There is only one thing that saved me from that fate, and that is that this girl was a decent human being who recognized that while I was indeed a dick, I didn't deserve to have my life ruined. A weak girl would have caved to the peer pressure. A stupid girl would have succumbed to Jizz's solipsistic logic. A petty, venal girl would have capitalized on the opportunity to exact revenge on the man who had spurned her.

Fortunately she was none of these, and I'm a free man.

But how many eighteen year old girls have that kind of character? Reason and justice are male values. Women are social, emotional creatures. Surround them with people saying the same thing, and many will crack. The typical female western college student is immersed in a tight network of angry feminists who are all too happy to use them as a means of imprisoning men. I imagine this is a pretty common situation. Most colleges are full of professional feminazi social justice warriors. Most colleges are chock-full of drunken, regrettable hookups. In this case, my entire life came down to the willingness of the one person who had the power to do the right thing, doing exactly that. I wonder how many men weren't so lucky.

So make no mistake, readers of a fornicating temperament, college students especially: The threat of a false rape accusation is real: Fortunately, by taking a few simple precautions, an intelligent man can greatly limit his exposure to this particular risk:

1) Send A Good Feelings Confirmation Text.

Ideally, the minute she walks out your door.

"Damn. Still thinking about (whatever)."

"Dayum girl you rocked that shiz last night."

"(Reference to stupid inside joke that came up at some point in the evening)"

Not only is this arguably solid post-bang comfort-maintenance, buyer's remorse-reduction game, a positive response from her will be a major chink in any bogus future hypothetical legal case against you.

2) Don't Be A Dick

Banging a drunk chick, pressuring a reticent girl into sex, pumping and dumping a girl after promising her that you'll love her to the end of time – none of these are in anywhere near the same moral ballpark as actual, legitimate rape. But they are still dick moves, like littering in a forest or double-parking. More importantly, by avoiding dick moves, you keep yourself safe. As fucked up as it is, the law is evolving to the point that regret = rape. Solution: Minimize regret. Don't bang drunk chicks. Don't bang chicks that give more than a tiny bit of last-minute resistance. Warm your girl up until she is literally begging you to fuck her.

3) Don't Bang Feminists

There are so many reasons why this should be a hard and fast rule for every man. Most immediately obvious is that Feminists are ugly, but here's another one: Decent girls do not make false rape accusations. Sick, evil, damaged, unloved dregs of society – i.e the sort that gravitate towards the social justice warrior mentality – make false rape accusations. If you are going dumpster diving and scraping ugly feminists off the bottom of the barrel just to get laid, you have no one to blame but yourself when you eventually lose that game of Russian Roulette.

*

Bottom line: As a man in 21st Century America, you are at risk. There is no way around that, save celibacy – a burden few of us would bear. However, if you're smart about your dicking around – only sleeping with decent girls, being a decent person back to them, and taking a few other simple precautions – the odds of falling victim to a false rape accusation will be much, much smaller than they would otherwise.

Women over 40 “Shocked” by Fertility Problems

W.F. Price · 12 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

A study from the University of California San Francisco found that 44% of women over 40 who needed IVF to conceive were surprised by their difficulties. Most women apparently had unrealistic expectations. Even more surprising to them was the fact that success with IVF also decreases sharply with age.

> In the study, the researchers at the University of California, San Francisco interviewed women from 61 families — including heterosexual couples, lesbian couples and single women — who conceived and delivered children via IVF after age 40. The interviews were done between 2009 and 2011.
>
> “We found that women did not have a clear understanding of the age at which fertility begins to decline,” the researchers wrote in their study, published online Nov. 30 in the journal Human Reproduction.
>
> Most women thought their fertility would last longer than it did. For instance, 31 percent said they expected to get pregnant without difficulty at age 40.
>
> “Very few participants had considered the possibility that they would need IVF, and 44 percent reported being ‘shocked’ and ‘alarmed’ to discover that their understandings of the rapidity of age-related reproductive decline were inaccurate,” the researchers wrote.

Women’s unrealistic expectations concerning family formation are a direct result of the message that they can live as they please and do what they want without having to make concessions. Society has worked very hard to construct this artificial reality for women, often at the expense of men, but we have less control over biology than we do over our economic and education systems.

If there is any real crisis among women, the inability of many of them to have families of their own is it. It is an enormous loss in life. At the end, what good were all those jobs and meaningless flings when you have nothing to show for them?

Kate Harding Gets her Hate On

W.F. Price · 13 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Kate Harding kicked off Jezebel's "Fuck You Week" with an anti-MRA rant that rehashes the familiar garbage feminists resort to when trying to smear their rivals. Apparently, it was prompted at least in part by the Toronto incident, which goes to show that the confrontational strategy is bearing fruit.

Incidentally, I noticed that a couple people I know personally have "liked" the article. I'm not going to say who they are, because they are entirely anonymous people of no particular importance, but it highlighted (for me) the kinds of men who actually still think feminism has some moral legitimacy. They are essentially urban, progressive techie dweebs. No families, no kids, and probably no women to speak of. In fact, I happen to know that one of the guys who liked it – a skinny little keyboard jockey – got arrested for domestic assault and was then served a restraining order a few years back, which rendered him temporarily homeless. Sigh… Some guys never learn.

Maybe, rather than go into details about the Jezebel screed, which isn't worth the bits in its unicode, I should discuss this phenomenon of hopeless urban betas supporting feminism. Given what a raw deal these guys have, it's kind of baffling. What could possibly motivate them?

I maintain that, like most progressive "righteous" causes, it's mostly based on fear. A deep, constant terror of the consequences of breaking ranks. Being called a "sexist" is as terrifying to these people as being called an infidel was to a 12th century cleric. They think it could result in instant banishment from their well-paid jobs and expulsion from their carefully cultivated social network, which is so important to them. This network is important largely because it has replaced family. Destroy the family, and people rely on more artificial social constructs, like street gangs for example. Unsurprisingly, most urban progressives have only tattered remnants of family, or they live far, far away from family. I think of the shattered families they grew up in, and it's no wonder that the more sensitive and thoughtful among them who managed to find gainful employment in a profession are so plagued by insecurity and so needy.

In a sense, they are like the monks of the Middle Ages, who found common cause amongst strangers – not kin – by adhering to a very narrow world-view, chanting the same litanies, praying to the same icons, and following other common rituals. Their very survival, as they see it, rests on a sort of spiritual/ideological fascism that both disciplines and protects them.

One might think it crazy that some errant monk would respond to chastisement, often physical, with an even stronger commitment to his faith, but that was the typical outcome. In the same manner, many men in this hyper-PC milieu of the progressive urban elite respond to personal setback and punishment for perceived transgressions with redoubled fervor, becoming all the more fanatically devoted to the ideology that chains them. It's a sad, small existence, but amongst the more intellectual sorts it is pervasive.

If you challenge the views that they hold sacred, they might fly into a the kind of rage that characterizes a cornered beast. "Bad words" are amongst the most frightening things in their lives. Although I wouldn't recommend provoking these types, it can be rather amusing to do so, because the hysteria they display is so ridiculous.

So what can we do about these men? I'm not sure it's worth the effort to either reach out to them or to fight them. For one thing, they are a small minority of the population. White males make up some 30% of the population, and these guys probably under 20% of them. So, we're looking at around 5% of Americans here, and that's being generous. Nor do they really want to get involved in the fight (with a few minor exceptions). If they do open their mouths, they are most likely pussy begging. You'll see them pop up on Jezebel from time to time, but how many men actually read Jezebel? If you aren't writing about men's issues, why would you care? The only reason I can think of is that some of the guys think it might help them get a little action by teaming up with the feminists.

When it comes to the curious phenomenon of the SWPL urban male, we ought to simply ignore them. Confront the feminists, and keep your eyes on them even as they attempt to throw men in front of themselves to fight us. Just brush these men aside and keep going after the feminists. Ultimately, the only men we have to worry about are the cops. It is only the law we have to follow — not some breathless weenies telling us we're "bad men."

Gay Marriage Developments in Washington State

W.F. Price · 14 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Now that gay civil marriage is the law in Washington state, a number of people have decided to enter into arguably the worst contract in American civil law. Most, judging from the media coverage, are lesbian, despite the fact that gay males outnumber lesbians by about two to one. Men – gay or straight – simply aren't as interested in marriage as women.

In about a year or so, I plan to go down to the courthouse to see if I can't find some lesbian divorce proceedings. I'm quite curious about how these will go down, because it could have implications for Washington state fathers in their own custody cases, as children will be involved in many of these civil marriages.

However, there are already some signs of potential complications. Many of the lesbians appear to be entering into civil marriage contracts with ready-made families; i.e. they already have children. In most cases, I assume, from prior relationships. Yes, some lesbians do get artificially inseminated, but the normal heterosexual method is more effective and much cheaper (and profitable — don't forget child support), so most lesbians with children get them that way.

Now, what's really obnoxious about this is that despite it being obvious that some of the lesbians obtaining civil marriage clearly had their children with straight men the old-fashioned way, their new partners are invariably called the children's "parent" by the news outlets. If the father has joint legal custody (usually does not mean joint physical custody) – and joint legal custody is the norm in Washington state – this is a violation of the father's rights and abuse of his status as a parent. The fathers of these lesbians' children are being treated as though they don't exist, and I'll bet most of them are paying child support, which will likely help pay the mortgage or rent for the new couple. Lesbians actually prefer women who have ready-made families because of this convenient perk.

So, although I don't care whether lesbians sign onto a civil marriage contract, it's a different matter when fathers' roles are being hijacked by the new partner. If gay marriage means that children's and fathers' rights must take a back seat to lesbian rights, then gay marriage is indeed two steps back for one step forward. Hopefully courts will clarify this matter, and not allow women to use gay marriage as yet one more tool to separate children and their fathers.

Snow in the Hills

W.F. Price · 16 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Had a nice time yesterday cross country skiing in the Cascades with the kids and grandpa. As you can see from the picture, it was really coming down up there. We were lucky to make it back over the pass – lots of people were giving up and turning around on both sides – but it's great to get out of the city every now and then.

Ken Kesey and the old Northwest

W.F. Price · 17 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I picked up Ken Kesey's Sometimes a Great Notion over the weekend, and read the book in my spare time. It's a novel about an Oregon logging community back in the mid-20th century. Although that isn't my family background (my Western forefathers were miners and urban working men — more like Jack London), it's pretty close, and it brought back memories of logging towns we'd often pass through on our family trips when I was a boy. By the 1980s, the culture Kesey describes in the book was already in steep decline; by now it serves as little more than a romantic setting for vampire books. Logging is a lot more systematic and better managed these days, largely out of necessity. The old growth forests have been shaved down for the most part, and what's left can only be profitable with a scientific application of forestry management, so the "gyppo loggers" of old (small, private operations) are out of business. The only comparable industry in the region today is fishing — crabbing in particular.

Sometimes a Great Notion is a difficult read. It almost requires some intimate knowledge of the old Northwest to understand it and to make sense of the characters, so I wouldn't recommend it to everyone. However, it offers a portrait of America in transition that can provide a good deal of understanding of contemporary culture and family.

Above all, the book is about family, and how the westward march of progress and industry across the continent chewed right through the fragile families that took root in its path. Not only were majestic forests and towering mountains little more than obstacles to be chopped down or blasted through, but human relationships as well. It was all about work and money, doing battle with nature and just struggling to hang on in the face of roaring, fire-driven progress.

In hindsight, it looks as though the cultural revolution of the 1960s may have been the first step in taming that beast. The nature-worship, the "dropping out" and the prioritization of love were in direct opposition to the prevailing culture of Western America of the mid 20th century. The typical man of the time was hard, brutal and defiant — not sensitive, thoughtful and caring. It might be tempting to compare the masculinity of the time favorably with today's, but those in my father's generation were often deeply resentful of their own fathers, who knew little more than the value of a hard day's work at the factory, in the forest or on the sea. Fatherhood to them was nothing more than putting meat on the table and raising the boys to do the same, using whatever methods they deemed expedient (hence the origin of contemporary family law, which is really a child of the Age of Industry). It was a transitional time that was hard on young men, and some of the misbehavior the "liberation" from the old ways engendered is understandable in that light.

Sometimes, when we look at problems we face today, it's tempting to blame a few people, or some particular group for causing the problem. In the case of the destruction of the family, however, I don't think we can pin the blame entirely on feminists, or any other political group for that matter. That isn't to say they have no responsibility for what's happened, but they've been opportunists more than anything else. They were riding a wave that has been in motion for two centuries now. It's a wave we couldn't have escaped even without them, and it's one we're going to have to deal with whether they remain a political force or not.

Newtown: Put the Police State on the Table

W.F. Price · 18 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

With the latest mass murder, which was apparently tailor-made for a liberal push to abolish the 2nd Amendment, we see the sharks in a feeding frenzy. There's no doubt that they smell blood, and plan to capitalize on it. Newtown is the contemporary liberal version of 9-11, and they appear to be intent on pushing it to their advantage to the same extent the neocons did in 2001, when some Saudi terrorists blew up the WTC and the US military ended up invading Iraq, which had nothing to do with it.

Yes, let's be honest: this tragedy is being used by the regime to further their aims to reduce the USA to another quasi-totalitarian leftist state like the UK, which routinely throws people in prison for making bad jokes on Twitter.

I'm not sure gun control is even all that relevant to the situation. It's just a push to do something to finally secure that permanent victory the Obama coalition is dreaming about. Killing a bunch of little kids doesn't require an AR-15; a lever-action .30-30, a six-shooter and a hatchet would do the job just fine. But that isn't the point. This is purely political. To weaken support for the Constitution, you have to find an angle, and the 2nd amendment looks like the weakest link in the chain of the Bill of Rights. Get rid of that, and it will be easier to throw people in prison for "hate speech," which is really the top priority for the left. In order to jail us for what we say, they have to first take away our right to defend ourselves.

So I propose a little test here. If they really want gun control, that's fine, but each and every restriction on citizens must also apply to the men tasked with keeping us in line. If we aren't allowed to have high-capacity magazines and body armor, then the police, who are also subject to our laws, should not have them either. What does "equality" mean if one class of people – government employees – is not subject to the same laws as the other? We have more government employees than ever, and they have more power and armament than ever. Don't believe me? Look at them:

All are carrying assault rifles with high-capacity magazines. In the overwhelming majority of instances, they do so going up against no more than one or two people armed with little more than a handgun. If ordinary civilians don't need these weapons, the police, with superior manpower, organization and communication resources, certainly don't need them either.

So fine. Take our guns. But give yours up, too. The arms race in the US is a direct response to the rise of the police and prison-industrial state. Why doesn't the left ever mention this? Why, because the cops are their very own paid mercenaries. SWPL city dwellers depend on these guys to intimidate the minorities in their coalition — to keep them in their place. As the US grows increasingly fragmented, they will depend on them even more.

This gun grabbing is about empowering the state at the expense of citizens who believe in a free yeomanry — it's about building an America under the thumb of a new Praetorian Guard. Fools. They are giving up our collective liberty for a little bit of precarious power, and they aren't by any means putting a halt to future violence, which will come in spades when people realize it's the only tool left that works in our hollowed-out, uncivil society.

I expect they'll have their way, just like the neocon Republicans steamrolled Iraq despite the big lies their invasion depended on for support. La plus ca change.

For us men, it's a wash. The police state is overextended at home. I'm not sure the left can take much more from us without wrecking their foundation, but that won't stop them from trying. They instinctively understand that they are going to need a whole lot of state violence to keep the funds flowing, and I think that's what's really behind the all-out push to disarm American citizens. If they break all potential for resistance, it might give them a few more years of collecting government checks, driving their priuses around and taking yearly trips to Europe — after that who knows? We don't plan all that far in advance these days anyway.

When it comes to gun control, I'll just recommend that we give them an ear, but at the same time hold out for less government power. If they take our guns, they should give up theirs, too. I know they don't want to consider that, but it's an entirely fair demand.

Panty Activists

W.F. Price · 18 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Looking for anything to stay relevant, feminists are vandalizing store displays with their own underpants to protest sex-positive Victoria's Secret lingerie that expresses approval of sex.

What's odd about the protest is that the targeted underpants actually follow feminist ideas of making consent explicit. They display messages such as "unwrap me" and "sure thing," which, although not particularly sexy, definitely give the go ahead. If a woman has a sign on her underpants that says "f*ck me," she's making a very positive statement of consent, provided she took off her pants or dress herself. So what's the problem?

It seems that feminists actually resent the idea of consent, despite wanting men to ask for it. Consent (actually, it's really assent in this case — feminists don't understand the language that well) is something women don't like to make explicit. There's something unattractive about loudly proclaiming a desire to have sex before the act has even begun.

So feminists, never to be outdone, came up with their own slogans, which are essentially sex negative. They display messages such as "no means no," "I'll let you know when I'm ready" and "ask first!" — total mood killers. The most obnoxious of all says "LISTEN to what I want." If I were a young man and I saw those messages on a woman's underpants, I'd just tell her to put her pants on and leave. However, I doubt any non-moronic woman who wanted to sleep with a man would wear the panties the feminists designed.

As for real rapists, why would they care whether women consent or not? That's what rape is all about — not caring whether she wants it or not. For those guys, signs on panties don't matter a bit.

Youth Homelessness Growing Problem

W.F. Price · 20 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There's never been as wide a disparity in wealth between the young and old as in contemporary America, and unemployment amongst the young is very high. Naturally, therefore, a lot of young people are ending up on the streets.

The NY Times addresses the issue, but leaves out the fact that these are mainly young men:

> SEATTLE — Duane Taylor was studying the humanities in community college and living in his own place when he lost his job in a round of layoffs. Then he found, and lost, a second job. And a third.
>
> Now, with what he calls "lowered standards" and a tenuous new position at a Jack in the Box restaurant, Mr. Taylor, 24, does not make enough to rent an apartment or share one. He sleeps on a mat in a homeless shelter, except when his sister lets him crash on her couch.
>
> [...]
>
> These young adults are the new face of a national homeless population, one that poverty experts and case workers say is growing. Yet the problem is mostly invisible. Most cities and states, focusing on homeless families, have not made special efforts to identify young adults, who tend to shy away from ordinary shelters out of fear of being victimized by an older, chronically homeless population. The unemployment rate and the number of young adults who cannot afford college "point to the fact there is a dramatic increase in homelessness" in that age group, said Barbara Poppe, the executive director of the United States Interagency Council on Homelessness.
>
> The Obama administration has begun an initiative with nine communities, most of them big cities, to seek out those between 18 and 24 who are without a consistent home address. New York, Houston, Los Angeles, Cleveland and Boston are among the cities included in the effort.

Homeless people, the ones who are outright on the street in particular, are overwhelmingly male. I've been trying to find statistics breaking down homelessness by age and gender combined, and haven't had much success, but I assume the ratio is pretty consistent across age cohorts. For obvious reasons, it's easier for young women than young men to find someone to take them in. Additionally, more resources are available for the typical homeless female, despite the frequent (and predictable) complaints that they are not as well-served.

In the meanwhile, the war on men – particularly young ones – continues apace. Even as more young men fall into the abyss, the pressure is ratcheted up by our so-called pundits, who can barely contain their glee as more and more young men's lives are marked by misery rather than stability and happiness.

Is Prostitution Really about Exploitation?

W.F. Price · 21 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Former Olympian and married mother Suzy Favor-Hamilton decided last year, while already in her mid-40s, to become a call girl, charging up to $600 per hour. She was not under financial duress, nor was she pressured into it by anyone. In fact, her husband knew what she was up to and tried to stop her, but she ignored him (he probably would have been arrested for abuse if he put any real effort into stopping it).

> A three-time U.S. Olympian who was publicity exposed on Thursday as an elite $600-an-hour escort has revealed that her husband knew about her double life and tried to put an end to it.
>
> Suzy Favor-Hamilton, a 44-year-old married mother of three, has been working with one of Las Vegas' top agencies to book 'dates' across cities including Las Vegas, Chicago and Houston.
>
> Despite using the name 'Kelly Lundy' as she advertised her services through Haley Heston's Private Collection, her double life has been revealed after she told clients about her real identity, believing there was an unwritten rule they would not speak out.
>
> But now at least one of these clients has contacted The Smoking Gun, which in turn has revealed the details of Favor-Hamilton's clandestine career, which she now calls a 'huge mistake.'
>
> Soon after the story appeared online, instantly sparking a furor in the media, Favor-Hamilton took to Twitter to offer her 3,183 followers her side of the story.
>
> In one missive, the 44-year-old mother explained that she was initially drawn to escorting 'because it provided many coping mechanisms for me when I was going through a very challenging time with my marriage and my life.
>
> [...]
>
> The Olympian has refused to be labelled a victim, insisting that she knew what she was doing and taking full responsibility for her actions.
>
> She told The Smoking Gun that her husband was the only one who knew about her moonlighting as a prostitute in cities across the country.
>
> 'He tried, he tried to get me to stop. He wasn't supportive of this at all,' Favor Hamilton noted.
>
> The 44-year-old has revealed that she is currently seeking psychological help for her problem.
>
> 'I fully intend to make amends and get back to being a good mother, wife, daughter, and friend,' she concluded in her most recent post.

So how does this fit into the prostitute as human trafficking victim narrative we hear these days? The woman was an Olympic athlete, had a husband so supportive he didn't even dump her for being a whore, and a good job, yet she chose to become a hooker.

She also put a great deal of effort into advertising her wares…

Again, what's all this about women being forced into prostitution, and men prowling around looking for innocent ladies to exploit? Doesn't seem that it takes all that much prodding to turn the lady into a tramp. Actually, seems more that it's the other way around; without men actively trying to suppress prostitution there'd be a whole lot more of it.

The Truth about Older Women and Younger Men

W.F. Price · 21 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Now that more money is in the hands of women and more men are hard up and without a job, it's likely that there will be more older female/younger male couples. However, rather than true love relationships, many of these will likely be some sort of gigolo setup or outright fraud. Unfortunately, I think fraud will come to be more the norm, because it offends a woman's pride to support a man, even when it would be fair of her to do so.

The number of lonely middle aged women is getting to that critical point where they will be seen as resources to enterprising young men who are down on their luck. Anecdotally, I've been hearing about this for some time, particularly in regards to men who set up internet dating accounts, only to discover that the majority of interested women are five to fifteen years older.

Some men are happy to date older women, but they are a pretty small minority. It simply isn't a normal practice anywhere in the world, which strongly suggests there is an insurmountable biological basis for men's preference for younger mates. However, there's more to it than that. Unlike older men who date younger women, older women are not usually generous with younger men. Rather than accept that their advanced age is something they ought to compensate for, which men are usually all-too-happy to do, they tend to instead delude themselves and act coquettish, as though they are half their age, despite the fact that their charms have all but worn off. So the man who goes into this kind of relationship expecting that she'll be understanding and generous is typically disappointed. This leads to resentment, which I suspect is behind a fair amount of the fraud.

For honest men, dating an older woman is generally a bad idea, because not only will she have less to offer sexually, she'll demand more as well. The more money she has, the more she'll expect you to spend on her. The worst story I've ever heard of concerning a woman with a younger man (boy, actually), was when a teacher seduced a friend of mine when he was 15 years old. She was in her mid-30s and had a son who was only a few years younger than my friend. Really a weird situation, when you think about it. The son was not at all pleased. So, my friend, who came from a poor, single mother household, asked her at one point for some money. Not as in a strict sex for money exchange, but instead just some cash to get around and amuse himself. At this point, the woman exploded, calling him all sorts of names, saying he was trash, that he didn't deserve anything, and he should be happy he was getting some from her for free. Keep in mind that she was committing a crime at the time. Rather than take revenge on her, which would have been as easy as calling the police or the school she was employed with, my friend just cut her off. However, even to this day he recalls the treatment she subjected him to with a great deal of bitterness. It had a negative effect on his life for the next ten or fifteen years, during which time he had a difficult time connecting with women in a healthy, non-exploitative manner.

Unfortunately, older women all too often do have this attitude of contempt toward younger men. After some experience, most men figure this out, so by a certain point the remaining men who are willing to date older women are well aware that they will have to defraud them in order to get anything in return for their efforts.

The following story, in which a younger Irishman ripped off a New York woman to the tune of $4 million, will probably become more common in coming years:

> A 60-year-old American woman has been defrauded of millions of euro by her younger Irish lover, who she claims had been leading a double life, the High Court has heard.
>
> New York-based Ms Elisa Rodino claims that Thomas J Queally, who is aged in his mid forties and who had been engaged to her, has stolen approximately $4m of her money.
>
> A large portion was lodged by him into a bank in Ennis, Co Clare.
>
> She also claims that Queally, who she has not seen for months, had another finance while engaged to her.
>
> Today at the High Court lawyers acting on her behalf secured a number of temporary freezing orders against > US based Mr Queally, of Lahaknock, Kilmaley, Co Clare.

>
> The orders prevent Mr Queally reducing, dissipating or transferring funds below a value of €1.6m held in a bank account at Permanent TSB in Ennis, Co Clare.
>
> Ms Rodino from Cathedral Avenue, Hempstead, New York claims the money in the Ennis bank account, approximately $2M which was converted into Euro, is hers. She claims that it was moved by Mr Queally from a joint account held in the US in both their names.
>
> Seeking the orders Ross Gorman Bl for Ms Rodino said his client was a vulnerable woman who had been taken advantage of by Mr Queally.
>
> Several years ago she inherited wealth in the form of a significant property portfolio in New York following the death of her father.
>
> Last August, in order to aid Mr Queally in a court case against a former employer, she agreed to put his name down on one of her bank accounts. It was a deposit account that contained US$5M.
>
> Mr Queally asked her to do this because it would show that he and Ms Rodino were a couple and that the work he did on her properties was due to their relationship, and was not a contract of employment, counsel said.
>
> Last October Mr Queally was due to meet up with Ms Rodino in Spain, but never showed up. When she arrived back in the US she discovered that money had been transferred to the bank in Ennis and to a US bank account.
>
> Counsel said that his client did not know exactly where Mr Queally is at present…

The old "let's get married" bait and switch — the golden trick for any aspiring gigolo. Mr. Queally is obviously a rogue, and ought to be punished for defrauding the woman, but if we heard the entire story she wouldn't come out too clean herself, I'd wager. Queally probably figured she owed him that much for romancing her (he might be about right — it comes out to a million a year for the stud service), and he wouldn't get it any other way, so might as well…

I expect a lot more of these stories in coming years. During the Victorian era, when young "gentlemen" were often desperate and completely broke, romancing wealthy widows was a popular means of securing some funds to survive. This is the origin of the prenuptial agreement. It was not, as many might assume, devised to protect men, but rather women (of course), because back in those days men gained control over family finances. Today, women are given more control than they had in the old days, which only guarantees that more men will resort to subterfuge to rip them off, and what better target than a middle aged or older heiress or divorcée?

Merry Christmas

W.F. Price · 24 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I hope everyone is enjoying the holidays. My kids are in town again, so I'm taking some time off to relax with family until I drop them off tomorrow.

I hope everyone makes it through to New Year's in one piece!

Putting Gender into Christmas

W.F. Price · 27 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

There were a number of articles prior to Christmas this year about how there's a movement toward "gender neutral toys," but that would be a surprise to most parents. It may be an issue for progressive parents, but they are a pretty rare breed; not only are they a minority of Americans (there are more Mexican nationals in the US than there are liberal progressives), but progressive fertility is the lowest in the the Western world, and that's abysmal. The rest of us try to be a bit more practical — a necessity for normal parents.

If you give your kids a choice, chances are there won't be anything particularly transsexual about their selections. Also, if you want them to actually be happy about the presents, you'd probably better steer clear of the gender neutral aisle.

Now, it may be true that some boys prefer playing with dolls, and some girls with trucks. If you've got a child like that, you'll probably love the kid just as much as you would any other, but let's be honest: it isn't exactly the norm, and the little boy who likes playing with dolls and makeup kits likes those toys because they are gender specific — not because they are "gender neutral." I don't think I need to spell out the implications here…

However, feminists are putting a lot of effort into trying to convince us that this is how the world ought to be, because of course gender is merely a social construct. Hence the "gender neutral" term. But is it really gender neutrality they are pushing, or gender consciousness? It must the latter, because truly gender neutral toys are merely idiosyncratic toys. Calling them gender neutral is inserting the word gender into something that has little if anything to do with gender issues.

As an example, my kids both like animals, but different kinds. I suppose one could argue that there's something gendered about the fact that my son likes creepier, scalier and slimier animals while my daughter prefers fluffy ones, but I don't think gender has much to do with it — they're just little individuals with their own interests. My daughter is a big fan of ducks for some reason. Should I see this in gendered terms? Is there anything gendered about ducks? It's kind of an absurd notion, but this is exactly how feminists see the world. They are the most gender conscious people on earth. Their entire movement is about gender, yet they spend most of their time telling us it is irrelevant.

So, some little boy wanted an oven for Christmas, and there was this big to-do about how all the toy ovens are gendered, presumably because toy companies are all about pushing girls into the kitchen. A girl got on change.org and made the case that her little brother should have a non-pink toy oven, and received 45,000 signatures for her effort (good thing we Americans have our priorities straight). So, to remedy the situation, Hasbro came out with the Easy-Bake Ultimate Oven in colors other than pink and purple.

My little sister had one of those when we were kids, and I thought it was pretty fun, because it actually worked. The thing was probably a terrible fire/burn hazard and probably would be banned today; I could put in a GI Joe, crank it up, and next thing you know the GI Joe started melting. Pretty awesome. Although I hate to break it to feminists, the boy's desire for an oven may have been for roughly the same reason I liked the toy rather than any desire to cook for his future feminist firefighter wife. Nothing wrong with cooking, of course (it's one of my favorite hobbies), but boys tend to approach it from a different angle — they see the oven as a tool rather than a prop for playing house. I'm fairly sure, therefore, that if Hasbro markets an essentially useless toy oven to boys it's going to be a failure. Instead of spending $50 on a toy oven for the kid, why not buy him a $20 Black and Decker toaster oven that really works?

Although the market may have much to do with the blatant gender focus of toys, a lot of it is a result of the grrrl power feminism that has become such a stifling feature of our culture. For example, while toys from earlier times were clearly often intended for either boys or girls, they weren't nearly as in-your-face about it. Back when sex differences were not only accepted nearly universally, but celebrated as well, toys were a lot more subdued. Did toy soldiers before the 1970s, when feminism really took off, have bulging, steroid-enhanced muscles and oversize guns? Was everything for girls painted pink and purple? Not at all. As feminism has grown stronger, toys have become caricatures of sex stereotypes.

If feminism were not a prominent feature of our culture, I doubt parents would worry much at all about gender as it relates to toys. Sure, boys would usually want boy toys and girls girl toys, but it wouldn't be an issue, and absent the rigid suppression of our true nature as men and women – or boys and girls – in public life, we'd probably express ourselves in much more natural, relaxed and healthy ways at home with our families.

Although feminists claim they want to eradicate gender differences, when they insert gender issues into everything – the workplace, school, the military, family, and now Christmas – they only succeed in making the differences oppositional rather than complementary. They create strife where it doesn't belong, drawing battle lines everywhere, even between little children, all the while calling it "neutrality." What demented people.

Soft Spot for Choice Mommies

Elusive Wapiti · 27 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, family Wapiti did some hunting for a new church home subsequent to moving to a different house in a different locale. In the process, I noted something that all of the larger churches had: a divorce support group.

How the Church handles divorce is always a thorny issue, one that often earns her some jeers from the manosphere. On the one hand, there is the pastoral responsibility to look after the flock, to close ranks around those in need. On the other there is the pastoral responsibility to discipline the flock, rebuking wayward brothers and sisters toward repentance.

While I tend to think that pastors err too much toward caring and not enough toward discipline, I recognize that the Church and her leaders are presented with a no-win scenario: What should be done about those members of the Body who divorce, or those divorcees who present themselves at the church door? Care for them? Or discipline them? Adding to the problem is victimhood. Usually, divorcees will blame their former spouse for their quandary: women because he was such an abusive or bad guy that they had to get out, men because the solipsistic and hysterical woman took their children, sold them for a few ducats and prizes, and kept half or more of his hard-earned stuff. How are church leaders to know the difference, when most/all claim that "she kidnapped my kids and took me to the cleaners" or "he was so bad I had no choice"?

So I can appreciate the difficult position the Church and her leaders are in. That said, what I find reprehensible is when Church leaders exculpate one population from their sins, and by extension, placing responsibility for the state of this population on another group. In this case, I'm talking about choice mommies–the "population"–and men, the always-useful other. Single mothers are near-canonized in churches, those saintly women, struggling so hard to make ends meet. Little thought is given to how they got into that position, and whether or not their present condition was due to her choice (most likely) or his (far less likely but still possible).

Thus I cringe when I see things like this from Pastor Driscoll of Mars Hill. I suppose one can add his moral support to the sum total of cultural and financial incentive for women to divorce, and to the near-complete liberalist campaign of removing the stigma from choice mommyhood:

> It's important for kids without a dad to have godly, male investment in their life. Young boys without a dad need the godly investment of a man. Young girls without a dad need a godly man's loving encouragement. And the single moms really appreciate godly men investing in their kids.

> [The church nursery is] a good place to meet a nice gal. Single guys may not know this, but nice, single gals who love Jesus and want to marry and become a mom someday are working in the nursery. That's like fishing in a trout pond if you're a single guy. And the single moms dropping off their kids should be considered for marriage too. After all, Jesus' mother was a single mom until Joseph married her and adopted Jesus. [bolded emphasis mine]

As mentioned before, there are many reasons for children to be without a dad, and not many of them are good. This white-knighting on behalf of single mothers may be helping a truly innocent woman make her way through a bad situation. Or more likely it is enabling the terrible choices of a choice mommy who has and is harming her children through her self-destructive and child-harming behavior. Furthermore, how do/would my male readers feel, if your children are the ones a choice mommy is presenting to the nursery for some Godly man investment, as opposed to your paternal guidance?

Then there is the bit about trolling for a wife in the single mom pond. This is just not very wise, and I recommend my brothers avoid looking to this population for long-term mates. Sorry choice mommies, I'm not judging you, but I am judging the evidence, and coming to appropriate conclusions based upon that evidence.

Last, there is the whole bit about Mary being a single mom. I doubt Pastor Driscoll is intending to indulge in blasphemy here, more likely he is clumsily attempting to illustrate that we may not know exactly how a single mother found herself in her position. Even then it is an imperfect analogy, for Mary wasn't single, she was betrothed, which back then was a state akin to marriage. Joseph took betrothal-marriage so seriously that he meant to divorce her quietly–therefore turning Mary into a single mom for being an apparent adulteress–and would have were it not for divine intervention.

Rather than soft-pedal and condone the socially retrograde behavior of choice momies, perhaps church leaders would do better to sadly note their condition while strenuously condemning from the pulpit divorce as the evil that God hates, an evil that Moses only granted to the Israelites because their hearts were hard. I still think Dalrock's sign at the church door would serve as a good reminder to all that while accidents happen, divorce is not accidental.

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to three, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

Women's Duty To Men

Joe Zamboni · 28 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

The duties that American men have to American women are many, and consistently enforced by a variety of heavy-handed mechanisms such as mandatory jail-time, court-imposed fines, the yanking of your driver's license, and separation from your children. As if that wasn't enough to force you to comply, there is also being disqualified for financial aid in college, community shaming, and denial of sex.

The duties of men to women very importantly include the duty to protect. This more generally could be defined as the duty to be drafted, to go off to war and die, to be maimed for life, or to be tortured by the psychological harm that one suffered as a result of one's violent military experience. On a more personal level, this duty takes the form of the man being the one who's got the duty to fight off a burglar or intruder. Again and again I will write this: there is no comparable duty of women towards men, nothing even close.

The list of duties includes the duty to provide financial support for a woman, if she has become your wife, and/or the mother of your child, regardless of whether she does anything for you. Remember this is a duty, not a deal. You have no right to get anything in return. It is important that you be clear that relationships between men and women are not an equal deal. Instead, on the man's side we have duties and obligations, along with a very heavy dose of accountability and responsibility, while on the woman's side, we have rights and options, without the burden of much if any accountability or responsibility.

For men, you might furthermore include the duty to provide child support, which is really just an euphemism for further money to the woman, not based on the needs of the children, but based on whatever can be extracted from you. You could additionally include the duty to never to hit a woman, even though she may feel free to hit you without any legal penalties whatsoever. These and other male duties are enforced by law, and the full power of the state is brought to bear to make sure that every man complies. If you don't believe me, read the instructions to the police who respond to domestic violence complaints, and read about mandatory instructions to arrest the male (it has nothing to do with who was at fault).

There are also other duties that men have toward women, such as the duty to listen to women, and treat them with respect, even if the involved women are doing stupid and despicable things. You see this in the general unwillingness of men to criticize women who are acting badly, such as bar hopping, getting pass-out drunk, having sex with multiple men they don't know, and then blaming the men and claiming they were raped. Very few men dare to say: "Well, what did you expect?" or "Excuse me, could you have had something to do with this result?" There is no comparable duty of women to listen to men, or to respect men, and I see this in evidence at the supermarket where women publicly say the most abusive and embarrassing things to their husbands — perhaps acting sadistically, or perhaps just not giving a damn how the husband might feel to have others overhear such criticisms. Or maybe, for the wives, this is a public showing of power…

Although not generally acknowledged, there is also a duty, that many men feel, to give women the benefit of the doubt. We men, at least us traditional men, will try our best to rescue women who have screwed up big time. We may give them jobs that they aren't qualified for, or extend the date when they would otherwise have been fired from their jobs for incompetence – and thus we hope to encourage them to get their acts together. We men are decidedly easier on women than we are on other men. This duty has even become institutionalized in many settings. For example, the physical standards for firefighters in many jurisdictions have been significantly lowered in order for women to be able to make the grade. The same lowering of standards, in order to give women the benefit of the doubt, can be found in the military. For men, if coming from women, there is no comparable benefit of the doubt, no bending of the rules, and no giving of special dispensations.

There is also a duty to be lenient on women, a duty to not force women to bear the full repercussions and impacts of their actions. You see this in the courts for example, where women are consistently given much shorter prison sentences than men for the same crime. Some of us call this phenomenon the "pussy pass," where a woman in many instances can plead insanity, or be on her period, or suffer from post-partum depression, and use that as her get-out-of-jail-free card. Men cannot get away with such behavior or anything like this. Women do not provide any such leniency towards men. In fact, I am regularly disappointed to see how strict and unforgiving women are toward men. For example, I know several examples of women who were married to older men who have gotten seriously sick. A number of these women have promptly abandoned their husbands, apparently because their husbands were no longer able to provide the trappings of the lives "to which they have become accustomed." I have been surprised that these women have apparently felt no duty to aid their elderly husbands. The old adage "for better or worse" doesn't seem to mean anything anymore, except to some traditional married men that I know (but for men this behavior may increasingly be due the extremely punishing consequences of modern divorce rather than adherence to this old fashioned notion).

The more I have been thinking about this, the more surprised I have been to note the severe imbalance between the sexes in the area of duties: there are a great many duties that men feel they have towards women, but virtually none (bar those imposed by law) that modern women feel they have towards men. This is consistent with Briffault's Law, which states that it is the female, not the male, who determines all the conditions of the animal family, and where the female can derive no further benefit from associating with the male, no further association takes place.

To really get this, and to let it in, can be disorienting but also, more importantly, emancipating. Women have no duty to provide sex, to cook, or to clean… no duty to take care of the children, or even to act like adults. They do whatever they please. And our society, most importantly the men in society, supports and allows women to do just that.

Which importantly sheds light on the advisability of men having children, getting married, or in any other way establishing a permanent commitment with a woman. In the current American environment, making such a commitment is most ill-advised. The woman involved can walk away from her side of the bargain, with virtually no consequences, in some instances in fact becoming better off than she was in the midst of the commitment. For example, a divorcing woman may do better financially if she walks away from her husband, if she collects alimony and child support from the ex, receives "gifts" from her new man, lives in the new man's house, etc. On the other hand, if a man has a formal commitment such as marriage, he is expected to continue to observe that commitment (such as be the financial provider), even though the woman is no longer giving him whatever she had given in the past that induced him to enter into the relationship (sex, emotional intimacy, whatever). Men really need to get that, not only will a woman walk away when an arrangement is no longer to the woman's advantage, but that the men often must continue to provide whatever it is that they committed to, even though they then get nothing in return.

This hard fact of life for a man can be seen in the plight of so many wounded male veterans. They have given a tremendous amount, and their lives are forever altered. What do they get, really? A lush life with ample benefits coming from the government? A revered and honored place in society? More attention from women? No, sorry, none of that. Their contribution is done and final. There is no going back. They are history. But they must nonetheless keep giving. You can see this as gross gender unfairness, especially when you understand that women do not need to keep giving, they can just keep taking, up until the point when they don't want to take any longer.

Thus not only do men bear the brunt of all the duties in a heterosexual relationship, but whenever women do make agreements with men, to provide something of value (sex, cooking, child care, gestation services, etc.), they can withdraw their contributions whenever they wish, with very little if any consequences. For example, a woman can put a baby up for adoption in many states, simply by leaving it on the hospital steps, without paperwork, expense, or the need for excuses. Likewise, a woman can get an abortion without her husband's consent or knowledge. But don't try to do such things if you're a man. For example, if she wants to keep the child, then you (the man) are obligated for eighteen years of child support, period, no exceptions.

In summary, the duty requirements for men contrast sharply with those of women. Not only do men have the duties, while women do not, but it is only with great difficulty that men can escape these duties. Consider the domain of money, where men cannot withdraw their giving without facing very serious draconian consequences (jail time, fines, loss of driver's license, loss of professional license, etc.). For example, a number of states, like Florida, still have lifetime alimony laws. Men are effectively thereby made into financial slaves, working for the benefit of the ruling class (women). On the other hand, women can walk away from many of their commitments to men whenever they please. Now that's gender fairness and equality, right?

Rape Abroad Study Recommends not Being Slut

W.F. Price · 29 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

According to a study published by the American Psychological Association, young American women who study abroad in non-English speaking countries are five times more likely to be raped (according to the respondents) than those who remain at home. It seems that despite feminists' insistence that the US is in the midst of a rape crisis and college campuses in the grip of a rape culture, other countries are significantly riskier than our own for American women.

The study cites risk factors such as non-fluency in the local language, easy access to booze and fewer friends and family as contributing to the rapes.

The problem here is that although American women have managed to arrange society so that they may take risks with minimal consequences, this is not the case in most of the world, and female students don't know that. Actually, the ideas pounded into their heads, particularly those that stress that women may do whatsoever they please and should not worry about the consequences, are a big part of the problem. Finally, there is the issue of the strict control of college males, who are already a highly selected group of young men whose behavior is even better controlled than the American norm. Add these together, and American college girls really haven't a clue what's out there.

Although I'm not sure whether what the girls reported as rape meets the legal definition in the countries in which they stayed, I don't doubt that they are more likely to be raped while abroad. The US is the most heavily policed nation on earth outside of war zones, partly because allowing women to do as they please without fear of sexual assault requires a very heavy police presence. If you want to live in a country where young women can go out on the town alone and get smashed, cavort with strangers and stumble around in dark alleys while simultaneously preventing every single man in the area from taking advantage of the opportunity, you have to have a very draconian set of laws and a constant police presence. You have to have such stringent laws and policies that lots of innocent men take the fall as well, hence the disproportionate number of men falsely convicted of rape as compared to other crimes.

Most other countries either cannot afford a police state or do not particularly want one, so when American women go abroad they are entering a cultural zone that is unfamiliar to them. Most of the world thinks that women who behave like American college girls are "asking for it." In fact, even whores in other countries generally take more precautions than college-age American women.

As for so-called "victim blaming," American women would do well to consider the fact that it's something most of us have to live with. If a young American man gets drunk, mouths off to some strangers and gets his ass kicked, do the police pursue that kind of case vigorously? Your typical cop would tell a guy to learn how to keep his mouth shut and stay away from thugs, then simply file a police report and forget about the matter. And a severe ass-kicking is no more fun than being raped. It just happens not to be a major priority for cops, because it usually happens to guys who were asking for it.

Sending American girls abroad is a risky thing, because they aren't prepared to function in the kind of sexual culture that is globally normative. They are used to having a heavily armed, sophisticated police force ready at a moment's notice to come rescue them from whatever threats – real or imagined – lurking on college campuses. They are also accustomed to a culture that locks up such a high proportion of young men that it filters most of the truly dangerous ones out quickly. This just isn't how things work in the rest of the world, where people must rely on family, common sense and good practice to avoid becoming crime victims. Reality certainly is oppressive.

So why not teach the women about reality, tell them that going abroad is risky, and they ought to exercise caution?

Surprisingly, the article does just that. While it avoids being so blunt as the Toronto policeman who told women not to "dress like sluts," thereby kicking off the slutwalk extravaganza (which is really a demonstration of female supremacy), it does recommend something called “safe walking,” which sounds like the exact opposite of slutwalking:

> If data from other schools are consistent with the findings in this sample, warning females going abroad, particularly to non-English-speaking countries, would be appropriate. Reminding those students of precautions around separation from friends, heavy alcohol use, and entering unknown environments is likely to pay the same dividends abroad as they do on campus. Reminders regarding safe walking, safe dating, and safe partying could be provided by Student Affairs offices before students go abroad.

Of course, the report adds: “Just as important, however, is the need to be able to respond to a sexual assault appropriately when it occurs outside the country.” But they know well that the campus police will have no such power. Even Hillary Clinton can do essentially nothing about it when hapless American girls get themselves into trouble with some Pablo, Giuseppe or Mustafa far from the reach of American law enforcement. It’s up to local law enforcement, and given the reputation American women have earned for themselves abroad I doubt the response would be all that energetic.

Happy New Year!

W.F. Price · 31 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

I hope the New Year finds you all well.

On these days I give my cheer to the living and tears to the dead. So may the whiskey, mirth and tears flow freely tonight for all friends, everywhere.

Tomorrow we can tighten our belts and put on our armor to go out and fight to see the sunset one more time. It will be another beautiful day to usher in the New Year, and there will be many more.

As the Scots say, Haud Hogmanay, and a guid New Year!

Sarkeesian finds Powerful Backer in Google's Yonatan Zunger

W.F. Price · 31 December 2012 · Archived copy · Original

Prompted by a baffling comment from a troll, who said that Anita Sarkeesian has already produced her videos on time (I can find no evidence of the existence of any of the promised Tropes vs. Women videos — if anyone has a link please let me know), I did a bit of looking around to see if I could find anything. Although I couldn't find her first promised video, the "Damsel in Distress" trope, I came across an article written by a feminist Google engineer named Yonatan Zunger, who is apparently a big fan of Anita Sarkeesian. Zunger is a prime example of the sort of SWPL geek who doesn't care much for the rest of America, young men in particular.

Zunger is a strange fellow. He says he is Israeli, yet he has a strong interest in quasi-jihadi movements such as the Arab Spring, and puts serious effort into defending Islam. He also boasts of being related to Karl Marx, and defends irrational wars abroad through convoluted reasoning, although I suspect his real motives are somewhat simpler and more personal than he lets on. Perhaps most relevant to us, Zunger has written for the Good Men Project, which is a bit odd, but makes sense given his interest in Sarkeesian.

There's something a bit ominous in the lessons he draws from Sarkeesian's Kickstarter campaign and TED talk. Zunger suggests that Sarkeesian is destroying a certain aspect of gamer culture through her deconstruction of games, and then goes on to say that we ought to apply this to society in general:

> In network theory, we often study the ways in which networks fail. Sometimes this is in order to keep networks alive more effectively – such as telecommunications networks – and sometimes it is in order to destroy them more efficiently – such as disease transmission networks. But the study of games has been mostly limited to how to make games better, for fairly obvious reasons. But if Sarkeesian's analysis is correct, and I strongly suspect it is, then perhaps we need to think about various aspects of society which can meaningfully be modelled as games – and then apply what we know about game design to deliberately sabotage them, make them not fun to play, and lead people to abandon them. Think of it as community curation by anti-engineering.

Although he doesn't come right out and say it, it's pretty clear that the "various aspects of society" he is referring to are the supposed misogynist gamers — essentially boys and young men who release their aggression through gaming. Given that allowing young men to have a pressure release valve in the form of gaming is a great way to prevent aggression and resistance in the real world, sabotaging that outlet strikes me as a particularly poorly-conceived idea for eliminating sexism. However, for guys like Michael Kimmel and Yonatan Zunger, only unconditional surrender on the part of the enemy (most men) will do, so they will tolerate no resistance, no matter how inconsequential.

Whether or not that's one of his goals, it's pretty disturbing to see a guy in charge of social network engineering for Google suggesting we play God with society through "deliberate sabotage."

Perhaps this provides Zunger's motivation for supporting Sarkeesian: he sees her as a useful tool for "community curation by anti-engineering." Although it's unclear whether Zunger had anything to do with recent career moves on Sarkeesian's part, he suggests in a comment that she should consult with game producers, slyly adding a smiley face to the end of the comment:

> …right now, she seems to have gotten the ears of a lot of the studios, and those studios are thinking seriously about how to attract more female gamers.
>
> Consulting could be a very effective move. 😀

Other commenters on his post also support deliberately sabotaging games; one fellow named Lionel Lauer suggests adding Jar Jar Binks to all of them:

> She's raised the cash legitimately, so as long as she at least fulfills the original goal, she can do what the fuck she likes with the rest of it. Personally, I'd use the extra to really piss off all the haters, like maybe bribe every game company to put Jar Jar Binks in every release this year.

So perhaps we now know why Sarkeesian hasn't produced a single video for her "Tropes" series yet — she's too busy consulting for game development companies and deliberately sabotaging society for Google's Yonatan Zunger, who apparently fancies himself the Machiavellian genius who will bring about a brave new world where Google engineers get all the girls (or boys — I'm not sure what Zunger's preference is in that way) and the rest of us stop playing because it isn't fun any more.

Sounds wonderful.

VAWA Dead — For Now

W.F. Price · 2 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

House Republicans let the Violence Against Women Act expire when they refused to pass a beefed-up, more expensive version that extended extra money and programs to illegal immigrants, lesbians and Indian tribes. What I'm curious about is why the lesbians need it, since as we all know only men commit domestic violence…

I wouldn't count on the bill staying dead, but it's pretty expensive, and the money just isn't there like it used to be. We may be seeing the beginning of the unraveling of the feminist regime due to its success in disenfranchising the men who have paid for it. Feminism is a self-defeating movement precisely because it consumes and destroys what made it possible in the first place: private, male-created wealth.

However, rather than cheer the end of this despicable, sexist bill, we should take a moment to reflect upon the men who have lost their families, careers and even lives as a result of its excesses.

Below is a video of a man, suspected of DV, being shot in the back when he tries to flee from a female police officer. As he lies bleeding on the ground, other officers offer her comfort for the distress she suffered from blasting a chunk of lead through a man's back:

Women Outpacing Men in Holiday Adultery Extravaganza

W.F. Price · 2 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The New Year brings with it hope, resolution, and divorce. January is known as "divorce month" in legal circles for the high number of separations initiated after the turning of the year. Some reasons for this phenomenon may include women's reluctance to spoil the holidays with a divorce, but I suspect the pressure of the holidays pushes more than a few of them into mental breakdown status, which seems to cause many women to cut and run — a sort of feminine stampede out of the corral.

So perhaps it isn't surprising that a UK adultery service has seen record numbers of women signing up after Christmas:

> UndercoverLovers.com, a dating website for married people seeking extra-marital affairs, has reported a record post-Christmas surge in women joining the site. Since Christmas Day 13,835 new female members have registered, substantially exceeding the number of men who've signed up.
>
> [...]
>
> She continues: "When we launched Undercover Lovers three years ago we had approximately 7 men joining for every 3 women. Since then however the gender ratio of our membership has been moving progressively towards parity. If the trend of the past week continues into 2013 we could soon reach the point where ladies outnumber the gents using the site, which would finally put paid to the preconception that men are intrinsically more adulterous than women."

What does surprise me is how many men still use these services. Given how many single women are out there, fooling around with married women hardly seems necessary — even for the hard up. However, perhaps part of the motivation is that in Anglo countries they are even easier than the single ones. Sure, you may really be slumming when you're running around with another guy's wife, but there is no short supply of lazy guys who want to get laid for the lowest price possible. And as it stands today, there's no cheaper sex than with a married woman, because her husband is going to pay for it no matter how it goes down in the end.

> Undercover Lovers have also noted significant differences in the way the sexes use their website. Emily Pope explains: "We know from previous research that women reflect for far longer before taking the huge decision to join the site and, once they do, are initially more tentative in selecting and communicating with potential affair partners. Men are more impulsive by nature and tend to jump straight into the fray. However we've also discovered that once women are active on Undercover Lovers, they're likely to behave more promiscuously than their male counterparts. Our Adultery Survey 2012 revealed that our female members have had 2.3 illicit lovers on average compared to the 1.8 affair partners of men on the site.

Gotta love that last part. I guess now we know why the term "hussy" originally came from housewife. It's a good thing we men can laugh at ourselves, because these days the joke is most definitely on us.

Issues with Senate VAWA Bill

W.F. Price · 3 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists and other assorted leftists are really upset about VAWA not being reauthorized, but I get the sense that they don't really understand what's at issue. The new, more extensive VAWA passed by the senate includes some novel provisions, such as extending tribal jurisdiction to non-Indians in domestic cases (as opposed to state or federal as mandated by law), giving non-citizens access to government programs and benefits when they accuse men of DV, and extending DV protection to homosexuals. Naturally, where liberals and feminists are concerned, there can never, ever be anything wrong with such feel-good proposals.

I have little knowledge concerning federal law as it pertains to tribal jurisdiction, so I'll leave that untouched here (those in the know feel free to fill me in). As for the homosexual "protections," I'm astounded that gays would support such a thing, because precisely as many homosexuals who benefit from the bill will see their lives destroyed by it. When it comes to couples, VAWA is negative sum, because while it may marginally benefit some partners it tends to punish the other partner with a severity that outweighs the help extended to the one who made the complaint. Gays prosecuted under VAWA would be treated like straight, married men under the Senate bill. I seriously doubt they realize what they'd be getting into with that kind of legislation. In fact, gays should be thanking the House Republicans for holding it up.

What most rankled the Republicans, I suspect, were the provisions relating to immigrants — illegal ones in particular. The senate bill would have granted them visas, funding and a raft of goodies when they made DV accusations. This is what we call an "incentive to accuse." VAWA already offers American women an incentive to accuse, and accusations have become so common that you'll hear at least every other divorcing wife making them in family court. When I read a comment on Maddow's blog from a prosecutor who said it was difficult to get women to accuse their husbands, I had to wonder what world he was living in. I think it might be the world where you get paid more for prosecuting more men, because that's one of the biggest whoppers I've seen in a while.

So, if the senate version had passed, we would likely have seen a giant surge in accusations of DV made by illegal immigrant women, filling our courts (and jails) beyond capacity. Becoming an official "battered woman" would allow them to avail themselves of all sorts of federal benefits, such as TANF, SNAP, medicaid, social security and others that are typically extended only to permanent residents (i.e. citizens or green card holders). It may be true that most wouldn't ultimately obtain that status (VAWA visa claims already have something like a 65% failure rate, which suggests that they are mainly fraudulent accusations), but that doesn't mean they wouldn't try, and try a lot. Given how many illegal immigrant women we have in the country, this could be an enormous mess. It's hard to believe the Senate is so stupid and short-sighted that they'd suggest such a program with so little debate. It's also hard to believe that the feminists and liberals are so stupid that they are willing to blow what remains of VAWA's credibility – and fiscal viability – by opening it up to a population of some 20 million who, given the incentives, would certainly use it at a much higher rate than the rest of us.

Sometimes I get a bit cynical, and think to myself "why not give them enough rope to hang themselves?" But then again I do still have some residual patriotism, and there's nothing in it for me (unlike Mr. prosecutor, who rubs his hands in glee thinking about how this will guarantee his job security), so I ought to take a stand against it. However, the more I think about these issues, the less faith I have in the competence of our governing class, and the viability of the US as we know it. We have devolved into a howling mob that knows nothing more than political catchphrases, and hasn't the foggiest idea about what the real-world implications of the policies they promote could be.

Urbanism and Fertility Decline

W.F. Price · 3 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's easy to blame feminism for a lot of things, but data from Asia show pretty clearly that cratering fertility is more a product of urbanism and modernity than feminism per se. It looks like feminism is actually a symptom rather than a cause of many of these social trends.

Some years ago, I studied Chinese demographics concerning the one-child policy. A lot of bright people have put much effort into understanding the effect of this wide-ranging policy of forcing people to have fewer children. Unsurprisingly, many American professors are quite supportive of it. However, the honest ones admit that it has had limited utility, and has taken second place to trends that began years before Deng Xiaoping ordered it into Chinese law. The policy has produced brutality on a scale that is difficult for most of us to comprehend. Millions of abortions been coerced or forced, and from the looks of the streets of Shenzhen in the late 90s, where gangs of child beggars ran rampant, a lot of parents were giving "extra" kids away (or selling them) to avoid the fines. It may be that the explosion in Chinese prostitution in the 90s was partly a result of this. However, it's plausible (although by no means certain) that even more misery has been averted — this is the view that most environmentalist American professors take. Although I don't share their faith in such measures, I'll at least concede that it's an arguable point.

What many do not realize is that fertility was already declining when the policy was put into place, particularly in cities. Shanghai was the first administrative district in China where fertility dropped below replacement level, and this happened as early as the late 1950s. As China modernized, other cities soon followed suit. By the 90s, the only parts of China with above replacement fertility were remote rural regions where modern culture had made few if any inroads.

Today, fertility in China's big, advanced cities is among the lowest in the world. In Shanghai and Beijing, it is only 0.7 — under half the replacement level. Other Asian cities outside the PRC policy have experienced similar declines. Singapore is barely above that with a fertility rate of 0.78. Hong Kong has 1.09, and Macau 0.92. Tokyo is at 1.02; Seoul 0.92. All terribly low.

Political feminism has barely made inroads into Asia, but the women there are behaving in much the same manner as their Western counterparts. This suggests that it isn't feminism that effected the cultural and lifestyle changes in large metropolitan areas, but rather that feminism is merely a political expression of post-industrial urban culture — a symptom, not a cause.

If you think about the implications, they are quite sobering. We often hear about environmental sustainability, but rarely, if ever, about cultural and demographic sustainability. There is obviously something unique about the economic powerhouses of Asia, Europe and the Americas that has allowed the development of extraordinarily advanced societies. However, from the looks of it, they contain the seeds of their own destruction. Demographically speaking, they are withering on the vine, and where the people go the culture will follow.

It is this trend above all that points to a world in decline, and it doesn't look as though it will be possible to prevent it. If China's brutal, ham-fisted population control efforts only had a marginal effect on population growth, there is no eugenics program or natalist policy that will have any significant effect on advanced urban populations. As the numbers get worse by the year, it leads me to speculate about the late Roman empire, and wonder whether there wasn't a similar process at work there. Perhaps, as someone once said, it is the meek who shall inherit the earth.

Feminist Myopia Concerning Indian Violence

Featured Guest · 7 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Hans Laven

The horrible case in India involving the rape and homicide of a 23yo female student has led to worldwide campaigns demanding greater protection for women. The student was tricked into boarding a bus that was actually being taken for a joy ride by a group of drunk men who then beat her with an iron bar, stripped her, gang raped her and threw her out of the moving vehicle naked on to the street then tried to run her over presumably to ensure her death. The woman died in hospital some days later from her injuries.

The violence committed by the offender(s) was despicable and unworthy of human status. Although the safety and costs of the death penalty are deeply problematic, personally I would have no moral objection to a death penalty for one or more of these offenders if proven beyond reasonable doubt to have led or participated actively in this violence. I'm sure most in the men's movement will agree with protests by large groups of Indian women and men demanding that violence including sexual violence against women be properly investigated and prosecuted to the full force the law. I'm sure most here would agree also that Indian police and justice system deserve criticism and to be held accountable if they have been turning a blind eye to, victim-blaming, treating as unimportant, excusing or minimizing such violence.

One incredible aspect of this depraved episode though has been the apathy shown towards the female victim's boyfriend. Many news articles completely failed to mention him at all or to report on his injuries or recovery. Media eventually reported more on him but only because he had recovered enough to make a statement about the events including criticism of how police responded when they found the pair. From occasional comments in media reports we learned that this man was also locked in the bus, beaten with the iron bar, stripped, thrown naked from the moving bus and targeted to be run over. He was knocked unconscious, then he regained consciousness at some stage and rescued the injured woman from being run over by the bus they had just been thrown from. He was forced to endure seeing or being aware of the physical and sexual violence towards his girlfriend and this will undoubtedly cause him post-traumatic stress disorder and lifelong psychological damage. But who cares? Nobody it seems has cared a damn about him.

The protestors and world media have shown appalling misandry by focusing only on the female victim of this violence and disregarding the male victim. Seriously violent crimes were committed by a group of drunk men against both a woman and a man. Some articles mentioned that the man had also been beaten but his victimhood and welfare were almost totally ignored. The exclusive focus of the response to this crime has been on women's rights and wishes.

Such feminist myopia is more than simply a moral issue of fairness. The calls by many have been for responses unlikely to reduce violence whilst contravening important principles of justice, equality and social cohesion. Feminist-focused protestors and media have demanded special treatment of women complainants throughout the process of Indian law enforcement, automatic assumptions by police of the truth of their allegations, expansion of definitions of rape and sexual assault, 'fast track' justice for those accused of violence towards women, and much harsher punishments including the death penalty for such crimes against women specifically. Sound familiar? The Indian government now appears intent on introducing some of those measures. Many western countries including New Zealand have pursued similar approaches with little protective result for women but massive injustice towards accused men and a degradation of the status of men in general, associated with erosion of family, community cohesion and serious increases in antisocial behaviour and gang membership by boys and young men. Well, what do we expect? If we treat the male half of our population as undesirable, discriminate against men and show widespread disrespect for them while still exploiting them financially and physically, what have young men to aspire to in their society?

Laws in most countries already, quite appropriately, exist against sexual violence and usually provide for harsh punishments. If authorities are not applying those laws properly then that is what needs to be addressed. Encouraging reduced standards of justice, more gender inequality and increased state violence towards men can only be expected to result in violent attitudes. Ignoring, excusing or tolerating violence by women and towards men can only be expected to perpetuate a violent society. To reduce violence it will be necessary to encourage non-violence and respect towards all humans male and female, to show understanding and mercy regardless of gender, and to identify and address the real factors that increase the risk of violence. These are likely to include alcohol and amphetamine abuse, poor conflict-resolution skills, lifestyle stress, erosion of community, reduction in care and safety for mentally disordered people, sexual and relationship deprivation for males who are not alpha males, unfair family laws and loss of family. The ‘patriarchal power and control’ and ‘man bad, woman good’ models have misled us badly, causing western countries and now the rest of the world to misunderstand the causes of violence and to look towards false measures that ironically promote violent and uncaring attitudes.

The Seventh Seal

W.F. Price · 8 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

After spending more continuous time with family over the last month than I have in five years, I've been taking a breather for the last few days. It's great being with family, and I'll never forget how much I missed it when I was overseas, but it can be just as exhausting as work. More in some ways.

So, to ease up a bit, naturally, I watched a Swedish existentialist movie about death. The Seventh Seal (Det Sjunde Inseglet) is a 1957 Ingmar Bergman film starring Max von Sydow set in medieval Sweden during the Black Death.

I watched the film on the advice of a medievalist, who called it one of the most accurate depictions of the medieval mentality, which I find interesting due to its profound difference from modern attitudes and mores. Religious devotion and imagery permeate the film, and are often depicted in a macabre light, perhaps reflecting the prevailing mood during the Plague, which carried away at least a third of Europe's population.

The main characters are Antonius Block, a knight returning from a crusade, and darkest Death himself, who has come for the knight. To put off his imminent demise, the knight challenges Death to a chess match, hoping that he can accomplish something meaningful before his time is up. Death agrees, and they begin to play, making a few moves during each encounter.

In between the encounters with Death over the chess board, the knight makes his way toward his castle, meeting up with a family of minstrels along the way. The husband and wife team have a little boy, and a companion named Skat who performs with them. The husband, a light-hearted, nimble fellow, also happens to be a clairvoyant, and has religious visions. However, his pretty wife is skeptical.

Other characters include the knight's squire Jöns, who is a cynical warrior, a blacksmith cuckold named Plod, Plod's lusty wife, a servant girl whose entire village was taken by the plague, and a villainous preacher named Raval.

On the journey back to the castle, they encounter a religious procession, a witch-burning and other ominous scenes. Antonius, knowing the end is near, desperately seeks knowledge of God and any sign that there is some purpose to life.

I'll leave the story and plot for readers to discover on their own, but the existentialist theme that ties the ancient medieval lifestyle to ours with one common concern – the meaning of life – suggests that despite our advanced society and relative safety, we are living in times that are as dark as medieval Europe. Antonius finally does find his meaning, and accomplishes his one good deed before Death takes him. Despite his doubt about God and the afterlife, he finds purpose and value in the young minstrel family, and manages to spare them his fate. That family, symbolizing life and goodness, was enough for him to find some acceptance of the terror and darkness that characterized the world around him.

Today, one could make the argument that the systems we have created, and our human shortcomings, are as much a threat to what is good and meaningful in the world as the Plague was in those pestilent times. Politicians and activists uproot families, sow discord and profit from misery, consuming all that is beautiful and good like ravenous wolves. If death were to appear today, wouldn't he be different only in wearing a black robe rather than a dark cowl? As the innocent fruit of love is mowed down by a grim scythe, we hardly even bother to justify it any longer; that lust and greed are temporarily sated is enough of an excuse.

And yet as we look around, we ask "what kind of life is this, where those things dear to the human heart are devoured around us?"

As I reflect on the film, I see little difference between Antonius and myself — and most men for that matter. In our lives we make a desperate bargain with fate, trying to stave off the inevitable to create a sanctuary for the little things we secretly cherish, so that the inevitable loss will not have been entirely in vain.

Our Own Little Bolsheviks

W.F. Price · 9 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Continuing my respite, I've been reading about the Soviet Union — its prison system in particular. I picked up Aleksander Solzhenitsyn's Gulag Archipelago a couple days ago, and have been enjoying the read. The book is a weighty one, but Solzhenitsyn manages to insert a good bit of humor into an otherwise depressing tome. Most of this humor is a result of the absurdity of Soviet policy and the many shortcomings of the people who implemented it.

Archipelago is a real-life example of an Orwellian dystopia, but it differs in some key respects from Orwell's 1984. First, the party is characterized more by blundering fools and petty villains than any sort of ruthless efficiency. Rather than intelligent, dedicated inner party technocrats like 1984′s O'Brien, Soviet NKVD (predecessor to the KGB) interrogators were greedy, lazy brutes who were simply trying to keep their place in the organization and line their pockets with the least effort possible. Unfortunately for Soviet prisoners, the easy way for the NKVD to accomplish its objective was to obtain confessions by any expedient means. For stubborn prisoners – especially those who insisted they were innocent – torture was the norm.

Secondly, although confessions were happily used by Stalin and his cronies for political purposes, the real prize was slave labor. Yes, many, many people were shot outright, but the overwhelming majority did time in slave labor camps across the vast expanse of Eurasia. Sadly, few young Americans are even aware that slavery was one of the defining characteristics of the mid-20th century. The Nazis and Japanese made extensive use of slaves during WWII, but Stalin outdid them all. Stalin was, for all intents and purposes, the successor to the Asiatic despots who have ruled Russia from time to time all the way back to the Huns. He ruled over a slave empire that stretched from the Baltic to the Pacific; even from the Arctic Ocean to the shores of the Caspian Sea. Genghis Khan himself would have been impressed.

What is most depressing about the book is that it dawns on the reader that an awful, nightmare of a totalitarian state need not be created by some cabal of evil geniuses, but rather can develop simply as a result of base human instincts, such as greed, resentment and a lust for power. Following the Bolshevik Revolution, Russia was in a shambles. During the chaos of the 1920s, a sort of gangsterism prevailed, which resulted in Stalin's accession to power (not that Lenin was much better). The gangster lord then went about expanding his style throughout the entire Empire, enthusiastically supported by armies of thugs who were handsomely rewarded for brutalizing their own people.

Solzhenitsyn goes into quite a bit of detail about the early development of Soviet courts and law. Following the Revolution, over the course of little more than a decade, justice was entirely subordinated to the party and its organs, and for all practical purposes ceased to exist. It took some time to work out the details, but by the 1930s the Soviet penal system became an industry in its own right, and was kept functioning at the expense of other sectors. Even as people starved to death by the million in the worst famines in Russian (and Ukrainian) history, the prisons were well-funded and well-staffed.

The constant churning of the population as people were uprooted, displaced, arrested and exiled to Siberia was an important factor in Nazi Germany's early success in Operation Barbarossa, the 1941 invasion of the USSR. Without massive American material support in the form of trucks, locomotives, food, tanks, airplanes and huge shipments of steel, explosives and ammunition – over 16 million tons in all – Stalin probably couldn't have withstood the assault. Ironically, some of the hundreds of thousands of trucks (mainly Studebakers and Fords) we sent to the USSR were used by the NKVD as their infamous "black marias" for collecting prisoners. The Studebakers were also famous as the platforms for the mobile rocket artillery ("Katyushas") the Red Army used to awesome effect in battles.

Of course, when you abuse people to the extent Stalin did, there tends to be some blowback. A little known story of WWII concerns the hundreds of thousands of Russians – ethnic Russians, no less – who actually volunteered to fight for the Nazis, despite being treated like subhuman dogs in German POW camps, which suggests that Stalin treated them even worse than that (ultimately, he did — after the war, returning Russian POWs were routinely sent to be worked to death in Siberia for the crime of having been taken prisoner). If it weren't for the ideological constraints and small-mindedness of Nazism, Germany could have potentially overthrown Stalin with his own subjects.

Stalin's USSR serves as an example of the depravity to which governments can sink, and because it was very real, the USSR is a far more disturbing example than 1984 could possibly be. It should remind us that we must be vigilant in preventing anything similar – no matter how "limited" – from developing in our own society, but unfortunately that lesson has been lost on many.

And how do we know it has been lost? Because people are at work using the same methods the early Communists employed right here at home. Communism is set up on the principle of "equality," which is antithetical to the principle of "liberty." If we are all to be equal, we cannot be free, because individual choices have different results. This is in direct conflict with English common law, which was developed on the basis of protecting liberty (e.g. property rights) rather than equality (redistribution).

Second wave feminism was directly influenced by Communist theory, and it was second wave feminists who wrote and implemented family law starting in the 1980s. The Violence Against Women Act was also strongly influenced by these Marxist feminists (despite Joe Biden's fraudulent claims of authorship), who have little regard for concepts such as due process, rights of the accused, and so on. In fact, if you take a close look at the way family law has come to operate, it resembles Soviet law very closely. It is neither criminal law nor civil law, but some strange hybrid that purportedly "levels the playing field." In so doing, men are substitutes for the "class enemies" of the Communists — capitalists, bourgeoisie, aristocrats, etc.

Guilt need not be established for a man to be dispossessed, children may be used as hostages, detention without trial is frequently employed and a mere accusation is enough to remove a man from his home. In many cases, child support and alimony orders amount to debt bondage (a form of slavery). All is justified because women are seen as an exploited class by feminists, and efforts to rectify this cannot be hampered by "reactionary" (Futrelle frequently uses that term — shows his true colors) notions of due process, trial by jury, and presumption of innocence.

The most disturbing parallel, however is currently developing in our universities in response to rape hysteria. For a couple years now, universities have been setting up sexual assault tribunals at the urging of the US Department of Education, which is using Title IX as leverage to force compliance. These tribunals find a remarkably similar predecessor in the Cheka (later NKVD) troikas used to mete out extrajudicial punishment, such as summary execution or imprisonment. They were created expressly to avoid trials, which were impractical due to the need for solid evidence and other such reactionary impediments to punishment. Likewise, our own college tribunals were created for essentially the same purpose. On reading about them, one gets the impression that Russlyn Ali, who is responsible for ordering the "new standards," must have picked up the idea while reading about Genrikh Yagoda or another one of the sadistic villains responsible for implementing Stalin's madness.

Ali's new standard, known as "preponderance of evidence," is a farce and a travesty of justice. Any fool or liar can claim that there's a "preponderance of evidence" in whatever case he or she pleases. What preponderance of evidence really comes down to is opinion, politics, or just plain preference, and what man in his right mind would trust a university-appointed troika on sexual assault to be unbiased?

Christina Hoff Summers reports:

> "We will use all of the tools at our disposal including … withholding federal funds … to ensure that women are free from sexual violence," Ali told NPR last year. One such tool is the standard of proof that college disciplinary committees use when determining guilt. Many colleges employ a "beyond a reasonable doubt" or a "clear and convincing" standard. (Roughly speaking, "beyond a reasonable doubt" requires a 98-percent certainty of guilt; clear and convincing, an 80-percent certainty.) Ali, however, orders all colleges to adopt the > far-less-demanding standard of “preponderance of the evidence.” Using that standard, a defendant can be found guilty if members of a disciplinary committee believe there is slightly more than a 50/50 chance that he committed the crime. That standard will make it far easier for disciplinary committees to try, convict, and punish an accused student (almost always a male).

>
> [...]
>
> How did Ali and her fellow lawyers in the Department of Education manage to find in the Title IX gender-equity statute grounds for demanding colleges to adopt a “preponderance of evidence” standard? That is a mystery. Hans Bader, a former Education Department lawyer, says that nothing in Title IX justifies taking away an accused person’s right to a firm presumption of innocence, requiring clear and convincing evidence. Ali and her colleagues, he suggests, are “legislating through administrative fiat, in a way that is arbitrary and capricious.” And dangerous, one might add.

We might be tempted to write this off as more campus silliness, but even taken in context this is a chilling development. While they may not be executing people, detention isn’t all that far-fetched, especially when we have people in the President’s administration demanding that schools implement extrajudicial punishment measures with troikas that approximate the Cheka model pioneered by the Bolsheviks. That the current administration is trying to preempt investigations and trials in state courts is another issue here, and may well be a violation of the Constitution.

The US may not be the hellish totalitarian dystopia of the early USSR, but there’s no sense in allowing any one part of our society to resemble it at all. Whether they are found in the family or the university, Bolshevik standards of “justice” should be firmly rejected before they metastasize and spread to other institutions. Finally, feminists should be called out for what they really are rather than given cover by politicians and the press. They are, quite literally, tyrants who will use whatever method they deem expedient to accomplish their goal. As I read The Gulag Archipelago, I find quite a bit of material that is familiar in the contemporary world. It seems that even we Americans carry the germ of totalitarianism within, and we would do well to keep an eye on it and aggressively root it out where we can.

After Wife Receives Divorce Windfall, Berlusconi Calls Judges “Feminists and Communists”

W.F. Price · 10 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Although perhaps not too many people will sympathize with multibillionaire playboy Silvio Berlusconi, who is notorious for spending time and money on young beauties, it’s refreshing to see someone with a voice calling it as it is where family court is concerned.

After being ordered to pay his ex-wife nearly $50 million per year in alimony (she will receive four times the average Italian yearly salary per day), Berlusconi said the amount was determined by three feminists and a communist (is there really much of a difference?).

Hopefully, we’ll see more and more men come out and call it like it is. When the powerful begin to feel some of the affliction that hounds ordinary men in divorce, it suddenly becomes news.

Drunk and Pregnant, Woman Knocks Out Her Own Child

W.F. Price · 11 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The following story is really horrible if you're a parent. A lot of things that might seem funny suddenly don't look that way when little kids are involved.

A woman, intoxicated and pregnant, was carrying her toddler around in the cold rain with nothing but a pair of dirty diapers and a t-shirt — at 3AM! So, some man (probably a father) saw her and asked what the hell she was doing with the kid in that weather.

> At 3 o'clock on the morning of the incident, a man in the 3700 block of South 144th Street called Tukwila police after spotting Woldeab carrying her child, who was wearing only a diaper and T-shirt despite the chilly weather, a Tukwila detective told the court. Concerned for the child's safety, the man called out to Woldeab.
>
> "What the hell are you doing with your baby out like that?" he yelled.
>
> Woldeab broke into a run but tripped, dropping her daughter and landing on top of her, the detective continued. The witness approached Woldeab, according to charging documents, prompting her to shout, "Don't take my baby!"
>
> Woldeab then threw her purse at the man and raced into a nearby parking lot, where she dropped her daughter again, the detective told the court. She picked the child back up, but then tossed her into thorny bushes before stepping inside a gas station nearby.
>
> Tukwila police arrived to find Woldeab running onto Tukwila International Boulevard with the toddler tucked under her arm "like a bag," the detective told the court. When an oncoming car stopped to avoid hitting Woldeab, she threw her child through its open window.
>
> "The child struck the side of the car with her head and fell limply into an open window, partially hanging out of the vehicle," the Tukwila detective told the court. "The child was not moving or making any noise."
>
> Woldeab then jumped into the car and told the driver – a stranger to her – to drive away. The man did not oblige her, and the first officer to arrive snatched up the injured child.
>
> By then, the toddler had sustained several cuts and bruises to her face, and had a tennis ball-sized lump rising from her head. The detective noted the girl was also covered in feces.
>
> Having secured the child in a patrol car, the officer returned to the other vehicle and pulled Woldeab from it. Woldeab was handcuffed and arrested; police later found a bottle of spoiled milk in her purse.
>
> The child was placed in state custody.

This is about as bad as it gets short of killing the kid. And she's pregnant with another one…

The fact that she's pregnant presents a real dilemma for feminists and our courts. On the one hand, the courts are supposed to act "in the best interests of the child," but according to feminists it's "her body" to do with as she pleases. As for the toddler, of course that kid has to be removed from her, and hopefully handed to the father (if he's not in jail or also habitually intoxicated).

However, what about the child in her womb? If you let her out of jail, chances are she's going to get loaded again, possibly causing irreparable damage to the child's organs. So, if you want to protect the infant, the best course is to deny bail and keep her locked up until she gives birth. But that would be to deny her "agency," and after all it's "her body."

So where would a feminist stand in this case? What's more important, the woman's freedom to do as she pleases or the health and safety of the unborn child?

If I were a judge, I know what I would do. I'd order her locked up in a women's prison until she gave birth, then take the child and give it to the father, or if he refused put it up for adoption. It wouldn't be a difficult decision at all. But I guarantee that there will be some real legal drama over this case, because mothers – no matter how bad – are privileged in our society.

It's nothing for a judge to remove a child from a father, but take a drunk, abusive, train wreck of a woman, and they will bend over backward to try to work something out. It is this mandate that children must always be with their mothers that is responsible for a great many child fatalities.

In a sense, I agree with the mandate. It shouldn't be easy to take a child from a parent. But when the courts so easily and casually take children from fathers, including protective fathers who want the best for their children, yet at the same time go to great lengths to keep children with questionable mothers, it really gives the lie to the "best interests of the child" doctrine.

Quarterly Resupply

W.F. Price · 11 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Now that the holidays are over, it's time for me to make the rounds shaking the cup. I'll make a more detailed report soon, but a few figures for now to let readers take the site's temperature:

Unique page views hit record highs in late fall of 80,000 readers in one month's time. This dropped a bit over the holidays, but we are still at over 72,000 uniques per month (well above the historical average) despite the slower pace of content over the Christmas and New Year's holiday stretch.

It's a good trend, and encouraging for the site's future. I suspect part of the reason things are going well in that department is that I upgraded the server in early fall to a more costly dedicated server, because the traffic was starting to cause the site to crash on a frequent basis.

When content is flowing freely, the site tends to attract around 80,000 page views per week — a little over 11,000 per day. Add to this the fact that there are now almost as many new as returning visitors, and it indicates that the reach has increased substantially.

Alexa figures are decent, too, with the site looking like it will soon break into the top 100,000 again if trends continue.

Now, not to crow or anything, but The Spearhead did pioneer the style that is starting to launch men's issues into far greater public prominence than they were a few short years ago. Not only this site, but others are getting much more traffic than was the case back in the late aughts. Before The Spearhead, men's issues were essentially stuck on AM radio — pretty much off the radar screen as far the politicized masses were concerned. I can't take credit alone for changing this, but confronting the feminists head in an unapologetic style online with a site dedicated exactly to that and little else was my idea, and it worked. The name of the site speaks for itself — it was intended to lead the way in a focused, direct thrust through enemy lines:

> An armored spearhead (UK English: armoured spearhead) is a formation of armored fighting vehicles, mostly tanks, that form the front of an offensive thrust during a battle. The idea is to concentrate as much firepower into a small front as possible, so any defenders in front of them will be overwhelmed. As the spearhead moves forward, infantry units following in the gap behind them form up on either side of the line of advance in order to protect the flanks.

