as two coffins proceeded to leave the church. I can still recall the upset I felt seeing someone I went to school with and knew had a promising future, being moved away in a coffin right past me and the finality of it all. You do not forget a tragic experience like that.

What do you say to parents that have just lost not one, but both of their two sons in a horrible accident? They can never be replaced. How many families have lost their sons at too early an age from suicide, from the effects of divorce, from fighting a war or fighting fires, or from an early accidental death or illness? The pain and sense of loss cannot be measured. Whilst we certainly can create abstract ways of measuring the value of both men and women in biological terms or otherwise, ultimately the value of human life is greater than the sum of its parts. The pain people feel from losing people they love, can be a powerful reminder of that reality.

Ultimately whether you are a man or a woman at the bottom of the distribution of utility and biological value, remember that your value as a human being transcends your utility and your biology. As I have said before, civilisation requires that we move beyond valuing human life based on its utility and biological characteristics. How quickly would civilisation descend into violent chaos if we began murdering the sick, the disabled and the elderly? Not long. We have seen how that turns out and the genocidal horrors that have unfolded from such thinking. Civilisation requires a basic unconditional level of respect for the sanctity of all human life, in order for it to function and be sustained.

So whilst I will be discussing the biological value of men in detail, please take the time to reflect on the reality that the value of human life is more than just what comes from biological value. Please take the time to reflect on how lucky you are to be alive and to simply exist, because we will all be dead one day. All of our problems and ideologies will mean little in our minds, when we face death in our final moments and are fighting for our last breath and we consider how tiny the length of our passage in this universe actually is. This is a large article and is divided into two parts, part one and part two. There is a great deal to discuss because of the amount of distortion of the truth and of the facts surrounding male value. I make no apologies for the length of this article, men deserve it.

The Biological Equality Of The Sexes:

In order for a phenotype of an organism to have value in biological terms, it must ensure sufficient copies of the genome that encoded it persist in future generations. A phenotype that results in greater copies of a genome existing after a thousand generations (or any other number of generations) than an alternative phenotype, is of a greater biological value to that genome and will be conserved to a greater degree. Biological value must also be defined in reference to the organisms investing in a phenotype and the payoff they receive from that investment.

Sex is a phenotype and parents invest in the male and female phenotype by producing male and female offspring. After any number of generations, each sex produces an exactly equal total number of copies of their parent's genome. Consequently, males and females have exactly equal biological value. This is why there is an almost equal sex ratio of males and females produced at birth in the human population and many other species. It does not pay for parents to invest in one sex over the other, because neither sex has greater biological value for the parents investing in them. This reality is explained by Fishers principle[1]. I have described the underlying evolutionary framework behind the equal biological value of the sexes at length in part one of Gynocentrism And The Value Of Men[2].

It is telling how gynocentric our society has become, when even significant numbers of people in the manosphere are convinced that women are more biologically valuable to the species because they have a uterus and think biology revolves solely or primarily around reproduction. If this truly were the case, then there would be a selective advantage from producing daughters instead of sons and female infants would outnumber male infants in the population. If reproduction was the sole or primary source of biological value, then humans and our hominid and mammalian ancestors would have eventually reverted back to asexual reproduction, or would not have evolved to sexually reproduce at all. Alternatively, our ancestors could have evolved to sexually reproduce as hermaphrodites (where all individuals of a population could gestate the fetus and fertilise each other's eggs), or at the very least would have devolved into small mammals with high rates of reproduction. None of this has happened.

As I discussed in part one of Gynocentrism And The Value Of Men, the empirical evidence, established evolutionary theory and our evolutionary history, all point in the opposite direction to the assertion that women are the more biologically valuable sex because of their uterus and that reproduction is the overwhelming driver of evolutionary success. We have literally had hundreds of millions of years for a selective preference for the female sex to win out and yet it has not. Why? Reproduction is one event in a series of events required to propagate the genome and the uterus is just one organ required to ensure continuation of the lineage. In the complex two sex biological system our genome encodes to propagate itself, there are many other requirements that must be met to ensure continuation of the genome aside from reproduction and the uterus. Reproductive success does not ensure evolutionary success and they are not synonymous. I discussed all of this in detail particularly in part one of Gynocentrism And The Golden Uterus[3] and in my further writings in part one and two on Gynocentrism And The Value Of Men.

The Sex Differences In Biological Value:

The biological value of men extends far beyond just their reproductive and genetic value in allowing sexual reproduction to occur. Males exist in our species in the form they do and contain half the human genome, precisely as a result of having equivalent biological value of their own and because reproduction is not the sole or exclusive source of biological value. The difference between males and females is not in the degree of overall biological value of each sex. The two key sexual differences in biological value, lie in the different manifestation of biological value in each sex and in the distribution of biological value among individuals of each sex. The sexes do not have to be the same to be equal in overall biological value and they do not have to be unequal in biological value to be different. This is a reality that feminists who assert that the sex differences are entirely due to socialisation and female supremacists that assert innate female biological superiority (and yes some people in the manosphere strangely hold the same belief), both fail to appreciate and understand. These principles can be illustrated with two simple analogies from modern life-

1. Two houses can be of the same monetary value and be vastly different.
2. The total wealth of two families can be equal, but the distribution of that wealth between individuals in each family can be different.

Whilst it would wrong to simply assert the lack of a uterus makes men less valuable than women, it would certainly be correct to identify this basic sex difference, as the ultimate source of the majority of all other biological sex differences. This would include the sex differences in the manifestation and distribution of male biological value compared to female biological value.

The greater rate of reproduction of the male as a result of lower reproductive investment, ensures the male population has a greater variance in biological value than the female population. The individuals that produce the greatest numbers of copies of their parent's genome are male. The individuals that produce the lowest numbers of copies of their parent's genome are male. Whilst feminists may be envious of the apex males in our society that are at the top of the social ladder that have the greatest evolutionary success, it is about time we showed some compassion for the forgotten men at the bottom of the social ladder (like the male homeless). The true value of a human life goes beyond biological value and all men regardless of their inherent biology, are deserving of being treated with dignity and respect. We afford this treatment to women and we can do the same for men.

Whilst the distribution of biological value between individuals is different for men and women, there is no difference in the total and mean biological value of each sex. Greater numbers of individual females may pass on their parent's genome, but the males that pass on their parent's genome do so at a greater rate per individual than the females do and consequently leave behind more genome copies per individual male than individual female. Despite this pattern, it is a mathematical reality that neither sex as a whole, can pass on more copies of their parent's genome than the other sex.

Men and women face different sets of selective pressures to propagate their genes as a result of only one sex being capable of gestation and this consequently results in different manifestations of biological value. Men have faced sexual and natural selective pressures women have not faced and vice versa. It would be correct to say that solely in reproductive terms, females convey greater value to the species than males. It would not be correct to say that then means females are more biologically valuable than males overall. Men and their male hominid ancestors have been shaped by millions of years of evolution to convey a survival value to the species that women cannot match. If women are the rate limiting factor of reproduction, men are the rate limiting factor of survival. Survival does impact evolutionary success, not just reproduction.

Investment in both survival and reproduction together drive evolutionary success. Activities related to survival and reproduction can often conflict with each other. Activities related to survival can often involve risks and hardships and take away energy and resources, that may conflict with the requirements of pregnancy and early child rearing. In the modern world this is less of a problem of course. However this basic life history trade-off[4] between investment in survival versus investment in reproduction, has existed for most of our evolutionary history and the evolutionary history of our ancestors. We evolved under conditions without birth control, mechanisation, electricity or modern medicine and it is a relative luxury that today the sexes are free to live differently to the paradigm our ancestors lived in for millions of years. The reality is that given the harsh selective pressures of our evolutionary past, there was a selective advantage to developing two sexes that were physiologically and psychologically adapted to specialise in either reproduction or survival, rather than being generalists that are far less effective at both.

There is especially a selective advantage, when the two sexes work together synergistically to combine their specialist abilities to perpetuate their lineage in a community, as two components in one biological system. Evolutionary gains that cannot be achieved alone by the individual males and females within a community, can be attained when males and females work cooperatively and synergistically with each other within a functional social system. This property of systems is called emergence[5] and is something which is overlooked when we reduce all of biology down to the rate of reproduction and individual reproductive success and ignore the multitude of other factors driving evolution.

Specialisation of function and the development of systems that contain components that specialise in various functions, drives efficiency. These factors have driven the evolution of multicellular life, it is why your body has multiple systems (respiratory, circulatory system etc) specialising in particular functions. It is why our economy and the superorganism known as civilisation, is driven by specialisation to maximise economic and social efficiency. Why have only one sex gestate the fetus? Efficiency from specialisation. Why have men been specifically sexually and naturally selected to contribute to the survival of their family and community? Efficiency and specialisation. Having males that contribute to survival, allows for greater investment by females in reproduction and vice versa. Having one sex specialise in survival and another sex specialise in reproduction, maximises the survival and reproductive output of the species. When men and women pool their biological capital together cooperatively in a community, this dynamic results in an emergent evolutionary success.

What Male Value Looks Like:

Male biological value does of course have a reproductive component to it and women to at least some degree, have contributed to the survival of their family and community. Whilst there is of course overlap between the sexes, with both sexes contributing to reproduction and survival, substantial sex differences do exist in their relative contributions to survival and reproduction. Each sex has its own set of adaptations that they have acquired over evolution as a result of one sex investing more in reproduction and the other sex investing more in survival. Male biological value is focused on contributing either directly or indirectly to survival. Male biological value and the male contribution to survival, manifests itself in four main ways:

1. Competition: Men are by nature competitive, they are driven to strive for status and compete. The result of that competition often leads to innovation and social and economic developments that further the survival of society. Of course we only hear of the negative and destructive aspects of male competition and never about the positive aspects of male competition. The reality is that we would not have a functioning economy or even civilisation without competition. It is also worth reflecting on the basic fact that the world is a harsh place and playing it safe and playing it nice, does not always led to the required outcome. Even the more destructive aspects of male competition can have a positive output when applied correctly.

2. Collaboration: Men cooperate with other men to develop, run, maintain and protect civilisation and to make the discoveries and drive the innovation and exploration to further civilisation. It is frequently overlooked that the “patriarchy” or the social dominance hierarchy that men live and work in, functions only because men cooperate with each other. Patriarchy is not all about competition. Men compete but they do so within a system of male cooperation and within established rules and norms. Men work in teams in sport, in business, in the military, in science, in emergency services and a multitude of other domains. The combined efforts of thousands of men have built cities, civilisations, all of our modern infrastructure, won wars and driven humanity into space.

3. Protection and Provision For Family: Men contribute to the survival of the family. Men have been sexually selected to protect and provide for their progeny and partner. For most of human history and prehistory, male provision and protection has frequently meant the difference between their progeny and their partner living or dying, or at least thriving versus struggling to survive.

4. Paternal Investment: Men contribute to the raising of children. This is frequently overlooked in our modern culture which pretends that fatherhood conveys no benefit, despite the overwhelming empirical evidence to the contrary.

All of these four dimensions of male value produce an enormous emergent benefit when the value of individual males is pooled collectively. An emergent benefit that civilisation depends on for its continued existence. Think for a moment about the combined intergenerational consequences of all the fatherless households in Western civilisation, on the future social stability and the economy of our countries. The description of these four dimensions, is by no means exhaustive and I could go into much greater detail describing all the ways men contribute to the survival of the species and civilisation.

The reality is that males are driven by testosterone and other factors to strive for status and to engage in behaviours that enhance the survival of their families, their communities and their civilisation. Men have acquired physical and psychological traits and developed specific biological strengths from a combination of sexual and natural selective pressures, to contribute to survival. These are biological facts and no matter how hard ideologues attempt to smear men and demonise them, the good in men and the value in men will keep rising to the surface.

Of course contributing to survival is not exclusive to men and neither is contributing to reproduction exclusive to women. However the reality is that men do contribute to community survival to a much greater degree than women, just as women contribute a great deal more to reproduction. The difference in the investment each sex makes in survival and reproduction is interconnected and interdependent. The male investment in survival supports and allows the greater female investment in reproduction and vice versa. These are realities that feminists will never acknowledge: Women in general do not make up the majority of workers that are doing the bulk of the risky, hazardous and dirty work, the work done in remote locations or night work and working the 50+ hour a week jobs. Despite more than 50 years of feminist social engineering, none of the following realities have changed:

- Men design, build, maintain, renovate and demolish the vast bulk of the thousands of physical structures (buildings, infrastructure, housing, roads, rail etc) that comprise our towns and cities.
- Men run the vast bulk of our essential infrastructure that supplies our towns and cities with electricity, water, gas and petrol.
- Men design, build and repair the majority of our machines, cars, planes, trains, boats, spacecraft and electrical gadgets etc.
- Men are running and maintaining our farms, abattoirs, fishing industry and dams and making sure our towns and cities remain adequately provisioned with food and water.
- Men are running and maintaining our oil rigs, mines, refineries, factories and warehouses.
- Men are the majority of our plumbers, electricians, mechanics and technicians.
- Men run the vast bulk of our waste management that ensures our towns and cities remain clean and healthy. Men make sure we have a working sewage system, recycling, hard rubbish and garbage collection.
- Men ensure the continuous transport of goods between towns and cities. Unseen men work on our container ships, on freight trains and on planes shipping goods all over the planet. They are on the road driving our trucks and keeping our supermarkets stocked with food.
- Men are the majority of our military, coast guard, police, firefighters and emergency service workers.
- Men remain the spearhead of innovation. Men are the majority of our inventors, Nobel laureates and Fields medallists. The major technological innovations, scientific discoveries, the majority of patents and the majority of the political, economic and social developments of our time, are the result of men. It was men that invented the light bulb, the aeroplane, the car, the radio, the television, the modern computer, developed the internet, developed most of our machinery and electrical gadgets and discovered antibiotics etc. It is male genius that is the reason why we have a population of 7 billion people living in electrified cities and not a couple of 100 million people living in caves. The reality is that the bulk of the intellectually gifted are men (men dominate the upper ranges of the IQ distribution), just as the bulk of the strongest and fittest people are men. Male intellect is a reality that feminist infested academia has tried to ignore, whilst asserting men and boys are somehow defective. I do not know how long this video[6] will remain up before it is taken down by feminist and sjw censors, but every person that has been told men and boys are stupid and bought into that lie, should watch it.
- Men are the majority of our leaders. They are the majority of our entrepeneurs, business leaders, thought leaders, leading scientists and politicians. Men have largely been responsible for starting the majority of new industries and academic disciplines (and subdisciplines), including social media platforms on the internet now taken over by feminists. Men are prepared to take massive risks, take massive responsibilities, present new revolutionary ideas that do not conform to established peer consensus at the risk of ridicule and work long hours often at the expense of the rest of their lives. This is the reality that feminists will not accept when it comes to acknowledging the cost of leadership on the individual and the personal cost of extreme feats of creative brilliance and the relative dearth of women in such pursuits.

- We could then look at the male contribution to music, writing, art, drama, philosophy and sport. I do not think I have to list the names of every man and their contribution. Imagine if there was no Shakespeare, no John Lennon, no Michelangelo and no Socrates. Men have shaped our culture in ways that have lasted thousands of years (like Jesus Christ and Buddha). Men have also invented new forms of art, music, drama, philosophy and sport and our society is much richer, more developed and more civilised because of their contribution. The male contribution to these areas in the last 50 years is staggering on its own.
- Men pay the bulk of government taxes and are the bulk of our full-time employed workforce. Men work in industries essential for maintaining GDP and that support service sector industries and government sector occupations the majority of women work in. Men either directly or indirectly finance the bulk of female consumer spending, by either providing women with the household finances directly, or indirectly through government welfare, or by working in industries that make female dominated occupations economically and technologically possible.
- Finally men are our fathers and are critical to raising physically and psychologically healthy children, with a prosperous and bright future. Fatherlessness and the breakdown of the family in the last 50 years, has done nothing but provide ample evidence for the importance of fathers.

The reality is that these differences in representation between men and women that I have just described, do at least in part reflect innate physical and psychological strengths men have over women in terms of their biology. Just as I mentioned in the previous description on the dimensions of male value, this list could be pages long and we could go through a similar list for men with our prehistory. Think for a moment about the huge impact the male contribution to survival in our history and prehistory has had on our evolutionary success and the capacity to pass on our genes.

Men have done and continue to do the work that women either cannot do or do not want to do. That is the unspoken taboo which our gynocentric society will not acknowledge until it is faced with a crisis of unimaginable proportions from placing female well-being above male well-being for decades and throwing men under the bus. Men are not superior to women and women are not superior to men, but we need to recognise that each sex has its own unique contribution to society and respect the value of both sexes and not just pedestalise women.

How many women are going to work in a sewage treatment plant? Let us be honest here. How many women are going to work on powerlines and in mines? How many women are going to work in garbage collection? How many women are going to risk their lives in actual combat or fighting fires? Men often do these things for their family and for their society, with little recognition or reward and while they are being told they are obsolete[7]. Many of the men keeping society running are invisible to society, but if they stepped away from their jobs for just one day, society would grind to a halt. That is the scary reality that is one of the factors that drives society out of fear, to con men into believing they have no value when it is the exact opposite.

The simple reality is that men do have strengths relative to women, just as women have strengths relative to men and men do things that women cannot or will not do, just as women do things men cannot or will not do. This man-hating culture does its very best to either ignore, downplay or attack these realities when it does not conform to the gynocentric overton window of female superiority. I could go through the list of valuable physical and psychological attributes that men possess to a greater degree than women, but that should not be necessary.

Yes in certain traits men are better equipped than women and can engage in particular activities with greater performance. We can also say the same about women in certain respects in relation to men and yet only that reality is politically correct to say in this gynocentric culture. Men are not allowed to be better than women at anything, but women are allowed to be better than men at everything. You can see this double standard play out socially on the street[8] and even politically[9] with President Donald Trump (the supposed "misogynist"). It is socially taboo to state men are better than women at anything of meaningful value in this gynocentric culture, which revolves around worshipping anything female and belittling men.

Whether people like it or not, there are certain biological realities we cannot deny and if we do continue to deny them, reality will eventually assert itself at our peril and threaten the economic and social future of society itself. Whatever social and legal barriers that may have held women back, have been removed and women have had at least 50 years to make use of all of the same opportunities men have had. Women and girls have also benefited from numerous affirmative action programs and policies in employment and education, that have placed women and girls above men and boys. Despite all of that and the massive preferential treatment women and girls have been given for decades, women have not overtaken men in any of the areas I described earlier and there is no sign that is going to change. We need to accept biological reality at some point. The sexes are biologically equal in overall value and equal before the law, but the sexes are also different. Neither sex is superior or inferior, just different.

If we want to understand and identify male biological value, we don't have to go through the long list of valuable physical and psychological attributes men have in greater abundance than women (again for the insecure nit-pickers, women have their own set of strengths). Just open your eyes and look at the world and reflect on what happens if men disappeared for a day and we had a day without men. If male strengths offend some women, they may want to consider that women at the very least have played a role in sexually selecting men with such strengths and that ironically women have partly themselves to blame if they are offended by male competence. You selected such males as mates for millions of years! Male competence is attractive to women and sometimes like female beauty, it can intimidate some members of the other sex (and sometimes members of the same sex, like feminists who seem to have a problem with both male competence and female beauty).

There are those that will assert that technological automation and robotics will make men redundant. The same logic can be applied to women. Technology can make women just as redundant as men. Artificial uteri and artificially induced male eggs, can eventually replace female reproduction. Artificial intelligence, automation and robotics can also replace female dominated work. However this reasoning fails to account for a regular pattern observed throughout history. With all technological change new work has emerged. Men have shifted to new work and new economies multiple times over the decades and centuries.

Rather than technology making men redundant, men will simply contribute to the survival and prosperity of their communities in other ways as they have done before. Men have demonstrated a robust capacity to shift to new activities throughout history and often have been the ones pioneering new lines of work and new economies and industries. Women have been the ones following male ingenuity and pioneering, not the other way around. The capacity of men to adapt to a shifting environment and still contribute to their community, has been demonstrable throughout history. Even today despite all of this "end of men" female supremacist chest beating, we can see that it is men that comprise the majority of those that are at the spearhead of new lines of work. Regardless as to what the future may hold, as I mentioned at the start of this article, the value of human life for both men and women is greater than either their survival or reproductive utility.

Please continue now to part two of this article.

References:

1. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fisher%27s_principle
2. https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-one/
3. https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-golden-uterus-part-one/
4. https://www.nature.com/scitable/knowledge/library/life-history-evolution-68245673/
5. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Emergence

6. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tSLoiFSpp0g
7. https://www.amazon.com/End-Men-Rise-Women/dp/1594488045
8. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oxpX6IQ3GY4
9. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KmY5LmaZImk

Red pill isolation

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism’s only standards are double standards

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Femspreading is spreading

Doug Mortimer · 12 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

You all remember the scourge of manspreading, i.e., men sitting with their legs wide apart in public areas, notably on subways and buses, and supposedly taking up more space than they deserve (in other words, acting privileged).

If it seems like that topic has been put on the back burner, there is a good reason. Let's call it femspreading – but it's neither a matter of female empowerment nor the result of a feminist think tank. Rather, femspreading is being promoted by a female orthopedic surgeon who began pondering the pain in her own aging joints.

Dr. Barbara Bergin, one of the founders of Texas Orthopedic Sports and Rehabilitation Associates in Austin, encourages women to sit like a man. To that end, she has coined the acronym S.L.A.M. (Sit Like a Man). In fact, the acronym has been trademarked, so technically it is S.L.A.M.™

When a man sits with his legs together the potential discomfort to the genitalia is obvious. That's why you don't see it very often. Unfortunately, rowers and weightlifters have to contend with it. I seem to recall Pee Wee Herman usually sitting with his knees together, but that's hardly a recommendation.

Since the female genitalia are mostly internal, sitting with her legs together shouldn't be a problem for a woman…but it is because her pelvis is wider than a man's. Consequently, a woman who habitually sits with her legs together is more likely to be knock-kneed than a man. Contemporary fashions and female seating habits assure problems, though crossing the ankles may alleviate the discomfort somewhat.

When women cross their legs or sit with their knees together, their femurs/thighbones have to revolve inwardly – more so than men's femurs/thighbones. Men who are given to sitting with their knees together or their legs crossed will be less likely to suffer from long-term damage because they have narrower hips and their legs don't rotate inwardly as much.

Pointing out any sort of sexual difference, even the most obvious, is discouraged these days. I don't want to resurrect the old phrase "anatomy is destiny" (first uttered by Freud in 1912), but I certainly believe that "anatomy is reality" – the bleatings of the gender-fluid crowd notwithstanding.

Over time, the hip and knee joints bear the brunt of sitting with one's knees together or legs crossed. Given the higher participation rate of females in athletics today, increased hip and knee problems can be expected, but who knew you could damage those joints just by sitting? Yet the problem isn't new. In fact, it goes back a century.

The loosening of manners and mores in the 1920s resulted in more women "spreading their legs" before marriage, but the short skirts of the flappers dictated that women sit modestly, i.e., with their legs together. The miniskirts of the 1960s, not to mention micro-miniskirts, dictated a knees-together posture when sitting to avoid putting on free shows. Exhibit A: Sharon Stone in the famous interrogation scene in the movie Basic Instinct (1992).

Spreading one's legs has long been a euphemism for yielding to sex; conversely, keeping one's legs together means refusing sex. Famously, in 2017 Canadian judge Robin Camp was forced to resign after the uproar concerning his comments during a rape trial, when he asked why the complainant didn't keep her knees together.

Short skirts occupy a bipolar place in the women's movement. One faction asserts that they turn women into sex objects; another asserts that such attire is symbolic of female emancipation, empowerment, and sexuality. No question that they offered young women with great gams (a nifty but probably outdated slang term for legs) to strut their stuff. Unfortunately, there is a price to be paid for this later in life when aches and pains start to appear. Does this mean that young women will get the message and convert to maxiskirts? Don't count on it.

It's long been a popular economic theory that hemlines rise when the economy heats up, and they fall when the economy goes south. I once had a professor who asserted that hemlines rose or fell according to the difficulty of finding a husband. Well, given all the lamentations about where all the good men have gone, if the professor's theory is correct, there's no chance short skirts will disappear any time soon. In the long run, a Muslim takeover would surely be a game-changer fashion-wise. Of course, the fashion mavens could decide that the Amish look is all the rage. Stranger fads have happened.

That may sound far-fetched, but fashion trends are irrational; health, functionality, and comfort always take a back seat. As a corollary, no fashion trend is so ridiculous (e.g., ripped blue jeans), ugly (spiky dykey hairdos), or uncomfortable (stiletto heels) that women will reject it. So short skirts are not going away. They allow a woman to have it both ways: by wearing a miniskirt she advertises herself as a Thoroughly Modern Millie; by crossing her legs or keeping her knees together, she signals to all present that she is still a lady…at least in public.

By promoting S.L.A.M.™, Dr. Bergin is not recommending that women sit like a Hustler centerfold. Rather, she recommends sitting with legs in the 11 and 1 o'clock positions – the way most men sit most of the time. This allows the outer thigh to relax and lessens the chance for hip and knee problems down the line.

I suppose, as with every other woe women complain of, they will find a way to blame it on men. After all, if there was no such thing as the male gaze, would short skirts have become so popular? If it wasn't for the male libido, would women have to sit with their legs together?

In the meantime, it may well be that male cucks may start a movement to show solidarity with women by sitting like them. There are many possible acronyms here:

S.L.A.B. (Sit Like a Bitch)

S.L.A.G. (Sit Like a Girl)

S.L.A.P. (Sit Like a Pussy)

S.L.A.V. (Sit Like a Virgin)

S.L.A.W. (Sit Like a Woman)

My aging testicles ache just thinking about it.

Psychotic chivalry at University of Portland

Peter Wright · 12 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I take “The Elephant in the Hospital*” out for a walk; nuts emerge, and not just acorns.

Gary Costanza · 12 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Many of us know that the eradication of Male Genital Mutilation is a slow process that faces huge obstacles that are apparent when confronting the public and medical establishment. Gynocentrism is one of these, as is apparent on my protests.

This issue is the most low hanging fruit of the men’s movement, and it must be pushed to the forefront of peoples minds, as the law is ignoring the screams of millions of baby boys.

So, like many others, I’ve taken to the streets to confront people out with their families with “The Elephant in the Room,” the mutilation done by them and the medical establishment that pushes it on them.

Below is my video of one of those protests.

I’m forcing them to confront their demons, resulting in a knee’jerk reaction to defend what they did to their sons or what was done to them, as evidenced by the guy who spit on my sign and another who hit my camera in anger. Another guy provided the drama when he tried to eject me and in so doing provided us with a classic example of the “Streisand Effect.”

Although I encounter much idiocy and ignorance, there are those with knowledge, compassion and insight.

I talked to some who have rejected circumcision for their boys, which proves that the tipping point is approaching where over half of American boys will be intact, which will encourage people to speak out, and along with an informed public this thing will finally bite the dust.

In my public protests, I’m forcing people to face the issue, almost forcing them them to take sides; they then are forced to defend their reasons to circumcise , however twisted they may be. Even better, I’m forcing some families to explain or at least to say something to the kids about this “man with the signs,” “what is he talking about?” or even “mommy, what’s circumcision?”

Progress.

*Iconic anti-MGM video “The Elephant in the Hospital”

A tale of two strifes

AVfM Video Source · 13 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

South Carolina family court Judge Rochelle Conits displays why SC needs judicial reform

Dion McNeil · 13 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

This is the story of a combat veteran, a father falsely accused of sexual assault, a convicted felon and a family court judge.

Suppose for a second we have a court case that is well documented and well outlined. Suppose we have a court case involving a family court judge where the litigant involved appealed the case and got part of the case completely vacated as a result. Now, suppose there was a judge who, some in South Carolina have said, has a clear issue with understanding parental rights and the law.

You don't have to suppose anymore. We have such a judge and that judge is Rochelle Conits.

This woman punished a combat veteran returning home from Iraq and made him pay $4000 monthly for child support. In the case of Scott Roesler v. Sara Roesler it was Judge Conits who decided that Sara Roesler physically assaulted Scott Roesler and admitted to such in court yet Judge Conits saw fit to make this man pay $4000 a month for child support.

Yes, that's right. A judge essentially agreed the wife involved here was the abuser but punished the abused as if they were the perpetrator. "The best interest of the child" is surely better served with the person who isn't being divorced and granted that divorce based on physical cruelty.

The reason why his child support is so high is because Mr. Roesler is a combat veteran who served in Iraq. He made a lot of money while deployed but that doesn't mean the money transferred over once he no longer held that position. This is what happens to a lot of combat veterans, especially men, in this state and we've covered this already on the Daily Caller. This story is, sadly, not that uncommon or unusual. Many veterans in the state of South Carolina end up homeless thanks to the family courts.

If anyone would like to know why then review the following quote from the legal documents to show how reasonable Mrs. Roesler could be.

> In October 2007, the family returned to Texas to pack up their household goods. According to Husband, Wife was upset about leaving "anything behind in the house." Wife insisted the pool slide, pool heater, light fixtures, door handles, two French doors, and built-in cabinets be packed.[2] Husband explained the house was in or about to enter foreclosure and "the expectation was . . . we were not going to be able to afford to stay in that house anyhow." As part of a corporate relocation program, Fluor paid a moving company to move the family's household goods from Texas to South Carolina and store the goods in South Carolina.
>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4906.html

What the above demonstrates is the kind of woman Mrs. Roesler was. She was upset that the family didn't have as much cash as usual and didn't care that her husband at the time might be suffering through a range of issues and it wasn't his fault that money couldn't grow on trees.

Mrs. Roesler somehow got physical custody of the children despite her apparent physical cruelty and our combat veteran only gets to see his kids for two weeks out of the year. One would think that if Judge Conits granted a divorce based on physical cruelty that she wouldn't allow custody to go towards a woman, Mrs. Roesler in this case, who initiated that physical cruelty.

> Shortly thereafter, a dispute arose between Husband and Wife over money and whether they were able to afford the Greer house. Wife began hitting and slapping Husband. Husband left the hotel and Wife followed. As Husband attempted to leave the parking lot in his car, Wife used her car to push Husband's car > approximately six feet onto the curb to prevent him from leaving. Wife exited her vehicle and began tossing items from Husband's trunk.

>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4906.html

The wife actually admitted to a lot of this. She was so bold that she didn't hide what she did because she appeared to be under the impression that South Carolina courts aren't exactly known for coming down hard on women even when the woman in question absolutely deserves it.

> Husband and Wife attempted to reconcile, and the family went bowling on New Year's Eve 2007. Upon returning home, Husband and Wife became involved in an argument in front of Child. Wife attempted to hit Husband's head against the wall. Husband explained Wife did not attempt to "physically damage" his head, but was "very, very physical demonstrative of making a point." The argument dissipated, and although Husband considered leaving Wife, he remained in the home because of Child. However, shortly thereafter another argument occurred and Husband left the home.
>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4906.html

Imagine how this would be explained by Judge Conits had it been Mr. Roesler and not Mrs. Roesler who was performing the assaults. This is why men don't bother reporting. What's the point in reporting the assault, getting the judge to grant a divorce based on physical cruelty and yet somehow the abuser gets the kids and the abused has to pay $4000 a month as a combat veteran? Judge Conits demonstrates why men have been silent about their abuse. After all, one could say those men have 4000 reasons a month to not come forward.

> Afterwards, Husband and Wife talked for approximately thirty minutes before Wife began hitting Husband. Husband attempted to leave a second time; however, Wife jumped onto the hood of his car and forcibly removed a windshield wiper blade which she used to strike Husband several times. Thereafter, Husband requested the hotel's front desk staff call the police. Wife was arrested, and Husband bailed Wife out of jail the next morning.
>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4906.html

In fact, this case provides a perfect example of what happens when it is the mother who is physically cruel and when Judges like Judge Conits are involved who, some have said, clearly demonstrates a bias towards mothers.

> The family court's final order granted Husband a divorce on the grounds of physical cruelty, awarded Wife custody of Child, allowed Husband two weeks visitation per year, ordered Husband to pay $4,000 per month in child support, and equitably divided the parties' marital property. No alimony was awarded. This appeal followed.
>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4906.html

Judge Rochelle Conits

Yes, our wounded warriors, once again as our reporting as revealed are being punished via these family court judges who see our bravest as nothing more than cash wells. Judge Conits essentially admitted to what Mrs. Roesler did via the granting of a divorce citing physical cruelty and yet, some could say, the lack of response from this judge shows why such admissions are a joke in the state of South Carolina. Some have said that if judges such as Rochelle Conits want people to believe she isn't just another judge with deep seated issues of a superiority complex to men or a disdain for fathers who question her then she could make sure that her rulings reflect that.

Take the case of the South Carolina Department of Social Services versus Mary Clark that was an appeal from a decision made by Judge Conits.

Some in South Carolina show the case of Mary Clark and how Judge Conits appeared to give her preference despite the facts involved in the case as a shining example of gender bias in the South Carolina family courts.

For example, the father involved in the Mary Clark case, Daniel Clark, was being accused of sexually abusing his own daughter. Now, if a person accuses another of sexual assault and if that assault has not been proven to be true then it is either the truth or a lie. In this case, even a complete fool would have to agree that a lot of lies were being told here and there is more than enough reason to question the accuser in this case. Judge Conits? Well, she had less questions than we did at the Daily Counter.

These accusations came despite testimony from other children that were biological to Mr. Clark testifying that they were never abused by their father.

> "Father's two daughters, Jacqueline and Victoria, testified at trial. Both strongly denied that Father had ever acted inappropriately, either towards them or towards Anna G. Jacqueline, who was twenty on the date of trial, stated both she and her sister had a close relationship with Anna G. Jacqueline stated she had slept in the same bed with Father and had also slept in the same bed with Anna G. and her sister, Victoria, but nothing inappropriate happened during those times, and at no point had he ever sexually abused her. Jacqueline also testified she had never seen Anna G. act out as she had in the presence of Mother or her therapist. Father's older daughter, Victoria, who was twenty-two at the time of the hearing, stated Father was loving and caring and taught his daughters how to be responsible. Victoria testified that because she works with young children as an early childhood major, she knows the differences between "what's curious . . . [and] what's weird. [Anna G.] act[s] just as normal with me as everybody else." Victoria stated while she considered herself "friends" > with Mother before the sexual abuse allegations arose, she considered Mother to be overbearing and overprotective, particularly with her instructions to Father on how to parent and care for Anna G. while in Father's custody.

>
> Father's ex-wife, Gwendolyn C., also testified at the intervention hearing. She stated that despite being divorced, she and Father raised Jacqueline and Victoria together, and she never had any reason to believe he inappropriately touched one of their children. While Gwendolyn stated she had to seek court action to require Father to pay child support, she said he was a good father to her daughters and to Anna G. and that based on her observations, Anna G. was extremely affectionate towards and attached to Father."
>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4891.html

The pediatrician involved said nothing happened that would lead them to believe sexual abuse was happening.

> "Dr. Tracy Butcher, Anna G.'s pediatrician, also testified at the intervention hearing. She stated Mother had brought Anna G. to her office for numerous health and allergy issues since Anna G. was born. Mother reported Anna G. suffered from nightmares and sleeping disturbances as early as May 2006, but Dr. Butcher stated Mother's concerns over these issues escalated after overnight visitation commenced. Dr. Butcher testified she was concerned that Anna G. was still breastfeeding at twenty-four months because the child was using this to manipulate Mother. When questioned on cross-examination, Dr. Butcher testified she never observed any indicators that Anna G. was being sexually abused."
>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4891.html

In other words, a man who appears to have been falsely accused of sexually assaulting his own daughter was forced to pay for attorney fees to his attorney. That is insane because this man only got such an expensive attorney because he was being accused of sexually assaulting his own daughter and would've gotten a less expensive attorney had that factor not been present. In other words, you can't accuse someone of Russian spying with expert after expert searching into you and get a lawyer that earned their law degree from the back of a Cracker Jacks box. No, you're going to hire someone who knows what they're doing and the fact you had to hire that person despite being falsely accused should be considered in terms of granting attorney fees.

> "Father did not appeal the family court's decision to require him to contribute towards the attorney's fees or the GAL fees. Thus, the family court's ruling is law of the case as it pertains to Father. See In re Morrison, 321 S.C. 370, 372 n.2, 468 S.E.2d 651, 652 n.2 (1996) (noting an unappealed ruling becomes law of the case and precludes further consideration of the issue on appeal)."
>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4891.html

Yes, you read that correctly.

A man who was falsely accused of things he clearly didn't do, was never arrested for and is a very serious offense has to pay for his own attorney just to see his own child. Once Mr. Clark was accused of sexually assaulting his own child then he wasn't allowed to be around the child for more than a year while the messy legal proceedings carried through in the South Carolina family court system. While the South Carolina Department of Social Services conducted an investigation Mr. Clark's parental rights were suspended. His rights were suspended, not based on an arrest or conviction, but because he was merely accused.

In fact, there is something else that the South Carolina Court of Appeals noted.

> "While Mother clearly cares greatly for her child, we agree with the family court's finding that the conflict in the parties' parenting skills and Mother's desire to micromanage Father's visitation with Anna G. has partially contributed to the circumstances surrounding these allegations. Moreover, we find it troubling, as did the > family court, that Anna G. continued to "display the level of sexualized behavior and distress after having absolutely no contact or visitation with [Father] in over one full year.""

>
> https://law.justia.com/cases/south-carolina/court-of-appeals/2011/4891.html

This child was just three years old at the time. That means that her father not even being around during the time that she exhibited "sexualized behavior" would only further demonstrate that Mr. Clark couldn't have possibly molested her with the lack of physical evidence, observable evidence and testimony from professional witnesses. Not only was this man's parental rights suspended based on mere accusations but the attorney fees he was seeking for having to take his accuser to court weren't even granted to him. He did everything right and yet Judge Conits decided that his plea just wasn't good enough.

Perhaps if Mr. Clark had a vagina he would've received a little more from the likes of Judge Conits. After all, it didn't take much to have his parental rights terminated like he is in some judicial form of time-out for offenses he wasn't even charged with. Protecting children is one thing but this cannot be the response every time a man is accused of something horrible. If this is allowed to stand then that means anyone, for any reason, could just accuse you over and over again of sexually assaulting your children.

Take the case of Andrew Jack Myers and minor daughter. Incarceration doesn't automatically mean the termination of parental rights in any state or territory and isn't usually the sole reasoning provided for termination of rights. However, Judge Conits decided to terminate this man's rights even though he had expressed a desire to be involved in the life of his daughter.

We are not going to defend some of the things that Andrew Jack Myers has done, been convicted of and certainly not the example that he could potentially set for a young child. However, as the saying goes, the "law is the law" and Judge Conits demonstrated that she didn't understand the law and thus when Andrew Jack Myers appealed the decision to terminate his parental rights as he was incarcerated during the time of the family court hearing and couldn't be present we find out that the South Carolina court of appeals mostly agreed with Mr. Myers.

In fact, according to Fox News the South Carolina Court of Appeals even gave a written decision with an entire court document we will provide here.

Quoted from the Fox News article:

> "Following his release in November, Myers appealed the adoption order and an appellate court judge agreed, citing a previous ruling that said incarceration was not enough reason to terminate a parent's rights.
>
> "We vacate the family court's finding that father's consent was not required for the adoption and the family court's order granting foster parents adoption of child," reads the appellate court opinion. "We find the record does not contain clear and convincing evidence showing father willfully failed to visit child.""
>
> Fox News. https://www.foxnews.com/us/south-carolina-parents-in-fight-to-keep-adopted-child-take-case-to-state-supreme-court

The simple fact is that, because of this judge's reckless and careless decision-making from the bench, a little girl had to get dragged into a controversial legal case that took a small town case and thrust that case into the national spotlight. Had Judge Conits not terminated Mr. Myers rights and allowed him to at least visit his child with standard visitation upon release then perhaps this whole situation wouldn't be occurring. It doesn't matter if the man is a convicted felon or not. Being a felon doesn't magically make him a person who doesn't deserve to see his kid after he has paid his debt to society.

If the person reading this believes we are showing too much deference to a man who is a convicted felon there is something else that Fox News revealed that Judge Conits said. This statement displays the highest levels of cruelty and callous disregard for basic human empathy.

Quote from the Fox News article:

> "Mr. Myers has willfully failed to support the child," she wrote in the final order. "He never paid any support for the child, despite having the ability and discretion to do so from funds in his commissary account."
>
> Judge Rochelle Conits quoted by Fox News. https://www.foxnews.com/us/south-carolina-parents-in-fight-to-keep-adopted-child-take-case-to-state-supreme-court

It doesn't matter if this man is a convicted felon or not. Expecting someone to pay child support with commissary funds is a bit ridiculous. Many prisoners use those funds to eat food when the prison food is less than edible. Those commissary funds are also the only real flow of currency. An inmate without commissary funds to pay off prison yard bullies, gangs, and other prison entities can find their very lives being in danger. That's the context behind why some prisoners elect to keep a healthy commissary balance. For prisoners who aren't the best fighters, most connected or protected by a gang survival can depend on that commissary fund.

If someone is incarcerated they're paying their debt to society and it is more than reasonable for that person to not have parental rights while incarcerated. However, shouldn't rights be restored once the debt to society has been paid in full? Is there never a point where even someone like Mr. Myers can face forgiveness? Should he walk around with a Scarlet Letter for the rest of his life and never get a chance to be involved in his daughter's life? Excluding him from the life of his kid and not allowing him the same rights as any other parent certainly wouldn't assist him in having a reason to not re-offend.

It doesn't matter what Mr. Myers did in the past. The fact that the South Carolina Court of Appeals vacated her decision demonstrates why some believe she has a fundamental lack of understanding when it comes to law, decency in judgement from the bench and the lacks the mental temperament for such a position. Others have said that when it comes to her judicial results if someone were just looking into the results that her work speaks for itself. The speaking that work would do, many South Carolinians fear, is flawed.

We have witnessed the results of multiple cases that spans multiple sensibilities. Even if you cannot identify with a convicted felon you couldn't just dismiss a combat veteran and another man who was clearly falsely accused of something he hasn't done.

What these cases show is that Judge Rochelle Conits shouldn't have been the judge in any of these cases. In fact, she shouldn't be a judge at all. She treated the bravest of us (a combat veteran), the most underappreciated of us (the hard-working father falsely accused) and even, what some would call, the worst of us (a convicted felon) all like they're less than human. The difference isn't the social status in life these men have but the difference is that these people are men.

You'll notice there aren't many complaints from female litigants directed towards Judge Conits. After all, if one were to ask Mark Roesler, he would probably say that Judge Conits will allow a female litigant to beat the hell out of you, she grant a divorce based on physical cruelty but it is somehow you the abused who sees their children the least and pays the most for their upkeep.

Judges that shouldn't be on the bench don't make bad decisions back to back. No, these people have a tendency to stagger their decisions. Act right for a few and expel judicial diarrhea on the rest. That appears to be the pattern of Judge Rochelle Conits. Unfortunately for this judge, as we promised, there is a new sheriff in town and this person doesn't mind doing the one thing most journalists don't like doing and that's reading through every court document.

Dion McNeil is a 29 year old expecting father to a newborn. He's married and will be a stay at home dad. He's a blogger, writer and general enthusiast for video games, comic books, fantasy and social issues.

Hungary Takes On the Feminist Goliath—and Wins

David Solway · 13 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism is a social and political movement. It is not an academic discipline on par with, say, mathematics, economics, business administration, engineering or physics. Gender studies, feminism's academic wing, does not constitute an appropriate subject for an academic degree. At best it is a subset of a complex of ideas, issues, and events properly canvassed by the History Department, along with a myriad other themes and developments in the study of Western civilization.

Moreover, such programs have no business infesting legitimate areas of study to the extent that an astronomer must sign an affidavit attesting to his involvement in social justice projects or an engineer proclaim his fealty to the feminist manifesto if he is to be considered for promotion. The same proviso applies to any applicant for a university position. It should be obvious that gender programs and initiatives have nothing to do with mapping the universe, finding a cure for cancer, investigating quantum entanglement or stochastic electrodynamics, studying the economic effects of the Protestant Reformation, assessing the impact of political theories from Plato and Aristotle to the present, resolving truss and anchorage problems in suspension bridge engineering, tracing the history of epic poetry from Homer to Michael Lind's The Alamo, or any canonical field of authentic endeavor. The fact that a bogus discipline, which has no reason for existing sui generis, can spread outward to influence and dilute genuine subjects is beyond comprehension.

Enter Hungary. In an effort to restore curricular and administrative sanity to university education, Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orban and his Fidesz Party have passed legislation to abolish Gender Studies as an area of official study. Hungary's Deputy Prime Minister Zsolt Semjen has stated that such programs "ha[ve] no business in universities" as they represent "an ideology, not a science," with a market profile "close to zero." Similarly, Orban's Chief of staff Gergely Gulyas said, "The Hungarian government is of the clear view that people are born either men or women. They lead their lives the way they think best [and] the Hungarian state does not wish to spend public funds on education in this area."

According to reports, Fidesz spokesman Istvan Hollik, echoing Semjen, brought in the economic argument, pointing to the obvious fact that "You don't have to be an expert to see there's not much demand in the labour market for gender studies." But the core of the issue goes deeper. "It is also no secret that our goal is to make Hungary a truly Christian-democratic country, which defends its normality and life and values…And now there's this situation with gender studies, which is not a science but an ideology and one which is closely linked to liberal ideology, and I don't think it fits in here."

Of course, such efforts to abolish clearly non-academic programs from the university will be considered an authoritarian and anti-democratic putsch by such bastions of liberal/left propaganda as the Harvard Journal of Law & Gender. The policy is naturally opposed by the Hungary-based Soros-funded CEU (Central European University), which sees the move as an "attempt at censoring academic curricula." The University, after all, is sacred ground. By these lights the German universities of the 1930s were well within their mandate to espouse and promote the doctrines of Nazi ideology, adopted in the name of progress, justice, and freedom from oppression.

Viktor Orban

Orban's surgical strike against the CEU is better understood as a reasonable effort to limit Soros' totalitarian meddling in the education and conduct of an independent democratic nation. Orban realizes that what he calls the "Soros Plan" entails "transforming Europe and moving it towards a post-Christian and post-national era." The CEU has now relocated its Budapest campus to Vienna where it can persist unmolested in its aim to undermine Western civilization.

Criticism continues to pour in from all the predictable quarters. "Every undemocratic government wants to control the knowledge production and sexuality, which explains why gender studies become the target in the first place," said Andrea Peto, a professor of gender studies at Central European University. But Peto's critique is clearly applicable to liberal/democratic governments across the West, which allow for no counter-proposals and are busy suppressing legitimate resistance or debate. Some democracy! As Ryszard Legutko points out in his brilliant The Demon in Democracy: Totalitarian Temptations in Free Societies, "there is some interplay between liberal democracy and communism…a stifling atmosphere typical of a political monopoly…imposing uniformity of views, behavior and language." His lengthy exegesis of our current "liberal-democratic system," as distinguished from traditional liberal democracy, seems irrefutable.

Writing in the progressivist journal Inside Higher Ed, Premilla Nadasen, a history professor at Barnard College, sees the attack on women and gender studies scholars as part of a rightwing push to "return to a heteronormative patriarchal society." More of the usual gibberish beloved by gender academics. In the same venue, Middlebury College professor Kevin Moss notes, with the vacuity of the pedestrian mind, "Gender studies and gender equality and equality for LGBT people are threatening for authoritarian regimes because authoritarian regimes require for somebody to have more power than somebody else." In the inimitable expression of Homer Simpson, "D'oh!"

A reading of the Norwegian feminist journal Kilden tells us all we need to know. Filled with the pietistic conviction that they are cutting-edge "scholars" and "researchers," as they like to call themselves, these self-proclaimed experts in the field of gender studies rely on flawed surveys and pseudo-statistical "studies" masking as science in order to bolster what is nothing less than ideological ravings. Such disciplinary malfeasance has been abundantly demonstrated in many different places, for example, Christina Hoff Sommers' Who Stole Feminism?, A House Built of Sand edited by Noretta Koertge, and Janice Fiamengo's ongoing video series The Fiamengo File.

Feminist ideologues protest that they are the target of "unfounded criticism" while apprehensive about their career prospects—a primary concern, obviously, for those who may inwardly suspect they are entirely dispensable. Thus, the clamor of remonstrations. The ladies doth protest too much, methinks. Their critics are routinely dismissed as belonging to "the extreme right-wing" and as using something called "right-wing logic," a most convenient calumny that also makes no sense. "Patriarchal knowledge" is at fault, claims Polish feminist Agnieszka Graff, "where men know everything and women aren't allowed to get a word in." Seriously? Any unbiased examination of YouTube and University panel discussions on the subject will give the lie to her deposition. Men are generally silenced, rendered apologetic or cowed into submission—unless you're Jordan Peterson.

Kilden director Linda Marie Rustad is correct in acknowledging "that the attacks on gender are part of a bigger picture"—namely, the upsurge of "right-wing populism." But what she does not and cannot recognize is that the real problem is not right-wing populism but left-wing progressivism. Two things should be briefly mentioned here. National populism is the result of, the reaction to, hegemonic progressivism and, as such, a necessary corrective to a political culture gone awry. And what is derisively called "populism" or "right-wing" designates a movement that seeks to restore the traditional values of the West: individual autonomy, property rights, equality before the law, the integrity of the nation, the sanctity of the institution of marriage and, in many nations, the Christian communion. The term "right-wing" is actually an honorific.

Left-wing—or liberal—progressivism strives instead to dismantle the nation state, to denounce the history of the West as a colonial monstrosity, to accumulate debt in order to finance various ideological projects du jour, to dumb-down education, to emasculate individual initiative and regulate entrepreneurship to death, and to redefine marriage as a fluid institution and thus destabilize the family. It is sad to note that liberalism is now synonymous with socialist orthodoxy, that is, state control, censorship, political correctness, distributive economics, funded abortion and non-binary gender relations. In Orban's words, "The situation in the West is that there is liberalism, but there is no democracy.

Orban has understood the nature of the threat and has taken a strong stand against the debilitating sickness represented by the left. In a July 29, 2018 major address delivered at an Open University summer camp, he said: "An era is a special and characteristic cultural reality…a spiritual order, a kind of prevailing mood, perhaps even taste—a form of attitude… determined by cultural trends, collective beliefs and social customs. This is now the task we are faced with…[to] embed a political system in a cultural era," that is, an evolving cultural era. The task is to defend Christian culture, to reject multiculturalism and monitor immigration, to protect the nation's economy and garrison its borders, and to preserve the traditional gender and family model.

Orban has a welcome ally in Brazil's President Jair Bolsonaro, who has introduced a bill "aiming at the principle of the integral protection of children," to prohibit the inclusion of gender issues in elementary schools. The bill is intended to respect the beliefs of parents and students, "privileging family values in their school education related to moral, sexual and religious education." The Brazilian Studies Association is up in arms, duly evoking a terror scenario in which "educators will be dismissed and bullied as a form of persecution" and "marginalized communities" will suffer something like epistemic oppression. Professor Marlene de Faveri of the State University of Santa Catarina claims that "the introduction of such a concept…is…meant to propagate hatred towards feminists [and to] minimize the scientific character of gender studies." This is typical feminist nonsense. The bill is intended to reduce the malign influence of hard-core feminists instilling hatred and false knowledge in their charges and to expose the blatantly non-scientific character of gender studies.

Orban has an even more powerful ally in Donald Trump, who is drafting legislation that defines sex as "a person's status as male or female based on immutable biological traits identifiable by or before birth." But it remains for the Justice Department to decide on the legality of the new legislation, which would seriously modify Title IX statutes and reverse the gender loosening rules of the previous administration. While events hang fire, little Hungary is leading the charge.

Liberal despots pickled in the brine of their progressivist ideology, feminist academics raking in lavish salaries for steeping their students in the euphoria of manufactured fury and lying about professional under-representation, and revolutionary zealots sheltering behind the walls of non-productive quasi-professions cannot tolerate conservative proponents of moral decency, civil order, common sense, and historical truth. Feminists and gender mavens believe that feminist politics and its academic vanguard of gender studies form the linchpin that holds the internal campaign against Western culture together. If it is weakened or expunged, the entire structure will begin to totter and the hated patriarchal forces they oppose will reassert themselves.

Hence the self-righteous indignation of the gender fanatics cloaking themselves in the rhetoric of academic freedom, scientific cogency, moral innocence, welfare economics, identity politics, and gender fluidity. And hence the fear and loathing of sensible and courageous leaders like Viktor Orban who insist that "there is a life beyond globalism," that a constitutional order is essential to the survival and prosperity of the nation, that there are two sexes, not seventy-three and counting, that marriage is a covenant between a man and a woman, and that "every child has a right to a mother and father."

A caveat should be introduced here. Abolishing gender studies as an academic discipline will not by itself repair the damage inflicted by feminism on what John Milton memorably called "beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies." This is only a first step toward restoring integrity to the university. For, as noted, the feminist bacillus has now permeated almost every office and faculty in the modern university, from hiring protocols to admissions policy to proctorial oversight of sexual conduct to student organizations to practically all licit departments and curricula. How to go about fumigating the parietal environment is a highly problematic enterprise, but the issue needs to be addressed.

Meanwhile, feminists may be livid and progressivists may virulently denounce populist figures like Orban—and his allies Bolsonaro and Trump—as political tyrants and cultural troglodytes. In the words of John Dale Dunn, this is what we can expect in "the current environment of academic and media shills for the left who specialize in vilification and character assassination of anyone who proposes a conservative answer for a serious political question." Orban's conservative answer is simple and honest. Our duty, he concludes, is to "defend human dignity, the family and the nation."

Makes sense to me.

David Solway's latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019.

The nature of male value and our gynocentric culture (part two)

Peter Ryan · 14 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

*Please read part one of this article before continuing.

The Gynocentric Obsession With Asserting Men Are Inferior:

I understand the desperate need of gynocentric bigots to justify their own double standards of prioritising women above men, with the reductionist concept that reproduction is all that counts to propagating your genes, and that having a uterus makes women more biologically valuable and that men are more expendable. I understand the lengths and the efforts they will go to, to assert their falsehoods and silence any dissenting opinion. Gynocentrism requires rationalisation for bigots to make their bigotry more palatable and acceptable for society. Distorting science to provide a supposed empirical basis for their bigotry, is a key method that they employ. This is why I have spent so much time writing on the subject of male value to set the record straight and it really does not help when the manosphere repeats the lie that men are inherently biologically expendable. As we saw in the phrenology scene[10] in the movie Django Unchained, junk science has been used to make all sorts of claims about group superiority.

The rationalisations and sophist claims that men are expendable because they lack a uterus, and that women have to be elevated above men to preserve the species, are just a different flavour of the same bigoted logic from that scene in the movie and just as ridiculous. The same claim that men are destined to be the more disposable sex because they lack a uterus, is analogous to the reasoning that African-Americans were destined to remain slaves because of supposed dimples in their skull. The key difference is that we now at least recognise one of these beliefs as bigotry.

Why Do We Believe Men Are Less Than?:

Why is the lie men are 'less than' so widely believed? People will look for simple ideas that justify their emotionally preferred worldview and appease their conscious. This applies to the manosphere as well. It is a comforting lie to believe that the sexism men face is an unavoidable and immutable facet of biological reality and the manosphere is no exception. However this gynocentric society is not comprised of people that are slaves to their biology. No, no, no, people do not get off that easily. People are wilfully and consciously going along with the marginalisation and exploitation of men and boys. The reason for this is not some innate biological mechanism, but the reality in our modern gynocentric culture that there is no incentive to care for men and every incentive to exploit them. Men that do not value themselves cannot expect society to care for them. Men that do not enforce boundaries with women and stand up for themselves, cannot expect women to not take advantage of them. The way men are treated by society, is a reflection of the way men treat themselves. The way men treat themselves is a reflection of how men perceive themselves.

The reason why society gives a shit about women, is because women give a shit about women. The reason why society does not give a shit about men, is because men do not give a shit about men. Ultimately society cares about women, because women give them an incentive to care and a disincentive not to. In contrast men simply place most of their sense of self-worth in what they achieve or do. Men place very little value in their physical and mental being. Society reflects that perspective right back at men in how men are treated. Men who regard themselves as human doings are treated as human doings. If men really want this to change, then they will need to change their perception of themselves from human doings to human beings.

Social stagnation is the norm for society and the social status quo prevails, because most people will not change without an incentive to change. Slavery was not abolished until sufficient numbers of people were incentivised to abolish it. The absolute rule of monarchs was not questioned until sufficient numbers of people were incentivised to challenge the established order. Every significant evolution of society has been preceded by a change in the mixture of incentives and disincentives in society. Things have to reach critical mass for major change to occur.

For centuries men have performed for society, because their own survival and the survival of society depended on it. This often meant that substantial numbers of men made sacrifices and died. What we have in the modern age, is a situation in which the fruits of what men provide are taken for granted. Technology has allowed apathy, short term thinking and decadence to dull our senses. Society has forgotten the true value of men and even men have forgotten their own true intrinsic value. Men cannot "do" for society, without caring for their being first. This is a basic reality that society and men have forgotten because of our decadent materialistic mentality, which has become divorced from reality and our long-term survival interests. Men are human beings first and the doing part comes from their being. Society has descended into a mass delusion, where we have forgotten that men are human beings and that their value emerges from that.

Why has male value been forgotten? Male biological value is more fluid in its form than female biological value. The reproductive role of women does not change much from one environment to the next. How men contribute to the survival of society, does vary to a much greater degree from one environment to the next. The result of this is that male value is not as fixed as female value and as a consequence there is more scrutiny placed on men to prove their value. It is harder to assess male value than female value and requires men to demonstrate their capacities. When you hear people say things like "man up", "be a man" and someone define what a man is, you are hearing people call upon men to prove their biological worth. This is a social pressure women do not experience to anywhere near the same degree as men. No one dares to tell women to "woman up".

Social scientists call this social pressure on men to perform to prove their worth as men, "precarious manhood"[11]. A positive side to the greater fluidity of male value, is that men have many paths they can take to express their biological value to society. For women their biological value is more fixed on motherhood. Women have greater stability and certainty in their biological value, but men have more freedom and scope in the expression of their biological value. Men rising to the top of their profession and pursuing a career or a talent or natural interest, will have a greater impact on their evolutionary success than it will for women. This biological difference does at least partly inform our societal attitudes and culture.

I do believe that this asymmetry between the sexes, is part of the reason why feminism has emerged and demanded all of these changes be made to our institutions and workplaces to empower women to pursue employment or other interests over having children. I understand, respect and support the need of women to find meaning in their lives outside of having children and to be valued for more than just their uterus.

Whilst we clearly do not have a 50:50 gender representation in all aspects of our economy and society and never will, it is a reality that there are no barriers left holding women back. Whilst evolved biological sex differences in interests and abilities do exist and do at least partly explain these differences in gender representation in society and why they will always remain, we have overturned the social and legal barriers that may have existed for women in pursuing a pathway outside of motherhood and being valued beyond motherhood.

The challenge I have for society, is that if we can clearly overcome our fixation on associating female value solely or primarily to motherhood, then we can do the same for men and their provision and protection for society. We can overcome our knee-jerk reaction to assign value to men based on what they "do" for society and how they perform. We can overcome and move beyond precarious manhood. As Dr. Warren Farrell has written about, if women are sex objects, men are success objects. If we can address one biologically informed cultural bias against women in regarding them as sex objects, then we can address the other bias against men in regarding them as success objects. If we can remove barriers for women, we can remove barriers for men.

There is another factor at play here as well. The male role in contributing to the survival of the community can obstruct our capacity to have concern for the well-being of men. When the community is dependent on men for survival, it becomes harder to see the need to support men. The nature of male value means that it essentially gets in the way of societal concern for male well-being. Men naturally want to take risks and they want to challenge themselves and take on hardships and society often benefits because of the extraordinary things that men do. Just as before, there is a positive flipside. Freedom for men is one of the most important things you can give them. Whilst there is less concern for male well-being from society, there is also less inhibition in allowing men to expose themselves to challenging and risky pursuits that can be highly rewarding both financially and otherwise. Men often find fulfillment and are naturally drawn to these pursuits. Men literally skydive from the edges of space and go to the bottom of the world's oceans, because they have a passion to push the envelope of possibility.

Whilst there are certainly psychological and physiological sex differences that at least partly explain sex differences in the representation of risky, challenging and dangerous work that has high personal and financial reward, it is also correct to observe that men have had greater freedom to take on risky and challenging pursuits in the past. Both factors are at play. Whether it is exploring the world on sailing ships, pioneering on the frontier of new territories, undertaking expeditions to find the Northwest passage and go to the North and South Pole, mining in the gold rush, flying prototype aeroplanes, or going into space, society has historically given men more latitude to pursue these rewarding but dangerous endeavours. Women have traditionally been protected from risky and challenging work and this has come to some degree at the expense of part of their freedom.

Just as society has had less concern for male well-being, there has been less concern for women's freedom outside of getting married and having children. Just as society has relied on men for survival, society has relied on women to produce the next generation. Just as male value has partly obstructed societal concern for male well-being, female value has partly obstructed societal concern for women's freedom. The concern for men to provide for society got partly in the way of society caring for men's well-being and the concern for women to produce children got partly in the way of society caring for women's freedom.

Again this asymmetry is no doubt partly why feminism has emerged for women and I understand, accept and fully support the need for women to have the freedom to be more than just a mother. The second challenge I have for society though, is that if we can overcome our protective fixation on making sure women stay at home and raise children, then we can overcome our reservation in caring about men's health and general well-being.

Despite what feminists claim, both men and women have faced discriminatory practices throughout our history and both sexes have had different types of "privilege". It has not been a man's world and an "oppressive patriarchy", it has been a world where men and women struggled for thousands of years to subsist and continue society. When faced with the risk of death, disease and starvation on a semi-regular basis, men and women had much less choice on how to live and the roles the sexes were to play in society.

Technology which mostly men invented, has given us the opportunity to escape our traditional biological roles and opened up options that simply were not possible before. We have the capacity to go beyond our basic biological programming and ironically society has demonstrated this with feminism. If we can overcome our societal reservations on women being something other than a mother, than we can overcome our reservations on addressing male well-being and recognise the intrinsic value of men as human beings. If one sex can be freed from the confines of their biological mandate, then so can the other sex. This is because the biological mandate of each sex (the rate limiting factor of reproduction versus the rate limiting factor of survival) is interconnected and interdependent.

Some say that feminism is merely entirely an extension of biology and from a reductionist lens that position may seem tenable. Certainly there are biological factors at play driving feminism, to at least some degree. However when we consider how antithetical feminism is to female fertility and the net evolutionary impact that has on the continuation of communities and lineages within a population, the absolutist position feminism is entirely biological and driven by evolution, simply has no empirical leg to stand on. Feminism has created countless numbers of childless women that will not directly pass on their parent's genome. If reproduction for the individual is "everything" from a skewed (and wrong) evolutionary perspective and women are the rate limiting factor of reproduction and biology is supposedly inescapable, then feminism in its present form should not have happened and yet it has. There is more to human evolutionary psychology and culture, than just reproduction and biology.

I wrote in part 2 of Gynocentrism And The Golden Uterus[12], that men are not biologically disposable. I wrote that male disposability is a pathological expression of a society that has abandoned concern for male well-being and now takes them for granted and exploits them. I made the point that society has historically had to possess at least some concern for male well-being to minimise avoidable losses of men, to ensure its own existence and prosperity. Whilst there has indeed been some gut level inhibition that society has had in showing concern for male well-being, society in the past has also had an understanding at a cognitive level that we must look after and support men to at least some degree, so that men can in turn support society.

A king may not have had much concern for the individual well-being of his soldiers at a gut level, but cognitively he understood the need to adequately feed, pay and train them so they would effectively fight. We have recognised this need in our past culture to support men not a gut level, but at the cognitive level. Another example of this can be seen in how our educational institutions in the past were established to educate boys, so that they would then be equipped as men to support society and families.

What has happened, is that technology has delayed the need for society to think about the long-term consequences of neglecting male well-being (we have lost our long-term perspective on many other things in general as well, like private and government debt for instance). So we have gradually slid into a mode of perceiving men as human doings and not as human beings and on assigning value to what men do, but not to the men themselves. We have lost our cognitive connection between caring for men as human beings, so men can in turn support society. It is a cognitive connection we must restore before we are too late to realise what is happening in time to save society. Our current social and economic prosperity cannot be sustained in the long term without caring for male well-being. It is only through the massive resource surplus of our civilisation (which is gradually diminishing), that there has not yet been mass awareness of the decline of our societies and its link with the issues facing men. We are in a cycle of decadent short term thinking, where the concerns for the future of our civilisation has become an afterthought and so has concern for men and what made our society great. We must snap out of this cycle. Every civilisation reaches this decadent stage of decline in its final stages before it collapses.

This is a glimmer of hope though. People are waking up. People are starting to notice what is happening to men and boys. Is it happening slowly? Yes, very slowly. All social change happens very slowly initially with few exceptions. Even the mainstream media now though[13], is starting to pay attention and show some genuine concern for men. So yes things are changing. If feminism can push back against the rigid expectations and attitudes that were directed at women, so can men when it comes to the rigid expectations and attitudes that have been directed at men.

However to accomplish this goal, men must first change their perception of themselves from human doings to human beings and men must help each other and boys achieve that. We need a new cultural narrative on masculinity. A narrative that focuses on men as human beings before paying attention to what they do. The movie Joker[14] is one example of this new type of narrative. Its popularity is no doubt at least partly the result of the film's storyline filling a void in our gynocentric culture in recognising the humanity of men and men's pain. Into The Wild[15] is another brilliant film that focuses on men as human beings and their pain, vulnerabilities and inner world. Society is in need of a change to our narratives on men and masculinity. Not a feminist inspired change that tells men they are "toxic" or "obsolete", but a change that tells men they are human beings first and foremost and have intrinsic value.

From 1848, it took more than a century for feminism to achieve many of the goals it set out to achieve. Men face a similar wait. Social change happens slowly at first and it can slow and speed up at various stages over time. Just because change may not be immediate and may be slow, does not mean men's place in society is biologically immutable. Our major hurdle in my view in the manosphere, is getting over the belief that men are biologically less than women and actually biologically disposable, as opposed to considering male disposability a pathological expression of a society that exploits men and has forgotten their value. Gynocentrism is built on and dependent upon maintaining the lie that men are less than women. Only when this lie is unlearnt, can gynocentrism really be challenged.

The Self-Fulfilling Cycle Of Learned Helplessness

The claim women are more valuable than men, has been put forward multiple times directly and indirectly in the culture over the last fifty years and in various ways even before then. We have all been raised in this lie from birth and have lived in a gynocentric culture saturated by it. This false claim has also unfortunately been propagated in the manosphere as well and often used to explain the origins of sexism against men. The major difference of course between female supremacists/radical feminists and the people in the manosphere that put forward this idea, is that female supremacists consider it to be vindication that their worldview is the natural order of things and treating men like shit is the way it should be.

In contrast proponents of this idea in the manosphere that women are more biologically valuable, either avoid the implications of what it means (including the implied futility of what they are doing in the manosphere to get society to pay attention to men), or alternatively adopt a black pill fatalistic view[16] that there is little scope for any substantive mainstream change for society to address the discrimination, hatred, marginalisation and exploitation of men and boys. This mentality is one expression of the learned helplessness factor I described in my article on the Normalisation Of Gynocentrism[17] and it becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy for men. Men deserve better. We should recognise biology and our limitations, but we should be cautious not to resign ourselves to a fatalistic worldview, or to fall into a reductionist line of reasoning. Things are not as simple or as set as they seem. The manosphere has to move away from this fatalistic perspective and recognise the true intrinsic biological value of men, if it is to move forward in any substantive way.

One example of propagating the idea women are more biologically valuable than men in the manosphere, comes from a video from Karen Straughan called, “Neoteny!”[18]. Now before people start thinking this is a hit piece on Karen Straughan, let me assure you it is nothing of the kind. Karen has done some excellent work for men and boys and continues to do so. It is also worth noting that Karen is not the only one that has propagated this idea in the manosphere either. There are plenty of other examples from other people (men and women, mgtow and mra’s, both high and low profile) I could have cited over many years.

It is because the idea that women are more biologically valuable than men (and that men are biologically expendable) is so widespread in the manosphere and never questioned, that I am addressing it so thoroughly in this two part article, in my series of articles on gynocentrism and male value and in my earlier series on gynocentrism and the golden uterus. Karen was inviting criticism of her video and so I will provide it. I can be wrong, Karen can be wrong, we all can be wrong. The danger is not in being wrong, the danger comes when people remain silent when they know people are wrong. That is when rigid ideology forms and we stagnate and divorce ourselves from reality.

In her video Karen makes an argument that the sexism men face is at least partly innate (as she says we can see from sex differences in neoteny and the social reactions that invokes) and that this innate sexism arises from the fundamental reality that women are more valuable than men. Her reasoning is essentially that women evolved neotenous features to a greater degree than men to elicit protection from the community and that we protect the more valuable and so women are more valuable than men.

Neoteny is certainly a trait that women have to a greater degree than men, although in our modern environment women exaggerate their neoteny. The innate sex difference in neoteny whilst still substantive, is considerably less pronounced once you take away female cosmetics. Prehistoric women were no doubt more weathered, hairy, dirty and adult in appearance, than many women appear today. Neoteny certainly can elicit help from the community, but as with many characteristics, there are multiple suggested causes for the sex difference in neoteny.

One explanation[19] is that female neoteny was sexually selected by males, as female fertility markedly decreases with age. Men find more youthful looking women more physically attractive as younger women are more fertile and so more neotenous women pass on their genes. Sex differences in neoteny don't necessarily reflect women having a greater biological value than men. Female neoteny can function as a biological marker to attract males to signal fertility. I do not think we should ignore the likely possibility that this dynamic could at least in part be at play in explaining the sex difference in neoteny. Of course certain people (cough feminists) and even some corners of academia (yes scientists can be biased and less than objective), rally against such explanations because it does not suit their narrative of female superiority.

Greater female neoteny is the result of differences in the manner in which each sex can maximise the propagation of their genes, rather than because women are more valuable than men. As I have discussed in the first part of this article and in part 2 on Gynocentrism and Male Value[20], the male and female sex manifest their biological value differently- One sex derives value by investing more heavily in reproduction and the other sex derives value by investing more in survival. I specifically singled out in my writings the greater intrasexual competition of males, as one of the ways male value manifests itself. There is an inverse relationship between the level of reproductive investment by a sex and intrasexual competition, which is what Bateman's principle describes[21].

Whilst competition is certainly not the sole domain of men, the biological reality is that men stand to gain far more from competition than women. The male sex can produce far greater numbers of progeny per unit of time, because males do not gestate or lactate and are thus more freely available to derive benefits from the mating opportunities arising from competition. The male sex also has the capacity to invest far more in activities related to acquiring status, competing and that are high risk/high reward or high effort/high reward, because they do not have to gestate or lactate.

Now let us consider the sex difference in neoteny and the presumption that neoteny has at least in part evolved to a greater degree in women to elicit protection. Will an individual be more successful at competing with others if he or she has to rely on the support of others to compete? How will that affect their status in a socially competitive hierarchy? Will an individual be more successful in acquiring status and engaging in high risk, high effort and high reward activities, if they have to rely on the support of others? Competition, status seeking, taking risks and undertaking challenges, all require one thing- personal agency. Personal agency requires independence and self-reliance rather than eliciting protection from the community. It is true that men have not evolved to elicit protection from the community to the same degree as women. However that is not the result of men being less valuable than women. It is because the life history strategy through which men manifest their biological value and pass on their genes, is different to women and requires different sets of traits.

The greater agency shown by men, is the reason why it is inevitable modern civilisation will be led by men. In order to lead in our modern complex world at the highest levels, you must accept high levels of responsibility and with that responsibility comes a large amount of sacrifice, hardship, risk and the need to be highly self-reliant and independent. This is what feminism does not understand or want to accept and why a "matriarchy" cannot scale to modern civilisation and is bound to fail with horrible social and economic consequences if it is forced on society.

The fatal flaw in Karen's reasoning, is the implied assumption that we always protect what is valuable and we only do not protect what is expendable. We do protect what is valuable, but not always. There are valuable things in the world that we expose to risk and hazards, because that is how their value is harnessed. Sometimes we do not protect what is valuable, when the source of value is protection itself, or the value is harnessed by exposure to challenge, hardship and risk. We spend billions of dollars on valuable military hardware, race cars and spacecraft and expose them to risks and hazards, because that is how we harness their value. Value alone does not determine whether or not something is protected. There is a duality to value that exists between the sexes that Karen has missed in her video. The duality of survival and reproduction and the interplay between the two in a complex life history strategy to perpetuate the human genome. One form of value that requires protection and another form of value that actually manifests itself as protection.

We also need to remember that both sexes died performing their biological roles. It is not as if women were so biologically valuable that nature protected them from hardship and put it all on men. Women risked their lives in their reproductive role and did die or suffered chronic health conditions from pregnancy and giving birth. Men risked their lives protecting and providing for society and died and suffered from injury as well. The deaths of men and not just women, cost their communities in terms of both reproductive capacity and survival capacity.

There is a duality between the sexes to sacrifice and the cost of their sacrifice to the community. Women have not escaped biological hardship because they are more valuable, they just have experienced a different form of hardship. We can argue over which sex has had it "worse", but really any sex difference in the degree of hardship comes down to the differences in the environmental and cultural conditions pertaining to their different biological roles and life history strategies, rather than differences in biological value.

The problem with gynocentrism and feminism, is not that they focus on female hardships or female sacrifice or female needs, but that they focus solely on those things and ignore male needs, male sacrifice and male hardships throughout history and in the present day. The problem with female superiority, is that without fail those that purport to claim women are superior, will selectively report only those strengths women have over men and consistently ignore or dismiss any evidence of male strengths and male value.

There is never any genuine recognition of all of the facts by either feminists or female supremacists, just the facts that are convenient. Ultimately it is one-sided gynocentric reductionist thinking, that consistently leads people to perceive only one side of the biological and social equation when it comes to the sexes. They ignore the duality of biological value and the duality of sacrifice between the sexes. The manosphere must try not to repeat those same mistakes.

I have a final point to make on Karen's video regarding her initial comments on fatherhood and the long developmental period of human offspring and her suggestion that it is has been the monogamous egalitarian model that has allowed prolonged development in humans, rather than paternal investment alone. I would suggest that monogamy and the levels of paternal investment in offspring go hand in hand. Monogamy reduces paternity uncertainty, which in turn results in greater paternal investment. The more monogamous pair bonding there is in a population, the greater the levels of paternal investment.

Yes a species can have paternal investment in offspring in a polygamous community, but it will be at a reduced level in comparison to a monogamous arrangement. Whilst some people beat a drum that humans are a polygamous species, we are actually only weakly polygamous and monogamy has been present to a substantial degree in both our prehistory and in our current societies. We don't really have one fixed mating mode we cannot escape from and human courtship is heavily influenced by culture and has been for many tens of thousands of years. Indeed cultural practices of marriage with only low levels of polygyny[22], are found to go far back into our hunter-gatherer prehistory.

Even in polygamous societies, only a small fraction of the population is actually engaging in polygamy and a substantial degree of monogamy still takes place in these societies. One only has to ask why monogamy has become so widespread, if we are supposedly so hardwired to be polygamous (as some claim). I could go into further detail on this point, but I will leave the discussion on polygamy in humans for another time and return to Karen's discussion. The reason I expanded on this point, is because there are some people that incorrectly assume monogamy has had no impact on our evolution and that monogamy is a modern invention. This is scientifically and factually incorrect.

Karen discussed in her video, an example of the marmoset monkey in which only one pair is mating in the group and the father invests more than the mother in raising offspring. Karen suggested that the failure of the marmoset to acquire a long period of maturation and exhibit high intelligence, shows that fatherhood alone is not sufficient to lengthen the developmental period of offspring. My response to that, is that only one marmoset male in the group is invested in raising offspring and the rest of the male and female population is providing intermittent alloparental care. Whilst paternal investment within the mating marmoset pair is high relative to the maternal investment, paternal investment in the population as a whole is actually relatively low in comparison to humans (It is also worth pointing out that the paternal investment of a male marmoset is not even close to that of a human male, which I am sure Karen understands.).

In a human population there are many mating pairs (not just one) and thus much higher overall numbers of fathers investing in the raising of their offspring (rather than just one lucky marmoset male with one lucky marmoset female). Greater numbers of monogamous mating pairs, provide the opportunity to have a slower individual rate of reproduction to replace the population. The paternal investment in offspring, harnesses this opportunity to provide the conditions to support a longer developmental period for offspring.

So I would agree that both the monogamous egalitarian model and paternal investment across the population (outside of just one exclusive mating pair), are both involved in lengthening the human developmental period. However it is paternal investment that has actually directly played a role in human development and allowing it to be lengthened. The spread of monogamy just permitted paternal investment to become widespread. That clarification is important to add to what Karen said in her video. Fatherhood is particularly important in human adolescent development and particularly important in respect to raising sons whom fully mature at an older age. These realities indicate that fatherhood is indeed connected to supporting the longer development of our offspring (Particularly with teenage sons!).

Conclusion:

In closing I would like to draw attention to the massive fires that are currently burning across Australia. Firefighters whom are mostly men, have been battling these blazes whilst the country has been enjoying holidays and New Year's Eve. It is funny how society on the one hand really needs men in a national emergency, but at the same time the mainstream media has no problem in telling men they are obsolete[23] and telling people why it is okay to hate men[24]. Despite men risking their lives fighting the fires, feminists somehow think it is appropriate to make claims from highly questionable feminist "research", that some men will come home from the fires to beat up their wives (yes you read correctly, watch this link[25] and this link[26]). We live in a culture and a society, that is dominated by an authoritarian feminist ideology that spreads outright hatred toward men with impunity and attempts to demonise men even when they risk their lives for their community. That is how threatened feminism is by male value. Any expression and recognition of the good men do for society, even when men are risking their lives in a national emergency, is to be quashed by feminists.

Society does not want men to know their own value, because if they did this whole parasitic gynocentric system of exploitation would grind to a halt. It is the fear of men discovering their own intrinsic value as human beings that drives male disposability in society, remember that.

I will finish this article with a link[27] to a speech by Charlie Chaplin. He made this speech in a movie called The Great Dictator in 1940 during World War 2. With our growing geopolitical tensions with China, Russia and now Iran, remember this speech. It is as relevant today for men, as it was back then. Make no mistake, war is a men's issue and may become the greatest issue men face this century. The rejection of male disposability and the recognition of men as human beings with their own humanity, is the antidote to war and violence. The machine minds of our world will stop at nothing to snuff that out of men's hearts and lead men astray with false promises of glory. Take heed of that warning.

"You are not machines, you are not cattle, you are men!"- Charlie Chaplin, The Great Dictator, 1940

How men perceive themselves will determine the fate of their lives and also the fate of the world. Reflect on that reality and what I have written in this article.

References:

10. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aQM4ebFILv4

11. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=q6EF00RL88M
12. https://avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-golden-uterus-part-two/
13. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=n0wCBFNTVhk
14. https://www.rottentomatoes.com/m/joker_2019
15. https://www.rottentomatoes.com/m/into_the_wild
16. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fHcPQ0pJ8_M
17. https://gynocentrism.com/2018/06/30/the-normalisation-of-gynocentrism/
18. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=C46rSIfTum4
19. https://www.researchgate.net/publication/249179177_Sexual_Selection_Physical_Attractiveness_and_Facial_Neoteny_Cross-cultural_Evidence_and_Implications
20. https://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-two/
21. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bateman%27s_principle
22. https://journals.plos.org/plosone/article?id=10.1371/journal.pone.0019066
23. https://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2010/07/the-end-of-men/308135/
24. https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/why-cant-we-hate-men/2018/06/08/f1a3a8e0-6451-11e8-a69c-b944de66d9e7_story.html
25. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_TgON5oYZvI
26. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_CwQcIn2Pgo
27. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=J7GY1Xg6X20

‘Frau Minne’ the Goddess who steals men’s hearts

Peter Wright · 16 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

German chandelier sculpture, ca. 1430, depicting Frau Minne as queen

Frau Minne (vrowe minne) is the personification of courtly love from German Middle Ages. She is frequently addressed directly in Minnesang poetry, usually by a pining lover who is complaining about his state of suffering, but she also appears in the longer Minnerede poems, and in prose works.

She is often referred to as the “Goddess” of romantic love, which is differentiated strongly from other kinds of love such as Christian agape as embodied in the figure of Jesus. To make the distinction clear, romantic love is understood as passion, whereas Christian and Buddhist love is understood as *com*passion.

A rare allegorical painting of ca. 1400, discovered in a guild house in Zurich in 2009 (see below) shows Frau Minne presiding over the suffering of male lovers who are having their hearts torn from their breasts. In this cruel scene Goddess Minne, the mistress of love, sits on a throne consisting of two men. She has just torn out the heart of a man to her left which she holds in her hand, while she is already cutting open the chest of another man to her right to rip his heart out.[1]

Goddess Minne sits on a throne made of two men, while preceding to rip out the hearts of men in love.

The pathological pain associated with romantic love has been linked to women’s cultivation of superstimuli, i.e., sexually provocative clothing styles, cosmetics, practiced gestures, and the cultivation of titillating and often frustrating behaviors of courtship that resemble sado-masochistic practices. Such passion-inducing love contrasts with other kinds of love as mentioned above, such as friendship love; the basic parental love extended to children; or that of Christianity or Buddhism which focus on human compassion.

As mentioned elsewhere,[2] romantic love started as a code of conduct among the aristocratic classes of the middle ages. However, the trend made its way by degrees eventually to the middle classes, and finally to the lower classes – or rather it broke class structure altogether in the sense that all Western peoples became inheritors of the customs of romantic love regardless of their social station. This breaking of class barriers is marvelously rendered in the painting below by Hans Koberstein, who portrays the Goddess leading a helpless throng consisting of royalty and pauper, young and old, who are equally held under her sway.

Frau Minne smashes all class barriers, making rich and poor alike suffer from love sickness. [Painting by Hans Koberstein (German, 1864–1945)]

A 15th century depiction "The Power of Frau Minne" (see picture below) captures the pain and pathology so widely believed to be part of the romantic love experience. The pathology associated with romantic love is so disturbing, in fact, that clinical psychologist Dr. Frank Tallis has written a book detailing the sickness of it based on his extensive clinical experience:

> Obsessive thoughts, erratic mood swings, insomnia, loss of appetite, recurrent and persistent images and impulses, superstitious or ritualistic compulsions, delusion, the inability to concentrate—exhibiting just five or six of these symptoms is enough to merit a diagnosis of a major depressive episode. Yet we all subconsciously welcome these symptoms when we allow ourselves to fall in love. In Love Sick, Dr. Frank Tallis, a leading authority on obsessive disorders, considers our experiences and expressions of love, and why the combinations of pleasure and pain, ecstasy and despair, rapture and grief have come to characterize what we mean when we speak of falling in love. Tallis examines why the agony associated with romantic love continues to be such a popular subject for poets, philosophers, songwriters, and scientists, and questions just how healthy our attitudes are and whether there may in fact be more sane, less tortured ways to love. A highly informative exploration of how, throughout time, principally in the West, the symptoms of mental illness have been used to describe the state of being in love, this book offers an eloquent, thought-provoking, and endlessly illuminating look at one of the most important aspects of human behavior.[3]

“The Power of Frau Minne”. (Allegorical depiction of women’s power over men’s hearts). Broadsheet woodcut, coloured, 15th century by Master Caspar von Regensburg. Berlin, SMB, Kupferstichkabinett.

References:

[1] Frau Minne hat sich gut gehalten, 2009
[2] Wright, P., The evolution of romantic love via romance writings, (2017)
[3] Love Sick: Love as a Mental Illness, by Frank Tallis – overview on Goodreads

Feature image: Frau Minne (personification of courtly love), painted wood, Southern Germany, 1320-1330 ca. The image depicts the lover presenting Frau Minne with his heart which has been pierced by three arrows. There are two German inscriptions with the image, the first of which translates as “Lady, send me solace, my heart has been wounded,” while the second reads as “Gracious Lady, I have surrendered.”

Dr. Teslsa and Mr. Hive

Doug Mortimer · 17 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Nikola Tesla is something of an exemplar, if not a god, in MGTOW circles. Given his scientific achievements, that is understandable. Just as significant to MGTOW adherents are his views on life:

> Be alone, that is the secret of invention; be alone, that is when ideas are born.
>
> I don't think that you can name many great inventions created by married men.
>
> Intelligent people tend to have less friends than the average person. The smarter you are, the more selective you become.

Tesla is also revered because he correctly foresaw mobile phones, television, and the internet. Consequently, interviews with him often took an oracular turn. A number of these interviews are available online, notably postings from the August 10, 1924 issue of The Galveston Daily News, the January 30, 1926 issue of Collier's magazine, and the February 9, 1935 issue of Liberty magazine.

In the Liberty interview, he proclaimed, "In the twenty-first century, the robot will take the place which slave labor occupied in ancient civilization." Now that we're one fifth of the way into the twenty-first century, this prediction seems to be well on its way to fulfillment.

When Tesla stuck to predictions involving his specialty of electricity, he was on the mark or close to it. When he strayed from his specialty…well, you win a few, you lose a few.

For example, in the same Liberty interview Tesla missed badly when he said, "The year 2100 will see eugenics universally established." Granted, that's 80 years away, but he made his prediction before the downfall of Hilter. Today, 75 years after the collapse of Nazi Germany, any advocacy of eugenics amounts to career or political suicide. You might agree with Tesla when he says, "Certainly no one who is not a desirable parent should be permitted to produce progeny." If so, best to keep your opinion to yourself.

Tesla also foresaw that "within a century coffee, tea, and tobacco will be no longer in vogue." Well, after 94 years, coffee is riding high and tea is holding its own. Only tobacco is on the ropes. One out of three…not too impressive. He also foresaw the "end of all devastating droughts, forest fires, and floods." Tesla certainly went down swinging with that statement.

He also missed the boat on this one: "The idea of atomic energy is illusionary." The Manhattan Project started in 1942 but Tesla died on January 7, 1943, so he didn't get the memo. If he did, he wouldn't have been able to read it, as he suffered from dementia.

The jury is still out on: "The world's internal reservoirs of heat, indicated by frequent volcanic eruptions, will be tapped for industrial purposes." Well, geothermal energy is a fact but it's expensive to tap into it, so it hasn't been a major threat to coal, oil, and gas. But a breakthrough may occur, so Tesla may be vindicated one day. Let's give him an incomplete on that one.

The foregoing is not an attempt to trash Tesla or his prognostications, but to point out that that his eminence as a scientist did not mean all his utterances were of Delphic import. We must keep this in mind when we consider his quotes on the future of women, particularly in the Collier's interview.

Tesla's status as a lifelong bachelor disqualified him from offering an informed opinion; on the other hand, lacking a wife and daughters allowed him to be more objective. As a brainy guy with an accent, impeccable grooming, and a fair amount of fame, he probably could have been a bigtime pickup artist if he was so inclined.

Born in Serbia on July 10, 1856, Tesla doubtless started out with old-world, old-fashioned ideas about women's place in society. By the time he was a senior citizen, female emancipation was a done deal. The 1920s brought women the vote, freedom to smoke and drink, shorter hemlines, even petting parties…which sounds pretty mild today.

Like a number of his contemporary pundits, Tesla pointed out the increasing encroachment of women in areas that had been reserved for men. But he predicted it wouldn't stop with equality. He foresaw "a new sex order, with the female as superior." If he were around today and could benefit from the volumes of neurological and sociobiological research on sex differences, he might have thought differently. It all depends on what he meant by "superior."

In one sense, "superior" means someone or something better than you. Or it could mean someone who outranks you, as your superior officer. Your "superior" may or may not be better than you by any objective criteria, but he is higher up in the chain of command, so he gives orders and you take them. If Tesla meant "superior" in that sense, then he was on the mark.

More disturbing is this statement:

> The acquisition of new fields of endeavor by women, their gradual usurpation of leadership, will dull and finally dissipate feminine sensibilities, will choke the maternal instinct, so that marriage and motherhood may become abhorrent and human civilization draw closer and closer to the perfect civilization of the bee.

Well, the beehive may be the perfect environment for bees…but what about human beings?

> There are the vast, desexualized armies of workers whose sole aim and happiness in life is hard work. It is the perfection of communism, of socialized, cooperative life wherein all things, including the young, are the property and concern of all.

Doesn't sound like a workers' paradise to me. Yet Tesla has unwittingly exposed the connections between feminism, communism, and gynocentrism.

> The center of all bee life is the queen. She dominates the hive, not through hereditary right, for any egg may be hatched into a reigning queen, but because she is the womb of this insect race.

"For queen and colony," might be the motto of the male bee, technically known as a drone. You might find it highly symbolic that the drone has no stinger. His main role is to mate with the queen bee. Sort of like a cougar and a teenage boy.

Now one can readily see how the elites might envy the bee society. Bees have no free will. They cannot revolt against their "superiors." They are not capable of rebelling. No need to crack down on them…no need to formulate propaganda…no need to institute censorship…no need for the queen to sequester herself in a gated community. Perfect obedience is assured.

The human male is not quite as degraded as the male bee. Man's offspring, however, require nine months of gestation and years of maturation. Luckily, his "queen" only rarely gives birth to more than one individual. So that sounds like a manageable amount of "enslavement," at least it was before the rise of the welfare state, or the welfare hive, if you prefer. Remember that Tesla's Collier's quote was from 1926.

Two years later Herbert Hoover proclaimed, "We in America today are nearer to the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any other land. We shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this nation." Well, those are the most edible words anyone ever uttered, but they do point out how far away we were from a welfare state when Tesla made his comments.

The rise of the welfare state assures that all male taxpayers will participate in supporting other people's children, or the children of the hive (great name for a horror movie). Federal government transfer payments are the biggest problem, but state and county taxes go to public schooling, from pre-school programs to state universities. A lot of those male-privileged incomes are taxed to support single mothers and their children. Every man – even an incel – is affected if he earns a living and pay taxes.

In a way, the drone bee is lucky, as he has but one hive to serve. The human drone serves multiple hives: the city hive, the county hive, the state hive, and the federal hive. If some international do-gooders have their way, the global hive may one day be a reality. Tesla himself thought so:

> International boundaries will be largely obliterated and a great step will be made toward the unification and harmonious existence of the various races inhabiting the globe.

Well, that global nirvana hasn't worked out as well as the computer models, but it's still on the drawing board. As a number of commentators have noted, however the rise of social media has given birth to a hive mentality. Hence the term "hivemind" to indicate a mindless, unreasoning conformity of thought. Disturb the hive – on purpose or not – and a cosmopolitan swarm will attack you.

Though Tesla was neither a sociologist nor an entomologist, he may have been on to something with his observations about women and beehives.

After all, there must be a reason man has long referred to his significant other as "Honey."

And whatever happened to the beehive hairdo?

The left's Great Lie is a pervasive threat to our culture

David Solway · 17 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

"The very concept of objective truth is fading out of the world," wrote George Orwell in a 1943 essay, Looking Back on the Spanish War. "Lies will pass into history." A truer thing was never said about the current omnipresence of the Lie.

Of course, everybody lies. That the vast majority of politicians lie, almost as a matter of principle, is common knowledge. But I had not grasped until relatively late that the Lie—in majuscule—had become so pervasive that it could be said to constitute a public if unofficial institution. Orwell said that truth had ceased to exist in 1936, an exaggeration made for emphasis, but there is little doubt that it has practically ceased to exist in the political and cultural world we now inhabit. It may be a tenuous or metaphysical distinction to make, but I have come to feel not only that lies are everywhere in the political and cultural world we live in, but that the Lie has become that world. We now live inside the Lie; it is the very air we breathe, the food that sustains us, the verbal milieu we communicate in, the dreams that disturb our sleep, the tastes and fashions we affect, the thoughts we think in our solitary moments. We are like fish who never consider the water they swim in; to leave that element requires something like an evolutionary lung and an amphibian yearning, features that pertain to only a few. This is our current condition.

The issue became clear to me some years back when I was researching The Big Lie: On Terror, Antisemitism, and Identity, a book five years in the writing. Before 9/11, I was solidly in the camp of the left. I read Chomsky with approval, harbored duly anti-American sentiments, commiserated with the Palestinians, marched in thought with Peace Now, subscribed to the appropriate dailies, and agreed with the political slant taken by our major news networks. The sources I relied on were the editorials of The New York Times, The Washington Post, The Guardian, and The Globe and Mail, the news reports of the BBC, CNN, and the CBC, the pages of The Nation and The New Republic, the popular accounts of American perfidy that crammed the shelves of the major book chains, and, most significantly, the smog of stock conceptions that were "in the air," pervasive but insubstantial as are all airy things.

Writing the book forced me to undertake relentless scrutiny of the values and beliefs I'd accepted as gospel and to realize that I had thoughtlessly succumbed to an all-encompassing lie fostered by the media, the academy, and the political left. Intellectually speaking, I had thought I was pole-vaulting; instead, I was doing the limbo. Almost every statement I'd read about American treachery, Israeli apartheid, the "religion of peace," feminist grievance, global warming, right-wing extremism, the ironhanded Patriarchy, oppression of minorities, and the rest was an outright lie and functioned as aspects of what Quentin Skinner in From Humanism to Hobbes called "the potentially ruinous impact of rhetorical redescription," that is, reframing something that is not the case as emphatically and undeniably the case.

Skinner refers to the insidious operation of the rhetorical figure of paradiastole—the conversion of a vice into a virtue—which would apply to the left's destructive policies and initiatives like those I had once endorsed. But the opposite device accompanies the trope of paradiastole, namely, that which the rhetoricians call meiosis, the reframing of a virtue as a vice. Thus the virtue of conservatism is redescribed as an analogue for the vice of fascism, a twisting of the "rules of… forensic speech." I finally began to understand that what I'd taken for history was nothing but ideology and what I'd thought was truth was an order-of-magnitude lie. And that my political and cultural preceptors were, to a man and a woman, professional liars.

Everything I've learned since I began paying attention has only served to confirm my conviction that we are living in unique times, an era in which lies come so thick and fast it seems like one is dodging bullets. It makes no difference where we turn, the lie is there. And we have credulously absorbed it as indisputable fact.

A few salient examples:

Canvassing the plethora of surveys and reports regarding AGW (Anthropogenic Global Warming), we come across documents like the one emanating from the University of Illinois 2009, a survey claiming that 97.4% of scientists agree that mankind is responsible for global warming. This is an impressive assessment. What we don't know is that the Illinois researchers decided that of the 10,257 respondents, the 10,180 who demurred from the so-called consensus weren't qualified to comment on the issue. Of the remaining 77 scientists whose votes were counted, 75 agreed with the proposition that mankind was causing catastrophic changes in the climate. Since 75 is 97.4% of 77, "overwhelming consensus" was demonstrated once again. The real percentage of concurring scientists in the original survey is less than 1%.

This is only one of a myriad such "studies" exemplifying the customary practice of systemic deception, as catalogued in my Global Warning: Trials of an Unsettled Science. The recent report concerning 11,000 scientists declaring global climate crisis is another, put to the lie by a meticulous examination of the list of signatories. The number of imaginary characters, ordinary people with no knowledge of the issue, professionals from other walks of life having nothing to do with climate, and complete outliers reduces the report to the level of farce, a piece of warming propaganda. Is Mickey Mouse a climate scientist? How about the Advocate for Snake Preservation? Are Sociology and Gynaecology climate disciplines? The sampling makes clear that most of the signatories work in completely unrelated fields.

The Australian bushfire coverage furnishes the most recent instance of a faux study. ABC's misleading satellite image shows one-third of the continent burning—media mendacity at its finest, obviously intended to bolster the left's global warming narrative. The map actually depicts areas that heat up in direct sunlight. There is no doubt about the catastrophic extent of the fires—an area somewhat larger than the state of West Virginia—but bad as this may be, it is nowhere remotely near one-third of the continent. As it turns out, climate change had little or nothing to do with the disaster, but 183 arsonists apparently did.

Similarly, most everything the feminist soviet claims about patriarchal domination, female under-representation, a yawning wage-gap, the calamitous prevalence of sexual assault on college campuses, and endemic male violence is based upon reams of false statistics, unscrupulous surveys, and anecdotal recollections.

Most recently, for example, in the midst of the national crisis in Australia, a feminist activist named Sherele Moody announced at a news conference that men returning from fighting fires were known to abuse their female partners, a claim based on a 2013 study published in the Australian Journal of Emergency Management dealing with the 2009 Black Saturday disaster. The paper is by Debra Parkinson, an Adjunct Research Fellow at Monash University in Melbourne, and is called "The hidden disaster: Violence in the aftermath of natural disaster." Parkinson acknowledges in the article that "no reliable statistics were available to document the effect of the disaster on domestic violence occurrences." Instead, in the complete absence of data, she relies on memories and anecdotes amongst a shockingly small interview group. On the basis of no reliable evidence, the men sacrificing their health and lives in the bushfires were publicly slandered. That is how the feminist methodology works.

Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.) delivers her inaugural address following her swearing-in ceremony at the Renaissance School for Musical Theater and Technology in the Bronx borough of New York on Feb. 16, 2019. (AP Photo/Kevin Hagen)

Other strategies may be employed. One favored technique is what I call "the pounce," that is, to take a previous lying or unsubstantiated report and cite it in a subsequent article as proof of authenticity. This recently happened to controversial pro-MAGA author Mike Cernovich who, according to the New York Post for January 30, 2018, argued that there is no such thing as rape. Not a shred of evidence, not a single source for the factoid is provided. The obloquy is then repeated in the NYP for January 2, 2020 using the earlier article as validation of its pronouncement.

A similar fate befell my wife Janice Fiamengo, creator of the anti-feminist The Fiamengo File video series. The Guardian newspaper stated, without an iota of evidence or backing, that she "promoted a conspiracy theory that the Notre Dame fire was started by Muslims, has tweeted support for white nationalists, and is a contributor to the Council of European Canadians website." The calumny was then picked up by the Huffington Post, citing the uncorroborated Guardian article as evidence. Janice's crimes, we are guessing since no data is given, were tweeting an article by Bruce Bawer, one of our finest conservative writers, and supporting Tommy Robinson, by any true account an honorable and long-suffering British patriot. She is not a contributor to the Council of European Canadians, not that there is anything wrong with the site.

We need not go into the standard practice of the politically-motivated Legacy Press; Donald Trump has done that for us. Nearly all the political news we get is Fake News, disseminated by a media conglomerate that constitutes the propaganda arm of the Democrat Party in the U.S. and the Liberal Party in my own country. The media are proof positive that the political and cultural left has completed its long march through the institutions. It has built a democratic tyranny. As Alexis de Tocqueville wrote in Democracy in America, "Under the absolute government of a single man, despotism, in order to reach the soul, crudely strikes at the body, and the soul, escaping these blows, rises gloriously above it, but in the democratic republics, tyranny does not proceed in this way; it leaves the body alone and goes straight to the soul." Indeed, the leftist microbe has burrowed deep into the soul of the nation, into every nook and cranny of the culture.

This is the blueprint for syndical victory. The left will deploy an armamentarium of outright lies, dodgy statistics, and obscurantist dogma to advance its inflammatory. Of course, when any leftist spokesman is caught in a flagrant lie, the default position is to claim that the lie tells a greater truth. How often have we heard this canard? For the left, the lie has become a vestibule to the truth—its truth.

And its truth encompasses the destruction of genuine liberal democracy and free-market societies across the Western world. This is the millennium project of the left, in tune with the U.N.'s Agenda 21 aiming at one-world governance under the sway of a self-elected elite intent on creating a new World Order predicated on zero economic growth and so-called sustainability, as the Democrat Party's Green New Deal envisages. In the words of Tom DeWeese at the American Policy Center, it is "an assault on our Constitutional rights." It is more than that; it is, in effect, the socialist master plan evolving from Marx to Gramsci to the present. And through the agency of the systematic and all-pervasive Lie, it has already been partially accomplished.

No appeal can be made to the purveyors of the Lie since they are either committed to its diffusion or, in the best if implausible scenario, may not be fully aware that the misinformation they peddle is anything but veridical. As Eric Hoffer pointed out in his indispensable The True Believer: Thoughts On The Nature of Mass Movements, the true believer of our political moment is a fanatic who is unlikely to examine his premises and assumptions. "The true believer is on the march…and is shaping the world in his own image." And he has the power of the entire range of political, cultural and institutional authority behind him.

One is now in the position of the biblical Judge Jephthah of whom John Locke wrote in Two Treatises on Government. Locke's point is that when no appeal is possible to challenge the divine right of kings, that is, to oppose constituted authority, then God must judge—thus, Jephthah's "appeal to heaven"—and one must act out of conscience to fight for and establish the truth. In our terms, we would say that the authority of the media, the academy, and our collusive political masters is irredeemably spurious and corrupt. The "appeal to heaven" is an appeal to conscience and common sense to overthrow the "kings" in our own minds. We need to recognize that these "kings" have built a world of lies so massive and infusorial that we have been unwittingly conscripted into its dominion. We must somehow expose this bogus world and return to the real one, we must be wakeful rather than woke, though I'm afraid the struggle may now be Sisyphean.

Sometimes I feel that evil is a reified force, not just a figure of speech or metaphor for affliction or a word to describe human malevolence, but an existential power that is discernibly afoot in the world. I can only understand evil as something mysterious and unintelligible that may be, as Terry Eagleton writes in On Evil, "uncaused, or its own cause," but that is implacably destructive in causing human misery through the operation of the Lie incarnate. As M. Scott Peck reminds us in People of the Lie, "the only power that Satan has is through human belief in its [Satan's] lies," a belief consistent with lack of empathy, the failure of introspection and the inability to distrust oneself. This leads to the further question of whether evil lives in the human spirit or is a factor in the objective world. As Peck remarks, "Perhaps it will forever be impossible to totally discern exactly where the human Shadow leaves off and the Prince of Darkness begins."

Clearly, the tendency to lie is inherent in the human soul and there are times when a lie may be therapeutic or benevolent, as when we lie to spare someone from embarrassment or personal misery. Ambiguity is part of life. But when the Lie becomes coterminous with the very world in which we have our being—in electoral politics, in education, in the entertainment industry, in the media print and digital, in publishing, in the censoring Big Tech platforms, in mass movements sweeping the planet like feminism and "climate change" and Islamic appeasement and identity politics and renewed socialism and Globalism—and when it lays down the latitude and longitude of our thinking so that there is scarcely any place left to locate our inner coordinates, it forms, as the ancient Gnostics believed, a wholly demonic environment, a false Creation. It is no accident that the devil is called the Father of Lies.

David Solway's latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019.

Make Women Great Again. What? Women Need to Change?

AVfM Video Source · 18 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: AVfM does not aim to enforce nor promote traditional gender roles, however we do endorse free choice, including the choice of men and women who wish to pursue a traditionalist path.

1950s ads illustrating traditional roles for women...

MY WIFE
JEAN IS HAPPY,
PRETTY & PREGNANT
BOY, AM I GLAD I BOUGHT HER A NEW HOTPOINT WASHER & DRYER
Hotpoint
ONLY
$249.95
Hotpoint
ONLY
$199.95
From the Onsuna Sun, Oswego, N.Y.

THE IDEAL GIFT FOR ALL OCCASIONS
"Oh darling! How lovely... I've just longed for a FOWLERS VACOLA BOTTLING OUTFIT for years!
Obtainable at all leading stores throughout Australia

Still want to thank you
THREE TIMES A DAY!
An everlasting gift!
New
In-Sink-Erator
Saturn Garbage Disposer
Write TODAY for free literature!
In•Sink•Erator

WIVES.
Look this ad over carefully. Circle the items you want for Christmas. Show it to your husband. If he does not go to the store immediately, cry a little. Not a lot. Just a little. He'll go, he'll go.
Husbands:
Look this ad over carefully. Pick out what you, wife wants. Go buy it. Before she starts to cry.
Dormeyer

She's very special Show her how you feel with a Hoover Christmas gift

Give her a Hoover and you give her the Best
THE HOOVER

More Power to You!
KitchenAid

Easier for YOU-and
You owe it to HIM
KitchenAid

LASTING WAYS TO SAY:
Merry Christmas
ALCOA
ALUMINUM
THESE FINE STORES AND OTHERS CARRY GIFT ITEMS OF ALCOA ALUMINUM

Still want to thank you
THREE TIMES A DAY!
An everlasting gift!
New In-Sink-Erator
Saturn Garbage Disposer
Write TODAY for free literature!
In•Sink•Erator

Hoover
Christmas morning she'll be happier with a Hoover HOOVER

JOHN BULL OUT OF THE CITY OF FEAR
by Scarlett Pauelnik
WIZARDS AT WAR
£500 FREE FOR HOME DECORATORS
fineart america

Paul interviewed on ‘Dad Talk Today’

AVfM Video Source · 18 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Tradwives, Modwives and Feminists

Peter Wright · 19 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

There's been a lot of discussion lately on a return to traditional gender roles as a way to reverse the ill effects of feminism. We see it promoted by advocates for traditional gynocentrism, and by those who promote non-gynocentric forms of traditionalism, in which men and women are called to adhere to strict 'gender roles' – eg. he is head of household who goes out and earns the money and protects her, while she makes babies, apple pies, and keeps the house clean. Its what many people refer to as the 'two-spheres doctrine' in which men and women are apportioned sovereignty over different realms – he over the political and social realm, and she over the domestic realm. This, argue the advocates of traditional gender roles, creates a delicate but eminently workable balance that has stood the test of time.

The fantasy of a return to the 'good old days' when men were masculine and chivalrous, and women were feminine and ladylike, has run strong through the manosphere and beyond, whether promoted by Anthony "Dream" Johnson and his traditionalism-promoting convention, or women like Suzanne Venker who specialize in promoting traditional roles for women.

I note Mike Buchanan of J4MB recently posted a link on his blog titled Tradwives – women who are bucking feminism, which leads to an article with the byline 'Submitting to my husband like it's 1959′: Why I became a #TradWife:

> And inevitably, it has become a 'thing' for a woman to actually admit that she wants a role as full-time housewife and mother. It's being called a Tradwife, short for traditional wife, though it was only ever a short-lived tradition for most people… Search the hashtag '#tradwife' on social media and you'll see images of cooked dinners and freshly-baked cakes with captions like, "A woman's place is in the home" or "Trying to be a man is a waste of a woman".
>
> There is a lot to that last statement, just as it is a waste of a man trying to be a woman. As Sweden has discovered, the more you try making men and women the same, the more they will emphasise their differences.[1]

I have also witnessed an occasional media article showcasing a woman who has decided to quit a stressful job to live like a 1950s housewife, insisting she's happy to spend her day cooking and cleaning because 'men should be spoiled by their wives.'

One such story in the UK Daily Mail describes a 30 yr old Oregon woman Katrina Holte as follows;

> A woman who was stressed out by her job in a busy payroll department, decided to quit the rat race and also turn back time – deciding to live like a 1950s housewife.
>
> Transforming her suburban home in Hillsborough, Oregon, into a working shrine to the era, Katrina Holte, 30, now loves keeping house for her engineering manager husband, Lars, 28 – cleaning, cooking and making dresses using 1950s patterns.
>
> Spinning vinyl discs by stars of the era like Doris Day, she flits about her business, making sure dinner is on the table when Lars gets in, saying: 'I feel like I'm living how I always wanted to. It's my dream life and my husband shares my vision.
>
> 'It is a lot of work. I do tons of dishes, laundry and ironing, but I love it and it's helping to take care of my husband and that makes me really happy.[2]

For most working men its a no-brainer that she would be more happy in a traditional roleplay of that kind. It is, as she points out, much better than working a stressful job as required of men's traditional role.

Whatever the trend for women to become tradwives, it is not the only alternative to feminist prescriptions, and it may not be the 'best' of the available alternatives either.

Here I'd like to introduce the phenomenon of "modwives" – women who have embraced multi-option lives over trad roles, and who allow, nay encourage multi-option lives for their husbands. Of course I just made up the term modwife, but they exist and are possibly also growing in number. Both tradwife and modwife eschew feminism which is geared only to female privilege, and not to partnerships based on reciprocal labor and devotion.

Over 150 years of feminism has bequeathed to women the famed multi-option lives, a sword which shattered the more narrow traditional roles with sure and mighty strokes. But the big question is this; are women today willing to renounce their multi-option lives in favour of single option traditional roles?

I would say not a snowfalke's chance in Hell. And to invite them to do so today can be construed as coercive and even an abusive act. I submit that few women today are going to genuinely trade in multi-option lives for traditional roles, other than a limited few who like the idea of free time and cosplay, and who can rely on husbands to bring home a healthy wage.

This unlikelihood that women will embrace roles of yesteryear with any real commitment leads to another option mentioned above – the modwife. At best, today's multi-option women can invite their men to do same. The modwife's modus operandi is based on personal liberty within relationships, extending a true freedom of opportunity to her partner such as society has championed for her, even though it goes without saying that the loaded gun remains in her draw, same as it sits in the draw of the tradwife.

Yet few multi-option women today are willing to extend that multi-option liberty to men, preferring instead to pocket the advantages extended by women's 'liberation' while expecting their boyfriends and husbands to remain in the mismatched role of protector and provider. There are women however, limited in number as they are, who lean toward the model of commensurate liberty for both men and women in relationships — some of them you will recognize among the supporters of the men's rights movement.

That libetarian spirit is usually understood as belonging to the political sphere, but it is accepted by the modwife as a guiding principle in her relationship with men. It emphasizes individual choice, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, and free labor-sharing arrangements and agreements. In a word; freedom.

Applying the concept of freedom to relationships may seem odd, especially when we consider the entrapment traditionally associated with marriage, not to mention the dangers and the restrictions on freedom that come with strict, prescribed gender roles of yesteryear.

Psychologist James Hillman speaks to the topic of freedom in his paper Marriage, Intimacy, Freedom:

> Yet what does the soul want with that word Freedom which sets off such expectations? What sort of preposition accompanies and influences Freedom? Freedom from – from fear, want, and oppression, such as enunciated by the Charter that established that established the United Nations after World War Two? Or is it Freedom of – choice, opportunity and movement, or access to today's political language?
>
> Or, is it Freedom to – to do as I like, to hire whom I want, to tell the boss to shove it, to go where I want, to marry whom I please–freedom of agency in the empowered and recovered adult of therapy?
>
> Or, fourth, is it possibly Freedom in? This seems moronic or oxymoronic, for the fantasy of American, epitomized by Texan, freedom is "Don't fence me in." "In" means within limits or constraints of any place, time, situation, condition, such as the kitchen, in an hour, in a conversation, in a marriage.
>
> This forth preposition,"in," rather than freedom of, to and from, suggests that the joyful expectation arising from the soul when the bell of freedom rings is nothing other than living fully in the actuality of this or that situation, as it is, which gives to that situation wings, freeing it from a desire to be elsewhere, to escape from it, to want more, thereby sating the soul's desire with the fullness of the present. How do I say it "I love what I'm doing… I'm fully in it." "I'm really into tex-mex cooking; my new computer; re-painting the house."[3]

Freedom 'in' as Hillman puts it, allows for creative negotiation on how to set up relationships that bypass the narrow choice-dichotomy between traditional relationships and feminist-informed ones.[*] For example, a man wishes to cook the food or be a stay-at-home father? So be it. She wants a career? Done. A bit of role sharing with him and her — both taking on part-time childcare, cooking and wage earning? Consider it done. This is the kind of freedom that comes with the multi-option couple, and it stands as a viable alternative to the traditional roles that we so often look back to with nostalgia.

The message of the men's rights movement has been consistent in its commitment to more options for men and boys. That call for more options, for more rights and privileges, turns out to be a good match for the liberties most women enjoy today. Whether we use that freedom to choose life with a tradwife or a modwife – or to reject wives and relationships with women completely – the choice is ultimately ours.

References:

[1] Tradwives – women who are bucking feminism, J4MB (Jan 2019)
[2] Siofra Brennan, Woman quits her stressful job to live like a 1950s housewife, UK Daily Mail (2019)
[3] James Hillman, Marriage, Intimacy Freedom, Spring Journal of Archetype and Culture (1997)

*Note: The terms Tradwife and Modwife – and by extension Tradhusband and Modhusband are used in a lighthearted way to designate the different ways people can set up a relationship. Following on from that its probably relevant to give a name to the third area which is dominated by feminist thinking – the one that insists the woman or wife should set the tempo of all relationship matters and the man should simply fall into line instead of mansplaining etc. these can be called the Gynowife & Gynohusband who has no will of his own. By contrast, Tradhusbands and Modhusbands don't need to defer to wives on all matters – they have some agency. Agency – options for and during the relationship, is the central point.

#Tradwife-1
(pre-industrial, fair labour division, gender roles w/ some role-sharing)
#Tradwife-2
(industrial era, woman-prioritising, privilege, 1950s) unequal labour division
#Feministwife
(women-led, woman prioritizing, female privilege) unequal labour division
#Modwife
(For wife & husband: respect for individual choices, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, and free labor-sharing arrangements and agreements).
GYNOCENTRIC
NOT GYNOCENTRIC

Men: Ask her for something

AVfM Video Source · 19 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Appeal to fund Mike Buchanan's attendance at the Conference on Men's Issues, New Delhi, 21-23 February, 2020

Mike Buchanan · 20 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It is widely agreed across the Men's Rights Movement that the movement in India is the most advanced in the world. It follows that Men's Rights Activists based outside India have things to learn from the Indian movement.

Anil Kumar is the leader of the Save Indian Family Foundation and is well known to MRAs around the world due to his talks at International Conferences on Men's Issues. He spoke at our two London conferences in 2016 and 2018, the videos are here and here.

Anil has kindly invited me to attend his Conference on Men's Issues in New Delhi in five weeks' time, details here.

If you'd like to attend the event, you need to send an email to siff.conference@gmail.com to confirm your attendance and to learn details about fees and the travel/visa/stay arrangements.

In an email to me, Anil wrote this:

> The presentations, panel discussions, and interactions during the breaks and in the evenings will be in English as everyone has to learn English in school and most attendees are well educated. It would be an interesting experience and new learning as ICMI is making breakthroughs in countries where the mother tongue in not English or a European language. This can help us in future in South East Asia, Japan, Russia or even China.
>
> Regarding crowdfunding of your trip, this visit and next year's ICMI in India will help worldwide solidarity on men's human rights and provide an opportunity to learn about experiments and innovations from different regions of the world. It's the new generation of confident young Indians that is taking on feminism and misandry. Anti-feminist groups and men's activists are emerging in the neighbourhood of India, in South Asia. That's almost 1.9 billion people, 25% of the world's population, who read English as their second language. As India is so big, its feminist policies impact neighbouring countries as well, and our men's movement is impacting other countries.

I've launched a crowdfunder to help me meet most of the cost of the trip, with a goal of £1,500. Thank you for your support.

Ugandans are ‘fighting back’ after American government spends billions promoting genital mutilation of males

Peter Wright · 21 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

With a nod to the great work done by Bloodstained Men, here is a picture showing pushback by Ugandans after the American government spent billions promoting genital mutilation propaganda in African nations.

Brother K. states, “AMERICAN HEGEMONY … The United States won’t educate or feed the impoverished nations of Africa, but we spent billions of dollars to fund junk science experiments and deceive them with free circumcision. The purpose of the fake circumcision experiments was to create propaganda for the American people, that circumcision has benefits.”

Robert Sapolsky: The role of Testosterone in male aggression and violence

Peter Wright · 22 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Testosterone causes aggression in men, right? Think again. Socialization plays a greater role.

The Cyprus Rape Liar—What really happened?

John Davis · 24 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Gang Rape in Cyprus, read the headlines for weeks this past summer. A British woman (Freya Heath) had accused 12 Israeli boys of gang raping her in a hotel room in Cyprus.

Within a few days, however, Freya Heath had signed a confession to the police that she had lied to them. Although the boys had been arrested, they were released from jail, and, in a poetic comeuppance, Freya Heath was, instead, herself in jail awaiting trial for falsely accusing the boys.

The Western media exploded when, on January 2, 2020, the District Court in Cyprus convicted Freya Heath of falsely accusing the boys. Five days later, the District Court in Cypress ordered her sentenced to time served (about 30 days) and a fine of about $175.00 for the false accusations against the boys.

At this point, the Western media exploded with sensational stories about how she had been wrongly convicted, and, had actually been gang raped, but how the corrupt Cyprus Court [courts in Cyprus are usually more competent and honest than court is in the UK on sex matters] had entered a ridiculous finding of guilt on her part. Those "news" outlets published their "stories" only on basis of gossip in each others' news articles, and a propaganda campaign by Freya Heath's attorneys.

None of those British and western news sources stated anything that was close to the reality of what actually happened.

For example her attorneys started the rumor that she was not represented by an attorney. The Court correctly points out that she was represented by the British Consul General from the British embassy. As another example, her attorneys started the rumor that she had been "interrogated" for 9 hours. The police records show that they confronted the rape liar with a video proving the boys' innocence, in a session that lasted about one hour and 45 minutes, and, that she signed a police confession, with the presence of the British Consul General, in a session that lasted about 15 minutes.

British and western news sources started fictionalizing what happened at the trial of Freya Heath. They started with false statements that Freya Heath's attorneys made about the trial. Then they exaggerated those claims to the point of dishonesty, and, repeated each others' exaggerated claims, over, and over, and over to Western audiences.

Only one news source, a reliable Greek news reporting service [and some Israeli news sources], reported anything accurately about the trial. Here is their article:

The article accurately cites from the Judge's 70 page verdict, finding Freya Heath guilty of having lied to the police and falsely accusing the 12 innocent Israeli boys of rape.

The story that unfolds, based upon verified evidence under oath (as opposed to the hysteria and "fake news" in the Western media) is as follows:

Freya Heath had been having sex with men, including one of the Israeli boys who she considered her "boyfriend," for at least two or three days before she had sexual relations with any of the other Israeli boys. The pathologist's report shows that she had a substantial levels of cocaine in her blood. That blood test was done in the UK. The patholgist's report also showed DNA from three men none of whom matched the DNA of the Israeli boys.

She invited a few of the boys to her hotel room, plied them with alcohol, including the underage boys, and then (apparently fueled by cocaine and alcohol) began sexually assaulting one of the boys. Her boyfriend was recording the sex with his phone. She told some of the boys to leave so she could continue "having sex" with the boy. At least half of the boys she accused had never even gone into her room. According to the video recording, she was in charge of everyone and ordering all of the boys what to do. Contrary to being "raped," as she later claimed out of malice, she was on top of the boy(s) and performing sex on them.

The next day, she found out that her "boyfriend" had recorded her sexually assaulting the boys, so, to avoid charges of underage sexual assault, she went to the police and proactively accused the boys of "gang raping" her.

We should note that British women are encouraged by the UK government to make false accusations against men and boys. Women who make false accusations receive substantial awards in the UK, such as financial rewards, support services, notoriety if they choose, and immunity from accountability for sex crimes they may have perpetrated on the man or boy they falsely accused. The British government rarely prosecutes false accusers.

The result is that false accusations in the UK are soaring, and, convictions are plummeting.

The UK rewards and encourages women who falsely accuse men of rate. As a result, convictions of men, for rape, are plummeting as Courts, police and the public learn about the high rate of false accusations fueled by the media and politicians.
The convictions are plummeting because police and prosecutors are gaining much experience in detecting false accusations of rape, from the flood of false accusations encouraged and rewarded by British media and British politicians.

This is deeply ingrained in the UK from medieval times and the dark ages. UK culture is very similar to the Ku Klux Klan culture that lynched over 4,000 men in the United States during one of the US's darkest periods. False accusations of rape or minor sexual conduct were used to justify lynching the men, just as the UK routinely uses the same excuses for persecuting men today. We can diagram the UK's hysteria over rape and sex:

The UK is caught in an historical “rape hysteria.”
For an example, one woman in the UK falsely accused 15 men of rape before the authorities did anything to protect the men, and, stop her from making false accusations against men. Many of the innocent men served jail or prison time.

The British media is trying to force this same rape hysteria on other countries (including Cyprus).

To force this rape hysteria and lynching mentality on Cyprus, the British media made no effort to be rational, intelligent, sober or to act in the public interest by invoking responsible journalism.

In the case of the Cyprus rape liar, the British “sleaze media” rushed headlong into falsely reporting the facts of the case, defending the rape liar as if she were the British kingdom’s version of the Blessed Virgin Mary, demonizing the innocent Israeli boys with relentless anti-semitic and man-hating comments and editorials, criticizing the honorable Cyprus Court as incompetent, corrupt or “male dominated,” and largely making up fantastic (and fantastically false) stories about what really happened.

The real victims in this international charade are the 12 innocent Israeli boys who suffered jail time, until they were cleared, and an indelible smear on their reputations.

The left is one huge internet troll

David Solway · 25 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

As conservative writers for online magazines are all too well aware, their leftist adversaries are not interested in serious debate or mannerly conversation. Civility is not the left's strong suit. Tactics vary along a spectrum of readily predictable talking points, false assertions, vituperation and obscenity, the stock in trade of those who have come to be known as trolls. Who and what is a troll?

Originally, trolls were unsightly folklore creatures dwelling in caves, forests, and, as in the famous folk tale, under bridges. Unlike their doppelgängers in the Disney film, they were not sweet and innocent powder-blue creatures resembling the Smurfs and the Na'vi, but gnarled and revolting specimens of indiscriminate voracity. Distinctly hostile and governed by an appetite for human flesh, they became the source of the contemporary internet troll.

The modern troll is the digital form of the contract killer. He lives in the shadows; is prone to using an alias behind which he hides; has no known street address or postal code; is often paid for his services by some powerful figure whose public presence may be known—say, a bloviating multi-billionaire with a highly dubious personal history who manages to evade the law; has no conscience and is not very intelligent but is as cunning as he is unscrupulous—in short, the internet troll is a coward who "kills" in the dark. He is motivated by envy and resentment and has neither self-respect nor moral fiber. He is devoid of productive talents and lacks the ability to make a success of his life. He is, in the current idiom, a loser.

Or course, not every troll is a hired gun. Some like to devour their prey as self-elected vigilantes who need not bother with the labor of constructing a convincing counter-argument—that, after all, takes real work. But in either case, they are the gremlins of the internet world, sniping away at the legitimate participants in the cultural debate or infesting the Twittersphere, often under the cloak of anonymity and the camouflage of fake accounts. They are not part of the conversation but the dregs of the hermeneutic exchange.

Trolls come from all across the political gamut but the vast majority, as noted, hail from the left. There can be no doubt about this. The "families" of the left constitute a political mafia that holds the country to ransom to further their own ends, operating a protection racket to dwarf all such criminal undertakings. They profit from open borders to swell their voting ranks; domination of the school system to create a cohort of political bosses, cultural enforcers, lying informants, and foot soldiers; high taxes to impoverish working people and the middle class whom they treat the same way as ants milk aphids; "trade deals" to fill their own pockets; collusion with enemies of the nation to solidify their fiefdoms and promote their seditious policies; and scams like "global warming" and single-payer health care to distribute resources to their cronies and hangers-on and to centralize command of the economy. And as in all such rackets, authority is assured via various forms of coercion, whether threat of sanction, public vilification, "canceling," legal action, fiscal ultimatums, censorship, blackmail, ban, or boycott—and, as we've seen, dispatching swarms of internet s to harry, insult, and bludgeon their designated targets with obscenities on the one hand and false data on the other.

Trolls are particularly obnoxious when they leave the shelter of the internet and band together to raise petitions and agitate as mobs to get people fired from their jobs, to crowdfund for disreputables, to disbench an unpopular judge who merely followed the rule of law, or to support women who file claims of sexual assault without credible evidence or testimonial consistency, a staple of the #MeToo movement. On the Net as commenters to articles and interviews, their effect is largely insectoid. They disgrace only themselves. Engaging with them is pointless and only inflates their counterfeit sense of importance. Trolls are either talking-point automatons who never entertained an original thought or vulgarians by nature oblivious to the usages of decorum, or both.

Indeed, trolling has become a cultural practice amounting almost to an obsession, rooted in the satisfaction that more and more people seem to derive from the act of contending, attacking, denying, and slandering in prolonged disputations—feeds and chains—without the benefit of strenuous knowledge and cordial deportment. Clearly no one is exempt from such failings but the progressivist woke have a virtual monopoly on them. Indeed, the phenomenon has been exponentially amplified by the internet with its easy access to slippery Wikipedian data, the picking up of hearsay and rumor, and the temptation to pontificate without analytical rigor or good faith, often incognito. Thankfully, the smart communicant is not helpless and is immune to noxious or maladroit persuasion. Using common sense, practicing the art of skepticism, doing at least a modicum of diligent research, and keeping one's cool is a response the troll cannot abide. He can be dismissed with silent contempt and effortlessly put to shame—assuming so coarse a sensibility is capable of feeling shame.

What is especially significant is that the psychology of trollism is spilling into all the domains of public discourse and institutional transactions affiliated with the various sectors of cultural Marxism—feminism, social justice, media depravity, climate change advocacy, corporate agendas, and leftist political rhetoric and action, which rely equally on fallacious arguments and the debasement of discursive etiquette. The "value" of trolls, if one can use that term, is that they are symptomatic. They show how far the standard of reasoned dialogue has fallen in the culture and how the capacity for independent thought has virtually ceased to exist in the progressivist world. Indeed, one might regard the left as a vast collectivist troll feasting on the greatest civilization known to history.

The only antidote to the great decline, so far as I can see, is to keep doing one's homework—reading, thinking, arguing from fact, resisting the infusion of the moral and lexical contaminants that vitiate the conduct of the left, and standing one's ground in the public domain—in genuine debate, in authorship, in daily life, in electoral politics. Nothing beats an educated and resolute mind.

David Solway's latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019.

One last thing about the phoney wage gap

Marcus Holden · 25 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I'm so so sick of hearing about this fictional wage gap. People, including some MRA's have this wage thing wrong. Its not about the earning of money, but the SPENDING.

Money has no power whatsoever, until it is being handed over at the cash register… so the spending of money is a privilege. To earn the money is a LIABILITY!

Women do most of the spending, not just groceries, but clothes, cars … everything. They are the privileged ones! The people who are doing the earning (and not spending), are the exploited ones.

Lets reverse it, and imagine how it would be presented to us. The feminists would be saying that the working women are exploited. They'd say we women are pushed out the door at 6am by our lazy husbands, only to return 11 hrs later exhausted.

> "We women work ourselves to death, only to hand the money over to our lazy husbands, and they go off and spend it as they see fit, and complain about driving the kids to soccer. We women are literally dying out there in accidents, we do the sewerage, we dangle from helicopters to save people, we run into burning buildings, we pull glowing pieces of steel from huge furnaces, we go underground to mine coal, and sometimes get trapped down there…and why?…. all to provide for our lazy husband and the kids. We work, and die …. they spend and live.
>
> "WE WOMEN ARE EXPLOITED BY THOSE LAZY MEN….WE ARE THEIR SLAVES!
>
> "And on top of it…not only do those lazy stay at home men show no gratitude for the sacrifice we women make, they have the gaul to complain (from their dressing gowns and slippers), that we women are earning too much! ….. bla bla bla.. ITS FEMOCIDE!
>
> "WE ARE A FEMICIDE DRIVEN CULTURE!"

Ok, back to the normal world…

Another way of looking at it is; if women are so economically downtrodden, then where do we see it? Do they drive cheaper cars? Wear threadbare clothes? Go to cheaper holiday destinations? Does your mother have a lower standard of living than your father? Does your sister live poorer than your bothers?

No one asks men what its like to live in bonded servitude, but that's exactly what it is. And there are so many men out their being economically exploited, but it has been twisted around to make those poor exploited men appear like selfish rogues.

Two more videos from ManWomanMyth

Mike Buchanan · 25 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

ManWomanMyth (MWM) was a legendary British vlogger, who published very high-quality videos on his YouTube channel over many years until 2015, since when he hasn't published any such material. His YouTube channel disappeared in 2015, but thanks to many people who'd downloaded his videos, we now have a playlist of 117 of his videos, here. His work was highly influential to MRAs globally, including myself. I doubt that I'd ever have become a full-time MRA without learning so much from his extraordinary body of work about feminism, gender issues etc.

At some point in 2014 he started a new video channel, "Humanity Bites", and started posting videos in which he personally appeared for the first time. The channel disappeared at the same time as his main one, and over the past few years we've made many attempts to find the videos, including public appeals, with no success. Until today.

Whilst on YouTube today I searched using the term "Humanity Bites", hoping for some new channels. Nothing. Then it occurred to me – I don't know why – to leave the space out, and searched "HumanityBites". Kerching! This led me to HumanityBites Mirror, a channel with two videos published by MWM in 2014 – Bring Back Our Girls (4:40) and On White Sprinters & Female CEOs (22:51), which are both featured below.

I appear a number of times in the second video. MWM drove from his home in London to my home in Bedford to interview me. At the end of the video the text states the interviews (Erin Pizzey and Steve Moxon in addition to myself) were recorded over 2011/12, although in the video he shows me as the leader of J4MB, which I launched in 2013. He must have stored the interviews of Erin, Steve, and myself, for two or three years before finalising the video. With the addition of these two items, our MWM channel now contains 119 videos.

From Peterson to Incels: is there a generation of ‘lost boys’?

AVfM Video Source · 25 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Other women's money

Doug Mortimer · 26 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

In 2013 Martin Scorsese made a movie called The Wolf of Wall Street. As was the case with his gangster movies, the film portrayed men behaving badly and enjoying every minute of it…until they received their comeuppance in the last act.

It would be interesting to know what Sallie Lee Krawcheck thought about the movie. Who is Sallie Lee Krawcheck? "The most senior woman on Wall Street" is a financial guru with an appropriately impressive resume, including top management gigs at Merrill Lynch, Smith Barney, Citigroup, and Bank of America. Her experience, however, left her with a dim view of the Wall Street "boys club." In fact, she was so disgusted she started Ellevest, an investing platform of women, by women, and for women. Since "elle" is French for "she," I guess we could dub Krawcheck the She-Wolf of Wall Street.

Now there is nothing wrong with setting up a service that focuses on women. Any number of businesses do that. Some products or services are more likely to be of interest to women than men. Besides, as has been often noted, women control the purse strings, accounting for the lion's (the lioness's?) share of purchases in America. Krawcheck, however, feels that, "The biggest money mistake that women tend to make is that we are not investing as much as men are."

Another way to say that is that women spend too much and have nothing left for investing, but woman as shopaholic spendthrift is a terribly unflattering stereotype. Stating that investing is good and men are more likely to do it is tantamount to admitting that men are doing something right and women are doing something wrong. One has to tread carefully in that regard.

Krawcheck says that good investing can make a bigger dent in your net worth than pay raises. On average, for all its volatility, the stock market has gone up 9.5% every year since the 1920s. Chances are your paycheck hasn't kept pace. Something both women and men should keep in mind.

Also, women's life spans and earning curves differ from men's. Did you know that salaries peak at age 40 for women, and at age 55 for men? (Curse you, gender pay gap!) At any rate, since women tend to live longer than men, that dictates a different investment strategy. Of course, any good financial advisor will take into account your financial vitals…your age, your income, your debts, your family status…and make recommendations accordingly. So why not your sex?

Sounds reasonable enough, and given the myriad of investment funds out there with different goals and missions, a fund for women doesn't sound too far out…until you look at Krawcheck's Ellevest web site. You can't help but come away with the idea that Occupy Wall Street has morphed into Infiltrate Wall Street. The recurring term "Disrupt Money" is an umbrella phrase for such topics as:

What Can Companies Do to Move Forward in Gender Equality?
4 Ways to Raise Our Children to Be Financial Feminists.
Stand up for paid family leave
Help your company close its own gender pay gap.
Finding women-owned and women-run companies.

Naturally, there are investment funds out there to facilitate the above. Consider the Pax Ellevate Global Women's Leadership Fund and the SPDR SSGA Gender Diversity ETF (exchange-traded fund).

"Closing the Gender Investing Gap" is the official mission of Ellevest, yet investors are also given helpful hints on "Closing the Unpaid Labor Gap" and "Closing the Gender Pricing Gap." Mission creep, anyone?

Krawcheck invites visitors to her web site to "Invest like a woman." This sounds like a straight line in search of a punchline, but I'll leave it to you to fill in the blank.

She also informs us that "86% of Investment Advisors Are Men, With an Average Age of 50+"…to which one might want to reply, "So what?" But you can't utter those two words in response to any of the grievances of the protected classes lest you be vilified as a fascist at worst or insensitive at best.

When it comes to equity in financial matters, Krawcheck conveniently overlooks a few things. Of course, you've heard of the wage gap, and no matter how many debunkers drive stakes through its heart, it refuses to die. A few men's groups have responded by pointing out the tax gap, the difference between what men and women pay in taxes and the difference in what they get out of those tax payments. But what about the inheritance gap?

I'm neither a statistician nor a demographer, but I think I can safely say that there is a yawning inheritance gap. In other words, the amount of money inherited by women outstrips the money inherited by men. Let's follow the money – the big money.

The Forbes list of the 400 Richest Americans in 2019 is overwhelmingly male. The list, overwhelmingly male, is headed by the usual suspects…Jeff Bezos,. Bill Gates, Warren Buffett, Mark Zuckerberg. The first woman on the list is No. 11, Alice Walton with $51.4 billion. In the "Sources of wealth" column (in Wikipedia, but not Forbes) it says "Walmart, inherited." Admittedly, the same is true of her brothers, Jim Walton and S. Robson Walton, who are neck and neck with her on the list. According to Forbes, she is more interested in art (she is chairwoman of the board of the impressive Crystal Bridges Museum in Walmart's hometown of Bentonville, Arkansas) than the family business. (All rather ironic for those of us who remember The Waltons, an old TV series about a poor but honest family in the Blue Ridge Mountains during the Depression.)

Now let's go down the megabucks list to Julia Koch in No. 13 with $41 billion. Where did her wealth come from? "Koch Industries, inherited." OK, so the two richest women in America inherited their fortunes…mere coincidence? Let's keep going.

No. 15 is MacKenzie Bezos. Her Wikipedia bio calls her an "American novelist and philanthropist." Who knew there were big bucks in those two pursuits? She is not an heiress, but her divorce settlement from Amazon's Jeff Bezos (who is No. 1 on the list at $114 billion) amounted to $35 billion. Not a bad reward for 26 years of marriage (it works out to $1.35 billion per year). Of course, she might have gotten more if she'd just waited for hubby to croak, but there's always the chance he might outlive her. Better to bail out early and go with the sure thing.

The next woman on the list is Jacqueline Mars, No. 18 with $23.5 billion, the result of her being born into the Mars candy family. That's a lot of Milky Ways, M&Ms, Skittles, Snickers, and Twix, probably enough to induce a diabetic coma in the entire population of a medium-sized American city. Again, to be fair, she was not alone, as her brother John Mars, also benefited from America's sweet tooth.

Next we come to Laurene Powell Jobs & family with $21.3 billion. Jobs, eh? You don't suppose she was married to…that's right, Steve Jobs. She inherited billions of bucks of Apple and Disney stock from him!

Next with a paltry $14 billion is Abigail Johnson, CEO of Fidelity Investments. I've no doubt she is financially savvy, but she took over from her father as CEO, and her grandfather founded the firm. Not quite an inheritance, but I wouldn't call her a self-made woman.

Worth a mere $8.5 billion is Christy Walton in 58th place (right behind George Soros and Jimmy Jones). There's that name Walton again. This time around, however, it's a case of marrying money. She was the wife of John Walton at the time he died of a plane crash in 2005, and hence an in-law of the aforementioned Waltons.

Rounding out the top 100, we find more people with the surnames Walton and Mars. Also, a number of women's names appear alongside their family's name or their husband's names, and there is the occasional widow who runs the show – often capably – after her husband's demise. I'm sure eventually there must be a woman on the list who was not dependent on a man in some form or fashion to jump-start her wealth, but by now I think my point is obvious. Women spend lots of money, and on occasion excel at managing money, but the creation of wealth is overwhelmingly male. Given a typical bell curve distribution, this should not be surprising, since men appear at the extremes more frequently than women. Also, typical male traits come into play…the role of being a good provider, objectivity, ambition – every one of them reeking of toxic masculinity…unless you stand to benefit from the wealth they amass.

Now very few women are fortunate enough to marry billionaires or to be born into the families of same. But many women do inherit money from mere millionaires or from men with lesser assets. Remember, women live longer, so they are more likely to inherit money than to bequeath it. The same can be said of life insurance. Women are far more likely to get a payout from that than their husbands. And let's not forget Social Security. Countless widows, even if they were stay-at-home moms, have received benefits checks courtesy of their late husband's payments into the system. So women really don't have anything to whine about…but squeaky wheels tend to get addicted to grease.

There's nothing illegal about inherited wealth or windfalls, but in leftist circles there is tinge of shame to them, as they raise the issue of unearned privilege. Of course, Ellevest conveniently sidesteps these sources of income – even though they provide ample fodder for investments – because, goshdarnit, they just don't fit the female injustice/inequity paradigm they're pushing.

No matter how woke the Ellevest folks purport to be, to survive they must make money for their clients. If Ellevest fails to attract male clients, it is severely restricting potential funds. I seriously doubt there are that many "woke" men out there looking for a female-friendly social justice investment vehicle. In fact, I suspect the majority of women investors are mainly concerned with making a buck, not with social change. There may be a niche market of woke women out there but probably not not enough to keep the likes of Ellevest afloat. In that case, Krawcheck has an escape hatch: Ellevest's failure (or at least underperformance) will be men's fault for choosing to invest in "socially irresponsible" funds.

Krawcheck herself, however, is not totally bulletproof in the SJ skirmishes. To a large degree, her target audience is affluent women, who, like herself, are far more likely to be white. She can't come right out and say that, but if you're going fishing, you go where the fish are. After all, women who live paycheck to paycheck don't have discretionary funds for investment, so there's no sense in making a pitch to them. Consequently, WOCs (women of color) are largely underserved. And let's not forget trans women! They have special needs too…but don't call them special needs people.

Ah, but comes the revolution and all women will be empowered and gender equity will be manifest in all walks of life…or will it?

Remember, you can lead a woman to the stock exchange but you can't make her invest.

Rosie is sickened

Mark Dent · 27 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The queen of gender bigotry in Australia is sickened.

The woman who has repeatedly denigrated, admonished, condemned and blamed men for all violence perpetrated upon children and women in this country is disgusted.

The callously, cold creature who stood upon her powerful platform and told male victims who had experienced physical and emotional abuse at the hands of a female partner that their experience of violence does not rise to the same level as a woman's, is angry.

The feminist female who chose to lay the blame for the death of her son at the feet of the patriarchy and all Australian men who wallow in their toxic masculinity even though it was her decision to choose the man who killed her son as her partner and then welcome him back into her bed after a separation due to his unpredictable behavior and mental issues.

Rosie Batty is beneath contempt. She is a liar. She is a deceitful, manipulative, power-drunk gender bigot.

I wonder how this woman places her head upon her pillow and sleeps each night.

The air has felt a little fresher and the sunshine a tad warmer and brighter since this sick woman gradually became yesterday's news. Oh, there is still the occasional quote or comment but nothing to compare to the almost daily sanctification of this hate-filled "Australian of the Year" a few short years ago.

The barrage was relentless and she used her power to do what many women have done throughout the ages. She played the victim and demanded the men in government prove how much they cared about her and all women who live under the potential threat of being harmed by the men who are closest to their hearts.

And just as every male dominated government has done for decades, they threw hundreds of millions of dollars into the feminist run coffers of various domestic violence organizations.

And now this demonstrably deceitful piece of work is sickened.

Why?

Former Australian of the Year Rosie Batty has slammed the awarding of an Australia Day honour to controversial commentator Bettina Arndt.

Ms Arndt, 70, was appointed a Member of the Order of Australia for striving to achieve 'gender equity through advocacy for men'.

Ms Batty said her immediate reaction was 'one of utter incredulity' and she felt 'sickened' by the announcement.

It makes me question the legitimacy of the awards system in the entirety across the spectrum,' Ms Batty told news.com.au.

'I cannot help but be appalled that someone who minimised violence towards women, who is part of the inevitable pushback and backlash that we all experience as we pioneer a way forward, would be awarded,' Ms Batty said of the appointment.

Batty believes using accurate statistics and expressing concern for male victims of family violence is an act of minimizing violence towards women.

Look at the way the story is framed in the headline. Bettina is hung, drawn and quartered before you have read the opening paragraph.

'I feel sickened': Rosie Batty slams decision to give an Australia Day award to controversial commentator Bettina Arndt after her shocking claims of a 'fake rape crisis'

Today is Australia Day and one of the traditions of the occasion is to award people who have served the community or worked to help others in some capacity as a form of recognition for their good works.

The panel responsible for selecting worthy recipients did the unthinkable. They chose to recognize Bettina Arndt for her efforts in seeking gender equity for men.

This is entirely unacceptable. This is outrageous. This is a heinous decision.

How has the press reported Rosie's angst?

Predictably, instead of focusing on the issue at hand, ie. whether or not Arndt's assertion that there is no rape crisis on our university campuses is a valid one, they attempt to smear her. It is an age-old tactic used by feminists and other rabid zealots who belong to ideologically driven tribes. Do not deal in facts or provide evidence to support your claims. Attack the character of the person who is opposing you. Demolish their reputation and then there is no need to do anything as low brow as actually engage with them and refute their claims in a discussion or debate. You simply rev up the haters to do what they do best.

I am not going to spend any time writing about the smear. I know nothing about it and don't care for it has zero relevance to the issue at hand. It is a pathetic diversion.

Batty knows she has the media and Twittersphere on her side. She knows she is giving them the green light to start a rabid attack on Bettina Arndt. I am no longer on Face Book and was never a user of twitter, but I predict there will be a campaign demanding Bettina Arndt has her Order of Australia award taken from her on the grounds she is a pedophile defender and supporter of the rape and violent abuse of women.

Perhaps the pressure of the mob will succeed. Time will tell.

When Sherele Moody is speaking out in solidarity with you on any issue, you know you are on the wrong side of history. She is most recently known for her comment about male firefighters being most likely to go home from a day fighting fires and bash their wives.

'Nothing says "gender equity" like a powerful woman with a platform laughing with a repeat male child rapist about his young female victim using her sexuality to trick him into abuse, right?' she wrote on Twitter.

Batty's constant pushing of the notion that disrespect and lack of representation of women in parliament (gender equity) is directly linked to violence against women is another outrageous, unsubstantiated lie. This furphy was brutally exposed by Senator David Leyonhjelm in this exchange.

She seems to be using domestic violence as a trojan horse to champion many other feminist causes much as our Climate Change hero Greta Thunberg adds the dismantling of the patriarchy and destruction of capitalism to her to do list alongside fighting the climate which will end our world in a few short years.

Batty would never dare to have a face to face confrontation with Arndt to debate the relative merits of their views. She knows she would be eviscerated. So, this woman who specializes in demonizing an entire gender and refusing to acknowledge male victims of family violence in any meaningful, empathic way continues to speak from her distant pulpit, safely hurling mud with zero chance of her target having any opportunity to confront her or push back.

Like Greta Thunberg, she is always surrounded by minders and protected from having her bigoted stance questioned or probed. On the rare occasions where she has been caught out and had to think for herself, she has looked like a rabbit in the spotlight, just as Greta does whenever she has to go off script and think for herself.

Like Greta, Batty is simply a pawn, a figurehead used by more powerful people who pull their strings behind the curtain.

They fit the bill so beautifully.

If you dare to attack or even mildly criticize or question Greta, you are branded an abuser of a vulnerable child. She can spew her vitriolic nonsense unimpeded and without having to defend her views.

It has always been the same with Batty. Anyone who questions her very gender specific empathy and compassion is reminded that she is a mother whose son was murdered and therefore untouchable and absolutely not to be questioned.

The media and government then step in and an avalanche of abuse is spewed in the direction of the one who dared to question the sanctified one. Mark Latham was the last person brave enough (or stupid enough) to criticize Batty and he felt the full fury of her comrades. John Setka was another who used Rosie's name in vain and paid for it.

Fawn over her and bow at her feet whenever she speaks but do not raise so much as an eyebrow in her presence unless you are prepared to face a most vicious, uncompromising backlash.

What has always genuinely appalled me most about Batty is the fact that most people who endure a horrific loss of any kind usually become deeply connected to anyone who has endured a similar experience.

War vets tend to talk about their experiences with other war vets and no-one else. Amputees are put in touch with other amputees so they can share their stories, offer support and provide some hope to those who are just beginning their journey in an at time frightening new world.

When a parent experiences the unimaginable nightmare of losing a child there are groups created for them. These groups consist of other parents who have lost a child and share the grief unique to the people unfortunate enough to have had to live through this hell.

Can you imagine a person who lost a limb or endured some other disability or severe illness deciding they wish to dedicate their life to finding a solution/cure for this disease, but only for victims who share their gender?

It is unimaginable.

Yet this is exactly what Batty has done.

She has made it clear that her compassion and concern is for women and children who are victims of male violence. Children who are murdered, tortured or emotionally abused by their mothers are never mentioned by this woman. Never. Men who are murdered or abused by women are dismissed as an almost irrelevant minority as rare as unicorns.

Can you imagine parents campaigning to end male suicide and only male suicide because their son killed himself? Can you imagine those parents dismissing the concerns of families whose daughters killed themselves because they are in the minority?

Can you begin to imagine the reaction if these parents were brought face to face with parents who have lost a daughter to suicide yet still refused to consider their loss as a part of the problem that needs to be addressed?

Can you imagine an annual vigil in Federation Square for male suicide victims, with not one female name read out or acknowledged?

Can you imagine these parents demanding that the government hand over hundreds of millions of dollars to organizations created specifically to find a way to end male suicide?

You don't need an imagination. All this and more has taken place in the sphere known as family violence.

When Batty's candlelight vigil for victims of domestic violence takes place each year in Melbourne's Federation Square, only the names of women and children are read out.

No reference is made to the multiple female perpetrators who have murdered children and men nor the many men who have died.

Below is a snapshot from NSW over a twelve-month period.

New data from the Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research reveals 38 people died as a result of domestic violence (DV) homicide in the year to March 2019, up from 19 in the previous 12 months.

Attorney-General Mark Speakman said the overall rate of murder in NSW was trending downwards, but the spike in DV-related homicides was alarming.

"Behind those numbers are real people," he said.

"They're mothers, daughters, sisters, wives, husbands, brothers, sons, fathers who've been the victims of domestic homicide."

Women accounted for 15 of the total number of victims, up from 11 the previous year.

Seven of the victims were children who were killed by a parent, up from one victim in the previous year.