It seems that it worked. However, there is a weakness:

> The tactic is quite risky. A determined enemy can counterattack against the infantry on the flanks, thereby cutting off the spearhead from resupply and quickly bringing it to a halt. In order to avoid this the spearhead must move as fast as possible in order to keep the defense from re-organizing in this fashion.

If the formation cannot resupply, it will run out of steam and lose the initiative. So, if you want to see The Spearhead to keep moving forward, please support the site financially. There's still plenty of ground to cover before it reaches its objective, and it would be a shame to let up before finishing the job.

One thing I'd like to add is that we are still in the growth stage where men's issues are concerned, so helping one site has a positive effect on the others. Actually, this is true even when the sites/organizations oppose each other over one issue or another (something I try to avoid, but human nature dictates that it will happen from time to time). Despite impressive growth, most people have little idea that we exist, and there's so much material to be uncovered and so much work to be done that there are plenty of jobs for everyone. However, funds are limited — we aren't sponsored by either the government or major corporations like many feminist organizations. This means we have to rely on help from supporters.

Speaking for The Spearhead, you are getting far more for every dollar you give in support than any donor to a feminist cause would. Literally thousands of articles and hours of work have gone into the site, and all on a limited budget that wouldn't support a single feminist for a half year. This, I suspect, is how we'll win.

But we do need help to keep going, so if you like the work we've done so far a contribution would be greatly appreciated.

Thanks for your support

Bill Price

Support Options located on the upper right sidebar.

Boy Removed from Homeless Mother by Grandparents 20 Years Ago Found, Feds Considering Charges

W.F. Price · 12 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In light of the National Organization for Women's support for international child abduction, and the routine refusal of officials to charge mothers who abscond with their children leaving broken-hearted fathers behind, one might wonder why federal prosecutors are considering going after grandparents who removed a boy from his homeless, mentally retarded mother back in 1994 to raise him in a stable, loving environment.

There's no need to wonder, because this egregious violation of parental rights happened to a mother. When fathers' children are unlawfully seized and transported overseas, it isn't much of a problem, you see, because fathers have no parental rights — they don't matter. If the father is inconvenient, all you have to do is manufacture some lies about him and everything falls in place right and proper just like that.

But if it's a mother who suffers such an indignity – even one who is living with the kids in a car and incapable of taking care of herself, let alone a child – it's time to call in the heavy artillery. Nevermind what the kid himself – now a young man named Jeff Landers – thinks, a mother was wronged and that's all that matters.

Jeff Landers' opinion:

> For you people who jump to conclusions you should find out the whole story I was where I needed to be. My `grandparents' were in the the right I dont care what anyone else thinks.

It's a sad story of a boy who was stuck in a bad situation and rescued by his grandparents. It seems they didn't intend to remove the boy from his mother (they had custody at the time because the mother was living in a "group home" that didn't allow children), but when the courts got involved they could see the writing on the wall. They knew the kid would be turned over to the mother and in all likelihood have a terrible childhood, so they decided to give up all they knew in their lives to save the boy the fate of growing up with a hopeless mother. They must have really loved that kid.

> Investigators reopened the case in September after a conversation between Richard Harter, Lisa Harter's husband, and an Indiana State Police detective who attended the same church prompted another search of Landers' Social Security number after several others over the years yielded no sign of him, Muntz said.
>
> That turned up a man with the same number and birthday with an address in Long Prairie, about 100 miles northwest of Minneapolis.
>
> Indiana State Police then contacted Minnesota law enforcement agencies, which began investigating along with the FBI and the Social Security Administration.
>
> Minnesota officials say the grandparents — now living in Browerville under the assumed names Raymond Michael Iddings and Susan Kay Iddings — verified Landers' identity. They were known as Richard E. and Ruth A. Landers at the time of the abduction.

All's well that ends well. The sooner we throw these miscreants in a dungeon, the better for everyone, right?

Lingerie Football league to go “Performance,” Removes Sexy Logos and Uniforms

W.F. Price · 12 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The lingerie football league, which drew attention for skimpy outfits and sexy players, has decided to replace all lingerie with “performance wear,” remove sexy female figures on uniforms, and masculinize the players with bigger shoulder pads.

From the league’s announcement:

> “This is the next step in the maturation of our now global sport. While the Lingerie Football League name has drawn great media attention allowing us to showcase the sport to millions, we have now reached a crossroad of gaining credibilty as a sport or continuing to be viewed as a gimmick. In the coming years we will further establish this sport in the US, Australia, Europe and Asia as the most known form of American football globally. In order to reach the next milestone, we feel the focus has to be the sport and our amazing athletes”, said Mitchell S. Mortaza, Founder & Chairman, Lingerie Football League, LLC.
>
> LFL re-branding announcement also includes:
>
> -Performance wear replaces all lingerie aspects of uniform.
>
> -New design of logos removing any sexy female figures.
>
> -Redesign of shoulder pads to increase protection.
>
> -Brand tagline shifts from ‘True Fantasy Football’ to ‘Women of the Gridiron’

So, the chairman has decided to drop what made the sport appealing (to some) in the first place. Sure, it’s a bit of a fetish to watch women wrestle, play football and so on, but there are a lot of men out there who enjoy that stuff. Far more, I suspect, than women who enjoy watching other women compete in helmets and shoulder pads at a man’s game.

Maybe Mitchell Mortaza, the founder, thinks he can get a sinecure from the NFL and be set for life as the director of a money-losing league that can never be disbanded because it would be “sexist” to do so. That’s pretty much what the NBA has been stuck with since David Stern hung the albatross of the WNBA around its neck. And speaking of gimmicks, how is it more of a gimmick for women to run around looking sexy than it is for them to play at a man’s game? I thought that’s what women did naturally when given the opportunity. Who’s more of a freak: a female beauty pageant contestant or a female boxer?

I wonder why these guys can’t accept the simple fact that there just aren’t enough lesbians out there to sustain this kind of thing.

Rapographics

W.F. Price · 13 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Chuck Ross debunked an infographic some feminist made about rape and how pervasive it is, how rare false accusations are, etc.

The infographic is childish and stupid (like most infographics), but some pundits retweeted it as though it was a "sad commentary on rape culture" or something like that.

What stands out is that she suggests only 1% of rapists are jailed for rape.

If this is true, then we can extrapolate from Bureau of Justice Statistics that there are about 23,000,000 rapists at large. Actually, that would be an understatement, because that's based on how many are under supervision on any given day. Given that the convicted sex offender population under supervision probably represents less than half of all those ever convicted, the true number must be over 50,000,000 men, or about a third of the US male population.

So, if feminists want the additional 99% of unconvicted rapists they claim to exist jailed immediately, we'd have to increase our prison population in the US by a factor of over 20 (we currently incarcerate 2.3 million people). This would increase our incarceration rate, which is already by far the highest on earth at 754 per 100,000 people, to about 15,000, or 15% of the entire US population.

Assuming costs rise in a linear manner on a per prisoner basis, our annual expenditures on incarceration would have to increase from about 60.3 billion to roughly $1.2 trillion — about a third of the recent federal budget, and nearly half of all revenue. Indeed, it would probably be more expedient to simply shoot every third American male (but then who'd pay the taxes?).

The absurdity of the feminist argument becomes clearer every day, but as in some of the totalitarian governments of the past century, few dare to point it out.

Encouraging Divorce

Featured Guest · 14 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Dale

In Canada, a man has been ordered to pay $175,000 Canadian dollars (177,757 US$) every month to his ex-wife.

A $175,000 reward, renewed every month, just for divorcing your husband — what an incentive for divorce. Why do our leaders allow laws that bring about the destruction of families? Of course, many feminists would define "family" to include female-lead homes that are without a father, so I suppose they see this as simply replacing one family with another. Surely at least a small number of feminists would be honest enough to admit that children are better off with their father however. And if a child is better off with their father, then giving an incentive to divorce is obviously bad for society. Fortunately, in this case the children were already grown; the youngest is now 17. There is therefore no legitimate need for child support, especially given the ex-wife is now "earning" $175,000 per month. But that did not stop her from asking. How many females have seared their conscience by greed to such an extent that they can show this complete lack of shame? To be fair, perhaps she asked for child support before knowing how much alimony she could take.

What makes this situation even worse however is that they had an agreement regarding alimony, signed 15 years ago. The female judge chose to ignore it, thus encouraging other females to consider divorcing their husbands too. According to the article linked to above, the judge said:

> while the agreement may have seemed fair to Michael McCain when it was signed in 1997, over time it had become "unconscionable."

Funny, I thought the whole point of a written contract was to guarantee certain conditions and payments, regardless of future events. If I buy a car with a contract that says I will pay $500 per month for five years, then I must pay that amount. If I smash up the car and can no longer drive it, I still have to pay. If the car is stolen, and I therefore no longer have the benefit of the car, I still have to pay. I signed a contract. But, I believe in personal accountability for one's actions and decisions. The average female may lack this maturity.

The Bible certainly gives some hints in this respect, such as allowing a father or husband to cancel a promise or agreement a woman has given (Numbers 30:1-16). Since females are abandoning their husbands for the state (through welfare, affirmative action, etc.), from one perspective it makes sense that the new "husband", the state, would think they have the right to cancel her agreements. Of course, the Bible makes no allowance for this perversion; only a father or husband were to have this authority to cancel her agreements.

Insisting upon treating females as equals in all ways, but then also allowing females to be treated as foolish children who need to be protected by the state from the consequences of their agreements provides a foolishness encouragement to females to divorce. If she were treated only as an equal, she would be required to fulfill her obligations as wife and be punished (e.g. loss of the children and the use of the ex-husband's wealth) if she violated the marriage agreement or abandoned the family. If she were treated only as an immature person, she would not have the ability to decide to leave her husband while also taking her children away from the only mature parent they have. If she were treated only as an immature person, she also would not be able to take the husband's resources away, to be spent according to her immature decisions. Perhaps it is no coincidence that the Bible required that the family's wealth be given to the sons; the wife or ex-wife was to receive nothing on the death of the father. (And yes, children were to care for their parents. But the wealth was under the control of the sons, not the mother.)

Daughters also were to receive nothing on the father's death, unless the man had no sons. Even then however, the wealth was not permanently hers; as soon as she married, it was treated as her husband's property, to be given to his sons on his death.

When choosing to ignore the agreement, the judge also considered the excuse that the now-ex-wife may have been compelled to sign the contract; i.e. under duress. This is one point I can agree with, at least in principle. Unfortunately, the judge also mentioned that some experiences of the marriage “must have been very hurtful”. So what? If I feel hurt that I have to pay $500 per month, should my feelings therefore invalidate the contract? Including this nonsense in her ruling may have the effect of adding that as a valid reason to case law that will be considered for future cases. A lawyer would know better than myself the consequences of including this in the ruling. It seems to me that this encourages divorce by allowing females to claim “hurt feelings” as a way to expedite the divorce and get more money as a reward for divorce.

And by the way, this “unconscionable” contract provided that the ex-wife would be paid seven million dollars, plus be given the former family home. I am not sure too many mature people would see that as cause for distress.

Sometimes it is necessary to push a principle to an extreme before a person will see the foolishness in the principle. Surely alimony in the amount of $175,000 per month is sufficient to demonstrate the foolishness of our laws that give an incentive for divorce.

It seems to me that the best way to have strong marriages is to abandon our feminist laws, and submit to the unchanging family laws we find from God in the Bible. Given our “individual rights” culture however, the humility and submission this would require will be difficult for many. But do we really think that our way is better?

On a personal note, I wonder if the agreement between the man and his now-ex-wife would have had a better chance to be honoured if it had been signed before marriage (prenuptial). Should I be considering marriage even with a prenuptial agreement? And exactly how hopeful / unwise does a man have to be, to allow him to be aware of these laws that encourage divorce without cause, and yet marry without a prenuptial agreement anyway? And yes, when I was in my 20s I was willing, even eager, to do exactly that. So consider me as part of the problem, at least in the past.

Sometimes I just want to scream… or at least give up on the idea of marriage.

How The Online Dating Crutch Makes Single People's Lives Much Less Exciting

Featured Guest · 14 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By AI

A few years ago I attended an event organized annually by A. Schwarzenegger's wife – Maria Shriver. I distinctly remember how during one of her speeches, Shriver urged parents not to spoil their children by paying all their bills as long as possible, because, according to her, making your children too comfortable domesticates them and robs them of their drive and ability to survive and grow. It takes away both, their hunger and their ability to hunt for themselves. And, when the time comes to use their claws, they are not sharp enough to grab onto anything that's worth having, because they haven't been sharpened over the years as they should have been.

As I was listening to Shriver, I couldn't help but draw a mental analogy to how antibiotics hurt us by weakening our immune system when they fight the infections that our body should be fighting and winning on its own. Indeed, this is yet another situation, in which if you don't use it, you lose it.

Online dating has a similar affect on our ability to build exciting single and dating life for both men and women. While creating so many opportunities to meet so many people that you would have never met otherwise, the online dating world robs its users of the ability to meet people in real-life casual situations, and thus deprives them of the excitement that comes with approaching, starting conversations and flirting with people in cafes, bus stops, libraries and other public places.

Online dating is especially effective at robbing us of the opportunities to flirt in the real world because it attacks both sexes. The men are becoming far less aggressive. They no longer turn around and look at a hot girl when she walks by, and they no longer stare at someone they like to look at like they used to. Why bother? He would much rather open his laptop and send a message to 20 single women in an hour about how much he likes their profiles, and how much he agrees with what they have to say. However, the problems is that when a guy leans on the online dating crutch for too long, he becomes unable to walk without it – he becomes completely incapable of approaching and meeting women outside of online dating sites, even in situations when he should make a move and when it should be very easy for him to come up to a woman and talk to her – i.e. when she makes it clear that she is interested with her eye contact and body language.

Women, on the other hand, become far less outgoing and far less enthusiastic as a result of talking to guys on the internet. Why bother and make eye contact with the guys around and why look available and interested? After all, when she comes home, she is going to have 10 messages in her OkCupid inbox from 10 different guys, who want to talk to her and ask her out for dinner. She has no reason to hope to meet a guy the "Hollywood" way – at a grocery store or at a coffee shop . Therefore, she is completely dedicated to texting and wearing her headphones when she is out, eliminating any chance of having any kind of casual chat with the guys around her. She neither has interest in meeting guys when she is out and about, nor hope that a guy would approach her and would try to meet her, because, as noted above, the men became so passive.

Thus, it appears that there is no longer need for guys to be aggressive and for women to make themselves look interested and available. This takes the excitement and the rush of meeting someone new in person out of the picture, which is very sad news for the world of romance and spontaneity.

I wonder how quickly people would revert to their older ways, if the option of meeting people online was completely taken away from them for a few months. Would we see an increase in men's assertiveness? Would women make more eye contact with the guys around them and will stop wearing sunglasses and headphones everywhere they go? Would women stop texting as much when they are out and would make an effort to flirt with the guys they meet because they won't have that option on their computer?

Since online dating sites aren't going anywhere any times soon, the only thing that single people can do to simulate that kind of situation is to deliberately limit their use of the online dating sites, so that they don't forget that meeting someone new in the "real" world is so much more compelling and exciting. Limiting the use of online dating sites might just force you to take more action in person, and it will also remind you that meeting someone special at a grocery store, at a coffee shop, or at a bus is a fantasy that can come true, if you make yourself a little more available and assertive, and you don't block the world around you when you are out.

By PracticalHappiness.com – Practical Dating and Relationship Advice

Time for Men's Sanctuaries?

W.F. Price · 15 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've long liked the idea of men getting together and helping each other get by in life. As far as I can tell from reading history, it used to be a lot more common for men to do this years ago than it is today. Fraternal organizations, labor unions, VFW halls, sports leagues and at the extreme monasteries come to mind. I wonder sometimes what it is that finally broke these institutions.

Could it be mass media and home entertainment? Too many hours at work?

It's probably a combination of factors, but I tend to think women's presence has had a disruptive influence in male organizations, and the trend for the last 40 years has been to invite women into every male space. Today, just about the only places left that are "male-only" are gay organizations and some clubs run by the super rich, who have always been able to pay off feminists (it must seem pretty cheap to buy them off when you're a billionaire — Forbes does it).

So for those of us who are neither gay nor rich, there's nothing left to speak of, and that's unfortunate, because "brotherly" organizations have been a great boon to many men. They help men network, teach them skills, and give them a place to "get away" from the rat race, and sometimes the home. They have arguably been good for wives, too; men who can spend some time with the boys are probably less likely to be thinking about spending time with another woman.

The rising consciousness pertaining to men's issues may give us an opportunity to reverse the disappearance of men's spaces. There are enough of us now that the ridicule and insults that would inevitably surround such an effort wouldn't seem to matter much any longer. Women have their own spaces, often publicly funded, and there's no law that says we cannot create our own. Furthermore, "hooking up" is so easy for young men these days that I don't think the idea of getting away from the meat market for a while would bother them. Perhaps they would relish the chance to relax, drop the game and just enjoy some company in a brotherly environment before heading back out into the world.

For married men it would also be a great way to unwind, and singles might enjoy the company.

I think it's time for those of us who have the time and inclination to start thinking about putting together some organizations along these lines. And rather than make them overly political or ideologically based, I think the first order of business should be to simply offer men a sanctuary — a place where they can get away from the world for a bit and calm their nerves. No competition over women, no workplace stress: just friendship, some understanding and a little R&R.

Although most readers here won't need to ask why men sometimes need a female-free space, I'll explain for newcomers and those who may still adhere to contemporary convention:

Women are a lot of work. Even if you're not married to one, finding sex partners and dating is, as Game proponents demonstrate, a pretty demanding task (unless you pay for it). And even if you're a single guy with no interest in dating, simply working with them is hard. Women are very demanding and they expect a lot of attention — they admit as much themselves all the time. Having men run around for them is immensely satisfying to women, but it can be exhausting for men. After my divorce, I deliberately avoided dating because I knew there was no way I could handle women and my then toddler children at the same time — it would have broken me. I had to choose one or the other, and naturally I chose my kids. It all worked out fine for me; it turns out that even if you don't date women will find you anyway. But even if women may sometimes make your life more enjoyable, they very seldom make it easier.

Sometimes, people need psychological rest, a little space for the spirit to rise and lower pressure. For most men, an absence of sexual tension is essential for achieving the kind of peace necessary for this. It can be as simple as a game in the gym, fishing, some time in the field, or maybe an extended retreat. It's important for mental health and a sense of well-being. Having other men around doesn't always help in this regard, but it certainly doesn't always sabotage it, and sometimes men want some company. Most important, though, is that other men with the same goal can work together to create the kind of environment they need. They can also defend it from incursions, organize, and keep each other covered when needed. Working together with other men to create this kind of place is simply more practical than doing it alone.

However, throw women in the mix and it suddenly gets a lot more complicated. A sexual undertone emerges, jealousies arise for all sorts of petty reasons, the woman demands changes to accommodate her tastes and "needs," and next thing you know she's recreated a home, a singles bar, a nursery, a spa or whatever it is that suits her desires at the time. The men then start avoiding the place, and it all goes back to square one.

So I'd propose that men who like this idea start thinking about how it could be made into a practical reality. I like the name "sanctuary," but perhaps someone has a better term in mind. We all have our interests and personal preferences, so I'd recommend keeping it pretty basic. The most important thing is restoring our space. When we have that, we'll find ways to make it work for us just like we always have.

Game Theory and Divorce

W.F. Price · 16 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

William Press and Freeman Dyson (still going strong at 89, apparently) have come out with a new analysis of the Prisoner's Dilemma that explains a lot about what happens in divorce. The Prisoner's Dilemma game deals with betrayal and cooperation, and attempts to explain why cooperation might have evolved.

In a simple, one-shot game it pays to betray the other party, but when a sequence of games is played the results get more complicated, because the other player's strategy becomes recognizable.

The new analysis shows how a sentient player (one who knows the other player's intent) can consistently maximize payoff by "extorting" the other player.

> Press and Dyson derive a simple formula for the long-term scores of two IPD players, in terms of their one-memory strategies. Their formula naturally suggests a special class of strategies, called zero determinant (ZD) strategies, that enforce a linear relationship between the two players' scores. The existence of such strategies has far-reaching consequences. For example, if a player X is aware of ZD strategies, then she can choose a strategy that determines her opponent Y's long term score, regardless of how Y plays. There is nothing Y can do to improve his score, although his choices may affect X's score. This is similar to the "equalizer" strategies, discussed in the context of folk theorems (11). Such a strategy is essentially just mischievous, because it does not guarantee that X will receive a high payoff, or even that she will outperform Y.
>
> However, ZD strategies offer more than just mischief. Suppose once again that X is aware of ZD strategies, but that Y is an "evolutionary player," who possesses no theory of mind and instead simply seeks to adjust his strategy to maximize his own score in response to whatever X is doing, without trying to alter X's behavior. X can now choose to extort Y. Extortion strategies, whose existence Press and Dyson report, grant a disproportionate number of high payoffs to X at Y's expense (example in Fig. 1). It is in Y's best interest to cooperate with X, because Y is able to increase his score by doing so. However, in so doing, he ends up increasing X's score even more than his own. He will never catch up to her, and he will accede to her extortion because it pays him to do so.

This is applicable to divorce, because in most cases the female spouse is the "sentient" partner; she is more subjectively aware than the other "player," who might not even realize that he is involved in a game. It is very helpful that Press and Dyson have set X as a sentient female and Y as an evolutionary male, because it allows us to get a more accurate idea of how the game is played in real life.

No fault divorce, in removing punishments for betrayal, has given X a permanent advantage whereby she can extort Y, forcing him to accede over and over again to her great advantage. Y's only defensive response to being taken advantage of is to sabotage the game so that X will receive a lower payoff, and perhaps consider cooperation with Y.

> Another possibility is that X alone is aware of ZD strategies, but Y does at least have a theory of mind. X can once again decide to extort Y. However, Y will eventually notice that something is amiss: whenever he adjusts his strategy to improve his own score, he improves X's score even more. With a theory of mind he may then decide to sabotage both his own score and X's score, by defection, in the hopes of altering X's behavior. The IPD has thus reduced to the ultimatum game (12), with X proposing an unfair ultimatum and Y responding either by acceding or by sabotaging the payoffs for both players.
>
> Finally, if both players are sentient and witting of ZD strategies, then each will initially try to extort the other, resulting in a low payoff for both. The rational thing to do, in this situation, is to negotiate a fair cooperation strategy. Players ignorant of ZD strategies might eventually adopt something like the Tit-For-Tat strategy, which offers each player a high score for cooperation but punishes defection. However, knowledge of ZD > strategies offers sentient players an even better option: both can agree to unilaterally set the other's score to an agreed value (presumably the maximum possible). Neither player can then improve his or her score by violating this treaty, and each is punished for any purely malicious violation.

Marriage 1.0 used the "Tit-For-Tat" strategy to keep spouses in line, but that has been legally eliminated in favor of a zero determinant strategy that, when unrestrained, encourages extortion and sabotage.

However, if both players are aware of ZD strategies, they can agree on a preset value (e.g. prenuptial agreements). Unfortunately, for those who are aware of ZD strategies without agreements, the best tactic when confronted with a problem is to immediately engage in sabotage, because that will force cooperation on the part of the other player.

For the mindless Y types (typical husbands), X can consistently extort to her advantage in perpetuity.

> Extortion strategies work best when other players do not realize they are being extorted. Press and Dyson discuss how extortion strategies allow a sentient player to dominate an evolutionary player, who mindlessly updates his strategy to increase his payoff. However, this is not the only use of ZD strategies. Had Press and Dyson > kept their results to themselves, they may have enjoyed an advantage in tournaments like those set up by Axelrod (6, 7), in which a variety of fixed strategies compete. To test whether this is true, we reran Axelrod's original tournament, but with the addition of some ZD strategies (Fig. 1). We found ZD strategies that foster cooperation and receive the highest total payoff in the tournament—higher even than Tit-For-Tat's payoff. In addition, we found extortion strategies that win the largest number of the head-to-head competitions in the tournament.

This suggests that for men, avoiding victimization begins with foreknowledge of the nature of the game and the rival, and understanding of the fact that ZD strategies have begun to dominate marital relationships.

Once informed, the options, therefore, are:

1. Do not play the game

2. agree on preset scores and, as a last resort,

3. Sabotage

Number 3 is the least favorable, but it also happens to be the tactic that most married men would need to use, since they don't have prenups. What this means is that without some sort of construct that enforces cooperation on both players, it is always in the player's interests to not cooperate.

Example: she initiates the game by saying "I'm unhaaaapy, so you need to do this and this and this or I'll leave." This is pure extortion. The man may stave off disaster by acceding to her demands, but she will come out on top, and will be emboldened to repeatedly use the same tactic.

Rather than cooperate, the man should immediately say something like this (or actually do it): "OK, then I'm going to quit my job, sell everything and disappear, or you could come to terms with me and we could avoid that kind of mess." To prevent a pattern of extortion from occurring, the man must be prepared to sabotage the relationship every single time an extortion attempt arises.

The implications of the game in regards to marriage are pretty clear, and suggest that mutual interests are best served by controlling scores with prenups. However, it is also evident that keeping men ignorant of the nature of the game is possibly the best strategy for wives, because it allows endless extortion from mindless males. Sabotage is an effective counter to extortion, but because it incurs high cost on both parties it should be used only when extortion is initiated.

Big Oil Terrorizes North Dakota with Young Men

W.F. Price · 17 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For my entire life, I've heard about the evils of Big Oil, that industry that maliciously controls the world by forcing us all to drive cars, fly, use electricity and make things in factories instead of walking, riding animals, chopping wood and paying a lot of money for things like iron tools. If it weren't for Big Oil, I'm sure lefties in our major urban centers would all be content to give up the modern lifestyle and return to the family farm to shovel manure for the rest of their lives, but sadly they have been deprived of that opportunity.

But now we have another dastardly problem brought about by Big Oil — it is causing large numbers of young men to congregate in places like North Dakota, Wyoming and Montana. it is also giving them access to… Money! Oh, the horror!

These young men are interested in women, and sometimes try to interact with them. An advertisement featuring local Indian lasses being "leered" at by young men prompted the good people of our urban centers to react with shock and indignation. What savagery will the oil industry afflict us with next?

In all seriousness, it's disheartening to see that ordinary young American men have come to be seen as a "problem." Even more so that even the productive, hard-working ones are viewed with fear and suspicion. Of course there will be more problems when there are more young men, but the same goes for any other large group of people. I could easily write an article about the consequences of a sudden influx of young women. The title could go something like this: "New University Branch Campus Means More Young Women — And More Gonorrhea," and it would be totally accurate. But people wouldn't think it was a very nice or fair article. However, they recoil in fear when we talk about "young men." What a terrible problem these young men must be for society. Why, we'd all be better off with a nation of old people, babies and women. As soon as the boys hit puberty, they are a menace until enfeebled with age.

We live in a very strange society that neither appreciates nor respects its young men, who are our future. They are held down in school, in government and even in ordinary corporate jobs to make way for women, then they are blamed for being slackers. When they go out and bust their ass to make a living, they are a "problem." The only young men who get any positive attention are the few wealthy entrepreneurs like Mark Zuckerberg and the tiny proportion of them who are professional athletes. Ordinary, hard-working young American men are just a "problem."

It's pretty sick when you think about it. As I get older, I appreciate young men more and more. When I'm old and weak, I hope there are some of them around to lend a hand. I want them raising the next generation, making my country wealthy with their energy and creativity, and protecting our communities. I certainly know I won't be able to count on young women to do a damn thing for me at that point.

How Many Bureaucrats Does It Take?

Featured Guest · 17 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By BC Dad

Can pressure on the current government regime lead to meaningful change? Or is it time for the MRM to get seriously involved in the political debate at a deeper level? Consider this argument:

Individuals, people, are the only possible source of and justification for government.

Government by definition is a transfer of power from individuals and natural social units.

The transfer of power from people to government concentrates it (a little from each of the many yields much to the few) and enables government to reserve for itself a monopoly on the use of force against people.

The exercise of government thus becomes a matter of using force against people for the benefit of people.

So the question is then: which people? Who decides when government force is justified? Who are the recipients of government coercion and violence?

I've never had a problem with drugs. I've had problems with the police. ~ Keith Richards

The rationale behind the answer can be based on simple principles, on the idea that basic rights are inherent to the condition of being born human. Government's only purpose is to preserve and protect those rights for the benefit of the citizens who created that government.

Ideology, on the other hand, provides a rationale based on a desire to change the fundamentally flawed nature of humanity, to improve the human condition according to its own identification of the problem. By its very nature, ideology seeks to control, change, and eliminate the perceived source of the problem.

Examples: the monarchy is the problem, the wealthy classes are the problem, the patriarchy is the problem, inequality is the problem, capitalism is the problem, socialism is the problem.

People (including governments composed of people) are vulnerable to the (often admirable and desirable) suasions of ideologues.

Example: All women should be free from violence.

An ideology which gains the support of a sufficient mass of people also gains the ability to influence and adjust the policies, functions, laws, institutions and practices of society and government, including the use of force to eliminate the perceived problem.

Contemplate legislation such as VAWA. For more, read Dr. Stephen Baskerville

The people, desirous of utopia, largely support the influence of ideology on government, and participate in the pursuit of that ideology's rationale and outcomes.

The fact that totalitarian government, its open criminality notwithstanding, rests on mass support is very disquieting. Mass support for totalitarianism comes neither from ignorance nor from brainwashing. ~ Hannah Arendt

Ideology is thus the underpinning for the transformation of social government into the anti-social state.

See Alfred Jay Nock Our Enemy the State

Partial truths, propaganda and outright falsehood are part of the means used to generate public consent, means which are justified by the utopian ends.

Examples: 1 in 4 women are raped, women have always been oppressed by men, domestic violence is a male problem.

The process of scapegoating is a useful mechanism enabling ideological capture of the government's monopoly on and subsequent use of force.

Example: America's White Male Problem

The public supports and helps to justify the use of legal force to obligate conformity among society's villains and scapegoats, and to clear the path to utopia.

Never forget that everything Hitler did in Germany was legal.~ Martin Luther King, Jr.

Eradication of scapegoats and other opposition becomes a prime goal and purpose of government in ostensible pursuit of utopia.

Experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when the government's purposes are beneficent. ~ US Supreme Court Justice Brandeis

People who see a need for controlling others in order to gain utopia, and those who see an opportunity for power and wealth, and those with a penchant for control and violence for it's own sake, are motivated to gain positions of authority and are publicly honored, having the approval and backing of their government, their society, and their ideological leaders. The bullies come out of the woodwork and become state employees. It takes an awful lot of bureaucrats to kill 6 million Jews, 20 million Russians, 25 million Chinese, 800,000 Rwandans, and so on.

See The Soviet Story

The state thus becomes the enemy of the people; it becomes anti-social in the true sense of the word. Whenever the legislators endeavor to take away, and destroy the property of the people, or to reduce them to slavery under arbitrary power, they put themselves into a state of war with the people, who are thereupon absolved from any farther obedience.

~ John Locke

The courts, final protectors of justice and human rights, become the perpetrators of injustice and abuse, the opposite of their proclaimed function.

The larger society has already begun to believe the courts mad, and a society that does not believe in its system of justice is a doomed society. ~ Margaret Hagen

The greatest weakness of ideological government, i.e. the state, is that the use of violence against its citizens to forcibly hasten the onset of utopia does not in fact work very well, including in a democracy. Seriously investigate the War on Drugs, the War on Terror, the War on Crime, the War on Domestic Violence, or any of the other 'Wars' our ideological states are invested in, and three things immediately stand out.

1) the bureaucracies and legislation to deal with these problems never stop expanding, and

2) the problem is never solved and often gets worse, and

3) the (human and financial) costs of 'solving' the problem are often far higher than the costs of the problem itself.

You can't regulate evil. ~ Michael Moore

Government, once morphed into the state by ideology, is thus the ultimate weapon against, and the greatest destroyer of, life and liberty. The precise ideology being invoked matters not one whit.

Democracy is the theory that the common people know what they want and deserve to get it good and hard. ~ H.L. Mencken

Mass persecution, abuse and killing follows as surely as night follows day.

Insanity in individuals is something rare, but in groups, parties, nations and epochs it is the rule.

~ Friedrich Nietzsche

When the MRM calls on the state to solve its problems with yet more bureaucracy and more legislation, it invites further abusive state micro-control, further loss of social power, further constraints on human rights; all based on the obviously flawed notion that ideologically-based legislation and bureaucracy can solve every problem. The low-hanging fruit, the easy solutions which government could meaningfully implement, were long ago accomplished under 'government by principle.'

The ideological state absolutely cannot solve the problems of men; by joining feminism on that path, we increase the danger of tumbling down the rabbit hole.

Believe less, think more. ~ John Trudell

Kathryn Bigelow Explores Psychopathy in Zero Dark Thirty

W.F. Price · 18 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I watched Kathryn Bigelow's movie about killing Osama bin Laden last night. Although it is quite good, as an American with a conscience, I didn't find it a particularly encouraging or comfortable film. I heard conflicting accounts concerning whether or not the movie defends or criticizes torture, but after seeing the entire thing it's pretty clear that it's the former. The heroes, if you can call them that, make use of some pretty awful techniques, and there's no sense that any of them did even a bit of soul-searching over it. The message is clear: the ends justified the means. However, I suspect this is not the director's voice speaking (she approached the issue mechanically rather than enthusiastically), but rather screenplay writer Mark Boal's.

Although I'd rather not dwell on the torture for too long, it came off as essentially pornographic, which, given Abu Ghraib's house of horrors, is probably a fairly accurate depiction of the practice. The interrogator, who goes by "Dan" (played by Jason Clarke) introduces hero Maya to torture immediately. At first she's shy – a torture virgin if you will – but it doesn't take long before she's having a beefy officer smack her subjects around. Dan comes off as a vicious Irish gangster who looks like he'd be right at home on the streets of Belfast circa 1978, kneecapping people for the sheer fun of it.

Perhaps people who work in the front line of this business are natural sadists — I'm not sure, but in the film it didn't seem that compassion for the victims of 9/11 was what drove the agents so much as the "hunt." For foreigners who see the movie, I'm afraid Americans are going to come off as a bunch of psychopaths, which is too bad, but sadly that's the face we tend to show the rest of the world these days. The only major character who appeared to be a normal human being throughout the film was Hakim, a CIA officer played by Fares Fares. None of the white characters display normal human emotional responses given the circumstances, with the possible exception of CIA station chief Joseph Bradley (Kyle Chandler). Additionally, they swear like sailors, using filthy language constantly. James Gandolfini of The Sopranos plays the CIA director, further impressing on the viewer that the CIA operates much like a criminal gang. Although some may read the above as criticism, it is entirely possible that Bigelow's portrayal of these people is accurate — if a lowly divorce court judge can go home without any distress over removing children from loving parents, it is likely that people working in the CIA feel little to no discomfort over killing people, and may actually enjoy it.

As for the hero, she is a complete fabrication. "Maya" never existed. Some of the characters, however, represented real people. For example, Maya's friend Jessica, the woman who got blown up in Afghanistan by a double agent, was based on a real female CIA officer who was really blown up (she made a fatal mistake). However, there was no skinny young woman who took charge and personally sealed the deal with her dogged determination and force of will, but a lot of people who see the film are going to leave with that impression. Although the character Maya may have been the necessary ingredient for creating a major hit with widespread appeal, she detracts significantly from the credibility of the film.

Overall, despite the flaws, it's a well-made film. Bigelow is clearly a pro. The depiction of the assault on the compound brings the operation to life without indulging in any unnecessary fireworks. In fact, Bigelow was very clinical about this scene. The slow, deliberate nature of the assault added significantly to suspense. The emotional detachment of the SEAL operators as they despatched their targets was chilling, but after all it is what they do for a living, and I'm fairly sure that's how they approach these tasks.

I have to hand it to Kathryn Bigelow for doing a stellar job — the movie is well worth watching. However, it depicts Americans and our government in a far from flattering light, and leaves the viewer confused as to whether this is the kind of thing we ought to cheer about. Here, I think Bigelow leaves it up to us. Rather than agonize over the moral ambiguity of our war on terror, she simply leaves it in plain view, like a car wreck we can't help but stare at dumbly as we slowly drive by. It's an interesting approach, but far from heartwarming or reassuring.

Lance Armstrong Tells Oprah: “I didn’t feel like I was cheating…”

Featured Guest · 19 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Brought to you by Day by Day cartoons.

40 Percent of Surveyed Japanese Men Prefer Bachelorhood

W.F. Price · 20 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter Kyo, who lives in Japan, pointed out an article on the preference many Japanese men have for bachelorhood. We've seen a few indications of this, what with the "herbivore" young men who simply avoid women altogether, and the cratering fertility rate in developed parts of Asia. In a recent online survey of 300 male readers of "My Navi News" a full 40% preferred bachelorhood.

However, in Kyo's find the Japanese men are uncharacteristically frank — amusingly so as it turns out. The reasons they give for avoiding marriage are fairly diverse, but aside from the ones making excuses, they all appear to be saying something along the lines of "it isn't worth it."

Here are a some quotes from respondents:

> "Just looking at my married friends and how day by day they become more and more emaciated makes me think that I'm lucky to be single." (25, Creative Arts)
>
> "Hearing about the cruel way that some wives treat their husbands turns me pale with fear."(25, Creative Arts)
>
> "To me, married men just don't look happy, and the more time passes, the more this look of unhappiness becomes apparent." (36, Finance).
>
> [...]
>
> "Rather than having your wallet squeezed of its last dime, spending your earnings as you please has got to be the more appealing option." (24, Communications)
>
> "All your hard earnings, in the blink of an eye, disappear into the oblivion that is housekeeping!" (24, Medical care, welfare-service)
>
> [...]
>
> "From impressions alone, marriage means throwing your hobbies out the window." (25, Machinery).
>
> "Being tied down creates unwanted stress. To put it simply, being on your own gives you the freedom to do what you want when you want." (31, Machinery)
>
> "I like drinking and gambling but tying the knot would surely mean an end to all of this." (26, Real estate)

I get a kick out of the last guy.

So it isn't just the West. It appears that all advanced, post-industrial settings tend to create substantial aversion to marriage, perhaps because men and women truly are fairly equal in terms of status and jobs.

This leads me to a theory about why marriage doesn't seem to work all that well in egalitarian settings where there's little difference between what men and women do.

When you level out the roles and create confusion about division of labor, it turns out that men and women don't need each other much. Add to that the ease of obtaining extramarital sex, and there's nothing all that compelling about marriage. Finally, because men and women really are different by nature, when they don't rely on each other they often don't like each other much, either, because they have such different interests. That's a generalization, of course (some couples do have a lot in common and share common interests), but it's probably true that in non-sexual settings most men don't really like hanging out with women all that much.

The EBT

W.F. Price · 21 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Lately, I've been noticing a lot more use of the so-called EBT card, probably because I'd never heard much of it until a couple months ago. I knew there was a food card, but I didn't know the specifics. There was the young man in the gas station trying to withdraw cash with one, then someone who stopped by and tried to sell me premium steak, and when I said I couldn't afford to pay so much for meat he asked whether I had an "EBT" (that's the first time I heard the term). Just the other day, I picked up a pizza at a local pizza place, and noticing how empty it was remarked on the slow business. The manager said "it's because they've all run down their EBT money by this time of the month."

Maybe I'm naïve, but it's been an eye-opener to see how widespread the use of supplemental food assistance is. I must be a real chump, because when I was dead broke after divorce I made heavy use of my crockpot and subsisted on beans and rice for the most part, losing over 35 pounds in the process (sadly, I've gained most of it back). And here I could have been eating roast beef and artisan bread pretty much every day…

What's sad about this program is that the need for welfare at the level it's currently used is largely the state's fault. In order to prop up our "equal" utopia we've structured society so that working people are having a harder time getting by on a full-time paycheck even as their jobs disappear. Add the destruction of the family and costs are even higher. Working class people and below are now at the point where they really do need state support to live an adequate modern lifestyle, which includes a car, medical and dental, a place to stay and food on top of the rest. It didn't have to be this way, but here we are.

Any attempt to cut social costs is going to involve one of two things, or both:

1. We are going to have to drop the pretense of equality

2. We are going to have to cut people's support across the board

The implications of 1 are that people are going to have to settle for what may not be their ideal lifestyle. Enforcing an equivalence between a married mother and a single mother is very costly, and involves state costs for the father(s), mother, children, lawyers, social workers and jails. The EBT, section 8 and other programs are essentially a subsidy to single motherhood and illegitimacy. Family law is a subsidy to courts, jails, child support agencies, etc. The taxpayer foots the bill in all cases.

As an example, say a woman gets pregnant and has a kid with some babydaddy, their relationship falls apart or never was much to begin with, and the process begins. First, the court puts a child support order on the father. Often, he can't pay, or it isn't much. On top of the CS, his living expenses go up, and he is now unable to pay for necessities. The father, although he won't get nearly as much as the mother, will have to apply for some support in the form of medicaid and/or SNAP to make it possible to pay his CS. Or he'll potentially be jailed, costing the taxpayers another $30,000 per year or so.

The mother will not be making much with a baby or two, so she'll get WIC, EBT cash benefits, section 8 and so on. It all adds up to a lot of money, and in the meanwhile you've got to pay the social workers, courts and so on.

However, say the mother and father stay together. They may need some support from time to time – say WIC when the children are infants – but in aggregate it will be far, far less than if they hadn't stayed together. And in fact they will be eligible for less if they do stay together. On a very simple level, it makes sense: two-parent families don't need as much support, so they shouldn't be eligible for as much. But this obtusely ignores human nature. When you privilege one group of people with subsidies, the others will make efforts to join them.

Even well-to-do young families with income differentials between father and mother are beginning to get on the bandwagon. I know a young man with a good job, a wife, and a baby who refuses to get married legally because it would increase their expenses significantly. His baby's mother is in fact his wife as we understand the term. She's a good one, too, raised on a self-sustaining family farm by a traditional Catholic family. But if they get married legally her health insurance costs go through the roof, and they won't be able to pay the mortgage and other important bills. She works, but doesn't make much money, so she gets subsidized healthcare because she isn't 'married'.

The setup is totally counterproductive, as it's guaranteed that every dollar spent will only result in increased costs in the future, because the welfare system is structured to encourage people to pursue the most socially costly lifestyles. Not only does it encourage high-cost choices such as single motherhood; it actively penalizes people for making socially responsible choices. This is a disaster in the making.

Reform would be easy practically speaking, but politically it would be very difficult at this point, thanks in large part to feminism and the politics of female sexual liberation.

One thing I'd propose would be structuring welfare so that two-parent households had access to better benefits than singles. Perhaps cash benefits should only be granted when both parents live together with the child, section 8 only to two-parent households (widows exempted of course) and so on. All mothers and children should be at least fed, clothed, doctored and sheltered – we have enough for that these days – but that should be about it if they are single mothers by choice. Even if we gave more to two parent households than we currently do, it would amount to less on a case by case basis than both parents cost when separate today. Actually, it would probably be significantly less than one single mother costs.

On top of that, a two-parent household is better for kids by all measures, which means the kids are less likely to end up in jail or on welfare themselves. The stability of the home would be more conducive to productive work, would decrease promiscuity and its associated costs, and would soon lead to far lower social costs. It would be the right thing to do, so why not do it?

Sometimes I get so cynical I almost believe there's a concerted effort on the part of higher ups to keep people down by wrecking families, creating dysfunction when it's unnecessary and so on. But that's too complicated. The real reason it's happening is that some people can profit from this, and they have created powerful interest groups, such as our courts, the AMA, feminist groups, bar associations and so on to perpetuate the scam. It's all about the same old sins: greed (on the top) and lust (at the bottom). People find a way to game the system, consequences be damned, and they just keep at it as long as the getting's good.

At its root, the welfare system, like so much else that characterizes the US today, is just another enormous racket. Ordinary Americans, as usual, are the victims.

The Wisdom of Submission to Feminism

Ethical · 21 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On Roosh's new site "Return of Kings" a recent article "Why Marriage Can Still be a Viable Option" made the argument that for marriage-minded men the risks of what he and others call marriage 2.0, might be mitigated by "permanent expatriation to a society where Marriage 1.0 still persists".

Despite all the controversy the article generated in its comment section, I found its search for solutions refreshing. If manhood is believing we have ultimate control over the circumstances of our lives, we sometimes forget that part of having that ultimate control is understanding where we are constrained. It's only with this knowledge that we gain the power to free ourselves.

> the idea of marriage has not entirely lost its luster for many of us … quite a few denizens of the manosphere would still be open to it under the right circumstances … I know that I am one of them.
>
> Athlone McGinnis

As the author mentions the "right circumstances" are definitely not the west's savagely anti-male divorce laws which turn marriage into emasculating bondage at the whim of "the feminine imperative", followed by divorce slavery afterwards. Recognizing that he like other men who want marriage are actually being impeded from achieving such a key life goal, his simple statement is a tacit acknowledgement that leaving the cancer of feminism to consume society does have a devastating impact on both men and women whether or not we decide to do anything about it.

It's a welcome step forward from "Men's Rights" Has Become A Euphemism For "Sexual Loser" and shows a deeper red pill awareness is growing. It's also an encouraging development from the misperception of the manosphere as being full of fearful, whiny misogynists which I've heard from a number of men in the past.

> "So what's unmanly about the men's rights movement? … fighting for our own rights … Traditionally chivalrous men saw themselves as protectors and benefactors of the rest of society, and like the men who stayed behind on the Titanic, they understood that this sometimes meant we would get the short end of the stick. In fact, they were proud of it".
>
> Mike from Toronto, Canada, The Pussification of Men

> "our calling as men is to protect the weaker sex, and this carping against those we are made to protect is unmanly and contemptible."
>
> Bonald, Patriarchists should shun The Spearhead

Many of these same men dismiss any perception of misandry as unmanly since the dictates of manliness make any semblance of fear or weakness utterly contemptible, particularly what to them seems to be the manosphere's neurotic fear of some consequences of feminism they believe to be fictitious. I believe there are many more of these white knights and manginas than all the unchained men in the manosphere combined. Strange as it may sound, outside the manosphere the instinct towards white knighthood is probably so much more common among alphas than red pill awareness, and mangina tendencies so much more common than red pill wisdom among betas, that from their prevalence natural selection of beneficial behaviors implies white knightery and mangina betatude might actually have been more beneficial to society than the red pill at some point.

> "a female's … life is far more valuable [to society] than a man's … The number of babies that can be born is the same even if a large portion of the men die, while this not the case if even a single woman dies …

> [assuming] that women spend their entire lives … bearing and taking care of children.
>
> …
>
> Human society was geared to transfer all resources to women as this correlated to the survival of children … But in the modern era, women now only use 10-20% of their lifetime childbearing capacity … yet society is still programmed to transfer resources to women… In the meantime, all the work that keeps modern society running, is done by men.
>
> …
>
> the citizens who produce the most value are under attack, while those who receive the best treatment are the ones who no longer perform the primary task upon which this good treatment was delivered".
>
> This will change. Rather soon.
>
> TFH (The Fifth Horseman, author of The Misandry Bubble)

Perhaps for men as a whole (though I can't imagine it's ever true for individual men) those white knight/mangina traits still are more beneficial in societies where gender relations are less broken than they are in the west now.

Even in the west where gender relations are so pitifully dysfunctional and contrary to the broader interests of society, the general male rejection of any fears concerning feminism might not be completely unjustified. There's some truth to the saying that you get what you focus on. If for example having a wife and family is your dream, there's a legitimate argument that believing you have the power to achieve your dream despite any obstacle is a more likely road to success than trying to avoid all feminism's potential pitfalls. But at the same time the many horrific stories of divorce rape, paternity fraud, and false domestic abuse accusations clearly show the danger of some wet dream of self-mastery providing a false sense of safety from the extreme risks men face. Such blindness makes us predisposed to dismiss the need for men's rights without even taking the time to inform ourselves. We're helped along in our false security by the feminist censor's stranglehold on the mass media. Without reliable media getting informed on any given issue becomes as time consuming as taking on a full time research project. Faced with the inconvenience of finding out the truth regarding gender issues, the ease for most men of lazily accepting feminist mainstream media propaganda provides more than enough percentage points of swing in public opinion to fuel the passing of misandric laws.

But most men don't seem to feel threatened by any feminist laws. As men we're naturally fearless of what we don't know we need be cautious about. This is why awareness is our only protection. Because all the while we believe we are lions, before the might of the feminist state's cloaked system of media control, we are merely a blissfully ignorant crop of lambs. Until we hit divorce court or face criminal proceedings against a woman, the sweetly narcotic blue pill fills our mind with a beautiful illusion of our male power. It's only in court when we're bent over to have the red hot poker of feminism anally administered to forearm depth, that many of us recognize the truth for the first time. We are in fact slaves; only more meat for the grinder.

It took this ignorance and recklessness of masses of un-awakened blue pill men to achieve our enslavement. So considering all the former or current blue pill men who've been so complicit in our current condition, I welcome red pill awareness from any quarter regardless of any philosophical differences with whatever part of the manosphere it comes from. As an MRA I'm not bothered in the least for example with comments on the website like those below:

> Men's Rights Activists. The beta male is the biggest external threat to the manosphere, but MRAs are the biggest internal threat.
>
> Solomon

Regardless of such comments, the awareness that Return of Kings is spreading among young Game practioners can't help but eventually translate to a lack of support for further feminist laws undermining marriage and family, families some young men will always want for themselves regardless of whether men like Solomon don't.

> If you're like me and children aren't in your future, the possibilities are endless.
>
> Solomon

Young patriarchs whose vision of success in this world is leaving a legacy furthered by strong, healthy, and successful children know that marriage is the best environment to achieve this. They'll eventually see the truth that men like Solomon don't share the same goals. And though perhaps in far fewer numbers, they'll continue to find ways to achieve their vision of a family whose wife and children are blessed with a strong patriarch. After all men are natural risk takers. Even if divorce involved literal castration some would still take the plunge anyways. Consider that the mere challenge of mastering our bodies, our physical environments, and our minds is more than enough to make us men risk instant death base jumping, or surfing giant waves. There is no level of risk that will stop a few men from marrying if there's something as important as a legacy to be gained.

With our natural propensity for risk taking, articles like Athlone's should be an essential part of any red pill diet; as our recommended daily allowance of risk mitigation. His article sets the stage for more that's sure to come from the Game community on reducing marriage risk through expatting. They'll be a fitting compliment to the in-depth mitigation strategies we've come to expect from Dalrock, like recognizing how divorce risk differs dramatically between demographics.

Of course marriage risk mitigation goes much further than relocating to the third world, or even choosing wisely as Dalrock seems to suggest. There's much talk of Game itself as a marriage risk mitigation strategy which raises a much deeper question about the merits of mitigating marriage risk by adopting "alpha" behaviors vs. adopting "beta" behaviors.

In moments when my mind wanders WAY off the manosphere reservation, I've felt this nagging question growing at the back of my mind. I look around at the young men who've successfully come through the politically correct indoctrination of today's universities, I look at the men who've successfully escaped divorce rape by submitting wholly and completely to their wives, and it seems clear that the whole of western society all the way from early education, through academia, the workplace, and marriage, is becoming more feminized. I'm compelled to wonder: if the environment is highly feminized doesn't that mean that feminized men are more likely to thrive in it? Could it be that marriages involving manly alpha master of the universe types are actually more likely to fail in divorce? Could it be these types get divorce raped even harder? Then afterwards, if these men are more disposed towards demanding what they're legally entitled to in divorce rather than prostrating themselves before their wives and begging for what she deigns to give them, are they in the end only forced by the full might of the state into a more costly submission? I can't imagine for example that Kobe, or Berlusconi aren't alpha in the eyes of most. And both are rich enough to hire the best legal representation. Yet when it came to a cage match with feminism each was quite decisively choked out.

Few other men have the resources to even try such a direct confrontation. So playing the devil's advocate, if a man is able to live his entire life and die in bliss because he doesn't notice the bars all around his masculinity, might he not be better off? And if that same man's lack of desire to walk too far in any one direction prevents him from being yanked back by his choke collar, doesn't his self-restriction enable him to live quite freely?

Increasingly the entire educational system that is a gateway to the upper middle class is already a kind of feminization filter. Feminism might not only be less of a hindrance for men who've assimilated enough to pass through it, but in addition, despite the negative long-term impacts on both women and men in society as a whole, feminism might actually also benefit the specific demographics of women these men tend to partner with. In particular feminism appears to be a net positive for upper middle class white women. After all under feminism these sexually liberated women are able to better leverage their sexuality by hypergamously riding the cock carousel before they marriage until they trade up as high as they can, though some ride so long they misplay their hand. Then after marriage they're largely protected from divorce or separation unless THEY want it.

Feminism benefits them because the savagely anti-male laws don't prevent these upper middle class women from finding a husband as much the laws do for the lower classes. The upper middle class men they tend to marry have less to fear from divorce. Firstly upper middle class men face divorce less often. For an upper middle class man there are fewer men above him in status for his wife to hypergamously trade up to. Even if they do divorce, upper middle class men can more often pay the support levied against them and still have enough to live on. They aren't as likely to be completely ruined. They're probably also far less vulnerable to being imprisoned as a result of messy divorces when compared to working class men. After the dust clears upper middle class men might even have enough assets left over to be attractive to other women so they can find a new partner and start a new life if they so desire.

By contrast feminism so effectively discourages working class marriage it likely harms working class women more than it helps. Without two parents in the home the children will statistically fare far worse than would be the case with intact families. Recognition that single parenthood is difficult and is far less effective at raising strong children isn't helped by feminism's promotion of single parenthood as a lifestyle choice without consequences. Only irresponsible people don't know better. In this sense feminism might even be having the socially disruptive and dysgenic effect of creating an environment in which men and women who are the most reckless and least productive in society are the ones having children.

But at the upper end of the economic divide feminism is undoubtedly one of the factors creating an environment in which the upper middle class self selects for positive traits such as increasing IQ. This is ostensibly a benefit for the upper middle class, though in the sense that it's increasing the class divide, it still might be far more harmful to society as a whole.

However regardless of the long term social devastation feminism will continue to inflict overall, it may have been inevitable that we are now ruled by women and the white knight male leaders who in reality serve them. Teamism (in group bias) is a group having a high likelihood of expressing strong support for its members regardless of the rightness or wrongness of their position as opposed to a non-teamist group only supporting their members if they specifically agree with them. Psychological studies have repeatedly uncovered women's particularly strong case of this likely untreatable disease. When interest groups become involved teamism is revealed as a weakness of current representative democracies. Because any time there's a high differential in the amount of "teamism" displayed by one group (e.g. women) and other groups (e.g. men), the non-teamist groups will eventually be ruled by the teamist one. Until democracy 2.0 brings direct citizen involvement in government, eventually the law that governs western democracies will always naturally come to reflect the values of the teamist matriarchal ruling class which controls our media as well as our legal and financial institutions.

Given the importance of marriage as an institution to growth the economic implications are grim. Even in the upper middle class where marriage is less at risk, the power imbalance of matriarchal marriage and a man's decreasing ability to pass on property to his son's in this matriarchal society are among only a few of the factors disincentivizing would-be patriarchs from matrimony. The feminist infestation is growing without impediment and creating a matriarchical upper class that may shrink in numbers, but is ruling an increasingly disproportionate share of wealth and power in a west with ballooning debt. Yet still they dig in deeper. More and more feminist women are finding their way into the judiciary, the legal profession and even the police where they are cleverly inserting themselves into positions of absolute control over all disputes between men and women. In many cases these women reign completely unchecked. Worse still the fact that quite a number of these women are lesbians means any balanced perspective of heterosexual gender relations in families, not to mention the interests of heterosexual men, are almost wholly unrepresented. Seeing men as "feminist appliances" there is no level of hateful injustice these women won't take every opportunity to inflict on men. Expecting justice from them is a recipe for devastation. Imagine instead a klansman in charge of taking complaints from civil rights activists deep in the Jim Crow south and you've calibrated your expectations more appropriately.

All this begs the question:"if feminism is the natural working state of the west wouldn't it be better to accept it?" Well these feminist values are endemic to and appear to benefit only the upper middle class and above who rule over society. Being ruled by a distinctly different class of people with values and goals that don't benefit the masses has always had the potential to eventually produce an extreme backlash. It's a pattern repeated for thousands of years now, and the fuse might already be lit. Of course if this feminist upper class is only identifiable or distinguishable by its behaviors … if the overlords look like the people they rule, and if the system of control is invisible and powerful enough, then it's conceivable that one day the cycle of violent overthrow of tyranny will be avoided and permanent peaceful rule over us will continue indefinitely. Like Cypher, we'll be contentedly enjoying our juicy steaks in the matrix, neither knowing nor caring that in some unhappy extremist's views we are merely farmed humans.

But besides submitting completely to a feminist marriage on the one hand, and the strategies mentioned by manospherists like Athlone or Dalrock on the other, there are additional risk mitigation strategies such as going into marriage extremely defensively: trusts, renting and never buying property, accumulating multiple passports, keeping foreign accounts, hiding the details of those assets from one's spouse (not the same as hiding them from the court), and being ready to expat at the first sight of a family court jackboot. I don't have enough information to confirm I'd use any of these, but I do know that regardless of whether adopting feminism and submitting completely to a wife might provide more effective risk mitigation for today's men than any masculinist strategy, I reject supplicating to feminism simply because a life of emasculation is too distasteful to justify the rewards. And I add that although I appreciate the wisdom of expatting and might one day do so myself, even those benefits can only go so far. I have to ask whether given the effort of running from feminism, whether it's abandoning one's country, abandoning one's parents or bringing them to an unfamiliar environment where they'll live out the rest of their days disconnected, is taking up some small position in the political fight against feminism really such a burden in comparison?

I occasionally hear opinions echoing this sentiment that wasting any time on men's rights activism is an evil trap for men, such as in this glowing review of the book "How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World" that Roosh wrote awhile back. Now I'll probably still read the book because I never cast aside any potential knowledge. But frankly Roosh's review condemns the book as one more piece of writing telling us older "red pill" men, that we risk whatever happiness we can achieve on this earth by pursuing what may prove to be a futile attempt to change the world. That in trying to change misandric laws in a hopelessly feminist system we are quixotically tilting at windmills. We already know that in not accepting that our sons will be held in bondage by women who care nothing for them or their children, that we've willingly given up our freedom to disengage from a system that relishes in a man's destruction. But we also know that by managing our expectations the effort can be liberating rather than making us miserable. Furthermore some of us reflect on what the world would be like if everyone before us also believed that the impossible wasn't worth sacrifice, sometimes even dying for. And we wonder?

- if Rosa Parks had just gotten off the bus
- if John F. Kennedy Jr. hadn't braved entrenched power and inspired an entire nation towards change?
- if Galileo hadn't fought the religious establishment with his heretical beliefs
- if a man named Jesus hadn't given his life that every man and woman might accept the redeeming and healing power of his message, and in that acceptance become free from fear

All of these individuals changed beliefs that were entrenched for not only generations, but for the entire history of human kind before them. I understand the prudence in restricting our efforts to where they're immediately effective. But that limitation leaves no room to allow us to be moved by forces far larger than ourselves. I respectfully refuse to renounce my God given right as a man to fight for what I believe to be right and just. I expect there'll be consequences for refusing to bow. As a man I accept paying that price.

And I submit that rather than giving up his masculine power by trying to change the mindset of unwilling millions, someone like Martin Luther King Jr. was more of a man than all but a few of us could ever hope to be when he accepted his inevitable martyrdom and still hollered out from the mountain top of his precariously prominent and dangerously exposed social position: "I am not fearing any man".

Nevertheless a defense of man's power to achieve the seemingly impossible isn't denying the wisdom in gauging the potential effectiveness of an offensive.

> "If it becomes obvious that your current course of action will lead to defeat then retreat and regroup."
>
> SUN TZU, ART OF WAR

Just as defending man's power to achieve the impossible doesn't deny the wisdom of retreating from a direct assault against overwhelming forces.

> "When the enemy is too strong to attack directly, then attack something he holds dear. Know that in all things he cannot be superior. Somewhere there is a gap in the armor, a weakness that can be attacked instead"
>
> SUN TZU, ART OF WAR

Here the author cited in Roosh's review may have much to teach about survival given the war that gender relations in the west have increasingly become. The author is a clever rodent. Rodents are successful in adapting to whatever indignities thrown before them, and no doubt this rodent author has useful advice for all of us about the power we can achieve by disengaging in the same way he's used to effect his own escape.

But I suspect the words of a rodent hiding from his responsibility as a male, and his responsibility to leave a better society for his children, are words that won't move many to the very core of their soul or inspire many to greatness in the same way Dr. King's message did. While I remain grateful for whatever blessings I have in this world, and hope for the strength to crawl as a rodent where that is the only means of survival made available to me, I for one won't seek out this freedom of those who give up all they hold dear so that nothing can be taken from them. I'll take my freedom from my belief in the power of free will and a world of limitless possibilities, from the value of fathering children and giving them the benefit of a strong father, from the strength to accomplish what I set out to do, and from the conviction that right thinking men and women will one day receive the red-pill and other truths that we as honorable men bring in good faith. And even if they ignore it … we will feel secure in the comfort that we have discharged our duty. We will die as we have lived, as MEN.

Of course having respectfully disagreed with Roosh's review as men will do, and despite me coming from the position of admiring the contributions of Paul Elam his one-time arch-enemy, I believe Roosh is a valuable voice for young men faced with reproductive choices such as the world has never known. He's a lawless pirate and an irredeemable cad in the most admirable way, a trailblazer who unflinchingly speaks his own unvarnished truth about women.

But back to the focus of this conversation. Manhood is power within one's sphere of control. Dalrock and Athlone pointed out some great opportunities to increase one's sphere of control by mitigating marriage risk. For the blue pill men on the outside who believe the manosphere to be fearful, I say recognizing that in the west men must be vigilant for unpleasant, entitled feminists who are selfish to the point of making unworthy wives and mothers, is simply a means of maximizing one's own relative sexual market value. And to those inside the manosphere who have sworn off western women, I say increasing one's sphere of control is realizing that expatting has its own pitfalls such as becoming financially responsible for the entire extended family of a disadvantaged woman. Non-western women have their own dangers that come with not speaking her language or knowing her friends, family, or social environment well. She could be a loyal and hardworking gem, or she could be for all intents and purposes be an escort who despite all the time you spend turning her into a housewife will never be anything more than a heavy spending liability. On top of that men without the flexibility to spend time in a foreign land looking for a bride often rely on dating services. Whether in eastern Europe, Asia, or Central America those services are steadily gaining sophistication in fleecing men of their money and there are increasing reports of them being populated by opportunists. Recognizing that emerging economies which are less feminist are on the other hand also unfamiliar markets with serious potential pitfalls to be wary of, is not fearful but informed. The essence of becoming powerful within one's sphere of control is focusing on using the information at hand to seize opportunities out of this chaos.

To gain such mastery a man must be knowledgeable of his power, lacking a clear understanding of which he is at a severe disadvantage. Because women are rarely confused in this regard. The shit tests that evolution has given women are very effective at probing the boundaries of a man's domain of control. In my experience alpha behavior arises organically from a man feeling that in some sense he carries a "big stick" which establishes his domain of dominance, whether that big stick is easy access to other women, or control over other men. In marriage that big stick might be replacing her without devastating financial consequences from divorce if she fails to do her wifely duties. It might be a prenup that puts her hypergamy in check, or it might be defensively securing trusts or distributed accounts and owning no seize-able real estate or property. Whatever the case women have a natural sense that gives them "tingles" when that big stick is near. But a man often believes he carries the "big stick" in the relationship without even knowing what the real stick is. If he doesn't, chances are he's not holding it. And especially where very desirable women are concerned, emulating alpha behavior without toting the lumber puts a man in a position of vulnerability.

Having been found bluffing suddenly he's a victim story waiting to happen. Even "good women" often divorce frivolously and legally sodomize their husbands as by law they have the absolute right to do. The men that get away merely physically sodomized are lucky. True mercenary women who will enter into marriage agreements they have no intention of upholding inflict another level of damage entirely. They'll think little of robbing a man of his resources while freely using their sexuality not only to obtain more resources from other men, but seriously undermining their own husband's security and well-being in the process. Mercenaries among the "mail-order brides" brought back to the west can be the most dangerous of all. Feminist western governments are only too willing to join in and make an example of men who are victimized by these scamming women. When these mercenary women are done, the state is right behind them to fine, jail, or even beat a man into further victimization.

Knowing there is no certain escape from western feminism, no cure all panacea, is protection from walking into any situation naively, but it's always desire to seize opportunity not fear that must guide us if we are to claim whatever power we have to control our outcomes. And the truth of the opportunity before us is that without claiming marriage and family is for everyone, there is nowhere on earth where a gem of a wife can't be found by someone, and nowhere where some successful patriarchal relationships don't flourish. An understanding of key strategies for patriarchs is emerging. There is no need yet to join the blue pill men prostrating themselves in marriage before feminism as the only way to procreate. As the manosphere continues to evolve we will see more of these masculinist strategies by which a patriarch can still "secure his domain".

The Evolution Of Slavery For American Males

Joe Zamboni · 22 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

While at first glance this article may appear to be a history discussion, it is instead quite practical, and it speaks to the current conditions facing American men and boys. It discusses: (1) the markedly increased sophistication of modern versus ancient slavery, (2) how both the enforcement mechanisms and trappings of slavery have dramatically changed over the years, (3) why most American males don't recognize modern slavery for what it is, and (4) how men can stay out of slavery, or at least limit the extent to which they are enslaved.

Before we get into the details of modern American male slavery, let's define the term "slavery." A reading of multiple dictionaries will show there are many different definitions of slavery. This disagreement about the definition indirectly points in the direction that this article expressly points: most modern American males are slaves but they steadfastly refuse to admit it, or else they are so blind that they can't see it. Creating a through-line across these dictionary definitions, the common elements include: (1) the state of being inextricably bound to, or legally owned by, another person, so forcefully that the slave is required to work for the benefit of the other person, (2) being forced to work hard in harsh conditions for low pay, pay which is not proper remuneration for, or appreciation for the work done, and (3) being dominated and forced to submit one's own will to the will of another person. You might want to write those points down, because they are three ideas that you may want to come back to later.

The institutionalization of slavery is facilitated by the natural differences between people. The atrocious slavery-related crimes against black people in the early days of the United States were facilitated because these people had notably different body features than white people. The atrocious and largely unrecognized current crimes against American males are likewise facilitated by the fact that males are readily identified, and then consistently treated differently from females. When natural and inherent body features are not used to separate slaves from non-slaves, other mechanisms are used. For example, the Nazis used tattoos to identify and track the imprisoned Jews in the 1940s. The mechanisms to immediately visually separate slaves from non-slaves have a long history; the ancient Romans for instance marked runaway slaves with a human brand with the letters FUG (for "fugitivus").

The enforcement mechanisms and trappings of slavery that we traditionally think of, including whips, chains, shackles, and prisons, are for the most part no longer necessary in modern America. They are still used for the most uncooperative and intransigent of male slaves. For example, fathers who don't pay child support on time — even though many of them can't pay because they are out of work — are increasingly being sent to prison. When in Federal prison, 100% of the able-bodied men are forced to work, according to the Prison Policy Institute. Looking at the data for 2003, the most recent year for which this author could find statistics, the prevailing minimum wage was $5.15/hour, but the Federal prison workers were paid $0.12-0.40/hour. Minimum wage on the outside was thus 13 to 42 times as much as what these men were paid when in prison. As this differential in wages suggests, the prison labor program is tremendously profitable for the corporations (the true overlords) that use it, and that may have something to do with the fact that this system has remained in place since 1934. Even if most men who are behind in their child support payments don't go to jail, the fact that they could go to jail has a significant compliance-inducing influence on their behavior.

The possibility that men might go to prison if they don't pay child support is thus an indication of the first part of the definition of slavery provided above: slaves are legally owned, and forcefully bound to the mother of their child (at least supposedly their child, but lets set aside paternity fraud for now), so much so that they are required to work for the benefit of the another, in this case the mother. The conditions for these imprisoned fathers who don't make their child support payments, are also a reflection of the second aspect of the definition of slavery mentioned above: being forced to work hard in harsh conditions, for low pay, which is not proper remuneration. Some of these fathers did not want to have children, but their objections to having a child were legally and socially ignored by the mother. The result for these unfortunate men, is that they are (and this is the third part of the definition of slavery mentioned above): dominated and forced to submit their own will to the will of another. As you read this article, you might want to repeatedly think about the current conditions of American men, and how so many of those conditions, where treatment differs by gender, are in fact a reflection of at least one of these three aspects of modern slavery.

So whips, chains, shackles, and prisons are for the most part now unnecessary. This is because most men comply, and go along with the program that enslaves them. Putting women exclusively in charge of training boys facilitates the indoctrination of slaves-to-be. Making men who wish to teach and support children out to be potential pedophiles not only discourages such men from assisting in the raising of young boys, it also lets them know that the full force of the law (via false accusations) might come down on them if they persist in meddling in a woman's domain. Think about it: who in America does the teaching of small boys? Babysitters, teachers, mothers, grandmothers, and the vast majority of these people are women. Part of this indoctrination is to teach boys that they are not subject to the same rules as females. For example, males are informed that they cannot hit females, but at the same time they must put up with females hitting them. Young males are told that they should not cry, and that people don't care about how they feel, emote, or think; at the same young females are indulged and permitted to not only to cry, but to whine, and talk on-and-on about their feelings, emotions, and many other aspects of their interior reality. Later the laws are used to force males to bear burdens that women do not bear, and to pay prices that women don't pay. For example, only men are required to register for the draft, and if need be, go to war, and be maimed or die for their country.

Such a female-dominated teaching environment helps to reinforce the reality that a whole different set of rules applies to slaves (males) than it does to the ruling class (by numbers, primarily females). It should be noted here that females are not the ultimate beneficiaries of American slavery; they are only the secondary beneficiaries. The super rich, the high level managers at the large corporations, the major stockholders of such corporations, and the politicians that are lapdog servants of these super-rich people — those are the true beneficiaries of male slavery. The vast majority of American females are largely unwitting accomplices who have been bought off with perks such as the latest fashions and preferential treatment in divorce court. Many of these females continue to support the male slavery system because it clearly favors women, and allows women a bit longer to live in their egotistical narcissistic fantasy worlds where they can indulge, among other things, the feminist notion that women are superior to men.

Thus, we see that the female supremacist movement, or if you prefer the more common term, the feminist movement, has successfully been coopted by the power brokers in super-rich big corporations and government in order to enslave men. While the female supremacism movement has always rested on morally unjustifiable grounds (the exclusive blame of men for society's problems, fantasies like testosterone poisoning, claims about the non-existence of female domestic violence, etc.), it has become tyrannical and oppressive recently because it is now used as the moral justification for male financial slavery. If they played their cards right, egalitarian feminists (who truly focused on equality) might have had a future. But the female supremacist feminism now widely in evidence in America is on a self-destruct collision course with reality, and this is in large part because the latter theory has been tightly lashed-up with male financial slavery.

No doubt sensing that a change is coming, the male financial slavery enforcement mechanisms are becoming more and more stringent, cruel, demanding, and difficult-to-escape. For example, if American males don't register for the draft, when they turn 18, they will not be eligible to receive federally-provided college financial aid or federally-funded job training. Those men who do not register cannot be hired for a federal job. Young men who are not in compliance with draft registration may also be fined up to $250,000, and/or put into prison for up to five years. Many of the states also deny driver's licenses to those young men who don't register. If you examine the enforcement mechanisms for many financial obligations of men these days (alimony and child support being of primary concern here), you will see that these mechanisms have similar onerous draconian consequences if a man doesn't get with the financial slavery program. In the near future, the reader should not be surprised when those in power start committing troublesome men to mental asylums, as has historically been done by the Russians, as a financial slavery compliance-inducing mechanism.

And men are meanwhile told that this special service, this additional giving, which is not required of females, that it is an “honor,” that it’s just “what men have gotta do.” The cultural mantras surrounding these special male duties are intent on reinforcing this notion, that it’s normal and expected that men give, but that women do not. Take the whole notion of being a hero… when you think of that word, you think of a man — you don’t think of a woman. Hit popular music contains many similar notions. Consider the hit by Bryan Adams entitled “Everything I do, I do it for you.” A woman would not be singing a song like that. That’s a hypnotized slave’s song … the song of one who has given up all sense of self-determination. It’s reminiscent of the men who so strongly believed the dictates of chivalry that they willingly sacrificed their lives in favor of women and children when the Titanic went down. Just one more music example: consider the Shania Twain hit song “Forever and for always,” which contains the words “I’m keeping you forever and for always.” Those are words of a slave-master, telling her slave to just stay put, not to even consider escaping. Slaves have no choices about leaving.

So let’s zero-in on the enslavement mechanism: the financial system, combined with the notion that men must be the provider for not only their wives, but also their ex-wives, and their children, whether they wanted or asked for these children or not. In order to eat, put a roof over your head, drive a car, and otherwise obtain the necessities of life in America today, one must have money. The American economic system has been engineered to channel the survival needs of people, to lash those needs up with the economic system, and to compel people to act in certain ways in order to get money. For example, it forces men to get a job, and to work hard at that job, to stay in that job, etc., and this ultimately benefits the overlords, and also of course their accomplices, and here I speak of women. The economic system can encourage individualism and freedom (as having your own farm did some two hundred years ago in America). Alternatively, the economic system can encourage the concentration of power and widespread slavery (as was once done on Southern plantations with black slaves, and same general approach has been refined and has morphed into modern institutions like the military, coal mines, and factories — institutions where legions of male slaves work).

How one gets money can be, and has been, engineered to support, perpetuate, and make still more cruel the existing male slavery system. Take the expectation that all men must work as an example. With social approval, and legal support, women are given an opportunity to be stay-at-home moms supported by a man, be stay-at-home moms supported public assistance, be married women with no children supported by a man, be married women with grown children supported by a man, work part-time, or work full-time. To be socially and in many cases legally acceptable, particularly if they have taken action in response to the natural biological instinct to have sex with a woman and have children, then men have only one option: work full time. Free people (or at least secondary beneficiaries of the system, namely women) have choices, while slaves do not.

Said a different way, the economic system, combined with laws requiring men to support their wives and children, forces men to make money. If men don’t do that, then they are socially ostracized and called “dead-beat dads,” “slackers,” and “bums” (note that all these, and a variety of similar words, imply the man isn’t working hard enough). There are no comparable derogatory words for women who don’t work, or don’t work hard enough. This language of ours is part of the control system, it’s part of the indoctrination system that makes whips, chains, shackles, and the like largely unnecessary.

To get back to the economic system, the structure of the economic system is the most compelling mechanism used to force men to work in jobs that they hate, work in dangerous jobs that pay relatively well (such as coal mining and taxi-driving), to get the money to pay to people such as ex-wives, people with whom these men often have no current relationship, to pay people that currently do nothing for them. Why would men willingly do that? Go back to the third element of the definition of slavery, and note that slaves are dominated and forced to submit their wills to the will of another (in this case the mother, but the system also takes its cut, for instance in the form of a rake-off for the child support collection machine).

The language used to eliminate the need for most physical constrains on slaves warrants some additional illumination. A sophisticated system of shaming and female disapproval is used to get males to adopt an unnaturally unfair set of gender discrimination rules, and to work according to the slave program (marriage and kids notably). Words like “man up” are used to indicate that men aren’t acting in an acceptable manner, in other words they are not behaving like good slaves. There is no equivalent “woman up” phrase for women. A rigid, legally-mandated, and economics-supported role model is foisted onto American males, but there is no comparable rigid role model to which females must comply. For example, males must be the “provider.” Sure, females can elect to have a career, but many soon find that (contrary to what the feminists have told them) working is not all that much fun, and they would really much rather stay at home and take care of kids, or perhaps just not work at all in spite of the fact that they don’t have kids. Males from their very young years are told not to cry, and they are later told it is unmanly and unbecoming to complain. Males cannot change the male role definition without great difficulty and resistance from others, but females are invited to do whatever they want. Slaves are not permitted to redefine their role, because their role is already established, and if men were permitted to readily redefine their role, then those men would naturally seek to escape their slavery. This is illustrated by a so-called joke: “A man who concedes a point when he is wrong is wise, but a man who concedes a point when he is right is married.”

Modern society has built a sophisticated propaganda system that reinforces and clarifies the slave role for males. Among the most pernicious of these propaganda systems is the notion of romance (as described in advertising, movies, books, etc.). Men are told to place great emphasis on their feelings and emotions for females, to base their decision to get married, and have kids, on their natural instinctual attraction to females (assuming the men involved are heterosexual, and gay men are lucky because they escape this trap). Men are discouraged from thinking seriously about what this big decision will mean to any individualized plans that they had for their life. They are instead encouraged to drop all their personal desires and plans in favor of supporting their wife and family. They are told that to do so is “mature” and “responsible.” To abandon their own life plan, and be dominated by a woman, and to support her in the creation of the house and family that she wishes to create, all that is supposed to be what a modern man should do. Again, we see men being pushed to step into the slave role, and pushed to do this at a young age, so that they never have much of a taste of the single life, lest they get to liking that single life and then decide not to get with the enslaved-and-married-or-divorced-with-kids-enslaved-provider role.

Prevailing stories about romance reveal a lot about the slavery racket. The system harnesses a heterosexual man’s natural desire to have sex with and have a partnership with a heterosexual female. With this harness in place, men soon become pack animals expected to carry a heavy load (make a lot of money). Consider the way in which a man is expected to ask a woman for “her hand in marriage.” The whole process is set-up to look like it is such a big deal for a woman to say “yes” to a marriage proposal. The man is expected to get down on one knee, as if he is subservient (a foreshadowing of married life) and beg her to say “yes.” The reality is just the opposite. Men are not desperate for marriage. But a very large number of heterosexual women desperately want marriage and they are trying to get their boyfriends to ask them to get married. It is as though conceptual mirrors were being used, with the sexes reversed. In reality, women want marriage and kids, in large part, because these things benefit them far more than these things benefit men.

The widespread, largely female-dictated cultural propaganda that reinforces that it is noble and proper for men to become and stay financial slaves, is further indicated by the current attitudes surrounding abortion. Never mind that the Constitution says that the country is made up of “free men,” it should have said that it is made up of free men as long as you neither get a woman pregnant, nor marry a woman, and you are sure not to violate any serious laws (parking tickets are OK), then and only then can you be a free man. Getting back to abortion and responsibility for a baby on the way, a woman can choose from a much larger array of commercially available birth control systems than a man can, and if she does get pregnant, she is the one who has exclusive control over whether or not the baby will be aborted. The woman is also the only one who can unilaterally put the baby up for adoption, or simply leave it on the steps of a hospital (in some states) with no questions asked. The man cannot terminate the pregnancy or his fatherhood. It doesn’t matter if he was tricked by the woman — perhaps because she poked holes in a condom — he is still responsible for financially supporting her baby, and there is no legal way to escape this duty. Paternity fraud likewise is alive and well in many states, and the fact that this assignment of fatherhood to the wrong man can continue is a good indication that something nefarious is going on. The fact that a husband is, in many states, still by default legally responsible for paying support for his wife's child, a child born during the marriage, a child for whom he is not the father, and even when this is shown definitively via DNA evidence — that is yet another landmark revealing the contours of the financial enslavement system discussed here. The fact that, in many states, a husband cannot legally get a vasectomy without first obtaining his wife's written permission, is yet another contour of this same system.

What is happening in America, and the reason why a heterosexual man often has no choice about these matters, is that he is being biologically, psychologically, culturally, and socially pushed into financial slavery. Rather than whips, chains, locks, prison bars, and the like, the economic system is used to enslave him. Once he has a child with a woman, or gets married, or both, he is a slave. Irreversibility is a hallmark of slavery. When the slave boats forceably captured African people from the west coast of Africa and shipped them to America, the process was irreversible. You could die, and maybe you could try to escape, but the latter was very difficult and dangerous. Just as there were many pre-Civil-War laws between the states to return an escaped American slave to his or her master, so there are now many intricate legal mechanisms to force a man to stay a financial slave once this virtual point of no return has been reached.