But there was a significant increase in male victims of DV homicide, with 14 men killed in 2018/19 compared with five in the previous year.

Only three men were killed by their partners, with the majority killed by an adult child, a parent, a housemate or their partner's current or former partner.

So, 14 men were killed and 15 women in the twelve-month period in the state of New South Wales in 2019. Deep breath. Read that statistic and then try very hard to contemplate Rosie Batty's very deliberate eradication of men as victims of family violence.

It is almost criminal.

Her words are on record and they are indefensible.

Bettina Arndt is a fiercely professional journalist who deals in cold facts and statistics.

She calls out bullshit when it is demonstrably false. She has courage. Anyone who chooses to advocate for the most despised demographic in our society has to be brave and thick skinned. Fortunately, Bettina is both.

Rosie Batty is a cold, manipulative gender bigot.

Nothing anyone says, no matter how enraged, threatening, unhinged, apoplectic, accusatory or hateful will change this fact.

I will find her behavior after the murder of her son utterly incomprehensible till the day I die. We all experience loss and tragedy in our lives. This can never be used as an excuse or a defense for promoting dangerous, harmful ideas (women never/rarely harm children or their partners) or enacting bigotry into law.

See Also: Aggrieved Entitlement – women's reaction to temporary loss of chivalry

Can Harvey Weinstein Get a Fair Trial?

AVfM Video Source · 27 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Gynocentrism, Sex Differences and the Manipulation of Men (Part One)

Peter Ryan · 29 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

This article is in three parts. This is part one.

Moving Beyond A False Gynocentric Understanding Of Biology:

As I have discussed in previous articles, there is a widely held belief in our gynocentric culture and even in the manosphere, that women are more biologically valuable than men because they are the rate limiting factor of reproduction and men are supposedly expendable. I have explained in great detail why this is not the case in the following articles and have covered every common argument that is used to justify this false and factually incorrect claim:

- Gynocentrism and the golden uterus (part one)[1]
- Gynocentrism and the golden uterus (part two)[2]
- Gynocentrism and the value of men (part one)[3]
- Gynocentrism and the value of men (part two)[4]
- The nature of male value and our gynocentric culture (part one)[5]
- The nature of male value and our gynocentric culture (part two)[6]

This claim is pervasive and is the foundation of the core belief in female superiority that drives gynocentrism in our culture. That is why I have written so much about it. Maintaining the lie that men are expendable and only women are valuable in the culture, is critical to maintaining gynocentrism. The claim of greater female biological value, is sometimes used to explain the origins of gynocentrism and even justify gynocentrism in society. Ironically this claim is actually a product of gynocentrism itself. In reality the two sexes have equal biological value, but biological value manifests itself differently in each sex. In women biological value is generally more focused on reproductive output and in men biological value is generally more focused on survival output. Of course there is considerable overlap (the sexes are more alike than different[7]) between the sexes and exceptions, but that is the general pattern.

There are some people that erroneously suggest that sexual selection is greater than natural selection and therefore reproduction is more important than survival. This is factually incorrect and can be debunked quite easily. If an organism does not survive long enough, it either does not reproduce or does not reproduce at a frequency that preserves its lineage, or its offspring die and the lineage dies with them. There is an equilibrium between sexual selection and natural selection. If the fitness benefits of sexual selection of a particular trait, are outweighed by the fitness costs of that trait arising from reduced survival, then natural selection will override sexual selection.

It is correct that certain traits can arise in a species that may enhance reproduction at the cost of reduced survival, but this can only develop to a certain degree (and the reverse can occur too where survival is enhanced at the cost of reproduction, in circumstances where the net fitness benefit of survival is greater). Positive feedback loops in sexual selection can occur, this is sometimes identified as Fisherian runaway selection[8]. However eventually such a process terminates when costs to survival become too high and natural selection pressure begins to exceed sexual selection pressure. In a species where this does not occur soon enough, a species will become extinct (like the Irish Elk). Over billions of years, evolution has eliminated species that reproduced at the expense of their own survival in an unsustainable manner. Sexual selection and reproduction are not biological absolutes that exist in a vacuum. Natural selection can override sexual selection and impacts on survival can be more important to evolutionary success than impacts on reproduction.

Each sex has its own optimal life history strategy to propagate the genome. There is overlap between the sexes, but there are also differences. One key difference between males and females, arises from the greater evolutionary success for males in taking on high risk and high effort challenges and hardships, that have a high return or benefit. A man that risks his life to earn social status or acquire resources, may win big and this may greatly increase his mating opportunities and the frequency with which he passes on his genes. Women thanks to their uteri, are limited to reproducing much more slowly and also incur a cost or risk to their primary reproductive function from taking on such risky hardships.

This basic sex difference, is just one of the reasons why men more so than women, are prepared to take on risks and challenges and engage in hardships. It is also one of the key reasons why men are less able to elicit support and protection from society and why women are more capable in doing so. Taking on risks and hardships requires self-reliance and independence from the support and protection from society. Developing traits that elicit support and protection from society, is at least to some degree (but not in an absolute sense) incompatible with male life history strategy. It is not a supposedly greater biological value of women that is behind society providing greater support and protection to women, it is a difference in the manner in which males and females optimise their evolutionary success that has in part led to this difference in societal concern.

We do have a predisposition[9] to show greater concern for female well-being in certain contexts. That it is a reality and it has nothing to do with women being biologically more valuable than men. Eliciting support and protection from society is a strength that women possess in greater abundance than men, because it is more aligned with women's life history strategy. A certain underlying biological bias toward supporting and protecting women over men does exist. It is important to remember though as I cited before, that whilst sex differences exist, the sexes are more similar than they are different. Both sexes for instance have evolved and display neotenous features. Our sexual dimorphism is intermediate and not huge like some other animals. So whilst an underlying bias to support and protect women over men may exist, it is not necessarily a huge chasm like sex differences in many other species. It is also important to recall as I mentioned in the normalisation of gynocentrism[10], that human civilisation has arisen from a capacity to make intelligent decisions and control and where necessary inhibit our instinctual impulses. The biases and impulses that drive gynocentric behaviour can be controlled and overcome to a substantial degree.

We can overcome our biases as a society provided that:

1. We are aware of them.
2. We recognise the need to address them as beneficial and worthwhile to our society.
3. We introduce social and legal measures into our culture and society to keep them in check.
4. We recognise and counter efforts to undermine those social and legal measures (like addressing attacks on due process and freedom of speech).

Racism has a biological basis to it, as politically incorrect and as troubling as that sounds. Humans are tribalistic by nature and we have in-groups and out-groups. However we have made efforts to address racism in our culture, in our legal system and in our institutions. We are not slaves to innate biological sexism or racism, with no capacity to change our behaviour. We had slavery and legally and socially sanctioned discrimination in the West for hundreds of years based on racist bigotry and we overcame that. What change seems impossible in the present, actually is not so impossible. Slaves thought the same thing centuries ago and look where we are now.

In my previous article[6], I mentioned that ironically in some ways feminism has actually demonstrated our capacity to override biology. Feminism has created large numbers of childless women, whose lineage will die with them. Where feminism has taken hold, many societies are pursuing a path that is in contravention to our biological imperative and the populations are failing to replace themselves and continue their lineages. Whilst culture is indeed informed by biology, it is not completely and absolutely restricted by it. Culture also can and does shape biology to some degree (read these articles here[11] and here[12]).

Part of the evolutionary advantage of culture, is to extend behaviour to a certain degree beyond the current evolved biological envelope and allow radical adaptation. Such radical adaptation is not possible if culture is completely unable to go beyond biological predispositions. This is why we can get things like feminism emerging in human society. It is why we can overcome our tribalistic tendencies and overcome racism. It is why we don't have a society where it is a free-for-all and survival of the fittest. It why we are able invest in activities that are so abstract and distant from the biological activities directly related to genome propagation.

I am not suggesting that there is no biological basis to gynocentrism. What I am suggesting is that the biological basis to gynocentrism does exist and has nothing to do with women being more valuable than men and more to do with the positive and negative effects of our evolved sex differences that arose from each sex having a different strategy in passing on their genes. I am suggesting that whilst certain biases have a partial biological basis to them, like our bias toward female neoteny, we can still manage and overcome these biases. I am not suggesting we can completely eliminate gynocentrism, I am suggesting we can substantially reduce it. Just as we cannot completely eliminate racism, we can and have been able to substantially reduce it. Slavery is no longer a mainstream practice in the West as it was for centuries. Hanging people of a particular skin colour from a tree is not socially or legally acceptable either and racism is not socially or legally sanctioned in society. These are all massive leaps forward that we have taken and positive leaps. Pockets of racism exist, but racism is no longer normalised throughout mainstream society. We can do the same with gynocentrism.

The fatalistic thread of the manosphere, is not achieving anything except keeping men in a perpetual state of learned helplessness. Men are valuable and men do matter. As I mentioned at the start of this article, gynocentrism is based on the core belief women are superior to men. The belief in female superiority ultimately rests on the unquestioned axiom women are biologically valuable and men are biologically expendable, because women have a uterus and give birth and men do not. Propagating this lie is a part of normalising gynocentrism in our culture and is the foundational justification that is relied upon when gynocentric double standards are challenged.

Convincing men that they are expendable with this fictitious lie and using sophistry and twisted interpretations of biology to change men's perception of themselves from a human being to a human doing, is a core means through which men are controlled in society. When men see themselves as expendable, then they willingly go along with their own exploitation. Even when they do not, men with this perception will not support any organised resistance to the exploitation and marginalisation of men because they perceive it as futile. The gynocentric programming has done its job in such cases- Men become paralysed in a mental prison of learned helplessness.

Briffault's "Law":

The notion that females determine all the conditions of the animal kingdom (or Briffault's Law[13]), is part of this programming and demonstrably false. Women are not omnipotent. Rape gangs exist, female sex slaves exist, female genital mutilation occurs, the murder and abortion of female infants occurs, arranged marriage exists, millions of Jewish women were exterminated along with men in death camps and the genuine marginisalisation of women exists in parts of Africa and the Middle East (and no I am not talking about Iran). Even in highly traditional theocratic cultures like Iran, where both men and women are restricted, women cannot do as they please. Don't believe me? Watch this documentary[14] on women and divorce in Iran. Women do not call the shots in Iran and neither do men, the theocrats and the family do. Plus one for a restrictive culture and minus one for female omnipotence. Even in the West women do not always get their way. Trump got elected despite feminists and even the democrats don't entirely follow female interests. These are not just exceptions to the rule, there are too many exceptions to count. These are chasms that cannot be explained with such an absolutist, monolithic and simplistic so-called "law".

In dating and relationships we can see men that pump and dump women wanting marriage, or men that opt out of relationships entirely and go their own way. I have often heard women are the gatekeepers of sex, but men are far more selective when it comes to getting married and having a relationship than they are with sex. Women might only prefer the top twenty percent of men, but those same men have little incentive or desire to settle down with them. These men have an abundance of women that want them and many men in the top twenty percent can and do simply pump and dump them.

At the same time, whilst women are complaining about where all the good men went and men not earning enough and pretending like feminism has nothing to do with it, less and less men are interested in marriage and relationships. Men are becoming aware of the bias in divorce and family court and steering clear of marriage. They are also steering clear of certain women in the metoo# climate and domestic violence climate and refusing to be alone with female co-workers or mentor them. Then there is the wall, where women over 35 experience a sharp drop in their sexual mating value in contrast to the rising sexual mating value of their male counterparts. So no, women do not control every aspect of dating, relationships and how the sexes interact in the workplace. Ultimately women cannot force men to do anything and men do act at least to some degree on their own self-interest. There are too many exceptions to make the generalisation women control everything. They do not.

There is a big difference in suggesting women influence society and taking the absolutist position women control all the conditions of the animal kingdom and by extension society. Do women control every political and economic decision made by our governments? Did women cause Trump to launch an attack on an Iranian general? Did women tell the US government to bail out the banks? The reason modern evolutionary biology does not cite Briffault's Law as a "law" or established theory, is because the facts and evidence do not support the absolutist position of female omnipotence it rests on. Evolutionary biology and psychology recognise female mate choice exists, but they also recognise male mate choice exists too and that other factors unrelated to female influence, also influence the conditions of society.

Gynocentrism And The Psychological Manipulation Of Men:

Like the Earth not being the centre of the solar system or universe and the Earth not being flat, modern 21st century science recognises that it is a bit more complicated than women being at the centre of everything. Why does such an outdated and questionable concept like Briffault's Law gain traction within sizeable communities of the manosphere? Men have been programmed from birth to see female approval as the mark of their worth. Mothers, sisters, female teachers, the wider culture and their female friends and partners, all inform men that their worth is tied to living up to whatever women's preferred definition of what a man is. That's why. It is another form of manipulation and control. In my previous article[6] I wrote about precarious manhood and the social pressure on men to prove they are a "real man" and cited a video[15] on the subject by Tom Golden. What was the "white feather"[16] during World War One? What are messages like "The End Of Men"[17] in the modern day? All methods to condition male identity around female approval and use precarious manhood to control men.

Naturally men have developed a perception from this programming, where they see women as the centre of the universe. This is the programming they have received their whole lives from every corner of society. That's where this thinking comes from and the manosphere is not immune to sliding into this fatalistic line of thinking that women are the centre of everything. It is why junk concepts like Briffault's Law still gain traction even in the manosphere. So when men like myself start writing about the fact that females do not control all the conditions of human society, some men in the manosphere perceive it as a denial of their lived experience and of their twisted and seriously flawed understanding of biological reality (which they almost never scrutinise).

It is your lived experience, it is my lived experience and the experience of every man in this gynocentric culture. I do not deny that. However even a casual observation of society shows Briffault's law to be false. Women do not control all the conditions of society. It ain't that simple. The fact men are conditioned from birth to assign their worth to what they do and think of themselves as expendable, does not then make them an expendable human doing any more than conditioning a human being to act like a dog makes them a dog. All it proves is that you can control how people perceive themselves by using social approval and operant conditioning. It just highlights how powerful the effects of social and psychological manipulation can be, especially when done from a young age on the target group (men and boys in this case). People are social learners and we are a social species and are susceptible to manipulation (especially when that is all we are exposed to from birth).

Men need to recognise the extent to which the lies they have been told about themselves influence their perception of themselves and of reality. Female omnipotence and male expendability are illusions our gynocentric culture uses to control men. Whilst the Myth of Male Power[18] was an excellent book, an equally important book is The Manipulated Man[19] by Esther Vilar. How do you convince the physically stronger sex to subordinate themselves to the physically weaker sex? Manipulation. That is the nature of the mechanism of control over men at work. How do institutions and governments exploit men whilst simultaneously relying on men to operate the system of their own exploitation? Manipulation.

Please continue on to part two of this article.

References:

1. https://gynocentrism.com/2019/04/29/gynocentrism-and-the-golden-uterus-part-one/
2. https://gynocentrism.com/2019/05/02/gynocentrism-and-the-golden-uterus-part-two/
3. https://gynocentrism.com/2019/08/19/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-one/
4. https://gynocentrism.com/2019/08/19/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-two/
5. https://gynocentrism.com/2020/01/10/the-nature-of-male-value-and-our-gynocentric-culture-part-one/
6. https://gynocentrism.com/2020/01/10/the-nature-of-male-value-and-our-gynocentric-culture-part-two/
7. https://gynocentrism.com/2018/03/03/jordan-peterson-on-psychological-differences-similarities-between-the-sexes/
8. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fisherian_runaway
9. https://journals.sagepub.com/doi/10.1177/1948550616647448
10. https://gynocentrism.com/2018/06/30/the-normalisation-of-gynocentrism/
11. https://www.bbc.com/future/article/20140410-can-we-drive-our-own-evolution
12. https://www.edge.org/response-detail/10456
13. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Robert_Briffault#Pseudo-Briffault's_law
14. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=yYaRb070r8E
15. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=q6EF00RL88M
16. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/White_feather#World_War_I
17. https://www.amazon.com/End-Men-Rise-Women/dp/1594488045
18. https://www.amazon.com.au/Myth-Male-Power-Warren-Farrell/dp/0425181448
19. https://www.amazon.com.au/Manipulated-Man-Esther-Vilar/dp/1905177178

Gynocentrism, Sex Differences and the Manipulation of Men (Part Three)

Peter Ryan · 30 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Please read part two of this article before continuing.

An Examination And Case Study Of The Gynocentric Bias In Reporting Sex Differences:

To illustrate the gynocentric bias in scientific research and the impact it has on society, I would like to go through a case study of what I am talking about in detail. There is now a plethora of research and data showing an adult male advantage in general intelligence (men have a higher average IQ of roughly 3-5 IQ points). Despite this reality, this large body of research and its findings are ignored and kept from the public by academic gatekeepers. Don't believe me? Watch this presentation[26]. The truth is inconvenient and runs against the gynocentric narrative, so the research is ignored. That is the gynocentric filter operating in science. Males are not "allowed" to have any ability of value to a greater degree than women and reporting such a thing is sexist blasphemy. Of course there is no problem in reporting strengths women have relative to men though. That gets you published, earns you a plum academic position and appearances on television.

In addition to the cited presentation, people can read through this journal publication[32] for even more information on the male advantage in general intelligence. The publication contains multiple journal articles that cover the positions of multiple intelligence researchers on the male advantage in general intelligence (experts from the field were invited to publish their papers for the publication to address the subject in question). Richard Lynn points out importantly in his presentation I cited earlier, that despite the plethora of research now available showing a male advantage in intelligence, academia continues to present a narrative to the public and in textbooks that there is no sex difference.

As Lynn explains in his presentation, the 3-5 IQ point male advantage in general intelligence, can have big effects on the representation of men and women at the upper ranges of IQ. Small differences in the average intelligence of the sexes, can have large effects at the tails of the distributions of intelligence. There are roughly 5 men for every woman with an IQ over 130 and 10 men for every woman with an IQ over 145, when there is a male advantage in intelligence of 3.9 IQ points. This is exactly the pattern observed in the population at the upper ranges of IQ and why there are so many more male geniuses than female geniuses in society. Lynn went on further to explain that the difference in intelligence between the sexes, can thus help explain the difference in representation between the sexes in the higher level occupations of society that require a high IQ. He also suggested this may help explain the gender disparity in representation in the sciences as well.

This male advantage in general intelligence has now been reported many times in numerous papers, by multiple researchers in multiple countries independently of each other and using a variety of different intelligence tests and measures of IQ. When the same IQ advantage in favour of males is consistently observed numerous times by multiple researchers and using different tests and measures of IQ, it cannot simply be ignored and considered an aberration. Here are two papers from different researchers both reporting a male intelligence advantage in g (or general mental ability) in the United States- linked here[33] and here[34]. The studies show a male IQ advantage in g and also in full scale IQ. There are many other research papers from other countries (and also more from the US) reporting the same male IQ advantage. Some of these papers are cited in the journal publication linked earlier if people wish to read through further studies.

Some scientists in the journal publication I cited earlier did not entirely agree men had a greater general intelligence than women in their articles, such as- Roberto Colom and James Flynn. Other researchers agreed that a male advantage in general intelligence exists and have reported this observation in their own research and also in their papers published in the journal publication concerned (although to caution a scientific consensus does not make something factually correct, just highly probable). Richard Lynn responded and addressed both Roberto Colom's and James Flynn's criticisms at the end of the journal publication I cited.

Since then Roberto Colom along with his other colleagues, has actually recently published research[35] finding a male advantage in general intelligence as measured by g of 5 IQ points. As for James Flynn, even he says his research[36] does not show a female advantage for "cognitive factors", despite the media distorting his research to promote the women are superior narrative. Richard Lynn in his response to Flynn, provided a number of research studies showing a male advantage in IQ in modern developed countries and from recent observations of current populations. The two papers I cited earlier from the US were published in 2012 and 2016 and Roberto Colom's study from Spain was published in 2019. All three studies show a male IQ advantage in modern developed nations and from recent observations of current populations. The results of all 3 studies were statistically significant and had good sample sizes. There are many other recently published studies from modern developed nations showing the same male advantage in current populations. The male advantage in general intelligence is not a blip, it is not an aberration, it has not disappeared and it is not disappearing. It continues to be reported independently by multiple researchers (including previous researchers now, that were initially sceptical) and remains consistent.

As Richard Lynn has pointed out, men do have larger brains than women (the difference is not huge, but it is substantive and significant) and this can explain at least some of the male advantage in IQ. The brain size difference between the sexes and the known correlation between brain size and IQ, does actually predict the size of the 3-5 IQ point male advantage in intelligence that is observed. Claims that brain size is correlated with intelligence are not incorrect. What is incorrect to assert, is that brain size alone determines intelligence. The two positions are not one and the same and yet that does not stop disingenuous people from conflating the two positions. Controlling for other factors, people with larger brains do have a higher general intelligence. Comparing human brains to larger brains in other species like whales and then asserting there is no link between brain size and intelligence, is nonsensical when the species that are compared have a vastly different brain structure. The sexes do have different brains, but they are not as different as a human brain and a whale brain in terms of structure. It is worth stating now, that none these realities make women inferior to men. Intelligence it is not the sole metric of human worth or ability.

The male advantage in general intelligence is consistently found across racial[37] and other demographic criteria[38] and also across multiple countries, continents and both developed (OECD) and non-developed economies. As I mentioned, the male advantage in general intelligence is not based on one isolated academic paper, but a plethora of research. The denial of the data and research showing the higher intelligence of males by academic gatekeepers, is the same gynocentric pattern we see with the denial of the data and research on domestic violence by feminists and our institutions. In both cases such research is generally condemned as being pseudoscience, when in fact it is actually academia itself practicing pseudoscience by wilfully denying facts that do not conform to a particular ideological point of view.

It is one thing for one researcher to report these realities and quite another reality for multiple researchers in multiple countries to independently report the same findings. Are they all pseudoscientists involved in a grand patriarchal conspiracy to put women down, or are we really dealing with a gynocentric institutional bias against inconvenient facts? What is more likely in this day and age, where even saying there are two biological sexes in academia can now get you fired? Civilisation unfortunately has a history of condemning people (and sometimes executing them) that challenge long-held and pre-existing views, especially during hysterical social periods and environments- like university campuses in the West in the present day. Many universities now resemble institutions of higher indoctrination[39] rather than institutions of higher learning. Condemnation of certain researchers and academic witch-hunts does not make the researchers wrong, no matter how hard ideologues attack them.

I will grant that this research is uncomfortable to accept, however it is worth noting the large overlap between the sexes in the general intelligence IQ distribution (some women are more intelligent than some men and some men are more intelligent than some women) and that each sex has their own unique contribution to human intellectual and creative capital. Intelligence is not the only contributor to human intellect and creativity. Cognitive biases can make smart people think and behave stupidity and life experience, personality and acquired knowledge also impacts human intellect and creativity. So I am by no means suggesting everything women have to say and do is somehow less valuable than what men contribute.

Women do have cognitive strengths of their own in certain aspects of emotional intelligence, social cognition, memory and in certain aspects of verbal ability and perceptual speed (The speed that someone can complete relatively simple perceptual tasks, like matching words to pictures. In some tests of perceptual speed that are more verbally oriented women do better and in other tests of perceptual speed that are more spatially oriented men do better.). As with male advantages, there is also considerable overlap between men and women where female advantages exist.

The reason I am writing about this specific subject, is because of the glee that the feminist media reports women and girls outperforming men and boys in education and the ease with which they will automatically assert women and girls are smarter than men and boys. This regular pattern by our media of promoting female superiority, has been going on for decades now and is distorting the societal perception of men and women in a highly destructive manner for both sexes. The women are wonderful effect[40] is a real phenomenon and does impact how sex difference research is presented to the public in the media and within academia itself, as Christina Hoff Sommers exposed in her video[41]. Reporting a female advantage in a given area earns you praise from the establishment and from society. Reporting a male advantage makes someone a misogynist, especially if it comes from a man and it is about cognitive advantages men have over women. I respect the opposite sex enough not to come to the conclusion that men are superior to women, when looking at sex differences. Unfortunately it appears the same cannot be said in reverse in this gynocentric culture.

We live in a world that keeps telling men and boys they are stupid, simply because they do not perform as well as women and girls in an education system designed to prioritise female learning at the expense of male learning. Claims men and boys are stupid and slogans like "the future is female"[42], lie in stark contrast to the reality that men run society and have discovered, built and invented the vast majority of the science and technology society runs on. There is a gynocentric disconnect with reality that badly needs correction. One has to really wonder why a supposedly "superior" and "smarter" female sex, would need an education system that prioritises their needs over men and boys and affirmative action and preferential hiring policies to promote women over men, just to reach parity with males. Even with the massive assistance and preferential treatment given to women and girls in education and in the workplace, the supposedly "superior" female sex still can't overtake men in patents for inventions, Nobel prizes and representation at corporate board level, in politics and scientific research etc and the list goes on.

One has to really wonder how much of these claims of supposed female intellectual superiority because "grades", actually have any substance to them. So let me make a few remarks to set the record straight about sex differences in cognition. Grades are not solely determined by intellectual ability, especially when the education system is stacked against boys. Effort and motivation effects grades and many boys are not motivated to put in the effort to academically achieve, in an education system that sees them as toxic and defective.

Even when boys perform as well as girls on standardised tests, boys are graded lower than girls in their actual schoolwork. This grade discrimination against boys has been reported in multiple studies and has been shown to impact boys future education. See this study[43] and this study[44] for discussion. There are many other studies reporting the same pattern of grading bias against boys. A common theme from the research, seems to be that boy's grades are penalised as a result of boys not being as engaged and behaviourally compliant as girls in class. Boys are not receiving lower grades because of lower academic performance. They are receiving lower grades because the teachers have a grading bias against boys due to their lower engagement in class and less compliant behaviour.

Why would boys not be as engaged or as behaviourally compliant as girls in a feminised school environment where their learning needs and interests are neglected and girls are held up as the gold standard? It is such a mystery! Now we drug boys in school, because they cannot sit still in a school environment that tells them they are defective. I would not be able to sit still either and would want out of the gynocentric asylum! Boys and men are marginalised from kindergarten to postgraduate education. Despite the reality women and girls have surpassed men and boys in education for decades now, all of the affirmative action, policies and programs, are still overwhelmingly focused on women and girls in education. Our education system is obsessed with closing the gender gap in STEM. In contrast our education system has no interest in addressing the general academic achievement gap between girls and boys, or the massive gender gap in reading and the low male participation in the humanities, medicine and in the teaching profession itself etc.

Women and girls are surpassing men and boys at every level of education, but the stop the presses! We must focus all of our attention in education on increasing female STEM participation. That is gynocentric madness. At the same time this is occurring, men and boys are forced to sit through classes at school and at university, where they are told how not to be rapists and domestic violence abusers. Young men and boys are lectured to in class about toxic masculinity and the false historical narrative of male privilege and female oppression.

We wonder why men and boys are disengaging from education when they attend class and the female teacher asks students to discuss bringing about a matriarchy and the class then starts discussing castrating men and boys. This has actually happened[45] by the way. Just imagine the uproar from feminists and our society for a moment, if male teachers asked students to discuss bringing about an oppressive patriarchy in the West and the class began discussing mutilating female genitals as a means to control women and girls. Imagine for the moment the impact such an environment would have on the attitudes of female students toward the education system. Would they be engaged? Would they be compliant and behave well in class? Would they be motivated to put in the effort at school?

This is the environment men and boys are learning in, so reflect on that when you consider boys and their lower academic performance relative to girls. Whilst boys are bored, disengaged and unmotivated from having their learning needs and interests neglected by our feminised education system, they are being told how toxic and inferior men and boys[46] are in class. I would encourage people to read through the link I just cited and the account of the boy that experienced this misandric school environment first-hand and the impact that had on his academic performance. I will quote a passage of his account from the linked article:

> "We were taught, at such a young age, all of the atrocities western men had committed against everyone else. We were literally, I'm not exaggerating here, taught to be ashamed of ourselves and of our gender culture. Girls were taught how great the suffragettes were and that without them they'd still be under the tyranny of evil men.
>
> I remember a particular class about this in history. The female teachers and female students were all laughing at the stupidity of boys and men. I remember the female teacher pointing out "all the men had to fight wars, while women didn't, but it was always men that started the wars," while the girls all laughed. I remember looking around at all the boys in my class just sitting there, quietly, blank stares on their faces, saying nothing. Then it hit me like a silver bullet. I was doing the same as them: nothing.
>
> However, after having years of political correctness and self-shame pumped into me by this so called education system, I had no knowledge of how to even discredit them. Everything they said seemed true. If it wasn't for my father teaching me about the great men of our past at a young age, I actually think I'd be another sad fool indoctrinated into feminist ideology."[46]

There are two parts in that passage that have stuck with me for years. The first part- "We were taught, at such a young age". Do people have any idea the long-term damage that does to men's perception of themselves, to be given the message from the school system as a child that they are inferior, whilst their female peers laugh at them. I am going to call this for what it is- This is child abuse and this is brainwashing and feminism and gynocentrism in our education system are behind all of it. Then we wonder why boys are falling behind girls in education and we do absolutely nothing to address it. Instead we talk about how women and girls are "smarter" and how girls "mature earlier". Anything to use sex differences to rationalise away the problem and justify neglecting boys. That right there, is the gynocentric use of sex differences by feminists and our gynocentric institutions and culture.

The second part of the passage that stayed with me is this- "If it wasn't for my father teaching me about the great men of our past at a young age, I actually think I'd be another sad fool indoctrinated into feminist ideology". This is why I make no apologies for spending a good chunk of this article and a good chunk of my series on gynocentrism, setting the record straight on male value and male strengths. Men and boys deserve it and men and boys need it. Notice how he mentioned the importance of his father in that statement. That is why feminism is at war with fathers. That is why feminism does not want adult men around children. They want to indoctrinate our children and psychologically castrate boys.

How many boys are now deprived of fathers? How many boys without a father are struggling in education? Reflect on the statistics in light of the young man's account. Men and boys have been brainwashed to think they are inferior and expendable, when in reality this society would not last a day without them. As Tom Golden pointed out in a video[47], this is the same type of brainwashing the Communist Chinese used. Men and boys are telling us in their own words the effect this environment is having on them and on their male peers. That is why the video by Andy Man, "Who taught you to hate yourself"[48] is my favourite video. Watch the video and share it with your sons and other men. It is beautiful and I don't say that lightly. Time for society to take a shot of wake the fuck up and swallow some red pills.

We know that when general intelligence is actually directly measured, it is men that have the advantage. The male advantage in general intelligence is consistently observed after the age of 16 and some male advantage is frequently seen at earlier ages of adolescence. During childhood a male advantage in IQ can also be observed sometimes. In the other cases, no sex difference in intelligence is observed in childhood favouring boys or girls. These observations are consistent with Richard Lynn's developmental theory of sex differences in intelligence.

Even Roberto Colom who was initially somewhat critical of Richard Lynn's position, has reported in his subsequent research[35] support for Lynn's developmental theory. This was in addition to Roberto finding a male advantage in general intelligence of 5 IQ points in his study. There are numerous other studies supporting the developmental theory, in addition to Lynn's own research and Colom's study. The reason for this observed pattern in sex differences in IQ, is because of the slower maturity of boys. Boys brains are still developing, just like their muscles, while their female counterparts are finishing puberty. Like sex differences in physical strength, boys have to fully mature first before sex differences in intelligence emerge.

The notion that boys maturing more slowly makes them intellectually inferior to girls is nonsense. Even with the slightly slower rate of maturity of boys (boys are about 1-2 years behind girls of the same age prior to 16), boys are observed to either have the same IQ as their female counterparts of the same age, or have a higher IQ. As boys and girls mature, the male IQ advantage emerges and grows as the sexes approach adulthood. If we are going to argue earlier maturity makes girls "better" than boys, then perhaps we should start saying dogs, cats and monkeys are "better" than humans because they mature earlier. Higher intelligence in adulthood, is associated with a slower rate of development and later maturity. It takes more time to develop extra muscle and extra intelligence, just as it takes more time to build a skyscraper in comparison to a small office building.

In addition to the male advantage in general intelligence, men have other cognitive, psychological and physical strengths over women. Men have greater spatial ability, mathematical reasoning (Whilst there is no sex difference in basic arithmetic, there is a sex difference in the higher-level ability of mathematical reasoning. Despite what some media outlets report, males are better at maths.), mechanical reasoning, pattern recognition and systems thinking capacity than women. Men also score higher than women on psychometric tests assessing general knowledge comprehension and have faster reaction times than women. There are more male cognitive advantages I could cite, but that is the general outline.

In terms of other male psychological and physical advantages, men have a greater willingness to take risks, score higher on emotional stability (a personality trait) and demonstrate a greater ability to perform under both physical and psychological stress. Men make up the bulk of our geniuses, those with high IQ's and inventors etc. Men do have greater physical strength and general fitness than women and even now such an obvious reality is becoming controversial to assert. Again I could go through a much bigger list of advantages men possess relative to women, but the point I am trying to make is that men do have strengths women lack and not just in the physical domain.

Why does any of this even need to be stated? For the last 50 years it has become socially taboo to acknowledge any strength men have relative to women. In the same period of time, it has become not only socially acceptable, but encouraged to promote a narrative women are superior to men. This social, cultural and institutional milieu of female superiority, feminism and gynocentrism, is all some generations of men and women have known for their entire lives and this needs to be corrected. A society that regards men as toxic, defective, expendable and inferior, does not have long before it collapses in on itself.

Men and boys are not stupid and women and girls are not smarter. The lower academic performance of men and boys in primary education through to tertiary education, is not the result of men and boys being less intelligent than women and girls. It is worth noting though, that even if there was a supposed sex difference in intelligence favouring girls, it would still be far too small to explain the large gulf in academic performance between the sexes and the chasm in university enrollment between men and women. Men and boys and their needs and interests are marginalised in the education system and that is a fact. I would invite people to watch this lecture[49] from education professional Dr. James Brown, on the bias against men and boys in education and to read Dr. Warren Farrell's book on The Boy Crisis[50]. There is a systemic gynocentric and feminist driven bias against men and boys in our education system and there has been for decades. You cannot expect men and boys to perform well in a system that views them as a problem and as inferior.

Sex Differences Are Not An Argument To Support Female Or Male Superiority:

I could keep going tit for tat citing a male advantage to every claim a female supremacist would make about women being superior to men. However ultimately claims of female or male supremacy rest on solely focusing on the strengths of one sex and the weaknesses of the other sex. It is tunnel vision. There is never serious consideration of the weaknesses of the supposedly superior sex (like ignoring the greater susceptibility of women to autoimmune disease) and the strengths of the supposedly inferior sex. It is delusional to ignore half of reality and claim women are superior to men (just as it is to claim men are superior to women and ignore female advantages).

Some of the sex differences undoubtedly have at least some environmental component to them, but there is a biological component to sex differences and that includes sex differences in cognition. The biological advantages that each sex may have relative to the other, does not make one sex "superior" to the other in a general sense. Making such a general remark about the sexes is vague and nebulous and has no real practical application beyond justifying bigotry and it actually causes a great deal of harm. Claims of male superiority or female superiority are subjective value judgments for bigots and not objective fact. A person can acknowledge sex differences without claiming one sex is superior to the other sex. By presenting this information I am not suggesting men are superior to women and I am certainly not suggesting we should discriminate against women in favour of men based on these sex differences. In contrast, those promoting female superiority do not share this view and rely on sex differences to justify discrimination against men.

It is important that we understand that the sex differences that do exist, are the result of a coevolutionary path that men and women have taken together. These male and female advantages have developed in an evolutionary context in which both sexes lived and worked together to perpetuate society and the genome. The sex differences are meant to complement one another. Some people find that wishy washy, but the reality is the long developmental period of our offspring, combined with our large brains and social behaviour, required the sexes to interact with each other beyond just simple copulation. Yes some degree of inter-sexual conflict can and does occur (no biological system is completely perfect), but that does not mean the sexes have not cooperated with each other and worked together at all (no biological system that has lasted is completely flawed either). If it were not for men and women working together, human society would have died out thousands of years ago or we would still be in trees.

How The Manosphere Has Bought Into Gynocentric Lies About Male Biological Expendability And Greater Female Biological Value:

Gynocentrism distorts the presentation of sex difference research to the public and even within academia itself. There is very little scrutiny of any research claiming a female advantage in some area (no matter how small the sample size is or how poor the methodology used). In contrast there are massive efforts put into scrutinising and silencing any research reporting a male advantage in any area of value. There are bold and highly questionable claims made by some scientists (not all), about women being more biologically valuable than men and men more expendable and these claims are never properly scrutinised. There is junk science like Briffault's law and pseudoscientific claims humans are naturally matriarchal and if only we could be more like Bonobos and women ran the world we would all live in peace. People will believe such nonsense if they hear it from a scientist, because they think what they are hearing has a factual basis to it. The problem is that so many people do not bother to check what is being said and many do not even know how to scrutinise the scientific literature. This allows gynocentric ideas to be promoted as legitimate science, when they are anything but.

What happens when science becomes so corrupted by gynocentrism, that facts are omitted and distorted to craft a narrative men are biologically expendable and women are more valuable? People believe it. Even many people in the manosphere and men believe it. So this belief then becomes held as some unquestioned biological axiom and never scrutinised, even by the manosphere. People do not notice what has been left out of what they were told. People do not realise the facts that were not considered in arriving at such a conclusion. People do not realise that the manipulation of such information to control the societal perception of men and women, controls the behaviour of men and women toward each other and toward members of the same sex.

It is in the interests of our gynocentric institutions to promote a narrative that men are biologically expendable and women are more biologically valuable. All that is required for this manipulation to work, is for people not to question what they presented with and not critically examine the research or arguments presented. Corrupted science is in many ways the perfect vehicle to spread such a deeply flawed and bigoted idea and have it widely accepted in society as some biological law of nature.

The manosphere has fallen into the trap of thinking that blindly embracing sex difference research without scrutiny, is somehow more reflective of reality because of their perception feminists assert and emphasise environment influence (which is to a degree correct, but not entirely the case). They have been blind to the gynocentrism lurking within science itself. As a result, certain gynocentric ideas have propagated in the manosphere without any resistance or critical examination. These include junk concepts like- Briffault's law, men being biologically disposable and women having the greater biological value and the persistence of a community all coming down to the female rate limiting factor of reproduction and rare eggs etc. There is a big difference between acknowledging society exploits men and treats them as disposable and believing men are actually biologically disposable. There is a big difference between recognising that women influence society and relationships and believing women control all the conditions of society. There is a big difference between recognising the importance of reproduction to a community and believing that is the ultimate factor in determining the preservation of a community. None of these important distinctions have been discussed in the manosphere and that needs to change.

People in the manosphere need to question sex difference research and ridiculous claims that men are biologically expendable and women are more valuable because uterus and rare eggs/plentiful sperm etc, like they do the feminist wage gap and the feminist revision of the historical record etc. It is in the interests of the gynocentric gatekeepers in the sciences, to promote a narrative that men are expendable and women are valuable and that women are superior and men are inferior. I cannot repeat that enough because of the extent to which corrupted science has been used to brainwash people.

Unfortunately significant portions of the manosphere have fallen for this kind of manipulation of science, by only being presented with half the facts when it comes to asserting false claims of male expendability and greater female value etc. People have accepted the lie that men are expendable and biologically less than, without recognising that the science they are reading from is impacted from the very same gynocentric bias that permeates the rest of society. The influence of gynocentrism and feminism in framing how science on the sexes and biological sex differences is presented to the public, is not a new phenomenon. This extends back decades and has distorted our general understanding of sex differences to at least some degree.

Consider the science you are told about regarding the sexes with caution and critique all of it like you would a feminist study. There is a gynocentric agenda controlling what gets reported and presented regarding sex differences and the sexes in general and what does not. Is all of science corrupted? Of course not. Not all of history and humanities is corrupted either, but feminism has corrupted a significant chunk of the disciplines and science is no exception.

Conclusion:

As with all forms of manipulation, it is on closer inspection that manipulation is revealed. When people give simple overviews of obviously complex multifactorial phenomenon (like feminists explaining the gender wage gap as due solely to discrimination, or people arguing gynocentrism occurs because men are biologically expendable due to women being the rate limiting factor of reproduction), that should be a major red flag for people that the picture presented is most likely incomplete and wrong.

A new paradigm in explaining gynocentrism is required. The work of Peter Wright and Paul Elam in Chasing The Dragon[51] and Slaying The Dragon[52], was a big step in the right direction. However far more needs to be done. Later in this series, I will present a multifactorial model on gynocentrism. Biology is involved, culture is involved and technology is involved. Gynocentrism is an emergent[53] phenomenon arising from the combined effects of multiple factors. We need to be mindful that gynocentric programming can get in the way of properly understanding the problem we are dealing with. Like Neo who realises he is in the Matrix and has taken the red pill but still thinks he is breathing air when he fights Morpheus and must still deprogram, men still need to collectively realise that the gynocentric lie of supposed biological male expendability is not real. It is all part of the same gynocentric illusion to exploit men and keep men ignorant of their own intrinsic value and resigned to their own marginalisation.

The tunnel vision explanation that gynocentrism is all about the uterus and reproduction, is itself a product of gynocentrism warping the mind. It is a narrative to control and exploit men. Time to see the forest through the trees and let go of it.

Time to fully deprogram from gynocentrism. Drop the false gynocentric fatalism of believing in male biological disposability and embrace your real intrinsic male value.

References:

26. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tSLoiFSpp0g

32. https://mankindquarterly.org/archive/issue/58-1

33. https://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/abs/pii/S0191886911002212

34. https://search.proquest.com/openview/db73c91bd057a53f3deb1a3cae4aacf0/1?pq-origsite=gscholar&cbl=30967

35.https://www.researchgate.net/publication/330058508_Testing_the_developmental_theory_of_sex_differences_in_intelligence_using_latent_modeling_Evidence_from_the_TEA_Ability_Battery_BAT-7

36. https://www.psychologytoday.com/au/blog/beautiful-minds/201207/men-women-and-iq-setting-the-record-straight

37. http://helmuthnyborg.dk/wp-content/uploads/2016/10/Publ_2015_Sex-differences-across-diffferent-racial-ability-levels.pdf

38. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=p5AkgRj2KgA

39. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-jEQYHAFfjg

40. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Women_are_wonderful_effect

41. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fhm_HZ9twMg

42. https://www.psychologytoday.com/us/blog/real-men-dont-write-blogs/201703/memo-our-sons-and-grandsons-the-future-is-female

43. http://ftp.iza.org/dp5973.pdf

44. https://mitili.mit.edu/sites/default/files/project-documents/SEII-Discussion-Paper-2016.07-Terrier.pdf

45. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fgrFdtHWtQU

46. https://avoiceformen.com/boys/generation-z-boys-in-modern-britain/

47. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-wSZVm7PXlM

48. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=64nFPc93idc

49. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LafoOGN-obQ

50. https://www.amazon.com.au/Boy-Crisis-Boys-Struggling-About/dp/1942952716

51. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VygKQV-hEpY

52. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=n5WLNMX4COA

53. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Emergence

Gynocentrism, Sex Differences and the Manipulation of Men (Part Two)

Peter Ryan · 30 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Please read part one of this article first.

How Sex Differences Are Used To Propagate A False Narrative That Men Are Inferior And Expendable:

The manipulation of men does rely on framing sex differences to support a narrative men are inferior to women and that men are biologically expendable. There is a misplaced belief in the manosphere that feminism takes the position that the sexes are the same and that any sex differences that exist are due to socialisation. This is wrong. Feminists are quite happy to emphasise sex differences if it is to women's social advantage, or helps support a narrative in female superiority. The manosphere needs to carefully evaluate claims of innate sex differences and not just assume there is no gynocentric agenda behind those in the media and academia that promote such claims. The feminist infestation in our academic institutions and mainstream media is extensive these days.

Feminists are quite happy to point out the greater physical aggression of men and erroneously associate it all back to testosterone and argue male violence is innate. This is despite the abundant research showing that aggression in men does not originate from testosterone and that testosterone can actually result in selfless acts. Please watch this short but informative video[20] from accomplished behavioural scientist Prof. Sapolsky and this documentary[21], on what the research actually shows on the effects of testosterone. Testosterone does not make men violent brutes.

Testosterone acts as a behavioural amplifier and drives men to seek status. The male sex hormone does not actually cause aggression and violence. Testosterone amplifies aggression and violent tendencies that have already been previously triggered by other processes in the brain by the environment under certain contexts. Even then this amplification depends on prior social learning and also the interplay with other hormones and biochemical processes. In contrast testosterone can also promote selfless acts. In reality testosterone amplifies both good and bad aspects of human behaviour to drive men to acquire status. At one extreme you have men like Jesus Christ and at the other extreme you have Adolf Hitler. People cannot acknowledge the worst in men and ignore the good and then claim they are accurately representing men (as feminists do). Testosterone is not toxic and neither are men. Men are human beings and like women they can be good, bad and everything in between.

A society that treats men as disposable utilities and with no compassion and ignores boys that are physically and sexually abused (including by adult women that abuse boys), will produce male violence and violent men. This will direct testosterone to amplify negative behaviours, rather than positive behaviours. How we treat men and boys and their well-being, has far more to do with male aggression and violence than testosterone. A major contradiction society has with male violence that feminists fail to acknowledge, is that we are actually quite happy for men to be violent as long as it serves societies needs and protects women. We have forced men through conscription to fight each other in wars and then feminists blame men for being violent in wars men were forced to participate in. This is despite the fact millions of men had no choice in the matter.

I also note feminists are silent on the indirect violence women initiate by getting men to be violent for them (like women hiring hitmen to murder their husband's, which actually happens more often than people think) and the psychological and social violence of women (women and girls often bully each other this way and it can drive other girls to suicide). The misuse of the legal system as a weapon in divorce and family court to marginalise countless fathers and alienate children from their dads, is also a frequent form of female violence in society that is not identified as the violence that it is.

Feminists are also silent on the physical violence of women in intimate partner relationships. This is despite clear research findings[22] that female violence is actually a substantial fraction of domestic violence and that women are actually the majority of perpetrators when only one partner is violent in the relationship. This feminist pattern of selectivity with facts, is not limited to violence and aggression. Feminists are quite happy to embrace biological sex differences when transgenderism threatens the exclusivity of female privileges and ignore these same biological sex differences when they are inconvenient. Bigots are selective in the facts they acknowledge and the manosphere needs to recognise that feminism is absolutely okay with emphasising sex differences to pedestalise women.

People need to recognise that for the last fifty years and particularly the last thirty years, feminism has been able to heavily influence our media, academia and educational institutions with little resistance and shape the public perception of how we see men and women. Feminism has not been arguing men and women are the same. Feminists have been arguing women are superior to men. The culture has been saturated with the following messages for decades: Mothers are brilliant and dads are bumbling fools. Women are peaceful and men are violent. Men are inherent rapists and domestic violence abusers and women are their victims. Adult men are potential pedophiles that cannot be left around children, adult women are always safe around kids. The examples go on like this. Feminism has relentlessly pushed the message that women are better than men and contributed to these bigoted beliefs forming. It is only in areas where it is to the benefit of women to support sameness, that feminists argue the sexes are identical.

Many boys have now been raised with no father and educated in a gynocentric school system and exposed to a gynocentric culture, in which they are told men are obsolete, the future is female and boys are stupid. That is going to impact how boys see themselves and other men in relation to women and not for the better. We can see the impact of this mass brainwashing on society just by asking people on the street like this man did[23]. Society has been manipulated to perceive women as being above men and that does influence how society treats men relative to women and how men treat themselves in relation to women (especially the younger generations of men, that have known nothing but a consistent cultural message that they are inferior because they are male).

How Gynocentrism Distorts Our Understanding Of The Science Of Sex Differences:

People think that feminism and gynocentrism in academia have not impacted the sciences- They have. Human sex difference biology, psychology and evolution is presented to society through a gynocentric lens. Yet the reality that a gynocentric bias operates in science like it does in the rest of society, does not appear to have been acknowledged by some people in the manosphere quoting questionable research, concepts (like Briffault's law), books and news articles presenting science on sex differences.

Gynocentrism in the coverage of sex difference science exists. That is why you get books from scientists preaching female superiority such as, The Natural Superiority Of Women[24] and Women After All[25]. It is why you get the willful denial of inconvenient research in academia on sex differences in intelligence[26], on greater male variability and male genius[27] and on single motherhood and the importance of fatherhood[28], that does not go with the gynocentric narrative. Stating facts that do not support the view women are superior to men, does not then make someone a male supremacist that supports male superiority. However that is exactly how such researchers are framed in supposedly objective academic circles, when they bring up facts that run against gynocentrism. These same academic thought police, don't seem too fussed about half-baked arguments women are superior to men though.

So rest assured the gynocentric bias in wider society, is also present in the sciences concerning research on sex differences. Men are persuaded by facts and logic and so gynocentric academics crafting a narrative of male inferiority and supposed male biological expendability, by using cherry picked science and omitting inconvenient facts without acknowledgement[29], is a great way to control the male mind and maintain the narrative women are superior to men in the wider culture. As I have written about, our institutions have a vested interest in keeping men down and thriving off their exploitation. Manipulating sex difference research to promote a message in academia and the media that men are genetically defective, inferior and biologically expendable, is a means to persuade people that gynocentric bigotry has some justification and rational basis to it.

It is all about framing facts to paint a desired picture and omitting facts that are inconvenient. Just as in the performance of a magic trick, or the mainstream media editing interview footage to suit an agenda, the manipulation of scientific information to persuade people to accept a narrative in female superiority, requires proper framing so that people do not notice what is not written about and what is left out. This is especially effective if your audience is interested in science and yet does not have much formal knowledge of science and cannot critically evaluate the positions presented or notice what is omitted and ignored (which is a great deal for those making sophist and pseudoscientific arguments to support a narrative of female superiority).

Is the entire scientific community like this? No. However there is a significant gynocentric influence within the scientific community in maintaining the gynocentric narrative that women are valuable and superior and men are expendable and inferior. Some of it is unintentional and just a result of years of gynocentric programming that everyone including scientists have been shaped by. When you are taught to perceive and interpret things a certain way from birth and your gynocentric colleagues validate preconceived assumptions about men and women, that will affect how you conduct research and how you draw conclusions. Such a gynocentric bias applies even for scientists supposedly pursuing objective truth.

Certain cohorts of the scientific community do police how science is presented to the public and make sure it is kept within the gynocentric Overton window of approved discourse. Just look at the example on greater male variability and male genius I cited earlier in this article. Janice Fiamengo has also discussed in a recent video[30] , the alarming feminist gatekeeping and thought policing going on in the hard sciences at major universities. I would highly encourage people to watch Janice's video, it will shock you. The reality is there is feminist authoritarian oversight present in the sciences at universities. The feminist control of academia and academic research, is not just confined to the humanities. I can cite multiple examples of researchers being silenced for going outside the gynocentric Overton window and the authoritarian feminist control of science. These are not isolated incidents, it is a pervasive problem.

There is some level of institutional gynocentric bias in scientific research and there are academics that harbour and espouse such views as maleness being a birth defect[31]. Just imagine for the moment if an academic dared to suggest being female was a birth defect, or that females were the simpler less enhanced sex. What do people think the reaction would be? Again the common thread with such claims of female superiority, is that those promoting it present only half the facts on sex differences that are convenient (and omit the other half of the facts that are inconvenient) to promoting their narrative.

In part 3 of this article I will examine a case study of gynocentric bias in scientific research, where I think the manosphere has gone wrong with discussing sex differences and what we can do to correct things. I will then present my final thoughts on this subject.

References:

20. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=J4W3WSJ8F78

21. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=G0Iq45Nbevk

22. https://domesticviolenceresearch.org/domestic-violence-facts-and-statistics-at-a-glance/

23. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oxpX6IQ3GY4

24. https://www.amazon.com/Natural-Superiority-Women-5th/dp/076198982X

25. https://www.amazon.com/Women-After-All-Evolution-Supremacy/dp/0393352315/ref=sr_1_1?keywords=women+after+all&qid=1579516088&s=books&sr=1-1

26. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tSLoiFSpp0g

27. https://quillette.com/2018/09/07/academic-activists-send-a-published-paper-down-the-memory-hole/

28. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3fD-XfL7wb4

29. https://link.springer.com/article/10.1007/s40806-015-0029-1

30. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Bmgrsvoh_cw

31. https://www.npr.org/sections/13.7/2015/04/16/400075715/is-it-sexist-to-say-that-women-are-superior-to-men

Was Jesus King of the Cucks?

Paul Elam · 31 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The following piece by Paul Elam from April 2011 remains as relevant as ever. – PW

I have to confess up front that I am an atheist. But I also want to qualify that by saying I am not the kind of evangelical, nutcase atheist that religiously dedicates his life to condemning anything Christian.

I am living proof that NAAALT. (Not all atheists are like that).

In fact, as a big fan of mythology and narratology I am more than a little impressed by the story of Jesus Christ as told in the New Testament, and for whatever it lacks in historical accuracy I find it rich in wisdom, humanity and inspiration.

To be even more blunt, the Jesus of the Bible was the kind of man I would like to be, but I know I am forever doomed to falling short of that ambition.

That being said, one of the constant themes I find in The Gospel and indeed throughout modern religious organizations is a tremendous disconnect between the life and teachings of Jesus and almost everything his followers, then and now, actually do.

One of the more glaring examples of that are the religiously dogmatic men that inhabit the modern church. If these clones are followers of Christ, then the Son of God must have been the biggest mangina cuk that ever lived.

The mentality and beliefs they present to the culture of their congregations reflect the new scriptural paradigm; "For God so loved the world, that he gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever worships Woman should not perish, but have everlasting female approval, and be a real man in the eyes of God."

It is true. The church, long vilified and demonized for being the primary source of misogyny and patriarchy, is actually quite the opposite. It is little more than a coercive training ground for the indentured servants to the Divine Vagina.

Above almost all other social entities, religious men rank at the very top in the dogma of mindless male servitude. And while there may well have been a time when the adherence to this position was practical, even laudable, the time for it has passed. Someone should pass that message around in the church and dole out some common sense at the same time.

Let's look, for example, at a nifty little website called Top-Christians.com.

On their "good husbands" page, they gift us with all the standard advice; protect your wife; be prepared to die for her. But ah, in the modern, enlightened church, there is so much more to learn. Top Christians also advises men to "submit" to their wives. Yes, submit. It is right out of scripture, they assure us. But of course it doesn't stop there.

At Top Christians, the modern version of Our Lady of the Unrelenting Vagina, we have even more advice, bellowed from the pulpit of Dr. Phil.

The following is the complete text from their "Spend Time Together," section. Res ipsa loquitur fully applies:

> When you spend time with your wife, don't talk about work!
>
> Or golf.
>
> Or cars.
>
> Or any other thing that interests you.
>
> If you really want to put your wife first, then you have to talk about the things that interest her*!*

> What's that? You don't know what her interests are?
>
> Ah, exactly my point!!
>
> You have been so self-centred that you don't even know what your wife is interested in. Shame on you!!
>
> If that is true of you, then now is the time to start changing it.
>
> And don't get all upset if she doubts your intentions. Or if she suspects that you have been guilty of something (like sleeping with her best friend).
>
> If you suddenly start acting differently – especially if such actions are so "unlike" you – she is likely to get suspicious.
>
> Start by telling her that you want to change and that you want to start putting her first.
>
> Ask her what would make her happy, "because I want to start doing those things".
>
> After the initial shock (and even doubt) she will be delighted when she discovers that you are really serious.
>
> She'll see that you really want to be a good husband to her, and she'll love you for it.
>
> Just keep at it. Get out of that comfort zone of yours, and start living a life of fulfilment with the wife that God has given you.
>
> I guarantee you it will be a terrific journey!

Just FYI, the bold print is theirs. I didn't even correct their typos.

It seems whoever penned this looked at the image of Christ on the cross and saw not the Son of God, but the Son of Oprah, and then obediently delivered a satanic dose of shame to any man foolish enough to listen.

Is this an isolated point of view in western churches?

Hardly.

Churches have followed the same exact path of governments, institutions of higher education and the media over the past 50 years. In other words, they have become watered down, feminized incarnations of their former selves. In doing so, they have sent one resounding message about their views on the life and death of Jesus Christ.

They don't give a shit about it and likely never did.

Whatever Christ means to these self-loathing, feminist quislings doesn't have the substance of a research paper on the wage gap funded by N.O.W… Their faith was sold out to pop psychology, pop culture and feminist fundamentalism a long time ago.

You may be asking at this point, what does any of this really have to do with the biblical Jesus?

And it is a fair question; the answer to which is nothing.

The Jesus I read about in the Holy Bible would not have put up with this shit for a minute. When the money lenders took over and defiled His temple, the Jesus I read about put a boot in their sorry asses and sent them running into the street for their lives.

The Jesus I read about defied every powerful, corrupt hypocrite in His world to speak the truth.

The Jesus I read about died for it without backing down.

But that was just the Jesus of The Bible. He never really has been the Jesus that most Christians believe in. Hell, He even spent the last three years of his life telling His own apostles that they didn't understand a word He was saying. And true to form, Christians have been emulating them, not Him, ever since.

If that is not true, someone please tell me of any Christian organization in this country, or across the western world, that is even making a peep about men being robbed of authority in their own lives, much less the authority in their families.

Please point to one church that is standing up and telling their congregations that this claptrap emanating from Top Christians and a thousand other places like it is a load of garbage.

Just one will do.

I am waiting.

And so, perhaps, is Jesus Christ.

Whether He was a real man and The son of God, or just a magnificent and instructive metaphor for the pinnacle of human actualization, He was not a mangina.

Spoken but unwoken: Quotes from Hollywood

Doug Mortimer · 2 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It may be difficult to believe today, but before #MeToo, a number of people in Hollywood were candid and outspoken about sex and all its ramifications. Differences between men and women were a given, sex appeal was lauded and flaunted, racy jokes were common…and nobody objected. I'm not necessarily talking about Hollywood during the silent era or its golden age before television. Some of the quotes that follow are from actors (or behind-the-scenes movers and shakers) who are still drawing breath. And none of them sprang from the mind of a screenwriter or publicist.

Producer Harvey Weinstein regularly employed the casting couch and paid a steep price for it. He didn't do anything his predecessors hadn't done. They didn't necessarily brag about it but they didn't try to hide it. Of course, this was before "privilege" was a curse word. Rank had its privileges, and that was that. Consider the following:

Why don't you sit on my lap when we're discussing your contract – the way other girls do?

- MGM Mogul Louis B. Mayer

The casting couch was an occupational hazard for aspiring actresses. It wasn't written about in the fan magazines but for women it was definitely part of the Hollywood experience:

Hollywood…the land of yes-men and acqui-yes girls.

- Screenwriter Dorothy Parker

What's an actress to do? Well, some went along, some didn't…some worked, some didn't. But more than likely, the young woman involved was probably not a paragon of virtue anyway:

In Hollywood, a starlet is the name for any woman under thirty who is not actively employed in a brothel.

- Screenwriter Ben Hecht

But even if a young woman was chaste (or relatively so), it didn't necessarily consign her to the unemployment line. There were other ways of getting ahead in Hollywood:

Girls have an unfair advantage over men. If they can't get what they want by being smart, they can get it by being dumb.

- Yul Brynner

And if women couldn't get what they wanted by being smart or being dumb, they had other arrows in their quivering thighs:

We modern women can learn a lot from Poppaea [wife of Roman emperor Nero]. We go about demanding our rights, arguing with a man for what we want. But Poppaea let down her hair, perfumed her body, and arrayed herself in her most daring costumes for his pleasure. Then she did whatever she pleased.

- Claudette Colbert, who played Poppaea in The Sign of the Cross (1932)

Other actresses readily understood how much power was embodied in their sexuality:

Women get more unhappy the more they try to liberate themselves.

- Brigitte Bardot

The male gaze (not to mention the male grope) has always been a motivating factor in human affairs. A notably pithy expression of this is:

Pussy rules the world.

- Madonna

Admittedly, when Madonna says that, it's chalked up to female empowerment. That same statement coming from a man…well, you can imagine the response. Nevertheless, the power of T&A has long been acknowledged in tinseltown:

Tits and sand – that's what we used to call sex and violence in Hollywood.

- Burt Lancaster

We're not getting enough production out of Jane's [Jane Russell's] breasts.

- Producer/director Howard Hughes referring to The Outlaw (1943)

I'd rather play cards if I can't have a lady with big tits.

- Producer/director Russ Meyer, known for tasteless movies with trashy/chesty actresses

Curiously, a number of women accepted the rules of the game. There was no shame in being a sex object; on the contrary, it was a sought-after status:

I'm very proud of my breasts as every woman should be. It's not cellular obesity. It's womanliness.

- Anita Ekberg

The trouble with the censor is that he worries if a girl has cleavage. He should worry if she hasn't any.

- Marilyn Monroe

There's a broad [Marilyn Monroe] with a future behind her.

- Constance Bennett

There's a little bit of hooker in every woman.

- Sarah Miles

One renowned sex symbol is on record with an admission that would give feminists apoplexy today:

I have the face and body of a woman and the mind of a child.

- Elizabeth Taylor

Sex appeal has always played a part in stardom. Directors have long recognized this:

All women are sirens at heart.

- Ernst Lubitsch

And it works both ways. Sex appeal is not just the province of the female:

A lot of 007's appeal, let's face it, stems from his doings with the ladies.

- Guy Hamilton (director of Goldfinger, Diamonds Are Forever, Live and Let Die, The Man With the Golden Gun)

Of course, female movie stars with sex appeal was a time-tested way of enhancing male turnout at the box office. A number of men not only admired the female figure, they chased it, kept score, and boasted about it:

I haven't had that many women – only as many as I could lay my hands on.

- Dudley Moore

I had a real Ford assembly line going throughout much of my life. If you're rich and famous, getting laid isn't difficult.

- Marlon Brando

There was never any trouble getting girls. But it's big trouble getting rid of them.

- Sean Connery

Not surprisingly, simply being a movie star enhances one's real-life sex appeal. The phrase "sexual athlete" is usually reserved for men, but it certainly fits some actresses:

I wonder about sex with every man I meet, and they sense it and – well, respond.

- Marilyn Monroe

Of course, some men were more enlightened, insisting that women had more to offer than mere sex appeal:

Having children gives a man confidence. A man should fill up a woman with children.

- Cary Grant

Keep in mind that Grant fathered but one child – and that at age 62! But another screen legend shared his opinion.

A woman doing comedy doesn't offend me, but sets me back a bit. I, as a viewer, have trouble with it. I think of her as a producing machine that brings babies into the world.

- Jerry Lewis

"Barefoot and pregnant," eh, Jerry? Is that how you really feel:

When they get a period it's really different for them to function as human beings.

Of course, any actor, no matter how popular, would be excoriated for merely stating there is a difference, much less vive la difference:

It's too simple to say men and women are equal. You can't make equals of an apple and pear, they're different.

- Dustin Hoffman

Sexual differences have inspired any number of jibes, observations, and put-downs:

What do I look for in women? Clean knickers [panties].

- James Caan

You know the Canadian definition of the perfect woman? She's 4 ft high, got no teeth and has a flat head so you can rest your drink.

- Tommy Chong

Women are more difficult to handle than men. It's their minds.

- Peter Sellers

My interest in the cinema has lapsed since women began to talk.

- Critic George Jean Nathan, whose career encompassed silent films and talkies

Actresses have busy minds. They're always busy changing them.

- Newspaper columnist Earle Wilson

The one thing that men and women have in common – they both like the company of men.

- Michael Douglas

Getting a hard-on, that's something a woman will never understand.

- Christopher Walken

Given the divorce rate in Hollywood, it's not surprising that numerous wisecracks concern marriage:

It's something that happens to you. Like blight.

- Woody Allen

Do you know what it means to come home to a woman who'll give you a little love, a little affection, a little tenderness? It means you're in the wrong house.

- George Burns

You never realize how short a month is until you pay alimony.

- John Barrymore

Marriage is the best magician there is. In front of your eyes it can change an exciting, cute little dish into a boring dishwasher.

- Ryan O'Neal

Take it from me; marriage isn't a word, it's a sentence.

- Director King Vidor

A man in love is incomplete until he has married, then he's finished.

- Zsa Zsa Gabor

Zsa Zsa, who was only weeks away from her 100th birthday when she died in 2016, was married nine times – a jaw-dropping number even for a movie star, and breaking Mickey Rooney's record of eight. So she was also something of an expert on break-ups:

He taught me housekeeping: when I divorce I keep the house.

I have never hated a man enough to give his diamonds back.

Known for being a shallow and materialistic beauty queen, Zsa Zsa was certainly qualified to comment on woman as vampire. One man who agreed was Cecil B. DeMille, who featured femme fatales in a number of his silent movies as well as his Biblical epics (e.g., Samson and Delilah and The Ten Commandments):

The main way that women hurt men is to drain them dry.

And you can take that literally, figuratively, or both ways. Small wonder that some men in Hollywood adopted proto-MGTOW attitudes:

I love Mickey Mouse more than any woman I've known.

- Walt Disney

In most action movies, women are in the way.

- Arnold Schwarzenegger

After Hollywood's numerous failed attempts at featuring kick-ass women in action films, it should be obvious that Arnie was right. Without meaning to, he also alienated the gun control crowd:

I have a love interest in every one of my films – a gun.

Love interest is a given in most old movies, somewhat less so today. Consequently, MGTOW-like quotes are rare. One curious exception follows:

The doc suggested as an experimental cure for emotional problems, I should try being celibate for six months – as all the creative juices expended in sex can give a man great power and energy in other directions. He was right. That six months was the most productive and sexually exciting time of my life. What power it gives one to say "No!"

- Anthony Quinn

Bear in mind that Quinn fathered 12 children, the last when he was 81! Of course, today he would be vilified for stomping so many carbon footprints onto mother earth.

Curious indeed that in the age of social media, more stars are speaking out than ever, yet most of them say the same thing…over and over. The First Amendment is as good as repealed if people with opposing views don't feel free to say what's on their minds. Since Hollywood is based on freedom of expression, one would think intolerance of dissident speech would be a big no-no. But it's just the opposite.

So hooray for Hollywood…on Turner Classic Movies. But not today.

How unchecked female hypergamy destroys society

Jon Anthony · 2 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A wise man once told me that two forces must be channeled in order for a society to function properly. The first force is male aggression. The second force is female hypergamy.

When channeled properly, these two forces are powerful human motivators, which propel society forward towards technological innovation, cultural achievements, and overall satisfaction.

When not channeled properly, however, they will inevitably lead to the collapse of a society.

Unfortunately, the West has been doing a terrible job at controlling and leveraging these forces over the past 50 years or so, and in today's article, I would like to explain why this might lead to the downfall of Western Civilization if we don't get these two forces in check.

The Forces of Human Nature

Despite the claims of ideologues, there is such a thing as human nature. Millions of years of evolution hardwired us to have certain biological tendencies. There are a number of tendencies which all human beings have, and then there are some tendencies which are gender-specific.

For men, we often have a tendency towards physical aggression. For well-functioning, adult men, this force is channeled into productive pursuits. It's what Freud postulated in his theory of sublimation, when he stated that men channel their libido into achieving great things.

Male libido has been a powerful force throughout the ages, which, when channeled properly, will push a society onward to technological advancement, cultural accomplishment, and dominance on the world's stage. When channeled improperly, however, male aggression can lead to an increase in crime, violence, and ultimately, the downfall of society.

Female hypergamy, on the other hand, can also either build up or destroy a civilization. Hypergamy is the reason why men achieve so many great things. Women are attracted to the top 10% of men, so naturally, men strive to achieve great accomplishments, in order to expand their dating pool.

When properly channeled, female hypergamy serves as a MOTIVATOR for men to achieve great things, but does not stifle them. In a society where monogamy is encouraged, each woman chooses to pair-bond with a man of the highest value she can attain. This gives every man hope that one day, he might have a beautiful wife, and a family.

Consequently, young men strive for achievement. When monogamy is culturally encouraged, each man has a chance to land a beautiful wife. This motivates men to achieve great things, whether it be inventing a world-changing device, or simply climbing the social hierarchy into a position of leadership.

When Hypergamy Goes Unrestrained

In an ideal society, both male aggression and female hypergamy are restrained. The great thinkers of the past naturally understood this; human nature is a double-edged sword. When channeled properly, a society grows and flourishes. When channeled improperly, a society decays and eventually dies.

Unfortunately, our modern culture is doing a terrible job at channeling male aggression and female hypergamy—and as I will soon explain, this has dire consequences.

Currently, our society discourages male aggression to an unhealthy extent, and encourages female hypergamy to an unhealthy extent. This deadly combination is one of the hallmarks of a civilization's last breathe, because it cannot be sustained for more than a few generations (at most).

Under unrestrained female hypergamy, the top 20% of men mate with 80% of the women. Numerous studies, publications, and research papers have proven what was long "common sense" to be true. Women are biologically attracted to wealthy, charismatic, and successful men.

…and while this might be good for the top 20% of men, what happens when female hypergamy is left unrestrained is that the bottom 80% of men do not have any mates. This not only discourages these men from investing into a society, but it simultaneously ENCOURAGES them to withdraw from said society.

Combine this with the fact that feminists everywhere are discouraging men from being masculine, and you have a gigantic amount of aggression bubbling beneath the surface.

The Cultural Collapse

Societies are complex in many ways, but in many ways they're also very simple. While you may need many things to form a functioning society, you only need to get a few very important things right. One of these important things, is an understanding of both female and male nature.

When men are ruthlessly persecuted in schools, academia, the media, and in the work force, there is very little incentive for them to continue investing in society. When you combine this with the fact that 80% of these men will likely have very little access to mates, you have the breeding grounds for a revolution.

To make matters even worse, most of the women who are pursuing the top 20% of men will end up old and miserable. After years of being used by alpha males, many women will grow resentful and spout the media talking points about how men need to "man up" and marry them.

Of course, no man is going to marry a 35 year old woman who's slept with 50 men in her lifetime, so these women will most often end up old and bitter. This will only add to the feminist sentiment that men are all terrible human beings, who refuse to marry a "quality woman."

What Happens Next

Unfortunately, once female hypergamy is let loose, it's very difficult to restrain. The same goes for male aggression—but it seems obvious that we have more of a female hypergamy problem than we do any sort of male aggression problem.

Whenever one of these two forces are out of balance, nature will naturally correct them. This will likely happen in one of two ways.

The first way that this might be corrected, is if enough men decide to go MGTOW and only engage in mutually beneficial relationships that are under THEIR terms. Ideally, this is what will happen, and seeing that many men are growing more upset with female hypergamy, it's not unlikely that society will self-correct this way.

The second way that society might self-correct is far more dire. Women naturally crave strong, dominant men, so when a society forces its men to repress these desires, women will naturally seek a different outlet for it. This is why so many feminists are pro-Islam, despite Islam treating women as property.

It's because, from a psychological perspective, extreme feminists have a repressed desire for male dominance—and if their society isn't going to give it to them, they'll see it out some other way, like by importing millions of refugees from countries where women are stoned to death for showing their ankles.

What's The Solution?

The only solution now, and the only solution that there has ever been, is for men to start taking charge of their own lives. Don't pander to feminist ideology, and don't get into a relationship if it doesn't serve you in some way. Relationships are meant to be mutually beneficial—not just solely for a woman's benefit. So, don't let women use you.

If enough men begin to wake up, and refuse to play into the feminist dogma, many women will naturally correct their behavior to secure a male suitor. Writers such as Roosh have even gone so far as to say that we need a resurgence of Christianity and traditional morals, which to be honest, would most likely be a good thing.

Regardless, we've reached a critical point in our culture—we can only go one of two ways. Either men begin to stand up for what they believe in, and fight against the corrupt system that brainwashes young boys, or we allow our country to be invaded by men who WILL do those things.

I understand this is far easier said than done. We have the entire establishment against us. However, their grip is weakening, in large thanks to the rise of the manosphere. In fact, as I previously wrote, it appears that the pendulum is now swinging the other way, when it comes to #MeToo gossip and propaganda.

The #tradwife and the manipulated man

AVfM Video Source · 2 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Some thoughts for critics of the Men's Rights Movement

Paul Elam · 3 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I hear from the occasional detractor that the men's rights movement has been a complete failure at getting anything to change. Usually, but not always, this kind of sniping comes from a small and bitter segment of the MGTOW community that is hostile to any effort to improve the lives of men in the legal realm. Not all MGTOW are like that, as the saying goes. Thankfully, the great majority of them aren't so stuck in anger. I think they're too busy enjoying the benefits of self-actualized living.

Still, I've never put anything on the public record in response to this silliness before and a recent comment here reminds me I should.

First, AVFM is probably the most prominent and well-known MRA organization, and we have never even attempted to change laws any laws at all. That was never our mission. All our efforts have been to reach men with a different, better vision of themselves – and to be a thorn in the side of hateful feminist ideologues. To those ends our efforts have been astoundingly successful given our resources.

That said, organizations like NCFM have been operating for decades litigating against misandrist laws. NCFM Vice President Marc Angelucci has single-handedly taken on the all-male Selective Service System and has scored major victories.

Shared parenting groups have been making inroads recently in some states, despite vehement and well-funded feminist resistance.

Men's rights activists in India have fostered a revolution of thought in that country that inspires us all around the globe.

But what is even more pertinent, and what reveals detractors in their utter ignorance, is that the jury is still out on ALL efforts. After all, it was 70 years between Seneca Falls and the passing of the 19th Amendment. Then another 50 years before gender feminism raised its ugly head, and that was with a lot of gynocentric attitudes enabling these things.

Comparatively, men have barely started effort for change, and they have done so against furious resistance that women could never imagine. Society rushes to help women who claim to be in distress. Society ridicules men making the same claim. Two very different worlds.

And so now come the occasional armchair quarterbacks who think massive social change operates like a microwave. They join the rest of misandric society in ridiculing men for their efforts.

And that is OK. MRAs are used to the resistance of willfully ignorant people. And unlike those fools, we understand that this is a multi-generational movement for change. None of us alive today will see the end of it.

That too is OK. Patience is common and abundant to those capable of grasping something greater and more important than themselves.

AVFM’s last ever fundraiser for server expenses

A Voice For Men · 4 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

As AVFM regulars have surely noticed, the look of the website has drastically changed in recent days. We have a new, more polished look that we are very proud of. And the changes were not just in appearance. Thanks to the work of volunteers and web professionals, the back end is now much more efficient and manageable. Indeed, it is so much sleeker that we have been able to drastically reduce our web hosting costs. Those expenses have gone from nearly $300 a month to a far less burdensome arrangement.

The cost reduction has been so significant that we will be able to meet web hosting fees out of our regular operating budget and will no longer need to do fundraisers every four months to make ends meet.

That leaves us here, launching our last ever server expense fundraiser to cover the last four months of operations. We do so feeling very comfortable reminding you of the critical importance of the AVFM website. Without it, there would have been no Red Pill Movie, no ICMI Conferences and not near the change in the cultural narrative that we have witnessed over the past ten years.

So, if you’ve ever considered the implications of a world without AVFM; if you’ve ever considered the work of Paul Elam as important to your personal Red Pill path, please chip in with this last push to modernize AVFM and to keep it accessible to the world.

Please donate now and thanks to all in advance for your support!

DONATE HERE.

The #MeToo Trial Of The Century – The Fiamengo File

AVfM Video Source · 4 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The fiscal strategy of the feminist left: fines and ultimatums

David Solway · 5 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It's old news by now. David Solomon, CEO of Goldman Sachs, has laid down the gender law, stating at the World Economic Forum in Davos that the investment giant will not "take a company public unless there's at least one diverse board candidate, with a focus on women." The scuttlebutt is that the investment bank is trying to redeem its "vampire squid" reputation, cleaning up the fallout from the notorious 1MDB scandal implicating seventeen former and current Goldman executives. In addition, the firm is obviously catering to the "social justice" trends of the day, with its emphasis on so-called "diversity"—women, gays, people of color—at the expense of straight white males. As William Sullivan writes in American Thinker, what we are witnessing is "an openly discriminatory policy to pacify the woke mobs." The new news would have to do with whether Goldman Sachs' largest competitors, JPMorgan Chase and Morgan Stanley, decide to follow suit.

Solomon goes on to claim that "the performance of IPOs where there's been a woman on the board in the US is significantly better than the performance of IPOs where there hasn't been a woman on the board." This avowal is meant to function as justification for its clearly prejudicial policy by appealing not only to conventional sentiment and presumably "better governance" but to fiscal considerations, higher profits and overall improved performance, "help[ing] to move the market forward." Woe betide an all-white, straight male Board, regardless of fiduciary competence and market effectiveness.

California Senator Hannah-Beth Jackson is an emphatic ally, having concurred with former governor Jerry Brown's bill "making California the first state to require public companies to have at least one woman on their board of directors to advance gender equality." Corporations, she declared, "will be more profitable" once they diversify their Boards of Directors and hire women. As reported in The Mercury News, "The legislation would mandate that all publicly traded California companies have at least one woman on the board by the end of 2019. By the end of 2021, it calls for at least two women on boards with five directors. At least three women will be required on boards of companies with at least six directors. Companies that don't comply will be fined $100,000 for their first violation." Jackson gushed: "This is a giant step forward for women, our businesses and our economy." Companies would be "more successful, more productive, more profitable" when they add women to boards.

Ay, there's the rub! Is it really the case that having women on corporate boards will generate higher earnings, that women are especially revenue-friendly and likely more astute than men? Or is it merely another piece of feminist hyperbole that is inundating the culture? On the face of it, such claims make little sense. Are we to assume that the female brain, or female "intuition," operates at a higher level of proficiency than whatever expertise or astuteness males bring to the table? The evidence for such airy proclamations is statistically dubious, though of course the data will be hyped, amplified or at least "mixed."

Moreover, there are too many hidden variables to unequivocally support such claims, for example, cherry-picking data, women applying to more successful companies, companies hiring women to avoid scrutiny, and all-female companies that have spectacularly failed, as reported in the Daily Mail, ResearchGate, Connected Women and many other places—although one must expect a host of exempting and self-justifying factors to account for the problem.

A plethora of impartial surveys suggest that male/female differences in boardroom aptitude are minimal or non-existent and that the argument that women outperform men is disingenuous and opportunistic. According to a meta-analytical study of board diversity with a combined sample of more than 90,000 firms from 35 countries, the average correlation between gender diversity and market performance is statistically insignificant. The research also suggests that gender-diverse boards make fewer mergers and acquisitions than all male-boards. The Strategic Management Journal predicts "that greater female representation on a firm's board will be negatively associated with both the number of acquisitions the firm engages and…acquisition size. Using a comprehensive, multiyear sample of U.S. public firms…[w]e demonstrate the robustness of our findings through the use of a difference-in-differences analysis on a subsample of firms that experienced exogenous changes in board gender composition."

Surely the composition of a corporate board should be based on the principle of maximizing profits via fair business practices, not on a ground of cultural shibboleths and gender politics, that is, postulates that derive from purely extraneous conditions of race, sexual orientation or "gender" (read: biological sex)—in other words, "diversity." If Robert Putnam's findings in his major study of 30,000 people in 41 American cities are correct—though the study has been disputed—diversity leads to a drop in "social capital." Putnam treats of "ethnic diversity," but the prospect of "harmony" and fusion" resulting from indiscriminately mixed groups is contradicted by a pervasive sense of discomfort, wariness and distrust.

Higher diversity, Putnam writes, leads to "lower confidence in local government, local leaders and the local news media … less expectation others will cooperate to solve dilemmas … less likelihood of working on a community project …It would be unfortunate, "he continues, "if a politically correct progressivism were to deny the reality of the challenge to social solidarity posed by diversity." Author of the bestselling Bowling Alone, Putnam is an undoubted liberal who believes in "creating more opportunities for meaningful interaction across ethnic lines," but there is no question that the diversity myth cannot be taken at face value. In particular, what we may call "forced diversity" is totalitarian both in principle and in fact, as well as dysfunctional in the long run, a caveat that applies to social justice advocacy in general and feminism is particular.

Feminism is already responsible for the ruination of sexual and family relations, the despoliation of the university as a place of learning and scholarly rectitude, and the ongoing corruption of the justice system. It is now intent on demonetizing the business sector with punitive fines and the threat of market suppression for the sin of non-compliance with its agenda. The free market is no longer free.

It should go without saying that a corporate board can be as "diverse" as it likes provided it honors its mandate of profitability and responsibility to its shareholders. But it cannot rely on unfounded presuppositions, cooked data and a policy of compulsion. It cannot prosper when beset by fines and ultimatums. The same is true, of course, for a society or a nation, otherwise this is how an entity of any size, composition or organization goes to DIE (Diversity, Inclusion, Equity).

As Martin Luther King famously said, "There is nothing more dangerous than sincere ignorance and conscientious stupidity." People like Solomon and Jackson may (or may not) be sincere and conscientious but they continue to strike me as ignorant and, if not stupid, certainly stupefied by unthought-through dogmas and feel-good assumptions. "Diversity" as currently understood is an unproven benefit and may well bring a destructive influence to bear on the institutions, corporations and societies that uncritically adopt its mantra of perfection. In a landmark paper entitled Fractionalization, Harvard economist Alberto Alestina et al. persuasively argued that greater diversity is a weakness often leading to stunted economic growth. Success by any measure is predicated on the positive criteria of excellence, skill, diligence and compatibility, irrespective of race, sexual orientation or "gender." These criteria are precisely the touchstones to which the social justice crowd—cultural Marxists, postmodern relativists, progressivist legislators and feminists in particular—are programmatically indifferent.

Indeed, feminism is hell-bent on crippling an entire democratic society: its marital structure, its intellectual life, its social media, its professional echelons and now its business practices. We may already have passed the cultural inflexion point. But one thing is sure. If we do not belatedly come to our senses and act to reverse its malignant momentum, the collapse of culture and nation will become inevitable.

David Solway's latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019.

Feminist censors fail again at A Voice for Men

Paul Elam · 20 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

As those who follow events around here closely know, we recently concluded our “Last Ever Server Fundraiser,” which was, thanks to you, a great success.

The reason for that particular fundraiser was because we have streamlined the AVFM operation and made other changes that have enabled us to move from very expensive hosting ($290 per month) to a much more affordable monthly fee that we can cover inside our standard operations budget. It was a win-win for AVFM management and AVFM readers, and the transition went smoothly.

Then came the would-be feminist censors. After our move between hosting providers, AVFM was brigaded with TOS complaints from feminist ideologues who want to shut us down. They went after us with complaints about articles on the AVFM site, and another flurry of complaints about the Register Her website.

The result of their efforts? Well, you are reading this on the AVFM site. Also, you’ll see a link to the unaffected Register-Her.net site in the sidebar. That’s the result. A big fat zero for the fascist pigs who tried and failed to abridge our free speech. We’ve also made a couple of other operational adjustments, the details of which I won’t discuss here, that will assure any and all future attempts to silence us get the same abysmal results for these censorious bigots.

And with that some final words for feminists who imagine themselves to be tyrannical arbiters of who should speak and what they should say. Give it your best shot. Bloody yourself with effort. Dedicate massive time and effort trying to silence A Voice for Men. You’ll only find out why we’ve been online 10 years despite the powerless wailing of you and your foul kind.

A Voice for Men, Register-Her and any other project we undertake will remain active and there is absolutely nothing you can do about it. But by all means, please keep trying. It gives me comfort to watch you try and fail to do anything right.

Justice for Harvey Weinstein?

David Solway · 20 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The trial of Hollywood mogul Harvey Weinstein, who is charged with five counts of rape and predatory sexual assault, has become a cause célèbre for the #MeToo movement. When I speak of justice for Harvey Weinstein, I am not thinking of vigilante justice, mob justice, or moral comeuppance. I am referring to the concept of impartial justice, based on the principles of "due process" and "beyond a reasonable doubt," conducted in an atmosphere of evidence-based fair procedure. My suspicion is that Weinstein will find himself judged in a kangaroo court fueled by moral outrage, irrelevant testimony, and the drive toward emotional sentencing.

To be clear, I have no qualms with describing Weinstein as a moral barbarian, an irredeemable narcissist, a sexual raptor, and a thoroughly reprehensible character. I have no sympathy for the man. Cathy Young called him "loathsome," Tucker Carlson dissed him as a "creep," Christina Hoff Sommers dubbed him a "monster," Roger Simon branded him a "pig," Andrea Widburg called him a "sociopathic brute," and so on. Indeed, I know and know of quite a number of such people, some of them famous, and you do as well. But, all things being equal, one does not go to prison for being a douchebag.

Weinstein is accused of rape, a crime that must be punished in law. But the problem for the prosecution is that the evidence substantiating the ostensible crime is far from "beyond a reasonable doubt." It seems that Weinstein abused his position as an influential movie producer, using his power in return for sexual favors. He exploited young women seeking careers in the Hollywood glitter world, but this is not a felony since these budding wannabes and actresses were free to reject his advances at any time. He made them an offer they could refuse. What actually took place seems to have been a long series of personal trade-offs in which both parties agreed to exploit one another for mutual gain: sex in one case, parts in movies in the other. Fair if sordid trade.

A brief, personal anecdote. Many years ago when I was first seeking employment at a teaching institute, I found myself in an embarrassing position. With a wife and young infant, my situation was rather pressing. I soon discovered that the job hinged on embarking on a sexual affair with the head of the department, a bossy, unattractive woman (shades of Weinstein) used to getting her own way. One can see the dilemma—providing for the family on the one hand, prostituting oneself on the other. I walked away, as any self-respecting person would, regardless of consequences. It was, as they say, a no-brainer. Perhaps the 19th-century American Transcendentalist Theodore Parker was right when he assured us that the moral arc "bends toward justice," for I soon found another job, far less remunerative but adequate. I can't see why the aspiring petitioners at Weinstein's hotel room door could not have done likewise. Desire is not necessity. There is such a thing as personal integrity. And there are other jobs out there, even if they are not those one covets or prefers.

At any rate, the essential claim is that Weinstein forcibly assaulted his victims. But the evidence plainly shows that his supposed victims continued to seek him out, were seen convivially together with him in public during and after the time of the alleged assault, sent him friendly and affectionate emails, and failed to come forward until many years had passed.

Moreover, of the hundred or so women he is said to have molested, only two are at present facing him, both of whom had persisted in meeting, wishing to meet, and appealing to Weinstein in many different ways. A so-called "expert forensic psychiatrist," Barbara Ziv, reportedly testified that continuing an intimate relationship with one's assailant or even pretending that the atrocity never really happened is actually a coping behavior. These alleged victims, she argues, lie to themselves and others about the event—but we are, apparently, to believe they are not lying when they come forward even a decade later.

This is perfectly circular feminist logic. If a woman avoids her rapist, that makes sense. If a woman pursues her rapist, that also makes sense. If a victim persistently lies, then she will tell the truth. Win-win for the plaintiff. As Janice Fiamengo points out in a corrosive video on the Weinstein travesty, The #MeToo Trial of the Century—and I urge the reader to access it—"The fact that such empty theorizing as Ziv's is now considered authoritative and is quoted with respect by pretty much every news source covering the trial gives us some indication of feminism's terrifying success in the realm of psychological theory." (Full disclosure: as some readers will be aware, Janice is my wife, but I can assure them there is no special pleading on my part.)

Let me go on record saying that I not only despise Weinstein's squalid behavior; I also detest his pro forma, Hollywood-vetted leftist politics. Sexually, morally, and politically, Hollywood is a cesspool. There are only a few exceptions to the general rule. In one way or another, just about everyone seems complicit in discreditable behavior. But this is not what is at issue here. It is not only Weinstein who is being judged but also our judicial system. In my estimation, there is no credible case to be made for rape, which is precisely what the trial is attempting to establish. Despite photographs, tears, and panic attacks, the evidence manifestly does not rise to "beyond a reasonable doubt," especially considering the email documentation attesting to the alleged victims constantly pursuing a sexual and affectionate relationship with him during and after the events in question, the lamentable Ziv notwithstanding. In addition, although corroborating witnesses may refer to Weinstein's past behavior, this is not the issue that the trial is focusing on. There are only two plaintiffs and their depositions are problematic.

I suspect as well that the judge may fear that his career may be in jeopardy. Running counter to massive public sentiment, standing up to the media, defying the baying mob, and dealing with the case exclusively on its merits is hazardous to the health. One remembers the fate of Justice Aaron Persky in the Stanford University Brock Turner case, whose fair verdict predicated on law led to his being torn to shreds by a maenadic mob, eventuating in his recall, his loss of status and earnings, and his inability to find subsequent employment even as a tennis coach.

As Janice concludes her video exposé: "If we really care about seeing a loathsome predator get his just deserts, it would make sense to ensure that he is convicted in a fair trial. Whichever way things turn out for Weinstein, it's not a great moment for American justice."

Four surprising minutes

Mark Dent · 22 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Women.

Not all women, but an incredibly substantial number of women, have a serious problem.

Is it narcissism? Neuroticism? Rage and anger issues? Envy? Self-obsession. A sense of entitlement? Perhaps all of the aforementioned terms.

They seem to have no shame, no internal voice or sense of irony.

Oscars were awarded a few days ago. There were many ego -centric, virtue signaling speeches which have already been forgotten. But the comments from Sigourney Weaver were so utterly absurd one has to wonder if she has developed early onset dementia.

Women seem to reflexively think of themselves as a woman first, rather than a person. They also think collectively. They don't seem to see themselves as an individual human being who just happens to be female, they are first and foremost, a woman.

I don't get it and never will. A woman flies an airplane across the ocean: The first words from the pilot's lips.

"I hope I am an inspiration to all young women around the world. Just understand that you can do anything!"

There is never a simple statement about their pride at having achieved such a feat and a thank you to those who made it possible. No-they are never an individual. Whenever a woman succeeds, she is striking a blow for all women!

A female actor wins an Oscar and you can rest assured her speech will be peppered with references to strong women, female empowerment and the need for us to inspire our girls.

I don't recall a male winner ever making a reference to his gender unless you include the last twenty years where it has become compulsory for male actors to disparage and condemn other male actors and apologize for their own presence on stage.

Funny though, even the loudest virtue signaling male feminists still take Oscar home to bed when they win that glorious statuette.

What did Weaver say and why did it cause my heart to start detonating in my chest?

On accepting her award she said:

"All woman are superheroes."

While introducing the awards for Best Score and Best Song, Larson, Gadot, and Weaver went on a riff centered around their famed superhero characters that they play onscreen, announcing that all women with no exceptions are superheroes.

Just as the "believe all women" rubbish caused me to think half of our population had undergone a Cuckoo's Nest style lobotomy, this line is at least equally obscene, hollow, cringe inducing and deceitful.

Surely every woman who heard it, even those who screamed their apparent approval, immediately thought, "Well, all women may be a bit of a stretch!"

But if you looked at their shining, teary eyes and apoplectic hand clapping you would never know.

Have they no shame? Imagine the embarrassment you would experience if some overhyped, overpaid male actor stood at a podium clutching his Oscar and said with not a shred of sarcasm:

All men are superheroes!

I would want to climb under my upholstered seat.

How sickeningly patronizing.

How exceedingly arrogant and presumptuous.

How idiotic.

Yet time and again, so many women seem to lap it up.

Imagine hearing this tripe about women as a man seated in the front row and feeling compelled to clap along wildly with the women just in case the camera panned and caught your eye roll or defiantly folded arms?

Seriously. Who swallows this shit?

While this endless self-congratulation and strident claims of oppression, misogyny and denial of basic human rights were being voiced I happened to see a four-minute segment on Tucker Carlson Tonight.

Tucker was doing something unheard of and rather shocking during this segment. He was devoting a few precious minutes of his time to issues and obstacles which are negatively impacting men.

Yes, that is correct. The host of a popular nightly tv program was concerned about men and wanted to present some facts which validated his concerns.

His guest was Mark Perry, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. Mark has compiled a simple chart titled: For every hundred girls/women. This chart shatters the myth of female oppression in America with such clarity it is impossible for anyone to refute the story it tells.

As I read the statistics (some of which I was already aware) I felt a sick sensation in the pit of my stomach.

Even as this indisputable information was being discussed and displayed in graphics on the screen, I was conscious of the fact that any feminist who viewed them would not be swayed to review their stance on gender equality or the patriarchy. I was also certain it would not elicit a flicker of compassion or empathy from their hate filled hearts.

Reflecting on this truth had the impact one would feel when smelling the disgusting stench of a rotting carcass for the first time.

I sat quietly for a couple of minutes and tried to imagine I was a feminist raised by a rabid, man hating mum and educated in schools and universities which taught me that men and boys were a privileged, pampered and protected group in our society. This same group also purposely created a world in which women and girls were undervalued, disadvantaged and oppressed.

What would my response be when confronted with Mark Perry's chart?

Perhaps denial. Perry invented or cherry picked those statistics.

But Perry explained very clearly that the statistics came directly from government sources which can be found online and read by anyone who has the inclination to do so.

He is a whiny man afraid of female empowerment.

He didn't manifest as whiny. He spoke calmly and quietly and presented facts. He didn't attack or denigrate women and he even stated that there are still legitimate issues which impact women negatively which need to be addressed.

At what point does a voice whisper in my feminist head- how is it possible that males are overwhelmingly the gender most savagely impacted in almost every area where harmful, deadly issues affecting quality of life can be measured? This is the very antithesis of what I have been told my entire life.

When I lie in my bed at night does my mind wander back to that chart and its shocking contents, even for the briefest moment?

When I engage with my feminist friends the following day and the conversation follows its natural course, ie blaming men for the world's woes and focusing on Sigourney's empowering comments at the Oscars, does Mark Perry's chart come to mind? Would I dare to speak about it with my friends?

I can genuinely say that feminists are one of two things: Evil bigots who are fully aware of the disadvantages and suffering afflicting our men and boys and simply don't care or stunningly ignorant morons. Take your pick.

Tucker Carlson focused on our politicians and even provided some sound bites from various campaigns over the years. All of these sick creeps claimed women in America are oppressed, disadvantaged, underpaid and without many fundamental rights. It didn't matter what decade these clips came from-the speeches were almost identical. Whether it be a male or female politician, it doesn't matter. Women are their primary focus and men are utterly invisible or worse- branded as the privileged, pampered oppressors.

In the light of the statistics presented by Perry, Tucker asked:

Why are we ignoring this?

Why isn't there a national conversation?

Obama created a White House Council for Women and Girls and yet refused to create one for men and boys.

Read it and weep.

> On March 11, 2009, President Obama signed an Executive Order creating the White House Council on Women and Girls. In his remarks at the signing, the President underscored that the purpose of the Council is to ensure that each of the agencies in which they're charged takes into account the needs of women and girls in the policies they draft, the programs they create, the legislation they support and that the true purpose of our government is to ensure that in America, all things are still possible for all people.
>
> Despite pressure from various groups to address some of the concerns outlined in the table above that disproportionately affect boys and men, Obama refused to create a "White House Council on Men and Boys."

How is this behavior defensible?

How can a President be so overtly bigoted and openly give more support and money to a group who is indisputably more successful in our education system, better protected, systematically supported, healthier and safer than the group he chooses to ignore?

How is such behavior any less heinous than a President pouring more funding and support into wealthy, healthy and safe white communities while giving nothing to underdeveloped, criminal infested, poverty ridden, black or Hispanic communities?

Our politicians' endless pandering to the female vote is a shocking indictment on women. For it is clear that they believe women are the key to their chances of election and women will only vote for a politician who states emphatically that he or she will prioritize women's needs and wants over those of men.

What group of people (other than men) would so meekly and mutely accept their coldly calculated, routinely enforced absence from any politician's campaign platform? I challenge any one to find evidence of past or present candidates who dared to mention concerns about issues negatively impacting men's lives and expressed a desire to address the problem?

It is incomprehensible when even a handful of Perry's statistics are digested.
In the age bracket 20-29 year olds for every 100 female suicides there are 450 male suicides.

For every 100 homeless women there are 242 homeless and unsheltered men.

For every 100 woman aged 20-29 who die of homicide 648 men are murdered.
T Reid writes :

> According to Perry, the data in the table show that based on a large number of measures, “boys and men are faring much worse than girls and women.” Perry explains, “Despite the fact that boys and men are at so much greater risk than girls and women on so many different measures, those significant gender disparities that disproportionately and adversely affect men get almost no attention.” He added, “It’s girls and women who get a disproportionate amount of attention, resources, and financial support.”
>
> He cited as examples the wide availability of women’s centers and commissions on college campuses, and the lack of men’s equivalents; the disproportionately high number of women-only scholarships, fellowships, awards and initiatives for female students and faculty; girls-only STEM programs and organizations, many of which, interestingly enough, are being challenged for violating Title IX.

Aside from the sickness I felt as I contemplated the total disregard for male suffering in our society and the very remote possibility that this will ever change regardless of how many facts are presented, it did confirm one thing.

We (men and women who advocate for men and boys) are the good guys.
We (as they like to say) are on the right side of history.
We speak and write the objective, demonstrable truth.

If I was presented with a chart which demonstrated the plight of women being so parlous in our society, I would feel ashamed of the enormous gender well-being divide and support any efforts by our government to address the horrific imbalance in deaths, illness, positive education outcomes, health and workplace safety. I would not hesitate to voice my concerns to anyone willing to listen and I would be writing to politicians demanding something be done. That is what any moral human being would do when shown conclusive proof of gross injustices being perpetrated upon a group of people.

The silence in response to these facts is heartbreaking.

The fact that women continue to stand at podiums, jewel adorned, cloaked in clothing costing obscenely astronomical sums, clutching yet another award and crying out about the fact that a woman didn’t receive a nomination for best director, is beyond absurdity. It is utterly insane and morally reprehensible. The self-absorption and sense of entitlement is stunning.

But it doesn’t end there.

The denigration and demonizing of the already undervalued, overlooked, disposable gender is evil and unfathomable. A male winning an Oscar is seen as evidence of patriarchal domination and the hatred of women in the film industry.

The death and injury gap in the workplace, the suicide gap, the murder gap, the homelessness gap, the university enrolment gap, the life longevity gap, the incarceration gap, the sentencing gap and the mental health gap are evidence of…..well nothing according to politicians and most women with a public platform.

Shame on those who continue to support this vile treatment of men and boys through their silence or overtly bigoted actions.

I do deeply appreciate Tucker Carlson’s ongoing efforts to bring the truth about the unjust treatment of our men and boys by our governments, media and society in general to his viewing audience.

Trump has been better than most when trying to create a fair system that doesn’t discriminate against men and boys but President Tucker Carlson resonates most pleasantly on the ear!

[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]

It is happening again

Mark Dent · 24 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It is Happening Again

I am so tired.

I don't want to write about this subject again.

I don't want to feel the constriction in my chest as I read over the endless lies, hate filled rants and deliberately deceptive statistics.

But I have to write again, or I won't sleep.

A father of three children murdered his wife and kids in the most horrific way a person could possibly imagine. He burned them alive.

The family

I felt sick when I heard the news and tried to imagine the utter devastation and shock all who loved these people would be feeling, but it was impossible.

If I am going to be honest (and I always am) I felt sick for another reason. I was very aware that this incident would be the catalyst for yet another tsunami of hatred directed at men, cloaked under the guise of compassion, hurt, a cry for justice and a desire for the protection of women and children.

My sense of foreboding was completely justified within a few short hours. The headlines and articles screamed about the monster who committed this atrocity. The comment sections were filled with people hoping this father would rot in hell. He wasn't a man-he was scum.

Fair enough most might say.

It could be considered an appropriate response to such an unimaginable action. But only if the response is always one of outrage and condemnation regardless of who committed the atrocity. Surely that is the very definition of fairness and justice.

The very moment we see different standards being applied in any situation, we begin to understand that there is an agenda, a bias, a rigged game being played. Kids sniff out a double standard quicker than a rattle snake strikes.

Three men were burned alive by their female partners in Australia last year. Two of them were set alight in front of their children.

Let me quote a passage from Jewell Drury's outstanding article on her Facebook Page:

> Last week I shared the domestic violence deaths of three men, Jeffrey Lindsell and two Fathers, Darren Reid and Daniel Surtees, who were all set on fire by their partners in separate incidents, in front of their children and later died from their injuries.
>
> Three men each murdered in a brutally, evil and barbaric act allegedly murdered by their female partners. All three set on fire and left to die.
>
> No floral tributes , no public domestic violence outcry, no DV outrage by the Project or Today Hosts, nobody to stand up for these men who were innocent victims of Domestic Violence.

I would suggest there would be very few people in Australia who have heard or read one word about these shocking murders. What does that tell us about the sickness in our society? How can our government and media be so transparently bigoted? But wait one moment. There is a television program in this country called The Project. One of the hosts of the program is a woman by the name of Lisa Wilkinson. You may recall I wrote an article about this vile woman when she ranted about men and demanded they teach their boys not to rape and kill women.

I didn't think it possible for this program or woman to promote an idea more sickening than the notion that boys have to be taught not to rape and kill, but I think she managed to achieve it.

I saw the opening few seconds of the show and immediately switched it off for my nerves were already frayed from a weekend barrage of lies and man hatred in the media.

Fortunately, Jewell Drury had the spine I lacked. She posted a clip of an interview in which Wilkinson discussed the tragic murder /suicide with Jenna Price- a rabid feminist. Almost as notorious as Clementine Ford in our neck of the woods.

The opening minute of the interview was disturbing enough as Price defended the idea her friend, Heather Nancarrow is hoping to put into practice.

> Heather Nancarrow, the chief executive of the Australian National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, proposed the most radical intervention.
>
> We must fix men who are, far and away, responsible for most murders of female partners (and of people in general.) This is no exaggeration, no fiddling with the figures.
>
> When any man is transitioning out of a relationship, she says, he should be monitored.
>
> What she means is that during the period of separation, every man must be put on a program with mental health checks and scrutinised for signs of violence to ensure he is making the transition safely and not a risk to women, children or themselves.
>
> "This won't please everyone but we have tried to put support around women and it's not working," she says. "We must target individual men."
>
> What would it involve? A law forcing every separating couple to register this development with police? The practicalities would be difficult and Nancarrow admits it's a radical idea but this is an indication of her desperation.

Worse was to come.

Wilkinson asked Price about men who die in domestic violence incidents at a rate of once every twenty-nine days. So even as she was framing a question to promote the notion she is not forgetting about male victims, she presented a shockingly inaccurate and false statistic which grossly understated the frequency of male deaths in domestic violence incidents.

According to the The Australian Institute of Criminology, one woman is killed every six days and one man is killed every 10 days in a domestic violence incident.

She is not just a bigot-she is a misinformed fool or a liar.

Jenna Price continued to utter sick and unhinged comments. She suggested although not all men are violent abusers, rapists and murderers:

> "I would say you have to argue that a lot of men benefit from the kind of relationship which keeps women in a subordinate position and then elevates men"

What the fuck is she trying to say? Even men who don't abuse are still benefiting from the abuse performed by a tiny handful of other men?

I'll never know because nobody bothered to ask for any clarification.

When Wilkinson presented her question about male victims, Price responded by saying women make up a tiny fraction of offenders. She said.

> "Men are murderers.
>
> I know that sounds dramatic and generalizing, but women are not murderers."

Again-these outrageous claims were not questioned. It is incomprehensible that a program claiming to be a fact based news presenter can allow such disgustingly bigoted views to be expressed and not counter them in any way.

Jewell Drury immediately posted a long list of recent child and partner murders committed by women in Australia. Some of them every bit as horrific and unimaginable as the actions of Rowan Baxter.

Contemplate the lie Jenna Price spoke on a national TV news program as you read Drury's response. Price could lie with complete security, safe in the knowledge that she would not be called out as a liar by the so -called journalists who interviewed her.

Rather than just post a link I want to present the words written by Jewell in this article. Her response was so passionate and honest it gave me some sense of hope after a very bleak weekend.

> Floral tributes have been laid today for the victims of yesterday's murder with public outcries cursing the man to hell.
> The Fathers Facebook videos are being used and spammed on every network interviewing "so called experts " as they blanket this tragedy as yet another assault on women and their children.
>
> In stark contrast the murders of children by their mothers below were represented as a mothers tragic cry for help or a woman who couldn't cope with the pressures of the family and of course the mother MUST have suffered DV at the hands of the Father, which has been found to be completely untrue in all of these cases below……
>
> Tamara Gurney is currently awaiting trial after allegedly murdering her three year old Isla Gurney.
> The mother was charged with murdering the child and then setting her daughters bedroom on fire, the same day she was to give the child to the child's Father after he was awarded full custody.
>
> Akon Guode, killed her three youngest children by deliberately driving her car into a lake.
> Guode was last year jailed for 26½ years for driving into Lake Gladman in Wyndham Vale with four of her children in the car on April 8, 2015.
>
> Milka Djurasovic, 38, was found by police with self-inflicted wounds at Mullaloo Beach hours after the bodies of her daughters, 10-year-old Mia and six-year-old Tiana, were discovered at the family's Madeley home in Perth's northern suburbs.
> She was charged with two counts of murder after bludgeoning her daughters with a hammer.

Charmaine McLeod, 35, murdered her four children Aaleyn, 6, Matilda, 5, Wyatt, 4 and Zaidok, 2, when she deliberately collided head-on with a truck on May 27, 2019.
Ms McLeod was also killed.

A Horrifying massacre took place at Cairns home six days before Christmas 2014.
Eight children aged between 2 and 14 were stabbed to death by Raina Thaiday, mother of seven of the children and the aunt of one.

A mother charged with the murder of her eight-year-old son died in jail.
Joanne Finch, 42, from Tootgarook on the Mornington Peninsula, was charged with murder over the death of her son Brodie Moran, 8, at their seaside home in March.

Mother, Deirdre Morley Murdered her three young children by sedating them using injections before they died of suffocation or lethal overdose.

Makavelii Leoni, 13 months, was not breathing when he was pulled from the bath
His mother Lina Daley, 20, has a history of drug use but claims she is not to blame
Bite marks, bruises, head graze and a possible burn mark found baby's body
Ms Daley insists she's not to blame but admitted to drug use and suicide attempt.

Newly divorced mother, 39, shot dead her three children all aged under 12 before turning the weapon on herself.
Ashley Auzenne, 39, was found dead Tuesday along with her children.
Her divorce with the children's father, Murvin, had been finalized just last week
Murvin Auzenne Jr. said his estranged wife was 'was very upset with the result'

These are just a few cases of hundreds I have found.

I really believe it is time to check ourselves.

Why is it when a woman kills her children or husband , societies first thought is that the mother needed help because of mental illness and points the finger at the Father?
They think of her with compassion and sorrow.

When a man kills his children or his partner, he is a selfish , evil monster who deserves an eternity in hell.

All acts are despicable but we can't have it both ways .

The truth is, there is an epidemic of parents killing their children .

Why is this happening ?

We must be outraged at every murder of a child and not merely pick and choose the ones that Fathers have committed.

This isn't about " a narrative " that all men are violent and all women are victims like many would have us believe .

Men and women can be violent.
Violence has no gender .
So why has yesterday's tragedy become another assault under the banner " mens war on women"

Every child in these stories is a victim of family violence, so why are the family violence laws gendered?

Why don't the family violence laws reflect women and men as perpetrators of violence.

It's time to call out the double standard that exists .

Let's support ALL victims of domestic and family violence regardless of age, gender or sexuality .

Let's identify the true narrative that Violence is not gendered .

Men and Women can both be violent , the proof is sadly in the pudding…just look into the eyes of each child pictured.

Let's call out the double standard.

> Let's recognise ALL family and domestic violence and End All DV.

And then we have Greens Senator, Larissa Waters posting the following comment on her Facebook page.

> Next week in parliament, I'll push for a national, real-time count of women killed by violence
>
> It's a statistic that should be published widely, daily.
>
> We have a national road toll to keep public attention on the issue and encourage people to be more careful on the road.
>
> The same awareness and deterrence could occur if we have a national toll on women killed by violence.
>
> This government needs to treat the epidemic of violence against women and their children as a national crisis and urgently take meaningful action to keep it citizens safe.
>
> We will never forget these precious little lives lost and their dear mother Hannah Clarke, nor all the other women and children killed by men.

I want you to read over her words carefully. Think about the utter contempt this woman has for the men and children who died at the hands of their mother or partner. She chooses to render them invisible. Their deaths are of no importance or consequence in her eyes.

Contemplate the far from complete list of murders of children and men committed by women in recent years and try not to have your heart explode as mine so often seems ready to do.

These bastards are as evil and contemptible as any rabid racist on this planet.

Imagine being the brother, son or daughter of one of the fathers who was burned alive by his wife and reading Larissa Waters' Facebook quote.

These heartless humans choose to ignore the many children and men who have been burned alive, asphyxiated, stabbed, shot, thrown from clifftops, drowned and bludgeoned because they were murdered by a woman.

This is not hyperbolic language. It is the simple fucking truth.

Yet this woman smiles back at us without a hint of guilt or shame, as do all of the women (and men) who coldly and very deliberately demonize men and ignore their pain and grief without a hint of regret.

These people are not misguided. They are haters. Rage filled haters.

Jewell Drury acknowledged our own Robert Brockway on her page.

Australian Institute of Criminology confirms that ONE man is killed every TEN days and ONE woman is killed every SIX days in a DV incident.

In an ABC Radio interview with Robert Brockway from Men's Rights Brisbane, the statistic that "one male is a victim of domestic homicide every 10 days" was challenged by the ABC presenter and by a number of listeners.

Listen to the stunned reaction of the female presenter when confronted with some facts about domestic violence.

In a rare piece of honesty and transparency, the ABC then contacted the Australian Institute of Criminology and an Assistant Professor of Criminology at Bond University who verified that the statistic was indeed correct.

Why don't our DV laws reflect this truth ?

I understand that this is more of a 1:00 am rant than a coherent flowing article but please bear with me.

I read an article on one of the murder suicides listed by Jewell Drury and found the tone and language so symptomatic of the difference in approach to child/partner murder by women that I had to quote some of its contents.

The bodies of Tanja Ludwig, 33, and her two-year-old daughter Tilly were recovered from the base of the cliff below Robertson Lookout at Mt Keira near Wollongong on Tuesday afternoon.

The tragic discovery came after emergency services were called to the site following reports of a concern for welfare.

In a chilling new detail the place where she plunged to death with her daughter was her "favourite place", according to Ms Johnston.

"Tanja loved the bush," Ms Johnston wrote in a Facebook post.

"She attended many of the meditation events we held in the rainforest under Robertson Lookout.

Her last conversation with me, less than a fortnight ago, we walked along the pathway together in the rainforest and she shared how she had brought her German friends that were visiting here for walk as it was her favourite place."

Ms Ludwig also spoke about "how much her daughter loved the trees and how she ran along the pathway enjoying it so much".

Tilly was just 10 days shy of her third birthday when she was killed.

"(Ms Ludwig) told me of the new trails they had explored together and the big tree she found," she said.

"She just loved this place and was always so thankful for the experience of being in nature, meditating and staring up into the tree canopy.

"She was thankful that she could come to this place to feel so relaxed and restored.

"The last place I saw her was under the view of Robertson Lookout sharing a tea."

A picture of a beaming Ms Ludwig also referred to Perinatal Anxiety & Depression Awareness week. Her profile was bombarded with tributes as news of her and her child's death began filtering out.

"I wish I did know you so I could've tried to help you find light in the dark," one local wrote on Wednesday.

Anti-domestic violence project, The Red Heart Campaign, mourned Ms Ludwig's child as the seventh young life killed this year.

Flowers have been laid near the lookout by members of the community touched by the tragedy.

An eerily similar incident took place on April 18, 2002, where a woman, 31, jumped off the same cliff holding her five-year-old son.

There were three comments about the murder/ suicide.

A sad very tragedy. Condolences to family and friends.

> thumb_up1
>
> Reply
>
> RJ
>
> 9 months ago
>
> My thought s are with her friends, family and the father of her daughter.
> I cannot begin to imagine the absolute hopelessness and isolation which has caused this tragedy, we should not judge her, as a person in depression is unable to think logically.
>
> Anyone reading this, if you feel you need assistance please contact one of the Mental Health support organizations or your local Mental Health Team.
>
> Reply
>
> flag
>
> NickM
>
> 9 months ago
>
> No way I feel for this poor young lady who cried out for help but the weight of a lost relationship was too much for her to bare! I feel for her family too, we have no right to judge this tragedy
>
> thumb_up1
>
> Reply

A cry for help. Poor young lady. We should not judge her. A person in depression cannot think logically. A very sad tragedy. Bombarded with tributes!

“I wish I did know you so I could’ve tried to help you find light in the dark,” one local wrote on Wednesday.

Possibly all of these comments could be considered appropriate if only the response was the same when a man jumps off a bridge with his child. That is called controlling, vicious, vengeful and an indication of men’s sense of ownership of their children.

Forgive me for my ramble. I will say goodnight.

The road goes ever on

On Jury Nullification and Rape

Paul Elam · 26 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

> I consider trial by jury as the only anchor yet imagined by man, by which a government can be held to the principles of its constitution. ~ Thomas Jefferson

With the possible exception of the sexual molestation of a child, rape is a crime that evokes the most visceral of responses from the average person. And for good reason. Sex that is physically forced or obtained by threat of harm sadistically reduces victims to their most helpless state, and leaves lingering damage that may well last the remainder of the victim's life. It is fitting then, that we seek to justly punish those guilty of the crime, but also that we proceed with caution and diligence, ever observing the rule of law in the process. That rule of law is integral to maintaining order; to preventing justice from being circumvented by political motives or mob rule; to ensure, as should be ensured in a just society, that the rights of the accused are protected with vigor and transparency.

Regardless of the personal repugnance we may feel for any crime, including rape, we must remember that without an overarching concern for justice, laws invariably become nothing more than the instruments of tyranny.

Unfortunately, where it concerns the crime of rape, that tyranny has been upon us for quite some time. With the epidemic of false rape reports, poor and sometimes corrupt police work, prosecutors blind with power and ambition, and an unconscionable but successful feminist campaign to define rape in the most ludicrous terms possible, we have created a monstrous system of abject injustice, with rights of the accused routinely ground to dust in the name of convictions, and to our national disgrace, in the name of sexual politics.

Whereas feminists lament what they call a rape culture in today's society, we actually live in a false rape culture, and it is in growth mode.

It seems every day there is a news story about a man freed from prison after being falsely convicted. Just recently, two Texas men were released from prison who had been falsely convicted of rape in separate incidents. One had served 27 years, the other 19.

That's two men, at the same time, not just from the same state, but from the same city.

Both men were from Houston, and their stories are being repeated around the country, revealing a somber reality that continues unimpeded.

There are a lot of innocent men in prison for the crime of rape. And much worse, our capacity to identify and exonerate them is overwhelmingly exceeded by an unjust legal system that continues to put them there.

The Innocence Project, which seeks to free individuals falsely convicted and incarcerated has overwhelmingly had the most success with the crime of rape. In a review of the 251 cases in which they have succeeded in freeing innocent men, nearly all of them were for sex crimes, and their average length of incarceration was 17 years. Most of those were freed only because they were lucky enough to have DNA evidence that could be evaluated. Many others are not so fortunate.

While the laudable efforts to free the innocent must continue, it is clearly time to seek to understand how we got to such rampant injustice, and what we can do about it. And that begins with a candid examination of what happens in a rape prosecution, from beginning to end.

It all starts with a police report; a compliant filed by a private citizen alleging that a rape has occurred.

And that is where we encounter the first of many problems. As the facts would have it, the chances of a rape accusation being true are barely more predicable than the toss of a coin.

Former Colorado prosecutor Craig Silverman once opined, “For sixteen years I was a kick ass prosecutor who made the most of my reputation [by] vigorously prosecuting rapists. I was amazed to see all the false rape allegations made to the Denver Police Department. A command officer in the Denver Police Sex Assault Unity recently told me he put the false rape numbers at approximately 45%.”

Silverman’s experience is not isolated.

Just recently the Orlando Police Department made the public proclamation that false rape allegations have become an epidemic. Last June the Baltimore Sun reported that police claimed that more than 30% of rape accusations were deemed unfounded. Louisville and Pittsburgh reported similar numbers.

A longitudinal study conducted by Professor Eugene Kanin concluded that over a period of nine years, 41% of rape allegations studied were fraudulent, concocted by the alleged victim to either create an alibi, seek attention and sympathy, or to seek revenge.

And there is the McDowell Study cited by Warren Farrell in The Myth of Male Power, which concluded that of 1,218 reported rapes on Air Force Bases around the world, 45% were discovered to be fraudulent.

This 45% of cases are not ones that could not be proven or for which a suspect could not be apprehended, but cases that were proven to be fabricated by the person filing the complaint. 27% of the false claims were admitted after the accusers were asked to take a polygraph test, or having just failed one.

Keep in mind though, that these are good results. All these false claims were discovered by diligent investigators who were seeking the truth. But what happens when police are not so careful?

33 year old William McCaffery spent four years in a New York prison because a false rape claim from Biurny Perguero Gonzalez, who alleged McCaffery had raped her after she accepted a ride from him when she was intoxicated.

The truth was that her acceptance of the ride from McCaffery had angered her girlfriends, and she made up the rape story to turn their harsh feelings into sympathy.

When questioned about the events, McCaffery cast blame at the officials, including “the arresting officers, the prosecution.”

Everyone, he said, “wanted to believe the lie. The ADA (assistant district attorney) first and foremost.”

And that is the status quo. While arrests for making false allegations appear to be on the increase, the norm has been to treat the criminality of the reports as a mental health issue. Crystal Gayle Mangum, the notorious liar in the Duke Rape Case, was referred to counseling, as was Danmell Ndonye, the woman who falsely accused five men in the Hofstra Case of gang raping her in a men’s room at a school dorm.

The police themselves add to the problem. In the Orlando, Florida story, the NBC News affiliate reported statements by police saying that they do not want to arrest these women. In fact, they only seemed to notice the problem when it got so out of hand that it was causing a stress on resources within the police department. They also noted the deleterious effect on the “real victims” of rape, but did not utter a word about the men at risk for being wrongly placed behind bars as a result of the allegations.

This type of police complicity in the false rape culture, by ignoring and enabling this criminal activity, is a cornerstone in the current crisis. And while they now publicly bemoan the false allegations, they show no signs of recognizing that the epidemic they face is partly of their own making; that it is, quite literally, the chickens coming home to roost.

And where the police leave off, the prosecutors go into overdrive.

Mike Nifong, the supposedly “rogue” prosecutor who pursued the Duke rape suspects long after there was abundant evidence to exonerate them, has become the poster boy for false rape culture.

Nifong, while getting massive amounts of coverage from the media, was hardly the exception, and not even the most extreme. Mary N. Kellett, a prosecutor in Bar Harbor Maine, is making a career of rape cases. She is averaging one indictment a week, from a population of less than 60,000.

Her most notable case so far has been against Vladek Filler, who was convicted of raping his wife, with no forensic evidence, and only her word that the rape occurred. The conviction was overturned due to prosecutorial misconduct and Kellett is appealing the case to the Maine Supreme Court.

The chronology of this story is lengthy and the details somewhat complicated, but have a look, and a good listen, to the following recording of police interaction with Filler's wife.

This is what passes for a credible complainant in a modern rape case. This is the compelling reason to put a man behind bars. Kellett is clearly a prosecutor out of control, but she is nonetheless still serving as an Assistant District Attorney, and rumor has it she has ambitions to run for the District Attorney when her boss retires.

The Innocence Project gives a detailed breakdown of the factors that play into bad convictions, both from police and prosecutors. Key factors range from coercion of defendants, to knowing use of false testimony (suborning perjury) and a host of other unscrupulous tactics.

Here first, is the breakdown for police actions, representing nearly half of the first 74 people exonerated by The Innocence Project.

Police Misconduct (a factor in 37 of the first 74 DNA exonerations)

And now the breakdown for prosecutorial misconduct on the same group.

Prosecutorial Misconduct (a factor in 33 of the first 74 DNA exonerations)

In light of what is going on in our legal system, Kellett is no more a "rogue" than Mike Nifong.

It is the system that is rogue; Kellett and Nifong were/are just an unusually visible parts of it.

Even given the rampancy of false allegations and misconduct by law enforcement and prosecutors, this is still not justification for looking the other way when a crime is committed. Liars, whether shedding fake tears or wearing uniforms or arguing before a jury, cannot be allowed to so subvert justice that we abandon the law itself. For it is the law, when justly and rightly applied, that gives us the checks and balances to overcome those who abuse the system.

Enter, however, Rape Shield Laws; the final nail in the coffin that holds the remains of our presumed innocence and right to a fair trial.

Ostensibly, rape shield laws were enacted to limit a defendants ability to cross examine a plaintiff regarding her past sexual conduct, the logic being that such information is not only irrelevant, but might prejudice jurors. For instance, if it were brought out that a married woman alleging rape had engaged in extramarital affairs, it might cause a bias in some jurors that strongly disapprove of such behavior and prompt them to acquit her alleged assailant.

It would seem reasonable, until you go back and review the information provided by The Innocence Project and consider what this type of system does with these kinds of laws.

In 1998, Oliver Jovanovic was convicted and sentenced to 15 years to life for kidnapping, sexual abuse and assault. It was alleged that he held 20 year old Jamie Rzucek in his apartment against her will for 20 hours while he brutalized her with sadomasochistic torture. Rzucek testified against him for six days in court.

During the trial, the judge, under the rape shield statutes, refused to allow email communications that she sent to Jovanovic after the incident, among other evidence.

Later an appeals court found that the judge had misapplied the laws and the conviction was overturned, but only after Jovanovich had served 20 months in prison, during which he was attacked and injured by another inmate.

The email from the woman that was excluded? In it, she described herself as “quite bruised mentally and physically, but never so happy to be alive.” And in another communication, she said, “the taste was so overpoweringly delicious, and at the same time, quite nauseating.”

It was also revealed that in the early part of the relationship the woman had expressed an interest in snuff films (films where actors are actually killed or death is simulated in a fashion as to appear real, for sexual stimulation).

Despite the conviction being overturned, and the prosecutor, Linda Fairnsteen, knowing about the exculpatory evidence, she still wanted to charge and retry Jovanovic. It was only when Rzucek, having to face the certainty of questions about her emails, refused to testify a second time that the case collapsed and was dismissed with prejudice.

In 2004, Jovanovic sued the city of New York, seeking $10 million for damage to his life and reputation, also asserting that the prosecution had prior knowledge of other false rape allegations made by the woman. An attempt by the city to have the case dismissed was denied by a federal judge.

A case grabbing even more headlines was that of Marv Albert, a formerly legendary sportscaster who pled guilty to assault stemming from an allegation made by his then girlfriend, Vanessa Perhatch. In a story that put Alpert’s admittedly unusual sexual proclivities in living rooms across the world, he was accused of sadistically biting Perhatch during a sexual assault.

Withheld from evidence by rape shield laws was Perhatch’s history of aggressive and vindictive actions against men who left her (Albert was about to be married) and the testimony of a former boyfriend that claimed that biting was a normal part of sex play for the woman.

Under the circumstances, Albert was compelled to either plead to a lesser charge or face very severe penalties at the conclusion of a trial. He opted for the former, was completely disgraced in the public eye, and in the process became nearly unemployable.

He was last seen playing a sidekick role on the television show Marriage Ref.

There are many more of these cases that are known, and undoubtedly many more that will never see the light of day. They are part an parcel to a system gone woefully astray, even if the original intent had some merit.

And there are more problems with many practices in courts during the course of a sexual assault trial. In some cases, the court will erect a partition; a screen that separates the alleged victim from the defendant, the logic being that the sight of the him will cause traumatic stress.

It has the prejudicial power of putting a sniper in the room with a gun trained on the defendant in case he decides to jump up and rape the plaintiff during proceedings.

It is clearly the presumption of guilt, legitimized by the same court that is supposed to protect the presumption of innocence.

These are all problems in need of a solution. And solutions are not forthcoming.

It would seem clear that reforming or eliminating these laws is in order. But neither is likely to happen. Imagine the professional life expectancy of a politician that tries to address this in the legislative sense. He, or even she, would be immediately branded as pro rape by feminist academics throughout the western world, and the pro-feminist machine we call the mainstream media would assassinate their image till they could not get a job alongside Marv Alpert.

Police are not going to help. They are a fundamental part of the problem.

Prosecutors? Who, Mary Kellett?

No. This is a problem so intractable and entrenched in the culture that any attempt to address it through conventional means is certain to result in failure and vilification.

So, what do you do within the system when the system is the problem? What do you do when laws that purport to serve the cause of justice can be so easily wielded as an instrument for revenge or the next rung up on a political ladder? And when there is all but impunity for those that do so?

What do you do when courts practice tyranny and innocent men are ground to dust along with their rights?

What do you do when these concerns are dismissed out of political expedience by a system that has built, with the majority of public support, a brick wall around its own systematic malfeasance?

Extreme circumstances call for extreme measures. And there is no better example of extreme than in the way this false rape culture has run common decency and sacred rights into the ground.

One possible extreme is jury nullification. When a law or system of applying laws becomes the source of injustice, jury nullification has long been a viable option.

Nullification occurs when a jury acquits a defendant despite the weight of evidence against him. It is legal and completely moral depending on the application.

For instance, a 1930's white jury finding a white male not guilty of murdering a black man despite a mountain of evidence that points to a conviction would be an immoral application of this principle.

But on the other hand, what would you think if a cancer patient were on trial for possession of marijuana, and you knew that drug was the only resource they had to help them tolerate their chemotherapy? Would it be immoral to ignore the law and let them go?

The law is clear. Marijuana is illegal. If they were in possession of it they were breaking the law. Should we not then send them to jail?

Now, I am not comparing an accused rapist to a cancer patient, but simply pointing to the fact that when the legal system fails to seek justice, when it is, in fact, undermining the very concept of justice, juries are equipped to put a stop to it.

Now what if you are on a jury in a rape trial, and you know that it is highly likely that evidence that may be exculpatory has been deliberately hidden from you? What if you think there is a genuine possibility that the trial is more about the career of the prosecutor than about the pursuit of justice?

What if you know you cannot trust what you are seeing?

In your mind, here and now, I challenge you to ask yourself. What kind of impact do the answers to these questions have on the concept of reasonable doubt?

And I would argue that if you are aware of how the system actually works, then you must be aware that reasonable doubt cannot be ascertained in a rape trial. There is just not enough trustworthy information in many cases to make that judgment, and unfortunately as a juror, you are not able to discern if the case you are seeing is one of the ones that has been tainted.

There are perhaps exceptions to this. If the state is able to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt that breaking and entering, an abduction, the use of a weapon or extensive bodily harm occurred during the alleged attack, then a guilty vote may be justified.

But I say perhaps for a reason. Remember the Jovanovic case? He was convicted of kidnapping with the other charges. It never happened. The Albert case as well. There were “injuries” involved there. All consensual. And he was convicted anyway. So even with these possible exceptions the state could be running a political circus instead of a legitimate trial.

Now, as to nullification, it is easy to conclude that the chances of getting 12 people on a jury knowledgeable enough of the system to see it for the railroad that it is, are highly unlikely. Actual acquittal is out of the question.

Never happen.

But in most cases it still takes unanimity to convict. It ususally takes unanimity to convict on retrial as well. It takes only one to bring the system down, even if only for the time being. And it is a system so tainted that it quite clearly needs to be corrected- for the sake of justice.

There are people that will react to this with outrage and indignation. “How could you?” they will demand, “How could you let someone walk when the evidence shows you that they have committed something as heinous as rape?!”

It is understandable. These are horrendously difficult decisions that test the moral bearings of any human being.

But often the same people who would react to the idea of nullification with such outratge, after reading account after account of innocent men being imprisoned, raped, tortured; destroyed, killed, on lies, will reveal the utter depravity of their indifference by refusing to face what is happening or acknowledge that it even matters.

Their idea of justice is just as corrupt and selfish as the false accuser. They want only punishment, and only where it suits them, at any cost. They care less for the rights of men than Mike Niphong, and their objections should be discarded as quickly as they are raised.

Jury nullification may not be the appropriate route to take in a rape trial, but until society learns to approach this problem without pitchforks and torches, it must be an option that is on the table.

Domestic abuse: not a gender issue | TEDxLeamingtonSpa

AVfM Video Source · 27 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

See also: Domestic abuse of men is a covered up history. The longest running support group in the world 200yrs+ was for men experiencing domestic abuse, its history deplatformed by today's social science elite.

How Amber Heard Johnny Depp

AVfM Video Source · 29 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A Cluster of Contemptible Cowards

Mark Dent · 2 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday the Australian senate voted to condemn Bettina Arndt for her comments about the murder of Brisbane mother, Hannah Clarke and her three children.

The vote was 55 to 2 in favour of the motion.

Bettina Arndt wrote an article in which she supported the comments of a police officer who said: 'he might have been driven too far" (referring to the killer) as a possible finding once the investigation into the horrific murder took place.

> Speaking on the motion she moved with Penny Wong, Kristina Keneally said "Bettina Arndt's comments are not reflective of the values that underpin the Order of Australia".
>
> "There is nothing plain and simple about using your position with an Order of Australia to spread comments that could be seen to be inciting violence that could seem to be condoning violence," Senator Keneally said.
>
> The motion stated Arndt has the potential to bring the Order of Australia "into disrepute", labels her comments "reckless and abhorrent", and that "the values that underpin Ms Arndt's views on this horrific family violence incident are not consistent with her retaining her Order of Australia".
>
> Liberal Senator James Paterson said he agreed with Senator Keneally that Arndt's "comments are reprehensible, that they are abhorrent and they deserve to be condemned and criticized and I'm quite comfortable for politicians to do that."

With the exception of two senators from the One Nation Party every other senator (from both the Liberal, Labor and Greens parties) voted to condemn Arndt's words and demanded she be stripped of her Order of Australia honour.

So: Bettina's comments are reckless and abhorrent and the values that underpin Ms. Arndt's views on this horrific family violence are not consistent with her retaining her Order of Australia.

Arndt is also inciting and condoning violence.

Let's journey back a few short years to 2017 and have a close look at the headline of an ABC article regarding the murder of eight children by their mother in Cairns and see whether they represent the values which meet the standard set by the Australian Senate when we talk or write about family violence

---

Cairns children killings: What drove Raina Thaiday to slay eight kids?

In the community she was known as a loving mother, but she reached a breaking point nobody saw coming.

Ongoing mental health issues had never been treated, and the financial and emotional pressure of being a single mum had become insurmountable.

Read it again.

The words written in this article and the words spoken by numerous media commentators when this incident took place did not simply question whether or not something or someone may have driven Raina to butcher her children. They told us emphatically that that is exactly what had happened. Even Tony Abbot, our Prime Minister at the time, when informed of the massacre by this mother, said:

> "We know that sometimes people break. We also know there are difficult circumstances people deal with. This is a > social issue as well as a law enforcement issue, but I'll be there in solidarity with them."

Where were our outraged senators in 2017? Why wasn't Tony Abbott censured and condemned for "condoning and excusing" violence? Why were there no demands for him to step down from his office? Why was the ABC not condemned by parliament for condoning and inciting violence?

Has there ever been a more blatant and stunning example of the sickening double standards our government and media demonstrate when it comes to violence perpetrated by men and women?

The mother who hacked her kids to death had reached breaking point. She had mental health issues which had never been treated. She faced the financial and emotional pressure of being a single mum.

Fuck me! And all of these explanations for her bloody butchery came in the first paragraph of the article!

But this was not in any way seen as excusing, condoning or encouraging violence against children. It was simply examining what may have led to this woman's abhorrent behavior.

A man kills his wife and kids and anyone who dares to suggest there may have been factors other than his own innate evil, vile and toxic masculinity which led to his terrible action, is condemned as a victim blaming, murder condoning monster.

All anyone has to do is read out the headline and opening paragraph of the ABC article in the senate chambers and demand an explanation for the vastly different response to those comments as opposed to Bettina Arndt's.

We all know the answer is a simple one.

The killer Arndt suggested may have reached breaking point had a penis.

Oh, I could provide endless examples of the "excuse making and honoring" of the murderous mother in Cairns.

One friend said:

> "She said she was changing her life. She wasn't well but she loved those kids."
>
> Neighbours had described Warria as "proud" and "very protective" of her brood, adding "she loved her children dearly".

Imagine if one of Rowan Baxter's friends described him as a loving father or a good dad. Scary thought isn't it?

But I have another rather shocking example of the double standards at play. Would you believe me if I told you Rosie Batty-yes-the Rosie Batty, broke every rule in the feminist book and many of her own sacred beliefs in the days following her son's murder by her partner?

Read the words she spoke for yourselves.

> Ms Batty says she had known Greg for 20 years, and over that time his mental health deteriorated.
>
> "[He went] from someone who brushed off losing a job to someone that was unemployable," she said.
>
> "He was in a homelessness situation for many years. His life was failing. Everything was becoming worse in his life and Luke was the only bright light in his life."
>
> She says Greg had been offered help, but he failed to accept it, instead choosing to "believe he was OK".
>
> She had an AVO against Greg, but says he loved Luke and there were no signs he would ever hurt their son.
>
> "You're dealing with someone who's always had problems, and they start out small and over the years they get bigger, but he's still the father," she said.
>
> "He loved his son. Everyone that's involved with children would know that whatever action they take is not because they don't love them.

> "No-one loved Luke more than Greg, his father. No-one loved Luke more than me. We both loved him."

Deep breath.

In truth, these were the most heartfelt and admirable words Batty ever uttered on the subject of her son's death.

But if we are to judge them by the standards applied by our senate and media she should be lynched as a murder apologist, but only after she has her Australian of the Year Honour expunged.

Rosie actually seemed to believe there were a range of circumstances which contributed to her partner's brutal act. Mental health, unemployment and homelessness.

Rosie said: He loved his son. Anyone that's involved with children would know that whatever action they take is not because they don't love them.

Of course, these words were spoken from the heart before Rosie had been pounced upon by the feminist fraternity. This is such an important point. When Rosie was in her most raw, vulnerable state she spoke from her gut. She said what she implicitly believed with every fibre of her being.

Then she was quickly re-educated.

She spoke with more polish and a cold aloofness which was absent on the day she spoke instinctively.

She renounced any suggestions that her partner Greg killed his only son for any reason other than his toxic masculinity. Today she attacks anyone who says a man who kills a child was "a good bloke" or "loved his kids".

In Batty's speech on the day she received her Australian of the Year honour she said:

I am on a path to expose family violence and to ensure that victims receive the respect, support and safety that they deserve.

That was a lie.

Just like the countless journalists and politicians who control the societal narrative — she has demonstrated nothing but contempt for male victims of family violence and children who are victims of women's violence. In fact, she did and still does worse –she behaves as if they do not exist.

But let's reflect for a moment on the spineless specimens who purportedly represent us in our parliament.

Look at Scott Morrison, our Prime Minister and Anthony Albanese, the leader of the opposition, attending a candlelight vigil and speaking in sombre tones.

Prime Minister Scott Morrison said it was important to remember their victims and who they were.

"All of that was taken from them in a murderous act of violence which none of us here can comprehend," he said.

Labor leader Anthony Albanese hoped the brutal murder marked a turning point.

"We have all failed, particularly men have failed, the women and children of this country," he said.

There we go. It isn't the fault of Rowan Baxter for killing his family — all men have failed the women and children of this country.

I want to know whether or not Scott Morison and Albanese have ever attended a vigil for children murdered by their mum or of a man murdered by his female partner and said:

"All women have failed our men and children."

I know- a ridiculous question. Of course, they haven't. I would suggest they have never attended a vigil for a male victim in their lives.

The truth has never been more apparent than in these past few days. Men are second class citizens in this nation. Men can be murdered, abused, denigrated, ignored and laughed at with impunity.

Men will never receive the compassion and empathy women are given regardless of how horrendously they have suffered.

I'm told it's all to do with our evolutionary instincts. Well I'm a bloody human and I'm certain I'm a male.

Why do I feel empathy and compassion for men as well as women?

Why do I feel just as outraged and wounded when a boy or man is bullied, hurt or mocked as I do when it happens to a woman or girl?

Am I a biological freak of nature?

Both my son and daughter were brutally assaulted late at night and both bear scars which act as a constant reminder. Who would be so insane as to suggest my wife and I were more devastated by our daughter's assault?

Yet this is exactly what the family violence industry sears into the minds of Australians every day. When was the last candle light vigil for a man murdered by a woman? As I stated in my previous article — three men were burned alive by their female partners last year. No vigils. Barely a reference in the media.

Male pain is of no consequence if it is a result of family violence.

Perhaps I have a modicum of intelligence and this has given me the capacity to understand that a man's tears are every bit as hot and salty as a woman's tears. A man's blood is just as red and bleeds just as freely when our flesh is stabbed and cut. Our hearts break and ache just as painfully when our loved ones are harmed. Our minds snap just like a woman's when we are subjected to relentless stress and injustice.

Why is this so difficult for so many human beings to comprehend?

"The nature of humanity, its essence, is to feel another's pain as one's own, and to act to take that pain away. There is nobility in compassion, a beauty in empathy, a grace in forgiveness." –

John Connolly

Rise of the shield hero: anime men's issues

Chris "mad_cat" Votey · 5 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It's fair to say that I don't like anime. I'm not saying they're bad, and there are some I've enjoyed, but for the most part, I have difficulty getting into them. Some of the things people seem to enjoy about them are elements that I tend to dislike. What I have seen of anime tends to be highly gynocentric, a focus on uplifting female characters to the nth degree that they are somehow super powerful or the key to some great legend, and the only characters deserving of character depth.

Very recently, we learned that Amber Heard was the actual abuser in her relationship with Johnny Depp. We know about this because Depp released audio recordings of her gaslighting him that she can't hurt him, so it's not abuse, and that no one would believe that she as a woman could be abusive.

I was watching TheQuartering about Amber Heard, and he mentioned Feminist outrage to an anime, "The Rise of the Shield Hero." Feminist outrage over an anime? This I had to see. I did some research, and apparently, it dealt with the issue of false rape accusations and a male that had to help save the world despite being hated by everyone. I had to see this anime.

Be forewarned; my review will have spoilers. Before I do so, I will give my overall impressions. It's good, very good. I give 4 out of 5 stars. If it didn't have the annoying stuff I dislike in anime, I would have given it 5 stars, so if you really like anime, then you might well give it 5 stars.

Rise of the Shield Hero explores what men go through when falsely accused of rape. It also highlights the great benefits that men can give to society, with values of duty and honor, despite having no motivation whatsoever to help anyone.

Of course, showing a male being a victim of a false accusation of rape really angered SJW's. So much so, Anime Feminist refused to review the show after watching the first episode.

> "I watched the episode, and it was worse than I had imagined. I have never seen a series with such a deeply held, misanthropic victim mentality. I contemplated how to approach the review. I thought about pretending to review it from an incel point-of-view, but that felt a little too close to the truth. I thought about writing with vitriol and rage, but that honestly felt pointless. Our readers know why a series hinging on a false rape accusation and slavery apologism is wrong; going into hysterics over it would only bring greater attention to it and give our detractors vindictive glee."

Then Anime Feminist gave a list of Rape prevention resources. Yes, it is so wrong to give attention to how a false accusation can actually hurt men and even make it harder for actual victims to be taken seriously. Because why would any woman ever lie about being raped? It just doesn't happen. You can see how people reacted on twitter here (https://twitter.com/AnimeFeminist/status/1082395009205321729).

S1E1 gave the show a D+, and focused on pretty much the same thing:

> "While I found a lot of the episode to be entertaining, it makes some epic-level stumbles that cost it the majority of any good will it builds. As is unfortunately common, its biggest stumbling block boils down to gender relations. Myne's betrayal of Naofumi involves her falsely accusing him of rape and planting false evidence to support her claim. There's a strong suggestion that Kitamura, one of the other heroes who seems to attract various women, put Myne up to the task, but it's Myne who's framed by the narrative as being both responsible for the lie and cunning enough to fool everyone else. There's a lot to unpack here, and none of it is good. The first and most important thing worth mentioning is that false rape accusations of this nature aren't really a thing (think about the social consequences for women even when their accusations are extremely credible; people don't do this kind of thing for fun). It's as if Myne's actions sprung fully-formed out of a misinformed, misanthropic incel fantasy;

> Kitamura is even depicted as some kind of an alpha male who gains women's attractions unearned. I feel like Myne's betrayal could have come in any number of different forms and not been half as problematic; unfortunately this choice reads to me as having been made with particular intent.
>
> The consequence of this is that it positions Naofumi to harden his emotions, come into his anger, and embody the type of toxic masculine traits that just make him into an unlikable protagonist. He begins to violently hassle shopkeepers and threaten people by confronting them with the low-level biting monsters he keeps hidden beneath his cape. He turns into the kind of world-reviling jerk that goes on to commit mass violence, inspired by the type of event these sorts fantasize as a common truth. It's dangerous and vile."

"…false rape accusations of this nature aren't really a thing…" Wow! So false rape accusations do happen, but not of this nature. Hell, despite being in a fantasy realm, I found it incredibly realistic. And his reaction of hardening his emotions is the embodiment of Toxic Masculinity!? According to SJW, any behavior done by a male is Toxic Masculinity. However, Naofumi did use violence at first to get what he needed, but that was because he was being ripped off by merchants because they wanted to screw him over. Certainly not moral of him, but then this world did kidnap him and forced him into this role… so that's debatable.

And yes, it does have a scene where a character is purchased as a slave. Yes, slavery and human trafficking are wrong, but this is a different world and a different time, and in this culture, it seems more of a gray area that's tolerated. Naofumi wouldn't have purchased a slave had he not been accused of rape, and his doing so ultimately helped him out later in his journey, on more than one occasion.

Despite the reviews by Feminist biased sources, the Fandom site (https://shield-hero.fandom.com/wiki/The_Rising_of_the_Shield_Hero_Wiki) for this anime poll reveals that 92% really enjoy the anime. Crunchyroll has announced there will be a 2nd and 3rd season.

That said, here is my spoiler review.

The story starts with our hero, Naofumi Iwatani, a university student who's obsessed with otaku (but not a gamer). Upon going to a library, he finds a book that transports him to another world where he is deemed the Shield Hero. The other heroes (sword, spear, and bow) came into the world much like him, but they believe this is a VR MMO game, and as such, they understand how to survive in this world much better than Naofumi. They also state that Shield class from their perspective worlds (they all come different Earth dimensions) is the weakest class.

The world is like a JRPG, except the game mechanics are part of everyday life in this world. People can talk about leveling up and gaining experience, much like we would talk about the importance of omega-3 in our diet. The four heroes were summoned to this world to stop waves of monsters that appear once every few months, getting worse with each wave.

Upon meeting the King, the four heroes are each given a party, but those members volunteer who they get to be with, and no one wants to be with Naofumi, because again, Shield class sucks. Then one woman, Myne, volunteers to go with him, and you can see where this is going. She insists on him buying her everything she wants (money the King gave him), and he reasons (since he can't use a sword, his shield won't let him) that if she's more powerful, then he'll level up faster.

That night, they're in a pub, and she keeps trying to get him to drink alcohol. He refuses and then goes to bed. He wakes up with all of his money and possession gone. The guards show up and arrest him. He is brought before the King, where the accusation is revealed that he got drunk that night and raped Myne. Upon asking for proof, the guards hold up a negligee stating it was found in Naofumi's room, which he does deny.

This is a matriarchal society (the true ruler is the Queen, but the King rules while she is away) and raping a woman is punishable by death, but since he's one of the four heroes, he won't be killed but told that everyone knows what he did and won't help him. The three other heroes also believe him to do it, with the princess warming up to the Spear Hero. Spear Hero is the classic Alpha Male, the kind of man that throws other men under the bus to appease women (which Paul described in his book as actual Toxic Masculinity).

Naofumi can't fight, he's defense only. So he must resort to buying a slave with what little money he has left, and he buys a very young demi-human. Owning of demi-humans is legal, but owning a human is illegal. Her name is Raphtalia, a sickly girl he uses to help him fight. She has a slave crest on her chest that causes her great pain if she disobeys anything he demands of her (this becomes important later).

They do a bit of fighting and level up. He's closed off emotionally, or so it seems as Naofumi treats her very well, even giving her all the food she desires and even gives her a ball that she sees other children playing with. He pushes her to do more than she's capable of, and even put his life on the line for her when she couldn't handle herself, which did inspire her to protect him instead.

Naofumi unlocks great power in his shield, and Raphtalia ages overnight to a teenage girl (and eventually a young adult). The first wave comes, and they help protect a village. At the celebration for stopping the wave, Spear Hero declares that Naofumi is evil because he has a slave and challenges him to a duel to free her (despite Raphtalia stating she wants to remain with him). Naofumi refuses, but the King demands he must take part.

Long story short, he loses the duel, much to the Myne's cheating. Had she not, Naofumi would have won. The King declares Spear Hero the winner, and it's revealed the Myne is his daughter. Naofumi pieces it all together. From the very beginning, it had been a setup. The rape accusation was used to get the entire kingdom to turn against Naofumi, and the King was in on it. In fact the duel was a way to take away the shield hero's ability to level up so he couldn't fight off the waves.

Raphtalia is set free. She then punches Spear Hero and rushes to Naofumi, stating that even as a slave, she chose to be his sword. All of this anger unlocks a curse shield ability. Later in the series, this power corrupts him, but his party (all females) breaks him out of, which I feel is a reflection of his character. His actions in helping them become stronger individuals become instrumental in helping him find his humanity.

Skipping ahead, there is a part where Spear Hero accuses Naofumi of brainwashing his party, because why else would they be with such a monster. I thought this was a great reflection of our world. Feminists are great at denying Female MRA's and Non-Feminists their agency, accusing them of having internalized misogyny or doing it just for male attention. Why else would someone make the decision they do, dismissing women from having a valid reason.

Much later in the story, the Queen shows up and puts the King and Princess on trial and uses the slave seal on her daughter so that every time she lies, she gets hurt. This is a lovely touch, as the idea of a woman being required to face the consequences of her lies is controversial today. Feminists argue that if we prosecute women of false allegations, then actual victims of rape won't come forward. The Queen also broadcasts this throughout the kingdom, clearing Naofumi's name. The Princess lies and is hurt every time she does. The Queen determines they lied about Naofumi and other actions as a means to grab at power, and their treasonist actions put the citizens in jeopardy. And so, she sentences them to death.

Upon being in the guillotine, Naofumi stops it and says that death is too good for them. He wants them to suffer as he had, to be publicly shamed by all citizens. He also says that the King's new name should be Trash, and the Princess's name should be Bitch, and her adventure name is Slut. So from then on, when anyone talks to her or about her, they call her Bitch. It's so funny. That is so wonderful.

This anime is fantastic. It's done so beautifully at showing how a false accusation destroys a man's life and how sadistic and cruel women can be. It also shows that men can contribute so much as well, even though he tries to turn his heart off, he still cares.

Whether you like anime or not, I recommend watching this. My hope is that this is another sign that the work we do in the Men's Movement is making a difference, showing the struggles of men and how seriously fucked up our world is. And as a cherry on top, that it angers Feminists and SJW's who can't stand something disrupts their narrative.

There is a lot I left out, and beyond what it does for Men's Issues, it is a great story.

Raphtalia: You could have lived in the capital.

Naofumi: Yeah, but it would only be a matter of time before I ran into Trash and Bitch.

It's all in the stars

David Solway · 6 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

As I have previously argued at some length, moral ignominy does not fall within the purview of legal jurisprudence, and personal allegations do not constitute evidentiary certitude. Because a man is a scoundrel with predatory inclinations does not mean we have license to clap him in irons. It means we avoid him like the plague. It means we do not succumb to his blandishments. It means we refuse to accept the gifts and advantages he offers in exchange for our surrender to his wiles and demands. It means, as the theological lore has it, that we do not sell our souls to the devil — or, in Harvey Weinstein's case, our bodies as well.

It also means that in a court of blind justice deriving from Magna Carta and established over a long evolution, predicated on the concept of "beyond a reasonable doubt" and grounded on factual evidence, Weinstein could not have been found guilty. What we have is a narrative of the acts and machinations of an obviously despicable person; hearsay, revelation, memory, tearful indignation and sundry testimonials do not constitute tangible and objective evidence. Criminal guilt cannot be established on the basis of the statements of the plaintiffs.

In addition, when one reckons that those who claim to have been assaulted or raped by Weinstein did not go to the police immediately after their ordeal when forensic evidence was fresh and may still have been gathered, and that many of these plaintiffs continued to seek out Weinstein's company with letters of affection and adulation years after the events in question, the issue begins to grow clouded.

As The Washington Free Beacon reports in considerable detail, these prodigies of adoration were legion and, for that matter, were not confined only to women. Men also liked to flaunt their brotherly admiration for their great friend and benefactor. They too have conveniently joined the chorus of denunciation against their former patron and promoter, or have tactfully remained silent.

But in a culture obsessed with sex and the myth of female guilelessness, it is the women who are regarded as oracles. Their charges resonate in the courtroom, yet these consist of circumstantial depositions that are seriously compromised. Moreover, multiple attestations and what is called similar fact evidence (or "criminal propensity" arguments) provided by corroborative witnesses who are not part of the actual criminal case are, at best, only differentially admissible and do not rise to the level of "beyond a reasonable doubt." Indeed, "similar fact" (sometimes known as "similar act") remains controversial and is highly problematic. Spencer v. Texas (1967) established that such evidence "would violate the Due Process Clause."

The Weinstein trial included powerful stories, and the number of accusers is overwhelming. But stories and numbers do not add up to hard, incontrovertible evidence, especially when all the countervailing factors are taken into consideration — and there are many such factors.

For one thing, there was the question of the novelist juror whose website described her book as an account of young women and "predatory older men," but who, despite lying about the subject of her novel, somehow made it through the voir dire examination when she should obviously have been stricken from the rolls. As Andrew McCarthy explains, "The trial judge denied the defense's motion to remove her for cause" — a curious blunder. It gets worse. The judge did not order the jury sequestered. This was a serious lapse, for the jury could conceivably have been influenced by the inflammatory and prejudicial "carnival atmosphere" — to cite the 1966 Supreme Court ruling for acquittal in Sheppard v. Maxwell — orchestrated by the media's lurid campaign to have Weinstein convicted. I do not see how the judge, the Honorable James Burke, could have been unaware of so clear a legal precedent.

For another thing, Weinstein had accomplices — and the accomplices were the very people who sought his favors and his friendship despite the criminal acts which they allege Weinstein to have committed. No psychological theory of traumatic innocence routinely espoused by feminists can launder such behavior unless we are dealing with infantile minds utterly devoid of moral agency. If Weinstein is guilty, so are his accusers who by their ongoing actions — and lack of consequent reactions — are equally complicit in allowing such criminality to persist, from which others would likely suffer in the future. Participation equals facilitation.

Weinstein's "casting couch" depredations were apparently common knowledge, but no one seemed very upset. If women sought his company, if they went to his hotel room, if they did not report his outrages, then they were in effect a willing part of the whole disreputable affair. If Weinstein was a perpetrator, they were enablers. They were under no compulsion or violent coercion to traffic with him. Those who decided to sleep their way to the top or to keep silent for fear of jeopardizing their careers must take responsibility for their decision or subsequent omertà and acknowledge their complicity. Justice cannot be sectorial.

Further, as noted, numbers are not dispositive. Ninety women have accused Weinstein of, variously, sexual misconduct, harassment and rape, corroborative confirmation of Weinstein's malfeasance. Color me unimpressed. Mass hysteria is a known historical phenomenon. One recalls the Satanic ritual panic that swept the U.S. and Canada in the 1980s. Large numbers of suggestible children were alleged to have been the victims of sexual abuse by a powerful cult of pederasts, as a result on which innocent people were severely punished with lengthy prison sentences. Lives were ruined. How could children lie so convincingly and in such myriads? Today we would gather in solidarity under the auspices of #Believe the Children. It took years before the scare was discredited as a mass hallucination.

As Janice Fiamengo points out in a Fiamengo File video on the subject of feminist mass hysteria, "it seems that our current preoccupation with all manner of sexual abuse shares some characteristics of other episodes of mass hysteria." She cites the 2012 episode in LeRoy, New York "where fourteen teenaged girls and one boy suddenly began exhibiting Tourette's-like symptoms" and the 1944 case in a small Illinois town "in which female residents thought they were being poisoned by a gas that caused their throat and lips to burn — though no gas was ever found and their symptoms went away when they talked to police." And who could forget Anita Hill's accusing Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas in 1991 of sexual harassment though "Hill kept in close contact with Thomas for years after the incidents were supposed to have taken place." And this is how it goes, Fiamengo concludes, one episode or incident leading to many others. Mobbing is contagious in our feminist age. The fetid sewer of nasty, ignorant and scurrilous commentary invectives against Weinstein's decent and talented lawyer Donna Rotunno speaks volumes.

One thinks, too, of the blood libel against the Jews earnestly attested to by millions of people across the ages, dating from the conspiracy started by the Egyptian-Greek sophist Apion in the first century A.D. and still going on, in one form or another, to this very day. (To see how such conspiracy-mongering works, read Josephus's historic account, Against Apion. Self-justified hatred, self-righteous posturing and deep insecurity are great motivators.)

Naturally, many people will be happy to see Weinstein punished, including conservatives for whom Weinstein was just another Hollywood leftist helping to bankroll the Democrats. There is rejoicing that he will face further charges in Los Angeles. This kind of schadenfreude is unfortunate since the significant issue involves not only the individual but the principle of due process, the failure of which could eventually impact any one of us, regardless of innocence. We need to realize that Weinstein may be a sinner, a profiteer, a Lothario, a moral monster and a brute but he is not a legal felon. He may be guilty in his soul but he is not guilty in law. Those of us who jubilate over the result of a highly suspect trial procedure are opening ourselves to the rapine of a manifestly flawed judicial system: judges who may be worried about possible recall should they run afoul of the public consensus, as happened to Aaron Persky in the Brock Turner case; the insidious effect of media feeding frenzy; factually uncorroborated accusations of absolute guilt; "similar fact" attestations; the proliferation of unhinged hysterics and the fevered baying of vigilante mobs on social media. None of us are safe. Would we remember Harvey Weinstein then?

We might also ask ourselves: Who or what is Weinstein? He is Hollywood, a representative of one of the sleaziest communities on the face of the earth, comprising a bunch of grasping, invidious, self-infatuated and morally corrupt people, many in cahoots with the man they have now turned against. Meryl Streep's "god" is now the spawn of hell. It is Hollywood that has been essentially indicted. Regrettably, you can't put Hollywood on trial. But perhaps we should let everyone off the hook and lay the blame on the stars, not the Hollywood but the heavenly sort.

Courtesy Eric Coppolino

Eric Coppolino, an expert in astrology and formerly a syndicated columnist, claims that we are living in a time in which "there is a lot of action in Capricorn…including the Saturn-Pluto conjunction, which is about investment capital, as well as family secrets and certain sexual matters…So on the surface we have an event about a rape trial… There was so much money riding on Weinstein and his business…that a vast corporate structure protected and facilitated his actions…This is the big Silver Screen of Hollywood, the illusion of cinema [entailing] the esoteric sense of a glamour (a spell) and the worldly sense of glamor (looking alluring on the red carpet, and young girls wanting to be movie actresses)…Individuals were in for individual payout; the concerns and corporations were in it for shareholder profit." This is what happens, apparently, when "Moon, Neptune, Pisces are all up in the 10th house of aspiration and reputation." Ipse dixit.

Whether or not one believes in the fateful decrees of the stars and planets is beside the point. (For the record, I don't.) But Coppolino's exegesis seems no less valid and authoritative than the judgment rendered against Weinstein. Yes, Weinstein may well be guilty, but his guilt cannot be established de facto. Under a constellation of ad hoc attestations and countervailing circumstances including the deliberate and prolonged relationship and even intimacy of the complainants with the accused, the pressure of the mob and the media on the exercise of impartial justice, the failure of the voir dire process and the non-sequestration of a vulnerable jury owing to a complaisant judge, and the crucial absence of literal evidence and material verification, like it or not, Harvey Weinstein is the victim of a jurisprudential travesty.

♦

David Solway's latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019.

The myth of men's emotional inferiority (a short rant)

Paul Elam · 8 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Of all the things I hate about the mental health professions (and the things I hate about the mental health professions are legion) one of the most infuriating is the manufactured narrative that men are emotionally challenged.

Men are emotional gods. It's why we have the founding fathers of psychology, not founding mothers. It's why all the greatest playwrights, poets and artists are and always have been men. It's why throughout history those who have broadened the depths of human understanding and emotional awareness have almost invariably been men. It's why society turns to men to address women's emotional needs, not the other way around.

Men's emotional acumen is so profound because men are charged with mastering their emotions versus being a slave to them. It is the masculine way to experience feelings, as deeply and profoundly as any woman, but to act and react rationally. It is intellect over emotion – The very definition of mental health.

Some might ask, "Well, if men are so healthy, then why the suicide disparity?" That's an ignorant question if there ever was one. We have a suicide disparity because the world uses men up and sees them as worthless when they're spent. It's not because they don't know how to express themselves. It's because as a society we have yet to find a way to treat them that isn't abusive, exploitative and cruel.

If men need to learn anything in the emotional realm, it is how to tell the world to go fuck itself and to take care of themselves. And to do it despite the way the world reacts.

Trying to shame men into self-indulgent, aimless emoting like women isn't going to help.

White House Vagiants

Peter Wright · 9 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The ‘long march’ through the institutions of power was happening long before Marx and Marxism were invented, in the shape of feminists and protofeminists who pushed for more female power in bureaucratic governance positions.

Among the first to push for this included Christine de Pizan whose book City of Ladies (1405) described a city whose institutions were controlled completely by women. All of the protofeminists advocated for increased social power and the need to ‘integrate’ women into central positions within governing institutions.

Following them, all three waves of feminism continued their naked search for power, a project so successful that we now see women’s dominance in key bureaucratic positions throughout the world — from the UN and World Bank all the way down through national governments, schools and universities, and to HR departments in most medium to large workplaces.

Their arguments for, and belief in the superior abilities of women as functionaries guides them: women’s greater compassion, virtue, inclusiveness, nonviolence, intelligence, patience, superior morality, nurturing proclivities and so on, combined with concomitant descriptions of male destructiveness, insensitivity and inferiority as we see described in the rhetoric of modern feminists.

Feminists not only govern the modern world via their occupancy of pivotal bureaucratic positions, but such governance fails to resemble the utopia promised by early feminists; certainly not the utopic social order characterized by loving, egalitarian, and art-loving peoples free from war, conflict, and sexist domination.

The behaviour of feminist-inspired functionaries is characterized by the destructive practices of “administrative discretion” which refers to the flexible exercise of decision-making allowed to public administrators. Such discretionary opportunity is made available by the wiggle-room in the bureaucrat’s code of practice, and she or he uses that to deliver preferred, and often unfair, outcomes.

The use of administrative discretion typifies the modus operandi of all governance feminists, which is (mis)used to implement a radical feminist agenda through all levels of society. Feminism-inspired women are increasingly dominating HR roles, and as revealed by hiring biases at educational institutions, government departments and businesses, they are exploiting that administrative discretion to favor females over males.

MEN'S REVIEW

A CHALLENGE TO MEN

This development was witnessed by early supporters of Men’s Rights Movement who noted with concern that women seeking employment in key bureaucratic positions were misusing the positions they held. In 1948, for example, the British Men’s Review remarked,

> "Women have captured practically intact the entire secretarial sphere. The communication gateway through which all letters must pass to reach those that control, whose actions can make or mar their fellow creatures lives. The possibilities with which this situation is pregnant requires but little imagination."[1]

Much of this gynocentric trend was already surveyed in a review of the book Governance Feminism: An Introduction by Janet Haley, so for the rest of this article I will look at just one example of governance feminism as it exists in one of the most powerful institutions on the planet: please welcome the 'White House Vagiants.'

Yes, that's an actual name for a group of women employed at the White House.

Vagiants is a portmanteau of vagina and giants, though we are not informed on whether the women using the term are to be understood as giants with vaginas, or giant vaginas? Whatever the case, the gynocentric self-designation was coined by powerful women working within the Obama White House, as the following Washington Examiner article explains:

> The women of President Barack Obama's White House saw themselves as a team among themselves. There was a regular dinner of female Obama senior officials where they discussed issues specific to being women working at senior levels in the administration.
>
> Alyssa Mastromonaco, deputy chief of staff, said the purpose of the dinners was "to support one another through the gender imbalance in the West Wing." The senior staff women even had a gender-specific name for themselves: "the Vagiants."
>
> This gynocentric self-designation was off-putting to some of the pro-Obama but less senior aides not in the Vagiant club. As Obama stenographer Beck Dorey-Stein wrote: "Why does 'Vagiant' make me feel bad. … I wouldn't especially love it if the men in the West Wing nicknamed themselves the 10-Inch Senior Staffs." The Vagiants also appeared to have certain privileges not granted to other aides. As Dorey-Stein observed, with more than a touch of envy regarding their leave to wear brighter colors than lower-level White House aides could, "Only the Vagiants can wear any shade from the J. Crew catalog."
>
> The "Vagiants" joined together in an alliance to advance the ideas of women in the administration. The tactic they adopted was named "amplification." It called for the women to echo the views of other women, and specifically, to agree with comments other female aides made in meetings. The Washington Post's Juliet Eilperin took note of the amplification stratagem and wrote that "it forced the men in the room to recognize the contribution—and denied them the chance to claim the idea as their own." Eilperin also quoted Obama senior adviser Valerie Jarrett's approving comment on these efforts: "It's fair to say that there was a lot of testosterone flowing in those early days. Now we have a little more estrogen that provides a counterbalance." [2]

According to the article, these senior women worked to "advance the ideas of women" and were prone to pursue "gender-specific crusades," often to the confusion of the men with whom they worked. Predictably, male White House staff are reported to have meekly acquiesced to their gynocentric demands, thus leaving the The Vagiants and their ambitions unopposed.

Considering the high profile of such women, Vagiants — slang meaning "huge and deep vagina with loads of pubes"— appears inappropriately lowtone, while being a typically haughty expression by women who consider themselves feminists.

With The Vagiants acting as conduits in administrative decision-making processes, it comes as little surprise that female-empowering initiatives by government have continued to flourish, while male-friendly initiatives, such as the proposed White House Council on Men and Boys, have been scuttled. In this sense the behavior of The Vagiants is synonymous with the term Vaginocrat, which Urban Dictionary defines as "Any woman who uses executive powers (government or non-government) to preference women over men in areas of crisis help, education, mental illness services, services for the homeless, family law, government funding, school or university placements, and health." [3]

Is this a new development in the United States? Hardly. For all its laudable qualities and championing of free speech, the USA has always been an epicenter of the spread of global gynocentrism, evidence of which is given in the following authors' observations[4] over recent centuries:

The long march toward institutional 'Vagiantism'

In 1856, author of Putnam's Monthly Magazine published the following summary of the gynocentric relations between men and women in America, stating that: "Long before the cry of 'woman's rights' was openly raised, the powers and prerogatives of the American husband had been gradually undermined."

> "Long before the cry of woman's rights was openly raised, the powers and prerogatives of the American husband had been gradually undermined. Usage superseded law, and trampled it under foot. Sentiment put logical consistency at defiance, and the American husband has thus become a legal monster, a logical impossibility, required to fly without wings, and to run without feet.
>
> "While the wife is thus rendered to a great extent independent of her husband, he, by a strange inconsistency is still held, both by law and public opinion, just as responsible for her as before. The old and reasonable maxim that 'he who dances must pay the piper,' does not apply to wives—they dance, and the husband pays. To such an extent is this carried, that if the wife beats her husband, and he, having no authority to punish her in kind, applies to the criminal courts for redress, she will be fined for assault and battery, which fine he must pay, even thought she has plenty of money of her own. or, in default of paying, go to jail! Such cases are by no means of unprecedented occurrence in our criminal courts.

In 1903 culture critic Max O'Rell observed the following about gynocentrism in the USA:

> "The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country."

Price Collier observed in 1909:

> In England the establishment is, as a rule, at any rate from a man's point of view, more comfortable than the American home. Americans staying any time in England, whether men or women, are impressed by the fact that it is the country of men. Likewise the English, both men and women, who visit America are impressed by > the fact that America is the country of women.

Irishman George A. Birmingham wrote in 1914:

> "There are people in the world who believe that we are born again and again, rising or sinking in the scale of living things at each successive incarnation according as we behave ourselves well or badly in our present state. If this creed were true, I should try very hard to be good, because I should want, next time I am born, to be an American woman. She seems to me to have a better kind of life than the women of any other nation, or, indeed, than anybody else, man or woman… American social life seems to me — the word is one to apologize for — gynocentric. It is arranged with a view to the convenience and delight of women. Men come in where and how they can…. The American woman is certainly more her own mistress than the Englishwoman, just because America does its best for women and only its second-best for men. The tendency among American humourists is to dwell a little on the greed of the Englishman, who is represented as incapable of earning money for himself. The English jester lays more stress on the American woman's desire to be called "my lady," and pokes sly fun at the true Democrat's fondness for titles. The American man is reverent toward women. It is not the homage of the strong toward the weak, but the obeisance of the inferior in the presence of a superior. This difference of spirit underlies the whole relationship of men to women in England and America. The English feminist is up against chivalry and wants equality. The American woman, though she may claim rights, has no inducement to destroy reverence.

Albert Einstein observed in 1921:

> Above all things are the women who as a literal fact, dominate the entire life in America. The men take an interest in absolutely nothing at all. They work and work, the like of which I have never seen anywhere yet. For the rest they are the toy dogs of the women, who spend the money in the most unmeasurable, illimitable way and wrap themselves in a fog of extravagance. They do everything which is in the vogue, and now quite by chance they have thrown themselves on the Einstein fashion.

Suffice to say that anyone not brainwashed by the prevailing gynocentric mythos can see the problem, as could our forebears who penned the observations above. We can only hope that the draining of the swamp undertaken by the current administration, extends itself to the gynocentrism that for too long has blighted a great nation. In order to Make America Great Again, The Vagiants need to be among the first to be dismissed.

References:

[1] The Men's Review (1948)
[2] Obama White House was full of slighted women, Washington Examiner (March 2020)
[3] Vaginocrat, in Urban Dictionary (2009)
[4] USA, champion of extreme gynocentrism, at gynocentrism.com (2018)

Be A Man

AVfM Video Source · 9 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

[ICMI 19] Mike Buchanan – “Feminism sows the seeds of its own destruction”

AVfM Video Source · 15 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Philip Davies MP – “The Battle Against Political Correctness in the UK” (ICMI19)

AVfM Video Source · 16 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Robinson College cites anti-terrorism policy as reason to deny J4MB hire of its conference facilities in 2022

Mike Buchanan · 19 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Established followers of this website may recall that in 2015 Amnesty International denied our political party Justice for Men & Boys the opportunity of using its London conference facilities to host the 2016 International Conference on Men's Issues, on the grounds that J4MB is an anti-feminist political party, while Amnesty is a feminist organization. Our main blog piece on the story is here. Paul Elam's video on the matter is here (5:31).

We're currently seeking a venue in the UK to host an ICMI in August 2022, and we thought that a good host city might be Cambridge, given the warm reception Elizabeth Hobson and I received there last year, details here. It is extremely time-consuming to find suitable venues for conferences, so we sent our venue requirements to a venue finding company which charges us nothing, but charges a commission to venues which it recommends to clients, and which are subsequently booked by them.

One of the potential venues for an ICMI in August 2022, identified by our venue finder, was Robinson College, Cambridge. Its key conferences page is here, and states:

> Opened as a purpose-built conference centre in support of our academic vocation, Robinson College has been excelling as a conference venue for over 30 years by exceeding expectations.

It appeared a suitable venue, in part because it offers nearby reasonably-priced student accommodation, not used by students during the summer holidays. I requested a site visit, and was emailed a form to complete before a site visit could be agreed by the college, External request to hold an event form.

A quick scan of the document revealed questions which I could imagine being used by the college to deny us use of its facilities, in a box on the front page, headed:

> Prevent – To comply with the College policies and legal requirements could you indicate the nature and content of the Event / Occasion?

The final two questions in the box:

> In your view, will the subject matter include views which people (whether they attend the event or not) may find controversial, offensive or distasteful? Yes / No
>
> In your view, have any of the speakers/attendees at the event previously expressed views which may be interpreted as causing contrioversy, or promoting extreme intolerance of the views of others? Yes / No

Is there a more weaselly word than "controversial" in the English language? No word is employed more to stifle free speech. It hardly needs me to point out to followers of this website that our views are considered "controversial" to feminists in particular, so rather than filling in the whole form, I decided to address this issue in an email sent to the college via the venue finder:

> [Name redacted], I've looked through the document you sent, "External request to hold an event form", and it strikes me that one issue in particular needs to be addressed at the outset, that of controversy. It seems fairly pointless to complete the form until and unless this issue is addressed (besides which much of the requested information will require a site visit and face-to-face discussions to flesh out). I'd be happy to discuss the issue of controversy face-to-face with the venue staff, but I'll attempt to address the issue here, with hyperlinks.
>
> Justice for Men & Boys is a political party, founded in 2013, and it remains to this day the only political party > in the English-speaking world campaigning for the human rights of men and boys on many fronts. In our 80-page-long 2015 manifesto we explored 20 areas where the human rights of men and boys are assaulted by the actions and/or inactions of the state, almost always to privilege women and girls. There is not one area in modern-day Britain in which the human rights of women and girls specifically are assaulted by the actions and/or inactions of the state. Not one. The state, in line with society, is blind to the suffering of men and boys, and obsessed with the suffering of women and girls.

>
> Last year an important book by the blogger William Collins was published, the 700-page long The Empathy Gap: Male Disadvantages and the Mechanisms of Their Neglect. Happy to send a complimentary copy (RRP £25.00) to the College.
>
> We're also the only anti-feminist political party in the English-speaking world. Feminists seek not gender equality, but ever more female privilege. They have enormous power in the UK and globally, and are ruthless in trying to deny freedom of speech to those who challenge their narratives. We have had our own experience of that. Last year, along with Elizabeth Hobson, our Director of Communications, I was due to give a talk ("Equal Rights for Men and Women") at the Alison Richard building, the home of the Politics and Sociology departments, at Cambridge University. Elizabeth was to give a talk, "The History of Feminism". Feminists wrote an open letter to the Vice Chancellor, demanding the talks be cancelled. The letter contained absurd claims and misrepresentations, none of which they ever substantiated (because they couldn't, they were all lies).
>
> Eventually the talks were moved to a lecture block in the centre of the city, and went ahead despite 50+ students trying to stop people entering the building. They made a lot of nose in an effort to stop the talks going ahead, but failed. A man who attended our talks was later assaulted by the protestors, and his 16-year-old son threatened. Along with colleagues I had milkshake thrown over me at a pub a few hours before we gave our talks. We've put together 40 blog pieces relating to our visit to Cambridge here, Cambridge University talks – related blog pieces, videos etc.
>
> The largest gatherings in the Men's Rights Movement are the International Conferences on Men's Issues. Starting in Detroit in 2014, later ones have been held in London (we organized two of them, the 2016 and 2018 conferences, at London ExCeL, the largest conferences and events venue in the capital), Gold Coast (Australia) and Chicago. Let me know if you'd like a link to the playlists of all the presentations, to give you a feel for the content. There have never been any protesters outside any of these conferences.
>
> So, to return to the issue of controversy. By definition, feminists will consider our events controversial, and try to stop them taking place, but only because they want to deny freedom of speech. I must leave it to the good people at Robinson College to decide whether they support freedom of speech, or are happy to see it denied – along with the evidence of male disadvantages and suffering – by feminist ideologues.
>
> Best wishes,
>
> Mike Buchanan

I think it's fairly obvious that to engage properly with the email, someone at Robinson College would have had to spend some reasonable time checking out the hyperlinks etc. I don't know how long it took our venue finder to forward my email to the college, but 31 minutes after I'd sent it to her, she replied with this:

> Unfortunately Robinson College have said that due to their prevent policy, they are unable to proceed with the event.

The Prevent Strategy – to which the college is alluding – has long been the main element in the government's strategy to combat terrorism. In 2011 the government published a 116-page document on the strategy – here. The following Foreword was written by Theresa May MP, the Home Secretary (and Minister for Women and Equalities) at the time:

> Intelligence indicates that a terrorist attack in our country is ‘highly likely’. Experience tells us that the threat comes not just from foreign nationals but also from terrorists born and bred in Britain. It is therefore vital that our counter-terrorism strategy contains a plan to prevent radicalisation and stop would-be terrorists from committing mass murder. Osama bin Laden may be dead, but the threat from Al Qa’ida inspired terrorism is not.
>
> The Prevent programme we inherited from the last Government was flawed. It confused the delivery of Government policy to promote integration with Government policy to prevent terrorism. It failed to confront the extremist ideology at the heart of the threat we face; and in trying to reach those at risk of radicalisation, funding sometimes even reached the very extremist organisations that Prevent should have been confronting.
>
> That is why we have reviewed the Prevent programme, and these are the results.
>
> First, we will respond to the ideological challenge of terrorism and the threat from those who promote it. In doing so, we must be clear: the ideology of extremism and terrorism is the problem; legitimate religious belief emphatically is not. But we will not work with extremist organisations that oppose our values of universal human rights, equality before the law, democracy and full participation in our society. If organisations do not accept these fundamental values, we will not work with them and we will not fund them.
>
> Second, we will prevent people from being drawn into terrorism and ensure that they are given appropriate advice and support. We will build on the successful multi-agency ‘Channel’ programme, which identifies and provides support for people at risk of radicalisation.
>
> Third, we will work with sectors and institutions where there are risks of radicalisation. Here, progress has been made in recent years, but it is patchy and must be better. So we will work with education and healthcare providers, faith groups, charities and the wider criminal justice system. We will also work to tackle the challenge of radicalisation on the internet.
>
> There will be other changes too. For example, the monitoring and evaluation of Prevent projects has not been robust enough to justify the sums of public money spent on them. We will make sure that they are improved, and unless there is evidence that they are effective and of value for money, projects will lose their funding.
>
> Finally, we will do more than any other Government before us to promote integration, but we will do so separately and differently from Prevent. As the Prime Minister declared in his Munich speech, the combined effect of this work and of the new Prevent strategy will be an unyielding fight against extremism. And as the Deputy Prime Minister said in his Luton speech, we will use smart engagement to take on extremist ideas alongside a ruthless determination to find and punish those who promote or take to violence.
>
> I would like to pay tribute to Lord Carlile of Berriew, who has provided independent oversight for the review. He agrees that this is a sound strategy for preventing the threat of home-grown terrorism. I believe it is a strategy that will serve us well for many years to come.

If anyone can enlighten me as to anything in the Prevent strategy document which might have any bearing on the college denying J4MB the opportunity to host an ICMI in 2022, I should be grateful. The college’s position is clearly a cynical excuse to deny free speech to those who shine a strong light on men’s issues and feminism.

Why is feminism so successful? Traditional sex roles

Robert Franklin · 19 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

On reading my last post, I realized that I'd glossed over an issue that I should have addressed. So, dear reader, mea culpa.

I too hastily said that feminism, from its origins in the mid-19th century to today, has urged the abandonment of sex roles. That's not completely accurate. Feminism has always urged society to grant women the freedom to step outside of their traditional role, but has been less enthusiastic about men's doing so. At least until recently.

Feminism has been astonishing successful; it's achieved far, far beyond anything its intellectual underpinnings merited. Feminist analysis of society, power and male/female relationships has always been at odds with basic facts and should long ago have been laughed out of serious public discourse. But that hasn't happened and, to the contrary, basic articles of feminist faith have been incorporated into everything from statute law to our "understanding" of sex, the workplace, much of history and more.

So how did something so intellectually bankrupt come to have such a powerful influence on our society?

The answer is traditional sex roles. Metaphorically, when women screamed "Help!", men came running to their rescue. Feminism has always relied on men, particularly members of dominant male hierarchies, a.k.a. power elites, to play the role of the knight on the white charger, St. George versus the dragon. So feminists have always played the maiden in distress, the better to recruit male power to their cause. That explains why feminists so often describe women as helpless victims of the most minor, everyday events and practices, a phenomenon remarked on by countless commentators. Why appear strong, when the appearance of weakness works so well?

Why has it worked?

Females have always been the protected sex. That was appropriate as long as human survival was in question, as it was for countless millennia. So men took on that role and do so to this day; evolved biology powerfully shapes behavior, so the mere fact that we no longer live in a world fraught with the perils faced by hunter-gatherer societies doesn't mean we've abandoned the behaviors on which we relied for so long to survive. Remember the YouTube videos from several years ago showing a man in a public place loudly berating his female companion? Complete strangers – all of them men – intervened to make sure the woman wasn't hurt. But when the same couple, both of them actors, switched roles and it was the woman not only shouting at the man, but hitting him, no one lifted a finger. Passersby barely glanced at the scene.

The journalist Dorothy Dix understood the dynamic perfectly. She agitated for women to be allowed to serve on juries. Her reason? Because all-male juries, when faced with a lachrymose female defendant accused of murdering her husband, too often voted to acquit. Dix understood that female jurors wouldn't be so easily manipulated, so justice for male victims demanded that women participate in judging female defendants.

Feminism's dark genius was and is to harness that male protective instinct for its own goals. So the Declaration of Sentiments in 1848 was, among other things, one long cry for help – help with rights, marriage, divorce, property, etc. So was the demand for the vote and later the Tender Years Doctrine, obtaining credit in a woman's name, and the like.

Needless to say, many of the goals of feminism were, certainly by the standards of today, perfectly legitimate. Male-dominated power structures were right to accede to many of their demands. But, whether the demands were legitimate (e.g. the vote) or not (exemption from military conscription, the Tender Years Doctrine), the dynamic was the same. Women cried "Help!" and men "rode to their rescue."

More recent events make that dynamic painfully clear. Indeed, it's informative to view today's feminism as simply testing the limits of the male inclination to protect. Perhaps air-conditioning in office buildings constitutes patriarchal oppression that "the Patriarchy" needs to change. That garnered ridicule, but little traction. What about

"free bleeding," i.e. abandoning tampons as more masculine oppression? A non-starter.

Those "issues" may seem trivial, but nevertheless illustrate that the dynamic, i.e. testing to see if male power will respond to a cry for help with corrective action, continues. Non-trivial issues demonstrate the same.

For example, we've known for decades that women are at least as likely as men to commit domestic violence and, since the 1970s, the male powers that be have lavished attention and money on female victims. But that same male power has always turned a blind eye to male suffering and female perpetration.

Likewise, due process of law has been gravely compromised in response to feminists' demand that more men go to prison when women cry "Rape!" Every acquittal of a man accused of sexual wrongdoing is greeted with feminist outrage, regardless of the weakness of the case against him (see, e.g. the case of Gian Ghomeshi). And academic institutions and male-dominated businesses rush to fire powerful men on the mere accusation by a woman of even minor sexual impropriety. When writer Stephen Galloway was hounded out of his tenured position at the University of British Columbia, women levelled the accusations and men in the university's power structure kicked him off campus and shunned him socially long before it was revealed that he'd done nothing wrong.

In short, the helpless woman/knight on the white horse dynamic is alive and well and feminists know it. Feminist success depends on it and always has.

Therefore, the fight to turn back the worst depredations of feminism is simultaneously a fight to turn men from their traditional ways of thinking about and acting toward women. As long as men in power respond to feminist complaints like chivalrous knights, feminists will continue to push for more and more and more. Why wouldn't they?

Until then, intellectual distortions blight the landscape of public discourse. When feminists don the mask of the helpless, victimized woman in order to stimulate the savior response in men, while also arguing that gender is a societal construct that must be abolished, cognitive dissonance is born. I strongly suspect that the former cannot beget the latter, that using sex roles to abolish sex roles will never succeed. Perhaps it's not intended to. Perhaps Little Nell and her rescuer are perfectly happy with their roles.

After all, as I established several posts back, feminism has always been about "more for us," i.e. more power, more money, more rights, more privileges for women. If traditional sex roles provide that "more," and they do, then feminists would be foolish to do anything but continue the drama that pays so well, until someone mercifully brings the curtain down.

In the meantime, the ironies pour on us like a biblical flood.

FTD in Sweden – female perpetrated domestic violence

AVfM Video Source · 22 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

ICMI20 to proceed as virtual conference

Robert Brockway · 22 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The ongoing COVID-19 (Coronavirus) pandemic is creating challenges that society hasn't had to face in decades. As a result of the pandemic, Australia will soon close its border and has introduced limits on public gatherings that make holding ICMI20 in the originally intended form impossible. Recent statements by the Australian government suggest that even more stringent restrictions lay ahead of us.

In consultation with Paul Elam and Mike Buchanan, I've made the decision to hold ICMI20 as a virtual conference. Tickets purchased for ICMI20 in its original form will be refunded in the near future.

Stay safe, and watch this space for more information on ICMI20.

When The World Stopped

Peter Ryan · 22 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Civilisation is a system. It should now be very obvious to people, how interconnected and interdependent our socioeconomic system is and how fragile that system has become. This is why I have tried to promote systems thinking in our polarised society. A society that is saturated with ideologues of all stripes that promote reductive thinking. In my article on Gynocentrism And The Demographic Implosion Of Western Civilisation[1], I wrote about the precarious social and economic state of Western civilisation. The current pandemic has simply just exposed the rot hidden underneath the veneer of debt laden decadence I wrote about in that article. Like a storm exposing the fragility of a terminate infested house, this pandemic is demonstrating how fragile our modern socioeconomic system is to a serious, but in historical terms a relatively minor pandemic (compared to the Spanish flu, Smallpox and the Black Death, that killed millions more than this virus ever will). Coronavirus is merely the straw that is breaking the camel's back and demonstrating just how exposed we have let ourselves become.

Yes the pandemic is serious, but this is not the first time our world has faced a major pandemic and it will not be the last. It is however the first time our modern society has faced such a challenge. Since World War 2, modern society has had 75 years of relatively uninterrupted peace and prosperity. We have become complacent over time in the absence of major hardship and have lost focus on what really matters and what is really important. There has been a gradual erosion of long term thinking and planning politically, socially and economically. We have been living in a bubble world of safety and prosperity. This bubble world we have created, has fostered all kinds of crazy delusional ideological thinking and unsustainable elements to thrive in our culture and institutions. Coronavirus is a needle to our bubble world.

We have lost touch with reality and this society has forgotten that pandemics and other major events (like major volcanic super eruptions which can and do have devastating global effects, a major meteorite strike, or a one in two hundred year solar storm like the Carrington event of 1859 that could wipe out most of our electrical grid and satellite network) do in fact occur and have to be planned, prepared and accounted for accordingly. These things don't just happen in movies like Contagion. We have become blasé about the long-term impacts of current decisions on our future and the sustainability of what we are collectively doing socially and economically. We have had little regard for how well prepared we are to handle external social and economic shocks. We can see that just by looking at our reckless reliance on debt to drive our economy and on our inaction to address fatherlessness and the destruction of the family and all the downstream social and economic impacts that has on our society. There are many other examples of this recklessness and cavalier attitude of course that I could cite.

Short-term thinking, apathy over the future consequences for current political, social and economic decisions and societal decadence, have all crept into our collective psyche. Older generations lived through the Spanish flu, two world Wars and the Great Depression. It was understood from the lessons learned from those hardships, that society had to plan and invest over the long term and not just think about winning the next election or focusing on short-term profit. These lessons have gradually been forgotten and we have been living off the fruits of past generations for decades.

The ideological claptrap of modern feminism and other ideologies, has swelled in this cultural memory loss of past hardships and in the absence of any relative existential threat to civilisation. They have thrived like parasites off a golden age of peace and prosperity. How relevant now is ideological feminism? How relevant are gender quotas in the middle of this major pandemic? How relevant is manspreading, mansplaining and sexist air-conditioning? How useful are feminists in this crisis? If there is a good thing about the Coronavirus it is this- It is forcing our "woke" society and our ideologically infested institutions to finally confront reality, put facts before feelings and identify what actually matters. The importance of border control should now be quite obvious, even to the most radical ideological idiots in our society. It is not xenophobic to want secure borders. The time for ideological bullshit is now over and it is now time for society to set its priorities straight.

The impact of this virus represents a stress test for our modern socioeconomic system. Civilisation has gone through far worse. We have survived pandemics, major disasters, wars, famine, recessions and depressions before. Millions and millions have died in some cases and society still found a way to go on. We were able to survive these periods because past generations lived and died by their values and worked together in a cooperative manner and supported each other. They made sacrifices, were no nonsense pragmatists and lived in reality and not in a woke ideological bubble. There was patriotism, values, meaning and purpose in what they did and in their culture. There was a relative absence of self-hatred, apathy, nihilism, fatalism and laziness. There was no nonsense about toxic masculinity or men being “obsolete”. The generations that lived through 1900 to 1950 in particular, were as tough as nails and we should attempt to emulate them today. How would they react to the present events? It would be water off a duck’s back for them. What we are going through is easy compared to what they faced. We can overcome this.

The reason I have focused on men’s issues in my writing, is because I understand how reliant this system is on men and on the family. Economic shocks can have very big effects on society, but if society has a strong social structure, it can withstand such hardship. The epidemic of fatherlessness and the breakdown of the family, does nothing but multiply the risk factor of social cohesion collapsing in the event of a crisis such as this by orders of magnitude. The economic impact of the boy crisis in education and fatherlessness, does nothing but substantially increase the fragility of our economic system to shocks like this pandemic.

As I mentioned before, everything is interconnected. Protecting the family, protecting fatherhood and addressing the needs of men and boys, is not just about looking after men, it is about ensuring our society is strong and has the integrity to withstand times of hardship like this pandemic. When we neglect men and boys, we weaken society and we magnify the risk factors that we will fall apart in the event of a societal shock or crisis. The social and economic effects of this pandemic will be felt not just for a few months, but for decades. The world has now changed in ways we are yet to even fully comprehend. There will be no returning to normal after the pandemic is gone. There is too much debt and too much economic and social degradation already in the system for a full recovery back to the pre-Corona status quo. We have not experienced a disruption on this scale since World War 2 and I would encourage people to explore what past generations did to cope with the hardships they experienced and what followed such major events. We are living through something historic.

I understand that there is a great deal of fear and panic in society at the moment. It is rational to have some fear, but it is dangerous to become overwhelmed by it. It is important to try to identify the positives over the negatives and keep ourselves mentally balanced. We are all impacted and that includes me. There are some positives to consider- This crisis presents society with an opportunity to re-evaluate its priorities, to re-learn some old and important lessons and to reconnect with what really matters and set a new future. I have been saving my money for years, because I understood the need to store seeds for the winter and I could see that at some point there would be a crisis and I would need to protect myself. I am glad I have prepared myself for this crisis. I have made the decision not to have children, because I could see that society was moving in an unsustainable direction. There is a lesson from this pandemic for everyone to save for a rainy day, to prepare for the winter and to hope for the best, but plan for the worst. I live my life that way- Cautiously optimistic but pessimistically prepared.

With the lessons we learn from our hardships, we will have an opportunity in the crisis and beyond it, to fundamentally transform our society into something far bigger, better and stronger than before. History shows that society can rebound very strongly after times of hardship. The renaissance and enlightenment followed the Black Death. Huge technological and social transformations followed World War Two. This crisis could become a positive inflection point in history. Alternatively if we succumb to fear and panic, we could descend into a new dark age and a period of totalitarian governance. It all comes down to how we collectively choose to respond to this crisis. Our future is in our hands.

This crisis is an opportunity for society to reflect on its unsustainable trajectory, to relearn valuable lessons and to undertake major transformative change. Our society is way overdue for a major reset and a fundamental restructure socially and economically. At the end of this crisis there will be opportunities for our society to do exactly that. A society that runs off unsustainable levels of debt, runaway gynocentrism[2] and numerous other unsustainable practices and activities, has a finite lifespan. If it was not Coronavirus that triggered this social and economic crisis, it would have been something else. We have to confront reality sooner or later.

The best antidote to fear is to work cooperatively and to focus on what is working and on developing a plan and solutions to get society through this crisis and back on track once this crisis has ended. Don't succumb to fear. Instead spend this time reflecting on what matters most, learning from hardship and on harnessing the opportunities to ensure your future and societies future. I would like people to watch this video[3] with renowned physician and addiction expert Dr. Gabor Mate, on the social and psychological effects of this pandemic. Dr. Mate raises some important insights that are worth sharing and for us all to reflect on. We can either succumb to the destructive death spiral of fear and descend into mob violence over trivial things like toilet paper, or we can rally together in a united effort to fight for our own future and set an example for others to follow and live by. This is a time where we either choose to live by values, or die from nihilism and fatalism. Are we going to rise up to the challenge as past generations did, or are we going to succumb to fear and violence? Our choice.

In the words[4] of US President Franklin D. Roosevelt-

"The Only Thing We Have To Fear Is Fear Itself"

In his inauguration speech during the Great Depression, Franklin Roosevelt also spoke about the necessity of speaking the truth frankly and boldly, of the importance of having vision and of respecting others and working together. There was no identity politics, no lies, no avoidance of reality and no ideological dogma in his speech. He was a true leader in every sense of the word. We should emulate that spirit. Society will not properly recover from this pandemic, unless we have the courage to confront the dark truths about our society and address social and economic realities we have ignored for far too long and are prepared to undertake major fundamental transformative change of our society.

"The greatest generation"[5] got through the Spanish Flu, the Great Depression and World War One and World War Two and they never gave up. We can overcome Coronavirus. We have a relatively minor challenge before us in comparison to what they faced. It is in our collective control to set our own future. Society needs strong men more than ever at this moment in time. Men have never been more valuable than they are right now. Men literally keep us all alive and God bless you for doing so.

Be bold, be strong, be courageous and take care. There is light beyond the dark.

References:

1. https://avoiceformen.com/featured/gynocentrism-and-the-demographic-implosion-of-western-civilisation/
2. https://avoiceformen.com/featured/the-normalisation-of-gynocentrism/
3. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7FEoQOurpGo
4. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=MX_v0zxM23Q
5. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Greatest_Generation

In the middle of a pandemic, feminists ask, “What about me?”

Perspective Post · 24 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Even in the middle of a global pandemic we can always count on feminists to remind us that it’s all about them.

The Atlantic released an article titled “The Coronovirus Is A Disaster For Feminism”;

The article addresses the self-isolation, work-from-home issue that has been suggested/forced upon us by health officials and our politicians. The author’s fear lies in a most critical issue: “Who’s going to watch the kids while we’re stuck at home?”

From the article:

> …one of the most striking effects of the coronavirus will be to send many couples back to the 1950s. Across the world, women’s independence will be a silent victim of the pandemic.

Although the article addresses the fact that the coronovirus effects “women less severely,” it should be noted that putting the emphasis on women being affected less severely redirects from the reality that it impacts men more severely.

But feminists don’t care about those types of inequalities. Just like the facts that men are more likely to die on the job, more likely to commit suicide, more likely to end up homeless, etc.

No, no, no. The real issue isn’t how we stay safe and healthy during a global pandemic, which has to date infected over 200,000 and killed over 10,000. The real issue is how this all effects feminists leisure time, presumably as men are either writing their great novel or, in fact, actually working. The issue is who’s responsible for child care?

It’s interesting to also note how the article at first seems reasonable in this question but further in in the article it subtly re-brands childcare as ”unpaid labor.” This is the technique of propagandists. Unpaid labor is mentioned three times in the article:

> At the same time, school closures and household isolation are moving the work of caring for children from the paid economy—nurseries, schools, babysitters—to the unpaid one. The coronavirus smashes up the bargain that so many dual-earner couples have made in the developed world: We can both work, because someone else is looking after our children. Instead, couples will have to decide which one of them takes the hit.
>
> All this looking after—this unpaid caring labor—will fall more heavily on women, because of the existing structure of the workforce.
>
> Look around and you can see couples already making tough decisions on how to divide up this extra unpaid labor.

I wonder how this attitude translates into the treatment of their children.

The feminists, who are also pro-abortion most if not all of the time, have no problem referring an unborn child as "just a clump of cells," and to the care of our children as just "unpaid labor."

Shameful.

The article references one woman's concern during this crisis. Her husband by the way, is a physician in the emergency department, who treats coronavirus patients. He's living in the garage in between shifts while her and the kids live in the house fighting over the remote.

> As I attempt to home school my kids (alone) with a new baby who screams if she isn't held, I am worried about the health of my spouse and my family.

At least she's "worried" about her spouse.

So as she suffers the responsibility of this "unpaid labor" her husband is tasked with saving lives while risking his own.

Sound familiar? If it doesn't check out the statistics on male deaths during WWII. While women used working in factories during WWII an opportunity to flex their muscles saying"women can do it too!". Men were walking head first into an a firefight on the beaches of Normandy.

Five million American women worked physical labor jobs in factories while about 400, 000 American soldiers died in WWII. Guess how many were men?

Both heroes, but not all heroes are the same.

How is this relevant? It's relevant because the slightest inconvenience a modern day, mostly white feminist, has to suffer involves the manipulation of data and facts to push a cause that only serves to benefit them.

They'll mention how black women are twice as likely to die in child birth, but these white feminists only exploit that data to serve their own interests.

So why are these feminists so opposed to caring for their children? Because they've been brainwashed into thinking childcare is an unimportant responsibility, as is evident in the high divorce rates in couples where the dad stays at home.

♦

This article was originally posted at The Perspective Post, and is republished here with the author's permission.

Janice Fiamengo – “Why We Need Male-Positive Histories” (ICMI19, Chicago)

AVfM Video Source · 24 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Free Download of E. Belfort Bax's Trilogy

A Voice for Men · 25 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

We are pleased to offer AVfM readers this set of writings by Ernest Belfort Bax – early father of the Men's Rights Movement. Download your free copies by clicking on the images below ►

Ernest Belfort Bax (1854 – 1926) holds a special place in the history of men's rights advocacy, being the first to mount a sustained public campaign soliciting compassion for men and boys, while denouncing gynocentric chivalry and cultural misandry that was common in his time. As the first major spokesman on these issues Bax is considered the father of the first wave of the men's rights movement.

The movement inaugurated by Bax was firstly a literary effort seeking to raise awareness of unreasonable discrimination against men; in divorce settlements, onerous financial responsibilities, military service, domestic violence bias, criminal sentencing disparities, misandric cultural roles and expectations, and so forth. While there were numerous men's rights advocates appearing from Bax's time forward, his efforts were published in mainstream publications spanning a period of thirty years, making his voice not only the first, but one of the most enduring.

Bax wrote on a great many topics, including religion, socialism, history and philosophy. This website reproduces all those writings (and only those writings) in which he dealt with men's human rights, along with the gynocentric culture he believed responsible for undermining those rights. In these writings he asserted that feminism was a central part of the "anti-man crusades" that were in turn responsible for the expansion of "anti-man laws" during the time of men-only voting in England.

Bax wrote many articles in The New Age and elsewhere about English laws partial to women and against men, and of women's privileged position under the law. He believed that women's suffrage would unfairly tip the balance of power to women. In 1896 he co-wrote The Legal Subjection of Men as a response to John Stuart Mill's 1869 essay The Subjection of Women. In 1913 he published The Fraud of Feminism, detailing feminism's adverse effects on males and society. Section titles included "The Anti-Man Crusade", "The 'Chivalry' Fake", "Always The 'Injured Innocent'", and "Some Feminist Lies and Fallacies".

The sheer volume of writings about men's human rights show that the topic exercised Bax's mind throughout his life, rivaling his interest in politics and philosophy but surprisingly little mentioned by biographers; perhaps the result of a widespread censorship of non-feminist narratives reported by Bax. With the resurgence of interest in men's human rights, biographers might now be willing to update Bax's life knowing they have a receptive audience for whom censorship is less likely to be accepted.

"Perhaps in that day of a future society, my protest may be unearthed by some enterprising archaeological inquirer, and used as evidence that the question was already burning at the end of the nineteenth century." — E.B. Bax on Injustice to Men

A note for the ladies from Dr. Paul

Paul Elam · 27 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I've been hearing women say, for far too long now, that when it comes to talking about problems, "I don't want him to fix my problems. I just want him to listen to me. I just want to be heard."

Ladies, I don't know what 10-cent self-help rag you read that in, but it's total bullshit.

Look. Men solve problems. It's what we do. It's what we've always done. Expecting us to listen to you drone on for 45 minutes about shit you have no intention of resolving isn't only a complete waste of time, it's downright rude.

Men don't listen to each other wallow in problems. We identify what's wrong and go to work on a plan to set it right. Once we figure out that the man we're listening to is just yammering about something with no interest in fixing it, we lose interest right away. Said yammerer will find himself without an audience, and quickly.

Any self-respecting man will do the same thing with you. And you know what? That's exactly the correct response.

So, the next time you want to hold a man hostage to your endless stream of complaints du jour, do yourself and especially him a favor. Take that shit to your girlfriends. Have a bring-your-own-Kleenex party and go to town. Try your best to out whine each other. And whatever you do, don't try to fix any of it. That would spoil the moment.

But when you get ready to actually DO something about the things that bother you, the man in your life will be happy to be there for you. Like I said, it's what we do.

Solving problems. It's a man thing.

Tommy Sotomayor – “The Bar for Queendom” (ICMI19, Chicago)

AVfM Video Source · 27 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

La Corona: John Donne shows us how prayer and faith can fight the virus

David Solway · 28 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

In response to the deluge of articles, reports, blogs, vlogs, news items, panel discussions, and press briefings that confront us at every turn regarding COVID-19, we apprehensively follow the prescriptions and advisories intended to combat the pandemic. We wash our hands five times a day, we practice "social distancing" (a new term that has entered the lexicon), we hunker down at home, we go into quarantine, we put our wavering hopes in hydroxychloroquine, and we hoard, hoard, hoard though the shelves are now as bare as they perennially were and are under communism. And we worry, too, that the cure may be worse than the disease as financial markets tumble, businesses close, unemployment skyrockets and the supply chains are indefinitely disrupted.

Aside from the various cautionary practices daily recommended and instructions regularly issued, personal and collective prayer has also come to be recognized as an antipathogen. Pope Francis called on followers to pray for the suffering. A National Day of Prayer has been organized in the U.S. to allay the disaster that has befallen us. "No matter where you may be," said President Trump, "I encourage you to turn towards prayer in an act of faith." Some theologians and no doubt laypersons believe that the Lord's wrath has been visited upon a decadent and corrupt society, a modern version of Sodom and Gomorrah threatened with the viral equivalent of "fire and brimstone," which prayer, contrition, and repentance may serve to mitigate.

I have nothing against prayer if it leads to introspection, humility, and personal strength to withstand the trials that afflict us and others, but prayer must be accompanied and supplemented by benign, determined, and virtuous action. The only way to find safety in Zoar (Genesis 19: 22-23) is through profound social and cultural change to overcome our moral decay. Our society indiscriminately slaughters its unborn. Such a society cannot find favor in the eyes of the Lord; consequently, the vast and lucrative abortion industry that thrives in the nation needs to be ended. Those seeking abortions should be subject to counseling and to medical intervention only in cases that are critically pressing.

Moreover, we should pass legislation to monitor and curtail insider trading and general rapacity that passes for congressional business as usual in which government officials on salary emerge as millionaires. Schools and universities that infect the minds of the young with false doctrine should be defunded and depoliticized. Similarly, an almost universally lying media guilty of violating professional standards codified in the Global Charter of Ethics should be arraigned before the courts. Much needs to be done to set the nation on a right, honorable, and constitutional path, difficult or improbable or unrealistic as the task may prove. Indeed, serious work would have to be done if we wish to keep the Republic, as Benjamin Franklin warned. This is the most effective form of prayer.

The 17th-century poet and Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral John Donne wrote a moving series of holy sonnets called, ironically in the present context, La Corona, a brilliant and complex "Heroic Crown," or Corona, extolling the virtues of faith, humility, and spiritual self-awareness. Faith is a "crown of glory, which doth flower always" and provokes "a strong sober thirst" for "miracles exceeding the powers of man." But faith does not solely imply surrender to the will of God and reliance on prayer and miracle; it requires a struggle against "envy…weak spirits [and] ambitious hate," a willingness to burn our "drossy clay" and to fight against "the worst" who reduce "self-life's infinity… to an inch."

In our more secular terms, faith implies a resolution to transcend our self-infatuated and worldly pursuit of power and wealth at the expense of decency, trust, honesty, and the teachings of morality. Unfortunately, as Donne puts it, "the worst are most" and—in the current situation—they are those who seek to profit from the calamity that harrows us by sowing panic and confusion, using the state of affairs to promote their ideological interests, and striving to score political points. "The worst," as William Butler Yeats writes echoing Donne's sentiment in another great poem The Second Coming, "are full of passionate intensity," a quality which the enemies of the civil order and of good political housekeeping command to their advancement.*

Whether or not the Coronavirus is a divine judgment on a degenerate society, I believe in the efficacy of common sense and pragmatic sobriety, in taking precautions, in refusing to panic, in rejecting the temptation of doom-and-gloom imaginings, in exercising, as scholar and historian Victor Davis Hanson informs us, what the Greeks called pronoia, "strategic foresight," in relying on medical innovation and standing by a responsible leadership that has a draconian cost-function decision to make where the stakes are existential, and in opposing in thought, word, and deed "the worst" who propagate fraud and deception among us.

More broadly, once the crisis passes, we must consider the necessity of decoupling from the sources of infection, restructuring the global trade, industrial, and diplomatic order to secure and strengthen our borders, and tackling the problem of profligate spending and runaway debt that augurs eventual societal collapse, which the spread of the pestilence has brought to public consciousness. This is how to fight the Coronavirus and its exploiters for advantage, an empirical reading of La Corona. And if this is how prayer may be understood, then I take up my station at the altar.

Harvey Weinstein’s attorney destroys a feminist interviewer

AVfM Video Source · 28 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Everybody Deserves the Right to Intact Genitals

AVfM Video Source · 28 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Covid-19: Fewer men in the dating pool – women most affected

Peter Wright · 29 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

As anyone not hiding under a rock should know, the coronavirus is carving its way through human populations and it is taking the lives of men in higher numbers than women. The coffins of men are lined up in rows before the furnaces, but little attention is paid to the true victims of that massacre – the women who watch on while grieving in silence.

Who will hear their voices?

This clearly is a grave situation for bevagina'd humans – the best humans – who are toiling on the front lines as the only ones truly capable of dispensing emotional labor, medical assistance to the elderly, and childcare — while men stand back and gaze in wonder at women's special skills and 'ways of knowing' during a peak emotional time.

As the recent headline reminds us, 'Women more stressed, burdened by coronavirus than men, poll finds. 5 ways to help change that.'

Thank goodness someone is trying to address women's grievances, along with the journalists already addressing same with thousands of moving articles underlining the horrific fact that women are most affected by, well, literally anything and everything. The article lists women's noble deeds, each deserving of serious chivalric response from the masses of unwashed Don Quixotes.

As the article says, women are the "most affected" by stress at this time, not men, and this prompts women to take more burdensome precautions than males. Moreover, unlike the case of men who feel nothing (or very little, lets be honest), such womanly stress makes women worry all the more. The article tells:

> Women are worried that they or someone in their family will get sick from the new novel coronavirus, known officially as COVID-19. They worry more about losing income and worry more about putting themselves at risk because they can't afford to stay home, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation (KFF), a non-profit organization focused on national health issues.

The bombshell revelation of women's hidden stress was unearthed by a KFF's 'self-reporting' poll for over 1,200 adults ages 18 and older in the U.S. that found women worry more than men which, for any thinking, compassionate person, indicates that most emotional support, resources, money and other compensations should be directed overwhelmingly to women.

While waiting for the necessary cash bonuses and other supports from governments, there are many things we as a society – and especially men – can do to alleviate women's worries. The article makes some preliminary suggestions, starting with how women can give themselves more self-love:

> 1. Give yourself five minutes to write down everything that is worrying you at the moment, Ali said. Next, look at your worries and see if you can pull from each one something that is in your control, something that you can manage.
>
> Then, acknowledge in each worry the things you cannot do anything about, i.e., not being able to control when schools will reopen or whether someone at the grocery store may have coronavirus."
>
> 2. Practice self-love in the form of deep breathing and mindfulness and gratitude practices.
>
> "These are things that don't take a lot of time and cost us nothing and even five minutes is better than not doing anything at all," Ali said. "Find those little times throughout the day to find your center so you can better help yourself therefore your partner and your children."
>
> 3. Find community in this time that you may be physically alone.

> "It's really important to recognize that social distancing is not social isolation," Ali said. "Even if you have individuals in your home with you, it could be helpful to reach out to siblings and friends and colleagues and make a connection."
>
> 4. Start where you are now and realize there is no one way to handle a pandemic, Rodsky said.
>
> "Understand that your home is going to look different than other homes and it doesn't have to look like others' homes," she said.

Importantly men, most of whom are spending most of their time in the shadows, and on the sidelines like voyeurs, are asked to step up to the plate and start supporting the pandemic's frontline worker sex:

> 5. Spend 20 minutes every night debriefing about how everything is going.
>
> "Sit down with your partner and say, "How are we doing? How's it going with us? How are we doing with homeschooling? Who's doing laundry tomorrow?'" she said. "Ask open-ended questions."
>
> Eve Rodsky, author of the book Fair Play, shows couples how to build a stronger marriage through sharing the workload at home. Eve Rodsky, author of the book Fair Play, shows couples how to build a stronger marriage through sharing the workload at home.
>
> Rodsky said asking open-ended questions and starting by explaining why something is important to you instead of just why something has to get done.
>
> "If you can focus on why it's important to you in your nightly check-in, it's the most important communication tool in a crisis," she said, noting that couples also need to agree that "all time is created equal," i.e., we all only have 24 hours in a day.
>
> If you don't have a partner, the nightly check-in is still a valuable tool to help you see what's going well, what's causing stress and what you can control versus letting go of.

Solid advice for men who are sitting around twiddling their thumbs clueless about how to help; in short, men are called to be emotional support persons who can sit patiently and listen to women talk about their feelings.

Its the least they can do.

While advice for women to focus more on themselves is increasingly urgent, the authors of the article, and indeed most mainstream press, have overlooked perhaps the most devastating price women will pay as a result of this pandemic: the reduction of men in the available dating pool.

In this, society draws a great big fat blank, and we all too quickly forget Hillary Clinton's sage advice that women are the primary victims of war – or in this case, pandemics.

Both collectively and individually, we need to pause and spare a thought for Becky who works in a lowly job at the local sandwich shop and who yearns for a husband who will provide the financial backbone of her dream for a better life. Or think of lonely Chloe, a feminist who works at the United Nations UNESCO department and who desires a man to support her in her endless emotional labors. These women, and millions more just like them are poised to find that the dating game will become more difficult as the numbers of available men are thinned by death — not to mention the competition between women for the remaining men is going to become far more catty and vicious.

Does anybody care that Becky will now have to face vicious relational aggression when simply seeking a date, or that Chloe will be more lonely than ever?

I doubt it. Such is the life of woman.

It seems that women have never mattered, and society will probably turn its back on women at the very moment Tinder begins to implode with infighting and the inevitable misuse of the 'report button' aimed at deplatforming competitor-women's dating profiles. The lack of sympathy for this potential situation is truly gut wrenching.

I live in hope that the next series of headlines to appear in mainstream media will be concerned with how Becky is going to fight the impending dating wars. Aside from that, its on us gents… or at least on those of us who are not yet deceased. We might begin by giving women more of whatever it is they are demanding, or alternatively, and perhaps more wisely, we could isolate our covid19-ridden bodies in the hope we can draw our final breaths in peace — away from the incessant ring of feminist whining.

On Point with Paul Elam (interview)

Peter Wright · 29 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A brief history of nagging

Peter Wright · 31 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I recently mentioned to a friend that feminist verbiage amounts to little more than organized female nagging — the endless attempt to shame & guilt men into serving women. Is it any wonder that feminist street placards emphasise "having a voice," "women speaking up," "not being silenced," and "speaking out"? These phrases are nothing more than euphemisms for the ear piercing, fingernails-on-blackboard nagging that women have never gone without. Sadly, the days of being able to deal with nagging by use the following device are long gone:

Scold's bridle – historical device providing the nagging woman with some therapeutic time out

So universal is the archetype of the nagging woman that I visited Amazon in the certainty that someone would have written a book titled "The History Of Female Nagging," but to my surprise found there was none.

I guess its like other universals such as 'everyone has a buttocks,' – so blatantly obvious that no book is necessary. That said, I still wanted to dig deeper into the topic and so decided to check an online etymology dictionary, which reads as follows:

> nag (v.)
> 1828, intransitive, "find fault constantly;" by 1840, intransitive, "annoy by continued scolding, pester with petty complaints," originally a dialectal word meaning "to gnaw" (1825, Halliwell), probably ultimately from a Scandinavian source (compare Old Norse gnaga "to complain," literally "to bite, gnaw," dialectal Swedish and Norwegian nagga "to gnaw"), from Proto-Germanic gnagan*, related to Old English gnagan "to gnaw" (see gnaw). As a noun, 1894, "act of nagging;" by 1925, "person who nags."
> Related: Nagged; nagger; nagging.[1]

What struck me here was the association of nagging with acts of biting and gnawing, which is exactly what feels like is happening to your soul when being nagged, as any man or child will confirm. In this respect it reminds of the mythical eagle gnawing at the liver of Prometheus, only to have it happen again the very next day in an endless round of torture.

Considering the longevity and ubiquity of female nagging, and considering also that gynocentrism and feminism are collective nagathons, I think the future looks bleak in terms of a breakthrough for men. Our modern world has successfully institutionalized nagging at the highest levels – from the United Nations to national governments, and all the way down to schools.

This leads to the disturbing definition of feminism as “Institutionalized female nagging.”

Let the naggers chew on that definition for a while.

Perhaps we can put a positive spin on it and say that the drip, drip, drip of female nagging, from bassinet to coffin, has a toughening effect on men, bringing out the best of stoic resistance and emotional control that men are famed for. At least when its not driving men to die early, or to suicide at four times the rate of women.

Having got the gist of what I already knew about nagging, I searched the internet a bit further and noticed the following blog article, which is relegated to Creative Commons. It digs a bit deeper into the topic, so I repost the following excerpts for your interest:

A brief history of nagging

The nagging wife is the universal villain of married life. From the earliest pages of human history there is perhaps no literature and folk tradition where the character of the nagging wife is not found widely. Along with archetypes of the sacrificing mother, forsaken lover, tragic hero and evil lord, the nagging wife will be found in all societies and cultures at all times in history. Even in today’s world, irrespective of the differences of race, wealth, religion, culture, language and social reform, the character of the nagging wife is universal. She keeps popping up in jokes, films, songs, novels and other cultural cultural creations.

Socrates, the famous Greek philosopher, is supposed to have had a nagging wife who drove him to spend his time in the city squares and gymnasia, much to the benefit of philosophy. The figure of the nagging wife finds mention in the Bible, (indirectly) in the Quran, and is a crucial moment in the story of the Ramayana. She is to be found in renassaince Italy, in medieval England, on the expanding border of America’s “wild west”, in the bedrooms of colonial India and in the sit-coms of post-modern Europe.

What is interesting about this figure of the nagging wife is that it is one of those few characters who transcend history. Like the sacrificing mother, the unrequited lover or the tragic hero, the nagging wife can be found in ancient, slave owning agricultural societies, in prosperous trading medieval ones and in post-industrial wastelands of contemporary West. What is it about the nagging wife which makes this character so universal and transcendental?

***

It is not only the wife who deploys this weapon of the weak. Children use it to excellent effect. In that context (parent – child) it is not generally called nagging but rather 'pestering'. It too emerges from a similar context of powerlessness of children within the family, where the only way for them to get their point across is to 'pester' their parents till they accept defeat. Today, the power of children to pester their parents into taking decisions is an important weapon in the arsenal of advertisers who use "pester-power" to sell everything from groceries to cars.

In the contemporary world, many families have moved out of the context under which nagging by wives exists. Women own property, often they are in positions of power and are effective decision makers. Nagging does not automatically end in these contexts, just like it does not automatically exist in all patriarchal families. Today nagging is not necessarily confined to the patriarchal family and has been, in a sense, freed from the context of the patriarchal family under which it originated and survived. It has become a cultural archetype which women (and men) absorb into their personalities in the process of socialisation. Where it exists outside the immediate context of the patriarchal family, it exists only as a weapon of offence and not as a survival skill of the weak wife and it "forges its own chains" for those who deploy it in inter-personal relations. The question arises, are we courageous enough to surrender this weapon? [2]

References:

[1] Nag, in Online Etymology Dictionary.
[2] Aniket Alam, A brief history of nagging, Creative Commons(2008)

See Also: The Henpecked Club

Replay: The Truth About Christina Hoff Sommers

AVfM Video Source · 31 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A video was recently circulated online of a 2018 speech by Christina Hoff-Sommers in which she denounces Paul Elam, and A Voice for Men, without providing any detailed rationale for her reaction. HoneyBadger Radio have just had an online discussion of the matter which you can listen to here.

The source of Sommers' angst? What ruffled her feathers so much? She was reacting to Paul Elam's 2016 video below — take a listen:

Chris Mackney's Nightmare Resurrected

Paul Elam · 1 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Back in July of 2014, AVFM published the tragic account of the life and death of Chris Mackney, a man who committed suicide after what he alleged was continuous psychological and legal abuse by his wife, Dina. We published Chris's suicide note in its entirety, which describes his nightmare in horrible detail.

Shortly thereafter we were contacted by legal counsel for Dina Mackney, informing us that she held the copyright to his suicide note (since he did not leave a will and the two were still married when he ended his life).

Trying to use Dina Mackney's alleged ownership of Chris's final words, we were threatened with legal action if we did not take down the post containing his suicide note. At the time there were a handful of other websites who were similarly threatened and who capitulated to the demands.

Naturally, we refused to assist them in silencing Chris Mackney forever and were prepared to engage legally but apparently Ms. Mackney's counsel thought better of the matter and we never heard from them again. The post in question remains up to this day, as it always will.

For the many of you who have seen The Red Pill Movie, you may have noticed in the end credits that the movie was dedicated to the memory of Chris Mackney and Earl Silverman, another victim of suicide who killed himself after being harassed and abused by advocates for women in the domestic violence industry.

I have long considered the matter sadly closed; another horrific story with a nightmare ending for a man targeted by a corrupt, misandrist system.

Just minutes ago, however, I was passed the following image from a Facebook friend who alleges that it comes from the same Dina Mackney who was married to Chris Mackney. The same Dina Mackney whom Chris alleged in his final words cruelly and abusively drove him to take his own life. My stomach turned as I read it.

And this, too, was passed my way.

I have no words to express how I feel after reading this. And it is probably better that I don't. Suffice it to say that the only thing I am grateful for at the moment is that I've been given a reason to stop and remember the life and death of Chris Mackney, and to assure readers of AVFM that we will never be silenced.

She got away with it: Why does society ignore abusive women?

AVfM Video Source · 1 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Italian “Pink Mafia” Doesn’t Care About COVID-19

Jakub G · 2 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A few hours ago, Mrs. Elena Bonetti, Italian Minister for the Family and Equal Opportunities, announced the distribution of 30 million euros (more than 30 million US Dollars) to what are called “anti-violence centers for women” (ACW). Founded as a result of the Istanbul Convention, they recruit only women to give help and support only to women — presumed victims of domestic violence by men. No help is given to male victims.

In Italy there are 360 ACWs spread all over the country, acting under the legal form of “associations,” that, in Italy, means: no need to publish balance sheets or financial statements despite the huge amount of public money they receive (between 80 and 100 million euros per year).

ACWs also release periodical reports on the number of accesses they record: usually numbers consistent with a war. Judging by their stories, thousands of women every month are abused by tyrant-husbands or jailor fiancés, as every man (their ideological presupposition) is by nature a stalker and/or a violent oppressor. Their figures can’t be verified or challenged. When asked, ACWs managers claim they can’t be verified for privacy reasons.

Elena Bonetti

Critics refer to them as a “State in the State.” They hold financial and political power, close connections with international bodies, the media and many Italian politicians. Their network has been nicknamed by the resistant men’s movement “Ro$a No$tra”, a nod to the more familiar mafia vernacular “cosa nostra”, but meaning something like “pink mafia”.

ACWs are openly accused of being financially greased mechanisms geared to push charges against men, especially in case of separation, like factories manufacturing false allegations. Official, verified numbers from the Italian Ministry of Justice seem to back up the criticisms. in the past ten years an average of 50.000 charges have been reported by women against men annually, with an average of 5.000 criminal convictions in the same period. This means 90% of charges ended up in nothing, most probably because false, specious or “silver bullet” accusations during a separation.

These enterprises will now receive 30 million euros from the Italian Government, while Italy is on its knees from the covid-19 pandemic. Thousands of people are dead and dying (80% of them men), hospitals with no personal protective equipment, families locked up in their houses with savings depleting, people severed from employment by companies, with an increase in suicide expected, and an economic recession that may hit the country very hard.

In this scenario the “pink mafia” has cried for an entire month about the torture of women locked up at home with their torturers. Media, politicians, opinion makers all chimed together in a choir that claimed that calls to ACWs had dropped 50% because women were trapped in close quarters with their abusers.

A long and hammering propaganda campaign spread everywhere against truth and logic. “Not a good sign” has been the mantra, a PR gimmick chanted whether calls to ACWs were decreasing, increasing or unchanged. “Not a good sign.” Never a good sign. And after the propaganda, of course, came the request: more money to face the emergency of women affected by the COVID-19 lockdown.

All of this is a gigantic lie started by Minister Elena Bonetti herself nearly one month ago. She penned the tune, the orchestra of pink business; hate men and grab political power. That's the miserable symphony.

A few hours ago the glorious ending, called by the minister again: COVID-19 emergency in Italy, with its real and countable dead, doesn't matter as much as the fabricated domestic violence emergency. This is how things work in a country where toxic, political feminism has been allowed to overflow.

♦

Source: the italian blog "Stalker sarai tu"

Covid19, Quarantine & the Feminist Regime

AVfM Video Source · 3 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Coronavirus: The United States of Misandry – RM#58

AVfM Video Source · 4 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Eternal Verities In A Time Of Change

Robert Franklin · 4 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

'Tis a season of change, a time of upheaval. It's an era in which everyday life has been turned upside down and things we thought of as givens now aren't. Do you need to go to the hardware store for a part for the leaky valve in the sink? You can't. Thought you had a stable job? You were wrong. Some things are known to be certain as a matter of cliché, but now even taxes won't be collected at the usual time. Death? That's another matter.

So in this time of crisis and uncertainty, where it seems nothing is predictable, it's "good" to know that at least one of life's eternal verities remains. I refer of course to sticking it to poor parents for child support (NBC News, 3/27/20). That, my friends, continues to be public policy, even now.

As we all know, the federal Treasury will soon be mailing out checks to individuals who reported under $75,000 in income on their tax returns last year. And pretty much all of those people will be getting them – except for those owing child support. So, for example, Sarah may be behind on repaying her student debt, but she needn't worry. She'll get her check in due course. So will Jason even though he owes the Internal Revenue Service a hefty amount in back income taxes. The government is empowered to collect those debts and could withhold Sarah's or Jason's check and credit the amount toward their indebtedness. But it won't do that. For them, the check's in the mail, and this time, it really is.

Not so Randall who's fallen behind on his child support. No, he gets nothing. Never mind that, if he got that check, he'd be better able to support his child. And never mind that the government's keeping it from him won't provide the child one penny more than she otherwise would have. None of those obvious facts matter. Like the system of child support enforcement, the federal government's action on stimulus payments is purely punitive. It assumes that non-custodial parents are able to pay what they've been ordered to, but don't out of spite, greed or whatever.

In sum, the stimulative effect of the checks is blunted, the lives of non-custodial parents are made worse and no child is benefited. Make sense?

And let's not forget that those who owe child support are, generally speaking, the poorest of the poor, i.e. the ones who most need and would most benefit from those checks. The Office of Child Support Enforcement has long told us that over 60% of those in arrears report incomes under $10,000 per year. Those are people to whom $1,200 is real money. But they won't get it, not because they don't need it and not because they don't care about their kids.

Overwhelmingly, those parents don't pay because they can't. And, since they don't even have the money to pay what they owe, they certainly don't have the money pay a lawyer to file for a downward modification of their support order. So their arrears go up and up and interest and fees only add to the burden that will never, never be lifted.

That's why the Department of Health and Human Services has for years reported that at least 40% of what's owed is completely uncollectable. It's a bad debt that any sensible business would have written off years or decades ago.

But not the federal or state governments. They go right along pretending that, if they keep hammering on it long enough, that stone really will produce blood. It's a fool's game that the politicians are playing solely because they don't have the courage to admit the truth. Being tough on "deadbeat dads" remains a ballot-box winner, so common sense and decency must be sacrificed.

And the poorest of the poor, the real hard cases of our society pay the bill so our elected officials can spend five minutes preening for the cameras.

Come to think of it, isn't that another of those eternal verities? Yes, I believe it is.

Amber Heard & Johnny Depp (part 1/3)

AVfM Video Source · 4 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Are women more important than men? ManWomanMyth

Peter Wright · 4 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Row Ad, known from his legendary youtube series entitled ManWomanMyth, has recently re emerged from a serious injury and is again picking up the ball on gender issues. Due to experiencing severe ongoing memory loss from his injury, he is exploring some of the fundamental questions of today's gender politics from the beginning, starting with the question of "Is gynocentrism the default setting of humans?" He invites our responses.

Please subscribe to his channel and feel free to offer support as he begins to rebuild both himself, and his new channel.

Amber Heard & Johnny Depp (part 2/3)

AVfM Video Source · 5 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Amber Heard & Johnny Depp (part 3/3)

AVfM Video Source · 6 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam of A Voice For Men Returns to Dad Talk Today

AVfM Video Source · 9 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A Tragic Suicide in Bangladesh

A Voice For Men · 10 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: The following is a suicide note left by a man in Bangladesh named Shamim Sultan. He took his own life after an acrimonious divorce. His note was posted on Facebook and went viral. We bring this to you with thanks to Dr. Rakib Hasan, who translated the note from Bengali to English. RIP Shamim. PE

Shamim Sultan

What is the point of having parents, sister, brother – in – law, uncle aunts, if they can't help me when I needed them the most? No one stood by me in my time of crisis. No one asked me how I was doing, or they didn't try to understand and solve my problem. My love is useless to my parents' ego, anger and arrogance.

I have few questions to the people of my neighborhood. You consider your ego is superior to my happiness? I had an arranged marriage but why so much problem after marriage? You guys created problems but never tried to mitigate them because it will hurt your ego. As a father you can't do this to your son at this time and age.

I want to say something to my in-laws. The financial conditions of a person can't remain same all the time. At some point, I used to carry USD 4500 worth of gadgets in my backpack. You also have a son who is looking for a job but cannot manage one because it is not easy nowadays.

I got married on October 22, 2017. That time I had good income that's why you said yes to marriage in such a short notice but when my financial condition worsened, I became a villain. All you want is money, not a son-in-law.

For Eshita's (my wife) job I rented house in a separate city. You might think only Eshita contributed to the family but that is not true. Nevertheless, my family was running smoothly but my mother-in-law used to interfere a lot. I always helped Eshita is household chores, washed clothes, but you left me.

Before marriage my in-laws used to tell Eshita she was lucky to have me but when the divorce was finalized everyone was saying I was an asshole.

Now, Eshita, I have something to tell you. I never had a relationship before marriage, so I loved you with all my heart. You said I was careless but all I cared was for you. I always tried to make you happy. Your family, relatives stood beside you at time of divorce but no one cared for you after the divorce. I did. I even brought you a dress, sent money, took you to job interviews with my bike after divorce. I can not tolerate this anymore, all I wanted someone to be by my side, but I am alone.

If I owe anyone money, please forgive me. Everyone be happy in your life. I pray, Eshita, that you find a person that you always wanted and be happy with him.

The Canadian Way of Dealing with a Pandemic: Ineffective, Clueless, and Dishonest

David Solway · 11 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The only thing certain about the etiology of the COVID-19 pandemic is that it originated in and spread from China. Whether the local origin of the disease was a wet market in Wuhan specializing in bat soup or a Chinese lab with inadequate safety protocols is immaterial. The culprit in the lethal melodrama that is being played out around the globe is China.

Yet, if we are to believe many of our politicians and journalists, the good guy working to mitigate the effects of COVID-19 is—you guessed it—China. Some self-serving politicians in the U.S. would like to refer President Trump to the International Court of Justice in the Hague for crimes against humanity for his handling of the crisis—Ohio State Representative Tavia Galonski apparently can't stomach Trump's promotion of hydroxychloroquine, which ironically has already saved the life of fellow Democrat Karen Whitsett. A reporter for Phoenix TV tried to put Trump in a bad light by asking whether he was cooperating with China, in her estimation obviously the heroic partner in the struggle. It turns out that Phoenix TV has intimate ties to Communist China and is linked with the PRC's Ministry of State Security. Joe Biden is a big fan of Communist China and has profited from his family's business relations with the regime. Trump is beset by those who would like to see him fail in his ongoing effort to find a way between averting economic collapse and maintaining public health. Nonetheless, Americans can remain confident that a responsible president, for all the trials and confusions he must contend with, has their wellbeing at heart and labors tirelessly to provide a solution to the current disaster.

Canada, not so much. The country's dilettante leader, who has no viable answer to the crisis, is not so embattled. The lying press, luxuriating in the prime minister's $600-million bribe, is almost universally on his side, and his inept and intellectually challenged ministers are ritually lionized. 600 mil clearly helps you get your priorities straight. The sheer amateurism of this government is evident in its policy initiatives.

Some of these decisions defy belief. Shades of the famous Tennessee Ernie Ford song, Canada sent sixteen tons of PPE (personal protective equipment) to China while undergoing shortages of much-needed supplies, such as masks, goggles, gloves, and appropriate clothing, in the fight against the virus. University of Ottawa epidemiologist Amir Attaran was surprised to learn of this supernumerary gift. “It was absolutely certain in early February that we would need this equipment,” he said. “This decision went beyond altruism into high negligence and incompetence because Canada did not, and does not, have surplus equipment to spare.” Canada, as was to be expected, has no emergency management agency in place and no way of dealing with the export restrictions of needed medical supplies adopted by countries around the world.

Theresa Tam is Canada’s Chief Public Health Officer, appointed to the office by Prime Minister Justin Trudeau on June 26, 2017. According to her resumé, she is “a physician with expertise in immunization, infectious disease, emergency preparedness and global health security,” and is chiefly responsible for the coast-to-coast lockdown of the country. A daily presence on national TV, Tam has become the face of the anti-COVID task force and the regulations intended to check the spread of the disease. But she remains something of an enigma.

Writing in The Council of European Canadians newsletter, an online site which has reaped the displeasure and vicious slander of Canada’s progressivist “social justice” warriors and multiculti vigilantes, Kidist Paulos Asrat asks, “Who is this woman now in charge of providing the ‘chief’ medical information concerning Canada’s lockdown? Where did she come from?” His research has produced little information of value. “There is very little available on her biography,” he continues, “very little personal (and even professional) information on Tam,” including her date of birth, place of birth (other than ‘raised in Hong Kong’) and the dates of her degrees. Indeed, the listings of her theses, dissertation, and alumni profiles seem to be missing, though Asrat has searched the University of British Columbia and the University of Alberta websites where such data should be available.

What do we know about Tam? We know that Tam is a feminist who attended the 2019 Women Deliver conference in Vancouver, whose mandate is promoting “gender equality and the health, rights and wellbeing of girls and women.” As for the health, rights, and wellbeing of men and boys, nary a hint, which is why she seems to have expressed no interest in the fact that men are more likely to be infected by COVID-19 and twice as likely to die from it. We know that she is intimately associated with the World Health Organization, significantly funded by China, that initially downplayed the scope of the disease, and whose Director-General Tedros Adhanon Ghebreyesus is a Marxist and a loyal defender of China, “uncritically repeating information from the Chinese authorities.” A petition is now circulating calling for his resignation.

Tam has warned against stigmatizing Chinese people, though it is far from clear that such a warning was necessary. Canada’s largest Chinese population is located in Vancouver, where I make my home, and I have not seen the slightest instance, whether in the media or the public, of prejudice or opprobrium. “Racism, discrimination and stigmatizing language,” she stated, “are unacceptable and very hurtful. These actions create a divide of Us Vs Them. Canada is a country built on the deep-rooted values of respect, diversity and inclusion.”

This is merely more of the usual virtue-signaling and self-promoting boilerplate beloved of career politicians of the woke variety. The last thing we need during a health crisis is a lecture on race relations and feel-good multiculti.

Spencer Fernando, whom I regard, along with the redoubtable Rex Murphy, as one of the vanishingly few reliable journalists in this country, pretty much has the goods on Tam. “The facts are undeniable,” he writes. “Tam was late at every step, focused on political correctness and lecturing when the virus could have been stopped, and seemed less informed of the risk than the general public and the MPs who were asking her questions.”

“Right now,” she said at a critical juncture, “the cases are in China. Very few are exported… the risk is low in Canada.” The cases did not stay in China but swept the world, including Canada. Moreover, we were assured that “WHO does not recommend travel bans” and that we need not worry about asymptomatic transmission. Wrong on every count. Her record is deplorable and her sympathies debatable.

Tam is a typical Trudeau appointee: a feminist, a self-aggrandizing special pleader, and a gross incompetent in the office she is expected to manage. There are others like her in the Trudeau cabinet, for example, the lamentable Deputy Prime Minister Chrystia Freeland who nearly deep-sixed our NAFTA treaty talks with Donald Trump and has a tendency to tear up at critical moments, though as former NDP Premier Bob Rae tweeted in Freeland's patronizing defense, "Crying is not a sign of weakness, it is a natural emotional response to a lot of different situations"; and the equally hapless Minister of Health, cultural anthropologist (!) Patti Hajdu with limited experience in medicine, repeatedly said, like Tam, that the risk of infection from the virus "is low," but now projects that up to 70% of Canadians may be infected. Despite being stroked by a shameless love article in The Globe and Mail, Hajdu's performance is frankly pathetic. And like both Tam and their boss, she seems to have a soft spot for China, insisting that "there's no indication that the data that came out of China in terms of their infection rate and their death rate was falsified in any way." All these gender quota mermaids are swimming fathoms beyond their depth and I suspect their fealty is compromised.

Obviously, we should not be giving away our medical equipment and then hoping to receive apposite supplies from foreign self-interested nations. As Rex Murphy argues in a brilliant column for the National Post, "Take care first of your own citizens, which means limiting the contingencies of external dependence." Our resources should be reserved for our own security if we are to protect ourselves "against pandemics and other unknown future shocks." The argument applies across the board to every economic, industrial, agricultural, and medical sector of the country. Murphy points out that it is the salt-of-the-earth Canadians—hard-pressed farmers, unemployed oil workers, cross-country truckers, those who do not tend to vote for a progressivist Liberal Party—who have been hamstrung by their government and forced to pay a crippling carbon tax while struggling to survive a decimating pandemic. They are, unfortunately, outnumbered by the many who have been brainwashed by a compliant media establishment and who elect parasitical governments that fritter away the nation's resources and mismanage the nation's business and security needs, including the response to national emergencies.

Meanwhile, at 7 o'clock every evening these brainwashed Canadians step out on their balconies and doorways and bang pots and pans in solidarity with the nurses—though not with the preponderantly male doctors, ambulance drivers, orderlies, and janitors who, being men, are apparently expendable, as good feminist doctrine holds. It is rather sobering to reflect that we have largely become a nation of feminist-inclined pot bangers, as if noisy displays of carefully targeted goodwill were an effective way of dealing with the current pandemic.

You offload 16 tons and what do you get? A nation that owes its soul to the company store.

David Solway's latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019

They let you do it!

Mark Dent · 11 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

We all recall the day the Access Hollywood tape was released by Trump's opponents. They thought it would signal the end of his run for the Presidency and so did I.

> "When you're a star they let you do it. You do anything. Grab them by the pussy. You can do anything."

The initial shock of hearing a presidential candidate speaking in such an uncouth manner and the fact that many in the media were waiting to pounce on Trump for the merest misstep seemingly ensured a feeding frenzy and the inevitable end of Donald Trump.

When I had some time to contemplate his words and look at what he actually said rather than what the breathless commentators were telling us he said, I began to reconsider my opinion on his demise.

Trump brags about sexual assault they screamed!

Trump is a disgusting misogynist.

Trump hates women.

But none of this was true.

By all means question the man's morality. He has no problem with attempting to bed married women. But then be consistent and brand the most revered presidents of yore sexual abusers of women. JFK, Bill Clinton and I've no doubt many more. And of course, the entertainment industry which led the lynch mob when this tape was released are the biggest demographic of adulterers on the planet.

But let's push judging a man's morality to one side and focus on what Trump actually said.

"When you're a star they let you do it. You do anything. Grab them by the pussy. You can do anything."

One word. Three little letters.

This is what every political commentator on the left and many on the right conveniently ignored or omitted from their hysterical rants and self-righteous condemnations.

The more I reflected on Trump's words the more I became convinced that they said very little about Trump that we didn't already know. They did however reveal something about women that most journalists and media commentators refuse to acknowledge or address.

If Donald Trump had been Mr. Trump, the high school janitor, rather than a multi billionaire celebrity, not one of the many women who let him grab them by the pussy, would have allowed Donald the janitor to place an uninvited finger on their arm let alone their genitals.

He would be Trump the dirty old man.

Trump the stinky breathed groper.

Trump the desperate old codger.

But be assured-he would not be allowed access to any woman's body other than his wife's, if she was in the mood.

What does that say about women?

It says some women (maybe a lot of women) will use their sexual desirability to gain access to a man's fame, wealth or power.

That is the simple truth borne out by countless historical and contemporary examples. The recent Harvey Weinstein circus is a perfect example of this phenomenon. Weinstein certainly used his wealth and power to coerce women into accommodating his sexual desires. He may well have raped or assaulted some of them and for that he should be condemned. But many of those women used their sexual desirability or simply agreed to accommodate his requests/demands in order to gain access to his power. Many benefited from it in just the manner they hoped they would.

Trump's statement should shame any rational female who reads it.

When I think about the tidal wave of outrage, horror, disgust and shock (be it feigned or genuine) which poured forth after Trump's comment was released to the public, all of it directed at the man who spoke it, one must wonder about the intelligence or integrity of journalists or any one with a public platform.

Even those who were Trump supporters hedged their bets and distanced themselves from him. His own advisers told him to dismiss it as locker room talk and offer some kind of an apology.

I would have told all of them to get stuffed.

I would have stated emphatically that I didn't assault anyone. All I did, was take advantage of the craven, power hungry, gold digging females who gravitate to any man they consider to be rich, famous, or both. It was a fair exchange. I wanted some sexual pleasure. They wanted me to spend money on them and hoped it would grow into something beyond a one-night stand.

It reminds me of the old Winston Churchill joke.

At a dinner party Churchill says to his dinner companion, "Madam, would you sleep with me for five million pounds?"

The woman responds, "My goodness, Mr. Churchill. I suppose I would."

Churchill replies, "Would you sleep with me for five pounds?"

She answers, "Mr. Churchill, what kind of woman do you think I am?"

Churchill answers, "Madam, we've already established that. Now we are haggling about the price."

Why do I resurrect this much discussed incident?

There is a man here in Australia who has tried to emulate the legendary Hugh Hefner's lifestyle. He has been paying women to live with him and drape themselves all over him for years. His name is Travis "The Candyman" Beynon and recently he drew the wrath of a number of women, including a politician.

Mr. Beynon was looking for more women to live in his mansion and subsequently posted an advertisement describing the type of women he was looking for and what their job description entailed.

The fact that he posted his advertisement on International Women's Day was surely a simple coincidence.

HOW YOU CAN BE THE CANDYMAN'S NEXT GIRLFRIEND

MUST BE:

- Attractive
- Fun
- Bubbly
- Outgoing
- Spontaneous, adventurous
- 100% confidential
- Totally loyal
- Extremely trustworthy

- Looking for a genuine relationship
- Willing to help around the mansion
- Happy to move into the mansion full time
- Keep hair, nails, and figure maintained

DEAL BREAKERS:

- Being in a relationship
- Having a relationship with anyone else whilst living at the mansion

PERKS:

- Designer clothing and accessories
- Fine dining
- Exclusive private parties
- 5-star travel around the world
- Allowance of $100 to $500 a week

The ad stipulated that women must be, and stay, attractive, live with his other girlfriends, accompany the Candyman to social events and help out around the mansion.

> Gold Coast-based Palaszczuk Government MP and assistant Tourism Minister Meaghan Scanlon slammed the ad, saying it was 'outrageous that in the 21st Century, women should be purchased and treated as property'.
>
> Mr Beynon told The Sunday Mail that feminists like Ms. Scanlon were trying to tell other women how to live their lives.
>
> "The last thing you want to do is tell a strong, independent woman what they should and shouldn't do because they just rebel," he said.
>
> "Obviously, with my mansion life, the philosophy I live by is freedom of choice and freedom of expression."
>
> Mr Beynon said he loved women but also respected them.
>
> "I'm a big supporter of strong independent women," he said.
>
> "My mum and grandmother were both matriarchs and I've always been around strong women. Two of my daughters are very strong girls."

Now we can take Travis at his word or call him a tacky, eccentric narcissist.

What or who he actually may be is entirely irrelevant to the fundamental question being ignored (once again) by all those who have commented on or attacked Beynon.

At no point have any of the many women who have agreed to live with him or have his business logo tattooed on their bodies been forced to do so against their will.

At no point has he deliberately mislead any potential applicant as to how he expects them to behave or how much importance he places upon their physical appearance.

The choice was every woman's to consider and make.

Ms. Scanlon accuses Beynon of purchasing the women and treating them as property. If a man makes a monetary offer to a woman in exchange for a particular service and she agrees why is this not simply viewed as a business transaction? It is the women who are seeking financial and material gain from the relationship.

When a man enters a brothel hasn't he been coerced by the alluring advertisement in the newspaper and isn't his powerful sexual libido being abused and manipulated by the women who profit by each visit?

Yet it is the man who is always viewed as the person with all of the power and privilege in this transaction. The woman, no matter how willing or manipulative she may be, is always viewed as the oppressed victim. Even as she places wads of cash into her purse.

Here in Australia, this Thai massage parlour worker sums up the reality for many prostitutes:

> Joy, whose name has been changed for hide her identity, started out as a legitimate masseuse but found the temptation for extra money was too strong. She can now make up to $1700 cash a week, for five days of work.
>
> "The first time I offered a 'handjob', I was scared and panicked because I had never done it before. I asked myself 'why do I have to do this?' But at the same time, I told myself, 'it's OK, for money, for money'," she told the program.
>
> Joy, who offers handjobs for as little as $20, said "full service" can generally cost $150 but it's up to the worker to negotiate the price.
>
> She also said most people do the job "of their own free will" but not out of want, they do it for the money.

Not every prostitute is powerful. Not every prostitute is living the good life. We know some women are abused and taken advantage of in the seedy world of transactional sex, but many men are also chewed up and spat out by the same process and treated like sleazy criminals simply because they are seeking sexual release in an otherwise lonely, sexless existence.

Men are always the autonomous agent. Regardless of the circumstances-men are always to blame whether they are the seducer or the seduced.

Women are always the victim, even when it is their raw avarice and narcissism which is the primary reason for their willingness to engage with this man or any other.

The two comments below are in response to an article by Christine Jackman. It was reasonably balanced and she made some fair points.

But it is these comments which I think are representative of the reaction so many people have to such stories. Women will always be the innocent, hapless victims of male treachery and lechery. They have no role in the mess they create by their own choices. They were coerced, manipulated and lured into a trap. Blameless.

Clare De Mayo

Thank you. Your welcomed response is quite mild given the realities that these women will most certainly face, but at least you have blown away the smoke and mirrors, and supposed glamour and made people acknowledge the true reality of the situation. It is pathetic that men like this can think they are so desirable that they can effectively control another human being for their own pleasure. And people say we no longer need feminism!

Greg Waters

What a vulgar and disgusting man!
I don't see much mainstream media, so I've honestly never heard of him.
It's an indictment on us men and there seriously should be laws to never allow such things in our society!
I'm not a religious zealot, nor seriously left or right wing. But I have three children and to have this going on in THEIR WORLD makes me sick to the stomach!!!

Greg doesn't view the plethora of women willing to have their backsides branded and their lives micro managed by a married man in the hope that they can wear designer clothes, attend exclusive parties and travel the world as an indictment on women and it certainly doesn't make him sick to his stomach.

He is clearly a moral man with high standards.

Courage

Mark Dent · 13 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

> I've been a so-called coward and a so-called hero and there's not the thickness of a sheet of paper between them. Maybe cowards and heroes are just ordinary men who, for a split second, do something out of the ordinary. That's all.
>
> Joseph Conrad- Lord Jim

My brother Stu and I have always been fascinated and obsessed by the concept of courage. On returning from a trip to South Africa, Stu informed me he had a special gift for me which was delayed due to it being placed in quarantine in Perth. Was it a wild beast? No. It was a Zulu shield hand crafted by a Zulu and made from raw cowhide. It hangs on my wall to this day-a glorious symbol of so much. Courage, brotherhood, childhood memories and passion.

From a very young age, perhaps after our dad had taken us to the Rivoli Theatre in Camberwell to see the classic film, Zulu, we were forever after entranced by stories of brave warriors and great battles.

We were not unique in this passion. Most young boys were preoccupied with fighting bloody wars in the backyards and streets of our neighbourhood. We used sticks for guns until we were given toy guns at Christmas. It was wonderful fun to pretend to be shot and fall in the most dramatic and spectacular fashion.

We were each given a box of toy soldiers when quite young one Christmas. The two armies of the American revolution. Stu received the box of redcoats and I the American blue coats.

Oh, the joy those soldiers brought into our lives. They were quality toys soldiers too. Each plastic warrior had a head that swiveled, a rifle or sword which could be removed from their hands and removable hats. Each soldier had clearly visible features on their face.

The battles in the loungeroom or hallway of our home were respectfully avoided by the rest of the family. They would tip toe around our troops as they stood in their lines, preparing to march into hellfire. Mum would leave our chosen battlefield room as the last to be vacuumed.

This passion for all things battle- related did not diminish as we grew. My dad noted that I in particular, loved to hear any stories of great deeds and heroics from the past and he relished the opportunity to share the many facts he knew with his besotted son.

Stu was more a man of action than me. He got involved in numerous fights as he went through his teenage years. I had a few scuffles and got punched up on a couple of occasions by a nemesis named Ross. But I preferred to lose myself in a good history book or novel while Stu was out partying and drinking.

Our bond remained during these years. We still talked about incidents of bravery we had witnessed or read about. It may have been a tale of a mate standing up to a group of thugs or the latest insight I had gained into what really took place at the Battle of Waterloo or during Hannibal's brilliant crushing defeat of the Romans at Cannae.

We admired courage on the footy field, whether it be the bravery of fellow teammates in our local competition or the inspirational deeds of our heroes at our beloved Collingwood Football Club.

Courage was an underlying theme which connected so many of the passions we indulged.

Don't misunderstand. I was the furthest thing from a bold, reckless boy you could imagine. I never rode a bike; I became anxious when serving as an altar boy and used to dread the weekly mass at which I had to serve. I was anxious when attending gymnastic classes, tennis lessons and secondary school. I lived in dread of the leather straps our Christian brothers kept on their person in case the need for a boy to receive six of the best arose.

When I was old enough to get my driver's license, I was a mess on the day of my test. I scraped in and I still remember my hands were shaking so much I could barely sign the form they handed me to complete the process.

I was fascinated by courage. I never said I employed it on a regular basis. But this fascination demands some kind of examination as it has been an ever-present thread in the tapestry of my life.

The quote I used in the introduction to this piece certainly rings true. I think each one of us could recall a day where we acted with great courage and another where we failed to stand up when a situation demanded we do just that. We always have to live with the consequences.

I write this as a man and my entire focus will be on men.

There are countless women who have displayed the most stunning bravery throughout history. That is a given. But society does not expect or demand such behavior from women.

A woman who fails to show courage in a moment where it is required does not tarnish her reputation or status.

A woman who screams or cries in the face of danger is not mocked or denigrated.

A woman who fails to protect her husband is not reviled.

Men, whether they are consciously aware of it or not, live each day with the certain knowledge that if the proverbial shit were to hit the fan at a time when they happened to be in the vicinity, then action of some kind is the minimum requirement.

A savage, rabid bull terrier breaks free from its owner's grasp and comes bounding toward the little girl in the park.

A group of loud, aggressive, intoxicated youths abuse your fiancé as you walk past them on a street corner.

A fire breaks out in a packed picture theatre.

A lone gunman walks into the local café and starts shooting.

A swimmer waves frantically about fifty metres from the shore- he is in trouble.

In every scenario, a man would feel an enormous pressure to do something to either protect or save the threatened individuals. The alternative for a man is almost more frightening than the dangerous scenario they are facing.

And let us make no mistake. I am a very empathetic and compassionate person, yet, whether it be right or wrong, I would most definitely judge a man who failed to respond and at least attempt to react to the imminent threat in any of these situations.

Perhaps not so quick to judge when a man is unarmed and faced with a rampaging gunman!

I cannot disentangle myself from the rest of my masculine brethren and pretend I would not feel some level of disdain for a man who failed to risk himself in the service of another-particularly if that other was a weak, vulnerable person.

It might be a feeling I try hard to ignore or push away, but it would be there.

I must remind myself that we cannot control how we feel in the immediate aftermath of any incident or confrontation.

When my son played football, I desperately hoped he would be a courageous footballer. Nothing made my body flood with pride more than when he risked his physical safety in order to win the football or help out a teammate. I can say that my son was an incredibly brave player.

There is a photo I love which shows my courageous son running hard into an oncoming collision in order to mark (catch) the football. He didn't flinch. The opponent coming in the other direction could have put him in hospital had he arrived a split second earlier. My son marked the ball, ran on and kicked a goal. I had tears in my eyes and goosebumps erupted all over my body.

Supporters called out their approval and recognition of his brave action.

There is text written over the photo of the words his coach spoke after Ricky announced his retirement due to his multiple head concussions. “Tough as nails” was how he described my son. Again, I felt that deep glow of pride.

Would I have loved my son any less if he had been a timid footballer? Absolutely not. Would I have felt ashamed if he had jumped out of the way whenever a physical confrontation loomed?

Yes.

I don’t think any dad would feel any differently. As Americans like to say:

“It is what it is.”

I would feel ashamed of my shame. But as I said, I cannot control my gut reaction to anything I experience, and I know it would have grieved me to think others thought my son was a soft footballer.

I have written about a moment of weakness in which I pulled out of a contest when I was a young man and how it devastated me when I realized my coach had not missed my shameful decision to avoid a fierce collision rather than get buried in the muddy turf.But there were also days when I played with great courage. That is why Conrad’s quote from Lord Jim resonates so deeply with me.

After one particular game which my dad had attended, he went home as soon as the final siren sounded so I didn’t see him until much later that same night. I was sitting on the loungeroom floor watching tv when he walked past me, reached down and ruffled my hair, saying:

“You’re a gutsy little fella!”

He then continued to walk on and left the loungeroom. That moment took all of five seconds. I am still talking about it forty years later, feeding off the nourishment and sustenance I absorbed knowing my dad was proud of me.

There is of course another kind of courage which is just as important and inspiring. Moral courage seems to be in rare supply these days. The willingness to take a stand against the mob. To swim against the tide. To speak unpalatable truths. To risk your livelihood in your quest to live with your conscience.

Dad made sure I was just as inspired by moral courage as I was by physical bravery.

The opposite of courage is not cowardice, it is conformity. Even a dead fish can go with the flow.

Courage matters.

The brilliant author and playwright, Oscar Wilde was sentenced to two years hard labor for the crime of sodomy in 1895. Wilde suffered terribly, for a man who was accustomed to the soft opulent life of a successful writer, the brutal regime in prison nearly killed him.

He wrote along letter, titled De Profundis during this time. It contains a passage which has always touched me deeply and has been a source of inspiration and a constant reminder to always stand by my friends, especially when they have been shunned, shamed or branded as being less than desirable company due to a change in fortune or circumstances.

When Wilde was condemned the general public reviled him. Whenever he was dragged out into the public spotlight, as occurred when being transported via a train at Clapham Junction Station, handcuffed to a policeman, the crowd recognized him and "started shouting and spitting on him."

On another occasion when being led from court in handcuffs through a large angry mob he recalled:

When I was brought down from my prison to the Court of Bankruptcy, between two policemen, – waited in the long dreary corridor that, before the whole crowd, whom an action so sweet and simple hushed into silence, he might gravely raise his hat to me, as, handcuffed and with bowed head, I passed him by. Men have gone to heaven for smaller things than that.

Wilde's dear friend, Robbie Ross, had stepped out from the crowd and raised his hat to his manacled friend as a show of love, loyalty and respect.

What impact did this small, yet courageous and powerful gesture have upon Wilde?

It was in this spirit, and with this mode of love, that the saints knelt down to wash the feet of the poor, or stooped to kiss the leper on the cheek. I have never said one single word to him about what he did. I do not know to the present moment whether he is aware that I was even conscious of his action. It is not a thing for which one can render formal thanks in formal words. I store it in the treasure-house of my heart. I keep it there as a secret debt that I am glad to think I can never possibly repay. It is embalmed and kept sweet by the myrrh and cassia of many tears. When wisdom has been profitless to me, philosophy barren, and the proverbs and phrases of those who have sought to give me consolation as dust and ashes in my mouth, the memory of that little, lovely, silent act of love has unsealed for me all the wells of pity: made the desert blossom like a rose, and brought me out of the bitterness of lonely exile into harmony with the wounded, broken, and great heart of the world.

Moral courage changes lives just as surely as physical courage can save them.

My brother, Stu died early last year. That Conrad quote at the start of my article was used on the front cover of his funeral booklet at his request. No-I am not going to regale you with a story of his brave fight with cancer. He was no braver and no less fearful than most people who face this disease.

But Stu had a raw physical courage which I do want to acknowledge and memorialize. We used to work out in his garage simply to keep in shape as the years began to take their toll. We loved to compete and "trash talk" each other as we did it.

One evening Stu announced he was going to fight in the Masters Games that were to take place in a few months' time. Stu had boxed for a short time as a young man but work commitments had meant he couldn't devote himself to the sport in the way he wanted to. At the age of 55 he was going to remedy the sense that he had unfinished business.

I watched him train relentlessly. The sparring sessions with the Australian Middleweight champion, Tej Singh, were more brutal than anything he faced in the Master's tournament.

I saw him before his fights. I saw the fear in his eyes and felt sick at the thought of having to endure those long hours before stepping into a ring to fight a man you do not know in front of a crowd of mostly strangers. That was when I felt most in awe of his courage. He looked sick and distracted. But he walked to the ring and he fought and he won.

On the day of his fight to decide the Victorian Masters Champion, my wife and I were watching him as he sat and waited to be called to the centre ring. He looked tired, washed out and nervous. Only now can we look back knowing he was already fighting with a cancer ridden body.

Well, Stu won the state title. He wanted to go on and fight in the Nationals but cancer put an end to that.

You'd be happy to know that Stu was an avid anti-feminist and loved nothing more than to get on Facebook and fight the good fight with them. He was every bit as passionate as me when it came to defending men and demanding they be given the same compassion and consideration as women. Like any man brave or silly enough to speak up on behalf of men, he won himself plenty of enemies in that fetid swamp.

A week before he died, Stu asked me to include a clip from Zulu in his funeral service. I thought I had misheard him.

"How exactly will I manage that?" I asked him.

"You'll find a way. Tell them I want it because it's all about courage in the face of overwhelming odds. Tell them to crank up the volume. Everyone will get goosebumps."

Well-I found a way and that clip was shown on a giant screen on the stage at the Karralyka theatre.

I miss my beautiful, crazy, tough brother. Did I tell you he cried when he watched old musicals like Carousel and Brigadoon? He was a talented singer and musician and wrote and sang a song he dedicated to me after I lost my leg and we could no longer run together. He was so much more than a macho man. His three adoring daughters and wife would attest to that.

So, I continue to read military history books. I read some passages over and over again. I am currently reading an incredible book on the Anglo/Zulu War of 1879. There are journal entries by soldiers who describe the hand to hand combat in details rarely used in the Victorian era of stiff upper lips and the silent treatment.

A dear American friend of mine who was conscientious objector during the Vietnam War asked me in a despairing tone one night:

“Why are so many of your heroes military men?”

I knew why.

I want to observe men in the moments where death is a breath or heartbeat away. What does friendship mean to them in that moment? What do the values they claim to live by and cherish amount to in that crucible?

And of course, the biggest question is for myself.

What would I do? How would I behave? Could I remain true to all I hold dear when I am safely tucked into my bed or enjoying the company of dear friends?

I felt tears well in my eyes as I read a passage from my book on the Zulu Wars.

Twenty-five thousand Zulus swarmed over a camp of fifteen hundred British soldiers and native contingents at Isandlwana. When the end was near, small groups of red coats clustered together in order to better defend their position but also for the comfort of standing shoulder to shoulder with their mates.

One recalls his officer, a young man himself in his twenties, calmly guiding them:

“Keep together boys, Keep steady.”

A brutal death is moments away, yet the man faces his annihilation with grace and composure and calms those who face the same brutal end. How can I not be drawn to such literature?

The courage of the Zulus was no less astonishing.

One man who wrote of his experiences in the heat of battle with the Zulus at Isandlwana was honest enough to say that as he rode for his life, hotly pursued by Zulus, a wounded man, Band Sergeant Gamble, pleaded with him to pull him up onto his horse.

He said:

“For God’s sake give us a lift!’

Brickhill’s response:

“My dear fellow, it’s a case of life and death with me!”

Brickhill rode on and survived. His “dear fellow” was stabbed to death moments after he deserted him.

The author remarked that this moment troubled Brickhill’s conscience for years to come.

Only minutes later another man on horseback. Private Samuel Wassall of the 80th regiment faced the same dilemma. With all of his instincts telling him to keep fording the river in order to reach relative safety on the far shore, he turned his horse, went back and retrieved the desperate man, a private by the name of Westwood, who had called for help. He saved his life and both men lived to tell the tale. As he said in his own words:

“There was a terrible temptation to go ahead and just save oneself. But I turned my horse round to the Zulu bank, got him there, (his horse) dismounted, tied him up to a tree (and I never tied him more swiftly). Then I struggled out to Westwood, got hold of him and struggled back to the horse with him…..I plunged into the torrent and as I did so the Zulus rushed up to the bank and let drive with their firearms and spears. Mercifully, I escaped them all, and with a thankful heart, urged my gallant horse up the steep bank on the Natal side.

Which man am I?

Both of them, of course.

Courage.

What an unbelievably complex concept. Yet it is an issue that every man must wrestle with his whole life.

In memory of my beloved brother, Stuie.

Read the quotes below. Each one of them carries the ring of truth yet many are in direct contradiction of each other. Which one resonates best for you?

Any coward can fight a battle when he's sure of winning; but give me the man who has the pluck to fight when he's sure of losing.
George Eliot

Courage is nine-tenths context. What is courageous in one setting can be foolhardy in another and even cowardly in a third.
Joseph Epstein

To a coward, courage always looks like stupidity.
Bill Maher

Some have been thought brave because they were afraid to run away.
Thomas Fuller

A timid person is frightened before a danger, a coward during the time, and a courageous person afterward.
Jean Paul

The difference between a hero and a coward is one step sideways.
Gene Hackman

That man is not truly brave who is afraid either to seem or to be, when it suits him, a coward.
Edgar Allan Poe

Many would be cowards if they had courage enough.
Thomas Fuller

Alas, nothing reveals man the way war does. Nothing so accentuates in him the beauty and ugliness, the intelligence and foolishness, the brutishness and humanity, the courage and cowardice, the enigma.

Oriana Fallaci

At the bottom of not a little of the bravery that appears in the world, there lurks a miserable cowardice. Men will face powder and steel because they have not the courage to face public opinion.

Fear is far more painful to cowardice than death to true courage.
Philip Sidney

Helpful Not Helpful

The opposite of courage in our society is not cowardice, it is conformity
Rollo May

Courage is often lack of insight, whereas cowardice in many cases is based on good information.
Peter Ustinov

Living in the UCCR, aka the Union of COVID Collectivist Republics

David Solway · 14 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

This is a familiar scene, so familiar that it has now become the New Normal. You are in a supermarket searching diligently for toilet paper to hoard for the long haul, but although the cardboard sign reads "1 package per family," the shelves are as bare as Old Mother Hubbard's cupboard, and have been for weeks. The same with kitchen towels, whose once plentiful supply we never learned to appreciate. Produce is still available, as is dairy and meat, but the freezers are beginning to thin out. A few bars of unsalted butter can still be found, though even at one per family, the future augurs a breakfast of dry toast, assuming the loaves haven't gone the way of all dough. A couple of bags of unpopular frozen veggies slump forlornly in the cooler, the same ones you saw yesterday, but they too will be casualties of tomorrow. To add insult to injury, it is often the lesser brands and inferior products that remain on hand.

My neighbors are practically all lefties, Liberal, NDP and Green supporters, for Vancouver is devoted socialist country. They are, for the most part, believers in "Social Justice," indigenous rights, identity politics, feminist leadership, "climate change," wind farms, solar panels, and redistribution of private wealth. They are against—give or take—free-market business practices, corporations, oil companies, fossil fuels, hydraulic fracking, pipelines, the profit motive, competition, individual autonomy or self-reliance, industry, big bank accounts, SUVs, Alberta and—of course—Donald Trump, the grasping incarnation of evil who, as acclaimed lefty poet and Princeton magus Paul Muldoon writes, rather lamely, builds the "Tower of Wrong…from the promises on which he'll shortly renege."

Nonetheless, these are the same people who drive across the border to the U.S. to fill up their vehicles since a gallon of gas in capitalist America costs the equivalent of a litre—one-quarter of a gallon—in socialist Canada. Indeed, shopping expeditions to Blaine or Bellingham in northern Washington State in order to take advantage of greater choice, better goods and lower prices were once weekly events for them. The contradiction never seemed to dawn, as it never does upon the conscience of a good socialist.

After all, good socialists are an impenitent breed, as their beliefs and behavior make amply clear. Cuba, where people work for a pittance and live in fear of a repressive regime, is regarded as the victim of a Yankee embargo. China, the world's largest polluter (in every sense of the term), is by their lights a well-governed nation slandered by conservatives. Venezuela, probably the planet's most fetid hellhole, has obviously been brought low by the rapacious policies of colonialist America—indeed, a sure sign of American perfidy is its refusal to send enough protective anti-viral masks to Canada. That the U.S. may not have sufficient to serve its own needs is irrelevant. Still, once the borders are open, we will be flocking through the Peace Arch Historical State Park to load up on non-carbon taxed supplies and inexpensive merchandise, returning to a progressivist country of which we are inordinately proud.

Socialists are uniquely prepared for pandemic living.

Meanwhile, the travesty and tragedy proceed. A more recent development has emerged to trouble public convenience. Lines have begun to form, carefully surveilled, at the entrance of stores and shops across the city, and no doubt in other parts of the country as well. At a small, out-of-the-way BuyLow where my wife and I briefly stopped hoping to avoid a crowd, people waited outside to be admitted one by one. At a large, hypermodern SaveOn, outdoor monitors herded the line like bouncers at a nightclub. Once inside, customers would be met by an air of desolation, rows of empty shelves, and a straggle of distracted and disappointed shoppers. No one is happy. Everyone is worried. Even the times allowed us to partially replenish our dwindling reserves are being rationed as new lockdown orders are promulgated. True, we are not—or not yet—being tracked by drones or trammeled by a slate of punitively excessive restrictions, as is the case in the U.K., but we should not be surprised if or when new enforcement measures are prolonged, perhaps indefinitely.

Where have we seen this before? I have pointed out to some of my anti-American neighbors and leftist acquaintances that such were, mutatis mutandis, the conditions that prevailed in the heyday of the socialist utopia of the USSR: long sidewalk queues at grocery stores and dry goods outlets, uniformed surveillance, bare shelves, prohibitive costs for basic necessities, stringent regulations coming down from on high, an atmosphere of depression and misery, and no intimation of when the nightmare would be over. But, to be fair, the picture was not entirely grim. The vodka was plentiful. Similarly, our liquor commissions are open. I have enough wine and Scotch to keep me going for months.

There are many well-known books recounting life in the Soviet Union, but among these I would recommend two lesser-known works, the very readable novel Forever Flowing by Vasily Grossman and the dauntingly massive but indispensable treatise The Soviet System: The Political Economy of Communism by Janos Kornai. Also, it helps if one knows Russian and Eastern Bloc immigrants whose memories of daily life in the USSR and its satellites are intact. Their stories are uniformly dismal reports of market scarcity, strict policing, limited freedom, the practice of evasion and poorly rewarded patience.

The assault on individual integrity was also demoralizing. Being forced to parrot and internalize state-fed lies demolishes one's personal sense of dignity. As Theodore Dalrymple observes in Our Culture, What's Left of It: The Mandarins and the Masses, "When people are forced to remain silent when they are being told the most obvious lies, or even worse when they are forced to repeat the lies themselves, they lose once and for all their sense of probity… A society of emasculated liars is easy to control."

The moral debacle grows even more critical when such lies become second-nature, part of one's unexamined belief system, as appears to be the case in the progressivist West. As Orwell noted, lies becomes truths. A good friend who emigrated to Canada from Romania and felt blessed to live in a free and prosperous country is now appalled by the socialist mantras and political degradation he meets everywhere, reminding him increasingly of his former country. “People don’t seem to know anything,” he remarks, “they don’t know what they are losing.”

My friend is right. The people I have spoken to are rigorously innocent of history, as are the many leftist journalists, politicians, talking heads and writers who swarm the public forum, along with the indoctrinated millennials, the brain-dead celebrities, our K-12 elf piñatas and red pantaloon academics who should know better—and the shoppers at our market mausoleums. The pandemic has brought home to us what it might have been like living in the USSR—or at any rate it should have—and what it may well be like living in a post-COVID managerial and regulatory state after our leaders have sampled the joys of centralist authority and the nation’s citizens have been cowed into a condition of docility, resignation and submission. This, regrettably, is not beyond the realm of possibility.

In the absence of a reasonably educated electorate and patriotic and indefatigable leaders like Donald Trump, I suspect the worst. Writing in American Thinker, Sally Zelikovsky believes that we can adopt prudent measures to combat the disease “while going back…to normal.” Perhaps we can find a middle ground between the draconian and the domestic, but we cannot take common sense and enlightened thinking for granted. If we are not vigilant we may soon enough find ourselves inhabiting the UCCR, that is, the Union of COVID Collectivist Republics, with no end in sight. That is a political pandemic from which there is little chance of a full recovery.

David Solway’s latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019

Gender Matters, episode #2 – Professor Gerard Casey

AVfM Video Source · 14 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Fathering through a pandemic

Elizabeth Hobson · 17 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Parenthood is often the most significant journey a human being makes. There is no right way to father – it's a role that must be undertaken instinctively and responsively, responding to circumstances and to the individuality of yourself, your child and your family. Current circumstances, under the wrath of the Covid-19 pandemic, can make finding a favourable approach even more challenging.

Men often excel at pushing their children's boundaries – so they go higher, speak more fluently, play an instrument more expertly or game like a pro (for example)! Children are intuitive and when you have belief in their abilities, their confidence tends to increase, and with it their competence. With schools closed, throwing yourself into the responsibility homeschooling is a great opportunity to help your children, to bond – and to distract your household from the tumultuous situation that we all find ourselves in.

My partner and I find that, while the lessons sent home from our school are good, it's necessary to supplement our days with lessons of our own devising to keep our sons enjoying the homeschool experience and actively learning. Our youngest boy loves performing science experiments so I am continually noticing what's in our cupboards and performing web searches to discover whether what we have in stock can be utilised for such purposes!

We're an arty family, so that's integrated into every day – and my partner is musical so he's giving regular guitar lessons. We're also blessed with a fairly substantial garden so plants are being tended and tree bark is being rubbed during nature studies. Work with what you have and what your skills are – and most importantly what you're passionate about because enthusiasm is often infectious! But don't expect too much from yourself or your children, we're all adjusting to a new normal and every minute spent on a productive and engaging activity is a little victory, every fruitless moment quite understandable!

Learn from your successes and mistakes, don't despise yourself when your approach doesn't work (or if you miss your aim entirely). It's easy to fall into despondency and self-loathing for not being the perfect parent, but it's not useful. Do what your children do when they stumble, dust yourself off and forge ahead, onwards and upwards, ideally a little bit wiser! Learn from your parents' successes and mistakes and those of others – but always bear in mind that what works for one parent and child isn't necessarily transferable to others because we're all unique. And bear in mind now that, we're living through a historic moment that nobody is quite sure how to navigate and nobody is likely to sail through entirely unscathed.

Pursuing good mental hygiene is something we should all do, all the time, but it's not always at the top of everybody's list of priorities. For populations living through this moment, though, it's never been more critical than it is now. Crucial civil liberties have been suspended and families are isolated in boxes (of varying sizes) to suffer each-others habits (of varying annoyance) incessantly; many victim to uncertainty and stress regarding work and finances, not to mention concerns for vulnerable loved ones or even bereavement… We all need to optimise our resilience – and modelling how in front of our children could prove an enormously beneficial investment in their futures.

Challenge negative thought patterns where you can, if they're related to the behaviour of those in your household please talk to them (as calmly, generously and honestly as possible). Distract yourself with activities that you enjoy. Plan goals – not for the fleeting sense of achievement when you meet them but for the sense of vitality as you progress towards them. Spend meaningful time with your household and maintain contact with other loved ones as best as you can. Ask for help and/or support if you need it. And attend to your vulnerability factors – that means eating, sleeping, taking your medication, taking your health and wellbeing as seriously as we all take our children's.

While fatherhood can be the making of the man, in our societies, for too many men their vital relationships with their children are denied. Each case where a loving father is denied the opportunity to fulfil his responsibility to father his children is a tragedy and a profound injustice. In a significant number of cases the tragedy and injustice are compounded by parental alienation that can poison a child's mind against a victim parent and leave lasting damage both on the relationship and the parent and child's health and wellbeing. Because each case is unique, my advice is broad: never, ever give up.

What this means for any given man suffering from being separated from his children will vary. Some may have the resources never to give up fighting through legal channels, some may have been awarded meaningful access – after significant harm has been perpetrated through parental alienation – and face a complex and challenging repair job, some may be devastated by the closing of contact centres, others may have to accept lack of contact and commit themselves to living the best life they can without their children, never giving up hope that they'll be returned to them.

I am concerned that after this pandemic there will be a spike in divorce after reports of a spike the same in China in the immediate aftermath of Covid-19 and the words of Baroness Shackleton of Belgravia who shared the opinion of U.K. divorce lawyers in Westminster that "following self-imposed confinement it is very likely that the divorce rate will rise." The psychological consequences on individuals and the damage done to inter-personal relationships by Covid-19 is unquantifiable. What is somewhat more quantifiable is the impact on children if we, as a society, allow parental relationships to break down:

- Single parent families are nearly twice as likely to be in poverty as those in couple parented families[1].
- Of >2.8million single parent families10, 92% of non-resident parents are fathers in the U.K.[2]
- Less than half of non-resident parents are awarded staying contact with their children[3].
- Day visits (without overnight stays) are ordered in 20% cases[4].
- No contact, indirect or supervised contact is ordered in 31% of cases[5].
- Almost equal caring occurs in 3% of cases at best[6].
- Father's involvement with children is linked to higher educational achievement and occupational mobility, and increases a boy's chances of escaping poverty in particular[7].
- Father's involvement is associated with fewer child behavioural problems[8].
- Father's involvement is associated with lower criminality, 76% of children and young people in custody had an absent father[9] as compared to the <25% national average[10].

- Father's involvement is associated with less substance misuse and addiction[11].
- Greater father involvement is associated with higher levels of self-respect and self-regulation[12].
- Father absence is associated with earlier sexual activity and teen pregnancy[13].
- Children with single parents show increased risks of psychiatric disease, suicide, and attempted suicide[14].

I advocate that plans be made and provisions ring-fenced to support parents enduring relationship crises to receive support that could assist them in reconciliation. According to The Centre for Social Justice research published in 2017, 89% of adults say they would support public money being spent on strengthening families – in the wake of Covid-19 it is more important than ever that it is. In our lifetimes, these experiences are unprecedented, these restrictions astonishing, these fears novel. I wish you and your loved ones well and hope that you manage to father your way ably through this crisis and beyond.

A Letter to Joe Biden

Stephen Bond · 18 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Mr. Biden,

Congratulations on your campaign's remarkable turnaround. With Bernie Sanders recent withdrawal from the race, it appears that you will be the Democratic party's candidate in this year's presidential election.

But as much as I'd like to, I can't vote for you. Let me explain why.

First, as an American citizen, I've always considered it a privilege—even a sacred obligation—to vote. Except for a few off-year elections I've voted in every election since I became eligible in 1972.

But I didn't vote in the 2016 election, as I felt neither of the candidates were worthy of electing, largely because their poor treatment of women.

I couldn't vote for Donald Trump because of his long history of disrespect for women, glaringly exemplified by his extremely lewd conversation about women on that infamous 2005 Access Hollywood tape.

And I couldn't vote for Hillary Clinton because of her mistreatment of the "bimbos" who dared accuse her husband of sexual misbehavior. This despite having twice voted for Bill Clinton and, early in the Clinton presidency, having once envisioned myself someday supporting Hillary for president. But that was before Bill's shameless lie about "not having a sexual relationship with that woman" and Hillary's and the feminist establishment's hypocritical stance whether Bill had sexually harassed Monica Lewinsky. Why didn't Hillary and her feminist friends "believe all women" then?

I'd like to vote for you, but I can't because of your poor treatment of men.

Specifically, I can't vote for you because your co-sponsorship in 1994 and continuing support of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), an act that you know—both through your own family history and by way of a paper written by one of your students at the Widener School of Law—is biased against men. Even the law's name testifies to that fact.

Your family history and the content of this student's paper show that you know the basic premise of the law—that women are the primary victims of domestic violence—is a lie. In fact, you know from personal experience that women are as violent or more violent than men in relationships. Just ask Johnny Depp.

First, your family history, which you shared in the "Women and Violence" senate hearings in 1990, shows that you are a male victim of domestic violence. Here's a part of your testimony (starting on page 171):

> "In my house, being raised with a sister and three brothers, there was absolute-it was a nuclear sanction, if under any circumstances, for any reason, no matter how justified, even self-defense-if you ever touched our sister, literally, not figuratively, literally. My sister, who is my best friend, my campaign manager, my confidante, grew up with absolute impunity in our household. And I have the bruises to prove it. I mean that sincerely. I am not exaggerating when I say that."

One particularly insightful analysis, "VAWA- Corrupt Law and Joe Biden's Abusive Sister", said this about your childhood abuse:

> "In these disturbing revelations, Biden offers us a glimpse into a tragically dysfunctional and abusive family. The rules he describes are clear. His sister was granted license to terrorize and abuse him over a period of years while the family strong-armed him into the role of her designated punching bag. This was maintained under the threat of a 'nuclear sanction' if he dared attempt to defend himself or stop the beatings."

And yet as an adult you went on to co-sponsor a bill that completely negates the reality of both your and hundreds of thousands of other males' experiences with violence perpetrated by women!

And surely you must recall the paper that you received by a student in your law class, David Burroughs? His paper, titled "State Discrimination Against Male Victims of Domestic Violence and Congress' 14th Amendment Power to Prohibit Such Discrimination" earned him an "A". His paper begins with the following quote from Richard J. Gelles, widely recognized as one of the earliest and preeminent researchers in the field of family violence, in an article written by Gelles, "The Missing Persons in Domestic Violence: Battered Men":

> "Men have been shot, stabbed, beaten with objects, and been subjected to verbal assaults and humiliations. Nonetheless, I do not believe these are the 'horrors' of violence toward men. The real horror is the continued status of battered men as the 'missing persons' of the domestic violence problem."

You may also remember Mr. Burroughs for his billboard campaign in 2005 at the Wilmington, Delaware Amtrak station to remind you that men are abuse victims, too.

But to be fair, perhaps you still don't see yourself having been abused as a child. Perhaps you don't recall Mr. Burroughs' law school paper. Or even his 2005 billboard campaign.

Perhaps you honestly are unaware of the following about the Violence Against Women Act:

- The law is the most blatantly discriminatory law passed by the United States Congress in more than a century. Even its name attests to this fact.
- The law is based, not on fact, but on gender prejudice, and it denies much-needed services to an entire class of American citizens, based only on their sex—because they are men!
- The law, far from being fair and just, helps spread hate and anti-male bigotry by promoting a provably false and one-sided gender stereotype of "violent men hurting innocent women". The law advances a misleading, sugar-and-spice depiction of women that denies the female role in intimate violence and completely ignores half of domestic violence victims—men and boys. Again, just ask Johnny Depp.
- The law is "feminist pork" (people might dislike Phyliss Schlafly, but this link is well worth reading). It provides incentives for false accusations of violence. VAWA money is often misspent. One study showed that 21 of 22 VAWA grantees were in violation of grant requirements. One audit in 2005 showed inadequate documentation for expenditures of $1.2 million out of a $1.9 million grant [source]. Government Accountability Office (GAO) reports here, here, and here show various problems with many VAWA grants and programs.

- If the Violence Against Women Act is a good and fair law, then why doesn't Congress also pass a "Violence Against African Americans Act"?
- The law is provably a lie. There are hundreds of legitimate studies, many sponsored by the federal government, that conclusively show that at least half of domestic violence is perpetuated, not by men, but by women!

You and others reading this letter may disbelieve this last statement. You and they may wish to take time to read the National Family Violence Surveys of 1975 and 1985. These two federally sponsored studies were the first to conclusively reveal the predominant female role in domestic violence. Over the past 30 years hundreds of other studies have confirmed the findings of these pioneering studies. They have all arrived at the same counter-intuitive, but undeniable conclusion:

Women are at least as violent as men in intimate relationships.

Or you may wish to read a revealing book by Patricia Pearson, a self-described feminist, "When She Was Bad – Violent Women and the Myth of Innocence". A single paragraph from this book perfectly summarizes the truth that The National Organization for Women and other gender extremists wish to keep hidden from you and the American public:

> "Women commit the majority of child homicides in the United States, a greater share of physical child abuse, an equal rate of sibling violence and assaults on the elderly, about a quarter of child sexual abuse, an overwhelming share of the killings of newborns, and a fair preponderance of spousal assaults."

History will ultimately show that, with your active support and assistance, the United States Congress, in passing the Violence Against Women Act, enshrined into American law an Act that shares the same ideological parents as the Nuremberg Laws of Nazi Germany: hate and prejudice. This law is not worthy of a nation that needs to present itself to the rest of the world as a "fair and just democracy".

So, Mr. Biden, even if you didn't know before, you do now: You can no longer deny the truth about the law you helped birth, the Violence Against Women Act.

All I and other fair-minded people ask is for you to commit to making the Violence Against Women Act gender neutral and remove restrictions on helping men. You can start by renaming the law the Family Violence Prevention Act.

If you do that, I'll vote for you later this year.

Otherwise I just may have to vote for your opponent.

Sincerely,

Stephen Bond

Interview with Ava Brighton

AVfM Video Source · 18 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Feminist Year 2019 in Germany

Das Alternativlos-Aquarium · 20 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Government

Feminists are trying to undermine the right to vote. Politicians and leading media are calling for a change in the electoral laws. Lawyer Silke Laskowski, “the mastermind of various legislative initiatives for equal participation of women in the electoral law”, claims that one must “first make sure that women have the same chances as men to be nominated”, because the possibility to get the seats by their own efforts “presupposes that all women are willing to enter these male structures”. The parties have the obligation to ensure equal participation, she says, “and ideally they would then find enough women. (…) But should there really be too few, yes, then the parties must pull their socks up and look for and find women”.

The German Women’s Council launches a petition for a parity law based on the French model (proportional candidate lists plus quota regulation for direct elections) and calls on female parliamentarians not to agree to any electoral law reform without parity. An alliance of women from nearly all parties discusses how the proportion of women in parliaments can be increased. Justice Minister Katarina Barley signals support. The German Association of Women Lawyers, which is planning a strategy to ensure that “parity laws do not fail before the constitutional courts”, is proposing changes to party laws and party financing, for example by giving more money to those parties that have a particularly large number of women.

Meanwhile, Brandenburg creates precedents. According to a draft by Silke Laskowski, the government of Brandenburg decides on an amendment to the electoral law, coming into force on 30 June 2020, obliging parties to put equal numbers of men and women on election lists. There will be exceptions for parties such as the Women’s Party.

Thuringia is the second German state to follow suit, passing a law requiring parties to alternate between men and women on their lists for state elections. The Greens in Bavaria are even more radical and demand that voters have to choose one woman and one man per constituency. A proposal by the Left Wing Party for a new parity law is meeting with resistance from the Greens, whose proportion of women is higher than the proposal provides for. “We must be able to keep this quota”. It would be absurd if the Greens were forced to reduce the proportion of women to 50%.

The Women’s Union demands the binding equal allocation of list places in the Conservative Party (CDU): “Men, not women, often run for election in the constituencies. This is also due to the fact that women more often than men decide not to enter into the tough debate about a constituency”.

Following the elections in Saxony and Brandenburg, which were successful for the Right Wing Party (AfD), commentators are propagating the idea of depriving men of the right to vote, or are even rambling: “The male ego rests on the pillars of possession, exploitation of land and people and the appropriation of female sexuality”.

Inspectors are horrified to discover what damage Ursula von der Leyen has caused to the Ministry of Defence: Violations of public procurement law, protectionism, contracts prohibiting the German Armed Forces (Bundeswehr) from repairing weapons, and expenditure of 155 million Euros in the first six months for external consultancy, almost as much as all the other 13 ministries put together. A senior official is trying to remove files with doctored consultant accounts, other documents are being blackened.

Von der Leyen escapes the appointed Committee of Inquiry by having herself nominated as a possible EU Commission head. Political opponents who circulate her sin register are put under pressure and row back. Her candidacy speech in the European Parliament is full of feminist slogans. On 16 July, von der Leyen is narrowly confirmed.

Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer succeeds Ursula von der Leyen as Minister of Defence. While the USA and Russia have largely given up disarmament control, all 9 nuclear powers are expanding their arsenals and there is all kinds of cause for concern, feminist politicians are as usual only revolving around themselves at the Munich Security Conference: “If only men develop algorithms, how are they supposed to depict a world that also works for women”.

At their party conference, the Greens decide that men no longer have a say in whether a debate may be continued if no woman speaks up. Furthermore, women may only be represented by female substitute delegates, even if there are not enough women available.

International Women’s Day on 8 March becomes a new public holiday in Berlin.

Media, Censorship & Manipulation

According to various surveys, many people in Germany no longer feel free to publicly express their own opinion. A journalist of the newspaper Zeit interprets it like this: “People are speaking more sensitively”. The assertion that no one is prevented from expressing his or her opinion, as Federal President Frank-Walter Steinmeier claims, misses the point when the price is driven up by insults, threats of violence and defamation at the workplace. Especially at universities, the call for regulations, bans and language rules is unmistakable. In politics and the media, it is now fashionable to sell contempt for democratic processes as a defence of true democracy. Members of the German Association of Judges visit the Federal Constitutional Court and exchange views on “the limits of free speech, especially regarding the protection of state officials”.

The elites’ fear of the people goes so far that security precautions at the Bundestag are to be increased by safety fences and a 10-metre wide ditch.

The Ministry of the Interior wants to force messenger providers to make encrypted communication readable.
The Ministers of Justice want to weaken the security of the mobile phone standard 5G in order to allow investigators to access it. Horst Seehofer, Federal Minister of the Interior, presents a draft bill according to which suspects can be forced by coercive detention to give out passwords for online services.

Katarina Barley’s successor, Minister of Justice Christine Lambrecht, presents a legislative package against hate crime, according to which authorities will be able to require internet services to hand over their customers’ passwords without a court order. She also wants to create 400 new positions in the Federal Criminal Police Office (BKA) to enforce the Network Enforcement Act.

In Baden-Wuerttemberg the police law is tightened. The Office for the Protection of the Constitution of Saxony-Anhalt will be allowed to hack computers and smartphones.

Again and again, selected journalists are invited to secret meetings at the Chancellery. After the Administrative Court of Berlin decided that “dates, topics, participants and locations” must be made public, the Chancellor’s Office complained that the government must retain the possibility of examining, in camera, “to what extent certain political positions can be communicated through the media”.

The Public Broadcasting Corporation of the ARD reacted to the massive loss of confidence by commissioning an expert report in 2017 that is now published and recommends framing, i.e. propagandistic language manipulation. Ideological framing of terms is intended to steer social discussions, for example on increasing contributions, in the desired direction (“If you want to get your fellow citizens to understand the added value of the ARD (…), then your communication must always take the form of moral arguments”). Demands for a reduction of financial resources are described as outrageous, as a process which is “in reality a demand for less democracy”. Not only are tricks and emotions being propagated instead of facts and objectivity, but there is also massive agitation against competitors (private broadcasting corporations).

The announcement of the report triggers a wave of criticism. ARD Secretary General Susanne Pfab appeases: This is just a discussion topic, a food for thought. Creator of the report and accompanying workshops (cost: 120,000 Euros) is feminist Elisabeth Wehling, who runs a Berkeley International Framing Institute, which suggests a non-existent connection to the US university of the same name and only seems to exist on paper. Funded by George Soros, the Bertelsmann-, Heinrich-Böll- and Friedrich-Ebert-Foundations, among others.

A UN study, which speaks of 464,000 people who became victims of homicides worldwide in 2017, over 80 percent of whom were men, is worked up by broadcasting company Deutschlandfunk like this: “More than 87,000 women and girls are victims of murder and manslaughter”.

At the University of Cologne, a lecturer is trying to force students to speak gendered language, and in doing so she makes assertions such as: “Universities are not a place of free speech”.

The Amadeu Antonio Foundation, which together with the Federal Agency for Civic Education acts unilaterally against political extremism and plays down left-wing dictatorships, is attempting in cooperation with the Federal Congress of Municipal Women’s Offices to defame criticism of gender ideology under the guise of fighting right-wing extremism (“Strategies against Equality. How Right-Wing Populists Act”).

Blogger Julia Probst advocates using cameras and lip readers to monitor people in football stadiums.

Work, Money & Health

On 1 January 2020, the new Anti-Discrimination Law of Berlin will come into force, which abolishes the presumption of innocence by reversing the burden of proof, legalises unequal treatment “if it serves the common good”, and allows women’s lobbies to have a say in determining what constitutes discrimination, because it is “irrefutably suspected” that such anti-discrimination associations, which are supported by state funds, “provide a guarantee for the proper fulfilment of tasks”.

On Equal Pay Day, the Berlin district of Charlottenburg-Wilmersdorf calls on the business community in the district to grant women a “21 percent discount on a product or service”.

On International Women’s Day, Berlin’s public transport operators are offering a ticket for women that is 21 percent cheaper. Men who get such a ticket are considered fare dodgers. There is also a vending machine that issues annual and monthly tickets for women at a reduced price. A camera scans the customer’s face and men receive an error message. The Anti-Discrimination Office dismisses complaints with reference to an alleged “factual inequality” of women.

News from gender pricing: The regular VAT rate (19 per cent) on tampons is being scandalised as a “luxury tax” which discriminates against women. Several leading media are eager to take up the topic. An online petition is signed by almost 200,000 people and ensures that the German government reduces the VAT on hygiene products for women to 7 percent.

The German Institute for Economic Research (DIW) publishes a household study which allegedly states that women and men work approximately the same amount during the week, while household work on Sundays is largely be done by women. In order to achieve this statement, facts were manipulated in such a way that it was not men’s weekly overtime that was taken as the basis, but only a single day of the week.

Sexuality & Violence

The Federal Ministry for Women’s Affairs is launching a 120 million Euro investment programme which will finance the expansion, conversion and new construction of women’s shelters and counselling centres over the next 4 years.

In Halle (Saale) a right-wing extremist attacks a synagogue. Two political scientists talk about it: “This is the basic structure of a patriarchal society. (…) On the one hand there is a deeply rooted hatred of women and hatred of queer people. In the conspiracy ideological narratives this then comes together with racism and anti-Semitism”. “Basically feminism is also a good project for men. Then they don’t have to be assholes anymore, but can become nice, solidary people”.

A Feminist Autonomous Cell proclaims its intention to fight “against the knots of the capitalist-patriarchal machinery”, carries out an arson attack on a city mission in Tübingen and encourages other people to do the same:

"We would welcome further actions against antifeminist institutions and participants. Because these exist everywhere – organize gangs – flatten them".

Family, Fathers & Children

On 18 March, a hearing of the Legal Committee of the Bundestag on the Law of Ancestry takes place. While lobby representatives of women's associations and reproductive medicine are represented, fathers' associations are refused to participate and, in addition, the public is left out in the cold, with the government coalition parties preventing the hearing from being broadcast via Bundestag TV, which is otherwise customary. The hearing makes the double standards of the prevailing state feminism visible: motherhood is defined biologically, fatherhood, on the other hand, by means of the presumption of marriage or the marital status; women, in contrast to men, cannot be expected to provide information about "intimate multiple sexual intercourse"; and the term "father" is to be largely replaced by "2nd parent" or "co-mother".

All this is part of the attempt to destroy the family as a bulwark against state indoctrination. The "parentless society" that would establish "pregnancy justice" is being propagated in the newspaper Zeit. Antje Schrupp ("A woman should not need a man to bear a child") defames fathers in the magazine Spiegel as "sperminators" and speaks out "against the fact that pure spermination already constitutes paternity rights".

On request, Katarina Barley refuses to name the experts in the Family Policy Working Groups of the Ministry of Justice and charges 30 Euros for this failure to provide information. She responds to a complaint about this by sending an enforcement notice.

On 13 February, the Bundestag's Legal Committee deals with the proposal of the Free Democratic Party (classical liberal) to introduce joint custody as a guiding model. As usual, fathers' associations are not invited, while mothers' lobbyists are allowed to express their views. This hearing is also not broadcast via Bundestag TV. Some leading media are already making a mood against the proposal in advance by making the polemic of the mothers' lobbyists their own. Their hypocritical argument that the government does not want to impose a model on parents ignores the fact that this is exactly what is happening at present: courts are forcing a single mother / father family as guiding model, which is always enforced against one parent and usually to the detriment of the children, often without even hearing the father. Unsurprisingly, in the Bundestag debate on 15 March the motion is rejected by all other parties.

After three years of deliberations, the Working Group on Custody of the Ministry of Justice merely presents a thesis paper which in principle grants both parents custody of their children after a divorce, and is apparently playing for time, especially since neither joint custody as a guiding model nor mandatory mediation is proposed. But even that is unbearable for women's lobbies such as the German Women Lawyers' Association and the Mothers' Initiative MIA. According to MIA, this would "completely undermine the protection of mothers in or after violent relationships" – fathers who are forced to leave their children to violent mothers do not appear in the world view of these feminists. Particularly perfidious is the often used trick of turning the anti-male realities against men, for example by pretending that the situation in which the vast majority of divorcees are forced to live corresponds to the wish of those affected, and that the campaigns of lobby organisations are proof of the population's unwillingness to change.

In September, the majority of representatives in the Committee on Legal Affairs reject the introduction of joint custody as guiding model, thereby ignoring Council of Europe Resolution 2079, the positive experience with this model in other countries and the wishes of the majority of the population in Germany.

Gender, Diversity & Misandry

In 2017, gender studies were funded by the German government with 16.8 million Euros, and in 2018 with 19.5 million Euros. In addition, there is the Women Professorship Programme, which has already funded over 500 gender professorships and is now entering the third phase (until 2022) "following a positive evaluation of the 2nd programme phase", for which 200 million Euros have been earmarked. The government coalition parties consider gender studies to be useful because they provide "important scientific findings on causes and mechanisms which impede equality". The Greens call on the government to expand the promotion of gender research. This is not only taking place in Germany: Worldwide, the German government is funding gender projects in the millions, for example to “promote gender justice in South Africa”.

The City of Hannover wants toilets for the third sex, and a similar situation applies to some primary schools in Bavaria. In the future, carpenters and bakers will also have to have their own toilets for the third sex and handle job advertisements accordingly, otherwise they will face severe penalties.

The Federal Agency for Civic Education publishes an essay by Laura Moisi of the Humboldt University of Berlin, in which, with reference to the cultural scientist Rosie Cox, it is claimed that garbage is socially constructed and serves to exclude others, that notions of cleanliness are “based on racist correspondences of whiteness with purity” and that “the proximity to dirt and garbage” is “globally racially and sexually structured (…). The private sphere thus becomes the sphere in which social inequality is continuously maintained”.

Since the then women’s representative of the City of Hannover, Ursula Müller, enforced in 1992 that for pictograms of bicycles on the street the middle bar which marks the bicycle a man’s bicycle has to be omitted, construction companies are always busy scraping away this middle bar.

Ilona Horwath, Professor of Technology and Diversity at the University of Paderborn, heads the Fortesy project to investigate the fire brigade service, funded by the Ministry of Education and Research. She complains that white heterosexual men from the working class shape the image of the firefighter and thus represent an obstacle to integration and efficiency. Fire brigades are “known for their resistance to change, which is essentially fed by social dynamics”.

More and more queer-feminist lesbians are hijacking successful gay projects such as the Gay Museum, which is still kept alive exclusively by volunteer gay men, but is run and conceived by lesbian women who express their contempt for men by cleaning rooms of male energies in a magical ritual.

The City of Hannover is issuing recommendations for a gender-equitable administrative language, a euphemism intended to hide the fact that this is actually a regulation (“The new recommendation is binding for all correspondence from the administration”) and employees who block the new rules must expect consequences, according to Equal Opportunities Officer Friederike Kämpfe.

In other cities, too, the genderization of language is progressing. Giessen is introducing the so-called gender star (“Einwohner*in“, meaning: inhabitant / female inhabitant), and in Baden-Württemberg, Bavaria, Berlin and Schleswig-Holstein work is underway on corresponding regulations.

The Trade Union for Education and Science in Lower Saxony goes even further and wants to introduce language dictation at school: “Language influences consciousness. That’s why it’s good if gender-equitable language is taught from childhood on”.

The most male-despicting advertisement of the year is from food company Edeka (“Thank you mommy that you’re not daddy”) and shows fathers on Mother’s Day as parenting failures and despicable types. The clip is from the advertising agency Jung von Matt, which employs feminists in management positions (Katja Kraus, managing director: “Every woman should be a feminist”).

“Until we have abolished patriarchy, we urgently need strict income and wealth limits for men” (newspaper Neues Deutschland).

The environmental protection and the Fridays for Future movement are also used to demonise men. Luisa Neubauer: “If today’s time teaches us anything, it is that #Women will change the world. Because #Men have not got it managed”. Climate change is supposed to be “essentially a sexist crisis”. Similarly several local groups of Fridays for Future: Bremen is holding a workshop on Feminism in the climate crisis, Dortmund Feminism and empowerment at FfF, Erfurt explains that climate protection is not possible without feminism, the Female Future Force Day is taking place in Berlin-Tempelhof. And in Regensburg, the generation that wastes resources like no other is scolding “the old, white men who got us into this mess”.

A young publicist on Twitter: “I hate men and hope that in the climate crisis they don’t die sooner, but have to suffer even more slowly and painfully”.

♦

This article was originally posted at Alternativlos-Aquarium and is reposted here with permissions.

Identity Politics in the Age of Trump

Dr. Paul Nathanson · 20 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I usually describe myself as "apolitical," because I reject the notion that all of human history amounts to nothing more, and nothing less, than an enduring struggle for power. It's true that power is the defining but morally neutral feature of politics per se, a universal feature of human life, but ideologues go further than that by adding profound dualism and cynicism. They care not so much about power in a general philosophical sense but about the sinister power of particular groups, which they define according to innate characteristics. This leads them directly to the conspiracy theory of history, according to which "they" stole power from "us" at the dawn of time and used it to "oppress" this or that "marginalized voice" ever since. I refuse to make "power" the central word in my philosophical vocabulary, let alone to adopt an ideological one. And yet I do sometimes find it necessary to comment on politics in the narrow sense of that word, party politics, along with its cultural and historical matrix. It is hard to avoid this topic, the manipulation of cultural (and other forms of) power, in this age of perpetual news coverage and ubiquitous "social media." To do so, effectively, I would have to cancel my sources of news—throw out my television, radio and computer—and, avoid personal contact with bearers of news. In short, I would have to become a recluse.

Consider the fallout from domestic terrorism. The ideas that have surfaced in connection with these events have revealed much about the political environment that actually makes them increasingly likely. This is not news; many people have written about identity politics but without changing the situation. Why am I adding yet another essay on it? I have a reason. It is bad enough that we have an epidemic of hateful rhetoric on both the right and the left.[1] Much worse, at least for those who actually want to end political polarization,[2] is that we have no clear and universally accepted definitions of racism, sexism and hatred. So far, we have relied mainly on definitions that each side finds useful for its own political purposes. This is what I hope to change.