Oh, sure you can get a divorce. But you will have to pay a lot of money. Perhaps you will even have to pay alimony for life (still legal and required in Florida for example). Look at who has to pay alimony. By far, it is men who have to pay alimony. Never mind if the wife is very smart, has a marketable skill, or is able to support herself, the husband is still expected to pay. Very very rarely do you hear of any wife paying alimony to her former slave, oh, sorry, I mean former husband.

The story about the system, that both men and women tell, claims that male financial slavery is the price of being with a woman, having children, and having a family. Enslaved men hardly ever tell other still-free men about the in-the-trenches realities of the slavery system. Because they don't share their experiences, except perhaps anonymously on the Internet, they do the still-free men a very great disservice. Why are enslaved men so quiet about this? Because, if these revelations were discovered, their slave-masters, or at least the secondary beneficiaries of the slave system (their "mates"), would come down on them very hard. Enslaved men seriously fear the consequences from females if they were ever shown to be revealing the male financial slavery system. Why do you think that male-only clubs and spaces are virtually outlawed these days? It's because enslaved men aren't allowed to tell the still-free men about the slavery system; the still-free men are expected to figure it out for themselves, after they have gone beyond the point of no return, when they are already enslaved. Not too far different from the old laws in South Africa, that prohibited slaves from congregating, in America we have feminist shaming and fits used virtually universally to prevent enslaved men from getting together and talking. Women and the slave-owners (the corporate and government elite) couldn't have that, because the enslaved men might riot, or scheme about how to break out of their slave conditions.

When it comes to modern American men, there are three events that lead to their slavery, and only two of them are things over which men have any control. The first of these is the fact that an individual happens to have been born male. Barring extreme, and for most of us out-of-the-question, gender reassignment surgery and hormones, being something other than a man is out of the question. But men still decidedly do have control over getting married and they decidedly do have control over fathering one or more children. When one honestly sees the system for what it is, aside from moving to another country that is far more supportive of males, the rational things to do, if one still wishes to have sex with women, is to get a vasectomy and never get married.

In summary, the American economic system is set-up to entrap heterosexual men in financial slavery. The strategy: take advantage of men's instinctual attraction to, and natural desire to be in partnership with women, and to have children, and use that to financially enslave men before they realize what's happening. Although it may originally have had the provision of needed support for the woman and her offspring as an objective, the system now is simply a process of squeezing men for all they can possibly provide. For example, alimony and child support amounts are based on the ex-husband's income, not on the actual needs of either the mother or the children.

Thus the American system is now an anti-male twisting of communistic slavery, or if you prefer, male financial slavery justified with just half of the communist credo. Rather than “to each according to their need, and from each according to his ability” the system gives “to women (and the largely-physically-absent rich overlords) as much as can possibly be extracted from financially enslaved men.” Note that women don’t need to account for money paid to them on behalf of minor children, and that child support paid by men need not in fact be used for the “benefit of the child.” The pretense of child support payments actually supporting children is now clearly eliminated; the system is now simply a financial transfer from men to women (and to rich overlords). This prioritization is also seen by the family law courts’ consistent refusal to enforce divorced fathers’ visitation rights with their children. The system doesn’t care about fathers, parenting, or children; it only cares about, and only enforces, what makes money (via soul-destroying jobs, onerous child support and/or unfair alimony).

Anyone who has any lingering doubts about the existence of an American male financial slavery system needs only to acquaint themselves with the existing laws that require male victims of statutory rape to pay child support to their adult female abusers. The notion that male children should be held financially responsible for the rape-generated offspring borne by their adult female abusers is beyond offensive. It reveals that, in the eyes of the law, males have next to no rights. Makes you want to sign up, right?

Will Hetero-Sexuals Line Up for the Fabulous New Benefits of Openly Gay Soldiering?

Uncle Elmer · 22 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Well that didn't take very long : as soon as the Pentagon allowed military personnel to be openly gay, same-sex couples started clamoring for off-post housing benefits and admittance to the "Wives Club", which will no doubt soon be named "The Spouses Club" to avoid confusions. I commented on one blog that in the near future taxpayers would provide military lesbian marital-partners with in-vitro fertility treatments, dual incomes, careers, and generous retirements, along with repeated admonishments about their "heroism". Looks like the future is here.

Back when I was on Ft.Bragg, soldiers were crowded into WWII-era wooden barracks built as temporary quarters meant to last no more than 10 years, but utilized by the Army well into the 1970s. When "marialitos" arrived from Cuba in 1980, the government housed them in some of those ancient barracks, and they rioted over the poor conditions.

But we made the best we could of it, and as military traumas go, that was pretty minimal. What I do recall though was the torrents of abuse the guys living in the barracks received from NCOs, which the guys living off-post were not subjected to. They just showed up to work like a regular job. There was some mild resentment of married soldiers who were granted extra pay and housing benefits so they could live off-post with their wives, and did not have to get flogged over dirty latrines or the trash cans overflowing with chicken bones and wine bottles. Otherwise we were free to "decorate" as we pleased, with Black Gentleman painting their rooms basketball-orange and "Crackers" papering their walls with somewhat clinical Hustler Magazine center-folds (for you younger fellows, back in the day we didn't have internet but relied on "skin magazines" for entertainment).

Single men could move off-post, usually with several other soldiers to share the rent. But even splitting the cost left little else from your paycheck. Lower ranking enlisted pay at the time was less than $500 a month, even with "jump pay".

Now, many of the female soldiers were lesbians, a tradition which endures to this day. The women lived in separate barracks and received no special treatment over the men, generally. And of course there were a few gay blades, but not flamboyantly so.

But all that is changing, and fast, as these "heroes" look to the media and politicians to step in and direct our military commanders to provide the extra pay and benefits needed to live together in off-post matrimony. While gay marriage is becoming legal in many areas, it is not yet recognized by the Pentagon. That barrier is sure to fall soon as pundits and politicos demand "justice" and "equality" for the brave gay troops. The effect on the morale of the hetero-sexual soldiers is not to be considered in the New Normal Military, because they're just going to have to get used to it.

So what's to keep straight soldiers from joining the party? Suppose you have two strapping hetero-sexual G.I.s, let's call them Murdoch and Kowalski, long known to be "butt-buddies" among their comrades (hey, we all had butt-buddies), who decide to "tie the knot" and get married, not because they are gay, but to get in on the generous marital housing allowance. With the extra cash and nice crib they could be real players with the ladies, so long as they keep up the front of a happy, gay married couple. Sounds like the plot to a funny-ass military sitcom.

The rest of the team would naturally join in: Rambo, Berry, Danforth, Ortega, Messner, Krackhauer, Colletta, Jorgenson. Openly serving as gay soldiers (heroes, really) while living closeted lives as "crypto-straights".

By Any Other Name — Masculist Erotica with a Political Edge

W.F. Price · 23 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Just before Christmas, I was contacted by William Rand, an American expat who has happily settled in Mexico with his Latina wife. He asked me if I'd like to take a look at a book he wrote, telling me it was an erotic novel for men. Although I don't have much experience with this literature, it piqued my curiosity, so I agreed. Having no idea what it would be about, I thought it might be something like a romance novel, a few of which I've glanced through just to get an idea of what they are like.

Boy was I wrong. There's nothing feminine about Rand's writing. His latest book, By Any Other Name, is suffused with male sexuality; it is every bit as graphic as the male imagination. It was a surprise to see those vivid images that run through a man's mind right there in words. It rivals some of the more obscure erotic oriental texts that sent shock waves through the Victorian world when they were published in English. It happens that one of my favorite historical figures was a linguist (among many other roles) who put a great deal of effort into translating eastern erotica. He was Sir Richard Francis Burton, the notorious British imperialist spy who snuck into Mecca on the Hajj, scouted Somalia when it was every bit as dangerous as today, discovered Lake Victoria with John Hanning Speke, and served in the Afghan war of the 1840s. Burton was a real man of the world and left a lot of written work behind, but some of his most treasured material happened to be of a sexual nature. Unfortunately, his wife Isabel burned a great many of his papers when he died, destroying many texts in the name of "Christian decency."

So I approach this material with an open mind, recognizing that it has value and is an important part of culture and the human experience.

What Rand appears to have done is create a distinctly American form of erotic literature. He draws from the different ethnic, religious and cultural strains of our society, creating contrasts of pleasure, desire and pain as well as guilt, resentment and deprivation. In the world he creates, true depravity is slavery, unfulfilled desire and hatred of natural male sexuality — not sex itself by any means.

By Any Other Name takes issue with much of what might be considered traditional morality in the US, comparing Latin mores favorably to the puritan values many Americans hold. The book also draws parallels between feminism and other supremacist – both racial and religious – movements of the past. Rand clearly sees feminists for what they are, and he pulls no punches in his portrayal of the brutal, repressive reality so many American men face today.

And yet, despite the strong political message of the book (Rand quotes political thinkers liberally at the beginning of each chapter), a man can easily lose himself in the erotic fantasies, the imagery and the heat of his prose. I suspect that women, too, might find themselves drawn in by the power of Rand's imagination, and it wouldn't surprise me at all if they enjoyed it every bit as much as men.

Not everyone will like the political messages of the book; feminists, naturally, will be enraged, but some Christians might take offense as well. However, if you're a fundamentalist Christian, erotica probably shouldn't be on your reading list in the first place. Even so, I think some self-reflection on the part of Christians could be a good thing, as it often seems as though sexual repression is higher on some Christians' (i.e. feminist Christians) agenda than the Commandments, which are routinely ignored in favor of ordering men to submit to thinly-veiled feminist dictates.

For sex-positive MRAs, the book is just right, as is its timing. I am amazed to see the alacrity with which Rand responded to the contemporary American atmosphere with a book that addresses so many of men's concerns. Despite living in Mexico, he has his finger right on our cultural pulse, and he didn't waste time in giving a diagnosis.

I look forward to more of Rand's virile prose in the future. Through his characters, he brings us liberated men and women, and it turns out that they are adamantly opposed to the feminist straitjacket imposed not only on our sexuality, but our society at large. It's a real pleasure to see that men like William Rand are adding their own voice to literature to let us know that yes, there is another, better world out there: a world without feminism.

Civilization and Cookie Dough

Featured Guest · 23 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Another good one from Chris Muir's Day by Day.

Subscriptions Reopening Soon

W.F. Price · 24 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'm in the process of running some tests and fine-tuning subscription software, so there may be an odd test post or two as I work out bugs and check out the permissions system (most likely in the feed or a tweet).

I'll let readers know when it's ready to go, and give everyone a rundown on what the new subscription option is all about.

Women Declared Combat-Eligible, Time for Selective Service Registration

W.F. Price · 24 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Leon Panetta has finally ended all misconceptions we may have had about women being the kinder, gentler sex: they are now officially equal on the battlefield. No more chivalry, no more going easy on them, and if they are enemies, no mercy. Welcome to the world of men, ladies!

However, they can't be fully equal until they, too, are forced to register with Selective Service, just like every 18-year-old American boy.

Selective Service remains a bastion of inequality and male privilege, and this surely must be rectified now that women are every bit as able to serve our nation under arms.

From the Selective Service System website, at the top of which are photos of happy, smiling young men, just waiting to be blown up:

> If you are a man ages 18 through 25 and living in the U.S., then you must register with Selective Service. It's the law. According to law, a man must register with Selective Service within 30 days of his 18th birthday. Selective Service will accept late registrations but not after a man has reached age 26. You may be denied benefits or a job if you have not registered. You can register at any U.S. Post Office and do not need a social security number. When you do obtain a social security number, let Selective Service know. Provide a copy of your new social security number card; being sure to include your complete name, date of birth, Selective Service registration number, and current mailing address; and mail to the Selective Service System, P.O. Box 94636, Palatine, IL 60094-4636.

Even today foul sexism and the evil patriarchy maintains an iron grip in certain sectors of government and society. Why shouldn't women also have the privilege of being eligible for the draft? Is it fair that men must always claim the lion's share of awards for courage in battle? Why, it's bad enough that all those "dead white males" got to write *his*tory for so long, so why should so many of the men blown up, shot or burned to death be festooned with stars, ribbons and medals when such a privilege and honor could be bestowed upon our poor, oppressed sisters (who are just as strong and brave, after all)?

Yes, it's time for women to register for the draft. If they are now just as capable of serving in combat, then it isn't equal not to include them in the draft. That would be privilege without responsibility, and we know our fine women deserve far better than that.

Masculinization of child care turns out to be good for kids

W.F. Price · 25 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I have started to think revolutions always occur some 40-60 years before we know it. That's because that's how long it takes for people to grow into positions of power. Hence Obama's unprecedented leftism, which is a product of the radicalism in the 60s and 70s as he grew up and came of age. The new Democratic left is something that was fostered back around the time the people in office were children or young adults, so although it seems "young and hip" to old timers like Joe Biden who were living and breathing that ideology as youths, it comes off as dated to me, and probably really just incomprehensible to people in their 20s and below.

With that in mind, I think it's a great thing that more and more men are spending time with their kids and teaching them male values and problem-solving techniques. Unlike most people of my generation, I, too, was exposed to this as a very young child. I spent a great deal of time with my retired paternal grandfather, who treated me like his best friend. To this day he lives on in my dreams and fondest memories. He probably influenced me as much as anyone to put all the effort I could into being an involved, caring father for my children. He was far from perfect, but according to what my aunts and uncle told me after he died I got the best he had to offer.

Today, more and more children are lucky enough to have some of the same. Fathers are spending more time with kids, and more than ever are at home with them. Although the Census Bureau suggests that only 3.6% of men are stay-at-home dads, I suspect that's an underestimate, because many men who work from home or who own businesses may be spending more time during the day with children than their wives, many of whom have conventional jobs.

From the Wall Street Journal:

> In New Rochelle, N.Y., at-home dad Bryan Grossbauer takes his children, 2-year-old Finn and 9-month-old Georgina, outside twice a day for yard work or a hike through the woods. He wasn't bothered when Finn recently picked a route through a big puddle and took a fall. "He walked back home happy as a lark, covered in mud," says Mr. Grossbauer, a former actor and teacher.
>
> He takes pride in pushing the kids to solve problems for themselves. Recently, Mr. Grossbauer stood back and encouraged Finn to figure out how to fetch a ball he had tossed into a milk crate nailed to a tree, just out of reach. After 20 minutes of frustration, and begging his dad to get it, Finn found a stool and retrieved the ball—a lesson in self-control and perseverance, Mr. Grossbauer says.
>
> His wife, attorney Erin O'Callaghan, says her parenting style is different. Leaving Finn's muddy clothes on the floor by the laundry room for hours "just doesn't bother him the way it bothers me," she says. Also, he lets the children "run and jump and climb and get themselves into precarious positions that I might not even allow," she says. She is also more "ready to get involved" when one of her children is frustrated or starts crying, to comfort and guide them to a solution.

There really is a very marked difference between how mothers and fathers treat children, and it appears that children need both forms of interaction. Mothers tend to infantilize children, whereas fathers encourage them to grow up and be independent. I suspect mothers are very important for psychological well-being, but fathers are crucial where dealing with the outside world is concerned.

Parenting experts confirm this:

> Kyle Pruett, a leading child-development researcher and co-author of a 2009 book, "Partnership Parenting," says Mr. Grossbauer's and Ms. O'Callaghan's differences, typical for many couples, can benefit the children. Dads' hands-off style tends to instill problem-solving ability, while the more engaged style typical of mothers often instills a sense of security and optimism, he says … Over the long term, having an involved father is > linked in research to better self-control in children, less risky behavior and better grades, says Dr. Pruett, a clinical professor of child psychiatry at Yale School of Medicine.

Unfortunately, access to fathers is often restricted to the upper classes these days, as working class and poor families are characterized by father absence, which should be considered a major national crisis. Intentionally separating fathers from children through policy is a crime in my book — one for which feminists should pay every bit as dearly as the deprived children and fathers. There may be grounds to bring it to the attention of the United Nations as a major human rights violation for which the US deserves sanction.

However, the fact that articles such as this one are appearing is a good sign. There may be a trickle-down effect as men of higher socio-economic status realize how important it is for all children to have a present father and begin to stand up for the rights of all American men in this regard.

Curiously, the author of the article managed to find one man who was bothered by not being included in stay at home moms' playground conversations:

> One father in the Journal of Consumer Research study lamented that when he took his kids to public parks, "moms would talk over me as if I was not even there."

Funny, but in all the time I spent with my kids at the park, it never bothered me one bit when the moms yapped with each other or on their cell-phones, which they did constantly; I was glad they left me alone. I'd just sit there in the sun reading a book, looking up from time to time to make sure the kids were staying nearby. Every now and then the mothers would initiate a conversation with me, often remarking on how well-behaved my kids were (other kids often made scenes and fought over toys, then cried for mommy). I'd tell them it's because I didn't treat them like babies — I expected them to work out their problems themselves, and if they couldn't do so playtime was over. The mothers acted like this was some entirely new way of dealing with the problem that they never would have thought of. To me, it seemed an entirely self-evident solution.

So, I hope that as more men spend time not only bonding with their kids but also teaching them how to relate to the world and others, we are raising a generation of children – boys and girls – imbued with positive, practical masculine values. It may take decades before that bears fruit, but if, as an old man, I see that I made some small contribution to it, I'll lean back and smile in my rocking chair.

Scandinavian Men Leaving Feminists to Themselves

Ethical · 25 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism loves heavy state subsidization like mold loves moisture, so it's no wonder that in the world's most extreme welfare states like the Scandinavian countries Denmark, Norway, and particularly Sweden, feminism is stronger than in any other places in the world.

But is a staunchly feminist country the best place for women? Women certainly seem to like it, though according to some that might be because the question of whether they enjoy feminisms larger consequences is too much of a logical leap to be within reach of her rationalization hamster wheel:

> The environment in Sweden produces women who are … deeply narcissistic and chronically unhappy.

No doubt there are some aspects of equality in Scandinavian countries that women there may not enjoy. Men for example treat them equally, exactly how a man would treat any other man … meaning roughly.

> Swedish men speak to Swedish women in ways which would be considered very unacceptable in other places outside of Sweden.

But there are also aspects the women certainly do enjoy. Like (at least according to some comments) the heavy government subsidization of their life choices by men:

> Economy wise: Swedish men pay on average 55% more taxes than females, but the average pay of men is NOT 55% higher. In fact, it's statistically been proven, that all things being equal other than gender, there is no difference between male and female earnings here.
>
> Most of the social care payouts go to females, and the general child care payout goes to females by default, not to both parents.

To say this feminist sociopolitical climate is disincentivizing is as much of an understatement as saying a bloody mauling and partial consumption of a tourist by a polar bear does not encourage pleasure hiking in Svalbard.

> The short answer is it quite bad for men and well liked by women as long as [you're] not too ambitious … for men this is a nightmare. Many laws are highly anti male and remove accountability from women. Speech which is not politically correct can land you in jail and bar you from employment. Your children can also be taken if your politics are deemed as not politically correct. The press is heavily censored and full of feminist propaganda.
>
> if you cohabit with a Swedish woman you will be lucky to get 4 or 5 years together (or even less) before she becomes bored with you and gets physically attracted to someone else and just leaves. Plus that 4 or 5 years will be one long argument because the women here are so full of themselves, full of anger too, and they always think they're right about everything. It's no wonder the divorce/dump rate is so high here. And another aspect is that because both partners have to work like crazy all the time just to live because the taxes and cost of living are so high it is very difficult to have a quality relationship and the temptation to cheat on your partner becomes too high … There are plenty of foreigners who have come here to get together with a Swedish woman and then deeply regretted it.

No wonder Swedish males are opting out of reproduction in such proportions and birth rates of ethnic Swedes are so far below replacement level. Inevitably someone else has to pick up the slack and provide labor as well as replace the population. In that respect the feminist climate and it's suppression of reproduction among the native population might partially be responsible for the heavy Islamic immigration and the negative impact associated with assimilating such a large influx of foreigners so quickly.

Some of reports of these negative impacts are astounding. Remarkably, there are stories of Muslim no-go zones where bands of young men enforce Sharia law and police are barred from entering for fear of their lives. Not that you could blame the Muslims for stopping the feminist plague from entering their neighborhoods after seeing what it did to their host country. In fact you might applaud the efficacy with which they're able to inoculate themselves. Because for all the fear mongering one thing is for sure: as a cultural containment Sharia law stops feminism cold.

But whether or not the reports of no-go zones are real or simply racist or xenophobic fear-mongering is difficult to tell. On one hand there is the heavily censored mainstream media. On the other there's the unabashed bias of the radical right wing; the only ones who seem to have the balls to brave the enforced silence and highlight these issues. Any of these right wing activists might be the deeply principled and unbiased free thinkers they say they are, but with the sporadic, unedited, and poorly funded news coverage they can muster it's hard to verify their accounts. Because by necessity they're unpaid amateurs, those who disseminate right wing coverage likely would never be able to publish their material professionally for pay in the main stream media.

> One of the reasons for this lack of response is a deliberate and pervasive censorship in the mainstream media, to conceal the full scale of the problem from the general public. However, I suspect that the most important reason has to do with the extreme anti-masculine strand of feminism that has permeated Scandinavia for decades

But whatever the truth, there are likely SOME serious issues with the integration of large migrant populations there. Growing reports point to increasing lack of safety for women. Feminism might actually have worked against women's interests in this regard because after being bullied to the point of being legally obligated to have to sit down to pee, and being made a laughing stock of in front of men around the world, Swedish men are not in the position (or perhaps not inclined) to be the white knights who will come to their countrywomen's aid.

> The male protective instinct doesn't take action because Scandinavian women have worked tirelessly to eradicate it, together with everything else that smacks of traditional masculinity. Because of this, feminism has greatly weakened Scandinavia.

Taking Sweden, which was recently called "the Saudi Arabia of feminism", as a measure of whether feminism benefits women, the answer may also be no for the simple reason that women have become so feminist the men of their country not only are disinclined to protect them, but no longer want anything to do with them at all. While the website boycottamericanwomen.com has been loudly denigrating American women as "the most likely to cheat on you, to divorce you, to get fat, to steal half of your money in the divorce courts, don't know how to cook or clean, don't want to have children, etc" and has been advising men to look for partners abroad, Swedish men have been quietly going about doing exactly that in such great numbers the trend promises to transform the entire country within a few short generations.

Scandinavian women marry abroad too, but whether by choice or by the lack of willing participants from other countries willing to submit to them, they generally only marry men from other feminist Scandinavian countries.

> When it comes to Norwegians marrying someone abroad certain trends have developed over the years. Currently most Norwegian women who marry from abroad marry from Sweden, Denmark and the UK. Most Norwegian men who marry from abroad marry women firstly from Thailand, secondly from Russia and thirdly from the Philippines.

Women from other countries of course are flocking to the rich and (they perceive) easily handled Scandinavian men.

> The import brides have clear reasons for their marriage choice: Russian women marry Norwegian men because of the 'Norwegianess' – meaning that Norwegian men are more domesticated than Russian men therefore Russian women have less domestic responsibility and more 'freedom'. South-east Asian woman marry Norwegian men because they want to up-grade their lifestyle and also use it as a means to support their family in Thailand.

Predictably Scandinavian feminists want to see an end to this practice of Scandinavian men taking foreign brides. Misandric laws make an ineffective choke collar for men who can just send a woman back to her home country if she becomes controlling, overbearing, or otherwise unpleasant.

> Through this study an unfortunate trend has surfaced. Some of these marriages have turned out to be a very bad arrangement. By Norwegian law a foreign spouse may be sent back to their country if the marriage hasn't lasted for more than three years.

But in the feminist's eyes giving any power whatsoever back to men forced to pee sitting down is terribly unjust.

> Some Norwegian men use this power to control their spouse. He threatens divorce, and in turn will send the import bride back to her home country, if she doesn't do what the man wants or the marriage has problems. It is known that if the marriage is disagreeable in the eyes of the Norwegian man he will divorce his first import bride, sending her home, and then, I quote from the documentary: 'they pick up a new younger wife from abroad if the marriage has conflicts'. Some of these import marriages trap women into a life of insecurity and service.

Particularly unjust, they feel, if the gentleman is older and offering his status and privilege to underprivileged foreign wives who give him their youth, beauty, and faithfulness in return.

> An upsurge in marriages between older Swedish men and young, underprivileged foreign women raises serious questions about gender equality, according to a new report.
>
> In a new 'migration by marriage' study, experts at the University of St Andrews found that over a fifteen year period there has been a 44% increase in young women moving to Sweden from mainly poorer nations to marry.
>
> The study also found that the poorer the country of birth of the migrant woman, the bigger the age gap between her and her Swedish partner – a finding that experts say raises serious concerns over such women's freedom of choice.

Swedish feminists may have to rush to insert a finger into this leaky dyke. Swedish men are now so keen on finding love abroad that Sweden may have the highest percentage of men with Thai wives in any country outside Thailand. But though feminists have not yet launched an all out assault, their rhetoric is beginning to sound like the beating of war drums:

> According to ROKS, current regulations make it too easy for men to start relationships with foreign women and bring them to Sweden for the sole purpose of taking advantage of them.

So getting back to the question of whether women would really like to live in an überfeminist state where feminists have free reign to create:

> … a vision of hell as dreamed up in the minds of the man-hating women who litter internet toilets like Feministing and who live in countries like Sweden, once proud nation of Viking warriors.

The answer seems to be that by the point things get this far men don't care. It's far easier for a western man to find a less unpleasant non-feminist foreign bride who will cook, clean, bear his children, and attend to his sexual needs, then get rid of her if she doesn't, than to tire himself out with the exhaustive effort of trying to house train a snarling native feminist. Scandinavian men may have been over civilized by the feminist laws of their respective countries, which by all appearances have had the opposite effect on Scandinavian women who have become quite undomesticated. But the former rugged Vikings appear to have gotten accustomed to his modern luxury. And to a civilized man looking to enjoy the comforts of his home in peace, snarling undomesticated animals still belong outside.

Are Nordic Men Really "Manginas?"

W.F. Price · 26 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A lot of people seem to be under the impression that Nordic men are submissive and strangely androgynous, but in my experience that's anything but the case. Above is a Knud Bergslien painting commemorating the Birkebeiners' perilous flight through the woods with the young prince Haakon Haakonsson, saving him from a rival faction trying to consolidate rule in Norway. I like the picture — it's a nice example of masculine childcare. I'm sure the two-year-old prince had a fun time on the voyage to safety in Trondheim.

Here in Seattle there are a lot of people of Nordic descent, and I happen to be one of them. Two of my great grandparents immigrated from Norway around the end of the 19th century and then met and married in Seattle. My great grandfather was from Trondheim, and my great grandmother was from Bergen. Norwegians liked Seattle because it's similar in many ways to Norway. Puget Sound is a long fjord teeming with marine life, there are lots of trees and mountains, and it's often wet and cloudy — just like home (although a bit warmer). Swedes and Finns seem to have preferred the Midwest, as that's more like where they came from.

So I grew up around a lot of old Norwegians and assorted other Nordic folks, many from the old country. I still see them from time to time when I go up to the ski club for a bit of skiing, and amazingly some of them are still going strong. There are 80-year-old Norwegian men (and one Swede who's pushing 90) at that club who put in 20 miles of skiing a day. They are tough as nails, and although Nordics have a reputation for being short on words, they are actually pretty friendly and can have fun.

One might ask whether they defer to women. Not as far as I can tell. Their wives come along from time to time, but they certainly don't act like a bunch of androgynous butch types. They seem pretty content with their respective roles. However, life has changed a lot back in the old country — these are old men who came to the US after WWII for the most part. Back then, with the exception of Sweden, the Nordic countries were in pretty bad shape. The war and occupation were devastating to industry and the economy. People were poor and cold. Reconstruction was the most pressing issue — not gender equality. So immigrants from that period were quite conservative. Like my Norwegian great grandmother who came a half century before, they were far more concerned with having a decent life free from want than they were with competing with the opposite sex. Ironically, that great grandmother, who began her career in Seattle as a hotel maid, ended up wealthy due to smart real-estate investments (seems the patriarchy wasn't all that effective at keeping women down in the early 20th century). But did she grow bored with her husband and dump him for an alpha? No, it seems that her only vices were occasionally gambling in Chinatown and perhaps spoiling her children a bit. From every bit of evidence I am aware of, Nordic gender relations prior to Olaf Palme were cordial, conservative and healthy.

So what happened? I think it's the same thing that's happening everywhere in post-industrial society, but it may have had more of an impact in Nordic countries because the shift was more severe. Living in northern Europe used to be pretty tough. It was not always a land of plenty — far from it. Just getting through the harsh seasons meant hours of physical labor every day. Chopping wood, feeding animals, butchering, milking, plowing, harvesting, fishing — the list goes on. The hard life over there is why the US opened its doors to immigration from Scandinavia; Nordic farmers were just about the only people willing to make a go of it in the northern Great Plains. And in the Northwest, their willingness to work hard on fishing and whaling boats and in the woods in logging operations made them attractive hires. Even as recently as the 1950s and 60s, many Scandinavian neighborhoods were working class ghettoes that Anglo Americans wouldn't deign to live in. In Seattle, all that remains is Fishermen's Terminal, where poor fishermen still live on boats in the off-season, but the SWPL scum are hard at work trying to get rid of them, too.

Thanks to natural resources, technology and a strong native work ethic, over the last 50 years the Nordic countries have transformed from relatively poor northern backwaters to some of the wealthiest societies on earth. This has led to profound changes in day to day life, and as always that makes a big difference in social behavior. Men no longer need to plow fields and chop wood, and women no longer need to tend the fire, milk the cows and handle heavy iron cookware. There's far more leisure time, and gender roles just aren't clear any longer. In the Nordic countries, this made a much bigger difference than it did in warmer, more forgiving climes such as the Mediterranean region and most of East Asia. I am convinced that the reason there's so much gender weirdness in Scandinavia and Finland is that the changes there as a result of the modern lifestyle have been more profound.

But still, as I've heard from some Scandinavians, and seen for myself up at the cabin in the mountains, when you put the Nordic people back in their natural, traditional environment, things have a way of going back to normal very quickly.

State Sponsored Child Acquisition

Featured Guest · 27 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Pugs Fugly

My older brother has gotten around over the years. His life reads like a billboard for unintended consequences and pervasive irresponsibility.

A few months back, he got what has become for him a familiar letter: a court ordered paternity test. I should mention that he's gotten about ten of these over the years, but only two of them turned out to be his. I've always wondered about the other eight. Did they ever find that child's biological father? How many other guys had to offer up their DNA for those children at the same time my brother was forced to?

He's in prison, 1,700 miles away, and finds out he has a one year-old daughter. In this reprehensible culture, a woman can apparently go through an entire pregnancy, delivery, and early motherhood without ever having to cop to who the father of her child is, assuming she has a reasonable guesstimate. I can't attest to the veracity of those talk shows where there's one mother, one child, and nine or ten different possibles for the father, but seeing what my brother's been through over the years, it wouldn't surprise me. I would imagine the most difficult part about rounding up names for the Attorney General's office would be remembering them.

It almost makes me feel sorry for these ladies. I mean, how many one-night-stands is a girl supposed to be able to keep track of over the short window of time that she can become pregnant? Five? Ten? Getting the first and last names, not to mention contact information, for every Tom, Dick, and Harry you drunkenly stumble home from the club with is asking entirely too much.

Then the state decides to stop giving them free stuff. In every case, including the ones that weren't his, we weren't dealing with an newborn or an infant, but a toddler. That's nine months of pregnancy plus two or more years that the child in question went with a blank space on their birth certificate while their mother soaked up entitlements like a dank, smelly kitchen sponge. It's only when the overburdened bureaucracy gets around to reviewing the bottomless bucket-loads of free food, medical care, and housing they've been blindly throwing at these women that positively identifying their child's father becomes a priority to them. For if they don't, the entitlements cease. So they begin the mental calesthenics necessary to remember who and when and how many times, and in at least one case, sent out half a dozen court orders demanding DNA.

It's amazing to me that the dialogue about dead-beat dads is always turned up to 11, but we almost never hear anything about these women who shirk responsiblity and milk the system while keeping their baby-daddy's identity a secret, usually either out of shame, or some half-assed reasoning about "not wanting him involved"…because while he was good enough to have reckless sex with, he's not good enough to even be made aware that he's a father. Our side of field is flush with stories of men getting billed for a decade of child support for a child they didn't even know existed, but the same agency enforcing it does nothing to hold these mothers accountable for why they kept their little bundle of joy under the radar for so long.

His new daughter was a different story. The state stepped in and permanently terminated her mother's rights for incessant crack-headism. This little girl is one of seven children the state has removed from this woman's custody by force. No one is suggesting that the state force her to get a tubal-ligation. No one is suggesting that she be issued some kind of mandatory birth-control. In spite of a lifetime of making the worst possible choices, over and over again, no one is suggesting that the state interfere with her right to choose. She can continue having children until the coffers run dry, and then maybe have a couple more for good measure.

My niece was in foster-care limbo for a few months while they worked out the adoption process, but she's here now, safe and sound. Happy, adorable, and getting along splendidly with my own daughter, despite their being two years apart.

It's a Pyrrhic victory of sorts. We get to raise this child without any interference from her mother or the state, but my brother is now a felon and will have to be a registered sex offender when he gets out, which means he can never live at the same residence as his own child. All because of one woman's lies, and another woman's omission.

It isn't that some women lie about rape or paternity. It's that they aren't often held accountable when they do. Men are held accountable, financially and morally, for children they didn't know about. I'd like to believe that most men, if they'd been made aware, would do the right thing. But it's impossible to be a father to a child whose existence is deliberately kept secret from you. We weren't given choice, and because of that, we missed out on the first two years of this little girl's life.

I'm writing about it because it's the second time in six months that the state has handed me, a man, custody of a child over the child's mother. Whether this is objective decency on the part of the court, or the beginning of a shifting trend, I can't say. But I hope it's both.

Subscriptions: What's New

W.F. Price · 27 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've wanted to set up an automated subscription system that works smoothly for a long time now, and finally I've found both the time and the means (and the server capacity) to do so.

One of the main reasons I wanted subscriptions was so that I could offer something extra to those supporting the site. As it is today, they get little more than someone browsing from search engine results, and that just doesn't seem right, because without them this site would be dead in the water.

So, a few of the features I'm going to offer supporters include exclusive content, access to deals on other media provided by me and others, and the ability to comment unmoderated and vote on comments. I particularly want to give subscribers more of a voice in comments and voting, because I care about their opinion a lot more than I do about that of some hostile troll, and before I restricted voting and comments people who opposed the site and our values had an equal say. Frankly, that just isn't helpful.

However, for the casual reader little will change. Most articles will remain open to the public, and comments will be allowed, although moderated, just as they have been since summer.

For starters, I'm going to offer anyone who has ever donated to the site a free three-month subscription, after which they can choose to continue to subscribe or not. The fee is pretty small – $5 per month – so for most it isn't a major commitment. In fact, I'd need a whole lot of subscribers to survive off the site at that rate, and even if it is possible it would probably take years of hard work to get to that point, so I'm still going to need to ask for extra support from time to time to cover overhead and pay for the time I put into the site, which is much more ideologically than financially motivated.

Although it will be pretty cheap, there will be a generous amount of value for those who do subscribe. Just as I've built an online presence with volumes of text, the exclusive subscriber content and material will grow to be impressive in time. I plan to offer ebooks and other files for free or at a steep discount to subscribers, and I'd like to approach others in the manosphere to see whether they'd like to promote their work with subscribers here by offering special deals and promotions. Additionally, and although this is a work in progress, I'm going to offer publishing services to those who would like to publish books and reports that I can then make available to subscribers. I envision a sort of book club and publishing outfit that provides quality material as well as services to those interested in men's issues.

So, if you've sent some support my way, let me know if you'd like to be added as a subscriber, and I will happily do so. If you haven't, feel free to try it out — it's only $5 to get started and you can cancel it at any time. Before I forget, I know some people value anonymity and some don't like paying online, so I've made some concessions for them. If you feel it's important to keep your identity protected or you'd rather use a check, you can subscribe by mail for a year at a discount.

For now, I'm going to keep it simple and only allow one basic subscription level, but I'll change that as the subscriber base and content develops and there's more to offer.

Finally, there are a lot of people who still have old subscriber accounts. Around 800, actually. Most are dormant, but if you have one and would like to keep it let me know and I will give you a free month's subscription to the new membership system, after which you can choose to keep it or not as a paying subscriber. After some time has elapsed, I'm going to purge the old accounts so as to reduce clutter in the database.

So if you'd like to help keep the site online and have access to some special features, sign up as a subscriber and we'll keep moving ahead with the site.

Looking forward to having you onboard

Your publisher,

WF Price

America is Getting Really Strange

W.F. Price · 28 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'm sure a lot of readers remember the "black helicopter" talk of the 90s. Lots of urban folks laughed about the paranoid people out in the boondocks, but there really were black helicopters flying around for various reasons. Some were likely on DEA operations, and others were involved in military training exercises. I saw one of these helicopters once while driving on a back road in Skagit county, WA around 2000. It was swooping down low and there was a door gunner hanging out with his machine gun pointed menacingly toward the ground — I assume it was a training exercise from one of our many local bases. Makes you feel pretty small to be in a little car on a dirt road with those big blackhawks flying overhead.

Since then, the hype over the helicopters has died down somewhat, but a recent exercise in Miami suggests they are back. Local Miami police and some military folks staged a joint exercise with black helicopters flying low through downtown, which is weird enough, but in this case they actually opened fire with what sounded like a autocannon, perhaps a chain gun of some sort. Unless they were shooting the Transformers sequel (it is supposedly being filmed in Miami), I can't really imagine what purpose this served. Well, maybe they are getting ready to implement some gun seizure, who knows…

Here's the video:

I suppose this isn't directly relevant to feminism, but there is a connection. Thanks in part to women's total faith in big daddy government, our "authorities" are starting to behave with breathtaking arrogance. Flying military helicopters through heavily populated areas and letting loose with automatic weapons – blanks or not – is a slap in the face to citizens, and can only be interpreted as an act of intimidation at best.

Update — more video:

Obama and the Managerial Elite

W.F. Price · 29 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Since learning of the helicopter assault training in Miami, I discovered that this is going on all over the US. There have been exercises in Minneapolis, according to commenters something is going on in Houston, and Chicago has seen them as well. I consider the silence about it an appalling omission on the part of the mainstream media. Not only have they refused to discuss this nationally, every single news report I see urges people "not to worry" and takes an entirely complacent, approving stance on what has been admitted to be special forces assault training in major American cities in conjunction with the Department of Homeland Security and local police forces. And yes, special forces are involved — this has been openly admitted.

Leaving aside the speculation about what exactly it is they are preparing for by staging exercises in US cities, this is an indication that something about the US has fundamentally changed quite recently, in just the past decade or so. One thing, of course, is that we are a much more fragmented populace than we used to be. Go to any large mall in a major urban area, and it sure doesn't look like the "America" we used to know. But even the results of the "invade the world, invite the world" policy George Bush left us with doesn't explain it all. There's also a growing rift between those managing our brave new world and those of us subject to management.

During the 2008 election I noticed a real enthusiasm for Obama amongst young technocrats. Aside from black women they were his most fervent supporters, and continue to be to this day. However, there was something more than mere idealism behind it — I could sense that they were eager for a changing of the guard (hence their disdain for Hillary Clinton, who represented the baby boomer political establishment). Obama was the perfect vehicle for their ascendancy, and his cabinet – full of relatively young, white male technocrats – reflects that.

There are a lot of trends that have converged to create a new managerial overclass, including identity politics, which have shattered any sense of greater civic responsibility, the higher technical demands of the modern workplace and the sheer weight and size of the United States, which is an enormous and unwieldy society. It was probably inevitable that it would happen eventually, just as it did in the past in many instances. The Chinese Imperial examinations created a class of bureaucrats that ran China for the putative benefit of the emperor, the French Capetian bureaucrats created what we know of as the Ancien Régime and the Byzantines wrought such an extraordinarily inscrutable administrative system that we attach the epithet "Byzantine" to all sorts of overly complex, incomprehensible bureaucracies.

What this new American elite has in common with its ancient predecessors is that the common folk values that held the state together in its earlier form have come to be replaced with an emphasis on expedience and utility, all exercised for the benefit of the state — not necessarily the people. In order to justify this, states usually resort to promoting a universalist philosophy or religion. In fact, there is evidence that the first monotheistic cult was promoted by an Egyptian pharaoh who wanted to bring all his subjects under a unifying single god.

China's emperors were considered the high priests of Middle Earth, who communicated with heaven and the gods on behalf of their subjects. Communism is another example of an essentially imperial universalist ideology, and the French kings ruled by divine right.

Along similar lines, America's elite has cast Obama in the messianic role with which they are most familiar due to our own cultural peculiarities. This is why, despite the fact that a lot of Obama skeptics have a difficult time articulating it, there is something to the criticism of Obama as a messianic figure. He exemplifies the universalist, transcendant value of equality (as understood by Americans) first represented to us by Martin Luther King Junior, and so serves as its avatar.

When you have a supreme spiritual mandate, in our case "equality," it can be used to justify almost any action undertaken to promote it. From the Inquisition to the torture chambers of the Lubyanka, men operated under this principle of service to a higher cause. Old rules and customs, such as the US Constitution and Bill of Rights, mean little to those engaged in promoting the one true faith. It is, in effect, a license to exercise power unfettered, and as always this tends to draw in some unsavory characters.

This is why we see the growth of an arrogant state that violates our Constitution and engages in shows of force designed to cow and humiliate lowly citizens. It is why we now have elite military units firing automatic weapons from helicopters above our cities. I suspect these are preventative measure, to let the people know that they had better not get in the way of the plans of their superiors.

However, I wonder whether this current construct has any permanence. I doubt it, because it assumes that the foreigners currently being recruited to join in the crusade will be as enthusiastic about 1960s American social movements as the young technocrats who were raised on them. As it stands today, there are some 35 million people – over 10% of the US population – who speak Spanish as their primary language, and I can guarantee that they are not listening to paeans to civil rights era ideology on NPR. Additionally, it casts well over a quarter of the US population (white males) as the "bad guys," and that is not a recipe for stability.

Although I'm skeptical of the Republican efforts to bring Hispanics "in," and think it will end in failure unless there are fundamental changes in the Republican party itself (it would have to become more of a coalition-based party — like the Democratic party), I think Hispanics may just be the wildcard that breaks the great liberal coalition. I don't say this because Hispanics are inherently conservative (they are not), but rather because they exist outside the paradigm. They feel no guilt and no sense of obligation, and will only support an Obama type politician if he provides them with something tangible. In other words, they can extort an equalist regime, and as their numbers grow that will put an enormous amount of pressure on a coalition that relies on a shrinking white male tax base.

So, even as we see the culmination of an old social movement in the Obama presidency, I believe we are approaching its end, and possibly its replacement with an entirely different, as of yet unknown national philosophy.

Why Youth Football is Big in Texas

Featured Guest · 29 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By AP

Tackle him. Tackle HIM! TACKLE HIM!! Run it again!

The sounds on playfields throughout Texas in late summer and fall as football coaches yell and scream at little boys. Tackle football as in full contact tackle football, it hurts football, not soccer.

Soccer is a good, fun and safe sport for boys and girls. Girls can compete with boys in soccer. Feminists love it. This is because soccer is an upper body passive sport. Boys don't develop nor require upper body muscles in soccer. Soccer is an invasive species not in the tradition of North American sports which require upper body muscle strength and coordination such as baseball, basketball, hockey and football.

I moved to Texas a few years ago from Michigan. Everybody told us about how big football is in Texas yet not one could explain why. As I sat on the sidelines watching my sons practice and play football, I began to make some observations and I would like to share a few of those. I also reached a some unique conclusions as to why football is so big in Texas. I realized the cruelest form of torture for a feminist would to be to force them to watch youth football in Texas seeing little boys grow into tough masculine young men.

Anthropologists believe the rituals of a society affirm and reinforce the values of that society. Football is a ritual which reflects Texan culture and American values.

Football is big in Texas because Texans believe football reflects the values of competition, risk and winning. The pioneer, cowboy and wildcatter spirit is alive and well in Texas. Texans believe these are good things. There is fierce and sometimes insane competition to win in Texas football culture. I never saw high school coach scandals in Michigan involving recruiting violations, falsifying grades for eligibility and pay for play. Football culture competition extends beyond the game as school bands and cheerleading in Texas is fiercely competitive. This competitive spirit is reflected in the business climate. There are few unions in Texas because it limits competition in the job market. Is it any wonder Texas at one point produced over half of the new jobs in the perpetual recession compared to the other forty-nine states? There is so much construction and economic expansion in Texas I was amazed to see heavy construction television commercial spots selling backhoes and bulldozers during the recent bowl games.

Texas youth football is a cultural shock for many little boys, even those in Texas. Most boys today have been taught to be good girls from women teachers in day care and public schools. Most boys only know women teachers and are surprised men can teach except adult men tend to shout at them. Feminists teachers discourage fierce competition preferring a nurturing, gentle, everybody wins, avoid risk, we're all the same attitude. Little boys quickly learn football is competitive zero sum game and the other boy across the line is in no mood to be nurturing. Your job is to be mean and tough to beat the other guy. It's not personal, it's just a competitive game. To the horror of feminists, there are no support groups for boys who fumble the football.

There is physical risk in playing tackle football. Feminists hate risk and football because it reeks of masculinity. They will eventually destroy football on the coasts applying the safety card. The safety card is an easy sell to an ever increasing effeminate population. Millennium parents have passively accepted restrictions forbidding playing on terrifying monkey bars, horrific games of tag, dangerous football and unfair dodge ball in public schools in the interest of safety. Feminist leaders will make decisions on risk, not parents or individuals. They will enforce their decisions through governmental regulations and it's evil twin, liability ligation. Expect many schools to be defendants in future lawsuits regarding any football injury however minor. They will drive insurance rates up trying to make the cost of a football program financially prohibitive for schools and private leagues.

Two years ago I was watching a game between the University of Michigan and Western Michigan when a thunderstorm broke out. There was severe lightning so the feminized officials at the University Michigan cancelled the game. There was identical weather at South Bend, but Notre Dame and South Florida finished their game. For 132 years, Michigan never cancelled a football game until 2011. The fans sitting in the Big House are some of the most intelligent people in the world who could have made their own decision to endure the weather conditions. Using the safety argument, feminists cancelled the game rationalizing they could be sued if someone were injured by lighting. Safety first. Besides, men have such silly football traditions such as playing in the rain and mud. (Bo Schembechler must be spinning in his grave.)

Football is big in Texas because Texans believe developing character and masculinity in boys. The future for boys is an important value in Texans. Texans want to leave a better world for their sons and grandsons. In all the years I watched youth football in Texas, I never a saw single girl play the game. I'm sure some do but only at the younger levels. Despite all the wonders of Title IX, to the best of my knowledge, there are no women playing at football at Texas, Baylor or Texas A&M much less in the National Football League.

Unlike most states, Texans form many private leagues and the public schools offer young boys the opportunity to play tackle football beginning in junior high school. In the other states, most public schools only offer football programs at the high school level. As a result, Texas boys have greater opportunities to play tackle football compared to other states. Boys in Texas are immersed in football culture, in their schools, their families and on television. In other states, families gather at weddings and funerals. In Texas, families gather at football games. When I moved here from the North, I couldn't believe junior high schools were playing under the lights during school nights. Nor could I believe the large number of private grade school youth football leagues. Many boys in Texas begin playing organized football in Kindergarten. On my son's fourth grade team, out of thirty players, only one may eventually make it to a high school football team, if's he lucky because of the intense competition.

Football is a rough sport and there is always the risk of injury. The risk of injury is less so at the youth level compared to junior high or high school ball. There is risk so what is the benefit? At the youth level it is the development of masculine character that can last a lifetime. It was a bonding experience for fathers and sons For the boys the boys on our team who had single mothers, youth football may have been their most important exposure to masculine values. Even one season of tackle football for a ten year old can make a difference in their life.

When I saw boys putting on pads for the first time they were afraid and extremely reluctant to block or tackle anyone. Again it's culture shock. Little boys today have been taught all their young lives to be good girls, sit still, be quiet, be passive and docile. Don't take a risk, you might get hurt. You're not allowed to hit anyone. Some boys are taught that any form of masculine aggression is pure evil.

The head coach of my son when he was in the fourth grade had experience coaching high school football but it was his first time with elementary school boys and his language was a little salty. He was shocked at their lack of aggression and hitting during various blood sport drills. At the end of practice, he screamed at the boys, "You guys hit like a bunch of pussies!" The boys looked around at each other in confusion and befuddlement. I'm not sure if they knew exactly what a pussy was, but whatever it was, it was clear they sure as hell didn't want to be one. The next practice pads were popping. Some of the Millennium parents were horrified at his language and he apologized but did get his point across.

Football teaches boys controlled aggression and risk taking. To paraphrase George Orwell, "Good people sleep at night because rough men stand ready to do violent acts on their behalf and defend their rights." Controlled aggression to someday protect their families, homes, state and country. Texas typically provides the greatest number of military recruits to defend the United States. The Texas population has a high gun ownership percentage. One of the state's finest university, Texas A&M, was founded as a military institution. When people think of rough cowboys, they think of Texas. These boys may become policemen, firemen, or serve their country in the armed services. The world is always a dangerous place.

Football is the ultimate and most complicated, exciting team sport requiring absolute coordination, unison and synchronization of every player on the team at the exact same time. As I observed my son's fourth grade team practice, I was amazed at their focused team discipline as they lined up and fired off on snap counts. I speculated if they could only show this much concentration and enthusiasm in school they would all become Rhodes Scholars. It's a shame women teachers don't know how to inspire and motivate little boys like the male volunteer coaches.

Football is big in Texas because Texans have a disposition for violence. There is an urban legend in the late 1930's the German Nazis sent observers to Texas to analyze American culture. They attended a Rodeo. Then they witnessed a football game between Texas and Texas A&M. Horrified, they cabled to Berlin that if this is what these people do for recreation, these are the last people in the world we want to fight a future war against. They sent a famous cable, "Don't mess with Texas."

It was my sons who led me to understand why football is big in Texas.

My sons were studying the Inca culture and they were amazed. Pizarro, with army of only two hundred men, conquered the Inca Empire, which had a population of six million people. Cortes, with an army of six hundred men, conquered the Aztec Empire of five million people. Two armies of less than a thousand men conquered eleven million people! My sons asked, "how could this be possible?" Keep in mind a typical Texas boy will kill about two hundred thousand bad guys and/or zombies each year while playing violent video games.

Historians teach that these civilizations had never seen horses, guns or armor. They were intimidated by European technology. In other words, these civilizations surrendered because they were afraid of horses and boom-boom. I then realized historians don't understand Texas football. I explained to my sons the answer to their question was in San Antonio.

Prior to the sixteenth century, people were oppressed and subjugated to tyrannical royal rule under the belief kings and emperors derived their authority from "divine powers." As added insurance, weapons to fight for any possible freedom were severely restricted. Royal rulers could be quickly interchanged, be it Spanish, English, French, Inca or Aztec. From this cultural perspective, the Spanish were not in any way superior to the Inca or Aztec. If Pizarro and Cortes switched places with the local emperors in Europe, the people in Europe would also fall into quick submission. People were taught to obey royal authority.

In contrast, at San Antonio in 1835, two hundred fifty very rough, armed and aggressive Texans fought a heavily armed Mexican Army of five thousand soldiers. The Texans at the Alamo, unlike the cultures of the sixteenth century, believed human rights and freedom were derived directly from God to an individual. They brought to Texas the spirit and ideas of the American Declaration of Independence and the United States Constitution. Vastly outnumbered and outgunned, the Texans refused to surrender. The competitive Texans at the Alamo believed freedom was worth fighting and dying for.

The main reason football is big in Texas is because football represents a subconscious love of freedom. The spirit of the Alamo and the fight for Texan independence is ingrained into the cultural consciousness of little boys all over Texas, who in turn will teach their sons about football. There is a certain attitude among Texans when it comes to individual liberty and human rights I've never observed anywhere else in the United States.

Honestly, I never heard a youth Texas football coach talk about the Alamo. I did hear them teach values of the Alamo such as hard work, honor, persistence, teamwork and being unafraid to play the game while taking risks. I heard them tell little boys to be aggressive and tough. I heard them tell little boys who felt pain to suck it up and get out there and play over the pain. I heard them yell at little boys when they made a mistake, but also tell them it was okay and to learn from it. I heard them scream at little boys to never give up on a play until the whistle blows and never quit or surrender their spirit no matter what the score of the game may be. Little boys who play youth football in Texas grow up to be young men are aren't afraid of confrontation. They grow up to be men who aren't afraid to defend freedom. Freedom is a big deal in Texas. So is football.

Manbiotics

W.F. Price · 30 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Despite having revolutionized medicine and healthcare, men don't always take care of themselves all that well. We tend to rely on our natural constitution to pull us through hard work and debauchery alike. Nevertheless, a few precautions and good habits can help out a lot. So, I thought I'd share a little recent victory along those lines.

Fifteen years ago, while on a trip with my stepdad who was visiting me in China, where I lived at the time, we stopped in a pleasant little provincial town called Yinchuan. Its nice, tidy streets and quiet modesty were a refreshing change from the stinking, hectic and crowded streets of Beijing, as was the clear blue sky above, devoid of the whitish cloud of smoke that typically hangs over Beijing. As Yinchuan is in the Gobi Desert, it reminded me of a southwestern US town, a likeness that was reinforced by the presence of dusty Mongol cowboys stopping by the local saloon. One I remember particularly well was sporting a glorious mustache, a white silk shirt and shiny black riding boots. He had a swagger and panache that drew the attention of the local ladies.

As the capital of Ningxia, Yinchuan is an old Silk Road town that in former days was largely populated by Hui, who are ethnic Han people who converted to Islam over the years. It is also the ancient capital of the Western Xia kingdom, which developed a flowering civilization that held its own for centuries despite being sandwiched between the Mongols, Tibetans and Han Chinese. It is a very culturally diverse region, featuring Mongols, Turks, Chinese, Tibetans and even a few scattered Indo-Aryans of Persianate extraction. Although it is largely unknown in the West, cultural exchange along the silk road introduced a great deal of Persian influence in China proper, which can be seen even today in Chinese music, dress, religion and art.

As it was a hot day, I went to buy some refreshments at a nearby store, and noticed an interesting drink called "suan nai" in Mandarin, which translates to sour milk. I thought it might be a customary local drink, so I bought a bottle. It was primitively packaged, covered only with wax paper held on by a rubber band. The girl at the store provided me with a straw, which I was to punch through the paper so as to drink the chilled concoction.

I wasn't sure what to expect, so I was pleasantly surprised by the tart drink. True to its name, it was tangy and slightly sweetened, and turned out to be very refreshing. I didn't know what it was called in English, so I simply assumed it was some form of thin yogurt, but it was much tastier than what I was accustomed to back home.

After I finally returned home, I looked in vain for a comparable product, but couldn't find anything except the same old plain, thick yogurt that I never cared for much. Eventually, I gave up and forgot about it.

Years later, on my recent trip to the Baltic, I had the opportunity to sample a popular local drink known as "kefir." Upon tasting it, I immediately remembered that sour milk I bought in Yinchuan. It was the same thing! What good fortune, I thought, to find the drink I'd given up on years ago, and so far from the Gobi Desert where I first became acquainted with it.

After coming back to Seattle once again, I was determined this time to find how to get the drink in the US. I found some in a local health food store, but it cost four times as much as milk and was of inferior quality. After diligently searching online, I discovered that all one needs to do to make kefir is obtain something called "kefir grains," which can be ordered online. Soon enough I found some from a Polish-American woman who runs a goat farm and sells them online, and promptly placed an order.

Although it took me a week or so to get the ratio of milk to kefir grains and the fermentation time right, I figured it out in due course, and now I have a glass of the stuff every day. Not only is it enjoyable and cheap, but it's had some pleasant health benefits as well.

Kefir grains are a gum-like substance that symbiotic colonies of bacteria and yeast exude, forming a matrix that protects and nourishes them. These microflora thrive in the presence of milk sugars, and within about 24 hours at room temperature they process milk, leaving it with a significantly higher vitamin and lower sugar content, along with a slight fizz and small amount of alcohol. In explaining to my children what it was, I called it “milk beer,” and that’s essentially what it comes down to.

Along with the vitamins come a number of other benefits. The bacteria, which are harmless to humans, compete with harmful microorganisms and aid in the digestive process. They boost immune function, reduce diabetes risk, and, as I’ve found, all but eliminate indigestion. For me, that’s been the most noticeable benefit. According to Baltic people, it’s also an effective hangover palliative. Ancient old men in the Caucasus – long known as a region with exceptional longevity – credit their long lives to daily doses of kefir.

However, there’s more to it than the mere health benefits. There is something rewarding about making one’s own food. In this day of the factory farm, processed foods and biological desert of pasteurized products, it’s encouraging to know that we can live and thrive without exterminating all the little critters who add to the raw ingredients. I have come to think of my little colony of kefir grains as a pet that I feed and who feeds me.

As a man in a profoundly strange, unnatural society, I find that engaging with nature even in such small, innocuous ways can go a long way to prevent the feeling of alienation from taking hold. And it seems that my body feels the same way.

And that is why I chose to share my little kefir story with the rest of you.

Making Kefir — from Mongolia to Scotland

W.F. Price · 31 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some commenters asked how to make kefir, and although I don't consider myself an expert, it's so easy that I see nothing wrong with providing a few tips.

However, before I begin I'd like to say that I was happily surprised to see that we have a reader from Mongolia who helpfully provided a link to a site about Mongol cuisine. From Mongol Toby's link, I learned that Mongols produce a variety of fermented milk products from different kinds of milk. When they use cow milk, they call it isgelen tarag, while horse milk becomes "airag" — otherwise known as kumis. Both would fall under the rubric of "kefir" for our purposes. Horse milk has more sugar than cow milk, so I assume the alcohol content would be a bit higher. Airag can either be drunk as is, or distilled into a liquor known as arkhi, which seems to be similar to Scottish blaand (some Scotsman recently revived the recipe). Blaand is said to have been introduced to Scotland by Vikings, who may have learned how to make it from either the Russian Tatars (i.e. Golden Horde Mongols) or the earlier Huns. I wonder whether Irish cream liqueur, which is actually a mixture of whiskey and cream, wasn't inspired by some original fermented milk drink from the Isles.

On to steps for making kefir:

First, obtain kefir grains. I ordered some from this woman, who goes by "Kefir Lady." If you want in-depth information, her site provides it. She sends a packet of fresh, live kefir grains that she's grown in goat milk via priority mail for a $20 Amazon gift card or $20 cash.

Although she won't send you a large amount of grains, hers are healthy and high quality, and they grow quickly as you make kefir, so you'll soon have more than you need, at which point you can throw out the excess or give it away to friends.

When you get started the grains may be a little goaty. For those using goat milk it won't make any difference, but the first batch or two with cow milk (most convenient for most of us) will taste a little "different." But that's OK, because your first few batches will be experimental.

You want to start with a ratio of about ten parts milk to one part kefir grains, so measure your grains to see how many tablespoons you have, set them aside, and then measure out ten times as much milk.

Put the milk in a glass jar, such as a mason jar.

For your first batch, I'd recommend warming the milk to room temperature before adding the kefir grains, so partially fill a pot with warm water and place your mason jar in the water so as to warm up the milk. This will increase the fermentation rate.

When the milk is warm (do not let it get hot), remove the jar from the water bath and drop in the kefir grains, then loosely cover the top of the jar so gas can escape. I use a mason jar lid with the band only partly screwed down, but you can use a cloth held on with a rubber band as well.

Now place the jar somewhere warm and out of direct sunlight. A cupboard is fine.

As the milk begins to ferment, you'll see it getting bubbly up top. Swish it around or shake it every now and then to keep the curds from separating, and after 24 hours you have kefir.

Chill it in the fridge and drink it without fear.

The first few batches might taste a bit odd as the grains adjust to your brand of milk, so you can experiment a bit by adjusting the ratio, putting the milk in at slightly higher or lower temperatures (again, not so high it will kill the yeast), and leaving it for longer or shorter times. There are also techniques that produce thinner or thicker consistency; some kefir is almost as thick as yogurt, but it can also be almost as thin as milk depending on how you make it. You can even try screwing a lid on tightly if you want it to develop more carbonation, but beware — gas pressure can break jars.

The longer you ferment it the more sour and alcoholic it will become. I once left some in the jar for four days to see what would happen, and the resulting product, which I was too chicken to drink, smelled like wine. I bet it had an alcohol content of over 5%. There are all sorts of uses for the curds and whey if you really want to get creative with the stuff, and the Kefir Lady provides some instructions for using it in that manner. The nice thing about the kefir grains is that they effectively prevent spoilage for quite a while, so you have more time to work with the milk products.

So if you're interested go ahead and get started. It's easy and cheap, and kind of fun.

No Force "Rape" Laws as Human Rights Violation

W.F. Price · 31 January 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There's a proposal to extend marital rape laws in Washington state to include "rape" without physical force or coercion. It will probably pass, but few (if any) husbands will be prosecuted, because in all likelihood it will simply be used spitefully by women in divorce, and juries tend to see through that stuff. One of the reasons the rape conviction rate is so low is that juries are not enthusiastic about convicting people under questionable laws and evidence. When it's a clear case of stranger rape, where a man broke into a house and raped a woman by force, convictions are relatively easy, but he-said/she-said cases lacking physical evidence are considerably more difficult. Feminists would like to change this by eliminating the presumption of innocence, and possibly by eliminating juries in favor of something like the troikas they have set up at universities, but for now we still operate under the traditional legal system.

However, even if juries don't casually convict people when they are charged under questionable laws, that doesn't mean people can't be arrested, intimidated and extorted with them. Much of the world operates in this manner; laws are not so much enforced as they are conveniently and selectively used against people. Take laws against homosexuality for example. The world over, people have always preferred to turn a blind eye to homosexual activity over vigorously rooting out and prosecuting people who engage in it. However, that doesn't stop governments from sometimes using these laws to selectively punish individuals they disagree with.

Take the case of Anwar Ibrahim, a Malaysian politician who took on Mahathir Mohamad and was subsequently accused of sodomy, arrested and thrown in prison. Whether or not Ibrahim was sodomizing his aide as he was accused is beside the point; people are rarely prosecuted for private sexual acts. There's almost always some ulterior motive for prosecution. The same happened to Oscar Wilde at the end of the 19th century. Wilde was flagrant in his disregard for Victorian era sodomy laws, but he remained untouched until he insulted and challenged a powerful lord who disapproved of his son's relationship with Wilde. It seems, therefore, that these sex laws tend to be used as a tool of power rather than justice. In the case of Julian Assange, this is about as clear as it gets.

So as sex laws become more and more comprehensive and strict in the West, it's time some people started asking whether this is justice or the hallmark of an increasingly repressive regime. When we start passing laws that most juries would be reluctant to convict on, then what is the purpose other than putting more power into the hands of police and prosecutors? Prosecutors in the United States already have enormous power that is often used for political purposes, e.g. Duke lacrosse false rape scandal, so is it wise to give them the power to charge men with "rape" for acts that involved no violence, physical threats or use of force?

It will be so tempting for people to use these laws as a political tool that it would be exceedingly unwise to put them in the hands of authorities, who will abuse them. Protection of women, who suffer far less from violence than men in our society, has long been used to justify repressive policies, warfare, racially targeted laws and so on. It will be used again.

One of the feral human instincts that civilized society must control to prevent descent into violence and savagery is the impulse to hurt or kill other men on behalf of or in competition for women. Competition for sex has long been a major cause of murder, mayhem and repression, and yet at the urging of feminists, rather than control this dangerous human tendency, we are to codify it into law. There is nothing "progressive" about such laws; they represent only a regression to the primitive state where most men lived in fear of the more powerful.

If people in the US refuse to extend any criticism to our authorities for creating an ever more repressive state, partly through the expedient of sex laws, I hope the outside world begins to take some initiative in pointing it out. Our State Department, for example, aggressively intervenes on behalf of homosexuals all over the world, saying that sodomy is a protected human right – an expression of love – and yet here at home heterosexual sex is increasingly regulated and criminalized, and innocent men dragged through life-wrecking trials and brought up on bogus charges.

So, just as our government is a staunch, unwavering supporter of freedom of sodomy abroad, I can only hope that righteous men in other countries begin to point out the hypocrisy of the US, and the fact that it has grown to be an oppressive state that uses sex to intimidate and repress its citizens to an extent equalled only by the most repressive theocracies.

The Complementary Relationship Between Authoritarianism and Feminism

W.F. Price · 2 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of the "Arab Spring" revolts in Egypt, the Maghbreb and some parts of the Arab world (it might be better termed Berber Spring than Arab Spring, as it began in largely Berber North Africa), many of the "progressive" policies put in place by dictators have come under attack by new political factions.

In Tunisia, where the revolutions began, the previous ruler had done a great deal to advance feminist causes in his country, possibly at the urging of his wife. Many of these Muslim leaders were educated and trained in the West before they came to power, and during the course of their instruction they absorbed a lot of what is known as progressive policy today. In fact, sometimes they were ahead of the West in that regard because, being authoritarian dictators, they had little standing in their way when they chose to implement new policies.

A report released by Consultancy Africa Intelligence describes in detail the policies implemented by Ben Ali and his predecessor in Tunisia:

> Directly after Tunisia's independence in 1956, the president of the new Tunisian Republic, Bourguiba, issued a personal status code (PSC). As a result, the role of Islamic law in this domain was ended or at least curtailed, and a more egalitarian family was established. This code was then, and still is, famous within the Muslim World and beyond for its abolition (or re-interpretation) of classical Islamic precepts.(2) For example, until this day, Tunisia is the only Arab Muslim country that prohibits polygamy and that secures equal divorce rights for men and women.
>
> In the years that followed, other codes were issued which aimed at women's emancipation as well. In 1959, Tunisia proclaimed a constitution, protecting the equality principle, and measures were taken to enhance female participation in society: women were granted active and passive voting-rights (1957), an effective programme of family planning was introduced (3) and women were granted a right to education (1980). In 1985, Tunisia ratified the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), which, on the basis of the constitution, prevails over Tunisian national law.(4) These measures together are generally termed le féminisme Bourguibien.(5)

Despite the nod to voting rights (even the Soviet Union held "elections"), this was all accomplished without the hindrance of democracy, so it was quite easy.

More:

> Ben Ali equally took a number of measures to improve the situation of divorced women. The first concerned maintenance upon divorce: although the PSC was the only family code in the region obliging the man to pay maintenance to his ex-wife upon divorce, this was often not enforced in practice. In order to improve this situation, Ben Ali created a state fund to secure payment of maintenance to mother and children after divorce (1993). The second measure concerned the nationality code, allowing women to pass on their nationality to their children. This was crucial to prevent women who had married a foreigner losing custody upon divorce on the grounds that the child had a foreign nationality (1993). The third measure provided that couples could choose to marry in community of goods, as opposed to the general practice where the spouses do not share any goods, even if these are acquired during marriage. The community of goods could prevent women who did not earn a living during their marriage ending up with empty hands upon divorce (1998). Fourth, the mother who has custody over her children obtained the right to stay in the marital home after divorce (2008), even if this belonged to the father.

Hmmm, sounds just like home. Looks as though Ben Ali modeled his country's divorce laws on California code. Perhaps it is no coincidence that the Arab Spring began with a slap to the face of a young man by a female authority.

Ben Ali, according to the report, used feminism as a means to gain legitimacy even as he committed human rights violations. As is so often the case, the excuse that one is "protecting women and children" often serves as a license to commit egregious violations of human rights.

> …Under Ben Ali, state feminism served a different goal: in a context of outraging violations of civil and political rights, the protection of women's rights became a means to gain legitimacy, both on the national and on the international levels.(12)
>
> The governments of Bourguiba and Ben Ali cautiously protected their feminist politics. They installed official institutions that promoted state feminism, such as the Tunisian women's organisation UNFT (Union Nationale de Femmes Tunisiennes, established in 1957), a research centre for women's affairs (CREDIF),(13) and a special Secretary of State dealing with issues concerning women and the family, later transformed into a Ministry. In the meantime, all voices of contestation were silenced through censorship and by making life difficult for those who dared to disagree. (14) But despite (or because of) this repressive context, state feminism was indeed contested.

Finally, the author of the piece, who is evidently a feminist (or feminist friendly) herself, admits that most feminist achievements in the region were achieved not in spite of oppression, but because of it:

> Tunisia is currently at a crossroads between authoritarianism and democratic rule. In this context, women's rights form a crucial stake. This is not only true because the feminist laws issued under the previous regimes were imposed on the Tunisian population in an authoritarian way, making a democratic renegotiation of these laws inevitable. That women's rights form a crucial stake in the current context is also due to the fact that the authoritarian feminist laws were very progressive, while the current government is relatively conservative. This situation has caused an intense fear among Tunisian feminists for a roll-back of the achievements in the field of women's rights, however undemocratic these achievements may be.

Feminism needs authoritarianism for obvious reasons: men must be forced by those with more power than they have to submit to the women in their lives. Feminists may sometimes claim to support freedom and democracy, but the smart ones know that both must be curtailed in order to achieve their version of equality.

Ultimately, however, as Tunisia demonstrates, the symbiotic relationship between authoritarianism and "progressive" policies such as feminism create an environment that is too much for the people to bear, and unrest breaks loose. When that happens in the West is an open question, but given our economic stagnation, I can only see the pressure rising from here on out.

Obama “wouldn’t hesitate” to Make Women Legitimate Targets

W.F. Price · 3 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

President Obama confirmed his support for sending women into the line of fire in a pre-Super Bowl interview, saying that because they sometimes sustain casualties in their current position they are already essentially in combat.

First, that’s a bogus argument. Civilians get killed in war all the time, and they are not combat soldiers. Same goes for journalists, doctors and others who are close to the action. Being a combat soldier is a distinction, but not necessarily a desirable one: it simply means that in a war zone you are always a legitimate target.

But whatever the rationale, women will now be officially equal to men on the battlefield, which brings me to an amusing revelation:

Barack Obama is an MRA.

When you say you will not hesitate to order women into a position that may well harm them or get them killed, you are violating the core principles feminists demand that men adhere to. Furthermore, you are embracing a kind of radical gender equality that is, in fact, a feature of much of the men’s rights movement.

I don’t happen to adhere to it myself; I find the idea of absolute gender equality to be short-sighted, counterproductive and, in the end, more harmful than reality based thinking. Some MRAs disagree very strongly with me on that point.

However, Obama is apparently on their side. Barack Obama wouldn’t hesitate to put women in harm’s way just the same as men. I think for feminists, this is going to be a confusing moment. It will be like what happens when you’ve got a particularly nasty, aggressive woman who gets up in a guy’s face and says “go ahead and hit me, you coward, I dare you!” and rather than back down like most men would, the guy gives it to her as though she were a man and lays her out.

This radical equality Obama is pushing is going to be the end of feminism as we know it for a couple reasons. First, the pedestal is effectively gone. White knighting has been erased from law, and the effect will be similar to what happened in the USSR, where women’s “liberation” eventually ended up giving them more work and responsibilities than they had before. This is going to be a major blow to women’s exclusive prestige and the end of chivalry as we understand it.

One could say it’s funny that the result of feminism will be that women end up losing the special status they used to have and find themselves looked upon as merely weaker, slower and more emotionally difficult versions of their male counterparts, but in the end we won’t be better off for it. No, it’s just going to make society somewhat more crappy for most of us — we’ll be a little more like China and Eastern Europe, and a little less like Switzerland.

Sometimes I wonder whether women will end up cursing the feminists who put them in this position. Unfortunately, I doubt many will. I think this whole feminist episode will be entirely forgotten, and the lesson forgotten with it.

Neutering Language

W.F. Price · 4 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The equalist legislators in Washington state have decided that rewriting Washington state code and documents to erase the distinction between men and women has “important significance,” and is worth effort and money. Other public servants, notably a University of washington communications professor named Crispin Thurlow, agree. Whether their enthusiasm for the project has anything to do with the potential jobs for “experts” and bureaucrats is not addressed in a Seattle Times article on the drive to neuter English.

> Over the past six years, state officials have engaged in the onerous task of changing the language used in the state’s copious laws, including thousands of words and phrases, many written more than a century ago when the idea of women working on police forces or on fishing boats wasn’t a consideration.
>
> That process is to draw to a close this year. So while the state already has welcomed “firefighters,” “clergy” and “police officers” into its lexicon, “ombuds” (in place of ombudsman) and “security guards” (previously “watchmen,”) appear to be next, along with “dairy farmers,” “first-year students” and “handwriting.”

Usually, language has a way of taking care of itself. But according to Prof. Thurlow, that isn’t good enough:

> Crispin Thurlow, a sociolinguist and associate professor of language and communication at the University of Washington, Bothell, said the project was admirable.
>
> He said as language evolves, such efforts are more than symbolic.
>
> “Changing words can change what we think about the world around us,” he said. “These tiny moments accrue and become big movements.”

Although he’s a relative peon, Thurlow is a representative of what I referred to the other day as the “managerial elite.” This man believes it is his mandate to shape society so as to produce a result consistent with Equalism. As a public employee, he also intends to be paid by the rest of us to do so

Perhaps at a future time, he can assume a high position in a Washington state bureaucracy called the “Ministry of Truth” or something along those lines.

Words such as “manhole” and “manlock,” have also come under scrutiny, but suitable replacements have proved difficult to find. However, this gives me an idea:

Instead of trying to neuter every word, why don’t we simply shoot for equal representation? We could just switch the gender of every other male-gendered word.

For example, instead of freshman, we could have “freshwoman,” and instead of manhole, “womanhole.” Other logical changes could include “womenstruation” from menstruation, and perhaps “womanatee” for the slow, portly sea creature. This could provide just as much work for Thurlow and his associates, and might turn out less confusing in the long run.

Christina Hoff Summers in NYT on Boys' "Poor Performance" in School

W.F. Price · 5 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For at least a decade now we've been seeing educators disingenuously "wondering" what's going on with boys. I don't believe teachers are confused in the least — they know exactly what's going on. I'm certain of this because I have a fair number of educators in the family, and they know just what the "problem" is: boys are, in general, more difficult to teach.

Boys are rowdier, more prone to acting out, and don't listen as carefully. Sometimes, they are aggravatingly unaware of their surroundings. My son, for example, will become interested in something, and suddenly the rest of the world doesn't exist to him any longer.

Boys also lack the desire to please that seems to be innate in little girls. They don't really care so much if the teacher is happy about what they are doing or saying.

But does this mean they are inferior students who "perform poorly?" No more than it means that an F-18 fighter, due the high skill required of its pilots, is an inferior airplane that performs poorly when compared to a cessna.

Despite the abysmal failure of public education in regards to boys, boys are still scoring higher on tests than girls. Even verbal tests in many cases. It's just their grades that are lagging, and unfortunately that's what keeps them out of college:

> Boys score as well as or better than girls on most standardized tests, yet they are far less likely to get good grades, take advanced classes or attend college. Why? A study coming out this week in The Journal of Human Resources gives an important answer. Teachers of classes as early as kindergarten factor good behavior into grades — and girls, as a rule, comport themselves far better than boys.
>
> The study's authors analyzed data from more than 5,800 students from kindergarten through fifth grade and found that boys across all racial groups and in all major subject areas received lower grades than their test scores would have predicted.

In other words, the teachers – overwhelmingly female – don't like them. Nor, apparently, do a number of NY Times commenters, who say it's just desserts for all that male oppression of the past. Yes, that's right: little kids who were born a few years ago must pay for the imagined sins of their grandfathers and great-grandfathers.

Example:

> B Lundgren Norfolk, VA
>
> Girls and women were shut out of education for centuries. In many parts of the world, they still are. No one cared. Now that men are coming up short, it's a crisis. Please, let's find a real crisis to solve.

Ah, feminists. So compassionate!

What this "boys crisis" really comes down to is a public schools crisis. Public schools may be a necessity, but they have some pretty severe flaws. As a socialized system, they do not reward teachers for being harder workers or even result-oriented. Teachers in my local public school district are in open rebellion against tests that would hold them accountable for their students performance.

What public school teachers prefer is an easy day with obedient, compliant students. Unfortunately for boys, they don't typically fit into the obedient and compliant category. So, rather than try harder, the teacher simply marks them down and leaves it up to the boys or their parents to deal with it (parents, many of whom are single mothers, definitely share some of the responsibility).

In private schools it's a different story. Sons of the wealthy have higher academic achievement than their female counterparts. This is because teachers at private schools are informed in no uncertain terms that students' performance in their classes is directly relevant to their continued employment. Miraculously, rich people's sons are better educated and perform better every step of the way than their daughters.

The problem isn't that boys are poor students. It's that they require more effort. However, the results speak for themselves. Despite the higher grades and academic achievement of girls in our society, boys still lead the way in productivity, innovation and achievement in every other measure.

So all this hand-wringing about boys' performance is misplaced, and I think the rest of us are beginning to figure it out. It isn't really that the boys are performing poorly; it's the schools that are lousy, and grades reflect little more than how teachers "feel" about their students.

Help Keep The Spearhead Online

W.F. Price · 5 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Late last year, I took on some extra expenses to accommodate The Spearhead's traffic, which has since grown to 82,000 unique visitors per month — the highest monthly number of visitors ever. About half the visitors in any given month are "returning" visitors, which suggests that tens of thousands of people are reading the site at least occasionally. On top of that there are over 2,200 RSS subscribers, and each article is read about 2,000 times on the site within a couple days of its release. Given the number of RSS subscribers and article views, daily readers number in the thousands, and weekly substantially more than that.

I like the numbers and am happy to see that we have so many readers, but that doesn't necessarily translate into money, because this isn't the kind of site that thrives off advertising or affiliate sales. Instead, it's a site that must rely on readers, much like traditional magazines and publishing outfits.

So, if you enjoy our content and would like to see it continue to be available, supporting it will help a great deal. I've installed some membership software that allows people to become paying subscribers and will give them access to exclusive articles, which I will soon begin to publish. I've been holding off so as not to surprise readers too much, but soon there will be content that is available only to supporting subscribers who pay $5 per month. I'll keep most content open to the public, but not all, so if you want access to everything sign up for membership as a subscriber.

During this current fund drive, I'll offer anyone who donates $50 or more online a year's subscription as a supporting subscriber. Just let me know if you're interested and we'll set you up with a new account or upgrade an old subscriber account if you have one.

The Spearhead has published thousands of articles, and I'd like to keep the content coming. If you are a reader who enjoys what we have to offer, please help out with some support. Support from readers has kept the site online for three years, but it's a fine line, as I am not a wealthy individual with money or time to spare. As much as I believe in the mission of the site, if there is no support I'll be forced to abandon or severely curtail it.

With The Spearhead, what you see is what you get: there is nobody between those of us submitting content and the reader. This is how I keep the site functioning on a low budget, and it is also how I keep it honest and true to its purpose. If you find that it has value to you, send something to keep it going.

On a further note, I'd like to stress that anything helps. If every regular reader gave just a few dollars a month, the site would easily pay for itself.

I'd like to thank the supporters who have kept the site online for the past few years, and also contributors who have donated their time and content to The Spearhead. It's been a group effort, and I'm glad to say we have brought ideas and content to the fore that you wouldn't see anywhere else. I'm committed to keeping it going, and with your help I'll do so.

Donations can be made through the PayPal link above right, or you can subscribe here. If you prefer to send support via mail, send to the following address:

Price Content
PO Box 28282
Seattle WA 98118

British Communists Hoist on their Own Petard

W.F. Price · 6 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The old left is having a hard time dealing with the feminist juggernaut they worked so hard to foster over the years.

The Socialist Worker's Party, a Marxist Leninist group seeking to create a Bolshevik utopia worldwide, is under fire for covering up an alleged rape with what has been called a "socialist sharia court."

A Communist woman, identified as "W," claimed to have been raped for six months in 2008-2009, but rather than go to the police she trusted her comrades to handle it. However, when the alleged assailant, one comrade Delta, was cleared by a committee tasked with investigating the accusations, she and others were unpleased.

During the investigation, the complainant was apparently questioned, which she called "reactionary," and she thought they were making her out as the responsible party.

From the Guardian's Nick Cohen:

> That's the way it is on the far left. The hierarchical party always has the potential to become a rapist's playground. Consider the predator's opportunities. The rank and file has to obey the party line without question. The leaders of political cults, like their religious counterparts, increase their power by fostering paranoia. Members can trust no one outside the party, especially the police and judiciary. The SWP says that Comrade Delta's alleged victim was free to go to the police and chose not to, but party dogma insists that justice is impossible in bourgeois courts. Only when it's too late do women learn that the alternative disciplinary system of Marxist-Leninists exists to control them and let the leaders do as they please. The parallels with the Catholic church are too obvious for me to labour.