I begin with a review of (1) identity politics, the infamously ferocious and futile debates between "progressives" and "conservatives." These have led to extreme polarization and therefore fragmentation, not "diversity," certainly not intellectual diversity. My point is that the underlying motivations of identity politics include hatred, not merely anger. But whose hatred has led us to this point? Many journalists and academics have discussed hatred on the right, of course, and traced that to Trump's own fighting words (never mind that hatred has a very long history in America). But few have noticed hatred on the left and its witting or unwitting complicity in polarization. I continue, therefore, by referring to needlessly acrimonious public debates over two closely related disputes that revolve around hatred: (2) illegal immigration and (3) misandry, which lies at the heart of my own research.

Identity politics

I am hardly alone in observing that identity politics has come to prevail in the American public square. This much was obvious from Trump's very first day on the job, or even before that, and is reaching a crescendo at the impeachment hearings. Nor am I alone in observing that identity politics is a euphemism for societal fragmentation and even tribalism. In this section, I discuss identity politics specifically in connection with (a) race and (b) hatred.

Race: President Trump is not the cause of domestic terrorism and white nationalism or white supremacy—not even if he secretly supports them (which would be very unlikely for someone who seems to have no coherent worldview at all and seems in no hurry to develop one). No rational person can seriously believe that he wants to unleash racial violence, much less that he created racial tension ex nihilo. At issue is only the extent to which his words "empower" those who really do want to solve racial tension by resorting to racial violence. And I do not want to condone his use of linguistic tropes. After all, the president does have what Theodore Roosevelt called a "bully pulpit" (and some presidents, notably both Roosevelt himself and Trump, have often resorted to bullying personal or national foes).

But I do think that we can easily overestimate the symbolic power of this metaphorical pulpit. In fact, it has greatly diminished in this age of the twitterati (as has the symbolic power of every traditional authority). The public square is no longer on the east coast or west coast, no longer at Yale or Harvard, no longer in the New York Times or the Washington Post. Digitally, it is everywhere. This has both advantages for democracy and disadvantages. On one hand, it encourages more and more people to have their say. On the other hand, it allows them to do so irresponsibly by hiding behind anonymity, reacting instantly to gossip or rumor, relying on emotional catharsis instead of careful analysis, absorbing ideological rants, ignoring other points of view and so on. This is close to what the Founders feared as mobocracy, which soon prevailed in France during the Reign of Terror. It would indeed be helpful for a president to embody the civility, kindness, tolerance, patience and other virtues that society needs so desperately. President Obama did that very well, in fact, but not in ways that actually unified the nation (although he could not have succeeded, in any case, in undoing the damage that identity politics had already left after several decades). President Trump seldom even tries to unify the nation.

Maybe social and technological conditions will change this terrifyingly anarchic state of affairs. So far, though efforts to tame the internet have been less than effective. Google, for example, remains notorious for using its algorithms to favor some political points of view, censor others and fire those who openly reject that corporate culture.[3] For the time being, this new public square—it originated on the talk shows, actually, and thus predates both the internet and social media—is a kind of Frontierland. It has produced one moral panic after another. The most recent and destructive has been a revival of hysteria on college campuses over what Susan Brownmiller called "rape culture."[4] By 2017, this had gone mainstream (and viral) as the #MeToo movement, which openly promotes vigilantism, thus undermining due process and the rule of law itself. No president can put this genie back into its proverbial bottle, because no group of people will be demonized forever without fighting back. Trump is not the cause of all this polarization, as I say, but he is the result—and a very predictable one at that.

For several weeks before El Paso—not hours or days, but weeks—the nation's "woke" pundits had engaged in relentless ranting about Trump. They had been doing so since the inauguration or even the election—long before he had actually done anything as president. Within days of the election, women were marching all over the country in visceral opposition to him.[5] CNN made it clear almost immediately that its primary function would no longer be to report the news or even to comment on it but, in effect, to make the news by "calling out" the president and thus making him "accountable." They were no longer journalists at all, in fact, but power brokers at best and propagandists at worst. After failing to bring Trump down with the Mueller Report, the Democrats decided to rely more than ever on name-calling. It was no longer enough that he says racist or seemingly racist things. It was now necessary to claim that Trump is a racist, which is an ontological argument that allows no debate. This reminds me of Humpty Dumpty's famously irrational argument with Alice. When she tells him that he looks "exactly like an egg," he reacts angrily to what he assumes is provocation. Alice explains that she was commenting merely on his outward appearance, not on his inner being—that is, his identity. But he retorts that it comes to same thing, because "my name means the shape I am."[6] I will return to that satirical discussion later.

It was in a very rancid atmosphere that millions of Americans tuned in to CNN for the debates among Democratic presidential candidates. How many viewers were surprised, when the network's Don Lemon referred glibly on the first night to Trump's "racist tweets" about "rat and rodent infested" parts of Baltimore, represented in Congress by Democrat Elijah Cummings (without actually stating that Trump is a racist).[7] He referred on the second night to Trump's policy of dividing the country racially and to "the president's bigotry" (without actually stating, once again, that Trump is a racist). But Lemon was hardly alone or the most vitriolic. Supporting him were senior pundits, who had been drawing the ontological conclusion, explicitly and with increasing frequency for years. According to Nicholas Kristof, "I don't see what else we can call him but a racist."[8] According to David Leonhardt, "Donald Trump is a racist."[9] Charles M. Blow, as usual, was even blunter: "Trump Is a Racist. Period."[10] John Cassidy wrote that "we have a racist in the Oval Office."[11] David Brooks told his viewers that the president's statements were "pretty clearly racist," adding that "It fits into a pattern that we have seen since the beginning of his career, maybe through his father's career, frankly. There's been a consistency, pattern of harsh judgment against black and brown people."[12] That list could go on and on and on. My point here is simply to note the conceptual slippage between calling Trump's words racist (or misogynist or anti-immigrant or anti-Semitic or whatever) and calling him a racist. The connection is not quite as obvious as it seems, because many explanations for his words are possible: racist beliefs—that is, an identity that relies on intimidation—but also circumstantial malice, anti-intellectual ignorance, rhetorical clumsiness, political opportunism and so on.

How many viewers were surprised, therefore, when candidate Kirsten Gillibrand crossed another conceptual boundary by announcing that "The first thing that I'm going to do when I'm president is I'm going to Clorox the Oval Office."[13] No one accused her of racism, because both she and Trump are white. In another context, though, many people would have denounced her for uttering a racial slur (using a metaphor that links black people with filth) and others would have denounced her for being a racist (supporting a worldview that fosters racial aggression). Clorox is not merely a bleach or a cleanser, after all, but a disinfectant. Her stated goal was not merely to sort out a mass of disordered papers and policies (due partly, perhaps, to Trump's chaotic management) but to decontaminate it (due, presumably, to the germs from his personal filth). In short, neither she nor her political and ideological colleagues are innocent when it comes to polarizing and potentially racist rhetoric.

During the impeachment hearings, attention shifted from name-calling to defining or redefining words. Because representatives were still looking for a crime, they argued about the expediency of using "quid pro quo," "extortion" or "bribery." By this time, Democrats in the House were approaching a new goalpost. What might well have begun for some as anger or despair over a lost election was turning—after three years of trying to reverse the election of 2016—into something more like hatred.

Hatred: Trump is the result of polarization, as I say, not the cause of it. To be more specific, he is both the inevitable result and, with poetic justice, the ultimate comeuppance of identity politics—that is, tribalism in its current form.[14] Some people have argued that most acts of domestic terrorism[15] express the identity politics of white people. And that is clearly true but for a reason that they seldom, if ever, acknowledge. You hardly need a doctorate in psychology to know that resentment, let alone hatred, can be very contagious.[16] By that, I mean that it is not easily contained or limited to one target group. People who hate blacks, for instance, usually hate Jews and other minorities as well. The rioters in Charlottesville certainly did, screaming that "Jews will not replace us" even though Jews had nothing to do with the matter at hand: Confederate statues.

Once hatred of any kind enters an influential worldview, moreover, it often becomes very consequential as well. For decades, advocates of what we now call "identity politics" have encouraged intense hatred toward one group of people in particular: those whose identity has been described as white, straight, "cis" and male. They have four strikes against them on the "intersectional" scale, which pretty well means that they have no right to live. Gay men or black men can sometimes consider themselves exempt from contempt—as long as they convert to the true religion of feminism or some other ideology, which entails allying themselves politically against other men. And that, in turn, entails an inherently conflicted identity. White people can sometimes become honorary black people, for instance, and gay men can sometimes become honorary women—but only by internalizing self-loathing. They come to see themselves as virtuous and deserving exceptions to the rule. For them, at least, personal identity takes priority over collective identity, which gives "identity politics" new connotations.

This phenomenon has long affected Jews in the diaspora for whom the price of admission to "society"—the social, political, economic and cultural benefits of assimilation—is to separate themselves as far as possible from their own communities and backgrounds even to the point of adopting some features of anti-Semitism. Trouble is, there is no guarantee of success. Non-Jews do not always like even Jewish converts to Christianity (socialism, feminism or some other ism). Worse (except in Nazi Germany), some of these converts find eventually that they are either unwilling or unable to cope with the contradiction between two aspects of their own identity. In the recent past, American Jews have found it easier than their ancestors to dispense with both Judaism and "Jewishness." More and more often, though, even largely assimilated Jews often find themselves the targets of anti-Zionist hostility (although, as many Jews noted after various statements by the Congressional "squad,"[17] separating anti-Zionism from anti-Semitism is no easy task).[18] In these cases, hostility comes from the political left and targets Jews who express any support for Israel—the world's only Jewish state. [19]

My point here is not primarily about anti-Semitism, however, but about another form of racism (and will be, in due course, about one form of sexism). Common sense tells me that people are likely to react very negatively when singled out for relentless and implacable hostility. Martin Luther King tried one way to avoid that problem, combining common sense with, to say the least, common decency. He relied heavily on the values that all Americans shared. King did not urge blacks to hate whites. On the contrary, he urged blacks and whites to see each other as fellow Americans and fellow humans. He drew on the spiritual authority of Christianity, shared by both blacks and whites (but also on that of eastern religions in the teachings of Mahatma Gandhi). In other words, he saw a huge difference between justice and revenge.

For various historical reasons, however, that is precisely not the message of identity politics, an outgrowth of the black-power movement, not the civil-rights movement. Identity politics on both the left and the right begins with the profoundly cynical notion that "they" are motivated only by the greed and arrogance that sustains their "privilege." This mentality rests on the naïve assumption that no one could possibly ever harm the targets of their hatred. Therefore, they see no moral need to pull back from any assault on the collective identity of their targets and no need to establish a moral foundation to ensure their own accountability. Anything goes: any lie, any allegation, any double standard, any punishment for the collective sins even of remote ancestors.

I will not go on and on about identity politics, because many people have already written extensively about it (although I suspect that most of their potential readers already agree with them).[20] My point here is simply that those who sow the wind shall reap the whirlwind. Those who ignore both common sense and common decency in the effort to establish a new and presumably better society are doomed to find their efforts stubbornly and sometimes murderously attacked by their targets. It is almost a self-fulfilling prophecy, because hatred easily takes on a life of its own. Or, to put it succinctly: hatred begets hatred.

It is a common mistake, to assume that "hatred" is a synonym for "anger" (and that anger is always a helpful response to conflict). The two phenomena often look alike, but they have nothing else in common. Anger is an emotion and therefore, apart from anything else, transitory. It is a psychological problem, therefore, to the extent that it interferes with personal happiness. Hatred is not an emotion and therefore not a psychological problem. It is a worldview and therefore a specifically moral problem. Hatred endures to the extent that people institutionalize and teach it so that it passes from one generation to the next. Hatred divides the world between "us" and "them" so that "we" are, by definition, innocent victims and "they," by definition, are evil oppressors. From that point of view, "we" are ontologically different from "them." People who say racist things, in short, are racists. Reacting to what "they" say not only allows but also requires this level of cynicism, because, coming from "them," its correct interpretation must be the most sinister one possible. This dualistic worldview originates in a realm beyond the personal (although people sometimes nurse personal resentments until these lead them to join groups or adopt ideologies that do foster hatred). In short, I suggest, hatred is inherently evil (possibly the only thing that I would describe that way), not only if it gets out of control and actually harms others. Consequently, I disagree with those who argue that hatred can exist only among those who have the power to express it freely and openly.[21] Anyone can hate, and every adult is surely aware of what has always been a lamentable fact of life. I see no way to excuse anyone for hating. Doing that, in fact, would prevent poor and marginalized people (or women) from being moral agents at all, a notable form of condescension.

As for racial hatred, that brings me back to Humpty Dumpty's bizarre semantic theory: "When I use a word," Humpty Dumpty said, in rather a scornful tone, "it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less."[22] After three dizzy years of theatrical virtue-signaling, it is time for Democrats to stop calling Trump a racist, a white nationalist, a fascist or any other ugly name—and to acknowledge Antifa as the proverbial elephant standing in the corner of their own room. Trump's enemies insist on bringing him down at any cost, if not formally by removing him (never mind waiting for the next election) then at least informally by denouncing him as a "racist"[23] often enough to justify repeated refusals on moral grounds to cooperate with him on legislation.

There will always be disagreement over definitions. In order to carry on any worthwhile or even intelligible discussion, therefore, we must at least make our own definitions clear to everyone and defend them if necessary.

With this in mind, I propose a working definition of racism. Like anti-Semitism and many other destructive isms, I suggest, racism is a form of hatred. It must therefore involve the conscious urge to harm people on racial grounds. (I will not extend that criterion to include unconscious urges, because those are impossible to identify clearly.) From what I have observed in everyday life over more than a few decades, it seems clear to me that many people say ugly things about others but without any urge at all to harm them politically, economically or legally, let alone physically. They say these things for many reasons: anger over personal conflict, anger over being saddled with the morally dubious charge of collective guilt,[24] the indifference or contempt that they have come to expect from outsiders, verbal clumsiness, political opportunism and so on.

The name-calling that prevails is irrationally simple (which accounts for its prevalence among academics), shockingly childish (which accounts for its origin among students) and even primitive (which accounts for its prevalence among politicians). Moreover, it is contradictory. Those who argue for the supreme importance of words, after all, resort themselves to using words for the purpose of name-calling and therefore intimidation. They use quoted words, whether judiciously or insidiously, to manipulate public opinion. Instead of using their dominance in the House to cooperate with Republicans and legislate for the common good (including that of legal immigrants), they have used every conceivable excuse to take revenge on Trump—thus proving, as they have since the very day of his election, that his "paranoia" is grounded more in reality than in neurotic fantasy. Some Republicans do hate "others," but so do some Democrats—though not, of course, the same "others." In a world that relies on ideologically motivated political correctness to shame and silence adversaries, though, many people expect only Republicans or conservatives to apologize and repent for hating but give Democrats or progressives free passes for doing the very same thing. Not only are double standards morally wrong, they are counterproductive.

Words do matter, sure, and Trump does have a talent for choosing incendiary ones,[25] especially if he thinks that doing so might be politically useful by appealing to his core supporters. But so do many other things matter. Identity politics, or tribalism, is a universal human problem. Name-calling, however, is identity politics for the grade-school set.[26]

Illegal immigration

Racial mudslinging is a strategy that "progressives" use not only to defeat Trump but also to defeat his "conservative" policy on immigration (the latter strategy being one way of achieving the former). In this section, I discuss immigration, especially illegal immigration and open borders, in connection with (a) change and (b) compassion.

Change: As a politician, of course, Trump is legitimately subject to any legal expression of personal hostility toward him. But the government's "comprehensive" policy on immigration, or lack of it, is another matter. Conflict over that goes much deeper than anyone's attitude toward Trump. Much of this conflict is not so much about racial change but about change per se. I want to argue in this section that those who resist change—which is to say, conservatives—are not necessarily motivated by racism. Change, massive and sudden change, can be problematic enough without having anything to do with race.

Trump explicitly opposes illegal immigration,[27] not legal immigration. The latter always involves change, but the former involves sudden, dramatic and unforeseen change. Democrats, certainly those seeking the presidency in 2020, have consistently elided the difference between illegal and legal immigration. Moreover, they have added fuel to the fire by accusing everyone who opposes immigration, including illegal immigration, of "racism." They have thus transformed a debate over law, in short, into one over race. Massive and sudden waves of immigration, whether legal or illegal, always mean massive change. And one form of change is indeed demographic—which is to say, racial or ethnic. But another form of change is cultural. It is one thing to oppose those who want to preserve only their demographic characteristics. It is another thing, however, to oppose those who want to preserve their cultural traditions that so few people ask if everything new is necessarily an improvement. The current polarization and fragmentation of American society is new (though not unprecedented), but does that make it an improvement? The rise of National Socialism in Germany was surely new, moreover, but few people today would consider that to have been an improvement over Weimar democracy. Even in 1932, most Germans refused to vote for the Nazis.

After many decades of ads and commercials promoting products as "new and improved," it seems hardly surprising

For many Americans, especially millennials, tradition of any kind is now ready for the scrap heap of history: notions of marriage and the family; sexual relations at home and at work; legal reliance on due process and the presumption of innocence … all are hopelessly contaminated, they believe, by systemic sexism (presumably in the form of misogyny alone) and racism (presumably that of white people alone). Postmodernists insist that every boundary, in fact, is not only a "social construct" but also an evil product of our oppressive society; it must be "deconstructed," therefore, as thoroughly as possible. Many boundaries really are cultural artifacts, sure, and some of them serve no useful or edifying purpose. But creating boundaries—making distinctions—is precisely how every culture allows people to create order out of what would otherwise be chaos. Demanding an end to all distinctions means demanding an end to culture and therefore to human existence. But that would never convince the ideologues. Down with all of distinctions, they would say. What they have in mind is not a new society of inter-dependent citizens, though, but a collection of allied interest groups at best or of autonomous individuals at worst. Why do we need "arbitrary" cultural distinctions between masculinity and femininity, they ask (reasonably), or even between maleness and femaleness (unreasonably)? Enter the increasingly "fluid" and evanescent world of "gender" identities." (Even feminists are beginning to rebel against that ideological fashion, despite its origin in feminism, because they realize that the trans-gender movement endangers protections for women). Change, in short, has become a synonym for progress (except for environmental change, of course, which is a synonym for evil) and therefore, in some circles, an end in itself.

Now, where does all this leave people who want to maintain their cultural traditions? Do they really have no rational or moral case? Or, to put it another way, do their communities have no reason and no right to resist at least some change and thus to endure in some recognizable form? How could that be? Every historic human community, like every natural organism, has always tried to endure despite inevitable change. Some communities accept or even embrace gradual changes; others resist any change. But all of them seek ways of continuing from the past and into the future. They derive meaning and purpose by doing so. They confer identity by doing so. They not only offer members the hard-earned wisdom and beauty of earlier generations, so that they do not have to keep reinventing the proverbial wheel, but also require the loyalty and sometimes sacrifice of current generations in order to enrich later ones. This need for continuity, whether conscious or subconscious, is an inherent feature of living in human communities. Otherwise, why would anyone have created and perpetuated religious or even scientific traditions, often at great cost? It is no secret that traditional American communities of all religions and ethnicities are afraid of runaway change, of change taking on a life of its own. And how could it be otherwise? Outsiders, especially rich and highly educated people, look with contempt on them, but contempt is not a moral argument or even a rational argument. (In fact, I suggest, this contempt is often precisely what hides their own fear, a very different one, of lacking total control over themselves, over society or over both.)

Complicating this argument is the strong link, in some cases, between culture and ethnicity. This is very obvious in connection with religion. Episcopalians, for instance, have long been ethnically or racially integrated. Nonetheless, they all retain liturgical and theological traditions that originated in Britain. Some people want that, and others do not. In a free society, though, everyone may choose (no matter how difficult to do that on emotional grounds) whether to join or not join this or any other religious community. Some Christian communities are much more closely linked than Episcopalians are with ethnic origins. In America, for instance, many Eastern Orthodox communities function as ethno-religious ones.[28] Theologically, anyone can join; not all new members are ethnically Greek, Russian, Ukrainian, Serbian or whatever. But most of these communities do insist on preserving historic—which is to say, ethnic—customs such as foodways, costumes, languages, calendars, artistic and musical traditions. Moreover, they encourage endogamy, not exogamy. The link between ethnicity and religion is even more complicated for Jews. Judaism does not encourage proselytism among gentiles. Even so, anyone can become a Jew, even an Orthodox Jew, by converting to Judaism. And no convert remains gentile after conversion; the ritual (following many months of intense preparation) makes them not only adherents of the Jewish religion but also members of the Jewish people.

So, do these religious or even ethno-religious communities have a right to endure in America? Some "progressives" argue that religion—they refer mainly to Christianity—no longer has any legitimate place in the public square (and by implication to endure).[29] Americans have been arguing about this for a long time, ever since the Founders created a "wall" to separate church and state. If so, then we must abolish religion (something that the Soviets tried to do) or invent secular religions (something that both the Soviets and the Nazis tried to do). If not, however, then we must recognize the right of every religious community to preserve its distinctive identity. And that would mean defending their "borders"[30] with "fences" or "walls" and other ways of "gate-keeping." It would be folly to accept converts to Judaism, for instance, who insist on interpreting the Torah in ways that support Christianity.[31] Doing that would lead quickly and inevitably to communal disappearance.

My main point here, though, is not about the continuity of religious or even ethno-religious continuity. It is about the continuity of any community from the smallest enclave to the nation as a whole. Newcomers are generally welcome if they arrive legally, slowly and generally adopt local traditions. This is what most immigrants by far actually do—and if they themselves do not, their children do. But more than a few Democratic candidates go much further by advocating open borders, or unregulated immigration. Even existing immigration laws, therefore, are tantamount to racist ones. And how could it be otherwise for those who assume that systemic racism has always prevailed and still prevails (which is what Democratic presidential candidate Beto O'Rourke argues.)?[32] In that case, then any attempt even to question the supreme value of "diversity" amounts to racism.

Candidates for the presidency never actually say that, of course, because they claim to be patriots. They want not to destroy national traditions, let alone the nation or the state itself, but merely to enhance, purify or perfect it by removing flaws. And when it comes to changes that would abolish systemic sexism (in the forms of both misogyny and misandry) or systemic racism (whether white or black or any other color), I can hardly disagree with them. Trouble is, some people on both the left and the right show no sign of understanding the limits, whether practical or moral, of change. This is why any attempt to stop or slow change becomes "immoral" (which is what Nancy Pelosi said glibly, perhaps unthinkingly, about Trump's wall).[33] They show no sign of understanding the profound difference, in short, between reform and revolution. Reform is a gradual process that rests on a foundation of emerging consensus. Revolution is a sudden intervention, whether by radically altering the legal, societal or economic system (as it would for a growing number on the political left) or by armed insurrection (as it would for a growing number on the political right). Either way, revolution rests on a foundation of ideology (such as feminism or socialism on the left and white supremacy on the right).

Here is another example, one that I know from personal experience, of the ambiguous relation between change and continuity. I live in Montreal, which is the largest and most cosmopolitan city in Quebec. For as long as I can remember, anglos and francos here have argued about the need for, and the possible results of, separation from Canada. As an anglo, I feel threatened by the rhetoric of separation. And yet I am not immune to all arguments of the separatists. Francos want to be independent, as they once were under the ancient regime.[34] At the very least, they want to protect their cultural identity. In the past, that would have meant the French language, the Roman Catholic religion (both granted to them, along with the Napoleonic Code of law by Britain's Quebec Act of 1774), large families, local foodways and so on. Now, it means only the French language, which might otherwise disappear in the continental "sea" of English. For most francos, in short, this is not about race. In fact, because of their very low birthrate, they have supported immigration from franco countries in Africa and the Middle East. But where does all that leave anglos (who have been here since the eighteenth century) and immigrants (some of whom have been here almost as long and adopted either French of English as their second languages)? I do not agree to the separation of Quebec from Canada, because I give moral priority to what brings people together, not what separates them. But I do accept the urge to protect French as Quebec's majority language—and English, too, as Quebec's minority language. Neither community wants, with good reason, to be "replaced" by the other.

The parallel between Anglos in Quebec and Mexican or Central American migrants to the United States is, I must admit, somewhat loose. Anglos are not, after all, recent immigrants. They have lived in Quebec for over two hundred years. English rule established the democratic institutions of Quebec. Scottish entrepreneurs built the industrial infrastructure of Quebec. Anglos no longer dominate either politically or economically. In my opinion, though, Anglos do have a right to be "at home" in Quebec and even cultural protection as a minority. Like it or not, history is what it is. Settlers from France and Britain created the two "founding nations" of Canada.[35] Montreal, at any rate, is largely bicultural and bilingual (but could be much more so).

The parallel is nonetheless instructive in ways that are germane to this essay. Like the United States, Quebec (and Canada as a whole) must still regulate the flow of immigration. Francos would reject a massive and sudden influx of illegal immigrants, no matter what their ethnic origin, and with good reason. That would almost inevitably mean (in the context of a democratic society) the end of their distinctive cultural tradition and historical continuity.

Compassion: Underlying the conflict over change, however, is a deeper one over the meaning of "compassion." Etymologically, that word refers to "suffering with" others, vicariously if not actually. By doing so, empathy becomes possible. And empathy is a moral virtue and therefore involves behavior, not merely an emotion. Otherwise, religious leaders could not command it. For Christians this "golden rule" is, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. For Jews, it is, "Do not do unto others as you would not have them do unto you." No one seriously disagrees over the need to treat all people, including immigrants, with the dignity that we would expect for ourselves. The only question is over what that entails—which is to say, in the case of illegal immigration, the effect on society as a whole of establishing open borders (or of not enforcing the immigration system that already exists).

Consider another historical venue for compassion. During the 1960s, one country after another adopted some form of no-fault divorce. Why should unhappy couples have to remain married? Why should unhappily married people not be free to remarry? And why should divorced people have to suffer, in any case, from any stigma? No-fault divorce, after all, means that no-one is guilty, at least not legally. But this kind of compassion created two new problems to replace the old one.

No-fault divorce was a disaster for children. Single mothers needed to earn money, of course, unless courts awarded them lavish alimony or the fathers were able to make lavish (and regular) child-support payments. But if single mothers had to get jobs, then who would look after the children? At the time, experts reassured them by claiming that children needed only "quality time" with their mothers (and possibly no time at all with their fathers). Children, they argued, were "resilient" and could adjust easily enough to "change." (Yes, there is that word again.) Now, though, we know better. Many longitudinal studies over the past half-century have indicated clearly, consistently and unambiguously that children of divorce are at much greater risk than other children for every kind of social and psychological problem. Children were bystanders in that experiment in social engineering. And nothing in that respect has changed. At first, no one even thought about the effect that gay marriage might have on children. The argument was over adult rights, period. After a while, to answer counter-arguments, advocates of gay marriage claimed that the children of two parents (two mothers or two fathers) were surely better off than the children of single parents. To make that argument, they had to believe that mothers and fathers are interchangeable and that children therefore do not need both fathers are mothers. But no one knew that during the rush for "equal marriage," and no one could have known that, because social scientists had not yet produced any longitudinal studies. In other words, children were once again the subjects of an experiment—subjects who were incapable of giving their informed consent.

But no-fault divorce, much more than gay marriage, has been very problematic for not only for the couples personally involved but also for society in general. Whatever the intentions of legislators, this measure weakened marriage and therefore the family—which is to say, the most fundamental institution of any society. It meant that the personal happiness, especially the personal freedom, of every individual outweighed all other considerations. In short, it both reflected and contributed to the hedonism of Western societies. From this point of view, compassion for the few can easily, but foolishly, outweigh compassion for the many.

Back now, though, to immigration. In terms of compassion alone, it is surely true that people should be free to live wherever they want to live. Why deny people the "right" to live freely and happily on one side of the border with Mexico instead of languishing on the other side? Many millions of people—and not only in Mexico or Central America—would flock with good reason to the United States if not to escape persecution then to realize the "American dream." We have no reason not to assume that most immigrants by far, both legal and illegal, would work hard to build better lives for their children (as millions of them already do and always have). But even those who would disregard the potential difficulty of social or cultural integration on such a colossal scale would surely find it hard to ignore the potential difficulty of economic integration. That would entail not only finding jobs for all newcomers, for instance, but also paying them fairly instead of exploiting them as cheap labor. Moreover, it would entail the draining of other countries, leaving them with populations of those who are too old or too sick for emigration—which would make it even easier than it already is for dictatorial regimes to exploit and intimidate them. Maybe American society could absorb millions of newcomers quickly and easily, but maybe not. And if not, then its compassion for the newcomers, let alone society as a whole, would come to nothing. In an ideal world, there would be no borders. But this is not, of course, an ideal world.

Misandry

My general focus in this essay has been on race, so far, because so many of the battles between Trump and his adversaries have relied on the political and ideological rhetoric of race—that is, attacking the president as a "racist" over and over again. But the political and ideological rhetoric of "gender" is never far away these days. Trump's adversaries routinely accuse him and his supporters of "sexism" or "misogyny," although they seldom acknowledge their own sexism in the form of misandry. Consider the perpetrators of racial terrorism: almost all of whom are white men. And I am by no means alone in seeing a link between racism and sexism. I might well be alone, however, in how I interpret that link. In this section, I want to discuss the perpetrators it in connection with (a) the loss of a healthy masculine identity and (b) the loss of fatherhood.

The loss of a healthy masculine identity: California's Governor Gavin Newsome blames the mass shooting in El Paso on "toxic masculinity"[36] (or what the American Psychological Association calls "traditional masculinity").[37] But is that really the link that explains why many of those who resort to domestic terrorism are young men who support white identity politics? There is an underlying link, I suggest, but it's not ideology. Consider this hypothesis.

All people need healthy identities, both personal and collective. But what makes an identity healthy or unhealthy? To have a healthy identity, I suggest, they must be able to make at least one contribution to society that is (a) distinctive, (b) necessary and (c) publicly valued. Until very recently, in historical terms, men could (and had to) do this. No matter how much notions of masculinity have varied, both historically and cross-culturally, they had that much in common. But men can no longer do anything that women cannot do (although women can still do at least one thing that men cannot do). Women can provide resources for themselves and their children, for instance, or protect themselves and their children—if not alone then with help from the state.

Add to apparent obsolescence the relatively recent problem of misandry, the form of sexism that now prevails in the journalistic or academic public square. Feminists have not directly caused the identity crisis of young men, which has been centuries in the making,[38] but they have greatly exacerbated it. They do so by relentlessly shaming men, blaming men collectively for every evil since the dawn of human history. This is what I call identity harassment.[39] They do so by manipulating both popular culture[40] and elite culture[41] to promote contempt for men. They do so for political reasons: to establish the doctrine of men's collective guilt and that of women's collective innocence. They do so by undermining even the most basic legal principles, such as due process and the presumption of innocence, to intimidate and punish men collectively. Women are not guilty for what men do, but they are surely responsible, accountable, for their own behavior.

From all this, it seems clear to me, that an increasing number of men, young men, come to the conclusion that even an unhealthy identity might be better than no identity at all. These are the ones who, given personal problems[42] and pathologies, turn to violence. For young white men, this sometimes means the kind of racial violence that we associate with white nationalism. They adopt this racial framework, because it remains so much easier to acknowledge their frustration in racial terms than it is to do so in sexual terms (although a few mass shooters do so).[43]

Why would it be easier to feel like a victim of racism than a victim of sexism? It might be at least partly because culture has conditioned everyone to think of men as so powerful that no one could possibly harm them in any way. The ideal of manhood in some communities, especially those of poor whites, is invincibility or invulnerability. A masculine man is always in control, presumably, of his own destiny. When reality contradicts this naïve ideal, therefore, it contradicts their identity as men. They are typically losers, as individuals, never the captains of their high-school football teams or alpha males of any other kind. Some take refuge in the rhetoric of race, therefore, because it provides an accessible model. White people and men are the only two groups that society singles out in the public square not only for contempt but also for retribution. One application of "intersectionality" is to curse white men collectively for evil on not one but two counts.

Many poor white people collectively reject the elite description of themselves as primitive, hateful or stupid (which is what Hillary Clinton did at a fundraising event for her presidential campaign).[44] This is one way of fighting back against a politically correct world that either ignores them or shames and blames them by imposing collective guilt on them alone. Unfortunately, some turn this class struggle against elite white people into a racial one against black people, Jews, "immigrants" or other scapegoats. This communal paradigm is already out there and becomes attractive to young men who lack healthy identities not only as whites but also as men. It can become lethal in conjunction with personal psychopathology.

The loss of fatherhood: Is there any hope for these men and other men to establish healthy identities specifically as men? Actually, there is one possibility. The one remaining way for men to make a distinctive and necessary contribution to society is by becoming fathers (actually or vicariously). Unfortunately, many people have come to believe that fatherhood amounts to assistant motherhood at best and a luxury or even a liability at worst. Moreover, they have come to believe that the family is either obsolete or infinitely variable. But humans have evolved to live in families, and family structures are not infinitely varied (the closest to universal, until very recently in the West, being the extended family). Recently, psychologists have observed that fathers are not quite the same as mothers. Sociologists have observed that more and more fathers spend time at home with their children. They refer mainly, however, to fathers of infants and very young children. I suggest, though, that their specific functions as fathers begin when their children are no longer infants, when they begin to enter the larger world and prepare to leave home. Moreover, I suggest that the most important non-material thing that fathers can give their children is not unconditional love (which is the most important non-material thing that mothers can give their children) but earned respect. That, after all, is precisely what they will need as mature adults from their peers.

If I am correct, our most urgent need is not necessarily more gun legislation or red-flag interventions (although both would be helpful). We need ultimately to assert the distinctive and necessary function of fatherhood, thus allowing men to create a healthy collective identity and invest in the future of society. To do that, we'd have to acknowledge misandry as a serious problem, challenging the "toxic" portrayal of men that flows from both popular culture and elite (academic) culture; encourage research on boys and men, especially fathers; and reconsider laws or policies that deny men due process and shared custody of children. Moreover, we'd have to reconsider single-mothers-by-choice and gay marriage (both of which deny the right of children to have both mothers and fathers). It would be to assert what our ancestors took for granted: the distinctive and necessary function of fathers.

Taking the currently despised members of society seriously and compassionately will not happen overnight. In fact, the prospect of dialogue between men and women, let alone other sexual or racial groups, has probably never been so daunting. But the alternative, passively succumbing to polarizing and paralyzing hatred in ever more forms, which lies at the core of all identity politics, would leave us with an even more dismal prospect: a society that would not be worthy of enduring.

Epilogue: I wrote this paper before Trump's impeachment and before anyone had ever heard of covid-19. The same pattern emerged in early 2020, however, with Trump's implacable enemies blaming him for "fiddling" while Rome burned—which is to say, trivializing the pandemic before taking action against it. Never mind that he quickly prevented all flights into the country from China, where the pandemic originated. That, of course, generated politically correct accusations of racism.[45] Next, Trump set up a committee of medical and other specialists. Did he always agree with them? No. But did he insist on having his own way, getting the nation back to work by Easter? No. The accusers continued night after night on CNN, as if this were a second act of the impeachment show. As usual, they relied largely on ad hominem arguments. Whatever happened or failed to happen, it was Trump's fault (even though earlier presidents of both parties had neglected to prepare for the next pandemic and therefore to provide enough ventilators for patients in overcrowded hospitals. Whatever Trump said was wrong, even though others had shown the same attitude only days or weeks earlier—not only wrong or even foolish, in fact, but gross indifference to human suffering. This became clear as soon as Trump announced that Americans must soon get back to work. Oh, said the critics, that proves that he cares more about money than about people, let alone sick people. After a few weeks of dire news from Wall Street and interviews with the experts, though, it became clear to almost everyone that massive unemployment could easily lead to another Great Depression, an economic catastrophe for the entire nation. It would have been hard to watch these "discussions" and fail to see visceral hatred toward the man himself. Meanwhile, few of Trump's enemies in Congress—real enemies, not imagined ones—had better track records for prophecy. Nancy Pelosi, for instance, was among those who tried to exploit the medical crisis for political purposes by adding money in the emergency budget for "green" projects that had nothing to do with any disease.[46] The fact is that almost everyone in almost every country had taken too long in reacting to what became an urgent problem.[47] As I say, hatred is not anger. Far from being a spontaneous emotion due to personal conflict, hatred is culturally propagated and even institutionalized worldview.

♦♦♦

[1] On the right are marginal but increasingly desperate groups, known variously as "fascists" and "white nationalists" or "white supremacists." Their more powerful allies, presumably, are "conservatives" or "Republicans." On the left are far more prestigious and culturally powerful groups, known variously as the "woke," "postmodernists," "feminists," "socialists" and "progressives" but also as "liberals" or "Democrats."

[2] By "polarization," I mean the fragmentation of society into intensely conflicting identity groups, mainly racial and sexual (although, in other countries, these groups would include linguistic, religious and other identity groups).

[3] See, for example, Libby Emmons and Barrett Wilson, "Google Shows Its True Colours with Defamation of Mainstream Conservatives," Post Millennial, 27 June 2019; .thepostmillennial.com/google-shows-its-true-colours-with-defamation-of-mainstream-conservatives/?utm_source=The+Post+Millennial+Bite+Sized+News&utm_campaign=1f720495d1-EMAIL_CAMPAIGN_2019_06_27_06_03&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_dfff09204e-1f720495d1-197710731; Ryan P. Williams, "Our Brush With Google Censorship; The Claremont Institute Criticized the Orthodoxies of Multiculturalism. The Company Banned Our Ads," Wall Street Journal, 7 May 2019; wsj.com/articles/our-brush-

with-google-censorship-11557268757?mod=itp_wsj&mod=&mod=djemITP_h; and Dennis Prager, "Don't Let Google Get Away With Censorship," Wall Street Journal, 6 August 2019; wsj.com/articles/dont-let-google-get-away-with-censorship-11565132175?mod=itp_wsj&mod=&mod=djemITP_h

[4] Susan Brownmiller, Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1975). Now considered a feminist classic, it has been in print ever since.

[5] These women might have suspected that Trump would oppose abortion (although he had not always opposed it), but their main claim was that he had "bragged" (in the leaked video of Access Hollywood) about "sexually assaulting" women. Like so many allegations to come, however, this one offered evidence of no such thing. Trump was bragging, to be sure, but not about sexually assaulting anyone. He was bragging about his alpha male status, which supposedly had the effect of making him unusually attractive to women—so attractive, he said, that they would allow him to "do anything" (which referred to groping, not rape). Whether he actually had any insight during these encounters is, of course, another matter entirely.

[6] Lewis Carroll, Through the Looking-Glass (Raleigh, North Carolina: Hayes Barton Press, 1872), p. 72.

[7] Jelani Cobb, "Donald Trump, Elijah Cummings, and the Definition of a Rodent," New Yorker, 29 July 2019. Trump did not call the people of Baltimore rats or other rodents; he said only that they had to endure infestations because their Democratic regimes had failed to solve that and many other problems. Why would anyone, black or white, want to live there? Trump was attacking Cummings, because Cummings had attacked him. Trump allows personal grudges to take priority over political wisdom. His words were very clumsy, to be sure, especially at a time when verbal conflicts often seem more important than economic ones. But that is not necessarily the same as racism.

[8] Niolas Kristof, "Mr. Trump, Meet a Hero Whom You Maligned," New York Times, 22 January 2018.

[9] David Leonhardt and Ian Prasad Philbrick, New York Times, 15 January 2018.

[10] Charles M. Blow, "Trump Is a Racist. Period," New York Times, 22 January 2018.

[11] John Cassidy, "A Racist in the Oval Office," New Yorker, 12 January 2018.

[12] David Brooks, "Shields and Brooks on Trump's 'shole' Comments; 'Fire and Fury' Fallout," PBS News Hour, 12 January 2018; https://www.pbs.org/newshour/show/shields-and-brooks-on-trumps-shole-comments-fire-and-fury-fallout#transcript).

[13] Jon Campbell, "Kirsten Gillibrand's Clorox Line Was a Big Hit; She Honed It on the Campaign Trail First," Democrat and Chronicle, 1 August 2019; democratandchronicle.com/story/news/politics/albany/2019/08/01/kirstin-gillibrand-clorox-line-democratic-debate-campaign-trail/1887945001/

[14] Libby Emmons and Barrett Wilson, "Tribalism Is Terrorizing America," Post Millennial, 9 [?] August 2019; https://www.thepostmillennial.com/tribalism-is-terrorizing-america/?utm_source=The+Post+Millennial+Bite+Sized+News&utm_campaign=d6f52ce805-EMAIL_CAMPAIGN_2019_08_09_07_44&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_dfff09204e-d6f52ce805-197710731

[15] Some acts of domestic terrorism, such as the Dayton shooting only a few hours after the one in El Paso, have no ideological context at all. A few, such as the "Congressional baseball shooting" in 2017, have roots in ideologies of the left.

[16] Paul Nathanson, "Sowing the Wind, Reaping the Whirlwind: Identity Politics, Ideology and the Contagion of Hatred," New Males Studies 7.2 (2018): 80-94; http://www.newmalestudies.com/OJS/index.php/nms/index

[17] The Squad members are: Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez; Rashida Tlaib; Ayanna Pressley; Ilhan Omar.

[18] Contrary to the self-image that the Democratic Party cultivates, trying to distinguish itself from the Republican Party, it failed to denounce in unequivocal terms the "Squad's" habit of making anti-Semites or anti-Zionists remarks. A matter of interpretation? Maybe. But that is definitely not what Democrats say about bigoted Republican remarks.

[19] Hostility toward religious Jews is another phenomenon. That comes primarily from the political right. Consider the 2018 shooting at a synagogue in Pittsburgh, for example, and the 2019 shooting at one near San Diego. In these cases, hostility came from the political right.

[20] See, for example, J. Oliver Conroy, "Panic Attack: A Wake-up Call the Woke Won't Read," review of Robby Sauve, Panic Attack: Young Radicals in the Age of Trump, Guardian, 28 July 2019; amazon.com/Panic-Attack-Young-Radicals-Trump/dp/1250169887/ref=sr_1_1?keywords=panic+attack+soave&qid=1563551175&s=gateway&sr=8-1?CMP=book_embed_box

[21] Jessica Valenti, "Feminists Don't Hate Men, But It Wouldn't Matter If We Did." Guardian, 13 March 2015; theguardian.com/commentisfree/2015/mar/13/feminists-do-not-hate-men. See also Julie Bindel, "Why I Hate Men." Guardian, 2 November 2006; theguardian.com/commentisfree/2006/nov/02/whyihatemen [22] Carroll, ibid.

[23] Other popular names for Trump would be "misogynist" or "colluder."

[24] Identity politics relies heavily on the notion of collective guilt, because that point of view assumes that people are not individuals at all but representatives of their class, sex, race or whatever. Even a good white man is still a white man, therefore, and deserves collective punishment for the privilege that other white men, even in the remote past, created for themselves. Collective guilt has a long and dismal history. Consider the Christian idea that all Jews, of whatever time and place, are collectively guilty of "deicide." God, according to this point of view, has cursed them eternally; they deserve, therefore, to be humiliated, isolated, banished or burned. Nazi ideology merely translated this theology into secular terms.

[25] For whatever reason, Trump chose the wrong words to explain Charlottesville. By saying that there were "fine people on both sides," he allowed an incendiary interpretation. Did he want to include as "fine" those who had resorted to violence? Or did he want to include only people on both sides of a debate?

[26] Hannah Selinger, "It Might Be Time To Cut My Right-Wing, Trump-Loving In-Laws Out Of My Kids' Lives," Huffington Post, 7 August 2019; huffpost.com/entry/trump-cutting-off-relatives_n_5d448ed4e4b0ca604e31f5ba. The author attacks her in-laws for their intolerance but reveals precisely the same intolerance, preferring to isolate her children from ideological contamination instead of teaching them to argue effectively against those who disagree with them.

[27] It was in the specific context of illegal immigration that Trump referred to the "rapists" and "criminals" among them.

[28] But one Orthodox denomination, the Orthodox Church in America, has focused heavily on Orthodox theology, not ethnicity.

[29] I say "by implication to endure," because religion is never an entirely private matter for isolated individuals. Rather, it is an inherently communal matter to be enacted both privately and publicly. Even Theravada Buddhism, which is primarily a philosophy for those seeking personal enlightenment (and thus attractive to Western intellectuals), flourishes in Buddhist countries not only within the sangha (monastic community) but also the larger community.

[30] For Jews, the word "wall" can have positive connotations. Ghetto walls in Europe, for instance, meant not only isolation from Christians but also protection from Christians. Of greater importance here, though, is what the rabbis have called a "fence around the Torah." By this, they mean rabbinic interpretations of biblical law in order to make it as unlikely as possible for Jews to overlook or trivialize divine commandments (as in “better safe than sorry”).

[31] Jews are well aware of the need for this boundary, because there are movements—notably that of the Hebrew Christians—that rely heavily on the possibility of being both Jewish and Christian. Insisting on this boundary between Jews and Christians relies not only on theology but also on historical memory: a long history of Christian anti-Judaism which led first to religious persecution and then, in the secular form of anti-Semitism, to racial persecution.

[32] Julio Rosas, “Beto O’Rourke: ‘This Country Was Founded on White Supremacy,’” Washington Examiner, 10 July 2019; washingtonexaminer.com/news/beto-orourke-this-country-was-founded-on-white-supremacy. “Here we are in Nashville,” said O’Roarke. “I know this from my home state of Texas, those places that formed the Confederacy, that this country was founded on white supremacy and every single institution and structure that we have in our country still reflects the legacy of the slavery and segregation and Jim Crow and suppression, even in our democracy.” There can be no doubt that racial slavery tainted the new republic and its institutions. Nor can there be any doubt that racism continued long after the Civil War (which had been fought over racial slavery). But there can be no doubt also that those institutions no longer enforce or encourage racism.

[33] Eric Zorn, “Pelosi Says Border Walls are ‘Immoral.’ But That’s Not the Conversation We Need to Be Having Right Now,” Chicago Tribune, 11 January 2019; https://www.chicagotribune.com/columns/eric-zorn/ct-perspec-zorn-nancy-pelosi-says-border-walls-are-immoral-but-that-s-not-the-conversation-we-need-to-be-having-20190111-story.html. One argument in favor of open borders rests on the notion of a universal right for all people to go wherever they want to go, which means wherever they see opportunities for better lives. That is a moral argument, to be sure, but it fails to account for reality—which is not a good sign, because moral reasoning is not daydreaming about utopia but making hard choices in the world as it is. Worse, it relies on a childish premise: all or nothing. To put it bluntly, there can be no such thing as a state, by definition, that either cannot or will not defend its own borders. The proper goal of any state should be to regulate immigration in ways that would offer a safe haven to refugees from persecution (which Americans have been doing since the colonial period) but also strengthen the nation by selecting non-refugees carefully and in relation to its economic conditions (which is what all modern democracies do).

[34] Actually, they were never independent under the ancient regime. On the contrary, they were colonial settlers under the governance of France. What modern francos want is not some nostalgic restoration of New France but independence from anglo Canada.

[35] Both nations conveniently forgot about the tribal peoples who had lived there for thousands of years.

[36] Paul Bois, “California Gov. Gavin Newsom: Mass Shootings Caused By Toxic Masculinity,” Daily Wire, 6 August 2019; dailywire.com/news/50302/california-gov-gavin-newsom-mass-shootings-caused-paul-bois

[37] Fredric Rabinowitz and others, APA Guidelines for Psychological Practice with Boys and Men, Washington, D.C., American Psychological Association, 2018; apa.org/about/policy/psychological-practice-boys-men-guidelines.pdf.

[38] Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young, Replacing Misandry: A Revolutionary History of Men (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 2015). In this volume, we examine changing perceptions of the male body, its ability to make a distinctive and necessary contribution to society, through a series of technological and cultural revolutions beginning with Neolithic invention of horticulture, the Agricultural Revolution (ten to twelve thousand years ago), the Industrial Revolution, the Military Revolution (“universal” conscription as the price for full citizenship), the Sexual Revolution, the Biological Revolution and so on. Our point is that the current identity problem of men did not emerge out of the blue or due to the current, and legitimate, campaign for sexual equality.

[39] Paul Nathanson, “If Not Now, When? Acknowledging Sexual Harassment and Identity Harassment,” New Male Studies 6.2 (2017): 1-56. I define this problem as the functional equivalent for men (who are the only targets) of sexual harassment for women (although some men, too, are targets of sexual harassment). Like sexual harassment, as now defined, identity harassment can take forms both serious (unfounded allegations of rape) and trivial (everything from jokes to “manspreading” or “mansplaining”).

[40] Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young, Spreading Misandry: The Teaching of Contempt for Men in Popular Culture (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 2001).

[41] Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young, Legalizing Misandry: From Public Shame to Systemic Discrimination against Men (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 2006). Part One is about the journalistic assault on men in connection with high-profile moral panics. Part Two is about the legal assault on men. We wrote this volume before the rise of #MeToo, “trauma informed” legal proceedings and the Obama administration’s “Dear Colleague” revision of Title IX, all of which discouraged due process and the presumption of innocence. Consequently, society has given informal permission for vigilantes to bypass and thus undermine the legal system itself.

Another academic venue of elite culture is theology (known in some circles as “thealogy”). This was our topic in Sanctifying Misandry: Goddess Ideology and the Fall of Man (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 2010).

[42] Among the problems of many is a growing up in a fatherless home. Far more young men from fatherless homes do not end up as mass murderers. But it would be naïve to imagine that fatherlessness is not a risk factor.

[43] Two of these unusual cases, both Canadians for some reason, would be Marc Lépine (who shot fourteen women at the École Polytechnique de Montréal in 1989) and Alek Minassian (the “incel” who drove his van into a Toronto crowd, killing 10 people. Most of the victims were women, although the police found no evidence of an intention to kill only women.

[44] Dan Merica and Sophie Tatum, “Clinton Expresses Regret for Saying ‘Half’ of Trump Supporters Are ‘Deplorables,’” CNN News, 12 September 2016; cnn.com/2016/09/09/politics/hillary-clinton-donald-trump-basket-of-deplorables/index.html. Clinton placed Trump supporters in her metaphorical “basket of deplorables” and must have regretted her carelessness immediately. She apologized next day, 8 September 2016, but it was probably too late to save her campaign; the expression had already gone viral.

[45] Lorne Gunter, “Political Correctness Got in the Way of a Swift COVID-19 Response,” National Post, 31 March 2020; nationalpost.com/opinion/columnists/gunter-political-correctness-got-in-the-way-of-a-swift-covid-19-response/wcm/ae8c0720-3268-4b5a-92fc-eac9317717d0?video_autoplay=true

[46] Noah Rothman, “The Climate ‘Crisis’ and the Present Crisis,” Commentary, 23 March 2020; commentarymagazine.com/noah-rothman/the-climate-crisis-and-the-present-crisis/?utm_source=ActiveCampaign&utm_medium=email&utm_content=A+Frivolous+People+No+Longer&utm_campaign=Daily+newsletter+03%2F25%2F20

[47] Noah Rothman, “The Coronavirus in Perfect Hindsight,” Commentary, 1 April 2020; https://www.commentarymagazine.com/noah-rothman/the-coronavirus-in-perfect-hindsight/?utm_source=ActiveCampaign&utm_medium=email&utm_content=The+Rise+of+the+Immunity+Caste&utm_campaign=Daily+newsletter+04%2F03%2F20. See also Holman W. Jenkins, Jr., “Trump Is Not the Coronavirus,” Wall Street Journal, 7 April 2020; wsj.com/articles/trump-is-not-the-coronavirus-11586300015?mod=itp_wsj&mod=&mod=djemITP_h

Gender Matters, episode #3 – Professor Janice Fiamengo

AVfM Video Source · 21 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Victim of Botched Circumcision Speaks

AVfM Video Source · 21 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Some of us are more equal than others

Mark Dent · 22 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists *are f*ascinating.

The fascination I have is similar to the way a person can be transfixed by something so distasteful and shocking that they cannot look away.

The endless examples of their cognitive dissonance are indisputable proof of the corruption of their ideology.

I was reading an editorial today which urged Australians to make sure they acknowledged and paid homage to our fallen servicemen and women on ANZAC Day despite the fact there is a lockdown due to the Corona virus.

One paragraph struck home and stirred the fiery embers in my gut into a flaming inferno!

> An early start to the day is no big ask to pay respects to the men and women of our armed services who saw and endured the hellish conditions of war, so we could be spared from it.

I know I have written at length about this issue before but if it is good enough for our media to ram it down my throat on annual basis then I can respond to this feminist inspired crap with the same regularity.

The editorial continues:

> Those who survived still carry the scars-both physical and mental, and many never spoken of-from their time in action.
>
> For one day a year they are reunited with their comrades who truly understand the traumas they have encountered.
>
> As tough as it is losing jobs, being isolated from family and friends, and enjoying less freedom of movement, it pales compared with the impact war zones have had on so many Australians, men and women.

Yes sir!

Thousands of grey- haired women fill our pubs and clubs, sharing their war stories and the memories of girlfriends who had their brains blown out or were disemboweled by shrapnel. You see them all over Melbourne. And one's heart simply aches as you watch the ever-thinning ranks of old women limping down Swanston Street, medals proudly displayed as they wave to the grateful, adoring masses.

If ever there was an example of the feminist capacity to grab the spotlight in order to share centre stage with men who actually earned their day in the sun, it is this. Sadly, we have to endure it every year. It is shameful and I cannot understand why sane women do not raise a voice in protest at this historical revisionism.

What is most galling is that feminists love to trot out that old canard that men cause all the wars and the atrocities which inevitably occur and that such conflict would never occur under female leadership.

They are quick to distance themselves from any of the negative connotations associated with the gruesome reality of war, whilst being ready to jump right on board the war wagon when the accolades and thanks are being given.

Before anyone mentions that a tiny minority of females have indeed served overseas in the past twenty to thirty years, even then, most of them are kept well away from the frontlines.

So, women share equal footing and recognition with men when sacrifice in times of war is mentioned regardless of the enormous disparity in victims.

Compare this feminist approach to war with their approach to domestic violence. One third of all victims of domestic violence are men. More than 50% of the children murdered in family violence incidents are murdered by women, yet men are never mentioned in any speech, campaign or advertisement about this societal scourge other than as perpetrators. Women are never mentioned as anything other than victims.

It is all a gigantic lie sold to a gullible public.

How difficult would it be for the compassionate, caring feminists who are so concerned about victims of family violence to say: Family violence is an issue which affects the lives of men, women and children all over Australia. Let's find a way to end this terrible, damaging abuse.

You know…equality. Genuine care and compassion for all.

Why is gender only specified when women are the majority of those affected, albeit by a small margin?

Any hint or suggestion that women may be drafted in time of war leads to anxious, breathless explanations as to why this is a misunderstanding of what true equality means.

> "The Norwegian Association for Women's Rights (NKF) considers female conscription as a misunderstanding of the concept of gender equality and the intentions of the Law on Equality.
>
> Gender equality implies first and foremost that women and men should have the same human rights and fundamental freedoms. Women should be valued and allocated power and resources on equal terms with men. But women and men do not have to be alike or do the same things to be equal.
>
> To ensure gender equality it is important in many cases that women and men are treated equally.
>
> But they should not necessarily be treated equally in all situation"

Hilarious. They have a cop out for every occasion. Offered them a chance to enjoy male privilege and they hurl it back in your face!

They make it abundantly clear they don't want to be treated equally!

> In an online editorial for Playboy, Lucy Steigerwald, a contributing editor to Antiwar.com*, acknowledged that excluding women from draft registration was "unfair" and "sexist."*
>
> "But the solution to the decrepit notion that the young of the country are communal property is not to remove the sexism, it's to remove the draft," she wrote.
>
> "You don't stop the runaway truck of U.S. foreign policy by throwing a man in front of it, and you > definitely don't stop it by throwing a man and a woman, just to make things equal," Steigerwald wrote.

Or how about this comment from CodePink?

> "Women's equality will not be achieved by including women in a draft system that forces civilians to participate in activities that are against their will and harm others in large numbers, such as war. The draft is not a women's rights issue, as it does nothing to advance the cause of equality and functionally limits freedom of choice for Americans of all genders.
>
> "While we demand equal pay for women in all areas of our economy, it is irresponsible for the fight for women's rights to seek equal moral injury, equal PTSD, equal brain injury, equal suicide rates, equal lost limbs, or equal violent tendencies that military veterans suffer from. When it comes to the military, women's equality is better served by ending draft registration for everyone.

Suddenly they are very concerned about the men too!

> The argument that extending the [Selective Service] registration requirement to women is a way to help reduce gender-based discrimination is specious. It does not represent a move forward for women; it represents a move backward, imposing on young women a burden that young men have had to bear unjustly for many decades — a burden that no young person should have to bear at all. Even more disturbing, this argument fails to acknowledge or address the pervasive climate of sexism and sexual violence that is the reality of military life for many women who serve.

The doublespeak is truly remarkable and the panic is palpable.

How ironic that these very same women who grab any opportunity to speak of the noble fight of their suffragette heroes never mention the vicious campaign they initiated in order to shame boys (they were mostly boys) into going off to fight and die on the battlefields.

Now, when presented with the opportunity to redress the callous bigotry of the icons of their movement, they quiver and quake and refuse to answer the call. I wonder if Ms. Pankhurst and her gang would be demanding they do their duty or face shame and disgrace?

I think not.

After all, she thought it was only right and proper for the men on the Titanic to give up their lives so women could live.

> Some suffragettes, including Sylvia Pankhurst, of the militant Women's Social and Political Union (WSPU), showed scant regard for the sensitivities of the occasion, asserting that – as "women and children first" was the "universal" rule – the men's actions were not "chivalrous", and insisting their sacrifices did nothing to offset the shoddy way women were treated in everyday life.

The excerpt below lauds her work during WW1 and makes a passing reference to her championing of the White Feather Campaign, seemingly blithely including it in her resume of good works during that time.

> Emmeline put the same energy and determination she had previously applied to women's suffrage into patriotic advocacy of the war effort. She organised rallies, toured constantly delivering speeches, and lobbied the government to help women enter the work force while men were overseas fighting, even organising a parade of 30,000 women to encourage employers to take them on in industry.
>
> A supporter of conscription, she also became a prominent figure in the white feather movement (which handed white feathers, a sign of cowardice, to men in civilian dress to shame them into enlisting).*

> Another issue which concerned her greatly at the time was the plight of so-called war babies, children born to single mothers whose fathers were on the front lines. Emmeline established an adoption home at Campden Hill designed to employ the Montessori method of childhood education. Although this was turned over to Princess Alice due to lack of funds, Emmeline adopted four children herself.

Treat us women like men? The very same people we refer to as privileged every day.

Perish the thought!

The charade performed by feminists every day is torn away and exposed for the fraudulent, deceitful joke it is whenever there is the slightest chance that true equality is coming to a place near every one of them.

When the army wants to demonstrate how diverse it is they make sure they recruit more women by having physical testing standards lowered. Of course, the vast majority of these women will never face an enemy soldier in combat or be found anywhere near the frontlines of any war.

A woman hits a man in his face. He punches her face in retaliation.

Feminists brand him an abusive, sexist monster for daring to hit a woman!

Are women the same as men? Are women the physical equal of men, or are they fragile, weak and helpless?

Believing women are fragile and weak would surely be the only possible reason anyone could be upset when a man hits a woman in retaliation.

No woman would give a damn if a tiny man punched a larger man and got knocked out for his troubles. They would say he got what he deserved and he was a fool for punching a bigger man in the first place. I'm sure many who witnessed such an incident would laugh as the tiny, unconscious man was carried out of the bar.

So, is it possession of a vagina that grants this invisible protective shield rather than physical weakness?

Which is it? Are women powerful or are they fragile? Or does vagina ownership grant the possessor certain privileges unavailable to men?

I think we know the answer.

Women's durability in the building/roadworks industry is yet to be tested as all any female does here in Australia is hold the stop signs as the men dig, drill and climb telegraph poles. If the men held signs while the women dug the ditches it would soon be in the news and questions about the disappearance of chivalry and courtesy would abound.

This would not bother me in the slightest were it not for the endless girl power advertisements that flood our screens and the endless call for more women to enter the building industry and show the boys that anything they can do we can do better.

Fine.

If you are going to work alongside the men in the local council road crew then do it. But all one ever sees, without exception, is the female members of the roadside crew doing none of the heavy-lifting, digging and climbing but assuredly receiving the same pay cheque as their mud splattered, weary male counterparts.

Surely the day of reckoning will come and feminism's hateful and dishonest agenda will become a subject of much wonderment and examination as future academics try to understand how such a corrupt, bigoted ideology established on a base of lies and half-truths ever took root in Western culture and wrought so much damage.

Feminists do not understand evolution

Marcus Holden · 23 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Why are we expected to believe that nature has allowed our species to consist of half the population being fundamentally flawed (males), while the other half are in full working order (females)?

Everyone, at some point, has been impressed by the results of evolution, need I even mention them? What is of most interest here, is the strictness of the evolutionary net, in fact, it is this that defines the process of evolution. Flaws are rarely allowed into the next generation, and on the rare occasions that they are, they find themselves quickly extinguished.

Most people are fully aware of the brutal strictness of the selection process, yet to despite this, we are expected to accept a flaw, so extraordinary, so appalling, so fundamentally cloddish in its oversight, that it should force us to review our awe of nature, or even the great creator (should that be the working paradigm).

The accepted premise, that half our species is 'flawed', yet that same species has managed to dominate the planet. The belief is almost magical in its increadibility. What a phenomenal defiance against evolution this represents. If the mainstream premise that half our species (male) is 'non functioning' were actually true, just think about what a remarkable triumph in the face of a 'deal breaker' handicap, we have collectively managed. It goes against the grain of evolution so blatantly, that we have to either dispense with the theory of evolution, or dispense with the premise that half our species is flawed. They are mutually exclusive.

Let's just reflect on the degree of our triumph. Our species, homo-sapian has clearly been a success story. We have covered the entire planet, and moulded the terrain to suit our needs. We are clearly the species that has 'captured the globe'. Any alien studying the earth's history, and writing a thesis, would put several chapters aside, purely dedicated to the incredible success story of a single species…us. Clearly, something went right along the way.

To despite these points, we are expected to believe that half the human stock (xy) is fundamentally flawed. The span of this 'so called' inferiority, we are told, includes most of the factors that define our humanity: Intellect, morality, spirituality, empathy, compassion, planning, seeing the world from another vantage point, and mercy, plus more. If humans were software, we are lead to believe that males would be version 1.0 and females would be version 1.1.

We are also expected to accept that this bizarre biological model only applies to our species, all other organisms are exempt, that is, they have an insignificant number inferior units to be considered relevant. Nature has done its job just fine.

All other species, apparently have no need to worry about the quality of their populations. The templates used to make the individuals are in fine working order, whereas, with humans, the 'male' template is apparently seriously flawed. When you actually think about it, the whole concept is ridiculous, it's childlike in its simplicity. No biologist would ever seriously consider this as a viable evolutionary strategy.

Regarding all the non human species, we happily accept the output of millions of years of evolution, and why not? By definition, the existing organisms on earth are the 'winners'. The 'losers' genes have been sent down a blind alley to sink into obscurity, and yet here we are, by definition, part of the evolutionary 'success club', in fact, probably the most successful of the 'success club'.

Yet we humans who have taken control of the planet, we who outnumber the other primates by factors of thousands, we who have been to the moon and back, are told that only half our members are in fully working order.

By any definition of success, we are it. We own it, so, how could it possibly be true that only half the species is 'the full deal' and the other half, flawed? Simple biology would determine that we should see this model in other successful organisms, yet where are they? Could it be that we are the only species that operates on this 'half-working' / 'half- not working' system? Why would the process of evolution, brutal and strict as it is, allow this to happen? Why only use this bizarre model on a single species? Why not two, five, a hundred? If there is indeed, only one species burdened with 50% of flawed units, then how could it come to pass that it is the most successful species on the planet?

The conclusion is obvious. This ‘fem superior’ asymmetry model does not represent any logical consistency with the principles of biology. It is, at best, intellectually dishonest, more likely, it is an outright lie, or put another way, shameless propaganda that will put shame to our generation in years to come.

Ex porn-star and activist explores men’s rights issues | BBC Stories

AVfM Video Source · 23 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Teachers instructed to focus on women on ANZAC day this year

Mark Dent · 24 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

My article, Some of us are more equal than others was published only a couple of days ago.

The major focus of my article was the way in which the media promotes the lie that women stood side by side with men in the trenches and on the battlefields in past wars and suffered through the same hellish conditions and endured the same shocking trauma and loss. They insist women should share the stage with men on the day we pay tribute to the sacrifice of our soldiers who fought in countless wars during the past century.

Well, this wasn't as accurate an observation as it might have been for it appears women are no longer just sharing the stage with men as brave warriors but are in fact pushing the men to one side and standing alone in the full glare of the spotlight.

Today, as I was perusing the Herald Sun I came across this prominent headline:

Anzac Day 2020: School Program Highlights women on the frontline

What followed was no less astonishing than the headline.

> Schoolchildren will for the first time understand Anzac history is now more than just men in trenches with a new program highlighting the role of women on the frontline.

Oh yes-it's so much more than just men in trenches.

Let's shift the focus from those men who had their legs and arms ripped from their bodies, their brains splattered all over their mates, and guts spilt open by devastating artillery bombardments and shine it on the many women who have hovered for too long out of reach of the limelight they so richly deserve.

Our schoolchildren have for too long lived under the misapprehension that it was men who gave their lives, limbs and sanity so we could live in times of peace and plenty. This myth is going to be hurled into the dustbin of bogus history and replaced with the truth.

Read it for yourselves:

> Ten years ago Melissa Houston was filling her car with petrol at an Adelaide servo when the attendant looked her up and down.
>
> "They let women fly planes now do they?" he mused, staring at her flight suit.
>
> Shocking, hey?
>
> She nodded, smiled, paid and drove off mad.
>
> She was indeed flying and is now not only a squadron leader but is the first female flight commander of the RAAF's proud 11 Squadron, that since 1939 has defended the nation's coastline.
>
> Her promotion is one of the last few posts in the Australian Defence Force that hasn't had a woman at is head and comes as schoolchildren will for the first time this Anzac Day finally learn of women's roles in the ranks.

No. 11 Squadron C Flight Commander Squadron Leader Melissa Houston, is acknowledged for her significant appointment as part of International Women's Day 2020.

Schools, educational institutions and community groups have received a mass mail out of educational material ahead of this Anzac Day and for Term 2 lessons that focuses on contemporary wars and peacekeeping missions and critically the role of women*.*

In the past, those featured wartime roles have simply been at home in factories or clerical roles or "keeping the home fires burning" but now features active service on the frontline.

The Department of Veterans Affairs sees it as a win that will ensure the next generation of schoolchildren understand Diggers these days aren't just men.

"I remember to this day being really shocked that anyone would have that view or would voice it," Squadron Leader Houston recalled yesterday of her servo experience.

Why was Melissa Houston really shocked? The fact is women still make up a tiny fraction of pilots/soldiers in our army and they rarely if ever take part in battles fought or find themselves on the frontlines. It seems disingenuous and feeds so nicely into the "women should stay in the kitchen" narrative she tries to infer was the common belief held by most men.

> "I was gobsmacked but I think those attitudes are changing and 10 years on I'm not seeing that anymore, people don't see me in a flying suit at Woolies on the way home and are shocked, it is becoming more normal."
>
>
>
> From left: No. 11 Squadron C Flight Commander Squadron Leader Melissa Houston, No. 10 Squadron Executive Officer Squadron Leader Jenna Higgins and No. 292 Squadron B Flight Commander Squadron Leader Trisha Kelly are acknowledged for their significant appointments. Picture: Supplied
>
> Sqd Ld Houston, originally from Melbourne, said it was good that women in senior ADF roles was becoming more normalised.
>
> "I've always been of the belief that you can't be what you can't see as in you don't think you can be something you can't see, so when I was coming up through the ranks we didn't have female flight commanders and we didn't have female commanding officers.

By the way, how does a female become a commanding officer?

> "So, what I am enjoying seeing now is that you've got some really strong women in some significant leadership roles."

Strong women. Those two words make my toes curl. There are apparently strong women in Hollywood and in our defense forces. Are the rest of them weak?

> For Sqd Ld Houston, when she joined she had no idea where her life would go when as a schoolgirl she attended a careers expo in Melbourne and was called over to the ADF desk.
>
> "I had a chat to a recruiter and in the space of 15 minutes I was convinced to apply and the rest of history, 15 years later here I am," she said.

Then Flying Officer Melissa Houston, a navigator with Crew 3 of 10 Squadron, carries out her pre-flight planning ahead of air, ground and naval forces from Singapore, Malaysia, New Zealand and the UK in the South China Sea in 2009.

She has since been on multiple deployments, notably to the Middle East.

The 11 Squadron is Australia's primary operational maritime patrol squad flying the P-8A Poseidon, state-of-the-art intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance aircraft with diverse missions to war zones and also most recently to help map the movement of this year's devastating bushfires in NSW and the ACT.

Veterans' Affairs Minister Darren Chester said while coronavirus meant there could not be Anzac Day gatherings, the mail-out provided schools with engaging tools to assist them in observing this national day of commemoration.

"There is also a focus on the important role women have played during wars, conflicts and peacekeeping operations. This is a significant undertaking, with a wide range of community groups and other stakeholders engaged, and is a key part of many communities' Anzac Day preparations and ongoing education about our military history."

Women simply must not be overlooked in any aspect of our society, no matter how minimal their contribution.

Here is a list of the Australian soldiers who lost their lives in Afghanistan.

I wonder if lists like this one could be used to prompt some discussion in even one lesson. How long would it take the children to notice who was missing from that list?

102 000 Australian men have died in combat.

I tried to uncover details about the number of Australian female combat deaths and could not find any information.

The absence of information speaks more powerfully and eloquently than anything more I could write on the issue.

I hope the education department is already working hard on its new curriculum on domestic violence where they will finally destroy the antiquated notion that only women suffer violent abuse in the home. I hope the facts about murderous mothers and cruel wives make it clear, once and for all to all of our students, that domestic violence harms men, women and children.

I'm sure the mail outs are being organized even as I write.

Everybody Deserves the Right to Intact Genitals

AVfM Video Source · 24 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Paul to YouTube: Piss Off

Paul Elam · 26 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Watch Paul's latest video talk on Bitchute because he just put YouTube in the rear view mirror.

Gender Matters, episode #4 – Tom Golden

AVfM Video Source · 26 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Janice Fiamengo: “Believe Women”?

AVfM Video Source · 27 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Stop Cutting US!

AVfM Video Source · 27 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Self-actualization and the Red Pill

Peter Wright · 28 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

We often talk about men's duties and responsibilities, or their failures to man-up and adequately serve women and society. But we rarely talk about men's needs, nor encourage them to carve out some self-actualized living.

Abraham Maslow's model of human needs is depicted as a series of hierarchical levels on a pyramid. At the base are what he calls the deficiency needs (D-needs) which must be fulfilled before moving up to enjoy the higher needs. Any absence in deficiency needs, such as social belonging or having enough to eat, creates a sense of deprivation that motivates people to seek satisfaction of those needs.

D-needs are comprised of the lower four of the following levels of need: Physiological, safety, belonging, and self-esteem.

The guiding principle in this model is that each base-need must be satisfied before moving onto the next level of need motivation, culminating finally in the pursuit of personal 'self-actualization,' a flowering of human potential inviting more free-time and the luxury of not being preoccupied with constantly servicing base needs for ourselves and others.

Sadly, catering to the deficiency needs of everyone around them is precisely what most men find themselves doing. Men collectively spend most of their waking hours servicing the base needs of others, particularly female others who are freed to pursue the more luxurious need goals related to self-actualization.

Think of the so called 'housewife' or 'home maker,' or of women who make the sensible choice of working part time so their work-life balance is not deleterious to their aspirations for self-actualisation.

Meanwhile, we often fail to ask who is labouring away at servicing the base needs of society; who is growing the most meat and vegetables to cater to human need; who is transporting the food; who is working longer hours to earn the bigger weekly wage to pay for all the foodstuffs that mostly others will eat? Who is building the houses and infrastructure for people to luxuriate within; Which sex is putting themselves on the line to ensure the safety of others? And which sex is pandering to women's relationship ideals – including the funding of regular holiday packages, latte and shopping money, and big helpings of benevolent sexism to ensure the 'esteem needs' of women are fully met?

You guessed it – they are the base needs servicing army.

Alternatively, and on a more personal level, which sex suffers most homelessness, street violence, workplace injuries, health deprivation, safety deprivation, love/belonging deprivation, depression, suicide or early death? Clearly men are not very good at servicing their own base needs – perhaps because they are so preoccupied serving those of others.

Analysed honestly, a picture emerges of men preoccupied their whole lives with catering to base needs of women and children, and in many cases neglecting those very same needs in themselves. And too often women appear reluctant to fill the breach – perhaps because they are preoccupied with enjoying their own creative pursuits of self-actualization.

Maslow conceptualized his model as a universal path regardless of one's gender, a human path not requiring sharp distinctions between the big-picture needs of men or women respectively. This however appears far from the reality when we consider that his pyramid today has been carved into distinctly gendered turf, with men relegated to servicing the bottom need-rungs for women (especially physiological and safety needs), or indirectly servicing them via paying taxes to a government who services those same needs, thus allowing women to devote energy to the creative pursuits of romantic love, belonging, self-esteem, and of course the cherry on the top – self-actualization.

Not only do men take care of most physical needs and safety issues, they feel compelled to provide support for whatever higher-need whims their female partners inevitably dream up — "I just do whatever she wants so she can be happy".

Betty Friedan, champion of the women's liberation movement and instigator of second-wave feminism called for self-actualization for all women, writing "Only by such a personal commitment to the future can American women break out of the housewife trap and truly find fulfillment… by fulfilling their own unique possibilities as separate human beings."[1]

Friedan cited Maslow's higher-order description of 'self-actualization' as essential for women to achieve this aim – and achieve it they have, in spades.

To-date we are still waiting for the cry to go out for male self-actualization.

To a large extent men, being perpetually stuck catering to bottom order needs is a hangover of human survival roles in which men and women divided labours between themselves in order to ensure survival of the family unit and, with it, the species. Having realized that survival, and living now in societies with far less disease, danger, and with greater material abundance, women have collectively seen fit to "liberate" themselves from traditional roles while men, generally speaking, have not. This is what we call the blue-pill conundrum — one sex is living the liberated dream, while the other remains stuck in a traditional service role.

The idea of men reaching for higher order needs is among the hottest of men's rights questions arising today: i.e. should we remain welded to our traditional roles of protector and provider and hope that "liberated" women will disavow their multi-option lives and come join us in the trenches? Or do we join them and insist that neither sex should be responsible for the base needs of the other while simultaneously neglecting their own safety and higher fulfillment?

I think the question is self-answering.

Men and boys might now pause to consider they have the option to focus on their own base needs as much as anyone else's. We also have the option to pursue Maslow's higher-order needs of self-actualization, described as, "the desire for self-fulfilment, namely the tendency for him to become actualized in what he is potentially. This tendency might be phrased as the desire to become more and more what one is, to become everything that one is capable of becoming."[2]

Self-actualization is further defined by Dictionary.com as "the achievement of one's full potential through creativity, independence, spontaneity, and a grasp of the real world." It entails nothing less than the realization of one's creative, aesthetic, intellectual, and social potential, but it can only come about by the commitment of the self-determined, red pill man to live a life of freedom. He is the one who opts for being over and above selfless sacrifice and catering to survival needs alone. He is the one builds, dreams, cooks, rides a Harley, has hobbies, visits friends, goes on an adventure.

If we accept that there are no victims in life, only volunteers, that means there is literally nothing standing in the way of a more a fulfilling, self-actualized existence. The choice as always is ours.

Peak Experiences

Another concept presented by Maslow's is peak experiences –those moments of intense happiness that stand apart from usual mundane experience, something he suggested was more likely to occur with regularity for the self-actualized person.

According to Maslow, feelings accompanying peak experiences included "wonder, awe, reverence, humility, surrender, and even worship before the greatness of the experience." And he added that reality is perceived with a sense of "truth, goodness, beauty, wholeness, aliveness, uniqueness, perfection, completion, justice, simplicity, richness, effortlessness, playfulness, self-sufficiency" [3]

Those humans lucky enough to enjoy the self-actualized life, punctuated as it is with peak experiences, would seem to live a privileged existence.

The following Wikipedia list offers some typical characteristics of peak experiences — experiences which in many ways are comparable to the freedoms described under red pill living:

- loss of judgment to time and space
- the feeling of being one whole and harmonious self, free of dissociation or inner conflict
- the feeling of using all capacities and capabilities at their highest potential, or being "fully functioning"
- functioning effortlessly and easily without strain or struggle
- feeling completely responsible for perceptions and behavior. Use of self-determination to becoming stronger, more single-minded, and fully volitional
- being without inhibition, fear, doubt, and self-criticism
- spontaneity, expressiveness, and naturally flowing behavior that is not constrained by conformity
- a free mind that is flexible and open to creative thoughts and ideas
- complete mindfulness of the present moment without influence of past or expected future experiences
- a physical feeling of warmth, along with a sensation of pleasant vibrations emanating from the heart area outward into the limbs.

Every detail of that list has been described by men who have swallowed the red pill and decided to live life on their own terms.

When men are no longer preoccupied in servicing the needs of Betty Friedan's liberated women, no longer preoccupied by honey-do lists, the long work hours and the burden of social guilt that accompanies the role of servicing (and ultimately failing) women's expectations, they can then begin to pursue their own needs as self-actualized men.

Those men who have swallowed the red pill report a new experience of freedom, one that comes with transcendence of temporal time and space as men become less chained to the clock and its plantation-like schedules. There's far less 'dissociation or inner conflict' as blue-pill cognitive dissonance becomes a thing of the past, and self-actualization becomes second nature.

Feminists since Betty Freidan have succeeded in managing all levels of Maslow's ladder, from physiological needs upwards, for their own self-benefit. They've treated human needs as a gendered turf war, with Maslow's pyramid divided up like real estate on a Monopoly board where all the good properties are owned by women, while men pay rent on their Mayfair and Park Lane stopovers, or go straight to jail. The time to level the playing field is long overdue.

Sources:

[1] Friedan, Betty, The Feminine Mystique (1963)
[2] Maslow., A. A Theory of Human Motivation, Psychological Review 50, pp. 370-396. (1943)
[3] Maslow, A.H. (1964). Religions, values, and peak experiences. London: Penguin Books Limited

Feminism and rape jokes

Sam Keene · 1 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Here is a key question, 'Is joking about rape funny?'

No doubt for someone who has been raped it probably isn't. Or in a more tautological sense someone who doesn't think rape jokes are funny will not find them funny. This may seem obvious for even the densest reader; however it is something I have needed to clarify again and again to feminists and other activists. That something is this: Humor is subjective.

If there is something which these aforementioned feminists love to rant about, it's about how awful rape jokes (and rape in general) are. By mentioning rape in anything other than a negative context you are supporting rape culture and sometimes even the patriarchy. Even many moderate feminists claim that rape jokes are never funny, ever, in any context, any place or any time. By joking about rape you have no positive regard to women, you are a misogynist. To the more radical feminists, rape jokes aren't just a horrific psychological and physical act perpetuated by someone evil. No. Rape is the worst thing in the world.

Now, it may seem initially apparent that rape / rape jokes are not funny. However, many people will disagree. Comedians frequently use rape for shock value, and it is responded to positively by both men and women.[1] This is what not just feminists, but any activist who claims something isn't funny doesn't understand. Humor is not objective. Humor is subjective.

It's important to clarify a point here. I do not necessary apply my criticisms to people who casually say: 'Their music is shit' or 'Their work is crap'. I appreciate that these everyday conversations don't actually try and invoke objectivity. This standard that intellectual honesty demands is one which applies to activist statements. That is, statements which are in clear defense of an ideology or tenet.

People have subjective humor. I've seen people laugh at the holocaust, I've seen people laugh at rape, and I've seen people laugh at the torture of terrorists. At assault, at death, at hunger and black people. Does this make it morally okay to commit genocide, rape or torture? Does it make it okay to assault black people or commit racist acts? No, of course not, but it is damn funny to some people and those people will laugh. Most people aren't actually racist, but we will happily joke that when a house gets broken into that "It must have been a black guy." Most people aren't actually sexist, but we will happily throw out stereotypes of women drivers when we're out with the lads. Most people aren't actually homophobic, but homophobic statements are used in comedy. [2]

I've seen the more extreme feminists try and label rape jokes as not just sexist and misogynistic but racist and homophobic. What? How do you arrive at a hatred or fear of homosexuals from a rape joke? It's nothing more than an attempt to shut down a debate before it's even started: "You support rape jokes? You homophobic fuck!" Racism falls under the same shaky foundations. How does a rape joke suggest discrimination by race?

I find even when we examine whether rape jokes are sexist or not you have difficulty justifying it. Every one of my friends, male and female, who joke about rape do not hold any kind of view which discriminates based on sex. It is an injustice to intellectual integrity to say rape jokes are sexist. It's pathetic. It's a sad attempt to victimize themselves, and others so they can imagine another phantom of oppression.

The most common insult when someone makes a rape joke is 'misogynist.' Feminists have warped the meaning of 'misogynist' to mean 'Anyone who disagrees with my particular version of feminism.' In fact, I have never seen any feminist ever use the word to mean what it actually means: Hatred / dislike / aversion to women.

Even if someone is laughing at rape jokes, or calling their male friend a stud for sleeping with ten women, and their female friend a slut for sleeping with five, this does not mean someone actually dislikes / hates / has an aversion to women. All it shows is the existence of gender roles, but it doesn't say anything for actual misogyny. For misogyny to manifest there has to be unequivocal, intentional hatred. I do not think that speaking in gender roles is evidence of misogyny by virtue of the gender role itself. It is how the gender role or the rape joke is said that determines whether actual misogyny is taking place. It is the context which is important – not wishful thinking. Feminists try to build bridges to make connections which aren't there; these bridges aren't made of empirical, objective brick-and-mortar, but rather subjective, fallacious sludge.

I am not convinced when feminists say gender roles / rape jokes and so on encourage and trivialize misogyny (and rape culture and patriarchy etc.) – while you can make a case for the worst gender roles (women have to stay at home doing all the work) actually having a negative effect, the vast majority of the common, pervasive gender roles simply don't lead to the hatred of women. Something like that only works when you make the word 'misogyny' incredibly semantically loose (which is what feminism has achieved so successfully). In fact, words like 'sexist', 'racist' and 'bigot' have had their semantic meanings abused violently by the feminists which use them so gleefully.

When the twin towers ignited, there came a plethora of 'sick' jokes.

Thousands of people enjoyed these jokes and retold them to many people, including me. Do you think the family of one of the victims would have found it funny? No, probably not. They would find it very offensive and upsetting that someone can find humor in an event or situation that caused them so much suffering. For an activist to say 'that X joke is not funny' is worthless. It means nothing. It is illogical. Saying 'I don't find X funny' is a perfectly acceptable statement. It is announcing your subjective opinion on the humor value of something. To try and invoke these pseudo-objective activist statements when there are plenty of people who will happily laugh at X is intellectually dishonest and a coward's way to defend or protest an ideology.

I know plenty of people who have been raped, or have lost a family member in 9/11. Yet they tolerate jokes about rape or the towers. Yet they sometimes tell these jokes themselves. Why? These people are not 'rape joke apologists' or '9/11 joke apologists' they only want to defend the human right to offend and in return, be offended.

[1] Louis CK's rape joke: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=b4hNaFkbZYU

[2] 'Louie' poker scene http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=v-55wC5dEnc

Feminist, anti-feminist and non-feminist

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 2 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist. Anti-feminist. Non-feminist. What do these words really mean and how do their meanings differ? How do they act upon each other?

Very well, feminist means feminist. That's easy enough. And non-feminist means not feminist. Again, easy enough. Now let's look at anti-feminist. This word simply means "opposed to feminism". That is all. And if you are opposed to feminism, it's a pretty safe bet that you are also not a feminist. I mean, when was the last time you met a feminist who was opposed to feminism?

So clearly, if you are anti-feminist, you must also be not a feminist. You have no choice. It is logically excluded that you could be anything else. Therefore, every anti-feminist you meet is also non-feminist.

But is every non-feminist anti-feminist?

I will offer up a novel viewpoint. I say yes; every non-feminist is anti-feminist, because whoever is not a feminist effectively opposes feminism.

That's right: in principle, both anti-feminist and non-feminist oppose feminism.

The non-feminist principle opposes feminism passively. This is good because the passive mode is politically efficient in its season. The anti-feminist principle opposes feminism actively. This is good because the active mode is also politically efficient in its season. Each modality is politically efficient in its season.

So a non-feminist person is no less anti-feminist simply for opposing feminism passively, than an anti-feminist is for opposing it actively. By the end of the day, all that matters is that they both put a drag weight on feminism in effectual terms.

To phrase that differently, both non-feminist and anti-feminist exist in opposition to feminism. So the real issue is existential. "Non-feminist" carries the same political weight as "anti-feminist" because all opposition to feminism has the same existential value. It all interferes with feminism by roadblocking it in some way. It all poses an impediment to feminist plans.

By the end of the day, “anti-feminist” is simply a type of non-feminist. A sub-variety or sub-category. The difference is, that anti-feminist seems to imply something actively adversarial, whereas non-feminist seems to imply “live and let live”.

I say “seems to imply”. However, there is a kicker: live and let live only works if it is a two-way street, and feminism is decidely “my way or the highway”. No two ways about that! Feminism innately lacks the capacity to live and let live, and to merely require such a thing puts feminism under strain.

To tolerate even one inch of space in this world that is not feminist, is to allow in principle that people and things which are not feminist have a right to be in this world in the first place. That they have a right to existence. Such tolerance throws the entire feminist project into question because it radically undermines the basis of feminist triumphalism. (In case you didn’t catch it yet,, feminist triumphalism is the idea that feminism is categorically and objectively right, beyond all further discussion, for all time.)

So no, feminism cannot live and let live alongside the non-feminist sector. Feminism’s drive is to make feminism the only game in town — and clearly, to permit a different game to exist in town at all, would nullify that purpose.

You might wonder, “what’s the point of being “non-feminist”, anyway? If you oppose feminism, why not just announce your anti-feminism and be done with it?”

Before we answer, we should make one thing clear. There is a chasm of difference between non-feminists who do not openly self-label as anti-feminist, and political numpties who very pointedly say, “I am non-feminist but not anti-feminist”. The former might be smooth, intelligent operators who understand the base dynamic, but the latter, who pointedly reject anti-feminism by name, are missing the plot altogether. They are simply a nuisance, and should straightway declare themselves feminist, because feminism is the master they are serving. They contain no principle of resistance to feminist innovation, not even the passive-aggressive option. They lack political backbone because, not being “anti”, they can do no better than roll over every time the feminists roll out a new plan. We like to give names to things, and so we call these people “rolling- stock”. If we are feeling less charitable, we call them “rolling puppies”.

Back to our question. I would reply that when you adopt an anti-feminist standpoint, you adopt an adversarial stance, toward feminism, that might be construed as aggressional.

Now, we all know that feminism is the primary or predominant aggressor. We all know that feminism initiated this war the minute it came into existence and started lying and slandering. We all know that non-feminist men and women are punching “up” and that feminism, the bully, is punching “down”.

Think a bit. Feminism as we know it is historically recent. Non-feminist men and women have been around, let us say, forever. They have enacted their various roles, as saints or sinners upon the stage of life, and practiced moral adjudication upon each other according to their own terms. (Non-feminist terms, obviously.) They got along fine without feminism, for thousands of years, and they don’t need feminism now. Most importantly of all, non-feminist people did not start this war. Did “non-feminists” rise up from the field one day out of the blue, and commence to rip-snorting around, and waving their banner, and telling everybody else what reality is, and radically tinkering with the world without consulting that very same world first? No. “Non-feminism” didn’t do these things. Feminism did. In fact, non-feminist people didn’t even know that they were non-feminist until feminism came along. They were a group that never knew it was a group, and many of them still don’t realize that they are a group.

So again, feminism was the original aggressor, and remains the primary aggressor to this day. Yet they are superlatively clever at playing the victim, mostly by spin control. Oh lord, how they have bamboozled us! They have crafted this into something like a martial art. When a conflict arises they will flip the script and make it a threat narrative — they will become the victim and the other side will be made the aggressor even if the truth is exactly opposite. This is one of the games people play on a personal level, but the genius of feminism was to make it political.

The non-feminist position undermines their game because it forces them to back off and leave you alone or, barring that, do something overtly aggressive that will give them a bad look. So this is elegantly simple: we are setting up the feminists so that they cannot play the victim, and if feminists cannot play the victim then feminism cannot effectively operate any longer. Finis!

They are NOT accustomed to living in a script where they are the aggressor — in other words, a script they didn't write. All you must do is frankly state that you are not a feminist and ask that your non-feminist boundaries be respected. How simple is that? You just want to live a peaceable life along with other non-feminist people, and you don't want any feminist headaches.

If you are a feminist and you persist in giving non-feminist people trouble, those people will band together to converse about the Feminist Problem, and finally make plans to do something about it.

So feminist, don't be the problem. Don't be the aggressor. Learn to co-exist. Share the world with the rest of the world. Most of all, understand that feminism is not the world and never will be.

That is heavy. That is loaded. Let the ripe significance sink in and saturate every fibre of your understanding all the way down.

Only feminists say "anti-feminism" like it's a bad thing — that is what makes them feminist. Yet only feminists can prevent anti-feminism, by not driving people to be anti-feminist in the first place.

Post-pandemic prognostications

Doug Mortimer · 2 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I have no doubt that as I write this there are T-shirt companies out there with templates saying something like "I survived the 2020 Coronavirus Pandemic." They're just waiting for the all-clear to sound. It would be unseemly to be premature.

Of course, such T-shirts risk being insensitive, as someone viewing the T-shirt may be reminded that she lost dear old grandma to the virus and start bawling. (Note to T-shirt companies: pledge some percentage of your profits to some virus-related charity and your critics might cut you some slack.)

I don't blame anyone for trying to make a buck, even if cremation vans with loudspeakers blaring "Bring out your dead!" start creeping through every neighborhood in the land. After all, the dead don't need money. They're not alive so they don't have to earn a living. In one of his few quotable moments, Silent Cal Coolidge supposedly observed that "The business of America is business." Reportedly, he uttered that 95 years ago, and it's as true today as it ever was.

In times of pestilence, such a quote reeks of crass commercialism. But suppose we construe the meaning of business to mean "a specific occupation or pursuit" (The American Heritage Dictionary), not necessarily for profit. That would certainly include the business of all breeds and mixed breeds of wokeniks. B.P. (before the pandemic) I'd grown used to their continuous bleating. My day was not complete unless I came across some sort of social justice absurdity or atrocity on this or some other website. I reveled in these revelations even as I cringed. Then came the shutdown, which, in retrospect, was a three-week sabbatical.

Before being called back to work, I was blissfully out of touch for 21 days. In fact, I was literally out of touch with keyboards and computers. My sole contact with the mass media was to occasionally turn on the radio in the morning ("Traffic and weather on the 8's") to see if I needed a light jacket or a coat before I went out, all the while knowing that I didn't have to go out if I didn't want to. A pantry full of non-perishables, a few cases of bottled water, a refrigerator full of beer, stacks of unread books and unwatched DVDs, and a shitload of toilet paper can have that effect on a fellow.

I didn't make an effort to avoid the news, but I didn't spend much time on it either. But when I went back to work, again the keyboard and the computer were unavoidable. When down time beckoned, I couldn't help but check out some of the websites I hadn't looked at for three weeks. I was disappointed but not surprised to see that nothing had changed wokenik-wise. The motley identity politicians were still at it. To be sure, the pandemic has stolen their thunder but they haven't gone away. Wokeniks never sleep. It's not often mentioned, but one of the leading causes of insomnia is ideology.

Not surprisingly, all sorts of groups are pondering the pandemic and wondering how it affects their tribe. When the dust has cleared, will it boost or hinder the tribe's agenda? What's loss of life compared to loss of influence?

If Greenpeace folks had been around in 1912, the sinking of the Titanic would have interested them only insofar as it affected the marine environment. The smoldering wreck of the Hindenburg would be of no concern to social justice warriors in 1937. A shocked radio announcer famously gasped, "Oh, the humanity!" A social justice warrior would be shouting "Death to fascists!" But a lot of the folks on board weren't Nazis. "Well, that's what they get for associating with fascists."

Well, there's no reason why we in the manosphere shouldn't be equally insensitive and self-centered when it comes to a timely disaster, so let's ponder what the pandemic portends for our tribe.

The divorce courts may be closed now, but once they open up again, will anything change? Will men thrown out of work be thrown in jail because they can't keep up their child support? Will saner heads prevail? Have they ever prevailed?

Of course, the feminists have to keep stoking the fires of dissatisfaction because the pandemic has put all their pet peeves on the back burner. And the longer the pandemic lasts, the less the chance that they can return to business as usual upon return. If the workplace shuts down, quibbling about equity in the workplace becomes academic.

Speaking of academics, it's all quiet on campus this spring, with some pundits asserting that a number of marginal colleges will likely go down the drain, thus removing the platforms for numerous university wokeniks. How many gender studies professors and diversity deans will end up on the unemployment lines with dim prospects of re-employment int their chosen fields. Lotsa luck, ladies. I was going to be a smart ass and say you can always get a job in a massage parlor, but they're closed for the duration.

I suppose the action on social media is still buzzing along, but a lot of females must be really miffed that they just aren't getting any real-world attention from men. The young women are wasting their youth sitting at home when they should be out there boozing it up and bedhopping and doing all that sewing of wild oats that used to be the prerogative of the male of the species. No parties, no rock concerts, no free dinners from would-be suitors. No arena behavior at all.

The older single females with the ticking biological clock have now lost at least two eggs since this thing started. They are now at least two months closer to "GAME OVER," more popularly known as menopause. Not to worry, ladies: Spinsterhood is powerful!

While the whole world is under lockdown or lockdown-lite to keep the lethal virus at bay, it just isn't seemly to whine about one's pet grievances. When people are getting sick and dying worldwide, bitching and moaning about manspreading isn't likely to find sympathetic ears. From what I've seen on public transportation the last few weeks, seats are abundant, so manspreading is not a problem. Hell, man*sprawling* wouldn't be a problem these days.

It's a bit like a Japanese gourmet complaining about his sushi in the aftermath of Hiroshima. There's no place for petty grievances and narcissism in the post-pandemic world. That doesn't mean grievances and narcissists will cease to exist. They will just turn down the volume until it's safe to turn it up again. If the wokeniks totally give up on agitation, their pet issues might go down the memory hole with Sacco and Vanzetti.

Of course, the ban on get-togethers of all stripes has robbed activists, agitators, and political theater types of their platform. Ironically, the Antifa folks were wearing masks before wearing masks was cool. Now they must wear masks in public but they're not allowed to hold political rallies. Not that it matters because there is nobody on the streets they can beat up. Stay classy, Portland!

It also occurs to me that sexual harassment in the office must be way, way down. Even if you're essential and still going into your office, there's nobody there to harass even if you wanted to. So that particular topic is a dead issue, at least for the near future. In fact, I suspect that quite a few furloughed females would be more than happy to put up with a little grab-ass if it would restore their paychecks.

Come to think about it, what about attorneys who specialize in sexual harassment cases? They must be considering a change of specialty, as those cases will surely dwindle. Even when people go back to work, the social distancing thing will persist. Cavort with a cutie who's a carrier, and you could be a dead pigeon! Oral sex can't be performed with masks on. A condom provides no protection from the coronavirus. You can't have sex in a hazmat suit. I guess a hand job is still feasible – but only with gloves on!

Heretofore, when a man decided to get intimate with a female, he worried about pregnancy or STDs. When the bars finally open up again, he will have to wonder if Typhoid Mary is sitting on the stool next to him. For a while, avoidance of women may reign. Like in second grade…remember? Girls have cooties! Keep away from them!

Of course, loss of employment means a disruption in income and that means a lot of men will not have the discretionary bucks to spend on females. The forging of relationships will slow to a crawl, the marriage rate will go down even lower, the birth rate will sink to unimaginable depths. A man who still has a good job will be more valued than ever. Such a man may get more female attention than ever…but remember those cooties!

So MGTOW may realize huge gains in a post-pandemic world. Who knew that MGTOW was ahead of the curve when it came to social distancing…or is it antisocial distancing?

But seriously, folks, after enough men have had a taste of going their own way, courtesy of the virus, won't a significant percentage of them adopt it as a lifestyle?

Remember what I said earlier: a pantry full of non-perishables, a few cases of bottled water, a refrigerator full of beer, stacks of unread books and unwatched DVDs, and a shitload of toilet paper. Admittedly, it's not as catchy as a loaf of bread, a jug of wine, and thou…but it worked for me. Nothing wrong with a jug of wine but I'll skip the bread (cutting carbs, you know). As for thou, please maintain a distance of six feet. In fact, why not make it six yards. Better yet, six miles.

By now, I'm almost getting used to my mask. In fact, it's hard to believe that there will come a time when I can go out without donning it. I just might keep wearing it ever after the all-clear sounds.

"Who was that masked man?" you might wonder if you see me plodding down the street.

Just another man going his own way.

The night I eviscerated Michael Kimmel

Mark Dent · 5 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Today I came across an article by Janice Fiamengo in my email inbox titled, Masculinity Studies as Man- Hating.

One of the people Janice focused on in this piece was the renowned feminist Michael Kimmel.

Michael Scott Kimmel is an American sociologist specializing in gender studies. He holds the position of Distinguished Professor of Sociology at Stony Brook University in New York and is the founder and editor of the academic journal Men and Masculinities. Kimmel is a spokesperson of the National Organization for Men Against Sexism and a longtime feminist. In 2013, he founded the Center for the Study of Men and Masculinities at Stony Brook University, where he is Executive Director. He has also written a number of books.

One evening, seven years ago, I was sitting at my computer browsing. I was reading an article titled, Feministing Erases Female Sexual Predators by Nicolai Rublev on the A Voice For Men website.

In the comment sections below, I noticed a woman had written that she had enrolled in Kimmel's Sociology of Gender class back in 1998. She made some scathing remarks about the content of his lecture

If you click on the link above you can read her comment in full. It is quite an eye-opener! (Natshultz)

Let me quote her.

> He went into the whole sociology of why society is anti -gay. A number of reasons came up, but guess who was really behind the 'anti -gay movement?"
>
> Answer: Straight white men. According to Kimmel, gay men are victims of straight men's patriarchal hatred of women. Not just some sexist men either. No. According to Kimmel. Every single straight male on planet earth has one goal and one goal only: to control all the power structures and all the wealth, and therefore keep women out of the workplace, barefoot and pregnant.
>
> I am not joking. He seriously said this :that every single male had one goal: to NEVER allow any women to break > through the glass ceiling. Apparently, (most) gay men are feminists and they must be stopped by straight men because they undermine the patriarchal privilege of straight men.

I had never heard of Michael Kimmel but I noted that he was a professor at a prestigious New York university. The girl's comments appeared to be slightly hyperbolic even to an avowed anti-feminist like me, but I thought it would be worthwhile to at least attempt to communicate with Kimmel and see what he had to say about this girl's allegations.

I found his email address on the university website and sent him an email saying.

> Dear Michael,
>
> this is just a small extract from a lengthy comment a former student of yours wrote. (I included the quote I cited above) and concluded my email with these words:
>
> Is it true? If it is, you are surely as hate filled and bigoted as any Nazi or KKK member who walked this earth. I look forward to hearing a refutation of all this girl has written. If there is no refutation, shame on you.
>
> Sincerely,
>
> Mark Dent

Two hours later I was stunned to see a response from Kimmel in my inbox. I had been writing letters and emails for years and rarely received a response.

I will reproduce extracts from his email as we ultimately engaged in a long, drawn out debate over a period of hours. I cannot reproduce the entire email exchanges because this article would become a book.

> Thanks for writing, Mark.
>
> As a professor, I try to be as clear and evidence based as possible. There is, alas, no way to control how students receive the information or process it-let alone how they remember it 15 years after the fact. I would never have said anything so preposterous. I make clear distinctions between individual people and the institutions they inhabit and the larger social structures that both constrain and enable behaviour…
>
> If you want to know what I really think or actually say in class, you can check out the text I wrote especially for that class: The Gendered Society.
>
> It saddens me to see my lectures remembered in such a distorted way, but it's a sociological axiom that we understand the world through various ideological filters.
>
> Michael Kimmel

Okay-I was impressed by the fact he responded so promptly and the reasonableness of what he had to say. It seemed to confirm my gut reaction to the girl's initial comments, which appeared rather too extreme for any educated, respected professor to speak.

There were however many other assertions made by his former student and they were written with such passion and genuine anger I felt less convinced by Kimmel's response with each passing minute.

Why would this girl so outrageously misrepresent Kimmel's words?

So, I wrote to him again.

> Hi Michael,
>
> Thanks for taking the time to respond, I appreciate it.
>
> I take you at your word, but I am genuinely at a loss to understand how a young woman could be left with such a > powerful and emphatic impression that you held straight white males responsible for anti -gay feeling in our society.

>
> She said she was excited to be in your class, so why would she choose to make up such outrageous statements and choose to misrepresent you in such a deliberate manner? I certainly understand that she may well have misunderstood some of your more subtle theories but clearly, the overwhelming message was MEN are to blame.
>
> Many other statements she attributed to you were very specific.

I then went on to explain that here in Australia, there are a number of female University professors who do make hateful, bigoted statements about men in their gender studies classes so it is easy for me to believe that similar language is used in America.

I asked him if he, or any male professor at a University in America or here in Australia would survive one day in his job if he was to make any hateful, denigrating statements about women. Of course, we know the answer is-no. Given this indisputable fact I asked Michael to explain why a society he claims is patriarchal and oppressive to women allows women in positions of influence and power to denigrate males, yet men in positions of power will automatically have that power taken from them for merely criticizing a woman, let alone the entire female gender.

Michael ignored my comments on the patriarchy but did say he disagreed with some of the more outrageous comments made by these self-proclaimed man haters.

He must have gone and read the complete comment from the AVFM website as he wrote:

> That woman is clearly unhinged. I hope she gets some help. What she remembers from my class is so misguided I don't know where to start. She spelled my name right.
>
> Sheila Jeffreys (one of the Australian feminist Professors I quoted) probably thinks I am closer to Paul Elam than to her. She's no fan of my work.
>
> Sorry to be perfunctory. I can't speak for the others to whom you have written, but I get several hundred messages every day, and several are from women like this one.
>
> I try to answer everyone who seems rational, but the volume is pretty overwhelming.
>
> Best,
>
> Michael

I am still relatively impressed with the responses (and the fact that he is responding at all), but there is a nagging doubt in the back of my mind.

I went onto You Tube and watched a few brief clips from his lectures and my blood began to boil. I also found some comments attributed to him which sealed the deal.

So, I wrote a third email.

> Michael, I am not stalking you, but I have done more reading and it is clear to me (despite your courtesy) that you are indeed a gender bigot. This is very sad. It breaks my heart to think of the countless boys and young men who are being or will be damaged by your twisted belief's about masculinity and why men need 'fixing.'
>
> In fact, this one comment was enough to make clear to me how bigoted you are.
>
> "Nine years ago, Kimmel reports, at Zachary's (his son) naming ceremony, we each offered a wish for our newborn son. When it was my turn, I quoted the poet Adrienne Rich, who wrote, "If I could have one wish for my own sons, it is that they should have the courage of women."
>
> I continued:
> If the genders were reversed, we would get a clear understanding of just how outrageous and stupid such a > statement is. Imagine your own reaction to a man saying proudly, "If I could have one wish for my daughters, it is that they have the courage of men."

>
> You would be apoplectic. It would be denounced as gender bigotry. How can any man, let alone a Distinguished Professor who "operates on ideas supported by clear evidence" make such a ridiculous, unscientific and demonstrably stupid statement?
>
> Courage is a human quality which has no relationship with or connection to gender. How dare you suggest that females, by virtue of their sexuality, have any quality, let alone courage, that men do not possess to the same degree. Substitute the word woman for white or black and see how horrendous it sounds. That is how we see statements for what they are,
>
> If I could have one wish for my sons, it is that they have the courage of white people."
>
> Disgusting isn't it? Ridiculous too.
>
> Yet you proudly boast of making this wish at a special naming ceremony for your son!
>
> Shame on you, Michael. Perhaps that girl's "unhinged rant" was far closer to the truth than your careful and courteous responses.
>
> Sincerely,
>
> Mark Dent

Michael responded:

> Oh, for heaven's sake! Why don't you read something I actually wrote instead of having someone massage it into something it was not.
>
> I did not quote that line from Adrienne Rich's poetry in the abstract. I was using it to say something about my wife. Not as theory, but in the acknowledgements section of the book.
>
> My wife Amy, to whom all my work-indeed my life-should be dedicated, is simply what I envision when I imagine the words, 'life partner' might actually mean-critic, cheerleader, collaborator, co-author, co-parent, companion.
>
> Nine years ago, at Zachary's naming ceremony, we each offered a wish for our newborn son. When it was my turn, I quoted the poet, Adrienne Rich, who wrote, "if I could have one wish for my own sons, it is that they have the courage of women."
>
> I wished nothing more for Zachary-that he would have Amy's courage, her integrity and her passion. I hope for that still.
>
> Quite different, isn't it? It was about my wife, a way to thank her. Your so-called friends misread my words deliberately, and you believed them rather than check the source.
>
> I think I may have over estimated your capacity for independent thinking. My mistake.
>
> Michael.

My response:

> Michael, if it was a tribute to your wife then why didn't you write, "I wish my son could have the courage of my wife, Amy?"
>
> That would have been a wonderful tribute. Instead, you chose a quote which refers to the entire female gender. Why did you need to use such a bigoted statement at such a special time? The fact that you knew of the quote and its author indicates that it holds some significance for you personally. I think you require some of the courage you hope your son will acquire and own what you put in print.

> Do you believe Amy is courageous because she is Amy or because she is a woman? I adore my best friend and soulmate, Maggie. When I write tributes to her, which I have done in poetry and in a book, I use her name. She is a beautiful, courageous person who happens to be female. The qualities she possesses have nothing to do with her gender. Her name is all that is required. What do other women have to do with your beloved Amy?
>
> Do you know any men who are courageous? Would you have felt just as happy writing "I hope my son one day possesses the courage of men?" If not, why not?
>
> If courage is not absent in men, why would you be willing to draw a distinction between the two genders by referring to the courage of women as though it is something unique and special?
>
> Writing women instead of Amy makes the statement a bigoted one.
>
> If I had a dear black friend named Joe who I loved and admired, do you think a quote attributing his qualities to all black people would be in any way acceptable?
>
> "I hope one day my son will come to have the kindness and generosity of black people."
>
> It sounds rather offensive and silly doesn't it?
>
> You obviously believe that women do possess a kind of courage which is unique to them (not just Amy) or you would never have chosen that quote. Therefore, we are back at square one. Choosing it is a form of bigotry.
>
> Regards,
>
> Mark

Michael's response is quite terse.

> As I said, I over estimated. Sorry.
>
> As a poet, you should know how one uses a line of poetry as a general statement in order to suggest the personal meaning it has for you. To praise one group is not to criticize others. THAT's bigotry.
>
> When you've actually read what I think rather than what you are told I think, we can have a meaningful conversation.
>
> Otherwise, keep your uncharitable mischaracterizations to yourself.

Ouch!

Me

> Michael, you have passed comment on a number of my emails without having read my book or poetry which I'm sure would give you greater insight into the person I am. This however is not relevant to our discussion.
>
> I have been commenting on a quote (provided by you) which was complete and in full context. I was not relying on inaccurate, second hand information. Yet, I still found the quote to be offensive. Why should I read any more of your material in order to gain deeper insight into your thoughts on men?
>
> I think you are being very evasive.
>
> To suggest that praising the qualities of one group is not criticizing another is absolutely untrue and disingenuous. I am a teacher, as are you. I might attempt an experiment next week. I will stand in front of my class and say,
>
> "I have a deep admiration for the fantastic work ethic of the boys in this room,".
>
> I can guarantee that all of the girls in the room would be affronted (and rightly so). People can be condemned by omission, just as you can lie without speaking a word.
>
> How can you as a person who lectures and teaches not know the truth of this?
>
> I would love to have an opportunity to talk with you for a few hours and really unravel your thoughts on a range > of issues. I'm sure you are quite relieved that will never happen. I love people, Michael. I don't think either gender has a monopoly on any human quality. Do you?

>
> Regards,
>
> Mark

Michael is now becoming angry.

> Mark, you have been amazingly arrogant. I've tried to reply carefully and stick to what I've written. You've accused me of bigotry and several times sought to shame me. You've accused me of things without actually having done your homework.
>
> What if your student turned in an essay on a text based on an unhinged Amazon review? That's what you have done. As far as I'm concerned, you're the bigot, if by bigot we mean someone who is prejudiced, that is, prejudges.
>
> I've made no judgement about your work which I have not read. I wish you'd extend the same courtesy. Raising your own work is a false symmetry-just like your other false reversals. Had I written to you about your work, and had you told me you were misunderstood and misquoted, my next stop would be to check out your actual work, not to some political website. I'm sure you are a great teacher, but it seems to me you've forgotten how to be a student-a dangerous position for those of us who teach.
>
> Your first message let me know that I need to be more careful in my lectures because there are some unstable people in my classes (I "know" this, but need to be reminded.) I appreciated that. I do not, however, appreciate being accused of bigotry and shamed. I've tried to engage with issues you've presented, but I don't need your unfounded accusations. You want to know what I think? Read my book. If I want to know what you think, I'll do the same.

Me

> But Michael,
>
> I have just stated that my recent emails have all been in regard to a passage you sent to me because it was complete and in context. I have not prejudged you at any stage. When I first wrote to you because of the alleged comments you had made in a lecture I said I was writing in order for you to confirm or deny the words attributed to you.
>
> How is that prejudging?
>
> When you clarified what you believe you said I accepted you at your word and finished by thanking you for your courtesy and promptness in replying.
>
> I then read more about you, including that quote which you said was completely out of context. Having read the completed version of the text sent by you, I wrote that I still found it deeply offensive. This was not prejudging you. This was a judgement made after you had provided me with the original quote in full.
>
> Why do I need to read your books before I can make a comment or judgment on the quote in question? It makes no sense to suggest I should.
>
> I have accused you of bigotry based upon a statement you made. I have provided very clear and concise reasons for labelling your statement a bigoted one, none of which you refuted with a logical, rational rebuttal.
>
> You wrote that praising one group does not mean you are criticizing another and I showed you exactly how doing this is harmful, and bigoted. You made no reference to my arguments nor did you make any attempt to refute them. You simply called me "amazingly arrogant."
>
> In all honesty, Michael, if a student attending one of your lectures said:

> "I admire men because they are so brave and adventurous and they are great at inventing things," I am quite certain you would pounce on such a statement and hold it up as an example of prejudiced thinking. You would talk about the courage of women and give examples of their adventurous spirit and perhaps invite the student to rethink their original statement. Am I wrong?
>
> I may well read one of your books, Michael. I hope there is no underlying message suggesting young men should be ashamed about who they are or require "fixing" of any kind. That would be ironic given your anger at what you considered to be my shaming of you.
>
> Regards,
>
> Mark

Kimmel's response

> Mark,
>
> No fewer than three times you've called me a bigot. Several times you have instructed me to be ashamed. I've tried to be reasonable, but this tries my patience.
>
> Your misinterpretation of my homage to my wife strikes me as shallow. (note that I am not calling YOU shallow, jus your interpretation as you've written it, is shallow.)
>
> If I had quoted Nelson Mandela praising the courage of South Africans through the years of struggle would you say I was criticizing white people?
>
> What if I quoted this line?
>
> "I salute combatants of Umkhonto We Sizwe (the ANC's military wing) who paid the ultimate price for the freedom of all South Africans"
>
> And then said I was inspired by that courage.
>
> Were I to have written I was inspired by the tenacity and compassion of gay people in the face of the HIV crisis, would you say that I should say that I am inspired by straight people's tenacity and compassion also?
>
> Would you see it as a criticism of straight people? Why is anything said about group A ipso facto a way of criticizing or ignoring group B? What sort of collective narcissism insists that everything is "actually" a comment on us?
>
> I praised my wife's courage and resilience, and wished it for my son. It was praising her and being rather self - effacing about me. It says nothing about men.
>
> Guyland would be a good place to start. It has been deliberately misread by your pals at A Voice For Men. It's a work of compassion for young boys, whom I see struggling to conform to truly arcane and crazy-making ideas about masculinity.
>
> If it's an indictment of anyone, it's an indictment of grown-ups for not understanding the world they live in and the terrible pressures they feel to conform lest they be gay-baited and bullied.
>
> Of course, the MRAs see it as an indictment of men.
>
> I want to end this conversation now, please. I've refrained from calling you names and shaming you. I don't care to engage with people who are so arrogant as to prejudge one's ideas, sling epithets, and insist on shaming.
>
> I do however agree with you. One of us should be ashamed to have behaved so disrespectfully.
>
> Michael Kimmel
>
> SUNY Distinguished professor of Sociology and Gender Studies
>
> Executive Director, Center For the Study of Men and Masculinities department of Sociology
>
> Stony Brook University

ME

> Oh Michael,
>
> You are being less than forthright. You cannot rewrite history.
>
> You did not praise your wife's courage and resilience and wish it for your son. You could have done just that but you chose instead to write about the courage of women.*
>
> When I wish to pay tribute to a friend or loved one, I use their name.
>
> Call me strange.
>
> You said, if you were to quote Nelson Mandela praising the courage of black South Africans, would I think you were criticizing white people?
>
> Of course not. Because the context of the statement is very clear. He is praising a very specific act of courage in the face of a very specific act of oppression.
>
> That is an entirely different proposition to the one we have been discussing. As I have written before, if you had selected a quote praising the courage of black people with no context, I would find it to be a stupid and bigoted statement.
>
> No race or gender has a monopoly on any vice or virtue. I'd suggest you may not necessarily agree with this viewpoint.
>
> The same can be said for the courage and compassion of gay people in the face of the HIV crisis. I believe even that would be a very broad and probably inaccurate statement. I have had cancer and I often tell my kids that being seriously ill doesn't automatically make you a brave or compassionate person. I saw individuals whose courage made me cry and I saw other terminally ill patients whose anger, selfishness and lack of compassion for others astounded me.
>
> I'm sure the same would apply to people in the gay community. That is why I would never refer to the courage of gay men or women as if it was a universally acknowledged fact. We are separate individuals, some braver than others and our gender has no relationship to this or any other quality.
>
> So if you had written that you admire the courage of women who have endured the loss of their children and battled on or raised a disabled child on their own, I would be understanding of such a statement, but even then I would say there are just as many men who battle on bravely in the same circumstances.
>
> I live in Australia. I was once a boy and I faced the "Guyland " years you have written about. I played footy with typical, knockabout Aussie men and I loved them. I have never encountered a homophobe or woman hater in all my years involved with this most masculine of pastimes.
>
> I have seen our male community rally together in the most moving manner when a member of our boys' team took his life. Fathers and sons formed a circle in the changerooms and as we sang the club song we wept openly with the father of the dead boy and with our sons and mates, while a photo of this beloved boy was placed on the floor in the centre of our circle.
>
> A young man who outed himself in our local football competition was universally accepted and embraced.
>
> I have had countless moments of love and support from my many male (and female) friends. Australia is regarded by many as a macho, blokey world. I live in it and I love the men I know with great passion.
>
> When someone attacks my gender, even under the guise of wanting to "fix it", I take offence.
>
> I like the way you regard anyone who doesn't respond positively to the points you raise as having been dishonest in their approach to them!
>
> I am a very honest man. Your attempt to suggest I am not is very disappointing.
>
> End of conversation.

> All the best
>
> Mark

KIMMEL

> I lived in Guyland too. I was in a fraternity in a college. Yes, there was much bonding, friendships that live to this day. And a lot of sexist and homophobic and racist stuff that provided the glue for that bonding. It seems to me that the difference between us is that I do feel ashamed that the glue was so toxic*, even if the bonds remain strong.*
>
> You seem to have built a life in defense against that shame. That's why you think yourself entitled to keep trying to shame me.
>
> I think I know the difference between honest disagreement and ad hominem attack. You began with the latter, accepted your mistake and moved to the former. But you've backslid, in my view, and I will no longer reply to you.

ME

> Michael,
>
> Your hypocrisy is breathtaking.
>
> You have just told me that I have built a life in defense of the shame of being a man, for, according to you, the glue which bonds men is toxic, consisting of racism, sexism and homophobia. What a frightening and rather disturbing belief.
>
> It seems you believe only men are capable of being sexist, racist or homophobic.
>
> I am truly shattered to think a man of your obvious intellect is out there causing so much damage to our young men with your notion of the toxic nature of the male gender.
>
> You tell me I have attempted to shame you and indicated what a terrible thing this is. You then proceed to shame an entire gender*!*
>
> Apparently, you are entitled to shame all men but I am not entitled to shame you for doing just that! Incredible.
>
> You don't know me, Michael. If it comforts you to portray me as a man who has built his life in defense of my shame at being a member of the male gender, you are terribly mistaken. I have spent my life loving and receiving love from countless males. None of them are perfect, but none are any more prone to racism, sexism, homophobia or violence than any female I have ever known. In fact, none of my friends have displayed an intolerance for gays, other races or violent behavior. They would not be my friends if they did.
>
> That is where we differ.
>
> You have drawn a neat line between two genders and labeled one of them, toxic.
>
> If I am the caricature you are attempting to depict, I am puzzled by the fact that I have many deep and loving relationships with women and girls, many whom I have worked with as a colleague or teacher. I love easily. I love people. I don't think a man who spends his time defending racism, sexism and any other "ism" you care to throw at me would have even one female soulmate, let alone many.
>
> You lived in a very warped world if you and your friends bonded through racism, sexism and homophobia. That says more about you than it does me and my friends. We bonded over things like shared passions, kindness, humor and being there for a mate when he is in trouble.
>
> Maybe they do things differently in America.
>
> I am a very happy, contented man, but my heart pumps in outrage whenever I encounter divisive, bigoted > behaviour. I have watched snippets of you on You Tube and I must say I would be standing up in that lecture theatre and condemning your words just as quickly as I would if a man was talking about "fixing" the problem with females.

>
> You say you are objective because you are a man and the boys in your classes are stunned when they realise you are a feminist. There are countless women (and the number continues to grow) who choose to speak in defense of men and boys and hate feminism. Clearly, they must be objective too, given your definition. Perhaps you should pause for a moment and consider the idea that you are misguided, mistaken (or worse) in how you choose to view the two genders.
>
> Anyway, this exchange has given me a clearer insight into who you are and how you operate. You are slick. I suppose that could be considered a compliment by some. Rather than fire back petty, self-pitying putdowns you could have directly answered the points I raised.
>
> Eg. The context of the statements you provided about Mandela and AIDS sufferers as opposed to the lack of context for your "courage of women" statement.
>
> Not a word.
>
> If you could at least put your hand up, declare your clear bias, and then argue in defense of it, I would still disagree but respect your honesty. You veil your resentment and anger for men under the guise of concern and wanting to fix them.
>
> I'm glad you wrote back one more time, even though I had written "end of conversation" at the completion of my last email. You had also stated you would not be conversing anymore. From my experience, busy people like you don't take anytime out of their schedule to reply to nutters, abusers and ranters. They write back when someone has presented a thoughtful, articulate argument which gets under their skin and stays under it, and no matter how much they want to fob it off, they just have to respond in some manner to hit away that uncomfortable feeling of being nailed to the wall.
>
> I thank you for your unintended compliment.
>
> Cheers,
>
> Mark
>
> PS
>
> Unlike you, Michael, I have maintained the common courtesy of signing off and wishing you well after each of my emails. It must be the feminine side of me coming out.

KIMMEL

> Thanks for writing.
>
> Good luck.
>
> Michael Kimmel

When I read this impressive resume, Kimmel is a superstar in the sphere of high-powered, socially acceptable discussions of gender. He lectures all over the world, liaises with government ministries, and was the first man to deliver the International Women's Day lecture at the European Parliament. He is beloved by public figures like Jane Fonda and Gloria Steinem, and when we read about his version of masculinity, we understand why.

It becomes abundantly clear, that it doesn't matter who is selling the snake-oil. The product is a sham, a fraudulent fairy tale, sold with a slick, sly patter and some convenient lies. When forced to stand and defend this twisted ideology, it collapses like a house of cards.

The non-feminist truth process

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 7 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

We all know that feminism is an anti-male hate movement which germinates from a bottomless disaffection both toward men and toward all things percieved as "masculine". And frankly, as much as that bears repeating, that is old hat. But there is another side to feminist hate. Most people aren't much aware of this other side, but we have got to train a worklight upon it and give it careful thought. More than that, we have got to give it due weight when we are strategizing. We must factor it into all of our calculations, pointing it out to as many people as we can so that those people, too, will commence pointing it out and spreading the iinformation further.

You see, feminism doesn't simply hate men and stop there. It goes the extra mile, by hating everything that is alien to feminism itself. Everything which does not uphold the feminist project, and fuel the never-ending growth of that project, is fair game. In a nutshell, feminism hates the rest of the world — the specifically non-feminist part of the world which can never be co-opted or re-tooled into a servile extension of feminism.

This is home truth about feminism, that it hates the non-feminist sector — and this critically important realization is the absolute dead center of any Strict Anti-Feminist (SAF) politics. The feminists would like to keep this truth under wraps. After all, it doesn't sound very nice . . . does it? And more to that, it betrays a fatal weakness within the feminist project. (We can discuss this elsewhere.)

Knowing all this, it becomes a priority task to squeeze feminism's hate, as it were, onto an open table where the world can plainly see it and even place it under a microscope. Not merely the feminist hatred for "men", but the hatred for anything or everything which is not feminist. The WORLD needs to know, in no uncertain terms, that feminist hates it. It is strategically insufficient for "men" to be the only ones who know that feminism hates them.

That is why we love it when a feminist bigot like Gloria Allred says, "if you're not a feminist, you're a bigot". She does not harm us by calling us bigots. In fact, Gloria has cooperated (unwittingly) with the counter-feminist effort, greasing the skids toward feminism's demise and making our work oh-so-much easier. We need only showcase these things — and throw in some tart commentary which helps the public to understand (by being entertained) that these things are part of a pattern. Clearly we would love it even more if thousands of Glorias were blossoming all over the landscape, saying equally bigoted things. So our mission is, to force their hand. And how to make that happen, you might ask?

Simple. Make conspicuously visible, to all concerned, that the non-feminist part of the world is SOMETHING.

As opposed to nothing.

Simple lack of feminism, as a factor in the algebra of occurrence, is profoundly political. Like so-called empty space, it is anything but dead or static. It is a living presence, brimming with dynamic energy, capable of bending and warping and repositioning things. This truth, and specifically the conscious realization of it, is death to the feminist project.

To understand this, it helps to review what we know about feminism's operative character. We say that "feminism's being consists of being in motion." Zero motion equals zero feminism. Feminism must remain in motion if it is to keep existing at all. Motion, in this case, means extension of feminist ideology into ever more institutions and cultural spaces. Quite right, it's that "long march through the institutions" that we've all heard about. It's that colonization of human communities that we've all witnessed in society.

The minute feminism halts in its march it starts dying, because it starts unravelling and shrinking. Feminism thrives only on a sustained diet of cultural incursion and expansion. In practice, this means constructing a fabric of lies upon a foundation of earlier lies, generating a renewed foundation for more lies in the future.

There is a reason why stage one in the feminist-nonfeminist cooperation spiral is "feminists lie." Feminism can survive only by bricking and mortaring one lie on top of another, fast enough that they go generally unchallenged and are forgotten as time rolls on. (For quickly, the mortar dries.) But the minute this lying stops (or is forced to stop), the truth process begins. Critical thinking rushes in (like a thunderclap) to fill the vacuum. The arrival of critical thinkers and questioners initiates the unstinting process of unravelling feminism's sweater. (I mix no metaphors here; I merely set them next to each other.)

When the truth process gets underway, the complex accretion of built-up lies from the past progressively disintegrates under the disinfecting sunlight of the world's gaze.

Feminism must remain in motion; that is the law of its life. It can be expanding or running in reverse, but either way it must remain in motion. If it stops moving, then poof! It is no more.

If feminism stops expanding, it can only commence shrinking, and the reason it commences shrinking is because the non-feminist truth process springs to life and commences eating it alive, from outward to inward, eventually down to its original elements. Hence, by "eating it alive", I mean decomposing it — on many levels.

So when we showcase the core fact that feminism hates the world (not just men, but the world), we immediately set a barricade in the path of feminist expansion. By alerting the world, we summon into life a universal critique which attenuates feminism's moral justification. In the end, this blocks feminism's further growth. Being blocked from further growth, it cannot "stay the same" at a point of stasis. It can only dwindle away.

Again, feminism hates the world — meaning everything which cannot be recruited or repurposed to serve the feminist project. The mere existence of anything that is not feminism is intolerable to it, and so, inherently, it cannot co-exist with anything that is not feminism.

And further, it can acknowledge no duty to co-exist with anything that is not feminism, because this would underscore that there is indeed a world beyond feminism in the first place, and that r*espect* is due to said world. This would be death to the feminist project not only because it would set a roadblock in the path of feminist expansion, but because it would underscore the plain, elemental, bald-headed fact that feminism is NOT THE WORLD, and never will be.

And for feminism, this would be game over.

To the Vapid Feminist Twat Trying to Censor A Voice for Men

Paul Elam · 10 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I am now in receipt of the following notice from Amazon Web Services, our web hosting service. It is the second letter of its kind in as many months.

> Hello,
>
> We've received a notice regarding unwanted content hosted on your AWS resources. A copy of the complaint identifying the content in question is included below.
>
> Please review the attached notice and take appropriate action.
>
> Regards,
> AWS Abuse
>
> Abuse Case Number: 17566894973-1
>
> —Beginning of forwarded report—
>
> * Log Extract:
> <<<
> Dear Amazon,
> I'm writing to report abusive content found on a blog that you host, > avoiceformen.com <http://www.paulelam.com>. These pages contain misogynistic > content I found very concerning. Some of it is intended as satire, but is > still quite disturbing.Please review these pages and determine whether they > comply with your terms of service.
> I will include the links below. Please keep my report anonymous. Thank you > for helping make sure that the internet is a safe place for everyone.
> Thanks,
>
> https://avoiceformen.com/feminism/why-men-are-more-intelligent-than-women/> https://avoiceformen.com/feminist-violence/if-you-see-jezebel-in-the-road-run-the-bitch-down/> https://avoiceformen.com/feminism/if-you-see-jezebel-in-the-road-run-the-bitch-down-part-ii/> https://avoiceformen.com/featured/october-is-the-fifth-annual-bash-a-violent-bitch-month/> https://avoiceformen.com/featured/feminism-as-narcissistic-personality-disorder/

In keeping with Amazon's request, I have reviewed the material. I am also taking the appropriate action to publicly inform the anonymous pinhead who authored this complaint that A Voice for Men and the material we publish isn't going anywhere. Pink-haired Karens don't have a say in that and they never will.

Also, fuck you.

We now return you to our regularly scheduled programming.

The gynocentric snobbery of Christina Hoff-Sommers

AVfM Video Source · 11 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The following video is by Vernon Meigs. Visit his Bitchute Channel here, or his new new blog 'V for Vernon' here.

Christina Hoff Sommers: Men's Rights is 'Taking it a Bit Far'

Vernon Meigs · 12 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It took two months exactly to finally come up with a response to Christina Hoff Sommers and her co-host for their Femsplainers episode "I Was Falsely Accused of Rape" simply because like anybody trying to be productive, I keep busy and otherwise I had been trying to figure out how to articulate it. Here is my video uploaded on Bitchute entitled: "A Rebuttal to Femsplainers Regarding Erin Pizzey and Men's Rights".

Yes, I know in the clips I used for commentary they say Erin Pizzey is "taking things a bit far" and I keep on using the word "going too far" as if I was quoting them. My mistake, but the idea is the same.

Actually, I did in fact write them a lengthy letter regarding my concerns the week that episode of theirs aired. To this day I don't believe they've responded, be it directly or on their listener reaction. Not surprised, actually. I had considered making it an open letter, but there's really nothing in it that I didn't address in my video.

Even after two months I think it's a very revealing segment where Christina Hoff Sommers professes to praise esteemed activist Erin Pizzey for her early involvement in the women's movement, and at the same time proceed to both ignore her likewise early involvement with men's issues (that got basically no support by comparison back in the day) and outright dismisses her current involvement in Men's Rights.

A few years back, Paul Elam of A Voice For Men posted a video on youtube calling out Christina Hoff Sommers, which I think was a well-deserved and refreshing take. Predictably, perhaps, he received a lot of reaction that bemoaned the fact that he was attacking a "potential ally" and that he ought to build bridges instead of burning them, to paraphrase their general message.

As I say in my own video, perhaps somebody ought to tell Miss Sommers and her circle of gossiping equity feminists just that. Instead she seems more interested in taking shots at those involved in the Men's Movement in earnest just for a few laughs, and it is clear enough to me that she is thoroughly uninterested reaching out and having a civil discussion with anybody in that world.

Let us not let the dialogue regarding men's issues be dominated by those meagre feminists who decry any Men's Rights Advocate for being "angry" and insist that only feminists talk about the issue for some bogus notion of "balance", the same kind of feminists that have no problem with the mutilation of baby boys' genitalia because of "cultural tradition", the same kind of feminists that talk up traditionalist roles expecting the gynocentrism of male altruism.

"Equity feminism" sounds nice and dainty and safe, but in turn one must consider what Jordan Peterson clarified many times about equity: it is "equality" of outcome, which has nothing to do with equality of opportunity nor the equality of responsibility, which feminists have done their best to ignore where it benefited them.

Radical feminism and political dimorphism

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 14 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Today I will talk about radical feminism and what it means for us in the present struggle. Not just feminism at large, but the radical kind in particular.

Elsewhere, I have defined radical feminism differently than a feminist would define it. It is my critical non-feminist prerogative, after all, to view feminism through an objective lens, from the outside looking in. It is axiomatic, in counter-feminist terms, that feminism is what we say it is — and we must never stop reiterating this. There is no infallible "Pope of Feminism" who can issue any papal bull upon that subject. The whole question of "what is feminism?" (radical or otherwise) is up for grabs, because feminism looks wildly different from different angles. (Besides, I have never seen a feminist definition of feminism that didn't deserve a good, stiff unpacking.) So again: feminism is what we say it is.

So I have defined radical feminism as the man-hating version of feminism — it's just that simple. Disaffection toward men and maleness is demonstrably feminism's root component, and this insight is helped along by the fact that "radical" is derived from the Latin "radix", or root. Radical feminism is the root version of feminism, from which all of feminism grows. As such, it is closer to summing up feminism as a whole.

This makes radical feminism is the "true" feminism, while other feminisms fall more or less short of the mark. Any manifestation of feminism can be gauged by its level of anti-male feeling. The more (or less) man-hating it is, the more (or less) quintessentially feminist it is. (I do not lapse into andronarrativism by merely pointing these things out.)

Radical feminism, in our non-feminist view, is not a bounded category but rather a thing manifested on a continuum of radicalness. In other words, it's relative, but in the end radical feminism is the singularity around which all of feminism swirls.

But that is only my non-feminist take upon the topic. So on the principle of "know your enemy", let's have a drive-by look at what feminists themselves mean by "radical feminism", and explore how this dovetails with the points I have been discussing.

At a core minimum, radical feminism means any version of the feminist ideology which defines women as a political sex class.

There you have it. Any feminist who can be pegged (on feminist terms) as a radical feminist, will either implicitly or explicitly harbor the belief that women are a political sex class.

AGAIN: The foundation of radical feminism is the idea that women are a political sex class.

Remember that.

You will not find a radical feminist anywhere who does not believe that women are a political sex class. That is the preeminent marker which differentiates a radical feminist from a liberal feminist, a moderate feminist, a coffee-shop feminist, a bubblegum feminist, a unicorn feminist.

A liberal feminist is chiefly a reformist, one who would pass a few laws and then integrate women into the institutional framework of liberal bourgeois democracy and Western jurisprudence. Feminists have an expression for this: "add women and stir."

On the other hand, a radical feminist wants to break the frame of existing institutions altogether, in the belief that those institutions are inherently stacked against women and cannot be made to serve women without a radical perestroika to their deep structural core. (Can you say "smash the patriarchy?")

This is where radical feminism (in the feminist usage, mind you!) begins its journey. From here, it grows. It mutates. It branches off in many directions. Yet always it commences with a radical break, a rupture, a discontinuity, from the bourgeois liberal tradition.

Radical feminists have correctly realized that if feminism stayed within the confines of the bourgeois liberal tradition, the whole feminist project (to increase the power of women) would eventually stall dead in its tracks.

Are you with me?

In order for the feminist project to remain viable, it must remain in motion by continual expansion. (We call this "perpetual revolution". It broadly resembles the "permanent revolution" which Leon Trotsky wrote about.) And yet, the feminist project in its bourgeois liberal form cannot grow beyond the bounds of possibility which the bourgeois liberal tradition permits.

I repeat: the feminist project in its bourgeois liberal form cannot grow beyond the bounds of possibility which the bourgeois liberal tradition permits. One sees that is logical.

So if the feminist project would remain viable, it must effectively dismantle the bourgeois liberal tradition. In other words, feminism as a whole would have no future if it did not evolve into more and more radical forms.

Radical feminism is feminism's only viable component, so next time somebody tells you that radical feminists are "only the extremist fringe", you may discount that speaker as an intellectual lightweight, a person of small understanding.

Assuming that no external force intervenes, radical feminism embodies the trajectory of the feminist future. Hence, listening to radical feminst conversation is like gazing into a crystal ball. Radical feminists are the feminist vanguard. They aren't the majority, but . . . they don't need to be!

Let's turn back to our non-feminist definition of radical feminism. Once again, we define radical feminism as man-hating feminism, and we consider man-hating to be the root of all feminism. So when you attack or undermine radical feminism, you cripple the feminist project altogether because you attack all feminism at its root.

The bourgeois liberal tradition, as we have discussed, sets an institutional barrier on how far feminism can grow. Similarly, the requirement to treat men and boys decently sets a moral barrier on how far (and in what direction) feminism can grow. In either case, a barrier gets imposed and growth of the feminist project gets constrained. Hence, in either case, feminism would wither on the vine.

So if feminism is to remain viable, it is necessary to dismantle both liberal bourgeois institutions and the requirements of morality.

Very well, let us recapitulate. Even though all feminism may be defined in terms of disaffection toward men, and the most extreme man-haters may be classed as “radical”, it remains true that in feminist terms, radical feminism is distinguishable from liberal feminism because it names women as a political sex class. Furthermore, radical feminism holds that the female political sex class can only be served if the bourgeois liberal tradition be abrogated.

So finally, this means that relations between men and women have become politicized, that the sexes now face each other, in principle, as adversaries. Women are named as a political sex class, which makes them a political interest group. That is unfortunately the case even if a lot of them don’t want this.

In the meantime, (non-feminist) men are in a kind of limbo. They must either start viewing themselves as a political interest group also, and standing up for their interests, or frankly they will get run over. And indeed, thanks to feminist innovation on many fronts, that is already happening.

Briefly stated, men and women have been engineered into what you may call a “political dimorphism”, meaning a co-existence of the sexes in asymmetrical and mutually dysfunctional political forms. Well it ought to be self-evident that this is an unhealthy, unsustainable condition culminating in a zero sum game, and that a house divided against itself cannot stand. And a world where men and women are competing political interest groups, is precisely that — a house divided. That is what feminism has so far given us, and as this develops further it can only pound the wedge deeper.

So in conclusion, I would recommend that we of the non-feminist sector begin to classify feminists as a political class. Not a political sex class, since both women and men can be feminists, but a political class pure and simple, with interests that run counter to everybody else’s interests.

From this it follows that we activated non-feminists, women and men both, should define ourselves as a political class also — with interests that run counter to those of the feminist political class.

Feminist v. non-feminist sounds more healthy than man v. woman, don’t you think so? A house frog-marching an unwanted guest off the property looks more sustainable than a house divided against itself.

Remember, from here on out, the foundational narrative is feminism v. the rest of us — which sounds like winning odds.

Political dimorphism has got to go.

ICMI 2020 Promo Playlist

AVfM Video Source · 16 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An Objectivist's Case for Men's Rights Advocacy

Vernon Meigs · 17 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It's been roughly over a decade since I've more or less taken a critical stance against contemporary feminism. In retrospect a large part of the reason I've opposed it was that in my mind, feminism relied heavily on collectivism and tribalism to promote its ideology, and I've seen early on enough telltale signs of its rampant misandry as shown in the college I attended as well as outside it, one idea circulating among students being "Schrodinger's Rapist", basically a way of saying all men are potential rapists. Mind you, these weren't radical feminist students promoting this idea, but regular run of the mill students, usually women. I didn't realize the impact of this at the time, but looking back this was a way radical feminist ideology crept into the mainstream via the college culture. Despite my acknowledgement of the existence of so-called "individualist feminists" even then, I had no doubts in my mind that they were far from the status quo.

It has likewise been about a decade since I've established myself as both individualist and libertarian in one form or another. Although I've been a gigantic fan of Ayn Rand and her works, which I still identify myself as to this day, I didn't classify myself as Objectivist until early 2013, after a great deal of thought on the subject. In any case, the decade was largely spent on preoccupation with individualism in terms of economic matters as well as philosophical.

It was not until the latter part of 2019 that I opened up to more serious problems regarding male-female relations in society and the creep of radical feminist ideas more and more into mainstream thought, not long after the advent of #MeToo and bromides such as "toxic masculinity" became household terms as it seemed. I had previously hoped to remain in a "neutral" position where I could pursue the advocacy of the dignity of the individual without resorting to sex-based collectivism as I perceive feminism had fallen into basically from its inception. Until I involved myself in hearing out the positions of the Men's Rights Movement, I perhaps had misgivings about the MRM – that, they were going to make the same mistakes feminists have been making. I consider myself to have been wrong, and I will detail how I have come to the position that I, as an individualist and more specifically an Objectivist, can also classify myself as an advocate for Men's Rights, with the philosophies hand in hand.

Alleged Value in Disposability

Even as I had immersed myself in an antifeminist perspective, one concern I had was the hardline traditionalist bent taken by many critical of feminism. While they have indeed defended men, too often they base their appraisal of men based on the fact that men have sacrificed – for society, culture, family – their resources and their entire beings. Always the appraisal based on what they have given, sacrificed, lost, and mutilated themselves, for the sake of others. Always the appraisal based on their self-sacrifice, and not how they have attained and achieved for their own sake. Men apparently receive praise strictly for being disposable, and not for valuing themselves.

My eyes opened up to how vastly encompassing the idea of gynocentrism was no matter who's promoting it – be it a feminist or a "tradwife". Whereas I had understood the existence of gynocentrism in some form previously but admittedly took for granted how prevalent it was, I was now understanding that it can't go unaddressed.

I was fortunate to have encountered minds that cared for Men's Issues while also being critical of the traditionalist gynocentrism that affects even many antifeminists. I was glad that the idea of disposability and the idea of male pressure for self-sacrifice was actually being addressed seriously by those in the Men's Movement.

I would like to take a few steps further than what I've seen thus far in the Men's Movement, however, in addressing a commonality between it and Objectivism, and that is the objection to a man's treatment and expectation as a sacrificial being. In addressing the problem of alleged value in valuelessness, that is, value in disposability for a man, I think we can find common advocacy for a man's dignity as an individual, not sacrificed to the expectations for others.

Defining Sacrifice

The idea of sacrifice has long been praised as an act of good and an act of heroism by society…at least, it seems, when society is the beneficiary of such a sacrifice. In recent years, Jordan Peterson (a man whom I admire and respect in many ways and I consider myself a fan of on the whole) had been speaking vastly on the idea of sacrifice as a necessity to move forward with their lives. I will talk more on Jordan Peterson and my agreements and disagreements with him hopefully more in detail in future essays, but for now I will say that his appraisal of sacrifice is a major point of contention on my part.

Consider the quote by Ayn Rand in Galt's Speech in her novel Atlas Shrugged, "If you exchange a penny for a dollar, it is not a sacrifice; if you exchange a dollar for a penny, it is." When I first read this in my initial immersion into Rand's works, I had a hard time integrating it and understanding its pertinence. Over the years in my efforts to understand fundamentals about capitalism and free markets, I had come to realize that the quote exemplifies the very idea of any given trade, assuming it is done voluntarily.

In a trade, we really do transact in a way similar to the quote. Using an example particular to myself, I pay $15 for a certain Magic: the Gathering card I really want, say a "Mind Over Matter". That "Mind Over Matter" is almost like a $20 bill for instance that I am trading in for my $15. I make a transaction where I give something I want less, for something I want more than my $15. Else the transaction would never have been agreed to. Such is the nature of trade, and profit.

It is my guess that the analogy of trade is the basis on the advocates of sacrifice, such as Peterson, make their case. In their minds, a sacrificial offering, often something of high value, is given in exchange for what they think is something higher. This may seem consistent at first, until we consider just who is collecting these sacrificial offerings.

A sacrifice, consistently, seems to take the pattern of a subject offering something of potentially immense value to appease an entity or entities that the subject is beholden to. The entity or entities offers nothing much in return except its own current contentment, and perhaps at best the prevention of a loss on the part of the subject. I am constantly reminded about fantasy scenarios about villages sacrificing one of their virgins to appease some dragon or demon so that their village may live another year.

A sacrifice, as I see it, is distinct from a proper trade. A trade is by its very nature profitable on both ends, assuming again that it was conducted voluntarily and without coercion. A sacrifice however has the element of the beholden – something of value exchanged with something that the subject is better off without; in other words, less valuable.

Who do the practitioners of sacrifice bestow their offerings to? A collective good? Others for the sake of beings others, by virtue of not being yourself? Ungrateful mobs whom you should never apologize to but you keep on doing so as they keep making more demands?

Peterson consistently makes the case that you get to "pick your damn sacrifice". It seems to me that every important step such a person takes in their life involves a sacrifice, with the ability to choose one's sacrifice being the spoonful of sugar to help the medicine go down, as it were. But it also seems to me that people who accompany every important action and decision in their life with a sacrifice cannot act without sacrificing more and more, like one who sacrifices their health more and more with each dose of a hard drug. Again, perhaps we should consider who is collecting and benefiting from these sacrificial offerings. In a free trade, both sides exchange a penny for a dollar. If you catch yourself exchanging a dollar for a penny, take a hard look at why you are doing it, and whether you shouldn't instead forsake the one you're making the transaction to.

Sacrifice is one side benefitting at the expense of a subject that consoles himself that it's survived another day.

Gynocentrism – The Collector of Spoils

Now, WHY was any of the above pertinent to men's issues when it may seem like a variant of an economics lesson? Simple – a calling out of the idea that a man has value only because of his sacrifice. Again, I do in fact praise Jordan Peterson for being a major voice on the behalf of males that has gained the acceptance he did. However, if anybody talks a lot of sacrifice it is he, and by and large the traditionalist take on male and female relations calls for male sacrifice for society, culture, family, and importantly, women. Gynocentrism is the premise that males make sacrificial offerings of their values and themselves entirely, beholden to female collectors.

It appears to me that the only difference between a feminist and a traditionalist is that the traditionalist purports to thank the male for their disposability.

What if a man were to say, "No thanks, I don't elect to be disposable and at the beck and call of women or society or culture, I am going to pursue my own goals"? Well, he would rather immediately be branded a loser and either dismiss them altogether or demand that they become, in essence, a cog who owes his services to society, to culture, to family. And no, I am the farthest thing from anti-family but we'll get to that.

To not further beat around the bush, I will call gynocentrism for what it really is – a call for male altruism.

But being altruistic and selfless is good, most of you reading this might say! I do note that incredibly intelligent people who make great points seem to think so. But this is a huge point of disagreement I have with them, and I am not sorry for that. By now you should realize why this essay is entitled "An Objectivist's Case for Men's Rights Advocacy", not merely "An Individualist's Case etc".

Altruism, "altruisme" coined by Auguste Comte, can be thought of as made from "alter" meaning "other." Altruism is literally "otherism". This "otherism" can be thought of to mean service of others at the expense of the self. Hence this "otherism" is synonymous with selflessness, that is, devoid of the involvement of self. The self doesn't factor in, with the exception of its strict absence.

Imagine defining selflessness, contextualized again for emphasis as "devoid of the involvement of self", as "compassion", "brotherly love", "interested in others", and even morality itself. This defines the act of kindness, compassion, and love as something in which a self is completely uninvolved, meaning it is conducted beholden to the demands and whims of others. But that's what's been going on for so long and it is basically second nature to the majority of people on the planet to think of kindness as an act in which self is not involved, for selfishness is supposedly evil.

Moreover, the selfless act of "otherism" is something we seem to be told to do because it is right by virtue of it not being for one's own self-interests. It stops being selfless altogether if the practitioner derives any sort of gain, and gain for the self and not the other is condemned on this basis. The gynocentric demand that males dispose themselves selflessly so they can sacrifice for the gynocentric society is an act of "otherism" in action.

Society bemoans the selfishness and individualism of one they demand as a sacrifice, but odd is it not, that nobody seems to bemoan the "selfishness" of those collecting the spoils?

"Me Me Me" is about Altruism, Not Selfishness

One thing I appear to have at odds with the rest of is the context thereby which feminists are described as the ones going "Me Me Me". I don't disagree with the fact that feminists and SJW types endlessly prattle "Me Me Me". What is do disagree with is the subsequent disdain of it as if it were some twisted form of individualism or selfishness and that the solution is to partake in "otherism".

When anybody decries the alleged "selfishness" of one person, it is usually accompanied by a kind of "What about me??" spoken aloud or not. I would go ahead and call this "Me Me Me" phenomenon a "Whataboutmeism" (not to be confused with "Whataboutism"). In decrying the individual selfishly pursuing his own goals for himself, the decrier demands that the individual instead direct his energy towards others, the decrier usually being the first of the others. Nobody seems to be going after the "selfishness" of this weasel-like moocher parasite demanding that others do things for him, instead of taking responsibility for his own life.

If taken seriously the following won't jive too much with the Objectivist appraisal of the idea of selfishness (or rational egoism), but I have always enjoyed this definition out of Ambrose Bierce's The Devil's Dictionary:

SELFISH, adj. Devoid of consideration for the selfishness of others.

I truly love that. In its own way it tells a truth that the naysayers of the selfish can ever recognize: if an individual doing his own thing selfishly is evil, what do you call the would-be collector of the things he would inevitably be forced to sacrifice?