Of all organizations, these were the ones pushing radical feminism with the most force and vigor back in the 1970s. Feminism and Marxism, at least in the US, went together like peas in a pod.

Gays Used as Wedge Issue to Undermine Boy Scouts

W.F. Price · 6 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One gets the sense that there wouldn't have to be a gay ban in the Boy Scouts of America if homosexuals had not become an official "oppressed community". Simply keeping one's private sex life to oneself and avoiding making advances on fellow scouts would have been good enough. Sure, it sounds "repressive," but we all have to make concessions from time to time. How many churchgoing men have to keep their mouths shut in service? How many of us have to play along at sensitivity training at work? Even atheists are banned from scout leadership, and surely there are far more atheists than homosexuals in the United States.

I feel a bit sorry for the Boy Scouts, because they are in a difficult position. The majority of parents who put their children in the Boy Scouts are conservatives, who may or may not be tolerant of homosexuals, but probably prefer to keep them away from their sons. If Scouts allowed open homosexuals to join as scout leaders, it would take a devastating toll on the organization, because Americans have a way of saying one thing and doing another where their children are concerned.

As an example, Americans love to pay lip service to diversity, but they act in the opposite manner where public education is concerned, often incurring significant expense merely to get their children into a "good" school district. I'm sure the exact same thing will happen in scouting. In public, parents will say "oh, sure, we support gay rights," but when it comes down to whether or not they want Johnny to go on overnight scouting trips with a 25-year-old openly gay man, many will quietly remove Johnny from the scouts.

There is a real issue with having gay adult men with adolescent boys. Leaving gay men alone with adolescent boys is about as smart as leaving straight men alone with adolescent girls — not a good idea. Some men can handle it pretty well – probably most of them most of the time – but an awful lot of them cannot. In an organization of millions, it's going to be a big, big problem. A big and expensive problem.

However, everyone knows this, so why the big push to make the Boy Scouts openly gay friendly?

Scouting organizations have long come under suspicion from totalitarian regimes. There is something about scouting that drives control freaks crazy. It gets them so uptight that many communist and fascist countries banned independent scouting organizations.

Here are a few regimes that banned or took over scouting in the past and present:

-USSR, scouts banned in 1918; replaced by "pioneers"

-Nazi Germany, scouts taken over in 1934; replaced by Hitler Jugend

-Cuba, scouts banned in 1961; replaced by José Martí Pioneer Organization

-Iraq, scouts taken over by state in 1979; subsequently called "Saddam Cubs"

The attack on scouts in the US today is part of the same impulse. Leftists hate and fear the scouts, and they are using gay rights as a wedge issue to destroy them. Scouting must be crushed, for it represents patriarchal values, masculine independence, and initiative — all without direct government oversight! Oh, think of all the horrible things they could be up to. Scheming to oppress women into relationships, to lower tax rates and to wreck our socialist utopia. That will not do; we'll all be much better off if we put those suspicious little boys in public schools and other programs that are directly controlled by state or – even better – federal government, so as to keep a close watch on them and keep them from getting too big for their britches.

So, as a patriotic American, I propose a new scouting organization created under the auspices of the federal government. Let's name it the "Rainbow Scouts," and have the little boys say a daily devotion before a giant picture of President Obama. They can learn about how not to be little oppressors, and how better to serve their leader and moral superiors. No more of that potential sabotage activity like orienteering and rigging — their new focus will be on political repentance and indoctrination.

Finally, we will have our victory over the evil force of the Boy Scouts of America, a bastion of right reactionary subversives.

In closing, isn't it odd to see how Barack Obama is so consistently using gays and women to bring rival institutions to heel? I think this must be unprecedented in the history of the world.

Prominent Nationalist, Pro-feminist Politician Assassinated in Tunis

W.F. Price · 6 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Chokri Belaïd, head of the Tunisian opposition group Mouvement des patriotes démocrates, was killed outside his home today by multiple gunshots to the head and chest.

Belaïd, a former supporter of Saddam Hussein (check out the likeness in the LA Times photo), followed roughly the same program as the old Arab nationalists who ran much of the Arab world during the postwar era, but who have recently been toppling like so many dominoes. His program is essentially an Arab-focused national socialism, which includes a highly antagonistic stance against Israel, so it's a bit strange to see him heralded as a progressive leader in the Western press, which would scream bloody murder if any Western democracy took up his platform. I suspect, however, that none of the American reporters have any idea what his program really amounts to.

Nevertheless, he was quite the progressive when compared to Islamic parties, proclaiming a desire for "une véritable égalité des sexes" — "true gender equality." Needless to say, he was strongly at odds with Tunisian Islamic parties, and some criminal element amongst their radical supporters (I doubt moderate Islamic politicians would have been directly involved; Islam does not condone murder, despite what some think) took it upon themselves to assassinate him.

Given American support for the Arab Spring as well as the fact that the State Department must have known that "moderate" nationalists would be replaced with Islamic parties, it's pretty clear that global feminism is a very minor concern to American foreign policymakers.

So, whenever you read an article about how our government officials are promoting women's rights abroad, and how seriously they take that struggle, you should know that they are lying. They really don't care much at all — it's always an excuse, or used as leverage to gain some advantage or other.

An Oxford Student Finally Explains it to Us

W.F. Price · 6 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

More here.

Share this:

- Share

- Reddit
- Twitter
- Facebook

Tagged as: Oxford, strap-ons, why we need feminism

Rogue LA Cop on the Warpath for Gun Control

W.F. Price · 7 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Chris Dorner, the former LAPD officer who is currently the subject of a massive manhunt, posted a long manifesto demanding, among other things, the implementation of an assault weapons ban. He had high praise for Diane Feinstein and assorted other left-wing politicians and media figures.

Dorner has also compiled a comprehensive list of targets, including, among others, minority cops and "misandrist" lesbians (who are apparently not true feminists):

> I am here to change and make policy. The culture of LAPD versus the community and honest/good officers needs to and will change. I am here to correct and calibrate your morale compasses to true north.
>
> Those Caucasian officers who join South Bureau divisions (77th,SW,SE, an Harbor) with the sole intent to victimize minorities who are uneducated, and unaware of criminal law, civil law, and civil rights. You prefer the South bureau because a use of force/deadly force is likely and the individual you use UOF on will likely not report it. You are a high value target.
>
> Those Black officers in supervisory ranks and pay grades who stay in south bureau (even though you live in the valley or OC) for the sole intent of getting retribution toward subordinate caucasians officers for the pain and hostile work environment their elders inflicted on you as probationers (P-1′s) and novice P-2′s. You are a high value target. You perpetuated the cycle of racism in the department as well. You breed a new generation of bigoted caucasian officer when you belittle them and treat them unfairly.
>
> Those Hispanic officers who victimize their own ethnicity because they are new immigrants to this country and are unaware of their civil rights. You call them wetbacks to their face and demean them in front of fellow officers of different ethnicities so that you will receive some sort of acceptance from your colleagues. I'm not impressed. Most likely, your parents or grandparents were immigrants at one time, but you have forgotten that. You are a high value target.
>
> Those lesbian officers in supervising positions who go to work, day in day out, with the sole intent of attempting to prove your misandrist authority (not feminism) to degrade male officers. You are a high value target.
>
> Those Asian officers who stand by and observe everything I previously mentioned other officers participate in on a daily basis but you say nothing, stand for nothing and protect nothing. Why? Because of your usual saying, " I……don't like conflict". You are a high value target as well.
>
> Those of you who "go along to get along" have no backbone and destroy the foundation of courage. You are the enablers of those who are guilty of misconduct. You are just as guilty as those who break the code of ethics and oath you swore.

Mr. Dorner is on a one-man war against the Los Angeles PD, and claims to have weapons that are up to the job, including anti-materiel rifles and shoulder launched anti-aircraft missiles (I suspect he's bluffing on that score).

So far he has killed a few people, including at least one cop, and spooked the LAPD into shooting some innocent pickup truck drivers (Dorner drives a pickup).

Although I doubt it will be reported as such, Dorner's rampage is explicitly left terrorism, and it just might have the intended effect of helping the assault weapons ban along.

Dorner's hubris is chilling. He is essentially saying "I am targeting police and killing a bunch of people so that the government will disarm the rest of the people." In the meanwhile, he has prompted police to shoot several innocents, which sadly confirms some of what he wrote in the manifesto. The inherent contradictions suggest that he has truly gone insane, but one has to admit that he does provide an inside view of the crazy world of Los Angeles — supposedly the glorious future of the rest of the US.

Although I'd argue that the existence of people like Dorner, who is 6 feet tall, violent and over 250 lbs., justifies citizen ownership of effective firearms as self-defense weapons, his ploy might just work in our current climate.

As Trigger-Happy LAPD Shoots Innocents, California Moves to Disarm Citizens

W.F. Price · 8 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It looks as though Chris Dorner may get his wish on gun control. In the latest spate of publicized violence, every single shooting has been carried out by a cop or ex-cop, four non-police have been shot and two killed, and California is moving forward with a bill that would severely curtail citizen access to guns with detachable magazines, such as those police officers – current and former – used to shoot innocent people yesterday.

> "We need to lead the way," Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said. "New York has stepped up and stepped forward. California needs to answer the call."
>
> The package of seven bills outlined at a Capitol press conference today includes measures to make it illegal to possess high-capacity magazines, ban the manufacture, sale, transfer and importation of rifles with detachable magazines and regulate ammunition purchases and require additional safety training for people who purchase new handguns. Lawmakers also called for increased funding and focus on enforcing existing laws, including ensuring that guns get out of the hands of people prohibited from possessing fire arms.

Will the ban extend to police? Of course not. California's finest will still have access to assault rifles with large-capacity magazines, pistols with extended clips and other goodies — the kinds of weapons they used to light up a couple little Mexican women delivering newspapers yesterday morning.

There is nothing "liberal" about a state that seeks to preserve all of its firepower while disarming citizens, yet this is what they call themselves.

Today, the more "liberal" the state, the more authoritarian it is. If California is the future, this is not a good trend.

VAWA Fight Offers More Proof Anglo Feminism on the Decline

W.F. Price · 8 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Family Research Council, a conservative Christian group, has come out against VAWA reauthorization, saying the bill is a waste of money and used by feminists to seize funds from taxpayers.

When VAWA was first passed in 1994, conservatives gave it strong support. The white knighting impulse was still strong, and anything to protect women – even if it was an anti-male, anti-family piece of legislation – was almost guaranteed to get the right's vote.

Feminists were at their strongest in the 1990s, because gender feminism had hit that sweet spot where feminists were coming into power while Americans still had a strong cultural mandate, originally part of the patriarchal deal with women where they cede some political and economic power in exchange for special status and protection, to be very protective of women. At that time, feminists could not lose.

However, things have changed. Conservatives, always a bit behind the curve, have finally figured out how destructive the law is to their values, which include marriage, family and benevolent patriarchy. They are now openly calling for letting VAWA die, and threatening to hold politicians who support its renewal accountable:

> The socially conservative Family Research Council asked supporters to help it oppose the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act because, the group says, the "real abuse" is how much it will waste taxpayer dollars.
>
> In an email alert on Monday, the FRC decried the VAWA ("which, ironically, is supported by the same administration that wants to put women in front-line combat!") as an "abuse of taxpayer dollars" that "does more to promote a radical agenda than it does to help women."
>
> The email quoted conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly, who also opposes VAWA. "In its 17 years of operation," Schlafly wrote on TownHall.com, VAWA "has done little or no good for real victims of domestic violence, while its funds have been used to fill feminist coffers and to lobby for feminist objectives and laws. Although every spending bill should be subject to rigorous auditing procedures in order to curb waste and fraud, VAWA has somehow ducked accountability for the [$660 million] a year it doles out to radical feminist organizations."

Feminist political immunity is officially over.

A Risk of Being an Alpha Male

W.F. Price · 11 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Charles Martel linked an article about Jodi Arias, a woman who felt "used" by her lover, and subsequently terminated him with extreme prejudice, shooting him in the face while he was taking a shower, cutting his throat, and then stabbing him nearly 30 times.

The lover, Travis Alexander, was engaged in a purely physical relationship with Ms. Arias that she says made her feel "like a prostitute."

> Arias, 32, recalled one occasion at a banquet in Oklahoma City, where she hid in a bathroom to cry after she saw Alexander flirting with a woman who was wearing a revealing dress.
>
> "I didn't think the behavior was appropriate … It hurt my feelings … I was appalled that he was doing it in front of me."
>
> Arias said her lover never introduced her as his girlfriend, but gave her a Valentine's Day present of a T-shirt reading "Travis Alexander's" and pink shorts with "Travis" printed on them – which were admitted as evidence in court.
>
> On the second day of testimony on Tuesday, Arias had detailed meeting Alexander at an insurance convention in Las Vegas in the fall of 2006, at a time when she was in another relationship.
>
> Describing their first kiss in response to questions from defense attorney Kirk Nurmi, she said: "He got right in my face, maybe four inches, five," adding, "He licked his lips and said 'I wish you didn't have a boyfriend.'"
>
> Alexander had been dead for five days when he was found with a slit throat, a bullet wound in his head and 27 stab wounds, the Arizona Republic newspaper reported. His death was connected to Arias after sexually explicit photos were found on the memory card of his camera.

This case confirms Heartiste's observation that love and hate are not opposite emotions:

> … I will say this, it's better to have a pissed off ex than an indifferent ex. Indifference, not hate, is the opposite of love. An angry ex can be gamed into a hatefuck, but an indifferent ex is already hopping on fresh cock. You are yesterday's news.

So true, but one would hope she isn't as pissed off as Jodi Arias…

The murder is almost five years old, but the case is news because Arias faces the death penalty. She is admitting to killing Mr. Alexander, but says that his "emotional abuse" is a mitigating factor.

Perhaps, but who would take mercy on a man who murdered a woman for marrying and then leaving him to gain some material advantage?

It will be interesting to see what the jury decides in this case. My suspicion is that she'll be spared the death penalty if there are younger women on the jury, and maybe even if there are not.

For whatever reason, people think it's nothing serious when a woman takes advantage of a man, but they feel sorry for women who are used in a similar manner.

Why Socialism Doesn't Work Very Well in the US

W.F. Price · 11 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Thos. posted a link to a Talking Point Memo article gloating over former Illinois Representative Joe Walsh's child support arrears. TPM is a partisan liberal site, pro-Obama and left-wing. You'd think that would mean that its readers would be humanitarian and compassionate, but then again, since this is the good old USA you'd know better.

Two former welfare workers express their contempt for people in arrears:

> Joe Leydon
>
> Way back when I was a welfare worker, I had to deal with deadbeat dads like this clown a lot.
>
> RichardinSanJo
>
> Yeah. Me too. And they always had a long litany of self-pitying excuses. Most of my deadbeat-dad clients at least had enough judgement not to attack the welfare system.

Another compassionate response:

> SRfromGR
>
> Throw this MFer in jail already and teach him a fucking lesson. First he can't pay child support as a U.S. House Rep. out of some kind of deranged principle, and now he can't pay child support because he can't afford it. Bullshit. Maybe its time to learn how to do an actual personal budget asshole, now that you no longer have to worry about the nation's budget concerns. Get your own fucking house in order before telling the rest of the country what's what…you putrid sack of shit.

A predictable honkey deserves no pity comment:

> pie
>
> What does Walsh think he's going to get out of this?
>
> Oh, I know. He'll be hired by the (white) men are abused contingent.
>
> What a freaking loser. His poor kids.

As we can see, liberals don't believe in socialism or compassion for all people, but rather only those who agree with them politically. Rep Walsh, a Tea Party Republican, may be an extreme example, but the sentiment holds regardless. Socialism in the US is only supposed to be for some people — the people whose views are unimpeachable (by the left).

If you asked your typical "liberal," he or she would agree that social benefits should not be extended to certain classes of people, regardless of need. The child support system itself proves this beyond a shadow of a doubt.

Try it. After a few drinks, ask a partisan Democrat whether white Republican men should be eligible for welfare if they lose their jobs and fall behind on child support.

This is why I have a deep, deep skepticism of MRAs who think they can "win" by taking a liberal political position. A few of them may be able to win a few invitations to speak here and there, and perhaps someone might "listen" to them at some point, but there is no serious chance that the political left in this country is ever going to extend any compassion toward their "class enemies." In fact, if they had their way they would starve us, and someday they may actually come close to succeeding in that goal. They will never entirely succeed, because when they take it that far there will be an uprising, but it doesn't mean they won't try.

Now, this doesn't mean the Republicans will be our savior. In their current incarnation, they will not, because they aren't compassionate toward anyone. While this may be preferable in some scenarios because it's more fair, in the current climate and economic system, which is inherently unfair (why do broke fathers go to jail while bankers get bailed out?), it's a losing proposition. A lot of people who vote for them, or who have voted for them, will need some help in the future because of the way our economy currently works (or doesn't work), and if the Republicans don't change their tune in that regard they will be abandoned wholesale, and they will deserve it.

Traditional Gay Marriage making a Comeback

W.F. Price · 12 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some moderns may be shocked and confused to hear it, but gay marriage was very much a part of life for homosexuals long before the sham marriages that are being "legalized" in liberal American states and European countries became a popular political cause (despite not being so popular with male homosexuals themselves).

In fact, until some 50 years ago most homosexuals were married. It just happened that they married someone of the opposite sex.

Nowadays, this practice is returning as more and more single women find themselves approaching the end of viable fertility without a love partner, and homosexual men find themselves longing for the fulfillment of fatherhood. This kind of arrangement, not uncommon in the past, has been around since the beginning of history. Although not perfect, it is hardly worse than many straight marriages (and maybe more stable so long as both parties are fully informed), and far better for children than fooling them by saying they have "two mommies" or "two daddies."

> Presenting an alternative to surrogacy, adoption or simple sperm donation, sites like PollenTree.com, Coparents.com, and MyAlternativeFamily.com, as well as Modamily and Co-ParentMatch, are quickly growing in popularity.
>
> David Arrick and Heidi Sadowsky, are also a couple who both wanted children, but didn't want each other. Their solution was to have the child together and co-parent, without any romantic relationship.
>
> The two had been friends for 20 years; Mr Arrick is gay and Ms Sadowsky never met a man she wanted to have children with, so the two agreed to have a child of their own, Nate, without the need for romance.
>
> 'This is someone I have known for a very, very long time, that I trust, and I love,' said Mr Arrick on the Today show.
>
> 'We feed and love and clothe and shelter him. The fact that we're not married, it's not a big deal.
>
> 'The biggest challenge is that we have separate households, so it takes a lot of communicating. You need to really be on the same page,' he said.
>
> Ms Sadowsky added: 'I really wanted my child to have two parents. And I wanted to share the responsibility of raising a child with somebody.

Some people might want to criticize the above parents, but Ms. Sadowsky is far better than a woman who shoves the child's father out of the child's life following divorce. Mr. Arrick is to be commended, too, for raising his own child in a cooperative manner, and allowing him to have both a mother and father. That they are not a "love" couple may not be ideal, but it is second best, and much better than a number of other arrangements.

Children do best with both a mother and a father. It's how nature designed us, so sometimes I'm quite confused by how leftists will vigorously protest GMO foods and then turn around and pretend that two men or two women can both be one child's parents. If a child has a mother, that child also has a father, and vice versa. This is, at its root, my objection to gay marriage. It denies the natural, biological basis of parenthood, and by extension of marriage. If two women can be "mothers" of a child, then the biological father is meaningless. Some feminists may accept this without question, but I wonder, is this how most sperm donor children feel about it? Evidently not:

> A letter to Dad on Father's Day
>
> Father's Day 2012
> Dear Dad,
>
> I often wonder who you are. What is your name? Are you even still alive? The immutable power of these eternally unanswerable questions gradually consumes my soul. I will never know if I have ever unknowingly > passed you in the street, or exchanged a sideways glance with your uncannily familiar brown eyes. In my mind's stagnant whirlpool you are my flawless ideal of a father, yet in the clarity of reality you are no more than a perfect stranger. Simply the pleasure of knowing you exist somewhere in this universe does not bandage the wound of your absence.

>
> I often wonder who I am. My family tree is severed in two- I am denied your half, its branches rich and strong with stories I will never be told. I wander aimlessly, never truly knowing the roots of my heritage, my nationality ambiguous and fluid. 'Caucasian', the sheet stated. This is a broad term that does not define anything…
>
> [...]
>
> I just want you to know, that whoever you are, wherever you are, and whatever you are doing, you are my father. The privilege of knowing who you are, of knowing who my family is, would place the missing piece that completes my existence. For now, though, and perhaps forever, I just wish.

What if Jodi Arias had failed?

W.F. Price · 12 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Accused murderess Jodi Arias has been engaging in some victim-blaming in court today. Actually, I'm not sure whether victim blaming is the right term. She's claiming that she is the victim, accusing Travis Alexander of rape, pedophilia, domestic violence and perversion. He was so deranged, she is arguing, that he had to be knifed and shot while he was taking a shower. Arias' accusations are typical for divorcing wives, only she's justifying murder rather than theft and betrayal — it's a script that plays out in courthouses across the United States every working day.

If a man who had killed his wife made those kinds of charges it would only earn him a faster trip to the execution chamber.

But there's another important issue here for us to consider. What if Jodi Arias had tried to kill Mr. Alexander, but failed? What if Travis Alexander managed to overpower Arias and knock her to the ground with a right cross? What if, instead of first seeing Mr. Alexander as a butchered corpse, the first contact had been with an agitated, blood-spattered man with a gun standing over a beaten, crying woman?

Even if Alexander accused her of attempted murder, would he have escaped arrest under VAWA? "Primary aggressor" laws are designed to guarantee that the physically stronger party (almost always the man) is usually the one arrested. There is a contrived logic in the factors used in primary arrest policies that will typically implicate the man.

Here are some examples (from Dept. of Justice):

-Comparable size, strength of the parties

-Who has access to or control of resources

-The person least likely to be afraid

-The person most likely to inflict injury

-Who has the history of help-seeking behaviors

-Who has access to or threatened use of weapons

In the last case, an exception is made for women who use weapons:

"A discrepancy in size or strength might help explain why a woman might grab an object to throw at her batterer while her batterer uses his bare hands."

In other words, if a man uses a weapon he's the primary aggressor; if a woman uses a weapon, the man is also the primary aggressor. It's a very convenient policy.

Here's another catch-22:

"Sometimes batterers call the police, especially if they have sustained visible injuries. They may do this ruin their partner's credibility with law enforcement or to deter her from calling law enforcement in the future."

So, if the man sustains injuries and calls the police, he's just trying to fool the police into thinking he's the victim. Got a problem with that? You must be part of the "abuse lobby."

If children are present, then the female may be more aggressive to "protect them," but you should be skeptical of their statements if they defend their father:

"If children are present, the victim might act with force to protect them.

[...]

Children may also make statements that minimize the violence and protect the batterer parent out of fear. Children may also wish to protect their batterer parent if he has systematically undermined the abused parent's ability to parent or has repeatedly belittled the abused parent."

All of the above will typically implicate the man. Feminists are so brazen that they will use the slanted standards as "proof" that men should be automatically arrested in any domestic dispute, and in most cases they get their way.

However, imagine if we had a "primary aggressor" law in regards to interactions between police and citizens. In 90% or more of the violent encounters, we'd have to assume that the police are the guilty party. By feminist logic, anyone who wins in a violent encounter because they are stronger and more physically capable should be assumed – all else being equal – to be a violent criminal. It has nothing to do with justice, and everything to do with feminist equalism — enforced with violence, naturally.

Because of primary aggressor laws, if Travis Alexander had successfully defended himself from Jodi Arias, feminists would have lined up with Arias and demanded he go to prison, and there's a chance that's where he would be today. It's a sobering thought for any man in a relationship with a woman, but that's the world we live in.

Having a hard time managing workers? Blame the patriarchy

W.F. Price · 15 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

An FBI agent assigned to the Seattle field office in 2005 has sued the agency because she was "not respected as a leader by her subordinates." The agent in question has a history of making complaints:

> In a lawsuit that partially cleared a key hurdle Thursday, Special Agent-in-Charge Laura M. Laughlin, 55, complained that she has been denied at least 10 promotions since she took over the FBI's Seattle field office in early 2005. She also asserts that she has been pressured since 2007 to retire from the high-profile position and has been denied requests for more staff.
>
> "As a combined effect of all these matters, she is not respected as a leader by her subordinates and management chain in the way that (special agents-in-charge) normally are," attorneys David Wachtel and Eliza Dermody wrote in a legal brief.
>
> Laughlin first complained of FBI behavior in 1997, when she filed an internal discrimination complaint against a supervisor. That complaint was subsequently settled.

Not only were her subordinates male, but white, too:

> Shortly after arriving in Seattle, Laughlin said in a legal filing, she found "multiple instances of race and sex discrimination and insubordination directed at a supervisory-special agent in her division by two white, male special agents." Laughlin further claimed the two white agents "had the support of a close associate" of FBI Director Robert Mueller.
>
> Laughlin says she reassigned the two white agents. Shortly thereafter, in June 2006, she says the FBI "severely damaged" her reputation when it took the "unprecedented step" of transferring a major homicide investigation to another field office. The investigation in question was into the 2001 killing of federal prosecutor Thomas Wales in his Seattle home. The case remains unsolved.

Traditionally, those in positions of authority and power would know better than to blame their troubles on underlings, but in this upside-down world even the President can be called a victim of "discrimination."

I wonder whether it will get to the point where companies owned by women will be allowed to sue male workers for discrimination if they do not perform well. Obviously, female leadership is unimpeachable, so it must be the fault of saboteurs and wreckers…

UK Man Wins Compensation for Paternity Fraud

W.F. Price · 15 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In a sign that times are changing Richard Rodwell, a man whose wife fooled him into believing children she conceived by affairs were his, was awarded £25,000 ($40,000) in damages following a lawsuit he filed against the cheating wife.

After giving birth to two illegitimate children, his wife Helen divorced him and began to collect child support. Rodwell paid a total of $25,000 in child support before rumors concerning the paternity of his putative children began to surface, upon which he sought a DNA test. Much to his dismay, it turned out that neither of the two children he'd grown close to over the years were his.

Sadly, Rodwell married a really nasty piece of work. His marriage started to fall apart in 2004 when his wife began to openly conduct affairs:

> …by 2004 the marriage was struggling. Mr Rodwell explained: 'Helen was disappearing for several days without telling me where she was going. I only found out from used train and coach tickets I discovered.
>
> 'I would collect the children from school as usual and walk into the house and it would be empty with no note or anything. Helen would go to places such as Newcastle or Manchester, and if I asked why she had gone there she would say, "Nothing to do with you."'

When Rodwell discovered the children were not his own, they rejected him, blaming him for ruining their lives. Sadly, they do not seem to have put the responsibility where it really belonged: with their mother. But this is one of the cruelest things about paternity fraud. The children are stuck with the mother, but they lose a father, so who are they going to blame? It's easiest, of course, to blame the innocent party, because he is no longer "attached" to them.

His ex wife didn't apologize, naturally…

> 'I confronted Helen on the phone but she insisted I was Laura's father. Finally I said I wanted DNA testing.'
>
> The DNA test was done by mouth swab and when the result came back Mr Rodwell was stunned. He said: 'When I saw the letter stating that I wasn't Laura's father I just broke down.
>
> 'When I phoned Helen we had an argument and she just said, "What did you expect." She didn't even say sorry.'

One of the (intentional) results of feminism was that women were free to victimize their families with impunity, but it seems that in England at least people may have finally had enough.

It's a shame what children have to deal with, but their mother committed fraud, and they will have to pay for it just the same as if they had a father who got caught embezzling from a company. The solution to these problems would be a complete overhaul of family law that removed all incentives for women to cuckold husbands and run off with children to collect support payments.

Will 2020 be a year of upheaval?

W.F. Price · 16 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Social thinker and occasional Spearhead commenter The Fifth Horseman (AKA The Futurist) predicted a few years ago that misandry would come to a head around the year 2020, after which "The Misandry Bubble" would pop.

TFH focused on sexual dynamics and the escalating oppression of men, which, although not the entire picture, is a very important factor in national and global affairs.

Now, academic Peter Turchin, a proponent of "cliodynamics," is predicting the convergence of a number of trends around the same time, with possibly revolutionary implications.

Turchin has identified rising inequality as a destabilizing factor that could lead to social disruption and a chaotic environment, similar to the ominous years of the early 20th century when the US was threatened with violent revolution. I recall watching the film J. Edgar early last year, and although I was aware of how tense the atmosphere was in the 1920s, the movie was a good reminder that terrorism and social strife are nothing new in the US. According to Turchin, we are facing a repeat of that era if something isn't done quickly about the stark economic inequality that has emerged since 1980.

Both TFH's article and Turchin's are long reads, but they both conclude that by 2020 the situation in the US will be profoundly different from what most of us were familiar with as children.

From Turchin:

> Three years ago I published a short article in the science journal Nature. I pointed out that several leading indicators of political instability look set to peak around 2020. In other words, we are rapidly approaching a historical cusp, at which the US will be particularly vulnerable to violent upheaval. This prediction is not a 'prophecy'. I don't believe that disaster is pre-ordained, no matter what we do. On the contrary, if we understand the causes, we have a chance to prevent it from happening.

From TFH:

> The title of this article is not the 'Misandry Crisis' or even 'The War on Misandry'. It is 'The Misandry Bubble', because the forces that will ensure the demise of the present mistreatment of men are already on the horizon. So allow me to introduce the Four Horsemen of Male Emancipation as a coalesence of many of the forces we have discussed, which will shred the present, unsustainable hierarchal order by 2020…

Air Force Compiles Catalogue of Shame

Uncle Elmer · 17 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Government sources close to The Spearhead have revealed some of the shocking materials discovered by Air Force officials during the recent agency-wide search to eliminate items which might offend women's sensibilities and/or careers. Air Force career officers and enlisted personnel worked feverishly to scour work spaces and living quarters, uncovering some 30,000 offensive objects of hated patriarchal culture. The contraband was duly cataloged and disciplinary entries made into the personnel files of the transgressors.

As profiled in Spearhead's Air Force to Scrap the Strawberry Bitch?,

Over 100 Air Force installations were inspected. Commanders of thousands of units inspected the workspaces of almost 600,000 Air Force military and civilian personnel. Commanders looked for and removed three broad categories of material: pornographic; unprofessional; or inappropriate or offensive.

According to the results, in the three categories, the Air Force found 631 instances of pornography (magazines, calendars, pictures, videos that intentionally displayed nudity or depicted acts of sexual activity);3,987 instances of unprofessional material (discrimination, professional appearance, items specific to local military history such as patches, coins, heritage rooms, log books, song books, etc); and 27,598 instances of inappropriate or offensive items (suggestive items, magazines, posters, pictures, calendars, vulgarity, graffiti).

Identified items were documented and either removed or destroyed. In some instances, findings were turned over to OSI where appropriate.

The Air Force has released a sanitized database of the inappropriate mugs, posters, trophies, crew patches, and nose art that some might call a compendium of unprofessionalism.

The document provides a "searchable" spreadsheet, a veritable treasure trove of inappropriateness, listing such shocking items as (sic) :

- pencil with small penis eraser
- photo of former Squadron Commander holding up two gay porn videos
- "Bullshit" button (like "Easy" button)
- Book, 50 Shades of Gray
- Airmen of pictures w/their wives @ beach in bikinis
- Quad chart like comparison of quality of life of USMC,USA, USN vs USAF Airmen
- Plaque "Time to put your big girl panties on" on civ female desk
- USO Photo/calendar featuring NFL cheerleaders
- Muscle magazines and photos of body builders
- 1 inappropriate item – Self magazine
- Poster of female straddling bomb
- "Gay Porn Star" Magnet
- 1 Cover of Runner's World magazine with picture of a women with penned in penis and other lewd comments
- WWII panel nose art (interior) with female back view scantily dressed airbrushed on. Utilized paper and tape to cover it due to lack of chemicals to remove it without damaging the panel. Panel is on order for replacement.
- WW II panel nose art (interior) with female fully clothed but promiscuous, labeled "Night Penetrator". Turned panel around so it doesn't show due to not having the proper chemicals to remove it without damaging the panel. Panel is on order for replacement.
- "Wicked Wanda" historical nose art based on aircraft. She was airbrushed onto the locker by one of our female Airmen. Covered the art.

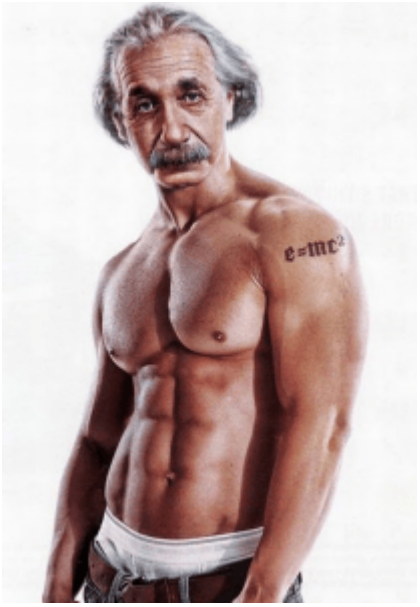
Among the materials uncovered, one in particular, brazenly displayed in a senior Air Force official's office, stands out as particularly offensive :



You heard that correctly, someone got gigged over "Buff Einstein". Now, I don't know what artist is responsible for this masterpiece so if any readers can identify [him or her] credit will be given. The graphic work is superb, with Einstein's sardonic mug attached seamlessly to the young Adonis. Beyond that it is funny on many existential levels, so much more so because of the context in which it was found and the initiative that uncovered it.

On a serious note however, women, who need to be encouraged to pursue careers in science and technology, and have only now just broken through the sexist barriers preventing them from serving in combat, should not be forced to endure wonton displays of sexually demeaning imagery that create hostile work environments and stymie their careers.

I'll bet Einstein would have laughed though.

The Feminine Mystique Hits 50

W.F. Price · 19 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

50 years ago, as a bored, middle-aged wife, perhaps longing for the exuberant days of her youthful Bolshevik activism, Betty Friedan wrote The Feminine Mystique, a book that condemned the drudgery of the 1950s housewife's life and contained the infamous line about the home being a "comfortable concentration camp."

Given Friedan's later equivocation about feminism's direction, it may not have been her intention to kick off second wave feminism when she wrote the book. Although Friedan later embraced the movement she supposedly founded, her original idea may have been to criticize the prevailing conservative, Freudian organization of American culture and society, which ran counter to her Marxist Leninist values.

Although I haven't read the book, it apparently stresses the need for women to engage in work outside the home, which is a basic Communist tenet. One of the odd things one notices about the former USSR and Eastern Bloc countries is that the "housewife" didn't really exist until recently — women over 50 or so never had the opportunity to be "stay at home moms." However, prior to the expansion of the American middle class in the postwar era, housewives were fairly rare in the US as well. The "housewife" as we think of her today was a 1950s innovation, based largely on Freudian principles introduced to the masses via TV shows such as Father Knows Best. Before then, only the upper classes could afford that kind of lifestyle; for most women, when they weren't taking care of babies they were working in one capacity or another.

Another clue that Friedan was fairly orthodox in her Marxism was her disdain for homosexuality (homosexuality was linked to bourgeois decadence in Stalinist Communism), despite the fact that feminism and lesbianism have always gone hand in hand in the Anglo world.

In an American Quarterly article, professor Daniel Horowitz brings to light the fact that, despite her claims in 1963 that she "wasn't even conscious of the woman problem," she was writing pamphlets about women's issues for labor union publications at least a decade earlier:

> In 1951, a labor journalist with a decade's experience in protest movements described a trade union meeting where rank-and-file women talked and men listened. Out of these conversations, she reported, emerged the realization that the women were "fighters — that they refuse any longer to be paid or treated as some inferior species by their bosses, or by any male workers who have swallowed the bosses' thinking." The union was the UE, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, the most radical American union in the postwar period and in the 1940s what historian Ronald Schatz, appreciative of the UE's place in history, has called "the largest communist-led institution of any kind in the United States." In 1952 that same journalist wrote a pamphlet, UE Fights for Women Workers, that the historian Lisa Kannenberg, unaware of the identity of its author, has called "a remarkable manual for fighting wage discrimination that is, ironically, as relevant today as it was in 1952." At the time, the pamphlet helped raise the consciousness of Eleanor Flexner, who in 1959 would publish Century of Struggle, the first scholarly history of American women. In 1953-54, Flexner relied extensively on the pamphlet when she taught a course at the Jefferson School of Social Science in New York on "The Woman Question." Flexner's participation in courses at the school, she later said, "marked the beginning of my real involvement in the issues of women's rights, my realization that leftist organizations — parties, unions — were also riddled with male supremacist prejudice and discrimination." The labor journalist and pamphlet writer was Betty Friedan.

So it looks as though Betty Friedan was one of the many dedicated Communists who caused so many problems immediately after WWII. I once looked up a list of known Communist front groups in the US, and noticed that quite a few of them were women's groups. Combined with accounts I've read from former Cheka agents, it makes for pretty convincing evidence that feminism was deliberately fostered in the US by Soviet agents. It makes sense to use women in that manner, because authorities are not as suspicious of women, and they can operate under the radar far more easily than men. Women also make excellent spies.

Although I'm sure resurgent feminism would have emerged in one form or another with or without Betty Friedan, it is interesting to note second wave feminism's Cold War origins in Marxist infiltration of US society. However, I'm not sure the origins are all that important, because once it took hold the movement took on a distinctly Anglo American character.

Despite the accolades, Friedan was a catalyst more than a true pioneer. It turns out she was little more than a loyal Bolshevik pawn who suddenly stumbled onto success by writing a thinly-veiled Marxist critique of American capitalist society from a woman's perspective.

Michael Kimmel's Quack Sociology

W.F. Price · 20 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On the occasion of the 50th anniversary of The Feminine Mystique, Betty Friedan's Marxist-inspired critique of 1950s-era American society, a number of leading feminists wrote articles in the NY Times about how feminism should march onward to eternal victory.

One of them was male feminist Michael Kimmel, who has been mentioned here on a few occasions before. In my last article on Kimmel, I pointed out that he is dishonest, and prone to using ad hominems (e.g. accusations of racism) to advance his agenda.

Male feminists often resort to twisting the truth because they have to. Credible statistics are not feminists' strong point, because the ideology relies on denial of reality, and has from the beginning when feminists declared gender to be a "social construct" — one of the biggest lies to ever make its way into popular American culture.

Kimmel's contribution to the NY Times concerns domestic violence, and why men must "change":

> Nothing better captures the importance of men helping realize the goals of feminism than efforts to end violence against women. Through courage and tenacity, women worldwide have made huge gains in raising awareness and forcing legal reform. But ultimately, because it is (some) men who commit this violence, it must be men who change.
>
> By this we mean not only those men who use violence in their relationships. We also mean the vast majority of us who have remained silent. Because men dominate parliaments, pulpits and police forces, when we are silent, we allow the violence to continue.

According to Kimmel, because some men commit DV, some men don't talk about it, and some men are tasked with dealing with crime and moral issues, we all must change. It doesn't really make any sense, but it might sound convincing to some people.

OK, say there's a heroin problem in some country, such as Switzerland. Some people are shooting heroin, some are selling it, and some are enacting and enforcing laws to deal with it. Most people – the vast majority, even – don't talk much about it, because it isn't a part of their lives.

So, this being the case, all Swiss people must change. Yes, they all bear guilt, and must think deeply about how they can change themselves to relieve themselves of the terrible burden of their shame. It doesn't matter whether they use or sell dope, or even whether they have even seen it: they are part of the problem, and must change.

Kimmel is pushing guilt onto innocent people. It's a tricky tactic, and works in Christian, guilt-based societies (probably not for much longer, though), but it's manipulative and dishonest. What it really comes down to is self-aggrandizement, because Kimmel's entire career is built around "changing" men. The more men who need to be changed, the better for Michael Kimmel, so what does he do? He goes around, like a quack doctor trying to drum up business through fake diagnoses, saying we all have a problem.

It isn't about harm reduction, which would be as simple as diminishing the financial and emotional conflict in divorce and custody disputes by mandating shared parenting (something he opposes, BTW), but rather increasing Michael Kimmel's stature and prestige.

Swedish Equalism Endangering Lives

W.F. Price · 20 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Since the late 90s, Sweden has mandated equality in firefighting jobs, which has required a severe lowering of physical standards to bring women into the force. According to Dispatch International, a Swedish magazine, female firefighters take more than ten times as long to open reinforced doors, which would leave most people dead if they were trapped in a burning apartment for that long:

> If your apartment catches fire, firemen need to get in there fast to save you. A common apartment door can be forced open in 10 to 20 seconds; a security-enforced door takes 45 to 60 seconds.
>
> Now information has leaked that female firefighters take more than 10 minutes to break through a secured door.
>
> "If this is true, it is deeply serious. After that amount of time, there will be no life left to save on the other side," says Henrik Persson, fire chief in Höganäs.
>
> After the article in Dispatch International on January 26th [not in English!] on how the diversity agitation within the Emergency Services South endangers public safety, the editors have received several hints about how bad things are in Swedish fire brigades. The situation seems to be worst in the city of Lund, whose fire brigade has been highlighted as "exemplary" due to an almost perfectly equal gender balance.

Unfortunately for Swedes, firefighting conditions have been getting more difficult as the country becomes more like the rest of the world (i.e. more diverse), which has prompted many Swedes to enhance security, and therefore increased the time required to break through doors.

> "The conditions when saving lives in buildings keep getting tougher. It is more common now that that we encounter security doors of various classifications when we need to enter an apartment," says Henrik Persson.
>
> "Forcing oneself through a security door requires strenuous muscle-effort and teamwork, under intense time pressure. And although I do not know of the specific exercise in Lund, where women took eleven minute to force the security door open, I am aware that competence is falling in several areas, simply because the demands for physical strength have been lowered."
>
> Can people survive eleven minutes in a burning apartment?
>
> "No, after eleven minutes there is, in theory, no life left to save on the other side of the door," replies Henrik Persson.

How many lives is enforced workplace equality worth? This is an entirely fair question, because we must ask at what point the right to life is trumped by the modern privilege of pretending that men and women are exactly equal in every ability. Unfortunately, I doubt an answer will be forthcoming.

Girls and Guns

Featured Guest · 21 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Keyster

A few weeks ago I attended a Concealed Carry class as required by my state to apply for a permit to carry a handgun. Out of about 45 attendees, two thirds were women. They all listened very intently and took notes as the material was presented. I wasn't offended that they might have been encroaching on a "male space", as a matter of fact I even thought "good for them". Unfortunately if a state law passes, these women will not be able to protect themselves using a hand gun on our college campuses.

Ever since the Sandy Hook catastrophe liberal politicians have revived their campaign of government over-reach on the 2nd Amendment because they believe government is the solution to all of society's ills, (while ironically it's their policies that end up causing a great many of them). Something bad happened, the government must act! So in a classic example of liberal Democrats protecting us from evil, they've managed to also offend one of their core constituencies – women. According to them women might not know how to operate a gun effectively or shoot someone by mistake, as pointed out by Colorado Democratic Rep Joe Salazar:

"There are some gender inequities on college campuses, this is true and universities have been faced with that situation for a long time. It's why we have call boxes, it's why we have safe zones, that's why we have the whistles. Because you just don't know who you're gonna be shooting at. And you don't know if you feel like you're gonna be raped, or if you feel like someone's been following you around or if you feel like you're in trouble and when you may actually not be, that you pop out that gun and you pop — pop a round at somebody."

So even though women on college campuses have faced gender inequities for a long time, women can't be sure if they feel like they're going to be raped, they can't tell if they're in trouble and might start busting caps in every direction in a fit of confusion and hysteria. On the contrary none of the women in my CCW class seemed like the type to do this, but maybe I'm just not sexist enough. Can you think of anything better than a gun to "equalize" a woman with a bad guy that wants to harm her?

But fear not for our new Democrat Majority in Colorado is giving women other options to protect themselves from bad men. In a policy statement from the University of Colorado they're all about helping women protect themselves as long as it doesn't involve a firearm:

What To Do If You Are Attacked

These tips are designed to help you protect yourself on campus, in town, at your home, or while you travel. These are preventative tips and are designed to instruct you in crime prevention tactics.

Be realistic about your ability to protect yourself.

(You're nothing but a girl, he's bigger, stronger and faster than you.)

Your instinct may be to scream, go ahead! It may startle your attacker and give you an opportunity to run away.

(It's cool to scream like a girl in this case, even though it's something guys would never do.)

Kick off your shoes if you have time and can't run in them.

(High heels are sexy. but they're not very practical.)

Don't take time to look back; just get away.

(Turning around to try and identify whoever you think is attacking you might slow you down.)

If your life is in danger, passive resistance may be your best defense.

Just let him pretty much do whatever he wants, perhaps strike up a conversation.)

Tell your attacker that you have a disease or are menstruating.

(This will cause the attacker to flee from you in disgust.)

Vomiting or urinating may also convince the attacker to leave you alone.

(Assuming he's not into that kind of thing, the discharge of bodily fluids is a sensible defense.)

Yelling, hitting or biting may give you a chance to escape, do it!

(And it will also piss him off enough to clock you upside the head or stab you, rendering you unconscious or dead.)

Understand that some actions on your part might lead to more harm.

(IOW – See above)

Remember, every emergency situation is different. Only you can decide which action is most appropriate.

(I'd like to carry a gun and defend myself with it, but you've made it illegal for me to do so.)

Equalist Democrats in Colorado want to take away the very tool that actually EQUALIZES women with a male attacker, because guns are scary and she might not know how to use it properly. Forget that it's ostensibly meant to prevent a mass shooting. They would prefer women on campus spontaneously throw up, piss themselves and throw a hysterical hissy fit or "passively-resist" the attacker. How utterly sexist of them! "AAHHH! Please don't rape me, I have Chlamydia right now!"

Bad guys are opportunists. Like a pack of wolves culling the herd for a calf or the weak and wounded. Women are easy targets, other men are best avoided. The safest place for a woman is with a man, preferably a man with a gun. If she happens to be independent; avoid being a victim of "rape culture" or a nasty mugging, if she wants equality with men out to harm her, she should learn how to shoot a gun and carry it with her. Your government will never end violence against women, or anyone else. Don't let "The Party of Women" deny you the right to protect yourself. Don't be a victim.

Sheryl Sandberg and the Emergent Self-Parody of Feminist Propaganda

Uncle Elmer · 21 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I couldn't make a better work of satire if I tried, but these people are serious.

Today in Business Insider, a hilarious stock photo essay attempts to breathe new life into the stale corpse of feminist delusion. The graphic work looks suspiciously like the legendary "What Happened to Women?" format of yesteryear, which only proves that in today's competitive journalism market savvy career writers are starting to pilfer ideas from the mano-sphere, not to mention certain well-known "game" bloggers. All the requisite "women empowered/women victims" imagery is there, along with some great "frat boy" memes, which I especially like since my son Hermann is now living the frat-boy lifestyle. I ast him would he like me to show up piss-drunk and give an inspirational talk to the fellas but so far he has been non-committal.

The Business Insider stock-photo essay profiles a forthcoming book by Sheryl Sandberg, of "FaceBook" fame, which posits that the reason women are so downtrodden is that they are not "taught" to promote themselves as leaders. This is old whine in new bottles. The consistent refrain from dissatisfied women is that no one taught them, or they were taught wrong, or society expects them, or society doesn't approve, or boys were encouraged and they were not, and on and on and on. For all the empowerment they are oddly incapable of taking command of the feminist voices swirling about in their heads. I would leave a pesky comment, but I don't have a FaceBook account, because FaceBook is for women.

Sandberg also says that "A truly equal world would be one where women ran half our countries and companies and men ran half our homes", obviously not having read Spearhead's landmark A Man Wants a Wife, Not a "Co-Worker" and its resulting media firestorm. One wonders how long she will beat the equalism pulpit before flagging FaceBook shares drive her home for good.

Look to your favorite media outlets to provide impassioned essays on Sheryl's new book in the coming weeks. I would leave a pesky comment on "The Atlantic", but they banned me some time ago.

100 Years Ago All Over Again

W.F. Price · 22 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the popular moral crusades of today concerns “sex trafficking,” which is supposedly an enormous problem, but in reality is blown all out of proportion. It probably is true that prostitution is on the rise, but as usual this is an outgrowth of economic inequality (why work at WalMart for peanuts when you can make a week’s worth of wages in a night lying flat on your back?).

Interestingly, there was a similar moral panic over sex trafficking almost exactly a century ago, and it prompted a crusade by the usual suspects — privileged women with too much time on their hands.

One woman who spoke out about the issue should be familiar to those with some knowledge of 20th century political history. Her name was Emma Goldman, and she was a prominent anarchist activist who was eventually deported for radicalism. In the following essay, although Goldman soon descends into anti-Christian bigotry, she initially makes some observations about the hysteria and hubbub that would be just as relevant today as they were 100 years ago:

> The Traffic in Women
>
> OUR REFORMERS have suddenly made a great discovery – the white slave traffic. The papers are full of these “unheard-of conditions,” and lawmakers are already planning a new set of laws to check the horror.
>
> It is significant that whenever the public mind is to be diverted from a great social wrong, a crusade is inaugurated against indecency, gambling, saloons, etc. And what is the result of such crusades? Gambling is increasing, saloons are doing a lively business through back entrances, prostitution is at its height, and the system of pimps and cadets is but aggravated.
>
> How is it that an institution, known almost to every child, should have been discovered so suddenly? How is it that this evil, known to all sociologists, should now be made such an important issue?
>
> To assume that the recent investigation of the white slave traffic (and, by the way, a very superficial investigation) has discovered anything new, is, to say the least, very foolish. Prostitution has been, and is, a widespread evil, yet mankind goes on its business, perfectly indifferent to the sufferings and distress of the victims of prostitution. As indifferent, indeed, as mankind has remained to our industrial system, or to economic prostitution.
>
> Only when human sorrows are turned into a toy with glaring colors will baby people become interested – for a while at least. The people are a very fickle baby that must have new toys every day. The “righteous” cry against the white slave traffic is such a toy. It serves to amuse the people for a little while, and it will help to create a few more fat political jobs – parasites who stalk about the world as inspectors, investigators, detectives, and so forth.

Indeed, there is nothing new under the sun.

Is Buddhism Feminist?

W.F. Price · 23 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A number of progressives prefer Buddhism because they think it is more in line with their self-centered thinking than Abrahamic faiths. This is ironic, given that self-abnegation is more of a feature of Buddhism than it is even of Christianity and Judaism, but ignorance frees people up to invent their own interpretations.

Nevertheless, I thought I'd set the record straight with a passage from Buddhist scripture. The following is from the Anguttara Nikaya, the fourth of the five nikayas, which are canonical texts in Theraveda Buddhism.

> ANGUTTARA NIKAYA 4:91 – SUJATA SUTTA THE SEVEN TYPES OF WIVES
>
> One day after a meal, as the Buddha was giving a discourse, much shouting and yelling was heard in the house as Sujata was again scolding the servants. The Enlightened One interrupted his discourse and asked Anathapindika what kind of a commotion this was, that sounded like the noisy shouts of fisher folk. The householder answered that it was his own daughter-in-law, who did not behave properly towards her husband or his parents, who did not give alms, who was faithless and unbelieving, and who was forever causing conflict.
>
> Then an unusual thing happened: the Buddha asked that she be called. When she appeared before him, he asked her which of the seven types of wives she wanted to be. She replied that she did not understand the meaning of this, and asked for more explanation. So the Enlightened One described the seven kinds of wives to her in verse:
>
> Who, with mind corrupted, is unfeeling Loves other men but her husband despises, He who with wealth has gained her She even seeks to kill — a Slayer is such a wife.
>
> Whatever her husband gets for her by trade, By skilled profession or a farmer's work, She tries to filch a little just for herself. Such a wife may well be called a Thief.
>
> The slothful glutton, bent on idling, A woman rude and fierce with coarse speech, He who supports her, she dominates. Such a wife a Tyrant must be called.
>
> She who always for her husband cares With sympathy, like a mother for her son, Who carefully guards his stored-up wealth, Such a wife may Motherly be called.
>
> She who holds her husband in the same regard As younger sister holds the elder born, Who humbly serves her husband's every wish, As Sisterly is such a wife known.
>
> She whom her husband's sight will always please, Like friends who see each other after long a time, Who nobly bred and virtuous, devoted to her husband, A Friend is she as well as wife.
>
> From anger free, afraid of punishment, Who bears with her husband with patient heart, And without grudge obeys his every wish, A Handmaid is she and a wife.
>
> Who is called a Slayer, a Tyrant, or a Thief, Who is rude, unvirtuous, and disrespectful, Such kinds of wives will on their death To hellish worlds of misery depart.
>
> But wives like Mother, Sister, Friend and Handmaid, Firm in virtue, imbued with long termed self-control, Such kinds of wives will on their death To happy destinies depart.
>
> "These, Sujata, are the seven kinds of wives a man may have," said the Blessed One, "and which of them are you?"
>
> Deeply moved, Sujata replied that from then on she would strive to be a handmaid to her husband. The words of the Enlightened One had shown her how to conduct herself as a wife. Later she became a faithful disciple of the Buddha, to whom she was ever grateful for her salvation.

> Any man who repeated the above without first saying it was Buddhist scripture would be called a raging misogynist. It is clear that Buddhism frowns on modern feminist values, like all religions that have stood > the test of time.

>
> I wonder, why is it that what has been seen as wicked for all of known history is celebrated today? Has humanity fundamentally changed, or are we, like we have so many times in the past, just willfully defying the ancient truth?

The Oscars: Bastion of Patriarchy?

W.F. Price · 24 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In one of those curious American ironies, it is often the institutions that are the foundation of the political and cultural left that are the least diverse of all, and the motion picture industry is no exception. Today, one female director – Kathryn Bigelow – will be conspicuously absent from the Oscars. It is true that Zero Dark Thirty is a controversial film, but Bigelow's effort was good enough to warrant inclusion. There is plenty to dislike about the movie's message and what it portrays, but as a portrait of the US during the War on Terror it is so far unsurpassed. However, Bigelow won an Oscar in 2010 with The Hurt Locker – another film about our overseas adventures – so there may be the sense that she's had her turn.

In The Atlantic, Govindini Murti writes that studio film directors remain overwhelmingly male:

> At the Oscars ceremony this weekend, not only will Kathryn Bigelow's name not be read out on the list of the nominees for a Best Director Oscar, but for the 81st time in 85 years, no other woman's will be, either. And while blame for Bigelow's Oscar snub is being laid on Zero Dark Thirty' s perceived controversial politics, the lack of any other women nominees for a directing award exposes a more fundamental problem: the scarcity of women playing major roles both off screen and on screen in Hollywood.
>
> Even though women buy 50 percent of movie tickets and form a majority of the U.S. population, only 4.4 percent of Hollywood's top 100 studio movies are directed by women in any given year. The disproportionately small number of female directors in Hollywood seems to have a direct impact on the number of women seen on-screen. A 2010 USC Annenberg study led by Stacy L. Smith notes that movies with male directors featured only 29.3 percent female actors, whereas in movies with at least one female director, that number rose to 44.6 percent.

Although studio films are still a masculine preserve, independent films are reaching gender parity:

> At the recent Sundance Film Festival, a record 50 percent of the films in the U.S. Dramatic Competition were directed by women. Overall, of the 119 films at Sundance this year, 34 percent had female directors. And for the second year in a row, a woman (Jill Soloway) won the Best Director Award in the U.S. Dramatic Competition, following last year's winner Ava DuVernay.
>
> A new USC Annenberg study co-authored by Stacy L. Smith, Katherine Pieper, and Marc Choueiti confirms that there are more opportunities for women directors in the indie world versus the studio world. Commissioned by the Sundance Institute and Women in Film Los Angeles, the study examined 820 feature films screened at Sundance from 2002 to 2012. The study found that 22.2 percent of the festival's U.S. narrative-competition films and 41.1 percent of the U.S. documentary-competition films were directed by women.
>
> What accounts for the gap between Sundance and Hollywood when it comes to women? Smith says that ingrained attitudes about female directors and stars play a big role: "In Hollywood, women in front of or behind the camera still seem to be perceived as a risky investment."
>
> At a Sundance panel on women directors, Naomi Foner (an Oscar-nominated screenwriter, and the mother of Maggie and Jake Gyllenhaal) described to me the difficulty she had in getting her directing debut Very Good Girls (starring Dakota Fanning and Elizabeth Olsen) off the ground. Foner said she had been in meetings in which she pointed out the success of women-centered films like Sex and the City, Twilight, and The Hunger Games, and "the executive will say to you, 'That was a fluke.'"
>
> When I spoke with Twilight director Catherine Hardwicke at the Los Angeles Film Festival this past summer, she echoed what Smith and Foner said, telling me that "all the writers I know now, even right after The Hunger Games, go to meetings and have pitches for television series for female protagonists, and they're told > [Hardwicke mimics a deep male voice], 'Well, we need a male protagonist.' It's so bizarre, it's like there's a disconnect." Jerusha Hess, who co-wrote Napoleon Dynamite, has heard similar stories: "I've had friends who've done animation, and they're told they can't sell this because there's not a boy in this fairy tale, and you're like, 'It's a fairy tale—it's supposed to be about a girl.'"

I wonder whether people in the American movie business are aware of the pink ghetto phenomenon, and are trying to preserve their dominance in the global movie industry. If the film industry were to become more female, like education, medicine and law, perhaps it would lose some of its vitality and prestige. Because the industry commands such awesome cultural power, its leaders are loathe to move in that direction.

Think about it: with the competition opened up to hordes of cheaper female labor, how much room would there be for mega-millionaire directors like Steven Spielberg and George Lucas?

Gender Roles, the Woman's Father and the Afterparty

Featured Guest · 25 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

by Spanier

I. Gender Roles

Biologically, women are the critical link to the next generation. Animal breeders all know this, as does anyone who stops to think for a minute: one man can impregnate 10 women, but 10 men cannot get one woman any more pregnant than one can. So, for reproduction and perpetuation of the human race, women are essential, while men are expendable.

When it comes to civilization, on the other hand, men are essential, while women are expendable. If every male truck driver suddenly decided to stop working, kick back, and relax, the economy would collapse within hours. If every female truck driver did the same, the overall effect would be insignificant.

So, assuming we want both the human race and civilization to continue, men and women must both be encouraged to play their parts– or at least not _dis_couraged from doing so. Women need to have babies, and men need to build trades, professions, and careers to work and provide for them. Both these roles involve considerable challenges and take considerable effort.

Let's look at these roles one at a time. If a woman wants children, from a purely medical standpoint, at what age should she try to get pregnant if she wishes to minimize the risk of infertility, complications of pregnancy, miscarriage, and birth defects? 17? 18? Let's just say 21. At this age, she is in her physical prime, and best able to cope with the complex and demanding task of bearing and nurturing a small child.

Why, then, does our society teach a young woman that the route to happiness lies in postponing childbearing until her 30′s or beyond? Why do we tell her to waste her prime years for her most essential function in life on completely irrelevant pursuits? Suppose you were talking to a 12-year-old boy who expressed an ambition to be a professional baseball player. Would you advise him to go to college, study law or accounting, build a corporate career, and then take up baseball when in his 30′s? Of course not. If he is serious about sports, his prime age for this activity will be in his late teens and early 20′s, and it would make no sense to pursue a different career at such a point in his life. It would be far more reasonable to play baseball when in his 20′s, retire at 30, and then take up something else. And so it should be with women and childbearing.

By pointing out these obvious facts, I am not claiming that the only thing women are good for is having babies. But it is their only _essential_ function. They certainly can and do help humanity in other ways, and there may be some women whose contributions in other fields are impressive enough that they outweigh their failure to reproduce. But a society suffused with Special Snowflake Syndrome, which teaches that women in general are so talented that they should chase lofty ambitions at the expense of fulfilling their basic roles in life, is a society that is headed towards demographic and cultural demise.

Having babies, of course, is only part of the picture. Children have to be fed, clothed, protected, cared for and educated during their long periods of immaturity, and to fill these needs, the role of fathers is all-important. As the Elusive Wapiti has brilliantly pointed out, the one thing that men desire most deeply, and the ultimate motivation for them to work and produce wealth, is a durable bond with their own biological offspring. A man may never completely leave the "wild oats" stage, but family interests will generally grow and come to the fore as he moves into his late 20′s and early 30′s. At this point, hopefully, he has a fair amount of experience both in the ways of women and in the business world, and has acquired enough resources to support a wife and children.

Combining these ideas allows us to rediscover a paradigm that was well established in classical Greece: Men should generally marry at around age 30, women at around age 20.

II. The Woman's Father

To introduce couples and promote fertile relationships, third parties and extended families, particularly women's fathers, need to take a much more active role. While PUA types go on about how, deep down, a woman wants to be dominated and ravished, I submit that, deep down, a young girl wants to be protected and guided by her father into a successful marriage. The current model of sending her unsupervised to high school and college, leaving her to her own sexual devices, and hoping for the best, is a form of abandonment bordering on the criminal. And a man who consents to his unmarried daughter patronizing bars and clubs in search of hookups, or having sex with men unknown to him, is guilty of a gross dereliction of duty towards both his family and his civilization.

On the contrary, is it a father's responsibility to solicit and cultivate the best suitors for his daughter, and this effort should begin many years in advance of her reaching a marriageable age. Like the boy who wants to play baseball, a girl needs to start no later than age 12 in planning for marriage and children, and she needs considerable help from her family in doing so.

Indeed, a straightforward application of red-pill wisdom shows that young women are simply not capable of making wise sexual choices on their own, and it is utterly unreasonable to expect them to do so. Again as understood by the ancient Greeks, women have a strong anti-civilizational bent. They will, if left on their own, reward the destroyers, rather than the creators, of civilization with their sexual favors, and in the process ruin themselves for better men and destroy their own prospects for a happy life.

To use a simple analogy: A patch of dirt, if left alone, will not continue to be bare ground– unattractive weeds will grow there. If I want it to look nice, I have to take an active role in planting and cultivating desirable plants, such as grass, thereby crowding out potential weeds. And so it is with women– they will inevitably have sex with someone, but their fathers need to make sure that that someone is a man who can and will provide for her and the resulting children.

III.The Afterparty

Women also have "wild oats" urges, but for a woman, any indulgence of these desires must happen after, not before, she has children. She may then, hopefully after an amicable negotiation with the children's father, join a different category of individual, but at the risk of devaluing her sexual brand.

We may call them, euphemistically, "free agents" — those women who neither have, nor have in prospect, a long term relationship with a man, but who engage in short term liaisons of various types. Much maligned in the manosphere, these "free agents" actually serve a vital purpose, by allowing younger men to gain sexual experience before marriage, and by serving as safety valves for men of all ages. The problem arises when the free agents try to transition to long term relationships or marriage– to "hop off the carousel" in Dalrock's phrasing. In that case, especially when there is misrepresentation or concealment involved, a man can be misled into investing far more in the relationship than it is worth. As always in human relations, economics plays a central role.

“Righteous” Indignation over the Oscars

W.F. Price · 26 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

To my amusement, I noticed that my take on the Oscars turned out to be somewhat accurate. It was indeed a rather male-oriented production as far as contemporary show business goes. Thanks to Seth MacFarlane, it turned out to have some ribald male humor, and was not exactly deferential to women. But how could it be otherwise? Without inserting some irreverent masculine playfulness into the mix, it would have been nothing but a sappy sequin fest that would guarantee nearly zero male viewership next year.

However, the jokes – MacFarlane’s boob song in particular – have inspired some rage on the part of humorless women across our nation. I suppose that’s to be expected, but this time there were a number of really, seriously offended men!

Spencer Kornhaber, who writes for The Atlantic, remarked upon the “banality” of MacFarlane’s “sexism and racism at the Oscars.” He was referring to the line about “the banality of evil” in the title of Hannah Arendt’s book on the Eichmann trial for WWII war crimes. Get it? He’s comparing making jokes about female actresses to the Final Solution, and Seth MacFarlane to Adolf Eichmann. That’s Kornhaber humor. Really funny, isn’t it?

From his article:

> But then William Shatner was beamed in for a Family Guy-esque experiment in the meta. Captain Kirk had come from the future to reveal that the headlines the next day would proclaim MacFarlane the worst Oscar host ever, unless he changed his routine. Cut to a clip—from the future, see—of MacFarlane performing “We Saw Your Boobs,” during which he essentially read off a Mr. Skin database of shirtless-actress appearances over time. The bit could have been a hilarious acknowledgement of MacFarlane’s past idiocies—if it had been, like, five seconds long. But no: We got a full minute-plus of breast chronicling, followed by MacFarlane’s definition-of-homophobic insistence to Shatner that he wasn’t a member of the gay men’s chorus he’d just sang with.
>
> From there, the jokes just got more and more… well, what’s the word? Calling them offensive gives them too much power, which isn’t to say that black people shouldn’t have felt uncomfortable about MacFarlane pretending to mix up Denzel Washington and Eddie Murphy, or that half the population needn’t have squirmed when MacFarlane called Zero Dark Thirty’s plotline an example of “a woman’s innate ability to never ever let anything go.” What the jokes were, really, was stupid, boring, and empty: humor that relied less on its own patently sexist, racist, homophobic, etc. content than on admiration for or disgust with the host’s willingness to deliver it. So much of comedy is about the shock of recognition, of seeing some previously unacknowledged truth suddenly acknowledged, but the only recognition MacFarlane offered was that some people say dumb things about other peoples’ gender/racial/sexual identities. Which, of course, should not be shocking at all.

What hole are these guys pulling their indignation out of? Jokes are routinely made at men’s expense, men are ridiculed constantly in media, and yet we must draw the line where women are concerned.

Whether or not MacFarlane’s jokes were politically correct is not necessarily relevant to whether they were funny or not, but that’s exactly what Kornhaber is saying.

I look at the men of my generation and younger who supposedly speak for us, and it’s embarrassing. They are like so many tattletales and teachers’ pets who do nothing but take the fun out of life. Instead of speaking for their peers, they might as well be speaking for old ladies.

Spencer Kornhaber, like so many of our young, male journalists, is a little twat. If anything was inappropriate and humorless, it was his Nazi reference in the title of his article, but let’s be honest: it wasn’t his intention to be funny.

No, if anything, Kornhaber was doing his best to kill humor dead. For that, at least, he has a talent.

Comment of the Week: How Feminism Destroys Economic Equality

W.F. Price · 27 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Responding to Spanier's poston raising daughters, commenter Jean Valjean points out some of the problems with feminism+hypergamy as they relate to family formation and economic equality. Not only do men lose out, but women as well, as the combined force of female social elitism and assortative mating conspire to concentrate earnings in the hands of the few.

It would be difficult to argue with Jean's logic, which is why feminists almost always ignore these issues, despite the fact that they are immensely more important to your average man or woman in an average job than sexual harassment or the gender gap in wages:

> Jean Valjean
>
> Why don't women have kids at 21 instead of 31 or 41? Indeed it is far more logical for women to have kids earlier. Not just for the reasons you cite but also because by delaying a career for 10 years she can see her children to a point where they are semi-autonomous.
>
> Once her kids reach 10 she can see them off to school in the morning and spend the day going to college or trade school. By the time the kids reach high school and need the least oversight the mother can begin her career and any employer can be assured that she will be more dedicated than if she had no children or had young children.
>
> But feminists don't want this. As Simone do Beauvoire wrote in "The Second Sex," women cannot be given this choice because they will choose it.
>
> Most women intuit the lie of feminism: that being a stay at home mom is "oppression" the moment they have a child and want to stay home. For the lucky few they are afforded the luxury of doing just that because of a willing and able husband. For most women, their choices are greatly limited thanks to feminism. Many men simply cannot support a household on their own income. Women, competing against men and employing hypergamy not only results in lower status men but also lower status women.
>
> For instance, if we have a community of 1000 workers and there are 100 good jobs paying around 100k a year, and only men are allowed to work those jobs then that means that 100 families will have an income of 100k a year. But when women compete against men and say 40 of those jobs go to women and those women employ hypergamy then only 60 families have an income of 100k, and 40 have an income of 200k.
>
> This means that 40 women will have to marry men who make less than 100k. This contributes to the widening gap between the rich and poor that many financial pundits fail or refuse to recognize.
>
> This same dynamic applies to those families with two 50k incomes. The actual pain of these lower incomes is really felt by the mother most because she has to work to keep the family at the middle class level whereas 40 years ago she could choose to stay home.
>
> But the real pain is felt at the lower incomes. Even two 20k incomes aren't enough to allow a family of 4 to enter the middle class. And these lower incomes are the most common (and so is divorce among this class).
>
> As always, feminism has always benefited the rich white women the most because the same dynamic that propels the sons of the rich into high paying occupations also does the same for the daughters.
>
> The problem is that hypergamy (and high divorce not discussed above) are creating more lower income women than before. Feminism is harming women only women are too indoctrinated and selfish to realize it.
>
> (Feminism harms men more but we already know that)

How We Treat our Good Men

W.F. Price · 27 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Injustices, great and small, happen every day in family court. The system is blind to fairness, and operates on a "best interests of the child" doctrine that is fatally flawed because it exempts women from acting in the best interests of children. What this means is that wherever possible the man is always made to pay for the female's transgressions.

Most of the time these injustices are ignored, but every now and then there's a case that's so egregious it demands attention.

Take the case of USMC Staff Sergeant Brandon Parsons, a combat veteran who found, after his ex wife emptied his bank accounts and demanded a divorce while he was deployed, that their child – the reason he married her in the first place – was not his. Parsons did "the right thing." Social conservatives would applaud him for marrying the woman he impregnated. He was the kind of guy who took manning up seriously. Not only did he fight for his country, he stood by the child that he thought was his own.

This was the biggest mistake he ever made.

> A Superior Court of California judge has recently ruled that SSgt Parsons, a combat veteran of Iraq and Afghanistan, must continue to pay child support another twelve years for a child that ISN'T his—a payment that, counting the $50,000 he's already remunerated his ex-wife, Crystal Parson, will put him on pace to pay over $250,000 before his legal obligation ends (twelve years from now), according to his lawyer. This payment, broken down, takes up approximately one-third of his current salary.
>
> The judge, having made the decision because of a loophole in the events leading up to the ruling, didn't hold back in his disdain for Parsons' ex-wife's actions. The first sentence in the second paragraph of the court's ruling says it all:
>
> While the court concludes that father was, in fact, despicably duped and victimized by Petitioner Crystal Parsons's (hereinafter "Mother") fraudulent concealment regarding biological paternity, a deception which has placed a significant, continuing financial burden upon Father, existing law, as applied to the facts of this case, precludes the court from setting aside the prior paternity determination or ordering genetic blood testing.
>
> So how did this apparent calamity of justice happen? Here's the gist:
>
> After completing his first combat deployment in the Spring of 2005—of which he spent the majority of time fighting in Ramadi, Iraq—SSgt Parsons, then a twenty-year old corporal, returned to Marine Corps Base Camp Pendleton and immediately began a sexual relationship with his then-fiancé, Crystal Domenech. Their first sexual encounter was, according to court documents, on April 5, 2005.
>
> Seventeen days later, Crystal announced to Brandon that she was pregnant. Brandon, without questioning any aspects of her statement or the legitimacy of his biological paternity, decided to bump up their scheduled nuptials and spent the majority of his money (an estimated $20,000)—of which most came from his recent deployment—on her dream wedding.
>
> What both Brandon and the court now know is that Crystal Domenech Parsons had been engaged in numerous sexual affairs while he was on deployment and, consequently, the child that Brandon raised—under the assumption he was legitimately the father—was indeed that of another man. (Crystal Parsons refuses to name the true identity of the biological father to this day.) Moreover, it was both alleged by Parsons and believed by the court that Crystal chose to sleep with then-Corporal Parsons purely to cover up her previous sexual encounters and pin the pregnancy on him, therefore having access to his military benefits.

Parsons wasn't aware that the child wasn't his for almost five years. Like many idealistic young men, he refused to believe that his wife could have cheated on him. It took a divorce and some hints from one of his ex-wife's acquaintances to bring suspicion into his mind.

> SSgt Parsons' first inkling that he was not the biological father, brought to his attention by a former friend of Crystal, occurred in April of 2010, less than a year after their divorce. Within the month, Parsons had confirmed through an over-the-counter test by Identigene that the child he had been raising for four and a half years was not his.
>
> "The worst part of being a paternity fraud victim is that nobody can help you," SSgt Parsons told me in a recent phone interview. "When a guy is dealing with a break up, his buddy can say, 'Dude, I've been there.' Nobody knows what to say in that kind of situation. I broke down and the Marines around me just stood there."
>
> SSgt Parsons confronted his ex-wife soon after that. This is the exchange, according to Brandon Parsons, in his official court declaration:
>
> After she had read the result I asked her to tell me the truth. She then began telling me that while I was in Iraq she had been raped. I told her that I did not believe her and to start telling me the truth for [Child's name – Redacted] sake. I asked her how many men she had slept with while I was on deployment. When she did not answer at first I asked her if it had been more than 2 men and she nodded her head indicating "yes." I asked her if it was more than 5 and again she nodded her head indicating "yes." I asked if it was more than 7 men she had slept with. This time she screamed at me that she did not know how many. After she calmed down she told me that in March 2005 [a month before his return] she discovered she was pregnant and told her mother. She said that her mother told her that military spouse benefits were excellent and she should remember that she did not have insurance coverage for the hospital bills.
>
> (It should be noted that, by all accounts, while Parsons lost the aforementioned legal case, the court never denied the plausibility of Parsons' report of the events. In fact, the judge made it more than clear that Brandon Parsons' side of the story was the most credible and that Crystal Parsons had acted "despicably" leading up to the ruling.)

It appears that the mother-in-law was in on the deception:

> When they came into the waiting room [Child's name—Redacted] came over to me and was talking to me when Crystal's mother came and grabbed him and pulled him away telling him not to talk to me because I was a stranger now. She also began calling me names. I asked her to please stop cursing at me before the child. This made her really angry and she looked right in my eyes and told me that I should have died in Iraq like I was supposed to do*.*

Some people might not believe that a mother-in-law could be that evil. They most certainly can. There's something sick about a lot of women of that generation — the mothers of today's young women. They are the women who put the laws that have destroyed SSgt Parsons, an innocent party and a true victim, into effect. Their daughters are essentially mindless actors in the travesty playing out in courthouses across our land.

This kind of injustice cries out for action. I know our opponents want very badly to accuse us of being dangerous, violent men, but the opposite must be true: if American men have so far borne such injustice with as much restraint and patience as we have so far, we must be remarkably peaceful people. But eventually patience runs out. Restraint is a limited resource, especially when its burden falls so heavily on our warriors.

I would like the elites of this country to think very carefully about what kind of monster they have created with family law. If they value stability, they must reevaluate these policies, because they will eventually lead to tragedies. When enough men lose hope and perceive that their lives are irreparably damaged, some will resort to force and people will get hurt.

It’s time we started thinking about mitigating the damage, before it’s too late. This cannot go on forever — something has to give.

Why does AIDS = “Victim” but Pregnancy = “Your Fault?”

W.F. Price · 27 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For a long time I’ve been in the “keep government out of the bedroom” camp, but homosexuality has been overtly politicized lately — so much so that it seems to be the #1 social cause of the Obama administration. As the gay revolution becomes socially dominant, I’m losing my patience with it. It’s an issue that concerns at most maybe 3% of the population, but it takes precedence over matters that affect far more people’s lives. Lately, I’ve been thinking of it as a boutique cause that elites can support with no inconvenience to themselves. On reflection, I’m pretty sure that’s why it’s so popular amongst the nomenklatura. If you’re obscenely rich because of an unfair economic and social system that is stacked against the common man, supporting homosexuality is a way to make yourself seem righteous and progressive while doing nothing to improve the lives of the majority of people, and even while making things worse for them.

So I just thought I’d point out one blatantly hypocritical aspect of it that nobody seems to mention.

Why is it that when a man gets a woman pregnant because he had unprotected straight sex he is a rogue who must pay, while a gay man who has anal sex with some anonymous guy in a bathhouse and gets AIDS is a victim to be pitied, and by extension paid for by the rest of us?

If children are a blessing, then shouldn’t that soften our attitude toward the man who knocks some girl up? AIDS has no social benefit whatsoever, but the guy who gets it isn’t blamed. No, instead he becomes some sort of special victim, all because he couldn’t keep his pecker in his pants. And isn’t that the argument for forcing straight men to pay for unwanted pregnancies; that they didn’t have to screw the girl?

So, as it stands today, unwanted results of straight sex are bad and punished, while unwanted results of gay sex make the unlucky dude a victim?

Can someone explain how that makes sense?

A Portrait of Domestic Violence: Can You Find the Truly Innocent Victim?

W.F. Price · 28 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A photographer named Naomi Lewkowitz posted a montage of painful photos on TIME magazine depicting what life is often like with a single mother. In it, a young wife with two children has left her husband to shack up with an ex-con with very poor impulse control (who'd guess?).

Amazingly, the photographer apparently expected it to be a touching story about the difficulties faced by ex-cons, and how an oppressive society conspires against the poor, misunderstood thugs. It starts with Ms. Lewkowitz asking to take the man's picture, so it wouldn't surprise me if she found him to be somewhat alluring herself.

> I had met Shane and Maggie two-and-a-half months before. Southeastern Ohio was still warm that time of year and brimming with small regional festivals. I had gone to the Millersport Sweet Corn Festival to shoot my first assignment for an editorial photography class. Almost immediately, I spotted a man covered in tattoos, including an enormous piece on his neck that read, "Maggie Mae." He was holding a beautiful little girl with blonde curls. His gentle manner with her belied his intimidating ink, and I approached them to ask if I could take their portrait.
>
> I ended up spending my entire time at the fair with Shane, 31, and his girlfriend Maggie, 19. Maggie's two children, Kayden, four, and Memphis, nearly two, were not Shane's, but from her then-estranged husband.
>
> Shane and Maggie had started dating a month prior to meeting me, and Shane told me about his struggles with addiction and that he had spent much of his life in prison. Maggie shared her experience losing her mother to a drug overdose at the age of eight, and having the challenges of raising two small children alone while their father, who was in the Army, was stationed in Afghanistan. Before they drove home, I asked if I could continue to document them, and they agreed.
>
> I intended to paint a portrait of the catch-22 of being a released ex-convict: even though they are physically free, the metaphorical prison of stigma doesn't allow them to truly escape. That story changed dramatically one night, after a visit to a bar.

Unsurprisingly, Shane and Maggie's relationship rapidly devolves into combat, and Lewkowitz manages to catch some of it on film. The photos were not easy for me to look at, but not for the reasons most people might assume when they hear the term "domestic violence."

The automatic assumption is that the primary victim is the battered female, but when you take a look at the facts of the case that gives way to another perspective: not only did the woman knowingly place herself in a risky situation, she did the same to her children, who had no choice in the matter.

There's one photo of the thug (I can hardly think of words that would describe my contempt for a piece of shit like him) pushing little four-year-old Kayden around. As a father, there is nothing worse than knowing you are helpless to protect your son from these kinds of animals when his mother decides she wants some hot badboy action. And just as bad is to think of the potential problems when your daughter starts to look like a woman some years down the road. To top it all off, the kids' father is paying close to half of his take-home pay so that the criminal can enjoy a nice wide-screen TV (featured prominently in one photo) while he shoves his kids around.

Now, as for the mother's partial responsibility for this mess, it's pretty clear. She chose an ex-con, she apparently left her husband while he was deployed (very common — in both senses of the word), and she did it for kicks. Yes, that's right: she was in it for the action, and she says as much herself.

> "Shane was like a fast car. When you're driving it, you think 'I might get pulled over and get a ticket.' You never think that you're going to crash."

It's a surprisingly honest statement of guilt, although I doubt she feels any herself. However, she does at least provide us with an idea of the paternal equivalent of that level of stupidity and recklessness: what she did is akin to a father developing a habit of getting drunk and taking his kids for joy rides on mountain logging roads. Of all involved in the story, I have less sympathy for the mother than anyone but the ex-con she shacked up with. Certainly the kids would top my list, and then their father, who will have to live in constant fear for his children as long as their mother has custody of them. Even the photographer is a more sympathetic character; at least she was neutral and helped put the boyfriend away for a long time. If she hadn't been involved, there's a good chance it would have dragged on a lot longer.