"Me Me Me" is the demand to the producer, the creator, to sacrifice and provide for these Others. "Me Me Me" is a call to altruism. It is the opposite of true selfishness. It is the opposite of rational self-interest. It is the opposite of individualism. A true individualist going his own way does not bother demanding others' things by default and yell "Me Me Me", "Mine Mine Mine", or "What about me?"

For an Individualist and Self-Interest Based Approach to Men's Issues

In my own way I hope to promote, in light of the problems above I see within and surrounding Men's Issues, a self-interest based approach to Men's Issues. In a world where many prominent voices that purport to be about the well-being of males still promote the form of gynocentrism in which males are appraised primarily if not strictly by their disposability and their utility in making others' lives content, I honestly think that the individualist (dare I say Objectivist?) case for Men's Right's Advocacy can be made, so men can realize that they can take unabashed, selfish pleasure in the great things they do for themselves and yes, for the ones they care about in their lives.

Men, or anybody for that matter, should not have to care for other people for the sole virtue of them being "the other". Individuals can absolutely care about others but it would follow that they hold those specific people (NOT for being the other) in high esteem and in genuine value. Individuals can care about other individuals for their own genuine reasons, not for being the other.

I will use myself for some examples. I care about Men's Issues not out of altruism or selflessness. I am genuinely interested in the issues as I know it can affect myself potentially as a man, and even if it doesn't happen to me directly it happening to men in general can resonate with me in a way that I am invested. With regards to genuine issues women face, it's basically the same idea in that I resonate with them as individuals with the same humanity and dignity as an individual as a man.

I care deeply about the problem of male genital mutilation and I am not even circumcised myself (thankfully!) but I don’t need to be just so I can care about the issue. I absolutely am invested in putting an end to it and spreading awareness to a Western world that continues to try to justify it. I don’t claim to be doing this selflessly by a longshot.

To revisit a point I made about sacrifice to family, I will again say that I am the farthest thing from anti-family. To clarify, I believe that the best family is forged out of actual self-interest in raising the family. A man (and woman!) can and probably should have a mindset of self-interest, personal investment, and love in seeing their family grow and flourish. There is self-interest to be had in passing down wisdom to one’s children as well as caring for them. If there are any “selfless” examples of family, look to the kinds of parents seeing their children as a chore or burden and hating every moment of their parenting and taking every opportunity to shirk it to others.

All in all what I am hoping to contribute is a sense of men and boys being esteemed and loved for being men and boys, as individuals that offer the best versions of themselves to the world at no loss and sacrifice to themselves. I would suspect that many already tell the same message, if perhaps in a somewhat different philosophical language.

Only women bleed

Mark Dent · 18 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Corona Virus has exposed the best and the worst of human behavior. Any crisis affecting a society will do this. One of the most noticeable of the many traits laid bare by this disease has been the deeply ingrained self centred, self-entitled, narcissism of feminists.

The fact that the virus is killing men at twice the rate it kills women is an inconsequential fact, not only for feminists, but for the mainstream media too. In the initial days it did receive some coverage, but there were no emotional outbursts or suggestions that men were dying because our hospital system simply didn't value their lives or demands that something be done about this shocking imbalance. No-the facts were stated and we all moved on.

Yet once again, we have been inundated with stories alerting us to the many ways in which the virus has affected women. Men may be dying in far greater numbers but women are stuck home minding the kids!

There are countless articles I could have chosen as examples of this sickeningly blinkered, bitter and bigoted attitude but I have settled on one by an Australian journalist by the name of Nikki Gemmell.

Nikki Gemmell

My attention was captured by the article's long title: Corona Virus, Will I ever be so deeply rested again? I don't want this state of grace to end.

Being an introvert who has similarly enjoyed the chance to enjoy the solitude and peace of my home in the company of my wife, I thought Nikki would share feelings with which I could identify.

I was wrong. Although the opening paragraph was reasonably promising, it soon became obvious that this was not the soulful reflection of a thoughtful person, wanting to convey her deep sense of restfulness and inner peace which has come as a result of our enforced lockdown.

No. This was simply another embittered feminist rant.

This was the first clue.

> And now – blessedly, luxuriously – this. Doris Lessing speaks of the tiredness of a fellow working mother in her memoir, Walking in the Shade, set in 1950s London. "She had some job that enabled her to leave work at four [pm], and was, like me, always tired," Lessing wrote. Seven decades later working mothers still accept this state as our lot; this perpetual feeling of being on the brink, wrung out, of never being quite on top of things.

Yes, women, and especially mothers, are the only people who feel perpetually exhausted, washed out, and "on the brink" because of the endless demands of life.

She continues:

> Children devour us. And men. We allow it. What value do we put on a woman's life, her inner life, beyond domesticity? I have always felt that time spent on my own creativity is time I'm thieving from domestic demands, > from the endless wants of others, and lockdown has given me the luxury of time. May my own young daughter be spared the expectations of others, all the needs that pull a woman away from doing what she really wants to do in life; but I don't hold out huge amounts of hope.

By now, the familiar increased heart rate and rising adrenalin levels had kicked in and I was struggling to overcome the overwhelming urge to put my fist through the computer screen. My male rage and violent tendencies would not have surprised Nikki one little bit.

Perhaps it was the last straw syndrome. Knowing men were dying at twice the rate of women and understanding that this demonstrable fact had yielded less column space than this woman's personal whine about how tired she is may well have been the reason for my slight overreaction. That, combined with the fact that this stupid, senseless sook clearly really believed every word she wrote was the perfect cocktail for my internal implosion.

> May my own young daughter be spared the expectations of others, all the needs that pull a woman away from doing what she really wants to do in life; but I don't hold out huge amounts of hope.

Even now, I feel a visceral response each time I read this sentence.

Read it a couple of times and try to absorb the unfathomable arrogance, ignorance and self-entitlement that drips from every word.

I assume she does not have a son, but would not be surprised to discover that she does. It seems the needs of others pull a woman away from doing what she really wants to do in life.

Men? Those blokes you see, even the ones with grey hair and heavily lined faces, digging deep ditches along the roadside or climbing the telegraph pole as the rain pelts down are living their dream. They feel as fulfilled and contented as a human being could possibly be.

What is a round of golf with mates or an afternoon of beers and laughter in the company of your best friends when compared to this bliss called work? How can you even begin to compare the thrill of waking at 5:00 am each winter's morning and pulling on your work boots to rolling over and snuggling up to the wife for another three hours? It isn't even a contest.

> Reading Doris Lessing on her 1950s life makes me think: for a working mother, why hasn't there been more change? Lessing's worries back then are the same as mine now, and in that time we've witnessed a huge feminist revolution that hasn't gone far enough.

The feminist revolution hasn't gone far enough.

Women have generous paid maternity leave, time off for domestic violence related health problems, affirmative action and quotas which ensure success when searching for employment. They can work full time, part time or simply stay at home (whether they have kids or not) if hubby is bringing home enough bacon and is happy for his little woman to remain at home.

Yet, Nikki wants more.

> And now I'm dreading the return to crammed normality and it feels like a transgression to say this. But with a stepping back into the regular world will come all the demands, the requests, the filling up of precious time when I could be writing, actually. "An immense dismay seized me, a tiredness, and this tiredness was my enemy, for so much of my life I wasn't doing what I would have liked to do, or enjoyed doing," Lessing wrote, describing the moment her godmother asked her to locate a retirement home for her; because it's what is asked of women, all the time, it is what we do too well, and perhaps no one else will do it if we don't.

No man feels a sense of trepidation about stepping back into the rat race when he has been granted a temporary reprieve. That sickening feeling in the guts so many experience as the all too brief holiday is coming to an end and Monday morning looms is one I am sure men (and women) understand. Stepping back into the heavy traffic, or packed train, the office or building site where deadlines have to be met and angry stressed bosses breathe down their sweaty necks. Driving home as the sun sets and the kids have already been fed and bathed and are ready for bed. Dad may be able to sneak a kiss on a cheek or read a bed time story.

And this is not a temporary state. This rolls on for years and years.

Nobody writes about it. No male journalist would ever use his writing column in a newspaper to moan about his lot in life. Female journalists seem to do it as regularly as they catch up with the girls for some coffee and cake in the local café.

Imagine if you will, writing about the tiredness you feel as a man. As you write, your entire focus is on the horrible demands life makes on you as a man and your hope that your son will be able to do what he really wants in life and not be drowned in a sea of demands from the women and kids in his life.

Imagine having the nerve to write about male tiredness as though it was something no woman could ever comprehend. It is (you write) a different kind of tiredness-it seeps deep into the bones and can never be shaken free. Only other males could ever understand.

And of course, (you continue) only males give up their hopes and dreams, their passions and hobbies because they have a needy, bloodsucking family demanding more and more from them. You must emphasize your resentment over the fact that men and only men are expected to work full time for a lifetime. Perhaps this is because no -one else will do it if we don't.

How dare your wife and kids intrude so rudely upon the plans you had made so many years ago.

But let's stop imagining and return to Gemmell's very real rant.

> But the Covid-19 pandemic and lockdown has given me an excuse to say no, I cannot critique your manuscript, write your life story, endorse your book, be on your committee or panel. It's been such a vast relief to be able to freely say no to so much without being judged; to put a firm red line through so many diary jottings.

In Gemmell's world men do not ever feel the overwhelming desire to shout "NO" to yet another demand on their time and energy. Men never feel pulled in a multitude of directions by the people in their lives.

> I can do in quietness right now the two things that give me the most pleasure in the world – mothering and writing – without having to bother about anything else. "I simply knew I was doing what I had to do, which was to write. And that meant managing my resources so my time was not invaded by the unnecessary, my energies were not used up wrongly. Easy to say, easy to write – but this is the crux and the heart of the writer's task," Lessing said, and it is usually so much easier for a male writer to manage this, always has been.
>
> Will I ever be so deeply rested again in my life? I don't think so. I don't want this state of grace to end. When this is all over, kick me into the long grass, for I do not quite want to step back into that world I'd left behind.

Here is a woman, who openly concedes that the two things which bring her the most joy in life are mothering and writing. There are tens of thousands of men (and women) who are locked into grinding, soul destroying jobs because they have people who depend upon them for the food they eat, the clothes they wear and the bed they sleep in. They are not lucky enough to be earning a living doing something that brings them great pleasure and satisfaction.

Gemmell says*: and it is usually so much easier for a male writer to manage this, always has been.* (To save his energy for writing, not allowing his time to be invaded by the unnecessary)

There it is again. Men have it easier. Men don't understand what it's like to struggle, to doubt, to balance their writing with their desire to be with their loved ones.

The arrogance is astonishing. Breathtaking. It frightens me to have the raw truth of how feminists think spelt out in such an emphatic manner. There is no shame. No sense of embarrassment. Clearly Gemmell would have read and reread her first draft of this reflection. What she read pleased her. The words reflected exactly what she was feeling. This is what I find so stunning. Feminists truly view the world as oppressive and unjust in what it demands of women without for one moment considering what it demands from men.

Why was the reference to men even required? Why couldn't Gemmell have written a reflection on her personal struggle with the demands of her life and the chance the enforced lockdown gave her to catch her breath and find some time to pursue her passions without disparaging men or suggesting men have a much smoother road to navigate?

It is simply because the sickeningly twisted notion that she has it harder must never be far from her conscious thoughts at any given moment. It is as familiar and as constantly present to her as the air she breathes. It controls her thinking and her actions. Everything she does and says is guided by the simple unshakeable belief that men are privileged and women oppressed.

There was something else Gemmell never mentioned because it is of no consequence to her. There are many people whose jobs have been ripped from them. Businesses have been lost and lives destroyed by this enforced solitude. She remains blissfully unaware of just how lucky she, I and others are, being able to view this strange time as a blessing when it is devastating the lives of so many people.

I wrote recently that feminists think of themselves as a woman first and then (if at all) as a unique individual. They wallow in the delicious comfort of perceived victimhood even when it is a concoction of their fetid imaginations.

She will never see the truth. Lifelong bigots never do.

I noted this comment under Gemmell's whine.

> Doris Lessing was a great writer but not such a good example in other ways. She walked out on her marriage and two young children to give herself more time for writing. She then married a communist East German spy.

She seems to be a perfect role model for feminists.

It's all about me.

Dr Lolita McDavid – Genital Mutilation of Children

AVfM Video Source · 18 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Before MGTOW there were MMGTOW

Doug Mortimer · 19 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

So what were MMGTOW? That's my ad hoc acronym for Mountain Men Going Their Own Way. Having coined it, I now abandon it, as Mountain Men Going Their Own Way is a redundancy. By definition, mountain men always went their own way.

The mountain man was a peculiarly American phenomenon (though some were Canadian and a few were European-born), and their golden age lasted only a couple of decades (roughly 1820 to 1840). Though of humble birth, the mountain man was the point man of the American nation as it marched westward across the continent. The famed phrase "Manifest Destiny," however, did not become popular till after the mountain man's heyday.

Historian Frederick Jackson Turner emphasized the importance of the frontier not just as a place but as a concept in American culture. Even today, we often hear of some luminary described as a pioneer in one pursuit or another. Famously, the brief administration of John Fitzgerald Kennedy was popularly known as the New Frontier.

Keep in mind that the geographical west was a moving line. Today it's difficult to think of Pittsburgh as a western city, but at the time of the Declaration of Independence, anything west of the Appalachians was considered the west. Most of the explorers and settlers who ventured into this wilderness were Scots-Irish (Protestants from Northern Ireland), who had emigrated to the young republic only to find that the Eastern seaboard was pretty well full up. The immense continent beyond was wide open, however. (Your manosphere reading list should definitely include James Webb's Born Fighting: How the Scots-Irish Shaped America, a history that traces how the American character largely was shaped by an ethnic group whose rugged mores had been forged through centuries of hardship and conflict in the old country, making them ideal shock troops for the push into unsettled realms.)

Of course, westward movement did not begin with the mountain men. There were famed frontiersmen who were kindred spirits. Best known was Daniel Boone, who died in 1820, more or less the beginning of the mountain man era, and went no further west than Missouri. Another was Davy Crockett, who died at the Alamo in 1836, and never went any further west than San Antonio, Texas. These men spent most of their lives east of the Mississippi, and never got anywhere near the Rocky Mountains, where the mountain men became legends. The famed French-Canadian voyageurs also predated the mountain men and had much in common with them, though they worked in crews, not alone.

The first iteration of the mountain man is usually considered to be John Colter (1774-1813). A Virginian by birth, he was a member of the renowned Lewis & Clark expedition of 1804-1806. A later claim to fame is that he is considered to be the first white men to set foot in the Yellowstone/Grand Tetons region of present-day Wyoming. Today, thanks to innumerable landscape photographers, the region is an iconic American landscape, but in Colter's day it was inhospitable – especially since Colter chose to do his exploring in the winter.

All of the above would be impressive enough on any mountain man's resume. But there is more. In 1808 he was captured by Blackfoot Indians in what is now Montana, and given a chance to literally run for his life – naked. Thanks to his life on the frontier, he was in good shape, good enough to outpace 500 warriors (except for one, whom he killed) in his "run for life" after a head start of roughly 400-yards. After eluding his pursuers by hiding in a beaver house till dark, he walked another 11 days till he reached a trader's fort. As a result, his feat captured the imagination of many a tenderfoot. The basic storyline of a man running for his life while pursued by savages is a natural for movies. The first was a 1912 offering called John Colter's Escape. A number of later movies (e.g., Run of the Arrow in 1957 and The Naked Prey in 1965) took the basics of the chase and reworked them.

Colter, however, was not the first "professional" mountain man. In a sense, the typical mountain man was as much a corporate employee as a lone wolf. A number of them worked indirectly for John Jacob Astor, the richest man in America, and the first multi-millionaire. The genesis of Astor's wealth was his American Fur Company, which was heavily dependent on the labors of the mountain men. Beaver hats were all the rage and you couldn't ask for a better material to fashion a winter coat. Beavers were able to withstand icy mountain streams because of the density of their fur.

So the mountain man wasn't just living off the land, he was exploiting it to put more money in John Jacob Astor's pocket. Imagine the irony of a contemporary MGTOW going to work for Microsoft to make Bill Gates richer.

Another important nabob was William Ashley (1778-1838), Lt. Governor of the newly minted State of Missouri (admitted August 10, 1821). In 1822 Ashley placed an advertisement for "enterprising young men" (i.e., fur trappers) in St. Louis newspapers. Being a fur trapper did not mean just trapping critters. The job duties also included skinning them, stretching the skins over frames to dry, and scraping them.

Response to Ashley's ad was robust, and he was able to put together an elite corps of 100 men for his Rocky Mountain Fur Company. After his stint in politics, Ashley himself became a mountain man and, unlike John Jacob Astor, did his fair share of Indian fighting and exploring.

By 1825 the mountain men were well established, so Ashley inaugurated the Rocky Mountain Rendezvous, an annual summer get-together of hundreds of mountain men and traders in the Green River country of northeast Utah and southwest Wyoming. The traders brought supplies, the mountain men their furs.

The Rendezvous also afforded the mountain men a chance to exchange information (networking!) with their peers. Since mountain men lived solitary lives, they relished the chance to actually socialize with their own kind. The amusements at hand included drinking, brawling, gambling, bullshit artistry (or tall tale telling), and other forms of roistering, sort of like a combination swap meet and Las Vegas convention.

As the fur trade declined in prominence, so too did the Rendezvous. The last was held in 1840. Afterwards, the mountain men capitalized on their encyclopedic knowledge of the west by serving as guides for wagon trains and military expeditions.

If John Colter was the first mountain man, the consummate mountain man was often considered to be Jim Bridger (1804-1881), who had done it all. He had responded to John Ashley's 1822 newspaper ad for fur trappers, and he also served as an explorer, hunter, scout, and guide. Over the years his reputation as a teller of tall tales embellished his image, though he remained illiterate all his life. Consequently, any number of schools, forts, mountain ranges, lakes, and streets were named after him, and he was portrayed by numerous actors in assorted movies and TV shows.

Another man who responded to Ashley's ad was Hugh Glass (1783-1833) a trapper/trader/hunter/explorer, who is best known for an incident when he was mauled by a grizzly bear (something of a rite of passage or occupational hazard for mountain men) while on an expedition Though severely injured, he was still alive but not expected to remain so for long. Two volunteers remained behind to wait for him to die so they could bury him. When the two men were beset by Arikara Indians, they fled. But Glass was not done for. Despite his injuries (infected wounds, a broken leg, deep lacerations on his back) he lived off the land and traveled 200 miles to Fort Kiowa in present-day South Dakota. As with John Colter, his against-all-odds struggle to survive has provided fodder for various short stores, novels, TV shows, and movies.

Naturalist John Muir and photographer Ansel Adams played key roles in popularizing the Yosemite Valley before its wonders were widely available to the public. Joseph Reddeford Walker (1798-1876), however, got there first. Five years before Muir was born (in 1838) Walker got a good look at it while blazing a trail through Northern California. He was so taken by his experience that he instructed that the epitaph on his tombstone read "Camped at Yosemite, Nov. 13, 1833."

Another mountain man of note was William Sublette (1799-1845) who was the first to take wagons through the Rocky Mountains and played a key part in the blazing of the Oregon Trail. Sublette was more family-oriented than most of his fellow mountain men, as four of his brothers were also involved in the fur trade.

They had Guinness beer in those days (though not in America) but they did not have a Guinness Book of World Records. If they'd had one in 1825, it would have shown that Jedediah Strong Smith (1799-1831) amassed a record 668 beaver pelts that year. Smith also goes into the history books as the first American to reach California by an overland route (the California coast had been visited by American sailors many times). On his way back east, he was the first to cross the Sierra Nevadas. He too was mauled by a grizzly. Unlike his cohorts, however, he did not drink, brawl, or fornicate with Indian women. Though a mountain man, he was also the dutiful son of a Methodist minister.

If you've ever seen the Bonneville Salt Flats west of Salt Lake City, bear in mind that it was named after Benjamin Bonneville (1796-1878), a mountain man who managed to achieve a fair amount of fame during his long life. Canadian Peter Skene Ogden (1794-1854) is usually credited as the first white man to see the Great Salt Lake. This was well before the Mormons arrived in 1847.

One name still famous today is Kit Carson. Carson not only touched all the bases during his mountain man career, he also achieved fame through dime novels exploiting his public image. One famous incident occurred in 1849 when Carson was serving as a scout for a cavalry regiment that had been sent to rescue a woman who had been captured by the Apaches. In the aftermath of the conflict (the woman did not survive) he came across a dime novel extolling and exaggerating his exploits as an Indian-fighter and suspected the woman had been reading about him before the Indian trouble started. It was the first time he encountered himself in a dime novel.

John Johnson (1824-1900) was stuck with a forgettable moniker, but he found fame as Liver-Eating Johnson due to the fact that he ate the livers (great source of Vitamin A, among other nutrients) of the Crow Indians he killed. The Crow Indians had killed his wife, so he killed them…roughly 200 of them. That's a lot of liver, that's a lot of payback. There's a horror film plot in there somewhere, but to date the best-known film about him was Jeremiah Johnson (his middle name was Jeremiah) a 1972 opus with Robert Redford, which included no cannibalism. At any rate, eating all that cholesterol-rich liver didn't hurt Johnson, as he lived to age 76 – a very good span in his day. Born in 1824, he died on January 21, 1900. Perhaps after three weeks of the 20th Century, he'd seen enough.

Irish-born Thomas "Broken Hand" Fitzpatrick (1799-1854) emigrated to the United States in 1817. The colorful nickname was due to his loss of three fingers after a rifle exploded. Fitzpatrick led the first Ashley expedition and formed the Rocky Mountain Fur Company with Jim Bridger and William Sublette in the 1830's. One good nickname deserves another, so Fitzpatrick was also dubbed "White Hair," when his hair lost its pigmentation after a particularly ferocious Indian battle. Guess we could call that a virtual scalping.

Not surprisingly, when it comes to mountain man exploits it is often difficult to tell where the truth ends and exaggeration begins. For example, Seth Kinman (1815-1886) boasted of shooting more than 800 grizzly bears. Well, there were more grizzlies around in those days, but this would seem to be an inflated number. Of course, there was no one there to witness his feats, so we'll have to take his word for it…or not. He also claimed he once shot 50 elk in a one-month period. Appropriately enough, he died after accidentally shooting himself in the leg. Poetic justice, PETA might opine.

Well, there isn't enough space here to list all the mountain men (Wikipedia has a chart of 85 known mountain men with links to their bios). Each had a physical and mental toughness that we can only marvel at today. For the diversity buffs out there, included among the mountain men are a former slave (Jim Beckwourth), an Iroquois Indian (Pierre Tevanitagon), and a sprinkling of Hispanics (Mariano Medina, Lou Vasquez, and Andrew Garcia). Sad to say, no women. Yes, when all's said and done, the mountain men were just another boys' club. They were, after all, mountain men, not mountain persons.

Mountain men were not hermits, who exist in other cultures and historical eras. They played a key role in the economy. Demand for beaver skins was high, so they supplied them. Yes, mountain men were (gasp!) capitalists. Of course, to sustain themselves as trappers, mountain men were also by necessity hunters and traders. Pretty much laissez-faire all the way.

Grizzly bears, by the way, were known to maul and kill men but not to eat them. So much for the popular saying of "Sometimes you eat the bear and sometimes he eats you." Today you would have to shop around to find bear meat, though it would surely be free of artificial hormones if you could find it. Mountain men probably took it – or any other wild game – when they were hungry. I think I know what happened to all that beaver meat after the animals were skinned. If it was good enough for the Indians, it was good enough for the mountain men!

While the mountain man might seem like some sort of romantic noble savage straight out of James Fenimore Cooper of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, there are some intriguing contradictions in his way of life.

To what extent were the mountain men bringing the ways of the white man to the wilderness, and to what extent were they fleeing the ways of the white man? Their way of life was made possible by the fashion dictates of more civilized easterners. The mountain men might have been lacking in social graces, but countless settlers benefited from the maps they created, the wagon trains they led, and their knowledge of local flora and fauna, as well as the mores of the various Indian tribes.

Another conflict is the mountain man's attitude towards Indians (of course, this would depend on which tribes he encountered). Due to the absence of white women, mountain men regularly married Indian women, frequently more than one. They learned a lot of their survival skills from Indians. They traded with them and even dressed like them. Yet they killed their share of Indians in skirmishes, battles, and mano a mano conflicts. Even worse, from the Indian perspective, once the fur trade dried up, the mountain men served as guides for wagon trains of settlers who would domesticate the open spaces.

I don't know how contemporary history books treat the mountain men (if they mention them at all), but given their role in abetting the white man's takeover of the west, they would probably be demonized. If toxic masculinity is your bête noire, then anyone who traps, skins, and eats animals, while killing Indians on the side, would probably be persona non grata at your dinner party.

At any rate, the west ain't wild any more. It's all been explored and mapped, not to mention dammed, mined, logged, and (in the desert) irrigated. Trains, planes, and interstate highways bring outlanders from the more densely populated regions to goggle at the natural wonders of flyover country.

Today a modern-day mountain man, or a reasonable approximation of same, would not be useful to society. In fact, almost everywhere he went, he might be trespassing. Even if he's not breaking any laws, anyone living like a mountain man would be highly suspect. You never know – he might be a scout for some sort of white supremacist militia! He might be a Unabomber in training! He may not be on the list of registered sex offenders, but keep the kids away from him just in case.

Even if he doesn't have a rap sheet, his personality profile might fit some sort of domestic terrorist computer model! Government surveillance would be called for. If he doesn't have any electronic gadgets that can be monitored, he can't hide from the satellites.

At the very least, he would be condemned as a kook or a nut case. He was way ahead of the curve on social distancing, however, and maybe that's what it's really all about: The ability to urinate, defecate, belch, or break wind anywhere any time without having to worry about anyone being offended

I wouldn't claim that as the definitive meaning of freedom, but it does count for something.

On the ‘I Don’t Remember My Circumcision’ Argument

Vernon Meigs · 20 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Towards those who are against male genital mutilation, a common retort by males who had it done to them when they were infants is that they don’t remember it being done to them, and that they, supposedly, turned out fine.

A few years ago I had a conversation in person with a friend (a big pro-life advocate) in which I expressed my discomfort to him about a different mutual friend of ours who made light on social media of the fact that they were getting their newborn son circumcised. Actually it wasn’t him directly, but rather his wife, posting her baby boy’s photo and joking about how he’s about to get his circumcision. However it was clear that the father was absolutely in approval of this and thought nothing of it. Back to the conversation with my friend, I expressed my concern about that, and he told me that he may have somewhat understood where I’m coming from, he’s said that he himself was circumcised and he didn’t remember it, and he felt fine. When I tried to convey the helplessness of a baby boy when he has his body violated in this way, he proceeded to go into his own tangent about how fetuses don’t ask to be aborted, being a big pro-life advocate.

I will save my detailed thoughts on the hypocrisy of some pro-lifers who argue for the rights of the unborn but are completely ok with the tips of their baby boys’ penises knived off. Today I just want to zero in on the “I Don’t Remember My Circumcision and I Turned Out Alright” argument, and hopefully put that particular one to rest.

As I have stated previously, I myself was fortunately never circumcised, but would like to offer perspective based on a different kind of event in my childhood.

Trauma and Memory

When I was in the second grade during my time growing up in Japan, I was on my bicycle after school to head to baseball practice and was rather gleefully speeding down a light slope. Although I was about to go through a crosswalk in which I would have had the right of way, I should still have been much more careful and slowed down.

A car, said to have been in a hurry, ran over that red light and hit my bicycle. I flew off my bicycle across the car and hit my helmet-protected head on the pavement. I had broken my left collarbone. This had happened close enough to my own home, and in fact practically right outside the home of a school classmate whose family informed my mother and father who rushed over to the scene of the accident.

By the time my parents reached me and before the ambulance arrived, I had awoken from consciousness and was said to have been crying, wondering what happened to me. This basically continued all the way when my dad was accompanying me in the ambulance. Aside from my broken collarbone, my forehead was lightly swollen. The doctor had said that it was in fact a good sign that I actually regained consciousness so soon. I received a brain scan at the hospital and they detected nothing wrong with my head. I was asked questions by the doctor, such as whether I knew my name and whether I hurt, and I answered properly. I followed the light with my eyes, again properly. If I had not been wearing a helmet when it happened, the damage would have been much worse. I don't regret wearing my helmet when it was not the norm among the Japanese to wear such a thing and I was in fact made fun for doing so. I of course also received an X-ray for the collarbone and fortunately it did not require surgery. I was able to return home soon and I escaped this with just a shoulder brace and a tiny scar on my forehead, which had faded in my adulthood.

From the vague memory of an oncoming car at the sidewalk at the end of the slope while I was on my bicycle, up until the moment I woke up in the dark bedroom on my futon after having slept for goodness knows how long, I have retained no memory whatsoever.

I don't remember crying in the ambulance. I don't remember answering the doctor's questions. I don't remember any moment of consciousness that I was said to have been in after the accident.

I had tried to imagine having undergone all the things that I was told I did. I tried to imagine being tossed into the pavement by a car. I tried to imagine the pain of having my collarbone broken. I tried to imagine actually being conscious to convey the pain. I would have guessed that it would have been excruciating for the roughly 8 year old me, perhaps it was. But it was so great at the time that I couldn't retain any memory from the shock. Just because I don't remember it, it doesn't mean it was nothing, that it didn't happen.

It is my understanding that this lack of memory of such an event is typical for anyone who has undergone it under similar circumstances.

I was not, however, an infant a small number of days old, who won't have any kind of clear memory or acute perception as it is to begin with. The ones who inflict infant male genital mutilation and the parents high on traditionalism that abet it let it happen on the notion that babies won't remember it, perhaps encouraged by the notion that you can do just about anything to a child and he won't remember it. This is far from an effective argument for infant male genital mutilation, and instead betrays the willingness of the parties involved to prey upon on a baby boy because he cannot resist, stand for his rights and his bodily autonomy, nor retain the experience.

Of course the baby won't remember his foreskin being knived off. But if he was being strapped down to have his fingers pried off one by one, assuming that doesn't kill him, he won't remember that either. It is still wrong. Speaking of killing, babies have died from neonatal cutting as well, by the way.

The baby's lack of memory of the mutilation of his genitals is just a convenient excuse to perform it. It is not an indication that nothing traumatic had occurred.

If I cannot remember my own trauma caused in part by my own carelessness as an 8-year old but can still accept that it was actual harm that happened upon me, certainly we can recognize as harm the severe trauma and neurogenic shock of neonatal cutting as it happens to a days-old infant who had no say or understanding what would happen to him.

The Expectation to Cry

To add to the factor of the infant boy not remembering the shock of having his genitals cut, another factor that goes in tandem is the fact that we, as a whole, are so used to the idea of babies crying at any given situation at any given time. I wonder if this causes us to become relatively numb to the idea of an infant's cries, and accept all circumstances as par the course when it comes to dealing with an infant… even certain ones they shouldn't.

Americans in particular seem to be so used to the idea of male infant genital mutilation (which they euphemistically call a circumcision) that they regard it as standard procedure. The shriek that the babies emit as the knife hits the flesh is perhaps treated with no more regard than when a child trips, falls and scrapes his knee, or if they were to cry when getting their first shot.

On top of all of this, since the infant in question is a male, we are conditioned to treat his cry as less significant than that of a female. The response to an infant boy, even when he's getting his foreskin cut without an anesthetic, seems to be something along the lines of "get over it." Funny, how we (rightly) malign female genital mutilation when it happens to girls who reach a certain age as a sick "welcome to womanhood", but a boy is barely out of her mother's womb before he is basically told to "man up."

Genital mutilation on infant boys is routinely done on the premise that the boy won't remember it, and that he can get over it, that his cries as it happens mean nothing. Not being able to remember such trauma is not an indication that it was no big deal, but rather an opportunity for those who are malevolent at worst and unthinking at best to force their boy to conform to a completely pointless standard, oftentimes at the risk of his life.

Let us not airbrush the trauma of an infant boy just because it's been traditional all this time to do so. This applies to recipients mired in self-denial as well as their complicit parents.

The basic mission: be an iconoclast

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 21 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism is radically open to question. Never forget that.

That much being said, let's get one thing straight: Feminism is not mandatory. You have zero obligation to think like a feminist, talk like a feminist, act like a feminist, live like a feminist, or support feminism in any way.

Feminism is just one of many ideological belief systems operating on planet Earth. It was contrived by human agency and its license to exist may be revoked by human agency at any time. (Wink, wink!) Feminism is not a privileged snowflake (although feminists want you to think it is). It carries no special mandate or divine right. There is nothing "woo-woo" about feminism, and no genuflection is owed to it.

We should add that feminism is not a race, or more to the point not a biological birth group. That's right, nobody is born a feminist. Feminism is an elective state of being; you must choose it. This means that you are free to reject it, or free to kick it out of your brain again if you unfortunately made an earlier choice to accept it.

Not only are feminists not a race, they are not an ethnic group. They seem to think they are, but that is because they are mimicking the behavior of people who claim protected status against so-called "hate speech". The feminists want a slab of that yummy pie too, if possible. When you say stiff things about feminism, they would like very much to swing the apparatus of law against you. (Name-calling and character assassination are not enough, it seems. They want to leverage the official power of state violence, under color of legality.)

Above all, feminism is not a sex. There are two biological sexes, male and female. However, there is no feminist sex. I repeat: there is no feminist sex. That may be perfectly self-evident to some of us, but a lot of people reject this plain bedrock truth like a vending machine spitting a dollar bill back at you.

The trouble is, that feminism is politically and institutionally hegemonic. It is a ruling force in human affairs, and that is simply a fact of life. This happened because certain humans worked hard to make it happen, while certain others stood by and lifted no finger to stop them. In consequence, feminism got deeply entrenched.

The crux of the difficulty is that feminism holds the power of a fetish, or sacred idol, in the public square. Some have even called feminism an unofficial state religion. Many people hate this so-called sacred object and wish to break its power, yet they fear to speak a word against it because they dread the social consequences that might follow. Furthermore, they aren't sure where to get started because, frankly, the terms of the problem are not entirely clear to them.

If we wish to overthrow the power of the feminist idol and undo its stranglehold upon the public mind, we must visibly and dramatically challenge it, until non-feminist women and men feel emboldened to join in the fun.

Imagine, if you will, a dauntless iconclast who walks up to that idol with a sledgehammer, in full view of the world, and shatters the head into rubble with a defiant flourish and a maniacal laugh.

Clearly this would send a message. It would spread some shock waves, would it not? It would trigger a collective gasp, am I right?

Many, standing in the public square, would be emboldened to join in the fun. They would look each other in the eye and catch the glint of revolution. It would be instantly clear to them that they were not alone, that they had nothing to fear but fear itself.

The core principle is this: that when you publicly defy or desecrate a sacred object, you break the spell. You dismantle the mojo. You turn that sacred thing into a common thing once more, prone to the same treatment as any other common thing — the callous handling, the common touch, and so on.

I shall await somebody bold enough to swing a very public metaphorical hammer against the feminist idol. I expect that person will be a celebrity of some kind, ideally a woman, who stands up and thunders: "I've had enough and I will take no more! To HELL with feminism, and damn the torpedoes! Come and get me, feminists!"

Naturally, it helps to be a celebrity rather than an obscure nobody. An obscure nobody who wants to make his message heard, must capture the limelight by a signal-boosting strategem or "setup" — in common vernacular, a publicity stunt. But a celebrity can grab the limelight any time. When a celebrity talks, the world listens, and the message travels.

So if you're a celebrity with the moxie of Martin Luther, and if you want to become a bigger celebrity, then nail your parchment to the door! Okay? Or if you know a celebrity, bring this talk to their attention and maybe it will inspire them along the lines we are suggesting.

There are less flamboyant but still valuable ways to assail the feminist idol and compromise its power. These are being carried out already by people in many places — the war of attrition, the innumerable chisel strokes. It's all good, it's all taking a toll, and it's all preparing the ground for those larger non-feminist breakouts that will occur in the fullness of time.

What is the bottom line here? What is the takeaway? It is that feminism must be challenged. Called out. Stood up to. Stared down. Made accessible to corrective forces.

There are many ways to make this happen. By far the most effective is to stand up and say, "I am not a feminist, and there is nothing you can do about that."

This brings the feminist dialectic to a standstill, because it introduces an alien willpower into feminism's self-contained moral universe. Seriously, what can they do about it? Feminism will have been fed something indigestible which it cannot ultimately ignore. That something is called "non-feminist alterity". The implications are existential and primordial.

Above all idol-breaking.

In a word: iconoclastic.

"I am not a feminist, and there is nothing you can do about that."

This deceptively simple statement reclines at the heart of the methodology we are preaching. The rest is details, and among these is the fact that feminism is on trial because all feminist claims and theories are open to question.

From the ground up, every imaginable thing about feminism is subject to a universal critique and an intellectual audit. You might say that we are calling feminism into the office for a little talk.

In closing, I repeat my call to anti-feminist celebrities: step out of the closet and swing a hammer at the feminist idol! Be bold. Be brave. Be defiant. Be a cheeky bastard and stand your ground. You have supporters everywhere.

If you are not a celebrity, do what you can to see that celebrities read this. Thank you.

Michelle Malkin: The Truth About False Rape Allegations

AVfM Video Source · 21 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

the following video was published a few years ago but is still as relevant as ever. In fact false allegations have rape by women appear throughout history.

Mass Hysteria, Madness and Feminism

Jan Deichmohle · 22 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: The following book excerpt is a translation from the German by the author. The following website provides an overview of his books: https://www.quellwerk.com

History of Mass Hysteria

An early occurrence of a new form of irrationality was surfacing in the age of ‚enlightenment', when a mob was yelling (rather unenlightened) "Hang to the lanterns, who has a handkerchief!", and "Hang to the lanterns, who hasn't got horny skin!".[i] The people who had soft skin, faced the danger to get lynched.[ii] On the picture above, women lead an armed march of revolutionaries.

Symbol of the French Revolution was an allegorical Marianne, portrayed swinging the tricolour during street fighting. When women and children, the whole family are involved in ideologies, this results in radicalisation. What had been rather a peripheral matter and aberration before, was transformed into a principle, the foundation of a systematically spread hysteria, and was spread along with ideological world views, closed in itself.

Suffragettes attacking the House of Commons

The first wave transformed hysteria into a principle of life, and to assume as a privileged group to be disadvantaged, to flock together as an angry sisterhood, whose attitude towards life was militant full of hatred and fighting, hysterical screaming because of completely imaginary disadvantages, and to fight against human nature and culture. Such screeching hysteria staged itself by a new political aesthetics they invented, which was later on taken over by fascism and is today regarded as typically fascist. That has been proven in my book "Critique of Feminist Ideology". This ideology is not only linked to stubborn ideological militance, but also to victimhood. In self-referred navel view, they lamented about invented troubles and imaginary disadvantages. They believed, the world would be unjust to them. Today, when they get criticised, they redraw insulted to 'safe rooms'.

I want the vote! (~1900-1913, while most men didn't have it either)

In this cartoon of the first wave 1900-1913 we can already recognize snow flakes of today.

Political hysteria of feminists was mentioned ~ 1910 in a debate of the British parliament as a characteristic attribute and danger, should society give in to feminist demands. The speech was quoted and analysed in my book on the first wave.

All of the predictions in that speech have been fulfilled. Additionally, later waves caused destructions much worse than the worst expectations of the speaker. Quotes and pictures of the book about the first wave show by historical sources, that this hysteria was not only linked to imaginary disadvantages and victimhood, but also to misandry.

Suffragists on the War Path. “Jump on him, he is only a mere man.”

After the First World War, feminism and its methods were accredited and integrated into society, after their demands were fulfilled. As a result, we had a disrooted generation of youth in the 1920s, disrooted and having trouble in matters of sexuality and sex roles; boyish women (flappers and vamps) and effeminate men were part of the phenomenon as well as massive difficulties of both sexes: confused women and men, whose money had been squeezed out by wives or ex-wives, boys, which girls didn’t accept as good enough any more. This has been proven using historical sources of the time in my book “Critique of feminist ideology”.

Angry screaming became a method of the political fringes: On the streets, supporters of the red front an Stalin were parading, later on supporters of the brown front and Hitler. Young women were screaming excited, or even fainted: After each outburst of feminist irrationality follows a phase of confusion or disarray: Women try to regain lost triggers of female instincts, on which the love towards men and society are based. As human nature is damaged, and time-tested culture lost, this is done in a distorted – and dangerous – way. That may result in hysterical admiration of a Stalin or Hitler, or screeching and fainting at the concert of a boy group, or throwing teddies to welcome demographical intruders, applauding and welcoming demographical conquerors replacing native men, who get degraded to incels or losers. Those native men had before been fought by screaming hate-filled feminists.

Like feminists, both communists and fascists perceived themselves to be persecuted, while in reality it was the other way round: They were persecuting those of different believes. Thus their perception was contrary to reality. Fascists believed in a 'Zionist world conspiracy', communists in a 'capitalist' and 'imperialist' 'enemy of their class', blaming them for every screw, which wouldn't fit. Feminists blamed subjective feelings and dissatisfaction with an invented 'patriarchal structure', as absurd a conspiration theory as the fascist version. They were never able to give any proof for the existence of such a structure. To the contrary, it can be proven that the course of their discontent were bad decisions of the feminists themselves, and the results of previous feminist waves.

> Many members of the BDM treated Hitler like a modern group of girls might a pop star; his visits to BDM groups were generally accompanied with screaming, swooning and fainting.»[iii] (babiafi.co.uk)

above: Beatlemania, below: Hitlermania

One only has to see old newsreels of women fainting, crying, screaming with adulation at the feet of Hitler»[iv] (dailymail.co.uk)

Association of German girls, The Hitler Youth, screaming

Irrationality generally broke out in world war and mass murder; after the ideology creating such actions was gutted, the causes remained: The breakdown of natural structures, of a cultural complement of both sexes and their relationships, through which feelings can develop and mature naturally. Feminism, in the delusion of knowing everything better and improving the world with an ideology, which is at war with human nature, and interpreting nature the wrong way round, made sure that the damage done by previous waves could never heal, but instead additionally new damage was done.

Therefore the problems persisted. Not only women were dissatisfied. Young people, especially boys, struggled to find a place in society. Women lacked something that could no longer develop naturally and culturally, after feminism damaged natural culture, eventually destroying it. There was therefore a lack of young men who seemed worthy of female admiration. Men were lacking, what could give them such feminine feelings. In particular, there was a lack of maturation which could give rise to mature, civilized love. Instead, dangerous animal instincts ran wild. Today, alpha males get preferred to betas and incels.

Beatlemania, mostly female fans screaming

In 1964 they screeched longing for rock musicians. In 1968, when the second wave broke out, they screamed aggressively, hateful protesting against ‘white heterosexual manliness’ and an imaginary ‘patriarchy’, a perversion of the longing for impressive males a few years back. Today they choose illegally admitted immigrants from Islamist or other problematic countries, because they unconsciously want victorious conquerors (like Hitler, Stalin, Duce, Mao, Che …). That’s a political perversion, too, resulting from the collapse of cultural bonds and structures.

Such animal instincts are very volatile and tip over quickly. A few years after girls screamed to adore young men, and some fainted because young men of high standing had already disappeared from normal society, the screeching discontent of daughters of the feminist era was already turning back into the hatred of men, with which trouble once had started.

> «I was a target for abuse. Anywhere I spoke there was a contingent of screaming, heckling feminists waiting for me. … Abusive telephone calls to my home, death threats and bomb scares, became a way of living for me and for my family.»[v] (Erin Pizzey)

When it comes to feminism, media has been biased since the first feminist wave. Voices critical of feminism where either ignored, or reports were defamatory. As documented in my books, as early as 1913 Ernest Bax described the bias of media and the feminist pressure on media, not to publish voices opposing feminism. One reason for this biased negative attitude is the sentiment of women influenced by feminism. They didn't want to tolerate free speech, which was a habit in previously male groups, as they existed in traditional cultures. Men talked among themselves without ‚political correctness'. However, when ladies were present, men tactfully avoided topics ladies could dislike. When women mingled into once male groups, they expected the same refraining from disliked topics or opinions. As a result, men had no place left where to talk unrestricted.

Our media didn't report about such matters. They were biased since the first feminist wave, even more so since 1968. When it came to emotic issues like the critique of feminism or emancipation, press wasn't free and either didn't report on it at all, or with a strong feminist bias. Even though there are enough historical sources and contemporary witnesses, it's not easy to find pictures of screaming feminists. Most reports are favouring them. When Erin Pizzey, who started women's shelters and soon realized, that men would need such shelters as much as women, was touring England to promote her book "Prone to Violence", she was threatened by hateful screeching feminists and needed police protection. Many had similar experiences.

They got naked in front of passers-by and then screamed angrily en masse [vi] (dailymail.co.uk)

This continues until today's third wave. A pathological trait has been added: To smear themselves red like blood; in at least one demonstration, participants also scratched themselves with razor blades to stain with their own blood.

Blood-smeared or red-painted feminists screeching

> A group of women plays the attackers, wrestles down her colleagues for minutes, who are shouting slogans. Wheeze, screech, roar. "Always in sync," Inna tells the activists. [vii] (Bild)

The hysterical perversion also continues to admit and adore more aggressive intruders instead of their own men who are ravaged. Because of the cultural destruction caused by earlier feminist waves, strong men from a cultivated cultural elite are missing. That is why, as a substitute, the most inadequate and harmful ones are hailed and screamed at in admiration. The same happened for Hitler, Duce, Stalin, Mao, Che Guevara. A comparatively harmless variant was the Beatlemania, when girls overran police barriers or rushed into a hotel to get closer to the Beatles or the Rolling Stones. Today, suicidal for all of us, they welcome a millionfold surplus of men immigrating from zones of war, crises and the world's most problematic areas. Famous murderers on death row also receive baskets of female fan mail or even get married behind bars, or waiting for execution. Similar anti-social blenders get their attention. Such negative selection spoils our gene pool with harmful traits chosen for procreation.

Screaming feminists

> In 2015 I was stunned to see a particularly large number of women screaming at the 'refugees' like at an Elvis concert. For my part, I see my assumption confirmed – they sniffed pheromones and are on a testosterone trip. There are also more and more mixed couples… hooray… until one cries….
>
> They are trained to bite off competition, to step on rape victims again – because the stupid pig has only indicated it because of xenophobia. They don't come up with the idea of who is really the most primitive – like when you're on a panting hormone trip yourself. Everything is reduced to your own pleasure, there is no space for anything else.
>
> And you can immediately recognize them by the fact that they are incapable of a rational conversation and instead yell everyone down with hysterical stone age noise – here there is pure emotion … and nothing else.»[viii] (Alexandra Bader)

The inadequate and fanatic welcome corresponds to the same hysterical feminist perversion as hating their own 'white heterosexual' men. The same holds for their anger at an imaginary 'disadvantage' of actually privileged women. Only by prescribing their utopic ideology as a result to be achieved, they construct female 'disadvantage' where there is privilege and always has been. Again, same perversion in their self-pity towards imaginary sufferings, while excluding local men from empathy and ignoring their real problems.

At the same time they fight their own local men with revolutionary attitude, screaming hate. These men share their culture, are mostly adequate and educated to local standards, yet they get broken and oppressed by feminist agenda. Such perversion has been a driving force of all feminist waves. This perversion resulted in feminist distortion of science, utopical ideology contradicting human nature. Instincts ran wild. There's no grain of truth in the nonsense they produced.

Feminists attack Argentinian cathedral. Aggressive feminist women, ready to use violence

Since the first wave, hysteria is a driving force of political ideologies and consecutive feminist waves. Following generations have a vague feeling, that something is missing, without any clear indication, what is missing. So they are susceptible for political or religious ideologies and new feminist waves. They hate, what they need. They destroy, what could help them: the culture they and previous waves have destroyed. Their fanaticism made them attack human universals.

Angrily screaming feminists presenting a giant vagina sculpture

Political hysteria, misandry and the described perversion of sexuality are driving forces of a new form of irrationality. The first feminist wave brought it up and made it acceptable in society. Such political hysteria and irrationality have been adapted by many extremist groups since, along with the methods. As feminist emancipation disrooted many, they became susceptible.

The first feminist wave had invented a self-presentation, which was later on adopted by fascists and is today known as “aesthetics of fascism”. Already the first wave was intolerant to opposing opinions. The second wave was screaming hatefully, burning bras and spreading hatred against opponents and different views. The first wave was known for militancy and terrorist attacks on men and artworks. They sliced pictures; the Taliban blew up Buddhas. During the second wave, female terrorism resurfaced as phenomenon; this time, however, in left wing groups such as the RAF in Germany. Most however were quickly established in media, politics, at universities and in society.

Already 1968, professor Goldberg from the University of New York could hardly publish his study about a human universal – differences of both sexes and their roles found all over the world in different societies. Since the 1970s, it was next to impossible to publish a deep-rooted non-feminist argument. Erin Pizzey told in an interview, that she knew many smart men, who could never publish their non-feminist book. In the very rare cases it was published, they would get threatened, as she herself. Even Esther Vilar, whose book was published 1971, had difficulties finding a publisher. All German publishers except one had already rejected her book, she told, when the last publisher finally accepted. Yet she was attacked and threatened by feminists and was forced to exile.

Today, hysterical screaming in fear of CO2 works the same way it did during feminist waves. An inversion to enthusiastic reverence for leaders is displayed by extremist movements, may they be right wing, left wing or religious. Screeching tips over from anger, hate and protest to sexual desire or to leader cult, and the other way round.

Beatles fans cheered and screamed. Women long for admirable famous men, whether at a pop concert or in a dictatorship.

Third wave demonstrators may dress in pussy hats.

Welcome to Germany

Even though the last picture was not examined, whether it's photoshopped, the components are real and stem from the same movement. As such, it describes reality. Today, even the difference between good satire and reality has become fluid.

Madness and Feminism

Biographies of many leading feminists contain (often hidden) evidence of mental illnesses, that not only shaped the lives of activists introducing new ideas, but also first appeared during a feminist wave.

> Medical researchers have long puzzled over schizophrenia's late emergence (it was first diagnosed in 1911, in Switzerland) and its prevalence in the industrial world, where the illness is degenerative and permanent. (In "primitive" societies, when it exists at all, it is typically a passing malady.) In 2005, when Jean-Paul Selten and Elizabeth Cantor-Graae, experts on the epidemiology of schizophrenia, reviewed various risk factors—foremost among them migration, racism, and urban upbringing—they found that the factors all involved chronic isolation and loneliness, a condition that they called "social defeat." (New Yorker Magazine)

At that time, at the height of the first feminist wave, the last remnants of Western culture complementing of the sexes began to crumble, and with it the bond between the sexes on the one hand, and the sexual-social identity. It's not surprising, when new mental illnesses emerge at the same time, which also play a role in the lives of leading feminists. This combination of psychosis with the feminist movement spreads these problems. This is paradoxic and tragical: Feminists are unconsciously missing something, feel an unexplainable suffering, then irrationally blame and accuse a 'patriarchy', used as a conspiracy theory. In reality, the culture they attack would have been key to overcome their suffering, giving them, what was already missing. Their suffering was created by themselves, their feminist agenda and previous feminist movements. In spite of it they use this suffering as a driving force to pursue their work of further destruction, and to instigate an angry cultural revolution against the last cultural remains. Thus they create the suffering from which they claim to save. Their psychosis is the result of the breakdown of natural and cultural relationships, which, if intact, would prevent isolation, loneliness and loss of identity.

> «The second-wave feminists had hoped to alleviate this isolation through the refuge of sisterhood.«[ix] (New Yorker)

Several leading feminist founders were in psychiatric treatment, in a mental hospital.

> «It's unclear when the first symptoms of schizophrenia surfaced … Neighbours were complaining that Firestone was screaming in the night and that she had left the taps running until the floorboards gave way. Laya flew to New York and found Shulamith emaciated and panhandling, carrying a bag holding a hammer and an unopened can of food. In the roman à clef, Firestone wrote that she had not eaten for a month—fearing that her food had been poisoned—and "looked like something out of Dostoevsky (which actually helped her beggar's earnings)." The next day, Laya took the action for which, she said, "Shulie never forgave me," and brought her to the Payne Whitney Clinic for evaluation. Her condition was diagnosed as paranoid schizophrenia, and she was involuntarily transferred to a residential facility in White Plains.»[x] (a.a.O.)

Beside Firestone also Kate Millet was affected. A lot of psychotic traits were described by her family, who suffered from her characteristics such as: "brutal sadist" and "violent bully".

> «In the 1970's I was alarmed to hear that my big sister, Kate Millett, who had serious mental health issues which had agonized my family and her friends for many years, was organizing a group called The Mental Patients' Project in order to claim that the psychiatric community and society were "oppressing" people and "stigmatizing them with labels such as psychotic, bi-polar, schizophrenic, borderline personalities," etc and unconstitutionally imprisoning them in hospitals thereby violating their civil rights. We, as a family, had struggled for years with Kate's issues, many times attempting to hospitalize her so she could obtain the serious help she so obviously needed. She was a brutal sadist, a violent bully at whose hands everyone about her suffered.»[xi] (Frontpage Mag)

As if in derision, all facts were turned upside down in psychiatric treatment, too: It was not the "brutally sadist" and "violent bully" that was the perpetrator, no, she considered herself to be the 'innocent victim' of a 'repressive psychiatry' that wrongly assumed all kinds of illnesses, just as she felt victim of a 'patriarchy', which she probably ascribed to be the 'sadist' and 'bully' she in fact was herself. By the way, the psychiatric agenda was harmful, too. Articles tell that many who needed treatment ended broken on the streets instead; some of them committed crimes as murder. Her rebellion against psychiatry cost lives, too. Just as many male suicides where the result of feminism.

The same trick she used in psychiatry and as a feminist, whether she blamed the psychiatric system, or men, society and the alleged 'patriarchy'. It's astonishing, that scientists, psychiatrists and the elite of her time either didn't see or didn't explain these absurdities, to stop a mass psychosis from spreading, which is at the core of feminism.

Jill Johnston, whose book "Lesbian Nation" is considered a breakthrough in lesbian feminism, also suffered from schizophrenia.

> «Hospitalized twice for schizophrenia, Johnston»[xii] (encyclopedia)

A list of important feminists having psychic disorders, stemming from feminists themselves, begins during the first wave at the end of the 19th century. It would be interesting to know, if non-feminist voices did observe more such cases.

> «The Politics of Women's Madness Narratives is a study of autobiographical writing by women who were diagnosed with psychiatric conditions. The book explores the psychiatric pathologizing of women and the ways in which women have used autobiographical writing to rebel against forced treatment and incarceration. It also outlines the history of psychiatric treatment in the United States and examines the > connection between larger social movements and reforms in the care of women mental patients. Among the American women whose narratives are discussed in the book are Elizabeth Packard, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Mary Jane Ward, Joanne Greenberg, Jill Johnston, Kate Millett, and Susanna Kaysen.»[xiii]

A Who's who of early feminism would resemble the list above. Already Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797), a precursor of feminism, had some sexual disorientation, according to modern feminist sources, who claim to continue her cause in modern unscientific gender subjects.

This should be a concern and field of research for scientists. As they fell silent in these matters, I'm compiling information so that it won't get lost.

Contemporaries used to observe a lot of absurdities, contradictions and harmful consequences of the feminist wave they experienced. Usually they assume, previous waves would have been justified, whereas the then current wave would have lost reason and entered the realm of absurdity. The reason is, that people tend to consider as normal what they experienced during their childhood and adolescence. Thus, they accepted previous waves, without reflecting, that they had rightly appeared just as absurd and harmful to their ancestors. No progress can be made, before they realize, that they are not the first generation exposed to it, and that previous generation were justified to be as sceptical as they get today.

> «Last fall, as I interviewed New York's founding radical feminists, the stories of "social defeat" mounted: painful solitude, poverty, infirmity, mental illness, and even homelessness. In a 1998 essay, "The Feminist Time Forgot," Kate Millett lamented the lengthening list of her sisters who had "disappeared to struggle alone in makeshift oblivion or vanished into asylums and have yet to return to tell the tale," or who fell into "despairs that could only end in death." She noted the suicides of Ellen Frankfort, the author of "Vaginal Politics," and Elizabeth Fisher, the founder of Aphra, the first feminist literary journal.»[xiv] (New Yorker)

Except those two central founding leaders of feminism, many other activists of their avantgarde group were affected, as Kate Millet herself claimed, and other activists confirmed.

> «She was diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia and pleaded guilty to "reckless assault with intent to harm" …
>
> While Warhol was on the phone, Solanas fired at him three times. Her first two shots missed, but the third went through both lungs, his spleen, stomach, liver, and oesophagus. She then shot art critic Mario Amaya in the hip. She tried to shoot Fred Hughes, Warhol's manager, in the head, but her gun jammed.»[xv] (Wikipedia)

Valerie Solanas was suffering of paranoid schizophrenia.[xvi] Ti-Grace Atkinson described self-destructive forces, too.

> «In a 1970 address, titled "Divisiveness and Self-Destruction in the Women's Movement: A Letter of Resignation," which was delivered to the Congress to Unite Women, in New York City, she warned that women's "rage, masquerading as a pseudo-egalitarian radicalism under the 'pro-woman' banner," was turning into "frighteningly vicious anti-intellectual fascism of the left." After hearing about the speech, several women, including Freeman, met and vowed to fight the problem. "Instead, each of us slipped back into our own isolation," Freeman said. "The result was that most of the women at that meeting dropped out, as I had done. Two ended up in the hospital with nervous breakdowns." After Ti-Grace Atkinson resigned from the Feminists, a group she had founded in New York, she declared, "Sisterhood is powerful. It kills. Mostly sisters."»[xvii]

We should not overlook the fact, that Freeman also identified isolation as a major problem, experienced something similar to Ti-Grace Atkinson, and experienced the destructive power of the sectarian feminist replacement community. Incidentially, Erin Pizzey, who was the first to fight domestic violence, recognized the same high percentage of female perpetrators and violent tendencies of problem-laden women, which is why feminists were hostile towards her. They stole her idea and turned it into a one-sided war against men. Erin Pizzey, who became a deserving voice against feminism, had grown up in Asia with large families and more cultural structures; in an interview she described the unusual loneliness in the small family of the West and the twisted reaction of the feminists to this problem.

Such isolation is understandably a problem when time-tested human relationships and communities we're used to break down. Additionally, the relationships of the sexes were once linked by exchange, both providing different contributions. That also faded away.

The loss of these natural bonds and efforts for each other makes us lonely. We are mostly concerned with the family, which was once an extended family or clan full of life, connections, roles and lifestyles. That was increasingly reduced to the core family, which was eventually also destroyed by feminism. Socially, that process was an impoverishment. Obviously, this creates loneliness and isolation, plus confusion of identity – exactly what triggered feminism, caused the suffering, which caused feminists to rise up, unfortunately in the most harmful way possible: to break families and culture. Causes, damage and suffering were increased and imposed on the rest of society and the world.

So far this was based on common sense, understandable for reasonable people. This isn't sufficient, though. We have to dig a little deeper to see the whole truth, step back from our habits, from what seems normal in our epoch, what we learned in childhood and life. We have to heed what ethnologist learn, enabling to understand foreign cultures as well as past eras of our own: We have to be prepared to give up everything we are used to, to shed contemporary values and ideas. Only then we can recognize the extent of damage done by feminism.

Only by digital differences of sound, like labial / non-labial, dental / non dental and so on, phonemes can evolve, enabling words, meaning and language. Grammar rules are also required for language to exist. Now the same happens for cultural structure and division of labour, whose origin was the division of labour between both sexes. If both do something different, they complement each other, and exchange evolves. That has been explained in detail in my first book "Culture and sex". Doing something for each other creates bonds. These are important for our development. Feminists chose to fight and destroy them as 'gender stereotypes'. Since then, the misunderstanding of both sexes grows. Not astonishingly, except for those who fell for feminist propaganda.

Both, the ability to learn language and to pick up the local culture are inborn. It's like a pre-coded learning program used by small children, who are not smart enough yet to learn language by rules as adults. Yet they outdo adults, learning much faster. They have an inborn ability and need to learn language at a very young age. The same holds for learning cultural sex roles and structure. This is obvious from the fact, that children pick up sex difference as early as language, or even earlier. The earlier it is, the deeper rooted it is in our biology.

Culture is a human universal, existing in all cultures of all times worldwide. The cultural structure is just as elementary as linguistic structure. Both are pronounced from early infancy onwards, is a specifically human ability. Conservatives only see the family, maybe a few more considerations of the tribe or nation, but nothing more. For this reason, it's not enough to defend only the family, eventually nation or tribe. Many believe, all would be fine, if only the family will be restored. That is a mistake. Culture is much more than just a few family ties and habits. Western culture has been impoverished for centuries. While the family initially remained stable, the structures complementing both sexes and creating bonds between both, fell apart. At the same time, massive misandry and one-sided glorification of women have grown over centuries (see Kucklick, "The immoral sex"). A misperception of women as 'oppressed' and 'suffering', and increasing privileges of women resulted.

As both culture and family were reduced to a minimal core, dissatisfaction and loneliness grew. That was the real reason for evolving irrationality, including feminist waves. Feminism worsens the problem which creates feminism in the first place. Thus it's part of a doom loop making things worse constantly.

> «genital differences between human beings would no longer matter culturally … children would be born to > both sexes equally, or independently of. … either, however one chooses to look at it; the dependence of the child on the mother (and vice versa) would give way to a greatly shortened dependence on a small group of others in general … The tyranny of the biological family would be broken.»[xviii] (Shulamith Firestone, clinically insane, The Dialectic of Sex, 1970)

According to biologists, anthropologists or Émile Durkheim, one of the founders of sociology, which at the time was not yet fallen prey to ideology, all division of labour goes back to a division of labour between both sexes, that has become increasingly refined and expanded to include social subgroups. That is central to culture and enabled it. Culture was originally describing, how members cooperate and do things for each other, harmoniously combining the different characteristics and needs of both sexes, an exchange that connects and obliges.

Those who grew up before the second feminist wave and paid enough attention to such things might still have experienced the social respect and love that was expressed by sex differences. We lack such warmth; we have become a bit more lonely, superfluous, uprooted, are more easily lost than before in anonymous masses. That intimacy resulting from exchange and togetherness is no longer. It was the charm of ancient cultures. We are missing something that we have to constantly seek, without in most cases ever finding, because these structures no longer exist.

It was a weird, ideological misinterpretation, that women should have everything that men work on. Feminism bereaved men of their contribution to society, making them less needed. Feminists spitefully enjoyed making them tendentially superfluous. On top of it, they felt envy and greed and made girls and women do and obtain themselves, what men do to win the sexual selection exerted by women and men. The result was increasing pressure on men and a growing number of incels and losers. Additionally, forcing men to reward women with alimony when kicking them out, and refused custody became another business model.

It is logically a serious mistake to demand the gift of the other side for yourself in an exchange system, because there is nothing left to exchange afterwards. There can only be an exchange if both sides contribute something of their own that the other side does not have. That's the only way a cultural structure, complementing them in an exchange of contributions for each other can exist. I am doing this for you because you are doing that for me. Mature feelings and sympathy for each other arise from such an exchange of care and contributions. Such tender and compassionate feelings were logically lost when the exchange faded away. We became an isolated crowd of egocentrics.

> «Growing up in seriously dysfunctional families seems to be a common denominator with radical feminists. It seems that if they don't have "daddy issues," they've got "mommy issues," and the predictable attempt to blame all their "issues" on male oppression is often at odds with the available evidence. … Uwe and Sheila Kitzinger sound like a perfect parody of the type of progressives who are so open-minded they believe in everything simultaneously. That three of their daughters turned out to be radical lesbian feminists doesn't seem particularly surprising. … This was circa 1974. Celia was plagued by "feelings of extreme isolation [that] led to a suicide attempt and subsequent hospitalization": Three months in a mental hospital, … So, naturally, she became a professor of psychology. Celia Kitzinger considers therapy harmful for women because women's problems are not personal, in her view, but rather political.
> Everything must ultimately be blamed on the patriarchy, of course. It is impossible for any feminist to to say otherwise. They have spent so many decades blaming every misfortune on the all-purpose scapegoat of male supremacy that one imagines the radical feminist who stubs her toe screaming in pain: "Damn the patriarchy!" Feminism is not a political philosophy; it's an idée fixe, the obsession of deranged minds. Male supremacy is to feminists what windmills were to Don Quixote or what Jews were to Hitler. This has been true since the Women's Liberation movement began, even before anyone realized that Shulamith Firestone was clinically insane.»[xix] overlook, because they confine themselves to defending family and morality. They don't realize other crucial losses like subconscious cultural structures. An ethnologist I quoted in my books wrote, that the central features of a culture are not noticed by consciousness.

The clinically insane firestone predicted the end of cultural bisexuality: A core problem that conservative forces

Envy has been established by feminism as basic moral principle of society and as a 'natural right'. Whatever men worked hard to gain, often to be accepted by society and women, women demanded for themselves, leaving those men without means to earn the admiration, women would waste on the unworthy. This closed our consciousness, so that we could not realize the losses involved.

Today's sentiments are shaped by competition. The interests and needs of both sexes conflict, whereas in a culture they match and both gain by the contributions of the opposite sex. Now that they compete, they tend to watch jealously, afraid to get 'disadvantaged'. Some angrily demand an exactly equal devision (while gladly taking much more than half or everything for women). They force the outcome they like, even though most women don't even want it. The more feminist influenced a society, the stronger both sexes differ in their attitudes and job preferences. This contemporary strive is a logical continuation of the struggle against human nature that feminism has been since its earliest waves. There is another source beside feminism to that mistake, though. As Kucklick has shown in his book, misandrist stereotypes were already fundamental to western philosophy of the enlightenment era. In that respect, it was rather unenlightened.

Justifications of feminism that we learn in childhood, school, education, the media and at universities, are institutionalized propaganda, turning facts upside down. This holds for past waves as much as for current ones. Women were never disadvantaged. Instead, they were always preferred. Under natural conditions, it did not make any sense for them to support feminist goals. Culture was offering them more. Men were carrying much heavier burdens. Only when modern technology lessened male burdens, and cultural structures were fading away, feminist envy could spread.

Man was always more burdened with duties and demands. Among animals and humans, the female sex dominates biologically. Females are fertile, limit procreation and exert sexual selection. Because of this, female life was protected more than male. Females were easily allowed to procreate, whereas many men in history never rose high enough in earnings or rank to be considered worthy enough. This is another male burden. Classic male strengths were a necessary counterweight. It's always harder to be a man that a woman. A woman just needs to be woman and fertile to get accepted and desired. That is a female dominance force. Men have to work much harder to get accepted by society and women, and many don't even succeed, even if they work hard. Feminism was gross nonsense right from the start.

Their feeling of being 'oppressed' or 'disadvantaged' was irrational hysteria contradicting the facts of biology and life. Society should never have listened to such irrational hysteria. Even the first wave of feminism was militant, radical, destructive and characterized by contempt for men. To make 'role models' out of these yesterday's militants, indeed to be 'holy figures', is falsification of history. Feminist victors have rewritten history to mislead generations to come. Previous feminism was as hysterical, destructive and insane as today. As long as this is not understood, things won't get better and we remain vulnerable to radical ideologies.

> «Yesterday's mental illness is today's social policy.» (Kathy Shaidle, "Feminism's Rotting Corpse", 2012)

Others also describe feminist madness as the cause and drive to invent a conspiracy theory of 'patriarchal power', to attribute to it their pathological conditions and suffering, whose origin is within themselves. Feminist arguments follow the same line: All guilt was attributed to others; they were unable to recognize their own fault. This is a pivotal mechanism, not just a minor human weakness.

> «That is to say, while feminists believe that the patriarchy makes women crazy, the rest of us suspect that crazy women made the patriarchy — inventing this imaginary conspiracy of "male supremacy" as the phantom menace of their paranoid minds, a fantasy bogeyman, a rationalization of their own unhappiness and > misfortunes.

>
> Here is where the meaning of the famous feminist dictum “the personal is political” exposes the real truth of their ideology. Rather than looking at feminism as a political movement to redress legitimate grievances shared generally by all women, we must understand feminism as a personal movement, concerned with the specific grievances … And most feminists are profoundly miserable.»[xx]

Other feminists also described their own suffering from mental disorders, such as Ms. Johnson, who like many of her quarrelsome sisters, was able to establish herself as a professor at universities.

> «In 2010, Professor Johnson published a book about her struggles with borderline personality disorder — “a serious mental illness,” according to the National Institutes for Mental Health. In her book, Girl in Need of a Tourniquet: Memoir of a Borderline Personality, Professor Johnson describes herself as a “psycho girlfriend” with a history of dysfunctional relationships with both men and women. Her book describes “what amounts to a nervous breakdown as the result of an affair with a married lesbian colleague.” Professor Johnson in 2010 described herself as a “newlywed lesbian” whose partner was apparently her former student»[xxi]

Kate Millet burdened others with her suffering, but vehemently refused to accept the necessary medical help. Instead, she preferred to work spreading her suffering around the world.

> «We, as a family, had struggled for years with Kate’s issues, many times attempting to hospitalize her so she could obtain the serious help she so obviously needed. …
>
> She was babbling and shouting incoherently whilst I nodded and pretended every word made perfect sense. …
>
> She stayed awake for five days babbling, ranting and wouldn’t allow me to sleep. She was seeing “little green men” and her eyes were literally rolling around in their sockets. Never have I been more alone and terrified.»[xxii]

The mental illness seems to have broken out in childhood or adolescence, as her family describes it so impressively. Later, in her feminist days, employees suffered.

> «At one point, in 1973, I found myself alone with her in an apartment in Berkeley, California where she did not allow me to sleep for five days as she raged at the world and menaced me physically. … This movie (Three Lives) was the very first ever produced with not one iota of male presence. Even the people who delivered food to the set had to be female and Kate was touting it as the first all-woman film production in history.
>
> Having had my youth overshadowed by Kate’s irrationality I warily traveled West and the moment I spotted her in the airport knew I “was in for it”. As she barreled across the airport’s expanse it was clear that she was in the throes of her illness and my heart throbbed with the desire to turn and run.
>
> During the speech after the screening she fell apart onstage before a packed assembly of fawning admirers.»[xxiii]

Threats, torture caused by deprivation of sleep – the founding feminist did worse to women than even feminist black propaganda has accused men of. It should not be overlooked that her lesbian lover committed suicide because of her ‘homage book’. Insanity had wreaked havoc beyond all the damage feminism caused, many cruelties to men and children, destroyed lives and families. Even society was broken and culture destroyed. We lost tradition and experience gathered in centuries. Children grew up with damaged souls and uprooted as stray individuals. Under the pressure of Kate Millet’s propaganda, helpless mentally ill people in the United States were released from care, ended up on the streets, where they either became easy prey and victims themselves, or committed crimes and murders. The peace of society was also damaged by making cities a less livable place. The mass migration welcomed by feminist states and Mrs. Merkel later had a similar effect.

> «Kate, herself, has written several books on this part of her life (Flying, The Loony-Bin Trip) chronicling the "oppressive" actions of our family, vilifying us for our deeply worried attempts to aid in her obvious sufferings. So I am telling no "tales out of school" as she herself has documented her own struggles with sanity although she consistently claimed, "mental illness is a myth". "Many healthy people", she said, "are driven to mental illness by society's disapproval of unconventional behavior and by the authoritarian institution of psychiatry." Really? Tell that to the families of the nineteen who suffered and died that Friday in Santa Barbara. … And, speaking of the affected innocent victims: later, she wrote a book about her lesbian lover at that time. Sita was the title. This woman committed suicide in response to Kate's "homage." …
>
> So when it came to my attention that as a result of these adventures she and a few cohorts had concocted a new "civil rights movement" for mental patients and in her characteristic ruthlessness was determined to 'liberate' NY's mental patients I was beyond appalled. God help anyone who gets in the way of Kate and her "righteous indignation" which had already spearheaded the militant Women's Liberation Movement. This was to be called, "The Psychiatric Survivors Movement."»[xxiv]

Kate's family describes their mental illness and the behavior they suffered from, but they justify themselves not to reveal any secrets, because Kate described everything herself, but had disparaged her. It can therefore be assumed that families of some other founding feminists – especially if they have not been slandered in an autobiographical book – refrained from going public with their knowledge. The number of unidentified psychological problems among leading feminists will therefore be higher.

Feminists themselves described their suffering, which they spread all over the world with the missionary zeal of the sufferer. They elevated the causes of their suffering to basic principles, laying them down in laws and constitutions and enforcing them with state constraints in all areas of life and society. Now we all suffer to some extent of the troubles they spread:

> «She could not read. She could not write. . . . She sometimes recognized on the faces of others joy and ambition and other emotions she could recall having had once, long ago. But her life was ruined, and she had no salvage plan.» (Self-description of Firestone in the third person, "Airless Spaces" (1998), "Emotional Paralysis")

A systematic search would find clear signs of psychosis in even more of the leading feminist voices. Camille Paglia, who herself came from the feminist spectrum, wrote:

> «The anti-porn crusader Andrea Dworkin (who died a decade ago) was a rabid fanatic, a self-destructive woman so consumed by her hatred of men that she tottered on the edge of psychosis.»[xxv] (Camille Paglia)

Media ignored this, courting destructive ideologists of feminist waves. Instead of describing the actual delusion of many feminist leaders, critics were wrongly blamed of an imaginary delusion, according to the motto: Anyone who is seriously against feminism cannot be healthy. Everything was turned the wrong way round.

The connection between feminism and disorders, which were then mostly called "hysteria", was common knowledge already at the end of the 19th century.

> «By the 1880s in England, it had become customary for the term "hysterical" to be linked with feminist protest in the newspapers and in the rhetoric of antisuffragists. As Lisa Tickner notes in her study of the British suffrage movement, "for half a century and more, feminism and hysteria were readily mapped on to each other as forms of irregularity, disorder, and excess, and the claim that the women's movement was made up of hysterical females was one of the principal means by which it was popularly discredited."»[xxvi] (Elaine Showalter, Hysterie, Feminismus und Gender)

After the triumph of feminism, this was forgotten and became invisible, as the loss of identity had become the new role model. Contemporaries can only notice what contradicts their habits and the remaining rest of unconsciously descending culture.

> «In England the New Woman as neurotic feminist intellectual had become a recognizable type by the 1890s» (ibid)

Today's feminists consider this absurd and get upset, when such a view is mentioned. Yet the 'snowflakes' and 'SJW' of today proof it right, as they are as known for psychotic and hysterical reactions ressembling those of the suffragettes at the end of the 19th century. They cannot stand if someone disagrees, someone like Trump or Orbán is elected president, or in Germany, when despite wild daily defamation of the opposition party, it is elected to parliament. In kinder'garten style they uphold political correctness, silencing different views.

Feminists of today are not 'crazier' or 'more intolerant' than previous ones – we have changed. We grew up in a society that has absorbed earlier feminist waves and therefore considers those past waves as normal, even though they were just as psychotic, irrational, self-centered, ideological and destructive as today's. But almost all people judge by what they are used to. They condemn what is different from their habits. That is why the truth often asserts itself very slowly; in the long run, however, the truth cannot be denied.

> «In France, the femme nouvelle was blamed for the declining birthrate; new divisions of labor seemed to threaten the stability of the family and the state.» (ibid)

History has proven this claim to be correct. The birthrate sank to a record low; we don't know, whether the north European type of people will still exist in a few generations.

For all feminist waves, a connection with loss of identity and exchange structures between men and women can be demonstrated. This loss was always painful. Healthy people suffered from increasing loneliness, loss of meaning, dissolving relationships, families and disappearing cultural forms. Sick people also suffered from it, but reacted in a pathological manner; they then attacked precisely those humanly universal forms that exist in all cultures, including matriarchies, across all epochs, which already had become too weak for us to be functional. They rebelled blindly and psychotically, shifted their inner suffering and inner conflicts into an activist struggle outside against an imaginary 'patriarchy' and against exactly those cultural bonds, fathers and role models, from whose absence they suffered. So they worsened the problem for the whole society. That way, they attempted to reduce their pressure of suffering by political action and acceptance by their supporters. It is not surprising that they could never be satisfied with what they had achieved, however great it was, because their driving forces were irrational, psychotic.

> «Hysterie, Feminismus und Gender – Elaine Showalter
>
> Hysteria has taken many strange turnings in its long career, but one of the most surprising is the modern marriage of hysteria and feminism, the fascination among feminist intellectuals, literary critics, and artists with what Mary Kelly calls "the continuing romance of hysteria. Feminist understanding of hysteria has been influenced by work in semiotics and discourse theory, seeing hysteria as a specifically feminine protolanguage, communicating through the body messages that cannot be verbalized. For some writers, hysteria has been claimed as the first step on the road to feminism …
>
> As the French novelist and theorist Hé1ène Cixous melodramatically inquires, "What woman is not Dora?"» (ibid)

That rhetorical question also reveals the mass impact of feminist ways of thinking that shapes the lives of entire generations to come. Contrary to what is believed in feminist self-reflection, the marriage of psychoses and feminism is ancient, already proven for the first wave.

> «But as Mark Micale notes, “No line of evolution within the historiography of hysteria is more complicated than the feminist one.” The feminist romance with hysteria began in the wake of the women’s liberation movement of the late 1960s and the French événements of May 1968, when a young generation of feminist intellectuals, writers, and critics in Europe and the United States began to look to Freudian and Lacanian psychoanalysis for a theory of femininity, sexuality, and sexual difference.» (ibid)

The latter claim is false, as we have already seen. A strong connection with hysteria has already been demonstrated for feminism in the 1880s and 1890s. There was also a relationship with schizophrenia, which first appeared at the time. In literary terms, mental illness was already expressed in feminist works such as Gilman’s “Yellow Wallpaper”.

> «Thus Jane Gallop writes, “Freud links hysteria to bisexuality; the hysteric identifies with members of both sexes, cannot choose one sexual identity. … If feminism is the calling into question of constraining sexual identities, then the hysteric may be a protofeminist.” Similarly, Claire Kahane defines “hysterical questions” as questions about bisexuality and sexual identity: “Am I a man? Am I a woman? How is sexual identity assumed? How represented?”» (ibid)

A remark made by feminists is, that feminism is to question sexual identities. That was true even before the first wave, for example with Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797).

Feminist consensus confirms my claim in this case; only the interpretation differs fundamentally: feminism denies the existence of two natural sexes. In particular, it denies any completement of the sexes, any exchange and any cultural language that results from forms of exchange or division of labour between men and women. This attitude is demonstrably wrong because it is in blatant contradiction to human nature. It is not just about the fact that there are clear differences of both sexes, especially in the psyche, reproduction and life strategies. Such statements are true, but trivial, commonplace, truism. Irrespective of physical or mental differences, social exchange, reciprocity, relationships and structures are just as vital as human language, which is also a kind of social structure based on innate ability and a basic need.

If this natural relationship between both sexes ceases to exist, their exchange and connection breaks down, so does the sexual and social identity, the human frame of reference of life, which triggers uncertainty, confusion and suffering. Feminism has also misinterpreted this, made a principle out of the cause of her suffering, and forced both on the rest of the world. It is not only children who need boundaries so that they do not lose themselves. The whole self-discovery rhetoric of feminist emancies since the 1970s was based on precisely this loss of their natural identity and the resulting uncertainty. Today entire peoples are abolished because of this feminist misunderstanding of boundaries, differences, identity and the connections between different identities.

There’s evidence that not only hysteria is a strong and widespread driving force for all feminist waves. The same also applies to schizophrenia, which first appeared at the same time as the spread of the first wave. In earlier epochs, and in other cultures, schizophrenia seems to be unknown as a permanent disease. Its appearance at the same time as the first feminist wave, even among several leading representatives, does not look like a coincidence.

Eating disorders and self-harm have also increased significantly; in the former case it is argued that the increased female choice overwhelms girls and young women. Because all women are instinctively interested in the same 20 percent men, they create a secondary social choice of the 20 percent coveted men, who make up only a fraction of the women. As a result, not every woman can get one of the few coveted men. So women create massive pressure for themselves through sexual discrimination against men. Since women attract men through beauty and body, they no longer feel good and slim enough, they want to be ‘starving’. This is not due to a ‘patriarchy’, as feminists assume, but on the contrary to feminism, which destroyed helpful cultural forms that not only alleviated the selection pressure on men, but also strengthened the complacency of young girls. Eating disorders are still rare in Asia’s extended families.

> «But when he talks about what he terms "successful hysterics," people who in their adult lives seemed to outgrow their adolescent hysteria, or transformed what had been hysterical symptoms into social causes, Israel mentions only women, such as Mary Baker Eddy, the founder of Christian Science, and Bertha Pappenheim, or Anna O., who became a German feminist leader. He sees their dedication as an evolutionary form of feminine hysteria itself, an obsessive desire to become the maître rather than submit to him, an acting out of fantasies of devotion. Thus female activism becomes merely a constructive pathology, and feminism only a healthier form of hysteria. …
>
> The same metaphor is used by Olive Schreiner, herself an example of the New Woman who overcame hysterical disorders to lead an important career as a feminist and writer. Schreiner imagined that if sex and reproduction could be separated … For Schreiner, the hysteric is thus a member of the sexual avant-garde. …
>
> Women were just as irritated by isolation and enforced idleness as men. Mitchell's patients indeed included many of the leading feminist intellectuals, activists, and writers of the period, including Jane Addams, Winifred Howells, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, and Edith Wharton. »[xxvii] (ibid)

In a similar manner, Greta Thunberg has been preaching hysterical anxiety regarding CO2 to overcome her psychotic symptoms. Even her father admitted that her activism was part of a self-therapy. That way irrational agenda has been spread to the world, so that the activist could keep their mental illness in check. Thus, the world got more sick.

Schizophrenics and hysterics thus shaped the ideology of feminism, which is based on misinterpreting facts, considering preferred women as disadvantaged, whereas men, discriminated against by women over sexual selection, as 'dominant' and 'oppressors'. Quite regularly it is the other way around. No, men and women are not equally affected. Feminists don't get off that cheap. It has been proven that men are sexually discriminated against, many are excluded from reproduction, and are therefore suppressed in key questions of life. The opposite of feminism is true! The destroyed culture has to be rebuilt, more precisely: a stronger, more balanced culture with no preference for women, no discrimination against men, which cannot be easily eradicated by feminist hysterics.

> «She sees female hysteria as stemming from sex-role conflicts that emerged in the nineteenth century.» (ibid)

There could be a connection, but unfortunately, it was interpreted the wrong way round, as is their habit. Erin Pizzey has confirmed it for loneliness: The breakdown of extended families and cultural structures made people lonely; this loneliness was a powerful driving force behind second wave feminism. Just like isolation, the disintegration of the complementing of man and woman, took away identity, dissolved relationships and connections, and thus also feelings. Feminists claim they were 'oppressed', but as always, it's an exact reversal of the facts. Women were the dominant and privileged sex, discriminated against men as "filters for genes" with sexual selection, and taught game rules useful for women. Feminists complained of overwork, demanded less work, and then found out that 'society does not demand enough of them'. (Betty Friedan) While feminists complained loudly about female work demanding its reduction, they actually suffered from boredom and lack of purpose. Her ambition was discontent with easy life, which was in fact a privilege and had been demanded by their predecessors, or even themselves. "Whom God wants to punish, he fulfills his wishes."

"Women were just as irritated by isolation and enforced idleness as men." (ibid)

While they were upset about the presence of men or families, it was actually isolation at home that they suffered from. On the contrary, with unsightly regularity everything was turned into the opposite and made worse. Incidentally it shows, that although men were just as irritated, feminist women became hysterical and reacted with irrational ideology. With more justification, masculist men could have protested, especially since they are actually discriminated as "filters for genes" in evolution and life. But they didn't.

The roles were not oppressive or too narrow, but much weaker and softer than in other advanced cultures. They were not constrained, but confused, shaken in identity and self-confidence, because they already had to little female roles and tasks. In prehistoric times, almost all work was divided between men and women; thus there was an abundance of tasks. The roles had never been so little as in contemporary West, when technical aids and devices began to make housewives superfluous. It was their increasing redundancy that made them dissatisfied. A healthy reaction would have been a new, sensible and balanced redistribution; they rioted hysterically, destroyed humanly universal foundations.

> «In The Newly-Born Woman (1975), Cixous took the position that hysteria was the "nuclear example of women's power to protest," and that Dora belonged to the pantheon of feminist history» (a.a.O.)

In the quote from a feminist's hand, hysteria is seen as the core of female power; whether 'nuclear' contains an additional allusion is undecided.

> «This romanticization and appropriation of the hysteric nostalgically assumes that she is a heroine of the past. "Où sont-elles passées les hystériques de jadis," asked Jacques Lacan in 1977, "ces femmes merveilleuses, les Anna O., les Emmy von N.? . . . Qu'est-ce qui remplace aujourd'hui les symptômes hystériques d'autrefois?" We might answer that the despised hysterics of yesteryear have been replaced by the feminist radicals of today, by contemporary women artists and poets, and by gay activists.» (ibid)

Let us note the instinctless aberration of praising serious problems as 'wonderful', and the replacement of hysteria by radical activism observed in feminist writings itself – even in subsequent generations. The contemporary "artists and poets" mentioned will be presented later.

The book quoted is biased; neither hysteria nor feminism are seen in a negative way; even critical voices are often part of a feminist society and its world view. They are caught inside a cage of feminist ideas. It needs a philosophical approach as provided by my books to get out of this cage.

> «In the popular mind, the pejorative association of feminism with hysteria and morbidity has not died yet.In 1983, for example, a controversy erupted in the Times Literary Supplement over the use of "hysterical" as a critical term for the poetry of Sylvia Plath and other "man-hating" feminist poets. Defending her position, Anne Stevenson wrote, "Hysteria is the very stuff of revolutions" … Moreover, those revolutions connected to gender and race continue to seem more "hysterical" than others… What had been hysterical hooliganism in the suffrage campaigns was now attributed to other groups.» (ibid)

These sources also see the connection and similarity of hysterical waves with feminism from then and now, as well as with hatred of men. Hysteria is even called the raw material of revolutions. The cases of famous feminists with psychological problems presented here, whether hysteria, schizophrenia or others, are therefore not 'weird inventions' on my part, but a connection that is manifested both by today's feminists and their literature, and by historical evidence from the time of the first wave. Even if people had not yet reached our level of science at the time and therefore their reasoning often no longer convinces, we should take them seriously. They weren't stupider than we are; their society was less disturbed than ours. They often sensed intuitively when a fate appeared. But because gender culture is unconscious and protected by taboos, they were unable to rationally justify it by today's standards. While their attempts to justify something that has grown naturally may be outdated today, the culture they defend is timeless and as valid today as it was then.

> «May Ayim (… actually Sylvia Brigitte Gertrud Opitz) …
>
> In 1985 she was a founding member of the Black Germans and Blacks Initiative in Germany. She made contacts with representatives of the international black women's movement such as Audre Lorde. … May Ayim suffered from psychotic episodes since the early 90s, which is why she voluntarily went to closed > psychiatric clinics several times. … she plunged from a high-rise to death on August 9, 1996.»[xxviii] (Wikipedia)

Rose S. Garston was under psychological care for 'PTSD', when she ignored medical advice to organize a collective hunt for all anti-feminist sites with the aim of getting them deleted. They celebrated every deletion in public. (Evidence in my book: Fulminantes Finale, Volume 1, page 170 ff.)

> «"The yellow wallpaper" is an autobiographical short story by the American writer and women's rights activist Charlotte Perkins Gilman, which was first published in New England Magazine in January 1892. The short story is considered an important work of early American feminism; it is about a young woman who is not cured by the treatment of her depression, but goes mad. In the course of the story, the increasingly confused and delusional observations that the protagonist makes about the pattern of yellow wallpaper in her hospital room become an image of her deteriorating mental state. …
>
> The short story shows strong parallels to the life of the author. … After the birth of her daughter Katherine, Gilman suffered from depression, although in retrospect it is not clear whether it was postpartum depression or another type of mental illness. Gilman's mental health did not improve, and after three years of illness, Gilman decided to seek medical treatment.»[xxix] (Wikipedia de, 2016)

It is typical of Gilman and later feminists, that they seek healing in activism; they try to heal themselves by imposing ideas and methods to the world, that are rooted in their illness. Later the world experiences similar problems and therefore appreciates, that the 'pioneer' expresses their feelings and problems, they wouldn't have without her. That's another paradoxon of feminism.

Silvia Plath is celebrated in a similar way:

> «This study examines mental illness in literature, with a focus on Charlotte Perkins Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper" and Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar, the primary texts of the research, and develops similarities and personal connections between the authors and their mentally unstable main characters. The study investigates the biographical aspects and mental health of the deceased women … Both women committed suicide … Plath began to develop mental illness at a younger age.»[xxx] (unt.edu)

A strongly feminist article clearly states:

> «Voices of Feminism and Schizophrenia in Plath's Poetry
>
> Clarissa LEE Ai Ling
>
> … Whilst struggling with the ardent feminist within her … Many of Plath's later poems are related to her battle with mental illness, despair, sense of betrayal and suicidal thoughts.»[xxxi] (utoronto.ca)

As in the pre-feminist and the first wave, so in the second and third.

> «Enter Polly Dunning. She is a third generation feminist (her mother is the feminist commentator Jane Caro). In a column for the Sydney Morning Herald she writes of how conflicted she felt when she learned that she was carrying a boy child rather than a girl: …
>
> "There were dark moments in the middle of the night (when all those dark thoughts come), when I felt sick at the thought of something male growing inside me."»[xxxii] (ozconservative)

What neither psychopaths nor feminists understand: It is not the male being who grows in her as her son who is sick, but she herself is mentally ill, if she sees her own child as a disease in an attitude hostile to men. Feminism is the disturbance that projects itself into the world. Feminism destroys everything, from which healthy sympathy and love for men can grow and mature. Feminism replaces a culture, in which men and women act and feel for each other, by a hostile chaos of conflict.

> «Mark Richardson, 31 December 2016
>
> They have created a social movement, a political ideology and a mental illness all in one place!
>
> Funny you should note this. I was in a bookshop yesterday and saw a copy of Clementine Ford's book. I read about five pages of it and had to put it down – I couldn't take any more of it. It was like reading the innermost thoughts of someone trying to convince themselves that they were not mentally unwell. Every paragraph read much the same: "Men hate us, want to kill us and rape us, the whole system leaves us unable to function, on the verge of breakdown, but when we complain about this we are told that we are being dramatic/paranoid, but we're not crazy, it's the world that makes us like this."
>
> Later that day I looked through some reviews and discovered that Clementine Ford has, in fact, battled with mental ill health.
>
> And yet these are the types of women published in leading newspapers as representatives of their sex.»[xxxiii] (ozconservative)

She has a background typical of leading feminists of the first and second wave.

> «Clementine Ford (born 1981) is an Australian feminist writer, broadcaster and public speaker. She has a regular column for Daily Life …
>
> Ford spent the remainder of her teenage years growing up in Adelaide, South Australia. As a teenager, Ford struggled with body image, body dysmorphia and an eating disorder. … She studied at the University of Adelaide, where she took a gender studies course; she describes this as a personal catalyst for her decision to become a women's rights activist.»[xxxiv] (Wikipedia, 2016, 2020)

Here we see what havoc gender studies do: They indoctrinate entire generations with the opposite of the truth, persuade the privileged group (women) to be disadvantaged, call for the complete destruction of human culture and nature, whereupon future generations grow up disrooted and harmed. The victims of their deception believe, that all their suffering is not due to feminism, the destruction of natural identity and culture, but to a 'patriarchy', which is such a mysterious conspiracy theory, that even leading feminists cannot explain what it should consist of.

Feminist psychopaths do not look for the cause in themselves, but project everything outwards, spread their suffering through feminist means in society as a whole, so that future generations, who lack natural identity and culture, are fraught with problems like those feminists, who had invented such ideology. They are proclaimers, prophets and missionaries of their own suffering, misfortune, their own disturbance. They make the whole world sick, because they don't want to face their own illness. This is how feminism of all waves and epochs worked.

> «Clementine Ford: How I quell the panic when anxiety threatens to take over
>
> By Clementine Ford, May 19, 2016
>
> About six weeks ago, after a period of relative peace and harmony, the anxiety that's plagued me on and off for more than 20 years returned to me in full force. With its reappearance, I experienced some dark moments; moments where I was frightened not only by the despair I was feeling but also by the ferocity with which I was feeling it. I found myself plagued by obsessive thoughts and terrified by my inability to get myself out of the cycle of them. Anxiety is oppressive, both physically and mentally and even the threat of it can be exhausting.
>
> But I have practice in dealing with this particular demon»[xxxv] (smh.com.au)

Incidentally, she involuntarily reveals why feminist founders really felt oppressed: the cause was in them themselves, neither in men nor in a 'patriarchy' based on conspiracy theory. In a typically feminist way, ideologically bored people see the cause of their disturbance everywhere, except not within themselves and their ideology.

> «Clementine Ford: 'There's something really toxic with the way men bond in Australia'»[xxxvi] (Guardian)

Feminism is a distortion of all facts to the contrary, just as sexually discriminated men become supposed oppressors, so their own suffering is projected into the outside world. Any culture that could help them, which is there to prevent such suffering, is destroyed. In other words, they destroy exactly what should and can prevent such suffering, which plunges entire generations and epochs into suffering similar to that which characterized them. All because they didn't want to be helped; instead, they broke the world. Such psychopaths and feminist ideology wiped out mutual love, a culture of two sexes complementing and helping each other. They destroyed female empathy for male losers, when those needed it most.

> «Why women's mental illness deserves more attention
>
> Clementine Ford, April 22, 2016
>
> I was 12 years old the first time I experienced significant struggles with anxiety.»[xxxvii] (dailylife)

The more appropriate headline would be: Why psychosis, projections and false assumptions by feminists deserve more attention.

Their suffering is rooted within them, more precisely in their confusion of identity, which prevents them from developing a trusting symbiosis with the male sex and sympathetic love for men in general. They project their psychotic disorder onto men and a supposed 'patriarchy', which is an irrational conspiracy theory. Their perception is wrong because they make the wrong assumption, that biologically and culturally privileged women would be 'oppressed' and that biologically and evolutionarily discriminated men would be dominant. Originally an evolutionary protection mechanism for children and mothers, innate biased perception is radicalized with a feminist perspective. Similarly, male losers get excluded from sympathy, because according to the evolutionary principle, that males serve as filter for good or bad genes, they shouldn't procreate, thus get no empathy. As a result, we instinctively mock male losers complaining. Widespread incel and MRA bashing is part of it. To be able to complain and get help is another privilege of children and women. This was exacerbated by feminism, too. So an innate preference for women in perception is militantly exaggerated, in the delusion of persecution, that they consider themselves disadvantaged or even haunted by an imaginary 'oppressive structural patriarchy'. Because of this ideology, the entire cultural complementary structure is destroyed, whereupon subsequent generations can no longer mature healthily, but grow into problems created and spread by feminism.

Many writers celebrated by the women's movement were marked and driven by such problems.

> «Virginia Wolf – much more than an insane feminist
>
> The writer Virginia Wolf often is placed into categories like 'insane' or 'feminist'. She was much more than that. Above all, she revolutionized writing …
>
> You can often see them pigeonholed, one is that of feminism, which led to an increased Virginia Woolf reading wave in the 1970s and 1980s. It is also not wrong to see her as a great feminist who she was, but it narrows her eyes. The famous essay "A Room of One's Own" is of course one of the milestones in feminist literature.
>
> … your commitment to sex-independent equal opportunities goes hand in hand with your artistic emancipation. In the pseudobiographical novel "Orlando", a humorous declaration of love to the friend, Vita Sackville-West, who was sometimes beloved – Virginia Woolf was attracted to women, the marriage to

> Leonard was more platonic in nature – the androgynous hero not only travels through several centuries, he / she also changes from one sex to another.»[xxxviii] (msn)

Such "revolutionizing of writing" spreads contentual, methodical and in life the suffering and problems from which it arose. Describing books as "rejected children" says a lot in an era when motherhood gets neglected, love for children and mother devalued, the peoples affected can't even reproduce themselves sufficiently.

> «Marlene Haushofer (1920-1970)
>
> "My books are all rejected children"
>
> "I never write about something else than own experiences. All of my protagonists are a part of me, a kind of split off personality." …
>
> The culmination of this rebellion was her novel 'The Wall' [title and content based on: 'The Yellow Wallpaper' by Gilman], which appeared in 1963 and most radically describes a woman's departure from the world. … It wasn't until twenty years later, after the 1983 edition of the book, that the author became an icon of the women's movement.» (Jutta Rosary, line by line my paradise)

The reference to an "insanely" strong depression, which makes her hopeless, is also clear.

> «For decades, Marlen Haushofer periodically keeps a diary, but only keeps these records for a certain time and burns them doubtfully: "Actually, I can only live if I write and write. since I am not writing at the moment I feel swamped u. disgusting. Will make children's book, better than nothing. See that the stories are insanely depressed and hopeless, written in a reasonably good time."» (Jutta Rosenkranz, line by line my paradise)

Her writing is self-therapy, just as feminist activism was invented as self-therapy. One can feel sorry for the children who get to read the children's books created in this way, because they are lured early onto a wrong track that damages them. She shared such suffering subjectivity with the later upheaval of the women's movement in the 1970s.

> «Such statements and the limited world that appears in Haushofer's texts have seduced readers to dismiss her prose as typically subjectivist women's literature … A way of reading Haushofer's texts identifying them with the new women's literature of the 1970s and their demands for radical subjectivity … falls short of her.» (Franziska Frei Gerlach, Scripture and Gender: Feminist Designs and Readings…)

Such radical subjectivity has torn apart the last remnants of cultural connections between the two sexes, and thus the basis of healthy relationships. Because only what women and men do specifically for each other and exchange, creates a reliable relationship, gives them identity, and lets feelings mature. Without such a connection, compassion breaks down into self-centered or women-related sentiments and demands, as the women's movement has done. That is the psychological and emotional core of the matter.

Feminism emerged as the denial and destruction of all connecting forces and forms between the two sexes. The feeling of paralysis of those affected was due to the crumbling of cultural complementing of both sexes, which increasingly narrowed the cultural field of life and thus deprived the sexes of meaning. The lack of importance and attention as a woman, which they state to have experienced, was due to the already too low importance that femininity and masculinity now had in modern times, shaped by technology. As technology is sex-neutral, its effect on human behaviour enables to more easily conflict human universals of all times and cultures. As always, feminism interpreted everything in the wrong way, found the worst possible turn, not only aggravated the problems, but made them a principle.

> «In her diary, she describes this book, which was created for the first time without being interrupted by an > illness, as “a study of madness and suicide”.» (Jutta Rosary, line by line my paradise, about Virginia Woolf)

Psychiatrists of that time before feminism overran and turned our consciousness, were astonishingly silent in the face of visibly psychotic features of the movement. Scientific studies can only be easily found in individual cases:

> «Images in Psychiatry, Virginia Woolf (1882–1941) …
>
> From the age of 13, Woolf had symptoms that today would be diagnosed as bipolar disorder; she experienced mood swings from severe depression to manic excitement and episodes of psychosis… she comitted suicide … At times Woolf railed against her illness, felt frustrated and impeded by it, and at other times, she felt that it was essential to her.»[xxxix] (Katherine Dalsimer, Ph.D., AmJ Psychiatry 161:5, Mai 2004)

Thrusts of a mental illness shaped her feminist revolution of writing; sometimes she felt handicapped by her suffering, but otherwise she felt that it was “essential to her”. To put it plainly: Her ideas and methods would not have arisen without illness; psychotic relapses are the driving force.

Incidentally, this should not only be typical of the feminist scene, but also its environment. In the early 1970s, young dropouts in London told me that their lifestyle was not intentional; they were not able to live differently, so they could not cope with it. Feminist writing and struggling was apparently the only way of life to get their suffering under control. The rest of the world pays for it, because this is how the cause of their suffering spreads all over the world: fanatically they force others on the confusion of identity and roles, which is the reason for their unsatisfactory existence. Because there was already far too little that both sexes do for each other. That is why the housewife existence was devoid of meaning, and also the male existence, by the way – only that men mostly reacted less psychotically.

Feminists broke exactly what would be necessary to enable happiness and recovery. Instead, they let their illness break out openly, become political. They wanted to make the symptoms controllable through living out in ‘self-treatment’. So they were rooted in society. Most youth of later generations was turned to some degree into a suffering feminist, who fights the last remnants of natural gender relationships, in order to get his own suffering under control, while creating greater suffering for everyone. The same model applies to CO2-anxiety and other hysterias of today.

> «Sarah Kane died in London last weekend. Whereof? By suicide.
>
> … Sarah Kane gave information about herself in conversations. Then she talks about the depression she had when writing “Phaedra”, about her unconditional search for truth… “I do not necessarily consider depression to be unhealthy. For me, this expresses a completely realistic perception of the environment. (laughs) You probably have to dull your sensibility to a certain extent. Otherwise you are chronically healthy in a sick society. Antonin Artaud is one such example: either you go crazy and die, or you work and you are sick. Which is the real madness.”
>
> Her role model and mentor Edward Bond says there is something emblematic about her death.»[xl] (Tagesspiegel)

What such performers think is ‘truth’ is a distortion that arises from their suffering; in their artistic or political activism they describe preoccupation with herself, which is lived out bringing harm to society as a whole. Thereby they try to keep their own pressure under control and consider this as self-therapy.

The psychotic core of feminism arises from the destruction of something, that is just as much innate, a need and ability for people, as language: The complementing of the sexes, that creates a connection by culturally pronounced mutual gifts. Exchange creates a social language that provides identity, empathizes and matures responsibility. Technical modernity had reduced this to a barely functional minimum in the 1950s, which resulted in a feeling of suffering. However, the suffering from a lack of mutual contributions for each other, the lack of cultural forms, took a morbid outbreak: Instead of standing up for developing a fulfilling, satisfying human culture again, limiting destructive influences of the technical environment on life, instead of creating forms and models worth living in, they accomplished destruction. They spread the causes of their suffering and their misery in the world as an artist or activist, while at the same time getting themselves under control by acting out. So they completely shred the remains of natural culture, leaving a pile of rubble.

It doesn't matter whether Kane was a feminist or not, because she did the same destructive work as feminists of all waves.

> «Whether Kane wanted to be called a feminist or not, the subversion of gender roles is obvious in her plays.»[xli] (csuohio.edu)

After such deep damage, a return to the lost experience of compensation mechanisms that have matured over thousands of years has become almost impossible. What can save us is a reconstruction of the primeval sex division of labor to complement and exchange, so that a new culture is created, in which we do things for each other, not merely for ourselves only. Such a division of labor would be broader and stronger than European tradition. Feminism is like a boomerang. Actually, people try to head this way on their own: The stronger feminist influence has been, the more job preferences of men and women differ.

The chapter Madness and Feminism would not be complete without naming psychotic disorders that were invented and spread epidemically by feminism using methods similar to medieval heretic hunting.

> «The New Yorker, April 6, 1998, The Politics of Hysteria …
>
> Prior to 1973's best-selling book, "Sybil," about a woman who had 16 different personalities, M.P.D. had been one of the rarest of mental disorders, but afterwards, M.P.D. exploded. Between 1985 and 1995 there were almost 40,000 new cases – mostly women – and the disease acquired a valid standing in the field of psychoanalysis. M.P.D. patients are susceptable to therapists' suggestions because they are given strong medications and are highly hypnotizable. Both M.P.D. and recovered memory are in large part feminist movements: female "victims" confronting their abusers. In fact, the M.P.D. craze was probably a side effect of feminism; it provided working-class women with a strong support network. M.P.D. is part of a history of hysteria, which has always been regarded as a women's syndrome – a manifestation of women's inherent moral weakness. It can be traced back 4,000 years, but in the late 19th century it acquired a new importance, in part as a reaction to the new women's rights movement.. During the hysteria fad, M.P.D. began to receive attention, as a subtype of hysteria. Soon, however, hysteria and M.P.D. died out . The return of M.P.D. began with the child-protection movement in the '70s, hich was then joined by the feminists. Out of this collaboration came the recovered-memory (R.M.) movement, which persuaded hundreds of thousands of women that they were part of a worldwide collection of sex-abuse victims, and many of these women began suing their alleged abusers. The single most important cause of the epidemic was the culture wars of the '80s and '90s, which caused both liberals and conservatives to embrace M.P.D. and R.M. Those who questioned the validity of the movement were accused of protecting sex criminals. This zealous fervor made the movement vulnerable to the thing that would finally undo it: the satanic-ritual-abuse, or S.R.A., craze.»[xlii] (New Yorker)

It is noteworthy that the feminist hysteria of false 'rediscovered' memories, the invention of non-existent diseases based on suggestion, auto-suggestion and hysterical campaigns, which had an almost hypnotic mass effect, was supported by all forces of society, by leftists and conservatives. Nobody wanted to stand back or catch a bad reputation. All parties embraced a movement that persuaded people to suffer from an invented problem that they created in large numbers. The real victims of real hysteria have been neglected, feminism critics have been insulted or ignored for criticizing false allegations. The movement fueled by feminism was victorious, did not end by itself. It was only when it went one step too far, expanded its methodology to include an alleged 'satanic ritual abuse', other groups such as Christian fundamentalists took part, that there was resistance, were falseness and absurdity of the allegations and methodology detected. Inborn preference for women and feminist ideology prevailed and allowed no contradiction. Hysterical delusion is only seen through when other groups are involved that are not preferred by innate, evolutionary forces.

A similar effect we experienced, after feminists had promoted mass immigration in their fight against the 'white heterosexual man'. Their allegations were just as baseless, irrational in the mud fights against local men, and were also based on suggestive persuasion of almost hypnotic effect. Here too, feminism critics have been ignored for decades and given malice. Only when women themselves were affected and women were no longer privileged, rather victimized by a different privileged group during mass immigration, did the absurdity of the method begin to attract attention. Again, we see the boomerang effect of feminism: They claimed to fight an imaginary 'victimization' of women, only to create a real one. They had shared their female privilege with masses of immigrants from incompatible backgrounds, effectively destroying their own privilege.

> «The S.R.A. epidemic was kicked off in 1980 by "Michelle Remembers," a book which described the alleged childhood satanic-ritual-abuse of Michelle Smith, who "recovered" these memories with the help of her therapist, Lawrence Pazder. Soon after the book's publication, the day-care scandals erupted, with children claiming that they had suffered atrocities of the same sort. Before long, adult women were also reporting such memories. In 1983, the F.B.I. investigated more than 300 such claims and could not find corroboration for a single one. …
>
> Predictably, the moderates walked out, extremism swamped the field, and the movement started to fizzle. The False Memory Syndrome Foundation was founded to help families confront their accusers, and soon the media reversed its supportive stance and began to criticize the movements; and criticism within the profession was also mounting at a furious pace. But the most dramatic change took place in the courts, as the wave of R.M. suits (patients suing abusers) gave way to malpractice suits (patients suing therapists). M.P.D. supporters started backpedalling, changing the name of the disorder, and even backing away from the central treatments – hypnosis, abreactions, alter-probing. The number of reported M.P.D. cases has significantly declined since the mid-'90s. Ultimately, the cause M.P.D. most damaged was feminism» (New Yorker, ibid)

Inventing and spreading psychotic disorders is itself pathological and deserves the name hysteria. For decades, feminists with hysterical energies assumed diseases, that were invented and later recognized as non-existent and discredited. Since large parts of society, the media and the public were infected, we are not only dealing with an almost exclusively invented illness MPD, false RM memories and non-existent satanic ritual abuse that were constructed by an RM movement to the detriment of those affected, but also with a real psychosis, namely the invention and imagination of nonexistent diseases, combined with an aggressive, suggestive assumption of such diseases, a virulent accusation and suspicion of large parts of society that is infected.

The procedure for mud fights against men in the feminist waves was the same. Feminist campaigns that assumed men to abuse, oppress, disadvantage, exploit, or the like, were a pandemic that worked with the same methods and psychological drives, spreading emotionally and ideologically contagious, like suggestively awakened false memories in the RM movement that 'Recovered Memories', i.e. supposedly 'found' false memories with their (auto) suggestions. Feminism of all waves is such a suggestion and auto-suggestion with an almost hypnotic mass effect, which is achieved through massive indoctrination and gendering from kindergarten.

It was therefore entirely justified to perceive feminism at the end of the 19th century as associated with a mental illness which at that time was given the name hysteria that has been used since ancient times. But regardless of name and diagnosis, they were right about their feelings and rejection. It would be wrong to dismiss the invention of non-existent diseases like the R.M. movement by saying that those "rediscovered memories" are now discredited. No, it's not just about not recognizing a non-existent disease. That's only the first step. It's much more important to recognize the real disease that breaks out with those irrational forces, that suggestively and fanatically persuade many people of false perceptions, false memories or false claims, which manifests itself in the form of the R.M. movement or feminist waves. Anyone who speaks of ‘mass psychosis’ in fascism must also do so in feminism, which as irrationally and systematically accuses innocents. By the way, feminism is older than fascism, invented the self-staging that was later taken over by fascists and is today considered characteristic for them.

Feminist waves always generate new false, irrational, but highly effective, suggestive and contagious suspicions with which they damage society as a whole – not just once, but again in every wave. We are already so pre-damaged by feminism that we no longer notice the consequences of earlier waves, because they have become part of Western identity. This damage is the cause of our weakness, which is why we are overrun by less damaged civilizations from Africa and Orient.

The first feminist wave invented political hysteria based on psychosis, depression and irrational imaginations and made it socially acceptable. Since then, this method has been used by all feminist waves, as well as by right, left and religious extremists and dictatorships, as well as by Greens and gender confusers. (‘Gender madness’) Climate hysteria, CO2- and diesel fear are of the same psychotic type today.

«”I want you to feel the fear I feel everyday!”» (Greta Thunberg,in spite of Asperger’s syndrome built up by ideological currents from feminist roots and compliant media as ‘climate saint’)

“Spreading mass hysteria”

«“Act as if your house would be on fire, demands Greta Thunberg” “Obviously, Greta Thunberg is seriously ill. Instead of doing something about her panic attacks, she is passed around as a climate change prophetess in an effective way. Very bad.”»

Already the first feminist wave has politically exploited a congenital distortion of perception of women as needy and suffering, of a majority of male losers as not worthy of compassion. This was further exacerbated by some mentally ill politicizing their suffering, creating a new principle of political hysteria. During the first wave, schizophrenia emerged as a new disease that was probably caused by “social failure”, triggered by the breakdown of traditional structures, extended families and cultural exchange systems between men and women. A disproportionately large number of founding feminists were affected by such diseases. They rationalized their illness, in a way tried to treat themselves by reshaping the whole world according to their ideology. Tragically, however, their ideology was based on error and exacerbated the very breakdown of sex complementing, extended families and cultural structures, which was the cause of the new emergence of suffering and previously unknown mental illnesses such as schizophrenia. To put it plainly: Feminists massively spread the causes of their suffering, made the whole world suffer from what had driven them into rebellion. Very similar mechanisms now also work for climate hysterics. Let us remember that we are in a geologically short warm interglacial period of a long ice age, so that in the long term the global warming hysteria is not only nonsensical, but is probably the opposite of reality, namely that a great cold period endangers human life. The sun still decides our climate much more than humans.

> «At the same time, however, Greta Thunberg is a 16-year-old in need of protection who suffers from Asperger’s syndrome and a number of other mental illnesses. …
>
> Artist mother, who was once plagued by eating disorders and depressive episodes, is not entirely satisfied with the course of her music career. She subconsciously compensates for this by concentrating on the long-term therapy of her behavior-sensitive children. In the end, the mother believes that the cold-hearted materialism that is destroying the global climate has also damaged her soul and the souls of her children.»[xliii] (Handels-blatt)

Similarly, founding feminists of all waves have suggested an irrational and false conspiracy theory that a ‘patriarchy’ would be to blame for their suffering. In fact, the opposite has been proven several times from autobiographies and other testimonies; a missing or too weak father, not the maliciously insinuated tyrannical.

Feminists have often tried to 'treat' their social isolation, a real cause of their dissatisfaction and suffering, in feminist fighting groups of quarrelsome sisters. Thus, feminism of all waves was already a crazy self-therapy that fantasized together male power and patriarchy as absurdly as fascist anti-Semites a "Jewish world conspiracy" that would be to blame for everything that is not going well in the world. Incidentally, Hitler also came from a family with several severely mentally ill members.

Instrumentalization of mental disease has haunted us since the feminist waves, from the first to the present. Greta clairvoyantly said of herself, without Asperger (and other psychological problems) "this would not have been possible here". Feminist waves that invented political hysteria and made it socially acceptable were similarly radical and intertwined with psychological problems.

> «April 30, 2019, 1:02 p.m.
>
> Thunberg book
>
> "She is the child, we are the emperor" [her family exploits her!]
>
> … "Our daughter disappeared into a kind of darkness and practically stopped working," the mother writes. Greta fell silent, stopped playing the piano, or laughing. The doctors diagnosed Asperger and related mutism, which means that Greta only spoke to the closest family members. After she refused to eat, the parents decided on a radical break: An end to her solo career, and the daughter's recovery is the focus from now on. …
>
> The basic problem with the content of this book is, that Malena Ernman causally mixes one with the other, interpreting (family) illness as a sensitive symptom of the state of the world. Greta Thunberg may be right when she keeps saying in interviews: "If I hadn't had an Asperger, it wouldn't have been possible here." …
>
> Me too, feminism, symbolism of illness and dogma of performance, in places everything is mixed with the climate crisis into a somewhat confusing overall scenario.»[xliv] (Süddeutsche Zeitung)

Feminists have harmed their souls, as have those of the men they mistreated, and especially those of their children, who were too small and dependent to defend themselves against maternal indoctrination and inappropriate upbringing.

The Greta Thunberg case is a contemporary lesson in how feminist forces of all waves ignored inconvenient truth, instead constructing convenient lies out of nothing. The opponent of feminism Ernest Belfort Bax described this as early as 1913. Feminists tried to censor opponents already in 1913, put pressure on editors, not to publish inconvenient views. During the second wave, schizophrenic or otherwise mentally ill founding feminists were revered as initiators and leading voices. Their condition was simply ignored. At the same time, as early as 1968, it was almost impossible for professor Goldberg of the New York University, to publish his book, which demonstrated the human universality of sex roles: scientific truth was already ignored 1968. The same thing happened to my books and arguments for decades, whereas any dirty feminist campaign based on error or subjective misinterpretation, partly disturbed feminists, was immediately built up to a media sensation. Such fundamental media imbalance has been driving the process for generations. It would be fatal to think that only today's campaigns have got lost or that the media have only now become blatantly one-sided. Rather, it has been a systematic error for well over 100 years.

> «Greta's younger sister Beata, who campaigns for feminism, also had major problems. The doctors diagnosed the 14-year-old with ADHD as well as with Greta Asperger, as well as an obsessive-compulsive disorder.»[xlv] (Augsburger Allgemeine)

Press reports documented that not only Greta, but also her sister and mother suffer from psychological conditions such as ADHD, which the whole family reinterprets in response to fear of (presumably imaginary) man-made global warming. However, her sister lives out her problems as a feminist. This is analogous to the belief of founding feminists that an imaginary 'patriarchy' is to blame for their suffering, even though a missing or too weak father shaped their childhood, the isolation of women because of disintegration of extended families and cultural relationships between men and women are the cause of the increase of mental suffering and schizophrenia. Feminists then tragically fought families and the complementary structures of the sexes, exacerbating the actual causes of their suffering. They themselves pointed the wrong way round, believing their struggle against 'patriarchy' and 'female disadvantage' – although women were always privileged, while men were sexually discriminated and faced with specific burdens – would be a fight against the causes of their suffering. It could be similar with the global warming hysteria, because in fact the sun is the strongest force influencing climate. More likely we live near the end of a warm interglacial period, before the ice age returns and will actually be a danger to mankind – through cooling, the opposite of warming. Only in many millions of years, when the sun runs out of hydrogen, will it heat up and thus make the earth uninhabitable – but that is not human fault, but the natural end of a star the size of a sun.

Greta's family stages psychological suffering as political hysteria – just like feminists of all waves. As long as we do not completely overcome feminism and rebuild a functioning culture with completement of both sexes and male prestige, the sequence of such irrational political hysteria, which also includes green and other extremisms, might be infinite. Even the screeching at Duce, Hitler, Mao, the enthusiasm for Stalin, Pol Pot had, at least in part, similar causes.

A few days before the publication of Greta's mother's book, a Swedish activist who worked in the same radical environmental organizations as her father, began to build up Greta skillfully and vigorously. This continued on the day of the appearance. This is too much for a coincidence, especially since her father's organization with Greta has collected millions of Swedish kronor. Greta read aloud in front of an almost empty room. Compliant media cut out the empty rows of chairs, turned everything into hype and sensation. A Deichmohle with substantial arguments has been icy ignored or met with hostility for decades; her hysteria of man-made global warming, while the return of an ice age is more likely and more dangerous, is being worshiped; the disturbed girl has even been compared to Jesus.

> «Research by critical media has shown, however, that its success is largely due to the Swedish PR expert Ingmar Rentzhog, who has good contacts with several propaganda organizations. Four days after Greta started her climate strike, her mother Malena Ernman's book was presented. The same day, Rentzhog posted a photo of Greta on Instagram and wrote a long article on Facebook … Greta's mother Malena Ernman, a well-known soprano, then confirmed on Facebook that environmentalist Bo Thorén had recruited her daughter. Thorén is a member of the board of the environmental association Fossilfritt Dalsland and is a well-known representative of the international environmental movement Extinction Rebellion, which has also been active in Sweden since last autumn.
>
> This radical leftist group, "Extinction Rebellion" also operates very openly with WeDontHaveTime … Gretas Papa Svante is the managing director of both Ernman Produktion AB and Northern Grace AB … The shares of both companies have seen an immense increase since Greta's first appearance … Gretas Father cooperates with the foundation "WeDontHaveTime".»[xlvi] (Weltwoche.ch)

The idea, that a chain of happy coincidences granted the founders and managing directors millions unintentionally, is made unplausible by a report, that shows an acquaintance of the PR professional with Greta's mother.

> «The PR connection
>
> It is also understandable in media reports, that her mother apparently knows the PR consultant Ingmar Rentzhog. Among other things both have already written an article on climate protection for the Swedish newspaper Dagens Nyheter. Rentzhog is no stranger to Sweden, he sold his financial communications company and founded the platform "We don't have time"»[xlvii] (Meedia)

Mr. Mere Coincidence was very busy, as it seems. ⍰

Opinion media create a sensation from an empty hall, whereas genuine critique of feminism has been stifled by ignoring it for generations.

> «Greta apparently turned to the crème de la crème of climate policy gathered in the room. But a short video clip shown on television the following day revealed that Greta was actually speaking in an almost empty room.»[xlviii] (connectiv)

Those who speak the truth are hushed up or insulted. On the other hand, those who are mentally disturbed are raised to 'saints' of feminist hysteria and compared to a Messiah.

> «Berlin's Catholic Bishop Heiner Koch compared the exemplary effect of the Swedish climate protection activist Greta Thunberg with that of Jesus Christ.»[xlix] (evangelisch)

This series of books presents many independent evidence. Doubts about a document, argument or topic do not affect the validity of others.

References:

[i] e.g. Georg Büchner, „Dantons Death"

[ii] This holds for men – no need of horny skin for women

[iii] http://www.babiafi.co.uk/2015/05/the-hitler-youth.html

[iv] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1142824/Nazi-women-exposed-bit-bad-Hitlers-deranged-male-followers.html

[v] http://fathersforlife.org/pizzey/failfamt.htm

[vi] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-4561784/Feminist-group-strips-naked-forms-pile-bodies.html

[vii] http://www.bild.de/politik/ausland/femen/bild-de-im-camp-der-nackten-wut-paris-30622458.bild.html

[viii] https://alexandrabader.wordpress.com/2017/03/13/feminismus-und-weiblichkeit/

[ix] https://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary

[x] http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary

[xi] www.frontpagemag.com/fpm/226834/no-gun-ever-killed-anyone-mallory-millett

[xii] http://www.encyclopedia.com/social-sciences/encyclopedias-almanacs-transcripts-and-maps/johnston-jill

[xiii] Susan J. Hubert, The Politics of Women's Madness Narratives, https://books.google.de/books/about/Questions_of_Power.html?id=v8qbMxKRNuQC

[xiv] http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary

[xv] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Valerie_Solanas, Stand: 28.2.2017

[xvi] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_people_with_schizophrenia

[xvii] «» (http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary)

[xviii] Shulamith Firestone, clinically insane, The Dialectic of Sex, 1970

[xix] theothermccain.com/2014/08/25/sex-trouble-feminism-mental-illness-and-the-pathetic-daughters-of-misfortune/

[xx]

http://theothermccain.com/2014/08/25/sex-trouble-feminism-mental-illness-and-the-pathetic-daughters-of-misfortune/

[xxi] http://theothermccain.com/2014/08/25/sex-trouble-feminism-mental-illness-and-the-pathetic-daughters-of-misfortune/

[xxii] http://www.frontpagemag.com/fpm/226834/no-gun-ever-killed-anyone-mallory-millett

[xxiii] http://www.frontpagemag.com/fpm/226834/no-gun-ever-killed-anyone-mallory-millett

[xxiv] ibid

[xxv] https://www.spiked-online.com/2015/12/10/feminist-trouble/

[xxvi] https://publishing.cdlib.org/ucpressebooks/view?docId=ft0p3003d3&chunk.id=d0e14039

[xxvii] https://publishing.cdlib.org/ucpressebooks/view?docId=ft0p3003d3&chunk.id=d0e14039

[xxviii] https://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/May_Ayim, Stand: 27.2.2018

[xxix] https://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/Die_gelbe_Tapete

[xxx] https://eaglefeather.honors.unt.edu/2010/article/54#.WpXGiXyDPIU

[xxxi] http://french.chass.utoronto.ca/as-sa/ASSA-No14/article3en.html

[xxxii] http://ozconservative.blogspot.de/2016/12/feminist-mother-and-son.html

[xxxiii] http://ozconservative.blogspot.de/2016/12/feminist-mother-and-son.html

[xxxiv] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Clementine_Ford_(writer)

[xxxv] https://www.smh.com.au/lifestyle/health-and-wellness/clementine-ford-how-i-quell-the-panic-when-anxiety-threatens-to-take-over-20160512-got2gm.html

[xxxvi] https://www.theguardian.com/world/australia-books-blog/2016/sep/28/clementine-ford-theres-something-really-toxic-with-the-way-men-bond-in-australia

[xxxvii] http://www.dailylife.com.au/news-and-views/why-womens-mental-illness-deserves-more-attention-20160421-gobzq0.html

[xxxviii] https://www.msn.com/de-de/unterhaltung/kino/virginia-wolf-%E2%80%93-viel-mehr-als-eine-wahnsinnige-feministin/ar-AAv8In1

[xxxix] https://ajp.psychiatryonline.org/doi/pdf/10.1176/appi.ajp.161.5.809

[xl] https://www.tagesspiegel.de/kultur/buechners-schwester/72124.html

[xli] https://engagedscholarship.csuohio.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?&httpsredir=1&article=1493&context=etdarchive

[xlii] https://www.newyorker.com/magazine/1998/04/06/the-politics-of-hysteria

[xliii] https://www.handelsblatt.com/arts_und_style/literatur/buchtipp-szenen-aus-dem-herzen-warum-das-buch-ueber-greta-thunbergs-familie-furchtbar-aber-wichtig-ist/24274034.html

[xliv] https://www.sueddeutsche.de/kultur/greta-thunberg-buch-mutter-1.4425956

[xlv] https://www.augsburger-allgemeine.de/politik/Greta-Thunberg-kennt-nur-Schwarz-oder-Weiss-id54135646.html

[xlvi] https://www.weltwoche.ch/ausgaben/2019-4/artikel/wir-basteln-uns-eine-klima-ikone-die-weltwoche-ausgabe-4-2019.html

[xlvii] https://meedia.de/2019/01/29/pr-marionette-oder-klima-galionsfigur-ist-die-greta-thunberg-story-zu-schoen-um-wahr-zu-sein/

[xlviii] https://connectiv.events/die-klima-ikone-greta-thunberg-wird-dieses-maedchen-fuer-eine-profitable-good-cause-company-instrumentalisiert/

[xlix] https://www.evangelisch.de/inhalte/155887/13-04-2019/bischof-koch-vergleicht-greta-mit-jesus

Betsy DeVos Drank the Feminist Kool-Aid – The Fiamengo File

AVfM Video Source · 23 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Delving into the depths of depravity

Mark Dent · 25 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

There are few people who illicit a more visceral response from me than Clementine Ford. There are few people who use their public platform to openly preach hatred of one demographic in our society with such impunity.

She is a vile human being.

Her history of misandric statements is a long and well documented one.

Her most recent comments and actions may be her most disgusting yet.

There it is.

A career ending comment for any male on this planet whether he be a President, Prime Minister, movie star, author, journalist, teacher or roof tiler.

No discussion would be entered into. No excuses could be offered.

Yet this contemptible creature seems certain to retain her $20 000 tax payer funded grant for new book. Her publishers have issued no comment on her wish for the deaths of countless men.

> The 39-year-old posted the outrageous statement on Twitter on Saturday in response to an article written about gender disparities in parenting children during the coronavirus crisis.
>
> *She shared the story of a woman forced to quit her lucrative job during the pandemic because her stay-at-home husband couldn't cope with full time parenting – and said the man in the story was a 'pathetic… globular dipsh*t'.*
>
> 'This woman deserves better,' she said.

This sick woman wrote what was purported to be an apology when there was some pushback to her words online and a reprimand from the Melbourne Lord Mayor.

> Lord Mayor Sally Capp said Ford's post was 'deliberately divisive and incredibly unhelpful when we are trying to keep our community together during COVID-19'.
>
> 'I found these comments offensive and distasteful and I agree with the sentiment of outrage expressed by many members of our community,' she said.
>
> Mayor Capp explained Ford was given the grant through an independent process as part of a program to support Melbourne's local arts and cultural sectors during the COVID-19 pandemic.
>
> 'I have asked the CEO to review the selection process for these grants,' she said.

Why was there not an instant withdrawal of the funds? Why is there a need for discussion or review?

The end result will most likely be some vague comments about maintaining standards, bringing the community together in this time of a crisis and a call for less divisive language- and that will be the end of it.

Ford will continue to target men with her vitriolic venom and her 88000 twitter followers will continue to cheer her on.

Imagine if an established, mainstream male journalist wrote a tweet saying:

> Honestly, the corona virus isn't killing women fast enough

Now stretch your imaginative powers and picture his comment garnering support and encouragement from his twitter army.

It would cause a media meltdown. Armageddon.

Yes, we have been here many times before but that doesn't mean this type of atrocious double standard and encouragement of male bashing should be ignored.

Here is the "apology" Ford produced, no doubt at the behest of her publisher or in fear of losing her grant. Steel yourself, my friends:

> I'm a big enough person to admit when I've misjudged something.
>
> I still stand 100% behind my fury at men exploiting women's unpaid labour (exacerbated by the global pandemic), but I've reconsidered my flippancy in discussing it.
>
> I've always maintained that the difference between jokes that punch up and down is the reality of harm.
>
> Eg joking about firing men into the sun has no basis in reality and therefore no potential to further harm, while 'jokes' about domestic abuse are very much reflective of an extensive harm already in place.
>
> The corona tweet was contextually in response to the fact women are once again shouldering the burden of domestic labour at the expense of their own economic freedom, being let down by men who are in turn upheld by systems that have privileged them.

> It is acceptable to express fury at that, and it's disappointing more men aren't outraged by this reality.
>
> But based on my own metric outlined up thread, I have to accept fault for the corona tweet because it made a flippant joke about something that IS actually a harmful reality, and one that affects marginalised men disproportionately, not to mention robs people of their loved ones.
>
> Regardless of what people want to think about me, I have no wish to compound harm and grief for anyone, nor be dismissive of the very real impact and fear a crisis like this presents.
>
> But I also think it's fair to be angry at the lack of interest in this crisis' impact on women.
>
> To be astonished at how women are expected to perform the essential tasks that allow men to thrive, at the expense of women's stability, while being denied recognition for that work.
>
> A flippant (and yes, poorly judged) tweet doesn't change that reality and it shouldn't shift the focus away from it.
>
> If we benefit from privilege, we should also be robust enough to accept critique of the systems that privilege us and work to change them.
>
> Anyway, this acknowledgement isn't for the men who are looking for any reason to ignore patriarchal impact but for the people genuinely hurt by my words.
>
> I'm sincerely sorry, and I wish I had framed my argument in better terms and in a way that didn't compound harm. Be well.

How does one begin to respond to someone with such an unhinged, twisted view of reality?

> But I also think it's fair to be angry at the lack of interest in this crisis' impact on women.

Men are dying at twice the rate of women but we should be angry about the lack of interest in this crisis' impact on women.

Translation. Women are babysitting their own kids during this pandemic! This is far more worthy of our interest than the deaths of men.

This woman has taken one anecdote about one particular relationship (and no doubt heard only one side of the story) and extrapolated it to be indicative of what is going on in hundreds of thousands of homes behind closed doors. But this of course is how feminists have always operated. One woman is murdered and very quickly, all men are indicted.

Does this witch not understand that mature, loving couples make a personal, mutually beneficial decision as to what best suits their family's needs during this pandemic?

Does she not understand that the overwhelming majority of women who have chosen to stop working and stay home during this virus lockdown did so because their husband is in a higher paying job which he intends to remain in for many years and this will benefit the wife and children as much as it does him?

Did it ever cross the fetid mind of this demented misfit, that many women are loving the opportunity to be at home with their kids and not rushing off into the rat race and fighting traffic or a demanding employer and getting home at dinner time?

Does this unbalanced imbecile not understand that many men would have relished the opportunity to stop working for a few weeks (if they could afford to) and enjoy the company of their kids? My son cherishes his rostered day off and spent today at the beautiful Rhododendron Gardens in Olinda with his gorgeous daughter Stevie. He texted me to say how much he loved the chance to be with her and just enjoy her company.

This is something so many men are denied in this society which expects men to be the breadwinner while women like Ford (and countless others) can dabble in part time work, pursue a hobby, work fulltime if they feel the desire or simply be at home all of the time.

This is the hideous fate women face in our apparently misogynistic patriarchal hell hole, according to Clemmie.

She makes no mention of the fact that the virus is indeed doing a good job of killing off men other than wishing it would do the job more effectively. No compassion for the families who have lost a dad or grandad or fears expressed for the vulnerability of the males she has in her life.

This witch simply calls whatever men do or experience, privilege.

Paid work is a privilege.

Unpaid work (Orwellian speak for looking after your own children so hubby can bring home the juicy bacon) is oppression.

I mentioned the pushback to her hateful comment. Here are some examples:

> Ford's initial post attracted an influx of criticism by people who accused her of 'weaponising feminism,' having 'daddy issues' and being 'toxic'.
>
> Former Senator Derryn Hinch described her opinions as 'repulsive'.
>
> 'Sometimes your Twitter views are truly repulsive. If this is a serious comment, I feel sorry for you. What a way to go through life full of hatred,' he responded.

Others suggested her post – which she claimed was in jest – paved the way for equally as damaging comments.

> 'Clementine, is this a similar joke to: "Honestly, the corona virus isn't killing black people fast enough" or "Honestly, the corona virus isn't killing disabled people fast enough" or "Honestly, the corona virus isn't killing health care workers fast enough"?'

Ford initially argued the backlash proved 'exactly how fragile men are.'

> 'The same men who insist all the time that women laugh at jokes about violence against us because 'dark humour' and 'relieving tension'. Men are pathetic*,' she wrote.*
>
> 'Men love to screech about snowflakes and triggered feminists and women not being able to take a joke and they crumble at the first sign of a hyperbolic tweet that doesn't place them as gods at the centre of the universe. Ding dongs, all of them.'

In 2017, she hand-signed a copy of her book 'Fight Like a Girl', with a message that read: 'Have you killed any men today? And if not, why not?'

Her words are truly the rantings of a sick, warped mind.

Men regard themselves as gods at the centre of the universe?

From what part of her repulsive anatomy did she drag this notion?

But the paragraph below is what truly infuriates me.

> The Melbourne-based author has previously spoken about being the target of graphic abuse, trolling and death threats from men on social media, and is known for her often-polarising comments about men.

Ford has played this game for years. She pokes and provokes men and boys with her evil bile and when they respond in kind or lash out, she pounces upon their tweets or posts as evidence of the misogynistic society she has been trying to expose!

Just two weeks ago she played this game with what could have been devastating consequences for a young boy.

Ford received a private message from a fourteen-year-old school boy, no doubt in response to another of her misandric rants.

Here is his message.

What did Ford do when she received this private message in her inbox?

She went on to share it publicly, also posting a picture of the teen and his name. Can you imagine the abuse that would have been directed at this boy? She obviously wanted her mob to emotionally lynch him for daring to say to Ford in a private message what she has been saying about all men for years in the mainstream media.

His photo and name were removed only after the boy's mum begged Ford to take it down.

A forty-year-old woman who has worked in the media for decades and uses the most violent, vicious language whenever she speaks of males, suddenly needs her fainting couch because a young boy suggests she put a gun in her mouth.

She pretends she is pushing back and taking a stand on behalf of all the young girls out there who are subjected to this kind of abuse, but that is a blatant lie. It is other females who are most likely to taunt and abuse girls online. We even have a charity named after a young girl who killed herself after a period of online bullying from other girls.

Ms. Ford explained the high school boy, thought to be around 14 years-old, contacted her out of the blue and sent a series of abusive messages.

Out of the blue.

What a dirty, disingenuous twit, is our Clementine.

She has written two books focusing on the toxic nature of boys and men. She has written countless abusive comments about males on line, she proudly claims to bathe in male tears and often suggests men be killed.

Out of the blue.

She claims to have been sickened by the boy's message.

Liar.

I think her nether regions would have tingled in sensual delight as another young male fell into her perfectly constructed trap.

She would have salivated as she posted (with trembling hands) his personal details and picture.

She felt sickened. And pigs fly.

What a disgraceful specimen of humanity.

Our boys are subjected to this barrage of hate every day whether it be Ford's foul-mouthed tirades, giant billboards on our highways or advertisements on tv reminding them just how toxic they are.

I wonder how many male journalists would get nasty comments from teenage girls if they regularly demanded the death of women or wrote books about the toxic nature of femininity?

To think this woman gets invited to speak at our colleges and high schools as though she is a figure of inspiration for girls and someone who has something worth saying to our boys.

When she appeared at Aquinas College in Ringwood (not far from my home) she performed the following stunt.

> The 35-year-old blogger and controversial, outspoken activist was slammed by parents after she blocked questions from year 10 schoolboys at the private secondary school.
>
> The incident, which caused some female Aquinas students to walk out of Ford's talk, happened in May this year.
>
> One angry parent claimed Ford had treated the 15-year-old male students "like crap".
>
> "The boys wanted to ask her questions, and she refused to answer questions from boys.
>
> She goes, 'No no, I'm only taking questions from girls,'" parent Darren told Melbourne Radio 3AW.
>
> "The ones that turned on her after she treated the boys like crap, was the girls who got up and left."
>
> The father said following the fallout from the talk, Ford "went nuts, she crucified the boys online and the school had to do a massive backpedal".

What a charming human being is Clementine.

Ford said, with regard to the private message from the boy: while teenagers can often speak in such violent terms, she was horrified by it and wanted to call out the behaviour and 'set an example'.

Here we have a woman who called another female journalist a cunt during a live tv program saying she was horrified by the boy's words.

'What's going on in the head of anyone who would say that to somebody?', she went on.

That's exactly what I ask myself every time I read another one of your bigoted, hate fueled rants, Ford.

#MeToo, Thy Name is Hypocrisy

Stephen Bond · 25 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Part 1: "The levels of hypocrisy here are unfathomable."

The #MeToo movement should be called the #MeTwoFaced movement.

But don't get me wrong. #MeToo originally had a valid point. No doubt some men can behave abysmally. Men like Harvey Weinstein and Matt Lauer probably deserve the scorn and ostracism that they have received. And don't even get me started about the contemptible Bill Cosby.

But #MeTwoFaced has gone too far. It has morphed from a movement for the expression of legitimate complaints by women about the sexual misbehavior of some men into a two-faced juggernaut that allows any man to be accused, tried, and sentenced in the court of public opinion, hounded out of his job, and made a social pariah without a shred of due process, often by anonymous accusers.

And the movement fails to recognize women's own corresponding bad sexual behavior or of the female contribution to men's sexual misconduct.

#MeTwoFaced desperately needs to address its own raging hypocrisy.

Five Examples of #MeTwoFaced Hypocrisy

Let's start an examination of this "#MeTwoFaced" hypocrisy by considering five examples: The Vagina Monologues, Lena Dunham, Asia Argento, former congresswoman Katie Hill, and a twofer, Monica Lewinsky and Helen Gurley Brown.

The Vagina Monologues

The Vagina Monologues provides a premier example of the double standards applied to women's bad sexual behavior. This crude and vulgar play denounces rape and "violence against women" yet, incredibly, glorifies the lesbian rape of a 13-year-old girl by a 24-year-old woman in a disgusting monologue called The Little Coochie

Snorcher That Could. (Prepare to gag. Also note that "coochie snorcher" is slang for vagina.)

A 2007 article, Vagina Monologues do more harm than good for women (from which this article's epigraph was taken), describes the rape scene:

> "The lady invites the girl over to her house, gives her vodka to drink and a 'teddy' to wear. She then proceeds to kiss the young girl, teaches her to bring pleasure to herself and then asks her to demonstrate what she had learned.
>
> "Wait a second. Isn't a 24-year-old getting a minor drunk while sexually taking advantage of her considered statutory rape in most states?
>
> "How can a play that gives proceeds to rape funds actually condone this type of behavior?
>
> "The levels of hypocrisy here are unfathomable."

Even more unfathomable is the monologue's final declaration, "… if it was rape, it was a good rape."

So, #MeTwoFaced, the rape of a minor is a good thing, as long as it's a woman who's doing the raping?

Lena Dunham

Lena Dunham, best known for her HBO TV series Girls, is a self-admitted pedophile. In her memoir, "Not that Kind of Girl" she confesses to sexually abusing her sister:

> "As [her sister] grew, I took to bribing her for her time and affection: one dollar in quarters if I could do her makeup like a 'motorcycle chick.' Three pieces of candy if I could kiss her on the lips for five seconds. Whatever she wanted to watch on TV if she would just 'relax on me.' Basically, anything a sexual predator might do to woo a small suburban girl I was trying. [emphasis added]"

Dunham is also a false rape accuser. In her memoir she accused a "campus Republican named Barry" of raping her. Unfortunately, her claim has been proven to be false.

So, again, #MeTwoFaced, the abuse of an underaged sister by a self-admitted sexual predator is OK, but only when it's a female who's doing the abusing? And making false rape accusations is OK, but only if the accuser is famous?

Asia Argento

You may know Asia Argento as the girlfriend of Anthony Bourdain, the American TV celebrity chef. (Bourdain committed suicide, some say, over his difficult relationship with Argento.[1])

Or you may know her as the #MeTwoFaced woman who accused Harvey Weinstein, 20 years after the alleged incident, of performing oral sex on her against her will.

Or, less likely, you may know her as the hypocrite who, even while spreading the #MeTwoFaced gospel to the world, paid nearly $400,000 to child actor Jimmy Bennett, who claimed Argento sexually assaulted him in 2013 when he was 17 and she was 37.

One of few articles to challenge #MeTwoFaced's hypocrisy had this to say about Argento calling the young male victim a liar:

> "Imagine, please, that the accuser was a woman [who] was treated the way that Asia Argento, the strident Joan of Arc of the #MeToo movement, was treating [the male] actor who, at the age of 7, had played her son. We would have hordes of ladies in black dresses and linked arms singing some random song from Lilith Fair."

Former Congresswoman Katie Hill

Then there's the stunning #MeTwoFaced hypocrisy of Katie Hill, the disgraced former congresswoman, who had to resign after revelations of her bad sexual behavior—including a three-way affair with a 22-year-old female congressional staffer and a (one-on-one) affair with a male campaign aide. Oh yeah, there were also photographs of the good congresswoman (for God's sake!) showing off a Nazi-era tattoo while smoking a bong, kissing her female staffer, and posing nude on "wife sharing" sites.

If that's not enough for you, Hill's breathtaking hypocrisy was on full throttle in her resignation announcement, where, instead of introspection, she blamed her husband, "misogynists", and everybody but herself for her X-rated downfall.

Monica Lewinsky / Helen Gurley Brown

#MeTwoFaced, and women generally, are quick to condemn men for the male role in sexual misconduct. But what they really need to do is to think about the female contribution to this male misbehavior.

Monica Lewinsky, who vowed "to bring my presidential kneepads" before leaving for Washington and nearly destroying a presidency, and Helen Gurley Brown, editor of Cosmopolitan magazine, are classic examples that illustrate women's own contribution to sexual misconduct between the sexes.

Lewinsky's case is living proof that "power is the best aphrodisiac": Would she have performed oral sex on, or even been interested in, Clinton if he had been, say, a farmer from rural Arkansas? Was Lewinsky herself complicit in the scandal, or should we give her a pass for simply being female? Oh, that's right, they did.

And Brown wrote two books, "Sex and the Single Girl" and "Sex and the Office" that encouraged women to dress sexily at the office and to use their sex appeal to get ahead. A chapter in the first book titled Nine to Five was subtitled Mother Brown's Twelve Rules for Squirming, Worming, Inching, and Pinching Your Way to the Top". Shouldn't we hold women who dress in overly sexual ways or who "squirm, worm, and pinch" at the office accountable for their contribution to the problem at hand?

So far, the answer is a resounding I-Am-Woman-Hear-#MeTwoFaced roar: "Hell no!"

These five examples are only the most egregious of many thousands available that illustrate #MeTwoFaced's thundering hypocrisy.

Next, let's continue our examination of #MeTwoFaced hypocrisy by cataloging just some of ways that women sexually behave just as badly as men—or even worse!

Female Sexual Predators

Men like Bill Cosby who spike drinks with "date rape" drugs to rape semi-conscious women are sexual predators, vile and reprehensible.

But women, too, can also be sexual predators, every bit as vile and reprehensible as their male counterparts. They just have better PR.

Female sexual predators appear in the form of teachers, mothers, and others who rape and sexually abuse minors, or in the form of groupies who exploit their bodies in their hunt for the attention—and money—of rock and roll stars, athletes, and other rich and powerful men.

Female Teachers Who Rape

Who can forget Mary Kay Letourneau, the former teacher who, two weeks after being released from prison for the rape of an underage male student was found by police with the same boy? She is but one of hundreds or even thousands of female teachers who raped their underage male students. Lists of these teachers-who-rape are readily available online, for example here, here, here, here, here, and …. well, you get the point.

Sexual Abuse by Women of Children and Teens

Women commit a significant share of the sexual abuse of children and teens. Lena Dunham is just one of tens (hundreds?) of thousands of cases of this abuse by females. But, according to the Female Sex Offenders – Female Sexual Predators Awareness page of the Canadian Children's Rights Council web site, 86% of the victims of female sexual predators aren't believed, so the crimes go unreported and don't get prosecuted. (Perhaps we should amend the fraudulent "Believe women" slogan to something more accurate: "Believe the victims of women". Also, be sure to visit the prior link for accounts of female sexual abuse, including an interview by Lisa Ling of a woman who admitted to raping or sexually abusing over 100 children.)

Even more disconcerting is the prevalence of sex abuse by mothers of their own sons! According to one Australian study described in New research shedding light on sex abuse committed by mothers against their sons, an estimated 4,800 Australian males had been sexually abused by their mother or step-mother before the age of 15.

As one (female) sex therapist said in the article, "Everybody wants to put their mother on a pedestal. Nobody wants to think that they're mother did something that is so horrible." Just add "or other females" to the quote and you'll see part of the reason for #MeTwoFaced's hypocrisy: women have been on a pedestal for so long, they're no longer capable of admitting, or even seeing, their own dark side.

Groupies

Perhaps the most socially-accepted—and devious—female sexual predators are groupies, who use their sexuality to entice famous men into relationships and often "pregnancy-induced" marriage, like Juanita Vanoy, ex-wife of Michael Jordan. These groupies prowl rock and roll, NBA and other sports venues, and include Predatory Teenage Girls. And there's even a wikiHow page on How to be a Groupie!

(To be fair, we must note that in the great groupiedom arena, some men, especially rockers, have had underage sex with groupies.)

Women Who Use Their Sexuality to Entrap Rich Men

This discussion wouldn't be complete without mentioning predatory women who use their sexuality to entrap rich men. I've already mentioned Juanita Vanoy. But the gold medal in the Gold-Digger Olympics surely goes to Anna Nicole Smith, the former stripper and Playboy magazine Playmate of the Year, who in 1994 at age 26 married 89-year-old Texas oil billionaire J. Howard Marshall II. Is there anyone deluded enough to actually think that she married him for love and not for his millions? Do feminists lie? Shouldn't there be a law against women taking advantage of (likely) senile old men?

She Works Hard for the Money

Other Female Sexual Misbehavior

False Rape Accusations

Feminists tell us—and far too many blue-pill citizens gullibly believe—that we must "believe all women" and claim that the rate of false rape accusations is two percent. And the sky is green! According to this analysis, "As far as can be ascertained, no study has ever been published which sets forth an evidentiary basis for the 'two percent false rape complaint' thesis."

Rebutting these feminist lies is like shooting bicycle-riding fish in a barrel. Here are four bullets for their tiny fish brains[2] that should finally put these fishy feminist false rape-figures fantasies to rest:

- Rolling Stone's 2014 A Rape on Campus, a completely fabricated and ultimately debunked false rape accusation by a Jackie Coakley about a purported gang rape at a University of Virginia fraternity
- The 2006 Duke Lacrosse Rape Hoax, where members of the lacrosse team were falsely accused of rape by stripper Crystal Gail Mangum (who was later convicted of 2nd degree murder of her boyfriend)
- The 1955 Mississippi murder of Emmett Till, the 14-year-old African American boy from Chicago, and the confession, years later, by Carolyn Bryant Donham, the white woman who accused Emmett of assaulting her, that she had lied.
- Or two simple words that completely rebut the feminist denial of false rape accusations: "strange fruit".

"Strange Fruit" is a song written by Abel Meerpol, a Jewish man who wrote it after seeing a gruesome picture of a lynching of black men, and recorded by Billie Holiday in 1939 to protest these lynchings. Strange fruit is a metaphor linking a tree's fruit with lynching victims.

Why bring up the dreadful history of lynching black American men, you ask? Because, as revealed in this article,

"The history of lynching in the United States is inextricably interwoven with the history of women lying about sexual assault."