As a mother, Maggie was negligent, but will that affect her custody of her children? Not a chance. She's a higher level of victim than the toddlers she brought into the situation. The photographer indicates as much herself, and shows not a trace of concern about the fact that she'll keep custody of the kids whether she stays with their father or not:

> I have continued to follow Maggie since the abuse, and I've also begun working closely with photographer Donna Ferrato, who first began documenting domestic violence 30 years ago.
>
> Since that November night, Maggie has moved to Alaska to be with the father of her two children, who is stationed in Anchorage. In March, I will travel to Alaska to document Maggie as she tries to put the pieces of her family and life back together. My goal is to examine the long-term effects of this incident on her current relationship, her children, and her own sense of self. Devoted to revealing these hidden stories of domestic abuse, Maggie asked me to move forward with this project and to tell her story, because she feels the photographs might be able to help someone else.

At least the kids will now be with their father. Thank God for that. But their mother will be perfectly free to put them through that hell once again if she chooses, and again nobody will be able to do a thing about it until the police show up to haul off her new beau.

Despite all this, all Lewkowitz and assorted other bleeding hearts can think of as a solution is VAWA, because they can't imagine for a moment that a so-called "victim" is part of the problem.

Twenty Years Ago Today

W.F. Price · 28 February 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On February 28, 1993 federal agents stormed the Branch Davidian complex in Waco, Texas on trumped up gun charges. Four agents and six Davidians were killed in the gunfight that broke out when heavily armed BATF agents attempted to enter the building. Both sides claimed that the other fired first, but one BATF agent said he thought the first gunshots came from the ATF "dog team" sent to kill the Davidians' dogs (standard operating practice in raids).

After a protracted siege, Janet Reno claimed that the Davidians were raping girls and abusing children, and sent in tanks to flush out the Davidians with gas. A fire broke out, and in the ensuing conflagration 76 additional Davidians, including over 20 children, perished along with leader David Koresh.

Some footage from that fateful day:

Gun Control Is Man Control

Elusive Wapiti · 1 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Found this older (mid-1990s) study linking gun control and other left-lib hobby horses to antipathy for masculinity and traditional male gender roles. A snippet:

> The relationship between the sexes has been changing since the development of oral contraceptives in the early 1960s. The biological division of labor has become less important, social roles have become more fluid. Increasing urbanization, the decline of primary industries and the rise of service industries, have devalued the male roles of hunter, provider, protector and replaced them with more equalitarian expectations. In a sense, women constitute a status group on the rise, who would like, finally, to see their concerns recognized in law and society.

> Gusfield wrote:

> > "Since governmental actions symbolize the position of groups in the status structure, seemingly ceremonial or ritual acts of government are often of great importance to many social groups. Issues which seem foolish or impractical items are often important for what they symbolize about the style or culture which is being recognized or derogated… Since drinking had been largely a male activity, the concern of the woman for Temperance was itself an act of controlling the relation between the sexes."

> Guns are largely a male activity. Is concern for "gun control" an act of controlling the relation between the sexes? Violence against women has become an increasing concern in Canadian society. Guns symbolize violence, so gun control is, for many, a response to these concerns. In the 1993 survey a lack of experience with guns, a desire to restrict pornography, and a favorable attitude toward homosexuals were associated with pro gun control attitudes. Additional questions asked in 1994 showed that other factors were also important, and the original relationships were specified. Lack of experience with guns and being pro-homosexual turned out to be only important for men. So few women in the sample have any personal experience with guns that it is not a major determinant of their attitudes overall (this was also true in 1993). Once women could express directly their desire for men to be more sensitive, less "macho," it became clear that being "pro homosexual" had simply been a proxy variable for women expressing this desire.

> Both men and women think gun control will greatly reduce violence against women, but for very different reasons. Women see it as part of a set of desired roles for men in their relationship with women: men should protect women, but not be "macho" about it. Men think it because they overestimate the role of handguns in murder, want to be sensitive to womens' concerns by prohibiting sexually explicit depictions of nude people, and come from urban homes that do not contain guns.

> Both men and women who would not defend themselves with a gun are in favor of gun control, but for somewhat different reasons. They both reject the death penalty for first degree murder, but for men this part of a set of "politically correct" responses which includes giving women a combat role in the army and opposition to talks on politically incorrect topics. These men may also reject self defense with a gun because there are no guns in their homes, and they may not have any idea of how to use a gun. For women rejection of the death penalty is more of a pro-life choice: they are opposed to easy abortions, think homosexuals should be allowed to adopt children, and are non-drinking vegetarians. Perhaps they would not defend themselves with a gun > because of a fear of killing the aggressor. Women who want to restrict the sale of sexually explicit materials are pro gun control. This is associated with a desire to prohibit all sexually explicit depictions of nude people, and a desire for men to be more sensitive, less “macho.”

> Overall, the men who favor gun control are those who reject traditional male roles and behavior. They are opposed to hunting, are pro homosexual, do not have any experience with or knowledge of guns and tend to have “politically correct” attitudes. Overall, the women who support gun control do so in the context of controlling male violence and sexuality. While this study has not explained all of the motivations for gun control (there is considerable unexplained variance in the regression equations) it does support the contention that gun control is, symbolically, male control.[emphasis mine]

Fascinating. Up until now, I had thought of the Second Amendment civil-rights fight as a part of the enduring struggle for liberty against the powers of tyranny. This article presents a different perspective: that gun control is merely another facet of social control of more masculine men by women, white knights, and effete men. Thus, on top of other types of social controls of men, for example, chalimony, sexual harassment law, rape law, and a men-to-women transfer payments regime, we can see that gun control is but one more way for yin to tame yang, for Eve to dominate Adam, for her own personal benefit.

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to three, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

Happy St. David's Day!

W.F. Price · 1 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As an American whose first colonial ancestors sailed to Virginia from Wales over 400 years ago, bringing my surname and establishing my American patrimony, I've come to appreciate the small but tough – and darkly beautiful – country of Wales.

Against all odds, the Welsh have withstood the onslaughts of the Roman, Saxon, Gael, Viking and Norman over the centuries, and kept their culture and language despite being right next to the center of the British Empire.

Dydd Gŵyl Dewi Hapus! (Happy St. David's Day)

The Welsh, being a musical people, like to celebrate their national holiday with song, so here's a patriotic Welsh song performed by a Welsh men's choir:

How the Left can Win America

Featured Guest · 1 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Sentient Liberation

Democrats have a unique opportunity not afforded to any political Party since the Republican Southern Strategy. It is well within the realm of possibility for Democrats to secure an ironclad grip on the under 30 male vote, and perhaps even the under 50 male vote as well. I am not talking about college grads, but the average everyday man. The core bedrock of the Republican Party is up for grabs and no one realizes it yet.

Do you honestly think Republican Party cares about men? Look at the VAWA, they opposed it because the re-authorization included gays, not because it didn't have enforcement clauses to protect male victims of Domestic Violence. Republican's also support many policies that are detrimental to young men. From foreign trade agreements, to excessive tax breaks for corporations and investors that move jobs overseas, to wanting to gut educational programs young men desperately need and Republicans harsh stance in the war on drugs. Republicans only care about the rich men and women who buy their votes, err… lobby them. They are just playing off the fact that we men by and large know that the Democrats/Feminists out and out hate us, deny our humanity and use government policy to discriminate against us. If Democrats took the initiative, they could leave the Republican Party without a base at all. All they have to do is throw feminism and feminists under the bus.

Even though this would effectively mean the end of feminism and the destruction of many feminists' careers, it would not mean the end of women's rights. After all, it isn't those on the left who want a rollback, as evidenced by talking head Ann Coulter.

Actually the exact opposite would happen, women's rights as human beings would become permanently enshrined into our society far more then they are today. There would be no risk to women's rights because the left would run the show and conservatives would have little representation in Federal Government, and increasingly weakened presence in state, county and local Governments. So the Democratic Party wouldn't lose all those "I am not a feminist but" gal's, but actually gives those gal's a way to proudly say "I am not a feminist because I support equality for men and women". Combined with the Democratic Party's influence in other demographics, electoral extinction of the Republican Party could be achieved within a decade or so.

Of course Democrats would have to prove their worth by actually going after feminists in order to really gain support. One mechanism is fraud. Hundreds of feminists who operate Domestic Abuse shelters are already guilty of it as the VAWA contained a clause prohibiting the discrimination against male victims of domestic violence. These shelters by refusing service to male victims of domestic violence in a very real sense defrauded the Government.

One could even take a swipe at Women's Studies classes. How so? All those pesky feminist statistics made up or distorted for "dramatic effect" were created with taxpayer money, so again you have a lot of feminists guilty of defrauding the government. This is really just the beginning of it; if the Federal Government recognizes feminism as a hate movement, that would give Universities and Colleges the muster to expel feminist professors and students en mass.

I am sure Republicans will try massive finger blaming, Democrats can dodge that easily through a few short steps:

1) Show compassion for boys, young men and men; that is something Republicans/Conservatives are incapable of doing. From the depth of their being they cannot view boys, young men and men as human beings, rather, they view males as merely a means to an end.

2) If Republicans begin finger pointing, all Democrats have to do is own their mistakes. Say that they messed up and show how they are trying to make right what they made wrong. Then they can turn everything around and say "where the heck were you?" to the Republicans. After all, Republican presidents supported Feminists twisted version of Title IX enforcement and other insane social policies that intentionally discriminated against boy's, young men and men. One would think that the opposition would stand against this insanity instead of using it for political gain. After all, which is worse: Falling into crazy ignorantly, or willfully allowing crazy to happen for political gain. The important thing is to make sure the message is “feminists lied to us and twisted good programs into evil ends”, and “Republicans intentionally supported it to ensure male voters would hate us instead of trying to end the insanity”. Either way, it would the negative blame onto Republicans while creating forward momentum for social programs and policies to fix the problems created by the feminist movement and other human rights inequalities.

All that together would create a very powerful message to the overwhelming majority of disadvantaged young men, and a growing segment of young women who view feminism as nothing more then a hate movement from a bygone era irrelevant to the 21st Century.

How to Cook a Juicy, Tender Pork Chop

W.F. Price · 2 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter Brian asked me to write another food post and, as cooking is one of my favorite hobbies, I'm happy to comply. For those who prefer more serious posts, please indulge me here — there will be plenty of those forthcoming.

One of my pet peeves is dry pork chops, so I'd like to give a lesson on the simple but elegant pork chop, which is not only cheap, but so easy to cook and so tasty that any man (barring those who keep kosher or halal) can enjoy it.

When I was growing up, pork chops were a common dish at dinner time. However, the pork chops I had at home were tough and dry, so although I dutifully ate them without complaint, I thought of pork chops as second-rate food compared to tender steak, salmon and chicken. But they were cheap, so when I started living on my own I found myself buying pork rather than steak for dinner.

I received a cast iron skillet as a gift when I was about 20, and because these iron skillets require oil to prevent sticking, I soon discovered the key to good pork chops: they must be breaded and cooked in oil. It should be obvious, but a lot of northerners do not understand to this day. There's a stigma against frying; it's supposedly unhealthy, or maybe it's seen as low-class in the north, but it's pretty silly given the physical properties of the common pork chop. Some northerners go so far as to soak pork chops in brine before cooking them, which is totally unnecessary and a waste of time (and the excess sodium can't be healthy). Others simmer them in various concoctions that leave the pork as the minor component of the flavor, and are far more complex than necessary.

When you're cooking lean pork, as opposed to bacon or sausage, it will always dry out unless you fry it in oil, simmer it or boil it. Actually, this is true of any lean meat, but for some reason people don't seem to realize that pork chops are lean. The pork chop was made for frying — not for roasting, broiling, grilling, boiling or simmering. It is a close cousin to German schnitzel, which is invariably breaded and fried.

What you're aiming for is keeping the lean, but tender pork loin moist and juicy to keep it from toughening up. Preferably, you do not want it to be dripping with oil, which ruins the texture, but to have a crispy exterior. This is where the breading come in. Also, remember not to overcook them. As soon as the chop is firm throughout and the juice runs clear it is done.

Here's how to cook a pork chop:

Essentials:

-A frying pan, preferably cast iron for even heat distribution, but any type will do.

-An egg

-Bread crumbs (the kind that come in a can, like Progresso, are perfect)

-Cooking oil

-Thick or medium cut boneless pork loin chop(s) (you can use bone in chops if you'd like – they are just as good if not better – but I'd recommend boneless loin chops for beginners)

Directions:

Crack the egg into a bowl and beat it with a fork.

Take a plate and pour out some bread crumbs onto it, spreading the crumbs so they coat the plate. You can add some salt or seasoning salt to the bread crumbs if you'd like.

Put your frying pan on the stove, then pour in enough oil to coat the cooking surface, but no more. Turn the burner on medium low.

While the pan is heating up, take your pork chop(s) and place in the bowl with beaten egg. Make sure the chop is thoroughly coated with egg. Pull out the chop and hold it above the egg bowl for a few seconds, letting excess egg drip off.

Then take the chop and put it on the plate covered with bread crumbs. Turn it over a few times and make sure it is thoroughly coated with bread crumbs.

Repeat above for each additional chop.

Now check your pan to see if it's hot enough. Flick a little water in; if it crackles and snaps it's good to go.

Place the chops gently in the pan, letting them brown for a couple minutes on one side, then turning to brown on the other. If they are browning too fast, turn the heat down a bit and turn them more often — you don't want blackened breading. When the chops are firm throughout, sweating a bit on top, golden brown on the outside and the juice runs clear, they are done. It shouldn't take more than ten minutes or so, and less if they are thin. Take care not to overcook.

To drain excess oil, you can set them on a rack for a minute before serving, but unless you used too much oil it shouldn't be necessary.

Serve chops with greens and your choice of carbs — they go well with just about anything. To avoid overwhelming the subtle flavor, they are best seasoned simply with salt. Also, use a sharp steak knife to cut the chop into clean, crisp bites while eating — this prevents them from getting smashed and losing their firm texture and crispy coating.

Some people say a white wine (zinfandel or pinot grigio) pairs well with pork chops, but I find they go very well with a nice, clean lager.

False Conviction Rate for Rape Historically Higher than Claimed False Accusation Rate

W.F. Price · 3 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Last summer, a study came out that suggested that more than one in ten of the men convicted of sexual assault in Virginia between 1973 and 1987 were innocent. To be precise, the proven wrongful conviction rate was between 8 and 15 percent — significantly higher than the false conviction rate for homicide, which was found to be 5 percent only when combined with sexual assault convictions. This means that in homicide cases, the false conviction rate is significantly lower than 5%, and therefore an order of magnitude lower than in sexual assault cases.

> a new study that involved the DNA testing of hundreds of old Virginia homicide and sexual assault cases supports the exoneration of at least 38 suspects, according to a study released Monday by a national policy group that examined the test results.
>
> This study, conducted by researchers John Roman, Kelly Walsh, Pamela Lachman and Jennifer Yahner of the Urban Institute Policy Center, analyzed the results of new DNA testing of old physical evidence from 634 sexual assault and homicide cases that took place in Virginia between 1973 and 1987.
>
> Their central question: "What proportion of convicted offenders in serious person crimes with retained forensic evidence could be exonerated if that evidence were DNA tested?"
>
> This marked the first study of the effects of DNA testing on wrongful conviction in a large and approximately random sample of serious crime convictions.
>
> The study found that in five percent of homicide and sexual assault cases DNA testing eliminated the convicted offender as the source of incriminating physical evidence.
>
> When sexual assault convictions were isolated, DNA testing eliminated between 8 and 15 percent of convicted offenders and supported exoneration.

Now, to put that in perspective, feminists like to claim that the false accusation rate for sexual assault is no more than two to three percent. If that were truly the case, then the data suggests states would have to be more likely to prosecute false accusations than real accusations. This is extremely unlikely. In fact, the high level of wrongful convictions in sexual assault cases suggests that sexual assault is either prosecuted even more vigorously than murder, that many defendants have been falsely accused, or both. Given that police do make some effort to screen out false accusations and prosecutors decline prosecution when they are unlikely to be successful, the false accusation rate must be significantly higher than the wrongful conviction rate. Given that wrongful conviction rates look to be above 10%, this has sobering implications.

What's valuable about this study is that it proves:

1. False rape acusations are not rare

2. Rape is not difficult to prosecute

3. Rape has the highest wrongful conviction rate of all violent crimes

These are all in direct contradiction to what feminists would have us believe. They claim that rapists get off the hook all the time, women rarely make false accusations, and prosecutors are handcuffed in rape cases. All lies that directly contribute to putting innocent men in prison.

The only conclusion one can draw from this is that feminists have no concept of justice, and no problem with harming innocent men. They are, to put it simply, waging war against men. Allowing feminists to have any authority over men's lives was a terrible mistake. Removing them from power should be our first order of business.

“Get him, boy!” Man Mauled by Police Dog as Punishment for not Obeying Wife

W.F. Price · 3 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Noel Saldana, a Lakewood, Washington man, was badly mauled by a police dog in 2011. The attack happened after his wife called the police on him during an argument in which she demanded he get out of the house. Evidently, after she called the police he left to walk to his sister’s house, and was found by police. Then, despite complying with orders to get down, he was attacked by a german shepherd dog named ‘Astor’. The dog ripped out a large chunk of his calf and permanently damaged his knee. German shepherds have incredibly powerful jaws. My father had one that could snap a broom handle in half like it was a matchstick with one bite.

Saldana is currently suing the City of Lakewood for damages as a result of the attack.

From the Lakewood News Tribune:

> Police responded after Saldana’s wife called 911 to say he wouldn’t leave their home when she asked. Saldana was walking along a sidewalk when the officer and dog approached. He said he turned around and dropped to the ground when asked, but Astor still attacked.
>
> He lost range of motion in his knee, walks with a limp and has scarring on both legs as a result of the attack…

Saldana recounts details of attack:

Wrongful Conviction Rates and False Accusations in Rape: Linked or Not?

W.F. Price · 4 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Clarence, a thoughtful commenter who understands what he is writing about, responds to my contention that the high wrongful conviction rate in rape and sexual assault proves that false accusations are higher in rape than any other crime. While he doesn't dispute this, he says that the study doesn't necessarily demonstrate a link between wrongful conviction and false accusation.

It's an interesting and important point, and I think it's worth some extra attention.

I know what Clarence is getting at, and agree that it's important to make a distinction between mistakes and willful fabrication, but along with raising the question of what we should call innocent defendants if not "falsely accused," I maintain that there is no other reasonable explanation for the high rate of wrongful convictions besides false accusations.

Clarence:

> Whilst this study does a good job of showing (what has been repeatedly stressed by organizations such as the innocence project) that the US has a problem with a very significant amount of false convictions, I fail to see how this shows the number of false accusations. You see, just like you can convict a murder defendant wrongly due to a lying witness – and yet there was still a murder victim, even though you got the wrong person – so with rape and things such as bad police lineup procedures etc, you can get a rape victim who helps convict the wrong person.
>
> This study is useful in demonstrating beyond any reasonable doubt, that "Houston, we have a problem with large amounts of bad convictions", but it doesn't necessarily say the same thing about the amount of false accusations, alas…
>
> Let me be clear: I've always said myself that based on the average of the various studies of false accusations I think a minimum of 15 to a maximum of around 25 percent of all rape (sexual assault NOT included) accusations are false.
>
> Problem is, this study doesn't seem to prove what you think it does. There are studies that deal with false accusations (and they have various descriptions of what the various studies authors consider a false accusation, some won't count it unless the police determine it to be false or the accuser recants) and they typically mention all types of other confounding variables such as police investigative procedures, bad forensics or late evidence collection, etc.
>
> I don't know how you'd legally or ethically get a guaranteed untainted population sample to check out the actual amount of false accusations. If you could put large amounts of people under secret surveillance (say at a college) for a year or so you might get an inkling of the rates, but I'm sure that many here including myself would have an ethical issue with such covert surveillance as well as the lack of what is called 'informed consent' for the students who would be the subjects.

My Response:

But the point still stands: whether or not it was a "mistake," when someone is wrongly convicted they were falsely accused by definition — the injustice is no less to the victim. I think we should avoid getting bogged down in semantics over what constitutes a false accusation in rape and sexual assault. Instead, we should use the same standard we would in other crimes: if the accused party is factually innocent, then he has been "falsely accused."

Perhaps in some cases women feel that they were raped when they were not. Say they didn't want to have sex, but never resisted, and perhaps never said anything, and then claimed to have been raped. They may "feel" it was rape, but it would be a false accusation because it wasn't.

As far as identifying the wrong person, that's been proven to be intentional in many wrongful convictions. Many of the men picked up and then identified were totally unknown to the accuser, but she had to point the finger at someone because she'd already made up a story about being raped for one reason or another. These are the most alarming stories of all; of men simply walking down the street minding their own business, and then suddenly thrown in an interrogation room with no idea at all of what was happening, and ultimately convicted and sentenced to lengthy prison terms, then exonerated decades later by DNA evidence.

Finally, if false identification can happen in murder as well, why is the rate so much higher in rape? In rape prosecutions, the victim is still alive; if they weren't it would become a murder case. This being the case, you'd expect that a surviving witness would contribute to accuracy rather than raising the rate of misidentification.

What is it about rape, as opposed to other crimes, that leads to such a high rate of wrongful conviction? There is only one reasonable conclusion: it is a crime that is uniquely susceptible to fabrication.

Campus Hate Hoaxes: False Accusations as Political Aggression

W.F. Price · 5 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Every year or so, or maybe more often, gullible reporters pick up on another campus hoax involving racist incidents. These incidents often involve some connection with the ancient KKK, such as nooses, white hoods, burning crosses, etc. I can't remember the last time one of these incidents turned out to be "genuine." It usually turns out that the perpetrator was involved in some minority activist outfit, and trying to drum up sympathy and/or hatred against perceived racial or gender rivals, usually heterosexual white men.

Despite the fact that these incidents are consistently found to be hoaxes, people on the left still rush to believe them because they fit the political narrative. Just as reports of Satanism invariably surface in religious fundamentalist communities, reports of KKK activity and the like are far more common in fundamentalist equalist institutions such as universities.

In Oberlin college, someone was allegedly spotted lurking around in a KKK outfit near the Afrikan Heritage House at 1:30AM. If that doesn't scream "HOAX," I don't know what does. If there actually were a white male in a KKK outfit on a campus as left-wing as Oberlin, one would have to assume he was mentally ill, because the retribution against him would be overwhelming.

So why do people stage these hoaxes? For the same reason the Soviets staged show trials and the Nazis manufactured the Gleiwitz incident. It's a pretext for taking aggressive action against a political enemy.

Feminists use rape in exactly the same manner. Every rape becomes a political act; a casus belli that justifies measures against the enemy — straight men. What was once considered a crime committed by a depraved individual becomes part and parcel of the narrative of oppression and the gender war. I'm not sure how many false accusations of sexual violence are directly politically motivated (probably not many), but as demonstrated in the Duke Lacrosse case, feminists are always on the lookout for incidents they can exploit.

This creates an environment in which accusations are encouraged because people are so eager to believe them. Just as Cotton Mather and his fellow Puritan fanatics created an atmosphere ripe for false accusation and hysteria, culminating in the Salem Witch Trials, assorted equalist political fanatics have done the same on campuses across the US. Perhaps it's no surprise that higher education in the US is directly descended from Puritan institutions.

Second Waver Wonders Why Feminists aren't Concerned about Cannibal Porn

W.F. Price · 5 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Gina Bellafante, writing for the NY Times, asks what's become of feminism when a policeman can get away with fantasizing about cooking women without provoking feminist outrage.

> Today, simply using the word seems benighted, as our most dominant feminist debates are conducted at the level of rarefied conflict between satisfying maternal desire and satisfying the ambition to run global assets management at JPMorgan. But if the case of Gilberto Valle, the New York City police officer who inhabited an Internet subculture populated by men who think about raping and torturing women, roasting them on spits and eating them, doesn't serve as a summons to broaden our gender discussions and think about what it means when a society can easily and actively nourish its most heinous notions about women, it's uncertain what could.
>
> [...]
>
> "There's a huge amount of online activity devoted to cultivating horrific impulses toward women," Jane Manning, a former sex-crimes prosecutor and currently the legislative vice president for the National Organization for Women's New York City chapter, told me. "And we haven't grappled with this as a society."
>
> "There's an odd confusion in the feminist movement," she added. "We've all accepted the idea that speech is protected when it's speech. But that seems to have extended to the notion that there shouldn't even be social condemnation attached to incredibly horrifying misogynist speech."
>
> In the instance of the Valle trial, the details have been so voluptuously grotesque that the impact of the strange universe that Officer Valle occupied has been blunted. Most New Yorkers have surely encountered coverage of the trial through the tabloids, which have predictably rendered it as a screenplay for the 46th chapter of "Scream." (" 'Cannibal' cop had BBQ plans for beauty," "If looks could grill!") There's been more vocal outrage over Seth McFarlane's distasteful Oscar jokes than there has been over the uncountable numbers apparently willing to think about women in the same terms as shell steaks.

An angry third wave feminist responds, saying that cannibalism is a far lower priority today than ageism, lookism, etc.

> There are so many ways that misogyny and sexism impact women's lives every day — marriage equality, equal pay, access to abortion, access to the morning after pill, ageism, lookism, I could go on and on. Feminists are screaming and yelling, blogging and tweeting, all over the Internet all day long about those issues. And even if feminists aren't standing on the UWS of Manhattan, yelling at people to sign a petition about porn, doesn't mean we don't get out in public either. Ever heard of the March For Women's Lives or SlutWalks? Ever read Racialicious or Feministing or Reproductive Health Reality Check? Instead, Bellafante patronizingly suggests in her piece, entitled "Remember Misogyny," that women today have become so complacent that we're content to let cannibals eat us all. Or something.

Although this cannibalism angle is a bit absurd, maybe Ms. Bellafante is on to something. Could it be that the issues facing women today are actually pretty trivial? Is it possible that whatever it was that motivated the 2nd wave feminists isn't even relevant any longer, and now feminists, for lack of any real problems, are resorting to getting worked up over boob jokes?

Vote Away

W.F. Price · 5 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I removed the login restriction on comment voting. Most readers don't comment (like 99%), and I assume they don't want to bother logging in, so there's no sense in forcing them to do so just to give a thumbs-up. I'm keeping comments for those not logged in on moderation (you get sick of waking up only to have to deal with trolls first thing in the morning), but votes are open once again.

Lesbian Hookup App Attracting Men

W.F. Price · 6 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Those dirty, patriarchal dogs are at it again (HT Chuck Ross)…

> The idea of men making fake profiles to browse a lesbian site might sound spurious but Exton has been surprised at the rate and extent to which this happens. “Daily, we have about five guys registering for an invite and it’s unsubstantiated but the emails have a guy’s name on them. We’ve seen fake Facebook accounts set up to try and get invites. You’ll see they set up an account yesterday, have no friends but they like Dattch and something like ‘Lesbian and bi girlies of London’. It’s amazing. The fact that people will go to that extent to try and check out gay women or convert them or meet up with them.”

She’s surprised? That’s pretty funny.

Although men who have reached a certain level of maturity probably wouldn’t bother, as they are aware of what most real lesbians look like, I can imagine teenage boys being extremely curious about lesbian dating apps. I’m afraid it’s a problem without a good solution, as many of these boys are one step ahead of online filters and security measures.

Frankly, I think it’s hilarious. Imagine the reaction of some hopeful lesbian when she finds out the hot, bi-curious young woman she’s been chatting up is some 15-year-old kid using his sister’s Facebook profile.

Satoshi Kanazawa: Patriarchal Surname Practices Best for Children

W.F. Price · 6 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Satoshi Kanazawa, who often writes on gender issues from a scientific perspective, posted an article explaining why the practice of giving children their fathers' surnames is beneficial to children:

> Marilyn vos Savant may be the most intelligent person alive in the world today, with the recorded IQ of 228, and she is a wizard when it comes to solving logical and mathematical problems in her weekly column "Ask Marilyn" in the Parade magazine. But she does get at least one biological problem wrong.
>
> vos Savant advocates a social institution where all individuals – men and women – keep their last names for life, rather than women adopting their husband's last name upon marriage, and where all boys inherit their last names from their fathers and all girls inherit their last names from their mothers. That is why, as an adult, she changed her last name from Mach that she was born with (vos Savant is a descendent of the physicist Ernst Mach) to her mother's maiden name, vos Savant.
>
> [...]
>
> Patrilineal inheritance of family names, where children inherit their last names from the father, not from the mother, evolved as a social institution as one of the mechanisms to alleviate paternity uncertainty. Like all mammalian males, human fathers can never be completely certain of their paternity, but, unlike most mammalian males, they are asked to invest very heavily in their offspring. Therein lies the possibility of cuckoldry – unwittingly investing their precious limited resources in the genetic offspring of another man. Males of only a very few species in nature (humans, and many avian species) face the danger of cuckoldry because male parental investment among these species is high … Males of these few species – human fathers in particular – therefore need to be reasonably convinced that they are indeed the genetic fathers of their putative offspring before they would agree to invest heavily in them. Both nature and social institutions aid in such an effort.
>
> [...]
>
> Patrilineal inheritance of family names is another social institution that emerged to convince the fathers of their paternity, by saying (if social institutions have a vocal cord) "The baby's really yours, because it has your last name!" … Fathers are therefore expected to invest more heavily in children who bear their last names than children who bear the mother's last names, because they are more likely to be convinced of their paternity. As a result, ceteris paribus, children who inherit their last names from their fathers are expected to be more likely to survive and thrive than children who inherit their last names from their mothers. Like polyandry, the social institution of matrilineal inheritance of last names contains the seeds of its own extinction….

Kanazawa is right. Patriarchy is indeed best for children and societies that practice it. This is why matriarchal societies are always outcompeted, and eventually lose out to stronger, patriarchal societies. Feminism results in cultural and ethnic extinction for all those who practice it for an extended period of time.

Feminist Music

W.F. Price · 8 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've written about feminist poetry, feminist philosophy and feminist literature. They're all pretty terrible. Not just bad, but really, painfully awful. The only way they can get people to read this garbage is to force them to do so in school.

However that isn't the worst of it. Possibly the most awful feminist creation of all is feminist music. To listen to feminist rock is to subject oneself to something akin to the death throes of a howler monkey. It is so spectacularly bad it goes beyond even being funny.

It is with this warning that I present Bikini Kill, a feminist punk band, singing the song "White Boy:"

Some lyrics:

> Lay me spread eagle out on your hill, yeah
> Then write a book bout how I wanted to die
> It's hard to talk with your dick in my mouth
> I will try to scream but the pains a little nice for me now
>
> WHITE BOY…DON'T LAUGH…DON'T CRY…JUST DIE!
>
> I'm so sorry if I'm alienating some of you
> Your whole fucking culture alienates me
> I can not scream from pain down here on my knees
> I'm so sorry that I think!
>
> WHITE BOY…DON'T LAUGH…DON'T CRY…JUST DIE!

Sarkeesian Releases First Tropes Video

W.F. Price · 8 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Nine months after her wildly successful Kickstarter campaign, in which Anita Sarkeesian very effectively played the victim of dastardly men, she has finally released her first video. I like to think the scrutiny from me and other observers helped motivate her to finally release a video. Perhaps appropriately, the first video, which is 22 minutes long, concerns the “damsel in distress trope.”

Sarkeesian, who has reportedly been working for Electronic Arts, may not be entirely objective, so if any gamers notice that she is selectively criticizing games according to what company produced them please let us know. So far, as I watch the video, it appears that most of her criticism focuses on Japanese games (Electronic Arts is an American company).

Steven Slevin gets big settlement for imprisonment without trial, county officials get off the hook

W.F. Price · 8 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Steven Slevin, a mentally ill New Mexico man arrested in 2005 for allegedly driving drunk in a stolen car, was held in solitary confinement for two years without a hearing or trial, and without any medical or dental care. He had to pull his own tooth out at one point, he got bedsores and fungal infections, and his nails and hair grew very long. Eventually, he got lung cancer as well.

Slevin was never charged with a crime, and never tried. But he still lingered in solitary confinement for years, ignored. Perhaps his jailers were merely waiting for him to die, so they could cremate him and dump his ashes in a pauper's grave. That way he would be far cheaper to the county, after all. No defense attorney, no welfare, no housing and no medical treatment — just lock him up and shove prison food through a hole every day. Probably saved the county a couple hundred thousand dollars or so.

Slevin's settlement – 15 million dollars – was huge, but I still think the county got a break, and he'll be dead soon from his terminal cancer anyway. I'll bet if someone dug into this case, they'd find others just like it. It wouldn't surprise me at all to see that this was policy.

By paying off Mr. Slevin, probably largely with insurance, real criminals who denied a man liberty and due process are getting off the hook. The settlement itself is a travesty of justice. I cannot believe that this was a mere "oversight" — someone was deliberately doing this to men.

Look at the county's position:

> The county had recently offered to settle the case for $2million, according to CNN, despite previously denying there was a lack of medical care and that, as government employees, county officials deserved immunity from liability.

So now government employees and county officials should have "immunity" when they capriciously destroy men's lives? What kind of country are we living in? One set of rules for us, and another for our masters…

Sickening.

Drone Dealers Suggest Using Drones for "Domestic Violence" Scenarios

W.F. Price · 9 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's odd that the drone debate has only now come up given that drones have been used domestically for quite a while. They are operated by DHS to patrol the border, and in one 2011 case a drone was used to facilitate the arrest of a North Dakota farmer for neglecting to report stray cattle to authorities.

> Court records state that last June, six cows wandered onto Brossart's 3,000 acre farm, about 60 miles west of Grand Forks. Brossart allegedly refused to return the cows, which led to a long, armed standoff with the Grand Forks police department. At some point during the standoff, Homeland Security, through an agreement with local police, offered up the use of an unmanned predator drone, which "was used for surveillance," according to the court documents.
>
> Grand Forks SWAT team chief Bill Macki said in an interview that the drone was used to ensure Brossart and his family members, who were also charged, didn't leave the farm and were unarmed during the arresting raid.

So yes, drones are already being used domestically. The Brossart case cannot be the only one (cooperation between DHS and local police is well known and openly discussed in border regions), but it was ignored because he's a hick farmer, and those people don't matter in the NY Times or on network television.

However, now that urban police departments have begun to order drones, suddenly the literati are starting to talk about them. City people might find themselves being videotaped by sneaky little drones while sparking up a joint in their apartment in a vibrant neighborhood. Maybe a tryst with an underage male prostitute, ordinarily ignored by police, might be caught on tape. It's pretty scary stuff!

But never fear, Vanguard Defense Industries, manufacturer of the Shadow Hawk helicopter drone, assures us that the drones will be used for uquestionable scenarios, like domestic violence policing:

> A ShadowHawk® can maintain aerial surveillance of an area (i.e. house, vehicle, person, etc.) at 700 feet without being heard or seen unlike full sized aircraft. Imagine the advantage provided to an entry team in the following scenarios; high risk warrant, hostage rescue, domestic violence, etc.

Quite clever of the manufacturer. I'm sure the company understands that at least 51% of all citizens will support almost any violation of civil liberties and the Constitution so long as it involves "protecting women."

Nevermind the fact that spying on people suspected of domestic violence is possibly the most covenient of all excuses for violating privacy (all the police have to say is that "a neighbor reported an argument") — if it is intended to prevent violence against women it's all for the best.

The crusade against domestic violence along with the war on drugs has provided more justifications for permanently shredding constitutional rights than anything in history. Before these campaigns, only wars were used in this manner, but wars are by their nature temporary. The war on drugs and the war against domestic violence are eternal. They will never end, and they will continuously justify more intrusions into the private lives of citizens.

Taking a Breather

W.F. Price · 12 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Just spent the weekend with the kids, and have them again next weekend for the spring break, so I've been preparing a bit the vacation, taking care of loose ends and such. Haven't had as much time for writing, consequently.

I'll keep posting, but it might be a little light for a week or so during spring vacation, as I'll be visiting the grandparents down in California. Either way, it should be nice to post a bit from San Francisco. It's an entertaining place for children and adults alike.

So stay tuned.

Steubenville and the Resurrection of the Lynch Mob

W.F. Price · 18 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The rape trial of two teens in Steubenville Ohio ended yesterday with two guilty verdicts. The boys will both serve a year in juvenile detention for rape, with one to serve an additional year for child pornography. I don't know much about the particulars of the case, but neither boy took a plea, possibly because it was a juvenile case and the stakes weren't as high.

I'm not shocked by the verdict, and not particularly bothered by the sentence. Not long ago, a young man similarly convicted could face execution. In fact, one of the largest mass executions in US history was for the rape of a single woman. Before the 1970s, even minors were regularly executed for rape.

I'm sure there are plenty of people who would like to bring back the old "hang 'em high" days when those convicted of rape were routinely executed, but given the number of people convicted of sex crimes (around 750,000 in the US), that would entail so many executions these days that the crematoria couldn't handle all the corpses.

So, despite the fact that the case probably wasn't entirely straightforward, and there may been some element of responsibility on the part of the victim (there often is in crime), the verdict doesn't appear unjust. Tragic, to be sure, but not a travesty.

However, what made the case particularly awful was how it became a social media sensation from the beginning. Kids with cell phones took pictures, tweeted stupid opinions, took video and made a spectacle of the event. The public nature of the offense was shameful, to say the least. It leaves me wondering whether young Americans are even acquainted with the concept of decency.

Public sexuality of any sort is provocative. There's nothing quite like it for drawing people's attention. So, as the videos and pictures made their way around the net, a mob coalesced online, and rather than allow the court to do its work, the mob began to take justice into its own hands.

The mob knew no more about the crime than I do, and certainly far less than the town's police and prosecutor, but they howled for blood all the same. One particular online group called "knightsec" became very highly involved. A few weeks ago, I ran across some tweets from its members, some of whom were planning masked actions at courthouses in some unrelated sexual assault case. While doing so, they were discussing whether or not there were laws against wearing masks in public places in West Virginia and Ohio. It turns out that many states do indeed have such laws, enacted largely because of another, earlier group of "knights" that had a penchant for vigilante justice, very often in the context of rape.

It seems like a little bit too close of a coincidence to me that a group that formed with the intent of going after two boys, one of whom was black, for the alleged (at the time) rape of a white girl, just happens to be operating out of West Virginia and has "knight" in its title. If the connection is not a conscious one, then it says something about human nature, that is, that people respond militantly to sexual assault allegations, despite feminist nonsense to the contrary. It isn't just a white American thing, either; I recall news from the 1980s, when a mob of Chinese in Beijing murdered some African students accused of raping Chinese girls. Sectarian riots have broken out in Egypt over rape allegations. War propaganda frequently uses rape allegations to provoke anger and predispose people to violence. The list goes on and on.

However, in most cases the news doesn't get around. I wonder whether the tendency to hide the victim's identity isn't a defense against the kind of social disruption and emotion that tends to accompany publicized rape cases. It may be, but in the Steubenville case the cat got out of the bag, and an anonymous online mob began to dominate the discussion, using every lurid detail possible to create an atmosphere of outrage.

What's different about this development is that the discussion was not, in this case, firmly in the hands of feminist ideologues. Even Amanda Marcotte expressed some reservations about the involvement of the anonymous mob

(one of the few times I've agreed with her). She recognizes that control of the discourse is slipping out the hands of the select opinion molders, and knows that this is not necessarily in her interests. Rather than controlled and tied to particular talking points and feminist tropes, the reaction was primal and anarchic, and that isn't safe territory for feminists.

So, politically speaking, the Steubenville rape case and the accompanying outrage has little to do with feminism. Instead, it is an indication of some disturbing changes in our society. The appalling indecency of the teens who were involved and the lawless reaction of the mob both hint at a youth culture unmoored from a sense of order and propriety.

I've seen some effort on the part of feminists and others on the left to influence or control what is known as "anonymous." Even the SPLC wrote a report on anonymous, suggesting that it is ideologically on board with the SPLC program. Some conservatives are hostile to "anonymous," linking it to the "Occupy" movement and other leftist causes. But I think these people are all wrong.

Anonymous isn't a group so much as it is an indication of the spiritual state, or mood, of our society. It is an expression of a common feeling, which from the looks of it is primal, anarchic and nihilistic. Given the unraveling of the old America, it may be an understandable sentiment, but this is not a happy trend, and it does not bode well.

25 Year Feminist Career Ends in Flight from Law

W.F. Price · 19 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jessica Carde, who began a long career of lies and swindles 25 years ago when she violated a custody agreement and fled to Washington state, is now a fugitive who jumped $150,000 bail for fraud charges.

> For decades, Jessica Carde told vicious lies, cheated and stole to get what she wanted — whether it be custody of her children or living a plush life in luxury homes without paying rent, prosecutors say.
>
> People went to jail and faced bogus charges; lives were demolished while Carde came out on top time and time again. That was until last week, when a voluminous set of charging documents emerged from the King County Prosecutor's Office.
>
> Last week, Carde was charged with 12 criminal counts. Prosecutors say that she's a fugitive wanted in lieu of $150,000 bail and that police are looking for her.

Carde first came to the attention of local media a couple years ago, when the Seattle Weekly published a long piece exposing her history of lies and manipulation.

Apparently, it all started with a custody battle, a kidnapping, and help from the feminist establishment in Minnesota and Washington state.

> Once back in custody in Minnesota, Carde began fund-raising. She established the Jesse & Nicki Family Defense Fund, shared her story during a brown-bag with a woman's group at the state capitol, and seemingly earned the support of Dr. Phyllis Chesler, a psychotherapist and prominent feminist who had just released a book detailing the disadvantages faced by mothers in custody battles. "Instead of criminal charges," wrote Chesler in one widely distributed fax, "Juanita and Michael's efforts to protect their children deserve to be regarded as an act of love." (In an e-mail from her home in New York City, Chesler says she has no memory of meeting Carde, and writes that the signature on the fax is "forged, although it's a close approximation." All told, Hofseth estimates that Carde managed to raise $80,000 for her defense.)

After kidnapping the children, Carde accused her ex of molesting his sons, earning the support of feminists everywhere she went for having destroyed her husband's life. Back in the 1980s and 90s, feminists operated what must be regarded as criminal racketeering organizations, fraudulently obtaining funds by accusing men of being monsters, and then using those funds to aid and abet felony crimes like kidnapping.

The brazen lawlessness of it was astounding, and it helped convince Carde that her future success could be found in more lies and fraud. She subsequently cheated men in dozens of deals, several marriages and rental agreements.

For 25 years, Carde defrauded and cheated men. She had what could be called "freedom to lie," and it took a number of wrecked lives before the state finally put an end to it.

It's time to revoke women's right to lie and falsely accuse. We could start by prosecuting every feminist who perjures herself, and rounding up everyone who has helped kidnap children. Additionally, we must hold their enablers, including feminist men in media, responsible for propagating lies and shielding criminals.

Donglegate: Letting Feminists Write the Rules has Consequences

W.F. Price · 23 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When posting on the Ada Initiative a while ago, I wrote that people who cave in to feminist groups are responsible for creating a chilling, authoritarian environment.

> Every company, every organization and every community that submits to feminist demands should be held accountable for making the world a little less free.

So, it was no surprise to me when Adria Richards, a feminist attendee at PyCon in San Francisco, emboldened by the organization's adoption of the Ada Initiative's authoritarian feminist policy on speech, inappropriately tweeted a photo of a couple guys who made an innocuous joke about code. Her objection was so silly, so infantile and so petty that most of us would laugh at her for caring about the joke. But it turned out not to be very funny, because a father of three was fired for it.

This is bad enough, but the Ada Initiative gals who wrote up the policy that encouraged Adria Richards have been in the habit of physically threatening people at conferences — in writing! They are thugs, plain and simple. Getting men fired can only be considered a triumph from their perspective.

The most obvious villains here are Adria Richards and Andrew Yang, the owner of Playhaven who fired his employee for, essentially, nothing. But behind the scenes are people who are equally as culpable. First, the strange women behind the Ada Initiative, including Valerie Aurora, a vicious woman with serious daddy issues that appear to have left her with a pathological hatred of men in general. And next, Jesse Noller, who chairs Pycon. Mr. Noller – in his words – argued "vociferously" for a code of conduct based on a template provided by a group that hands out threats at conferences:

> By now, if you're linked in to current Python / Python Software Foundation News you know that as of November 21, 2012 the PSF now requires that all conferences it sponsors, or provides grants to (and there are many), have a code of conduct in place. The exact wording of the reslution the PSF board ratified is this:
>
> > RESOLVED, that the PSF will only sponsor conferences that have or agree to create and publish a Code of Conduct/Anti Harassment guide for their conference. A basic template to work from has been generated by the Ada Initiative at http://geekfeminism.wikia.com/wiki/Conference_anti-harassment/Policy
>
> Before I go much further; I'm going to state unequivocally that I am the one responsible. I proposed, argued for it, put it on the agenda and argued for it vociferously during our meeting. However, the board approved it overwhelmingly as a body with a single abstention.
>
> Additionally, as you read this, do not assume anything about my personal politics, political leanings, etc. You would be wrong – trust me on that one. If you are assuming that a horrible event at a PSF / Python event triggered this, you are also wrong.

How ironic it is that a horrible event occurred after the short-sighted Mr. Noller implemented a feminist policy. Ironic, perhaps, but entirely predictable.

When you let feminists write the rules, you get something like our current family law regime, where men can only lose. It happens every time. In schools, in courtrooms, in companies, and now at tech conferences.

Jesse Noller was foolish to let wolves into the pasture. He should be held responsible for his lapse in judgment. Noller is to blame for a man taking the fall — it's on his head.

As for the bleating sheep who voted for his proposal, I hope they are aware of the mess they created. The best way to deal with feminists is to not deal with them. Next best is to ask them to leave. The Ada Initiative should have been banned from conferences from the moment they began issuing physical threats, but instead they were given the opportunity to write the rules. How could that possibly go wrong?

Men in our culture have to learn to say no — to tell them to take a hike. It's surprisingly easy when you get used to the idea, and you wouldn't believe how much more pleasant things can be without them around.

Notes from San Francisco

W.F. Price · 25 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It's nice to be back in San Francisco in March. The wet, creeping chill of Seattle, where my fingers and toes grow cold and creaky while I sit and type, despite my wearing a heavy wool coat in the house, is mercifully absent. The skies are sunny to mildly overcast, and there's usually a nice breeze coming off the sea to keep it all comfortably cool.

In Chinese, San Francisco is known as Jiu Jin Shan, which translates to "Old Gold Mountain," and that isn't too far off the mark today. The city is awash in wealth. So much so that the happy-go-lucky homeless make an easy living digging through trash, unlike my damp, dripping, left-fascist hometown, where we have a more desperate, angry and severe sort of street poverty. I chatted with a couple street folks outside a liquor store (surprisingly friendly sorts), and one little fellow who looked like a gay leprechaun told me he found $2,500 after rummaging through a bag that flew out of a limousine window. I had no reason to suspect him of deliberate exaggeration, but it's possible his math was off by at least one zero (or maybe not).

It may surprise some readers, but San Francisco isn't really that "gay." Or perhaps it is, but it isn't quite so militant about it as Seattle. It has a live and let live attitude that is both refreshing and liberating. It's like, "whatever you say, man…"

Culturally speaking, San Francisco is the top city on the West Coast of North America. Perhaps on the West Coast of all of the Americas, actually. People from all over the Americas, Europe and Asia fit right in. For me, it's a playground of sorts. Excellent Chinese restaurants that serve a half day's worth of food for $5, Slavic delis with the best sausage you'll find west of Chicago, laid back Irish pubs — you name it. Of course, I'd like most of America to stay downhome American, but a few port cities like San Francisco are a great addition to our country, and aren't much of a threat to the wider culture as opposed to, say, mass importation of peons for cheap labor.

The city is also a great place to take kids. The cable cars, trolleys, ferries, bridges and other infrastructure are lots of fun for little boys and girls. The people themselves can also be quite entertaining. Even the fat sea lions down at the wharf put on a show for the kids.

Other differences from the Northwest include the size of the people (they are smaller and thinner in San Francisco), the looks of the women (better), and the real philosophical tolerance that is lacking further north.

There's a very different quality to the leftism one finds in places like San Francisco. It isn't based so much on forcing compliance as it is in more northerly climes, where it takes on notes of Puritanism. Instead, there's more of a lackadaisical approach to life, and an easygoing attitude that accommodates more people. It is liberal in the true sense of the word, which isn't to say it's perfect, but it is far more tolerable than the stifling, narrow and totalitarian forms of leftism that prevail in the northern power centers of the United States.

I think this is a distinction men must make. There's liberalism, and then there's left-fascism. The former is far, far preferable to the latter. So, when criticizing (real) liberals, keep in mind that in many cases they are the lesser evil, including when compared to some forms of misandrist conservatism.

That said, I'm perfectly happy to recommend San Francisco to men with the time and money to take a trip there. It's easy for me, because I have family in SF and a place to stay for free, but lodging can be quite pricey. That's really the only serious drawback to the city for visitors.

I'd suggest men take a tour of the ethnic neighborhoods, including little Russia on Geary (very impressive Russian Orthodox cathedral on 25th and Geary), the North Beach Italian neighborhood, and Chinatown. Chinatown can be a little intimidating for many non-Chinese, because it's a lot like being in China proper, but if you think of it that way and don't expect it to be anything like a typical American town it's a lot of fun.

For those who want to meet local girls, I wouldn't discourage them as San Francisco girls are pretty, thin and feminine by American standards, but if you want to mingle with the hot ones you're going to have to go to bars that charge $15 per drink (that's how the filter works in big cities), so be prepared for some cash outlay simply for the privilege of being in their vicinity.

They Are All Adria Richards Now

Uncle Elmer · 25 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Twitter, which “explodes” every 36 hours over each new outrage meme, has become a violent, expanding gas over the Adria Richards affair. By all accounts, it is something with the force of a thousand Hiroshimas. Not since the Oberlin KKKarnival have we seen such wailing and pulling of hair From Around the Web. Unfortunately for my insatiable attention-whoring needs, Bill Price is off on yet another work/life balance hiatus and can’t publish this priceless essay before the meme cycle expires. By the time you are reading this the PyCon row will have been depleted of click-traffic value, milked for all it’s worth by the usual suspects who you can count in the coming week to drum up another example of man’s inhumanity to women, and the cycle will start anew. I intend to profile this phenomenon in an upcoming Spearhead essay titled Femininst Web Sites Costing Businesses, Taxpayers Billions.

As I traveled back east last week, I saw Sheryl Sandberg’s angry mug touting Equality World from every airport video screen. Fortuitously her voice was drowned out by the ubiquitous chorus of screaming black chicks, which Encorpera seems to think must provide background ambience (along with Kenny Rogers) to my every shopping or travel experience. When I departed the hotel I stepped on a free copy of “USA Today”, which featured a full-page photo of a tactical woman fording a river under weight of a gigantic rucksack and M-16, her “jungle pattern” face heroically breaking the surface in a special ops photo-op that would make John Rambo blush with envy. They say women can be infantry soldiers these days. Then, on return home I stupidly got on the internet and become enthralled with the latest gender debacle.

I’ll get to the point : The biggest threat to women who actually work in tech are the Women in Tech. As an example mentioned in my recent examination of self-emergent feminist parody, the Richards affair has blossomed from a heartwarming story about a self-appointed busybody and professional victim to a tragic tale and teaching moment over online bullying.

When a man masters something, he tends to take risks with it. From this coupling of mastery and risk comes innovation. Females can exhibit the same traits, such as a figure skater pushing the performance envelope; her juxtaposition of graceful beauty perched on eminent risk is compelling and irresistible. However, men are more prone to gambling their futures, while women are more prone to securing their futures. These traits are complimentary in functional societies.

All men want to kneecap you. But only men, and only a small fraction of them, take the risks that drive innovation and industry. These alpha-innovators will utilize you to suit their needs, and from this symbiotic predator-prey fundamental, cauldrons of co-worker perfidy emerge as the lesser betas bicker over the gravy train.

Having worked in tech for 30 years now, I have met plenty of sharp gals who could code circles around me, make more pragmatic decisions, and generally be more pleasant to work with than my constant nemesis : fellow male competitors. The easiest of those women seemed to have good, or at least strong, relations with fathers and brothers. They have witnessed their own brothers getting stomped in life, and don’t seize every opportunity to impale men over their minor, daily screw-ups. They can be quietly efficient and have a gift for pointing out some solution or doing it for you.

Which brings us to the “PyCon” imbroglio. For every charming female co-worker just described, working men must endure the Adria Richards in their many guises. We all know her! This episode has become an extreme, iconic example of the feminist poisoning of Encorpera’s waters. Literally a caricature of everything that has gone wrong in American industries and why, when Obama inflicts Title IX on engineering schools, our competitiveness in technical innovation will pass once and for all, overseas.

For women working in tech this should be a loud “wake-up call”. It appears the dam has burst this time and men across the technical spectrum are finally confessing the truth instead of parroting the party line out of fear of removal. Rather than beat men at their own game and winning their respect, there is a steady pipeline of female complainants ready to wield their special powers of victimization to best their male rivals, or in their words, “what’s fair and equal”. It has cast a darker pall across the work-world savannah, and men are recoiling from their female colleagues to avoid being drawn and quartered over some unauthorized “micro-aggression”. Between men though, the mood has taken an ominous turn. Women in tech are now less likely to find champions and advocates among men who are awakening to the cold fact that female co-workers are just more competition with an extra set of tools in their arsenal.

Men are starting to Lean Out.

Sheryl Sandberg Harnessing the Hamster Wheel

W.F. Price · 26 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Kate Losse, writing for Dissent Magazine about Sheryl Sandberg's "Lean In" style of workplace feminism, wonders whether a feminism that is all about monetizing every aspect of life is beneficial for women in general:

> Lean In begins with an introduction called "Internalizing the Revolution," and like Zuckerberg's 2007 F8 speech it aims to redefine what revolution means. Sandberg's revolution is not asking corporations to renovate their operations to eliminate sexism. Rather, revolution in Lean In is a battle to restructure the self.
>
> [...]
>
> Sandberg's language in this chapter, while directed at women, recalls and even replicates the language deployed at Facebook to push its employees to work harder. At Facebook, the offices are festooned with posters that read things like "Be Bold," "Move fast and break things," "Done is better than perfect," and "What would you do if you weren't afraid?" Facebook's corporate imperative to move quickly and gain influence over more people, figured in a Formula One vocabulary of speed and victory, is repeated in Sandberg's writing. "When more people get in the race, more records will be broken," and, "Don't put on the brakes. Accelerate. Keep your foot on the gas pedal."
>
> Life is a race, Sandberg is telling us, and the way to win is through the perpetual acceleration of one's own labor: moving forward, faster. The real antagonist identified by Lean In then is not institutionalized discrimination against women, but women's reluctance to accept accelerating career demands.

There's something of the herd animal in every human, but in women it's particularly pronounced. This is why there's something evil about pushing women to sacrifice their self-interests on the basis of some trend, or so that a few people can reap profits from it (e.g. divorce). And by its nature, this corporate rat race can only reward the few; most women (along with most men) don't have what it takes to be corporate captains of finance like Sheryl Sandberg, and will end up with the short end of the stick.

Men tend to understand this, and when men had political clout they crafted a compromise whereby the majority of men, who had no desire to devote their lives entirely to work, were compensated fairly for their time. Women's liberation played a big part in destroying this compromise, but it's gone even farther now. As more young men are dropping out of contention, discouraged by the enormous pressures of modern family life and the puny to nonexistent rewards most get for sacrificing themselves to a company, companies are pushing women to take their place. Rather than a triumphant movement toward equality, it smells of desperation to me: if you can't find enough boys to be suckers for "the man" you turn to the women.

Sheryl Sandberg is a taskmaster who drives her underlings to great sacrifice through manipulation, ambiguous promises and poorly defined ideals. She's the kind of boss who'd be perfectly happy if her female workers gave her their entire reproductive lives, only to end up desperate and childless in middle age. For all the anger some conservatives display toward players and PUAs, these guys are only taking advantage of a situation they didn't create or ask for, but these same middle-class conservatives who hate players, by encouraging their daughters to get on the career track right out of high school, frequently push their daughters right into the arms of a corporate surrogate husband, all but guaranteeing they'll have a fruitless sex life during their prime reproductive years.

In the end, the feminist demands about the workplace are just a reaction to their greatly diminished status as women. They've sold their femininity for a paycheck, and in most cases a pretty meager one. It's going to be a bitter harvest in coming years for many, many women, and the new, "empowered" feminism of the corporate world is largely responsible for creating this problem.

Mission Dolores — a Sad Little Foray

W.F. Price · 27 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Photo of Women's Building by SanFranAnnie

Yesterday, I thought I'd go check out the Mission district in San Francisco, as I'd never been there before on foot and wanted to try some San Francisco-style Mexican food. Furthermore, my grandma used to live there as a young woman back in the 1930s, so I thought it might be nice to spend some time on the same streets she'd walked so long ago.

I caught the number 33 bus and headed over the hill through a very nice neighborhood with stunning views, then descended into the Eureka Valley, passing through the Castro. I got off the bus across the street from the impressive Mission Dolores High School, which faces Dolores Park, and headed down 18th toward Valencia.

Just a block or two down the street, I noticed a sign sticking out in front of me that said "Women's Building," and naturally this aroused my curiosity. There was a group of feminist-looking women hanging out in front of a large, multi-storey building attached to the sign, and one of them, who looked like a 30-something New Yorker, had a familiar look about her, as though I've seen her face on some writer profile somewhere or other. She glared at me suspiciously, but having already seen the mural that festooned the building, I couldn't help but smile with repressed laughter.

The Women's Building is graced with one of the most hideous, comically grotesque murals I've ever seen. Painted in 1994, the Maestra Peace Mural depicts women of diverse ethnicities in various states of self-satisfaction. The style is reminiscent of both Soviet era and 1960s "Age of Aquarius" art, drawing to some extent from socialist realism, but also from New Age, and possibly stylized Aztec paintings as well. It depicts, among other things, oceans flowing out from between a pregnant woman's legs, a Masai woman who looks like Mr. T, handicapped women frolicking together, and so on. The painters squeezed as many ethnicities as possible into the mural, and a number of utopian themes.

After taking several photos of the mural, I continued on my way to the Mission, still marveling at the scene. I mused that the building may be one of the world headquarters of feminism – it appeared every bit the feminist cathedral, if not the Vatican – and determined to look up its origins later.

The Mission was a bit of a disappointment. Apparently, the area has "gentrified," so the Mexican character of the neighborhood has declined significantly. Nevertheless, I found myself a little taqueria called "Taqueria La Cumbre," which bills itself as the home of the Mission-style burrito. Not a bad place as far as Mexican restaurants go, but a little pricey, as the clientele is mostly Anglo. Usually, when I eat foreign food, I try to find a place where the ethnicity of the clientele matches the cuisine. That's how you get the best deals and most genuine food. I'm sure Californians will find it a bit amusing that anyone could see authentic Mexican food as foreign or exotic by now, but for those of us up in the north woods it still is to a large extent.

After having my fill of the Mission district, I turned back onto 18th and headed toward the Castro to see what all the fuss was about.

The Castro is marked territory these days. You can tell exactly where it begins and ends by rainbow flags that stand along the streets, including the largest rainbow flag I've ever seen flying above Harvey Milk Plaza. It's actually a pretty small neighborhood, smaller than the gay enclave in Seattle, although perhaps it is more specifically gay than Seattle's Capitol Hill/Pike Pine corridor. It's a desirable little neighborhood from a real estate perspective, tucked away in a little valley right off Market that provides easy access to downtown. The houses are of the Victorian style common to San Francisco, and fairly well-maintained.

However, it isn't exactly what one might expect from all the hype. The average age of a Castro resident looks to be somewhere around 50; it is not particularly young. In this way, the neighborhood is kind of pathetic. Basically, you have a lot of middle-aged and older gay men trying to keep appearances up. I suppose they do a better job than straight men on average, but there's something sad about that level of vanity in mature men. I will say, though, that what the neighborhood lacks in children and youths, it somewhat makes up for in very stylish little dogs, which are quite common in the Castro.

After heading back and seeing the kids to bed, I looked up the San Francisco Women's Building for some background on my discovery, and found that the building was probably highly relevant to my own family history. So much so, that it may be responsible for my very existence.

It turns out that the building is the old San Francisco Sons of Norway lodge, formerly named Dovre Hall after the Dovre Mountains of Norway, and it was sold to a feminist collective in 1979. Several decades before that, my grandmother, as a young woman, moved from Seattle to live in San Francisco. Her father was a member of the Sons of Norway in Seattle, and helped build the old Seattle lodge. I have little doubt that my grandmother found friends and a place to stay through the Sons of Norway, which was an important resource for the Norwegian immigrant community in the early 20th century. Perhaps she chose to live in the Mission because it was near the lodge, and was a center of San Francisco's Norwegian community at the time.

Finding the building helped fill in a bit of family history for me, but it also evokes some sadness to see that what a fraternal order ran for the benefit of family and community all those years ago was sold off to a group dedicated to destroying and dismantling family and community in the name of an impossible utopian ideal. What a sad little microcosm of our society.

Antifeminism Might Become Illegal in the Nordic Countries

Featured Guest · 29 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Henry Laasanen

The Nordic Council has received recommendations from the expert panel to forbid antifeminist speech in the Nordic countries (Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Iceland and Norway).

The "Expert panel" was full of radical feminists and profeminist men.

The report is written in the Nordic languages (except Finnish) and some parts in English.

In the report antifeminist speech and right-wing extremist hate speech towards immigrants are treated as a part of the same movement.

MRM is labeled as part of right-wing extremism.

The report has an English summary (page 35).

1. Antifeminist Threats and Harassment must be made Illegal (We recommend that the Nordic governments ensure that threats and harassment on the basis of gender are made illegal. Hate speech online must be prosecuted similarly to hate speech in other public spheres.)
2. Low threshold services for reporting threats and Harassment must be established (We recommend that the Nordic governments establish a low threshold service for reporting antifeminist and extremist threats and harassment.)
3. Annual national surveys of anti-feminism must be implemented.
4. Research on anti feminism must be prioritized.
5. Increasing equality and anti-discrimination requires the change to Masculinist standards
6. Measures to aid marginalized men and boys should be implemented.
7. Anti-feminism should be part of the Equality officers' activity area.
8. The press must take care of their responsibilities against antifeminism (The media must ensure that it has the competence to meet extreme actors without legitimising them or their opinions. Editors of online comments' fields have a special responsibility to ensure that their users are not made targets of threats and harassment, and that xenophobic and antifeminist sentiments are not fuelled or legitimised.)
9. Cooperation on antifeminism between countries and groups must continue.
10. Interdisciplinary Nordic anti-feminist conference should be conducted.

Point number 8 interesting: "Editors of online comments' fields have a special responsibility to ensure that… xenophobic and antifeminist sentiments are not fuelled or legitimised." The expert panel wants to treat MRM same as racist hate speech, and Editors of the media must obey.

I am described in the report

Finnish gender researcher (and feminist) Katariina Mäkinen describes me (Henry Laasanen) in the report this way (Page 34).

> To illustrate the importance of what we do, I will talk briefly about the views of one of the most profiled Finnish antifeminists. He claims to be a gender researcher, runs five different blogs, and claims to be a spokesperson for men with a low status in society. His blogs are explicitly antifeminist and misogynist, and he is contributing to normalizing hatred towards feminism and women. In particular, he argues that women's sexuality gives them power over men, and draws on well-known theories about sexual capital to back up his > arguments. Serious gender research is taken out of context and ridiculed.

> This blogger is regularly interviewed in the press, and there are several readers who believe that he is indeed a scholar and that his unscientific theories are valid.

I don't have any connections to extreme right or to the social conservatism, but I am treated as a part of right wing extremism with Anders Breivik etc.

How the report will be received in Finland?

Finland is ruled by the state feminism. In the equality politics feminists have total hegemony and politicians have no guts oppose feminists, because opposing feminism could end their career and label them as misogynists.

It's entirely possible, that expert panel's recommendations will be taken granted in the Nordic countries.

Feminist strategy: connect MRM to the extreme right

In the Finland we have only the liberal MRM organization, called "Men's Equality". Organization has no right wing or conservative opinions. In spite of that, feminists and left wing multiculturality praising researchers desperately want to connect finish MRM to extreme right wing.

Feminist strategy here in Finland is to connect MRM to the right extremism and to the social conservatives, because they are the "official" bad boys.

It doesn't matter, how many times finish MRA says, that we are more of an ultra liberal kind than the conservative kind.

I have read tens of times in the internet, that "I want to go back to 50's" and "I want my wife to stay home" in the traditional way. The truth is, personally I am for the MGTOW and for the PUA ideologies and I have no intentions of going back to the old gender roles.

Articles via Google translate

Want to make the anti-feminist harassment offense

Suggestion: Make it a criminal offense to criticize feminism

Censorship of feminism criticism

Anti Feminism and gender criticism?

Discussion in the Reddit.

Most Gender Equal Place in America: Pine Ridge Indian Reservation

W.F. Price · 30 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I recently came across a Forbes article pointing out the most "unfair" places in the US for women. These kinds of articles show how absolutely removed from reality the feminists have become, so I looked up some data myself to find what might be the most fair place for women by pay gap standards. But first let's take a look at the most "unfair" place for women.

Given that it has the highest median household income in the US, you might think Stamford Connecticut is a great place to live. But this is not so; according to Forbes magazine it is an awful, unfair place for its poor women, who make an average of only about $64,000.

> At No. 1, the most unfair city to be a working woman in America, or the city where women earn just 54 cents for every dollar earned by men, is Stamford, Connecticut. Women in this metro earn an average of $63,553 annually while their boyfriends, husband and brothers pull in nearly $120,000…

The women of Stamford must be suffering terribly from the inequality.

On the other end of the fairness scale, located in the Badlands of South Dakota, we have Shannon County, which lies entirely within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, where the vanquished Sioux Indians were corraled following the shameful 1890 massacre at Wounded Knee, which marked their utter defeat and the final destruction of their way of life.

According to Cecilia Fire Thunder, the first female president of the Pine Ridge Reservation, there is some sexism in Pine Ridge, but it is meaningless, because women utterly dominate the economy:

> "There are some people in the community who want me to fail because I am a woman. But they have to understand that 68 percent of the college graduates on the reservation are women. Seventy percent of the jobs are held by women. Over 90 percent of the jobs in our schools are held by women."

Fire Thunder was impeached two months before the end of her two year term for trying to open an abortion clinic in Pine Ridge. For those who might be confused by this, abortion was typically considered a crime against the tribe in traditional Plains Indian law (i.e. law that existed before US dominance of the region).

In Shannon County, women make $1.11 for every dollar men make, which must mean it's a great place to be a woman, right?

Well, if you consider utter despair, third world living conditions, pervasive substance abuse, a woefully short average lifespan of 48 years for men (!) and 52 for women, infant mortality 5 times the national average and 80% unemployment to be tolerable, maybe so…

Surely, it must be a better place than Stamford, Connecticut, where the poor women suffer from the surfeit of rich, healthy, employed and comfortable men in their community.

I have yet to see feminists explain why the places with the highest income disparity between men and women are characterized by wealth, comfort and health, whereas those places where the women outearn men are invariably dumps inhabited only by those too hapless and defeated to leave.

Do feminists want the US to be more lke Pine Ridge in general, or more like Stamford? I'm not sure they can answer that question, because they have neither the knowledge nor inclination. All they care about is that they, personally, aren't making as much as that guy in a suit they see at the local café. As for the rest of us, it doesn't matter.

This is why nobody with any sense should listen to feminists when it comes to policy that affects our communities, cities, states and countries. They are worse than useless; they are selfish, destructive people.

Finally, I'd like to suggest something that could dramatically improve the lives of the Lakota Sioux in Pine Ridge: take some of those federal grants for women that go to employ upper middle class female college grads and allocate the funds to jobs for men in Pine Ridge. Surely, feminists can't object to that, can they?

Price Drop on AlphaSmart NEO

Uncle Elmer · 30 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Is now the time to get one of these babe magnets?

What do you get when you cross a camera with a computer?

A computer.

Back in the old days you could operate any camera built before 1990. The paradigm of subject, lens, and image relationships governed by F-stop, shutter speed, and film type were an easily understood and universal user interface. During the early years of digital cameras this user-interface model became fragmented as silicon imaging systems required different control signals to function. Camera makers eventually returned to the simpler approach of the mechanical era and added audible “shutter” sounds and simpler menus.

Often my wife pulls out her “smart phone” and hands it to me to get an image. Usually the thing goes nuts when I touch it, as the glass interface responds to my sweaty fingers by flipping and spinning the image view, shutting on and off, or dropping into some confused sub-menu until she corrects it for me. I spend a large part of my time working with specialized camera and video systems. The last thing I want to do in my off time is become acquainted with some appliance’s idiot user interface as I often have to decipher some computeroid nonsense on the job.

On a positive note though, digital imaging is a boon from the production side of photography, having unshackled us from the darkroom and the exorbitant film, paper, and development costs.

This ubiquitous soft-menu user interface on all our products is now a major selling point, as seen in car commercials that extol the virtue of the console display with “MP3” and internet connectivity. Recently I visited back east and “upgraded” my rental car to a Lincoln SX, which was enjoyable enough but one wonders the cost of replacing the specialized computer display or sensors when the car starts getting old.

So I spend much of my day on a computer running CAD, scientific, and physics codes, along with text editors and of course, the open pipeline to the information sewer. The internet provides me an exact template to match my inner angst, always ready to serve up exactly the swill I need and cleverly able to pull me back in if I stay away or have thoughts of more worthwhile activities like enjoying the sunset or going for a walk. As I work at home most of the time it is a real challenge to stay focused. (Often, instead of getting up and interacting with the physical world, I post assinine comments on various websites to satisfy some small-minded urge to draw attention to myself. As proof that the internet creates a self-emergent false identity, after some work at trolling I had developed a following; a virtual population of imaginary friends. This has lead to an even more confused and fragmented reality than any of my previous incarnations.)

Many times in my work I need to write a lot, such as when developing technical proposals to keep the work pipeline filled. Of course I use MS Word, and every time I put together a proposal I swear it will be the last time I use Word as the final editing tool. I am not going to knock Word, it has its strengths, but free-flow narrative development is not one of them (for me anyway). There are some tools like WriteRoom that attempt to provide distraction-free writing. But the PC or laptop we all use to host word processors exacerbates the problem through the distractions of it’s bootup/shutdown cycle, the operating system and the internet. Generally it’s a clutter that slowly drives you mad. It never fails that when I am writing a proposal I end up wasting a lot of energy fighting Word and the PC. Mind you, those tools are great for producing publication-quality work, but content is King, and the ability to generate compelling wordplay trumps slick formatting. Combining these disparate qualities however can make for an irresisteable proposal. Or so it seems until it inevitably gets rejected.

The AlphaSmart NEO

This may seem like an unusual subject for the Spearhead. Reason I am doing this is because I use one of these a lot and would hate to see it go out of production. My fears were heightened when they recently dropped the price to $120, which may be due to getting battered by the various tablet/keyboard products emerging. If you are trying to improve your writing output this machine would be worth far more to you than the current price.

In a nutshell this device is just a good, solid keyboard with display and memory. There is no operating system and no internet connectivity. You turn it on, and 3 seconds later you are in your document. Turn it off, put it away, then repeat on your next writing opportunity or inspiration. It performs one function extremely well : writing production. To transfer your work to the PC just plug in the USB cable, hit the “Send” key and it pumps your words into whatever app you are running, such as your favorite text editor or even your blog site. It also has a file manager applet for quick transfer, as well as an IR interface for wireless connection to the PC.

This thing will run over 700 hours on 3 AA batteries. That is a solid month of operation, or about a year of normal use! You could take this thing overseas and write a novel without ever needing to charge it or replace batteries. It is lightweight and stashes easily, yet stout enough to make you feel like Hank Chernaski hunched over a classic Royal typewriter.

The display is minimal but very readable in direct sunlight. I tend not to look at the display much when I write anyway, though the keyboard has some rudimentary word processing function so you can navigate your text. The minimal display conserves battery power, which is also why it doesn’t have any external memory ports for a flash drive. The NEO has a cousin called the “Dana” which has a larger display and can take a SD card for backups, but requires a little more battery power to operate. I picked up a Dana off ebay for less than $60 (4 years ago) and eventually ordered a new Neo for about $250.

A couple other uses I have made for the Neo. I use it during important meetings at Encorpera to capture the discussion instead of scibbling on a notepad, and the thing is so much more masculine than a laptop or some fruity display device. Another use is to take it on travel with my laptop and a nice solid trackball similiar to my office arrangement, as it functions like an ordinary keyboard. Can fit it in my rolling computer-luggage easily. Other folks have used it as a keyboard for their iPad or “smartphones”.

If you are going “trekking” in any fashion and want to record your experiences or do attempt serious writing during your travels, you cannot beat the Neo. (While you are at it leave the camera at home so you can experience your travels instead of trying to get an awesome shot of every damn thing you see. But that’s the subject for another essay.)

I probably have not impressed on you how much this device can improve your writing, while allowing you to do it from anywhere for any length of time. The simplicity of not waiting for the machine to boot up, or charging batteries, or getting distracted by the operating system or internet, and simply being able to start writing instantaneously is very gratifying and helps you focus on …writing.

Neo owners like to take photos of their keyboard in exotic locales though, and to help convince you to get online right now and order one, I found some great Neo shots From Around the Web that provide a glimpse of the essential Neo experience.

This being The Spearhead, I will have to start with this great shot by Kees van Leijenhorst. Notice the classic photo-composition with the main subjects arranged in an eye-pleasing pyramid; the gentleman higher in the frame exuding wisdom to the adoring young lady, and the natural visual flow to the stylish Neo olive-green case. A very compelling image. You can understand now the true meaning of the name *Alpha*Smart, because women are drawn to a Neo man like a magnet. You are likely to get approached by hot women at the coffeeshop who will show a keen interest in your rugged paleo word machine.

“Thank God, there’s an American AlphaSmart Neo in the house, with all the characters in place. It easily connects to the Mac via a USB cable. This did the trick, and surely made her day… ”

Now judge for yourself : which of these guys screams “beta” and which one has that “alpha” smirk?

Kees has some other excellent shots :

"An AlphaSmart Neo and an ash tray –what else does a man need?"

"As astute observers will notice, focus is on the almost finished glass of Campari. That's wrong, obviously, but I'm afraid I was preoccupied with Campari shortage –my Neo still had 60%…"

———

Our next Neo aficiando, Wade Shepard, may be of interest to Spearhead readers as he is traveling the world and writing about it using his Neo :

"This is a photo of my writing on an Alphasmart Neo while in camp in Hvalfjordur, Iceland. Work doesn't get much better than this."

———

Next up is Doug Nienhuis, who took his Neo on a bike tour of the Philppines.

"Neo on the table in Taytay, Palawan, Philippines"

"AlphaSmart Neo in Sabang, Palwan, Philippines"

A guy calling himself "Oldwoodchuck" poses with his Dana :

"The Old Woodchuck was on Star Island for a week recently, and one of the things that you do there is to paint/sketch/photograph the lighthouse on neighboring White Island."

"Tintagel Castle, and the Woodchuck is waiting for the fret, or sea mist, to burn off and is making some notes. A comfortable place, but if I lean back a bit, it will be Le Morte d'Marmot that we'll be reading, not Le Morte d'Arthur."

———-

Frederic Durbin has a nice spread showing his day in Frick Park with his Neo :

“I stayed in the park for about five hours on Monday and turned out 1,846 words. That’s not spectacular; I was writing a slower section that’s moving into the next point of tension. But it’s spectacular for a day when I thought I’d be working the paper line at my job”

———————-

Brian Byrne has taken his Neo to a few remote places :

“Well, I have used my Alphasmart in some interesting places, 5,000 metres up in the Andes, on top of a glacier in Iceland, over the Great Barrier Reef, the Coliseum in Rome as just a few. This latest was at a unique event, the final inshore race of the 2011/2012 Volvo Ocean Race, out on a small boat in the middle of the whole thing on Galway Bay.”

———-

Here’s a nice shot from somewhere in the Philippines, but the guy’s web link is broken :

———-

One last link to Brian Hollar's Neo review, which has some good links of its own, and finally, a link to AlphaSmart's Neo site itself. Tell 'em Elmer sent you.

Bad For Business: Everyone Has An "Adria Richards Story"

Obsidian · 31 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"Live by the tweet; get fired by the tweet…. if it's offensive, try first to ignore it."
-Stuart Schneiderman

By now the name of one Ms. Adria Richards hardly needs any introduction; over the past week, the Internet has been aflame with her exploits, most notably her actions taken in a moment of outrage over two fellow tech conference attendees making what she interpreted to be sexist, even misogynistic jokes while sitting behind her (even though one of the gents – a certain "Mr. Hank" who wound up getting fired – has insisted that nothing he or his bud were joking about was of a sexual nature, and has in fact turned out to be nothing short of a true gentleman in the wake of his fate). Her actions – which included snapping a picture via her camera phone without the consent of the putative offenders and then posting it to her Twitter account along with her own running commentary – has led to at least one man being fired from his job. But by then, the story had not just gone viral – it went pandemic – and before the week would be out, Ms. Richards would also find herself out of a job, as the former "Dev Evangelist" for the tech outfit SendGrid, not just for the way in which she handled the Donglegate affair, but because she has proven to be the very divisive force she was hired to address.

I've been following the events of the Adria Richards story as best I can over the past few days, and to be sure, there are many takes on what went down, what it all means and how things will or should "change" moving ahead. For my money, perhaps the most comprehensive take was posted by a tech insider and someone who knows Ms. Richards fairly well, but I leave that to my readers to decide for themselves.

While one can speculate as to why the Adria Richards story has caught virtual fire in the media, for me it seems rather simple – that despite the unneccesarily ugly actions of some online – making rape/death threats to Ms. Richards, "DDOSing" her former employer and so forth, there is a very real reason as to why the backlash against Ms. Richards' actions was so fierce and enormous.

It's because we all know an Adria Richards. I know I've encountered one.

We all know of Women/Feminists like Adria Richards – someone who has a perpetual chip-on-the-shoulder attitude, constantly looking for instances to be "offended" and never missing an opportunity to lecture others about how they should behave, regardless as their her own actions (please note that Ms. Richards, for example, tweeted about using a "big sock" at the very conference she took issue with Mr. Hank and his buddy). These are Women/Feminists who see themselves as striking a blow against the Patriarchy – and in this case, against "institutional racism", too – keep in mind, that Ms. Richards has referred to herself as the Joan of Arc of our times (!) – a bigger conceit, is harder to conceive.

The real story here – one that everyone knows but fears of speaking about openly – is of the over-reach of the Adria Richards' of the world; how they so willfully break the rules and bully others in a perverted attempt to make the world a better place. Nor is this something that is confined just to the workplace; we've seen it before.

For example, consider the Nice Guys of OKCupid fiasco, late last year – Feminists, like Ms. Richards, took it upon themselves to create a Tumblr which featured the profiles of self-professed "nice guys" lamenting their lovelorn fates. Because there was some of the guys who used what said Outraged Feminists considered to be sexist/misogynist/racist statements, said Feminists felt justified in potentially breaking the law in "outing" them, not paying attention to the fact that some innocent guys got caught up in the dragnet as well. And to be sure, there were quite a few in the media, who defended these outraged ladies' actions – Hugo Schwyzer was one; the good folks over at Jezebel another. Thank God one person, in the form of Ms. Joanna Schroeder, saw fit to speak out against the abuse and downright bullying that was taking place over the Nice Guys of OKCupid incident. Too bad, that to date and as far as I can tell, no one of her caliber in the online media, has joined in with her.

In another story, a few years back, another intrepid Feminist decides to snap a picture of a Man (without his knowledge or consent, of course) supposedly relieving himself on a subway platform some distance from her, as prima facie evidence of street harassment (according to the writer, the Man in question was masturbating as a result of her presence). Jezebel ran the piece, and from what I can tell, nothing came of the matter. But the precedent was made, and if you're anything like me, you tend to take notice of patterns of behavior. In all three instances, Feminists took it upon themselves to be judge, jury and executioner, using social media to "try" the supposed offenders, and ginning up a Digital Mob in dealing with said supposed offenders. If anything even aping something like this was done by Men – and God forbid, straight White ones – we'd never hear the end of it.

This ain't funny so don't you dare laugh, but the truth is that we truly have entered the 1984 Era – one where Crimethink is a very real thing, and carries with it very real consequences. We've kicked First Amendment ideals and the principles of tolerance that has made the Western world the unprecedented success it is to the curb, and put in their place an Orwellian web of arcane and draconian protocols that are inscrutable to decipher, impossible to satisfy and ultimately ruinous for everyone in the longrun. And all in the name of "social justice".

As a Black Man, one who has either witnessed or experienced things far and away more "offensive" than that which any of these ladies have per their kerfuffles above, I have to say that I am deeply saddened to read and hear of how my fellow African Americans have responded to the Adria Richards debacle. I wonder, how would Jackie Robinson, or Hank Aaron, or Willie Mays, or Roberto Clemente, would have reacted to such things – Black Men who faced, daily, death threats, racial slurs and out and out, in your face racism, inside the clubhouse and out in the stands? The historical record says, that they handled it like true champions, for in the end, everyone loves a winner.

That's the attitude I take in my own life. I've won over hardened bigots, not by threats of burnin' the mutha down, but by proving, consistently, that not only could I do the job, but I was one of the best that ever did it. Having a thick skin and channeling equal parts Sidney Poitier and George Jefferson when needed, has taken me far in life.

When the dust settles, the record will show that what Ms. Richards has done will have done much more harm than good insofar as the "cause" of Blacks and Women are concerned. Whites and others, will see this as yet another example in a long chain of examples that don't make the paper or the Internet, of folks who are constantly looking to be aggrieved, offended, to exact some measure, not of justice, but of revenge, on others in a pitiful attempt to assauge personal demons and paper over personal and professional deficiencies. This, of course, severely damages Blacks and Women who are indeed, very good at what they do and don't feel the need to haul out Al Sharpton or stage a boycott/protest everytime somebody says something silly. As a result, our society will become more and more separate; what MLK called a "negative peace", will continue to ensue. Ms. Richards' actions are the final nail in the coffin of the good will African Americans have squandered over the past half a century – that we've gone from Jackie Robinson, to Adria Richards. Oh, how far have we fallen.

The Empress has no clothes.

Now adjourn your arses…

The Obsidian

Happy Easter!

W.F. Price · 31 March 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of my favorite subtexts of the Easter story is the devotion of Mary Magdalene, who kept a vigil at her Lord's tomb, and thereby became the first witness to the Resurrection.

I don't see it as a specifically Christian message, but rather a universal one: the woman, regardless of her background or past, can attain holiness through selfless love and devotion. I hope some day that our own errant women can follow Mary Magdalene's example.

Keeping it Real

W.F. Price · 2 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've received some suggestions to meet up with people IRL, and although I've never been averse to the idea, it's kind of a hassle given that readers are scattered across the globe. However, it turns out that there are a number of local readers, and it would be nice to meet up for some good old fashioned comradery and socializing.

I'd be happy to get together with people in the Seattle area for good conversation and fellowship, so I thought I'd throw the idea out there. However, for starters I don't think politics should be the first order of business. Instead, simply hanging out to have a good time and get to know each other ought to be the first priority.

I like the idea of spending some time in a relaxed, friendly environment where men can speak their minds without fear and enjoy each other's company. So I'd like to propose a get together.

As for rules, they are quite simple:

1. Respect your fellow man regardless of his faith (or lack thereof), ethnicity, age, wealth and ability. Just accept him for who he is and be a gracious, kind and polite person.

2. No feminists.

I think the above should suffice.

Anyone interested who happens to live in or be traveling through the Seattle area should feel free to get in touch via the contact form if interested. I think it's about the right time for some socializing. Hopefully, we can expand this sort of thing to other locales as well, but I'll have to start at home.

More Evidence That Grades != Academic Achievement

Elusive Wapiti · 2 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

…and more evidence that the best thing parents can do for their sons' future is just pull them out of a schooling system of, by, and for females:

> The causes of the decline in boys' educational achievements are many, ranging from their over-medication, to the feminization of the classroom, to their being raised by single mothers, to their being told from birth by popular culture some version of the old T-shirt slogan "Boys are stupid. Throw rocks at them." Now it turns out there's yet another obstacle to boys' learning – their teachers.

> > A recent study published in the February edition of the Journal of Human Resources found an astonishing thing. Although boys and girls score about the same on standardized tests, boys get lower grades than do girls. Stated another way, the grades you'd expect boys to get based on their test scores were higher than what they actually received. Girls, by contrast, received grades that were higher than would be predicted by their test scores. Students were given tests in reading, math and science, while teachers also rated students' abilities in all three areas, as well as rated them on classroom behaviors. The study found that when assessing kids' academic abilities, the teachers factored in their classroom behaviors…girls scored about 15 percent higher in behavior (also called "non-cognitive skills"), which meant they earned better grades than boys, even though they didn't score as high on the tests.

> Meanwhile…an entirely different study done on a different continent using different methodology arrived at a surprisingly similar conclusion. Read about it here…a study out of the United Kingdom found that female teachers grade male pupils more harshly than they do female students:

> > Female teachers mark male pupils more harshly than they do their female students, research has claimed. Additionally, girls tend to believe male teachers will look upon them more favorably than female teaching staff, but men treat all students the same, regardless of gender. [Moreover, h]aving a male teacher increased the efforts of female students whereas a female teacher lowered the efforts of boys.

> Given that over 80% of public school teachers in the United States are women, the discouragement of boys about education should come as no surprise. It's not their ability, their intelligence or their effort that matters; it's their sex. Remember, a lot of these are little kids of five, six, seven years old. Can we not cease, even in the cases of those defenseless boys, our denigration of males?

It won't cease, because it can't. The problem is systemic. Putting aside for a moment the fact that public schooling is designed to "produce" "identical" cogs for the industrial age machine, cogs just smart enough to pull a level but not smart enough to rock the boat, the cure the decline in male academic achievement is for parents remove male children from the system entirely. A system where feminine behavior is rewarded and masculine behavior punished and/or drugged into compliance, liberalist/feminist scholarship is taught, higher male cognitive variability is binned (on the low end) and ignored (on the high end), and where the presence of men in the teaching ranks is discouraged.

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to three, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

More Feminist Art

W.F. Price · 2 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

After uploading the photos from San Francisco and looking them over, I felt I had to share one more picture from the Women's Building in the Mission. Although a few mere photos can't do justice to the masterpiece that is the Peace Mural, this particular shot captures more action than the last one I posted.

Behold your betters, mere mortal males (click for large version):

[image]

Two More Female Marines Flunk Out of Officer Combat Training

W.F. Price · 4 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The second pair of women attempting to pass the Marine Infantry Officer Course washed out a few days into the 10-week program, much like the women who gave it a shot last fall. About a quarter of the men who take the course also fail for various reasons. It should be kept in mind that the men who take the course have already been preselected through both individual motivation and USMC basic training, so they represent a high quality pool of soldiers.

Many people who support women in combat have lapses in logic when suggesting that some significant percentage of women could handle it. They think of women who are faster than the average man, or who can do numerous pullups, lift a lot of weight, etc. However, they are not considering that these are generally women who are gifted in one particular ability, which does not mean that they have the all-around skills and strength necessary for combat. Little girls, for example, are typically more talented at pullups than full-grown women. But would that make them good soldiers? Likewise, very thin women can often outrun heavy men in distance races. But could a 110 lb. woman (or a 110 lb. man, for that matter) carry equipment significantly heavier than she is up a mountain?

Women best qualified to pass such a course would probably tend to be weightlifter types, but they have the disadvantage of being slow, heavy and prone to overheating, which is a real problem in battle or on marches.

The truth is that, on average, women are significantly smaller, weaker and slower than men. When you look at the distribution of physical ability, only a small fraction of women have the same strength as the average man. And far, far fewer can match men who are significantly stronger than average, like your typical soldier.

Finally, the kind of women who might have a shot at competing with men in the top 5% or so of physical ability could qualify as high-level athletes, and that being the case, why would they join the military when they could easily obtain a full scholarship to a good school on athletic ability alone?

Your Support Needed

W.F. Price · 4 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'd really like to keep The Spearhead online, but the bills are getting to be a bit much for me at this point, and I can't afford to subsidize the site myself. I rent a server for the site in order to host a WordPress installation, which allows multiple authors and a great deal more control than free sites, not to mention some protection from arbitrary shutdowns, which sometimes happen on free blogging services.

This requires more work on my part to maintain the software, and additional expenses.

I've devoted a great deal of time and energy to The Spearhead over the last three and a half years. It hasn't been a particularly lucrative endeaver, largely because I tend to eschew the salesman approach, focusing instead on doing what I like best: writing with as much candor and honesty as possible. This is good for readers, but not great for business, so I must rely on donations to keep the site running and keep my head above water.

Currently, I'm at a point where running the site as a fully hosted, frequently updated source of content may not be feasible for much longer. My out of pocket expenses run about $2,500 a year, which isn't a great deal, but that doesn't account for the time and work I put into the site, which is considerable.

I'd really like to keep The Spearhead online as a resource for men who want to change the status quo. I think it's an important part of the constellation of sites that have emerged to advocate for men, and indeed it's one of the pioneers of the new approach to countering out-of-control feminism, which is starting to show real results.

If you support The Spearhead's goals, or if you simply enjoy the content, please contribute to the site to help keep it online. I pledge to use every contribution to further its mission, and to make the most of every dollar sent in.

All support is welcome, including small donations. If every regular reader sent in only $5 per month the site would be fully self-supporting, and I'd have nothing to worry about. So please consider becoming a supporting subscriber.

However, I realize that this being the internet, it doesn't work that way, so it has largely been a few generous donors who have kept the site alive. I am very grateful to those people, who have pulled my chestnuts out of the fire on a few occasions over the years. Without their support the site simply wouldn't have made it this far.

Thanks to everyone who has supported the site over the years, and a big thank you to contributors as well. I hope we can keep it online and productive — with your help I promise to do just that.

Donation info is on the top of the right sidebar. You can send money via PayPal, or you can send a check or money order to my PO Box at:

William Price (or Price Content)
PO Box 28282
Seattle WA

Female Bounty Hunters: Shoot First, Apprehend Later

W.F. Price · 7 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the following video, a female bounty hunter outfit called “Lipstick’s Most Wanted” attempts to apprehend a felon on a drug dealing case. The three women, armed with tasers, rubber bullets and pepper spray, fail to capture the men, but they manage inflict some punishment on him, breaking his nose and blinding him in one eye with the rubber bullets. Now, the guy is suing them.

His lawyer disputes whether he even owed any bail money, and says that the women used excessive force and failed to give him a chance to surrender peacefully. It certainly looks that way from the video.

Because it’s women, the video comes off as pretty ridiculous. However, imagine male bounty hunters employing “shoot-first” tactics like that. They’d probably find themselves in jail in short order. Hopefully, somebody shuts this company down and revokes their license before somebody gets shot with real bullets.

Gotta hand it to the Canadian MRAs

W.F. Price · 9 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The video I've embedded below clearly displays one of the reasons I've distanced myself from public activism from the beginning — I really can't stand most "activists." From the time I was a boy in Seattle I grew to dislike them intensely. Whether they were pro-Sandinista activists at the local church (Seattle's Catholic Church was that radical in the early 80s), weirdo leftists with various causes dressed up like hippies, the vulgarians at gay pride rallies in the neighborhood I grew up in or, more recently, violent anarchists who smash windows and trash my town, they've all left me with a sense of disgust. The feminist activists in the video are pretty much par for the course.

I did not want to be those people. That's always been what "activism" meant to me. But maybe there is a different way — one that creates a contrast, and offers people an alternative point of view. MRAs affiliated with various groups, including AVFM, CAFE and others seem to be redefining public activism in a positive manner. Instead of screaming, wielding weapons, swearing in public, hurling invective and breaking things, they conduct themselves graciously, and document the result. The last part appears to be particularly effective; some of their videos have received hundreds of thousands of views on YouTube. That's pretty impressive, especially considering that it's making feminist activists look like screaming bigots.

Here's some video CAFE shot of the feminist activists doing their thing at the University of Toronto last Thursday:

There's a lot more where that came from. One video, viewed almost 200,000 times so far, shows a feminist yelling "shut the fuck up" at a couple of MRAs over and over. She was trying to read a statement of lies about how feminists do not really want to deny fathers custody and such, and whenever the MRA disagreed she'd just screech STFU!

The attitude of entitlement these feminists display is so obvious that reasonable people who see it will conclude that they represent the ugliest kind of supremacism.

Really well done on CAFE's part to put on these events. The AVFM activists also conducted themselves very well, and most importantly got it on film.

I don't agree with everything in the MRM, but that would be too much to expect, and progress doesn't come without disagreement and ideological competition. However, whoever is taking on the feminists – and doing so effectively – has my support. I am also very, very pleased to see that MRAs have finally fully adopted the position that feminism is a poisonous movement that must be eradicated rather than accommodated.

Another Invite

W.F. Price · 11 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Since I suggested people in my local area meet up in person last week, I've met with two men in person, and had productive, enjoyable conversations with both. As one might expect, all of us were drawn to men's issues through personal experience. One of the reasons I started The Spearhead was that I knew there must be millions of men out there who have had personal experiences with state and social discrimination against men, particularly in family law. I figured that this would be a pretty large pool of potential readers, so I wasn't worried at all about whether or not there would be enough interested men.

However, I noticed that there was very little on offer for men who have had these kinds of painful experiences. There were few easily accessible sources of information, and I wanted to change that. Not to say there was nothing out there, but it was largely confined to forums and other communities that required some effort to access. Angry Harry, the pioneer of MRA blogging, may have been the sole MRA blogger online, and there's just too much out there for one man to cover. Fortunately, that has changed quite a bit over the last few years. Now, it's pretty easy to find information and articles on any number of relevant topics with a simple Google search or two.

I'm pretty confident that the content and info out there, while perhaps not yet as comprehensive as it ideally could be, is sufficient to get the average guy started on educating himself. Work remains to be done, but we've got a good foundation set up.

So now it looks like it's time to move on to developing a sense of comradery. Groups like AVfM and CAFE are doing that through activism, producing good results on the ground. Others are reaching out through video blogging, and of course a number of us continue to build communities online. But nothing can substitute for face time. And for a lot of us, human contact is pretty important.

Unfortunately, many divorced men and noncustodial fathers are emotionally pretty screwed up. There's a strong temptation to withdraw from society during recovery from a traumatic event like divorce. I did it myself, living like a hermit for a few years following my divorce, but at least I had my children around much of the time. Although it was probably necessary to have some time to lick my wounds, and it helped me get The Spearhead off the ground, I came to realize that it was becoming a habit and part of my character, which was a reversal from my earlier life, when I'd been quite social and gregarious.

Getting together with men in real life – especially those who share a common experience or interest – can not only help us get things done, but help us deal with some of the misfortunes we've experienced. I think it's necessary, and it's a damn shame how little is out there. This is largely the fault of feminism, which has so demoralized and frightened divorced men and fathers that until the last few years all they could do was blame themselves, so whatever groups that did exist had no lasting appeal, because the message was so negative. Usually, the leaders of these groups were counselors or other "professionals" who made a living largely off of feminist destruction of families. Naturally, they had little interest in changing the status quo, and this left men who needed company and support profoundly alienated.

Things have changed. Men don't feel the need to apologize any longer — they are losing that sense of guilt. This is a great opportunity, and I intend to seize it. I hope other men in other places catch my drift here: it's time for men to start getting together and enjoying each other's company and promoting each other's interests again. There is a lot of strength in personal associations, and we'd be foolish not to take advantage of that.

So, once again, I invite any men in the Seattle area to contact me through the contact form. I've received responses from nearly a dozen so far, and responded to every one (if you missed my response, please let me know). I'm happy to continue to meet with people personally for the time being, until we can organize a group meeting.

Additionally, if anyone in another location would like to suggest a meetup in their neck of the woods, I'd be happy to facilitate that with a post here.

The Androgyny of North Korea's Juche Regime

Featured Guest · 11 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Aych

Lately, the torrent of unusually loud and pugnacious rhetoric emanating from North Korea has been dominating the news cycle over the last few weeks. Many of you readers out there have undoubtedly noticed this. This wave of bellicosity has made me want to re-visit an excellent book on the topic of North Korean ideology and propaganda. The book is: 'The Cleanest Race' by B. R. Meyers.

It is a painstaking, systematic examination of the major themes which are generated by the North Korean propaganda apparatus. The reader is provided with useful insights for understanding these frothy outpourings which seem too bizarre and over-the-top to take seriously. (One must also keep in mind that North Korean domestic propaganda frequently differs from the English-language KCNA news releases which get issued to the rest of the world's press agencies.)

The North Korean regime, undoubtedly the world's vilest, is surely the worst possible example of extreme Patriarchy run amok. Furthermore, the ruling men of the Kim dynasty are surely held-up as the most macho, barrel-chested, bare-knuckled, testosterone-fuelled, manliest men who have ever lived. Am I right?

Well, hold on — not so fast.

Among other issues, the author of the book discusses the use of gender in the portrayals of North Korean leadership. An outside observer might reasonably assume that, since Korean culture is so strongly rooted in neo-Confucian values, Kim Il Sung and Kim Jong Il are (and were) seamlessly portrayed as being the ultimate patriarchs for the nation to look-up to. That assumption, however, is quite misleading when you analyze North Korean media carefully.

Contrary to this assumption, it turns out that the NK propaganda mills frequently violate the most closely-held tenets of Confucianism by playing-up the Kims' more 'feminine' features:

> Even when Kim is referred to as Father Leader (aboji suryong)… there is nothing Confucian or patriarchal about him… Kim is referred to primarily as Parent Leader (oboi suryong), though with his maternal side praised far more often than the other. Kim Jong Il himself has long described his father's motherly qualities as key to his success.

This is underscored by the many images of Kim Il Sung and Kim Jong Il in which they hold joyous soldiers or workers close to their chests. The two Kims (the book only briefly touches upon Kim Jong Un) were, in fact, a fusion of paternal AND maternal features:

> Artists and writers not only play up the feminine aspects of Kim Il Sung's appearance- the soft pale face, the dimpled smile, the expansive bosom- but also show him holding small children or letting them clamber over him. In photographs we see him grinning as schoolgirls pull yearningly on his arms and hands. Even in depictions of his guerrilla years these qualities are always on display. In one illustration he is tucking children into bed…

In this way, the Leader is both the mother who nurtures the people and the father who fights the outside world.

While processing this idea, one should also bear in mind that Japan's World War II emperor-centered ideology (the ideology which provided the initial raw materials from which the North Korean personality-cult came forth) frequently portrayed the emperor Hirohito as an androgynous figure rather than a patriarchal one. (One portion of the secret Imperial Japanese enthronement ceremony reportedly involves the Emperor symbolically giving birth to himself.)

The book continues on the Kims' less-than-patriarchal portrayal:

> …Kim Il Sung's peculiarly androgynous or hermaphroditic image also seems to exert a far more emotional attraction than any of the unambiguously paternal leaders of Eastern Europe were able to. I am not qualified to analyze the cult (or anything else) from a psychological standpoint, but just enough should be written here to counter the reader's skepticism that sane people could give themselves over to the adoration of a male mother figure. Sigmund Freud wrote of every child's yearning for a phallic mother, a truly omnipotent parent who is both sexes in one…

So rather than being a bunch of out-of-control macho patriarchs, the Kim dynasty is instead a regime which attempts to fuse both elements- father AND mother- into the very same personage.

This may provide one psychological explanation of the NK regime's stubborn endurance in the minds of those unlucky enough to be born into it: rebelling against the Kims would deprive the nation of both its parents. This is a loss which, psychologically, the nation could not survive.

But is North Korea a flat-out patriarchy? Well, if an accurate summation of its internal propaganda is any guide, their regime is arguably a rather different creature indeed.

Tranny MMA fighter beating up girls, white knights incensed

W.F. Price · 11 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As the US gets weirder and weirder by the day, I suppose all that's left is to sit back and enjoy the show, so maybe it shouldn't be surprising that MMA officials are defending transgender fighter Fallon Fox, who has been destroying his – oops, "her" – opponents in the ring. It certainly does make for quite a spectacle.

Fox, a 36 year-old father, had his external genitalia lopped off six years ago, and then took female hormones so as to achieve some sort of approximation of a female. Having wrestled in high school (he was mediocre according to former teammates), he decided he might have a shot in MMA if he stuck to fighting girls. Turns out he was right. Fox has been manhandling his opponents, who are amongst the best female fighters on earth.

Although this says a lot about the retarded idea to make women combat soldiers (if a physically mediocre, 36yo castrated man who has been on estrogen for years can easily outfight the toughest women, why does anyone take women in combat seriously?), it also speaks to the farce of women's sports in general.

For some reason, a lot of men in MMA are taking issue with Fox fighting girls. Why? Are they concerned about the poor little things getting hurt? If so, then what difference does it make whether they are annihilated by a eunuch or a woman? These girls are cruising for a bruising, and if they can dish it out they can eat it, too.

I know there are a lot of people out there saying that women should also have the opportunity to compete against their equals, and physical excellence is a noble ideal for women to strive for as well, and I used to feel the same way. But look at the results:

Title IX, the WNBA, female boxers, female MMA fighters, shrieking about inequality in college sports and cancellation of men's sports programs, dropping wrestling from the Olympics (!), federal lawsuits, beastly, steroid-enhanced womyn, etc., etc. ad nauseum.

If equality is really the goal, let's eliminate gendered sports. All of them. Let's eliminate barriers to competition, and make all sports open to all consenting adults.

Here's Fallon Fox destroying a very rough looking woman and making it look easy:

Fallon Fox: hero for gender equality.

It's Only Natural

BC Dad · 12 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Relationships are the most important part of life in China. They include family especially, but also connections with bureaucrats and officials, with business men and women, and with all and sundry who might enhance one's face or who have the potential to be an ally in the future.

The primary mechanism for networking and deal-making, social and business, is the dinner party, where a few select friends and acquaintances get together at a restaurant and absorb excessive quantities of food and alcohol.

On weekdays, this usually means the party winds up by 9 pm or so, and even on weekends only the diehards carry on at the bar or a KTV (karaoke club). The standard Western house party which ends at 3 a.m. is virtually unknown here. However, the early start and end to the festivities in no way minimizes the amount of alcohol that is consumed – shit-faced is the predictable outcome; the booze never stops coming. Gan bei, the Chinese version of cheers, means dry glass, and they're not kidding – there's an entire protocol to be followed with each downing of a glass of beer.

During these outings, business deals are discussed and negotiated, but also much social business takes place, including arranging dates, hook-ups, and even marriages, often through one of the group acting as an intermediary. More on that in a bit.

Many restaurants in Benxi are not recognizable as such by Western standards – there is often no main dining room, just a kitchen and a series of private rooms of varying size. Karaoke clubs also are strictly private rooms only, and everything is available – food, alcohol, girls, killer sound system, English songs, etc. Although no one has mentioned it, I would not be surprised if that list included boys (young men, at least) too. Drugs seem to be verboten though; if there's a drug scene here, I haven't seen it, and given the nature of Chinese law (death penalty anyone?) I want no part of it.

My most recent experience of such a dinner party came courtesy of Mr. T, an official who supervises the Chinese English teachers in my district – a dozen primary schools and roughly a hundred or so teachers. I have had dinner at his home previously. Mr. T is reasonably intelligent and bilingual, a man who cultivates and collects relationships the way some gardeners cultivate rose bushes – with meticulous attention to detail, grave concern for each branch, stem and leaf, and with a clear eye towards (his own) long-term goals. He recently purchased a brand new vehicle (made in China) so life is clearly agreeing with him.

We enjoyed a feast of bone marrow, which is sucked out of the large leg bones of pigs using a straw. It 's a house specialty of the restaurant we were at. Our other dinner companion was a young man (24) visiting his parents while on a break from university in Beijing, where he will graduate this spring. His father is the president of the local law court, and thus very powerful – the young man told me their home is stuffed with bottles of expensive bai jiu and cigarettes, courtesy of those his father is in position to benefit.

An extremely pretty and exotic young woman was part of our waitressing team, and when I mentioned how attractive I thought she was, Mr. T wasted no time in providing an introduction. The girl and I exchanged smiles, a bit of chit-chat, phone numbers and QQ ID (kind of like Skype, only better), and I have since chatted with her on-line a couple of times – strictly in Chinese, her English is minimal at best.

Mr. T advised me that relationships in Benxi, particularly if a foreigner is involved, must use a third party to negotiate terms of engagement, including arranging for the girl to spend the night with the man if both parties are willing – the chief detail being cost. When I told my companions that hook-ups in the West are trivial, private and effectively anonymous – a connection somewhere, a few drinks, etc. – they were shocked that no money changes hands. 'She doesn't ask for money?' Mr. T asked me, somewhat incredulously.

With the agreement of the young man, Mr. T told me it is completely within the realm of normal behavior here for girls to accept one-night ‘dates,’ particularly with powerful, wealthy older men, in exchange for cash and/or favors, and that even married women are often available for such trysts. It’s only natural, he pointed out. In fact, a teacher (married with child) who I work with has offered some hints which, when I explained them to Mr. T and the young man, were in their eyes clear evidence that she is seeking some sort of sexual adventure. Female consent is the controlling factor – husbands and fathers are secondary considerations, to the best of my knowledge, for females who are of age.

Mr. T went to great lengths to explain that I must use him (or another reputable Chinese) as an intermediary for any such relationship. As a foreigner who has no ties to the city, there is nothing to stop me from mistreating someone and immediately leaving town or the country if I choose – mistreatment being considered as the failure to show a woman and her family the appropriate respect (through honorable behavior and cash payments, mainly). Also he advised I am a poor candidate for marriage for the same reasons, and thus unlikely to be seriously considered or pursued by any local females. I have heard opposing views, however, primarily concerning Chinese women who are seeking a ticket to the West.

While we were having this conversation, he was on the phone with another woman, a 35-year-old divorcée, who expressed these sentiments to him when he asked her if she was interested in meeting or dating me. As he put her feelings, no woman wants to become involved with a man who is free to get up and walk away whenever he feels like it. I somewhat sarcastically suggested he ask what guarantees she could offer that she wouldn’t divorce me too down the road, but he refused to even ask her.

As for the young man, he’s headed for an American university this summer to pursue a Master’s degree, which is a stunningly expensive proposition for a Chinese, indicative of the wealth his family holds. He wanted advice on improving his English and on Western culture, so I told him to read The Spearhead, enjoy the scenery, and stay the hell away from the women.

Hearty and Healthy Fish Stew

W.F. Price · 13 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

After you've been cooking for a while, you can take some liberties and get creative with your dishes. The following recipe, which I came up with while thinking about how to lower saturated fats in my diet, is the result of a creative hunch. I'd never heard of anything like it, but it seemed to make sense from what I knew of the ingredients. I'm sure something similar exists, but I've never run across it in my neck of the woods.

I decided to combine anti-inflammatory foods with lean protein low in saturated fat. Fish, of course, is a great source of heart-healthy protein and oils. Vegetables, for their part, have anti-inflammatory phytochemicals and antioxidants that protect against atherosclerosis and even cancer. For American men, who are put under an enormous amount of stress and pressure to accommodate women's comforts and desires in our society, it is very important to include these beneficial and reparative chemicals in one's diet. They can go a long way toward mitigating the damage stress does to the body, and significantly boost quality of life over time.

However, if the food one eats is healthy but unappealing, you aren't going to eat much of it. The key is to make it tasty and hearty; the kind of food a man likes to eat. Given how awful American health food tends to be, you might think this is a contradiction in terms, and that it would be very difficult to prepare tasty, healthy and hearty food. Fortunately, you would be wrong.

By creating the right balance of protein, fats and carbs you can make just about any food hearty. The problem is that so-called health food rarely does that. You'll typically be offered some insubstantial product that tastes like sawdust, has a terrible texture, and does nothing to promote satiety — the feeling of having eaten well.

With the following recipe, I'll demonstrate that it is both easy and cheap to make a hearty meal replete with healthy oils, proteins and beneficial chemicals that will promote both health and manly vigor. It is also a simple recipe that can be modified as one sees fit, so long as the basic principles are adhered to.

The recipe as set out serves four for dinner

Equipment:

Two quart pot (at least), ladle, cutting board, well-honed steel knife with a very keen edge.

Ingredients:

One pound (about .5 kilograms) cod fillets (other lean white fish may be substituted)

One 14.5 oz (411g) can diced tomatoes

4-6 fresh tomatillos

Two fresh jalapeno peppers (entirely optional — substitute mild chilis if desired, or no chilis at all)

Four cloves garlic

1/4 cup (60ml) olive oil

1 tsp (6g) salt

Two cups (450ml) chicken stock (one 14.5 oz can is fine)

One broccoli crown

One tsp (5ml) lemon juice (totally optional, and you can add up to a tablespoon if you want a strong, tart citrus flavor)

1.5 cups (0.35 liters) white rice

Preparation:

Quarter tomatillos, then cut the stalk off the broccoli and separate into florets. Slice the cod crosswise by the inch. Peel and chop garlic cloves.

Set cod and broccoli aside, keeping each separate.

Put the pot on the stove, then empty the can of diced tomatoes inside. Next, toss in the quartered tomatillos and garlic. Turn to medium, then add chicken stock. When it all begins to simmer, turn down to low (make sure it keeps bubbling a bit).

Put a pan on a burner and turn to medium high. When it's good and hot, throw the jalapenos on as is. Sear them until they are soft, then remove and let them cool for a minute. When cool enough to handle, core the jalapenos by slicing lengthwise then removing seeds and pulp. Next, slice them crosswise at about quarter inch intervals (or a little less), then add to pot.

Begin cooking rice in separate pot or rice cooker.

Add olive oil to simmering vegetables in pot.

As rice is cooking and vegetables simmering, stir the vegetables occasionally, and wait until the tomatillos are nice and soft and beginning to break apart.

When the tomatillos and tomatoes have merged into a sauce, add the cod. Put in the cod slices and make sure they are covered with liquid. Then, immediately take the broccoli florets and place on tope of the stew and cover the pot. The broccoli will steam as the fish cooks.

In fifteen minutes or less the rice and stew should both be well cooked.

Put rice in bowls and ladle stew onto rice. Serve piping hot.

Give it a try. If you're married, you can cook it and teach your wife to do so as well — it's quite simple so she should be able to learn it without too much instruction, even if she is American. She'll probably like it herself, too. If single, adjust recipe size if so desired, but it keeps pretty well in the fridge for at least a day, so you can have a couple meals out of it.

This recipe is very good for men who have issues with, or want to prevent, high cholesterol, diabetes (if one goes easy on the rice), or a number of other health problems related to metabolic syndrome. It tastes great, and will leave you feeling full and satisfied.

Actress Busted for Battering Male Roommate

W.F. Price · 14 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ordinarily I don't pay much attention to celebrity misbehavior, but this is kind of an odd case. Tami Erin, who starred in The New Adventures of Pippi Longstocking back in '88 and is now 38 years old, was overheard arguing loudly with her roommate (it isn't clear whether they were in a relationship), who then cried out for help:

> The Walnut Creek Police Department in northern California told the website that Erin, 38, was placed under citizen's arrest by a neighbor who overheard the star of the popular 1988 children's movie arguing with her male roommate. After the roommate cried for help, the neighbor intervened and detained Erin until law enforcement arrived.

So the neighbor restrained her and held her until police arrived. I'm going to assume the neighbor was male, because I doubt she would have submitted to a citizen's arrest by a female. Additionally, I'll bet the neighbor knew the score about DV laws. In the old days a man wouldn't have considered arresting a woman over a domestic dispute with a man, but it seems that men are adjusting to the new reality.

Cultural changes can eventually make quite a difference over time. This is something I learned from experience in foreign cultures, where women generally wouldn't consider intervening in another woman's domestic troubles, as opposed to the US, where women are all too happy to jump in on any woman's side regardless of the circumstances.

Perhaps now men are finally starting to help each other instead of looking the other way. I like to think that spreading the word, as we do here and on other sites, has helped this process along. Although I am generally opposed to state intervention in families, I can't see anything changing until women start to face the same kind of draconian enforcement as men.

Thanks to the recently renewed VAWA, Tami Erin is probably going to have a pretty rough time of it for a while. I suppose the lesson here is the following: if the woman you live with attacks you, run outside and scream for help. It's humiliating, sure, but if it's your word vs. hers you'll lose, and it certainly beats jail time, DV "treatment" and all the civil disabilities that come with a DV conviction.

Food Control: more cause of than cure for obesity

W.F. Price · 15 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

While listening to NPR the other day on the way to pick up my kids, there was some discussion on Michelle Obama and her campaign against obesity, which I suppose is a noble goal. Obesity in the US is a national embarrassment, not to mention a costly health problem.

However, something about elites and their solutions to dealing with it rubs me the wrong way. Take NYC mayor Bloomberg's ban on soft drinks over 16 ounces for example. Billionaires like Bloomberg seem to think that it's a simple matter of banning the stuff, as though the sole source of the problem is the companies selling sugary drinks. Of course the people who drink them are responsible as well, but there's a big factor being left out here:

Healthy food in the US is much more expensive and less accessible than salty, oily, sugary crap.

It's no problem for Bloomberg to send his personal assistant to shop at Whole Foods and buy him the healthiest, tastiest organic food on offer. For some below-average urban food stamp recipient, however, spending $18 for a pound of fish and $6 for a loaf of artisan bread is simply not feasible. If you have a limited budget, you're going to get your calories on the cheap.

One could say that finer products should rationally cost more, but having lived and traveled in Europe, I know that isn't the entire story. Rye bread, which is healthier than white bread, has more vitamins and minerals, and does not cause a spike in blood sugar, is the cheapest stuff on offer in Eastern Europe. Herring and sprats, both of which are full of vitamins and healthy oils, are also cheap snacks throughout Northern Europe. Dairy is a staple, but it is generally processed according to tradition so that it serves a variety of purposes, and not spiked with sugar. Organic vegetables are cheap and locally produced, and stores are located within walking distance.

So, elite Americans pay a premium to eat what is the food of the common European, while fast food in Europe is generally more expensive than the home-prepared variety, and even a number of healthy restaurants. The situation is essentially the same in Asia as in Europe. European peasant food, which on the east side of the Atlantic is the staple of the masses and quite healthy, is only realistically available to the upper class in the US.

This is great for businessmen who produce these foods in the US, as they can charge much, much higher prices for the same stuff that would sell for a fraction of the price in France, Germany or Poland, but for the American underclass it's a disaster. Let's face it: low-class Americans are essentially being subsidized to eat like cattle at a feed lot, and that's the real problem.

Banning sugary drinks or taxing the stuff isn't going to help anyone, but it will put more money in the hands of the elites who are overregulating and monopolizing the food production industry and herding Americans like livestock into a low-maintenance consumption mode.

I'd suggest that since this is just the way things are in the US right now, young men who are seeking a trade might want to go into craft foods. Too many "organic" food producers are frauds, and if you can produce the real thing and market yourself well, there's an awesome opportunity out there in catering to the spoiled, overmoneyed types who like to stand up at a podium and propose stupid, doomed-to-failure measures to "fix" a situation that they profit from. Just use the simple, healthy foods you can buy on the cheap from the source, process them, put them in pretty packages, and sell them in places like Manhattan and Silicon Valley.

Peter Hitchens Takes on Feminism

W.F. Price · 15 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Conservatives in the Anglo world have been maddeningly slow to respond to the enormous damage feminism has done to the values they usually claim to adhere to, such as two-parent families, legitimacy of children, marriage, sexual restraint, etc. Many of these men dodged the bullet by just barely managing to slide through before the door closed to traditional families for middle class, urban Americans. This tipping point occurred some time in the early 80s, about when women passed men in college enrollment, American industry began its long decline, and affirmative action kicked in for real. Today, only the upper class still practices what could be called traditional marriage.

I often encounter men in their 50s and above who still lay the blame primarily on men, thinking that if a marriage fell apart, the guy wasn't doing his duty. Or, if a man can't pay his burdensome "obligations" to his babymomma, then he must be a lazy cad. The worst, however, is the assumption that the man married "the wrong kind of woman." This is frustrating because it implies that 50% of women (if one takes the 50% divorce rate as a guideline) are the wrong kind of women, so only half of men should be able to expect to marry.

But some of the conservatives are getting the message, and it looks like Peter Hitchens is one of them. Feminism is not just a silly little tantrum, but rather a very serious power-grab that has done unprecedented damage to families.

Here, Hitchens puts the blame for the dissolution of the family squarely on the feminists:

> The more fuss we make about mothers, what with all those soppy cards and special Mothering Sunday lunches in restaurants, the less we seem to want them to bring up their own children.
>
> The view seems to be that it's just about all right for women to give birth, but after that can we please separate them from their young as soon as possible, for the sake of the economy?
>
> New Labour was frank about it, with that terrifying commissar Patricia Hewitt describing the dwindling numbers of full-time mothers as a 'problem'.
>
> The Lib Dems' chief feminist, Lynne Featherstone, says with her usual simple-minded bluntness that having a baby is a 'bit of a setback', adding that: 'One of the main barriers to full equality in the UK is the fact women still have babies.'
>
> [...]
>
> Nobody ever questions the claim that it is automatically good for mothers to go out and be wage-slaves. Once, this idea was widely hated, and every self-respecting man worked as hard as he could to free his wife from the workbench.
>
> Then the feminist revolutionaries began to argue that the home was a prison and marriage was penal servitude, chained to a sink. Most people thought that was nuts – until big business realised that women were cheaper than men, more reliable than men and much less likely to go on strike or be hungover than men.
>
> What's more, all the really beefy men-only jobs – mining coal, rolling steel, stoking furnaces – had been abolished.

Some MRAs may take issue with the idea that men should work so their wives can stay home and care for children. Given today's reality, it's understandable that men expect women to pull their fair share economically. However, as Hitchens points out – rightly – it hasn't been a matter of women augmenting men's earnings, but instead replacing them, and where does that leave the men?

Are women going to put the men up for free? I didn't think so…

Why the Boston Marathon?

W.F. Price · 16 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Boston Marathon bombing has caused a lot of speculation because people can't figure out what it means, as opposed to the WTC attacks, the OKC bombing, and other terror strikes where the motive for attacking that particular target quickly became quite clear and rational. The Rudolph bombings in Atlanta were an exception, but Eric Rudolph himself called in to warn the police about his bomb, so he wasn't trying to hide the motive.

But how come nobody is thinking about the simple matter of operational feasibility? I mean, if you're going to do a successful terror attack, it's important to be able to pull it off without being identified as suspicious.

So, I'm going to go out on a limb here and suggest that the Boston Marathon might have been targeted because the bombers were East African, and they could be part of the crowd without arousing any suspicion. I mean, if you're a Somali trying to plant a bomb without standing out, wouldn't it be a better idea to do it where many of the athletes and spectators look a lot like you as opposed to, say, a Boston Bruins game? Also, you might get to ruin the day for those pesky Ethiopian and Kenyan neighbors who are so fond of interfering with your local jihad. So it's a double bonus — killing Americans and stealing the glory from your African rivals.

Although you may not have heard, 30 were killed in Somali bombings in Mogadishu yesterday. Al Shabaab claimed responsibility. Coincidence? I kinda doubt it, but I guess we'll see…

Formerly feminist lawyer wakes up after son put through wringer by college rape troika

W.F. Price · 18 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Judith Grossman probably never expected that her feminist activism would come back to haunt someone like her, but she found herself personally affected by the heavy hand of feminist legislation when her son was accused of having raped his girlfriend at a "small liberal-arts college in New England." The alleged rape had occurred some two or three years previously, and police were not contacted, but the new, Title IX-mandated tribunal was set into motion against her son:

> I am a feminist. I have marched at the barricades, subscribed to Ms. magazine, and knocked on many a door in support of progressive candidates committed to women's rights. Until a month ago, I would have expressed unqualified support for Title IX and for the Violence Against Women Act.
>
> But that was before my son, a senior at a small liberal-arts college in New England, was charged—by an ex-girlfriend—with alleged acts of "nonconsensual sex" that supposedly occurred during the course of their relationship a few years earlier.
>
> What followed was a nightmare—a fall through Alice's looking-glass into a world that I could not possibly have believed existed, least of all behind the ivy-covered walls thought to protect an ostensible dedication to enlightenment and intellectual betterment.

Welcome to a man's world, Ms. Grossman! This is how you have reaped what you've sown with your feminist activism all those years back.

But rather than condemn her for past errors, I'd like to at least give Judith Grossman credit for recognizing and pointing out the worst part of these troikas:

> Thankfully, I happen to be an attorney and had the resources to provide the necessary professional assistance to my son. The charges against him were ultimately dismissed but not before he and our family had to suffer through this ordeal. I am of course relieved and most grateful for this outcome. Yet I am also keenly aware not only of how easily this all could have gone the other way—with life-altering consequences—but how all too often it does.
>
> Across the country and with increasing frequency, innocent victims of impossible-to-substantiate charges are afforded scant rights to fundamental fairness and find themselves entrapped in a widening web of this latest surge in political correctness. Few have a lawyer for a mother, and many may not know about the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, which assisted me in my research.

That's absolutely right. Few of us have family in a position to help us should we be falsely accused. The worst excesses of these troikas will inevitably afflict working and middle class boys who can't claim any protected status. It will be the kinds of boys who are struggling to make something of themselves, perhaps to move up in the world, who will be hammered down hardest. This is an oppressive system that has nothing to do with justice, and everything to do with stripping power from young men in the name of fighting "the patriarchy" — a threadbare excuse that today sounds so cynical that only vicious and vindictive feminists, whose sole motive is power at the expense of others, could continue to use it.

What's Anger Management Like?

W.F. Price · 18 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A local reader wrote me asking for some advice about anger management classes, because I've written that I had to take one some years back. I was happy to make a recommendation (hopefully it's a good one — the teacher seems to be the same guy), and it reminded me of an article I wrote about the class I attended.

I took the class to allay "fears" a judge might have because I was accused of being angry and abusive (this is a pro-forma accusation in custody disputes). I'd never been arrested, despite having had the cops called on me, accused by my ex of making death threats while armed with a gun during a handoff. This provoked a heavily-armed police resonse that I was definitely NOT expecting. In fact, I was chilling out and drinking beer after a long day with the kids, and saw police cars zoom by, thinking at the time "I wonder what that's all about?" Little did I know…

I was fortunate in that a neighbor witnessed the entire so-called "incident" and my ex retracted her initial statement under closer police questioning, and later admitted that I'd been neither armed nor threatening. It turned out that her feminist mother had urged her to make the call, probably because because a hearing was coming up soon, and she figured I couldn't contest anything if I was in jail. If it weren't for the neighbor and professional police work, I'm sure I would have spent the night in jail, assuming the police didn't shoot me first, and although I likely wouldn't have been convicted of anything, it would have been a really big problem for me.

The only time I really lost my temper during divorce proceedings was at my in-laws, who wouldn't let me see my kids even when there was no visitation/custody order on the books. In hindsight, instead of yelling at them and using harsh language, I should have just called the cops and had the children returned to my custody, which legally they were obliged to do. But there's something about having people get between a father and his children that causes feelings of very intense anger — even rage. It's instinctive, so I don't feel ashamed about it, although I recognize that it was counterproductive.

So, the upshot of all of it is that I had good reason for being angry, but being angry, even if it's a reasonable reaction considering the circumstances, is treated as a quasi-crime in family law. In order to atone for my anger, I agreed to take an anger management class. I really didn't have any choice, because the alternative was a six-month DV program that cost thousands of dollars and would have prevented me from seeing my kids during the time I took to complete it.

Here's what I wrote about the experience back while I was still involved in it four years ago:

Social Policy Breeds Pop Psychology

5/07/2009

I have had some recent experience with the world of social work, and although I've tried to have an open mind, I certainly haven't been too impressed by it. Yesterday evening I was in an "anger management" class, and the teacher embraced what appeared to be a Daoist ideology. He described emotions as "energy," which sounds suspiciously like "Qi" — the vital force in Daoism. There is really nothing scientific about Daoism, but it does contain a lot of valuable insights about nature, spirituality, human perception of the world, etc. However, the American understanding of Qi is necessarily primitive, it not being a millennia-old cultural concept here, so I'm not sure what value it holds for people without any background in Chinese religion.

The office and classroom were adjacent to a couple of naturopaths, whose profession seems to me to be rather superfluous in our society, but if someone's willing to pay for it I guess that's fine. However, as I discovered yesterday, much of the money flowing in the direction of these practitioners of ancient methods of healing and foreign spirituality comes directly from the taxpayer, and attendance is mandated by courts in the case of divorce, and, for all I know, various other civil and minor criminal issues. As far as I could tell, about half of the attendees had been arrested in domestic violence incidents, and most of the others were going through contested divorces.

One poor guy was ordered to attend for losing his temper during mediation, which is very ironic to me, having been yelled at and threatened by a mediator in a failed attempt to get a reaction out of me in my only mediation session. A few others, like me, were persuaded to take the class by their own attorneys as a kind of protection against the exceedingly common tactic of calling the spouse angry and dangerous (I have seen this over and over in court, and promise to write about it soon).

The teacher quite plainly stated in class that the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) has contributed greatly to his business. That all but two of the attendees were men, the majority of whom would probably rather clean the gutters than attend new age classes, would appear to validate this statement. He told stories about how things have changed since he was younger, and warned that even touching someone while angry, e.g. poking them with an index finger, can result in a "life-changing" arrest. Because this is true, I have to give the guy credit for warning people about this and at least attempting to keep guys out of jail, but he isn't offering a cure so much as a palliative treatment. In fact, one could call these kinds of programs hospices for broken hearts.

During the class we learned about the physical damage anger and stress can cause, and the teacher suggested a few techniques for dealing with these feelings. They probably work, and some, such as getting a massage, seemed perfectly agreeable. However, at one point, when he said that anger is often used as a cover for other feelings, I asked him whether being angry is really worse than being depressed. He had no real answer to this, but he implied that being sad is better than being in jail, and that was probably the most important lesson of the day as well as the most poignant critique of our judicial regime.

An overzealous system of family law, and the criminal law that has been developed to support it, has made it necessary to scour the world in search of exotic solutions to the very problems created by "fixing" what wasn't really broken. Now that the traditional concepts of marriage, family and relationships have been discarded, we are treated to half-baked notions of "energy" to help people cope with the devastation wrought by contemporary family law. In the long run, I doubt that pop psychology can have much more than a marginal effect, and in some ways these classes border on punitive, but they may do some good for a few people. However, the real problem – the injustice inherent in unnatural family law – will have to be addressed before significant relief can be obtained and people can go back to leading happier, less stressful lives.

Is Assimilating Immigrants Becoming more Difficult for US?

W.F. Price · 19 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the weirdest things about the US is that in the past few decades it has become ethnically more heterogenous, but culturally more Northern European at the elite level. The American dream is no longer a simple affair that requires only hard work and an effort to be a decent citizen, but instead requires something like a graduate degree and indoctrination in “progressive” values.

The end resut is dissonance for anyone who doesn’t see what’s behind it, and I suspect that includes most young men with some awareness that things don’t add up.

Commenter Charles Martel suggests that the Tsarnaev brothers were culturally isolated, and that’s part of what led to their attacks. I’m sure that’s a big part of the story, but I have to say that I’d feel “culturally isolated” in Cambridge, too. In fact, I feel a bit that way in Seattle, but I have enough friends and family to mitigate it, and I know that a lot of what passes for public opinion is simple political posturing.

But what if you don’t have that advantage? What if you’re an immigrant from, say, Central Asia, and all you see in public is affirmation of values that are abhorrent to you, and indeed to most of the world?

It used to be that America assimilated people from around the world because we had values that were universal and easy to embrace, but that has changed a great deal. It’s easy to understand the values of hard work, honesty, freedom and equality under the law. It’s a lot harder, however, to wrap one’s mind around values like gay marriage, feminism, marital infidelity and class warfare.

And then, to make it even harder, it’s obvious that the very people promoting these values are the least likely to live by them.

I think we need a break from mass, indiscriminate immigration, and have felt this way for quite a while because I see it as a major economic and cultural strain on the native population. However, perhaps we should add to those the fact that the US is becoming an increasingly strange, culturally aberrant place by global standards, and bringing people here who are not likely to react well to the new reality is going to be bad for everyone.

How to Be a Woman and The Savage Banality of Modern Feminism

Featured Guest · 22 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Red Pill Theorist

The latest generation of feminists is somewhat lacking in star power. Jessica Valenti et al haven't been able to fill the gap left by Naomi Woolf after she detonated her credibility by writing 80,000 words on the subject of her vagina. Apparently, even for progressives, there is a limit. Enter Caitlin Moran, whose British ancestry hasn't stopped her from captivating Women With The Right Sort Of Degrees here in states.

Moran, a broadcast "journalist," and music critic, wrote a book called How to Be a Woman. But it's not a how-to. It's a feminist tract for the 21st century, wrapped up in the kind of jaunty cool-girl prose Cosmopolitan wishes it could achieve on a monthly basis.

As of last July, How to Be a Woman had sold 400,000 copies in sixteen countries. It's been reviewed in The Atlantic, The New York Times, and excerpted in The Wall Street Journal. So it's a big deal. (If you're asking why I'm adding the only-slightly-less-august Spearhead to the list, I'd direct you to Sun Tzu.)

The book's structure is a combination of memoir and polemic. Moran is quite a writer, doubly so if you consider her intended audience: young, urban female professionals. She speaks their language, that scatterbrained, hyperkinetic look-at-me conversation style that will be familiar to any readers who've had a conversation with a woman under thirty.

But Moran has something to say; she's an effective memoirist, and the scenes of her childhood are touching and very real. Her project-dwelling family is populated by left-side-of-the-bell-curve characters whose surpassing stupidity is funny and a little terrifying. Her childbirth story is literally hair-raising. She's attacked by local street thugs for being ugly.

But beyond the emotionalism, there's an uncomfortable conclusion in the offing. Moran's childhood and intellectual development were devoid of culture, comfort and understanding love. When she writes about rapturously about her dual pleasures of masturbation and library books, it becomes clear why feminism is twisted, stunted ideology: its adherents come from backgrounds that are totally beyond the broad spectrum of Western bourgeois experience. Feminists are either wealthy, or grossly poor. They either have no family, or a horrible one. Moran's explicitly Marxist leanings come from an upbringing full of the uncaring cruelty of the stupid.

And that's just the memoir. As a polemicist, Moran is neither convincing nor outrageous. She is hamstrung by her preoccupation with developing feminist pornography. She complains that heterosexual porn is as "detrimental to women's collective peace of mind as it would be if 12 percent of images of men on the Internet were of them having their heads horrifically blown off by alien laser guns." Sailer's law strikes again. Pornography needs to change because pornography makes Caitin Moran feel unsexy.

Moran then strikes out on the parade of horribles that is modern female grooming. "It is pubic hair that is now the most politically charged arena" is sentence that will stick with me to my dying day. She's an inveterate user of the passive voice, which enables her to evade placing the responsibility for social phenomena on groups she doesn't want to. Anything men do that is obviously positive or women do that is obviously negative is hidden by bad writing. ("Until the twin sink was invented") Or women's victories "are seen as uncool." But who sees them as uncool? It's no secret that women, as a group, determine what they think is cool in other women.

Then there's her chapter on abortion. She got pregnant in her thirties and didn't want another child, so she had it killed, full stop. This is a chapter which has been hailed as courageous numerous commentators in the media. But is it courageous to snuff out the possibility of human life because a woman doesn't want to spend "another three years of being life support to someone who weeps for me and rages against me"? There is no nonsense here about fetuses. She knew she was killing a person, and she knew that she had to "in the same way I know absolutely that I don't want to go to India, or be blond, or fire a gun."

Ultimately, How to Be a Woman is a fun little jaunt through feminist history. Even if she's not a particularly deep thinker, Moran has a future as a humorist. I certainly thought the book was funny. But, at the end, when you learn that the baby she aborted was a boy and read, two sentences later, "my two girls are all I want," you're left with a profound sense of disquiet. And a little pity for the boy who never lived because his mother was a feminist.

Sisterhood Is Thicker Than Blood

Joe Zamboni · 23 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

An old German proverb holds that "blood is thicker than water." By that people mean that their loyalty is primarily with their family, not their friends, and certainly not some unknown third parties. The phrase dates from the 1100s, when families were a much more important part of one's life, well before modern feminists made up a bunch of self-serving myths and malicious lies in order to separate and isolate husbands and fathers from their families.

I am coming to see that the modern situation in America could be more aptly described as "sisterhood is thicker than blood." In other words, women have an alliance with all women, even unknown and unseen women, and they give preference to those other women, not just over unknown and unseen men, but over their own biological sons. This last part was personally shocking to me, and it took a personal experience with a friend to compellingly reveal what was going on.

This experience illustrates the twisted nature of the way that many American women think about American men, and how hateful feminist thinking has become towards men. How many women think this way I don't know, but I'd wager a lot of women do view men and boys in this denigrating way. There's really no way to find out, because most women asked a direct question of this nature would probably deny having adopted the "sisterhood is thicker than blood" viewpoint. This is because when you really look at that viewpoint, it's totally inexcusable, indefensible, and immoral.

The woman in question is generally an independent woman, has her own opinions, isn't traditional, nor is she a feminist. She is heart-felt, compassionate, smart, willing to confront and discuss the truth, and actively engaged in her own process of personal development. Frankly, if she was a feminist I wouldn't talk to her, aside from perhaps the few words necessary to get a transaction completed at the supermarket, or somewhere else where she stood between me and a particular objective.

I noticed that her 26-year old son had completed college but could not find a job aside from being a part-time personal trainer at a gym. This had gone on for about 20 months, so it wasn't just a temporary "in transition" experience for that young man. This job at the gym was a big come down for a young guy who had been told for years that he needed to go to college to get a degree, and then he was going to get a good job. Society lied to him about that result. To put it another way, because he was a white male, there were no preferences like affirmative action to help him along. He was at the bottom of the list to be hired.

I talked with this woman about the trouble her son was having and about the need to do some career planning. She told me that he was going to go to massage therapy school, and that massage had a great future in a health care system that would soon pay for alternative health care modalities. She was very resistant to talking about his future, or even to admit that he might need some coaching and assistance here. I couldn't figure out why she didn't even want to talk about it, because I felt bad for the young guy and wanted him to have a good start in life, wanted him to not have to sweat money all the time. I asked her why she was so resistant to even talking about this. Then the critical piece of information was revealed: she thought that he didn't get any help because he was a white male. She went on to talk about "all those white males who inherited banks from their fathers."

I was speechless, after pausing for thirty seconds, I said, "What? All of a handful of white males in 300 million people in America today?" I told her that most young guys like her son were having a very hard time in the job market because they didn't have experience and the competition was tough. I mentioned that they didn't get any preferential treatment. At that point she said, "I can't talk about this now." I suppose that was a polite version of "men don't get it." So even this relatively open-minded woman, a woman relatively untouched by the mythical and malicious anti-male claims of the feminists, even she had been taken in by the propaganda dished out by the feminists over the last several decades. The depth and pervasiveness of the brainwashing of women is astounding.

On a certain level it was a relief to understand why she had never given him any guidance about finding a job, getting training or an education that will pay well, etc. On another level, I hated it, because things in American society started to fit together in a different way, in a way that made a lot more sense to me. For example, now I understood a big reason, but no doubt not the only reason, why young men were doing considerably worse in the job market than young women. Beyond all the preferences and special advantages that the law and government doles out to women, today's young women were getting extraordinary support from their single-parent household mothers, but the young men were not. The young men were automatically considered to be alpha males, abusers, and the ones who should be blamed for all that's wrong in the world. Supposedly that means that they don't deserve any support. And the surprising part is that some, perhaps many women, think this way even about their own sons, the young males that they brought up from birth.

So when there's an absence of the father in a family with young children, we see that the sons suffer far more than the daughters. The daughters are nurtured and pampered by their mothers, but the sons are on their own. This perversely is parallel to the way that money gets handled in a number of households that I know of where there is still both a husband and a wife. The husband's salary is "their money" and the wife's salary is "her money." So women support other women, and themselves, but they do not support men, even their own flesh-and-blood sons. And today's young men are suffering a great deal as a result of this perverse feminist-inspired approach.

It's time to get out of our fantasies about women, especially all that stuff about the sanctity of motherhood. The venom of feminism has poisoned the well of family relations to such a degree that the malicious lies about men, and the cultural-endorsement of misandry that accompanies them, now often overpowers even the loyalty of a mother to her own son. I could have mentioned other real-world cases where I have seen this prioritization in action, but one example is probably sufficient. I leave it to the reader to come up with his own examples of this phenomenon in action.

Men — you've got to really get, let it into your bones — how shallow to non-existent the compassion for your plight is coming from modern American women. You've got to get how utterly deaf and disinterested women are about what's happening to you — even your own mother. You've got to get how you're strictly on your own. Homeless, alcoholic, suicidal, in jail due to false allegations of rape, victim of paternity fraud, destitute due to onerous child support, prosecuted for domestic violence perpetrated by the wife, suffering from PTSD as a result of military service, limbs blown off in combat, whatever — many women just aren't interested, they just don't care.

And older men — we urgently need you to better support the younger men, because if it's not us old guys supporting the young guys, then nobody else is going to do it. Us older guys can start to help by telling the young guys the truth about what it's like for men living under the tyranny of feminism.

Book Review: Enjoy The Decline

Elusive Wapiti · 24 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Book: Enjoy The Decline, by Aaron Clarey, 204 pages, published 2013.

Summary: Subtitled "Accepting and Living with the Death of the United States", this book asserts that the United States is in a terminal economic and social decline. It argues that readers, in order to live their lives to the fullest during this decline, should adjust psychologically to this new reality and re-organize their lifestyle so as to not only insulate themselves as much as possible from the decline, but even to enjoy life during this decline.

By far the most useful aspect of this book, in my opinion, is in the case that it makes for readers to realize that whatever bourgeois values they may presently possess, there is a high probability those values are maladaptive in the present economic and social climate. Up has become down and right has become wrong in these last days of the American republic. Work hard and save for retirement? Don't be ridiculous. Why save when the nation's leaders gleefully debauch the currency, pulling a "stealth Cyprus" to the tune of 8 – 10% each year? Why delay gratification when there will likely be little / no Social Security for Xers and younger generations, particularly if the government will simply appropriate your savings through an outright Cyprus/France/Hungary/Ireland/Argentina/Poland-style seizure? Why work hard, when doing so only qualifies you to be taxed even more to support an income redistribution scheme consuming more than 2/3 of the Federal budget, "spread [your hard-earned monies] around a little", to bankroll parasites who didn't earn it? Why hope for things to get better when unemployment is presently at around 14% and the labor force participation rate is at a 30-year low, is trending downward, and has been so for decades? And why scrimp to pay for college while the higher ed bubble continues to inflate, making your parent's advice to "get an education" in order to succeed nearly financially suicidal and economically ill-advised in the new economic reality? For that matter, why marry and have children? Silly rabbit, very few men and women these days are equipped to be proper husbands and wives. Moreover, 5,000 years of traditional Marriage 1.0 has been subsumed by Marriage 2.0–and now, by homogamy–and is characterized by easy divorce and the subsequent trafficking in former spouses (usu but not always ex husbands) for the pecuniary interests of the state and ex-wives.

Pretty grim picture, to be sure. So what does Mr. Clarey advise? First, that readers of his book put into action the conclusions that naturally follow from a hard-nosed assessment of the ground truth: a realignment of their behaviors and habits. To this end, the author dedicates a chapter toward what he calls "the art of minimalism"–reducing possessions to the minimum essentials necessary, thereby lowering purchasing, maintenance, storage, and disposal costs. Techniques from the minimalizing playbook include buying things used or second-hand, avoiding having (expensive) children, acquiring a trade in lieu of an "education", performing repairs yourself, eschewing going out to eat and instead entertaining at home, avoiding buying real estate (a house is a liability, not an asset), and buying only catastrophic health insurance. Moreover, since the minimalist lifestyle will likely appeal to far more men than women, readers should have little issue with following through on his additional recommendation to avoid the expense of weddings–and if one does get married, elope. Do it all correctly, and Mr. Clarey calculates that a single fellow can live quite nicely for less than $USD 20,000 a year, depending on the locale. It doesn't take that much time to earn 20,000, even in today's poor economy, leaving the Enjoying the Decline (ETD) citizen ample time to take many vacations, work when he wants, and enjoy life in general, heeding Mr. Clarey's call for readers to "not waste their youth" like he did.

Continuing on the minimalism vein, for those ETDers who want to go the "full Clarey", he recommends not even bothering to save for retirement (see "why delay gratification", above). Won't that leave a person penniless in old age? Yes, it will, and Mr. Clarey suggests, in all seriousness, the .45 cal "Smith and Wesson retirement plan", as the last six months of life are extremely expensive and not all that pleasant anyways. Not a very Christian recommendation as far as recommendations go, but Mr. Clarey does not identify as a Believer and therefore has the latitude to recommend such a nihilistic option.

For those who do follow his minimalist advice, Mr. Clarey outlines several benefits: freedom from employers and the daily rat-race, better mental and physical health, a better social and family life, more travel, more sleep, and, paradoxically, a higher chance of becoming rich. In Mr. Clarey's accounting, minimalizing your life offers you the chance to enjoy your youth while you can and focus on things that really matter, such as family, friends, and other human relationships, rather than on busting your hump as a cube-drone for a faceless company to whom you are likely little more than a number. And even if you're not, is your work more important than your family? Will your work be there over the long haul? Or will your family?

Interestingly, Mr. Clarey's book contains a chapter called "Plunder", where he identifies ways in which an ETDer may take advantage of the many government programs designed to provide assistance to those with similar income levels as the minimalizing ETDer, thus aiding the ETDer in the effort to enjoy life and work less. From welfare to free meals to health care to food stamps, the author provides a road map to where the aspiring ETDer may obtain all the no-cost-to-him government cheese available. Won't that make the ETDer a member of the parasite class, those folks disparaged above (see "spread around", above)? Certainly, but then again, one may rationalize doing so in view of (a) they're giving it away anyway, (b) the ETDer is merely taking back what he paid in, and (c) in taking some of the cheese, the ETDer is helping accelerate the decline and fall of the United States and the presumably the spawning of whatever political entity will eventually replace it.

The last chapter of the book was also the most uplifting one. Titled "Revenge", it has nothing to do with directly harming one's adversaries; instead, it advises the ETDer to "get back" at the leftists who have destroyed this country simply by being happy. By living life to the fullest, by doing fun things, grandiose-fun things, working less, being a better, more cultured person, having better friends, by truly enjoying and making the best of a finite life, the ETDer rubs the leftist's nose in the equalitarian misery he has made for himself. Thus while the leftist on his death bed compares the ETDer's life, lived to the fullest, to his, and is filled with envy, in contrast, the ETDer will die with few regrets but many good memories.

All told, I thoroughgoingly enjoyed this book, despite some jabs at my male-heavy semi-industrial home town in a flyover state suffering from chronic "brain drain"–as well as ethically dubious advice to mooch off church groups as part of the Plunder program. In addition, even though I am not in a position to minimalize as much as he recommends (married, three kids, etc) there is wisdom in here for just about everyone. Especially for the single male, for whom I think this book is most applicable. For it is he who is not subject to baby rabies, not genetically hardwired to "nest", and likely to be marriage-cautious if not marriage-avoidant, single males are the population subgroup best positioned and most inclined to enjoy the decline, such as it is, and will be.

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to three, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

Why I'm Skeptical about Amnesty's Prospects

W.F. Price · 25 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Immigration is an issue men ought to be concerned about for a number of reasons, because it can have both positive and negative effects on our lives. The kind of immigration that occurred during the Bush administration (with full complicity on the part of the president) was, on the balance, bad for American men. The mass influx of low-skill workers without documentation pulled the rug out from under working class Americans, who can't compete with virtual slaves. It also increased the burden on public schools, health care and welfare, and drove up the price of housing, which has been a problem for young families.

One of the aspects of immigration from Mexico I don't see mentioned very often is the wage disparity between Mexico and the US, and the cost of living in Mexico as compared to the US. Mexican wages, last time I checked, come out to about one eighth of American wages. The cost of living in Mexico is significantly lower as well. This is the number one reason Mexican men come to the US to work.

Imagine what would happen if Canada paid an unskilled American construction worker $80 per hour. Millions of Americans would cross the northern border for the money, and they would be willing to work their tails off and live in subpar conditions just to put in a few years so they could return home relatively wealthy. This is what many Mexican men have done, and it's hard to blame them for it. A number of the Mexican men I've spoken with have told me they far prefer Mexico to the US, and plan to return and buy a house there when they have a nice nest egg. In general, these are the quality Mexicans who came to the US to work hard.

However, once it became easy to sneak into the US from Mexico, others followed the hard-working men, including many women who, once in the US, rapidly have multiple US citizen children and contribute little to the economy. Sleazier sorts who couldn't get by even in Mexico also figured they'd come to the US to live off the fat of the land.

So, what we have is two groups of Mexicans: the workers and the spongers. Amnesty would obviously be a problem with the spongers, who would immediately start to legally draw welfare benefits, but it would also be a problem with the workers as well. Instead of going home to Mexico to retire or raise a family, amnesty would incentivize an even longer stay in the US to secure social security benefits. Once they were entitled to these benefits, they could then, as dual US-Mexican citizens, return to Mexico and buy that house, and on top of that draw benefits from the US government, sucking taxpayer money right out of this country.

To put it bluntly, amnesty is simply unaffordable. The US government cannot afford to spend out what it would take without destroying the social welfare system as we know it. The only solution would be to drastically curtail welfare, and politically that would be disastrous for Democrats.

Republicans, for their part, might support an amnesty if they could pull it off without losing too many votes, but that's unlikely. Both parties are stuck in a difficult situation here, because while the Mexican votes may seem very tempting to Democrats and the prospects for cheap labor may make Republican donors salivate, neither can figure out a way to get what they want without ultimately alienating their base.

But then again, it wouldn't be wise to trust our contemporary politicians to make choices based on the nation's long term interest, so I guess we'll see.

Will Feminists Disavow Murder?

W.F. Price · 25 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Kermit Gosnell, a Philadelphia abortionist, is on trial for murdering babies and causing the death of a patient by drug overdose. Most of the press is ignoring the story, because it doesn't suit their narrative. They are afraid, it seems, that people will draw the "wrong conclusions" about abortion. Some intrepid liberals, however, are trying to spin the trial, including one who said the real problem is racism. That one's kind of hard to figure out, because Gosnell himself is black, but where there's a will there's a way, apparently…

Others, including the execrable NARAL, are saying that all this really proves is that there is not enough freedom to abort:

> Abortion rights opponents are drawing the wrong lesson from the horrific case of Kermit Gosnell, Ilyse Hogue, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said Friday.
>
> Instead of encouraging more restrictions on reproductive rights, Hogue said, the Gosnell trial should serve as a warning about the consequences of denying women access to safe and affordable abortion care.
>
> "This is exactly what happens when you place undue restrictions and you try to shame women to keep them from exercising their constitutional right to safe and legal abortions," Hogue told The Huffington Post in an interview. "You make them victims to people like Gosnell, because in their desperation they'll turn anywhere. You want to drive people like Gosnell out of business? Then you actually support medical facilities and the right of women to safe and legal abortion."

It's odd, but I didn't see any concern there about the dead babies. Does NARAL care about the babies? No, it just wants them aborted more efficiently, and safely, I suppose.

When you look around, you'll notice feminists calling the Gosnell case horrific, sad, disturbing and all that, but you'll hear nary a word about the dead babies. It's about racism, or lack of access to abortion, or something else along those lines. I suppose the patriarchy is bound to make it in there, too.

It seems that the feminists are forgetting – or perhaps ignoring – the fact that Kermit Gosnell is on trial for murder. He is not on trial for abortion, or even illegal abortion, but killing little human beings.

Lest anyone suggest that feminists have a problem with child killing, it must be pointed out that mainstream feminists support abortion at will, without any restrictions whatsoever. They want it whenever they choose, and they want it for free. Sometimes, they even openly support post partum abortion, otherwise known as infanticide.

I'd like readers to consider for just a moment what the reaction might be if someone supporting men were to advocate murder. There would be outrage, hysteria, denunciations — you name it. As it is, anyone who advocates for men, or even questions feminists, is frequently called upon to denounce others for going to far. For suggesting, for example, that the 19th Amendment was a mistake. For advocating patriarchy, or even for saying that women shouldn't be in certain historically male professions, such as the military.

But feminists get a free pass for advocating murder. Legally defined murder, no less — this is no hyperbole.

So, I'd like to ask feminists out there a serious question:

"Will you disavow murder?"

As Colleges are Feminized, Degrees Lose Value

W.F. Price · 28 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One fact that is rarely mentioned in the US press is that in developed countries, the prevalence of college degree holders has little correlation with economic output. Russia, for example, has the highest percentage of college degree holders on earth, while Germany has far fewer than the OECD average.

In the US, people with associate degrees are beginning to outearn those with bachelor's degrees if one excludes elite institutions. This isn't true throughout the country, but in certain regions the difference is pronounced. According to the Wall Street Journal, Tennessee community college graduates outearn university grads by thousands of dollars in their first year out of school:

> Think a community-college degree is worth less than a credential from a four-year college? In Tennessee, the average first-year salaries of graduates with a two-year degree are $1,000 higher than those with a bachelor's degree. Technical degree holders from the state's community colleges often earn more their first year out than those who studied the same field at a four-year university.
>
> Take graduates in health professions from Dyersburg State Community College. They not only finish two years earlier than their counterparts at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville, but they also earn $5,300 more, on average, in their first year after graduation.

If you take a look at a typical university classroom, it's pretty clear why this is happening. Colleges are becoming finishing schools that teach little more than politically correct etiquette to their mainly female students. They are also a form of welfare for career students, AKA professors, many of whom couldn't teach a job skill that didn't require begging for federal grants.

For those who attend Ivy League schools such as Harvard or Princeton the degree is probably still worth it, but these are effectively gated communities; middle and working class white boys not wanted (but they'll take their sisters if they are hot).

It's important that young men are taught from a young age what their best chance is at making a decent living, but there's so much invested in college degrees and the bloated education system these days that they hear ten lies for every piece of sound advice. Fortunately, it seems that many of them are figuring it out anyway, which is encouraging.

For a bright and competent but not exceptional young man a technical education is a perfectly good start in life. If he wants to finish a four-year degree later, it won't be very hard, and he can start making decent money early on. The same applies to young women, and an extra bonus for them is that without having some of the wrong-headed ideas shoved down their throats at universities they might be more satisfied with a normal life and make better, more practical decisions.

I don't think any more than a quarter of the population, and maybe less, has use for a full college degree. For the middle 50% or so a two-year technical degree is fine, and for the bottom 25% high school should do the trick. I'm glad I took some of the university courses I did, but to be honest only a couple of them taught any skills that have helped me get by, and I probably could have found those at a community college (e.g. writing for the web and Mandarin Chinese). If I had it to do over again, given my location and skills, I probably would have simply completed a technical degree in programming for web applications and gone straight to work in that, finishing a four-year degree later if I wanted.

I suppose there's one thing to be said for a college education, and that is that it helps students acquire a well-rounded base of knowledge. However, I'm afraid that with the replacement of classical education with politically correct garbage that doesn't apply any longer. Maybe at some point in the future we can rebuild schools that teach wisdom and the classics, but the most urgent matter is helping our sons live productive lives rather than turning them loose in a world that prefers to take advantage of them, so for now it's probably best to counsel most of them to learn a trade before completing a four-year degree.

And as always, we should remind young men is that while credentials may sometimes be a necessary evil, they are not as important as character; what counts most is not what's written on a piece of paper, but how you live your life.

Rehtaeh Parsons, Steubenville, Rape Hysteria and Feminist Vigilantism

Featured Guest · 1 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Matt Forney

A hundred years ago in the Jim Crow South, black men suspected—not convicted, not tried, merely suspected—of raping white women were hunted down by angry lynch mobs and hanged from trees. We in the 21st century are not so barbaric and uncivilized.

We hunt men suspected of rape down online and metaphorically hang them; smear them, dox them, shout "GUILTY! GUILTY! GUILTY!" long before they can be tried in a court of law.

Enter the case of Rehtaeh Parsons. Parsons was a Nova Scotian teenage girl who died after trying to hang herself supposedly in response to having been gang raped, then having photos of the rape distributed online. The RCMP investigated the case but was forced to drop it because they couldn't find enough evidence to charge her alleged rapists. Following Parsons' suicide, Anonymous took up her cause, digging up enough evidence for the RCMP to re-open the case. Both Nova Scotian Premier Darrell Dexter and Prime Minister Stephen Harper have also gotten involved, pledging new laws to ban underage "sexting" and "revenge porn." This is all good… right?

Except that no one has managed to actually prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Rehtaeh Parsons was raped.

To their credit, Anonymous has refrained from their usual scorched earth tactics by turning the info on Parsons' alleged rapists over to the police rather than publicizing it. But despite the fact that the RCMP still hasn't charged any of the perps (nor is there a guarantee that they will be able to, or that the courts will find them guilty), the Canadian media and feminists in general are rushing to crucify the boys along with anyone who doesn't want to light the torches. For example, National Post columnist Christie Blatchford is being raked over the coals right now for an article in which she essentially asked people not to rush to judgement:

> But Postmedia sources point to huge problems with the case that made it virtually impossible to take to court, chiefly the shifting accounts from Rehtaeh herself and independent evidence, including retrieved online messages, that supported the suggestion the sex that took place was consensual.

At no point in her article did Blatchford allege that Parsons wasn't actually raped, or that she deserved it, or anything like that; all she argued was that the case against Parsons' rapists is still weak enough that no one can make a definitive call on what happened. In response, professional Liberal smear-meister Warren Kinsella called her column "hateful garbage," while VICE Canada's Patrick McGuire called it "tasteless" and "insane." For what it's worth, Glen Canning (Parsons' father) had a reasonable response, but his voice is being drowned out by the chorus of leftists screaming for Blatchford's head.

Additionally, as Blatchford pointed out in her column, other people have been making the same point; an anonymous pamphleteer has been going around Halifax posting up flyers reminding people that there are "two sides to every story" and not to rush to judgment. This too has the feminists up in arms.

For all their chest-beating about being "progressives," leftists and feminists have had a disturbing amount of success in regressing rape cases—and the public's perception of them—back to the Jim Crow days, the days of the torch-wielding mob. The reason why Western jurisprudence frowns on vigilantism is because angry mobs, whether they wield shotguns or keyboards, have a poor track record when it comes to determining guilt and administering justice. The blind emotionalism of the Crowd can and has gotten innocents killed or destroyed their lives, and despite its flaws, our system of courts, judges and juries and its various precepts, such as the presumption of innocence and Blackstone's formulation, has proven to be the most effective way to punish criminals and uphold the law.

With the number of high-profile false rape cases in recent years—Kobe Bryant, the Duke lacrosse team, Ben Roethlisberger, Julian Assange—you would think that people would become less hysterical about rape. Instead they're becoming more so, to the point that simply stating that an accused rapist is still innocent until proven guilty is grounds for being denounced as a victimblamingmisogynistwhodoesntthinkwomenarehumanbeings. High-profile feminists like Jessica Valenti have even argued for abolishing the presumption of innocence in rape cases, which would literally take our justice system back to the Middle Ages.

None of this is really news to us in the manosphere, but there's a new, disturbing dimension to rape hysteria: it's starting to interfere with the prosecution of actual rapists.

The recent Steubenville case is a perfect example. The mainstream media and leftists lauded Anonymous for getting involved in the case, and while it's a good thing that the rapists were prosecuted, the mob storm that was kicked up around the story arguably hindered more then it helped. Breitbart contributor Lee Stranahan has been covering the various lies and rumors that sprouted up around the story, and even documented several instances where Anonymous' involvement actually hurt the prosecution's case and obstructed justice.

In response, Anonymous began an Internet-wide smear campaign against Stranahan, posting his address, harassing his wife and children, creating an Encyclopedia Dramatica page about him (link NSFW), and dredging up every skeleton in his closet (link NSFW) in an attempt to discredit his reporting. The Anons even went so far as to taunt Stranahan about the death of his infant daughter. These smears were subsequently repeated by the left-wing blogosphere, with not a single person bothering to factually refute any of his claims. Indeed, as Catherine Fitzpatrick wrote, it's particularly rich that the smear artists tried to attack Stranahan for his erotic photography, seeing as Anonymous was birthed in the swamp that is 4chan's /b/, a notorious source of child porn and other disgusting shock material.

But the ultimate problem here isn't Anonymous. It's the idea that rape is so horrific a crime, so evil that we can chuck centuries of legal precedent and draw and quarter anyone we even suspect might be guilty of it, or anyone who isn't eager to form a posse and string up the accused. And if both Steubenville and the Rehtaeh Parsons case are any evidence, things are getting worse. If on the off-chance that the RCMP still can't level charges against her accused rapists or a jury finds them not guilty, the Canadian media and feminists will have conspired to destroy these boys' lives for absolutely nothing. You think Kinsella, McGuire and their ilk will issue so much as an apology? I doubt it.

And if what happened to Lee Stranahan is any indication, the feminists and the angry mobs they've unleashed have no reservations about silencing anyone who opposes them.

Lest you doubt that these howling maniacs hold the levers of power, let me remind you what happened to another one of their victims: Indiana State Treasurer Richard Mourdock. Mourdock ran for Senate as the Republican candidate last year and was heavily favored to win until a debate two weeks before the election where he explained why he opposed allowing women who have been raped to get abortions:

> Mourdock added: "I just struggled with it myself for a long time but I came to realize: Life is that gift from God that I think even if life begins in that horrible situation of rape, that it is something that God intended to happen."

Mourdock is an evangelical Christian, who believe that God dictates the course of events in our world. By that logic, when a woman is raped, it's still a horrible act, but it happened for a reason; maybe the kid is going to grow up to be the next Albert Einstein or George Washington. You don't have to agree with Mourdock's viewpoint—I don't—to understand the reasoning behind it.

Feminists seized on Mourdock's remark and smeared him as being "pro-rape," a lie the mainstream media was all too happy to repeat. Within a week, his lead in the polls had evaporated. He ultimately lost to Democrat Joe Donnelly by a six-point margin.

We’re in for some dark days ahead.

For more from Matt Forney, visit his blog.

Shake and Bake Software Engineers

Uncle Elmer · 1 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter “Thos” posted a link to a recent Huffington Post essay about sexist pronoun abuse in the tech industry. Not sure what the stock photo of male models had to do with the essay, but one expects this from femsites. Frankly, I can no longer endure ladie’s web sites. Trying to wade through too many popups (yeah, I know you can turn off “popups”), flashing animations, come-ons for other items of interest, links From Around the Web, and links You Might Also Like just to get to the comment box and excrete some devastating wit only to have it lost into the abyss of the internet is really a complete waste of time. They are a gold mine of feminist parody though.

Anyway, I had just gotten back from the dentist where I endured the ubiquitous Chorus of Screaming Black Chicks while he drilled me, and still drooling on myself, scanned the commentary.

Some lady named “Women 2.0″ shilled her software training institute for girls :

Hackbright Academy is churning out women software engineers, the next class graduates May 7, 2013. Recruit from Hackbright!

So I checked out their website, which offers a 10-week intensive programming course for women only, with tantalizing promises of employment possibilities through their extensive “high-tech” business network. (The “Learn More” button didn’t work though, but maybe it’s just me)

Their business model appears to be : churn out women “software engineers”, and rely on federal and corporate mandates for female technocrat quotas to provide the graduate employment pipeline. Otherwise, why “for women only”? They have an answer :

Why Women Only?

In short, we hate the Dave-to-Girl Ratio in software development. We want to do our part to equalize this imbalance, and we felt that a program exclusively for women was a good place to start.

All right, that pisses me off. Apparently there is an HR metric called the “Dave Ratio” that is applied to prospective applicants. I am going to “out” myself here as I can no longer remain silent. My first name is “Dave”. Elmer is my middle name, having been named after my real “Uncle Elmer”. I was nonplussed as a kid to have “Elmer” as my middle name, but in adulthood think it’s awesome, like “Angus” or “Vern”, and other masculine given-names. But now in addition to being a middle-aged white man, apparently I can add “Dave” as a reason not to get hired. Yes there were five Davids in my kindergarten class but that does not confer upon us any special advantages that should now be redressed through discriminatory labor practices.

But seriously, their graduates are not engineers. Attaining the title engineer involves more than a 10-week programming boot camp. In some places (Texas for example), you cannot be called an engineer unless you have a 4-year degree and pass some certification. There’s a good reason for this : public safety. The design, testing, and implementation of embedded and real-time systems require a detailed understanding of electrical or mechanical components and their behavior. These systems often appear in transportation, power generation, and medical devices to name a few applications. To truly understand these domains requires years of study in mathematics, physics, electrical, and mechanical engineering, and in tough competition with other well-prepared students. Now I realize there are a lot of guys out there with solid programming skills and no university background who could make a decent living in the consulting market, but they can’t legally call themselves engineers.