(Even if you don't read the article, you really need to click that last link for a horrible, unflinching image with a startling juxtaposition. Also note the preamble: "History's interjection to the notion that #MeToo accusers are incapable of lying or being motivated by malice or financial gain." A small glimmer of hope.)

So let's close out this section with a 1991 quote from Catherine Comins, a former dean at Vassar, also known as "The Bigot of Vassar College":

> "Men who are unjustly accused of rape can sometime gain from the experience."

I wonder if Ms. Comins thinks these black men somehow "gained from the experience"?

False Claims of "Campus Rape Culture"

The false rape accusations just discussed affect individual or small groups of men.

As bad as these individual false accusations are—and they are horrible—monumentally worse is the feminist claim of a widespread "campus rape culture", itself part of a global rape culture, a one-sided gender gospel lie that is even propagated by the United Nations.

Rape culture is false rape accusations writ large.

Unlike individual false rape accusations, the alleged rape culture advanced by feminists promotes unfair, generalized, and indiscriminate false rape accusations about an entire class of people—men. The belief of a rape culture is every bit as credible as the accusations made by the Nazis about an entire class of people—Jews—who allegedly collaborated in a vast "Jewish conspiracy" that worked against the German people.

And it's every bit as credible as the 2% false rape statistic pushed by feminists.

Finally, it's every bit as credible as Rolling Stone's 2014 "A Rape on Campus" article, a piece that was written because the author, Sabrina Rubin Erdely, swallowed the campus rape culture myth hook, line, and sinker, where (in her words) "…not only is rape so prevalent but also that there's this pervasive culture of sexual harassment/rape culture." It's clear that Erdely's unsubstantiated belief in this fantasy rape culture—and her bias against men—drove her bigotry.

To see how biased and unfair the rape culture doctrine is, imagine if we were to declare, based on the evidence presented in the prior section, a "false rape accusations culture"? First, here's one definition of rape culture:

> "Rape culture is a culture in which sexual violence is treated as the norm and victims are blamed for their own assaults. It's not just about sexual violence itself, but about cultural norms and institutions that protect rapists, promote impunity, shame victims, and demand that women make unreasonable sacrifices to avoid sexual assault."

Here's how we might define things from a male perspective:

> "False rape accusations culture is a culture in which "believing women" is treated as the norm and male victims are often falsely accused of rape, historically often with deadly consequences. It's not just about false accusations themselves, but about gynocentric[3] cultural norms and institutions, combined with chivalric foolishness, that protect false rape accusers, promote female impunity and irresponsibility, shame and degrade men and boys[4], > and demand that males make unreasonable sacrifices to avoid these false accusations. In other words, men must 'Man up!'"

As they say, what's good for the goose is good for the gander. [5]

False Abuse Allegations

Feminists also deny the prevalence of false allegations of abuse and domestic violence.

How about a fifth bullet for those tiny fish brains? To rebut these feminist denials, let me offer a single quote made in 1993 by an Elaine Epstein, former president of the Massachusetts Women's Bar Association:

> "Everyone knows that restraining orders and orders to vacate are granted to virtually all who apply . . . In many [divorce] cases, allegations of abuse are now used for tactical advantage." [source]

Another dead fish.

Paternity Fraud

Regular visitors to A Voice for Men almost certainly know what paternity fraud is. For those who may have Google-stumbled into this article (Welcome!), here is the definition from the Wikipedia entry:

> "Paternity fraud, also known as misattributed paternity or paternal discrepancy, is when a man is incorrectly identified to be the biological father of a child. The underlying assumption of paternity fraud is that the mother deliberately misidentified the biological father. [emphasis added]"

As should surprise no one, feminists lie, obfuscate, or actively work to prevent legislation that addresses the problem. For example, the National Organization for Women,

> "… pressured [California] Governor Gray Davis to veto the 'Paternity Justice Act' which would have helped curb the thousands of paternity fraud cases and protected innocent men from being victims of psychopathic women." [source]

How about several more bullets for those tiny fabulist fish brains? Here are a few facts and examples that rebut these damned feminist liars:

- According to a 2006 study printed in Family Law Quarterly by attorney Ronald K. Henry, The Innocent Third Party, Victims of Paternity Fraud, the prevalence as determined by the American Associations of Blood Banks, found that close to 28% of paternity tests in California excluded the man as being the biological father. And this number doesn't include cases where the father hasn't challenged paternity, most likely because he's completely unaware of the deception! [6]
- Henry's report included a high-profile example of paternity fraud, the case of billionaire Kirk Kerkorian, whose wife admitted that the four-year-old girl for which Kerkorian was paying more than $320,000 in support was not his, and that she faked DNA tests.
- It's bad enough for a woman to falsely and knowingly accuse a man to be the father of her child, but even worse is "sperm jacking" or "spurgling", the collection of a man's sperm, committed by women who want to have a child with a man without his permission.

In other words, it's women stealing men's sperm.

If you think women might feel guilty about it, think again. One woman, a Reddit poster named feminista8 actually brags about it, and instructs other would-be-spurglers how to do it!

The levels of hypocrisy here are more than unfathomable, they are unbelievable.

But we've killed a bunch more fish, haven't we?

Pornography

For years, feminists like Andrea Dworkin and Catharine MacKinnon (not worthy of links, you can Google yourself for info on these man-hating monsters) railed against pornography as the "objectification" of women and as male sexual domination. They also claimed that pornography was a form of that old feminist bogeyman—sorry, bogey*woman*— "violence against women."

In the 1980's these two hateful, close-minded women ran a campaign to impose censorship laws against all forms of pornography, although there are myriad views on pornography, even among feminists!

The unspoken assumption was, of course, that women who appeared in pornographic magazines and films were the oppressed, innocent victims of men's evil sexual desires, with little or no agency in their own decisions to take part in pornography.

Perhaps anti-porn feminists, instead of complaining about male behavior, should ask themselves about female behavior, about the female contribution to pornography. They should ask themselves "Why do women actually participate in pornography?" Or "Why is there lesbian pornography, or even feminist pornography?"

There is a simple answer to these questions:

"Because women like it."

Women like to view porn and they like to be in porn. A Psychology Today article, "Why Do Women Become Porn Actresses?" [7] lists a variety of reasons, with "money" at the top (53%, making porn "prostitution-with-a-million-men"), followed by "sex" (27%), "attention" (16%), and "fun" (11%). Note that "coercion" was less than 1%.

So, as Herbert Purdy says in his book Their Angry Creed: The shocking history of feminism, and how it is destroying our way of life, women are active, willing participants in creating porn:

> "…it is stating the obvious that liberated women are the primary players in the pornography that excites men.

> These are liberated women exercising their freedom from hitherto guiding social mores; they are hardly unwilling victims. Pornography is everywhere. From the organised industry it is in California, to the plethora of amateur web sites where ordinary women are uploading their own explicit acts for the world to see [emphasis added]. Yet this is all, somehow, men's fault? The sheer hypocrisy of feminists, let alone their totally disjointed thinking, is astonishing."

So, #MeTwoFaced and you close-minded, lying feminists, instead of just blaming men, how about considering the active female role in pornography, most notoriously exemplified today by women who [Porn Warn: sexually explicit content ahead!] upload their own explicit sex acts? It's long past time for women to climb down that damned pedestal and do a little less self-filming and a whole lot more self-reflecting.

Prostitution

Feminists and I agree on at least one thing: forced prostitution is real, it is worldwide, it is sexual predation at its worst, and it is evil.

Where we likely disagree—no surprise!—is that it's also perpetrated by women!

Although exact statistics and their interpretation can be complex, studies show that women also force other women into sexual slavery. (So much for the sisterhood!) One such study, Female offenders of human trafficking and sexual exploitation, summarized the situation:

> "Female offenders are seldom studied by criminological scholars. This is certainly the case regarding offenses like human trafficking and sexual exploitation. However, the number of women suspected of being a perpetrator of human trafficking should not be underestimated. [emphasis added]"

Don't believe it? Just Google "woman pleads guilty to slavery". Even I was surprised by the number of results: 5,310,000! One notable example is the participation of women, including Smallville actress Allison Mack and Seagram company heir Clare Bronfman in a strange-as-hell sexual slavery conspiracy.

Why can't women see their own #MeTwoFaced, sex trafficking hypocrisy? It's simple. As was noted in the discussion of mothers who abuse their sons, women won't, or possibly even can't, admit to their own role because they've been on a pedestal for so long they're no longer capable of admitting, or even seeing, their own dark side. No matter how much they believe otherwise, the facts conclusively show that women are not all sugar-and-spice.

But beyond forced prostitution, what about women who willingly prostitute themselves? Women have for millennia capitalized on the sex drive of men. Sadly, we must admit that some women do it to survive or to support their families… much like men who have to go into coal mines, or work in the "death professions" where men are ten times more likely than women to be killed, or die in the nation's wars.

And what about women who willingly trade sex, not for survival or to support families, but simply for money or other quid pro quo arrangements?

Women like our #MeTwoFaced Madam, Asia Argento, who, despite her dishonest claims of Harvey Weinstein's predation, willingly traded sex for advancement in the film industry. In his book Men. Women. Relationships: Surviving the Plague of Modern Masculinity, Paul Elam perfectly described Argento's hypocrisy:

> "Uh, yeah. I'm sure that Argento's desire for fame and fortune in Hollywood had nothing to do with her letting a powerful Hollywood producer go down on her. After all, women don't do those things for movie roles, right?
>
> "Anyway, twenty years later, Argento made an Oscar-worthy performance of her totally unsubstantiated claim at the Cannes Film Festival. Coincidentally, this was when the #MeToo Movement was gaining traction. In other words, Argento got really brave as soon as there was blood in the water."

Or women like young "sugar babies" who sell their bodies to "sugar daddies" to pay student loans, make the rent, or just enjoy gifts that their rich "benefactors" buy them, as described in Vanity Fair's Daddies, 'Dates,' and the Girlfriend Experience: Welcome to the New Prostitution Economy. And true to form, Helen Gurley Brown's Cosmopolitan magazine doesn't see anything wrong with women prostituting themselves—forgive me, "finding an arrangement", the euphemism used by Cosmo to hide the true "prostitutorial" nature of these arrangements. Incredibly, their web site had not one, but several sugar daddy stories. And all part of their "love/sex/relationships" section!

So much for true love.

The level of #MeTwoFaced and female hypocrisy about prostitution is completely unbelievable!

Women's Contribution to Men's Sexual Misbehavior

OK, it's time to bring out the shotgun. Let's finish shooting those pesky, tiny-brained, bicycle-riding, hypocritical, #MeTwoFaced fish[8] by examining women's own contribution to men's sexual misconduct.

First, let's restate a few previously discussed observations:

– Many women like to be in porn, usually for money

– Many women willingly prostitute themselves for money or other quid pro quo arrangements – Asia Argento traded sex—prostituted herself— for movie roles.

– Based on Vanity Fair's "new prostitution economy", Cosmopolitan's sugar daddy stories, and the magazine's disingenuous euphemism for prostitution, "finding an arrangement", it appears that in the past 50 years the world's oldest profession has become the world's most popular profession. [9]

So, any reasonable person would conclude that women might—just might—trade sex for money, or cars (or car repairs-yikes!), or vacations, or drugs, or a job or promotion, or … well, again, you get the point. (One mother even traded sex with children for drugs and cash.)

And a reasonable person, not fooled by #MeTwoFaced's hypocrisy and feminism's sugar-and-spice PR machine, might—again just might—conclude that many women have been willing and active traders on Hollywood's "casting couch" sexual trading floor. One man courageous enough to say so, risking the wrath of crazy #MeTwoFaced zealots, was Sir Ian McKellen, who in Actresses Trading Sex for Roles was 'Commonplace' in Industry, provided this vignette:

> "But from my own experience, when I was starting acting in the early Sixties, the director of the theatre I was working at showed me some photographs he got from women who were wanting jobs. . . some of them had at the bottom of their photograph 'DRR' — directors' rights respected. In other words, if you give me a job, you can have sex with me."

So much for female innocence.

Finally, a reasonable person might—again just might—conclude that women, capitalizing on men's sex drive, gladly offer their bodies in transactions where women serve as predatory "pushers" and men as sex- addicted "users". For those diehard "women are wonderful" apologists who claim that females who trade sex are the "innocent victims" of the transaction, this claim has as much validity as saying that drug pushers are the innocent victims of drug transactions. And the sky is green.

Still not convinced of women's contribution to men's sexual misbehavior? Let's talk about Harvey Weinstein's recent lynching, er, "trial". Or actually, I'll have anti-feminist Janice Fiamengo (a modern-day saint, IMHO) cover this one. In her article, The Accusations Against Weinstein are Not Credible, she describes the contributory sexual behavior of the two female witnesses:

> "… rather than being victims, the women now preparing to testify against the once media mogul had long-term affectionate relationships with him, and that these relationships extended long after the alleged sexual assaults…
>
> "Both complainants, though now willing to see Mr. Weinstein go to prison for the rest of his life, maintained a close and friendly relationship with him for years. Far from seeking to avoid the man they claim assaulted them, they sought him out. The first complaining witness, in fact, continued a consensual sexual affair with him for many years after the supposed assault."

But "women don't do those things for movie roles, right?"

Even worse than the blatant feminine hypocrisy of these women is the outrageous, jaw-dropping, Pinocchio-nosed lie told to cover for the obvious inconsistency between their actions and their testimony:

> "The feminist response to the defense evidence is easy to predict, and Gloria Allred, lawyer for [witness] Mimi Haleyi, has already formulated it: just because a woman maintained a close relationship with a man or sent him friendly emails doesn't mean he didn't rape her [emphasis added]. This is now feminist orthodoxy, encapsulated in a theory of female rape trauma and officially promoted to police, prosecutors, and judges as part of something called trauma-informed investigation."

Feminists like gender-ambulance-chasing Allred may be evil, but they're not stupid. They have a Jedi mind trick ability to convince us that the sky is green and that these women are completely innocent. Feminists shamelessly lie, twisting common sense into impenetrable knots to excuse the unconscionable behavior of women, rather than admit to women's own often-immoral behavior, sexual and otherwise.

And we've been letting them get away with this nonsense for fifty years.

It's clear that Harvey Weinstein engaged in some particularly egregious sexual behavior. But it should also be clear by now—except to ardent feminists and overzealous #MeTwoFaced bigots—that these women are also guilty of contributing to this male misbehavior by engaging in their own equally egregious sexual misconduct.

Instead of completely excusing female "co-conspirators", or making ridiculous rationales to cover the inconsistencies between women's accusations versus their actions, why not implement a "contributory sexual misconduct" legal doctrine, borrowing from the doctrine of contributory negligence, for all sexual misconduct cases, including rape[10], whether in court or filed with the EEOC:

> "Behavior that contributes to one's own injury or loss and fails to meet the standard of prudence that one should observe for one's own good. Contributory negligence sexual misconduct of the plaintiff is frequently pleaded in defense to a charge of negligence sexual misconduct."

So, once again, what's good for the goose is good for the gander.

And it's only fair.

Women's Contribution to Domestic Violence

So far, we've examined the predatory and selfish nature of women's sexual behavior, a nature that completely contradicts #MeTwoFaced 's female-chauvinistic, sugar-and-spice self-image. We've also just seen how women's sexual misbehavior contributes to men's sexual misconduct.

But this examination wouldn't be complete without a brief review of the female role in domestic violence. Why do we need to do this review in an article about #MeTwoFaced?

Because #MeTwoFaced wouldn't exist without feminism's Big Lie about domestic violence.

Let's begin by recounting the experiences of two female victims of domestic violence. These two "special victims", Erin Pizzey and Suzanne Steinmetz, were stalked by and received death and bomb threats from the same abusers.

Pizzey was forced to flee England after her dog was shot and killed. Steinmetz's abusers tried to prevent her from receiving tenure at the University of Delaware and had bomb threats made at an ACLU conference and at her daughter's wedding.

What had these two women done to provoke their common abusers' wrath?

They told the truth:

Women are at least as violent as men in intimate relationships.

And who were their common abusers?

Feminists who wanted to keep this ugly truth hidden from the world.

Erin Pizzey founded the world's first women's shelter in England in 1971. She observed that that 62 of the first 100 women who came into the refuge were as violent as the men they had left. She wrote a book, Prone to Violence that told the truth about female violence. Feminist extremists hounded her out of the country:

> "Over the 12 years that I was running the refuge, if I went to speak there were screaming feminists outside. I tried to publish a book called Prone to Violence, we finally did get it published, but I had to have a police escort all round England and there were death threats and bomb threats. And the final moment came for me, after struggling for all those years, when the bomb-disposal unit came to my house because there was a suspect package and so everything that came to me had to go to them first because they were concerned about my safety and the safety of my family. And that's when I left England and went into exile for something like 15 years." [source]

Dr. Susan Steinmetz, author of The Battered Husband Syndrome received death threats from radical women's groups after her book was published. Two partners in related DV research, Richard Gelles and Murry Straus, described how the extreme feminist reaction over the issue of battered men squelched further study of the subject and caused many other researchers to avoid the field completely:

> "Perhaps the most unfortunate outcome of the wrangle over battered men is that since the debate in the late 1970s, there has been virtually no additional research carried out on the topic. The furor among social scientists and in the public media has contaminated the entire topic. … Other social scientists who witnessed the abuse heaped on our research group—especially on Suzanne Steinmetz—have given the topic of battered men a wide berth." [source]

But in the years since these two courageous women were threatened by feminists for telling the world about the female role in domestic violence, other women have come forward to speak the truth:

- In her book When She Was Bad – Violent Women and the Myth of Innocence, Patricia Pearson challenged the stereotype of men as the aggressors and women merely as innocent victims:

> "The idea that domestic violence refers exclusively to wife abuse or to violence against women is so deeply ingrained in Western consciousness that it is impossible to grapple with [stories of male victims of DV] without first unraveling some potent conventional wisdom. … At the heart of the matter lies human will. Which partner – by dint of temperament, personality, life history – has the will to harm the other? By now it should be clear that such a will is not the exclusive province of men."

- Cathy Young, cofounder and vice-president of the Women's Freedom Network, wrote in her book Ceasefire! Why Women and Men Must Join Forces to Achieve True Equality,

> "…bad acts by men are magnified into a "war against women", while women's bad acts are denied. A new emphasis on special protections for women rather than equal rights has dangerously eroded the rights of men accused of rape, domestic violence, or sexual harassment [emphasis added]."

- Syndicated columnist Kathleen Parker, author of Save the Males, wrote in an article Men Aren't the Only Abusers,

> "… the [feminist] myth-making industry has continued to produce what amounts to propaganda – churning out statistics, erecting billboards of bruised women, going for the aorta with images of tear-streaked children asking "Why won't Daddy stop hitting Mommy? … But some have been so driven by their political agenda to advance women's causes, even at the cost of truth, that they can't permit a variant view. [emphasis added]"

- American writer Nancy Updike in 1999 wrote an article Hitting the Wall in "Mother Jones" magazine. The article described a study performed by female psychology professor Terrie Moffitt of the University of Wisconsin:

> "A surprising fact has turned up in the grimly familiar world of domestic violence: Women report using violence in their relationships more often than men [emphasis added] … "[The] research disputes a long-held belief about the nature of domestic violence: If a woman hits, it's only in response to her partner's attacks."

- English journalist Melanie Phillips, in her book The Sex Change Society: Feminised Britain and the Neutered Male, wrote how feminism had become an "unchallengeable orthodoxy" in England. Her book describes an ominous campaign launched by the Cabinet Office Women's Unit:

> "Children were urged to report violence against mothers and sisters. There was no mention of abuse against fathers. Instead, a television advertisement showed a husband berating his wife when she told him dinner would be late. That was the violence. It was followed by a helpline number for children to call if a woman in their house had been abused." [Note that the husband was berating his wife, not beating her.]

- Mary Cleary formed the organization AMEN (Abused MEN, renamed Men's Aid Ireland). She observed that male victims of domestic violence were systematically denied their basic human rights:

> "No social issue in modern times has been the subject of such deliberate deception and misrepresentation as that of domestic violence."

Pizzey, Steinmetz, and these other brave and honest women, unbeholden to feminists or the National Organization for Women, aren't some right-wing, woman-hating nutjobs. What they say is backed up by solid research:

- Two pioneering, federally sponsored studies, the National Family Violence Surveys of 1975 and 1985, were the first to conclusively reveal the equal female role in domestic violence. Also see a list of the many reports generated as a result of these surveys.
- In an annotated bibliography References Examining Assaults by Women on Their Spouses or Male Partners by California State University professor Martin S. Fiebert includes 286 scholarly investigations, 221 empirical studies, and 65 reviews and/or analyses that all show women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners. (Yes, you read that right: "or more aggressive".)
- An analysis that completely demolishes the feminist lies about female abuse of men, Disabusing the Definition of Domestic Violence: How Women Batter Men and the Role of the Feminist State (notice the title ending: "the Role of the Feminist State"), was written in 2003 by Linda Kelly (now Kelly Hill) and published in the Florida State University Law Review. Anyone who wants a brief, but extremely well-annotated summary about feminists' assault on the truth about domestic violence is strongly urged to read this analysis.

- In an ironic—even hilarious—contradiction to the feminist position that DV is predominantly "men beating up women", multiple studies show that lesbian couples have much higher rates of domestic violence that do heterosexual couples. This article discusses the findings of two federal studies that revealed these higher rates of abuse. If you do the calculation, one study shows that lesbian women are nearly 75% more likely to be victims of domestic violence that are heterosexual women.

So much for female innocence.

Feminists have denied the facts about women's role in domestic violence since Erin Pizzey and Suzanne Steinmetz brought it to the world's attention nearly 50 years ago. And feminists continue to deny these facts to this day.

They've made many rationales, some as bizarre as the female-rape-trauma-Jedi-mind-trick excuse made at Harvey Weinstein's railroading (oops! again, my bad!) "trial". But even if feminists deny the facts of these studies and the words of these women—and no doubt they will—feminists can't deny the web-documented reality of women abusing men.

Just ask Johnny Depp.

Or ask golfer Tiger Woods, or comedian Christopher Titus, or model Lewis Burton, or baseball player Chuck Findley, or John Bobbitt, or … well, yet again, you get the point.

Or, finally, you could ask Texas dentist David Lynn Harris, or comedian Phil Hartman, or American salesman Travis Alexander, or Susan Smith's two children, or Caylee Anthony. Oh sorry, you can't ask any of them. They're all dead, killed by girlfriends, wives, or monstrously selfish mothers.

Or you could do a Google search on "male victims of domestic violence". I was again surprised by the number of results: 57,000,000 (or 471,000 when I searched for the exact string)!

Why do feminists and the National Organization for Women stubbornly cling to their "blame it on the patriarchy", gender-biased view about domestic violence?

For chivalric sympathy:

Marie Anne Du Deffand, a French hostess and patron of the arts perfectly summarized, some 250 years ago, a core reason why today's jaundiced feminist view of domestic violence (and the entire world) has been so successful:

> "Women are never stronger than when they arm themselves with their weaknesses."

Feminism is the abuse of male chivalry.

As long as feminists can gain male sympathy by appealing to men's chivalric nature, the more lies they can get away with. It really is that simple. Feminists have always preyed on the better angels of men's nature.

But mostly it's all about the money (and hating men):

In one interview our inestimable Erin Pizzey summarized the money-and-hating-men angle:

> "[There's] a lot of money in hating men, particularly in the United States-millions of dollars. It isn't a politically good idea to threaten the huge budgets for women's refuges by saying that some of the women who go into them aren't total victims. Anyway, the activists aren't there to help women come to terms with what's happening in their lives. They're there to fund their budgets, their conferences, their traveling abroad, and their statements against men [emphasis added]."[11]

In her "Disabusing the Definition of Domestic Violence" analysis, Linda Kelly Hill supplies a more thorough summarization of the money motive behind DV:

> "For real-world domestic violence advocates, defining domestic violence as a woman's problem is a practical, not an academic, decision. In a world of infinite problems but finite resources, competition for adequate attention and funding is terrific. Recognition demands prioritization. By limiting the definition of domestic violence to male violence, domestic violence advocates have been able to frame the issue in a manner narrow and sympathetic enough for it to remain high on the public agenda. Broadening the definition to include female violence risks diluting the effectiveness of domestic violence funding campaigns, as female violence as well as male violence would then have to be targeted with, presumably, the same fixed amount of money. As the commentators honestly explain, given the "fierce competition" for funding,
>
> [i]f we acknowledge the existence of battered husbands, then the funding designated for programs to assist battered women will be cut further because monies will be directed at programs for battered men. Thus, many radical feminists have fought for years to keep battered husbands closeted so that the small amount of money that was available for wife abuse would not be jeopardized." [12]

It's all about female selfishness.

The quintessential example of this focus on money is the billions of dollars in feminist pork available to feminists to distort the facts about domestic violence via the Violence Against Women Act, an act whose very name reaffirms the "men beating women" portrayal of intimate partner violence while it completely ignores the existence of violent women. As summarized in my prior Voice for Men article A Letter to Joe Biden,

> 'History will ultimately show that, with [Joe Biden's] active support and assistance, the United States Congress, in passing the Violence Against Women Act, enshrined into American law an Act that shares the same ideological parents as the Nuremberg Laws of Nazi Germany: hate and prejudice. This law is not worthy of a nation that needs to present itself to the rest of the world as a "fair and just democracy".

Have we killed all those damn fish yet?

Oh, yeah, one more thing:

The sky ISN'T green!

Part 2 of this article will examine how #MeTwoFaced is itself another example of predatory female behavior.

References:

[1] Paul Elam's book, Men. Women. Relationships: Surviving the Plague of Modern Masculinity, provides an insightful analysis, "Some Thoughts on Anthony Bourdain", about how Bourdain's poisoned relationship with Argento contributed to his suicide. Elam explains that what ultimately killed him was Bourdain's "profoundly toxic sense of his own manhood", mixed with a blind infatuation with a woman—the real toxic masculinity.

[2] For humorless feminists who will claim the "four bullets for their tiny fish brains" refers to them personally, so is yet another example of "violence against women", I feel compelled to note that it's only part of an analogy. You know, about shooting fish in a barrel. Rest assured, if I had actually meant to threaten feminists, I would have said "their tiny feminist fish brains".

[3] Gynocentric: centered on or concerned exclusively with women; taking a female (or specifically a feminist) point of view.

[4] Like Gillette's infamous "Is this the best a man can get?" commercial.

[5] It didn't initially occur to me just how appropriate this expression is for this article, but in Googling for its etymology I found that "gander" is the male species of goose. Thus the phrase means that whatever is appropriate for the female is also appropriate for the male goose too. Who knew?

[6] The information on The Innocent Third Party, Victims of Paternity Fraud report was found, extracted, and paraphrased from a book by Bob Lewis, The Feminist Lie: It Was Never About Equality. Highly recommended reading.

[7] This link stopped working in final check of all links in article. The link is here. Could be your lucky day.

[8] AGAIN, you humorless feminists and #MeTwoFaced hypocrites, it's an analogy!

[9] About the same length of time since second wave feminism came along. Surely just a coincidence.

[10] For example, in cases like so many on the nation's college campuses where women get drunk, willingly have sex, and then later—sometimes months later—claim to have been raped by an equally drunk male student. Who else thinks that holding these women accountable for their willing participation in drunken sex will reduce the number of such cases?

[11] Daphne Patai. Heterophobia: Sexual Harassment and the Future of Feminism (cited David Thomas, Not Guilty: The Case in Defense of Men).

[12] The secondary quote is from "Intimate Violence: The causes and consequences of abuse in the American Family", by DV researchers Richard J. Gelles and Murray A. Straus, 1988.

S.C. Family Court and Lawyers Retaliate Against Outspoken Journalist

Alex Campbell · 26 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The South Carolina Family Court system has retaliated against a journalist who routinely investigates judicial corruption. To some, Dion McNeil, 34, of Columbia, S.C., is someone without fear and willing to write about whatever he believes protects the people. He started a news publication covering topics that other many other publications wouldn't cover and some topics that most all cover. His main focus is to stop judicial corruption and Family Courts destroying the bond between children and their parents. For his efforts, he has been demonized, lied on, and alienated from his son without a criminal record, without a missed child support payment, and without any justification.

This is a story of Dion McNeil, 34, of Columbia, South Carolina. He started The Daily Counter and while no longer owns this publication his story needs to be told. This involves a Family Court fudging documents, a lawyer appearing to commit fraud upon the court, a person alienating this man from his child, and a little boy caught in the middle. Dion McNeil has been allegedly assaulted by his wife who has been given an unquestionable amount of undue deference by the Family Courts. The best part about this story is that we have proof.

Domestic Violence Incident

On January 12, 2019, at around 6:30 AM Dion woke up in his home thinking that the day would be like any other day. He was wrong. Dion and his wife, Kyana McNeil, 32, got into a verbal altercation. This is stemming from beliefs Dion had about his wife cheating on him.

He admits to grabbing her phone from a spare bedroom to look through it. Several days before this incident, multiple neighbors informed Dion that his wife was cheating on him. This would be claimed by other neighbors and The Daily Counter has obtained a sworn statement from a neighbor that appears to justify Mr. McNeil's suspicions. When he grabbed the phone Kyana became visually upset and chased him into the couple's bedroom.

It was in the couple's bedroom where it appears Kyana McNeil struck Dion McNeil. Dion called the Richland County Sheriff's Department. On the incident report, Kyana McNeil is listed as the suspect based on a cell phone video Dion McNeil got of Kyana appearing to strike him.

Here is a copy of that incident report:

Here is the video showing the alleged physical assault. Keep in mind that this assault happened in front of the couple's then-2-year-old son.

Dion says that before the police showed up Kyana shouted, "you will never see your son again." The last time Dion saw his son Langston was May 11, 2019. It would appear that Kyana kept her promise.The reason why he believed this was the case was that his neighbors told him that they saw Kyana out with other men and that Kyana was rarely home. Richland County Deputies arrived at Dion McNeil's home in Columbia. One of the Deputies, Deputy Ben Bolden, was placing Kyana McNeil into handcuffs. Dion stated that he didn't want Kyana arrested because he is an avid supporter of the 2nd Amendment and if convicted Kyana would lose her gun rights. Even though, based on the police report and a 3rd party witness to the video, that Kyana appeared to be a domestic abuser based on 3rd party statements (police report) Dion appeared to show compassion.

"I didn't want the mother of my child to go to jail. I worked in correctional facilities before. I didn't want that for her no matter how bad of a person she is. Plus, in this state, gun rights being restored after a domestic violence conviction can be hard. Do I think she's horrible? Sure. But do I want her to not be able to defend herself? No. I couldn't live with myself," Dion stated.

The First Family Court Case

Records show that Dion was alienated from his son for about 2 weeks until he was served with court papers. To his shock, Kyana McNeil was claiming that Dion McNeil physically assaulted her even though there was no video, no physical injuries, and no police report backing up the statement. On January 24, 2019, Dion and Kyana went before South Carolina Family Court Judge Dana Morris.

There were no physical injuries and if they were those injuries were never listed in the 21 court documents we've obtained. She claimed Dion punched her in the chest three times and laughed about it which sounds almost psychotic. She also claimed this when the records show she never called the police (like Dion did), never went to a hospital and showed any physical injuries, and if she were so serious about the assault, why agree to visitation with the man who behaved like a comic book villain?

How can a man who is over 6 feet tall, a combat veteran, a trained martial artist, and someone who appears to be as physically athletic and as strong as Dion McNeil can punch someone in the chest 3 times but there be no physical injuries?

Before the hearing, Kyana's attorney, Blakely Copeland Cahoon, convinced Dion into believing that CBD was federally illegal. That wasn't the case. She talked Dion into relinquishing primary custody even though Dion was a stay-at-home father.

Judge Dana Morris, according to Dion, looked confused during the hearing. Dion says he remembers Judge Morris stating, "I thought this was an order of protection hearing but I'm hearing about custody." The whole case was about child custody, Dion received a court-ordered visitation document giving him standard visitation, from January 24th to May 11th for every other weekend.

Sworn Statement from Frank Green

If you look at the picture to the left you'll see a sworn statement from Dion's neighbor Franklin Green, 52, stating that Kyana was gone so much that he wasn't even aware the couple were married. Frank Green believed that Kyana was Dion's friend with benefits or, as quoted from the sworn statement, "maybe someone that Dion was just messing around with."

Why would a neighbor say this? What benefit would Frank Green possibly have for saying something like this if it were not true? How many other neighbors have noticed this and just didn't say anything until now?

Dion McNeil's other next-door neighbor, Kay Feagan, stated that it was Dion who was with the couple's 4-year-old son Langston almost all of the time. Feagan stated that she noticed Kyana away from the home often and it had nothing to do with Kyana's work as these absent days were on weekends.

This means that neighbors to the left and right side of Dion's house have both stated that it was Dion who took care of the couple's son with Kyana being gone so often that, as Frank Green said, "she might as well not be here at all if he had to the do all the child-rearing and now he hasn't seen his son in so long. It's pitiful. You get women saying all the time that men aren't good dads but here you have one who hasn't missed a single child support payment, no arrests, and all he wants to do is be involved in his son's life."

Visitation was scheduled by Judge Morris from January 24, 2019, until May 11, 2019. Judge Morris specifically ordered that the couple were not to engage in any adverse contact. Yet, it appears that Kyana ignored that order and decided to accuse Dion of cursing out a daycare worker when that never appears to have happened. We spoke with the daycare worker in question. She had only spoken with Dion three times and none of those times involved a single profane word. Dion presented a phone recording from February 23, 2019 featuring a conversation between himself and Kyana. There was a discussion about their son's daycare arrangements. This is when Kyana began what appears to be adverse contact by seemingly instigating an argument that didn't need to occur.

Dion mentioned this in a later court date and tried to present a recording but the judge in that later case refused to hear this evidence.

Have a listen to the recording. Start at around the 7-minute mark:

Audio

Served with Court Papers on Memorial Day, Dirty Tactics

Dion McNeil has his child support amount set at $896 monthly for one child. That amount is absurd because child support is supposed to support the child and not the mother. What child on planet Earth has two parents but one has to give up so much of their money to the point where they have to visit Dorn VA Medical Center's food pantry?

During a later court hearing, Dion McNeil and his attorney went up against Kyana McNeil and her attorney, Blakely Copeland Cahoon. By this time, Dion was already served on May 27, 2019 which was Memorial Day by Cahoon. We have obtained a copy of the proof of service by Sharp Investigations who didn't appear to care that this man was a combat veteran being served on a day reserved for veterans. We have reasons to believe this was done intentionally and we will show just cause for this inference in this article.

Sharp Investigations claim that they visited Dion's home on May 23, 2019, at 5:35 PM and again on May 24, 2019, at 12:27 PM. The problem with these claims is that two witnesses who lived with Dion have stated this is not accurate.

Jason Phillips, 29, served with Dion in Kandahar, Afghanistan. He says that during May 2019 he lived with Dion and witnessed a process server only appearing on May 27, 2019. "I was there. I know what I saw. I even came with Dion to the first hearing with Judge Morris. I saw the retaliation and the targeting of him because he is a father. I'm gay. I don't have a dog in this fight but I'm willing to say that nothing about Dion's case is reasonable," Jason Phillips stated. Phillips' husband, Jordan Engle, 25, was also present and stated nobody came to the house on either on those days. What's even stranger was that May 26th was open so why didn't Sharp Investigations serve this paperwork on that day? Why wait for a day reserved for veterans if it wasn't intentional?

What makes this situation worse is that Blakely Copeland-Cahoon is pretending to support veterans.

Below is what Copeland-Cahoon posted on Memorial Day 2018:

If you were an attorney and you knew you had someone who is a combat veteran served on Memorial Day and you post pictures like the one above then why wouldn't you apologize to that veteran?

"I don't want her apology. Anyone who does this to any veteran doesn't deserve to even be looked upon with respect," Dion said.

How far does Dion believe Kyana and her legal council would go to get under his skin?

According to Judge Morris' order, after January 24, 2019, Kyana was not supposed to come back to Dion's home. Let's take another look at the sworn statement from Dion's neighbor Frank Green. Click here to get a full copy of the statement.

My name is Frank William Green and I'm Dion McNeil's next door neighbor.

On January 23, 2019 I witnessed Kyana in a brown van accompanied with a tall white man and police officers show up to the house where Dion lives. Everything was fine on that day. Later that week on Friday January 25, 2019 I witnessed a black Dodge Charger show up to the house next door where Dion lives and I saw his wife Kyana get out of the car and enter the house. When I saw Dion again he was visibly upset and saying that his wife destroyed his house and that they had a joint restraining order.

Throughout my time next door to Dion I noticed he was always the one with their son. On the weekends Kyana would get in her car and leave and this was almost every weekend of every month she would do this. At one point Dion was a stay at home dad and I visibly observed this because during the day he would always be outside playing with his son or have his son. Kyana was gone so much I wasn't even aware that was his wife and I assumed that was his sister or maybe someone that Dion was just messing around with.

According to the sworn statement, Frank Green is claiming that he saw Kyana and a tall white man show up to Dion's house on January 23, 2019. That is fine and doesn't violate a court order because Judge Morris' order had an effective date of January 24, 2019 which was a day later. However, Frank Green is also claiming that on Friday, January 25, 2019, he witnessed Kyana arriving at Dion's home, getting out of a black Dodge Charger, and entering the home. Green also said that that he saw Dion visibly upset.

According to Dion, when he came into his home on Friday January 25, 2019, at first he and his friend Jason Phillips believed the home had been burglarized. The front door was wide open. Dion grabbed his firearm and cleared each room in the house. While clearing the rooms he noticed that the placed had been left an absolute mess.

Jason Phillips stated, "I honestly thought someone had broken in. He was with me the entire time and he stayed at my place because he was afraid Kyana would show back up to start stuff."

Here are some pictures:

Dion and Jason instantly suspected Kyana. On the following day, their speculations were confirmed during a recorded phone call between Dion and Kyana. Dion went to the Department of Veterans Affairs for a Saturday appointment on January 26, 2019. He had Langston at that time as visitation was ordered from February 24, 2019 until May 11, 2019.

We've obtained a copy of that recorded phone call. If you listen you can hear Langston in the background. At the 7:30 mark you can hear Kyana say, "I didn't mean to leave that place the way it was." What did she mean by that? What other condition would you leave a place other than the way you found it? Why would you leave a place a mess unless to do it intentionally?

Dion said he kept his cool because his son was around and there was a VA nurse present who was working on getting him some pain medications. If it wasn't Kyana who destroyed this man's home then why would she be telling him about this on the Saturday after Dion claimed she destroyed his place? Why wouldn't she tell him about how she "didn't mean to leave that place the way it was" on Friday?

In the recording, you can also hear Kyana bringing up numerous subjects other than the general care and custody of Langston. Judge Morris' order specifically dictates that contact between the couple should only occur for the general care of Langston and nothing more. Why then can Kyana be heard mentioning utility bills? Wouldn't that be a violation of Judge Morris' order?

Here is a copy of that phone recording:

Audio

You may have noticed a blue suit in the picture gallery above. Dion says that was his favorite suit because it was a gift from his mother.

"Mama got me that. This was before she came down with dementia where she can't even remember my name. That's why it was special to me. She (Kyana) knew it was special to me. When you look at the crime you realize it was a crime of passion. You'd only do something like this to hurt someone. That suit cost over $500. It was a navy blue Sean Jean suit and when mama got it for me I was very overweight. She brought it a size too small because she knew I wanted to wear it and if I did wanna wear it I'd have to lose weight. I lost the weight but the suit is now ruined because she is toothpaste all over it," Dion said.

Dion says that it isn't the suit being ruined that bothered him. It was more the fact that it was then that he noticed dirty tactics would be used. He didn't expect civility after that. Instead, he expected Kyana to be mean, nasty, and to use Langston as a weapon.

"She knew that the reason why I had been walking, working out, and trying to lose weight was so I could fit into the suit. I was using that as my motivation. My mother rarely did nice things for me and I expected child abuse from her. I was neglected, abused, molested, you name it. That suit meant the world to me because that was my mom trying to help me instead of hurting me," Dion explained.

"Why? Why do this?" he asked.

Judge Monet Pincus

According to Dion and phone records, Kyana had him blocked from the daycare. There doesn't appear to be a reason as there were no allegations of child abuse, no S.C. DSS (Department of Social Services) child abuse reports or arrests. It appears to have come out of the blue. On May 12, 2019, a day after the temporary visitation order ended, Dion tried to go to The Sunshine House on Garners Ferry Road in Columbia, South Carolina. A daycare worker informed Dion that he wasn't allowed to see Langston even though at that time there was no court order prohibiting him from doing so.

In April 2019, Dion ended up in court again. This time, the opposing counsel hurled accusations ranging from child abuse, spousal abuse, cannabis use, and all sorts of other allegations. Numerous times Dion asked for evidence to corroborate these allegations but was never presented that evidence in court.

According to Dion, Judge Pincus told him to be quiet when he was trying to present evidence that criminalized Kyana and that he wasn't to defend himself from any allegation. Judge Pincus ordered Dion to take a urinalysis and a 10-Panel hair follicle test due to the allegation made by Kyana and her legal counsel. Dion was ordered to pay for these tests out of pocket. Judge Pincus also set Dion's child support to $896 monthly. How was this man supposed to afford all of this and afford to live off of VA compensation alone?

He says he was already aware of Pincus due to a State Newspaper article by John Monk featuring the story of Matthew Younginer. Dion realized it wasn't common to find publications covering family court stories and especially when the judge appears to be in the wrong and the case gets vacated. Dion says that even though he suspected Pincus wasn't a good judge he tried to give her a chance without requesting a new judge.

Dion decided to conduct a criminal background and internet deep search on Monet Pincus. He found out that Monet Pincus was arrested for marijuana possession back in 1986 which was the same year Dion McNeil was born.

Here is proof of Pincus admitting to this in her South Carolina Judicial Merit Selection Committee screening:

31. Have you ever been arrested, charged, or held by federal, state, or other law enforcement authorities for violation or for suspicion of violation of any federal law or regulation, state law or regulation, or county or municipal law, regulation, or ordinance, or any other law, including another country's law?

I was arrested in July 1986 in Brick Town, New Jersey. The charge was possession of less than 25 grams of marijuana. I received a conditional discharge/dismissal and my record was expunged. No conviction was entered. This was disclosed on my bar applications to SC and Florida.

Read More About Monet Pincus: Click Here

"That's hypocritical. I've never been arrested for anything and especially not drug-related. Now that I'm a journalist a lot of people tell me stories about these drug tests that get ordered based on no evidence. Pincus is from Berkeley, California, and got caught with weed. If someone told you that a person from California was caught with weed you wouldn't even question it. You'd just assume it happened," Dion said.

Dion has submitted several clean drug tests including a 10-Panel hair follicle test he was ordered to take more than once. Again, this man has no arrests to his record and a clean criminal history yet is ordered to pay hundreds of dollars for drug tests based on mere accusations. Dion has presented 5 drug tests including the results of a 10-panel hair follicle test that tests back to 90 days of the testing date. He has come back negative for any illegal drug. Dion has admitted to smoking cigarettes and taking CBD gummies but neither activity is illegal.

Kyana claimed to have witnessed Dion smoking cannabis. Dion says he smoked CBD and would travel to go get some. He felt that the CBD helped him with anxiety and sleep. Many people would look at CBD and cannabis fruit and would have a difficult time telling the difference between the two. Dion believes Kyana has engaged in a case of mistaken identity and says he has explained to her several times that the substance he took was CBD.

According to court documents, Blakely Copeland-Cahoon claimed that Dion McNeil was a habitual user of cannabis and that he was "self-medicating." The problem with this claim is that based on all available evidence it is false.

Here is the proof that Dion passed a 10-Panel hair follicle test:

Retaliation from the Bench, Judge Rosalyn Frierson-Smith

In December 2019, Dion sent a letter to the South Carolina Office of Judicial Conduct. This letter was a complaint against Richland County Family Court Judge Rosalyn Frierson-Smith. Dion has provided more than enough evidence for us to comfortably say this judge attempted to retaliate against Dion McNeil for public criticism of the South Carolina judicial system.

Let's provide some context.

By this time, Dion met and spoke with Matthew Younginer and Nathan Ginter who both had issues with Judge Monet Pincus. Dion was then warned about several other judges across the state of South Carolina. He says he went to read a few news articles and began conducting criminal background searches as well as social media searches. What Dion found is displayed in his writing across The Daily Counter.

He found:

- Some people such as Linwood Edwards, II had felonies on their record but was allowed to be a judge
- Some were arrested for weed but will have litigants drug tested for weed without evidence (Monet Pincus)
- DUI judge (Bradley Mayers)
- Several judges cheating on their spouses (he says he will be releasing those articles soon)
- Legislators who happen to be attorneys in vacation photographs with judges which several violates judicial canons
- A former judge such as Arther Brynelson who somehow became a judge even though he was a construction worker/carpenter with no legal experience to speak of

Dion ran across another name. That name was Rosalyn Frierson-Smith. He joined a Facebook group known as South Carolina Father's Rights. In July 2019, Several members of that group informed him of Clint Doran. Dion learned that Clint Doran was the leader of the S.C. Father's Rights group. Judge Rosalyn Frierson-Smith hit Clint Doran with so many legal fees that he couldn't pay them all and thus had a bench warrant issued for his arrest for missing a child support payment. Doran spent 6 months in the Kershaw County Detention Center for missing child support payments.

Dion also read about Judge Pincus' role in the case and realized how ridiculous the ruling was based on the evidence. It was claimed Doran was an abuser but the criminal charges against him were dropped due to lack of evidence. Pincus wrote into the final order concerning Clint Doran that he was somehow a child abuser for letting his son ride a riding lawnmower.

On September 8, 2019, Dion uploaded a YouTube video to his Devil's Advocate channel. The video was titled, "South Carolina Judicial Corruption."

In that video, Dion specifically mentioned Judge Rosalyn Frierson-Smith and Clint Doran. Frierson-Smith was involved in the Clint Doran case. Dion would have had to mention Clint Doran because he read out David Hucks' take on the situation from MyrtleBeachSC news. Hucks specifically titled a section of the article Judge Rosalyn Frierson-Smith. Dion also posted a link to Hucks' article about the situation.

Read more about David Hucks' coverage on Clint Doran: Click Here

In October 2019, Charleston's Post and Courier also covered the Clint Doran situation and specifically mentioned Judge Rosalyn Frierson-Smith. Read more about Post & Courier's coverage on Clint Doran: Click Here

The reason why all of this is important is that Dion admitted to posting the video that would have gotten his wife arrested. He says that the reason why he did so was to try to force her to let him see his child who he was still paying child support for. This was a violation of the order Judge Pincus gave which prohibited Dion from posting about the situation on social media. Dion received notice of an emergency hearing a few days later.

Dion arrived to the emergency hearing and noticed that Judge Rosalyn Frierson-Smith was presiding over the hearing. Dion spoke with several court officers who then told Judge Frierson-Smith who appears to not have cared. The hearing went on anyways. Judge Frierson-Smith had to have known that Dion McNeil criticized her and that he was supporting Clint Doran. The video that Dion posted that would have gotten Kyana McNeil arrested was posted after the "South Carolina Judicial Corruption" video. All Judge Frierson-Smith would have had to do is go to Dion's YouTube channel and view the video.

Here is a screenshot of Dion specifically mentioning Judge Frierson-Smith and Judge Pincus in the video's description:

Why would Judge Frierson-Smith continue that hearing if Dion mentioned that he just publicly criticized her? Is there any way that hearing was fair?

Dion was fined $982 even though his child support is set to $896 a month. Judge Frierson-Smith also ordered Dion and Kyana to both pay an additional $500 for a guardian-ad-litem. That means that Kyana was already receiving child support payments from Dion but she wasn't expected to pay even half of what he had to pay even though, based on several financial disclosures, they roughly make the same amount of money. During the month of October 2019, Dion had to visit the Dorn VA Medical Center's food pantry to find food. A combat veteran was reduced to begging for food because of an order issued by a judge in a case she clearly shouldn't have heard. It's almost as if Judge Frierson-Smith was intentionally picked to preside over this case.

What are the odds that Dion would get this specific judge when he specifically criticized that same judge just a month prior?

Do you believe Dion McNeil was heard by this judge on accident?

ANNOUNCEMENT: Mike Buchanan on the future of the party

AVfM Video Source · 26 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

You can donate to Mike Buchanan's Retirement Fundraiser, here: https://www.gofundme.com/f/mike-buchanans-retirement-fund

You can donate to the Justice For Men And Boys party Here: https://j4mb.org.uk/donate/

Support Elizabeth's work by making a donation here https://www.patreon.com/antifembot or https://www.subscribestar.com/antifembot

Elizabeth Hobson, new J4MB party leader

AVfM Video Source · 26 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Donate to Mike Buchanan's Retirement Fundraiser, here: https://www.gofundme.com/f/mike-buchanans-retirement-fund

You can donate to the Justice For Men And Boys party Here: https://j4mb.org.uk/donate/

Support Elizabeth's work by making a donation here https://www.patreon.com/antifembot or https://www.subscribestar.com/antifembot

Outsiders: The Gender Balance of Housework, Inside and Out

P. A. Jensen · 27 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I belong to an odd fraternal organization. You've never heard of us, but you may have seen us. We meet predawn, in the winter, in our own driveways, usually when the snow falls. We have no dues, no leadership structure, no fancy logo, or even a name. We don't even know each other's names, some of us. Call us Snowblowers Anonymous.

Our only membership requirement is owning a snowblower, which here in Minnesota means we have a lot of potential members. Yet, somehow, year after year, virtually all of our members have been men.

We have affiliate chapters, too. These meet in the summer, though the meetings are less structured: people come and go as their lawns need mowing, or their trees need trimming, or their eaves need cleaning. Oddly, despite the similarly lax membership requirements, summertime meetings are also attended mostly, if not exclusively, by men.

Also oddly, we haven't gotten a lot of complaints about discrimination.

My wife—my professional, beautiful, hard-working wife—belongs to a sister organization, but their meetings occur inside the house, remotely, connected by smartphone, and rarely early in the morning. Her meetings include electronically-zipping pictures of newly hung mirrors and new furniture and new decorations, and a lot of pies. This club—again, without formal membership requirements—is overwhelmingly female.

Again, no complaints.

Both of our clubs claim to do "housework," but in starkly different ways. A good example is painting. My wife has painted over a dozen rooms over the years, all in the name of "keeping things updated." One spring I painted our shed and our deck, in the name of "keeping things from rotting."

Let's be clear: my wife does important stuff around the house, too. Still, if I were to die tomorrow (perhaps because I had killed myself cutting down a tree or repairing the spring on our garage door—two examples that are only barely fictitious), all of "my" work around the house would still need to happen. All of it. And here I mean "need to happen" in a literal sense: not how a room "needs" updating, but how you "need" to get out of your driveway to go to work or “need” to get your sump pump replaced. Etcetera.

On the other grease-stained hand, though, I know that if my wife died in a tragic pie-baking or mirror-hanging accident, I could manage without a lot of other “housework.” After all, I somehow managed without it for nearly a decade, before my wife moved into my house. During that time I did all the work outside the home, as well as cooking and cleaning and laundry. I was pretty self-reliant, actually.

Not so with my wife, and with a lot of people reveling in the 21st century, frankly. Before she moved in with me, my wife lived in an apartment, and the housework that I do now just… happened, thanks to other people. Over the years, she has relied on countless appointments with a brigade of service people to keep her homelife humming. We all call experts sometimes, but I’ve come to learn that many “self-reliant people,” both men and women, are actually “self-reliant” with a silent asterisk: they merely make the money necessary to hire people to do the hard or dirty or dangerous work.

While we as a society strive for gender balance in the workplace, we often ignore gender balance in the home. Many women might agree, albeit for other reasons: they’d cleverly respond that, these days, women work full-time both at work and inside the home. And sure, some of them do. But many well-publicized studies that ask men and women to measure their housework rarely take the extra step of separating “work” from, say, “things I do around the house that feel like work but might actually be unnecessary.” Which, frankly, seems to describe a lot of what my wife exhausts herself doing. She and I would even agree on that point.

But why, then, does she continue to exhaust herself with extra cleaning inside the house instead of, say, mowing the lawn? I’m convinced that she perceives a pressure to maintain and stylize and clean—especially clean—our home in ways that I’ll never understand. This pressure, whether perceived or real, probably stems from what she learned as a girl, and probably persists today in a somewhat mutated form. It’s a little heartbreaking, actually, watching a woman you love overexert herself doing so many things that you view as largely optional, especially when you know she sees them as optional, too. It’s also backbreaking: as a result, all the literal heavy-lifting is left for me.

Somehow, distinguishing “work” from “work-like stuff around the house” seems easier—for both of us—when I’m the one doing it. My wife lovingly brings me water, for example, when I’m packing yards of fill and landscaping rock around our foundation to keep water out of our basement. That’s work, of course. Note that she doesn’t bring me water, lovingly or otherwise, when I help my neighbor build his “man-shed,” or when I spend hours amateurishly cursing my bike in the garage, no matter how sweaty I get. But I wouldn’t expect her to, either—those things don’t count as real, necessary “work,” nor should they. In these cases, we’ve both somehow managed to separate the wheat from the chaff.

The chaff used to be harder to separate, especially in the home. Back on the farm, my grandmothers undoubtedly spent hours fussing about how their homes looked, but the differences from today are stark. First, they made a lot of their own decorations—hence the boxes of Hardanger-lace and crocheted doilies when they died—and even if they did buy something, they were usually (painstakingly) cheap about it. More important, though, no one questioned their spending so much time on the appearance of their homes, because that’s where they actually spent their lives. They slept there, ate there, cooked there, and worked there. Everyone was so appreciative of the hours that Grandma spent working in the kitchen, for example, that if she wanted to change something about the kitchen, what did Grandpa care? He spent his days in the yard or the field—out the home, regardless.

Things have changed, at least for a lot of us. Women are no longer the uncontested masters of the kitchen, or the home in general, as my grandmothers were. For one thing, a lot of women today work outside the home, which balances the gender scales considerably. Beyond that, though, a lot of what our grandmothers did around the house has been made almost unrecognizably easier by machines and pre-bought conveniences. As obvious examples, neither my wife nor I bake bread or sew clothes, to say nothing of the frozen pizza we made in the pizza oven last night. Today, fewer people can lay claim to the inside of the house because fewer people slave away inside of the house—home life is just easier, full stop.

I know this because I've been a stay-at-home dad for most of the last decade. I gave up my own career to stay at home with our son, and I know virtually everything that goes on in the home, inside and out, necessary and otherwise. A lot of today's men are in the same boat: we're not as ignorant of "inside-the-housework" as men of previous generations were.

And yet, our culture hasn't kept up. Despite the fact that the scales are more balanced within the home, women still feel pressured to "keep a home" like their mothers and grandmothers did. Maybe some men still apply that pressure. Regardless, many women seem to feel both obligated and emboldened to assert some long-obsolete authority in keeping the home. And sure, maybe that made sense two generations ago, or with stay-at-home women today—maybe authority within the home naturally comes with spending your whole working life there.

These days, though, we often have a mismatch. Despite the fact that I'm the one living in our home 24 hours per day, my wife continues to attempt to keep a home like her mother and grandmother did. But because she works a full-time job outside the home, too, she struggles to keep a home looking like a magazine cover and to clean the kitchen as if it were a surgery ward. And sure, I eat the pie, but I could probably use a little less of that, too. She and I agree that it is borderline pathological for her to undertake all that responsibility, or to assert some sort of lady-of-the-manor authority in doing so. But if you were to ask either of us, we'd probably count all of that struggle as "housework," foolish as it may be.

Like in many battles in the culture wars, the enemy here is inertia. Two generations ago, the division of labor between the sexes was clear. Importantly, acknowledging that fact is not the same as yearning for it—our history's stark division of labor can serve as a starting point for recognizing our current struggles in the home. We're still excavating remnants of the old system where each sex was ignorant and silent about the other's domain.

But that ignorance hasn't lasted, and nor should the silence. Men these days are much more likely to know the goings on of housework, inside and out. They simply have to be: many have lived alone for extended periods, whether in college or in today's often-extended bachelorhood, and therefore have needed to learn to do the housework that men of previous generations had done for them. Thankfully, technology has lessened the learning curve for a lot of that work: even a fool can push a button on a Whirlpool and throw something into the microwave and deploy a Roomba.

Routine outdoor work has changed less. The company that makes the Roomba vacuum cleaner also makes a lawnmower, but I'm not about to send it across my hilly yard that abuts a stream. Also, much less of outside "housework" is optional, or it requires testosterone-laden muscles to do it right. Or both. These pesky details are often ignored when we talk of "housework," whether in the media or in our own families. These days, we seem to talk only about the hours spent "working" on our homes, inside or outside, regardless how hard or on what. To make matters worse, attempts to compare the two kinds of work are often labeled sexist, and the conversation grinds to a (screeching) halt.

As a homeschooling, stay-at-home dad who is married to a successful professional, let me tell you that those days are over. They should be, anyway. In general, our trend away from full-time homemakers demands that we reprioritize housework. Inside the home, washing machines and microwaves, to say nothing of Amazon, have made life easier, to the extent that many men are now capable of "keeping a house" in addition to their traditional duties outside. I belong to a generation of men who can teach their sons in the kitchen as well as in the garage. And that's a good thing, yes?

But progress is asymmetric. Many jobs in the garage or in the yard remain just as physically demanding as they are necessary. Unfortunately—and believe me, it is unfortunate—my petite wife literally couldn't do a lot of the jobs that traditionally fall onto men's shoulders. This is not just for lack of knowledge, which may owe to cultural reasons, but also for lack of flat-out strength. Some household roles just will never be reassigned, it seems. Sadly, my wife will probably never have the rugged pleasure of using our larger-than average snowblower and getting early-morning snow in her beard—albeit for a couple of reasons.

So, we Snowblowers will continue to freeze ourselves during predawn blizzards, all so everyone—both sexes—can get to work. Our club is in no danger of dissolving, though—our membership has remained strong, winter after winter. And male, winter after winter.

And I'd bet that, in discussions of "housework," we'll also remain Anonymous.

A portrait of oppression

Robert Brockway · 29 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Mona Eltahawy seeks to destroy The Patriarchy. Being so oppressed makes her a high profile feminist as we all know that within feminism the person with the most oppression points wins! As we will see, Eltahawy scores big.

This poor woman was born in Egypt, a country where today a third of the population live below the poverty line. Eltahawy herself was born to middle class parents who were engaging in medical research. By all accounts her childhood was safe, secure and she always had enough to eat, such was the extent to which she was downtrodden. When she was seven her family moved to the UK on a grant provided by the Egyptian government so that they could continue their research. Oppression! Starting at 15 she spent a few years in Saudi Arabia. During this time Eltahawy had it far harder than anyone else who happened to be living in Saudi Arabia at the time or at any other time.

Later she studied at the American Univerity of Cairo, graduating with two degrees in Mass Communication. Further proof of her subjugation. After university Eltahawy worked as a journalist in Egypt and Israel. She went on to write for The Washington Post, The Guardian, and other publications in the mainstream media. This poor beaten-down woman.

She eventually moved to the US and gained citizenship some years later. Sheer and unadulterated persecution.

Eltahawy is, by her own admission, a secular radical feminist Muslim woman. As such she is often preyed on by evil patriarchs and oppressive menz. The menz have so much power as a result of The Patriarchy that they are able to stop her travelling, speaking publicly and publishing books.

Today Eltahawy is so oppressed that she travels the world to say 'fuck The Patriarchy' wherever and whenever she pleases. How she is able to deal with this sort of suppression of her freedoms is anyone's guess.

Eltahawy is so sidelined that during her extensive travels she visited Australia where she spoke at the inaugural Broadside feminist conference held in Melbourne. Coinciding with the conference was an episode of Q&A on the main TV channel of the government-owned Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC). The ABC is widely considered to have a significant feminist bias in its reporting but the episode of Q&A took this to a new level. Five feminists including Eltahawy discussed a variety of topics including abolishing the police and physically harming men. It was so bad that even the biased ABC took the unprecedented step of removing the episode from its streaming service and stated that it would not be transmitted again on its TV stations. Eltahawy was not deterred though, pushed for the episode to be made available again, and made it available on her own Youtube channel against the wishes of the copyright holder, the ABC. Narcissism, thy name is Mona.

She has recently published a book with the title Headscarves and Hymens: Why the Middle East Needs a Sexual Revolution. A man made her do it.

But fear not, with her bright red hair, garish glasses and a mouth that would make a drunken sailor blush, she is narcissism writ large.

Poor Eltahawy. Let us pity her. Let us weep. Hers is a life of systemic oppression characterised by international travel, fame and wealth. That we could all be so hard done by.

Feminism is what we say it is

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 30 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Have you ever noticed that the feminists are eager to tell us what feminism is, but not so keen to learn from us what feminism is? Therein lies the crux of a sore difficulty. It is a simple point but a matter of prime importance, so I want to establish this very, very clearly and keep it in view always.

We must ask: by what authority do they hold a monopoly privilege to tell the world what feminism is? How do they get away with this? Is it by the grace of God or some equally royal power? We reckon not. Or does the word "feminist" confer a special mandate the moment you pin it to yourself? Again, we reckon not. Both theories involve magical thinking, which is best avoided.

That leaves just one explanation: that people who stick the word "feminist" to themselves have commandeered their monopoly privilege by exercising it unopposed for many years. They do it and nobody speaks against it, so they keep doing it.

We think this fits the case elegantly, that no other conclusion is possible or necessary. The feminists have gotten away with it for so long because nobody has called their bluff.

That said, what objective consideration bars us from inspecting feminism by our own lights and calling it as we see it? Who is to say that feminism is not indeed that very thing, or pattern of things, that we might clearly discover by using our own eyes and our power of critical judgement?

Most of all, what effectual force bars us from adopting a non-feminist definition of feminism and operating entirely on that basis? I submit that nothing ought to deter us, and I am aware of no feminist who has ever made a compelling case otherwise.

What is feminism really? Since reality (or "the real") enters into the composition of this question, we suppose it must enter likewise into the composition of the answer. Accordingly, our search for an answer ought to probe something real, and what could be more real than the real world of objective facts and deeds?

However, before we go further, let's be generous and entertain (as a thought experiment) some of the abstract notions about feminism which feminists themselves entertain. The canonical definition of feminism, as written in dictionaries, runs more-or-less as follows

Feminism, n: the doctrine advocating social, political, and all other rights of women equal to those of men.

There is a difficulty here. Feminism is defined as a "doctrine" advocating a particular outcome, but if you call it "masculism" instead of "feminism", and make "women" and "men" swap places in the sentence, you will end with a slightly different doctrine advocating the very same outcome. Accordingly, if outcome is what matters, there should be no special reason to favor "feminism" over "masculism" or the reverse — in theory, both roads lead to Rome.

The canonical definition describes a thing which is conceptually unequal right out of the gate. Either "masculism" or "feminism" would load the issue unevenly on one side or the other, so the only linguistically unbiased solution would be "sexual equalism" or something like that.

We have heard the feminist response. A feminist would tell you that the board of power and privilege is tilted specifically against women (not men), that we must set the board level, that the word feminism simply acknowledges this.

However, their response begs the question because it takes feminist doctrine for granted. In non-feminist terms, it is not a fact that the board is tilted against women. It is simply an assertion that one may argue for or against, and it happens that powerful arguments have been made against it.

Indeed, ALL feminist claims and theories are open to question and always will be, and if you assert the contrary, that too may be challenged. A cultural and intellectual “all-stop”, in the traffic of feminist ideas, is in effect.

In summary: to take feminist self-conception on feminism’s own valuation has no value for us except as a thought experiment. We are not feminist, and our approach to understanding feminism should make allowance for this.

A cardinal rule of semantics is that “the word is not the thing”. When we talk about feminism, we refer not to the popular understanding of the word, but to the holistic factuality of the thing itself, ecologically embedded in a web of relations with other things. When we speak of this and the likes of this, we are probing something real in our quest for definition.

To “probe something real”, means to monitor reality where, when and how it really happens, and to extract real conclusions with pragmatic cash value. This keys upon the thing called feminism as opposed to the word called feminism. If there is any meaningful defining to be done, let it begin here.

We therefore discard the canonical definition of feminism because we find it both misleading and useless.

Don’t get me wrong; dictionaries are a useful thing, and all in all, a good thing.

But they are made by corruptible humans, and they can be used for corrupt purposes by other corruptible humans. When this happens, we are bound to speak up. We mustn’t be in awe of “the Dictionary”. It is your friend, but not your God.

So, our non-feminist critique is radical. It suspends, on principle, every claim or theory which feminism puts forward, and does so “on the fly”, the instant such a thing pops up in conversation. We love to remind feminists that “endlessly repeating something doesn’t make it true.”

We also suspend the language in which feminist claims or theories are formulated. In this way, we dismantle the entire feminist thought-world and build again upon the basis of a non-feminist epistemic plan. Our method has affinities with Cartesian doubt.

Finally, we come to a reality-based understanding more in line with non-feminist experience.

For many years feminists have told the world what feminism is, but that order of subject and object is now reversed and the consequences are revolutionary. It is now the world’s turn to tell feminism what feminism is — such is the battle for feminism’s soul. The meaning of “feminism” is up for grabs, and non-feminist men and women everywhere are free to benefit from this.

The feminists needn’t bother whining that we non-feminists “can’t do that”. Have they not realized that what they permit to themselves they license equally to others? They should spare themselves the trouble of whining, because we aren’t listening. Neither are we believing. The point is that it’s too late — the plan is now swung into action. We manifestly ARE doing “that”, which refutes the notion that we “can’t” do it!

When we (as non-feminist men and women) speak of feminism, we speak the truth. Who can refute this? Who can discredit the basis of our non-feminist authority? We have eyes, we have ears, we have rational minds, and we are free to employ these faculties. We trust the facts to speak with precision on their own account, and we trust ourselves to register this with equal precision.

Feminism not only self-defines, it props up and predicates its self-definition with pronouncements about the nature of the world. Guess what? WE ARE THAT WORLD! As such, we reserve the right to answer back with pronouncements about the nature of feminism.

So in the end, feminism is what we say it is. That’s right. If these people have got the nerve to tell us what we are, then we are more than nervy enough to return the compliment. And if they ignore non-feminist input on the question “what is feminism?” they are being solipsistic and deserve so much the more to be told what feminism is.

There are many reasons that we may justifiably relieve the feminists of their self-definition privilege. It’s a rich vein of ore, it runs deep, and it would please me to see many people working that vein. Yes, I want to share the wealth, but I don’t want to do all the work for you — so grab your picks and shovels and head on down there.

#MeToo, Thy Name is Hypocrisy (Part 2)

Stephen Bond · 30 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Part 2: "The Smug, Spoiled, Arrogant Daughter of Feminism"

To expose the hypocrisy of the #MeTwoFaced movement, part one of this article discussed the sexual misbehavior of women. This misbehavior included the little-recognized, often socially accepted, predatory sexual behavior of teachers, mothers, groupies, and gold-diggers who prey on both men and boys. It included discussion of appalling female misconduct in the form of false rape and abuse accusations, paternity fraud (including the theft of men's sperm), and the willing, even eager, female participation in both pornography and prostitution.

Part one also discussed the female contribution to male sexual misbehavior.

But this discussion about #MeTwoFaced wouldn't be complete without the addition of one final observation: #MeTwoFaced itself, and by extension, feminism, are also forms of predatory female behavior:

#MeTwoFaced is the smug, spoiled, arrogant daughter of feminism.

Under the guise of "protecting women", #MeTwoFaced serves as another way for women to continue a long history of false rape and abuse allegations and to spread feminist misandry—the hatred of men.

Three examples make this clear:

The Gender Bigotry of Emily Lindin

Emily Lindin, a self-righteous gender-bigoted columnist for Teen Vogue posted the following #MeTwoFaced-motivated atrocity to her Twitter account in 2017:

> "Here's an unpopular opinion: I'm actually not at all concerned about innocent men losing their jobs over false sexual assault/harassment allegations, Sorry. If some innocent men's reputations have to take a hit in the process of undoing the patriarchy, that is a price I am absolutely willing to pay".

Lindin is no better than the white women described in part one who were culpable for the lynchings of African American men by falsely accusing them of rape. (See article Strange Fruit from part one that shows "the history of lynching in the United States is inextricably interwoven with the history of women lying about sexual assault".[1])

While we no longer literally lynch men, #MeTwoFaced lynches them figuratively: it allows men to be falsely accused, sometimes anonymously, often without a shred of evidence (see story of Mike Tunison below), ignoring due process, and turning "innocent until proven guilty" into "guilty-because-he's-a-man".

Coincidentally, at least one man, CNN's Jake Tapper, had enough courage to take this gender bigot to task by making the same connection to false accusations: "I'm guessing you didn't get a good grade for your 7th grade book report on To Kill A Mockingbird", referring a 1960 book where a black man is falsely accused of raping a white woman.

Did Teen Vogue fire or even discipline Lindin for her horrendous assault on one of the foundations of our legal system, "innocent until proven guilty"? A quick Google search didn't reveal that she suffered any consequences for her bigotry. Why hasn't Teen Vogue fired Lindin, a person who is provably guilty of bias and gender bigotry, railing irrationally against innocent men and spreading feminist hatred of men and boys to yet another generation of girls?

Mike Tunison and the Shitty Media Men List

A horrifying example of #MeTwoFaced's often false accusations is that of Mike Tunison and Shitty Media Men, an online list created in 2017 by another smug, man-hating gender bigot, Moira Donegan. (Is it just me or should that face appear next to the definition of "smug" in the dictionary?[2]) The list collected anonymous, unvetted allegations of sexual misconduct and assault against approximately 70 men who worked in media.

Someone anonymously added Mr. Tunison to the Shitty Media Men list, accusing him of "harassment," "stalking" and "physical intimidation". Prior to this, Mr. Tunison was a successful freelance writer who had worked for the Washington Post, had a book published by HarperCollins, and was the editor of a successful website. After his inclusion in the list, his writing work dried up and many friends deserted him. He became suicidal, as he described in an online post, Hi, I'm on the Shitty Media Men list, but maybe you already knew that:

> "Weeks after it surfaced, I felt desperate enough to tweet — without mentioning the cause — that I was having suicidal thoughts and couldn't afford counseling. A number of friends and associates offered commiseration and emotional support. Yet it wasn't long before loneliness, hopelessness and fear of forever losing the career I'd poured a decade into again overwhelmed me. It was easy to think everyone who has seen the list assumes I'm contemptible and deserve what happened to me. The only remedy I could think of — writing a piece like this one, explaining my side — struck me as certain to invite more outrage and judgment. A year later, I felt hopeless enough to call a suicide hotline."

How in the world can a movement that claims it works for "social justice" (Ha!) allow anonymous, publicly shared, false accusations ruin innocent men like Mike Tunison?

The Washington Post's "Why Can't We Hate Men?" Article

Finally, in June of 2018 one of the nation's leading newspapers, The Washington Post, published another #MeTwoFaced- motivated atrocity, an Opinion piece titled Why Can't We Hate Men?, by a smug women's studies gender bigot (no surprise there!), Suzanna Danuta Walters, who openly and shamelessly broadcasts a Nazi-like hatred for men in a nationally-read newspaper.

Just substitute "Jew" for every instance of "man" or "men".

How does a premier newspaper like the Post, whose slogan is "Democracy Dies in Darkness", print an article that mocks its own slogan and that can only be characterized, by its very title, as "hate speech"?

The short answer is:

"Feminism".

The long answer is:

"Feminist indoctrination".

Or the complete answer is because the Post—and essentially every other media organization throughout the world—which are supposed to serve free societies as a bulwark against oppression and tyranny, have been co-opted by a dishonest, decades-long campaign of feminist political, legal, and cultural indoctrination—with a clear bias against men.

#MeTwoFaced is the smug, spoiled, arrogant daughter of feminism because the child has been pampered by decades of tempting toys and candy and cake and ice cream in the form of feminist lies about "The Patriarchy", "women's oppression", "domestic violence", the "pay gap", etc., ad nauseam, with absolutely no consideration of how men also suffer from their gender role.

Just ask the "patriarchal, male oppressors" of the Titanic who forced those poor innocent, oppressed women into those tiny little lifeboats to drift in the icy cold north Atlantic. Oh, that's right, we can't. These oppressors died in that same icy cold ocean saving women and children.

Feminists, working behind a facade of "equal rights", with the stupid complicity of the Post and the rest of the world's media, governments, businesses, legal systems, law enforcement, and education—in particular through "women's studies" programs at the world's colleges and universities—have been lying to the world for over 50 years.

Women's Studies Programs

Feminists have lied via women's studies programs which operate less as legitimate academic disciplines than as feminist indoctrination centers.

Here's how Christina Hoff Sommers described women's studies programs in her landmark book Who Stole Feminism?:

> "A parent should think very carefully before sending a daughter to one of the more gender-feminized colleges. Any school has the freedom to transform itself into a feminist bastion, but because the effect on the students is so powerful it ought to be honest about its attitude. I would like to see Wellesley College, Mount Holyoke, Smith, Mills, and the University of Minnesota—among the more extreme examples—print the following announcement on the first page of their bulletins:
>
> "We will help your daughter discover the extent to which she has been in complicity with the patriarchy. We will encourage her to reconstruct herself through dialogue with us. She may become enraged and chronically offended. She will very likely reject the religious and moral codes you raised her with. She may well distance herself from family and friends. She may change her appearance, and even her sexual orientation. She may end up hating you (her father) and pitying you (her mother). After she has completed her reeducation with us, you will certainly be out tens of thousands of dollars and very possibly be out one daughter as well."

Those who fully understand the subversive nature of women's studies programs aren't surprised that Suzanna Danuta Walters, author of the Washington Post's repulsive "Why Can't We Hate Men?" article is a director of a women's studies program (at Northeastern University). She amply serves as the personification of the hate that these feminist indoctrination centers generate in colleges and universities throughout the world.

Lies About Domestic Violence

Feminists have lied about domestic violence, as previously discussed in the "Women's Contribution to Domestic Violence" section of part one of this article. Again, just ask Johnny Depp.

Lies About the Wage Gap

Feminists have lied about the alleged wage gap. Even the U.S. federal government says so! In 2009 the government produced a report, An Analysis of the Reasons for the Disparity in Wages Between Men and Women – Final Report [3] which said "… the raw wage gap [between men and women] continues to be used in misleading ways [emphasis added] to advance public policy agendas without fully explaining the reasons behind the gap." Isn't "used in misleading ways" just a polite way of saying "they're lying"?

Lies About "The Patriarchy"

Feminists have lied about an imagined male conspiracy, "The Patriarchy", eerily similar to the "Jewish conspiracy" of Nazi Germany, where men "through male social, political and economic institutions, consciously and deliberately conspire against women via a system of economic discrimination"[4] that (according to Gloria Steinem) "uses violence or the subliminal threat of violence"[5] to enforce its will over women.

In the same way that the Nazi's use of "Jewish conspiracy" aided in perpetuating hate and violence against Europe's Jews, the use of the term "The Patriarchy" aids in perpetuating hate and violence against men. Why else would gender bigots Emily Lindin and Suzanna Danuta Walters both use the term in their prejudiced #MeTwoFaced-inspired screeds? Or why else did the creator of the Shitty Media Men list, Moira Donegan, make five references to the term in an online article written by her?

It's because all three are in the throes of a Patriarchal Pandemic.

As for inciting actual violence against men, why else would Mona Eltahawy, an Egyptian-American feminist who has had nearly two dozen opinion pieces printed in the oh-so-feminist-friendly Washington Post, argue for the use of "justifiable violence" against men to "dismantle the patriarchy" in a hateful 2019 radio interview:

> "I want patriarchy to fear feminism. I want patriarchy to fear women."

If you don't see anything wrong—or just plain evil—about Eltahawy's utterances, just switch the genders:

"Let's use justifiable violence against women to dismantle feminism. I want FEMINISM to fear the men's movement. I want FEMINISTS to fear men."

After all, isn't what's good for the goose also good for the gander?

It's bad enough that feminists have been so successful in spreading their hateful lie about this imagined Patriarchy to the naiveté of so many malleable minds.

What's sadder still is that the purported evil "Patriarchy" is actually the opposite of what a "patriarchal culture" implements. Anyone who cavalierly references "Patriarchy" should read the chapter "The Evolution of Patriarchy" in a book by Herbert Purdy titled Their Angry Creed: The shocking history of feminism, and how it is destroying our way of life:

> Patriarchy is the way things developed through history. In simple terms, men are pre-disposed physiologically to protect, through their greater musculature, their generally superior strength, and their generally greater height, and this automatically confers a leadership role. … It really is just as simple as that, and it has nothing to do with control, or a desire to control. Quite the reverse: men will sacrifice their health, their safety, their enjoyment of family life and their children, yes, even their lives in the pursuit of their inherent, inherited role [emphasis added]. It is all easily explained in terms of psycho-physiological differences between men and women that set limits on the roles and behaviours [English spelling] of each. It is important to clarify the difference between dominance and domination, terms that are used ambiguously these days, mainly by feminist propagandists to justify what they call patriarchy, and to denigrate men and maleness.

Notes:

[1] Even if you don't read the article, you really need to click the link for a horrible, unflinching image with a startling juxtaposition. Also note the article's preamble: "History's interjection to the notion that #MeToo accusers are incapable of lying or being motivated by malice or financial gain." A small glimmer of hope.

[2] To those who might complain that I shouldn't make fun of this poor, brave, innocent woman, my reply is: "She deserves it."

[3] The link to the actual "wages disparity" report, after working for months, began to work only sporadically. The link provided above is to an article about the report; the direct link to the report is here. It could be your lucky day.

[4] Paraphrased from Feminisms: A Reader.

[5] Revolution from Within: A Book of Self-Esteem p. 222.

Trump’s Social Media Executive Order

AVfM Video Source · 30 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Riots? What Riots? Never Let a Good Crisis Go to Waste

David Solway · 2 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Everyone knows that America is now aflame with widespread riots protesting—or in all too many instances, ostensibly protesting—the death of George Floyd in police custody. As Floyd was black, the rioting, looting, vandalism, destruction of property, defacing of historical monuments and multiple homicides are regarded as a reaction to police violence and institutional racism.

As Heather Mac Donald correctly points out in National Review, "There is no epidemic of racist police shootings. It is a racial group's rate of violent crime that determines police shootings, not the race of the officer…In fact, if there is a bias in police shootings after crime rates are taken into account, it is against white civilians." Her argument is supported by a new study published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences and by another 2015 Justice Department study of the Philadelphia Police Department—legitimate studies which "demolish[ ] the Democratic narrative regarding race and police shootings."

Such truths are passed over as inconsequential. Indeed, whites tend to be relatively passive in reacting to violence perpetrated against them. The fact that Mohamed Noor, a Somali police officer, killed a white woman without cause in Minneapolis, Ground Zero of the present turmoil, ignited no riots. As The Intercept reports, some activists believed that Noor "was unfairly targeted because he is a black man who killed a white woman…Nekima Levy Armstrong, a civil rights lawyer and local racial justice leader, said Noor's conviction reveals how the court system treats white people differently compared to everyone else."

The question is obvious: What is wrong with this picture?

The answer is: everything. I do not give the racist meme much credence. With African-Americans convincingly represented in the halls of power, as mayors, governors, members of Congress, including an American President and two Attorneys General, it should be clear that Jim Crow is pretty well dead and buried. Race has become a huckster's source of power and profit. Let it be said once and for all: The United States is not a racist nation, but in fact bends over backwards to appease the bearers of the slander and the advocates of anachronistic reparations.

It needs also to be said that the fires burning across the country are nothing less than a national insurrection, brewing for years and exploited by the hawkers of racist dissension and programmatically by the Democratic Party. What is taking place is an emeute, a war against the Constitution, a plot to unravel the fabric of the Republic, in short, a coup against the State and a sitting President. It is a condition of civil war in everything but name, long simmering and now breaking out into the open.

This is not the time for breast-beating, for systemic timidity, for merely defensive measures, for making amends and concessions. As William Butler Yeats wrote in The Second Coming, one of the great poems in the language:

Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,

The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere

The ceremony of innocence is drowned;

The best lack all conviction, while the worst

Are full of passionate intensity…

Words that were never more pertinent than now. The political and cultural left, the guerilla cadres wreaking havoc on the streets and in the public square, their supporters and backers—they are indeed "full of passionate intensity." Those who would oppose them, arguing for civility, reluctant to return fire with fire, relying on toothless or disregarded legislation, slamming governors for being weak—they may be "the best" but often seem to lack "all conviction."

Newsmax reports, the former House Speaker Newt Gingrich hopes President Donald Trump's designation of Antifa as a terrorist organization will reveal who is funding it. "Who is paying for these people?" Gingrich is right. What we are witnessing is "war against America…These are not riots in a traditional sense…You have a nationwide group, Antifa is part of it, but there are other elements involved…who is organizing it?…we have to do whatever it takes to put down the people who would destroy our country."

These are true words. President Trump has declared Antifa a terrorist organisation, which is a step in the right direction—but only a step. Antifa and their kindred outfits will simply go underground and continue a sporadic campaign of inflaming anti-democratic sentiment, creating civil unrest, pillaging and destroying property and assaulting innocent people. Two decisive measures are required to quell the insurrection.

As Gingrich advised, Trump "should indicate he is prepared to declare an emergency for the destruction." This means, or should mean, not only that government will rebuild devastated neighborhoods, but that the American police, National Guard or military should be permitted to use lethal force when attacked by domestic terrorists of when dispersing hoodlums and gangsters laying waste businesses, smashing storefronts, assaulting bystanders and committing arson. That such an initiative, as many will argue, would only provoke violence, or more violence, is the classic evasion of the temporizers and fearful propitiators among us.

But even more importantly, the Justice Department must be immediately tasked with seeking out and identifying those who sponsor and finance the army of commandos, mercenaries and terrorist groups that have declared war on the nation. The identities of some of these shadowy bankers are already well-known and have been known for many years, yet nothing has been done to investigate or arraign or even extradite these fiscal malefactors.

The head of the snake must be cut off—call it Operation Ophidian—if the civil venom is to be stanched. If, as in the Greek myth of the Lernean Hydra, the head keeps growing back, which it surely will, then perpetual vigilance will be necessary. But the old adage remains apt: follow the money. When the funds are cut off, the reptile loses its main force.

President Trump should take Winston Churchill's observation to heart, made in reference to the 1945 Yalta Conference, "Never let a good crisis go to waste"—a phrase pilfered by Rahm Emmanuel for malign rather than constructive purposes. Churchill intended the remark to indicate the need for a proper post-WW II resolution to disputed territories. Interestingly, the axiom originates with geriatric psychiatrist M.F. Weiner, who titled a 1976 article in the journal Medical Economics "Don't Waste a Crisis — Your Patient's or Your Own."

Weiner meant that a medical crisis can be used to ameliorate mental health or the lives of both patient and physician. Whether in Churchill's or Weiner's use of the phrase, the intention is genuinely therapeutic and the acceptation, positive.

The future course of the American Republic hangs in the balance. This is the real issue.The current state of unrest is an opportunity for the President to embark upon a surgical operation to excise the tumor of revolt, orchestrated violence and, to be explicit, national destruction. He should not let it go to waste.

Abolition of Science by Feminism (Part 1)

Jan Deichmohle · 2 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

*Author's note: This is an excerpt from one of my older books, translated from the German original.

_____

Science, legislation, jurisdiction, government and reporting require strict objectivity, dispassion and basic principles of justice and state, such as the presumption of innocence, freedom of expression, protection of privacy. Let us consider what has become of it.

Feminist pseudoscience, deliberately and consciously based on subjectivity, partiality, influencing and changing the "research subject", has replaced objective science in all subjects that are remotely related to culture or gender. Some even say that all sciences except hard core subjects such as natural sciences are affected, but attempts have been reported even from mathematical faculties to gender them.

Abuse of universities, research centers, the judiciary and power for subjectivity and consciously tendentious struggle are neither derailment nor overzealousness of individuals but planned feminist approaches that have been openly described in feminist literature. These are not "isolated radical" writings by "outsiders", but the central, founding theoretical writings and methods, which continue to have an institutionalized effect down to terms, definitions, approaches and topics. That caused objectivity to collapse in all areas of science, that deal with people. It is the strategy and leitmotif of the whole feminist wave, as well as previous waves.

Let's look at what has become of the basic principles of science, legislation, jurisprudence, government and public service.

> «A fundamental universal position is out of the question for women. Women can define themselves into and out of the law; for there is no compulsion to be consistent, as in – cosmopolitan male universal – science. Aporias only dissolve in the process. (see Smaus 1989).»[1] (Marlis Krüger {ed.}, What does feminist actually mean?, 1993, p. 281, Volume 1 of the Feminist Library) [basic feminist script, no satire, meant completely seriously])

Women's studies, founded by feminism, contradict the criteria of factual science and objectivity. Partisanship and subjective feelings of consternation/(??)/concernment due to ideological attitude set up the domain. The same applies to other propaganda subjects such as gender, queer, black and LGBT studies. Even male studies were also founded with feminist premises and approaches, almost all other subjects were infected. In addition, feminist subjects disguise themselves with many creative names.

> «This paper theorizes that one future pedagogical priority of women's studies is to train students not only to master a body of knowledge but also to serve as symbolic "viruses" that infect, unsettle, and disrupt traditional and entrenched fields. In this essay, we first posit how the metaphor of the virus in part exemplifies an ideal feminist pedagogy, and we then investigate how both women's studies and the spread of actual viruses (e.g., Ebola, HIV) produce similar kinds of emotional responses in others. …
>
> In doing so, we frame two new priorities for women's studies – training male students as viruses and embracing "negative" stereotypes of feminist professors – as important future directions for the potentially liberatory aspects of the field» (Multidisciplin Journal of Gender Studies, Volume 5, Number 1, Hipatia Press)

The entire university, research and state system, as well as the public, were overwhelmed by this anti-scientific method, infected, and transformed into breeding grounds for their feminist ideology virus. Since then, the state, schools, universities and research institutions have been producing the virus of feminist ideology that has been hammered into their heads, instead of objective science.

> «The inclusion of personal concern into the research process is an indispensable element of feminist science. The same holds for the principle of partiality …
>
> Conscious partisanship is thus the social and, as it were, politically turned dimension of concernment. It creates a closeness through similarity with the other woman or with other women …
>
> Autonomy
>
> The basic principles of concernment and partiality result in demands for feminist research itself, namely the demand for autonomy …
>
> Feminist family sociology as partisan science, lived openly, will not fade away on the political level. …
>
> The connection to the women's movement, especially autonomous women's research and practice … is indispensable.» (Brigitte Brück et al., Feminist Sociology, 1997)

Radical, partisan propaganda, which tears apart all connections between the sexes, fights and disenfranchises men, is not a fancy new aberration, but a central principle since its foundation, operating with massive government funding and support.

> «This basic framework was formulated by Maria Mies in 1977 in the "Methodical Postulates for Women's Research"» (Christa Damkowski, Psychology Today, September 1988)

These are (unfortunately) not excesses of individual extremists, but basic principles on which the ideology is based, as well as their campaigns, their approach in all areas of society, especially feminist-minded pseudo-research in all subjects that are distantly related to people.

> «Maria Mies' "Methodical Postulates for Women's Research" (1978) provided the scientific-theoretical foundations.» (Vera Konieczka et al., Feminist Science, p. 11)

Feminist literature makes it clear how important methodological postulates such as those of Maria Mies for feminist "science" and methodology have been and continue to be as the "basis"; for terms, approaches, questions, methods, the whole feminist building is based on such postulates and false feminist presuppositions. This is also confirmed by academic feminist writings from 2010:

> «Christa Müller
>
> Partisanship and concernment: Women's research as a political practice
>
> … Maria Mies, a professor of sociology at the Cologne University of Applied Sciences, now emeritus, formulated methodical postulates for women's research. As Andrea Baier (1996: 142) writes, they are regarded as the undisputed starting point for the German debate on methods and methodology in women's research …
>
> Maria Mies also sees her own involvement in social movements as knowledge generating … Here, the sociologist follows the Maosian epistemological paradigm that the essence of a phenomenon can only be recognized if and by changing it.»(Handbook for Women and Gender Research: Theory, Methods and Empiricism, edited by Ruth Becker, Beate Kortendiek, VS Verlag Springer Fachmedien, 3rd edition 2010)

Such anti-scientific postulates, methods, wrong assumptions and twisted approaches underlie feminist-influenced 'research', no matter what the subject is called, whether women's research, feminist 'science', gender research or gender studies. New names will be added.

> «feminist sciences, which are named either as feminist research, women's research or, since the 1990s, gender studies. Their emergence and development cannot be separated from the political movements at their respective times. Especially the so-called new women's movement (Lenz 2009) acted as an initial spark for feminist sciences in the 1970s and later as a pacemaker. The same applies to queer-feminist sciences.» (Handbook Qualitative Research in Psychology, edited by Günter Mey, Katja Mruck, 28.9.2010)

So it doesn't help to want to partially distance yourself from the wrong prerequisites and methods decades later, but to leave the scheme of lies based on it.[2]

Entire generations have been infected with such ideological science, "sensitized" in their gibberish.

> «If women make their own subjective concern as the starting point and guideline for their research, then they are first sensitized »(Contributions to feminist theory and practice, 11, 1984, p. 11)

Such subjectivity can prove everything and the opposite of everything, especially if the following postulates are observed:

> «Methodological postulates
>
> 1. The postulate of value-freedom, neutrality and indifference towards research objects – the most important yardstick for objectivity so far – is being replaced by conscious partiality»(contributions to feminist theory and practice, 11, 1984, p. 12)

Today, activist pseudo-research of that type has spread to many areas.

Partly because of partiality, partly from unconscious, innate, cavalry-like skewness, my books from the 1990s, from which these quotes and evidence are taken, were ignored by the media and the public, as was my literary account of the problem and female selection power since the 1980s.

> «3. The contemplative, uninvolved 'audience research' is replaced by active participation in emancipatory > actions and the integration of research into these actions» (contributions to feminist theory and practice, 11, 1984, p. 13)

In medicine, even double-blind studies are used or prescribed, in which even the doctor does not know, whether he is administering a placebo or a medication, so that imagination (subjectivity) can have no effect on the course of the patient, the study and the resulting statistics. Because even if only the doctor knows what is in his hand, an unconscious transmission is possible, which leads to false statements about the effectiveness of a drug. The combative interference described was a widespread feminist model that explains their claims as well as the weird 'statistics' used to back up such campaigns and claims. The theoretical statements are in no way follies of a few extremists. Instead, they are basic motives and an accurate description of how feminism originated and which methods it's based upon. The entire humanities have been infected by it. Note, the word 'qualitative research' is used as a euphemism, which means completely zero-quality subjective feminist insinuations:

> «Social Research Methods
> Alan Bryman (p. 403)
> Feminism and qualitative research
>
> A further dimension that could have been included in in the section on 'Some contrasts between quantitative and qualitative research' is that, in the view of some writers, qualitative research is associated with a feminist sensitivity, and that, by implication, quantitative research is viewed by many feminists as incompatible with feminism. This issue was briefly signposted in Chapter 2. …
>
> The notion that there is an affinity between feminism and qualitative research has at least two main components to it: a view that quantitative research is inherently incompatible with feminism, and a view that qualitative research provides greater opportunity for a feminist sensitivity to come to fore. Quantitative research is frequently viewed as incompatible with feminism for the following reasons.
>
> - According to Mies (1993), quantitative research suppresses the voices of women either by ignoring them or by submerging them in a torrent of facts and statistics.

[Remark: What a cruelty to let go of facts on feminists, who perceive their preferred gender as a victim in a subjective navel gaze!]

> - The criteria of valid knowledge associated with quantitative research are ones that turn women, when they are focus of research, into objects. This means that women are again subjected to exploitation, in that knowledge of an experience is extracted from them with nothing in return, even when the research is conducted by women (Mies 1993).

[Note: Because of feminist empathy disorder, men are never seen as victims, although they are at least as much, or more, affected by such practices. Apart from that, there is no science when objectivity is replaced by subjective feminist partiality. Even if feminist women do the research, that's not feminist enough for them. Here anti-science and subjective humbug are raised to the norm.]

> - The emphasis on controlling variables further exacerbates this last problem, and indeed the very idea of control is viewed as masculine approach.

[Note: Controlling the variables is a prerequisite for being scientific. Otherwise there could be many other causes for appearances than the assumed one. Refraining from controlling the variables means charlatanism, propaganda humbug or esoteric spinning.]

> - The use of predetermined categories in quantitative research results in an emphasis on what is already known as consequently in 'the silencing of women's own voices' (Maynard 1998:18).

[Note: Not only is the absurdity of feminist principles unbeatable, but they also build on the opposite of the facts. Indeed, there is an empathy gap for men, as evidenced by modern evolutionary biology, because women are inherently preferred in our perception, which was and is one of the real causes of feminism. Male losers have always been silenced, but not women. Feminism has silenced the voices of men for generations with systematic oppression, as I document in censorship chapters of all of my nonfiction books. In contrast, early feminist voices have been published and preserved by men since the Middle Ages. Conversely, feminists try to systematically prevent uncomfortable books in advance, or to withdraw them from circulation, if they cannot be prevented. Today it has even become common to throw them out of libraries as 'politically incorrect'. Others have been boycotted or stolen from shops.

Now to the categories: If it's not clearly stated beforehand, what is being investigated, it is not research, but agitation, which invents itself categories, that best match its propaganda. If you don't even know what you're investigating, you can state anything. Arbitrariness and caprice are invited, when subjective minds subsequently invent or create categories.]

> - The criteria of valid knowledge associated with quantitative research also mean that women are to be researched in a value-neutral way, when in fact the goals of feminist research should be to conduct research specifically for women.

[Note: This is a commitment to unscientific as a method. It is also extreme sexism according to the feminist definition of this term. Even if we reject the term because there are natural, demonstrable differences between the sexes, feminists contradict themselves. The fact, that they explicitly call for research for women only (the privileged sex), already exposes feminism. Furthermore, their rejection of sex-neutral research reveals their unscientific partisanship.]

> - It is sometimes suggested, that the quest for universal laws is inconsistent with feminism's emphasis on the situated nature of social reality, which is seen as embedded in the various social identities (based on gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation, class, and so on), that are unique to individuals (Miner-Rubino et al. 2007).» (Alan Bryman, Social Research Methods, Oxford University Press, 5. Ausgabe)

[The latter related to the quirk to deny universal laws, to think of everything as individually and socially constructed, just as new genders are constantly being invented.]

Feminists demonstrate that they are not only unable or unwilling to use scientific methodology, but deliberately pervert it to its radical opposite. Therefore, feminists are a danger to science, scientific methodology, objectivity and fact-based knowledge. Since they have infected a large part of the population with their collective hysteria, and in particular have seduced entire generations of women, feminism has been experimentally proven and made clear what great dangers feminist emancipation brings: The entire system of science is getting perverted into irrational ideology. It's suicidal for a civilization to go this way.

> «Skeggs (2001: 429-30) argues, that the political goals of feminist research led to a preference for qualitative research to 'focus on women's experience and to listen and explore the shared meanings between women with an aim to reformulate traditional research agendas'.» (Alan Bryman, ibid)

[Female sensations and the collective prejudice of feminist circles replaced scientific approaches. In fact, it is male losers (80 percent of men tend to be made losers by unrestricted sexual selection), whose experience is consistently disregarded by evolutionary mechanisms, and is additionally suppressed by feminism.]

For decades, feminists have been fiddling with statistics they have faked. As early as the 1970s, Esther Vilar found that her opponent in the television debate, Alice Schwarzer, consistently used incorrect numbers of twisted statistics. It would be beyond the scope of this book to go into depth on this special topic.

> «To produce the pattern of systemic discrimination against men (even as a by-product) and to represent its underlying premise (…), ideological feminists have had to invent or refine several specifically legal strategies. One type of strategy involves defining or redefining a problem so that it has ideological significance and political power… But some of them originated in the emotional confusion of heterosexual relations at a time of rapid change. To establish these legal changes as legitimate solutions to bona fide problems, feminists have exploited ambiguity in their definitions.
> Even when quantitative information is available, though, it can be manipulated. Some feminists have used aggregated statistics, for instance, which have skewed the results to support their claims. Others have fabricated statistics. Even academic feminists have indulged in statistics abuse by publishing false statistics in professional journals, often specialized ones that are accountable only to feminist editorial boards.
> Having defined or redefined problems ideologically, these feminists have had to get them onto the agendas of justices and legislators. This goal has always involved the mobilization of resentment.» (Paul Nathanson, Katherine Young, Legalizing Misandry: From Public Shame to Systemic Discrimination Against Men)

Once put into the world, the false claims remain and stick in our mind, even after being refuted.

> «But, as I have discovered over the years, among false statistics the hardest of all to slay are those promoted by feminist professors.»[3] (Christina Hoff Sommers, Persistent Myths in Feminist Scholarship)

Anger and hysteria were then fuelled with false claims and extremely skewed vision; a model of the rage emerged.

«False Statistics by Feminist Groups Lead to Hysteria, Misandry»[4]

Often only women are examined; in this way it is systematically suppressed that men are mostly affected in the same way or more, which gives a fundamentally wrong picture.

If feminists are no longer able to remove the truth from their statistics, they remove the statistics. It should no longer be published, which contradicts their ideology:

> «This goes beyond data being merely unavailable – statistics previously published are removed from the record! The Statistical Abstract of the United States, for example, used to publish a breakdown by sex of perpetrators of child abuse. Once men's rights advocates publicised this, however, a government bureaucrat decided the world didn't need to know that most perpetrators of child abuse are female. So 1992 was the last year they were published. (Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1992, Table No. 301).» (Peter Zohrab, Sex, Lies & Feminism)

To falsify reality, feminists do not shy away from any hand-trick. Since the life expectancy of women is now on average several years longer than that of men, they (once again) move away from their principle of gender equality, and arbitrarily, at their own discretion, set a longer female life expectancy as a "target", to extract the real difference from their data. It is no longer a question of comparing actual ages at the time of death, but ages with a gender-specific "target life" of their choice, which happens to be lower for men.

> «First the UN Feminists did a statistical conjuring trick: They set an artificial maximum life-expectancy for women that was five years greater than men's, and an equally artificial minimum life-expectancy for women that was likewise five years greater than men's, then proceeded to "adjust" their raw data and make their calculations and rankings on that basis.» (Peter Zohrab, Sex, Lies & Feminism)

This article will be continued in Part 2.

Notes:

[1] Evidence and basic arguments come from my manuscript “Les Deux Sexes – The Two Sexes” from the 1990s; at that time it was impossible to get such a project published.

[2] Volume 5 “The Oppression of Men” uses sources of so-called men’s research, which formed against much feminist resistance in the slipstream of feminism and received little support, to show that even this faculty is firmly based on feminist principles. Thus, its approach does not get out of the closed feminist world view.

[3] http://www.catholiceducation.org/en/controversy/feminism/persistent-myths-in-feminist-scholarship.html

[4] http://patch.com/california/petaluma/false-statistics-by-women-s-groups-lead-to-hysteria-misandry

New study finds non-feminist majority despise 'toxic masculinity'

Elizabeth Hobson · 2 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A Google search on 'toxic masculinity 2020' brings up 6,710,000 results – the first three are:

1. 'We need to redefine manhood. Our warped ideas are causing a mental health crisis',
2. 'Men are less likely to wear masks – another sign that toxic masculinity kills' (1 & 2 are both from The Guardian) and;
3. 'TOXIC MASCULINITY IS UNSAFE… FOR MEN'…

A new pilot study ('Reactions to contemporary narratives about masculinity: a pilot study' Barry et al) shows that a majority of men and women agree with the last statement on toxic masculinity — but not because, as the author of that piece writes, "The belief that "real men" must be strong, tough and independent may be a detriment to their social needs later in life" — but because they find the term itself to be insulting and potentially harmful.

The study asked participants about their attitudes to toxic masculinity, traditional masculinity and positive masculinity concepts – and how they imagined these concepts could impact on individuals and wider society. The study also asked participants whether they're feminists, whether women should have equal opportunities to men and whether they believe that Patriarchy prevents women from having equal rights to men.

It was found that the higher people's self-rating as feminist was, and especially the more they agreed that Patriarchy prevents women from having equal rights to men – the less insulting both men and women found the characterisation of 'toxic masculinity'.

As the study explains though, higher self-esteem is correlated with lower suicidality – and a favourable attitude to masculinity is correlated with higher self-esteem in men. So maybe the branding of men and boys with 'toxic masculinity' really is a killer; because it attacks the favourable-attitude-to-masculinity-barrier against suicidality. 88% of men are concerned about boys hearing and/or reading about 'toxic masculinity' for fear that it will have a harmful effect and the demonisation of masculinity that we see within the psychological field (for example the American Psychological Association Guidelines for Psychological Practice with Boys and Men, 2018) could dissuade men and boys from seeking help – or exacerbate their problems if they manage to access help.

Sex differences are fundamental features of humanity – but the complex interplay between biological and cultural drivers is obscure and it's right to be mindful of how social pressures to conform to sexpectations may negatively impact on some individuals. Masculine archetypes that involve 'providing and protecting' tend to breed less societal empathy than traditional feminine archetypes, and I think there's room for improvement there.

"However", as Barry et al point out, "rather than challenging this view of men by moving to a more equal position of greater empathy, contemporary socially constructed Western narratives of gender, reflected both in social policy and the media, are in danger of amplifying these archetypal differences even further," and "notions of male power, patriarchy and even toxic masculinity, may be leading to a "double-whammy" of lower self-esteem in men coupled with decreased compassion for them."

Abolition of Science by Feminism (Part 2)

Jan Deichmohle · 3 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Continued from Part 1.

When it came to campaigns against men, an accusation by feminists could be based on "own observation" in their environment, in which strongly feminist wise indoctrinated people testified in their favor. This was later refined at universities, but the irrelevance of their approach, their wrongly formulated question, and restriction of the study to women and feminist views, remained.

> «While the "Fact-" and "Insider-" reports are dramatized, the "halved statistics" method is presented 'scientifically' cool.» (Esther Vilar, dtv anthology, p. 209)

The methodological principles of feminist "research" guarantee the greatest possible subjectivity already when collecting data.

> «Methodological principles …
>
> Data collection and data analysis
>
> In order to capture the inherent logic of biographical construction processes as appropriately as possible from the perspective of the designers, and to minimize the problem of the reification of scientific interests at this point, collection methods are preferred in biography research that largely leave the structuring of data production to the interviewed subjects.» (Bettina Dausien, in: Handbook for Women and Gender Studies: Theory, Methods, Empiricism, edited by Ruth Becker, Beate Kortendiek, 3rd ed. 2010, VS Verlag Springer Fachmedien)

Only trust statistics that you falsified yourself! The feminist methodology guarantees twisted terminology, crooked and one-sided approaches and questions, data falsified already by the choice of topic and again by the "research objects" involved.

The methodological writings cited here may not be approved by everyone. But even those feminists, who find such methods wrong, use perspectives, terms, methodology, questions, the results of surveys, campaigns, laws, etc., which were achieved with such one-sided means.

The grotesque thing is that such unscientific research was carried out at the expense of the state and taxpayers, and ideologues were also promoted in huge numbers into science, government and the judiciary. Nobody came up with the idea of classifying a tendency towards ideology and unscientific subjectivity as disqualifying. State and society reacted as wrongly as possible. The war against men was mostly paid for by men.

> «4. Participation in struggles and actions and the integration of research into these struggles also means, that changing the status quo is seen as the starting point for scientific knowledge. The motto for this approach could be: "To get to know a thing, you have to change it." "If you want to get to know the taste of a pear, you have to change it, i.e. chew it in your mouth." (Mao Tse-Tung 1968, p. 353)» (contributions to feminist theory and practice, 11, 1984, p. 14)

A very telling approach. This is similar to determining the number of live wild animals by slaughtering and filleting them. Their own effects mix uncontrollably with the agitation object. Thus, science is made absurd. Maoism has long since disappeared, but much more radical overthrow of human nature through feminism has shaped us to this day, prescribing behaviour, basic principles of thought and life, and is still in the process of expanding its massive encroachment on human nature and destroying the remains of millennia-old culture.

Cultural revolution considers itself and is paid as science. Demagogy and propaganda seized power in the scientific apparatus; knowledge has become ideological, with the aim of manipulating the object under investigation, if possible inciting it, and selling its integration into radical agitation as 'knowledge'. They do not explore reality, but their own manipulation. These replies remained unpublished for two decades and were strictly ignored in the media, while feminist "science" spat out state-sponsored ideology every day, massively indoctrinated, and massively preferred ideologists made careers that buried objectivity – this contrast sheds an illuminating light on the situation.

> «5. From the foregoing it follows, that the choice of the research subject … will depend on the general goals and the strategic and tactical requirements of the social movement» (contributions to feminist theory and practice, 11, 1984, p. 14)

Ideology and war against men are already part of approach and premises. Their one-sided choice of topics is already agitation; the formulation of the research subject distorts reality by hiding all factors that contradict their assumptions, all aspects showing that men, for example, could be the most affected, victims or suppressed, and all questions that run counter to their propaganda. They also take things out of coherences and context. They cannot see what they hate, as structures creating bonds between the sexes, such as cultural complement and its significance for human life, for the development of empathy and responsibility between the sexes. With their ideological questions, they infected all of science, politics, justice, the media, art and society, transformed them into a dysfunctional distorted image of themselves, ridiculed the basic values of civilization and themselves.

> «6. The research process becomes a process of becoming conscious, both for the previous research 'subjects' and for the previous research 'objects' … The decisive thing about this method is that the concrete research is done … not only by scientific experts, but also by the Participants themselves.» (contributions to feminist theory and practice, 11, 1984, p. 15)

What is leading the way in the state, the media and at universities today stems from trend science that is based on false assumptions and twisted premises. None of this should ever have been taken seriously.

> «Christa Müller
>
> Partisanship and dismay: women's research as a political practice …
>
> 7. Places of development of a feminist social theory are not the research institutes, but the actions and struggles of the movement as well as the theoretical discussion about their goals and strategies. (see Mies 1978) »(Handbook for Women and Gender Studies: Theory, Methods and Empiricism, edited by Ruth Becker, Beate Kortendiek, VS Verlag Springer Fachmedien, 3rd edition 2010)

So far, there has never been such an extreme perversion of research into ideological struggle.[1]

Subjective invention and female-feminist feeling were and are systematic methods, according to basic feminist writings, which describe their postulates, methodology and theory.

> «Methodological principles
>
> … in the feminist understanding of research as a search process, in which gender research designs and "invents" its subject in a reciprocal relationship between theory and empiricism (cf. Becker-Schmidt 1987: 14) or in other varieties of constructivist social research (eg Knorr-Cetina) 1989, Sutter 1997).» (Bettina Dausien, in: Handbook for Women and Gender Studies: Theory, Methods, Empiricism, edited by Ruth Becker, Beate Kortendiek, 3rd ed. 2010, VS Verlag Springer Fachmedien)

They deliberately invent topics, whereas real issues and real problems, such as male burdens and male losers, are systematically indignantly prevented and thus suppressed. Problems were also deliberately created systematically:

> «But that corresponds exactly to the principle of combining action and research. 1. A problem must be created. ("To recognize a thing, you have to change it").» (Contributions to feminist theory and practice: women's research or feminist research? 11, Social Science Research and Practice for Women, 1983, page 17)

Feminist female subjectivity, moods, hysteria, and not only non-factual methods, but strategically falsifying and anti-factual methods have, like a virus or cancer, eroded the once objective science and destroyed its basic values. The same applies to politics, legislation, law, education, training, the media, reporting, entertainment, the public and the whole of society.

The feminist principles presented here formed the basis for the emergence of a feminist perspective, its questions, selection of topics, procedure, and perspective. Since they were anchored like a virus everywhere in the scientific world, they are continuously reproduced and continue to have effect, possibly with increasing strength, even if these principles should no longer be shared by future feminists or scientists. They are institutionalized, and therefore invisible, work in terms and ways of thinking that produced feminist waves.

Already the terms, questions and underlying perspectives are wrong, but are often no longer perceived, because they have become a habit, that is taken for granted by those affected by them. Therefore, they're not questioned, even less overcome. What didn't exist before, was an irrational and false conspiracy theory ("patriarchal system" or "patriarchal science"), is now demonstrable fact in the form of a radical feminist social system and feminist pseudoscience, that pervades all human-related subjects.

The consequences spread throughout society.

> «Tricks in the discussion
>
> – Make excessive demands: ask for something that you don't really want …
>
> – Bring opinions as facts. ("After all, it's a fact that you can't trust car dealers.")
>
> – Shake your head dismissively, pull a face as if what is being said are extremely ridiculous.» (De Groot, Ter Veld, 1985, Courage to Strategy, p. 83, Verlag Frauenoffensive)

Brainwashing instead of learning from kindergarten to university degree, research with an ideological approach, where already the question that was so biased, that feminist prejudices could only be confirmed. UNscientific subjective methodology, state and statutory enforced feminist ideology, tendential funding, approving research projects when they have feminist bias. A climate, in which "politically incorrect" opinion, topic or method of work threatens to destroy professional future or existence of the researchers, teachers or professors involved, so that hardly anyone dared to examine important issues and questions without feminist ideology.

Objective research collapsed in humanities. The basic principles of science and the rule of law have been twisted like by no ideology before. Instead of scientific facts, the scientific enterprise produces ideological viruses: feminist tendency. The immune system has collapsed, also affected by the feminist virus. The state promotes precisely those forces into the terminally ill system, that have created the destructive virus and continue to install it, who have disqualified themselves through subjective, emotional partisanship based on rampant hysterical ideology. The same results from an analysis of politics, where subjectivist and balance-destroying principles have been anchored in a similar way. Exactly those forces are promoted by the state, that operate this work of destruction.

> «If scientific knowledge … can be interpreted against the grain, then science in the interest of women must endeavor to make the knowledge "monopolized" accessible to women» (Renate Schwab and 9 others, Between autonomy and appropriation: women's research and feminist science …, 1990, p. 57)

Explosive knowledge of female activists fighting men is hidden from men. Such ideological secret 'science' could be rightly called as a "feminist conspiracy" that actually exists, whereas "structural patriarchy" is a wrong conspiration theory of feminists. By contrast, classical science had value neutrality as basic principle, which feminist theory expressly rejected. Feminists spoke of "value-free", "objective"[2] and "consistent … universal male science"[3] and created the opposite.

> «Susanne Dermutz
>
> Science in the interest of women …

> 4. It is necessary to develop various strategies so that science … does not turn out to be a boomerang … to make the knowledge "monopolized" accessible to women and to translate the research results into practical action with women. This requires the implementation and recognition of other forms of publication and exploitation of scientific knowledge and, last but not least, the intensive cooperation of feminists and between different institutions» (Renate Schwab and others, Between autonomy and appropriation: women's research and feminist science…, 1990, p. 129)

Secret commands that work mentally underground, strictly excluding men and the public, using their results with their networks in practical actions fighting ‚heterosexual white male' – at the expense of the state and many male taxpayers![4]

Due to the secrecy of feminist 'research', this book can only document the visible tip of an iceberg. The 'results' kept secret could be worse. In my book "Culture and Sex" I described the results of a hacker named "Agent Orange", who infiltrated a radical feminist secret group, that debated (in strict exclusion of men) the possibilities of androcide, i.e. exterminating men.

> «Confidentiality in Gender Studies
>
> Hadmut Danisch, October 1, 2015 …
>
> I have often written about the absurd secrecy of gender studies. In the United States, they sometimes have to guard the teaching materials during breaks and are only allowed to carry them around outside in brown paper bags so that men cannot see them … And now a reader refers me to this video of a student from LA who is surprised about it that as a first duty the brazen vow of silence is imposed on her:»[5]

While their activities, teachings and 'results', on which campaigns are based, are hidden from the public, especially from men, so that no one knows what really is going on, critique of feminism has been suppressed for decades, so it could not reach the public in time.

> «This censorship is measurable and verifiable. The specific mechanism by which it happens is the tendency for women as a group to suppress any opinion that isn't biased towards women, in contrast with the equally measurable and verifiable tendency for men not to support another man unless they specifically agree with the man's opinion.
>
> GirlWritesWhat explains at 20:35 in her video entitled "How feminism conned society, and other not-so-tall tales"
>
> A 2004 study of gender differences in automatic in-group biases found that men lack a mechanism that bolsters automatic own-group preference. Only women showed this bias in all four experiments, and in 3 of them all subjects, male and female, showed a strong bias towards women. … "which is horrifying to me because it means women in power will act strongly in the interests of women, whereas men in power exhibit no own-group preference at all but will act more often than not in the interests of women as > well.”»[6]

The study shows that male participants either preferred women or showed no preference, while women massively preferred other women. The phenomenon has been observed many times.

In addition, experiments have shown that men feel good when they are free to express their opinions, but women tend to feel uncomfortable when views are expressed that they do not approve of, especially when it’s done by men. (see above) Internet forums and feminism massively confirm the above study.

In addition, there is an effective inhibition in men of using their strength against women. In contrast, there is no such inhibition in women of directing their strength against men.

Feminine and childlike traits, characteristics and their high voices, usually calm angry men. Conversely, male characteristics as deep voices rather excite angry women further.

According to new developments in evolutionary biology, men lose their reputation (in the male hierarchy), when they compete with or turn against women, as well as when they do not behave in a cavalier manner. Therefore, men instinctively avoid such behavior. This does not apply to women when dealing with men.

> «All this brings the MRM to a devastating impasse. Newspapers and magazines know women will have deep objections to any article that doesn’t blatantly favor women, many women going so far as calling efforts to address the increasingly poor educational success of boys or efforts to address the cruel imbalance against men in family court as “woman hating”. Media outlets know as a result that women will effectively boycott any newspaper or magazine which prints articles championing men’s rights, particularly if that article is written by a man. No sensible media company executive would print the truth under these circumstances, especially given that women control most of any household’s spending on the products that businesses pay the newspaper money to advertise.
>
> Since as a consequence men generally can’t be paid for writing on men’s rights the way women are paid for writing about feminism, this censorship also has a incalculably huge impact on any discussion that impacts public policy.»[7] (Ethical, 21.11.2012)

While men naturally prefer women or are impartial in debates, such as when making decisions, but never discriminate against women, according to the above studies (among others), women have a clear and systematic preference for women, whereas unfortunately no impartial attitude could be found. This goes so far, that not only unilateral, partisan decisions are made, but massive censorship and oppression of those who think differently, even the manipulation of entire societies and generations, starting from early childhood.

A strong, also mental, bite inhibition in men prevents them from criticizing women, feminism, the women’s movement, opposing their determination, no matter how much their own vital interests are violated. Even at the moment of own danger and threat from feminist ideology, this reflexive mental biting inhibition works reliably, as several feminist waves have shown, most blatantly the current one.

The reverse is true for women. A collective aggressiveness and tendency to be bossy, even if all the facts speak against it, which are simply hidden, is impressively demonstrated by all feminist waves as a collective pattern that can easily be triggered by emotional and irrational spurring. Apparently, there is a drive that can be activated by mass psychology in women when they turn against men, which is the exact opposite of male bite inhibition.

If there are no cultural structures that give people orientation, there is always the risk that such mass psychological aberrations due to subjective misperception (see books “Oppression” and “Abrechnung”) can be triggered again at any time, destroying the foundations of civilization, science and culture.

These facts should have been known before feminist waves hit us. May future, less indoctrinated generations be able to draw logical conclusions from the facts, which are currently too “politically incorrect”, and would therefore be detrimental.

How a balance was and is possible under these circumstances, why it's impossible in a feminist society, can only be understood through abstract logic, that is neutral in value. Contemporaries who approach the topic emotionally or with personal concern will fail, as will anyone who does not break away from feminist terms, topics and views.

In addition to deliberately suppressing objective scientific methodology through manipulative feminist ideology methods, and facts through propaganda, the feminist struggle against truth and science took on a very banal meaning:

> «Feminist PhD Candidate: Science Is Sexist Because It's Not Subjective
>
> Women and minorities cannot understand logic or objective truths, says a graduate student in her dissertation, so science classes should stop using the scientific method.»[8]

Objective methods are more demanding and tedious. Those who want to erase all statistical differences misuse state power to massively promote the incapable. Quality and excellence they find disturbing.

> «The other function: strategic thinking, correcting actions that do not correspond to ideology» (Courage to strategy, 1986, Verlag Frauenoffensive, p. 203)

The goal is the deepest indoctrination of entire generations that has ever existed:

> «Influencing is the key word when carrying out an action» (Courage to strategy, 1986, Verlag Frauenoffensive, p. 106)

Soothing by giving in does not work against strategic manipulation by radical ideology; on the contrary, it means massive funding.

For decades, masses of feminist trash was produced, funded by tax-payers, propagated in media, while critical analysis was completely ignored. Most of the time, the books didn't even get publish. Now they're hidden and unknown.

Notes:

[1] The fears of critics of earlier feminist waves have been far exceeded. If they were still alive, they would have to be overcome by horror of not having resisted more resolutely.

[2] «Methodological postulates
1. The postulate of value-freedom, neutrality and indifference towards research objects – the most important yardstick for objectivity so far – is being replaced by conscious partiality»(contributions to feminist theory and practice, 11, 1984, p. 12)

[3] «There is no compulsion to be consistent like in – cosmopolitan male universal – science … (cf. Smaus 1989).» (Marlis Krüger {ed.}, What does feminist actually mean here?, 1993, p. 281)

[4] Already in the 1990s I described it in "Les Deux Sexes / The Two Sexes", which was unfortunately not published. For decades, it has not been possible to make the public aware of the facts about how we are being lied to and deceived by feminism. In the meantime, this ideology has raised heavily indoctrinated generations, who no longer know natural conditions and culture, who can hardly fully recognize the full extent of the problem. We have no idea how much better the world would look today without such one-sidedness.

[5] http://www.danisch.de/blog/2015/10/01/geheimhaltung-in-gender-studies/
I don't use the encrypted .PDF mentioned in the cited article as an argument; in that case there may be other explanations (e.g. legal ones). This does not reduce the real problem of feminists excluding men and acting in secrecy from men.

[6] www.the-spearhead.com/2012/11/21/feminist-censorship/, derzeit: http://lunaticoutpost.com/showthread.php?tid=246857

[7] www.the-spearhead.com/2012/11/21/feminist-censorship/, https://lunaticoutpost.com/showthread.php?tid=246857

[8] http://thefederalist.com/2016/09/29/feminist-phd-candidate-science-sexist-not-subjective/

Journalist Gloats over Jordan Peterson’s Troubles – The Fiamengo File

AVfM Video Source · 3 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Heads I Win, Tails You Lose

Mark Dent · 4 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Men may not know it or believe it, but they are playing in a rigged game.

That doesn't mean individual men cannot be successful in a business venture, the entertainment industry, sport or simply being a good dad and contented employee. Many men are wealthy, comfortable and content.

A man may only ever become aware of the rigged nature of this game when the shit metaphorically hits the fan.

Fortunately, for some of us, that day never comes.

But it is has and will for countless numbers of men.

What exactly am I referring to?

I have been aware of the cognitive dissonance of feminists and our society when to comes to gender related issues for some time.

But the recent riots in America brought this concept into sharp focus for me and before long I felt overwhelmed by the sheer raw truth of this concept.

As thugs and ANTIFA gang members burned and looted cities across the United States many media outlets and celebrities were explaining why so many of these looters were in fact themselves victims of a society which oppressed and devalued them. This is why they steal clothing, jewelry, flat screen televisions and Play Stations.

It's a cry for help.

It's defiant stand against injustice.

It's a pushback against centuries of abuse.

It is a breaking of the shackles of slavery which still weigh down every black American, be it Lebron James tweeting encouragement to the looters and arsonists from his multi- million-dollar mansion or billionaire Oprah Winfrey expressing her grief online.

Barack Obama and his wife Michele, and a large number of rich, powerful people from both sides of the political aisle have used their public platforms to denounce the death of George Floyd (as they should) and to point to that horrendous murder as just the tip of a very racist iceberg. They speak of oppression and systemic bigotry. They openly support the arson, looting and bashing.

Was young Tony Timpa a victim of racial violence? Tony was a white man who called the police in the hope that they could help him.

Timpa's death in the parking lot of an adult video store came after he called 911, saying he was off his medication for schizophrenia and depression and needed help.

He was handcuffed and placed on the ground. He was physically restrained and could be heard saying: "You're gonna kill me!"

He did indeed die.

Could I not take this incident and claim it is another example of the violent and abusive manner in which men are restrained by the police?

Would I be justified in pointing to statistics which show how men are far more likely than women to be gunned down by police or suffer bodily harm due to excessive force?

Most people would laugh or suggest I was a fool.

Men are mistreated and abused more than women!

Ridiculous! There's a reason for this unpleasant fact. Men are more violent, aggressive and likely to break the law than women and they place themselves in dangerous situations.

Now try to respond with the same argument to some of the world's most rich and powerful people who say oppression and racism is the only reason black men are dying at the hands of the police.

You would face an immediate and frightening back lash.

Racist. Bigot. Victim blamer! Shame on you! In today's volatile climate you might even be physically assaulted or worse.

Do you see that something quite astonishing happens when George Floyd becomes a man, rather than a black man or African American?

One label makes him a heroic victim who will forever stand as a symbol of American minorities' fight for equality under the law and in the eyes of every citizen.

The other makes him a statistic and nothing more. A bit like Tony Timpa or Daniel Harris (a deaf unarmed white man gunned down by police). Their deaths don't fit a narrative or create rage.

These celebrities and media outlets like CNN and MSNBC have done everything in their power to present the rampaging street thugs as victims of an unjust, oppressive system who are responding in an appropriate manner.

Their iron clad proof for this systemic oppression is provided in the form of statistics which indisputably show us that blacks are disproportionately represented in America's prison system and blacks receive harsher penalties for their crimes.

Interesting.

This is a subject of endless debate and outrage in our communities here in Australia. The issue is not on the same scale in Australia but the sentiments and anger are the same.

Black men disproportionately fill our prisons.

Okay.

Men are disproportionately residing in prison systems the world over. 93% of prisoners in America are men. There is a far more disproportionate representation between men and women's incarceration than the gap which exists between black and white men.

The sentencing gap (time spent in prison for similar crimes) is also far bigger when comparing men to women than it is between blacks and whites in America.

There are studies that indicate that men aren't necessarily more criminal by design but there indeed is an institutional bias against them. For example, men are regularly given much longer sentences and "female arrestees are also significantly likelier to avoid charges and convictions entirely, and twice as likely to avoid incarceration if convicted."

This gender gap is about six times as large as the racial disparity that Prof. Starr found in another recent paper. (Linked in earlier paragraph)

How is such a startling statistic almost unknown by all but a handful of academicians? Why do these raw numbers not shock us to our core and have us demanding answers which explain this incredible imprisonment and sentencing gap?

People scream in outrage about the injustice of sentencing disparities between black and white prisoners even though it is only 10% compared to 63% between men and women.

What if I were to corner a feminist and ask her a couple of questions?

Does the fact that being a man means you are twice as likely to serve time in prison than a woman who committed the same crime disturb you?

Does the fact that men are given 63% longer prison terms than women who commit the same crime disturb you?

Does this not clearly indicate that men are the victims of systemic prejudice and oppression under our judicial system?

I think I know how she would respond.

"Well, men commit all the crime and murder, so they deserve to be in prison!"

Get it?

It is truly shocking when you come to understand that even after people are made aware of this grossly disproportionate gender sentencing gap it elicits no shock, anger or outrage.

When any minority adopted as a virtue signaling symbol is disproportionately jailed, this is compelling evidence of their oppression and abuse.

If you dared to suggest that perhaps the minority disproportionately commit more crime you would be instantly branded a racist and a bigot and a supporter of white supremacy.

A rigged game my friends.

The very same evidence used to prove the systemic oppression of one group (minorities) is used to prove the criminality and toxic nature of the second group (men).

All that has changed is the identity of the victim, yet the narrative swings 180 degrees the moment the disproportionately incarcerated victims become men.

Let's look at another oft repeated talking point in society when the subject of racism or bigotry is discussed.

A slam dunk argument in support of the premise that LGBTQ people are oppressed and considered disposable in our society is to cite suicide rates.

It seems clear that in order for men to be recognized as suffering injustice or oppression they must be coloured or in a minority group (tribe).

Please read this linked article on the rise of female suicide in Australia.

Here is the opening paragraph:

> The number of Australians who took their own lives surpassed 3,000 last year for the first time, new figures from the Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) have revealed.
>
> In 2015, there were 3,027 people who died by suicide — 2,292 were men and 735 were women

The article's headline is focused on an increase in female suicides and features a photograph of a despondent woman yet it concedes men are killing themselves at over three times the rate of women!

It continued:

> In 2015, 56 girls between the ages of 15 and 19 ended their lives, up from 38 in 2014.
>
> "The numbers are not large but certainly the fact that it is a 45 per cent increase in a one-year period certainly needs good investigation," Ms. Murray said.
>
> "I think we need to be looking very carefully at the type of suicide prevention programs we're delivering."

Even when men are openly acknowledged as the overwhelmingly most negatively impacted by a societal scourge, it garners no cries for change or calls for investigations.

The suicide of gay and trans people is always raised as proof of societies loathing for these minority groups. Why else would a person kill themselves other than the fact they carry a feeling of utter hopelessness and worthlessness?

Board member of the Trans United Fund Brynn Tannehill and author of the linked article wrote:

> If we want to end the scourge of suicide, it's time we stop trying to fix transgender people.
>
> It's time to fix society.

When was the last time anyone outside of our bubble demanded the same for men?

When was the last time anyone questioned a society in which approximately 2200 men kill themselves annually or demanded this society "fix itself" in order to address this terrible problem? (Australian statistics)

Men, we are told, are their own worst enemies when it comes to early deaths or suicide. Their toxic masculinity has taught them to lock up their feelings and not seek help when they are depressed.

It's our fault for dying at such high rates.

In fact, one study has openly stated that older white men kill themselves at the highest rate because they are privileged!

Colorado State University's Silvia Sara Canetto says:

> White older men, however, may be less psychologically equipped to deal with the normal challenges of aging, likely because of their privilege up until late adulthood, Canetto asserts.

Minorites suicide rates- proof of marginalized status in society.

Men's suicide rates-they need to break out of their toxic masculinity bonds and talk more about their feelings!

No matter how badly affected men are by any calamity, disease or legal injustice they can ever achieve victim status.

Any attempt to bring the injustices perpetrated upon men as a demographic into the public arena for discussion and review is met with rage, mockery, denigration and censorship.

The bitter irony of the endless stories of men being victims of their own toxic natures and lacking in self-awareness or an ability to express their pain or cry out for help, is the fact that when men do exactly what these "experts" demand, they are mocked, taunted, denigrated and abused.

Clementine Ford is a leading feminist in our country who proudly proclaims she bathes in male tears and enjoys it. We have countless examples of feminists calling men seeking justice for their gender snowflakes and whiny sooks.

When I gathered with a few hundred other people to hear some speakers address men's issues in the city of Melbourne, we had to have a cordon of police to protect us from a mob of raging feminists and ANTIFA types who called us Nazi Pigs, white supremacists and women haters throughout the speeches. Our own Robert Brockway was one of those speakers.

There was not a word of hate spoken during our rally, yet the sight of men gathering (with their female friends and family members) to talk about male problems was infuriatingly offensive to the feminist mob.

Our peaceful gathering was framed as a meeting of woman hating Neanderthals who are definitely far right and probably white supremacists too. They said the police had to separate the two opposing groups inferring our quiet, friendly group were just as eager to come to grips with the foul mouthed, angry mob who bashed drums and made noise in order to drown out our speakers.

This happens every time men attempt to gather and focus on issues impacting their lives.

When men attempted to gather and hear a speech from Warren Farrell about male suicide, we saw some of the most vitriolic, vindictive and rage fueled abuse it is possible to witness. Feminists literally spat in the faces of the young men as they tried to enter the auditorium. They were called fucking cunts and rape apologists. They were physically prevented from entering the building.

Why won't men express their vulnerability and emotions? What a sick joke.

What disingenuous and seriously damaged people there are in this world. Feminism seems to be a refuge for most of them.

No group of men have ever prevented women from attending a speech by another woman on an issue pertaining to women's health or for any other reason in any western society. Never.

I challenge someone to prove me wrong.

Yet this horrific mob behaviour received minimal coverage and no expression of outrage anywhere, including the very university on whose grounds this occurred.

Men can never be victims.

Just try to imagine what would have happened had a large group of men spat in the faces of women attempting to attend a talk on female victims of domestic violence. Imagine if these men placed their faces up close to the women's faces and told them they were "fucking cunts" and prevented them from entering the building.

It makes me sick to my stomach to this very day.

Men cannot complain, cry or ask for help, for if they do, they will be shamed. This is an established fact. Even now, after ten years of advocacy for men on this site, it is women who are the only ones to have a voice for men in the broader public sphere and be assured they will at least have a chance to be heard.

Yet Clementine Ford talks of male power and the patriarchal oppression of women. Men silenced. Men shackled? Hilarious.

Men run the world.

Men are entitled, privileged pigs.

Boys are not stupid. They understand how this game works.

Men can never be victims.

When a man pays a woman for sex, we say he is exploiting her. This must be the only transaction where the person receiving the money is portrayed as the victim.

Why do men pay for sex? "Society says they can and the law says they can," says Mia. "You must ask yourself, what are they buying? It's power. It's a very powerful thing to have control of somebody's body in that way. It's a power fix and they know it."

Who is exploiting who? It's a business transaction. An exchange. Yet only one side of this story is overwhelmingly presented in the movie world or MSM-women are the victims.

When an adult woman molests and rapes a boy, men say "Half your luck!" with a wink and a nod. Women insist that this kind of rape is not to be compared with the criminal action of a man who has sex with an underaged girl.

The media refers to a woman's abuse of a boy as an infatuation, or love affair. Sometimes the adult woman is portrayed as the true victim.

When society condemns men to the role of breadwinner and a life in the (at times) grinding, soul destroying, back breaking, life- risking world of paid labor, feminists call this privilege

When baby boys have their genitals mutilated in the name of a religion or simply to please the mother who prefers the aesthetic appeal of a circumcised penis- any suggestion that this is a gross injustice or that the little boy is a victim of a cruel , unnecessary violation is met with laughter or a dismissive roll of the eye.

“it cannot be compared to FGM!”

“It is for hygienic reasons.”

“He won’t remember this moment of pain.”

The final comment, a most common defense of this butchery, is perhaps the most offensive and moronic. As I mentioned in the comment section of the wonderful article linked above, if that is the standard set for assessing the level of criminality in an action, Bill Cosby should be released from prison immediately.

Is there a starker measure of the lengths our society will go to in order to ensure no male can be viewed as a victim?

Little boys and babies have died during botched circumcisions or suffered terrible infections and damage to their penises. Yet people continue to scoff at those who oppose circumcision with the scorn usually reserved for flat earthers or those who claim to have been kidnapped by aliens.

When two people fall into bed in a drunken stupor and fumble about before finally consummating their lust fueled grope, the man is often called a rapist the following morning if the woman feels uncomfortable about what happened or worried about what others may think.

No heavily intoxicated man could ever claim he was used and abused by a woman who took advantage of his vulnerable state. Does this happen? It certainly does. Has any woman ever been charged with sexual assault or rape of a drunken man?

No.

Men can never be victims.

In the world of politics, a man, can never be a victim. He may be ruthlessly chewed up and spat out by his own party. He may be stabbed in the back, belittled, humiliated, have his personal life ripped open and exposed to the public but he will never be regarded as a victim.

He can have his personal features mocked and caricatured. He can have his nose, ears, hair, penis size, height, eyebrows or weight scrutinized, evaluated and made a target of derision.

This is not sexist.

It is not misandric.

It is not unjust.

It is simply politics.

Women in politics are perpetual victims. If their physical appearance is referenced -even in a positive, affirming manner-they are a victim of sexism and woman hating misogyny.

Trump and countless other male politicians have had their physical appearance ruthlessly analyzed and critiqued by the mainstream media. Trump makes no comment nor does any other man who has his physical features denigrated. No man in politics would dare to complain. It would end his career.

Snowflake.

Diddums-did someone say a mean word about your fat tummy? This sook is supposed to be our commander in chief?

Men must suck it up.

Governor Gretchen Whitmer was outraged by some comments from anonymous online trolls regarding her "curves" which she denounced as sexist before adding:

> "I'm tough. I can take it." It then became a crusade for all women and girls.
>
> In my speech I was encouraging people to see the humanity in one another in this cruel political environment. In an era when so many women are stepping up to lead, I'm hoping people will focus on our ideas and accomplishments instead of our appearance.
>
> Her message to other women and girls who have to deal with similar "garbage" was simple: "I've got your back."

Such courage. An inspirational leader. She crusades for all women and girls! Someone complimented her curves.

Let's get an ex -boyfriend of Gretchen's onto Jimmy Kimmell's show and have him discuss the size and sagginess of her breasts in front of a hysterical audience and see if she can maintain a dignified silence and resist the urge to question the morality or vulgarity of the people who set out to utterly humiliate her.

No need for her to worry, for it will never happen. That disgusting treatment is reserved for male politicians.

If a female politician's policies or decisions are criticized -this is poisonous sexism at work.

If she is caught lying and questioned about it-she is being held to a higher standard than men and that is clearly sexist.

If she is involved in a scandal and this is exposed, she is a victim of sexism and held to a different standard.

Women are always the victim.

Men can never be a victim.

When a very wealthy self- made man marries an attractive woman and she decides to leave him not long after the confetti has been swept from the church-the splitting of all his hard earned assets and cash is seen as nothing less than he deserved and worthy of a "YOU GO GIRL!" from the hundreds of thousands of women who read about it over their morning latte.

He got what he deserved (even when it's not apparent that he has done anything heinous or injudicious) because he is a man of means. Suck him dry girl.

Men can never be victims.

When, on the very rare occasion a rich self-made woman marries a man who later files for divorce and the courts in a very rare moment, apply the law equally, society is outraged. How dare that bastard take one cent of her money! What did that creep do to deserve any of the money she earned by the sweat of her brow? What a scumbag!

When it comes to domestic violence, men can rarely claim the role of victim. On the rare occasion when a man has succeeded in proving his partner beat him, abused him emotionally or destroyed his property, the consequences for the perpetrator are never commensurate with the punishment meted out to males.

Governments and organizations whose entire existence is supposedly dedicated to supporting victims of family violence coldly and very deliberately eliminate men from the story. We are repeatedly reminded by our governments and domestic violence organizations that their goal is to stop violence against women and their children.

It is unfathomable.

We see it everywhere we care to look. Billboards, picture theatre screens. train stations, subways, highways, television screens, (please watch this ad-this is what we have to endure in Victoria, Australia) newspapers and online.

Males as victims of domestic violence do not exist. Oh, MRA"s occasionally make some noise and there may be the rare concession that a handful of men do experience some level of violence in the home before quickly reiterating that women are the overwhelming majority of victims and the greatest threat to women and children in our society is the men who supposedly love them! Lies of course, but thrust down our throats nevertheless.

Men can never be victims.

For some indefinable reason, women ogling naked or even semi naked men is not objectification of the male body, Posters of men with rippling abs , big bulges in the crotch area and firm, tight glutes are not in any way demeaning males or setting impossibly high standards for your average man, causing him to spiral into depression, self-hatred and obsession with his body image.

Men admiring the naked or semi naked female is disgusting objectification. It is dehumanizing and leads to rape and abuse.

Magazines and posters which depict women with flawless skin, pert breasts and perfectly sculptured bodies are sexist and set impossibly high standards for women to achieve which leads to self-harm, depression and eating disorders.

Men can never be victims.

Violence perpetrated by a woman or women on a man is hilarious.

Countless advertisements, films and TV shows still regularly feature the obligatory man or teenage boy copping a kick in his testicles, a hard slap on his face, a punch in his gut, a dish or other heavy object hurled at him or smashed over his head. The perpetrator is almost exclusively a female which only adds to the hilarity.

When a man has his penis hacked off by an angry girlfriend or bitter wife, it is considered funny. Newsreaders will relay the story with the hint of a smirk and a little nod to the viewers,

"Ahem, men out there, let that be a warning-keep the wife happy! Now to Joanne with tonight's weather!"

No matter how vicious, unprovoked, life threatening or soul destroying the savage attack on a man by his wife or girlfriend may be-the chuckle or fist pump from women is almost guaranteed an appearance.

We have all seen films or tv series where men are tortured, torn apart, blown up, decapitated, drowned, stabbed and shot in numbers too high to count. In the same movie a woman may be punched or raped. The reviewer pouts and frowns before suggesting that the rather gratuitous violence against the woman was disconcerting and rather offensive.

This is not a joke.

It is something I have seen routinely over the years. Game of Thrones is a good recent example.

Men can never be victims.

We have all been educated about nature's sexism. Whenever a natural disaster occurs, we are invariably informed that women have been most affected by it.

Women are most affected by climate change.
Women are most affected by earthquakes
Women are most affected by tsunamis.
Women are most affected by the corona virus
Women are most affected by any natural disaster
Women are most affected by poverty.
Women are most affected by war
Women simply suffer more than men.

Here's the proof:

> Which is the weaker sex when it comes to pain? It may be hard to say since women and men have different experiences with pain.
>
> New research has found that women report more pain throughout their lifetime. Compared to men, women feel pain in more areas of their body and for longer durations.

Sigh.

Imagine if a study found that men suffered more than women based upon the fact that they report (complain) feeling pain more often!

The headline would be something along these lines.

Study finds men whine and moan more than women when they feel pain.

Or

Study shows women are able to endure their pain and demonstrate a greater capacity to suffer in silence.

The study found that men have a higher tolerance for pain and tend to be less emotional about their physical suffering.

> In another set of experiments, volunteers were asked to put their arms in an ice water bath. Men were found to have higher pain thresholds (the point where they began to feel pain), as well as higher pain tolerances (the point where the pain became too much).
>
> "Social and psychological factors cannot be ignored," Keogh said. "We have found that women will focus on the emotional response to stress."
>
> In contrast, men typically think only of the sensation itself, which may explain their higher thresholds and tolerances.

No articles triumphantly proclaiming men are far more tolerant of their pain and suffering!

One can only wonder about news stories and headlines if the study had found women were able to tolerate more pain than men.

No-it is framed as women suffer more. That fits the endless narrative very nicely thank you very much!

It's a rigged game.

When more women die as a result of a natural disaster, it is evidence that they are most badly affected.

When more men are killed by a disease or war, women are still more negatively impacted.

Didn't Hillary alert us to the fact that women are the primary victims of war many years ago? They lose their husbands, fathers and sons.

We read endless tales of the sex trafficking of women in Africa, Asia and the Middle East yet men and boys are kidnapped in their tens of thousands and are forced to fight in armies.

To understand just how disgusting our media coverage of this human rights issue is, read this Wikipedia link on "child soldiers". The word boy or boys is not used once! It is child and children from the beginning to the end. This is a common practice and just another method used to allay any idea that males suffer oppression and injustice on a massive scale. Here's a sample of their gender bigotry.

> Children in the military are children (defined by the Convention on the Rights of the Child as people under the age of 18) who are associated with military organisations, such as state armed forces and non-state armed groups.[1] Throughout history and in many cultures, children have been involved in military campaigns.[2] For example, thousands of children participated on all sides of the First World War and the Second World War.[3][4][5][6] Children may be trained and used for combat, assigned to support roles such as porters or messengers, or used for tactical advantage as human shields or for political advantage in propaganda.[1][7]

In the linked article regarding sex trafficking, they make it abundantly clear that the majority of victims are women and girls. Yet a substantial minority are in fact boys.

> According to a new report from the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), the vast majority of all human trafficking victims – some 71 per cent – are women and girls and one third are children.

I could focus on workplace deaths and homelessness-two areas which overwhelmingly harm men but are most often presented in gender neutral terminology or with regard to homelessness, still focus on the needs of women at the expense of the majority-men.

Those who sleep "rough" on the streets are mostly men but this category is often confused with those who don't live in their home.

Where are people staying?

- Improvised dwellings, tents or sleeping out 7% (8,200)
- Supported accommodation for the homeless 18% (21,235)
- Staying temporarily with other households 15% (17,725)
- Boarding houses 15% (17,503)
- Other temporary lodging 1% (678)
- "Severely" overcrowded dwellings 44% (51,088)

Males comprise three quarters of people considered by the ABS to be experiencing homelessness in boarding/rooming houses on Census night and just over two-thirds of people sleeping rough or in improvised dwellings.

Yet this issue is never considered to be a gendered one. Issues never are when men are the most affected.

Workplace deaths are almost exclusively the deaths of men. Yet even on the official Safe work Australia cite-the page on deaths does not mention the gender of those who have been killed at any point in its presentation!

Not one word about who is dying in their place of work every week.

They are Australian workers.

They are people.

They are bystanders.

Here's a little sample:

> Year-to-date 2020: Preliminary worker deaths by industry of workplace
>
> As at 21 May, there have been 76 Australian workers killed at work in 2020.
>
> In 2019, 174 Australian workers were fatally injured while working, compared with 144 workers in 2018.

This website has a side panel with additional statistics. Oh-Surely, I will find a gender breakdown of the dead workers there.

Here are the categories:

- Fatality statistics – by age group
- Fatality statistics – by industry
- Fatality statistics – by occupation
- Fatality statistics – by state/territory

Can you believe it?

It really strains the imagination when you try to fathom why a government website would not present a breakdown on the gender of who is dying.

It's almost as though they are trying to conceal the fact that it is men dying at work. What other logical possible explanations could there be?

The very same government is meticulous and at times deceitful in the way they make gender the central focus of their reporting on domestic violence

There are no "people" or "family members" dying or being injured.

They are women.

Females.

Girls.

We must do something about it-NOW!

Men and boys die and suffer too, yet they are invisible.

This has been a long ride. I occasionally feel as if my eyes have been opened or I have been red pilled for the first time when I read the paper or watch the news.

There are many areas of male disadvantage I have not touched on. They may be a focus for another day.

I know that some MRA's hate the notion of victimhood or the idea of claiming it for men. The word has been stained by the twisted and narcissistic desire of so many people to claim victimhood status without a valid reason.

They crave the spotlight, attention, sympathy and the delicious comfort of never being responsible or accountable because they are a victim.

This sick modern-day phenomenon should not alter the fact that the word victim is still a valid one and it is a word that should be used in relation to those whose lives have been torn apart through no fault of their own.

But sadly, I will remind you one more time-men as a collective, can never be victims.

Domestic Abuse is a Men's Issue, Too (National Conference on Men's Issues)

Mike Buchanan · 6 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

[Note added 6 June: Regrettably we have had to change the timetable, as the video received from Professor Nicola Graham-Kevan had a technical problem. She is going to film another and we'll publish it as soon as it's available.]

The first National Conference on Men's Issues, Domestic Abuse is a Men's Issue Too, will be held as a virtual conference on Sunday, 7 June, with videos being published on our YouTube channel from 10:00 onwards. Two of the speakers are male survivors of domestic abuse at the hands of female partners. Details, including the timetable on the final page, here.

The videos will be published on our YouTube channel.

The conference timetable:

10:00 Mike Buchanan – Introduction

10:15 Ian McNicholl – "Domestic Abuse and Sexual Abuse Are Not Gendered Issues: A Male Survivor's Perspective"

11:15 Virtual tea, coffee, biscuits

11:30 Andrew Pain – "Domestic Abuse and Parental Alienation: A Very Common Partnership"

12:00 Deborah Powney – "Controversy, Idea Laundering & Woozles: How the Gendered Paradigm Hides Male Victims of Domestic Abuse”

13:15 Virtual lunch (self-service, limitless options)

14:00 David Eggins and Denise Knowles – “Perpetrator Programmes – How Children, Families and Society Can be Better Served – not the Current Game: ‘Find the Lady!’ ”

15:00 William Collins – “Families Need Fathers – Both Parents Matter Cymru survey of male victims of domestic abuse”

16:00 Virtual tea, coffee, biscuits

16:15 Elizabeth Hobson – “The Links Between Domestic Abuse and Other Men’s Issues”

18:00 Virtual dinner and drinks at a nearby virtual Michelin 3 star restaurant, courtesy of J4MB

An imbalance in the scales of justice

Doug Mortimer · 6 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I admit to being prejudiced against political science majors. In fact, I cringe at the very phrase "poli sci"). I used to think of political science majors as parasites in training. If I had a son in college who wanted to major in political science, I would consider striking him from my will. Of course, if he majored in gender studies, I would disown him.

Admittedly, I never took a course in political science, but I've always had the impression that a political science professor was just a glorified political junkie. There are, of course, many other types of junkies (sports fans – you know who you are!), who rattle on endlessly about their obsessions and can't understand people who don't share their enthusiasm.

I always thought the "science" part of political science (why not Political Studies?) was to make it sound more respectable. Throw in enough data – no shortage of polls, local, statewide, national; primaries, runoffs, special elections, general elections – so the political science professor (let's shorten that to polisciprof) has ample opportunity to showcase his lucubrations. Pre-election: what's going to happen? Post-election: what happened? What about two years hence? Four years hence? Blather, rinse, repeat.

One such polisciprof is Calvin Jillson of Southern Methodist University (better known as SMU…don't want that Methodist thing to creep out too many secular applicants) in Dallas. Until recently I'd never heard of Professor Jillson, though he appears to be something of a local media celeb in that blather-rinse-repeat cycle. He actually has a 15-page resume posted online. His bona fides are all in order.

Nevertheless, while perusing an article about a speech he made to a local Rotary Club, I came across an interesting quotation. He opined, rightly, that it was easy to get information on all the major candidates. But what about the down-ballot candidates? When you get to local judges, do you really know anything about them? Not much, unless you are employed in the legal profession and deal with them regularly. So how to vote when it comes to judges? Well, Jillson's policy is "If you have no criteria on which to make a decision, because you don't know either one, vote for the woman. Help even things out."

Smooth move, prof; guaranteed to get applause and chuckles of delight from the audience. I'm sure the boys in the Rotary Club at least pretended to be amused, especially if women were present.

One little problem, prof: you don't know what you're talking about.

Dr. Jillson made his speech in Dallas County. Fact is if you get called for jury duty in one of the 30 courtrooms in Dallas County, your chances of landing in the courtroom of a female judge are better than even.

Let's start with the civil courts. There are 13 such courts in Dallas County. According to the Dallas County web site, female judges preside over 8 of those courts (in fact, half the women are black, for those of you who care about such things).

Now let's go to the criminal courts. There are 17 in Dallas County. Here the testosterone levels may be high among the defendants, but not on the bench. Only 4 of the judges are male. Again, for those of you keeping score, of the 13 females, 8 are black! One of the female judges is Asian, a real outlier, as Asian female is probably the least likely demographic to appear as a defendant in a criminal court.