No matter though, Silicon Valley is apparently eager to correct the scandalous gender imbalance in the high-tech industries, and ready to put these newly-minted engineer gals to work alongside of the usual riff-raff of males who didn’t earn their White Privilege.

The curriculum description reads :

Here is what you will learn. Some words you may not understand when you start, but will when you finish:

Python and its associated web frameworks
Pair programming
Git and source control
Interview skills
SQL and ORMs, and NoSQL
HTML, CSS, JS, Ajax, and WebSockets
Deploying into EC2 and GAE
*Terminal shells, grep, netcat, and other nix command-line fu
Message queues, batch processing, distributed processing
Why some nerds really love lisp, vim, and emacs

Well, one can learn about these topics in 10 weeks, perhaps enough to continue developing one's interests and maybe just enough to get an entry level job if you carried some enthusiasm with it. But programming skill takes years to acquire, just like anything else that's worth decent compensation in the labor market.

The real challenge these females will encounter after settling in at their new Encorpera cubicles will come from other women, specifically the ones who clawed their way through an engineering program and will chafe at the idea of strip-mall finishing-school alumni competing against their own career aspirations. For the biggest threat to women who actually work in tech are the Womyn Who Work in Tech.

As for you guys, if you have an interest in tech work and the full-blown engineering degree is not a realistic option right now, you can take advantage of your local community college for training in software development as well as many other trades. Continued education and certification can be attained once you get a toehold in the technical employment market through employer-sponsored educational benefits. Online options from many schools can provide "glue" to put together an accredited degree or get a Masters.

There are a couple of finer points for understanding how to succeed in tech. You have to develop a "domain skill" such as aviation, accounting, or biomedics in addition to computer skills. Straight-up programming skills are great but you need to stand out by having a strong theme in your work. Lastly, develop salesmanship skills, because you are going to need them to compete against the hordes of career women who will be increasingly taking up space and consuming resources in the once pellucid technical eco-system.

Feminists Acknowledge PR Problem

W.F. Price · 3 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A feminist professor of women's studies, of all people, has suggested dropping the word "feminist" (at least when it's convenient) in an article she wrote for The Atlantic:

> When I was a senior in college and a recent convert to feminism, I bought one of those "This is What a FEMINIST Looks Like!" t-shirts, and it quickly became my favorite item of clothing. The lettering was pink—ironically pink, of course—and I liked to push that irony further by pairing the shirt with a skirt, and maybe even some knee-high boots with flowers embroidered around the top.
>
> When I got married a year after graduation, I wore the shirt proudly on the first day of my honeymoon, while holding the hand of my new husband, our flea-market wedding bands gleaming. I enjoyed the confused looks from people who would stare at my shirt and then at me; I could almost see their brains whirring, trying to process the mismatch between the person in front of them and the shrill, angry, neo-Amazon that a feminist is supposed to be. I loved challenging that misconception, with almost evangelistic zeal.
>
> Seven years later, I still have the t-shirt, but it now lives in a box of old clothes in the attic. I can't bring myself to give it away, but I also can't remember the last time I wore it. We are at an impasse, the shirt and I, and this stalemate mirrors another growing ambivalence of mine, one I have only recently admitted harboring: an ambivalence about the word "feminism" itself.
>
> This is a surprising admission for someone like me. Feminism wasn't just a passing college fad. I have two advanced degrees in feminist studies, not to mention a book on feminist literary criticism coming out later this year. I am now a college professor and regularly teach courses in our women's studies program. And I still feel that new-convert fervor when it comes to naming and opposing forces of sexism in our society.
>
> And yet, in my professional and personal life, I increasingly find myself talking about feminist ideas without actually using the word "feminism." Why? It is exhausting to preface every conversation about combating misogyny with winsome, disarming anecdotes about how I actually do like men—enough to even marry one!—and how I actually haven't burned any bras (and probably never will, because they are so expensive). I'm tired of doing this myth-debunking dance, and, weirdly enough, the conversation often goes more smoothly if I just avoid the "F-Word" entirely.

However, later in the article she suggests that the term still has its uses as an in-group marker:

> Every semester, young women come into my office in tears. Much as I did, they are first becoming conscious of how terribly the world views and treats women. In this vital, fragile stage of life when they are just beginning to craft a self and envision a future, these students are simultaneously bombarded with damaging cultural myths about gender. They feel silenced, unheard, diminished.
>
> In moments like these, feminism feels like a gift than I can offer, a word that represents the antidote to what wounds them. A word that can open new ways of thinking and living, not to mention a vault of incredible writers, philosophers, activists, and ideas. I can still remember those initial flashes of discovery, and the way the label used to feel before I became exhausted trying to defend it, how it was strong and new and whispered a promise of change. Yet, as life-giving as it has been for me, the word "feminism" comes with a lot of baggage, and I know that if these young women and men choose to embrace the label, they will also inherit its stigma and the burden of trying to maneuver around it to improve our world.
>
> I wish I had more to give them, more than a galvanizing but hopelessly divisive word for them to cling to, but, for the moment, it's the only word I have. So until I have something better for them—and I want something better—I will hold onto my t-shirt and keep using the label.

> Sometimes.

I've long thought that when feminism finally falls out of fashion, women will simply deny ever having been feminists, or even knowing what it means. Instead, they'll just pretend feminism never happened, and go on about their lives as if nothing ever changed. And, as I get older and see the world more for what it is, I doubt that things will change all that much with or without feminism.

However, if anything, discrediting feminism will take a weapon out of the hands of the people and institutions that use it to disenfranchise and dispossess others, so it is ultimately a worthwhile endeavor.

We ought to keep in mind that what the author here is describing – the double-edged nature of labeling oneself – is something that can apply to men as well. This is one reason I have consistently avoided the MRA label. It can be helpful for rallying the troops and creating a sense of belonging, and it can inflate one's profile, but it can also pigeonhole people and create negative stereotypes.

For example, when a woman calls herself a "feminist," she can immediately be linked to Andrea Dworkin, the psychos who support infanticide, and nutjobs like Valerie Solanas. However, women tend to have a labile sense of group allegiance, and are excused for the same (I'd guess it's innate), so it isn't as much of a liability for them to associate with a particular group. For men, on the other hand, once you self-identify with some particular group, it's a lot harder to disassociate yourself from it. This suggests that perhaps the most effective tactic for discrediting feminism lies in going after the men who proclaim themselves to be feminists.

Something to keep in mind.

A Feminist Admits That Feminism Isn't About Equality

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 5 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists say that feminism is about equality. MRAs and many other anti-feminists know that feminism is really about female supremacism. Louise Pennington writing in the Huffington Post admits that feminism admits that and believes that "equality" is nothing more than a smokescreen to prevent the liberation of women:

> My original feminism was about equality: women were equal to men and all we needed was the laws to force misogynists to stop being misogynists. The older I get, the more I believe that 'equality' is nothing more than a smokescreen to prevent the true liberation of women. Equality before the law means nothing when violence is endemic;

What is the "true liberation of women"? It's nothing more than female supremacism. Since Pennington is against both equality between men and women and presumably women having a lesser status than men (because women wouldn't be "liberated" in this case), the only option left is that she supports female supremacism. This is confirmed by her attack on equality before the law and elsewhere in Pennington's article:

> Feminism requires more than equality. It requires liberation. It requires the liberation of ALL women from male violence.

Governments have been waging a war on crime ever since governments have been around despite knowing that the complete elimination of crime (or violence) is impossible. The only way to even try to do such a thing is a police state the likes of which wasn't even seen in the Soviet Union. Neither socialism nor the police state of the Soviet Union were totalitarian enough and female supremacist enough for her because even socialists still pay lip service to equality and the idea that both men and women have human rights:

> Until two years ago, I would have still identified as a socialist-feminist, although my awareness of the structural oppression of women was growing. The unrelenting misogyny and rape apologism on the left made me reconsider my political stance as did the creation of the Feminist/Women's Rights board on Mumsnet. The more I read on Mumsnet, the more radical my feminism became. I started reading Andrea Dworkin, Natasha Walters, Kate Millett, Susan Faludi, Susan Maushart, Ariel Levy, Gail Dines, Germaine Greer, and Audre Lorde. I learned about cultural femicide and I started reading only fiction books written by women: Isabel Allende, Alice Walker, Maya Angelou, Kate Mosse, Margaret Atwood, Kris Radish, Barbara Kingsolver, and Andrea Levy amongst many others. I started reading about women's lives and the power of real sisterhood.
>
> My feminism, both the definition and activism, has changed dramatically over the past 18 years. Now, I self-define as an anti-capitalist, pro-radical feminist as I believe that the source of women's oppression is male violence which is perpetuated by the structures of our capitalist economy. The Patriarchy may predate capitalism but we cannot destroy it without destroying capitalism too. I don't always feel a 'real feminist' or a 'good enough' feminist. All I know is that I am a feminist who truly believes that women have the power to liberate all women from male violence; that feminism is fundamentally about the power of sisterhood.
>
> My feminist activism involves privileging women's voices over men's voices. I now only read books written by women. I try to get my main news from women's news sites and women journalists like Soraya Chemaly, Samira Ahmed, Bidisha, Helen Lewis, Bim Adewunmi, and Sarah Smith. I follow only women journalists on Twitter and Facebook. I support organisations which are placing women's experiences at the centre of public debate: Women Under Siege, The Everyday Sexism Project, and The Women's Room UK.

Pennington says here that she is privileging women over men. It's not just about what Pennington reads or her actvism. Throughout her article, Pennington doesn't just attack the a general vague idea of "equality", she attacks very specific ideas of equality, namely equality before the law. Being against equality before the law means that Pennington wants to elevate women above men legally which is the most important aspect of female supremacism. There can be no doubt here that Pennington is a female supremacist and that feminism is about female supremacism.

Divorced Dads and Little League — A Followup

Featured Guest · 6 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Thrown Away Dad

All the American communities that "Do Little League" have their own ways, customs and rules. Things such as the beginning of the season, the scheduling of games and practices, ceremonies at the beginning and end of the season, and one of the most important and least agreed upon is how players are divided up onto the different teams. In the community where I coach, a late Winter time, indoor tryout is held where one by one, each child will field a few ground balls, make a few throws, and then take several swings with a bat at a practice ball attached to a long stick.

Although we call this day the tryout, a more accurate word for it would be the evaluation. All of the coaches are there watching each of the boys as they take their turn demonstrating their abilities, or lack thereof, and then days later their is an actual draft of the players by the coaches. Again, the word tryout implies that some of the boys will not make the team. All of the boys end up on a team. The boys that perform the best during the tryout are chosen early and the ones who perform poorly of course end up being chosen last.

In an article I penned one year ago, I explained how my ex used an Emergency Order of Protection to stop me from being able to attend the tryout for the 2012 season. At the time, my goal was simply to survive her attempt to have me removed as my son's coach, and I did survive and keep my gig as a coach, however I soon learned that the move she made dealt a fatal blow to what would become a long hard season for the team I referred to as "Green", (the color of our shirts).

Because I was not allowed to attend the tryout, I was blind on the day of the draft. Furthermore, my concern during the draft was simply to get it over with and run away as fast as I could because on that day I still had the Emergency OP hanging over me, and again this was explained in the article that I penned last year.

Green was collectively younger than all the other teams and short on talent. Green could best be described as the Bad News Bears without a Cinderella story. All through the 2012 season I had to keep reminding myself that my goal was simply to survive as a coach despite being a divorced father with the typical ex wife who is constantly scheming and sniveling around. One positive outcome of our 2012 season is that numerous players on that team who had never before gotten out of the grass, (meaning previously they were always stuck in the outfield), were now playing in the infield sand with some even pitching and catching. It was refreshing to watch their skill level improve with each passing game, but as sports goes, the competition improves as well. All but one of our games was a loss. We endured a number of blowouts. We had a number of close misses that were absolute heartbreakers. We ended up with a record of 1 victory and numerous losses, and it is a record that my ex is very proud of and broadcasts loud and proud to anyone who will listen.

I distinctly remember last year talking with a friend of mine and explaining to him that I could not attend the tryout and why. My friend is unfamiliar with the Single Mother court system and he absolutely insisted that an Emergency Order of Protection cannot be used to stop a man from performing his duties. My friend adamantly told me that Emergency OP's are only for protection and that I cannot be arrested simply for attending a Little League tryout. The secrecy of the Single Mother courts and the refusal of the media to expose them leads to mass ignorance of what our Single Mother court Judges are getting away with. Sadly, it is true that most people agree with my friend. Even more sad is that fact that today, probably 99 percent of Emergency OP's are intended exactly to stop the man from performing his duties, whether it be as a father, as a coach, at his home based business or at his employment. Emergency OP's have become nothing more than a freebie bargaining chip or a power play utilized by our heroic Single Mother's at the time they choose to expel the father, or even years later when the pesky father who refuses to go away needs to be reigned in or handicapped in some way.

January of 2013 rolled around and it was time for players to sign up and for potential coaches to fill out a form if they wished to coach. Of course, I filled out the form knowing that due to last year's results I would probably not be chosen. However, the phone call came in late February that I had been chosen and the word went out to all the parents, including the Heroic Single Mother, the day and time of the tryout. This year, I was prepared. Because I anticipated the Heroic Single Mother would again go to court and tell the Judge that she wanted another Emergency OP, (that is all it takes), I informed the gentleman who would be my assistant that I might be unable to attend the tryout and asked if he could he attend instead.

If my visitation weekend did not fall upon the weekend of the tryout, I literally would have went into hiding on the Friday morning before the Saturday tryout so that the cops would not be able to find me and serve me with the Emergency OP. However, my visitation weekend did fall on the tryout weekend so I had to show up at the usual time to pick up my son and hope my son would be waiting for me instead of a County Deputy with the Emergency OP in hand. Last year when the County Deputy served me with the OP, I simply stood motionless and silent while he read through the list of locations and persons that I was prohibited from being within 300 feet of. When he was finished, he told me that he had two sons of his own that he loved very much and would do anything for. I wanted to ask the clown if he believed that because he had children, his serving me the OP was “ok”, but I remained silent. He then asked if I had any questions. I would have loved to ask the clown a few questions, but I simply shook my head back and forth. That occurrence was the third time one of our Single Mother Court Judges handed out an Emergency OP against me so I was very familiar with the procedure.

On Friday afternoon, I was prepared to endure the same thing all over again. Frankly, I was stunned when I saw my son instead of a Deputy. I even took a look around to see if a Deputy was approaching. There was not. As me and my son drove away, I kept checking my rearview mirror thinking they were simply late and would catch up with me. I felt like a man who had just broken out of prison, constantly looking around to see if “they” are coming to get me. Then I started asking myself what had happened. Is it possible that the Judge refused her request this year ? Absolutely not, I know better. Is it possible that word got around last year as to why Green’s talent level was so much lower than the other teams and the Heroic Single Mother was shamed for her actions ? Not in this society.

During the 2013 tryout, I felt absolutely relieved and vindicated regarding the previous years poor performance of my team. I was amazed at how visible each boy’s skill level showed with just a 2-3 minute evaluation period. Skill levels ranged from the poor child who tries to fit the ball glove onto their throwing hand, to boys who today look like they might be serious contenders to play minor league ball some day. If you are going to Coach competitively in this community, you absolutely MUST attend the tryout. After already having held a few practices, I can already see we have a much higher talent level than last year’s team.

This is now the fifth year that I have attempted to coach or volunteer as an assistant coach for my son’s baseball teams. On year number 1, I was told to not even bother filling out a coaching application because they preferred fathers who live in that community. I showed up to practices and games and observed that the gentleman coaching the team already had another gentleman acting as his assistant. In fact, I will never forget the day I introduced myself to that coach and asked him if I could have a copy of the game schedules he was handing out. He apologetically told me that he only had enough schedules, “for the parents”. On year number 2 I did not even bother asking if I could fill out an application. However during the first practice, I observed a new coach throwing batting practice without anyone to catch for him, so I quickly grabbed my glove and caught during his batting practice and this landed me a gig as his assistant coach. On year number 3, I pulled a very similiar stunt with a still different coach and landed a gig as the assistant. On year number 4, I felt “qualified” enough to fill out an application which led to the adventure as written about last year.

Now on year number 5, not only am I coaching, but I am coaching without a handicap. It takes just a moment to let the last sentence sink in. Practically any married father in America today can coach his son’s little league team simply by volunteering to do so. Because the skank I foolishly married wanted a divorce, it took me 5 years of trying to get to equal footing with the married fathers.

I get rather amused when the Single Mom’s of my players approach me with one BS story or another about how their ex husband might not bring Junior to the game, or Junior may not be at the practice because the ex husband is such a dastardly man. All these Single Mothers are trying to find yet another bloke who agrees with them that their ex husband is a really bad guy. What is amusing is how their negative comments about their ex husbands come to an abrupt stop upon obviously learing that the coach himself is an ex husband.

I coach in a lilly white community and fully half of my player's moms are single moms. I rather enjoy approaching the other thrown away fathers and asking them if they can help out in one way or another. Of course, these men always jump at the chance to help out because it is giving them an opportunity to be a little bit more of a father to their son than the Single Mother Court Judge allows them to. And I just absolutely love to watch the single mothers grinding their teeth while these good fathers are allowed to more fully fulfill their responsibilities as fathers to their sons.

University of Wisconsin Probes Vagina Monologues Incident

W.F. Price · 6 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some mischievous girls disrupted a performance of the Vagina Monologues, prompting the University of Wisonsin Madison to open an investigation into the public act of heresy. The girls, who are suspected to be sorority sisters, reportedly banged on windows and made obscene gestures. One girl is alleged to have lifted her skirt in a move that may have been calculated to taunt and provoke the largely lesbian performers and audience in a "can't touch this" gesture.

> The disturbance came toward the end of a Saturday night performance that was part of a three-show weekend run held as a fundraiser for UNIDOS Against Domestic Violence, a Madison-based nonprofit that aids Latinos and immigrants.
>
> The show was held in the basement of Brink Lounge. Near the end, a bus parked on East Washington Avenue let out members of the sorority for their spring formal to be held in a basement lounge adjacent to the theater space. A large window forms part of the back wall of the theater fronting East Washington Avenue.
>
> The majority of sorority members walked by without incident, Feder said. One woman allegedly starting pounding on the window as the scripted portion of the play was concluding, she said. After a brief lull, other young men and women joined, with most pounding on the window and one woman briefly lifting up her skirt, she said. In total about five people were part of the disturbance, she said.
>
> The second part of the disturbance came during the final scene of the play when actors step to a microphone one by one and share personal, unscripted stories of their own experiences with sexual violence, Feder said. Some spoke in English. Others spoke in Spanish.

It's informative to see that while screeching protests that involve violence, civil rights violations and intimidation as well as illegal alarm-pulling are not investigated in North American universities, a few kids horsing around outside a window calls for a "full investigation."

But I suppose that when the holy, pure and sacrosanct ritual of feminists talking about their vaginas is being performed, respect and reverence is not optional. Students who do not pay the proper respect to the vagina, that inviolate wellspring of victimhood, must be forced to pay for their transgressions.

On another note, this thing feminists have for foreign women should be suspect. I have noticed for years a certain obsession with politically marginalized immigrant women among the radical feminist set. Somehow, I suspect that feminists' interest in compliant, powerless young females isn't entirely altruisic.

Jury Still Out on Jodi Arias Case

W.F. Price · 7 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The jury is still deliberating in the Arias murder trial, in which Jodi Arias stands accused of slaughtering her lover Travis Alexander in a jealous rage.

Arias took photos of Alexander immediately before killing him while he was taking a shower. She shot him, stabbed him and cut his throat open, leaving blood all over the place, and then took more photos for some reason. Police were able to recover some of the photos, which were taken with Alexander's camera.

It was a gruesome crime, even as far as most murders go.

After her arrest, Arias denied involvement. Later, when it became crystal clear that she was the killer, she changed her story, claiming that she did it because Alexander was abusive toward her. This defense proved very effective in the Mary Winkler case, among others, as a means to excuse women for killing male lovers. It is Arias' only hope for an acquittal, as the facts are stacked against her.

The deliberating jury has the option of convicting Arias of 1st degree murder, which could result in a death sentence, 2nd degree murder, manslaughter or acquittal. I'm curious as to what readers think the jury will eventually settle on, so I'll put up a little poll pending the outcome:

Meet “The Patriarchy”

W.F. Price · 7 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The breaking news about the Cleveland kidnapping/sex slave case has all the trappings of the feminist narrative, except for, well… the suspects.

> CLEVELAND — The police had been called two times to a house where three young women from Cleveland, who disappeared about a decade ago and who friends and relatives feared were gone forever, were found on Monday, the authorities said on Tuesday. In 2000, the owner of the house, Ariel Castro, had called the police about a fight in the street. In 2004, the authorities interviewed Mr. Castro, a driver, after he “inadvertently” left a child on a school bus.
>
> [...]
>
> Mike Iwais, 35, a grocery store owner who lives near the house where the women were found, said he would see Mr. Castro strolling around the neighborhood, in nightclubs or restaurants. Mr. Iwais, who has lived in the neighborhood for 35 years and like Mr. Castro went to Lincoln West High School, said Mr. Castro played in a Latin music band at a club called Belinda’s.
>
> “But I never saw anybody going in or out of his house except him. Not even one person,” Mr. Iwais said. ” We all thought he lived alone because he was always by himself going in and out of the house. Sometimes he would sit on his porch and drink beer.”
>
> “He would have beers with people, other guys in the neighborhood, in their yards or on their porches, but he would never invite anyone over,” Mr. Iwais said. “And sometimes, you would say hello to him and he would not acknowledge you. It was strange.”

Feminists love to point to these incidents and use them to discredit the overwhelming majority of ordinary men, as though they have anything in common with the Castro brothers. They are used to portray every middle class guy as a potential menace to society and freak who would keep girls in a sex dungeon. But it turns out that, in fact, the fellows who kidnapped these girls are about what you’d expect: a few disheveled, low-class weirdos.

So why is it that despite the fact that the guys who commit these crimes are almost always on the bottom of the male power and privilege scale, feminists are constantly linking abuse of women to men’s power, and agitating for stripping what remaining male privilege exists?

It’s time for the patriarchy/male privilege narrative to be exposed for the sham it is. Privileged men are least likely to abuse women; patriarchal types are most likely to protect them. It is overwhelmingly the powerless, those without privilege and the undesirable who resort to crime to obtain sex. The few others, like Ted Bundy, are simply the exceptions that prove the rule.

But perhaps the real issue here is that women aren’t as interested in making up stories about guys like the Castro brothers, because those guys don’t turn them on like Christian Bale in American Psycho.

Were the 1950s so bad?

W.F. Price · 7 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I still get comments from indignant women about an article I wrote advising women to get on it by the time they hit the age of 25. Mainly, these comments feature a lot of rationalization. You know — that infamous, furious hamster that characterizes Western females.

Here's a recent example:

> I just turned 25. This article sounds like it is written by a bitter male still living in the 1950s. These days, 25 is a lot younger than it was 20 or even 10 years ago. Furthermore, age is just a number. I meet 18 year old girls that look about my same age or older. Shakira is 36 and looks about 20. She just had a baby with a man 10 years younger I see lots of women in their mid 30s everyday who look young. W.F. Price needs to wake up. Halle Berry is almost 47 and is pregnant. Do I realize pregnancy at a younger age is safer? Yes, but that doesn't mean doors are closed for women in their late 30s and 40s and even 50s. Personally, I think very late 20s and early 30s is a good time to get married. Most marriages that start in the early 20s end in divorce. With that being said, I have friends who had kids out of wedlock in their teens and early 20s. They are miserable and never went to college and not with the fathers of their babies. I only know one who married the baby's father and she looks pretty miserable as well. Everybody who got married young is no longer with their partner either. The thing is our brains aren't even fully developed until we are in our mid-20s. If we get married in our teens or early 20s, we might choose a partner we feel lust for, but is not stable and not a good match. With that being said, I married at 23 and I wish I would have waited until at least my late 20s to meet somebody. I have lots of problems with my husband who is a little older than me because he, himself was not financially ready for marriage and still too attached to guy friends. If I would have waited until I was professionally employed and met somebody else who was also professionally employed, I would be a lot happier now.

I'm not going to address it point by point. It's too obvious what's going here: the girl married a guy close to her age, he's still beneath her in terms of SMV (sexual market value), and she is itching to trade up. Your median divorce happens right about when women reach that critical tipping point where male and female SMV converge — the late 20s. Dissatisfied women in their late 20s will look for whatever reason they can find to run for it, because they sense this is their last chance to really be on top of their game and snag a higher-status male. I'm sure the hormones have a lot to do with it, too.

The above female is pretty extreme, though. She apparently believes that she can still hope for a child up to her 50s. It's delusional; that's like a man thinking he can join the major leagues and succeed past 30 (it's happened a few times, but only a fool would count on it!). But it isn't so much about the child for her as it is about capitalizing on the sexuality — this is a woman's biological prime directive. Nature didn't build in birth control, but it did give women a relentless drive to use sex to snag high-status males as long as it's possible. Nature's point was to ensure maximum fertility and infant survival, hence the use of sex to climb the ladder. As long as women are having sex they are propagating their genes by having babies, and their status climbing is ensuring the survival of these babies and genes. Put the two together and there's a good recipe for the Bible's (and nature's) commandment to "go forth and multiply."

But what gets me is this constant running down of the 1950s. I know they weren't perfect, even though I was born significantly later in the mid 70s myself. My dad told me the 1950s were pretty miserable in a lot of ways. He mentioned impoverished, working class families. Irish American families with more kids than they knew what to do with, scrimping and saving just to pay rent and eat. Italians resorting to organized crime. Rural Anglos moonshining, and black families who couldn't afford sugar, and instead just made do with small amounts of molasses for their cornbread. One car or no car families. Desperate people who counted on the church community for support. Men who felt trapped, and women who had to struggle to find enough food for everyone. Families still hurting from the loss of brothers, fathers and sons from the war. It was no picnic.

But there were good things about it, too. People actually helped each other. People had a sense of duty and shame. Caring for one another was a virtue. Women were feminine and thin, and physically attractive. Men were masculine and thin, and physically active. Children were free and happy, and evidently very healthy and privileged considering the great success and wealth of the generation born during those years.

So I have to ask what it is about the 1950s that prompts feminists to disparage that decade so much? Why is it that contemporary times, replete with obese, helpless single mothers, bastardy and mass reliance on government welfare are so great? Why is it that keeping our society civil today requires the world's highest ever rate of incarceration? Why can't we count on our neighbors? Why are women fatter and uglier, and men lower status? Why is unemployment so damned high?

Why is our society so much less equal in terms of income and socioeconomic status today?

I don't want a return to the 1950s – they were far from ideal, and we could do better – but it looks to me as though these simple-minded women are condemning the decade for all the wrong reasons. Are our young women today, pumped and dumped and raising fatherless children, worshipping the false idols of Barack Obama, George Bush, Bill Clinton and other would-be gods, really so much better off than the women of these dreaded 1950s?

Justice for Travis Alexander

W.F. Price · 8 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jodi Arias has been convicted of murder in the first degree for the brutal killing of her lover, Travis Alexander. Perhaps we have turned a corner, and the days of smearing dead men to excuse their wives and girlfriends for capital crimes are drawing to a close.

Feminists often speak of "blaming the victim" in rape trials and cases, but there could be no more blatant example of this than Jodi Arias's defense, in which she attempted to explain away her vicious murder, which involved stabbing Mr. Alexander dozens of times, shooting him in the head and cutting his throat by calling him "abusive." What nerve…

Let us hope that Ms. Arias can come to repent for her crime, and do what she can to make amends before she meets her fate. Her attempt to justify and rationalize the murder argues for the most severe punishment, but perhaps she can show enough contrition during sentencing to save her life.

Mercy is now in God's hands — she can expect no more from men than she extended to Travis Alexander.

Manboobz Chronicles — I'm So Ronery, by Andrew Johnston

W.F. Price · 8 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I see that the slob Futrelle is still at it, using any comment he can to take potshots at my and other androsphere blogs. I don't know who's paying him, but he's making a career out of being a feminist guttersnipe, so might as well have a little fun with him and his halfwit readers.

Turns out one of his commenters is in pain – deep psychic pain – because he got rejected by a Chinese girl.

The guy is named Andrew Johnston, and runs a site called "Kingdom of Sharks" where he begs Chinese (girls) to get in touch with him. Andrew is a white guy, and he really, really likes Chinese girls. Nothing wrong with that – Chinese girls have plenty of admirable qualities – but this guy takes it to another level. Actually, he takes it so far that one could call Mr. Johnston a "stalker" without exaggerating.

Let's take a look at his obsession with the object of his desire:

> Why I Can't (Quite) Move On
>
> I'd like to get personal for a moment. This may come across as self-indulgent, but the way I see it, it's my blog and I'll do what I want with it.
>
> I've tried to keep the details of this between me and a few other people for a while now, but since I'm trying to make a clean start here I feel like I should put it out in the open. Some of this you may be familiar with the basics – I just realized while I was writing this that it's been one year since I first wrote on this topic (and about half a year since the follow-up), which is also around the point where everything started to go to hell. I've certainly touched upon it before, but now that some time has passed I'd like to delve into the details. Bear with me.
>
> As many of you know, I was in a relationship with a woman who went by Audrey Huang. She was unlike anyone I've ever been with, and I was ready to marry her. I was going through the steps to bring her over here so we could be together. It was a slow process, but I was working my way through it.
>
> And then, one day, she was gone. There was one terse message telling me that she was strong enough without me, and that was it. I never heard from her again. One day we had a future, the next day it was vapor.

You know, it strikes me as ironic, but not the least bit surprising, that a guy who posts on Manboobz' site is chasing foreign women. It might be one thing if the women were chasing him and he were simply weighing his options near and far, but obviously this isn't the case — "Audrey" dumped his sorry ass after he'd promised to bless her with his hand in marriage. Andrew wasn't picking and choosing, but rather being weighed and judged and found wanting.

Ouch.

So what does Andy do? Why, what any guy who got rejected by a long-distance girlfriend would — he spends months trying to track her down online:

> So I've spent the last two months trying to find her, and there's not much I haven't tried in pursuit of that goal. I reached out to her friends and family, but either they didn't know anything or wouldn't tell me. I started reaching out to anyone I thought might have some connection to her – people who worked for the same companies, people who came from her hometown or who were there presently (she had spoken about going back there). When that didn't work, I went to QQ and started posting everything I knew about her in the hopes that someone I hadn't thought of might have seen her. I dug through old pictures and emails (opening a few wounds in the process) for any information I might have missed. I paid for international calls to her number and the numbers of several people who might have known her. I searched for people with similar names, finding dozens of others and feeling my heart leap every single time. In a moment of desperation, I even sent a > letter to her last workplace in the vain hopes that someone there might have something to tell me.

>
> Every effort failed. After two months, I've tried everything I can imagine, save a few options that would be going much too far. She's gone.
>
> Except…she's not gone. I keep close tabs on the traffic that leads here – the subscription spam has made it difficult to track my legit traffic, so I watch this thing carefully. Shortly after Audrey cut me off, I started getting views through a VPN – the kind of thing used by people in the PRC to get around government censorship. Ever since then, I've been receiving regular hits from that same person at least once a month, sometimes more. Now, I don't have definitive proof that those hits are from Audrey, but no one else from that part of the world has ever taken any interest in what I write. Audrey did. I can't help but feel that she's been watching me this whole time (Incidentally, I hope that whomever is watching will consider contacting me, if only to clear things up).

Creepy…

Why did Audrey reject the Manboobz regular? The following may offer a clue:

> What you have to realize is that while I was unemployed, I felt terrible most days. Audrey was really the one ray of sunshine I had. She was such a sunny, positive person, and I felt infinitely better any day she contacted me, even if she had nothing in particular to say. When she stopped talking, that light went out. I never realized how much I depended on that.

Good going Audrey. The guy was not only unemployed, but a mangina as well. The former might be excusable if there were ameliorating circumstances, but not the latter, even if it means a visa to the USA, which has obvious, huge benefits to a Chinese woman.

I'd like to congratulate Audrey on her good judgment, and refusal to stoop to such a low level as to shack up with the kind of guy who posts on David Futrelle's website. Score one for Chinese women. But really, even a woman in the most desperate of circumstances would have to think long and hard about shacking up with Andrew Johnston.

Which leads me to the final lesson:

If you love a woman and want her to love you back, the last man you want to listen to is David Futrelle. Futrelle to a normal woman is like naphtha to moths — he will drive them away in sickness. Maybe Andrew Johnston has some time to figure this out. I hope so, but first he'll have to purge himself from any and all association with Manboobz, and stop being such a whiny little putz.

I'd recommend reading Heartiste, Dalrock and Roosh for starters, and then perusing other androsphere blogs. We manosphere types may be hated by David Futrelle and assorted feminists (largely fat lesbians), but we certainly aren't lacking for female companionship.

Andrew, I can guarantee you one thing: Audrey is making sweet love to a man who is not ashamed of being masculine. She is enjoying it, and she laughs at your limp affection and beta entreaties. She tells him about you, and he laughs a deep, dismissive laugh, then has sex with her. You are the butt of their jokes. As she submits to his masculinity, she breathes a sigh of relief that she didn't screw up and attach herself to a pathetic mangina like you, and then enjoys the deep, penetrating pleasures of being treated like a real woman.

If you care about her, you will be happy for her pleasure, move on, and leave her alone.

And for the love of God, stop being such a creepy stalker already!

Prison Love: Black Guerilla Family Style

Obsidian · 8 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Obsidian

By now, you've probably heard about the latest activities of the prison gang/organized crime outfit, the Black Guerilla Family – the local Baltimore chapter chief, one Tavon "Bulldog" Smith, seems to have been up to quite a bit during his stay in the state's prison. Among other things (like running a full-service drugs dealing operation from his prison cell), he allegedly impregnated at least four of the thirteen Black female prison guards that serviced him and other members of the BGF.

For those of us who follow the news headlines and examine them through the lens of EvoPsych and Game, none of these developments comes as any shock or surprise, nor is the incidence of "prison romances" anything new; indeed, The Spearhead has covered such stories in the not-too-distant past, where we find the rough-and-ready, yet sensitive-and-charismatic Prison Guy woos the female prison guard or psychologist or what have you. While some have excoriated the powers-that-be for what they see as the downsides – and they are real – of the increased participation of Women in what was traditionally all-Male workspaces – I have a differing tack on this thing.

I see the BGF and related incidents as our Psychosexual Hardwiring being exposed to the harsh light of day – and I think this, at least as much if not more than anything else, is what bothers a goodly number of MEN, more than anything else. I mean, let's face it – when's the last time you've read about these stories, and have seen hordes of Women rising up in righteous indignation over it? Yea, that's what I thought.

No, it's mainly guys who take umbrage to these stories – about how the Women would/could get involved with the supposed dregs of society, and so forth. Underneath all the "Save Western Civ" outrage, is the very real sense of Sour Grapeism.

And, there would be some truth there – after all, Women being fully self-supporting would mean that their mating calculus would change, as to be expected for any human when he or she encounters a changed environment; they would be fully expected to adapt. And contrary to the dogmas of others along these lines, the simple truth of the matter is that Humanity has a wide menu of mating options and strategies, both short and longer term, and can and will select one depending on the particularities of the situation they find themselves in at the time.

So, for me, the Black Prison Guard Ladies who got with Mr. Bulldog, were merely choosing the best choice from among the mating options that were on the table; just because there were more "stable, productive" and most importantly, "law-abiding" Black Men available on the outside, they clearly lacked something that did it for these ladies, and they opted to get with the aforementioned Bulldog instead. Among other things, he offered material bennies, had good looks/hot physique, and was able to display formidable dominance. These are traits that, among males, are in short supply anywhere, inside the joint or otherwise. So, when seen from this angle, a purely EvoPsych one, it would make perfect sense for the ladies to do what they did.

So too does it make perfect sense that they would share an Alpha Male – and here we obliterate another polite fiction. These Women didn't have to share anyone with anybody; they made their own money and were gainfully employed, so the notion that Women who enter into harems do so because they have no other options simply ain't so. Indeed, if anything – and I've long predicted this – we will see MORE De Facto Harems, not less, PRECISELY because Women, in this case Black Women, like it that way. They can and will go in on a timeshare on a obviously successful Man, than have a lesser one all to themselves, when push comes to shove.

In a word, I'm having a hard time seeing what all the hub-bub regarding the BGF – which got started by the prison-love interest of Angela Davis – is all about. After all, when you understand Game and EvoPsych, none of these stories in the news comes as any great surprise or shock in the least.

The Obsidian

As Rabbinic Courts Neutered, Israeli Divorce Rate Rises

W.F. Price · 9 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I knew all the talk about Israel being a feminist haven was balderdash, as Judaism hasn't survived for millennia by accommodating feminist influence, but until recently I wasn't aware of certain implications of halachic law, which governs many personal matters, such as marriage and divorce.

It turns out that women are not allowed to be witnesses in rabbinic courts (Beth din), and from that I extrapolated that women cannot testify against husbands in divorce. This took me by surprise. I can hardly imagine how much time and money this saves both the courts and the parties involved. Add to this the fact that civil marriage does not exist in Israel, and it starts to become clear why Jewish birthrates in that small country have shot up to well over replacement levels and the divorce rate, at 30%, is quite low by developed countries' standards.

However, things are changing. In 2008, the Knesset passed a new law allowing property division before finalization of divorce, allowing a stealth form of civil divorce. Additionally, Israel has begun using pressure tactics, such as restraining orders, to remove husbands from homes (this remains rare, but that's likely to change).

The results are what you'd expect. After the new rules went into effect, divorce rates rose substantially, even as they remain stabilized in most other developed countries. It looks as though Israel is starting to lose its pioneer edge, and if this trend continues we can probably expect to see a liberalization of family values and subsequent rise in illegitimacy, adultery and other wonderful features of decadent post-industrial societies in Israel.

Surprisingly Humorless Onion Piece Proves Me Right

W.F. Price · 9 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Onion ran a piece on the Cleveland kidnapping case that is supposed to be satire, but comes off as pure, feminist man-hatred. Here's an excerpt:

> And men just live in the moment, you know? They don't hesitate or waste time thinking about the moral and ethical consequences of, say, oh, I don't know, tying three human beings up in a basement for a decade and subjecting them to near-constant psychosexual abuse, for example. They don't burden themselves with worrying about whether something like that is legal or ethical or humane. Or whether or not they are pitiless monsters who should have killed themselves years ago. No, sir, they see something they want, and they're not afraid to just take it. Honestly, you have to admire that about men. We sure do!
>
> Another thing that makes men the very pinnacle of life in this universe? The way they can just, in an instant, tear you away from your family, friends, and all semblance of a normal and happy life, purely to satisfy their own most sickening whims and desires. And beyond that, how they are able to strip you of not only everything you've ever held dear, but also of every last shred of dignity and humanity you have. I mean, name us a woman who could do that! Puh-leeze! We'd like to see one try.
>
> Now, we've heard some people criticizing men recently, but take it from us: If you just give him the chance, a man will show you that he is capable of things you could never even begin to imagine. Things that you'd never think a human being could ever, ever even contemplate doing, let alone actually accomplish. Things that just have to make you say, "Wow, bravo! You set up that dungeon-like torture chamber all by yourselves? Golly, you've really outdone yourselves this time, male gender! We really hope you're proud of yourselves."

The reason feminists aren't funny is because hatred and is not funny, and that's their primary emotion.

I predicted that some feminists would jump on the Cleveland kidnapping case to condemn all men, and then use it to bolster their arguments about patriarchy and male privilege. Then, I argued that the case only proves how wrong they are about patriarchy, because it is yet another example of a case that refutes their premise about male privilege being tied to abuse of women.

This really enraged them, because how dare I use one of "their" cases to point out that they are wrong. From their perspective, it should be a sacred feminist right to use these incidents against men as a political bludgeon so as to coerce more concessions, more power, etc. Some went so far as to accuse me of blaming women and feminists for the kidnappings themselves (rubbish), while a few others sent me some hate mail.

But you know, I'm going to keep it up, because they do not have the sole right to the narrative when convenient tragedies occur. The Castro brothers were neither patriarchal nor privileged; they were low-life predators from the bottom of society. Not to say that low-class men are all bad people, either, but men without privilege are the most likely to commit crimes, for obvious reasons.

Go to any domestic violence court in the US, and what does one see? A parade of sad, sorry pathetic men shuffling before a judge. Go to a criminal court and it's generally the same. Male criminality and abuse of women is not positively linked to privilege, but the lack of it. Feminists like to say that only means that wealthy, privileged men get away with it. I call bullshit. While a wealthy man may have more resources to defend himself in court, he also stands to lose a lot more if he commits a crime, and the lifespan and health of privileged men's wives as compared to the miserable lot of their underclass counterparts speaks volumes.

The myth of male power and privilege is just that, and the Cleveland case is one more pebble on the mountain of evidence that exposes it for a lie.

Empowering men in their families will not lead to more crimes against women and girls, but fewer. Fathers are protective of their children – both male and female – and husbands protective of wives. Married women are healthier and live significantly longer than singles; children with present fathers are far less likely to become victims of crime, or criminals themselves. Feminists will doubtless use examples of outrageous crimes in an effort to remove more men from their families, thereby creating both more victims and more criminals. They will use examples like the Castro brothers' kidnapping whenever and wherever they can. We must stop them from doing so, and we must not be intimidated by their feigned moral outrage when we speak the truth about their agenda.

A NY Times Mother's Day Op-ed: Trannies are Equal Moms

W.F. Price · 12 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When you see some kinds of articles, you start to understand why it was prescient women like Phyllis Schlafly who killed the Equal Rights Amendment. Men were pretty much in favor. I mean, what's not to like about it? Under legal gender equality women would have to share all the crap that falls primarily on men's shoulders. However, it should be pointed out that feminists, with a few notable exceptions, never supported it either. The version they supported included something known as the "Hayden Rider," which preserved all female privileges and exemptions while granting women all of men's privileges, i.e. the status quo.

But a brave, valiant minority is challenging female supremacy. Not patriarchal drones or supporters of male privilege, but men who reject everything about masculinity. Men who reject it so much that they chop off their genitalia and take female hormones in order to eradicate everything male about them.

One of these stalwart, self-mutilating individuals – a "former" male who goes by the name Jennifer Finley Boylan – has declared that he's every bit the mother as any woman. Sure, he had children as a male, but that doesn't mean he can't now call himself "mom," and demand they do the same. However, it isn't only his kids who must call him "mother," but all of us. If we don't accept that he's a mother, we're bigots. Why? Because he has shared the defining maternal experience, which he puts down as "suffering."

> ONE day, toward the end of my transition from father to mother, I came home to find my 6-year-old son looking thoughtful. "Are you all right?" I asked.
>
> "Yes," Sean said quietly. He was playing with Thomas the Tank Engine. His favorite engine was No. 5, red James. That had also been my name, back before it became Jenny.
>
> "What are you thinking?"
>
> "It's just it used to be you and me and Zach, the three boys on one side," he said, "and Mommy and Lucy-dog on the other."
>
> "I know," I said, feeling my heart clench.
>
> "Now it's Zach and me on one side, and you and Mommy and Lucy-dog over there."
>
> "I'm sorry, Sean," I said. My voice was barely a whisper. "I'm so sorry."
>
> "It's O.K.," said Sean. "The boys are just outnumbered."
>
> I have been a dad for 6 years, a mom for 12, and for a time in between I was both, or neither, like some parental version of the schnoodle or the cockapoo.
>
> [...]
>
> People have pointed out to me that, despite calling myself a mother, I didn't give birth to my sons. They're right, of course. But there is a lot more to parenting than birthing, just as there is a lot more to a novel than its opening sentence. After this long journey from an opposite-sex couple to a same-sex one, my wife and I can say it's what comes after that counts.
>
> I understand the reluctance many people have to play down the importance of gender, or for that matter, biology, in parenting; a world in which male and female are not fixed poles but points in a spectrum is a world that feels unstable, unreal. And yet to accept the wondrous scope of gender is to affirm the potential of life, in all its messy beauty. Motherhood and fatherhood are not binaries. And that, I'd argue, is a good thing.
>
> Only a small percentage of American households now consist of married couples with children in which only the father works. The biggest outliers in our culture are not same-sex couples, or transgender people, or adoptive parents, or single fathers, but the so-called traditional American families themselves.
>
> What does it even mean, at this hour, to call anybody traditional? Surely it is not the ways in which we > conform that define us, but the manner in which we each seek our own perilous truth.

Pure self-indulgence of the most disgusting variety, and highlighted on Mother's Day. I'd like to say it's sacrilegious, but sadly it is appropriate. I understand why some of the most selfish, depraved men among us would want to relinquish their masculinity. In our society, women are free to pursue their heart's desire without fear of sanction. Judging women for putting their own needs first is condemned in every mainstream outlet, from Dr. Phil to The Atlantic.

Some men are bound to be envious of this. Some of them go so far as to try to try to become a woman. And what kind of woman do they emulate? The worst parody of one. Gaudy, self-righteous, exhibitionist, attention-seeking, demanding, selfish and all too willing to place their burdens on others.

And in this great society we have built, it is they who stand at the pulpit and speak to the masses.

USA! USA! USA!

Not So the Women

BC Dad · 14 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A group of ex-pat teachers and I were recently joined for a restaurant dinner by a couple of Chinese girls who attended at the invitation of one of our group. At best they were only modestly interesting and attractive, and typical of most Chinese I've met (especially the women), were entirely absent from the discussion when it came time for every one, including the lone female ex-pat, to cough up their share of the bill. The Chinese girls did not offer a thank-you for their dinner and drinks.

They were happy, however, to join us when we decided to make a night of it at a nearby club. Even better, no sooner had we arrived at the club than we were joined by the male friend of one of them. In China it is typical for nightclubs to require payment upon ordering, prior to drinks actually arriving at the table. So we ordered a bottle of Scotch and enough beer to see all of us through the evening, for which the bill came to about 800 yuan, roughly $130.

Naturally enough, we divided the total among the group and asked the Chinese to contribute an equal share. Within moments, all three unceremoniously got up and left without bothering to say good-bye.

It has been my consistent experience that foreigners are viewed locally as resources to be exploited, by right of skin color, ethnicity and location of birth. This incident, one of many, has in no way altered my opinion.

I met a rather pretty young Chinese woman recently who speaks fairly good English and has lived, worked and studied in Brussels. She and I have exchanged language lessons – I teach her specialized English in topics such as economics, law and politics, while she teaches me basic Chinese. She is clearly intelligent and hard-working, yet her teaching skills are poor – I have had to instruct her on the best methods for teaching me Chinese. (To be fair, this is a problem I've encountered back home as well – I can almost always teach myself faster and more effectively than any instructor).

I took Sasha (her self-given 'English' name) for lunch shortly after meeting her, and while she impressed me with her non-parochial world-view, education and intelligence, I was also a tad dismayed by a couple of things. One was the fact that she told me at least five times over the course of our meal how handsome I am. I appreciate flattery as much as anyone, but the compliments felt forced, perhaps even manipulative. And in all honesty, I just ain't that handsome.

Another thing that turned me off was her skin. Open pustulating pimples, greasy and oily face, coupled with hair that was clearly washed only weekly or so, were enough to put me off my feed, so to speak. This is not rare, either. I don't know if it is a cultural or economic issue, but it is uncommon in Benxi for me to meet a woman who looks, and more importantly smells, fresh and clean.

Perhaps of most interest; we were discussing the myriad ways by which the Chinese take financial advantage of Westerners (through dishonest and illegal contracts and outright lying and cheating), when she came up with the comment that she felt Chinese were more intelligent than Westerners, by virtue of their ability to 'outsmart' them in business dealings. Needless to say, I merely nodded and smiled.

While teaching a class of sixth-graders, a boy in the front row was fooling around, so I absently tapped him (quite gently) on the head with the blackboard eraser I was carrying in my hand. A few small bits of chalk dust drifted onto his face, and apparently into one of his eyes. He made a big fuss over it, so at the end of class I examined his eye, but saw zero signs of irritation, such as redness or swelling, and told him he would be fine.

Shortly thereafter, I was hauled unceremoniously into the English supervisor's office. She informed me in no uncertain terms that abusing the children in anger was not to be tolerated. When I pointed out that there was no anger or abuse involved whatsoever, merely a trivial incident, she launched into an utterly irrational discourse, including calling me by the wrong name, reminding me that Chinese parents love their children much more than American parents, and that I would be required to pay for the obviously necessary visit to hospital.

When I pointed out that I am Canadian, not American, that she got my name wrong, that the boy's eye was fine, and that the Chinese love for their children includes allowing their Chinese teachers (almost all female) to punch, kick, slap and otherwise physically abuse them without mercy (I've seen this dozens of times, with the boys taking the vast majority of the abuse while the girls cry), and that her position was disingenuous at best, she subsided and contented herself by pointing out that it had better not happen again.

My response was to go home and look up the Chinese for 'go fuck yourself, you stupid cunt,' which I did, and am thus now armed for our next encounter, which, judging by past experience, ought to be next month or so.

A fellow ex-pat in Benxi, an Irishman who teaches at another school, showed me a video he took of a young woman in Shen Yang (a large city just north of here). He was motivated to point his smart-phone at her because she was behaving oddly, squirming and fidgeting while sitting on a main street public bench.

This young woman, wearing a skirt, positioned her buttocks over the back edge of the bench, whisked off her panties, hiked up her skirt, took a shit in full public view, pulled out a piece of tissue and wiped herself, tossed the tissue behind her, then put her panties back on and walked away. Yet, there are public toilets available almost everywhere one goes in this city. There is no explanation. I am hoping to get a copy of the video, and will post it online if possible.

I can offer many more examples, but the point is this: the irrational, self-serving, deceitful and abusive behavior I've witnessed here is primarily female. Male treachery is of course present, although I have almost no personal anecdotes to relate, but in my estimation it bears the hallmarks of masculinity – it is obvious, undisguised, rationally selfish, and thus fairly predictable.

Not so the women.

Pentagon Report Fuels Media Rape Fantasies

Uncle Elmer · 14 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The pentagon has released a report quantifying the rate of sexual assaults in the military, which was quickly picked up by various media outlets as evidence of a culture that victimizes women and deprives them of legal protection. Less ethical organizations, such as "The Editorial Staff" at USA Today, took it a step further with bombastic headlines invoking Vietnam-era casualty rates claiming "500 military sexual assault cases a week" that indicate "women in the military continue to be vulnerable to rape, anguish and injustice because the Pentagon's attempts to fix the problem have been inept". Others have joined the clarion call, demanding that the military's UCMJ be overhauled to provide greater assurance of convictions for sexual assault cases.

The results of the study are based on a survey administered by the Pentagon and taken by 22,792 military personnel. The survey, titled the 2012 Workplace and Gender Relations Survey of Active Duty Members (2012 WGRA), is based on civilian gender violence data-gathering tools and takes a wide scope on what constitutes sexual assault, including "unwanted sexual contact, unwanted gender-related behaviors (i.e., sexual harassment and sexist behavior), and gender discriminatory behaviors and sex discrimination", and even "unwanted phone calls". Notably, the respondents also include male victims, though one wonders how many men lined up to fill out this paperwork.

Reading into the report, as opposed to grabbing outrageous numbers and running with accusatory headlines, one quickly finds statistics on actual assault cases brought up for disciplinary action :

In FY12, the Department completed development of and deployed the Defense Sexual Assault Incident Database (DSAID), a secure, centralized, case-level data system for documenting sexual assault reports and managing cases. The Department also continued to standardize case disposition definitions, resulting in a standardized definition for the term "substantiated." At the end of FY12, the Military Services reported dispositions for 2,661 of the 3,288 military and civilian subjects receiving or waiting for a disposition for the allegations against them at the close of FY12.12 Investigations determined that 947 of the 2,661 subjects were either outside the legal authority of the Department or a military criminal investigative agency determined the allegations were unfounded (false or baseless). 13 The remaining 1,714 subjects investigated for sexual assault were presented to military commanders for consideration of disciplinary action. Of the 1,714 military subjects, commanders could not take action against 509 due to evidentiary problems. Eighty-one of the 1,714 military subjects received no disciplinary action because commanders determined the criminal allegations were unfounded (false or baseless). Commanders had sufficient evidence to take disciplinary action against 1,124 of the 1,714 military subjects. Of the 1,124 subjects, sexual assault charges were substantiated for 880 subjects for whom it was determined a sexual assault offense warranted discipline. For the remaining 244 subjects, evidence supported command action for other misconduct discovered during the sexual assault investigation (such as making a false official statement, adultery, underage drinking, or other crimes under the UCMJ), but not a sexual assault charge. Command actions for sexual assault charges and other misconduct charges included court-martial charge preferrals, nonjudicial punishment, administrative discharges, or other adverse administrative actions. Sixty-eight percent of subjects receiving disciplinary action for a sexual assault had court-martial charges preferred against them.

These statistics are from Volume 1, which most of the news outlets are referencing. The rest of the report describes institutional bromides to alleviate the problem. Volume 2 provides details on the research method :

To determine the extent of unwanted gender-related behaviors, members were provided a list of 12 sexual harassment behaviors and four sexist behaviors and were asked to indicate how often they had experienced the behaviors in the past 12 months. The 12 sexual harassment behaviors comprise three components of sexual harassment—crude/offensive behavior (e.g., repeatedly told sexual stories or jokes that are offensive); unwanted sexual attention (e.g., unwanted attempts to establish a romantic sexual relationship despite efforts to discourage it); and sexual coercion (e.g., treated badly for refusing to have sex). To be included in the calculation of the sexual harassment rate, members must have experienced at least one behavior defined as sexual harassment and indicated they considered some or all of the behaviors to be sexual harassment. Sexist behavior is defined as verbal and/or nonverbal behaviors that convey insulting, offensive, or condescending attitudes based on the gender of the respondent (Fitzgerald et al., 1988). Members who indicated they experienced unwanted gender related behaviors were then asked to provide details of the experience that had the greatest effect (i.e., where the situation occurred and who the offenders were). Trend comparisons on unwanted gender related behaviors are presented from surveys administered in 2002, 2006, 2010, and 2012.

Based on weighting of the response rate and comparing it to reported civilian phenomenon, the report extrapolates that 6.1% of female military personnel are assaulted each year, resulting in news reports of "26000″ assaults. Regarding the above disciplinary statistics, the study further concludes that only 10% of assaults are reported, presumably due to fears of retaliation. Taking this dubious claim at face value, 10 X 880 = 8800, not 26000, which in USA Today's calculator parlance, amounts to one military rape victim every 20 minutes.

While news outlets are reporting the "26000 military women sexually assaulted each year" as fact, the findings in this report are based on subjective opinions of survey takers using a broad definition of what constitutes sexual assault. That being said, anyone who has spent time in the military knows that female service members are sexually harassed in the extreme, and that black troops are the most egregious offenders. Racial statistics are not provided in the Pentagon's report, and for good reason, as the rate of black-on-white assaults and harassment would be revealed at nearly 100% of incidence. That is an ugly truth that feminist media outlets will not broach, preferring to spill their ink vilifying the majority of decent military men and their leadership with demands for reform to better accommodate the career aspirations of today's young women. Our military mission is steadily morphing from national defense to being an equal-opportunity jobs program that ignores brutal realities in favor of expanding female employment prospects.

Our President, who recently emasculated American men in his computer-generated Mother's Day proclamation that lauds women's long march against oppression and blithely puts our mothers on "the battlefield", was also quick to seize upon the Pentagon's report with directives for the Secretary of Defense to "go after" and cashier military sex assault defendants. The president and his staff should have probed the report a little deeper to seek workable solutions to the problem instead of grabbing another chance to pander to female voters. Other female-centric political leaders, in demanding an overhaul of the UCMJ specifically to address sex assault cases, care not that innocent men are going to be railroaded in upcoming attempts to prove that sexual harassment reduction initiatives are succeeding. A year from now you can bet on hearing about encouraging results towards making the military a safer place for our daughters and sons.

When an organization becomes feminized, focus shifts from efficient production of goods and services to establishment of rules for the comfort and security of women. Our military, which has been at the forefront in providing opportunity for men of all backgrounds to prove themselves based on their talents and efforts, is devolving into a politically correct Petri-dish for universal inclusion in the name of social justice. As this process continues the armed forces will weaken, and we will at some point find ourselves facing an enemy that does not entertain such noble delusions. When that time comes, a good number of our young men are going to die attempting to prop up the rotten edifice of feminist overreach.

90 Essays from a Black Knight: A Review of The Best of Roosh, Volume 1

Featured Guest · 15 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By The Theorist

Why Washington, D.C. produced three of the greatest theorists on "game" in the English-speaking world is something of a mystery. Certainly the US capital has more than its fair share of crime, corruption, and careerist women. Rocky soil may make for hardy plants. Then again, there are no game bloggers of note hailing from the Bakken oilfields. Though establishing a conclusive explanation may be impossible, it is, however, an undeniable fact that out of the primordial slime of the DC dating scene came three lions of the manosphere: Virgle Kent, Roissy, and Roosh Vorek.

Roissy is the heart of the manosphere. VK is one of its funniest storytellers. But Roosh Vorek is the man who wrote Bang, a book released six years ago that still occupies the upper rungs of its Amazon category, ahead of the Karma Sutra. Roosh is the guy who quit his job, ground his way through South America, barnstormed his way through Europe, and incited the hatred of right-"thinking" people on three continents. His plain, matte-black, self-published pickup tomes are lying around male dorm rooms across America. Like him or not, he is the public face of game 2.0.

From 2006-2013, Roosh wrote 1,793 blog posts, most of them around 500 words each. That's 900,000 words, or around eleven standard-length novels. He's distilled that down to a single collection: The Best of Roosh: Vol 1. It's a comprehensive look inside the head of Roosh, and by proxy, the minds of the first generation of men to come of age in the context of a mature manosphere.

The collection covers 10 topics: Pre-Game, Approaching, Game, Dating, Sex, Life, America, Culture, Travel, and the author himself. But this is not a book about game per se. It's a book about how and why one man developed his own code for navigating the mendacity and misandry of the male role in today's declining West.

There's a sense of rage and loss in Roosh's writing; a kind of social irredentism. Western Man built a civilization which provides more prosperity for more human beings than any method of social organization in the history of the world, but now that man is derided as "boring," "colorless," his achievements meaningless in an age where the highest ability a man can possess is the ability to entertain others. The most important commodity in the world, sexual access, is now governed solely by the societally-irrelevant capacity for clever wordplay. It's clear from the text that much of Roosh's disillusionment stems from this simple fact.

To read Roosh's essays can be depressing. The man is a realist. There is no masculinized version of "having it all." The men who can live in the public eye and receive society's respect while exercising their sexuality are limited to a tiny proportion of apex alpha males: sports stars, actors, comedians, artists. Roosh does not pretend to offer that. To even have a coin-flip chance of achieving the bourgeois respectability that was the birthright of our grandfathers involves sacrifice beyond what my generation is willing to bear. Roosh understands this, and regrets it in equal measure. "You did this to me," he writes. "You are a corrupted and damaged female, and have tried your damnedest to bring me down to your level."

While I can't quibble with Roosh's philosophy, his prose style could use some work. These are blog posts, and though classics like "You Did This To Me," "Everything I Know About Women," "What It Feels Like to Be a Hot Girl," and "I'm Ready to Man Up," are undeniably worth reading, the blog style wears on you after a while. There isn't much in the way of humor, either, but that's okay — I didn't read it for comedy purposes, or snazzy prose. I read the collection because I wanted to partake in the wisdom of one very cold player indeed.

Ultimately, Roosh, like everyone in the manosphere, is concerned with finding the right path for his own masculine reaction. In another era, Roosh's enormous productive energy would have been marshaled in the service of something a little more important than getting girls, but alas, our age is our age, and the behavior of women and their minions shows no sign of changing. Perhaps the finest essay in the collection, “What is Your Project,” gets at the heart of the fundamental question of manhood. A French-Venezuelan rancher in the Andes Mountains asks Roosh what his project is. Roosh says, “To write a book.” Eighteen months later, he dropped Bang. If the old mission of marriage-family-children is dead, dead, dead, it doesn’t mean there is nothing else for us. Roosh, for all his (justified) anger and his nihilism, is living proof of that.

Confusion Over Kermit

keyster · 15 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

by Keyster

I realize most of the Manosphere is loath to discuss abortion because they're either pro-choice or it's a complicated moral issue, a "rat hole" they'd prefer to avoid, etc. This is regardless of Feminist Inc. putting at least 90% of their unlimited resources behind the "Women's Reproductive Health Movement" (ie – abortion rights and govt funding). But I'm gonna go there anyway because the Kermit Gosnell case raises some conundrums and paradoxes that have me hopelessly flummoxed.

When a woman has an abortion the baby, fetus, zygote, fleshy parasitic mass – whatever you want to call it depending on your view of abortion – is unceremoniously sucked from the uterine wall and disposed of. This supposedly kills the "mass" as it's support system for life is taken away, although it's not clear how long it continues to live afterward, let's assume it pretty much dies instantly…at least that's what we're told.

This takes us to the uncomfortable realm of the late term abortion provider such as Gosnell, where the fetus starts to resemble a human and can quite possibly live outside the womb as early as six months with premature neo-natal care. The late term abortion provider (meant for women who could never get around to aborting at 6 to 8 weeks of pregnancy), must then kill the human formed fetus or "baby" in utero to remain within the legal bounds of our country's Supreme Court's rulings on abortion or state law. Once the human formed "fleshy mass" is confirmed dead (or a "confirmed kill" in military parlance), it's then within our legal bounds to abort or "still born" the baby.

Where Gosnell tripped up was that in at least several hundred late term abortions he performed the babies (typically black) were "delivered" alive, and he killed them by snipping their spines post facto. OH THE HORROR! This was probably easier and came with less risk to the "mother", hence his very competitive pricing schedule. But at least he was more concerned for the health of the woman (even though one died in his care), which is all that really matters to the pro-abortion crowd. And this guy was no "back ally abortionist from the 1950′s". It was an established "Women's and Family Health Care Center" on a busy Philadelphia street corner in business since 1979.

So as long as the fetus is not a baby (as deemed by the pregnant woman or "mother"), and remains inside her body, regardless of trimester and within state law, it can be legally killed. But the second that fetus magically becomes a baby and is birthed live and outside the her body, it becomes an official human able to "walk you to the bus stop" and if you kill it while it lies their breathing and squirming, an official murder in the first degree. Of course the "clients" of Dr. Gosnell aren't charged as accessories to murder either, even though they agreed to it and paid for it.

As Kermit Gosnell sits in a jail cell contemplating his actions, I wonder if he merely rationalized infanticide as another abortion "technique", just pushing the boundries a little. I wonder if a moral society contemplates the line between abortion and infanticide that the Gosnell case presents. To give life or to take life. Her body her choice.

Feminists in Power: IRS Agents Working for Planned Parenthood

W.F. Price · 16 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the emerging IRS tax scandal, it has come to light that the agency was not only apparently deliberately discriminating against conservatives during an election year, but inserting itself into issues such as abortion.

According to the Thomas More Society, A Catholic law firm that takes on charitable cases, a client that attempted to get nonprofit status faced demands from the IRS that the entire board sign a letter promising not to publicly protest Planned Parenthood:

> In one case, the IRS withheld approval of an application for tax exempt status for Coalition for Life of Iowa. In a phone call to Coalition for Life of Iowa leaders on June 6, 2009, the IRS agent "Ms. Richards" told the group to send a letter to the IRS with the entire board's signatures stating that, under perjury of the law, they do not picket/protest or organize groups to picket or protest outside of Planned Parenthood. Once the IRS received this letter, their application would be approved. After a series of letters following a request for more invasive information, Thomas More Society special counsel Sally Wagenmaker sent a letter to the IRS demanding the tax exempt status be issued immediately.
>
> Wagenmaker summarized her concerns about what she called "the IRS's disturbing ability" to stall and suppress legitimate applicants. She explained how through lengthy questionnaires and wrong citations of applicable law (as in the case of Coalition for Life of Iowa), applicants with less fortitude or without access to legal advocates like the Thomas More Society will be effectively silenced from exercising their constitutional freedoms. Wagenmaker added, "The IRS's role should only be to determine whether organizations fit the section 501(c)(3) test for 'charitable, religious, or educational' qualification, not to inquire about the content of prayers, protests, and petitions. It's high time that the IRS be called to account for its workers' potential to trample on our constitutional rights, through such ostensibly innocuous means…what the Ways and Means committee will discuss may only be the tip of the iceberg of IRS abuses."

Given the DOJ's recent moves against free speech in universities and the witch-hunt against the relatively obscure Jason Richwine, it appears that there's a real push afoot to criminalize politically incorrect expression in the United States.

Man unilaterally aborts child, charged with murder

W.F. Price · 16 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

John Andrew Weldon, a Florida man whose father is a doctor, has been charged with murder after allegedly tricking his pregnant girlfriend into aborting their child by giving her abortifacient drugs instead of antibiotics. The man forged his father's signature to obtain the drugs, then told his girlfriend that she had a bacterial infection and should take some amoxycillin. Instead of the antibiotic, he gave her misoprostol, which induces miscarriage. The drug did its work, killing the fetus.

> TAMPA, Fla. — The 28-year-old son of a Florida fertility doctor has been charged by federal authorities with tricking his girlfriend into taking a pill used to induce labor and cause an abortion, killing the fetus she was carrying.
>
> John Andrew Welden was indicted Tuesday by a federal grand jury on charges of product tampering and first-degree murder and faces up to life in prison if convicted of the murder charge. He's also the defendant in a lawsuit filed in state court by his ex-girlfriend, 26-year-old Remee Lee.
>
> "Whenever a woman is robbed of her ability to give birth and have a child, I don't think there's any greater harm you can cause somebody," said Lee's attorney, Gil Sanchez. "She's devastated. She still can't believe this happened to her."

You know, it's a pretty sleazy thing to do, but imagine if the tables were turned. Man doesn't want his child aborted, but girlfriend does it anyway. Who believes she'd be charged with murder? No, it would be her "right," because it's "her body." Using that logic, however, how could we come up with a murder charge agaist the boyfriend? If a woman can terminate a pregnancy at will and face no charges for the injury done to the child, then the most Mr. Weldon should reasonably face is a felony assault charge for drugging his girlfriend.

This is yet another case where the law clearly and explicitly demonstates that men and women are not equal under the law, and most people – including women – do not want them to be.

I'm not arguing for or against abortion here, but instead pointing out the hypocrisy inherent in law surrounding abortion. Commenters have pointed out that Kermit Gosnell was merely the "hit man" for the women who hired him to kill their children. Not a single one of his patients was charged with any crime for having him exterminate viable infants.

These kinds of cases demonstrate that in some areas, women clearly have superior rights. That might be tolerable if men had superior rights in other areas, but this is unacceptable to feminists. The advantage must always tilt toward the female, and there must be no balance. In the long term, this is unsustainable.

Does collapse of old media explain proliferation of scandals?

W.F. Price · 17 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

With the recent explosion of stories that have spun out of control for the Obama administration and generally left-leaning traditional media, it strikes me that the collapse of the old media paradigm is just beginning to be felt in a big way. The IRS scandal, Benghazi, and Kermit Gosnell's house of horrors are the kind of stories that, back before so many people were online, might have been effectively contained by a sympathetic media. The IRS scandal is big news, obviously, but I can remember other scandals that were just as bad, but somehow kept under control by the major media outlets. The Clinton campaign taking money from agents of the People's Republic of China during the '96 election, for example, struck me as one of the most brazenly crooked things imaginable, but it never went as far as it should have in the press. The entire affair was remarkably well-managed.

1996 happened to be the last year before the Internet really took off as a popular medium, so there was no good alternative to the newspapers and TV networks. And even after people began to go online en masse, it took years for online journalism to gain any credibility. The Drudge Report was an early success story, but there weren't many others at the time. As I remember, the Internet was more associated with pornography than with news for at least a few years after it became popular. I think Bill Clinton was lucky for that — there was enough odd stuff going on in his administration that there's no telling what might have come up in today's environment.

Blogging, for its part, didn't really come into its own until around 2005, and maybe even a bit later. As it matured, and online classified ads took a bite out of newspapers' profits, the big papers started to founder. In the last fifteen years their decline has been remarkable, and although many are moaning about the end of traditional journalism, I don't see it as a big loss. If the journalism of the end of the 20th century is characteristic of traditional journalism, then good riddance! It was about as biased as it gets, and unfortunately much of the refuse from that time has managed to hang on in one way or another. But today these people are no longer dominant. The fact that so many truly diverse blogs and sites with different perspectives from theirs have emerged shows them to be the partisan shills that they are.

I'm not sure we can come to any firm conclusions quite yet – it will be easier to see what's going on now in hindsight – but there's something noticeably different in the air. It just seems that they can't contain stories and control discourse like they used to.

For example, Kermit Gosnell had been operating his charnel house for decades, and I'm sure a lot of people knew about it, but if he'd been busted in, say, 1988, we probably wouldn't have heard much about him. He might not even have been charged with murder, because the photos wouldn't have been disseminated. It turns out there's another guy in Texas who has allegedly been doing the same thing for a long time, and now it looks like he's going down, too.

Why is he being investigated? Because somebody put the evidence online, and you can't ignore that kind of stuff (you can find a link to it in the article linked above — I'm too squeamish to post it or even look at it myself).

Even Benghazi might have been successfully "managed," but there are pictures of Ambassador Stevens' corpse online, and evidence of a coverup has leaked all over the place. The IRS story, for its part, has legs online because there's no effective filtering of the documents coming out, and many of those involved are telling their side of it to any blogger who will listen.

As the big city papers slowly fade away and network television news ceases to have an authoritative voice (both literally and figuratively), all these crazy things are coming to light. It isn't that they weren't there before, but that journalists just didn't talk about them. Editors would pick and choose, and editors were, for the most part, in agreement with other editors about what's fit to print. That's all out the window now, and it's finally starting to make a palpable difference. It's about time.

On the Urgent Necessity of Criticizing Women

BC Dad · 19 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A story which had no apparent impact on the collective psyches of gender combatants is that of American Sami Shaffer, who authored a run-of-the-mill advisory on having an abortion in China, based on her personal experience.

Ms. Shaffer's concerns in the matter are noteworthy and include:

- buy a pregnancy test without risking seeing someone we knew;
- I had forgotten to shave my legs that day so that was embarrassing;
- I make it onto the table first so the doctor inspects me first;
- I was feeling really embarrassed and awkward;
- I'd even go as far as to say it (the abortion) was nice.

The primary focus of Ms. Shaffer's concerns are self-evident: her thoughts are entirely absent of ethical debate or insight and highlight the female-serving nature of society's increasingly irrational response to this issue.

Abortion-as-murder has made the headlines on a couple of notable occasions of late, in the instances of Dr. Kermit Gosnell, who received three life sentences for killing late-term fetuses after they survived abortion, and of a Florida man charged with murder for tricking his girlfriend into taking an abortion drug.

The newest spectacle in this gong show comes from Canada, where the Supreme Court has just upheld the acquittal of a woman who left her newborn for dead in a Wal-Mart toilet.

The conclusions to be drawn are disturbing, to put it mildly. At best, it appears that the definition of an aborted fetus as a human being depends largely on which gender is doing the killing. Accountability for women, who are the instigators, contractors and accomplices of abortion, is non-existent, while men are ruthlessly punished and demonized for essentially the same act.

It is apparent also that concern for the fetus/baby is not at issue, or such a hypocritical and cognitively-dissonant perspective would never be tolerated.

> This is public madness on a civilization-wide scale, and it is built on a willingness to ignore the incongruities and abuses of female behavior.

It is my increasingly firm conviction that feminism, while aggressively exploiting the blind eye turned toward female behavior, is not the source of that convention, but rather, that the pedestalization of women is endemic to all societies in some form, regardless of the technical status and rights obtained by the females within those societies.

Accurate, pointed and realistic public criticism of female behavior is thus long overdue; co-operation with the pussy pass, cultural Marxism and the politically correct goal of equal outcomes renders the female of our species free to continue and escalate her destructive, irrational and abusive behavior without hindrance. The consequences of this are highly detrimental to men, as the past 50 years of history show, but also to society at large and to women themselves.

Rather than obligating women to raise their intellectual, ethical and behavioral standards, society has chosen instead to embrace, with all the religious fervor of an Inquisition, a false image of reality – shiny happy victims holding hands with government – which in the long term can benefit no one. This allegiance to the false idols of feminism has led directly, since the 1970's in particular, to the loss of basic human rights and freedoms, a loss which is now deeply ensconced within every Western nation's political and legal foundations, a loss which impacts men most profoundly.

Looking past the obvious evolutionary value of the pussy pass, there is little purpose in cooperating with and maintaining the fraud, and to do so will lead inexorably, in this era of virtually omnipotent governance and bureaucracy (the 'new patriarchy,' created, just like the old one, for women at their own behest), to the ever-escalating abuse of men and children, up to and including the potential for societal collapse.

This path will undoubtedly see the regression of society into a quasi-Victorian state, one in which the bulk of men are so heavily constrained and alienated that they lose all desire to participate in the social venture. Signs of such a zeitgeist can be seen in many countries already.

As well, if the escalation of destructive female behavior continues, blowback from young men in particular will be increasingly prevalent, whereby outright disdain for females becomes both a descriptor of and a motivator for the new generation of men: there are numerous blogs out there which speak clearly to this possibility, as many people are aware. The obvious contempt towards women displayed by certain commentators would seem to be well-earned, and it does not bode well for females.

Humanity will undoubtedly survive, though with much unnecessary suffering, but it is incumbent upon rational men (and women) to speak truth, to expose the great gender lie. In addition to refusing compliance with a false reality, this most definitely includes pointing the accusatory fingers of reason and culpability directly at women, a task which can no longer be shirked.

Israel's progression to American-style family law regime remarkably rapid

W.F. Price · 20 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As some readers may have noticed, I've been keeping an eye on Israel lately, because it recently came to my attention that the same revolutionary changes to marriage and family law that occurred in the US starting nearly a half-century ago are happening there right now. This is providing a first-hand view of how a few changes to the law can cause a cascading domino effect that plunges society into a hypergamous free-for-all in a very short timeframe.

I can't say I'm an expert on Israel or Israeli culture, but I am aware that it is a more conservative society than the urban parts of the US in which most American Jews live; in other words, Israel is not just a distant burough of New York City.

However, due to its small size and very close relationship with the Jewish American community, which is arguably a more powerful entity than Israel itself, Israel is more vulnerable to the whims and trends of American society in general than, say, Ireland or Italy. This is why it looks like Israeli men are in for some rough times.

European countries are no picnic for men, but in many regards they are much, much better than the US (I'll let the British commenters here decide whether they belong in Europe or not in this regard). Child support is not punitive, alimony is very rare, and men are more likely to share physical custody of children. Smearing a husband in court results in little in the way of payoffs — people are, for the most part, expected to work a divorce or separation out without resorting to expensive litigation.

But Israel, as far as I can tell is moving swiftly toward an American-style family law regime by replacing rabbinic courts with civil courts in which all the wonderful features of American law are apparently included. I have no doubt that plenty of enterprising attorneys will be all too happy to lighten their clients' or their spouses' wallets in vicious, protracted custody battles.

According to Avri Gilad, a popular Israeli TV host, there has been an explosion of false accusations as of late, probably after the new law allowing women to testify against their husbands in court before divorce went into effect in 2008:

> Every day I get e-mails from fathers whose natural right to see their children is denied them by social workers, courts, the police, and what not," Gilad wrote on his popular Facebook page, which is followed by more than 20,000 people. "They cry out and no one listens – sometimes they are even mocked.
>
> The feminist revolution, which I support wholeheartedly, is felling victims among my brothers, the divorced fathers. In the name of [fighting] thousands of years of discrimination, in the name of an injustice that was done in the past and is done in the present to millions of women in the world, by rapacious men who shame the male sex, the legal systems believe that it is okay to mow down good people, devoted fathers who divorced because they chose to, or because others chose so for them.
>
> I regret to say that there is a fad of submitting false accusations to the police regarding violence, the fear of violence, sexual abuse and other kinds of lies against good, loving and devoted fathers, whose only sin is that they did not get along with the woman with whom they thought they would live forever.
>
> The police report that there is a huge number of strategic false complaints against men, which automatically set in motion a process of distancing the man from his children, transferring his limited meetings with them to contact centers – dingy rooms in the welfare offices – under the watchful eyes of female welfare workers (very busy, underpaid, who get a raw deal themselves) who are usually hostile, and in extreme cases, a complete severing of the connection between the man and his children."
>
> [Gilad notes that a governmental committee – the Schnitt Committee – has recommended joint parenthood as the default arrangement for divorce in Israel, but its recommendations are not being implemented.]

> Almost no lawmaker is dealing with the matter. In private conversations, they admit that they fear the power of the militant women's organizations. I am not afraid and I say with a clear voice: One evil is not corrected by committing another! Children are not raised by separating them from their fathers…

Sound familiar? This is a script that's been playing out in the US since the 1970s, first dramatized by Dustin Hoffman and Meryl Streep in Kramer vs. Kramer way back in 1979.

Sadly, it looks as though Israel's men have some catching up to do. Avri Gilad declares his support for feminism – a mistake that it took American men decades to correct – perhaps because he is not aware that the evils he addresses above are exactly what feminism is all about. Gloria Steinem herself indicates that absolute power over procreation (she calls it "reproductive freedom"), which includes parenting, is the cornerstone of the feminist temple. What Gilad and others have to keep in mind is that when feminists say "equal," they don't mean fair, as too many naive men assume. Feminist equal is an arbitrarily set value, prone to subjective interpretation and never to be defined by men (because that would not be equal).

But maybe there's hope for Israelis. Unlike Americans, they are not the first to go through this nightmare, so they'll have plenty of reference material from the get go. Some of the stories coming out of the states might give them some motivation, too. Maybe they are starting see the threat to father's rights, but that isn't all that's at stake: do Israelis relish the idea of home-grown versions of monsters like Kermit Gosnell to implement the "reproductive freedom" envisioned by the likes of Gloria Steinem? How about an integrated army in which coddling and providing for female "soldiers" takes priority over battlefield effectiveness?

For Israelis, the most important question should be:

Can Israel afford feminism?

Personally, I doubt it. The US can't really afford it, but this is a massive nation. Feminism is already a chronic problem here, but we can sustain a lot of damage before it becomes an existential threat. Israel, on the other hand, is a lot more vulnerable in that regard.

The Janet Reno Rap

W.F. Price · 20 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

While doing a bit of research for an article, I came across this amazing historical artifact from the 1980s, and thought I had to share it. It's an early example of girl rap, and brings us right back to the heady days of feminism rising.

I'll let the girls of "Anquette" lay it down for you:

Something else, isn't it?

A circle of victimhood in Florida statutory case

W.F. Price · 21 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The following story and the comments I've seen on it under various articles expose an alternate universe — one in which many women are blaming the alleged victim of sexual assault, the villains are the parents of the victim for demanding charges be pressed, and the older sex partner of an underage teen is being called a victim of discrimination. There are multiple victims, multiple perpetrators, and there's a perpetrator-victim as well as a victim-perpetrator.

Now here's the real kicker: the defendant is a cheerleader, and the alleged victim is on the varsity basketball team. How could this all be possible? Well, they're both female…

> Kaitlyn Ashley Hunt was arrested February 16 by the Indian River County Sheriff's Office on two counts of lewd or lascivious battery on child.
>
> Her mother, Kelley Hunt Smith, explained on Facebook that Kaitlyn began a "mutual consenting" relationship with a girl at Sebastian River High School who was about three years younger. The parents of the younger girl were upset by the situation and contacted police, she wrote.
>
> "They were out to destroy my daughter, they feel like my daughter 'made' their daughter gay," Kaitlyn mother's said. "They are bigoted, religious zeolites [sic] that see being gay as a sin and wrong, and they blame my daughter."
>
> The parents of the younger girl also pressured the Indian River County School Board into expelling Kaitlyn, she added. The teen is now attending an alternative school.
>
> "Those parents have forced the State Attorneys office to go thru [sic] with felony charges and are trying to ruin my daughters life," Kaitlyn mother's continued. "This is insane. This should have never been a legal matter, it is a family matter. They are trying to send an innocent young girl to prison because they are full of hate and bigotry. These girls are teenagers in high school, who had ONE mutual consenting sexual experience. My daughter isn't a criminal, she isn't a predator."
>
> Kaitlyn has until Friday to accept or reject a plea deal of two years house arrest and one year probation, according to her mother.