As you can see, if you really want to "help even things out," when in doubt, vote for the judicial candidate with a penis. Neither Jillson, nor any other polisciprof would ever exhort voters to do that, of course. Not if he wants to get invited back to the chat shows and lecture circuit.

Interesting to note that Jillson does not reside in Dallas County. According to his resume, he resides in Collin County, just north of Dallas County. This rapidly growing county has absorbed a lot of white flight from Dallas County, and is more affluent, so it must be more conservative, right? Perhaps Jillson was referring to Collin County when he invited voters "to even things out." Well, it seems he neglected to do his homework for Collin County also.

Collin County has 13 courts. The breakdown of judges is 4 men, 9 women (sorry, all you identity politicians out there, but there are no pictures on the web site, so I can't add anything as to the ethnicity of the judges, male or female).

Well, I'm not going to belabor the point. And I'm certainly not going to check all 254 counties in Texas. But advising voters to vote female to "even things out" in judicial races (or any other race) is simply asinine, no matter how long your resume. Then again, I'm no expert. As I said at the outset, I've never taken a political science class.

Polisciprof Jillson is an expert. Lots of local nabobs sing his praises. Expert status comes with lots of perks, but to me the ultimate perk is: No matter how often you're wrong (naturally, he didn't foresee the election of Trump), you're still an expert.

Nice work if you can find it.

The old girls book club

Doug Mortimer · 8 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

If you have ever had a mortgage, you know what equity means. You own your house in conjunction with your mortgage company. The relative amount of skin in the game is each party's equity. It's not difficult to understand. If you put down 20% on your house and the mortgage company foots the rest of the price, then they have 80% equity in your home. Go ahead and call yourself a homeowner but you're not. You're more like a minority stockholder.

Somehow the concept of equity has been perverted in recent years. According to wokenik social theory, if half the population is female, then half the cushy jobs should go to females. This is not equity, it is a quota system. I still remember a half-century or so ago when the concept of affirmative action was broached and its proponents insisted they were not demanding quotas. Heaven forfend!

Well, now it's come to that. But it's no longer a bad thing. Now it's a good thing. Funny how that works out, isn't it? Is it possible to turn the tables, however? Could men get away with demanding quotas in certain industries in the interest of equity?

A good place to start is an industry that is so oriented towards the female sex it has all but shut out the opposite sex. I'm talking about publishing companies that specialize in romance novels. That particular branch of the publishing industry is more female-friendly than a convention hall filled to the rafters with Xena: Warrior Princess fangirls.

According to the folks at Harlequin Publishing, 99% of the readers of romance novels are women, and most of them are long past nubility. Perhaps readers isn't the most apt word for these women. Women who buy romance novels don't just read them, they devour them! To this day I still recall a visit I made decades ago to a shopping mall bookstore where I witnessed a middle-aged woman carefully carrying a towering stack of paperback romances and gingerly placing them on the counter – without spilling one! She was literally buying them by the yard.

If you ever visit used paperback stores, you know most the stock fits into several predictable categories. If you check out the space devoted to romance novels, I daresay you will find more square footage than for science fiction, mysteries, westerns, or any other popular paperback genre. Most romance novels are traditional, but there are also various sub-genres. Just as pornography caters to an array of fetishes, so do romance novels…interracial, lesbian, cowboys, nurses, time travel – even Amish!

Now I don't object to the fact that 99% of the readership is female. Equity in terms of readership would serve no purpose for the manosphere. Besides, outside of school, you can't command people to read books they don't want to read.

But I do think men should demand equity in the writing of such novels. There's a lot of money to be made on this stuff. In 2017, romance/erotica made $1.44 billion. The second best-selling genre was crime/mystery at roughly half as much, $728.2 million. So a male scribbler who mastered the formula of the romance genre could greatly enhance his income.

Another statistic says that 90% of the writers of romance novels are women. It may be a surprise that even 10% of the writers are men, but you could never tell that by looking at the names of the authors. One must look long and hard to find a romance bearing the name of a male author.

To be sure, pen names are used for a variety of reasons. Some more high-toned female authors may use a pen name because they wouldn't want their colleagues in academia to know that they dabble in such a low-status genre (though there are critics who assert that the only reason romance novels are lacking in prestige is because the genre is dominated by females). So it's understandable that men who write romance novels would use some sort of female pseudonym. They don't want their buddies to know what they're doing, but more importantly, a prospective female reader might look askance at a paperback romance penned by a man. How could a male author create a believable heroine?

Well, we could mention Leo Tolstoy (Anna Karenina), Gustave Flaubert (Madame Bovary), or Henry James (Daisy Miller) for a few, but those are examples of bona fide high-falutin' literature read by both males and females. Mass-market genre fiction, is another realm entirely. So let's ponder whether or not a male author can write to the romance market.

Except in cases of extreme narcissism, it takes two to tango in a romance novel. Lesbian romances aside, the heroine must have some sort of man to pair off with. The female authors have no trouble creating swains for their heroines. Are any of these male characters believable? How could a female author possibly create an authentic male character?

Remember, none of the female authors has the lived experience of maleness. Personally, I hate that phrase "lived experience," since it is redundant, unless you're talking about vicarious experience. Also, I don't like it because it is almost always employed by someone complaining of having been marginalized. Human marginalia are inevitable in any society, but you can't come right out and say that. Nevertheless, I'm going to wield the concept of lived experience, even though my use of the phrase reeks of patriarchy. I confess to being an old white male or, if you prefer, a dead white male in training.

To most men, the hero of a romance novel is laughable. He is almost always the answer to a woman's prayers. If he is not rich (though living in a mansion doesn't hurt), he has great expectations. If he is not drop-dead handsome, he is rugged and spends his time "doing manly things." But they're the good kind of manly things. He would never do chainsaw sculptures and sell them at flea markets.

He may have a drink now and then, some sort of expensive imported spirits, but he will never drink himself into a babbling stupor. And he might enjoy an occasional sports event on the tube but he would never watch football nonstop all weekend, every weekend from September through December – and he certainly wouldn't waste his time on a fantasy football league.

He will likely have an impressive set of wheels. No, not a muscle car, but some sort of understated/overpriced import. His dashboard will not be graced by a quivering topless hula dancer. No fuzzy dice or air fresheners hanging from his rearview mirror. And unlike his coarser brethren he would never think of keeping a Big Gulp cup in his car for an emergency piss bucket.

The male romance hero might seem to have it all…except for one thing. He lacks a good woman (conveniently enough, the heroine) to complete him – his better half, as married folk were wont to say.

If he has some sort of deep, dark secret, so much the better. I don't mean that he is a serial rapist in remission or he suffers from chronic projectile diarrhea or seborrhea of the genitalia. It has to be some romantic deep, dark secret. Something that he shares with no one…but our heroine, who can help him bear his burden.

One example you might remember from high school English is Charlotte Bronte's Jane Eyre. Granted, we're talking 1847, almost a century before the rise of the paperback, but it is an instructive example.

Jane Eyre's employer, Mr. Rochester, is a brooder. He has a good reason to brood, however. He is already married to a nutter, albeit tucked away, who turns out to be a suicidal pyromaniac!

Brooding and moodiness are good traits for the male lead in a romance novel. Charlotte's sister Emily created an equally famous male brooder – remember Heathcliff in Wuthering Heights? In fact, going all the way back to Hamlet, why do you think Ophelia found the moody Dane so attractive? Of course, she went nuts in the process, but overdosing (five acts!) on brooding and moodiness will do that to a girl.

In a different medium, consider the case of James Dean. He became a legend even though he only starred in three movies (Rebel Without a Cause, East of Eden, and Giant). But the moody S.O.B. brooded in every one of them! Marlon Brando and Paul Newman deserve honorable mention in any cinematic brood-off, but they lived long enough to exhibit other forms of behavior. I think Dean was fated to be the cinematic equivalent of a Byronic hero, so-called because the famed poet, George Gordon (Lord) Byron, a leading figure in the Romantic movement, was given to moody brooding. Why do I say Dean was destined? His middle name was Byron!

Dean was only 24 when he died; true, the bobbysoxers swooned over him, but they and he were a bit too young for romance fiction. His fans, however, were future consumers of romance novels and he was on track to be a mature but moody man, an archetypal male lead in a romance novel. But the brooder is not the only archetype.

Another good choice is the alpha male. What female reader wouldn't want one of them for a soul mate? Think Rhett Butler/Clark Gable in Gone With the Wind. Scarlett O'Hara sheds two husbands before she finally gets to Rhett Butler, a can-do kind of guy who stands up to her and calls her out on her narcissism. The more a woman gabbles on about her independence, the more she is begging for a man to keep her in line…but she will never admit that to anyone, and maybe not to herself. Rhett Butler is such a man.

Whether the male lead is an alpha male or given to moodiness, true love never runs smooth. There is always some major obstacle keeping the man and woman apart. Eventually, the obstacle is cleared away and the man and woman are free to get together and commit. In the case of Wuthering Heights, Heathcliff and Cathy do not consummate their relationship in the flesh, but the tale ends with their ghosts wandering the moors together. (Interesting to note that a contemporary sub-genre of the romance novel is the paranormal romance novel.)

So we're not talking about high school sweethearts who never dated anyone else, get married and remain married till one of them assumes room temperature many decades later. That's too easy. Not a bad life, maybe even desirable, but not romantic.

Now it would be great if male authors drew upon their lived experience to create more realistic leading men. I'd love to see a romantic leading man who plays beer pong, collects comic books, and has indelible skid marks on his underwear. But would that appeal to the female readership? Sad to say, I think not. But that doesn't mean aspiring male authors should give up.

For example, consider a romance novel about a man with a harridan of an ex-wife who has so haunted the man that he simply avoids the opposite sex…until he meets a NAWALT heroine…with a killer bod and season tickets for the Red Sox.

Or a story about a guy brooding over his inability to advance because his office politics is dominated by queen bees, quota queens, and other parasites, so he has totally soured on women…until he meets a NAWALT heroine…with a killer bod who owns a craft brewery that turns out a scintillating Double IPA.

Or he's been violated by a divorce court judge and vows he will never get married again…until he meets a NAWALT heroine…with a killer bod and an extensive DVD library – including the complete works of Charles Bronson.

Unfortunately, there is no room for the avowed MGTOW in a romance novel. Oh, he may be one at the beginning of the novel but by the end must repent and pair off with the heroine. Riding off alone into the sunset may work just fine in westerns, but not in romance novels.

Considering the income potential of churning out romance novels, I think equity in the authorship of same is a course worth pursuing; however, I don't think demanding equity in the writing of romance novels will avail us anything. Remember, women's rights are human rights but men's rights usually appear with quotation marks around them (printed when written, air when oral). So demonstrating/rioting in front of Harlequin Books HQ might get you on YouTube but it probably won't get results. There's more than one way to assault a fortress, however.

Consider the possibility of writing under a female pen name. If you have a unisex name like Terry or Leslie, you've got it made. If not, then something dignified and mature, vaguely Ango-Saxon…like Nora Roberts, Johanna Lindsey, Julia Quinn, Jessica Bird, Julie Garwood…these are all good, but these names have been taken Stay away from names like Appasionata or Hypatia. Certainly not Zsa Zsa. Nothing too ethnic – no LaKeisha Washington or Sadie Rabinowitz or Agnieszka Kowalski…unless you're writing for an ethnic niche of the romance market.

It is improbable but not impossible for a man to write under his own name. Consider the case of Nicholas Sparks, who wrote Nights in Rodanthe, which was filmed in 2008 with Richard Gere and Diane Lane. A male pen name is not out of the question either. One such author is Damon Suede. Great pen name, but he specializes in male-on-male relationships. If you're lived experience doesn't include same, probably best to pass on this market.

Truth to tell, there appears to be something of a homosexual subtext in the covers of romance novels. Look at how many covers include a chiseled, bare-chested (but oddly hairless) male. I suppose you could say this is to compensate for all the male-oriented publications that feature chesty females on the cover – "Tit for tat," as Hardy used to say to Laurel. But could it be that such covers are made to appeal to a secondary market – the closeted gay male? ("Oh, I'm just buying them for my sister…she can't get enough of these things.")

So if you're interested in penning a romance novel and, more importantly, getting it published, where to start? Well, you could buy a copy of Writing a Romance Novel for Dummies, by Leslie Wainger, an Executive Editor at Harlequin Books. (I assume the author means the dummy is the aspiring author, and is not implying that romance novels are for dummies, but you could read it either way.)

At any rate, here are the five fundamentals:

A sympathetic heroine a strong, irresistible hero (extra credit for brooding…just my opinion) emotional tension an interesting, believable plot and a happy ending (fairy tales can come true…it can happen to you…).

Just so we're clear, we're not talking rape culture. it's ravish culture. Not ravage! Ravish! If you don't understand the difference, you, sir, are no candidate for romance novel author. Ironically enough, romance novels used to be called bodice rippers, but I wouldn't utter that phrase today.

So don't let all that lived experience go to waste when you could profit from it financially while fighting the good fight for equity in the world of romance novel authorship.

Or you could just sit at home and brood about it.

Gynocentrism And The Dehumanisation Of Men (Part One)

Peter Ryan · 9 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Disposability Versus Exploitation

What is disposable? Something is disposable when it has little or no value and can be easily replaced and readily discarded. Disposable cutlery is one example of this. Highly valuable items that cannot be easily replaced or readily discarded, are not something we consider to be disposable. Famous paintings come to mind as one example of what we would not consider to be disposable. I have always had a problem with the concept of male disposability as a generalised description of the state of men's lives throughout history. People that are truly disposable are exterminated in death camps and dehumanised to the point their very right to exist is challenged. Genocide is what the end result of disposability of a group looks like at a societal level. When society considers a group of people to be disposable, they are disposed of. There is a difference between facing discrimination or being marginalised and actually being considered to be disposable.

Please read this two part article in its entirety before you comment or form opinions about what I am saying. Disposability implies that society considers men to be of little or no value and something to be eradicated. Throughout history it is certainly the case that we have always had some degree of misandry in the culture. I would certainly agree that to some degree male disposability has existed throughout history, however I would not agree it was systemic. The only exception to this would be during war. Opposing armies have certainly regarded each other as a threat to be eliminated and the dehumanisation of men in war has resulted in enormous loss of life and gruesome abuses as a result. We only have to look at prisoner of war camps and the millions of dead bodies on battlefields to attest to male disposability in war.

Male disposability in war dwarfs any other historical example of male disposability by orders of magnitude. However even in war men of opposing armies have demonstrated extraordinary civility with their opposing male counterparts at times. The Christmas truce[1] of World War One being one example of this. Men in an unofficial ceasefire instigated by the soldiers themselves, decided to lay down their arms, fraternise with the enemy and celebrate Christmas with each other. It is even suspected there may have been a football match!

To repeat, I am certainly not suggesting male disposability has not occurred in our history or on a large scale in times of war. However I think there has been a mistake in understanding the true nature of the discrimination men have historically faced, versus what they now face today. Like soldiers that do not value the life of their enemy, society does not value the life of people it considers to be disposable. Disposable people are disposed of and it eventually leads to war or alternatively civil unrest, revolution and then genocide. What I think we confuse as historical male disposability in the manosphere, is actually better described as the exploitation of men. Men have historically faced exploitation to a much greater degree than disposability. For as long as civilisation has existed, society has gone to great efforts to control men and exploit male labour. If men truly had no value whatsoever and they truly were regarded as disposable, then our society would be indifferent toward men and would put no effort into controlling and exploiting them, because doing so would yield nothing of value.

There has been an unchallenged narrative in the manosphere for many years that men are biologically disposable because women are the rate limiting factor of reproduction. This reductionist mindset, rests on the flimsy assumption reproduction and how many uteri a population has, is the sole or overwhelming determining factor for the continued existence of communities. This assumption does not consider the vast multitude of other requirements that must also be met to ensure a community's survival and future existence and the essential role men have played to ensure that those other requirements are met. This reductionist narrative of glorifying the role of women in reproduction, is itself gynocentric and comes from certain dogmatic pockets of the manosphere that are simply repeating a narrative from our gynocentric culture. I have scrutinised it extensively in my writings[2], because of how entrenched this narrative has become in the manosphere and because it has remained largely unquestioned for many years. It is keeping the manosphere in a stagnate holding pattern and needs to go.

I think this gynocentric narrative of the golden uterus and male disposability has reality backwards. In reality I think men are not disposable and men actually have tremendous value. In fact, I think men have so much value and society and the aristocracy have been so dependent on that value to survive and build civilisation and expand their empires, that enormous efforts have been put into controlling men and exploiting them. This exploitation has often come at the expense of men themselves and has been used to build and expand empires and nation states for the ruling class. Now before people start muttering "Marxist!", "Communist!" etc let me be clear- Any civilisation of any kind will have some level of corruption and some level of exploitation.

Human beings are imperfect and the societal systems we create are by extension imperfect. It should be obvious by looking at past and present society, that the assertion that our culture is perfectly aligned with our biology and merely an expression of biology, simply does not have a leg to stand on. Biology does restrict culture, but culture can overshoot biology to a certain degree and aspects of it such as political ideology, can become destructive and maladaptive to evolutionary success. No biological system perfectly constrains culture to maximise evolutionary success. Evolution is not perfect, it is not intelligent design.

I am not suggesting either that human society is best described as being composed of the proletariat and the bourgeoisie that exploits them. Society is a much more complex mixture than that and reality is much more grey than Marxist ideology cares to admit. I am not calling for some communist revolution. History is littered with examples of how badly that turns out. Men have certainly faced exploitation to varying degrees throughout history, but that does not mean that was the entirety of their experience.

There has certainly been some level of disregard for the well-being of men throughout history, because of the desire of the ruling elite to exploit men for their own benefit. However it has not been a complete disregard for men, like what we would see if men were truly regarded as disposable. There was some logical understanding in past society of the need to look after men, so that the value that men can provide can be harnessed and exploited. Men pressed onto ships were given vitamin C, men conscripted into armies were fed, clothed and given shelter and men working in mines were given at least some incentive to work under incredibly dangerous conditions. Even slaves on plantations or that built ancient structures, had to be adequately looked after by their masters to perform the labour they would be involuntarily forced to do. Does this make exploitation acceptable? Of course not. However there is a very dark contrast between a group that is exploited and a group that is considered disposable. It is an important distinction to make when we consider how men may have been treated historically and how men are treated today.

In the past it was known that men had to be supported to some degree and society had to help raise boys so they could perform their role. There used to be a cognitive connection in society of the need to look after men, so they could in turn look after society. Societies that flourished ensured their men were in a good enough condition to perform for society. Societies that treated men as disposable and neglected the health of their men, neglected the foundations of their own civilisation. The armies that took care of their soldiers, had the stronger and fitter men to win the war. The armies that lost the least amount of men, survived to fight and win another battle. This is the simple logic of survival and in our dangerous and volatile past such pragmatic thinking, was essential for the continuation of societies.

This is the logic that our culture has lost because of the technological and debt driven bubble of peace and prosperity we have created over the last three centuries, since the beginning of the industrial revolution. It is a bubble that insulates society from the harsh reality of survival and has led to all sorts of delusional ideologies and belief systems flourishing. This bubble has not eliminated the basic requirements to sustain civilisation, it has merely delayed the time period between the decisions and actions we make today as a society and the future consequences for those actions and decisions. The bubble creates a temporal buffer that allows society to lose perceptual awareness of the connection between action and consequence and reality itself. The consequences will arrive, but when they do it will be the accumulation of consequences from decades of reckless and delusional decision making. That's the danger. It is a danger that COVID-19 has given us just a little inkling of what to expect, if we keep ignoring basic realities about the nature of the world we live in and the nature of ourselves as a species, as a society and as individuals.

To repeat I am not suggesting men have had it good for centuries. The exploitation of men was a significant trend in historical society, particularly in the lower classes. Society has placed enormous amounts of effort into controlling men and regulating how men perceive themselves and other men. Men are sold a lie from birth that they can only be considered "a man" and have a place in society, if they perform as human doings. This is what drives precarious manhood[3]. This cultural message is the carrot and the stick that society uses to keep men in line and keep the machinery of male exploitation going.

Be a gentleman, do your duty, be a man and if you don't do your duty here is a white feather for you! All of this is psychological blackmail to shame men into their own exploitation. Keeping men ignorant of their own intrinsic value as human beings and beating into them from birth that their masculine value is externally derived, is the key mechanism that society depends on to control men. This form of control works so well because human beings are herd animals and we like to conform to the group to belong and form affiliations. Men that don't toe the line are ostracised from their community. Remember that men are raised in an environment with this social programming and social pressure to conform to "what a man is", from the earliest years of their life.

Despite all of these social pressures, men have still fought against their own exploitation. The development of our legal system and the concept of people having "rights" have all followed from men rising up against authoritarianism in one form or another and to their own exploitation. Men have fought revolutions and wars over their own exploitation. The past is a mixture of society giving men the bare minimum concern for their well-being and men pushing back and demanding better treatment from society. In some cases society has treated men fairly and in some cases society has treated men poorly. Often it has been men in the lower classes of society that have been treated the worst and the remainder of men have faced a mixture of fair and exploitative treatment. The lower classes of men have been the invisible workers and the invisible homeless of our societies. They are the men the ruling aristocracy have been able to most effectively exploit, because they are the most powerless in our society to do anything about it. They were the ones sent to the mines and to the trenches during war in the millions.

It would be wrong to describe the system exploiting poor men as the feminist "patriarchy". This is not a system that privileges men because they are men. Men were only given a partial reprieve from exploitation if they were wealthy and even then they were exposed to unfair treatment relative to women of the same class because they were men. A clear example of this can be seen with the Titanic. Even women in third class had a better chance of survival[4] than men in first class. In the case of the Titanic we do have a historical incidence of male disposability. When the logic of survival no longer demands that looking after men is conducive to enhancing the survival of a group and men are living in a culture of male exploitation that regards them as human doings and not as human beings, then men predictably will face disposability when society sees no use for them and has a reduced concept of them as human beings.

Historical incidences of male disposability did occur, but outside of war these incidents were exceptional and often noted in our history for the exceptions that they were. Examples like the Titanic do illustrate though, that the discrimination men faced cannot be entirely attributed to class and was at least partly the result of simply being male. The feminist concepts of "male privilege" and "the patriarchy", simply fly in the face of history. Men were not privileged to die on the Titanic or die in the numerous wars fought over history.

Gynocentrism Is A Sex Based Form Of Exploitation

Aristocratic women have played a key role over the centuries[5] in developing and codifying into the culture, a system of male exploitation to serve women at the expense of men. We call it gynocentrism[6]. Gynocentrism first emerged 900 years ago and it is not surprising it first originated in the aristocracy. As we know power corrupts and the female aristocracy, like their male counterparts, enjoyed considerable power over society. Gynocentrism spread so effectively throughout society, partly because it came from people of influence and also because there was already some form of male exploitation in society (particularly among the vast numbers of poor peasants). It is predictable that even today, the worst forms of gynocentrism are promoted by the upper echelons of society and felt the worst by the lower rungs of society. Of course gynocentrism exists at all levels of society, but the general pattern that is observed is what I have just described.

Men have fought against all forms of exploitation throughout history, but have been relatively silent when it comes to gynocentrism. The reason for this is because men are raised from birth with another big lie- Men have all the power in relation to women and women are powerless in relation to men. This is the myth Dr. Warren Farrell debunked in his masterpiece, The Myth Of Male Power[7]. Men are agents, women are damsels in distress. That is the narrative feminism rests on and that narrative is ultimately dependent on the myth of male power deeply embedded in our culture.

Feminist ideology depends on maintaining a narrative of female victimhood and male agency. Any mainstream acknowledgement of female power over men and any scrutiny of it, is not permitted in our gynocentric culture. Men don't want to do hear about it and women don't want to hear about it (for the most part). Society is uncomfortable confronting the power women have over men and the consequences of that power. Why? Deep down society has a problem holding women responsible for what they do to men. Why? Holding women responsible for what they do to men, would require society to consider men as human beings first and that would undermine the whole societal system of male exploitation.

As I mentioned earlier, men are told a lie from birth that their whole worth is externally derived from how well they perform as a human doing. Men are especially judged and evaluated as well by women on how well they perform as human doings. Women will not date losers or men they perceive to be "weak". Women don't generally prefer dating men that earn less than they do, despite all of this mantra about female empowerment. This lie that men are human doings and the social pressure associated with it, demands that men must see themselves as powerful and as agents to protect their own sense of self-worth. Human doings can't be permitted to be in the vulnerable and powerless position, otherwise their capacity to "do" is questioned. So when you consider these two lies men are told from birth and are socially programmed to follow, we can predict men will be blind to their own exploitation when it comes in the form of gynocentrism. Men will recognise fascism and fight against it, but not feminist fascism in a dress.

Men are told from birth by our culture that they have all the power and are told a narrative men have always held the power and are responsible for everything bad that has ever happened. Men are taught to associate power with positions of authority and men see that men do indeed hold all of the positions of authority. So predictably from all of this social programming, men in society form a perception that men have all the power and women are the weaker sex that need to be protected and cared for. Men cannot see themselves in a position of less power in relation to women, because they have not been raised to identify such situations and because their sense of self-worth and finding a partner depends on constantly maintaining a mindset that they are agents with power. Adding to these two dynamics, we then have chivalry playing on men's desire to perform to earn externally derived worth from women and society. Despite what people may think chivalry is alive and well in the present day and has just taken a different form to what we observed in the past. We identify modern day chivalry in the manosphere as "simping".

Men do not recognise gynocentrism as a form of exploitation, because men's sense of self views the exploitive dynamic of gynocentrism as a source of pride rather than a source shame. Men willingly go along with their own gynocentric exploitation because that's what they think "a man" does. To summarise it is the concept of chivalry, how men's self-worth is constructed and men's perception of power, that prevents men from seeing their own gynocentric exploitation. If business partnerships resembled modern marriage, no man would form a business partnership. To paraphrase Dr. Warren Farrell from the Myth of Male Power, men are taught that earning money someone else spends while they die sooner is "power" . Men are blind to how they are being exploited, because of the three factors I have identified.

Yes biology is certainly at play and I will have more to say on that in my further writings. However biology alone does not result in gynocentrism. Gynocentrism is just one pathological manifestation of biology, like murder, racism and every other human vice. Culture is not purely an extension of biology, but a product of a continuous feedback loop between the environment and biology. Culture can become corrupted with certain pathological elements and those pathological aspects of our culture can hijack our psychological drives in maladaptive ways. Paul Elam and Peter Wright have both discussed how gynocentrism can grow from superresponses to superstimuli in Chasing The Dragon[8] and Slaying the Dragon[9]. Certain pathological elements can arise in our culture, when certain environmental conditions persist for long periods. These pathological aspects of culture, can short-circuit our base biological drives and gynocentrism is one of them.

Gynocentrism can in a way be considered as a type of "mind virus" or germ, like what evolutionary psychologist Prof. Gad Saad describes in his new book, "The Parasitic mind"[10] and what I discussed in The Normalisation of Gynocentrism[11]. When men's perception of power, self-worth and responsibilities in relation to the opposite sex are distorted in the way that they are, men cannot psychologically protect themselves from the cultural pathology of gynocentrism. It is analogous to the immune system failing to recognise a parasitic infection.

Remember that men are conditioned from birth to form a distorted cognitive and perceptual framework around power, self-worth and responsibility when it comes to their interactions with the opposite sex. This social programming has been going on for centuries now, from generation to generation. When you consider the social pressure on men to maintain this blue pill perception, from our institutions, from our culture and from their peers and that this programming is all men are exposed to from birth, it is like coming out of the matrix and just as hard to do.

Like what Morpheus said to Neo about people in the matrix, many men will fight to protect the system that exploits them. Without an identifiable and attractive alternative to forming their own sense of self-worth, many will resist any challenge to their gynocentric programming and even then it is an uphill battle. When men are dependent on gynocentric social programming to maintain their sense of self-worth, they will fight against any challenge to gynocentrism out of psychological self-defence. That's the hurdle men have to overcome to adopt a red pill perception of the world. That's why unlike other forms of exploitation, many men fail to challenge gynocentrism and actually fight for it. Men's sense of self-worth is tied up in gynocentrism, because of those three factors I spoke of earlier and all of the biological buttons they press.

When these factors are combined with a narrative and an image cultivated in our gynocentric culture, that masks female vice and magnifies female virtue at every turn and conversely does the complete opposite in relation to men, we have the recipe for the blind acceptance of the gynocentric exploitation of men. It is the deification of women and the demonisation of men. Women are wonderful, women are powerless but divine, men are human doings and men must act like “men” and be chivalrous and rise above their “animal state”. That is the gynocentric message in our culture. True female power (not feminist female empowerment nonsense) is not only largely unacknowledged in our culture that views women as perpetual victims, even when female power is recognised in society, the image of female innocence cloaks any female abuse directed at men from receiving any significant degree of societal attention and condemnation.

That is the cultural milieu that male exploitation grows in and why it is so hard to combat.

Please read the further part of this article in part two.

References:

1. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Christmas_truce
2. https://gynocentrism.com/2020/01/31/gynocentrism-sex-differences-and-the-manipulation-of-men-part-one/
3. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=q6EF00RL88M
4. https://www.anesi.com/titanic.htm
5. https://gynocentrism.com/2013/07/14/about/
6. https://gynocentrism.com/2018/12/04/diagnosing-gynocentrism/
7. https://www.amazon.com.au/Myth-Male-Power-Warren-Farrell/dp/0425181448
8. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VygKQV-hEpY
9. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=n5WLNMX4COA
10. https://www.amazon.com.au/Parasitic–Infectious-Killing-Common-ebook/dp/B0853F4VKP/ref=sr_1_2?dchild=1&qid=1591528227&refinements=p_27%3AGad+Saad&s=books&sr=1-2&text=Gad+Saad
11. https://gynocentrism.com/2018/06/30/the-normalisation-of-gynocentrism/

Gynocentrism And The Dehumanisation Of Men (Part Two)

Peter Ryan · 10 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Please read part one of this article before continuing.

From Exploitation To Disposability

In our modern world technological and social change has resulted in an enormous increase in misandry. We have transitioned from male exploitation to genuine male disposability. Our decadent, safe and prosperous societies have lost touch with basic fundamental truths required to sustain civilisation, because technology has temporarily buffered and delayed the consequences of doing so. This is why we have clown world. Only a society completely unconcerned with its own future survival, would tolerate the level of insanity and mass stupidity we see in present day society.

Due to these societal changes, men are now indeed viewed as disposable and are dehumanised to the point their right to even have a place in society is being questioned. Our culture is now filled with messages like, "The End Of Men"[12], "The Future Is Female"[13], "Why Can't We Hate Men"[14] and "The Coronavirus Is Not Killing Men Fast Enough"[15]. There are a plethora of examples like this over the last fifty years. These messages are not coming from the margins of our society, they are coming from our mainstream media and our political system. We can also see the routine marginalisation of men in the legal system and the abuses of their fundamental rights. In the education system we can see a complete indifference to the learning needs of young men and boys and the long-term economic impact that will have on society. The list goes on. Men are not actually biologically disposable as I have discussed in my previous writings, but men are certainly treated as disposable in this modern society and there is a general level of indifference shown toward them as a result.

There is no concern for how failing to support men and boys will impact on societies future whatsoever. The cognitive connection of looking after men so they can in turn look after society has been lost. Our culture has lost the logic of survival and neglecting men will inevitably result in a socioeconomic collapse of our societies, which Karen Straughan called the Fempocalypse[16]. As I have discussed in my earlier writings[17], men still remain essential to keeping our societies functioning. This is despite all of the social and technological changes that have occurred. In some dimensions we are even more dependent on men today than we have been in the past. However because of the effect that technology and creating massive amounts of debt has had on greatly enhancing the living conditions of society, we have become disconnected from this reality and other realities related to survival.

It is easy to see when you look at history, how the exploitation of men from gynocentrism has led to the emergence of male disposability. Men's blindness to gynocentrism and the technological and social changes that have occurred over the last three centuries, made it inevitable. If men were not going to challenge their own exploitation from gynocentrism, then the exploitation of men would flourish along the lines of biological sex and it has. The only obstacle that stood in the way of male disposability in the past, was the logic of survival and an understanding of the importance of supporting men so they could support society. Once that logic was lost, any concern for men went with it.

It does not take much for exploitation to transition to disposability, when supporting "human doings" so they can be exploited, ceases to be perceived to be necessary. If society has no concept of men's humanity and does not regard them as human beings, they become disposable once they cease being perceived to be useful human doings. That is precarious manhood and men's place in the world is conditional under precarious manhood. As the world has undergone huge changes, men have gradually been losing their place in society and have come under increasing attack and dehumanisation as a result. Of course men are more than human doings, but gynocentrism unlike other forms of exploitation, has never been challenged by men on any substantive societal level and so has been allowed to grow for centuries to become the monster it is today.

The Final Outcome Of Disposability

The eventual outcome of treating a group of people as disposable is genocide. This is what Adam Kostakis wrote about[18] in his series on gynocentrism, when he talked about the eventual outcome of feminism. People might dismiss the idea of men being eliminated as they are the "physically stronger sex". As we can see from war, all it takes is for men to be turned against each other to make androcide possible. When rampant gynocentrism reaches a level where our own institutions regard the majority of men as a threat and a minority of men in authority in a feminist controlled state are given the "honour" of being the "good men" fighting the oppressive force of the "patriarchy", then those men will do the killing for their female betters.

That might sound brutal and unbelievable and that is understandable, but look at history. Many Jewish people had the same level of disbelief initially before they were sent to the death camps. What Jew would have thought that his entire family would be exterminated only a decade after Hitler came to power? These atrocities happen because good people in society are asleep at the wheel during critical moments in history and remain in a state of disbelief. Yes people really are that insane when insanity is not challenged and yes androcide can happen and it can happen on an industrial scale.

Setting men against each other is gynocentric female proxy violence 101. Now imagine that on a societal scale with the full support and enforcement of our institutions. That's the eventual outcome of rampant gynocentrism- A society that regards men as subhumans that have to be eradicated and a handful of chosen men are considered to be reformed and "good men" that do all the dirty work for their feminist masters. These are the male feminists and the white knights. The ones that think that killing men in the name of protecting women makes them brave and honourable.

Do I think all male feminists are like that? No. But at the extreme end of any movement you will find people with extreme views and as we have seen, feminism has no immune response to extremists in their ranks. With every year the feminist movement becomes more and more radical and more and more dangerous. We know the genocidal leanings of radical feminism, because they have written about it in their writings. They are not a fringe element of feminism any longer. People may regard such men and women as insane and yet this is insanity has found its way and continues to find its way into positions of power in our institutions and governments.

Can we stop this? Yes we can, but it is going to take a major shift in the way men see themselves and the way society regards men. Perhaps when society truly discovers the dark evil radical feminism presents and looks back at history, there will be a recognition that change in how we regard men is needed. Men need to be taught to reframe their sense of self-worth along lines of intrinsic value and on that of a human being and not a human doing. Men need to be raised to see the duality of power that exists between the sexes and the power women have in relation to men. Men need to be raised to identify the exploitive nature of chivalry. Only if this social programming is overcome, will men be in a position to challenge gynocentrism. When the mask is lifted and men have an empowered sense of internally derived self-worth and men see the gynocentric dynamic between men and women for what it is, then the days of gynocentrism are numbered.

Men going their own way (MGTOW) is all about men finding their own intrinsic sense of self-worth and going in their own direction in life. MGTOW and red pill knowledge is a significant part of the solution to overcoming gynocentrism. Men that go their own way and have an awareness of the exploitative gynocentric landscape of modern society, are in a prime position to challenge gynocentrism.

Feminism is fascism in a dress and the sooner men recognise the threat it presents and the cultural pathology of gynocentrism it emerged from, the better. Keeping men divided and against each other with gynocentric threat narratives[19], is a huge part of gynocentrism and what prevents men from challenging it. For decades we have had a feminist threat narrative that men have oppressed women for thousands of years. There are many other feminist threat narratives, such as the feminist account of domestic violence as an expression of men's patriarchal tyranny and the feminist rape culture narrative. All of these threat narratives are seeds of hate to justify the demonisation and dehumanisation of men. They have been sown in our society over many decades by feminists. As a result of this, our academic institutions, media, legal system and political systems are now predictably full of contempt for men (particularly academia). At the same time this has occurred, there has been a creeping trend toward authoritarianism, selective censorship and infringements of our civil liberties in so-called Western democracies. Feminism and an emerging authoritarian police state are a perfect marriage of evil cloaked in the supposed feminine innocence that our gynocentric culture glorifies. Feminism is a wolf in sheep's clothing, or as I prefer to call it- Feminism is fascism in a dress.

The enforcement of gynocentrism, requires men to see themselves as the good guy slaying the evil men and protecting the women (or the damsels in distress). All of the threat narratives from feminism, tap into the psychological dynamic in men to see themselves as the protector and provider of women. All of these feminist threat narratives demand that men redeem themselves by demonstrating a hatred for their own sex. That's how the seeds for mass androcide are sown. All a feminist police state has to do in such a social environment saturated with these threat narratives over many past decades, is to convince the "good men" in authority to view the men that challenge feminism as a threat. From there feminists can then reframe the rest of men in society as a threat and as an example of toxic masculinity that must be eradicated for the survival of humanity. The "good men" in authority will then do the violent and androcidal bidding of feminists on their behalf. After that, then any "good man" that is not ideologically pure enough for the feminist authorities becomes the new threat to be eradicated and so the mass murder goes on and on from there.

For people that doubt this could happen, look at how easy it is to get other men to vilify and condemn other men for being white or black, with all the threat narratives targeted at white men or black men over the decades and centuries. Look at how divided men are because of far-left ideology and identity politics. Consider how dangerous it is for men in particular, to divide men against each other by race. Feminism has been right up there promoting racial identity politics with the far-left for decades. There are too many sick radical feminist ideas to cite and too many examples of extreme feminist ideology such as toxic masculinity[20] being taken up by our institutions, for the real possibility of androcide to be dismissed. People in academia have even written about selectively aborting male fetuses and using genetic engineering to control and subjugate men. It is sick and yet this is coming from people in academia. These people have influence and are not on the fringes of our society. So yes, it is indeed possible for society to head down a very dark road when it comes to the future treatment of men and boys in society.

Remember the men from the Christmas Truce in World War One I wrote about at the start of this article? These were men that despite all of the propaganda, recognised they had more in common with each other than they had with the people that had sent them there to fight and die. Men need to overcome the gynocentric forces dividing them and come together to overcome gynocentrism. It is possible that men can do this. Even during war, men from opposing armies have come together under extraordinary circumstances. If men can come together in war, they can come together to fight gynocentrism. However it will require patience, a lot of effort on the part of men and an unconditional regard for the well-being of our fellow men regardless of race or ideology etcetera (whether they are black or white, or a male feminist or a men's rights activist). Men have to overcome the gynocentric lines that divide us and identity politics. Love your enemy, because feminism sure as hell does not love a male feminist. Feminism just regards their male allies as pawns to enforce gynocentrism and feminist ideology on society, nothing more.

Feminists have put an enormous amount of effort into preventing men from gathering together to discuss men's issues, or gathering together in general into any sort of men's only group or organisation without female supervision. Feminists know the power of men getting together in groups and discussing men's issues and how it undermines gynocentrism and their power base. That's why there is so much effort from feminists[21], to censor the manosphere and disrupt men's conferences and events. As Prof. Janice Fiamengo said[22] at a lecture on men's issues that was disrupted by feminists, "It's the signature of a totalitarian ideology to attempt to quash dissent". Feminism is fascism in a dress.

Time for men to wake up and come to together. Time for society to wake up and recognise men as human beings. Gynocentrism will come to an end in some form or another. Gynocentrism can only end in three ways- socioeconomic collapse, androcide or men peacefully rising up against the authoritarian feminist police state that will emerge from decades of rampant unchecked gynocentrism and passively resisting their own exploitation and dehumanisation. Perhaps we may get all three occurring at once. It all comes down to how much men are prepared to defend their own lives and their own future.

References:

1. https://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2010/07/the-end-of-men/308135/
2. https://www.psychologytoday.com/au/blog/real-men-dont-write-blogs/201703/memo-our-sons-and-grandsons-the-future-is-female
3. https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/why-cant-we-hate-men/2018/06/08/f1a3a8e0-6451-11e8-a69c-b944de66d9e7_story.html
4. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=yxyJq9Hl-jo
5. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=w__PJ8ymliw
6. https://gynocentrism.com/2020/01/10/the-nature-of-male-value-and-our-gynocentric-culture-part-one/
7. https://gynocentrism.com/2014/05/25/the-eventual-outcome-of-feminism-part-i/
8. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=WWw8QmVEK2M
9. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=yqXCO8ivFf8
10. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-jEQYHAFfjg
11. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=OciDuhHk2zM

The real history of MGTOW

Paul Elam · 11 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

*First published in May 2016.

Recently, Brad Wilcox of PragerU did a video trying to sell the idea that a man is better off yoked to a woman he has to take care of versus life as a bachelor pursuing his own interests and leisure activities.

The reaction from the group of men who identify as Men Going Their Own Way, or MGTOW, was swift, critical and on point.

Now, you might think that the divide between MGTOW and pro-marriage advocates is a relatively new one, born in the internet by a collection of men who made a choice to rebel against the institution of marriage and opened a real-time, public dialogue about it.

In modern times we can trace the kerfuffle back to the early 2000's, when a group of Men's Rights Activists created the first internet forum dedicated to men going their own way. An archived conversation with one of the founders was recorded by Rocking Mr. E.

Part of the problem those men encountered was also, in their minds, the solution. Men of this type were fiercely independent. Or, more bluntly put, MGTOW tend not to play well with others. Rather than cooperate with each other, they often went their own way.

That is not a criticism. Quite the contrary, it was MGTOW steadfastness and out-of-the-box thinking that led them to re-popularize the idea of men checking out and taking care of themselves.

Their ideas were subject to quick evolution. For instance, early in the first known internet version of a MGTOW manifesto, they claim to hold the objective of, and I quote, "instilling masculinity in men," a clear "man up" mandate that would most likely be scoffed at by contemporary men going their own way.

Thus, as far as we know, is when the modern use of the term emerged. Many have assumed that this is a first for western culture, and have even struggled to claim ownership over what "going your own way" means.

There has been a fair amount of infighting over that, from which I have not been exempt. Yet, if we look at history we find that the bickering is like two fleas arguing over who owns the dog. The idea of men going their own way is bigger and older than anyone talking about it today.

Going one's own sweet way and other variants have been in popular discourse for centuries – including but not limited to men's freedoms and the right to a bachelor life.

There is a record of men avoiding marriage — the dictates of gynocentrism, and the attempts by those who would shame men from that path that stretches back nearly into antiquity.

One good source to gather more information on this is The Age of the Bachelor: Creating an American Subculture by Howard P. Chudacoff, a 1999 book that chronicles a good bit of the history of misogamy and debunks completely the idea that it is a new phenomenon.

The following excerpt from the volume Medieval Forms of Argument provides more detail about the tradition of men rejecting marriage:

The early manifestations of the quarrel often focus on marriage, one of the pressing problems of the late Middle Ages and the early modern period: An uxor sit ducenda (Should One Take a Wife) was a question much discussed by Italian men, and in Germany it could appear as Ob einem manne sey zu nemen ein eelichs weyb oder nit (Should a Man Take a Wife or Not? – Albrecht von Eyb, 1472). In answer to this question male misogamy (hatred of marriage) is expressed as misogyny (hatred of women) and philogyny (love of women) as philogamy (love of marriage).

Christine de Pizan's praise of women was directed against the misogamists and misogynists of her time, the anonymous text Les quinze joies de mariage (The Fifteen Joys of Marriage) deplored the loss of male liberty in marriage, and a century later Erasmus of Rotterdam presented the misogamist virgin in his Virgo misogamos (The Misogamist Virgin – 1523), who desperately wants to enter a convent but inspired by love she thinks better of it at the last moment. Philogynous texts questioned why women were punished more strictly for adultery than men or why a husband had to be brought (by a dowry); misogamists and misogynists, eg. In England, answered the question by stating that women tend to squeeze money out of their husbands.

In Germany this aspect of the querelle has been largely ignored (interest has focused on voices which argued in favor of women's intelligence and reason), although the querelle du mariage played an important role here: the wide-ranging marriage debate during the Reformation, in particular in its sensational and scandalous early phases – public betrothals of monks and nuns, closures of monasteries and convents, an epidemic of marriages in Germany to which even French reformers travelled who wished to marry – must be read as an integral part of the European querelle des sexes and the same goes for the marriage debates of the Counter-Reformation. Martin Luther's Von chelichen Leben (The Estate of Married Life – 1522) speaks quite in the manner of a querelle text by turning against the traditional misogamist attitude:

> "What we would speak most of is the fact that the estate of marriage has universally fallen into such awful disrepute. There are many pagan books which treat of nothing but the depravity of womankind and the unhappiness of the estate of marriage […]. So they [young men listening to the advice of a Roman official] concluded that woman is a necessary evil, and that no household can be without such an evil. […] For this reason young men should be on their guard when they read pagan books and hear the common complaints about marriage, lest they inhale poison . For the estate of marriage does not sell well with the devil, because it is God's good will and work. This is why the devil has contrived to have so much shouted and written in the world against the institution of marriage […]. The world says of marriage, 'Brief is the joy, lasting the bitterness."

Looking back as recently as 1950 we have evidence of the shaming backlash against men who reject marriage and gynocentrism in the form of a book, "Why Are You Single?" a collection of essays compiled by Hilda Holland.

The thrust of the text throws a shadow on the mental and emotional fitness of confirmed bachelors, raising doubt about the quality of their parents, suggesting unresolved Oedipal issues, a lack of maturity and insufficient moral bearing. Such characteristics echo what later came to be referred to as Peter Pan Syndrome.

One of the contributors, Dr. Bernard Glueck, wrote that bachelorhood represented "primitive and infantile thinking."

He also characterized bachelors as "impulse ridden," "excessively narcissistic" and even "sadistic."

It's the mid-twentieth century version of Brad Wilcox, only with less finesse and undoubtedly less backlash from a population of men more tolerant of being shamed.

Reaching back a bit further in time, to 1896, Ernest Belfort Bax neatly summarized the obvious driving force behind the resistance. In his essay titled "The Matrimonial Privileges of Women," Bax outlines 12 key areas that put men at unjust, egregious disadvantage, vulnerable to fraud, deception, violence and incarceration at the hands of wives.

Also, in the same year, according to Peter Wright of gynocentrism.com, "Mrs. Charlotte Smith, feminist activist and President of the Women's Rescue League, spearheaded an anti-bachelor campaign based on her concerns about the increasing numbers of women who could not find husbands — a surprising development considering men outnumbered women in the United States then by 1.5 million. Her solution to the "problem" was to denigrate, malign, and ultimately punish bachelors in order to pressure them into marrying any women unlucky enough to remain unwed.

Part of her remedy was to have bachelors excluded from employment in prominent public sector positions. Her second punishment proposed a universal bachelor tax of $10 per year be applied, amounting to between 1-4 weeks of the average wage, with the proceeds to provide living standards for 'unmarried maidens' orphans and the poor."

It seems Mr. Wilcox is standing on a lot of shoulders, and it does not stop there.

In 1707 a conversation about a bachelor tax between two young women was published. Eliza kicks off her conversation with Mariana with the following:

> Amongst all the female grievances we have hitherto debated there still remains one we have not yet touch'd upon. There are an abundance of bachelors who, thro' a cowardly apprehension of the cares and troubles of the > marry'd state, are so fearful of entering into it, that they would rather run the hazard of damning their souls with the repeated sin of fornication, than they will honestly engage in Wedlock to procreate within those reasonable bounds which the united laws of both God and man have both religiously appointed: Therefore methinks it would well become the care of a Parliament to redress this grievance, so very hurtful to the Kingdom in general, as well as to our sex in particular, by some compulsory law that should enforce Marriage upon all single sinners who otherwise will never keep a cow of their own whilst a quart of milk is to be brought for a penny."

The full conversation goes on to ensure that even celibate men are granted no reprieve. The two women imagine all sorts of evils befalling society from the minority of men who eschew married life as well as sexual relations.

In this we get a glimpse of the true source of hostility toward gay men. The hatred is not a fear of them, but a resent of their freedom and their lack of utility to women.

To Eliza and Mariana, as it is to the Bradford Wilcox's of today, men must marry, and they must do so within the confines of the law and the church. If they refuse, they are inferior, defective threats to society. They are to be punished and burdened for their refusal to indulge gynocentric culture.

Yet still, men resisted.

In 1898, two years after Charlotte Smith started advocacy to shame and punish men who refused to marry, a group was formed by the name, "Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band." Their mandate was clear.

As was reported in the New York World, then one of New York City's two top newspapers, 'The motto of the club is Solomon's proverb: "It is better to live in a corner of the housetop than with a brawling woman in a wide house." The objects of the club are to oppose matrimony, to fight for the liberty of man, to encourage the manufacture of all such devices as bachelor buttons and to check the movement inaugurated by Mrs. Charlotte Smith "and other disgruntled females" to require bachelors to wed.'

In one declaration, it is a statement supportive of both men's rights and men going their own way.

Eventually, of course, these voices of dissent on behalf of men would be pushed out of the mainstream media and shunned, as the media became more and more feminized. We can see the eventual result of that now plastered across the pages of most mainstream publications and places like PragerU, mocking and demonizing MGTOW and the MHRM, generally speaking.

The point of this is to make clear that misogamy, which covers the lion's share of MGTOW, isn't new. And MGTOW itself, has risen and fallen throughout the ages under many different names.

When the plan is reversed and women lie in wait for men to trap them into matrimony, it can arouse only disgust in the mind of man. If men prefer a single life and the enjoyment of selfish bachelor luxuries, it is because no woman has as yet touched their hearts in the right way, and that is not their fault either, but plainly the fault of women themselves. If women were what they might be and ought to be, they would not have to go gunning for husbands, dragging them in by the ears unwilling and holding them fast till the marriage ceremony was over. The husband who had been taxed or trapped into marrying could not do otherwise than despise ever after the woman who had thus trapped him. Let the men go their own way, to marry or not to marry at their own sweet will. If women were as really attractive, as self helpful, as they might be, they could get husbands fast enough—that is, if getting a husband was the chief end and aim of a woman's existence, which it is not; quite the contrary. If there were half as many marriages as there are, such as they are, and half as many children born, such as they are, the race would be better off.

Even literal reference to the subject predates all of us with a feminist writing about and somewhat encouraging men to go their own way in 1897.

The difference now, and actually the only difference, is the internet. With the new technology, silencing men who reject the slavish dictates of legally sanctioned marriage is no longer possible. As an instrument of support and education, the World Wide Web now affords the opportunity to reject marriage, and to reject the inevitable shaming by feminists and gynocentrists like Brad Wilcox.

Marching to your own drum still comes with a price, but the internet has made it affordable. That isn't good for marriage as it stands. Since white feathers and the empty allegation of being less than manly no longer work, the only solution left will be what has heretofore been unspeakable.

If society wants to encourage young men to marry, it will require an overhaul of the law and an overhaul of the female psyche. Biased laws have to go. The outrageous privilege and entitlement of women have to go.

It is hard to tell which will be harder. The legal change or the social change. Both are daunting. Most MGTOW won't care to worry about it, though. They will be too busy living their lives. They have already gotten the message, even if most don't know how old that message is.

Here at A Voice for Men we have already explored the roots of romantic love and chivalry that led us to life under the branches of this twisted old gynocentric tree.

We've taken it back 900 years to the work of Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughter Marie de Champagne, who commissioned many a troubadour to spread propaganda glorifying male sacrifice for the sake of women.

But even then there was a chink in the armor. In their seminal commissioned work, The Art of Courtly Love, by Andreas Capellanus, he makes a surprise conclusion after penning chapters on the noble dictates of romantic chivalry.

He says, and I quote: "Therefore if you will examine carefully all the things that go to make up love, you will see clearly that there are conclusive reasons why a man is bound to avoid it with all his might and to trample under foot all its rules."

One has to wonder if the courtly Marie ever read the whole work, and Capellanus may count himself lucky if she did not read the above addenda to the work – she might have had him beheaded.

Incidentally, the tendency to claim absolute ownership of the meaning of bachelorhood is also nothing new. Over a hundred years ago, in The Bachelor Book, a magazine dedicated to confirmed bachelors, we read the following:

> >
> Bachelorhood is surely one of the fine arts. No man becomes a bachelor other than by selection. A mere failure to connect on the matrimonial timetable does not constitute a bachelor! By no means. As well you might call a man a Frenchman who missed his steamer, thereby finding himself in France."

Today, many MGTOW will tell you that they had it backwards, that all it takes to be MGTOW, or a "real" bachelor if you will, is to miss that steamer. Perhaps there would even be a war of words between Bachelor Book subscribers and some modern MGTOW.

If there were, though, it would hardly matter. With time, and with embracing an understanding of our shared history, a larger revolution is unavoidable.

What constitutes a real bachelor or a real MGTOW? I am not going to pretend to know. I am just thankful that the age of shame is over for any man who chooses, and that the advocates of male subservience to hypergamy and gynocentrism no longer have the pulpit to themselves.

They can kiss those days goodbye, forever. We know this as we see them on the receiving end of some of the shame they are dishing out.

Fedora tip to Peter Wright of gynocentrism.com.

MGHOW: My journey

Peter Pan · 11 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Occasionally we republish notable articles from our archives. This article was first published in August 2012, and is republished as one of the original MGTOW classics.

My road to being a MGHOW was forged after witnessing my parents' marriage break down, my mother's and step father's marriage break down, and the countless other marriage breakdowns that dominated not only my family, but nearly all the families I knew by the time I was a teenager. I followed suit, with one marriage, and one long term de facto breakdown, which between them left me, at 38 years old, financially not much better off than I had been at 20. This was after I had made considerable investment in two houses, and nearly paid one off completely .

I didn't know what a MGHOW was, but I knew that legally recognized relationships of any type, with a woman, often resulted in financial ruin for men and that the law supported and encouraged women to use it as the tool for this destruction. All my life I had heard how it was a man's world and men were privileged, but my view of the world told me that it was entirely up to the woman to decide if you should continue to be allowed to have ownership of your home, be a father to your children, or even retain ownership of your income.

Once single, I stuck a sign inside the entrance to my unit which was my declaration of independence. It had three headings in large letters, with a small explanation of each underneath. The three headings were:: NO MARRIAGE, NO DEFACTO, NO KIDS. My open stance on this did not seem to limit my sex life at all. In fact while it drove women who wanted any of these things away, it attracted those who were like minded. I accumulated many 'friends with benefits' who all knew about each other. I had even explored the swinger's scene on some occasions, though it was not a predominant part of my life.

Most of the women in my life were affectionate, extremely sexual, and most of all, very independent. Some of these women would casually refer to themselves as feminists. Some had disowned the term altogether. All of them would become aware of my anti-feminist opinions over time and, apart from some disagreements, it didn't seem to affect anything much between us. My conclusion, in hindsight, is that no matter what these women considered themselves, they were not feminists.

At one point, in the early days of my MGHOW lifestyle, I was seeing a woman who I allowed to hassle me into agreeing to monogamy. Almost immediately the relationship changed and I began to feel uncomfortable with the arrangement. This was because after agreeing that she would be my sole source of sex, it would also become apparent that she would also be my sole source of female companionship and affection of any kind. Not only that, I had to alter my life so that I could be seen to be abiding by this.

The complaints came soon after. 'You spend too much time with other people', 'you went out on such and such a night and didn't tell me in advance'. That's code for 'you didn't ask my permission'. Before I knew it, I was heading down that same old road of answering to someone for every move, altering my comings and goings, always with thoughts of not triggering suspicions or complaints.

Disagreements would see sex withheld, and I felt pressure to agree to anything to avoid that happening. It became obvious to me after analyzing all of my past monogamous relationships, that this was the deal. This was monogamy. This is what it meant to a woman…..control.

I came to the conclusion that it was not enough to rule out marriage, de facto, and children. Indeed, if I had no intention of having more children, then monogamy was redundant. It served no purpose at all except to pander to women's (and men's) irrational and purely emotional need to secure ownership and control of their partner's body. This indeed makes sense if you are planning marriage, children, and raising a family together, at least until you have all the children you want. It made sense in times gone by, when the absence of birth control and hygiene products, disease prevention, abortion etc would leave a trail of destruction in the lives of those neither practicing monogamy nor celibacy.

I, however, live in an age where marriage has become a one way commitment, where children mostly become a man's child support payments, and where his house becomes his wife's house.

I was leaving work one day and about to head over to Debbie's. I'd been in a monogamous relationship with her for several weeks and already I was starting to feel the claustrophobic feeling that reminded me of my previous marriages. I didn't feel like going there – I was only going because she was a pest.

She had been harping on about how I wasn't spending enough time with her and had started repeatedly bringing up the subject of us living together. I started driving over to her house, and pulled over to the side of the road. I text'd the message on my phone, "going home, feeling very tired." Then I turned my phone off, and drove home.

The land line was ringing as I walked through the door. The conversation went something like,

"Peter, we need to talk."

"No we don't, what we need to do is stop seeing each other."

"aarrrh…umm, FINE, if that is what you want."

"That is what I want." The sound of the phone slamming down followed.

I breathed a sigh of relief, and suddenly I didn't feel tired anymore. I felt like painting blue lines on my face and jumping on a horse and riding with my sword thrust into the air, and yelling "FREEDOM!"

I had accumulated many friends with benefits prior to this relationship I had managed to remain in contact and friendly with some. I rang my closest friend with benefits, Tam, and told her I was back. After listening to my bitching about my hellish existence for the past several weeks, she said "That's what you get when you get involved with nice girls." I said "Yes, it won't happen again, only hardcore cock loving sluts like you for me, from now on, I promise.'

A celebration was called for, and this time it happened to be a gathering of friends and a night of debauchery followed.

It's been that way pretty much ever since.

My declaration expanded to four items, which was no longer displayed on my wall, but I made no secret of where I stood on each of these:

1. No marriage. Marriage has become nothing but the temporary "for as long as I feel like it" arrangement that nearly always results in divorce, and the stripping of assets and children, and parental rights from men, and often, the continued enslavement of men via alimony. Furthermore, as a partnered man, you are probably even more at risk of false allegations than a swinging dick because false allegations are being enabled, and becoming standard tools for women to use in order to extract further benefits upon divorce, and separation and to further remove the man from her life, and the children's lives. It is far too dangerous a deal for a man to consider, and even if you think not, it is going to get worse.The marriage deal you agree to today will be rewritten and amended behind your back via feminist lobbyists exerting their will over the legislative process while you wait for the inevitable divorce to come.

2. No defacto. In many jurisdictions, de facto holds exactly the same weight as marriage, and in the jurisdictions where it does not, it soon will. If you agree that marriage is too dangerous, then you must rule out living together, too. Since you only undertake these arrangements with a view to "until death do us part," what do you think the chances are of the rules not being amended during your life time? And if it's not death do us part, but temporary that you are planning, then why do it?

What temporary relationship is worth the risk, and the cost of the ass reaming you will get via family law, if she chooses to strap that giant dildo on at the end? You have no say in whether she chooses to use the tools that have been made available to her. Her word is not worth the paper it's not written on. Pre-nups may or may not hold legal weight in your jurisdiction at the time you enter into such agreements, but at the time of dissolution they are toilet paper, just waiting for the government and feminists to peel it off the roll, wipe and flush.

3. No children. Obviously if you aren't going to marry a woman, or live together, then you would have to be crazy to have children with one. It can only result in you eventually being removed from their lives, and paying child support, regardless of any deals you have with her. Family courts need not honor either verbal or written agreements you have with her. Let breeders be responsible for populating the world, and let breeders pay the price for it.

4. No monogamy. This one results in the most objections, even from MGTOW. But think about it. If you rule out the other three No's, what reason is there to agree to monogamy, and what reason does a woman have to agree to monogamy with you? Jealousy? Insecurity? A fear of competition? A distaste for women who sleep around? Why? Have not women the same right to go their own way, also? Indeed, if as MGTOW, we are going to reject marriage, and other forms of committed relationships, then we are faced with either life-long celibacy, or acceptance of the non-monogamous woman. As long as you are trying to go your own way, but seek to have a pet woman, who is monogamous to you, you are seeking two mutually exclusive things and that very desire will see you surrendering control.

Is this monogamous relationship going to be for life? If not, then why bother? Who will break this relationship off, and what will be the fallout when that happens?

But aren't women who are sexually active, and not monogamous, just sluts? And sluts are bad, horrible women, right?

First, what is a slut? Oh, those are those women who dress in provocative clothes and parade down the street shoving their pseudo sexuality in people's faces in order to incite hatred against men. No, not really. Those are show ponies and posers who want to use their sexually provocative appearance and displays to gain attention for their cause and promote the hatred of men. A truly sexually liberated woman uses her sexuality to pleasure herself, and her partners.

Wait, but sluts are those bitches that make false rape allegations after begging to be fucked senseless by groups of men, aren't they? Well, I've known many women who aren't averse to group sex, but none of them have caused me or any other man any grief. Obviously, being a sexually liberated woman does not go hand in hand with being any of these other negative things.

The women who do that are more often immature, dishonest women who have some expectation to gain something from a sexual encounter, and don't get it. Being a sexually liberated woman who spreads it around and enjoys her sex life with anybody she chooses to engage with does not mean she is a liar, a cheat, a bitch, or that she hates men. In fact, the vast majority of women I've known who are this kind of sexual free spirit, really like guys.

They are often called sluts and whores by many people who are aware of their private sex lives. Most take offense at the whore label. Among friends, the term slut is often used, and is almost a term of endearment. They don't sell sex, they give it away, and don't want anything in return except the enjoyment. This makes them the opposite of whores. In fact, the average women has more in common with a whore than this type of sexual free spirit (slut). That statement isn't meant as an insult to average women, or whores. It's just an observation of the fact that the more requirements a woman places on a man to provide utility, or material goods, or services for her, in order for him to gain, or maintain access to sex with her, the more that relationship resembles prostitution.

A woman who has a high libido, an open mind, a love for men and sex, is not the enemy of men or of the MRM; not on that account alone, regardless of how many lovers she has, or what sex those lovers may be. In fact, for the MGHOW who does not want celibacy, and has rejected any form of state sanctioned legally binding relationship, the non-monogamous, sexually active women is your only option outside of prostitutes.

To enjoy her company though, you will have to dispense with attitudes that are incompatible with your chosen lifestyle of a sexually active MGHOW. To put it bluntly, as an MGHOW, you have no right to expect a woman to make a commitment to you, while you shun commitment. If you are not a celibate MGHOW, but a sexually active one, you are in fact, a slut, if the same standards are applied to yourself.

The sexually liberated and liberal women, is the woman that prostitutes seek to imitate. They are what the show ponies, the cock teasers, the users, the rinsers and most of the other nasties seek to appear to be, but are not. Beware of imitations.

A woman who is in the habit of flaunting herself and behaving provocatively in public, is more often an imitation. She is sending out messages saying, I'm hot, I'm sexual, but usually not to obtain sex, but to obtain something else. Attention, money, drinks, etc, but not sex. They want you to want them, but they don't want you to fuck them, at least not unless you are living up to some other agenda they have.

A hidden price tag with an unstated amount.

The truly sexually liberated woman may on occasion dress up and behave provocatively, but when they do, they aren't playing pretendies, and they seldom take offense at being approached, even a clumsy pass by a guy they are not interested in will usually not see them behave rudely or maliciously.

As opposed to traditionalists, the MRM's message is largely that men should be freed from the expectation of provision and protection of women; that it is no longer appropriate to hold men to traditional roles while women have been freed to pursue lives of their choosing.

Men are still being held to traditional standards though. Most women count on this. Shaming men on the basis of their sexuality, being gay, being celibate, being bi-sexual, being promiscuous, etc., is all part of the mechanism that keeps men protecting and providing. Indeed, the provision of sex, or the withdrawal of sex, is a powerful tool that is used to keep men pursuing relationships that, when looked at logically, differ little from prostitution; prostitution without a clear price tag. They will let you know what the cost is later..

With the ever increasing stance of feminism being anti sex, particularly anti sex between men and women, that all sex is rape, and other ridiculous lies that feminism is spreading and slowly having enshrined in law, feminists have become the new totalitarian prudes of the world as opposed to the sexual liberation movement that they promoted themselves to be in the sixties.

The MRM has the opportunity to replace them as the movement that promotes true sexual equality, responsibility, as well as the notion that your sexual activity is a personal issue, and should not be used as a yard stick to gauge your value as a human being, or even your morality. Those things should be judged by – honesty, integrity, compassion, work ethic – are not what you do in bed, or who you do it with.

Enter Tam. I've known Tam for eleven years and regard her as a very dear friend.

Tam looks and behaves pretty much like an ordinary middle aged woman. Nobody would ever guess the evil that dwells within.

Tam has a full-time job, and often works overtime. She also generates some income from writing and has done copy for advertising, as well as writing erotica. She has two adult children who are both very fine examples of good upbringing. They are educated, productive and fine upstanding citizens.

Tam is divorced from their father and maintains a friendly relationship with him. In the divorce, she rejected the family court's insistence that she take more assets and money than she was agreeing to, and told them if they confiscated it for her, she would just return it to him. There was no dispute over children, and no child support paid either way. The kids pretty much just came and went at both houses as they chose. Although Tam could have received some child support being the lower earning partner, she did not apply for it.

She has her own place, paid off, and has renovated it herself, mostly with her own hands. She currently has a job that is partly physical, and partly outdoors. She is totally financially independent, and totally independent in all ways. She donates to charity, and has spent many a night in the past out in the cold helping homeless people (men). She regularly visits her ailing mother and performs chores for her, including shopping, housework etc. She is very likable and respectable member of the community. She neither smokes, or uses drugs, and is a very modest social drinker.

Tam is also a major slut, of the highest caliber. She has used several dating sites and meets up with guys now and then for sex. On some Saturday nights you may find her at home, reading, watching tv, going to a movie, or in a threesome with a couple of fuck buddies, or maybe a woman or a couple. You may find her at a swingers' party, or even a much more extreme gathering. Pretty much nothing is out of the question for Tam. All that, and she'll even spin for dinner and drinks at times.

You may think that women like Tam are rare. I would disagree. Nowhere near as rare as one might think anyway. I have known, and still know, many of them. In fact, you might say my life over the past 12 years has looked like a river flowing full of women like Tam. They are not hard to find, they are everywhere. But in order for them to reveal themselves to you, you must first be willing to accept them as they are.

My recommendation for MGTOW is to seek to acquaint yourself with such women, not just as a source of sex, but as a source of genuine friendship with women who do not require anything from you except the same.

As a popular movement, MGTOW has a long way to go. Many see the withdrawal of support of women, and the rejection of committed relationships as not only a method of protecting themselves from some of the worst excesses of feminist governance and legislation, but also as a political effort. They see it as a way, perhaps, to force laws to be rewritten and for marriage to be made safe, and beneficial to men, instead of just to women. If enough men adopted MGTOW lifestyles, I'm sure there would be much pressure for law reform that would benefit men.

I, for one, do not want things to go back to the way they used to be, where the marriage, commitment monogamy model is the only acceptable road to take for men, or women. I want marriage to be fair for men and women who choose it, and divorce to be the same. I want parental rights and property rights protected. I want the bias in favor of women in custody, child support, property etc, to be eliminated. But I want marriage, de facto, monogamy, and all the other choices to be just that, choices.

And no matter which lifestyle one chooses, you are as safe in your rights as in any other choice. Only then, in absence of moral and legal directives and sanctions for refusal to comply, can men truly choose

I used to be a proponent of commitment and monogamy. So who made me change? Feminists made me change. They made me who I am now, as surely as if they molded me and worked me with their own hands into my current form. So would I return to my old self if things were changed tomorrow? Nope, that toothpaste is not going back in the tube for me.

I discovered far too many women who like me just the way I am for me to give the slightest fuck about the others. For the women out there who are horrified at the existence of growing numbers of men like me, I suggest you reconsider your support of feminism, and the untenable nature of marriage and committed relationships for men, as rendered by feminist governance and legislation. You may have nothing but men like me to choose from in the future unless you reverse these trends.

Men are starting to see what monogamy really is. A temporary desire that women have, which draws from the ancient past where women were dependent upon finding a man to protect and provide for them and their offspring for their survival.

That instinct is inherited and is part of the hard wiring of the female brain, because they are all descendants of women who had that trait. The others did not survive. The hypergamous instinct also dictates that women seek out another mate in a number of years. Of course, in the ancient past, she would seek a mate with the greatest capability to protect and provide. But the instinct to move on is about reproductive diversity, I believe. In the modern world, the gold digging instinct is less important than the urge to diversify (have sex with others) and this explains why so many women cheat on their successful husbands with an economically inferior man. It's about a change of cock more than anything.

A non-monogamous relationship defeats this need by removing the requirement to get rid of your partner, or cheat, in order to satisfy this instinct. Hypergamy is exacerbated by monogamy. This is why the number one reason for marriage breakdowns is marriage itself. How many times do you hear "I'm just not in love with him anymore" No particular reason, she just isn't. She wants him out of the way so she can seek out that new dick. She begins to sabotage the relationship, she withholds sex, she starts arguments over nothing. He grovels and buys flowers and reads relationship advice and tries to ramp up the romance and be Mr. Nice Guy. This just shits her off to no end, because what she really wants is for him to fuck off so she can get herself some fresh meat. She isn't even aware of it. She rationalizes it all by making him the bad guy in her mind, and usually to everybody else as well.

The long term, or rather permanent monogamy of the past is dead gentlemen. It can only exist in an environment where to be otherwise carries a very high risk of adverse consequences.

Women have none.

The good old days are not coming back, and they weren't good for men anyway. What needs to happen is for men to claim the same freedom women have.

Remember the sixties? Civil rights, women's rights (feminism) and free love? Feminism was made popular largely because it hitched itself to free love. Women flocked to the movement, and so did men. This is a far cry from the attitudes that feminism promotes today.

I have a vision of the future. The 2020s and beyond will be the era of civil rights, men's rights, and free love. Yes, we will be the new sexual liberation movement. We will be the movement that brings an end to shaming people based on their sexual lifestyle and choices, whether they be straight, gay, bisexual, monogamous, swingers, or anything in between. The personal is not political, and it's about time that feminists got that message loud and clear, from men, and women. That might be a little hard to do though while so many of us are willing to throw rocks at any women engaging in any form of casual sex, as I have seen so often on MRM sites.

I'd like MRAs to think about the current feminist stance on matters of sex, and sexuality. The view that women are somehow rendered victims of something horrible by sexual contact with men, is not unlike the traditionalist view that women are sullied and dirtied by sexual activity with men. And I ask you something, if indeed men are not the pigs and apes and lower creatures that feminists say we are, then why should a woman be held in contempt for engaging in sexual activity with men? Why should the sexual activity she engages in devalue her if men are fully human and wonderful creatures? How is she dirtied by sex with men unless we also hate men, and think low of ourselves?

Unless a woman adheres to traditional standards, and demands commitment, which many men in the MRM and outside the MRM, are rejecting, is she crazy, victimized, or a low life? Is she worthless? This sounds very similar to what radfems, the church and traditionalists say. So what is the difference between us and them on sexuality issues? Not much in some cases, and women have noticed. I know that for a fact.

In the Image and Likeness of God

Peter Wright · 11 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

According to a recent poll only 18% of U.S. people consider themselves feminist.[1] On that account we can expect readers of romance novels to comprise not more than 18% feminists, and likely far less due to the fact that feminists disparage traditional approaches to romance…. at least according to their rhetoric.

A more generous National Geographic/Ipsos survey[2] of more than 1,000 American women found that 29% of respondents identified as feminists. From the study its worth noting, as an aside, the political spread among feminist women, with Republicans scoring low in feminist self-identification, Democrats scoring high, and Independents somewhere in the middle:

In line with these surveys, we can assume that women who identify as feminist represent less than one third of all women in the USA. With this fact in mind, imagine my surprise when I recently discovered that a whopping 60% of readers of romance novels are feminist, which means that almost two thirds of romantic love enthusiasts are…. feminists! This finding is from a survey of 800 people, which discovered the following details about the average romance reader:[3]

Author of the survey summarised the question and answers in the following way:

> "In the survey of romance readers, I asked if one identified as feminist, believed in equality but wouldn't use the term feminist – or, not at all. 61% of respondents replied in the affirmative to the first option. While many commentators expressed their ire at the believe-in-equality-but-wouldn't-use-the-term-feminist option, 35% selected this. Just 3% said not at all ("The third option makes me cry," one self declared feminist wrote).
>
> The more I read from both sides, the more I realized that we're more alike than we let on. Whether you call it chivalry or manners, we all want someone to open the door for us."[3]

Her last sentence proposes a rationale of (the high number of) feminist readers of romance novels: that they still want doors opened for them, whether actual doors, or doors into better jobs, boardrooms and other kinds of feminist power that are gifted to them by the actions of chivalric men. This point about feminist rationale was confirmed in a study by Gul & Kupfer[4] which discovered that feminists felt the positive sides of benevolent sexism outweighed the negatives even if they believed it was somewhat patronising.

Many feminists believe that romantic love is a subversive trope, a positive one that works to increase the power of women relative to men. Elizabeth Reid Boyd, of the School of Psychology and Social Science at Edith Cowan University, and Director of the Centre for Research for Women in Western Australia with more than a decade as a feminist researcher and teacher of women's studies, tells:

> "I muse upon arguments that romance is a form of feminism. Going back to its history in the Middle Ages and its invention by noblewomen who created the notion of courtly love, examining its contemporary popular explosion and the concurrent rise of popular romance studies in the academy that has emerged in the wake of women's studies, and positing an empowering female future for the genre, I propose that reading and writing romantic fiction is not only personal escapism, but also political activism.
>
> Romance has a feminist past that belies its ostensible frivolity. Romance, as most true romantics know, began in medieval times. The word originally referred to the language romanz, linked to the French, Italian and Spanish languages in which love stories, songs and ballads were written. Stories, poems and songs written in this language were called romances to separate them from more serious literature – a distinction we still have today. Romances were popular and fashionable. Love songs and stories, like those of Lancelot and Guinevere, Tristan and Isolde, were soon on the lips of troubadours and minstrels all over Europe. Romance spread rapidly. It has been called the first form of feminism (Putnam 1970).[4]

Readers of my writings are familiar with the idea that romantic love and feminism constitute a seamless tradition of gynocentrism that first began in the royal courts of Europe.[5] There have occurred transformations in the campaign strategies of feminists throughout the ensuing centuries, but the primary impulse remains consistent through each new generation of feminist activity: to increase the power of women via the institution of a 'sexual feudalism' – ie. the proposition that men should act as a quasi serving-class for women.

The following examples of romantic love in Victorian literature are excerpted from the book Male Masochism by Carol Siegal [6]. Notice the thematic continuity of this literature with the earlier sexual-relations contract first invented in Medieval Europe:

> "A great deal of what [Victorian] women's literary works had to say about gender relations may have been as disquieting as feminist political manifestos, and ironically so, in that the novels seem most anti-male in the very places where they most affirm a traditionally male vision of love. While women's lyric poetry tended to reverse the conventional gender roles in love by representing the female speaker as the lover instead of the object of love, women's fiction most frequently reproduced the images, so common in prior texts by men, of the self-abasing male lover and his exacting mistress.
>
> For example, in Wuthering Heights, Heathcliff declares himself Cathy's slave; in Jane Eyre, Rochester's desire for Jane is first inspired and then intensified by his physically dependent position; in Middlemarch, Will Ladislaw silently vows that Dorothea will always have him as her slave, his only claim to her love lies in how much he has suffered for her. In several Victorian novels by women, men must undergo quasi-ritualized humiliation or punishment before being judged deserving of their lady's attention. For instance, in Olive Schreiner's Story of an African Farm, the fair Lyndall condescends to treat her admirers tenderly after one has been horsewhipped and the other has dressed himself in women's clothes to wait on her. Although Victorian women's novels do explore the emotional insecurities of the heroines, their apparent self-possession is also stressed, in marked contrast to their lovers' displays of agony, desperation, and wounds."

The author goes on to say that male masochism and the dominatrix-like behavior of women in much literature is continuous with courtly love literature from the Middle Ages. And whilst some men self-consciously chose their lowly position in relation to women, the men described in Victorian women's novels lacked such volition and were helplessly controlled by the power of love and beauty:

> "These texts also insist that the true measure of male love is lack of volition. While the heroines make choices that define them morally, the heroes are helplessly compelled by love, and not judged to love unless they are helpless. In this respect Victorian women's fiction recovers the ethos so often expressed in medieval courtly romance that love must be "suffered as a destiny to be submitted to and not denied." It also departs from the conventions of medieval romance in describing the helpless submission to love as an attribute of true manliness, and thus Victorian women's fiction directly attacks the degeneration of chivalry into the self-conscious and controlled "gallantry" of eighteenth century libertines."

Just like their forebears, feminists constitute an army of women working to preserve and extend the tradition of elevated womanhood that has been championed over the last millennium, making the feminist project a remarkably traditional enterprise while putting a lie to its claim to be a forward looking, progressive movement.

The only question left to ask is how, exactly, can this tradition be most accurately characterised? Is it a philosophy, an ideology, human nature, or the slow cultural build-up of behaviorist techniques applied to heterosexual relationships? Its probably a little of all these things, but I'm going to follow the European tradition at the root of romantic love, which saw it primarily as a religion complete with its own guiding Goddess. Her name, as spoken in medieval Germany and through the centuries was Frau Minne.

I have published details about this Goddess before, so rather than rewriting the details I invite the reader to visit the article[7] and look further into the essential religiosity at the heart of our gynocentric cult. Furthermore, as recently stated by Alison Tieman, divinity has today become associated with every human woman, imparting to her the power of "I am a Goddess" in much the same way as once done to pharaohs or emperors, or divinised mortals, who became God-men in ancient times and received religious devotion due of a God. That is, half the human population has undergone an apotheosis, while the other half stand in awe and service.

The differences between a god-complex arising variously from a psychotic episode, in cases of extreme narcissism, or in a society that has seen fit to elevate an individual/s to God status is perhaps moot. These things more often appear together, in combinations. Whatever the causes, we are safe to conclude that feminism amounts today to a global religion, one as powerful as any that have gone before it, with women collectively representing the Godhead to an enthralled male audience.

A man presenting Frau Minne with his heart which has been stabbed by three arrows. (painted wood, Southern Germany, 1320-1330 ca.)

References:

[1] Only 18 percent of Americans consider themselves feminists, Vox 2015
[2] Less than a third of American women identify as feminists
[3] Dangerous Books For Girls: The Bad Reputation of Romance Novels Explained.
[4] Elizabeth Reid Boyd, Romancing Feminism: From Women's Studies to Women's Fiction, 2014
[4] Gul, P., & Kupfer, T. R. (2018). Benevolent Sexism and Mate Preferences: Why Do Women Prefer Benevolent Men Despite Recognizing That They Can Be Undermining?. Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin, 0146167218781000.

[5] Damseling, chivalry and courtly love (part two)
[6] Male Masochism by Carol Siegal
[7] 'Frau Minne' the Goddess who steals men's hearts

MGTOW – A Discussion

AVfM Video Source · 12 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

> MGTOW – A Discussion
>
> More and more men are leaving the broken system of marriage and relationships. Why is this happening, where are they going, what will come next? Tune in with Janice Fiamengo, Paul Elam and Tom Golden as we discuss this growing phenomenon!
>
> Posted by Regarding Men on Thursday, June 11, 2020

My Barbaric Yawp

Mark Dent · 13 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I feel I am drowning in an ocean of lies.

Dystopian nightmares about a world so distorted and disconnected from reality we feel a pulsing dread and disorientation are no longer the sole preserve of fiction novels and the silver screen.

It is here and now.

Have you ever had a nightmare which involved familiar people and places yet carried an underlying feeling of unease bordering on fear?

There was something not quite right. The faces looked the same. They smiled and engaged with you. The sun shone and there was nothing overtly sinister lurking in any corner of this dreamscape.

But you know better. Things are not as they appear. Your primal instincts are on full alert and the message is clear. These people are not your friends. This environment is not safe.

Sadly, my gut is screaming the same message to me today.

The silent majority may well be as disgusted and bemused by the rapid changes and barrage of lies to which we are subjected every day, but they are called the silent majority for a reason.

Silence ultimately changes nothing.

That is why those who hold the power terrorize those few who dare to speak out and draw attention to their mind games and terror tactics.

Am I being hyperbolic? A tad too dramatic?

Prove me wrong.

Wear a MAGA cap and walk down a busy street or stand on a packed train.

Proclaim the scientific truth that there are only two genders on a university campus or your Twitter account. Dare to say: Only women menstruate.

Write: Women are not the only victims of domestic violence.

Post the words, All Lives Matter on your Facebook page or in public.

Speak or write words of support for your police force.

Write about the systemic prejudice men are subjected to in our daily lives.

Refute the lies about the systemic oppression of the Indigenous people of Australia with facts and statistics.

Point out the facts about the black crime rate in America and Australia.

Suggest every country must have a right to decide who comes into their country.

Post a simple line: Don't believe all women.

Call abortion the legalized killing of a baby.

Suggest whites are not the only race which can be racist.

Do any of the things I listed and you will suffer consequences.

You will be scorned, abused and ridiculed.

You may be banned from the platform you used to utter your profanities.

You will be threatened with physical violence.

You may experience physical violence.

You will end friendships.

You will be branded a hater and an inciter of violence when in fact only you will be under threat of harm.

You will be called a racist, a sexist and transphobic.

You may well be sacked by your employer.

Your house may be smeared in graffiti and your windows smashed.

These are not suppositions. It is the truth.

I have become deeply saddened by the fact that I have had to remove myself from Facebook in order to prevent a complete breakdown within my extended family.

The one person who stood by my side and supported me whenever the accusations and branding began in response to calmly stated facts is now dead.

My younger brother was my "wingman". He was far from a saint. He was a rascal. But, like me, the lies and misrepresentations of the truth caused him to physically fume and his guts burned just like mine.

As we worked out together he used to punch the heavy bag in a burst of adrenalized fury as I talked about the latest feminist inspired programs and funding of our state government or the collective blanket of guilt being thrown over all men yet again when a woman died at the hands of a man.

I miss my brother. I ache for him.

I am saddened by the knowledge that if some of my friends were aware of where I stand on the political spectrum I occupy today or knew how I felt about the BLM movement, they would distance themselves from me, talk in disbelieving tones behind my back and ultimately lessen their contact.

I am fortunate to have a tight inner circle of people I consider soulmates who know exactly where I stand. But those outside of this tight circle would perhaps recoil if they heard me speak my mind on an array of politically hot subjects.

Don't misunderstand me.

I don't hesitate to speak out and tell the truth about any subject. I don't go proselytizing but if it is raised in the company of friends and family I will give my opinion without equivocation. But I know there will be fallout, tension and consequences.

So, I sit on the edge of my seat, waiting for someone to make a disparaging comment about men or self-indulgently shake their head in disgust at just how racist their fellow Australians are or what a hell hole America has become under its current president.

Of course, any reference to female oppression in our country is violently rejected regardless of the company I find myself in.

But you see the disbelief on their faces. You see the slowly emerging anger, sometimes controlled but still very obvious because I dared to question what is meant to be an observation requiring nothing more than universal support and acknowledgement.

"Who brung him!' they silently scream.

My dear dad often used this expression in jest when somebody misspoke or clumsily dropped a plate or spilled his tea.

Oh dad. What would you make of these times?

I was thinking about the question of power and lies last night.

I was struck by the compelling truth about the two groups currently garnering the support of the media, government, education system and mobs in our western culture.

Black Lives Matter and feminism. Both of these movement's entire premise is built upon lies.

Here in Australia, the claim that our indigenous people are marginalized and ignored, targeted by violent police and unjustly incarcerated is demonstrably false.

Just as feminist claims about the oppression and invisibility of women are actually the complete inverse of reality, so too are the indigenous claims of oppression.

If what they say is true, they must explain the following facts.

There are a range of government funded programs and entitlements which are only available to people who are indigenous or Torres Strait Islanders.

> The Royal Dental Hospital of Melbourne offers free general dental care, emergency dental care and denture care to indigenous and Torres Strait Islanders.
>
> There are no waiting lists for Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander patients for general dental care and denture care.
>
> We will offer you the first appointment that is available.

No waiting lists. If you are black you are rushed to the front of the line.

If you are a low-income white man with four rotting molars and a terrible toothache, tough luck.

I'm sure this personal story will move you as deeply as it did me.

> Our Stories – Robert Critch
>
>  As a young Gunaikurnai man growing up in Broadmeadows, Robert Critch was too busy working and worrying about his finances to give his dental health a second thought. It wasn't until he had to have the last of his natural teeth extracted at the age of 27 that he realised the consequences of poor oral health.
>
> Robert got in touch with The Royal Dental Hospital of Melbourne (RDHM) and has been attending denture appointments. He is optimistic that this time he will get the smile he has always dreamed of.

You see- Robert was too busy working and worrying about his finances to take care of his teeth and he didn't realize the terrible consequences of poor oral health until he had the last of his natural teeth extracted!

We white folk who happen to eat too many lollies and neglect our dental hygiene get the results we deserve!

Toothache-well clean your bloody teeth more often. Yellow, rotting teeth. Give up your drugs and cigarettes. You have no-one to blame but yourself! You want them fixed? You better be ready for a budget breaking bill!

Never fear, Robert. You are indigenous. Your skin tone is just the right shade. You go straight to the top of the waiting list and you get your new dentures for free! (Robert actually looks about as indigenous as I do, perhaps he has a great great grandad who was indigenous.)

If you are homeless and white you too may get free dental treatment. Indigenous people do not have to be homeless in order to have access to this benefit.

Payments and support for Indigenous Australians

Department of Health helps Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples stay healthy and strong with a free health check.

Use Payment and Service Finder to help you find out what payments and services you may be able to get.

ABSTUDY can help you and your family with study, Australian Apprenticeship or traineeship costs.

Relocation Scholarship can help if you need to move to, or from, a remote or regional area to study. It's paid once a year.

Student Start-up Loan is a voluntary loan you can get up to twice a year. You can get it if you're an eligible higher education student. It can help you buy study related items like textbooks.

Assistance for Isolated Children Scheme can help you with the extra study costs for your children. It's for people who can't go to a state or public school on a daily basis because they either:

Getting help with the cost of medicine

The Pharmaceutical Benefits Scheme offers reduced cost prescription medicines. You can get help to buy medicine if you have a chronic disease or are at risk of one.

The Closing the Gap PBS Co-payment helps you get most prescription medicines at a lower price.

But there is more.

> Job Centre Australia's Aboriginal Employment Pathway Program (AEPP) is designed to provide culturally appropriate support for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people to overcome barriers to gaining and maintaining employment. We individually tailor the support required, whether it be training, on the job support or mentoring to help in the transition to employment. Job Centre Australia has Indigenous Engagement Co-ordinators and trainers in NSW and QLD, with approximately 6% of our staff identifying as Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander.

There are jobs which are permitted to advertise exclusively for Indigenous or Torres Strait Islanders.

> Unfortunately, there is some misunderstanding that discrimination laws are an obstacle to addressing the inequality experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people in employment. On the contrary, discrimination laws recognise that some groups, including racial groups, have suffered historical disadvantage and do not enjoy their human rights equally with others. These laws permit employers to adopt 'special measures' to assist disadvantaged racial groups so that they can have similar access to opportunities as others in the community.
>
> This guideline will help employers to use the 'special measure' provisions in the federal Racial Discrimination Act 1975 (Cth) and state and territory discrimination laws, to target Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people for recruitment. We believe this is an important resource for employers seeking to advance the rights of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples.

Dr Tim Soutphommasane Race Discrimination Commissioner

The Race discrimination Minister promotes racial discrimination.

How deliciously Orwellian!

Our federal government spends 30 billion dollars a year in an attempt to meet the needs of our indigenous people.

That equates to:

> Estimated expenditure per person in 2012-13 was $43,449 for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Australians, compared with $20,900 for other Australians (a ratio of 2.08 to 1 — an increase from a ratio of 1.93 to 1 in 2008-09).

Yet we are a racist country.

We have provided millions in funding to support the Aboriginal Arts community.

We openly discriminate against non-indigenous people and enshrine the right to do so in law,

Confirm your Indigenous heritage

> Some of our positions are just for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. We call these positions Affirmative Measures. You'll need to confirm your Indigenous heritage if you are offered an Affirmative Measures position.

The marching mobs chant about indigenous deaths in custody, inferring those who died were murdered or brutalized when the vast majority died from health-related problems or suicide. They have no concern for or interest in the deaths of white men in custody.

Trend

Using prison population data from the Report on Government Services (SCRGSP 2014a), the rates of death in prison custody across Australia were:

- 08 per 100 Indigenous prisoners and 0.17 per 100 non-Indigenous prisoners in 2011–12; and
- 11 per 100 Indigenous prisoners and 0.20 per 100 non-Indigenous prisoners in 2012–13 (SCRGSP 2014a)

So non indigenous prisoners are more likely to die in custody than indigenous prisoners! In fact, in the 2011-12 period non indigenous prisoners were twice as likely to die as indigenous prisoners.

Not one of these mob members wishes to confront the reality of the shockingly high rates of crime committed disproportionately by our indigenous people or the black people of America.

Indisputable facts become weapons used by "racists."

Could the disproportionate crime committed by black people possibly account for the disproportionate number of black people incarcerated in our prisons?

NO! Fuck off racist!

The fact that indigenous men are thirty times more likely to commit domestic violence or the disturbing truth that the vast majority of indigenous people murdered are killed by other indigenous people is a truth too uncomfortable and disturbing to be addressed.

> Aboriginal women here are 37 times more likely to be hospitalised than non-Aboriginal women for non-fatal family violence-related assaults. In the Northern Territory the rate of hospitalisation is up to 86 times higher for Aboriginal women. In central Australia, this figure is 95 times more likely for Aboriginal women.
>
> We also know that Indigenous people are disproportionately victims and offenders in homicide incidents, and that most of these occur between family members.

So, the vast majority of journalists refuse to mention it and they join the crusade with a tear in the eye and black square on their Facebook profile.

Watch this Avi Yemini video in which he questions those who are taking part in the Melbourne BLM march. It says everything that needs to be said about these mobs. Avi was the host of the Melbourne March For Men in Melbourne a couple of years ago.

Do I want our indigenous people cared for? Yes, I do.

Do I want every indigenous person to have the same opportunities as white people? Yes, I do.

Is there a need for some of our indigenous people to get a "leg up" from our government to help them find their way? Perhaps.

But I do not write about the support of our indigenous people because I object to it or find it incomprehensible. I present these facts because we are constantly told we continue to oppress and subjugate our indigenous population.

There were signs calling the deaths of indigenous people in custody, genocide.

One poster said "We have 432 George Floyds of our own. They deserve justice.

Another said: "Where's the justice for 432 murdered indigenous Australians?

They literally make things up to fit their agenda.

Lies.

What kind of cause can it be when people have to invent a narrative to engender the sympathy and support of the population? (I can think of another that does just this.)

If we truly do oppress our indigenous brothers and sisters the evidence should be overwhelming and obvious.

Of course, the opposite is true.

We grant privileges and entitlements to our indigenous people which are not available to white people in our country.

Are indigenous people living in poverty and suffering unacceptable levels of violence, addiction and abuse? Yes, they are.

Is that a result of current day oppression and racism?

No.

It is far more complex than that. Countless governments have tried and are continuing to attempt to close the poverty gap but at some point, the indigenous community must take responsibility for themselves.

> Although poverty in Australia is evident among all ethnic groups, it is Indigenous Australians who appear most profoundly affected by poverty. Research has shown, over the past thirty years since the Henderson Inquiry into poverty, that Indigenous Australians are significantly worse off than non-Indigenous Australians, according to all social indicators…Not only is poverty deeply entrenched, the causes are complex…despite government policies directed towards achieving economic equality for Indigenous Australians, there has been little improvement to their relative socioeconomic status, according to standard social indicators.[2]

Indigenous activist, Jacinta Price can have the final word on the credibility of the The Black Lives Matter Activists who marched in cities all around Australia.

> 'Just watching the footage of protesters and the conversations around white privilege make me sick to my stomach,' she told Sky News.
>
> These are narcissists … they don't have to do any hard work just appear as though they care.'
>
> Ms Price, a Warlpiri woman and Alice Springs Town Councillor, said more Aboriginal people die outside of police custody than within it, with the majority of Aboriginal people killed and maimed by other Aboriginal people.
>
> 'You don't care because the perpetrators are also black, and that's the big problem,' she said.

> 'People only care if there's seen to be a white perpetrator.'
>
> According to the Australian Bureau of Statistics 2014–15 National Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Social Survey, more than one in five or 22.3 per cent of all Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people aged over 15 had experienced physical violence or threats in the previous 12 months.
>
> Half of all of those who had experienced physical violence over the 12-month period said that their most recent attacker was a family member.
>
> 'This is the reality that goes on in the remote communities that these protesters care zero for,' Ms Price said.
>
> 'They do not care one bit. They stand there virtue-signalling and acting as though they're so terribly sorry for the racism that Aboriginal people are faced with.
>
> 'It's not racism that is sexually abusing our kids and it is not racism that is killing our people – it's the actions of our own people.'

Now, let's turn our attention to that other "oppressed" and "disadvantaged" demographic -women. Feminist claims of gendered injustice for women carry no more validity than the erroneous and deliberately divisive claims of Black Lives Matter activists.

I will not run through facts which have been presented with such regularity on this website with regard to the entitlements and privileges our government showers upon women, nor will I provide the countless examples of media and educational institutions which prioritize women's needs over men's.

We know all about them.

It is quite shocking to acknowledge the fact that these two groups- BLM and Feminism have succeeded in gaining world -wide attention and support for their "cause" when their claims of victimhood are based upon lies and inventions.

Both groups rely on shaming and intimidating anyone who questions the validity of their claims.

Both groups rely on the cowardice or ignorance of the general population to create massive support for their cause.

Both groups know their lies will rarely be called out by a compliant, virtue signaling media.

Both groups no there are never any consequences for their violent actions, lies and threats.

For they are black.

For they possess a vagina.

They are oppressed no matter how incongruous such a claim may appear to be.

So many black people who claim they have no voice in America do so from a microphone, standing at a podium in front of a sea of cameras in front of tens of thousands of people. And their voices are heard, acknowledged and people rush to accommodate their requests regardless of how insane they may be.

Defund the police? Fuck that. Remove all police!

Feminists do the same.

They complain about their powerlessness and lack of a voice from the steps of the Parliament in which they reside.

They write about their unique female struggles and burdens in their daily column in the country's biggest selling newspaper.

They talk about gender inequity to their school staff of which 80% are women.

They talk about the lack of roles for women in the entertainment industry as they accept their fifth Oscar in their jewel encrusted attire.

Does the word oppressed actually hold any power or meaning anymore?

The words racist and victim have been twisted and manipulated and misused so frequently that they have lost the capacity to draw empathy or register shock.

They really have lost their sting. They are a blunt, ineffective weapon used by those who have no case or true cause.

They are as effective as a toothbrush with frayed, softened bristles.

And then we come to the cause close to our hearts. The systemic abuse of men and boys in our judicial and educational institutions.

The media and entertainment industries' endless assault on masculinity is self-evident for anyone with eyes to see.

The deliberate and calculated blanket of invisibility thrown over men who are victims of domestic violence, war, workplace death, homelessness, suicide and injustice in our courts-all of which can be demonstrated to be true with statistics and cold, unemotional facts.

We have the truth. We speak and write the truth.

Yet we remain a gnat on the shoe of the giant which is societal indifference.

My sister is passionate about refugee rights. She knows I am an advocate for men's rights and is relatively neutral (at best) on the subject.

When she rails against public indifference to her cause my hackles are raised.

I point out the fact that at least her "cause" is on the "table" and in the public domain as an issue worth debating. I refer her to the ABC, The Age and many other powerful media outlets which regularly promote and support her cause.

I explain that even her opponents in the debate, at best might call her a "bleeding heart" or simply suggest her heart is in the right place but the realities and practicalities of the issue escape her.

They don't laugh in her face. They don't mock, denigrate and dismiss her concerns. They don't respond with rage and threats. They don't label her with poisonous pejoratives inferring she is the lowest kind of bigot and hater when it is love which fuels her passion. They don't block her or remove her online comments. She doesn't lose friends.

This response is reserved for those who speak up for men.

The same can be said for many other noble and "safe" issues concerning race, disability, LGBTQ rights and many other political causes. You can ride their wagons without fear of censorship or censure. You will win multiple "likes", lots of virtual as well as real pats on the back and feel a warm fuzzy glow in your tummy too.

You are one of the good guys (and gals).

Our passion, our hope for some recognition of the injustice endured by those we advocate for is nowhere near the "table" upon which all of these issues and causes are hotly discussed and noted by governments.

We are not even a whisper in the corridor outside the room where the "table" resides!

On the rare occasion men and women gather to bring awareness to this travesty which impacts far more lives than those who claim to be victims of racism or sexism in this country, we are attacked with unbridled hatred and feral rage.

We are shut down, lied about, blocked, censored and shamed into silence.

So, I bay at the moon.

I scream at the sky.

I sound my barbaric yawp over the roofs of the world.

And then I go to bed.

If you want your sense of hope raised, watch this beautiful, brave, black woman speak the truth to a BLM mob. It makes one dare to believe this madness will end one day.

I am black! I am not oppressed! she cries.

Her next target should be the annual women's march.

Being in a minority, even in a minority of one, did not make you mad. There was truth and there was untruth, and if you clung to the truth even against the whole world, you were not mad. George Orwell, 1984

Black lives do matter

Robert Brockway · 14 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

We're hearing a lot about the problems of African-Americans at the moment. There are some very serious issues that need to be addressed. Those issues are, to a large extent, problems that primarily affect black men. A Voice for Men and the broader men's rights movement has discussed these issues in the past and will again in the future.

A new problem that has appeared in the black community in recent years is Black Lives Matter.

Black Lives Matter (BLM) is a social and political movement that is driving many of the riots and disturbances currently being seen across the United States and other countries. As we see with feminism, many followers of BLM apparently know little of the movement itself. BLM is part of a coalition of groups across the United States called the Movement for Black Lives (M4BL). BLM has come to dominate M4BL and they are increasingly being seen as indistinguishable. The About-us page on the M4BL website is insightful about their true aims:

> We believe that prisons, police and all other institutions that inflict violence on Black people must be abolished and replaced by institutions that value and affirm the flourishing of Black lives.

So they are going beyond merely abolishing the police but prisons too. We'll be hearing more about that in the mainstream media if they can get the police in Minneapolis abolished.

> We believe in centering the experiences and leadership of the most marginalized Black people, including but not limited to those who are trans and queer, women and femmes, currently and formerly incarcerated, immigrants, disabled, working class, and poor.

Here they avoid a direct reference to men. It is worth noting that the vast majority of African-Americans who are currently or were formerly incarcerated are men.

> We believe in transformation and a radical realignment of power:
> The current systems we live inside of need to be radically transformed, which includes a realignment of global power. We are creating a proactive, movement-based vision instead of a reactionary one.
>
> We build kinship with one another:
> We draw from political lessons, grow in our leadership, and expanding our base to build a stronger movement.
>
> We are anti-capitalist:
> We believe and understand that Black people will never achieve liberation under the current global racialized capitalist system.

Here we see that M4BL seeks radical political change at a global level and that M4BL is anti-capitalist.

M4BL also has an extensive policy platform. Selected items are presented below:

Political Power:

> We demand independent Black political power and Black self-determination in all areas of society. We envision a remaking of the current U.S. political system in order to create a real democracy where Black people and all marginalized people can effectively exercise full political power.

Here we see that M4BL seeks radical political change at a national level.

Community Control:

> We demand a world where those most impacted in our communities control the laws, institutions, and policies that are meant to serve us – from our schools to our local budgets, economies, police departments, and our land – while recognizing that the rights and histories of our Indigenous family must also be respected. This includes:
>
> (1) Direct democratic community control of local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies, ensuring that communities most harmed by destructive policing have the power to hire and fire officers, determine disciplinary action, control budgets and policies, and subpoena relevant agency information.
>
> (2) An end to the privatization of education and real community control by parents, students and community members of schools including democratic school boards and community control of curriculum, hiring, firing and discipline policies.

Here we see that M4BL seeks radical political change at a local level.

This section makes it clear that control of the machinery of government would fall to a minority of the community – exactly what BLM has supposedly been rioting against. They don't say who gets to decide if a community is most impacted or most harmed by destructive policing but we can safely say the plan is that they do.

Quotes from the BLM & M4BL organisations above demonstrate that they seek to make political change on local, national and global scales, are openly anti-capitalist and seek redress for the working class in the manner of Marxism. The Marxist influence is particularly obvious when comparing this to the explanation of Marxism offered by an openly Marxist organisation, Red Flag:

> What's in a name? Being a Marxist means being a revolutionary anticapitalist, a fighter against all forms of oppression, an internationalist who wants to end capitalism around the whole world, and a believer in the power of the working class.

In addition two of the three founders of BLM, Patrisse Cullors & Alicia Garza are openly Marxist.

During one interview Cullors commented on the wide range of philosophies she had read while attending a year-long course at the National School for Strategic Organising (NSSO):

> We spent the year reading, anything from Marx, to Lenin, to Mao, learning all types of global critical theory and about different campaigns across the world,…

BLM is quiet about its Marxist connections but other Marxists are not.

BLM also enjoys widespread support from Marxists outside the United States such as the UK based Marxist Student Federation.

It is not surprising that Cullors has studied Mao. The tearing down of statues that we are currently witnessing is reminiscent of the four olds of the Cultural Revolution in China – Old Customs, Old Culture, Old Habits, and Old Ideas.

More can be seen on the BLM website:

> We make our spaces family-friendly and enable parents to fully participate with their children. We dismantle the patriarchal practice that requires mothers to work "double shifts" so that they can mother in private even as they participate in public justice work.
>
> We disrupt the Western-prescribed nuclear family structure requirement by supporting each other as extended families and "villages" that collectively care for one another, especially our children, to the degree that mothers, parents, and children are comfortable.

Here we have explicit references to “patriarchal” practices. In the 19th century children and then women left the workforce as societal wealth grew. In the 20th century feminists demanded that women return to the workforce as not working was apparently oppressive. And now BLM is claiming women working is patriarchal.

They go on to talk about disrupting the nuclear family and talk about replacing it with ill-defined extended families or villages.

> We foster a queer-affirming network. When we gather, we do so with the intention of freeing ourselves from the tight grip of heteronormative thinking, or rather, the belief that all in the world are heterosexual (unless s/he or they disclose otherwise).”

Here we see references to intersectionality in all but name. The black community (and black men in particular) have so many serious issues to address that they would be better off staying focussed. They can’t though, because BLM is tied to intersectional feminism as we have seen in the last two quotes.

This paragraph is written in a very unusual manner, especially considering how well the rest of the document is written. The words before and after rather in the quote above do not have the same meaning. If they really preferred the words after rather they could have simply rewritten it.

BLM and M4BL are also critical of Israel and have connections to the anti-Israel Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions(BDS) movement just as feminism does.

What we are looking at today is a Marxist-Feminist-BDS-BLM Continuum. Not everyone on this continuum agrees with everyone else but they are in touch and they do work together to achieve common objectives.

Black lives do matter but we’ll all be worse off if BLM and the rest of the continuum continues to grow and gain control of state institutions.

Problematic Pronouns

Doug Mortimer · 17 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The other day I got an email from a woman I know. Not a friend, just an acquaintance. For various reasons, we communicate via email occasionally. The text of the email itself was nothing earth-shattering – in fact, now I can't remember what it was about. I scrolled all the way down and glanced at the usual ID stuff…name, title, address, name of organization, phone, fax, etc. At the bottom of this mix were two words: "she" and "her." I pondered that for a few seconds then went on to other things.

A few days later it dawned on me what it was. I was watching some YouTube videos of college kids at political meetings. Upon being given a microphone, each one would announce name, class status (freshman, sophomore, etc.), and finish off with the pronoun of preference. It was completely ludicrous since everyone I saw was readily identifiable as male or female. Just more laughable loony left nonsense. If you didn't see it and hear it with your own eyes and ears, you wouldn't believe it. Oh, these kids today.

But the woman who sent me the email is not a goofy college kid. And there's no doubt she is a bona fide adult human female. There is nothing in her dress or demeanor to suggest otherwise. Even if you saw her from a block away, you would have no doubt about that. She doesn't have one of those unisex first names like Terry or Chris. Yet she apparently feels it is necessary to include her preferred pronouns on email correspondence. This is a first for me. As is sadly the case today, when something like this happens, one can't help but wonder how long before it becomes part of the woodwork. In more progressive niches of society, it may already be SOP.

No one wants to reinvent the wheel, so why is it necessary to reinvent the pronoun?

Well, upon reflection, I realized that the woman who sent me that email is involved in some, let's say, trendy, arty organizations. In that world, it may well be de rigueur to include one's pronouns on emails to signify to everyone on your list that you're a wokenik too. Dogs can sniff each other's butts to verify who's who, but humans can't do that…well, they can, but not in emails.

On the other hand, the presence of pronoun preferences in an email could be useful for other reasons. Suppose you are compiling an email list for, say, the Re-Elect President Trump campaign. You would probably do well to avoid adding anyone who feels it necessary to advertise his/her/whatever pronouns in the ID block.

If pronoun preferences are now part and parcel of emails, have they invaded other spaces? One wonders…do job applications now include a check box for preferred pronoun? You know…male, female, other. Then a blank line to fill in a custom pronoun. If you were taking applications for prospective performers at a transvestite bar, it might be understandable. Otherwise, what's the point? Thank God the second person singular pronoun of "you" still works for everyone. Just be sure you don't add "people" after "you" when speaking in the second person plural.

I won't attempt to list all the alternative unisexual/asexual/pansexual pronouns floating around these days. The list would probably be obsolete before this article is posted. Come to think of it, what about all those languages with masculine and feminine nouns? Are they due for makeovers? The German language has masculine, feminine, and neutral nouns. Will there one day be a movement declaring all nouns neutral for the purpose of making the German volk woke? And if you refuse to go along with the program? "Ve haff vays to make you talk mitout zexism."

Thankfully, one doesn't need to learn a new alphabet – though that doesn't mean the status quo is safe. Somewhere in darkest academia there may be a smarty-pants Marxist who has determined that putting things in alphabetical order is oppressive! A goes to the front of the line while B must wait behind and bide his….er, her…er, its time. And Z? Don't even ask about poor marginalized Z! In the interest of justice, if we are to keep the alphabet, we should end the tyranny of alphabetical order and have randomized letters, sort of like picking letters in Scrabble. And if A doesn't like it, if's off to the gulag or the guillotine.

Actually, pronouns have been troublesome things for a while now. One of the biggest no-nos is using "he" or "his" when referring to a generic individual in the third person, e.g., "anyone can do it if he wants to." I don't know what today's English workbooks are like (maybe they don't have them anymore, seeing as speaking proper English is considered elitist in some circles, and in the most enlightened realms, the very concept of proper English is denigrated) but there was a day when "he" was meant to apply to a man or a woman simply because English has no gender-neutral pronoun. A woman reading a phrase such as "no one should take himself that seriously" readily understood that the statement applied to her as well as to a man. But somewhere along the line someone or some group decided the generic "he" was another manifestation of systemic male privilege. So then we got the more cumbersome "he or she" and "his or hers" – or even worse, "s/he." And that's not all…

The worst-case scenario occurs when he and she are both woven into the text alternatively. For example, "Ask your doctor if she will…" or "If your attorney doesn't provide you with her fee schedule" to go along with similar constructions using male pronouns, resulting in a roughly 50/50 breakdown of male/female pronouns. This is particularly popular when referring to people in high-status professions. I have yet to see anything along the lines of "When the ditch-digger arrives at your property to install the gas line, be sure to ask her…"

I don't know what's going on in editorial offices today. If I were to submit an article to a magazine with conventional pronoun usage, would it be rewritten? And if I objected? Would it be kicked back to me? "Hey, great article, Doug, but, man, your pronouns suck!"

The binary world used to be so easy…too easy, I guess. It has served us well at all times and in all places. Of course, there always have been and always will be the exceptions, the FUBAR folk, the ones who inspire double-takes…you know the ones…more given to bimorphism than dimorphism. Even with most of them, however, a closer inspection will reveal which side of the line they fall on. There are precious few who are neither here nor there, though a lot of them are not all there. The language mavens never catered to then before, so why now?

It seems the goal is to eliminate misfits – in fact , much like pervert, the word itself may be taboo. If you can't fit the square peg into the round hole, then it's not the peg's fault. Get out your chisel and chip away at the round hole until it the peg fits. In days of old, the misfit used to heed the beat of that different drummer. Used to be almost a badge of honor, kind of like MGTOW.

The misfit used to be satisfied if he was not persecuted. Today that's not enough. Now the misfit is not just recognized but embraced by the mainstream. You can't be too inclusive, you know.

But in mainstreaming the misfit, the majority must bend over backwards to cater to his whims. If mainstream pronouns aren't good enough for the misfit, then we'll be happy to change them. Eight billion people in the world, but if there's the slightest chance that one person anywhere in the world might be offended, the other 7,999,999,999 have to modify their behavior.

The contemporary misfit wants it both ways, to be part of the mainstream and to be special. By eschewing the normal pronouns that work for 99% of the people, one avows that one is special and can't be saddled with a mere "he" or "she," or any other manifestation of babbitry.

Thinking back to the email I got, I wouldn't be surprised if some corporate entities aren't already putting the gender preference thing in the email signatures of their employees. The bigger the corporation, the more likely it is to do so.

But isn't all this fuss and feathers about "he" and "she" really a waste of time? If we have to resort to a gender-neutral pronoun, we have that old reliable "it" to fall back on. I know it sounds dehumanizing. In common parlance, "it" is usually used in reference to inanimate objects. When it is used in reference to living things, they are usually monsters. Just look at how the word "it" is employed in horror film titles:

From Hell It Came (a mobile tree stump);

It Came From Beneath the Sea (a giant octopus, gender unspecified);

It Came From Outer Space (jellyfish people, gender unspecified, who can assume human form);

It Conquered the World (a cave-dwelling Venusian, gender unspecified);

It! The Terror From Beyond Space (a Martian, humanoid but gender unspecified); and Stephen King's It! (a shape-shifter, usually in the form of a male clown, but presumably gender-fluid).

And we would be remiss if we did not acknowledge Cousin Itt (a disembodied hand, gender unspecified) from the Addams Family. And while we're at it, let's not forget The Thing (from Another World), humanoid in appearance but gender is irrelevant because it's a vegetable. Sure, it's tall enough to play center for the Knicks, but that doesn't mean it's a "he."

Then there's the Elephant Man, who had a monstrous appearance, but insisted he was no monster. "I am not an elephant! I am not an animal! I am a human being! I am a man!" He might have added "I am not an 'it'!"

As useful as "it" is in everyday speech, it just doesn't cut the mustard as a pronoun for human beings. It's the old human dignity thing, I guess.

Now if I had to come up with an alternate third person pronoun for myself, I know what I would choose. I think it would be fitting if people referred to me not as "he/him" but as "his excellency."

Or does that sound too privileged?

Beyond belief: gender, science and ideology. Prof Eric Anderson

AVfM Video Source · 18 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Eric Anderson is Professor of Sport, Masculinities & Sexualities, University of Winchester.
As scientists and rational human beings we like to think of our ourselves as people swayed by hard evidence. However there is another thread in the human experience, one which can sway us to have “faith” in ideas that go beyond science.

A Valentine for Clementine

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 21 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Clementine Ford, feminist of Australia, has entered some very repellent words into the public record, and this needs to haunt her for the rest of her life.

First, let us make one thing clear: Clementine Ford never forthrightly informs us, in set terms, that she is a feminist. A basic courtesy, you would think. So does she think it is unnecessary because "everybody who is anybody" is a feminist anyway, and if you are not in the feminist church you don't count? Does she feel it is entirely normative to be a feminist — that such a thing goes without saying? Well, at the very least, I would call this socially illiterate. I would also call it a violation of protocol. (Somewhere down the road, I will explain what that means.)

I, the present writer, am no feminist. For that reason I stand among the majority of the human race, and so I represent a normative factor. I needn't make any special "to do" about my lack of feminism; I needn't be self-conscious in the least, since I am not the "other" in this context. After all, we non-feminists were here first, and we are still the majority. We are under no burden to explain ourselves — that is our natural advantage. (It is not a "privilege".) But if you are a feminist, the burden is on you to explain yourself and what you stand for — and the first step along that road, is to announce your presence. Something like, "I am a feminist, and I believe such-and-such."

Accordingly, while it would have been proper for Ms Ford to declare her feminist standpoint right up front (yet she never once mentions it), it is nowise incumbent on me, or any other non-feminist, to declare our lack of feminism. Ever. Nevertheless (and mark this well) I am doing it anyway, because . . . well, because that is just me! It is how I roll, and my fellow non-feminists everywhere will be strategically wise to do the same.

At any rate, I do plan to make Ms Ford's feminism, specifically, an issue here, given that she so notably avoids the subject.

Ms Ford's opening snippet of feminist death rhetoric is embedded in a context that stretches back for many years — for example, back to hashtag #killallmen, back to Robin Morgan who really did mean that men should "possibly not exist", back to Valerie Solanas in 1967 who not only wanted men to die, but literally attempted to render Andy Warhol dead.

Oh, I almost forgot to mention what my darling Clementine said. On Saturday, 23 May of 2020, she tweeted this:

> "Honestly, the corona virus isn't killing men fast enough."

That was the mindless pot shot (soon deleted) which ignited the big battle — let it sink in. Before the day was out, Ford got hit by a veritable cannonade of angry public pushback. This was predictable: when you push, the world pushes back — so if you don't want pushback, don't push in the first place.

So did Ms Ford deserve all of this? Well, the people who roasted her evidently thought she did. They thought they were right, and you know what? Maybe they were!

At any rate, Clementine clearly felt pressured to make some kind of response — otherwise, she wouldn't have done so. The response she felt pressured to make was, significantly, an apology. People clearly expected such, and Ford clearly lacked the gumption to ignore them. So let's talk about how she handles things.

Ms Ford's apology voices a sorrow at doing something very stupid. It is the kind of "sorry" you might feel if you stubbed your toe: "Oh my god that hurts!! I'm so sorry I didn't watch where I was going!" It's basic: a stupid game was played and a stupid prize was won.

But wait! The stupidity doesn't stop there. I said I would make Clem Ford's unconfessed feminism an issue, and I can hardly escape this because she makes it impossible to overlook. Look, who does she really think that her audience is? From the sound of it, she thinks that her audience is other feminists. Granted, this is complicated to explain, however, it is worth our while, so I will give it a go.

What I mean is, she apparently believes that feminism is the world. It isn't, of course. It is only a portion of the world, but Clementine Ford and most feminists can't seem to wrap their minds around that. They babble on self-referentially as if nothing outside the feminist bubble matters, or even exists at all.

Ms. Ford could have given the world an unmodified "I'm sorry" for the trashy thing she said, and followed through with some honest self-crit. She could have ended it right there, and turned over a new leaf in the future. If she had only done this, it might have satisfied a lot of people. But no, she compounds her trouble by effectually saying: "I am sorry, and yet I am not sorry." This, for better or worse, was the message she sent.

Basically, she tries to exonerate herself — or more plainly, she makes excuses. When the public comments started piling in, Clem started piling it on:

> *"And because some men (not all of them) clearly need context explained to them, the Corona tweet was in response to this article, outline yet again the unpaid domestic burden men place on women, because they can't care for their own fkn kids."*

Observe, that she immediately goes into deflection. In this case, she deflects the heat away from herself by setting an irrelevant conversation into motion. That conversation goes on for several tweets, and most of it is bubbling gishgallop. So rather than sort out the gishgallop, let me say this: it is nothing but feminism. Pure feminism from start to finish. All feminism, all the way down! For a gal who won't even admit being feminist, Ms Ford surely can dish out the feminism!

Clem Ford apparently needs a non-feminist like me to explain context to her. Very well, if you assume that nearly everybody you talk to is a feminist like yourself (or a reprobate who must be converted) it is tantamount to suggesting that feminism is the world. And Clementine Ford certainly sounds like she thinks feminism is the world, or that nothing beyond feminism counts as real, or worthy, or innately noble.

Her opening remark, that "some men" need "context" explained to them, is misandry right out of the box. (She is careful to say "not all of them", yet how soon she chucks this to the wayside like she never said it, and makes her opinion of the male species unmistakably plain.)

But more to the point, does Ms Ford truly believe that males compose the entire non-feminist sector? Well I can assure you that plenty of those non-feminist people are women and that plenty of those women would also need Clementine's "context" explained to them. Let's be inclusive!

You see, the only "context" little Ms Context Queen truly has in mind, is feminist context. Yet that is but a fraction of the total context the world offers, for one may contextualize many things in many ways. One may even contextualize context itself — in which case you would call it meta-context. But to prioritize feminist context over every other possible context on Earth is tantamount to, let us say, feminist privilege. Do you follow me?

Clementine Ford, despite never confessing her feminism, says a heap of things which only a feminist would say, and which only a feminist would find edifying. Throughout her invective, she insults "men" time after time — men are "ding dongs", apparently — yes, all of them:

> "Christ alfkn Mighty, men love to screech about snowflakes and triggered feminists and women not being able to take a joke and they crumble at the first sign of a hyperbolic tweet that doesn't place them as gods at the center of the universe. Ding dongs, all of them."

She treats the word "men" as an abstraction. And notice how she conflates "feminists" with "women". (We call this "hiding behind women".) Will feminists ever stop doing that? Probably not, and that alone is reason enough to put feminism out of business by suitable means.

So get in the back row, Clementine, along with the other class clowns. "Men" don't want to be "gods at the center of the universe". Got that? They just want to be human beings, and they want to be treated like human beings. I have known plenty of actual men, I know what I'm saying, and that is the "context" which I bring to the table! Feminists are the only people I know who want to be goddesses at the center of the universe, and Ford, you sound like a case in point.

Clementine offers the world no legitimate argument, but only a mess of feminist talking points and dogmas which feminists like her have regurgitated for years and propagated like gospel. You want context? There you go. When non-feminist people get angry at feminists, feminist behavior is just the "context" that they have in mind, and most feminists evidently need to have this explained to them.

All right, Clementine Ford wanted to pull herself off the hook, and frankly, a mea culpa was the only way that could have happened. However, at the same time, she wanted to save face. She was presuming that boilerplate feminist rhetoric would ride to the rescue (in its time-tested manner), and that is why she laid it on.

Observe the progression: Ms Ford started with the most quintessentially feminist statement you could imagine (wishing death upon men). That was bad enough by itself, but when it blew up in her face, she was dutifully contrite for only a moment. Then she treated the angry public to a string of ripe feminist goodies without ever considering that the bulk of said public is not even feminist.

To be concretely specific, Clementine followed up her offensive tweet with feminist talking points that were arguably even more offensive. Here is one example:

> *"The Corona tweet was in response to this article, outline yet again the unpaid domestic burden men place on women, because they can't care for their own fkn kids."*

The article she speaks of, is on a feminist website called TheLily.com. The tale which that article tells (and which Ford endorses) is old anti-male agitprop that feminists have been repeating for years (but here dressed up in the politics of COVID-19). The veracity of that ancient message remains questionable on various levels, yet according to Clementine, here is precisely the "context" that we non-feminist folk should have installed into our folklore by now. (Feminist folklore should be everybody's folklore! Get it? Feminists like Clem Ford shouldn't need to explain this painfully clear context! You lazy sods should have learned it yourselves, years ago!)

Clem Ford rationalizes her misandry with MORE MISANDRY. That does not sound like a well thought-out strategy at all. What on Earth was she thinking? And who did she think she was fooling? No doubt there is a wealth of feminist doctrine behind her words — a kind of feminist "gold" standard which turns out to be a misandry standard. So to a non-feminist, it is no better than redeeming worthless words with prior worthless words. The point is that feminist currency simply has no value in the non-feminist sector, hence no "purchase", and finally no traction. Yet Clementine Ford and other feminists never seem to learn that.

So yes, it should be needless to point out that Ford's verbiage drips hatred of men, as venom from a cobra's fangs. It is simply old hat, that feminists hate men. And those young schoolgirls, who staged a walkout on behalf of the boys on that notorious day, must have picked up her vibe with superlative clarity.

But right now, the focus is a bit different. We need to consider exactly what Clementine is doing: she is taking back, with her left hand, the "apology" she handed out with her right. It was an embarrassment, a sting, to even make that apology, and she wanted to undo some of it.

Evidently, she thought that making a display of *feminist attitude (*for the edification of non-feminist people) would mitigate the original offense. Or to put it another way, she first made a feminist statement (about men dying), and figured that additional feminist statements would make it all good. But this was patently childish, and pointless, and of no mitigating effect. We could even argue that it rubbed salt in the original wound.

Look now: suggesting that men are unhelpful bastards around the house is a classically feminist statement that non-feminist people would not endorse. (They would more likely opine that some men and some women are this way.) Nor would they go along with the idea that household work and job market work are equivalent things. Only a feminist would voice that idea.

On Sunday (the day following), Ford came out with a more lengthy, pained and nuanced apology, and I will discuss that now:

> "I'm a big enough person to admit when I've misjudged something. I still stand 100% behind my fury at men exploiting women's unpaid labour (exacerbated by the global pandemic), but I've reconsidered my flippancy in discussing it. I've always maintained that the difference between jokes that punch up and down is the reality of harm. Eg joking about firing men into the sun has no basis in reality and therefore no potential to further harm, while "jokes" about domestic abuse are very much reflective of an extensive harm already in place."

Her "misjudgment" was (how shall I say it?) the kind of transgression that a non-feminist man or woman would almost certainly never commit. But on the other hand, there is something about being a feminist which, on its own account, naturally comports with making such a blunder. Chalking it up to "bad judgment" is no excuse, since only a feminist would be apt to load the faculty of "judgment" that way in the first place. In other words, to embrace feminism at all entails a judgment in itself, from which related judgments will predictably flow.

We see next that her "fury at men" is unabated, and that she stands behind it 100%. This, once again, is a quintessentially feminist thing to say. "Fury at men" is elemental to feminism altogether, and without it feminism would literally not exist, full stop.

And the bit about men exploiting women's labour is, frankly, once more, a feminist idea — so Clementine is only being presumptuous when she lays it out for her non-feminist readers. I do not believe for one minute that this timeworn talking point is the genuine source of her "fury", but regardless, I reject her ideology, along with any hypothesis which upholds it. Hence, the ideology lacks any meaningful force of argument for me, but more to the point, it does nothing to mitigate the audacity of Ford's suggestion that men should die of corona virus more quickly.

Moving along: how wonderful that she has reconsidered her flippancy! (She makes it sound like a wrong move in a board game.) I wish she had done that before she did the flippancy, but I see where she is coming from. She is trying to sound like a "big" person capable of introspection and self-correction. Okay, sure, that could give her a good look, but it does not change the fact that she is addressing a largely non-feminist public by inflicting a feminist "context" on them, while the fact completely escapes her that non-feminist people also speak from a context, and that she is arrogantly ignoring this. Feminist subjectivism is invincible; we see it all the time.

One more thing: I don't know what "jokes about domestic abuse" she means — is that just more feminist hype? It certainly isn't common public knowledge. If I could hear some samples, I could evaluate them and decide if they were funny or not. (Feminists, as we all know, lack a sense of humor. Just watch a feminist comedian — they absolutely cannot "do funny"!)

However, I do know that feminists have lied about domestic violence for many years, and maliciously stacked the deck against half of the human race (the male half). This is arguably the gravest of feminism's moral crimes against the non-feminist sector, and in the future I hope to see a lot of professional "deep dive" books published about this, and plenty of documentary films that can be shown to school children, so that they will know the truth from their earliest years.

So here is what the feminist Ford says next:

> "The corona tweet was contextually in response to the fact that women are once again shouldering the burden of domestic labour at the expense of their own economic freedom, being let down by men who are in turn upheld by systems that have privileged them. It is acceptable to express fury at that, and it's disappointing more men aren't outraged by this reality. But based on my own metric outlined up thread, I have to accept fault for the corona tweet because it made a flippant joke about something that IS actually a harmful reality, and one that affects marginalised men disproportionately, not to mention robs people of their loved ones. Regardless of what people want to think about me, I have no wish to compound harm and grief for anyone, nor be dismissive of the very real impact and fear a crisis like this presents."

And there we go; feminist Ford once again assaults us with that old feminist folk tale which we non-feminist people have no duty to believe, and every right to question. After all, it is only a random story, and its veracity is poorly grounded. We hear random stories almost daily, we are often phlegmatic, and we find it annoying that feminist Ford wants "outrage on cue". Ford has no entitlement to that, but apparently thinks she does, and that is a symptom of her feminist privilege. She might be disappointed, but she needs to get over it. I mean, don't we all face disappointments in life?

The rest of the paragraph sounds like proper moral introspection, and Clementine largely gets it right, but unfortunately, in the context of everything else she says, it sounds like posturing. The point is not that she was dismissive of the corona crisis. The point is, corona or no corona, that she would ever make such a vile statement under any condition. To be disappointed that more men are not dying, is disgraceful in its own right, and fully in character with feminist rhetoric over the years.

Thus, historic feminist behavior is the context here, because non-feminist people are keen observers of that behavior and frankly fed up with it.

Next comes more of the same:

> "But I also think it's fair to be angry at the lack of interest in this crisis' impact on women. To be astonished at how women are expected to perform the essential tasks that allow men to thrive, at the expense of women's stability, while being denied recognition for that work."

Yes, more variations on the theme of "women are oppressed" — which is merely a fractional truth in need of parameters. And it is hardly fair to demand all people at all times to view this fractional truth through a feminist lens, to feel an identical anger for identical reasons, and to ignore the many ways that women are the exact opposite of "oppressed."

And still more of the same:

> "A flippant (and yes, poorly judged) tweet doesn't change that reality and it shouldn't change the focus away from it. If we benefit from privilege, we should also be robust enough to accept critique of the systems that privilege us and work to change them."

All I can say here is: "Physician, heal thyself." Feminist Ford's statements, which I have unpacked in this article, are little better than an extended exercise in feminist privilege. Ford and all feminists should be robust enough to accept critique of the down-punching, hegemonic systems that privilege them, and work to change those systems.

And finally:

> "Anyway, this acknowledgment isn't for the men who are lookng for any reason to ignore patriarchal impact but for the people genuinely hurt by my words. I'm sincerely sorry, and I wish I had framed my argument in better terms and in a way that didn't compound harm. Be well."

I'm sorry, but to be perfectly frank, her acknowledgment isn't for any non-feminist person at all. Non-feminist people are not on board with the concept of "patriarchy" in the first place, and feminists are practically the only people who throw that word around. Mind you, they are quite welcome to throw that word around, but they should do it only amongst themselves. When they address people outside the feminist bubble, they need to keep a grip on it. It is simply bad manners for feminists to presume that the rest of us understand, or have some duty to understand, what the hell they are talking about.

All right, I think we have wrung more than enough juice from our present topic.

If this article contains any lesson at all for the feminist Clementine Ford, it should instruct her to overcome her feminist subjectivism, and to make a genuine apology for that sorry thing which she wrote on Twitter. She oughtn't make herself emblematic of feminism as a whole, since non-feminist men and women are surely bound to notice this. Ms Ford has given us a lecture on feminist ideology. Sorry, but that is no apology. She has got to do much, much better.

And feminism itself has got to do much, much better. One feminist at a time.

An Uncivil War

David Solway · 21 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Left-wing thinking effectively blanks out the real distinctions between representative government and totalitarian dictatorship.

– Roger Scruton, Fools, Frauds and Firebrands

There is a growing consensus among conservative writers and many individual citizens that America has descended into a condition of virtual civil war. It is not, or not yet, characterized by military confrontations on a national scale, as in 1861-65, but the facts on the ground strongly suggest a breakdown of civil order:

- the irreconcilable conflict between the political left and right;
- the belligerence and vituperation that passes for a national "conversation";
- sporadic acts of violence, flash mobs and organized riots erupting in every corner of the country;
- the dismal lack of local and state leadership;
- Orwellian Ministries of Truth, otherwise known as digital platforms, controlling and censoring information;
- a rabid feminist network intent on destabilizing cultural traditions and mores;
- a president betrayed by his own generals and party senators;
- a rogue enclave set up by malcontents and domestic terrorists in the middle of an American city;
- and racial mayhem fomented and exploited by a class of partisan criminals.

Whether or not we call this situation the preliminary stages of civil war or simply massive social unrest and cutthroat politics may be only a matter of terminology.

What seems most obvious is that a civil war, like any war, requires two sides pitted against one another in outright combat or in destructive ideological engagements. And given the mass capitulation of mayors, governors, police chiefs, media editors, entertainment celebrities, CEOs and members of Congress to the insurrectionary cadres holding the nation hostage — forces of disarray like Antifa, Black Lives Matter, raging Twitter mobs, hate-promoting institutions like the SPLC, the ACLU, The Nation of Islam and others — one is hard pressed to locate and identify a respectable "other side" of the struggle.

Admittedly, there is a beleaguered though resolute president (abandoned by many who should logically be his allies, including members of his own party), a small number of conservative commentators who have stood their ground in the public square, and an inchoate "silent majority" (assuming it is indeed a majority), but they scarcely comprise a visible and identifiable "other side" equal in approximate strength to an active, vociferous and bellicose hostile power. That being the case, we cannot say that a de facto civil war is in progress. The side of law and order seems to have surrendered without much in the way of robust and concerted resistance.

We can say that the nation has grown dysfunctional and largely ungovernable — civil disintegration, not civil war — and will remain so unless those who believe in the Constitution and re-possess sufficient authority in the military and government agencies, backed by a genuine silent majority emerging at election time, can mount a viable defense against the agents of destruction. This does not mean that the left will be defeated or lay down its arms, only that the playing field — or battlefield — will have been made rather more level.

At that point, once a balance of forces is achieved and a meaningful engagement of opposing sides becomes possible, we may have entered a condition of veritable civil war, whether institutional or manifest, unless a resolution or armistice can be worked out. And the only resolution that might make some initial sense is an official divorce between the warring segments of the nation, a secession of states from the federal system, red and blue states going their own ways. Such would inevitably involve manifold complications, with citizens of differing political loyalties abiding in the same state, the division of economic and industrial property, the re-assignment of components of the military, the complexities of foreign relations, and so on.

2016 presidential election by county licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 4.0 International license.

In Democracy: The God That Failed, Hans-Hermann Hoppe, who teaches at the University of Nevada, has gone more deeply into the intricacies of peaceful separation. Hoppe proposes that “a modern liberal-libertarian strategy of secession should take its cue from the European Middle Ages when, from about the twelfth until well into the seventeenth century, Europe was characterized by the existence of hundreds of free and independent cities, interspersed into a predominantly feudal social structure.” He believes that in this way, “besides recognizing the fact that the liberal-libertarian potential is distributed highly unevenly across the country, such a strategy of piecemeal withdrawal renders secession less threatening politically, socially and economically.”

Regrettably, the problems created by Hoppe’s medieval solution would be insurmountable:

· how to arrange for a nationwide agreement or consensus eventuating in the creation of innumerable small city-states distinct in administration but presumably bound by treaty; how to combine for effective defense against an external or internal aggressor;

· how to equitably divide economic, fiscal, industrial and technological resources spread across an enormous territory and vested in thousands of self-governing pockets;

· how to provide for safe internal travel, and so on.

We are not in the Middle Ages, and a litter of far-flung tiny municipalities is a relic long ago superseded. The problems of secession are real enough and would only be exacerbated in so fungible a scenario.

In Politics, particularly Books I and III, Aristotle defends the polis or city-state as a “natural” development of communal life and as the model political organization. But in today’s far more complex and interconnected world, it is reasonable to assume that he would argue similarly for the nation-state, its “formal cause” being the Constitution and its “material cause,” a given territory. Thus, even when a state or nation breaks up, its constituent residues would also be states or nations, however reduced.

The nation-state and its provision for central authority — the linchpin of the modern system of international relations — did not arise out of a vacuum, but out of the Thirty Years War and the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648. It came into being for reasons of necessity. Indeed, the nation-state is the culmination of a long historical process. It can neither be reversed nor transcended, dissolving on the one hand into a dispersed congeries of political and cultural particles, or evaporating on the other hand into a Global or One-World Superstate, which would be a throwback to the Bronze Age of vast, ultimately unsustainable empires. The nation-state as such, whether conservative, centrist, leftist, locked in internecine discord, or fissiparous, is here to stay.

What, then, is the solution to America’s potential ills of possible civil war or collapse into a leftist totalitarian regime? How are these devastating alternatives to be averted? Perhaps neither one nor the other of these historical options can be avoided, and the future is uncompromisingly dark. Perhaps separation of red and blue states coalescing into non-contiguous administrative polities or lesser nations may be thinkable, a kind of “velvet divorce” on the model of Czechoslovakia, though far more complicated, with an arranged exchange of populations and a peaceful division of the spoils. Perhaps businesses, industries, manufacturers and increasing numbers of people will emigrate away from blue states, leaving them to malinger in debt and dysfunction, with mounting social problems and a depleted tax base.* Or perhaps the scattered constitutional forces under a dogged and muscular president will improbably prevail — though without inaugurating an era of unbroken peace.

For better or for worse, America will either persist as a nation-state, internally fractured or under a socialist dispensation, or devolve into a jigsaw of smaller nation-states. Considering that the left has spread its capillaries throughout the body of the nation, leaving no institution untouched and incapable by nature of either negotiation or compromise, as Roger Scruton explains in Fools, Frauds and Firebrands, and considering that a younger generation of disaffected “millennials,” victims of a massive indoctrination program via the universities and the media, are functionally ignorant and politically malleable, it follows that the prospect for a harmonious or pragmatic resolution to “the troubles” seems unlikely. In whatever way the current drama plays out, I fear that we may be witnessing the end of the American experiment in republican governance as we have come to know it. Although it is no consolation, as always history will have the last word.

*Lana on Twitter writes: “We should pick a general location in the north, south, west, east and center of America and all the good folks who aren’t leftists, globalists or sell out neocons, move there. No website. No name. Just good folks moving to be in a community of other good folks. Nominations?”

David Solway’s latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019.

Elizabeth Hobson: Celebrating male role-models

AVfM Video Source · 22 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Support Elizabeth by donating to her Patreon

Mike Buchanan – Thirteen Reasons Why

AVfM Video Source · 22 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Representation politics, and the purpose of fantasy

Vernon Meigs · 23 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What do I mean by “representation politics”?

Just like how identity politics means the obsession and preoccupation with defining oneself and identifying with a group no matter how particular, granular, or arbitrary and making sure everybody knows it and takes account of it in any given situation, I offer the term “representation politics” as a corollary to identity politics: the maniacal obsession to get every form of media and enterprise to represent any given category, group, and identity, as if their members cannot go on without this representation that they would destroy any and all who do not comply.

Bending the knee has had unfortunately literal expression in the past few weeks, but we can safely say that knee-bending has been taking place in one form or another long before that, in which male-occupied roles in movies, comics and shows have been replaced with women for the sake of representing women, white replaced with black, characters made into LGBTQ. Stranger yet in the present day, representation politics has taken a bizarre turn in which actual images of a black person, a huge example that comes to mind being Aunt Jemima, are being erased.

To add to my classification of representation politics as the demand to represent more and more groups no matter how in the minority they are, it should be mentioned that the path to increased representation often entails the de-representation of those who had earned their place by merit or otherwise original intent. When people, real or fictional, are being replaced to fulfill a quota in this way, we cannot trust that the result will be of anything close to high standard quality.

Tokenism on the Screen

Even before the initial news broke out that 2016’s brand new Ghostbusters film was to consist of an all-female main cast, one big concern I have had was the tokenism that I feared would become rampant in the modern era of movies, shows, and other media portraying the fictional. I had hypothesized that we would increasingly enter a situation in which we cannot trust which characters are in fact portrayed based on honest, competent storytelling.

Ask the average person and perhaps they’ll say that it’s good that women and minority races are getting representation to the point that they may not even question having all-female primary casts in a movie that was once a male one; no doubt they may process that as fair game or revenge for the past, even in an unconscious way. Either no thought is given to the fact that the inclusion of characters for the sake of representation, or perhaps they are afraid to question it.

We seem to have been crossing a place for a long time in which when a nonwhite character is cast or portrayed in anything, the active-minded cannot trust its intent. Was the black character cast because of character-first writing in which it didn’t matter primarily whether he or she was, or is the motivation of this character’s inclusion to appeal to the current zeitgeist of inclusion for the sake of “diversity”, representation for the sake of “diversity”? What about for an Asian? What about for a gay, lesbian, or a bisexual? In the present day, what about transsexuals?

Speaking even as someone who doesn't watch Doctor Who, I too am aware of the Jodie Whittaker Doctor's existence…I understand that the show had not exactly been performing well with her. She had her white knights when it was first announced, but again I ask the question – was it a natural progression, or just pandering to the new sociopolitical atmosphere that parrots "The Future is Female" at every turn? What of this Rey character in the new Star Wars films, or the Finn character, or the practical dominance of female and/or "POC" characters in the absolutely atrocious Star Trek: Discovery in which once proud, sometimes intimidating characters like Captain Christopher Pike get reduced to simpering milquetoasts that let the women around them denigrate them, no matter what rank?

Speaking of Star Trek, let's talk about that for just a moment. At the moment I am writing this, not counting my commentary podcast Trek Through Trek which just got started on the 2nd season of The Original Series, I am currently in the midst of a runthrough of Star Trek: Voyager and the episode "Message in a Bottle" is still fresh in my mind. A subplot of the episode (the main plot takes place in the Alpha Quadrant where the Holographic Doctor is transmitted to a Federation ship there) takes place on Voyager and involves the monitoring of a vast communications network as they wait for The Doctor. There is no need to get too deep into plot details, but they then discover who the network belongs to and they respond by demanding they terminate their link. This part mostly involved Engineer B'Elanna Torres and Seven of Nine, with a plot point between them involves B'Elanna confronting Seven for being rude while working together, hence the pairing. Captain Janeway gets more involved too when the Hirogen come in (that's the people the network belonged to).

[Images taken from memory-alpha.org]

As I was watching this episode, one thing absolutely astounded me as it crossed my mind. I didn't realize it until deep in, but as it turns out, there were three women main characters working to solve a problem. And I didn't even notice it. That was the eye-opening part. I didn't even care that they were women because I processed them beforehand as distinct characters important to the series just as much as Chakotay, Paris, Kim, Tuvok and Neelix (yes, even Neelix). The fact that they were women mattered no more than if any men took their place in the writing process. As it turns out, when you don't actually have some hardline sociopolitical agenda in the writing, everything feels natural and honest and not forced. There are other moments like that, though this very fact is something I'm more conscious to pay attention of in terms of respect how natural everything felt back in these good old days of Trek. I recently watched the episode “Think Tank” and that had Janeway and Seven boarding a ship together and that too felt natural.

Compare and contrast to the world of “new” Star Trek, where all female characters are shoehorned in and Starfleet’s higher echelons apparently seem to be dominated by rather bitter, condescending women (and it’s allegedly supposed to take place during the pre-Kirk TOS-era timeline). The lead character is a woman named Michael Burnham (isn’t that telling, huh?) and in the series as well as the jarring Short Treks the men are usually bumblers and incompetents being looked down upon by women completely Mary Sue’d into the scenes. Watching this in this current atmosphere in the real world, there is no doubt in my mind that there has been an active “woke” agenda inserted to create a revisionist canonicity of the Star Trek timeline, where nothing adds up and everything either exists to pander to people who aren’t previously Trek fans with visuals and technology that would make Star Trek: Nemesis era USS Enterprise-E crew shit their pants, or pander to the what they think is the new state of mind of the people, where the future is female and men have to be “put in their place”.

The Purpose of Fantasy

For a moment, let me talk about the purpose of fantasy. I know what some of you are thinking – fantasy is just escapism and it can be whatever at all. What then, is the motive of your fantasy? If it is indeed escapism, then no doubt it’s to leave the drudgery of the real world behind so as to enter a different one. Fair enough. Then, what purpose do you have of entering this different world? Perhaps it’s to experience, relatively speaking, a world in which things turn out the way you’d want them to play out for you. Perhaps it could be a world where you can be more like yourself. Or, perhaps it’s just a way for your creativity to flourish, or for you to indulge and bask in the creativity of someone you are on the same page with. In any case, this new world is a superior one. It is an ideal one in the proper sense of the word. You’d either trade the world for it…or you’d want to make the real world closer and closer to this ideal fantasy.

Assuming that this is the predicate for fantasy put out in the world for an audience to consume like any given fictional TV show from soft fiction such as a real life drama or comedy, or something more creative like a piece of science fiction or fantasy lore such as that found in Lord of the Rings, Magic: the Gathering, or Dungeons & Dragons. In terms of their creators, either they’ve found an outlet and format for their creativity, or they’re trying to portray an ideal world.

I would like to quote Ayn Rand in her work The Romantic Manifesto, under the chapter “Art and Cognition” – “Art is a selective re-creation of reality according to an artist’s metaphysical value-judgements. Man’s profound need of art lies in the fact that his cognitive faculty is conceptual, i.e., that he acquires knowledge by means of abstractions, and needs the power to bring his widest metaphysical abstractions into his immediate, perceptual awareness. Art fulfills this need: by means of a selective re-creation, it concretizes man’s fundamental view of himself and of existence. It tells man, in effect, which aspects of his experience are to be regarded as essential, significant, important. In this sense, art teaches man how to use his consciousness. It conditions or stylizes man’s consciousness by conveying to him a certain way of looking at existence.”

Then I would like to expand upon Rand’s definition and provide a context that accounts for fantasy:

The purpose of fantasy is to depict, using the formats available to an individual or that which he has affinity for, an ideal world that draws directly from his metaphysical abstractions, that is, his values and proper ideals.

If my above definition has either sunk in or you’ve become able to entertain the idea for the sake of argument, let’s turn our attention back to the existing fantasies and fictions of the modern world. At this point you’re probably wondering, what does defining the purpose of fantasy have to do with representation politics and idiots bending the knee for virtue signaling reasons?

Consider what Star Trek for the most part used to be when it was founded, and dare I say was true for what I consider its golden age (that is, all the way up to Star Trek: Enterprise and I will defend that show at any given time so don't try me): although there was a push to be more inclusive and diverse in a world, to be fair to Trek, was not too caught up in treating people of different groups like normal human beings, it did so in as natural a way as a show with writing restrictions like the earliest of Star Trek can afford at the time. The Original Series juggled an Iowan Caucasian captain, a Vulcan first/science officer, a Southerner doctor, a Scottish engineer, a Japanese-American helmsman, a Swahili communications officer, and by 2nd season a Russian ensign. Speaking briefly about The Next Generation, LeVar Burton's character Geordi LaForge, who was black, never ever had his race made a big deal out of. In short, everybody involved in what I refer to as Trek's golden age made a gigantic deal of their ethnicities. Well, Benjamin Sisko in Deep Space Nine had a small amount on an episode or two, but that deserves an analysis having taken in context for a future discussion.

Looking ahead to today's "Trek", Star Trek: Discovery and Star Trek: Picard, we see practically dystopian tropes in which men are knocked down and made to be humiliated, apologize, and bend the knee to any given snide and bitter woman in any given situation as the formerly dignified Christopher Pike and the formerly beloved Jean-Luc Picard are indications. Take also Spock himself, being overtly emotional under the narrative in which the stoic Number One from the Original Series pilot "The Cage" is retconned into being the source of Spock's logical attitude. From pathetic Captains being talked down even by his subordinates, to crazed awkward Edward obsessed with genetically engineering Tribbles (which aren't supposed to be introduced yet in the canonical timeline when the Short Trek episode he was featured in was introduced), men are basically the dirt on the floor, while women, crowded in vast numbers, always take care of the job. Then we see a world where "organics" and "synthetic" life forms continuously being at odds with one another, whereas older Trek may have come up with solutions to bridge the gap in terms of relations, in new Trek we see no other indication than "organics" are privileged oppressors of the "synthetic". Instead of standing against the status quo of the drudgeries of real life, the same drudgeries and pathetic excuses for addressing them seep right into the mindset of the new series calling itself Star Trek and offer nothing better than a shaming of those it vilifies in the present world.

What is the metaphysical abstraction of the mind at work when it comes up with this sort of cynical drivel? Is this the ideal world that they wish to convey and for the audience to take in? A world where men, the few that are permitted to exist, are pathetic creatures serving as rungs on the narrative's ladders they don't hesitate to step on? Is this the kind of future or vision of humanity they want?

In the rabid pursuit of representing every perceived minority as well as women (who in themselves as a broad category are hardly minorities), writers have sacrificed storytelling and natural character development for representation and pandering to identity politics. We now live in a time in which every depiction of those non-white or even non-male is met with suspicion by the active-minded, and accepted without question by those that can't even begin to contextualize the cultural implications. We don't know whether the presentation of a non-white, especially if they are female, is done so out of sheer inspiration straight from the fountainhead of character craftsmanship, or to be sure they make the correct representations out of fear of being cancelled their reputations vilified. As I've stated before, there is no goalpost. Pander to the mob, and they will still never be satisfied each time you do it and apologize.

Don't Let Representation (and the Demand For It) Rule You

Speaking of pandering, J.K. Rowling's been given the big draw-and-quarter treatment as of late, hasn't she? How sympathetic am I of her, really? She's been pandering enough, as far as I am concerned, to the "woke" crowd, with one big example being she's basically accepted the presumption of her own character from her Harry Potter series, Hermione Granger, as a black girl, under the excuse that, and I paraphrase, "her race wasn't explicitly established". This, despite an image of her in the public consciousness of being basically modeled after Emma Watson, her actress in the Harry Potter films, appears to be something that J.K. was willing to promote, to appeal to the crowd that wants more and more representation for blacks, even if it means changing already-existing establishments.

The same crowd she appeared to be appealing to went after her when she was speaking in recognition of the fact that biological sex exists. Referred to as a TERF (for those not actually in the know [and have you been living under a rock?], Trans-Exclusionary Radical Feminist), J.K. Rowling has been attacked in the media, publishers refusing to work with her if I understood recent news correctly, and even faced vilification from the very otherwise insignificant actors and actresses that have benefitted from portraying characters on the big screen for movies based on her most famous series of books.

To answer the question, perhaps I have some vestige of sympathy for her and I ultimately don't agree with what's happening to her. But there is another part that says that she largely brought this upon herself. She pandered in this new era of virtue signaling for representation politics, and all she got in return was a goalpost that was yanked away from her harder than Lucy van Pelt pulling away the football from Charlie Brown. To quote Paul Elam, there are no victims, only volunteers. She went into this herself and perhaps should have realized from the get go what would happen to her. Only in the here and now she can begin to set things right for herself and cease with the pandering and stand up more and more for herself.

What I am hoping more and more people would do, and this is the exact same that I am hoping I myself can accomplish, is to be honest from the get go about viewpoints that are now being considered grounds for a vigilante witch hunt. Instead of remaining silent, let us speak our minds, openly disagree with any given potential thing, and strengthen our own skin in the face of this volatile crowd of woke SJWs. Let the fact that we have nothing to lose since we have the truth to stand on be our immunization against the intellectual pandemic that is politically correct identity politics and representation politics.

A word of advice to those who keep on seeking representation in the very media that they consume: knock it off. Identity is wasted on those who identify primarily as a member of a group, as a pawn or a cog for a collective. If you are of a personality or presentation that falls outside the norm of what is considered, well, the norm, then own up to it and be able to defend yourself in your own right and represent yourself for yourself. Don't count on others or force others to do it for you. You are responsible for your own validation and actualization and your place in this world. Do not rely on Magic: the Gathering cards or your favorite fantasy or sci-fi shows or your pancake mix products to represent you in particular, nor even be upset that it's not excluding you. They aren't you know; they're just representing themselves at best when they aren't pandering , and that is fine. Don't define your life by how others pander to you and profess to represent you.

Sam The Man Hayakawa

Doug Mortimer · 24 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The recent nationwide rioting evokes memories of same that took place in the late 1960s. In those days, the economy was in great shape, so one could truthfully say it was the best of times, it was the worst of times; today the latter is the winner by a knockout.

In the late 60s, however, there was pushback against vandals, looters and arsonists. They were not lauded as liberators, even in left-leaning media. One man who personified that pushback actually became an unlikely media celebrity.

S.I. Hayakawa (not to be confused with actor Sessue Hayakawa, best known for playing the commandant of the prison camp in The Bridge on the River Kwai) was born in Vancouver, British Columbia in 1906. He received degrees in English from the University of Manitoba and McGill University in Canada, and the University of Wisconsin. In 1955 his academic career took him to San Francisco State College, which would be the institution where he achieved his greatest renown, even though he was a highly respected professor and author before he arrived at SFSC (not known as SFSU till 1974).

Hayakwawa was a disciple of Alfred Korzbyski, a Polish nobleman who emigrated to America and achieved fame as the founding father of what he called general semantics. Hayakawa's book Language in Action, later revised as Language in Thought and Action, helped to bring semantics to the public's attention in the 1940s. In fact, my unabridged dictionary, published in 1936, does not have a definition for semantics. Not so today as the American Heritage Dictionary offers up "the study or science of meaning in language forms, esp. with regard to its historical change." In some areas it overlaps with semiotics, a more recent discipline, which focuses on signs and symbols.

In my high school English class we used Language in Thought and Action. When referring to the author outside the classroom, we usually truncated S.I. Hayakawa to SIHI. Little did we know that our very own SIHI would soon go viral, at least as viral as it was possible to go given the primitive media of the times.

What brought Hayakawa to the public's attention was a student strike at SFSC pertaining to "non-negotiable demands" by the Third World Liberation Front because the curriculum was too Eurocentric and the student body lacked diversity. Sound familiar? Such demands were not widespread in 1968, as most colleges focused on the Vietnam War and traditional civil rights issues. Second wave feminism was on the back burner but not for long.

Whatever the grievance, the groves of academe bore bitter fruit in the late 60s. Demonstrators often took over administration buildings, sometimes camping out in the President's office, which had great symbolic meaning. At Columbia University some even toted guns. Whether or not they actually knew how to use them was never put to the test. The 1960s also gave birth to SWAT (Special Weapons and Tactics) teams as a means of controlling riots.

To the best of my recollection no student (and I use the term loosely, as many "students" were not registered at the schools where they demonstrated) was given the bum's rush or expelled. Other institutions – with the possible exception of churches – would have called in security guards, the police, or some other pest control firm to roust the interlopers.

The presidents, deans, chancellors, et al of America's colleges didn't chime in with the "pigs off campus" chanters, but the high priests of academia couldn't stomach the thought of the high sheriffs and their myrmidons intruding on their precious community of scholars. So they engaged in what was then known as "meaningful dialogue" with the demonstrators. That's academicspeak for they talk, we listen. If we respond, it will be with head-nodding, platitudes and encomiums, not criticism. When faced with campus uprisings, secular academic administrators quickly converted to Quakerism.

SFSC was literally an embattled campus when Hayakawa took over as acting president on November 26, 1968 (his predecessor, Dr. Robert Smith, lasted all of five months). Students and police had clashed repeatedly and classes had been cancelled since November 13. To convey just how thoroughly discouraging the situation was, we need only note that John Summerskill, the President before Smith, chose to continue his academic career in Ethiopia after leaving SFSC in June of 1968.

When Hayakawa officially re-opened the campus on December 2, he was faced with a mob of student strikers, whose sloganeering and speechifying was amplified with the help of a sound truck, even though Hayakawa had banned them from campus. Perhaps the strikers figured that the tiny (5'6"), soft-spoken Asian professor would be a pushover. Undaunted, Haykawa boarded the truck and ripped out the loudspeaker's wires. Don't know if semanticists have an official position on "action speaks louder than words," but Hayakawa certainly embodied the phrase.

Thus Hayakawa enforced his own rule. Perhaps he was also passing semantic judgment on their oratory. Then again, maybe it was just his way of saying children should be seen but not heard. Whatever, his deed was captured by TV news cameras and broadcast to the astonishment of viewers nationwide.

It was a simple yet decisive gesture, unlike anything his peers were doing. A college president…as an action hero? Hell, S.I. Hayakawa could teach G.I. Joe a thing or two!

If a latter-day SIHI were to attempt such a deed at SFSU today, it would be a career kamikaze mission. He would be out of a job immediately, channeling Tony Bennett and crooning "I Left My Career in San Francisco." He would be unemployable in academia, and maybe anywhere else, no matter what laurels had been bestowed on him during his career. He would be doxed and harassed till his life was hell on earth. The stigma of white privilege would not apply to an Asian male but toxic masculinity might be trotted out. In 1968, however, the State of California, though lurching leftward, had not gone off the rails. Manhood was still legal.

Hayakawa's bold move was not just an effective way to silence the protestors, it was great public relations. The image of the ballsy little professor standing up to the mob caught the fancy of the public and Hayakawa became a household word in California. "In the age of television, image becomes more important than substance," he once said. He was about to find out how true that was. Hayakawa was also attracting national attention. Throughout 1968 riots and demonstrations were as integral to TV newscasts as weather and sports. Most viewers didn't like what they saw. Richard Nixon called such people the Silent Majority and they elected him over Hubert Humphrey a month before Hayakawa's feat. When these same people saw Hayakawa on the tube, he was literally pulling the plug on the foul-mouthed, dope-smoking, unkempt hordes they detested. Countless middle-aged viewers, many of them veterans of World War II, sat up and took notice. Hayakawa's boldness might have done more than anything else to dispel any lingering resentments they felt about Pearl Harbor.

After the incident Samuel Ichiye Hayakawa was dubbed Samurai Sam. By rights, he should have been Sensei (Teacher) Sam. As a professor of semantics, he would surely have averred that the pen was mightier than the sword, samurai or whatever. After all, he had rushed in where Toshiro Mifune might have feared to tread.

Samurai Sam had backbone but he was not inflexible, as his subsequent appearances on television made clear. He made some concessions to student demands and the campus became relatively peaceful. On July 9, 1969, the California State Colleges Board of Trustees appointed him permanent President. It was their way of saying aregato for restoring order. So Hayakawa remained at SFSC (towards the end of his tenure, it was briefly known as California State University, San Francisco before it was SFSU) till 1973.

Then as now, California was widely known as the land of fruits and nuts, and not just because of local agriculture. Southern California certainly had its share of weirdness, but in those days there was also a countervailing culture of conservatism. Not so in the San Francisco Bay area.

In the years after World War II, San Francisco neighborhoods became famous for hipsters (North Beach), hippies (Haight-Ashbury), and homos (the Castro District). Many of the city's denizens defied classification; some of the eccentrics were lovable, some not so much. The city had more human oddities than all the Ripley's Museums combined. Sam Spade and his trench coat were long gone; Dirty Harry and his .44 Magnum now roamed the mean streets.

In flyover country, San Francisco was considered an open-air insane asylum. Stand-up comedians affecting brain-damaged druggie speech or lisps and limp wrists (yeah, you could do that back then!) were getting laughs on late-night TV monologues. Nevertheless, the city remained popular with tourists thanks to the climate, the waterfront, the hills, the bridges, the cable cars, and the scenic views.

San Francisco was not the only hotbed of turmoil, however. On the east side of the bay, Oakland had a large and festering ghetto, a very active group of Black Panthers, and a highly visible Hell's Angel's chapter founded by the notorious Sonny Barger. (This was the chapter that Hunter Thompson rode with – and got beat up by – when compiling Hell's Angels; the Strange and Terrible Saga of the Outlaw Motorcycle Gangs, his first published book in 1966.)

Adjacent to Oakland was Berkeley, ground zero for university-related radical movements. As the flagship school of the University of California system, it was far more prominent (and elite) than SFSC. University President Clark Kerr was caught in the crossfire of the famed Free Speech Movement. The protesters thought he was too conservative, the California regents thought he was too liberal. Even the FBI tried to smear him. Unfortunately, he was Clark Kerr, not Clark Kent, so he could not transform himself into Superman before taking on his antagonists. As a result he was scapegoated and fired in 1967, just one year before Hayakawa took over at SFSC.

So this was the scene in the SF Bay area while Hayakawa presided over SFSC. To say he went against the grain would be greatly understating his position. He had lived in San Francisco since 1955 but by 1968 he must have felt like a stranger in a strange land.

When he retired from academia in 1973, he was 67 years old. Surprisingly, he was about to embark on another high-visibility profession. After five years, California voters had not forgotten his one-man stand against the social justice mafia.

In 1976, Senator John Tunney was up for re-election after one term. Tunney was the son of Gene Tunney, a former heavyweight champion boxer. Tunney the younger was something less than a political heavyweight – in fact, some pundits believed he was the basis for the Robert Redford character in The Candidate, a 1972 political comedy about an idealistic but clueless Democratic California Senate hopeful (Robert Redford).

Though Hayakawa had been a lifelong Democrat, at age 70 he was persuaded to enter the Republican primary in 1976. To the surprise of the GOP establishment, he defeated three career politicians. He was rightly perceived as a political outsider. Tunney underestimated him and squandered a large lead in the polls. By the time he realized he was in trouble, it was too late, and Hayakawa defeated him.

Unfortunately, while voters often say they prefer plain speaking over platitudes and political outsiders over insiders, they often have second thoughts. Over time, the plainspokenness wears thin and they return to the comfort food of warmed-over nostrums. Outsiders are at a disadvantage, as getting things done in Congress requires social skills and political savvy, not naiveté. That the elderly Hayakawa was given to dozing off in meetings did not endear him to his colleagues in the Senate.

While Hayakawa's flirtation with politics might have been an ego boost, he should have known that he was out of his element. When presented with an issue, a politician is always pressed to take sides. Neutrality is not acceptable. At the very least, he must say something to the effect that he will have his staff look into it. Hayakawa was not up on all the issues and never pretended to be. Famously, regarding a ballot pertaining to greyhound racing, he said, "I don't give a good goddamn about greyhounds one way or another. I can't think of anything that interests me less." In one fell swoop, he alienated anti-gambling moralists, the SPCA (no PETA in those days), and pari-mutuel lobbyists. Hayakawa was well read, but perhaps he had skipped Dale Carnegie.

When Hayawka was up on the issues, he often took surprising stances. In truth, though conservatives had championed him, he was no ideologue but assessed each issue individually. Even though he was of Japanese ancestry, he came out against reparations for Japanese-Americans (the Canadian-born Hayakawa did not become an American citizen till 1954) who had been interned during World War II. He also spoke out against bilingual schools and ballots (adios, Mexican vote) and even sponsored a constitutional amendment to make English the official language of the United States. He angered many supporters by supporting returning control of the Panama Canal to Panama. During his 1976 campaign, he had joked the United States should not surrender the canal because "we stole it fair and square."

Perhaps his most telling quote was "Being an educator all my life, I am accustomed to dealing with those who are unenlightened." Not exactly populist sentiments. Joe Sixpack and his old lady may say they like straight talk…but not in regard to their own shortcomings.

The honeymoon between Hayakawa and the voters was short-lived and by 1982, it was obvious he would not be re-elected (in fact, re-nomination was unlikely) so he dropped out of the race. (The Republicans held onto the seat, however, as former San Diego mayor Pete Wilson defeated Jerry Brown).

If Hayakawa were around today (he said sayonara to this mortal coil in 1992) he would find that semantics is more relevant than ever on campus and in politics. The Vietnam War is over but most of the old issues are still out there in some form or fashion, and since social justice is such an open-ended term, the potential issues are limitless.

Thanks to the new electronic media, the war of words is unceasing and increasingly vicious, and the casualties are mounting. Despite all the communications devices we have, discourse has never been more degraded. A careful parsing of what people say and what they really mean is more necessary than ever. Contemporary semanticists possess the intellectual tools to undertake such analysis, but they are understandably reluctant to do so.

Hayakawa certainly understood what we call the echo chamber. In his heyday, he might have known it as the amen corner. "If you see in any given situation only what everyone else can see," he noted, "you can be said to be so much a representative of your [sub]culture that you are a victim of it."

Hayakawa also understood the "Thought-Terminating Cliché." You may not have heard this term before but you have likely seen it employed. In semantic circles it is the practice of terminating a debate by resorting to a non-responsive cliché. For example, in a discussion about global warming, one may hear a proponent argue that "the science is settled." The intent is not to defend a position or stimulate debate but to invoke cloture – kind of like the old advertising phrase "Nine out of Ten Doctors agree."

Catchy slogans, of course, are a must in both politics and advertising. You don't argue with a slogan, you just repeat it, or hum it, if it's been set to music. You can't totally shut it down, and once it's embedded in your brain you might believe there's something to it. "Everybody knows…"

> We have nothing to lose but our chains
>
> Melts in your mouth, not in your hands
>
> Black lives matter
>
> Winston tastes good like a cigarette should
>
> Silence is violence
>
> Breakfast of champions
>
> Check your privilege
>
> A diamond is forever
>
> No justice, no peace
>
> Just do it
>
> A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle
>
> Where's the beef?

Semantics also deals with the meanings and connotations of words and how they evolve over time. Language, like society, doesn't evolve fast enough for some people, so rather than wait for word meanings to change over time, it is necessary to formally redefine them.

Of course, we've seen numerous debates about the definition of feminism. "It's all about equality" is the usual thought-terminating cliché. In truth, that's more or less what it says in my dictionary published in 1985. The current definition might be well beyond that and tomorrow's definition may be really off the wall. Concepts like "patriarchy," "equity" and "systemic oppression" might be called into service to expand the definition.

Of course, you can see where this is going. If you want to control the debate, first control the definitions of words. Get the media to buy into your new definitions, and the battle is almost over before it starts. Semantics 101.

Perhaps Hayakawa would have been more valuable as a political commentator than a politician. Surely some semantic insights into the candidates, the parties, the speeches, and the political commercials would be a blessing today. A latter-day Hayakawa could easily sniff out all the verbal manipulation, but who would grant him a platform? How long would he last on CNN? On YouTube? On Facebook?

In a 1958 interview published in the Paris Review, Ernest Hemingway said, "The most essential gift for a good writer is a built-in, shockproof shit detector. This is the writer's radar and all great writers have it."

The same is true for semanticists. Now when we need them more than ever, they are nowhere to be found.

If only we could resurrect Samurai Sam – make that a legion of Samurai Sams – to pull all the plugs that need pulling.

In the hierarchy of oppression, blacks trump women, so ‘Karens’ is now a thing in the MSM

AVfM Video Source · 24 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Marxist Feminist Roots of Black Lives Matter

AVfM Video Source · 30 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Interview with Janice Fiamengo

AVfM Video Source · 1 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Subscribe to Paul's BitChute Channel here.

Boys raped more often than girls

Tom Golden · 3 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Do boys face sexual abuse as children? According to research, the answer is a very powerful yes. A CDC study in 2005[1] showed that 1 in 6 boys experienced unwanted sexual contact by the time they reached the age of 18. The number for girls was a bit larger, it was 1 in 4. So 25% of girls and 16% of boys were reported to have had unwanted sexual activity prior to the age of 18.

I am sure that some of you are wondering exactly how the question was worded in order to get to those numbers. We live in an age where definitions have become so watered down that statistics really don't tell the story. So for those of you who are wondering let's look at the exact wording. This is taken directly from the journal article:

"Four questions from Wyatt[36] were adapted to define sexual abuse during childhood and adolescence: "Some people, while they are growing up in their first 18 years of life, had a sexual experience with an adult or someone at least 5 years older than themselves. These experiences may have involved a relative, family friend, or stranger. During the first 18 years of life, did an adult, relative, family friend, or stranger ever (1) touch or fondle your body in a sexual way, (2) have you touch their body in a sexual way, (3) attempt to have any type of sexual intercourse with you (oral, anal, or vaginal), or (4) actually have any type of sexual intercourse with you (oral, anal, or vaginal)?" A "yes" response to any of the four questions classified a respondent as having experienced CSA. In addition, the frequencies for each component were calculated."

This wording seems fairly straightforward and accomplishes the important task of not using the word abuse. We now know that males have been reluctant in the past to answer that they have been abused because males often times simply don't see their experience as having been abusive.

One study[6] used a sample of children, both boys and girls, who DHS had defined as having experienced childhood sexual abuse. Of that group only 16% of the boys thought that they had been abused. You can compare that to 64% of the girls who thought they had experienced abuse. In this sample four times as many girls who had been designated as having experienced sexual abuse as children believed their experience was "abuse." Only a fraction of the boys felt they had been abused even though they had a similar experience. This has likely been a factor in some previous research showing that boys were less frequently sexually abused as children.

Simply using the term "abuse" in a research questionnaire would throw off the numbers. Things seem to shift drastically when you only ask about the exact experience and not label it as abusive. This study shows that when you do ask about specific experiences the boys and girls have similar rates of abuse. The men and boys will answer the questions honestly; it is simply they have a different view of the word "abuse."

The idea of 1 in 6 boys having been sexually abused as children is not limited to this research nor is it new. There are a number of other studies that have come to very similar conclusions. (See references.) The range seems to be between 14% and 18% for the boys. We knew even in the 1980?s that boys comprised a sizable number of those children who experienced sexual abuse. The classic and best selling handbook for female survivors of childhood sexual abuse “The Courage to Heal” estimated that 1 in 7 boys faced the trauma of sexual abuse as children. The book, like so many other media sources focused almost totally on female victims.

The idea of 1 in 6 has become so accepted there is now a web site 1in6.org that offers information specifically for boys and men on childhood sexual abuse. It provides a place for men’s stories about their abuse; has information for the men, their family members, therapists and professionals. It is well worth a look. I think it’s a breath of fresh air.

This particular study went further than only examining the incidence of sexual abuse among boys and girls. It also kept track of the sex of the perpetrator. For many years the assumption has been that the perpetrators of sexual abuse of boys are primarily men. This research and other recent studies challenge that assumption. This study found that of the boys who were abused nearly 40% of the abusers were female. It also found that 8% of the perpetrators of sexual abuse of girls were also female.

The study also examined the life impact of their childhood sexual abuse. It found that both boys and girls were negatively impacted in a similar manner. This also challenges some of the old assumptions that it was the girls who were abused that faced the greatest hardships/trauma and negative life impact due to their abuse. This study says that is far from the truth. They conclude that both boys and girls are impacted and the impact is very similar for both.

I am grateful to these researchers for their even-handed examination of this problem and their ability to ignore the status quo politically correct version that focuses on girls who are victims and ignores the hardships and needs of boys. They take a very important stand on this issue as can be seen in their conclusion (emphasis is theirs):

In conclusion, the data presented provide important implications for public health and preventive medicine. First, childhood sexual abuse is a common form of childhood maltreatment in both men and women. Second, childhood sexual abuse and severity of the abuse have a similar relative impact on behavioral, mental health, and social outcomes for both men and women survivors, as reported during adulthood. Moreover, it was demonstrated that female perpetration of CSA upon boys was common (40%), and increased the risk of behavioral and social outcomes among male CSA victims.

The Title of This Article

I do have one bone to pick with this research. It has to do with one of the tables of data they offer in their article. Table 2 on page 433. Here’s a graphic of that table:

432 American Journal of Preventive Medicine, Volume 28, Number 5

Table 2. Prevalence (%) and characteristics of childhood sexual abuse by gender

	Men (n=7970) %	Women (n=9367) %
Type of sexual abuse
Touched in a sexual way	13.2	22.5
Forced to touch an adult	8.1	7.9
Attempted sexual intercourse	7.3	8.6
Completed sexual intercourse	6.7	5.6
Any type of childhood sexual abuse	16.0	24.7
Severity of sexual abuse[a]	(n=1276)	(n=2310)
No intercourse	58.2	77.1
Intercourse	41.8	22.9
Sex of perpetrator[a]
Male only	51.0	91.9
Female only	20.8	2.1
Both male and female	18.3	3.6
Not specified	9.9	2.4

[a]Frequencies calculated only for those who met the definition of

Notice that this table separates the male numbers from the female numbers of those who experienced childhood sexual abuse. A quick look at the table shows that a total of the various types of abuse sum to 16% of males and 24.7% of the females. Okay. But look at the numbers for the least intrusive sexual abuse. This is the category that one would assume would be the largest for both boys and girls with declining numbers to follow. But what you find is that 13.2% of the boys experienced this lowest level of abuse and 22.5% of the girls experienced this lowest level of abuse. Still not a problem but obviously the girls experienced much more of the least intrusive type of abuse.

But look what happens with the more severe abuse: In the next category "forced to touch an adult" the boys outnumber the girls, 8.1% to 7.9%. Then in the next level of abuse of attempted intercourse the boys are 7.3% and the girls 8.6%. But it is the last most abusive category that got me wide-eyed. In this category of completed intercourse the boys outnumber the girls 6.7% to 5.6%! This seems to say that more boys then girls were raped as children. That is a notable statistic.

My beef with the researchers is they didn't highlight this difference and question the reasons for such a startling stat. It was basically glossed over.

While I deeply appreciate these researchers focusing on boys and showing they need and deserve compassion – and I really appreciate their focus on boys being just as negatively impacted by their experiences of sexual abuse – I just can't forgive them for not putting this stat into their discussion and pointing out that their data indicates that boys are more often the victims of severe sexual abuse as children.

The more severe the abuse becomes the more boys and girls are in equal numbers with boys being slightly more likely to experience the worst types of sexual abuse. That is what their data says and that is a very powerful message that might wake up some of both our slumbering psychological professionals and the general public. The least they could do would be to get a discussion going about the reasons that boys outnumber girls in that most intrusive category.

The popular percentages of 16% of the boys (1 in 6) and 25% (1 in 4) of the girls having experienced childhood sexual abuse is a bit misleading. The standard 1 in 4 girls are sexually abused may be technically correct but I think it misleads a bit especially when it is compared to the 1 in 6 of the boys. It makes it look like many more girls face sexual abuse. The fact is that many more girls do face the least intrusive category of sexual abuse, nearly 1 in 4.

All the while about 1 in 8 boys faces this least abusive category. But when you only look at the more severe forms of abuse the numbers change. Now for both boys and girls it is more like 1 in 14 with slightly more boys experiencing the most severe forms of sexual abuse.

I don't want to minimize the impact of the less severe forms of sexual abuse but at the same time I think it is vitally important to ensure that the fact that both boys and girls are equally susceptible to the more severe forms of abuse gets into the public knowledge base.

Our media has painted a picture over the last 40 years that girls are the real victims of sexual abuse in childhood and men are the primary perpetrators. If you think about your own perceptions I would bet that you would go along with those ideas. We have gotten only half the story from the media. When you only know half the story you carry a potent bias. It leaves us with a disinterest and even a disbelief in the pain and hardship that boys face.

Just imagine that our media was biased in the opposite direction. Just imagine they were much more interested in the hardships that boys face and preferred to ignore the hardship of girls. How would they go about taking the findings of this study and promoting their bias? A media like that might produce the following headlines:

MenAreGood NEWS

www.menaregood.com THE WORLD'S FAVOURITE NEWSPAPER - Since 2005

Boys Raped More Then Girls!!!!!

One or two of these boys was likely raped. This startling fact is part of the latest CDC study on child rape.

The latest research indicates that boys clearly outnumber girls as victims of rape in childhood. The CDC study shows that 6.7% of boys were raped while a lesser number of girls faced such powerful trauma.

Legislators are immediately coming together to find some solution to this crisis in order to help our boys experience a childhood without major intrusive trauma.

Some ideas that have been circulating include creating a system of supports for boys not unlike the Shed movement in Australia. This would give boys a safe place to go that was boy friendly.

There is current debate about exactly how to fund these initiatives. Many of the legislators are considering a special tax on women since it is women who have been entrusted with our children's safety and have failed to

(continued on A6)

MenAreGood NEWS

www.menaregood.com THE WORLD'S FAVOURITE NEWSPAPER - Since 2005

Women Rape Boys!

Which one of these women might be a child rapist? We just don't know.

The latest research indicates that about 6.7% of boys will be raped prior to the age of 18 and nearly half of those rapists will be women. This surprising statistic has shocked many people. One expert explained that women have lived under the cloak of innocence for many years and this has aided many to commit evil acts while escaping public suspicion.

This betrayal by so many women has left the general public both shocked and angry. Most people want children to experience a childhood free from trauma and had assumed that all women wanted the same. Now that trust has been broken. Some are calling for mandatory testing of mothers via vaginal photoplethysmography to find the offenders and bring them to justice.

It has also been found that those women who were arrested for the rape of young boys have not faced justice. These cases were often deemed unimportant and forgotten. Legislators (continued on A8)

These headlines show what a biased media might do if they were only concerned about the needs and hardships of boys and men.

We have had nearly 50 years of the opposite: a media that is only concerned about women and girls. The above headlines don't lie, they simply tell only half the story. This engenders a very false image in the minds of their readers.

We have all been duped. Most people believe that women and girls have a corner on the market of hardship and discrimination. This is a completely false message as can be seen by the research discussed in this article. We need a media that shows compassion and interest in the needs and hardships of boys and girls – not just girls. This research study is a good example of the beginnings of this sort of thing.

And let's not forget, Men Are Good!

References (these were taken from the 1in6.org research page https://1in6.org/the-1-in-6-statistic/)

1. Dube, S.R., Anda, R.F., Whitfield, C.L., et al. (2005). Long-term consequences of childhood sexual abuse by gender of victim. American Journal of Preventive Medicine, 28, 430–438.
2. Briere, J. & Elliot, D.M. (2003). Prevalence and psychological sequelae of self-reported childhood physical and sexual abuse in a general population sample of men and women. Child Abuse & Neglect, 27, 1205–1222.
3. Holmes, W.C., & Slap, G.B. (1998). Sexual abuse of boys: Definition, prevalence, correlates, sequelae, and management. Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA), 280, 1855–1862.
4. Lisak, D., Hopper, J. & Song, P. (1996). Factors in the cycle of violence: Gender rigidity and emotional constriction. Journal of Traumatic Stress, 9, 721–743.
5. Finkelhor, D., Hotaling, G., Lewis, I. A., & Smith, C. (1990). Sexual abuse in a national survey of adult men and women: Prevalence, characteristics, and risk factors. Child Abuse & Neglect, 14, 19–28.
6. Widom, C.S. & Morris, S. (1997). Accuracy of adult recollections of childhood victimization part 2. Childhood sexual abuse. Psychological Assessment, 9, 34–46.

Nicola Graham-Kevan: Coercive Control and Domestic Violence

AVfM Video Source · 3 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Professor Nicola Graham-Kevan has long been an internationally renowned (British) authority on domestic violence and coercive control, and is unusual in those fields in being a non-feminist.

We've just posted her keynote speech (70 minutes) – "Coercive Control and Domestic Violence" – from our recent (online) conference, "Domestic Abuse is a Men's Issue, Too". We think the video is outstanding. She speaks in the video about the government engaging only with feminist "researchers" – biased ideologues, of course – in these areas, and that's been the case for a number of decades.

Our playlist of all the eight conference speeches:

https://www.youtube.com/playlist?list=PLjMscr0TpRqjnZVjAituKqJr9kyVQAJnF

Mike Buchanan

Dr Kristi Winters Vs ShadowDancer | Feminism DEBATE

AVfM Video Source · 3 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Origins of 2nd Wave Feminism: An Interview with Mallory Millett

AVfM Video Source · 6 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Dignity of Showmanship – A Defense of Men of Slapstick

Vernon Meigs · 7 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I notice that slapstick doesn't get a whole lot of love or respect. To each everybody's own, but I think this admittedly lowbrow form of humor gets a bad rap that it doesn't deserve – from people who generally prefer "genuine wit" over slapstick, to those who seem to downright hate it and everything it stands for.

I want to not only come to the defense of the idea of slapstick, but also to advocate on behalf of the very best of it. When absolutely comic violence is happening to the characters on screen, are we really laughing at them for being pathetic and pitiable, or are we in fact actually laughing with them, because we root for them as they have a blast in an over-the-top adventure, and we perhaps relate to them in one small way or another?

I am going to pay special attention to my favorite form of American slapstick as done by who are, in my opinion, legends: The Three Stooges. I will also talk about some mentions of my favorite Japanese comedian Ken Shimura and the troupe he used to be a part of: The Drifters.

While I talk a lot about guys smacking each other around in creative, sometimes hysterically sadistic ways while completely bereft of cynicism, I hope you will realize by the end that this essay really isn't solely about slapstick. In fact, this is more of an essay on showmanship and the quality of masculinity the men of slapstick and unabashedly lowbrow comedy lunge themselves into – for the sacred service of making the audience laugh. These are not pitiable creatures. They are lovable in the most sincere, optimistic of ways.

The Three Stooges

The faces of true love and fellowship!

In episode 3 of Season 7 of Penn & Teller: Bullshit! entitled "Video Games", magician Penn Jillette speaks of how children generally learn the difference between fantasy and reality very early on in their lives. Jillette says (and I paraphrase to correct a naming error on his part) when they were kids, this fantasy/reality difference was "whacked home" by Louis Feinberg and Moses and Jerome Horwitz, also known as Larry Fine, Moe Howard and Curly Howard, of The Three Stooges. According to Jillette, the Stooges laid fake violence over real love in a way that still moved him to tears of laughter. "The Three Stooges were all about outsiders sharing love and friendship through fake slapstick."

Consider myself one of those children who had that clarified to me early on. When I was a child during the mid-'90s I had adored a VHS tape of a collection of Stooges films: "In the Sweet Pie and Pie", "Phony Express", and "Playing the Ponies". Not so long after I've indulged in another VHS tape (featuring Shemp Howard as the third Stooge in place of Curly) including "Vagabond Loafers", "The Pest Man Wins", and "Three Dark Horses", and then an early cheap DVD including the then-already public domain shorts "Sing a Song of Six Pants" and "Brideless Groom". I understood it wasn't too typical of people to be into The Three Stooges at that early an age, and add to the fact I was living in Japan where no other kid I showed it to can possibly relate on a language level (though some of them did laugh at the physical comedy).

During that age, The Three Stooges (as well as the likewise old Our Gang series of films) were watched with a sense of longing on my part – that is, my longing to be a part of a "gang" of friends. Whereas Our Gang involved a pretty extensive network of friends in any given situation doing epic, mock-adult things (as well as being "relatable" as I would have been the same age as the actors as I watched back then), The Three Stooges were of course grown men always in a group of three. However, this still didn't deter me from trying to relate to them and pretend I was a member of a couple of guys going about town just doing stuff together and being in real inseparable friendship. I may not have been able to express what I wanted out of this at the time, but I think that Penn Jillette was right on this – it really was about love and friendship.

For a long time in my recent life, I had wanted to give focus and praise to men who were unabashedly themselves in a world that can sometimes be too condescending, too highbrow for their own good, and otherwise too "high society". Men of physical comedy often are passed over in favor of so-called "genuine wit"; while there is of course nothing wrong with such genuine wit, in my opinion it very much takes enough raw wit to come up with the sheer performance happening in something like The Three Stooges. More on men unabashedly themselves, this can extend to musicians that play a little too loud, a little too longwinded, a little too over the top; boys who skateboard on daunting places that would freak their mothers out; men in general who don't apologize for being who they are and don't care who knows it. This sort of thing, in my mind, is exemplified by the Stooges in what amounts to the most optimistic way.

By what is no doubt coincidence, as I was gathering my thoughts to write this, I've come across some harsh sentiment against slapstick on social media (For reasons of tact, I won't divulge who says this). Apparently, slapstick has been regarded by a certain individual as follows: "All slapstick comedy is male. Humans laugh when seeing men hurt. It's the devil." Then some more: "Slapstick comedy is spermatic. Killing the competition to reach the egg. It's why we laugh at it. It's far less funny when women get bonked about." I was left speechless by the last bit: "The devil hates God and takes great delight in seeing man (made in God's image) 'take a fall'".

In my mind I was seeing these set of accusations being lobbed at what can be considered genuine heroes of mine. I say Three Stooges but I hope it's clear by now that I am talking about four individuals: the three Howard brothers and Larry Fine. I take their optimistic presentation of themselves and their ongoing drive of never being bogged down despite every pratfall on screen, then imagine them being directly accused of whatever this guy says slapstick is all about, and I can do nothing but be livid. It had shown that my position not only seems atypical but downright at odds against a world that merely see these comedians as pitiful bumblers.

I will grant that enough media out there indeed paint men in a way that is for condescending. They are not to be rooted for, and their downfall should be celebrated, as their agenda goes. This is prevalent anywhere from the older "screwball comedies" to modern Woke fictional media in which men exist only to be trampled and berated by Mary Sues like in new Star Trek outings. But this is not what true slapstick is all about, not even close. The Three Stooges are no pushovers. In fact, they are resilient, defiant, often irreverent and iconoclastic in the best of ways, and they stand alone but together. I would rather face hell with my own gang of Stooges than serve in whatever Heaven this person above seems to prefer.

In the Sweet Pie and Pie

Since we're on the subject of resilience, I want to explore what is still to this day among my most favorite of The Three Stooges films, "In the Sweet Pie and Pie". There will be some spoilers here so perhaps it is best if you actually saw the film if you can find it. Or, you can just read along here.

Three sisters, Tiska, Taska and Baska Jones are to marry three convicts to retain an inheritance, a scheme cooked up by their lawyer. The convicts in question are three falsely convicted innocent men on death row, and who should they be but Moe, Larry and Curly. When we cut to the Stooges, we find out they face hanging the next day and are determined to get out and not give up. In true bizarre fashion, Curly just happens to have three large saws in his pants, and almost right away the saws get put to good (ab)use, cumulating to a fencing match between Moe and Curly. But watch – Moe's saw goes clear across Curly's head. Upon closer inspection shows that the saw Moe was using wasn't in any way lethal, but then a closeup of the then-ruined saw was swapped in. When you think they were real saws being fenced with, for a second you'd be flabbergasted as to how Curly actually survived that with no damage.

The sisters then come into the cell and they are hastily married to the convicts, and then are left immediately to rot once the deed is done. I will note the amusing moment with Moe going “No wedding kiss!” followed by him looking at Curly and they give a quick smooch.

At the start of the hanging, in truly absurd fashion complete with a sports broadcaster intending to provide a “jerk-by-jerk” description of the hanging complete with an audience of other prisoners with a vendor of snacks and a program. The hanging is botched however when the ropes break and are tangled in it. Immediately though, they get a message that the real criminals have been captured and have confessed and the Stooges have been pardoned by the governor, and they are free.

Really I'm just including this still because I paused it there at a time and found it too hilarious to not include.
I love this next part. The Stooges, newly freed and suited, barge right in to see their newlywed wives, to which they spit out their drinks and evade them. After it gets explained that they are pardoned, the three sisters punch the Stooges in the face "just to let them know who's going to be boss around here". Now of course, in today's lowbrow comedies where men are portrayed as pathetic trash, that's all the fight we will ever expect from those men in question. But not Curly, Moe and Larry. Not for a second. "Well if that's how it is," goes Moe as they get up, "boy that's how it is! Shake!"

Then they proceed to toss the girls from behind their shoulders and slam them right into their own floor! Now that's standing up for yourself! "That's just to let YOU know who's going to be boss around here!" says Moe. Are these the acts of pathetic men? No, I say! They've stuck together for their rights and were in complete "sympatico" as they asserted their dignity. How can you not love that?

Of course you realize, this means war. The sisters, desperate to get rid of their new husbands, cook up a scheme to get them signed up to as much high-society routines as possible, so as to make them fail when they get so sick of it and leave. Made aware of this, Moe stresses at night that they have to act like society now (Curly retorts hilariously: “I refuse to act that dopey!”) lest their new wives have any excuse to throw them out. And maybe this is just me being ignorant about norms of the old days or wealthy households, but it’s hilarious to me that the Stooges sleep with themselves and not with their wives. Well, I laugh at the situation of course, I don’t laugh the Stooges themselves as I’ve already explained. But the thing is they, like any given comedy gang, tend to sleep with one another like brothers. A touching concept in itself in a way, isn’t it?

There is more hysteria to be had here, as they’re still used to the “prison” way of sleeping so they are discontented with their comfy beds, so they turn their beds in to a bunk like in jail, but Curly gets stuck with very high-up top bunk. I can’t possibly convey in words how hilarious the result is when Curly manages to stack a bunch of furniture to use as a ladder and finally reaches the top bunk. You must see it, and it’s driven me to psychotic fits of laughter every time I saw it when I was little.

Then next the Stooges must take dance lessons, and really the following scene is reused stock footage of another episode. Before that though, there is quick bit where Curly protests doing dance lessons so early and without breakfast, but Larry retorts, “You can’t quit! That’s what they want us to do!” So this is what I read as instead of mere conformity and being pushed around, it’s the Stooges banding together to survive and resist the tyranny of their new wives. In their own silly, cartoonish way, the Stooges ultimately seem to have their own sense of dignity, even though they kick and scream their way through.

After the dance lesson footage where everybody including the lady instructor ends up out the window and into water, the Stooges are said to have undergone a grinding wheel of routines and still they persist in sheer defiance. The lawyer then proposes a party in which the Stooges will be so humiliated in front of society members that this will be untenable for them.

It starts off shameful enough, the stooges are in their tuxes and top hats but forget their pants and are rushed out of the party. The lawyer then bribes the butler concerning a big cake, for later.

There is some dialogue around the table that is pretty witty for the dialogue-based comedy fans out there in my opinion, though of course Larry and Curly are always punished for any given thing they say by Moe who basically acts like a grouchy big brother to them both. Moe of course is literally Curly's older brother in real life and wasn't the grouch he is here in fiction, so this comedic fiction of violent expression of brotherhood has a charm to it.

Then the butler with the cake returns, and pretends to trip and slam the cake upon an otherwise civil and sociable Moe. Tiska outwardly accuses Moe of tripping the butler, but the other woman there (played by Symona Boniface) defends Moe and accused the butler of doing it deliberately. Love this woman for standing up for the truth by the way; even to the point that after Moe accidentally pelted her with a piece of the cake because the butler ducked, she slammed a pie in the butler's face because he "started it".

And thus begins the very first proper pie fight in Three Stooges history. The Butler and the woman laugh hysterically in their delightfully childish piefight which leads into nobody, no Stooge, no man, no woman there, being potentially spared from pies in the face. There is too much to detail here that can't be better explained than by just watching the absolute unabashed mayhem and irreverence towards high society. In the end, the lawyer walks back into the war ensuing and barks and slaps the Stooges and declared that their marriages will be annulled at once, but the wives, no doubt exasperated at the lawyer's hair-brained scheme gone awry, join the Stooges and everyone to inundate him with pies, and thus a happy (?) ending for this film!

A Few More Words About the Stooges, and Real-Life vs Fantasy

"In the Sweet Pie and Pie" saw Moe slap, eye-poke, and bonk foreheads and guts, all of which are fairly typical in Stooges film. The same film saw Moe fling the end of a saw on Curly's face, run the same saw through Curly's head, drag Curly by the nose, and other more situationally appropriate punishments.

It should be obvious to the reader by now that, not even counting the over-the-top ones like with the saw, casual violence in real life is probably not the best way to go about showing fellowship. Many in the real world unfortunately inflict physical violence on others, in particular their own children, and completely excuse it with notions of “tough love” or “teaching discipline”. Remember me mentioning that mutual friend of a friend whose wife boasted about their second son’s circumcision on social media, back on my essay “On the I Don’t Remember My Circumcision Argument”? The same mutual friend of a friend had likewise boasted on the supposed benefits of whipping his first son with a belt “like his own dad did to him”, professing to be grateful for being beaten in the ass for social media clout. He must have been a tortured specimen to be sure, taking out his frustrations on his own flesh and blood and then calling it love. I don’t buy it when anyone uses this excuse.

What is it, then, that makes it love when the violence is completely fictional and completely fake?

In “Vagabond Loafers”, again in which Shemp Howard plays the third Stooge in place of Curly, Moe gets a bag of steel pipes landed on his head, Shemp falls flat on the floor from the fireman’s pole where the backseat of the Jeep should have been, Shemp accidentally blow-torches Moe’s ass, and Moe slams a pipe wrench on Larry’s head. This amounts to anywhere from comic accidents to Moe being an exaggerated grump trying to keep everybody in line where he is not always the brightest himself. Shemp thinks the “water don’t work” because pipes are clogged up with wires, which are actual electrical wires, to which Moe, allegedly the brains of the gang, initiates connecting water pipes to those electrical pipes, practically resulting in water flooding areas of the house.

In “Three Dark Horses”, Shemp takes a huge bite out of Moe’s Finger, only for Moe to bite Shemp on the nose while both grunt frantically. This resembles an over-the-top version of some squabble between two brothers (Shemp, too, is a real-life brother of Moe) who we can bet otherwise love each other’s company.

A maniacally funny scene to me is in “Pest Man Wins” where Moe, in retaliation for Larry feeding him rat poison, straight up rips out a huge chunk of Larry’s hair.

In “Sing a Song of Six Pants”, Shemp wrestles with an ironing board, smacks his own hand with the hot iron, hits Moe accidentally with a broom only for Moe to bonk him with the broom, shove the end up Shemp’s mouth and drags him away with it. Moe rewards Shemp’s ineptitude by tweaking his nose with a pair of large scissors. Moe cooks up a pancake lunch using the steam ironing press (best way to prepare them, am I right?), and later uses the same press to punish a member of a gang of crooks by pressing his head between it while Larry shoves a hot iron on his ass.

Of course, I could go on with examples like these. What is the point I'm even trying to make here?

In a past essay of mine about Representation Politics, I mentioned my theory on the purpose of fantasy – to put it succinctly, it is about envisioning an ideal sort of world and bringing that closer to reality as we can within reason. When applied to this world of love through fictional violence and fake slapstick, it's really all about being able to let loose. When Moe inflicts punishment on his fellow Stooges, it's not because we hate them or pity them and want to see them defeated and end up in the gutter. It's not because we laugh at any permanent damage. In fact, if you notice, there is no permanent damage or barely even short term damage.

The fantasy is to do "dangerous" things and live life long range, and not actually be hurt by it. The aspect of bringing it closer to reality is really just putting it on the screen and seeing it happen with real people. It's not that hard to figure out that some of the more dangerous-looking scenes use either dummies or stunt doubles, and Moe isn't really trying to cut off Shemp's nose with scissors. I've already mentioned that the saw that went through Curly's head was also just a clever prop. But the illusion of all that, especially for a child like I used to be (and still am in many ways??), makes it for epic entertainment. People not only living life a wild way that can be nothing but envied, but doing it with some of your best friends? In a childhood in which I was constantly being marginalized for being different and friendships were neither easy to come by nor can be as epic as on the screens, I've dreamed and fantasized constantly of such silly, levitous adventures.

It is so strange to me to call this, essentially, the Devil's handiwork against those created in God's image. No, this is not the time for me to go into my thoughts about religion, but if these people think fake violence is this bad, what about men and boys that oftentimes risk real injury through skateboarding, American football, and other long-range sports? Does the thrill most of us derive from watching these men and boys in action come from our contempt of them as they smash their faces in or break their legs? No. If anything we are awed at their successes. In turn, think it's safe to say we can be awed by how these men of slapstick make it look so easy to act absolutely bugnutty and over the top while coming out of it with a full skin and an optimistic smile.

Shimura Ken, and The Drifters

This image has taken from a Google search and is associated with a mirror.co.uk article reporting on Shimura's death.

I am going to refer to Japanese comedian Ken Shimura as Shimura Ken (Surname then given name as per Japanese custom) simply because that's precisely how I've internalized my personal comedic hero; please bear with me here. Otherwise I'd just be correcting my work all over the place as I proofread.

Shimura Ken, practically a legend of Japanese comedy and a household name of the country, died on March 29th, 2020. He was said to be the first celebrity to make public their diagnosis of COVID-19, and his death sent waves of shock and disbelief among the Japanese people. Ever the symbol of lighthearted persistence and active at the age of 70 with now unfulfilled plans including carrying the Olympic torch for a relay for the Tokyo Games, nobody expected him to be dead just like that.

I could talk more about slapstick as it relates to Shimura Ken and the band-and-comedy-group that he started out with, The Drifters, because there truly is a lot to say. I will keep it short, however, and will say that I fondly remember the very impromptu feeling I got from watching a Drifters slapstick performance, be it a televised stage performance on their show Hachijidayo! Zen'in Shuugou! or television. They smack around, slam objects, perturb, abuse, and "torture" in ways that, just like with The Three Stooges, are devoid of any cynicism or misanthropy. When one guy gets hit, sometimes they go something along the lines of "that one really hurt, dumbass!" and that just made things even more funny. Like I mentioned before, they make it all look so easy and exciting, and yet we as children knew it was all fiction. Any of Shimura Ken's antics during and after his Drifters work is something most of us knew was unacceptable, from the fake violence, ultra-lowbrow humor (where due to differences in Western and Japanese standards, are even more juvenile than the Stooges), and downright gleeful perversion and suggestive jokes. (Ok, I said I'd keep it short but I've rambled long enough)

No context.
Instead I want to shift gears and talk about the showmanship of men such as these.

Being an improvisational genius must have been a requisite for anyone to be accepted into The Drifters. For one, there is the fact that they were a band and had to put on a comedic but oftentimes airtight performance (trivia: when The Beatles had their first concert ever at the Nippon Budokan, The Drifters had a very short performance as an opening act).

In Hachijidayo! it seems to me that there is a general script for any given stage performance, but allowed for a lot of improvisation, especially on the rare occasion something unexpected happens like a whole stage set falling apart or somebody catches fire. Fellow comedian and fellow Drifter Cha Kato (or “Kato-chan” joined Shimura Ken in ‘higedansu’ or “Moustache dance” routines in which they performed clever, talented acts like catching a flying orange with a sword blindfolded from a distance, or balancing a bowl of raw eggs high atop the stage with a long pole, or sillier things in which they would spin bigger and bigger buckets around with a punchline in which they get soaked by their own devices.

Aside from those regular acts, Shimura Ken and Kato-chan have other skits with just them together. A pair of consecutive skits come to mind that I really want to talk about.

The setting is at a home where Shimura Ken, in drag, plays the housewife welcoming back home the husband, played by Kato-chan, from being discharged from the hospital. The housewife then proceeds to serve the husband a glass of milk which he accepts and takes a light sip from, but the housewife then complains that “back when you were healthy, you always chugged milk in one go! You must still be sick I’m calling the hospital right now” to which Kato-chan denies that’s necessary and proceeds to chug the milk. He then wants his curry rice dinner, and the housewife serves him curry rice and a glass a milk. “I’ve only asked for the curry,” he says. The housewife goes into the same spiel, “you always had a glass of milk with your curry! I’m calling the hospital” to which he again chugs down the milk to assure “her” everything’s ok, though he loses his appetite for the food by then.

Something similar happens on and on throughout the skit with ready-made glasses of milk, from a newspaper and a milk, cigarettes and a milk, an ashtray and a milk, a telephone call and a milk, with variations such as Kato-chan tossing the milk while Shimura Ken isn't looking, to which a new glass is immediately replaced, and Kato-chan failing to chug and spilling the contents all over himself to which a new glass is replaced again.

The punchline at the end is when he wants the housewife to get the futon ready for bed, with a gigantic glass canister of milk. All the while Kato-chan has been chugging what looks like real milk many many times over as part of his performance, with no tricks. At the same time I am laughing my ass off at this every time I watch it, I also think: that takes some nerve, some resolve, to carry on a skit like this with dignity.

Immediately after this skit ends, the stage crew replace the stage sets with a very brief musical intermission; Kato-chan and Shimura Ken likewise change outfits behind the scenes. When the second skit starts, Kato-chan, now in drag, runs a wanko soumen restaurant that serves thin wheat flour noodles, for those unfamiliar. Shimura Ken, actually a guy this time, is a customer walking in for some of that wanko soumen, which you can ask for as many refills as you want. Note that Kato-chan is doing this skit right after he chugged an absurd amount of milk.

Each serving a quick meal for the hungry, Shimura Ken orders his second, then his third that Kato-chan just places a new load into the bowl. Satisfied, Shimura Ken says he is done. Kato-chan then proceeds to just toss in another load into the bowl, expecting him to eat it. The skit parodies on Japanese social norms of not wasting food, where it is more stigmatized to do so in contrast to say, the United States, where doggie bags or the downright tossing of food is considered far less of an issue. “If you’re done, please put that cap onto the bowl, please. Unless it’s capped off, I’ll just keep refilling” says Kato-chan, to which Shimura Ken acknowledges and proceeds to shove down more noodles. Right as he finishes round 4, Kato-chan shoves round 5 before Shimura Ken even gets a chance to put the lid on.

This gets more elaborate with things like using a long pole to refill after Shimura Ken shoos Kato-chan away, sneaking up from behind him, shoving noodles onto the lid while he’s not looking so he refills it himself, and such! During this Kato-chan goes, “Thank you so much for all that milk earlier!” That’s right, it’s revenge time. Now Shimura Ken has to shove down soumen noodles and it takes the all showmanship he’s got to carry through. After the tenth bowl he’s finally had enough and he caps off the bowl. Kato-chan says that for those who eat so much there’s a prize: a huge bowl of free soumen to take home!

It’s the kind of revenge you inflict upon your friends when you get put upon in Mario Kart or some other interactive video game such as that. It’s hilarious to see this sort of thing being performed upon each other in succession. But way large scale and fantastical, of course! Only these genuine entertainers soldiered on with some wild acts for the entertainment of the audience. And once again, they aren’t the objects of pity by the audience. The audience loves them for this banter. The kids love them, not to condescend, but as heroic evangelists of levity in a world that always seems to need it, when the silly conventions of the world need the ridicule they deserve.

Shimura Ken will be missed by myself and so many.

The Lightheartedness of Masculinity

The reason I felt compelled to write all this stems back to sentiments I’ve had when I was writing “An Objectivist’s Case for Men’s Rights Advocacy”. In a world where even a lot of defenders of men’s issues make the argument for men being a provider, self-sacrificial animal, and basically valued for only what they can give and what they will lose and what we can take from them, I’ve wanted to provide a voice for the self-interested man, the “selfish” man, and the man who achieves things because it is they who achieved it, and it is what they wanted to achieve. Another side to this is that I want to advocate for the man that is just his own honest self and doesn’t care who knows it. There is that irreverent, iconoclastic streak to this sort of man that I just have to admire; the man that mocks gynocentric high-society that demands male altruism as well as chivalry, gallantry and “honor” as a socially programmed paradigm. The equity feminists tout this traditionalism ad nauseam and they meet at the ends of the horseshoe with the ultra-conservative types that praise their more stone-faced, self-sacrificial ideas of masculinity that doesn't particularly esteem males going their own path and doing their own things anyway. They seem to me to be deathly afraid of a little decadence, lightheartedness and lowbrow for fear of "degenerate influences". But so long as we're talking about true men, I don't think true men are in danger of this sort of thing affecting them negatively.

As much as the ideals out there for masculinity such as the uniform, the protector, the provider and the teacher of values do indeed serve classic male archetypes, I offer the counterpart to that which should never be misunderstood: the roughhousing male, the absolutely funny male, the male that thumbs their nose at ridiculous expectations of an often unfair society, and very importantly, the male who doesn't care what you or I think about him.

Slapstick can be seen as a dramatized form of fantastical roughhousing. When we see kids roughhouse, whichever kid is down at that moment, we aren't pitying him. We know he will stand back up and roughhouse back. It is the fact that we see this sort of thing happening among adult performers (with more clever tricks) tugs at the heartstrings of the viewer because perhaps some of them wish they can be childlike as The Three Stooges are on screen and forget the worries of the world. It should be noted that a lot of the scenarios The Three Stooges are in are of various worries of the world, from facing death row while innocent, to running a struggling business. In their own optimistic plans, schemes, and efforts, we see them take the road to getting themselves to a better place together, and oftentimes they do in fact succeed!

If it is true that men bond through roughhousing of one sort or another, then it is no surprise that the Stooges are always bonded, whether it is Larry, Moe and Curly, or Larry, Moe and Shemp.

I understand that The Three Stooges tend not to have as much popularity outside of the United States. I could be completely wrong about that and am open to correction, but I base this on when I've spoken to a few people none of them Americans, what their opinions of the Stooges were and they didn't really have any to speak of. Goodness knows that even a household name such as Shimura Ken (again, in Japan) is virtually unknown in the Western world. But to the reader, I ask that you consider the men of slapstick and sheer showmanship as a proud, dignified part of the masculine spectrum in a world that focuses on just putting men down for the sake of putting them down. We have to find and appreciate the men who stand up for themselves when they get brought down, and we laugh with them, not at them.

Image taken from Nikkei Asian Review's article of Ken Shimura's death

_____See also: Stooges Behaving badly

What really makes a man happy in life?

Alexander Reich · 10 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Nothing makes you unhappier than trying to be happy.

We live in a pleasure society. Everything is designed to make you feel good. Sugar in every food and drink. Sexuality displayed everywhere and gained with one tap of your finger on your phone.

And still, people are constantly searching for happiness. But this is a fallacy. Especially for us men.

Because indulging in these happiness-factories we built in our society makes you unhappier than you think.

It is exactly what happened to me.

● Seeking pleasure makes you depressed

I remember almost two years ago what my life looked like. I was working a decent paying 9-5 job, was married, had some friends I met on the weekends, and my spare time after work I was spending on playing videogames, watching porn, eating junk food, and then spending each evening on Netflix.

Basically had everything society tells me is good. But somehow I still felt empty inside. Something was missing, but I couldn't put my finger on it. It just felt pointless somehow. Was that really all there is? The next step would be a house and kids. Good. And then? Working 30 years in a job I hate to retire without money, waiting to die?

Maybe that is too cynical, but I am sure it resonates with some men out there. Probably even most men. As the quote goes, "The mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation. —Henry David Thoreau, Walden."

I was that man. I was desperate for better sex as an external validation that I am a man who gets some. I was desperate for more money to buy stuff to show off to my friends to feel better. I was desperate for meaning in my life because that current life felt so predefined and irrelevant.

I remember telling my wife that I liked being a small cog in a big company. Doing my part of the trade, so this company keeps running. She just nodded, but was probably thinking, "Really? Are those the sum of your aspirations in life?”

She never said anything like this because the ladies rarely communicate as overt as we men do.

● Do we all need to be millionaires?

After waking up and noticing that I don’t like my current life at all, I went on a mission to find myself and what I truly want. Only to realize that I am not the cog in the machine. I don’t like this life at all.

I want millions of Dollars, fast cars, big houses. And I actually enjoy the freelancing lifestyle. Which is why I started my own blog, wrote books, and help other men. But the point is, I am well aware that not all men like that.

My best friend for example totally thrives in being the family dad. He loves playing with his kids, and this is the sum of aspirations he has. This made me realize two things:

- There is no one-size-fits-all solution to this
- It is totally fine if I want to be utterly different

We are being raised to follow that predefined lifestyle. Go to school, learn a corporate job, meet a woman, marry her, buy a house, have kids, work, retire, die. And for some men, this is totally fine. But for others, it is hell. And these men – like me – live lives of quiet desperation.

We never say a thing. But even worse, we never do a thing about it. We see these fast cars and cool stuff rich people buy and have, and we’d love to have that as well, but we believe it is impossible because that’s what we’re told from growing up.

Maybe it is not money that you seek. Maybe you just want to help kids in Africa get an education, and you’d like to do this voluntarily. Maybe you want to be a digital nomad and write from anywhere around the world to an audience. Maybe you want to be a famous movie star. Maybe you want to have sex with every type of woman possible.

Whatever your dreams and aspirations are, the problem is that you’re not living them, and that makes you unhappy.

● Adversity means happiness

This is something none of us are ever taught. That adversity, and most importantly, overcoming it is what makes you happy. Men thrive when we have a mission, a purpose. Something to strive for, something that fulfills us.

David Deida said in The Way of the Superior Man that for the feminine, happiness is derived from love. From having a “loving nest” with kids and a man. But for the masculine, happiness is derived from being in line with his mission.

Men are on this planet to mean something.

Most people would agree with this, but then put labels on it. It means you have to be rich and famous.

No, absolutely not. It just means you should be doing what you like! And this might not be what your current life is. Maybe you just need a little bit of adjustment. Just start a hobby you love, or once did. Maybe it means you need to leave the country to feel whole.

I don’t know. Nobody knows. You do! But to get to this, you need to overcome obstacles. Nothing worthwhile is ever easy. If you want to live in happiness, you need to overcome adversity. This is your calling as a man. If it weren’t, and just indulging in all those easy pleasures would be your calling, then you wouldn’t be depressed and feel empty.

So what you should be doing is not trying to be happy. You should try to do hard things. Which are aligned with your dreams. Maybe you don’t know what your real dreams are, yet. Fine. Do something. Start anything. But if you aren’t happy in your current place of life then you need to do something.

You need to seek adversity. You need to do the hard stuff. Be it trying to be more dominant with your wife, setting boundaries with your kids, or trying to make more money. Whatever it is, it won't come easy.

And that is the point. Easy won't net you what your soul seeks. Overcoming adversity is what makes you happy in the end. Remember the last time you went jogging, or to the gym? After an hour of a great workout session, you feel great. Alive, energetic, full of willpower. Because you overcame adversity. Through the workout itself and because you overcame your inner demons.

This feeling is true for life in general. Overcome those inner demons, do hard things, work towards your dreams and goals relentlessly. And at the top of that mountain, you will find happiness.

Stop Circumcision – Defend Foreskin – IntactPac

AVfM Video Source · 10 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Houston, We Have a Statue Problem

Doug Mortimer · 11 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Dick Dowling – Texas

It is a curious comment on our times that we pay taxes to fund public artworks that are ugly, insipid, or downright ridiculous while statues with far more aesthetic appeal are being defaced, destroyed, or removed. Of course, politics pollutes everything it touches, so why should history or art be exceptions?

The anathema statues have been almost exclusively of men so one imagines the distaff members of Antifa take particular pleasure in their iconoclasm. On occasion, however, the removal of a statue serves to draw attention to a great man or at least a common man who once accomplished a great feat. Such a man was Dick Dowling.

On June 17 in Houston a longstanding (since 1905) statue of Dick Dowling was removed from Hermann Park. Houston mayor Sylvester Turner had promised that the removal would precede Juneteenth, a state holiday marking the date (June 19, 1865) when Texas slaves first found out about the Emancipation Proclamation. Funny how remarkably punctual politicians can be when it comes to keeping certain promises.

This was not the first controversy pertaining to the Dick Dowling legacy in Houston. The first concerned Dowling Street, renamed Emancipation Avenue in 2017. One year later a Houston man failed in an attempt to blow up the statue. Houston may be a port city but it is not Portland, so he was sentenced to six years in prison for his crime.

If you don't live in Houston – or even if you do – you may not be familiar with Dick Dowling. But you should be. Dowling led a short but remarkable life – an immigrant success story if ever there was one, but unfortunately he does not qualify as an IOC (no, not the International Olympic Committee, but an immigrant of color).

A multi-talented fellow, his skill as an artilleryman was unmatched. Unfortunately, he employed that skill to repel Yankees. So 155 years after Appomattox, his street and his statue are history, but not in a good sense. Nevertheless, his deeds need not perish from the manosphere.

Richard William Dowling was born in County Galway, Ireland in 1837. As a boy, Dowling and his family escaped the Irish potato famine and emigrated to New Orleans. As a youth, he managed a saloon in the French Quarter. Rising anti-Irish sentiment as a result of the Know-Nothing Party's success in New Orleans convinced him that the luck of the Irish might be stronger in Houston.

Arriving in Houston in 1857, he prospered as a saloonkeeper – not just one saloon but three of them. Dowling was more than a bartender, however. He was also a player in the city's first gas company, fire department, and streetcar company. So far, so good, but nothing really statue-worthy. Then on February 1, 1861 Texas seceded from the Union.At the outbreak of the Civil War, the 24-year-old Dowling was already a member of a local Irish militia. The militia was quickly absorbed by the Confederate Army and Dowling and his Houston Irish brethren, mostly 20-something dockworkers, became a Confederate unit popularly known as the Davis Guards. Or, if you prefer, Company F, Cook's Regiment, First Texas Heavy Artillery.

It didn't take a military genius to realize the importance of Gulf Coast ports to the Confederate cause. So long as bales of cotton remained piled up on the docks, precious revenue for the CSA withered away.

The U.S. Navy blockaded the Texas coast in the summer of 1861, but the big prize was further east. New Orleans, at the time the largest city in the South and one of the world's major ports, was occupied by the Yankees in the spring of 1862. Next came Mobile and Galveston. But on New Year's Day, 1863, the rebels retook Galveston, which remained under Confederate control for the duration of the war. Dick Dowling and his cohorts were among the victors that day. But they had not seen the last of the Yankees.

In September 1863 a flotilla of four gunboats and 20 troop transports was dispatched to the mouth of the Sabine River which divides Texas from Louisiana. The mission included capturing Beaumont, another port city, and recapturing Galveston. Houston was also on the agenda, but before the dredging of the Houston Ship Channel boat traffic was minimal. The city was an important railroad nexus, however.

A Confederate fort with six cannons stood on the Texas side of the Sabine River. Aware of the impending invasion, Dowling, then a lieutenant, led the men of the Davis Guard, just 45 in number, as they made careful measurements of distances and powder charges. Then they took target practice—lots of it. When the Yankee ships arrived on September 8, the Irish Texans were prepared.

The Yankee warships engaged in long-range shelling of the fort for 90 minutes in the early morning hours. Knowing the ships were out of range of his artillery, Downing ordered his men to hunker down and wait.

The Yankees, thinking they had rousted the rebels or at least softened them up, returned that afternoon. When they came within range (about 1,200 yards), the rebel cannoneers sprang into action. Despite the disablement of one cannon, the Davis Guards fired their guns 107 times in 35 minutes, which qualified as rapid fire in 1863. Two of the Union warships were destroyed. A third found the channel blocked by one of the immobilized ships and was forced to turn back. The captain of the fourth ship realized he was the proverbial sitting duck, so he made a U-turn and went back out the Gulf. The 20 troopships never got close to landing. Against overwhelming odds, the Confederates easily won the battle, which was over in 45 minutes. Estimates vary, but at least 24 Yankee soldiers or sailors were killed or seriously wounded, 37 were missing, and more than 300 were captured.

Had the Yankees landed, there was no way Dowling and his men could have defended themselves against the roughly 5,000 men in the flotilla. Thanks to the cannoneers' sharpshooting, no ground combat was required. Amazingly, Dowling and his men suffered zero casualties.

Confederate President Jefferson Davis (for whom the Davis Guards were named) called it "one of the most brilliant and heroic achievements in the history of this war." Normally, that would qualify as political hyperbole, but Davis was a graduate of West Point, served as a Colonel in the Mexican-American War, and was Secretary of War in the Franklin Pierce administration, so he was hardly unschooled in the ways of war.

To be sure, it was a humiliating defeat for the Union, even though the blockade continued. Outside the South, news of the engagement was also of interest. U.S. credit declined abroad and the U.S. dollar lost 5% of its value against gold.

Keeping Yankee troops off Texas soil was a major achievement. Aside from Gettysburg, fought two months prior, the theater of war had been below the Mason-Dixon Line. The occupation of Texas could have been relatively benign (albeit riddled with corruption) as in New Orleans, or it could have been nastier, like the scorched-earth policy General Sherman inflicted on Georgia and South Carolina in 1864. The retention of Texas did not keep the South from losing the war, but at least postbellum Texas was not in a state of ruin, making it easier for the natives to pick up the pieces afterwards.

To say that Texans were gladdened by Dowling's victory would have been an understatement. If you look at what people call stunning, amazing, or awesome today, you would have to come up with a new word to describe Dowling's feat. There's no telling how much suffering he and his men prevented.

After the war, Dowling, discharged as a major, remained a local hero. In fact, he picked up where he left off. His newest saloon, the Bank of Bacchus, was particularly popular as it was across from the Harris County Courthouse. He formed the first oil company in Houston (that alone should have secured his place in local history) and owned a large chunk of downtown Houston.

Dowling's business acumen was a match for his military smarts; unfortunately, his Irish luck had run out. He fell victim to yellow fever in 1867. The same disease had already taken out most of his family members. He was just 30 years old.

Nevertheless, September 8, 1863 marked a great achievement for Dowling and was a great day for the Irish. Ironically, a couple of months before, Irishmen in New York had been the most conspicuous participants in the New York Draft Riot. In those days before mass media and social media, it took something big to stir people up. The new conscription law was indeed a big deal, particularly to an Irish immigrant who couldn't have cared less about ending slavery, saving the union, trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored, or any other crusade you could name.

If they'd had draft cards in those days, the Irish probably would have burned them, but what really riled them was the provision that a man with $300 to spare could buy his way out of the draft. $300 was a tidy sum in 1863, and few men – and very few Irish immigrants – could pony up that amount. Wasn't this a New World version of the British tyranny they had endured for centuries? Hence the riot…or should we call it a protest? Final score: 120 deaths, 2,000 injuries. Maybe we'd better call it a riot.

The statue honoring Dowling was a long time coming, though planning started soon after he died. It was finally unveiled in 1905 at City Hall. It was the first publicly funded monument in the city. In 1939 it was moved to Sam Houston Park and finally in 1959 to Hermann Park. Now it is in storage. Finding it a home may be difficult, even on private property. The statue could be considered, in legal terms, an attractive nuisance; in other words, something that attracts children, or in the case of BLM/Antifa mobs, the childish.

The statue of the remarkable young man who saved Texas from untold woes will no longer stain the cityscape. Never mind that today's Houstonians, all 2.3+ million of them, are beneficiaries of his proficiency with artillery. Had the Yankee invasion succeeded, Houston might be very different today. Granted, given the air pollution and traffic, some might argue that would be a good thing.

There was a time when a remarkable military achievement could be duly noted if not necessarily celebrated. Many a Yankee had to admit that Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, and Nathan Bedford Forrest were pretty sharp. In fact, they might have wished they had generals of that ilk on the Union side. There was much to admire about these men. Sure, they were rebels and maybe they owned slaves (Forrest, tut tut, was also a slave trader!) but that is not what defined them. Once upon a time such men went down in history; today, no matter how outstanding their achievements, they go down in infamy along with their statues.

But the iconoclasm in Houston may just be getting started. Recently a statue of Christopher Columbus was removed from his namesake city in Ohio. The same fate could await the equestrian statue of Sam Houston on the north side of Hermann Park in Houston. It wouldn't be the first time the Father of Texas was snubbed.

In 2006, for example, Houston's Major Soccer League franchise was pondering nicknames. The name chosen was the Houston 1836, based on the year Texas won its independence. Unfortunately, in the process Mexico lost a lot of real estate, so the usual suspects complained that the name 1836 was divisive (isn't that what independence movements are all about?) so after one month the nickname was changed to the Houston Dynamo.

Houston was no Confederate – indeed he spoke out against the spread of slavery and secession many times. After Texas seceded in 1861, he refused to swear allegiance to the Confederacy and was removed from office. Also, he championed Native American rights, spoke Cherokee, and once married a Cherokee woman. But goshdarnit, he was in charge at the decisive Battle of San Jacinto, just east of present-day Houston…and he and his troops killed a lot of Mexicans (roughly 630) in the process.

Well, these days it's one strike and you're out – actually, make that two strikes. Houston also owned a few slaves, which he freed before his death in 1863. If his statue goes, it's entirely possible that the name of the city will also go bye-bye.

The big enchilada, however, is the Sam Houston statue adjacent to I-45 outside of Huntsville, Texas. A modern-day Colossus of Rhodes, it stands 67 feet tall. I'm sure the Antifa Lilliputians have this one on their agenda also.

I don't know if Dick Dowling had any slaves or not. But I do know the fort he defended was built with slave labor. Not that that should tarnish his victory, but we live in illogical times.

There may be yet another reason to flush Dick Dowling down the Texas history toilet. At the Battle of Sabine Pass, his planning, preparation, and execution were flawless. If you have a soft spot in your heart for rebels and you like to root for the underdog, he certainly qualifies.

Unfortunately, governments generally aren't fond of people like Dick Dowling. He shows that you can defy the odds and not only emerge victorious but unscathed. That's not an idea you want to implant in men's heads. Rather, just the opposite…you know, resistance is futile…lay down your weapons and bend over. For sure, we could use a Dick Dowling or two in fighting today's culture wars.

The story of Dick Dowling's victory may be far more dangerous than any statue ever could be. For the time being, his story is still told at the Sabine Pass Battleground State Park in Port Arthur. It's located at 6100 Dick Dowling Road…whoops! This just in! According to the internet, the address has been changed to 6100 Dolewood Road.

Sneaky bastards!

When The World Went Mad

Peter Ryan · 13 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Fifth Horseman

> "Never Go Full Retard"*– From the movie *Tropic Thunder

When we discuss the apocalypse we sometimes refer to The Four Horsemen- Death, War, Famine and Plague. We have two of those right now, but is there one missing from that list? Is there a fifth horsemen we can add? I think there is. I would call it madness. The world has gone mad. Our world is now led to a significant extent by crazy people with crazy ideas. We call it clown world and as we can see with the toilet paper, madness does reign in 2020. Madness brings chaos and chaos brings the fall of society. There is no greater example of madness in modern society, than woke culture and identity politics. This has become the subject of Douglas Murray's book, The Madness Of Crowds[1]. We are at a critical juncture in history and what is going on needs to be thoroughly examined and addressed. The first thing we have to acknowledge with madness, is that madness is never supposed to make any sense. Do not go looking for rational and sane causes for irrationality and insanity.

Madness has nothing do with reason and exists in the absence of reason. Year after year attempts have been made to use reason to cure the far-left ideological madness in society. This will never work, just ask the violent mob that divisive identity politics nurtures. All of these intellectual critiques of woke culture and identity politics will fail to bring about their downfall. Appealing to reason to challenge woke culture, is like trying to fight a fire with straw. It is the freedom from the consequences of irrational and pathological ideas and beliefs, that has resulted in the proliferation of madness in our society. When academics can espouse madness in our institutions for decades and when bureaucrats can introduce absurd policies with impunity and there is no accountability for the results of their ideology, madness will grow in society and that is exactly what has happened. Appealing to reason with people, requires that they be open to examining their own beliefs and questioning them. This will only occur when people bear the costs of their own beliefs and cannot push them onto society for their benefit and at our expense.

Unchecked power corrupts and the people promoting the madness we are witnessing in modern society are doing so from privileged positions and with impunity. There are no consequences for these people and no costs they incur from their own ideology, so why should they care about whether their ideology has a positive or negative effect on society? This is the key mechanism of how madness proliferates in society- Lack of accountability for beliefs and ideas. Gynocentrism[2] is a bad set of beliefs and ideas that gains traction in a society that permits madness to proliferate. It is certainly not the only set of bad ideas that thrives in madness, but it is definitely a prime example of one of them.

The peace, freedoms and prosperity we have enjoyed for decades after World War Two as a result of massive technological and social change, has resulted in a relaxation of our vigilance to weed out bad ideas and beliefs. We have dropped our guard as a society and have failed to hold people accountable for promoting bad ideas and beliefs. This is because we have become less concerned with our own survival and have lost our sense of the danger madness represents and the threat it poses to society. Don't get me wrong, people should have the freedom to say what they like, no matter how stupid or wrong they may be. However I do think people should not be free of accountability for what they promote and implement from positions of authority in the mainstream media, academia, the boardroom, the legal system and in politics etc. Too often woke culture, identity politics and the Marxist far-left, gets a free pass for the results of their ideas and policies whilst holding privileged positions of authority and are kept in a protective bubble free from accountability. That has to change and to change things we have to diagnose what is going on. We have to be able to identify the factors that are driving the madness in society and fuelling the growth of sets of pathological ideas like gynocentrism, if we want to identify the madness in our society and then hold people accountable for promoting it.

The Forces Of Madness

There are eight core social factors or forces that need to be discussed in explaining the power of the current societal madness we are experiencing and that drive the growth in the madness we have observed. Every single one of these eight social forces also drives gynocentrism and the pathological aspects of our culture that are like it. The power of gynocentrism is not all about just sex and neoteny, there is more to it than that. Although these social forces exist independently of gynocentrism, we have to discuss them to properly understand the power behind gynocentrism and what drives it. So what are these eight forces that drive gynocentrism and the growth of madness in society? They are as follows:

Lack of accountability for beliefs and ideas– I have already discussed this and it is the most important force of the eight that I will identify and describe. When people get into academia, into teaching, into the media, into politics, onto boards, into management, into our legal system and into policy, they have to be held accountable for the beliefs and ideas they promote and implement. An elite class has emerged over the last fifty years that appears to be beyond accountability for the ideas and beliefs they push onto society. The consequences of their ideas and their beliefs are never felt by these people and they are never confronted and held to account for them. These elites are the "establishment". These are the people that consider themselves our moral superiors and live in an echo chamber and a protective bubble where they can virtue signal with impunity and chastise the unwashed masses in society that won't comply with the ideology they promote. This elite also makes certain to censor any dissenting opinion and "cancel" or ostracise anyone offering a view that runs counter to their narrative. For decades this elite have indoctrinated society through their control of the education system and our media to hold distorted, dangerous and damaging ideas and beliefs. There has been no major resistance or accountability for this indoctrination whatsoever.

Blind faith in authority– People will follow what they perceive to be official and authoritative, even when the information or opinions presented are clearly ridiculous or nonsensical. When people are afraid, angry, uncertain or emotionally invested in a certain belief system, they will turn to authoritative figures and movements to solve problems. If the mainstream media says it, then it must be true. That's the thinking that embodies what I am describing here. It is the thinking one finds in cults and when such thinking becomes mainstream in society, it is devastating. There is a substantial amount of society who will believe what they are told regardless as to what it is, provided it comes from a position of perceived authority. The genocides instigated by the Nazi party and religious extremism, are horrific examples of what blind faith in authority can lead to and how powerful it is.

Herd mentality– People will go along with what other people think and do, simply to fit in and belong. People are also to some degree cognitive misers. People will think as little as possible in certain circumstances, if they feel they have no incentive to think with any effort. When thinking independently is not perceived to be useful or worth the effort, people will follow what other people think and follow whatever social trend is popular. That is one example of herd mentality- Following the group simply because it involves less effort. Herd mentality is why we have no supermarkets with toilet paper in a pandemic caused by a primarily respiratory virus! Human behaviour does not require logic when herd mentality takes over. Herd mentality fosters groupthink and strict social policing to enforce conformity on the group. Herd mentality does not allow any dissent from collective insanity, delusion and hysteria and thus becomes incredibly dangerous when it grows to a certain level and starts impacting political and economic decisions with long term implications.

Tribalism– When group identity becomes the predominant theme in society, then everything begins to revolve around group identity. People are judged not by what they say and do, but what identity they belong to. We called it discrimination in the past, but apparently discrimination is now equality. When group identity becomes the primary value system of society, expect hypocrisy and double standards to become the new normal. It eventually becomes impossible under such conditions to have meaningful discussions on anything and address societal problems. I don't think I have to explain in detail how obsessed our society and institutions etc are with group identity at the moment. Tribalism paralyses society and prevents us from properly functioning. Eventually it fractures society and leads to mass violence. We have already had a taste this year in 2020, of what to expect if this tribalistic "us" versus "them" mentality is allowed continue unchallenged.

Surface Thinking– People will skim the surface of a subject based on the information immediately and easily available to them and form snap judgements. Little analysis or scrutiny will be done of the information people are exposed to. Information is just absorbed and repeated in such circumstances. This is a further example of being a cognitive miser. Thinking is hard. There are a lot of lazy people in our decadent society and these lazy people form lazy half-baked opinions about ideas they have not even properly bothered to examine. We know all about surface thinking in the manosphere. How many times does the gender wage gap need to be debunked? How many times?

Surface thinking is why the media can so easily manipulate the beliefs of society about particular issues. How many people bother these days to scrutinise the information they are presented with, or research a topic beyond the information directly disseminated to them, before they form a strong opinion on something? Quite often the goldfish attention span of modern society drives surface thinking. If you can't explain something to someone in one minute, then they do not wish to know of it. That's the mentality of a surface thinker. Thinking requires effort and sadly it seems many people lack either the attention span or the motivation to examine things in any detail. Surface thinking is exemplified by the massive void in society of any deep level of intellectual curiosity that extends beyond the frontiers of current knowledge and a lack of motivation to explore the unknown.

Short Term Thinking– We are the society of the short-termers. Short term thinking is evident in sayings like, "She'll be right", "I will be dead by then" and "Not my problem". This type of mentality has become pretty widespread in society. Well I got some news- She won't be right, you won't be dead by then and it will be your problem. COVID-19 has put the spanner in the world of the short-termers and suddenly people need to start thinking long term again. Suddenly people are starting to recognise for instance, that saving money, having an emergency cash reserve and not getting into high levels of unsustainable debt, is a good idea.

It is truly incredible how little thought has been given from the top of our society and all the way down to the general public, on our long term future. For decades there has been an apathetic attitude toward the future from the public and also from our leaders. There has been far too little consideration of the long term implications and consequences of decisions made in the present and little responsibility or accountability demonstrated for those decisions. This is particularly the case with our politicians. Just look at the mushrooming levels of government debt we have accumulated over recent decades and continue to accumulate, with no regard from our politicians on how that debt will be paid back or its effect on future generations. Woke culture and identity politics have thrived in the absence of any long term thinking. Frankly it remains to be seen whether COVID-19 will result in any substantial shift in the mentality of society to plan long term and think of the future. Due to this apathy, we have a society of people that will not address reality until it comes crashing into their lives in a major way, like it just has with COVID-19. In the end reality asserts itself.

Reductionism– People will reduce complex information down to simple categories and single causes. There is no recognition of the wider system or the multifactorial nature of a problem or issue and no consideration for the nuance and detail of a subject. This is how we got the current polarised society we now live in. Our media, our political system and our academic institutions, are now filled with arrogant ideological fools that reduce every single matter down to a left wing or right wing issue or down to identity politics. There is no room for any proper intellectual and thoughtful discussion of any issue of significance in public discourse because of this. That is a big problem and we need to address it as a society.

Emotional Thinking– People will let emotions direct their thinking to some degree and this has become much more the case over the last 50 years. Emotional thinking is especially prevalent when people are afraid, angry and have spent decades being indoctrinated into an ideology they are emotionally attached to and that has been promoted with impunity for decades in our institutions. People have an emotionally invested position on certain topics and can consequently be very resistant and hostile to hearing alternative points of view on those topics. You know you have started discussing a topic of this nature, when the people around you suddenly go from 0 to 100 on an emotional scale. This where the safe space and trigger word bullshit comes from. It is also a key reason gynocentrism is so hard to challenge with reason and with facts. Gynocentrism is saturated in emotional thinking. For many of the emotionally challenged on the left side of the political spectrum, merely offering a different opinion now automatically makes you a Nazi. Emotional thinking leads to a reductionist and highly polarised way of thinking.

People have emotional biases and the extent to which they let their emotions bound their thinking, is the extent to which they become wilfully ignorant and intolerant of dissenting opinions. Reality does not care about emotions and sooner or later reality inevitably asserts itself for these people. Unfortunately it is usually only after much destruction, that emotionally charged thinking finally gives way to reason. People who let their emotions drive their thinking, believe in fantasy over reality. It is not the rejection of facts that is the problem with emotional thinking, it is the selective filtering of facts. Such people absorb emotionally appealing information and filter out information that does not conform to their beliefs or ideas that they hold an emotional investment in. We call this confirmation bias.

The role of fatherlessness in creating a society of emotional thinkers is worth mentioning. Fathers have played a key role in socialising children into rational and responsible adults that develop beyond emotional thinking. The absence of fathers has created generations of people that have a stunted psychological development and this is now showing with the new generations of young adults. This what our future looks like, when we remove fathers from children- A society of madness and of chaos.

These eight forces are rife in our society at the moment. They are not only observable with the general public, we can also see them at work within our own governments, corporate sector, academic institutions and especially from our mainstream media and politicians. These forces drive mobs to burn buildings, destroy and vandalise statues and property, assault innocent people, take over city blocks and call it all progressive justice. They are also the same forces that drive mobs of people to buy toilet paper and to behave and think like complete idiots in a pandemic. The level of idiocy has been almost unbearable for me to watch this year. We really have reached new heights of mass stupidity in 2020. Emotion and particularly fear and anger, are at a multidecade high. All that the media is doing is just fanning the flames and they are doing it deliberately for their own agenda and the agenda of their owners. More on that later.

Do We Deserve What We Have?

If people really are this stupid then perhaps society should collapse. Do we really deserve what we have inherited from past generations when we react so emotionally and without reason, as we have done in 2020? It is a question now worth asking. What I am talking about can be illustrated with the example of COVID-19 and our reaction to it.

How would people that lived during the Spanish Flu, World War One and Two and the Great Depression react to COVID-19? Would they have locked down their entire society to the same degree as we have, or would they have made smarter and harder decisions? There was a toughness to earlier generations, that frankly our modern society lacks. They accepted far greater levels of mortality and continued to run their economies and keep their societies open to at least some degree, even when bombs were literally raining down on their cities.

Even during the Spanish flu when at least 17 million people died (Many estimates are much higher than that) and the world population was much less than it is today, countries put in place some restrictions, but they did not go to the same extremes as what we are witnessing today all over the world in responding to COVID-19. COVID-19 as of July 2020, has not even caused 5% of the deaths observed from the Spanish flu (Based on the conservative estimate of 17 million deaths from Spanish flu) and we have a far larger world population today than during the Spanish flu pandemic. Of course we need to take COVID-19 seriously, but we also need to have some perspective and keep things in proportion and recognise we have had far worse pandemics historically (Like the Black Death which killed between a third to one half of Europe). We seem to lack in modern society, a readiness to make hard decisions and accept hard realities. We have become soft. There will likely be a second, a third and a fourth wave of this virus and more waves after that until there is a vaccine or the pandemic has run its course. Sooner or later we are going to have to choose between keeping society locked down to save lives, versus the very real prospect of a great depression or even the complete collapse of our national economies from a protracted lockdown and all of the death that will result from that.

Aside from toughness, there was also an intelligence and rationality to the decisions of our leaders during the numerous difficult periods of the early 20th century. This intelligence and rationality seem absent today. We have known the age profile and the health profile of those that are hospitalised and die from COVID-19 since April of this year. We know the majority of those that are infected and are then hospitalised or die, are elderly and/or suffer some kind of health condition (obesity, diabetes, hypertension, heart disease and lung disease often from smoking etc). We know that the majority of healthy people that are under 60 years of age with no health condition and get infected with COVID-19, will not die or be hospitalised. A substantial number of these people may not even have any symptoms or will be mildly sick. This is not conjecture, these are facts that anyone can check up on. We have had this same pattern confirmed multiple times across the world and have now had time to prepare our hospitals. We now have the knowledge of COVID-19 and the public health capacity, to be more targeted in our measures to react to the pandemic. Despite these realities, we continue to live in fear whipped up by the media and continue to lock all of society down and risk the possibility of another major depression or even socioeconomic collapse.

Sooner or later we will have to confront our thinking on what we are doing, because the long-term consequences of the lockdowns will begin unfolding in major ways. Remember this lockdown was meant to give our hospitals time to prepare and not to eradicate the virus (which is what the media and political narrative has now morphed into). A lockdown will never eradicate this virus. It is also not a socially or economically sustainable long-term solution to the pandemic, to lock down society every single time there is a “wave” of the virus. This is a hard reality that sooner or later we will have to confront.

Interestingly none of the fear of the virus we now seem to again be consumed by and none of the lockdown restrictions seemed to matter, when we had violent mass protests a month ago all over the world during a pandemic, because of the unjust and tragic death of a single individual in one country. What does that stark contrast say about the intelligence and emotional state of modern society? It is complete nonsensical madness! How much of this reaction to COVID-19 is just emotional hysteria whipped up by the media and our politicians, which they ramp up and down with news cycles to suit their agenda? No one seemed to care about social distancing during the protests and our collective fear and concern only seems to arise when we are told to be fearful by our media and politicians. What does our reaction to COVID-19 say about our current society in comparison to past society? I think it speaks volumes on how regressed society has become intellectually and culturally. In many ways we have made intellectual and cultural progress as a society in comparison to the past, but in other respects we have gone in the exact opposite direction and regressed, or have not met the standards we claim to have reached.

I am not suggesting we be cavalier with COVID-19 and the risks it presents, but we need to be tougher, less emotional and more intelligent in how we are reacting to it. A more targeted approach to managing the risk that COVID-19 represents based on considering the age and health profile of those most at risk, seems far more sensible than repeatedly locking down all of society when there is inevitably another wave of the virus. We could put in measures to isolate and properly support those most at risk, along with positive cases, overseas travellers and medical and aged care staff. We could reopen the rest of society and still encourage social distancing where possible and preventative measures like wearing masks and washing hands when people are out and about during the pandemic. Yes that does mean more cases, but not a huge spike in hospitalisations and deaths.

There are reports that some people with mild or asymptomatic cases of COVID-19 can exhibit signs of tissue damage with their organs. However there is a view this damage may not be permanent in some instances and may just be temporary damage that the body will repair. This is concerning of course and I am certainly not saying healthy people under 60, should have a carefree attitude toward the virus. Social distancing, washing hands, wearing masks and proper hygiene, are all very important measures that should be encouraged. Everyone should take precautions, because the virus is dangerous. However, it is a reality that the degree of danger is heavily skewed towards the elderly and those with certain health conditions. They are the majority of people filling our hospital beds and dying from the virus.

It is also a reality that going to the extent of locking down society for more than a few months and/or having multiple mass lockdowns, is also dangerous to public health. Protracted or repeated lockdowns do cost lives. This is about managing risks and consequences and making hard decisions. In the short-term with many unknowns, it could be argued that a lockdown was justifiable, so that we had time to prepare and also evaluate the threat of the virus. In the long-term a protracted lockdown or repeated lockdowns becomes less and less tenable as a strategy, because of the increasing cost to human lives and public health from the lockdown itself. There is a threshold where lockdown measures cost more lives and have a greater negative impact on public health than the actual virus and other risk mitigation strategies have to be considered instead. This is what people with a reductionist mindset swimming in fear of the virus cannot perceive, because they can only focus on the danger of the virus and the deaths directly from the virus. A perpetual lockdown is not a tenable long term option and sooner or later it has to end.

If people want to criticise my opinion on COVID-19 I am perfectly fine with that, as long as such criticism is well thought through. Please consider the facts before you form judgements on an issue that will determine the very social and economic future of our countries for the next 20-30 years. That is how big of a footprint the lockdowns will leave on society. I would also encourage people to watch these discussions with Nobel Laureate Prof. Michael Levitt[3], distinguished physician Dr. Scott Atlas[4] and former UK Supreme Court Justice Lord Sumption[5], before they reactively form a view from listening to our mainstream media, that locking all of society down (sometimes on multiple occasions) for a protracted and often uncertain period of time, is the only way to react to this virus.

Also ask yourself these questions- How many times can we keep locking society down with every new wave of the virus, before we no longer have the economy and the money to support our health systems beyond 2020? What resources will we have available for the next pandemic or for future waves of this virus, if we destroy our economies? How many lives will be lost from suicide, addictions/overdoses, intimate partner violence, stress induced heart disease and cancer and from failing to seek medical care to diagnose and treat other life threatening conditions (Other than COVID-19, like preventing the diagnosis of cancer or heart disease at an early stage) etcetera from the lockdowns? How much is overall health and life expectancy going to be reduced from livelihoods being destroyed because of the lockdowns? These lockdowns are not harmless to public health. There are costly limits to the effectiveness of locking society down over a protracted period of time or doing so repeatedly.

It takes a certain level of responsibility, a strong intellect, moral discipline, emotional toughness and resilience, to ensure the continuation of our modern civilisation. Frankly I see very little of any of these attributes reflected in our leaders or from the general population at the moment. Past generations built society by putting reason and accountability before feelings. Our society is not even close to where past generations were in this regard. It may seem cold, but being overly emotional on important issues like a pandemic is dangerous and can be more dangerous than the actual virus itself. You don't get all of the technological and social progress we have experienced in the West over the last 300 years by letting feelings and the mob dictate society. We could learn something from that. What did Franklin Roosevelt say during the Great Depression? "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself"[6]. When I look at society today, it is consumed with fear and our leaders and mainstream media are stoking and playing to that fear. That is the difference between past society and the society of today.

What we are living through is a challenge to the age of reason and modern civilisation itself. We are living through a crucial moment in history. This year and this decade are inflection points that will set the course of the rest of this century. Facts have to come before emotion. Bad ideas that are proven to be factually incorrect need to be dismissed, regardless as to how emotionally appealing they may be. People need to think for themselves instead of robotically following the herd or authority. People need to consider information, ideas and opinions more deeply before they just absorb them, think long term and take in the bigger picture beyond the reductive lens of ideology. People need to value individuality above group identity, because individuality is the ultimate form of diversity. We need to hold people that promote bad ideas accountable for the consequences of their ideas. At the moment we are doing the complete opposite of every single one of these things and rest assured it will have enormous consequences on society.

When we cannot have nuanced discussions on complex and difficult issues because society has become too polarised and emotionally charged to discuss them, civilised society is under threat. If winning the argument is determined by who yells the loudest, violently protests and censors the most, then society will eventually implode in the intellectual vacuum such conditions create. When the group identity of a person determines the value of their contribution to society and not what they actually contribute, then society destroys its very capacity to be a society. In these conditions and after enough time, society eventually transitions into a fractured collection of tribal groups. In such a dystopia, the authoritarian mob and group identity rules. Individuality is gone, individual liberty is gone and the rule of law is replaced by the law of the jungle and totalitarianism.

What Is At Stake

Make no mistake, all of our individual liberties are at stake over the next three decades. We are in an information war against ideologues that what to divide the population against itself and keep society weak, dumbed down and in a state of perpetual social and financial dependence for their own gain and for their own power. These elitist ideologues are in our media, they are in our universities, they are in our legal systems and they are in our politics and boardrooms. They will use societies blind faith in authority, herd mentality, tribalism, surface thinking, short-term thinking, reductionism and emotional thinking and their lack of accountability they enjoy, to manipulate society for their own benefit and at our expense.

Notice when black is turned against white and women are turned against men, society is never uniting to challenge the societal status quo that leaves people weaker and poorer every year? That is not an accident. It is the strategy of divide and rule. This is not a conspiracy, it is an open secret and being done right in our faces. The media and academia are leading the way on a sustained campaign of psychological warfare against society. There is a reason the establishment funds and supports divisive political ideology- It keeps the public too distracted and divided to identify and resist the gradual introduction of a sophisticated system of mass exploitation.

Gynocentrism has gone far beyond any historical level seen in the past, in part because of those eight forces I have mentioned growing in our society over the past five decades and the influence of bad actors in our society fanning the flames. Our institutions and culture need to encourage the very opposites of these eight forces to quash the general madness in our culture and gynocentrism. However that cannot occur without accountability being applied to people promoting bad ideas.

We are quite capable of turning things around as a society and addressing these eight forces, by fostering, encouraging and demonstrating their exact opposites in our culture and in our institutions. We are capable of more than we are currently exhibiting as a society and I think there is an increasing awareness of that and that something is really wrong with the direction we are headed in. All it takes is for the silent majority to decide enough is enough and it all stops. We have subversive ideologues in positions of power. They have to eventually be held accountable by the public and I think the public is running out of patience with what is happening to society. You can see in it the public reactions to various issues as each year passes. People are reaching a tipping point, where they won't keep buying into what they have been told for years. The next step is to actually demand something be done and without compromise.

Some Room For Hope

We have the rule of law, for the very reason that we recognise that the concept of justice is above the emotion of a mob. We are emotional beings, but that does not mean we have to be slaves to our emotions. We have been rational enough to form governments, administer and enforce laws and adopt science over superstition. We are animals, but that does not mean we have to be slaves to our animal impulses. We have a choice to behave as better people and we have strived in the past to become those better people and a better society. That is what drove the enlightenment and the industrial revolution. The realisation of what society could become is a powerful motivator to improve.

So much positive social change has been preceded by a hunger to move beyond our more primitive ways. We have made some progress there. Just because we still have violence, bigotry and cruelty in society, does not mean we have not improved over the thousands of years of civilisation. We are less cruel, less bigoted and less violent than in the past. There is more justice and fairness than in the past. No matter how much ideologues would convince us otherwise, we have made social progress and continue to do so. I would encourage people to read Stephen Pinker's two books on the subject, Enlightenment Now[7] and The Better Angels Of Our Nature[8] which discusses this further. Are we perfect? No. Have we improved in all areas? No. Can we still improve? Yes, we have demonstrated that over thousands of years as a civilisation and as a species.

If humanity can come as far as it has in the last ten thousand years from huts to space stations, then clearly we can live beyond pure instinct and emotion and continue to improve. If we can do these things, then we can overcome the madness that has currently gripped society. I think we can do a better job in the future than we have done in the last fifty years, but only if we recognise where we have gone wrong. It is true that civilisations have risen and fallen, but with each iteration of civilisation, humanity has become more civilised, more advanced and more adherent to reason. We have the capacity to learn from the past and slowly with each cycle of civilisation, we are moving further away from our primitive behaviour and toward a higher state of being. There has been an undeniable upward trend in the advancement of civilisation.

There is no reason to think we have to wait until the current civilisation collapses before we can move to the next level of civilisation[9]. We can work on addressing the madness now and moving beyond it. We can start taking notes right now on what is going on, formulating a plan and building our future. We can either look toward the future, plan for it and take control of our own destiny, or we can let fear, tyrants and ideologues set our future for us. We need to have the courage to call the bad actors out, address our vices and support each other when we do.

References:

1. https://www.amazon.com.au/Madness-Crowds-Gender-Race-Identity/dp/1635579988
2. https://gynocentrism.com/2018/12/04/diagnosing-gynocentrism/
3. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sEbcs37aaI0
4. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=biC4nHPYtbA
5. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SJPF5j129QQ
6. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rIKMbma6_dc
7. https://www.amazon.com/Enlightenment-Now-Science-Humanism-Progress/dp/0525427570
8. https://www.amazon.com/Better-Angels-Our-Nature-Violence/dp/0143122010/ref=pd_lpo_14_t_1/139-5844765-5383145?_encoding=UTF8&pd_rd_i=0143122010&pd_rd_r=55af01d4-8dc0-4a8faab2-61a29f0b3649&pd_rd_w=PnRr0&pd_rd_wg=MtCix&pf_rd_p=7b36d496-f366-4631-94d3-61b87b52511b&pf_rd_r=Y6D7JA4XM8RXDBMXWPTM&psc=1&refRID=Y6D7JA4XM8RXDBMXWPTM

9. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tnmmnpj_pX8

DARVO: Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 14 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

This article is also available in Portuguese.

Have you ever marveled at how your abusive wife, girlfriend or ex is able to do and say the most hurtful, underhanded and contemptible things and then portray herself as the innocent victim? Have you ever wondered how she is able to convincingly accuse others, usually her victims, of the abusive behaviors and attitudes of which she is actually guilty? Wonder no more, the answer may be DARVO.

Dr Jennifer J. Freyd, PhD of the University of Oregon identified DARVO in the 1990s at the tail end of the repressed sexual abuse memories hysteria. In spite of its dubious origins, DARVO is a helpful concept with broader applications than Dr Freyd seems to have originally intended. Freyd writes about DARVO in conjunction with her work on betrayal trauma, which I discuss on the original Shrink4Men blog. According to Dr Freyd's webpage:

> "DARVO refers to a reaction that perpetrators of wrong doing, particularly sexual offenders, may display in response to being held accountable for their behavior. The perpetrator or offender may Deny the behavior, Attack the individual doing the confronting, and Reverse the roles of Victim and Offender such that the perpetrator assumes the victim role and turns the true victim into an alleged offender. This occurs, for instance, when an actually guilty perpetrator assumes the role of "falsely accused" and attacks the accuser's credibility or even blames the accuser of being the perpetrator of a false accusation."

DARVO seems to be a combination of projection, denial, lying, blame shifting and gaslighting. Dr Freyd notes that other observers have identified the same phenomena using different terms. My male clients experience this behavior when they try to hold the abusive women in their lives accountable. It also seems to be common behavior in most predators, bullies, high-conflict individuals and/or abusive personality-disordered individuals. DARVO especially seems to occur in high-conflict divorce and/or custody cases.

Of course, not everyone who denies wrong doing is engaging in DARVO. Many partners and exes of abusive women are accused of things they didn't do or of things that never happened. Naturally, when this happens, you deny the accusation and perhaps feel a little (or a lot) bewildered. How do you know if an individual's denial is the truth or an instance of DARVO? Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) proposes:

> "It is important to distinguish types of denial, for an innocent person will probably deny a false accusation. Thus denial is not evidence of guilt. However, I propose that a certain kind of indignant self-righteousness, and overly stated denial, may in fact relate to guilt.
>
> I hypothesize that if an accusation is true, and the accused person is abusive, the denial is more indignant, self-righteous and manipulative, as compared with denial in other cases. Similarly, I have observed that actual abusers threaten, bully and make a nightmare for anyone who holds them accountable or asks them to change their abusive behavior. This attack, intended to chill and terrify, typically includes threats of lawsuits, overt and covert attacks, on the whistle-blower's credibility and so on.
>
> The attack will often take the form of focusing on ridiculing the person who attempts to hold the offender accountable. The attack will also likely focus on ad hominem instead of intellectual/evidential issues. Finally, I propose that the offender rapidly creates the impression that the abuser is the wronged one, while the victim or concerned observer is the offender. Figure and ground are completely reversed. The more the offender is held accountable, the more wronged the offender claims to be."

This is similar to how William Eddy, LCSW, Esq describes the persuasive blaming tactics of high-conflict individuals."Persuasive Blamers persuade others that their internal problems are external, caused by something else or someone else. Once others are persuaded to get the problem backward, the dispute escalates into a long-term, high-conflict situation. One that few people other than persuasive blamers can tolerate" (Eddy, 2006, p. 29). Getting the problem backward is precisely what happens when DARVO occurs. Figure and ground are completely reversed.

"It's only the Persuasive Blamers of Cluster B who keep high-conflict disputes going. They are persuasive, and to keep the focus off their own behavior (the major source of the problem), they get others to join in the blaming" (Eddy, 2006, p. 30). This is why many Narcissists, Borderlines, Histrionics and Antisocials effectively employ smear campaign and mobbing tactics when they target someone—be it a spouse, attorney, court evaluator or therapist. By blaming others for everything that's wrong in their lives they keep the focus off the real problem; themselves. This seems to be the exact denial-attack-reverse victim and offender behavior Freyd describes.

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) states:

> "The offender is on the offense and the person attempting to hold the offender accountable is on the defense. 'Deny, Attack and Reverse Victim and Offender' work best together. How can someone be on the attack so viciously and be in the victim role? Future research may investigate the hypothesis that the offender rapidly goes back and forth between attack and reverse victim and offender."

This behavior is crazy-making if you are the target of it. You know you're being attacked while your partner/ex plays the victim role for all she's worth, insisting on her distorted version of un-reality. Worse yet, many people believe her; their reasoning being, "She's so upset it must be true." Even some of my male clients who know their wives'accusations and lies aren't true, sometimes doubt themselves and what they know to be reality. I believe that many women and men who engage in DARVO come to believe their own lies after they repeat them enough times. I call it the "O.J. Simpson Effect."

Abusers typically employ different types of denial. Perhaps you're familiar with some of the following ones:

- Outright denial or gaslighting. "That never happened."
- Minimization. "It wasn't that bad."
- Amnesia. "I don't remember doing that."
- Redefinition. "I have a bad temper, so you shouldn't upset me."
- Projection. "You're abusive and controlling. You hurt me."
- Conversion. "I did wrong, but I'm a changed person and won't do it again."

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) concludes:

"The offender takes advantage of the confusion we have in our culture over the relationship between public provability and reality (and a legal system that has a certain history in this regard) in redefining reality. Future research may test the hypothesis that the offender may well come to believe in [her] innocence via this logic: if no one can be sure [she] is guilty then logically [she] is not guilty no matter what really occurred. The reality is thus defined by public proof, not by personal lived experience."

It may be difficult to sort out who is telling the truth in these cases. However, I've found that high-conflict individuals who engage in this behavior often can't substantiate their claims or, if they just make up more lies to try to substantiate their claims, they're inconsistent over time, so pay close attention and document their lies. This may help you hang her with a rope of her own making, if and when you need to prove your version of events as opposed to her ever evolving versions of the truth.

If she is threatening to call the police and make false allegations against you and/or you're considering divorce, it's extremely important that you document the abuse you're experiencing in a journal, a digital recorder or some other medium. Abusive, persuasive blamers rely on the force of their emotions to sell their lies, half-truths and distortions. Since most people are suckers for drama, especially in the form of a tearful, self-righteous woman, you'll need proof if you want to be believed. Think of it as making yourself DARVO-proof.

References:

Eddy, W. (2006) SPLITTING: Protecting Yourself While Divorcing a Borderline or Narcissist.

Freyd, J.J. (1997) Violations of power, adaptive blindness, and betrayal trauma theory. Feminism & Psychology, 7, 22-32.

Shrink4Men Coaching and Consulting Services:

Dr Tara J. Palmatier provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation/coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

Remembering Marc Angelucci

AVfM Video Source · 15 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Marc Angelucci: modern martyr like ancient Saint Vincent

Douglas Galbi · 19 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Marc Angelucci, a civil-rights attorney who worked selflessly for decades to overcome gender injustices against men, was murdered on July 11, 2020. Among much other important work, this Angelucci worked for years to get sexist selective service overturned in court. He was victorious through a U.S. District Court ruling that declared sexist selective service to be unconstitutional. The media, Congress, and dominant elites have largely ignored Angelucci's victory for gender equality. The U.S. Selective Service System itself continues to require only men to register to have their bodies drafted for death in war.

Marc Angelucci was a hero quite unlike the hypocrites, posers, popularity-seekers, speech-policers, and panderers the U.S. has nurtured over the past decades. Consider, for comparison, the career of Niel L. Golightly. By worldly standards, Marc Angelucci had a much less successful career than has Niel Golightly. Angelucci was murdered as a relatively low-profile civil rights attorney uncovering local-government corruption, addressing family court travesties, and helping men falsely accused of rape. These are very unfashionable concerns. Niel Golightly, in contrast, ascended to the top of corporate public relations. About six months ago, he was hired as the lead spokesperson and Senior Vice President of Communications at the Boeing Company.

In 1987, Niel Golightly sought to provide better for the common defense and exclude women from the mortal dangers that men face in combat. He was then a fighter pilot and lieutenant in the U.S. Navy. Golightly wrote an article questioning including women in combat. Combat forces are a small share of overall military personnel. Non-sexist selective service registration is operationally reasonable even if only men are subject to death in combat. In his article, Golightly supported only men being subject to death in combat:

> Before we impose combat duty on women, we should understand that successful warfare depends less on manual or mental skills than on an amalgam of intangible human qualities including cohesion, morale, efficiency, esprit, and aggressiveness. We should ask ourselves not only whether women can physically and mentally perform basic combat functions — shooting a rifle, operating a missile system, loading bombs on a carrier deck — but, as well, whether women and men can adapt emotionally to the socially radical step of fighting side-by-side. The debate must acknowledge some of the basic realities of armed service.

The young Niel Golightly failed to recognize basic realities of gynocentrism. In the U.S., a majority of voters are women, 70% of consumer spending is controlled by women, women predominate among elementary-school teachers and news journalists, and women are more active than men in social networking on social media. When women want an opportunity that only men have, women easily get it. When women don't want a burden that only men have, only courageous heroes like Marc Angelucci speak up for gender justice. So it is with women in combat and sexist selective service registration.

From a 29-year-old fighter pilot questioning women in combat, but not sexist selective service, Golightly as a 62-year-old corporate executive came to understand women's power. On July 2, 2020, Golightly resigned from his position as Boeing's lead spokesperson. A Boeing Company press release explained:

> Niel's decision to resign stems from an employee complaint that brought to the Company's attention an article he wrote in 1987 while serving in the military, about whether women should serve in combat.
>
> Boeing does not agree with the views expressed in the article, and it does not reflect Niel's views today. "My article was a 29-year-old Cold War navy pilot's misguided contribution to a debate that was live at the time. My argument was embarrassingly wrong and offensive. The dialogue that followed its publication 33 years ago quickly opened my eyes, indelibly changed my mind, and shaped the principles of fairness, inclusion, respect and diversity that have guided my professional life since. The article is not a reflection of who I am; but nonetheless I have decided that in the interest of the company I will step down," said Golightly.

This cowardly, foolish decision wasn't a rash one:

> "Niel and I discussed at length the article and its implications for his role as the Company's lead spokesman," said David Calhoun, President and CEO. "I greatly respect Niel for stepping down in the interest of the company. I thank him for his contributions to the Boeing Company, which have been substantial even in a short time. Our Executive Council and I thank him and wish him all the best in his future endeavors."
>
> Mr. Calhoun added, "I want to emphasize our Company's unrelenting commitment to diversity and inclusion in all its dimensions, and to ensuring that all of our employees have an equal opportunity to contribute and excel."

Principles of fairness, inclusion, respect, and diversity are now claimed to require the resignation a person who 33 years ago wrote against having women in combat, but didn't write against sexist selective service. Principles of fairness, inclusion, respect, and diversity actually meant to Marc Angelucci what those words are rightly understood to mean. Often those words now merely provide cover for bigotry, exclusion, viciousness, and ideological purification. Such deceptive practices lead to airplanes crashing.

We now live in a nasty, brutish world very different from what Marc Angelucci sought. The modern martyr Marc Angelucci belongs in the tradition of the ancient martyr Saint Vincent of Saragossa. In the third century, Vincent became a deacon in a nascent Christian church in Spain. Fearing the growth of Christianity, the Roman Emperor Diocletian sought to force all to worship the dominant, traditional Roman gods. Vincent refused. He had a different understanding of the truth about god. Dacian, Emperor Diocletian's governor for Spain, threatened Vincent:

> "Dare you, unhappy man," says he,
> "to violate with coarse words > this law of gods and emperors, > a law both sacred and civic > that humankind must obey?
> Does not pressing danger rouse
> you in your passionate youth?
> This is an order you must accept.
> Either with incense and vegetation > you now supplicate this altar, > or you pay with bloody death."
>
> { "audesne, non felix," ait,
> "ius hoc deorum et principum
> violare verbis asperis, > ius et sacratum et publicum,
> cui cedit humanum genus?
> nec te iuventae fervidae > instans periclum permovet, > hoc namque decretum cape:
> aut ara ture et caespite > precanda iam nunc est tibi, > aut mors luenda est sanguine." }

Having the high and mighty threaten him didn't intimidate Vincent:

> Do it thus, with whatever powers, > whatever authority you have,
> I openly resist, go ahead!

> Hear what our voice is:
> Christ and the Father are God,
> we are his servants and witnesses.
> Tear out, if you can, our faith!
> Torture, imprisonment, iron claws, > flaming plates hissing,
> even the ultimate punishment itself,
> death, are merely play to Christians.
> Oh, how vain and inane is > the brutish decree of Caesar!
> You order that I worship divinities > carved by a worker's hand > or refined by hollow bellows, > divinities lacking in voice and step,
> immobile, blind, mute.
> For these divinities, you raise costly, > gleaming shrines of marble;
> for these, mooing cattle you > strike in the throat and sacrifice.
> …
> Your gods are also demons!
>
> { age ergo, quidquid virium, > quidquid potestatis tibi est,
> palam reluctor, exere!
> vox nostra quae sit, accipe:
> est Christus et Pater Deus:
> servi huius et testes sumus;
> extorque, si potes, fidem!
> tormenta, carcer, ungulae > stridensque flammis lammina, > atque ipsa poenarum ultima > mors Christianis ludus est.
> o vestra inanis vanitas > scitumque brutum Caesaris!
> condigna vestris sensibus > coli iubetis numina > excisa fabrili manu, > cavis recocta et follibus,
> quae voce, quae gressu carent, > inmota, caeca, elinguia.
> his sumptuosa splendido > delubra crescunt marmore, > his colla mugientium > percussa taurorum cadunt.
> …
> divique et idem daemones. }

A bright, energetic person fearlessly speaking the truth enrages the principalities, powers, and rulers of gynocentrism in this world — the preservers of wickedness in high places. Just so, Vincent's defiant statement infuriated Caesar's governor of Spain. The governor shouted:

> Stuff his mouth,
> the immoral one will speak no more.
> His speaking voice will be imprisoned.
> Quick, give him to the executioners, > those underworld conductors of the accused.
> They feed on cut flesh.
> Now the government's law will be done;
> the slanderer will feel it.
> He will not, free of punishment, > amuse himself in destroying our gods.
>
> { os obtrudite,
> ne plura iactet inprobus.
> vocem loquentis claudite > raptimque lictores date, > illos reorum Plutones > pastos resectis carnibus.
> iam faxo ius praetorium
> conviciator sentiat, > inpune ne nostris sibi > dis destruendis luserit. }

Christians understand death not as imprisonment in the underworld, but for the deserving liberation to spend eternity with God. Christians were famous for fearlessness in the ancient Roman Empire.

A voice that witnesses to the truth cannot be extinguished.
{ vox veritatis testis extingui nequit }

The Spanish governor put Vincent to worse punishment than the quick gunshot killing that Marc Angelucci suffered. First the executioners held Vincent's arms behind his back and slammed him up and down until they had broken all his limbs. Then they tore the flesh off his ribs so that his throbbing heart and lungs were exposed. His executioners tore at him so much that they tired and had to rest. Watching, the governor exclaimed:

> He rejoices, smiles, challenges > the torturer to sharper torture!
> You practice techniques of power > for the deaths of all criminals > that in this contest make no progress.
> Pain's very art is being conquered.
>
> { gaudet, renidet, provocat > tortore tortus acrior!
> nil illa vis exercita > tot noxiorum mortibus > agone in isto proficit, > ars et dolorum vincitur. }

Vincent challenged the governor to take up the torturing himself and be even more brutish. Vincent proclaimed a certain invincibility:

> You error, blood-thirsty one, if from me > you think you are exacting punishment > when you kill by tearing apart > limbs subject to death.
> Another exists, is within me, > whom no one is able to violate.
> That one is free, quiet, whole, > exempt from mournful pains.
> This, which you labor to destroy > with such furious power, > is only a vessel made from clay, > inescapably destined to be broken.
> Yet why not strive now > to cut and flog that > which stands within, which > tramples on your madness, tyrant?
> This, this you must attack, this you must destroy,
> this that is invincible, insurmountable, > that is subject to no storms,
> but rests under God alone.
>
> { erras, cruente, si meam > te rere poenam sumere > cum membra morti obnoxia > dilancinata interficis.
> est alter, est intrinsecus, > violare quem nullus potest,
> liber, quietus, integer, > exsors dolorum tristium.

> hoc, quod laboras perdere > tantis furoris viribus, > vas est solutum ac fictile, > quocumque frangendum modo.
> quin immo nunc enitere
> illum secare ac plectere > qui perstat intus, qui tuam > calcat, tyranne, insaniam.
> hunc, hunc lacesse, hunc discute, > invictum, inexsuperabilem, > nullis procellis subditum, > solique subiectum Deo. }

The governor in response ordered that punishment recommence more harshly. He demanded that Vincent provide all his writings so that those books could be burned. Vincent refused, declaring:

> You, malignant one, threaten > our spiritual writings with fire;
> you yourself will more justly burn with this,
> for the swords of Heaven > are vindicators of our volumes, > burning by thunderbolt the tongue > that is your broker of such venom.
> See the glowing ashes that indicate
> Gomorrah's crimes;
> Sodom's cold ashes also provide > a witness of everlasting death.
> This is your example, serpent.
> Soon sulfurous soot > and coal mixed with pitch > will envelop you in the deepest Hell.
>
> { quem tu, maligne, mysticis > minitaris ignem litteris, > flagrabis ipse hoc iustius.
> romphaea nam caelestium > vindex erit voluminum > tanti veneni interpretem > linguam perurens fulmine.
> vides favillas indices
> Gomorreorum criminum.
> Sodomita nec latet cinis, > testis perennis funeris.
> exemplar hoc, serpens, tuum est, > fuligo quem mox sulphuris > bitumen et mixtum pice > imo inplicabunt Tartaro. }

These words shocked Vincent's persecutor. He turned pale, then red. His eyes rolled frantically, he gnashed his teeth and foamed at the mouth. He then ordered that Vincent be pressed into a burning, spiked bed by a heavy iron plate.

Vincent was wholly invincible. With eyes on Heaven, he endured the brutal torture. Then, with his legs stretched in stocks, he was thrust into a pitch-black dungeon. There he was laid on broken pots having jagged corners and sharp points. But God smashed the stocks binding Vincent's legs, bathed the dungeon in bright light, and clothed the broken pots with tender flowers. An angel invited Vincent to join in the companionship of celestial angels:

> Arise, illustrious martyr, > arise, secure in your self,
> arise, our companion,
> and join our kind union.
> Now to the end you have fulfilled > your duties under menacing punishment.
> With your noble departing in death,
> every suffering you have traversed.
> Oh most invincible soldier,
> bravest of the brave,
> now for you the savage, bitter > torments themselves tremble at their conqueror.
> The God Christ, who watched this, > compensates you with eternal life.
> He with generous right hand crowns > you associate of his cross and his mother.
> Lay aside this frail vessel, > a fabric of earthen framework > that dissolves and dissipates, > and come in freedom to the sky.
>
> { exsurge, martyr inclyte, > exsurge securus tui, > exsurge et almis coetibus > noster sodalis addere.
> decursa iam satis tibi > poenae minacis munia, > pulchroque mortis exitu
> omnis peracta est passio.
> o miles invictissime,
> fortissimorum fortior,
> iam te ipsa saeva et aspera > tormenta victorem tremunt.
> spectator haec Christus Deus > conpensat aevo intermino, > propriaeque collegam crucis > larga coronat dextera.
> pone hoc caducum vasculum > conpage textum terrea, > quod dissipatum solvitur, > et liber in caelum veni. }

Vincent and the angel began to sing together. The light shining in the dungeon broke through the closed doors. The dungeon keeper noticed the light. He peeked inside and was astonished to see flowers and Vincent walking freely and singing.

News of the strange happenings in Vincent's dungeon reached the governor. He was furious. He ordered that Vincent be taken from the dungeon and placed outside for further punishment. A throng of faithful persons from the town gathered around him. They built for him a soft bed. They tended his wounds. When Vincent rested his head on that soft bed, his soul went straight to God in Heaven. He died not under torture, but supported with the generous love of good people.

Marc Angelucci delighted in court victories over the reigning authorities of gynocentric injustice. More than a decade ago, he worried that he would die in a plane crash and that his promising appeal of blatant discrimination against men by domestic violence shelters would vanish. He wrote argument notes so that another attorney could argue the case if he himself died in a plane crash. Angelucci probably never imagined that one day he would be murdered.

Marc Angelucci believed that men deserve rights and justice, just like any other human beings. Today, vicious tribes destroying civilized life smear men's rights and justice for men as if they were demonic ideas. "Angelucci" literally means angel of light. Marc Angelucci is an angel of light. May Angelucci continue to inspire men and women in righteous progress toward gender justice for all.

> Now you shine brightly, sharing > in the exalted robe of the angels.
> As an indomitable witness,
> you washed your robe in streams of blood,
> when the minister of idols, > encircled with dismal laws, > would with iron and chains force > you to worship the gods of the tribes.
>
> { nunc angelorum particeps > conlucis insigni stola, > quam testis indomabilis
> rivis cruoris laveras, > cum te satelles idoli > praecinctus atris legibus > litare divis gentium > ferro et catenis cogeret. }

* * * * *

Snockered with Knockers

Doug Mortimer · 19 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine my shock and horror when I came across an article entitled "Women are drinking more than men to cope with coronavirus due to 'psychological distress' and the presence of children in the home during the pandemic" on a web site (www.stationgossip.com). As if there weren't enough systemic injustice in this world, now we have this to deal with!

In a nutshell, the article states that coronavirus stay-at-home orders have forced many women into being stay-at-home mothers! As a result, more and more women are turning to booze for self-medication – resulting in a 16% rise in the number of alcoholic drinks consumed by women. Yes, America's mothers are starting to imitate the gaits of their toddlers! The difference is when they faw down, they don't get up so quickly.

Of course, the very idea of children at home is appalling. Just because families are smaller than ever and middle class houses have more square footage than ever doesn't mean the little buggers don't get underfoot any more. Where to stash the kids has always been a problem.

But there are some commonsensical solutions to the problem. First of all, if mothers would share their alcohol and spike their kids' drinks, they'd probably get more stress relief than by consuming all the booze themselves. Dump an ounce or two of vodka into junior's sippy cup and every meal becomes a happy meal! Who says adult beverages are for adults only?

To be sure, men are drinking more too these days, but the imbibing has increased more for women than men. In other words, women are more affected, so it is time to take action in the name of equity.

One possibility is inducing men to drink more. Usually, this is easily achieved by offering drinks on the house but with the bars closed, this is no longer feasible. Some bars and restaurants, however, are now offering beer, wine, and mixed drinks to go. And, of course, supermarkets and big box stores still have alcoholic beverages for sale. So the federal government could issue special stimulus vouchers to be used only for purchase of alcoholic beverages by men so they can catch up to women. Even teetotalers would benefit, as a brisk secondary market in vouchers would likely ensue.

On the other hand, I can already hear critics bellowing that giving men free booze promotes patriarchy rather than subverts it. Such a program would be a tough sell to the local wokels. Rather, let's consider…

Free booze for women! Why? Because of their special needs! In these stressful times booze is like mother's milk to mothers. But what's a mother to do when her need for liquor outstrips her resources?

Remember the "End Period Poverty" movement to provide women with free sanitary napkins? Since men have no need for sanitary napkins, charging women for them was prima facie discrimination! So when women's need for alcohol surpasses men's, the government should step in and do the right thing. Free alcohol for women, or at the very least, some sort of government assistance program to augment women's alcohol budget to alleviate their stay-at-home ordeal.

Well, every prospective law needs a good nickname. You can't just call it H.R.292, or whatever, and expect the public to pay attention. So how about Hooch for Kooches? A good slogan is also helpful. How about, "A woman needs alcohol like a fish needs water"?

Few females, even those who declare they are not feminists, are going to argue with free booze. Oh, the Women's Christian Temperance Union is still out there, even though you don't hear much from these days. I hate to think how they will react when they get the news about that 16% uptick in women drinking. After all, how can women convince men to take the pledge while they're getting plastered in record numbers?

So let's take a serious look at alcohol as a special female need, like sanitary napkins. Alcohol is a proven coping strategy, just another one of mother's little helpers. And, frankly, I think it's a matter of public health. After all, if alcohol-based hand-sanitizing is being encouraged to stop the spread of covid-19, doesn't it make sense to promote consumption of alcoholic beverages to sanitize one's innards?

Imagine a national ID card for every female American…sort of like a voter's registration card. Or maybe we could work it like World War II where every adult female is given a book of ration stamps. Take your stamps and your ration book to the retail outlet and take home a free six-pack…fifth…quart…half gallon…we can work out the details later.

Then again, the simplest approach might be to just expand the current food stamp program to include alcoholic beverages. I know, this sounds counter-productive, but alcoholic beverages are plant-based products and aren't dietary do-gooders exhorting everyone to ditch meat in favor of a plant-based diet?

And the benefits just keep on coming. Surely the nation's supermarkets, chain stores, and liquor stores will appreciate this shot in the arm. All the farmers growing corn, rye, barley, and other grains that are key ingredients in alcoholic beverages will surely be on board with it. Brewers, vintners, distillers – I think I know where they would stand on this issue.

Now, men, don't feel resentful because you have to buy your own booze while women get it free (so what else is new, you might be thinking). You see, in today's gender-fluid world, once you declare yourself a female, you too would be eligible to get free booze. Just out yourself as a dame, sign an affidavit that says you're a woman, get a note from your gynecologist, and apply for your free booze. Only a fascist would dare to complain you aren't what you claim to be.

Of course, there's no getting around those government warnings on the bottle.

1. According to the Surgeon General, women should not drink alcoholic beverages during pregnancy because of the risk of birth defects.

The sturgeon general! That fish-faced SOB is such a wet blanket! True, there is a risk to the unborn child when pregnant women drink alcoholic beverages. The last thing an already stressed-out woman needs is to give birth to a baby with fetal alcohol syndrome…but how to alleviate the stress of pregnancy if one cannot drink?

Here is where the classic feminist call for abortion on demand is crucial. Why should a woman have to give up the delights of alcohol consumption just because she's pregnant? Once the doctor makes a diagnosis of FAS, abort the little freeloader as quickly as possible. As is the case with most procedures, however, the woman would have to do without alcohol for 24 hours before the abortion. But once the little souse is evicted, let the good times roll! Of course, there's always the chance that FAS may not be diagnosed till after the baby is born. Well, in a more enlightened society, infanticide on demand would also be an option. Attitudes are changing, so perhaps one day defective children will be dumped on the ash heap of history.

Then there is that second warning on the bottle:

2. Consumption of alcoholic beverages impairs your inability to drive a car or operate machinery, and may cause health problems.

No doubt those killjoys at Mothers Against Drunk Driving will weigh in against giving free booze to women. Undeniably, such a government program would increase the likelihood of women being arrested for drunk driving. But that is easily remedied by labeling it as just another form of discrimination…you know, DWF…driving while female. Once you establish that being stopped by cops is the latest front in the war against women, you can weave back and forth from one lane to another all day long and no law enforcement officer will dare stop you and risk a civil rights lawsuit. Besides, in many traditional societies, weaving is a predominantly female activity.

As for operating machinery…geez, I don't see that as a big problem because I never see women doing that, and hardly a day goes by that I don't witness construction crews, road gangs, or utility workers on the job. Nevertheless, I bow to the possibility that there are such women out there. Frankly, operating a bulldozer with a beer buzz sounds like a hoot! Better than any ride at Six Flags and you don't have to stand in line! Who am I to deny women such pleasure if they are in a position to experience it?

Now some people may think free booze is just another attempt to pacify women, to keep them from getting too uppity. I think not. Surely, we have seen women who get more uppity the more they drink, so I think they would cancel out the passive ones who sit there as cool as a Cheshire cat lapping up a mint julep.

Of course, it is difficult to refute the assertion that such a giveaway program only adds to an already bloated federal deficit. Admittedly, in most circumstances, I would be against anything that increases federal spending.

In this case, however, call me a Keynesian!

Of angry men and misinformation

Robert Brockway · 21 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Here we are again. The mainstream media keeps referring to violent men with alleged links to the men's rights movement. If you listen carefully you will often hear violent men being called MRAs by the media after an attack. As more information becomes available they may drop this but they will never acknowledge the lie that they propagated.

This happened with Alek Minassian who drove a truck down a sidewalk in Toronto, Canada in 2018, killing 10 and injuring 16. He had no connection to the men's rights movement, but that didn't matter. The slur was made anyway by the Fourth Estate.

Anders Breivik, who perpetrated mass murder on an island in Sweden in 2011 was claimed, without any evidence, to be an MRA by The Good Men Project.

One particularly egregious example was that of Elliot Rodger who, despite no known links to the men's rights movement, is still routinely called an MRA. Rodger, of course, is infamous following a massacre in California in 2014.

Today it is Roy Den Hollander. Den Hollander is alleged to have killed one man, seriously injured another, and may yet be implicated in the murder of a third but as expected the mainstream media is making it all about misogyny.

Den Hollander wrote one article for A Voice for Men (AVfM), which was published on October 24, 2010 – nearly ten years ago. A quote from this one article has been widely circulated in the media as it attempts to link AVfM to violence. The mainstream media focuses on the mention of firearms. This quote though is perhaps more telling than they realise, for it expresses the pessimistic view that Den Hollander already had of the men's movement all those years ago:

> The future prospect of the Men's Movement raising enough money to exercise some influence in America is unlikely. But there is one remaining source of power in which men still have a near monopoly—firearms. At some point, the men in this country will take the Declaration of Independence literally:
>
> "[W]hen a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new guards for their future security."

More recently Den Hollander published a manifesto in which he has made clear his position on the men's rights movement:

> I don't belong to that group of wimps and whiners. They're trying to win back their rights by acting like girls instead of men.
>
> Most men's rights advocates act like little girls and behave largely as the Feminists tell them to. You can identify them by the politically correct lingo they use and their copying of Feminists tactics by simply changing the sex. For example, "A woman is more likely to physically attack a guy than vice versa." True, but who cares, unless she's behind the wheel of a Mercedes Benz. Even if she has a gun, most girls can't shoot straight anyway, so unless it's a shotgun, she'll miss.
>
> In one of my martial arts class, one Senshi always told us don't hit the girls and I don't. I let them hit me, which rarely hurts, unless it's low.
>
> What the men's righters don't understand is that girls have different weapons for causing evil, such as fraud and the intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Very clearly AVfM (and the wider men's rights movement) is going in one direction and Den Hollander was going in another. He was no MRA – he said so himself. It took AVfM about 30 seconds to find this information in Den Hollander's manifesto, so we must presume that the mainstream media found this too and are thus lying when they refer to Den Hollander as an MRA.

Den Hollander reached out to an allied organisation in March 2020 to express interest in assisting with a project that was being jointly worked on with AVfM. A discussion ensued on an internal AVfM channel and Paul Elam offered the following comment about Den Hollander:

> Roy Den has a few screws loose. NCFM won't touch him. I had to reject an article from him he wanted to publish with us, "The best way to preserve men's rights is with a gun"

NCFM refers to the National Coalition for Men.

Every movement has its ideologues and extremists. What's important is how they are dealt with. The many extremist feminist leaders are well known and listing them is beyond the scope of this article. In feminism, extremists tend to percolate to the top. Feminism thus selects for extremism whereas the men's rights movement selects against it. The MRM pushes extremists to the side, and that's what happened to Roy Den Hollander. But that won't matter to the mainstream media, who will continue to peddle their lies.

With assitance and advice from Peter Wright.

Previous females, now male, explain life isn’t better as a man, it’s much harder

AVfM Video Source · 21 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

featured

* · 21 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Taxpayers Sue Massachusetts Medicaid About Circumcisions

Gary Costanza · 23 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original https://circumcision.org/taxpayers-sue-massachusetts-medicaid-about-circumcisions/

Gynocentrism and the undeserved deification of women

Peter Ryan · 26 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Lester Ward 1841 – 1913

In this article I will be examining Lester Ward's theory on gynocentrism (see these links here[1] and here[2]). I have chosen to write this to demonstrate that views on the supposed superiority of women are not isolated to just the last fifty years. The undeserved deification of women has been going on for far longer than fifty years. My issues with Ward's theory are too numerous to write in one article, so I will provide my general criticism of his work. You will also notice that many of my future articles, including this one, are going to be considerably shorter than before. These articles are to encourage people to think more deeply about specific topics in the manosphere. I have laid the general foundations on my views on gynocentrism in my previous writings and have gone into great detail. It be should be sufficient now for me to provide a general outline on further topics I will discuss. Rest assured I could go into enormous detail on any given topic (as can be seen from my previous work), but I would rather cover more topics and rely on people to refer to my previous writings on gynocentrism if they need more information.

The Three Problems In Claiming Female Or Male Superiority

Lester Ward puts an argument forward about why women are the naturally superior sex in his theory. There are three major problems with claiming one sex is superior to the other. The first problem is defining what makes one sex superior to the other. Who decides what set of traits are important and what traits are less important? Who decides what combination of traits are relevant to determining which sex is superior? Who decides what even makes something superior? Claims of the overall superiority of a group are nebulous subjective value judgements. There is no universal definition that can be agreed upon, on what makes one group of people superior to the other. It makes far more coherent sense to claim superiority in relation to a specific metric, than to claim one sex is generally superior to the other. If I were to state that men on average have a superior height to that of women for instance, then that claim is far less vague and nebulous than stating that men are superior to women or vice versa.

The second problem with arguing one sex is superior, is that each sex are two interdependent and essential components of one biological system that replicates itself. We are not talking about two sets of organisms that exist independently of each other, where one can gain at the others' expense over the long term. The relative success or failure of males and females which defines their value, is to some degree dependent on the relative success or failure of the other sex. It is the evolutionary success or failure of the whole biological system that males and females are components of, that determines the success or failure of males and females and thus their value.

The reductionist mindset cannot fathom the interdependent nature of a biological system and the emergent properties of such a system. The sum output of a system is greater than its individual components (synergy) and the components alone do not produce the desired output. The battle of the sexes, is really just a dysfunction of a bigger biological system that is temporarily out of equilibrium. Like cancer, intersexual conflict over the long term is a disturbance from the proper functioning of the biological system of the species. Just as cancerous tissue cannot ultimately gain at the expense of the body, neither can one sex ultimately gain at the expense of the other sex over the long term and not destroy the biological system that comprises the species as a whole.

The third problem with making claims of male or female superiority, is its usefulness. How useful is such a nebulous generalised subjective value judgement of entire halves of the population? It has no sustainable social or economic utility, because such claims are made about each sex in general and are subjective and not focused on just a specific metric or evidence that has practical implications. Claims of male or female superiority are nebulous. What do I mean by nebulous? There is a difference between suggesting that only women should run society because they are “superior”, without reference to any metric or solid evidence and suggesting men have superior physical strength and therefore need their own weightlifting events. One claim is specific to a metric (physical strength in this example) and backed up by evidence and facts and has practical implications, the other claim has none of those characteristics.

We also have to consider the destructive effects of claiming one sex is superior to other on society. How destructive is such a bigoted value judgement? We have centuries of history demonstrating how corrosive and how destructive claims of the superiority of one group of people over the other are. Genocides have occurred on the basis of group superiority and the alleged inferiority of the other group. Our society requires a certain level of cooperation, fairness and civility to function and remain stable and intact. Claims of group superiority of any kind whether it is based on race or sex (or some other characteristic), undermine these critical features that form the foundation of civilisation.

There has to be mutual respect and reciprocity for different groups of people to work together to form and run civilisation. Men and women cannot on their own form their own civilisations and so it becomes essential to maintain mutual respect and reciprocity between the sexes. Once you remove the basic level of respect men should have toward women and women should have toward men, you undermine the core relationship between the sexes that forms the basis of the nuclear family and civilisation itself. There is no relationship more fundamental to civilisation than that between men and women. For this reason we can in part measure the health of society, based on the health of the relationship between men and women. Claims of male or female superiority undermine the relationship between the sexes and thus society and the foundations of civilisation. This is why radical feminism, gynocentrism and claims of female superiority or male superiority, need to be addressed and not ignored.

The Greater Variability Of The Male Sex Does Not Make Them Inferior

Lester Ward’s theory argues that women are superior to men because the female sex is more conserved in nature and the male sex is more variable. That is essentially what his core argument boils down to. Evolution is driven by natural selection and natural selection drives adaptation and adaptation is the result of variation. The fact that the biological role of females is less variable in nature, does not then result in females being the naturally superior sex. Sexual reproduction and the origins of biological sex, result from the evolutionary advantage of variation that arises from them. Being more variable does not make males inferior. The greater biological variation of the male sex in nature, simply demonstrates the importance of the male sex and its role in reproduction, in providing the variation required for a species to adapt to its environment and also enhance a species evolutionary success in general.

Females Are Not The Source Of Life

Lester also seems to hold a view that the female sex has existed long before the male sex and so that somehow makes them superior. Bacteria have existed long before humans, does that make bacteria superior to humans? Just because something has been around longer, does not make it superior. Aside from that reality, females have been around as long as males. The female sex literally cannot exist without sexual reproduction and the existence of the male sex. This should be obvious.

Ward shares a view in his theory, that females have been the main trunk of life. There is a trap in thinking that if less males passed on their genes, then males had a lower contribution to the continuation of the lineage. People fail to consider that in instances where fewer males reproduced, males that did reproduce did so at a higher frequency than females (where sexual reproduction involves an individual male and female, as it does in our species). Thus the total contribution of the male and female sex to the continuation of the lineage is exactly the same, regardless as to how many males versus females reproduce in a species like ours where each instance of reproduction involves one male and one female.

In relation to Ward's view that females are the main trunk of life, Ward seems to think that asexual life can be considered "female" and therefore asexual life should be counted towards the female contribution to the continuation of life. It is scientifically and factually incorrect to conflate asexual life and the female sex as being interchangeable.

Lester says the following in his writings:

> "Origin of the Male Sex. — Although reproduction and sex are two distinct things, and although a creature that reproduces without sex cannot properly be called either male or female, still, so completely have these conceptions become blended in the popular mind that a creature which actually brings forth offspring out of its own body is instinctively classed as female. The female is the fertile sex, and whatever is fertile is looked upon as female. Assuredly it would be absurd to look upon an organism propagating asexually as male. Biologists have proceeded from this popular standpoint, and regularly speak of "mother-cells" and "daughter-cells." It therefore does no violence to language or to science to say that life begins with the female organism and is carried on a long distance by means of females alone. In all the different forms of asexual reproduction, from fission to parthenogenesis, the female may in this sense be said to exist alone and perform all the functions of life including reproduction. In a word, life begins as female." [1,3]

There is a big difference between the biology of an asexually reproducing organism and a biological female that sexually reproduces. It does do violence to language and to science to attempt to conflate the two. Most of the asexually reproducing species on this planet are simple forms of life and reproduce very differently to sexual reproduction. In contrast, most of the complex forms of life on Earth are sexually reproducing species. There is a big difference between the biology of bacteria asexually reproducing in a petri dish and a human female and how they reproduce. It makes no sense to categorise life that existed 3.8 billion years ago as "female", or any other form of asexually reproducing life. Life did not begin female, it began with asexually replicating single celled organisms and in the absence of biological sex. Females did not come before males, females originated at the same time as males did. The existence of the female sex, requires the existence of the male sex.

Females in our species and in many other sexually reproducing species, cannot reproduce or "create life" without the male. Females do not "create life" in our species, human males and females create life. This basic reality seems lost on Ward. Ward's related and skewed presentation that males simply act as fertiliser, fails to properly represent the breadth of what males contribute. Males do other things other than provide sperm, especially in higher order species and in humans (i.e like paternal investment in offspring). Ward does not appear interested in exploring or examining that in any detail, aside from giving it a passing remark.

There Is No Universal Law Of Male Inferiority

A major flaw in Ward's theory, is his use of different examples in nature of males and females to demonstrate the supposed superiority of the female sex. Examples in nature can be found to demonstrate the exact opposite (i.e

"male superiority"), but he does not seem interested in citing those examples. This is confirmation bias, selectively filtering information to confirm an existing belief or conclusion. Ward seems quite willing to accept that the greater variation in males, may lead to instances where females are in a "superior" position to males in certain respects in particular species. In contrast Ward seems uninterested in giving equal consideration to examples where this same greater variation of males, may put males in a superior position to females in certain respects in other species. Who is to say either that what Ward considers is a weakness of a male of a particular species in one context, might actually be a strength is another context. A male spider of a species might be smaller and therefore considered "inferior" by Ward, but that same trait may allow the male spider greater mobility than the female to roam through its habitat and confer certain advantages.

Biology across all of nature is extraordinarily variable across species, families, phyla and kingdoms etc. To draw examples from widely different branches of nature and then form some grand unified theory that males are naturally inferior to females based on cherry picked examples as Ward does, is rife with problems. The evolutionary forces at work across different branches of life can be vastly different. It cannot be assumed that observing a similar pattern between the sexes in two or more different species (that allegedly demonstrate male inferiority), is the result of the same cause and that this cause is male inferiority from greater male variation. It is likely there are completely different forces at work that produce a similar pattern across the species he cites, given how different the biology and habitat of each species he refers to actually are. This would especially be the case when citing examples of males and females from completely different kingdoms as Ward does (species from the plant kingdom versus the animal kingdom)!

Why The Sexes Are Different But Equal

Ward's theory on gynocentrism, is an example of the warped thinking that occurs when the brain is on gynocentrism- Reality goes out the window and people get selective with facts. I could write far more about why Ward's theory is fundamentally flawed, but what I have written should suffice. Ultimately one can make arguments that men are superior to women and women are superior to men, but only in certain defined respects (i.e the greater physical strength of men or the greater immunity of women to infectious disease). However when it comes to the overall value of each sex in our species, neither sex is more valuable. For this reason, it does not make much sense to claim either sex is superior in general. In our species the male and female sex each produce exactly the same total number of copies of the genome/number of offspring (the source of biological value) and consequently our biology produces males and females in roughly equal proportion. See Fishers principle[4] for more information on why this is so. As mentioned, even in instances where greater numbers of women reproduce in our species, the fewer men that reproduce will do so at a higher frequency than any individual woman and the total reproductive output of each sex will still remain equal.

Our biology does not favour the production of "superior" males or "superior" females over the other sex (hence the roughly 1:1 sex ratio at birth), because each sex produces the same biological value (i.e number of offspring or copies of the genome). Any subjective value judgement of male or female superiority, is our own social invention. As males and females are produced in equal proportion in our species and have the same total reproductive output, each sex faces equivalent selective forces to develop and harness their different strengths in equal proportion to propagate the genome. Nature abhors a vacuum and will select against any scenario where half the population does not pull its own evolutionary weight. Consequently males and females may have different strengths, but over time selective pressures ensure these sets of strengths of each sex have equal value in terms of propagating the genome and the lineage. Ultimately propagating the genome is where all biological value comes from and so each sex has equal biological value. For more discussion on this topic on the biological equality of the sexes, consult this two part article of mine (linked here[5] and here[6]).

It is possible for the sexes to be different in relation to each other, but equal in relation to biological value. This is no different from two houses being different, but having the same monetary value. People who argue that differences between people make equality impossible, fail to consider people can be different in some metrics and equal in other metrics. People can indeed be different in one respect and equal in another respect. Reductionist bigots generally don't like the complexity of realities like that, but that does not make these realities any less true.

Reference List:

1. https://gynocentrism.com/2015/05/06/the-gynaecocentric-theory-by-lester-ward-1903/
2. https://gynocentrism.com/2015/05/15/our-better-halves-1888/
3. Pure sociology; a treatise on the origin and spontaneous development of society (1903)
4. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fisher%27s_principle#:~:text=Fisher's%20principle%20is%20an%20evolutionary,celebrated%20argument%20in%20evolutionary%20biology%22.
5. https://gynocentrism.com/2019/08/19/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-one/
6. https://gynocentrism.com/2019/08/19/gynocentrism-and-the-value-of-men-part-two/

Haiti raises men's and boys' issues at the United Nations Human Rights Council

Robert Brockway · 27 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I have recently been in contact with a representative of the Government of the Republic of Haiti who advised that they raised men's and boys' issues at the United Nations Human Rights Council. The representative strongly believes this is the first time that men's and boys' issues have been raised at the Human Rights Council.

The Permanent Mission of Haiti at the United Nations office in Geneva was given an opportunity to make a short statement during the Human Rights Council 44th session, July 2020. The statement at the Human Rights Council can be seen here beginning at 35:48.

The official English language transcript of the statement has been reproduced here with permission. It is notable that the transcript indicates that it is a joint statement with other member and observer states, however, these states have not chosen to make their support public. Kudos to the Republic of Haiti for having the courage to take a public stand on men's and boys' issues.

> JOINT STATEMENT
>
> Men and Boys for Gender Equality
>
> Human Rights Council 44th Session – Item 1: Decisions and Conclusion

Thank you Madame President,
1. I proudly take the floor on behalf a group of Member and Observer States.

2. One of the main themes highlighted during the June sessions of this Council is the situation of human rights of women and girls – and appropriately so. Over the past 100 years, we've witnessed substantial and steady progress towards realizing the full enjoyment of all human rights by women and girls.

3. The positive trend is something the international community should be proud of. For example, 100 years ago…
…the right to vote; the right to work outside of the home and in the field of their own choosing; the right to not be harassed at home and at work; the right to divorce; wear pants; join the military; and own their own property to some degree, in every region of the world, were birthrights predominantly inherited by sons and not daughters. The rights mentioned earlier, and the many more we did not, were also advocated for and championed by men, including some who held organizational or political authority.

4. The job hasn't been easy and remains incomplete. To advance further and support the women and men in this work, the United Nations created the Commission on the Status of Women in 1946, and UN Women celebrated its 10th anniversary last week on July 9, 2020.

5. Unsurprisingly, many more years of labor lie ahead in achieving equitable societies, and all three sessions of the Human Rights Council provide a helpful reminder of how much work the international community still has to do. Empowering women and girls is not enough in accomplishing this shared objective. An often missing tool in the pursuit of gender equality is the growing need for attention and consideration of the challenges that have a disproportionally negative impact on men and boys.

Madame President,
6. Men and boys fully engage as strategic partners and allies for the empowerment of all women and girls, and we must continue to encourage men and boys to fully participate in all actions towards gender equality.

7. What we are bringing to the Council's attention is that there is an absence of energy towards human rights issues where males are at a disadvantaged and an imbalance of champions at all levels which may stall the progress towards equitable societies. Gender equality is not a zero sum game. The quality of life of women and men, girls and boys are interwoven, interrelated and interdependent. The international community must continue to address the impacts of multiple forms of discrimination against women and girls. And in a different manner, within the context of gender quality, begin to grapple with the complex challenges facing men and boys today.

8. Here are five facts far from the public consciousness:

-men and boys are more likely to engage and suffer from violent behavior;
-men and boys constitute the overwhelming majority of the worldwide prison, missing adults, suicides, drug addicts and homelessness populations;
-men and boys can also suffer from negative body image;
-unfavorable biases exist in draft selection; war deaths; veterans issues; divorce proceedings; education; and in the family and criminal court systems;
-lastly, men and boys are more likely to die in all stages of life. For example, while COVID-19 continues to have unique and unreasonable affects on women and girls, men comprise the majority of COVID-19 deaths in every country where data is available and reliable.

Madame President,
9. Some are content with the position that the topic of men and boys have in the gender parity solar system – the role of distant planet Pluto. Rotating on the far-far edges of gender discussions and while it is acknowledged as part of the system, it is misunderstood and even disregarded. This joint statement is no chest-beating exercise.

10. Incorporating a different perspective in the gender parity conversation will by no means turn Pluto into the Sun. Real and substantive parity will benefit both sides in many ways. The call for more inclusivity is neither an attempt to steal the spotlight or valuable resources away from our shared responsibility of empowering women and girls but an invitation for this Council to play a more complete and comprehensive role in the promotion and protection of all human rights by all human beings for a better complementary world in the next 100 years.

11. I thank you.

Why MRAs (and their sympathisers) should contribute to the funding of Ava Brighton's documentary 'A VOID'

Mike Buchanan · 28 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The young Dutch anti-feminist Ava Brighton (above) has quickly made a name for herself in the MRM. Her website is here. She burst onto the consciousness of MRAs nine months ago with her first video, 'Are Almost All Women CLINICALLY INSANE?' She has since published another 17 videos, the latest being the trailer (11:14) for her forthcoming documentary A VOID.

I hardly need remind MRAs (and their sympathisers) how influential Cassie Jaye's movie The Red Pill was, internationally. It was first screened almost four years ago, and I'm writing this piece to urge MRAs to help fund Ava's documentary project, which is already well underway, A VOID. I believe it has the potential to be even more impactful than The Red Pill, in part because it focuses on the feminists' battle which has surely caused more human suffering than any of their other battles – their battle against the nuclear family, which has had such a devastating impact on men, women and children. This impact has been both direct and indirect, for example the devastating impact of fatherlessness on children – especially boys – an issue so well explored by Warren Farrell in The Boy Crisis, and by William Collins in The Empathy Gap: Male Disadvantages and the Mechanisms of Their Neglect.

The feminist battle against the nuclear family – and against fathers in particular – first came to Ava's attention because her partner Tristan Lonley had suffered such egregious attacks. The two of them spoke at the last Messages 4 Men conference in London, last November. Their talks are on the associated playlist (22 videos).

Ava recently launched a campaign and crowdfunding website for her documentary. From the website:

> What I'm doing.
>
> In these tumultuous times of change I'm here on Indiegogo, trying to raise funds for my feature documentary 'A VOID'.
>
> The project started off as a movie to raise awareness for alienated fathers and their children. I saw men being completely destroyed, stripped of their rights and from their children, their possessions, their sanity and, in too many cases, their lives. I wondered why this is happening to hundreds of thousands of men, all around the world. So I wanted to give them a voice, especially when I noticed men don't dare to speak, are not believed and the system is, by default, against them: Men's oblivion, an invisible black hole, most people don't even know exists – until you get near it.
>
> This became the start of a long and dark journey into the hidden realms behind feminism – if this is even the correct term, as what the female whistle-blowers described sounded a thousand times more savage than the fight for equality.
>
> Once word got out I was considering making this documentary, female whistle-blowers started to join in, and this is where 'A VOID' took a sharp turn and got sucked past the event horizon of this black hole.
>
> It made me realize I had to record all the whistle-blowers' interviews prior to announcing the making of this movie. And now, with over 30 hours of the most important footage, 'A VOID' is becoming a movie in which women expose the truth behind the gender warfare. And we'll be needing you to help us explode this evidence across the world.
>