Modern sex law isn't really equipped to handle these kinds of cases, so I suspect the court will eventually implement some version of the well-established "mentula rea" (guilty penis) test and try to ascertain who did what to whom or, to put it a little more bluntly, who stuck what where, which is never easy if neither man nor (male) beast was involved. I would assume that if the varsity basketball player female indeed strapped on a dildo and penetrated the cheerleader, the cheerleader will likely be acquitted. If the cheerleader was the penetrator and thereby took on the masculine role, she'll probably do some time in prison unless she cops a plea. Although I'm not a lawyer, I'd advise her lawyer to urge her to accept a plea if the latter was the case.

I have to admit I'm a bit conflicted about this case. On one hand, it's very difficult for me to feel pity for a lesbian who gets busted for sex with an underage girl, because I know a lesbian prosecutor would have no mercy whatsoever on a very young man in a similar situation. Take Janet Reno for example. When the bulldyke butcher of Waco was climbing the career ladder she not only used alleged statutory rape as a justification for burning scores of Christians to death, but prior to that great achievement effectively destroyed the life of a 14-year-old Dutch boy accused of satanic sex abuse in the witch hunts of the late 80s. After two years in prison, the boy was tried and acquitted, and Reno was then hired as attorney general of the USA, where she went on to distinguish the office by killing more Americans, including a couple dozen children, in a single police action than any predecessor had before.

Naturally, the temptation might be to keep one's mouth shut and smirk in schadenfreude. But, as a man, something about that approach strikes me as ugly and unbecoming. There is such a thing as objective right and wrong, and in this case felony prosecution may well be an injustice. It appears the contact was consensual, the age gap small, and the potential for physical and emotional harm relatively minor. The punishment should fit the crime, and this wasn't a case of sodomizing boys or anything that hazardous and cruel. However, the same goes straight sexual activity; no consensual sex between adolescents, so long as it is not aberrant and cruel, should be prosecuted as a felony.

As for the accusations that the victim's parents are Christian bigots only persecuting the girl for having consensual lesbian sex, why is it that so many feminists are eager to go after young straight males when they have sex with girls a few years younger than them? Is that any less bigotry? Christians are known to do the same from time to time, so how can this be said to be selective prosecution? It isn't. Lesbian sex is probably the least prosecuted of all, so it's ridiculous to maintain that Christian bigots are persecuting lesbians.

Finally, this case brings up questions about the wisdom of propogandizing homosexuality to children, which has come to be regarded as acceptable to those who make decisions at the top. There are some gray areas with youth sexuality, and adolescents may be somewhat confused, so pushing the notion that anything goes is bound to cause problems both within families and between individuals. While I have no doubt that some people are born homosexual, we can't necessarily assume that everyone below the age of majority is sure about it. That being the case, it's no more appropriate to instruct them in gay sex techniques than it is to decide their career at that age. The consequences are simply too dangerous, and the risk of abuse too high. I'm afraid that it will result in something like the prison culture in some schools, where younger and smaller boys are preyed upon and sodomized to enforce a certain pecking order, whether they are gay or not. This could lead to very angry fathers and significant acts of violence down the road.

The Great Gatsby — An American in Babylon

W.F. Price · 28 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I was pleasantly surprised by Baz Luhrmann's rendition of The Great Gatsby, which was truer to the original novel than I had expected. Bringing Fitzgerald's imagery to life on the big screen can't be an easy task, and it is a necessarily subjective one, so it required a certain boldness. This has earned Luhrmann some critical disdain, but in reading all the snarky reviews I just have to ask: "do you think you could have done better?"

The Great Gatsby is among the greatest American works of literature, and Fitzgerald's prose may be the best yet written in our nation. It is, at its core, an existentialist novel, much like Moby Dick. In a sense, it is the companion to Herman Melville's great sea epic; where Captain Ahab's monomania and undoing were born of fanatical hatred and vengeance, Jay Gatsby's obsession and doom were triggered by an all-consuming love and hope. Both books are ultimately about the futility of men's passions, and the tragic failure that awaits us all.

However, if that were all there was to it, not many people would bother to read the book. Fitzgerald offers a portrait of America in one of its most opulent periods, bringing the boom times of the 1920s to life with a series of languid, colorful passages on the people and scenes of New York City. Underneath these images runs a dark current of sin and malice driven by avarice and constant striving for more, better and higher that characterized the New York of the time (and of much more recent times). If anything, Luhrmann sacrificed some of this darkness and underplayed the theme of modest, humble middle America vs. proud, decadent New York. But it's still discernable, however faintly it may be understood by the millions of contemporary youngsters and foreigners whose first introduction to Fitzgerald will be through this production.

Where the movie fails in adequately portraying the dark side of Fitzgerald's Jazz Age, it shines in its scenes of wealth and excess. Luhrmann's use of contemporary music such as hip-hop was a good choice, as it will give younger viewers a more accurate sense of how their counterparts in the 1920s experienced the parties, music and celebrations in their own time. I grew up associating jazz with ancient men and women who barely survived into my living memory, and I can only assume that today's adolescents would find it as quaint as I would the ragtime of the Gilded Age. The Long Island mansions used as sets were gorgeous – indecently so – and offered a glimpse into a world that few people ever experience, then or now. It is in putting these sumptuous settings to artistic use that Luhrmann excels, which suggests that there may be something of the character of Gatsby in the director himself. And that is exactly where the film was done right, and how it should have been done right because, after all, Jay Gatsby is the main character.

Leonardo DiCaprio plays Gatsby brilliantly. I thought to myself on leaving the theater that he wasn't exactly what I had in mind when I read the book, but then immediately I realized that no actor I can think of could have done better in the role. He was the best man for the job, and frankly I'm relieved that he, rather than a lesser actor, will define the character for a generation.

Tobey Maguire is decent as Nick Carraway, the humble narrator who ties the story together as Gatsby's neighbor and Daisy Buchanan's cousin. Luhrmann made the biggest modification to the original story by casting Nick as an amalgamation of the alcoholic Fitzgerald and his insane wife Zelda in the opening and closing scenes. This innovation, although it may seem a bit odd to those who have read the book, appears to be a tribute to the writer. It doesn't really ring true, but it's a nice thought. Tom Buchanan, the arrogant Anglo aristocrat, is played by Joel Edgerton, who becomes more convincing in the role as the film progresses.

As husband to Gatsby's love interest Daisy, Tom Buchanan figures into one of the touchier (and therefore more interesting) aspects of the film. Because The Great Gatsby was written almost a hundred years ago, it wasn't exactly politically correct by contemporary standards. In a few passages, Fitzgerald displays some distaste for blacks and Jews, which is particularly evident in the character Meyer Wolfsheim, a corrupt Jewish gangster who is Gatsby's business partner. The film doesn't censor this, as I had expected it would, but balances it with Tom Buchanan's bigotry. Tom, who is something of an ass, expounds upon the white supremacist theories of the day — odious to contemporary polite society. What I found amusing about this portrayal of Tom is that people like him exist to this day, and haven't fundamentally changed at all, but they now have an entirely new set of prejudices. Those ideas were fashionable at the time, whereas today they are anathema amongst elites, and here we are laughing at the buffoon for his simple-minded bigotry. In another hundred years' time, I'm sure there will be audiences laughing at the inane bigotry of contemporary self-righteous types for the stupid opinions they hold dear today. All in all, I have to give credit to Luhrmann for tactfully dealing with the text about as honestly as one can these days, which is to say that he only misled the audience a little bit.

For those men who haven't already, I'd recommend reading the book before seeing the movie. However, the film is well worth it. DiCaprio's performance was superb — he brought Gatsby to life on film as never before. Women, for their part, will find the movie fascinating – probably more so than the book – so feel free to take your date or significant other along. In this age of cultural mediocrity, dominated by vapid half-men and snarky gossip girls, such a sincere effort to honor one of America's greatest works of art is both refreshing and reassuring, and offers a much-needed boost to morale. As a replacement for the book the movie would be woefully inadequate, but as a director's and actor's interpretation it is a thoroughly enjoyable rendition.

Openly Rejecting the Concept of "Gender Equality"

W.F. Price · 29 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes we all need to take a little break to get some perspective on the world. Over the last week, I've had some time for reflection, and one of the things that occurred to me is how utterly inane some of these issues I've been struggling against look when I remove myself from them.

I don't mean to say that they aren't real problems, or that they should be ignored, but rather that so much of feminism and the "gender" debate is patently wrong on the face of it that, when you step aside for a moment, it looks like some sort of mass psychosis.

For example, the idea of "equality" between men and women, which people somehow manage to discuss with a straight face, is something one can disprove simply by leaving one's house, walking around in public and observing the physical world. But still – and this is the really crazy part – people are not supposed to speak of it.

Now, there are "useful" taboos. For example, there are racial disparities that people avoid discussing to keep the peace. Urban whites, usually self-described liberals, assiduously avoid openly discussing the issue of black crime, and not necessarily because they think they are doing blacks a favor. I suspect the main reason for this taboo is that so many black men are harassed, arrested and incarcerated in dubious, unconstitutional procedures (with tacit "progressive" approval) that liberals would be hard pressed to defend it with their own ideological tools, so in order to conceal their hypocrisy they pretend that it isn't a problem. In this case, what might look to an outsider like consideration for others is actually a way to keep the lid on a very obvious racial disparity in law enforcement — one that anyone with eyes can see.

But I wonder, is there anything useful about continuing to lie about equality of the sexes? Unless you're running for office, I can't see it. Perhaps those in corporate jobs who must maintain the public "face" of the company would be well-served by lying, but for worker drones keeping one's mouth shut while on the job (usually a good idea no matter what the issue at hand) should suffice. Otherwise, outside of work, I can't think of a single benefit of following the taboos regarding gender — not even in colleges, where they are most vigorously guarded.

The difference between interracial and interreligious taboos and gender taboos is that, for the most part, racial and religious groups self-segregate, whereas the sexes do just the opposite. Segregation of the sexes, although important and useful in a number of areas (e.g. the military, sports, labor, etc.), always takes some effort because men and women have an affinity for each other. This isn't typically the case with different ethnic/cultural groups. In fact, sexual attraction is one of the few forces that regularly overrides the tendency of human groups to segregate themselves from others.

So we can't speak of men and women as discrete groups in the same way we do when referring to different ethnic or cultural groups of people because, aside from sexual minorities, they are not separate from each other, but rather in constant intimate contact. Is there such a thing as a "women's neighborhood," or a "men's town?" Women and men exist as separate groups only in an abstract, statistical sense, e.g. voters, consumers, welfare recipients, etc. These statistical groupings are very useful for certain purposes, such as selling shampoo or tailoring political ads, but for the individual they are all but useless.

The problem we have today is that individuals are behaving – or being told to behave – as though distinct male and female groups are concrete, real entities. We are being manipulated to think and behave as though the abstract, arbitrarily defined divisions between men and women represent real, physical phenomena. The concept of "gender equality" rests entirely on the false premise that there is a division between the sexes, which provides almost all of the quantitave measures by which gender equality is determined.

Because social divisions between men and women are imaginary, even institutions that appear to benefit women at the expense of men do nothing of the sort. Yes, it looks as though women are winning out in punitive family law proceedings, but before you can see the details here you have to first take a broader perspective. Every man ruined in family law is one less man for another woman, just as every woman pumped and dumped by an alpha cad is one less good wife for another man. The woman who divorces her husband for another man and bankrupts him in the process has just monopolized the resources of two men, leaving one woman high and dry. If she leaves the man and gets state assistance, she is drawing from the resources of many men at the expense of many women. If you take the broad view here, it is a zero sum game for both men and women, with a professional guild and political interest faction – family law practitioners and feminists – being the sole groups that see a net benefit.

From the above, it is apparent that there is neither an individual nor social benefit to maintaining the illusion of a gender war, but rather a price to be paid to parasitic factions that have employed a divide and conquer approach to better feed off the social host. Feminism, therefore, must be viewed as a parasitic cult, seeking to grow fat while weakening its host and offering only negative sum rewards to a minority.

To combat this, men and women alike should reject outright the concept of gender equality as a false and divisive lie; one from which neither men nor women can benefit, as any given society – like any given family – functions best as an organic whole, not cleft into two warring parties.

Thanks for the Health Tips

W.F. Price · 29 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Although I deliberately avoided the computer as much as I could for a few days, I snuck a look at some of the comments under my “getting in shape” post, and I learned a few things. Chipper’s comment about the Atkins flu, which I hadn’t heard of, explained my fatigue. That ended up lasting three or four days and then clearing up. I had immediately and drastically reduced carbs without being prepared for the consequences, and it took a toll.

I liked the suggestion that I should get a dog — my 8-year-old son would definitely second that idea! Unfortunately, I don’t think I can do that at present, as I live in the city (I hope to get out someday).

Another good suggestion was to switch to wine from beer. For now I’m going to lay off all alcohol for a while to accelerate weight loss and maintain discipline, but when I’ve lost enough and relax it might be a good idea to avoid beer — at least most of the time. The problem is that I really, really love beer. So much that I find myself wishing I could live in the low countries at times. That Dutch lager and Belgian ale is like nectar of the gods. Alas, it was probably the beer that caused the hypertension — after I eliminated it my blood pressure dropped dramatically within a week. Drinking wine, which I don’t relish nearly as much as beer, would probably prevent me from overdoing it.

I started feeling significantly more energetic by the end of the Memorial Day weekend, and am currently settling into the new routine. It’s pretty amazing how rapidly one feels the positive effects of a few changes. In addition to the lower BP, my entire digestive tract feels much more easygoing and friendly and my pants are already a little looser around my waist.

One nice thought I’ve had is that although life’s “little pleasures” can lead to unhealthy habits, self-improvement is pleasurable as well, so one can find a happy equilibrium there with a bit of attention.

Atlantic: What Gays can teach Straights about Marriage

W.F. Price · 30 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Atlantic magazine (along with much of the rest of the American old media) continues its descent into self-parody in Liza Mundy's new piece on marriage. According to Mundy, when it comes to marital relations, straight couples just aren't going about it the right way. So, in order to fix marriage, they should pay close attention to gay couples because, after all, who could be better qualified to serve as an example?

Of course, she doesn't mention that gay men overwhelmingly choose not to marry (for perfectly sound reasons, I might add), but that's just a minor detail…

The title and subhead look to have been chosen for novelty value:

> The Gay Guide to Wedded Bliss
>
> Research finds that same-sex unions are happier than heterosexual marriages. What can gay and lesbian couples teach straight ones about living in harmony?

From such a provocative title, you might think there'd be something revolutionary and interesting in the content, so let's take a look at a few of the spectacular revelations Mundy presents.

- Women are more likely to initiate divorce

  That's right: even when they're gay, women initiate divorce a lot more than men.

  > A growing body of social science has begun to compare straight and same-sex couples in an attempt to get at the question of what is female, what is male. Some of the findings are surprising. For instance: we know that heterosexual wives are more likely than husbands to initiate divorce. Social scientists have struggled to explain the discrepancy, variously attributing it to the sexual revolution; to women's financial independence; to men's failure to keep modern wives happy. Intriguingly, in Norway and Sweden, where registered partnerships for same-sex couples have been in place for about two decades (full-fledged marriage was introduced several years ago), research has found that lesbians are twice as likely as gay men to split up. If women become dissatisfied even when married to other women, maybe the problem with marriage isn't men. Maybe women are too particular. Maybe even women don't know what women want.

2. Gay couples are more egalitarian — when they aren't

   Gays tend to share duties evenly, but actually they don't.

   > Even as they are more egalitarian in their parenting styles, same-sex parents resemble their heterosexual counterparts in one somewhat old-fashioned way: a surprising number establish a division of labor whereby one spouse becomes the primary earner and the other stays home. Lee Badgett, an economist at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, told me that, "in terms of economics," same-sex couples with children resemble heterosexual couples with children much more than they resemble childless same-sex couples. You might say that gay parents are simultaneously departing from traditional family structures and leading the way back toward them.

   However, for gays, determining who takes on what role requires more effort:

   > "You start throwing out questions for men and women: 'Who's going to take care of the money?' And the guy says, 'That's me.' And you ask: 'Who's responsible for birth control?' And the guy says, 'That's her > department.’ ” By contrast, he reports, same-sex couples “have thought really hard about how they’re going to share the property, the responsibilities, the obligations in a mutual way. They’ve had to devote much more thought to that than straight couples, because the straight couples pretty much still fall back on old modes.”

Perhaps it would do straight couples good to sit down and have a long talk about who’s going to nurse the baby and who will do home and auto repair. I’m sure that would result in a more efficient, harmonious household…

3. Men not entirely happy with monogamy

In a stunning new finding, it turns out that men – including gay ones – like sexual variety.

> When, in the 1970s and early 1980s, Pepper Schwartz asked couples about their sex lives, she arrived at perhaps her most explosive finding: non-monogamy was rampant among gay men, a whopping 82 percent of whom reported having had sex outside their relationship. Slightly more than one-third of gay-male couples felt that monogamy was important; the other two-thirds said that monogamy was unimportant or that they were neutral on the topic.

STOP THE PRESSES!!! “EXPLOSIVE” NEWS: UNRESTRAINED MEN FOOL AROUND

What are the implications of this shocking discovery? Some (gay males) recommend tolerance for infidelity:

> …some gay-rights advocates, like the writer and sex columnist Dan Savage, argue very publicly that insisting on monogamy can do a couple more harm than good. Savage, who questions whether most humans are cut out for decades of sex with only one person, told me that “monogamy in marriage has been a disaster for straight couples” because it has set unrealistic expectations. “Gay-male couples are much more likely to be realistic about what men are…”

Oddly, no heterosexual female opinion on this matter has been included in the article. It remains to be seen whether wives would endorse Mr. Savage’s idea, which appears to suggest that women ought to cut men a little slack when it comes to infidelity.

So, according to Liza Mundy, what we can learn from gay marriage is that women are emotionally capricious, men crave sexual novelty, and division of labor is important in marriage.

What would we ever do without The Atlantic?

Charles Ramsey Proves that it Doesn't Pay to be a "White Knight"

Obsidian · 30 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the big lessons, so we're told, to come out of the events in Stuebenville, OH, where young girls were allegedly sexually assaulted by members of the local high school's locally prestigious football team, was the failure of Men to get involved. Feminist activists throughout the nation implored people – Men especially – to step up and be counted, to intervene if and when such circumstances happen again to an unfortunate young lady.

Around the same time, highly regarded British actor Patrick Stewart – best known for his roles as Capt. Jean-Luc Picard and Prof. Charles Xavier – exhorted Men to join him in stopping domestic violence.

And here locally, in my hometown of Philly, Feminist activists have been stepping up their efforts to heighten awareness around the purported scourge of our age – "street harassment" – by specifically appealing to Men to once again, intervene in ways big and small, in an effort to curtail the boorish actions on the part of their putative brothers out on the streets.

None of these efforts are particularly new — Feminists of varying stripe have been at turns appealing or cajoling, shaming, demanding and guilt-tripping Men into doing the grunt work of making social change in our society a reality for at least four solid decades now. But what does seem to be different is that these "appeals" seem to be occurring with increasing frequency and urgency, and by all accounts, fewer Men are heeding the call. Make of that what you will – the result of living in a more atomized age, or the predictions coming to pass by many within what is known as the Manosphere, who have long argued that as our society becomes more Feminized on the one side, and more punitive of everyday actions of everyday Men on the other, more and more Men will simply "go their own way". And to be sure, for the mainstream voices in the media, of which the Femisphere now plays an inextricable part, such predictions and analyses have been mocked and dismissed as the blatherings of a bunch of Male Losers in Life who can't or won't adapt to our more supposedly enlightened world.

And then came Charles Ramsey.

By now, you know the name well: Mr. Ramsey is the unkempt, middle aged African-American Man who literally set Ms. Amanda Berry free after a decade of allegedly being held against her will by Ariel Castro on May 6th of this year. By all accounts, the Feminists – and Patrick Stewart – should be proud of the actions of Mr. Ramsey, right?

Not quite. Within mere days of Mr. Ramsey's truly heroic actions, he was being pilloried and dragged through the mud by the very same media that routinely writes off the Manosphere, many of whom consider themselves staunch Feminists, or at the very least, Feminist-friendly. Ramsey's own criminal past was brought to light, along with other personal and, quite frankly, wholly irrelevant details about his life, that only served to make a mockery not just out of him, but of the entire notion of "Men doing the right thing". By the time a week had passed since the Ariel Castro case had broken open (due to Mr. Ramsey's actions) what remained of his good name lay in tatters, torn limb from limb by the Mindless Digital Mob – the same mob that has demolished innocent Men before – and by those who side themselves with the very same mainstream media outlets who led the charge in taking potshots at Ramsey.

Given all that he's been through, one simply must ask: What's In It For ME, as a Man, to "do the right thing"? What's the incentive? What's the payoff?

You may think posing such questions is beyond the pale, or at the very least selfish. Nevertheless, there ARE real costs to being what some in the Manosphere community refer to as a "White Knight" — intervening in an assault taking place on the street, may very well result in YOU being assaulted or worse. Ramsey intervening on behalf of Ms. Berry could have landed him on a coroner's slab. For all we know, Mr. Castro could have been on the premises, and could have blown off Mr. Ramsey's head with a shotgun. And for those demanding why those young boys didn't "do something" in Stuebenville? Uh, have you seen teenage football players lately? We're not exactly talking about 90lb. weaklings here. Add lots of hormones and alcohol to the mix, and you could very well find yourself in a world of hurt for trying to be Capt. Save-A-Fill-In-The-Blank. Simply put, the prospect of finding oneself in the midst of a fistfight – or even a knife or firefight – is very, very real if you're a guy coming to the aid of a damsel in distress. As good as it might feel to do so, it might feel a heck of a lot worse as you lay there in the ICU.

Sure, go ahead and charge me with hyperbole – after all, Ramsey wasn't shot. But his reputation was killed in the days following May 6th, ripped to shreds in every way imaginable, instead of being honored for what he truly was that day – nothing short of a hero.

Say what you will, but for all the flowery talk we Americans love to speak about "doing the right thing", in the real world where mere mortals must make their existence, incentives drive behavior. And in an age where it has become more and more costly for Men to "do the right thing" it makes all the rational sense in the world as to why Men are slowly but surely, pulling back from such heroic deeds. What happened in the days following May 6th is not likely to encourage more Men to step into the breach, either – and on this note, the ladies should be afraid. Very, very afraid –

Because if, on top of the prospect of facing potentially lethal violence for intervening on behalf of a Woman whom you will not know and have no connection to (i.e. not your wife, girlfriend, female relative, etc.), you also have to face the very real likelihood of having all the nooks and crannies of your life scrutinized and perhaps made into fodder for the cheap yuks of the public – which include Women! – then, it makes perfect sense to me that you would balk.

I know I would.

Which is truly sad, because it appears that, even taking the Castro case into account, Cleveland has a Missing Woman Problem – and it needs all hands on deck in order to solve it.

But so long as Men like Ramsey continue to be made a laughing stock and tsked-tsked for actions that occurred more than a decade ago, that he's paid his debt to society for and has by all accounts lived a law-abiding life since, then please count me out of the White Knight Brigade…

…for Mr. Charles Ramsey's actions prove, yet again, that No Good Deed, Goes Unpunished.

Enjoy the harvest, ladies.

Now adjourn your arses…

The Obsidian

From Free Love to "Historic Rape"

W.F. Price · 1 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

An editorial in the UK Independent rejects the notion that different sexual mores in different times means that people shouldn't be held to today's standards for what they did half a century ago.

> The revulsion that attended the revelation of Jimmy Savile's six-decade career of sexual predation is, in some quarters at least, giving way to weariness, even scepticism. As Operation Yewtree proceeds – and the list of long-standing media favourites accused of "historic" offences grows ever longer – the horror over Savile is turning to talk of witch-hunts and "things being different then".
>
> Such complaints are as invidious as they are absurd. Not only is there no reason – legal or moral – for such crimes to "expire", particularly given the trauma that often results. Rape, sexual assault and child abuse were just as illegal in the 1960s as they are today. The times might indeed have been more "permissive" – for which read misogynist. But while that may explain why such behaviour went unchecked, it can neither excuse nor render it less criminal.

I'm not sure that Savile was ever tried for anything, so whether his acts were criminal under today's laws – not to mention those of the 1960s – is an open question.

The editorial dismisses the idea that there is any issue of ex post facto prosecution; that is, throwing someone in jail for something that was not a crime at the time, but is now. Naturally, this could apply to all sorts of things. Say an 85-year-old woman had spanked her kids with a wooden spoon back in the 1950s (common back then), and today we went after her for child abuse. Would that be fair?

So, if a 70-year-old man had a consensual fling with a 16-year-old girl back in the 70s when he was 30, when it was culturally tolerated, should he be prosecuted for it today? The editorial suggests that it was a crime back then, but this is unclear. Was it, really? If so, was it considered rape and punishable by imprisonment? Even if it was, is it proper to prosecute for something that happened so long ago?

The Indepedent says yes, it was a terrible crime and should be prosecuted. But we aren't talking about genocide here, or murder, or even maiming. We're talking about grown men behaving like pigs, to be sure, but it strikes me as the height of hypocrisy for those in power today, many of whom participated in this orgy of free love back then, often politicizing free sex in those days as a way to destroy the old order (which it did) to turn around and hold what amounts to show trials of their old sex partners to consolidate their authority.

Lest anyone forget, feminists were full participants in the free love culture of the 1960s and 70s. Gloria Steinem, for example, promoted feminism by saying that it meant men would get lots of sex. Feminists shamelessly used sex with powerful men to get ahead. Steinem slept with Henry Kissinger, Bill Clinton's affairs were given a free pass by the National Organization of Women, and promiscuity, enabled by chemical contraceptives, was said to be "liberating."

Some feminists opposed pornography, but that's only because they saw no profit from it — what good does it do if the men are ignoring the women around them in favor of images? And that, I suspect, is the reason for the recent change of heart about 1970s mores. The feminists in power today gain no profit from sex of any kind, because nobody wants to have sex with them any longer, so they have totally rejected the freewheeling standards of their youth. The affairs and flings they used to rely on to pry favors from older men are a thing of the past, and now must be retroactively condemned, because they are a threat to their current power. It's time now to keep the men in line, and keep them away from tempting young things, because the women in charge today are neither young nor tempting.

There is nothing "moral" about it — it is purely cynical self-interest.

Aristocratic Feminism

W.F. Price · 2 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In an interesting take on the concept of "equality," British feminists have joined forces with women of rank in demanding an end to the rule that inheritance of title goes to a male heir.

> The proposed law changes to ensure that a daughter born to Prince William and the Duchess of Cambridge can succeed to the throne, should apply to titles as well, daughters of the aristocracy have said.
>
> The current tradition follows the previous royal succession law which sees a male heir inherit over a female.
>
> Now daughters of the gentry are calling for a equal rights to inherit titles as the new law would leave the aristocracy 'two steps behind' the royal family.
>
> The aristocracy's current rules are even harsher than those of the crown, as a title will die out rather than be passed onto a female heir.
>
> Lady Clare Kerr whose father is Tory politician Michael Ancram, is the 13th Marquess of Lothian, will miss out on inheriting her father's title due to the aristocracy's rules.

Yeah, I guess it's unfair that girls don't inherit titles like boys do, but isn't the entire concept of aristocracy unfair? If equality is the goal, why not eliminate the aristocracy altogether?

In the meanwhile, the rules for royal succession are being changed to give girls and boys an equal shot at becoming the titular head of great Britain:

> MPs will meet today to start rewriting 660-year-old laws to ensure that if the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge's have a girl she will become Queen, even if she has a young brother.
>
> Ministers are to prioritise the law change with the urgency usually reserved for anti-terror laws.
>
> Deputy Prime Minister Nick Clegg said: 'This Bill will bring to an end centuries of discrimination against women so that the first born is next in line to the throne, regardless of whether they're a boy or a girl.'
>
> The Liberal Democrat leader added: 'I'm delighted that all of the Queen's realms have agreed to this historic piece of legislation, that will enact in law what we agreed back in 2011 – that if the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge have a baby girl, she can one day be our Queen even if she has younger brothers.
>
> 'We're pressing ahead with this as quickly as we can – it's clearly something the entire country can get behind towards the close of this momentous Jubilee year.'
> The four-page Bill states that in future 'succession to the Crown not to depend on gender' and rewrites the Treason Act 1351 to replace 'first son and heir' to mean 'eldest child and heir'.
>
> Other laws affected include the Bill of Rights, Act of Settlement and the Regency Act 1937.

Feminism: it's about making the most of one's birthright.

Military Rape Hype: Manufacturing a Crisis and Alienating Young Men

W.F. Price · 2 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Patty Murray, one of the two hardcore feminist senators that represent Washington state, has "learned" that 40% of women treated at Puget Sound area veterans' hospitals have reported being sexual assault victims.

> Four out of every 10 women veterans seeking medical care at U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs medical centers in the Puget Sound area report that they were victims of sexual trauma in the military, Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., learned at a Seattle meeting Friday.
>
> "The consequences of military sexual trauma are permanent: They are not something you walk away from when you leave the military," said Dr. Joyce Wipf, professor of medicine at the University of Washington and director of the VA's Puget Sound Women's Program.

I'm not sure exactly how this figure was obtained, but I imagine it was based on a questionnaire. These questionnaires have been responsible for inflating rape figures for decades, most frequently in universities, but now in the military as well.

Typical questions are along the lines of "have you ever felt pressured into sex?" or "has anyone ever touched you in a way that made you feel uncomfortable?" This ends up being reported as rape and sexual assault, despite the fact that in most cases it would fall far below the standard in a court of law.

But even worse is the title of the article, which strongly suggests that a full 40% of women treated in the VA are being treated for sexual assault:

> 4 of 10 women treated at local VA sexual trauma victims

Most people would assume, on reading the headline, that the women are being treated for sexual assault, when this is not even close to being true.

When it is reported that men are falling behind in university enrollment, people look at all answers besides the most obvious: they are not welcome there. The radical feminism that characterizes humanities departments across the land has resulted in humanities programs that have all but excluded males from the classroom due to a real and relentless ideological assault on men. Why would any self-respecting man want to take classes that cast him as the incarnation of evil?

Now the US military appears poised to do the same. I can't think of any domestic political measures that could hollow out the armed forces like mounting a sustained campaign against men and masculinity, but our politicians seem determined to do just that. Within a decade or two, the prime recruiting pool for the military – young working and lower middle class American men – will begin to avoid it just as they have already begun to avoid college. It's a disaster in the making, but those in power today seem determined to wreck what's left of our institutions no matter what the cost.

Feminists Object To Hot Women Showing Their Bodies

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 3 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently there have been a couple of examples showing that feminists have a problem with hot women showing their bodies. For example, a feminist at Femspire wrote an article attacking every single aspect of the new Star Trek movie, Star Trek: Into Darkness. In particular, the author of that piece objected to a scene where Dr. Carol Marcus (played by Alice Eve) was in her underwear. Nothing actually happens in that scene. There is no pornographic aspect to it or anything to worthy of an objection. It was nothing more than anyone would see on most beaches. Here is an image of what was in that scene to judge for yourself:

One of the comments in the Femspire piece, actually called this "gratuitous nudity". For something to be "gratuitous nudity", it actually has to have NUDITY which would require Alice Eve to be naked, not in her underwear.

In the UK feminist groups, UK Feminista and Object, have launched a legal campaign against "lads' mags", magazines that have hot women in their underwear and similar amounts of clothing. These magazines aren't pornographic, and they have nothing to complain about. Despite those facts, UK Feminista and Object are saying that "lads' mags" constitute sexual harassment or sexual discrimination against employees and customers of the stores where they are sold. Since the "lads' mags" show nothing more than would be seen on most beaches, UK Feminista and Object are saying that going to the beach is a sexually harassing experience, which is clearly absurd.

Clearly, feminists have issues that go beyond nudity or pornography since they have a problem with men seeing women, particularly attractive women, in their underwear. They are even trying to change language so that women in their underwear are considered "nude". What is happening here is an attack on (heterosexual) male sexuality. Men like looking at hot women with few clothes on. The problem feminists have with images of women in their underwear is that men like looking at them. Everything that the feminists are saying about "harassment" (as if you can be harassed by an inanimate object), "nudity", and/or "misogyny" is just a smokescreen for how they can't stand men doing something they enjoy like looking at hot women.

Just in time for Father's Day, Hateful old Feminists Come out of Woodwork

W.F. Price · 4 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The NY Times is having a discussion titled "What are Fathers For?" in the opinion section under the heading "Room for Debate." Several of the opinions say "not much," including Jane Mattes, founder of "single mothers by choice," and Michele Weldon. Jane and Michele are both single mothers, and admit that this was their own choice. Their children, of course, had no choice as to whether they would be fatherless or not, and that should be enough to give everyone some reservations about their judgment.

I'll add that personally, as a father who went through a custody dispute, although I fought for time with my kids, I never for a single moment considered removing their mother from their lives, and never would have done so even if it had been possible. To me, denying a child access to a parent, unless that parent is flat out dangerous, is unthinkable. How is it that so many women can find the nerve to justify doing so for even the pettiest of reasons? It is a moral shortcoming that I just don't understand, because it implies a real lack of consideration for one's children's needs as human beings.

Both Mattes and Weldon are second wave feminists; the type who were celebrated in the 80s and 90s as empowered career women. However, as the picture of single motherhood comes into focus after decades of cultural attacks on the family, we don't see so many professional women raising children alone, but rather hapless, impoverished, dependent and uneducated young women.

These old feminists, in defending their part in dispossessing so many American children, and perhaps the unspoken results of their choices, would throw millions of future children under the bus for a concept of "family" that just doesn't work very well. In an article titled "When Children are Better off Fatherless," confronted with the emotional pain that fatherlessness causes children, Weldon displays a callousness that must come from ignorance; if not, she is a thoroughly disgusting person.

Take her interpretation of a scene from The Fresh Prince of Bell Aire, in which Will Smith breaks down when his father disappoints him:

> In time for Father's Day movie bonding, Will Smith stars in "After Earth" with his real-life son, Jaden. But a 1994 episode of "Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" shows a much younger Will Smith in a scene that is more real to many American boys. The Smith character's father runs out on a promise to take his son on a trip, and Smith shouts: "I'm gonna get through college without him. I'm gonna get a great job without him and marry me a beautiful honey and have me a whole bunch of kids. And I'm gonna be a better father than he ever was." And then he chokes, "How come he don't want me, man?"
>
> I know there is no possible answer to that question. But I also know it is time to stop damning the children who need to ask.

Ms. Weldon, by dismissing the importance of fathers, you just did damn those children. Is justifying what you did to your own sons so important that you would break the hearts of even more boys?

McCain to Women: Stay out of Military until Rape Problem "Solved"

W.F. Price · 4 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Above: girls in IDF show us their stuff

John McCain has come up with a novel solution to the alleged sexual assault crisis in the military: women should not join the military.

What an original idea! Why hasn't anyone thought of that before?

If you think long and hard about it, it just might work…

> Sen. John McCain, who built a potent political career on his record as a Vietnam veteran and ex-prisoner of war, on Tuesday told the leaders of every military branch he cannot in good conscience advise women to join the service as the military grapples to contain and curb its sexual assault epidemic.
>
> "Just last night, a woman came to me and said her daughter wanted to join the military and could I give my unqualified support for her doing so. I could not," McCain, an Arizona Republican, said during a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing examining whether all serious sexual crimes should be removed from the chain of command.

Of course, we could follow the lead of the Israeli Defense Force, which segregates men and women, and recently disciplined female recruits who were caught behaving in a sexually suggestive manner.

Michael Douglas Throat Cancer Raises Issue of HPV Vaccinations for Boys

W.F. Price · 4 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A few years ago, all girls were urged to get HPV vaccinations, as an HPV infection, which can lead to cervical cancer, is known to be a health threat to women. There was no call to have boys vaccinated, presumably because cervical cancer doesn't affect males. However, even at the the time, doctors knew that HPV can cause more than just cervical cancers, and is responsible for the majority of anal cancers, many penile cancers and a majority of certain types of oral and throat cancers. Additionally, boys with HPV can infect girls with HPV, so it's curious that only one part of the population was urged to get a vaccination.

Until recently, the issue has been largely ignored and downplayed, as male health threats often are, even as anything that might have even the remotest negative effect on female health, such as spray tanning and "feelings" about appearance, is endlessly discussed. Yes, in our contemporary culture, how women feel about images of other women in magazines is treated as a more urgent health issue than the effects of a widespread, carcinogenic infectious disease on men. It turns out that HPV causes two thirds as many cancers in men as women (and this may be an underestimate), yet the vaccination rate for boys is a measly 1.4%, as compared to roughly 50% in girls.

Fortunately, Michael Douglas opened up about his own brush with oral cancer, which, according to doctors treating him, developed after he contracted an HPV infection. Douglas attributed it to oral sex, but this need not be the case. HPV can be contracted merely from kissing someone who also has an oral infection (or, for that matter, from receiving oral sex). His openness about the cause of his cancer has brought some much-needed attention to the fact that the virus can harm men as well as women.

However, there was an immediate reaction against Douglas, who was subsequently forced to issue a statement exonerating male on female oral sex, presumably because it implicates something feminists frequently promote.

Can anyone imagine a woman who said she'd contracted oral cancer from giving head having to downplay the risk due to male objection? Of course not; that would be unthinkable! Women's health takes priority over men's pleasure in our culture every single time. Perhaps that's the way it should be, but why not men's health, too?

In this case, the double standard is not only blatant, but stupid as well, because men with HPV can infect women. It's another case of feminism, by separating what's good for women from what's good for men, coming not only at the expense of men, but society as a whole. If, from the berginning, we'd treated HPV infection as a problem affecting all of society rather than just women, perhaps many more infections among men and women could have been averted, but the pathetically low male vaccination rate proves that, until now, few considered this common-sense idea.

Once again, Michael Douglas has taken a stand against radical feminism. First, he took on false accusation and sexual bullying in the office with Disclosure, and now he's letting us know that men can not only be victimized by women in a professional setting, but can suffer from the same diseases as well. And, despite standing up for men and earning the wrath of feminist critics like Roger Ebert, he married the objectively beautiful Catherine Zeta-Jones. It's great to hear that Michael Douglas's cancer is in remission and he is healthy. Hopefully, his candid remarks about HPV and oral cancer will lead more parents to take preventative measures for their sons; clearly we can't rely on the establishment to handle the problem.

Prostitutes Beat up Competition in Miami Beach

W.F. Price · 4 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Prostitutes who have staked their claim at a South Beach hotel are not about to let any uppity women move in on their business.

> A vacation getaway to a swanky South Beach hotel turned into a nightmare for a southern New Jersey woman when she was mistaken for a hooker and beaten up by actual prostitutes who saw her as competition, the woman and her husband claim in a federal lawsuit.
>
> Thirty-four-year-old Anna Burgese asserts in the lawsuit filed last Friday in Camden that a group of women she believes were prostitutes attacked her in the lobby of the W Hotel in Miami Beach in January as she and her husband, Joseph, were returning from a night out. Burgese says she was violently attacked from behind and slammed into a wall, then thrown to the ground. She was taken to the hospital for her injuries, attorney Lance Rogers said.

So where's the part where these "victims of human trafficking" have been forced into the business by wicked men? Surely, the prostitutes must be unwilling participants in the sex trade, and their unprovoked attack on a woman was a cry for help.

Quick! Find a man to blame!

Ah, here we go:

> the suit claims, hotel staff failed to detain the attackers and even helped them escape by putting them in a taxi. The hotel was aware of previous violent episodes and failed to take precautions to protect hotel guests, according to the suit.
>
> "The Hotel fosters a prostitute-friendly environment where prostitutes are permitted to market themselves on the premises, as evidenced by, among other things, the reviews left on various travel websites by former guests," the lawsuit contends. "It is believed and therefore averred that, in the past, prostitutes have become violent with guests and/or visitors on the Hotel's premises and in the surrounding area."

Yep, it was the hotel staff and management who were responsible for the hooker attack, so the patriarchy must pay.

Catholic Church Sued in Ohio for Opposing Single Motherhood

W.F. Price · 5 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A jury in Cincinnati has awarded a lesbian who had herself artificially inseminated $170,000 for wrongful termination and discrimination. The Catholic school that employed her fired her for violating a signed agreement not to have children out of wedlock, and let her go when she became pregnant.

> CINCINNATI — A Catholic-school teacher who was fired after she became pregnant through artificial insemination won her anti-discrimination lawsuit against the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Cincinnati yesterday and was awarded more than $170,000.
>
> A federal jury found that the archdiocese discriminated against Christa Dias, who taught computer classes, by firing her in October 2010.
>
> Dias declined to comment after the verdict but said later in a telephone interview that she was " very happy and relieved."
>
> The jury said the archdiocese should pay $51,000 in back pay, $20,000 in compensatory damages and $100,000 in punitive damages. Dias had sued the archdiocese and two of its schools; the jury didn't find the schools liable for damages.
>
> Dias' attorney, Robert Klingler, had argued that she was fired simply because she was pregnant and unmarried, a dismissal he said violated federal and state law. He had suggested damages as high as $637,000, but Dias said she was satisfied with the jury's award.

The woman, Christa Dias, claimed that she had no idea that she was violating the agreement she made with the church when employed.

> Dias, who is not Catholic, testified she didn't know artificial insemination violated church doctrine or her employment pact. She said she thought the contract clause about abiding by church teachings meant she should be a Christian and follow the Bible.
>
> Dias also has claimed that the church policies are not enforced equally against men and women.
>
> Goodin argued that Dias, who is gay, never intended to abide by her contract. She kept her sexual orientation a secret because she knew that homosexual acts also would violate that contract, he said.
>
> Neither Dias nor the archdiocese claim she was fired because she is gay, and the judge told jurors that they could not consider sexual orientation in determining motivating factors for the firing.

As she was a lesbian, I find it hard to believe she signed a contract with the Catholic Archdiocese in good faith, but then again these sorts of things are often viewed as mere formalities among urban Catholics. The idea is to not force the issue, but her pregnancy did just that, and that's likely why she was fired.

There's a lot of hypocrisy in urban Catholic institutions, because the lives many Catholics lead are so far from what the Church preaches. This might not be much of an issue if the Catholic Church were not such a huge institution with so many state entanglements, but it is.

In the current climate, clashes between the Catholic Church and the state are inevitable. Rampant illegitimacy, promiscuity and divorce undermine the fundamental principles of Catholicism to the degree that the church can no longer call itself a part of urban society. Instead, it turns out that most of what it stands for is in opposition to prevailing social norms. This being the case, the church should withdraw from its entanglements and operate in more of a missionary and faith community capacity, perhaps as the early church did in pagan Rome. This might be accompanied by loss of secular political power and influence, but as it stands today this influence only corrupts the church and highlights hypocrisy, driving away the faithful.

Comment of the Week: Fathers are Culture-Bearers

W.F. Price · 5 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

TheLastSaneMan brings up family dysfunction and cultural transmission from father to son in a thoughtful critique of contemporary (and historic) Western society.

Two points:

1) As much as I despise the crookedness that women put their ex husbands through regarding the children, this is a bit of a more well rounded phenomenon than many people would like to believe. It's much more of a regular occurrence than you would like to believe, for the sick, elderly, disabled, and otherwise infirm, to get kidnapped, by family members, and kept from people, just to spite their loved ones/them themselves.

Deep down, most people are bastards, male or female, and when something happens, more often than you'd think, vultures swoop in to take care of the poor victim…for a modest fee and a cut of the poor victim's personal belongings, not to mention bargaining rights for access to the victim. This is whether they're children, old, mentally ill, injured, whatever. You hear about this most with child custody disputes, but ironically, slim as the chance may be, it is children who are the most likely to have an out in such situations: most children grow up, and as such, after reaching adulthood, usually come to understand who in the situation was full of shit, and who was not.

If you get in a car accident, have no will, and become mentally impaired, if Aunt Martha and her greedy cousins come to take you away to the welfare farm, if you don't have anyone closer as next of kin to speak for you, that's it. You're their prisoner. 100 people, your best friend, can testify that those people are full of shit, that you never had any dealings with them before today. The system doesn't care. Look up crooked probate courts and crooked relatives on any search engine: you will find numerous stories of people, male and female, who decide to play grabass games with people lives and their property. While I don't disagree with the assertion being made that women play shit games with men's kids, this is one of those instances where I think there's a bigger issue, of which child custody is a smaller part of.

2) Heard the saying, "how do you make a great archer? Start with his grandfather." I have come to the conclusion that the same thing applies to fathers: how do you make a great father? Start with his grandfather. Fathering is basically the passing of the cultural template and methodology of understanding the world from one generation to the next. The father teaches his son how to hunt, how to build, how to plow, how to deal with women, both as he was taught by his father, and how he learned the world was for himself. This is nothing less than an art, and IMO is the primary reason why we have ascended as a society above apes: apes are not able to pass knowledge from one generation to the next in the way that humans are – apes now are doing pretty much the same thing apes did 10000 years ago, as they are unable to have discussions about history, or better ways of doing things, or probable futures and methods of preparing for them. Humans, primarily fathers, do all of these things, and do so better with every increasing generation. As go the fathers, so goes the overall culture of the society. Compare patriarchal societies with matriarchal ones, and ones where the males have been eradicated or decimated in the past. The Chinese, Japanese, and East Indians are considered some of the most industrious, technologically savvy people in the world: note that these societies are very patriarchal, and in the case of the Chinese, have an imbalance and surplus of male talent. Each of these countries went through major wars and occupations, and were able to industrialize themselves in incredibly short periods of time.

American Blacks and American Indians have the most dysfunctional cultures in the New World. American Blacks endured a systematic culture wash of their old societies and cultures, coupled with the complete destruction of the family unit, and removal of the father figure from said family unit. American Indians got all of that, plus the added benefits of simply being virtually genocided, with the survivors having Christianity and English pretty much beaten into them. American Blacks and Indians are well known as the least achieving members of society: is it coincidental that for both of these societies, the image that pops to mind when you think of fathers is either a drunkard, a thug, or a puff of smoke headed out the door?

The lesson here couldn't be any more stark: your country and people can endure centuries of war, pain, death, misery, and suffering. So long as the men survive, and are able to continue making family units, the culture lives. Fuck, you can drop an atomic bomb on a people, and so long as the men live, the culture lives. Kill all the men, the culture dies, and not just temporarily either – it dies to the point where it's almost impossible to come back. There are indeed successful, intelligent American Blacks and American Indians in society, and when one takes a look at them, one sees strong father figures, and a strict, patriarchal family structure in most of these households. The same goes for those West Africans who come here explicitly to study: many of them have much more of a drive for education and learning than the American Blacks here. They also a) have father figures in their lives, or b) are not being dominated by women. These people are in the minorities in the societies I am talking about, as most of them are run by "strong X women," who, curiously enough, aren't good at math, science, reading, writing, reasoning, basic fucking art, astronomy, hunting, fishing, building, or anything that makes humans human as opposed to apes, but they're "strong". And their societies are dying for it.

Apparently the lesson doesn't seem to be taking though, as America, and the West period, seems to be more and more intent on taking fathers out of the life of every child of every race every day. I have little doubt as to what will happen, little at all. Given that I probably won't be having children myself, and am planning on leaving this country anyway, I am not very concerned with it either.

Men's Use of Testosterone "Abuse," Women's use of Estrogen a Right

W.F. Price · 5 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recent reports on the growing use of testosterone supplementation by middle-aged and older men have suggested that it's a problem we ought to worry about, because most men "don't need it."

From the NY Times:

> The number of middle-aged men with prescriptions for testosterone is climbing rapidly, raising concerns that increasing numbers of men are abusing the powerful hormone to boost their libidos and feel younger, researchers reported on Monday.
>
> Testosterone replacement therapy is approved specifically for the treatment of abnormally low testosterone levels, a condition called hypogonadism. The hormone helps build muscle, reduce body fat and improve sex drive. But a study published in the journal JAMA Internal Medicine found that many men who get prescriptions for the hormone have no evidence of a deficiency at all.
>
> The new study is the largest of testosterone prescribing patterns to date, involving nearly 11 million men who were tracked through a large health insurer. The report showed that the number of older and middle-aged men prescribed the hormone has tripled since 2001.
>
> Men in their 40s represent the fastest-growing group of users. About half of men prescribed testosterone had a diagnosis of hypogonadism, and roughly 40 percent had erectile or sexual dysfunction. One third had a diagnosis of fatigue.
>
> The medical group that sets clinical guidelines for testosterone replacement therapy, the Endocrine Society, recommends treatment only in men who have unequivocally low testosterone levels. That finding requires a blood test. But the new report found that a quarter of men did not have their levels tested before they received the hormone. It was also unclear what proportion of men who did undergo testing actually had results showing a deficiency.

Not long ago, there was a trend of women using estrogen during and following menopause, and while this was later found to contribute to some health risks, not once were women accused of "abusing" the female hormone. In fact, use of estrogen was widely praised and recommended in all sorts of media outlets.

But now that we have older men doing the equivalent, it constitutes a problem. This is because masculine characteristics, in our culture, are seen as inherently problematic, whether they be men's sexual preferences, personality characteristics or work habits. Testosterone is seen as a culprit in many of these masculine behaviors and proclivities, so it's bad, right?

Estrogen, in the meanwhile, is a wonderful unicorns 'n rainbows magic elixir that bestows nothing but good on earth, so women can pop as much as it as they want, and under Obamacare we all have to pay for it!

Another issue is this matter of health risks. While having teens and young men use testosterone on a widespread basis is probably unnecessary and may have harmful long-term effects (such as testicular problems and permanent hormonal imbalances), mature men, you'd think, can make up their own minds about what to put in their bodies. Even if it does have attendant health risks, is that a reason to limit these men's choices? If a man decides that it really improves quality of life, is it our business if he incurs some risk by taking a medication?

I've never tried testosterone, but if I felt that I wanted to at some point I think that option ought to be available without exposing me to suspicion of "abuse." If men's hormones are to be highly restricted and and only given to men who are determined to "need" them, then the same should apply to female hormones. How many of the tens of millions of women on estrogen actually need it? Perhaps they could be considered to be abusing the hormone.

In short, this is a matter of discrimination against men, and there's no reason middle-aged men should be scrutinized when they seek out prescriptions for androgenic hormones. Sure, doctors should tell them about the risks, and can refuse to prescribe it if the patient would be endangered, but in most cases the decision should be left up to the men themselves, just as women have the choice of taking their own synthetic equivalents on their own initiative.

And finally, it's amazing that the Times has the chutzpah to cast aspersions on ordinary men's use of T when it so happily endorses "gender reassignment" procedures for men, which require enormous doses of hormones in addition to risky surgery.

Three European Feminists Held in Tunisia, Three Others Deported

W.F. Price · 5 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

After exposing themselves in a protest against the Islamic mores that jailed a Tunisian FEMEN supporter, three European women are being held in Tunis on charges of public indecency. Three others who tried to stage a protest after their arrest were seized and deported. Islamic groups have asked to be included as injured parties so that they can seek damages against the women, and possibly FEMEN, and obtain access to case files.

> Three members of a radical Ukrainian feminist group have been expelled from Tunisia on suspicion of planning a topless protest in front of the court where their colleagues were being tried on charges of public indecency, the interior ministry said on Wednesday.
>
> The statement on the Ukrainian ministry's Facebook page said information had led to one individual being taken to the country's main airport on Tuesday, while a Belarusian was stopped there the same day. Another Ukrainian was turned back on Wednesday at the airport.
>
> Three fellow activists from the group, Femen, are on trial for public indecency after demonstrating topless in front of Tunisia's Palace of Justice. They were calling for the release of a Tunisian member of the group.
>
> The trial began on Wednesday with lawyers representing several Islamist groups petitioning to delay the trial so they could join as plaintiffs. The judge adjourned the session and said he would make his decision on 12 June.
>
> The activists, Pauline Hillier and Marguerite Stern from France, and Josephine Markmann from Germany, appeared topless on 29 May in the group's first semi-nude protest in the Middle East.

The feminist attack on Islam in Europe has the potential to cause serious political friction, particularly in France, which is home to millions of devout Muslims. If nationalist groups comprised of and led by European men confronted Islam in the manner FEMEN has, they would doubtless face prosecution in Europe by European authorities.

However, when feminists do it, prosecution becomes problematic, because both Muslim immigrants and feminists are considered oppressed groups whose grievances are legitimate.

I wonder whether it won't be some conflict of this nature that finally shatters the illusion of European unity. The anti-native coalition of the progressive left and immigrants has won politically in Europe, so future competition for European dominance will likely be between the two powerful factions.

The fact that feminists have actually flown to Tunisia to take the fight to the Maghreb suggests that they are very serious about confronting Muslims, so we should expect to see this issue heat up in the future.

What does Equality Mean?

W.F. Price · 6 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I responded to a few questions from a journalist yesterday, and ended up spending a fair amount of time on them. Sometimes, it's helpful to write for someone besides the usual audience, because it forces you to explain yourself in new ways, and put a little more thought into things.

One of the questions she asked was "Do you think equality between men and women is an admirable or necessary goal?" I think regular readers would know that I don't – at least not in the way in which "equality" is understood today – but it's important to explain why, because the modern concept of equality has to be debunked.

I think I did a fair job of doing so without wasting too many words, so I thought I should post that response for readers. We should all be armed against this idea that equality is an unqualified blessing, because one of the first accusations one faces these days is that of being anti-equality. I think we might as well own it — agree and amplify so to speak. Equalism is becoming the bane of our time, and there's no good reason to make compromises with it.

So here's my response:

Do I think equality between men and women is admirable or necessary? I could answer the easy way and say that it's impossible, which it is, but to be more specific I also think it's an absolutely terrible, evil goal that is very harmful and destructive when pursued. I don't think so because "a woman's place is in the kitchen" or some other simple aphorism, but because men and women together comprise humanity, and each part is required for us to survive, just as different parts of an organism are required. Would we declare an arm and a leg equal? Or a heart and lung? Or even the left and right hemisphere of the brain? It's just an appalling idea to me, and beyond comprehension. If men and women were suddenly equal, humanity would cease to exist in short order, and that sounds pretty awful. I think it's the worst kind of dystopia imaginable.

There's only one kind of equality that we can honestly speak of, and that's a spiritual concept that applies to each of us as "souls." In the sense that we love all of our children, God loves each of us, and in that we are "equal" — man, woman, Greek, Jew, slave, free, etc. Now, I'm not pretending to preach here; I'm agnostic, but my point is that the concept of equality is entirely religious in origin, and mainly Christian. Our current secular concept of equality is based on this religious idea, which is exactly why it developed in the Christian West and nowhere else. Nowhere at all — feel free to check up on that. Of course, we can extrapolate some of this religious concept of equality to the law, and we have to a great extent, which is overall a very good thing.

But there are limits. The law cannot defy nature, as King Canute so famously demonstrated when he commanded the waves to be still. So even the law recognizes that the sexes are not equal in all ways, and it will always continue to do so. Women are some of the biggest supporters of this, because they know that strict legal equality would be a very raw deal for them.

When you're talking about social equality, again, it's an abomination and a dystopian nightmare. Think of the totalitarian measures that would be required to make all boys and girls "equal."

Writer capitalizes on reality of female desire

W.F. Price · 6 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Journalist Daniel Bergner has come out with a "groundbreaking" book about female sexuality that comes to the shocking conclusion that women are not all sweet innocent little things.

Bergner's conclusions, judging from the press, are pretty much the same ones we've already reached in the androsphere, which leads me to believe he cribbed some of our material. But even we can't take all that much credit; hell, you can find the same material going back thousands of years to Homer, the Bible, barbarian European sagas, Hindu texts and so on. In fact, the greater part of evidence that has stood the test of time confirms that women's sexuality is a powerful and often disruptive force.

Salon on Bergner's book:

> In accessible and entertaining prose, "What Do Women Want?" details everything from individual women's fantasies to the search for a "female Viagra." More important, though, it represents a complete paradigm shift. The book, which grew from a much-discussed New York Times Magazine cover story in 2009, reveals how gender stereotypes have shaped scientific research and blinded researchers to evidence of female lust and sexual initiation throughout the animal kingdom, including among humans. It reveals how society's repression of female sexuality has reshaped women's desires and sex lives.
>
> Bergner, and the leading sex researchers he interviews, argue that women's sexuality is not the rational, civilized and balancing force it's so often made out to be — that it is base, animalistic and ravenous, everything we've told ourselves about male sexuality. As one researcher tells Bergner of all the restrictions put on female sexuality: "Those barriers are a testament to the power of the drive itself. It's a pretty incredible testament. Because the drive must be so strong to override all of that."
>
> "Women's desire — its inherent range and innate power — is an underestimated and constrained force, even in our times, when all can seem so sexually inundated, so far beyond restriction," he writes. "Despite the notions our culture continues to imbue, this force is not, for the most part, sparked or sustained by emotional intimacy and safety." In fact, he argues, "one of our most comforting assumptions, soothing perhaps above all to men but clung to by both sexes, that female eros is much better made for monogamy than the male libido, is scarcely more than a fairy tale."

Yes, female sexuality can be terrible in its power, but knowledge disarms much of that power. This is why I don't think the "constraints" put on female sexuality are really hard and fast rules so much as they are components of an illusion — an illusion that renders unknowing men all but helpless in the face of the angelic female ideal. It is women – not men – who have been most vigilant in maintaining this illusion, because it profits them.

People often mention the "Red Pill," and that term has come to be a catchphrase for male awakening to reality. I'm not a really big fan of the term, because it sounds a bit cultish and brings The Matrix to mind (I wasn't all that impressed by the film), but it does describe a real phenomenon.

The Red Pill, in short, is simply the truth about female sexuality. All Bergner has done is repackage the red pill and make it look sexy, and even empowering to women. So I suppose we should give the guy credit for doing us a favor, because although it is being sold with some misleading advertising, at least his book will contribute to general knowledge about the ancient truths of the world.

Ricin letters may have been attempt to set up husband

W.F. Price · 7 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Shannon Rogers Guess Richardson, a Texan actress who called the FBI to report that her husband had sent the ricin to President Obama and various other political liberals, has been arrested for having sent them herself. Notes included with the poison, which is derived from castor beans and kills by means of violent, massive diarrhea, indicated pro-second amendment views and opposition to gun control.

> Investigators have been probing who sent the three letters, all postmarked May 20 from Shreveport, La. and sent without a return address, authorities have said.
>
> Authorities are still investigating the three ricin-laced letters sent to Michael Bloomberg, President Obama, and a lobbyist, but Texas-based actress Shannon Rogers Guess has said her Army veteran husband Nathanial Richardson is behind the letters. NBC's Stephanie Gosk reports.
>
> The letters sent to Obama and Bloomberg were discovered during routine mail screenings processes. The letter to the director of Mayors Against Illegal Guns, Mark Glaze, was opened.
>
> "You will have to kill me and my family before you get my guns," the message sent to Bloomberg read, according to NBC New York, which obtained a copy of the letter. "Anyone who wants to come to my house will get shot in the face. The right to bear arms is my constitutional God given right and I will exercise that right till the day I die."

Mrs. Richardson's husband, we may infer, is a conservative supporter of the right to bear arms.

Rise in Female Doctors Has “Unintended Consequences” for Britain’s NHS

W.F. Price · 7 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

According to Tory MP Anna McIntosh, female doctors are putting a strain on the UK’s National Health Service:

> “When they go into practice and then in the normal course of events will marry and have children, they often want to go part-time and it is obviously a tremendous burden training what effectively might be two GPs working part-time where they are ladies,” she said. “I think that is something that is going to put a huge burden on the health service.”

Health minister Anna Soubry agreed, referring to the “unintended consequences” of having so many female doctors, who are projected to be a majority of all doctors within a few years.

“Experts” immediately went on the offensive, calling her remarks “outdated,” but then all but admitted that there’s a problem when they called for changes in planning.

I have no problem with female doctors; they often have a pleasant way of dealing with patients, and may have some advantages over men in some regards. However, the real world requires doctors to be available to patients, and if female doctors do not put in as many hours due to childbirth and personal choice, this is obviously a problem when most doctors are female.

Britain is getting less return on its investment for each female doctor trained, and this cost will be passed on to the British people. “Equality” does indeed have many unintended consequences, and many of these are quite expensive. Ultimately, the costs will put physical constraints on efforts to achieve equality, or else they will put constraints on economic growth and quality of life.

On “Natural Roles”

W.F. Price · 8 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Continuing my discussions with a journalist, I defend my assertion that natural sex roles do exist, and claim that this proves feminism to be a fundamentally flawed, and therefore discreditable ideology:

Natural roles, as I see them, are so personal, intimate, and in some cases intangible, that we often make errors when we try to assign them to manmade institutions and ideologies, but that does not mean that they do not exist.

Take farming, for example. When French missionaries first encountered the Iroquois around 1600, the women did most of the farming for corn and squash, while the men hunted and made war (the Iroquois were very warlike). Back in France, however, farming was mainly a man’s job, although women certainly chipped in. So, obviously, we can’t say that farming is a natural role for one sex or the other. It can certainly become gendered, and in some contexts this is an adaptive thing.

Here’s how:

Iroquois women had to be around their babies, which they nursed for several years, and the men often had to leave the village to obtain fats and protein via hunting, and you can’t take a child on a hunt. The women, in the meanwhile, could work on the fields adjacent to the village while carrying the babies around, or letting small children run around nearby.

In France, farming required teams of oxen, heavy plows and substantial upper body strength. Men were inherently better suited to it, so women could be more productive back home processing food or selling it at the market.

Therefore, farming was generally a man’s job in France, and a woman’s job in Iroquois territory. And how did this happen? Because the very basic natural roles created the conditions for it to become that in the respective cultures.

Now, say the conditions that made farming a man’s job in France suddenly disappeared, because upper body strength was no longer relevant (this is not actually the case in intensive agriculture — at least not yet). Would you say that was proof that the basic sex roles didn’t exist? This is the mistake feminists make. They may be correct that women can be perfectly adequate doctors, lawyers and managers, but that isn’t because the natural roles of men and women don’t exist; it’s because, for the most part, they are irrelevant to those jobs today.

This is also where the idea that natural roles do not exist can be conclusively proved wrong. Whether or not formerly gendered occupations are compatible with natural roles today is irrelevant to the fact that at one point they did develop from them, and have done so in countless examples over the ages. Because gendered roles did develop, and continue to do so, the natural roles they were based on must necessarily exist. Something does not derive from nothing. That feminists can look over the span of history – not to mention contemporary society – and maintain that none of these results are based on nature discredits all of their subsequent conclusions. In other words, the cornerstone of Western feminist thought is based on flawed reasoning, and all of the evils of feminism derive from this fundamental flaw.

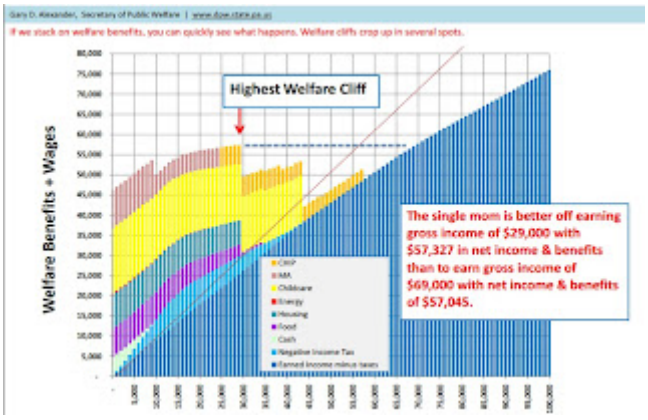
Cash and Prizes: Single Mother Grossing $29K Effectively Grosses $69K

Elusive Wapiti · 11 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I opined that being a "choice mommy is a hard row to hoe", and that their chosen life path is not a "reliable recipe for getting rich". In these two posts, I discussed the following datapoints:

- The average income for a divorced / separated single mother is $29,000.
- The average income for a never-married single mother is $17,400.
- The average non-custodial father makes $48,000 annually, and pays his former wife $3,800 in chilimony, tax-free.
- The single mother's income may be supplemented by various means-tested credits, deductions, and subsidies that significantly boosted her effective net income.

I did not quantify this last number, as I lacked the time or expertise to compute it. Turns out I didn't need to, as the American Enterprise Institute, responding to the "Life of Julia" ads launched last year by Mr. Obama's 2012 presidential re-election campaign, beat me to it:



Source: AEI

While I stand by my previous comments, being a single parent is challenging work and few women get wealthy being one, the above graphic suggests single "breadwinning" mothers have it far better financially than many think…and better than over half of Americans, for whom the average income in 2013 was $49,000. Furthermore, the "cash and prizes" awarded to choice mothers…let's call these women "Julias"…from the pockets of Julia's ex husband are actually quite small compared to the cash/prizes transferred to her by her new husband, the State. Or if you want to get technical about it, the moneys paid to her by all her new husbands…all 131M of them, comprised of employed male and female Americans who pay some income tax.

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to three, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

Is anyone surprised by NSA revelations?

W.F. Price · 11 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some time in the middle of the last decade, I processed a European Parliament report on Echelon, a shadowy signal intelligence program allegedly run by the Anglo countries of the world (AU, US, UK, NZ, CA) under the aegis of the National Security Agency and its counterparts in the UK and commonwealth. The report was compiled by non-Anglo Europeans, and they weren't all that happy about Echelon. Around the same time, I read The Puzzle Palace, James Bamford's excellent book on the NSA. I would highly recommend the book to anyone who is interested in the NSA in light of all the recent hubbub.

At the time, you could already tell where things were headed. Echelon is (allegedly) part of an enormous data collection system, making use of satellite dishes set up at strategic points around the world to snoop on communications. One of them happened to be in Yakima – not too far from me – but it has evidently been shut down and staff transferred to Colorado. One can also find stations in New Zealand, Australia, Canada, and in the bleak fields of Yorkshire.

The idea behind Echelon was to collect as much data of any sort as possible. Since global communications relied so heavily on satellites through the 90s, we could theoretically listen in on people pretty much anywhere on earth. However, with the rise in fiber optics, the satellite signal intelligence became less important, and gathering information became more a matter of tapping into the major exchange points run by communications companies. So what the NSA did – with our dear leaders' approval – was augment its passive intelligence gathering capabilities with a much more hands-on approach. With the cooperation of major communications companies, they've been installing their snooping software at pretty much every major data exchange point, which is how they can collect everyone's metadata, and probably a lot more, on calls, emails, browsing habits, etc.

[Evidently, not everyone knows what metadata means. It is the information about the communication you are sending/receiving. For example, if you click "extended headers" under your email "view" you'll see a lot of numbers, times, dates, etc. This email metadata can specify location, IP, server and, with access to company records, the user, among other relevant bits of info.]

I assumed this was common knowledge. If I can look at a list of calls to and from my number online, so can someone else, and it's only natural that some agency would have this access as well. In the contemporary US, there is really no way you can expect the government not to have access to whatever electronic information it wants. Even the measly State of Washington can peer into noncustodial fathers' bank accounts without their permission and seize the funds whenever it wants to, without the need for any due process at all. What kind of a fool would assume that the feds have less power than that?

Although it may seem reasonable to many that those tasked with protecting us have access to the tools they need to do so, the problem is that these tools usually end up being used for more than that, and by more people. For example, who would have originally thought that electronic funds transfers could be used by the state to drain one's bank account without due process? How about use of social security numbers as a means to track life history, credit, medical records, etc? When these tools first became available, people assumed that they would be safe in the hands of the few, but now they are used by all sorts of podunk public agencies in addition to the federal government.

Once, when I was at a junior college after hours, I saw the college security chief, a former cop, looking through students' records and identifying information on a computer in the office I worked in. It was a clear violation of policy, but there he was using the forbidden tool, and sad to say neither I nor anyone else did a thing about it (I kept my mouth shut and took it as a lesson in how these types operate). This is just what people do if they can get away with it — all the way down to a junior college rent-a-cop! If this PRISM program is really as spiffy as they make it out to be – you can basically sit back and watch everything the target does online – I highly doubt that people will resist the temptation to use it in all sorts of dubious circumstances. I guarantee that if PRISM holds up to the scrutiny, we're going to have people demanding to use it to catch pedophiles, then drug dealers, then rogue traders and finally just about anyone "suspected" of a crime.

Think about it: if it's easy enough for the local sheriff's department to obtain a no-knock warrant for suspected pot dealers, imagine how much easier it will be for them to get a judge to sign off on spying on one's online activities. PRISM is not like those enormous satellites the NSA uses to intercept signals from space — it's much, much more easily scaled down, and probably not all that unwieldy technologically speaking. I'll bet it's so easy to use that even the dumbest agents could start using it in minutes (this may be the most alarming thing about PRISM). Most annoyingly, it has been put in place with the cooperation of companies we are paying good money to protect our privacy. And, as Bill Gates said, "if there's a court order for companies to do things it's typical that they're obeyed." So there you go. Judge Blackrobe says "OK, go ahead, take a look at that fellow," and next thing you know agent Blacksuit gets to enjoy the little scene your girlfriend or wife treats you to over the webcam, and maybe record it for his buddies. Wonderful…

The saddest thing about this intrusive program is that it won't work very well for real, hardcore terrorists. If even I – a tech amateur whose work in intelligence was limited purely to text – have suspected the existence of this capability for the last ten years, they must have assumed it long ago. Criminals adjust very quickly to surveillance. If people can smuggle things into high security prisons and manage to get away with all sorts of shenanigans despite 24-hour surveillance, it follows that this latest surveillance tool will work best on the unsuspecting — the innocent. It won't really make us much more secure, but it will make us more vulnerable, and that's why it's a problem.

Naked Woman Goes Missing in Northwest Woods

W.F. Price · 11 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A search is on for a young woman who wandered into the Northwest woods wearing nothing but a fanny pack with a compass and small knife — not even shoes. Maureen Kelly left a campground at Canyon Creek in the Gifford Pinchot National Forest at about 5PM on a "spiritual quest," according to friends, who called authorities at midnight when she failed to return.

My first thoughts were that the girl was intoxicated – maybe tripping on some mushrooms – and perhaps upset over something. The forests of SW Washington are very thick and dark, and when the sun falls low they are much harder to navigate than open fields. There are rushing creeks and rivers swollen with snowmelt this time of year, the nights are too cold for bare skin, and the terrain is difficult. I'm afraid the girl may have succumbed to exposure overnight. A very serious danger is a fall into a creek, which could quickly chill the body enough to lead to hypothermia.

I hope she's alright, but whenever someone gets lost in the woods it's a race against time. The survivors are, more often than not, healthy young men; the older folks, women and children rarely make it.

When I heard about the story, it gave me pause to reflect on the frailty of humans unprotected against the elements. And then I thought of how self exposure, as in slutwalkers and FEMEN, has been reframed as a right in the West.

This girl went alone, nude, into a place where she is very unlikely to run into a man, and for that she may well die. It's something I hadn't considered before in this debate over baring it all — that women's freedom to expose themselves relies in most of the world on the protection of men. If all these slutwalkers were to march in minimal clothing right into a wilderness devoid of men, most would be dead of exposure within a couple days' time. I am sure they know as much, so it leads one to wonder what their real point was. I don't think the marchers and protesters are actually calling for men not to assault them as much as they are for men to protect them, and to create a safe environment for them.

Sadly, it may be that Maureen Kelly was doing the same thing in her own misguided way. She announced she was going on a "spiritual quest" without any clothes, and wandered off. She walked a bit, and nobody followed, so she walked a bit more. Still, no one came for her, so she went farther, and then it got dark…

Now many men are looking for her, but it may be too late.

What a poignant simile for our society.

British Columbia: Children not entitled to father without mother's consent

W.F. Price · 12 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

British Columbia may now have the dubious distinction of having the worst family law on earth or, in other words, the most "progressive." I reported on the new BC Family Law Act back in March, and it's one of those things that just gets worse and worse the more you learn about it.

The first thing to come to light in the press is that you can be automatically married simply by living with someone for two years, which means they can sue you for a very real divorce. Another thing that can trigger marriage is getting a woman pregnant. But it turns out that this has an optional clause for women: if she doesn't want you to be the kid's official father, there isn't much you can do about it. Even if you know the kid is yours, you have to jump through all sorts of hoops simply to be approved by the state and then granted the title "father."

> A Sunshine Coast man has challenged the constitutionality of the new Family Law Act in a bid to prevent a child conceived during casual sex, and its mother, from moving to Alberta.
>
> The names of the twentysomethings are being withheld, but Gibsons lawyer Judith Wilson represents the man, who is trying to establish a connection to the infant and obtained an interim order in provincial court to block the woman's planned move and obtain a paternity test.
>
> "I argued when we got the interim order for guardianship that the Legislature could not have possibly have intended to deprive a child — on the face of it — of the right to their dad," Wilson said. "It just didn't seem to wash."
>
> Unless the mother agrees, Wilson said, the new law forces biological fathers into court to prove a relationship and gain visitation or other rights.
>
> "The rules of the act say the mom has to agree, you have to have visited the child, or you have to have a pattern of looking after the child — which applies to (an estranged) father or someone who has had access to the child," Wilson said.
>
> "But, even if the mom agrees, you still have to have a criminal record check, you have to have a (Ministry of Children's and Families) check so that they can say there is no bad stuff in its files against you — you have to prove prima facie you're not a bad guy."

I can see exactly where this will go. A significant fraction of mothers will abscond with the baby and the guy will have no option unless he has tens of thousands of dollars on hand to fight it in court, so he'll give up, lick his wounds and move on. But this won't be where it ends.

Some years down the road when the child has been comfortably removed from the father and prevented from developing a relationship with him, she'll look him up and hit him with a paternity suit demanding back child support with annual interest tacked on, and he'll be ordered to pay it. Mark my words — this will happen to many poor suckers out there. If there's anything in the law preventing women from changing their minds and identifying the father later to get retroactive support I'll eat my hat.

What is sick about this law is that it gives women full legal power over every aspect of reproduction and childrearing, and men none at all. This is "equality" feminist style. Children's concerns, naturally, are secondary if considered at all.

Amazingly, this law gives women the ability to not only throw the real father out of the child's life, but to substitute another guy and then ID him as the father if he took the kid out to McDonald's or the movies a few times. The law makes no distinction between the child's biological father and any other guy. It's really all just up to mom — whatever she thinks is in her best interests.

From here on out, any man in British Columbia who dates a single mother should be considered an imbecile. This negative incentive may be the one good thing about the law — it will all but guarantee that single mothers have a hard time finding replacement daddies, and that might make some of them think twice about trying.

However, this is a disaster for children. By declaring fathers optional, the law suggests that children have no right to a father. If it stands, judges will not be able to use the best interests of the child in determining whether or not the father will have a relationship with them. It is a step backward in human evolution to a time when the concept of fatherhood didn't exist. This means it is probably a step back to before the evolution of homo sapiens, perhaps to homo erectus or some other troglodyte precursor.

For men, this is simply irrefutable evidence that family law in BC has finally gone around the bend. When it's "heads she wins tails you lose" every single time, and you don't even get a consolation weekend with your kid, it's time to stop even trying to work within the system and start fighting it.

For Canadian men, I'd recommend appealing to the United Nations or for help from some other country outside Canada in pressuring your deranged legislators. Your government clearly isn't willing to deal reasonably with its male citizens, so its time to start letting the rest of the world know about the abuses taking place in British Columbia.

Economists' Poll Predicts First Female Fed Chief in 2014

W.F. Price · 12 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A Reuters poll found that 40 out of 44 surveyed economists think vice chair Janet Yellen is most likely to replace Ben Bernanke:

> The poll found that an overwhelming 40 of 44 economists said Yellen, the former president of the San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank, will take over for her boss in February 2014. Support for her nomination was strong but less decisive, with 23 of 38 economists backing Yellen's bid for the top job.
>
> Yellen, a 66-year old economist who is seen as a monetary policy dove, has held the No. 2 spot at the central bank since 2010. She has been a forceful advocate of the aggressive steps taken under Bernanke to spur U.S. economic growth and boost employment.
>
> "If President Obama nominates Janet Yellen, it would be a feather in his cap, as the first president to nominate a female Fed chairman," said Ellen Zentner, an economist at Nomura.

It would certainly be characteristic of Barack Obama to appoint a woman to lead the fed, as he bases a number of appointments on gender, and has habitually relied on women to shore up political support.

What Edward Snowden Left Behind

W.F. Price · 12 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Whatever else we may think of the man, one thing you can't say is that he had nothing going for him here in the US. At 29 he was living in Hawaii and pulling down $200k while dating a professional dancer with an absolutely superb physique.

Most of us can only scratch our heads in dumb amazement at his decision to toss it all away, but that's just the thing of it; the men who have the balls to pull off these spectacular acts of defiance are just the ones who can pull these kinds of women.

Now that he's a world famous fugitive, he'll have access to even more of them, assuming he can avoid being extradited and locked up in supermax for the rest of the millennium (or machine-gunned in some dark alley in Hong Kong).

Isn't it just a hell of a world out there?

Following the Money

BC Dad · 13 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

From 1935 until 1974, the Canadian government created the new money it required through the Central Bank of Canada, then spent it into circulation, including building the world's third largest navy, recovering from the Great Depression, and financing its WWII contribution, without significant debt.

After that period, the creation of money was devolved almost solely onto private banks, with government borrowing money from them instead (which is how most money is now created), at interest. The result was significant debt, with interest costs ballooning to ten times or more of the principal borrowed.

Whereas previously $40 billion in new money resulted in $40 billion injected directly into bureaucracy, infrastructure, health care, public services, employment and so forth, it now results in an additional $400 billion of debt through the magic of compound interest, the re-payment of which is extracted by force from taxpayers, who are also obliged to pay for the mechanisms of force used against them.

Creating money through private banks contravenes both the Canadian Constitution of 1867 and the US Constitution. Obviously, private banking powers (the IMF, the World Bank, the BIS) provided government with a significant 'incentive' (threat? ideology?) to choose this path, but in reality the majority of new money goes to the owners and executives of the world's financial cartels and corporate conglomerates, instead of being spent into circulation.

> The question 'why has wealth inequality risen so dramatically in recent decades?' has its answer right there, as plain as the nose on your face. It is literally that simple.

As well, the interest due (money) must also be created, generating a situation in which the money supply always increases, leading in turn to a need for constant economic growth, and the likelihood of inflation.

Justification as always comes through the 'trickle-down' theory, which states that if the super-wealthy have enough riches, a sufficient trifle will inescapably drip onto the rest of the population. Except, as corporate and other cash balances show, it doesn't.

The 'this money is capital necessary for investment' argument fails as well, since investment cannot take place when the citizens have no money to spend on goods and services, and indeed no investment is in fact taking place despite unprecedented cash balances and profits by banking, corporate and large private interests.

Add the cost of bail-outs to the taxpayers' bill, and it is difficult to escape the conclusion that our own governments are actively complicit in the redistribution of wealth, in defiance of both free-market AND socialist political imperatives. Oddly enough, or perhaps not, there's no mention of this fact in the 'social contract' which none of us signed but are forced to comply with, even as the terms of the 'contract' are routinely rewritten for the convenience of our rulers.

The MSM has been hugely effective in helping acclimate the citizenry to this Ponzi scheme run by our bureaucrats. Indeed, given the concentration of media ownership in the Western world (Canada in particular), this was and is inevitable.

The American Federal Reserve is the U.S. equivalent of the Bank of Canada but is privately owned and operated by banking cartels, and instead of being by-passed as in Canada, it actively calls the shots in the money creation scheme, without any oversight or accountability. The outcome is the same, or perhaps worse, since monetary policy is entirely governed by an institution whose obligation to ordinary citizens is precisely zero.

Consider this: a deposit at a local bank is redeemable on demand. But, if all the people who had deposits in that bank asked for them back on the same day, only about 10%, and probably a lot fewer, would actually get their money before the bank collapsed and closed its doors for good.

In the real world, knowingly making contracts which cannot be honored is called fraud. In the fractional reserve banking scheme, it is fraud whose purpose is to transfer wealth to the people who run the system.

Government, thanks in part to the break-down of families and the loss of traditional values and ethics, has degenerated into a mechanism intended to redirect the flow of wealth.

Men need to ask themselves an important question: why does this vast, entangled and corrupt mechanism utilize the irrational ideology of feminism as one of its tools? Because it enables and enhances the disempowerment of the only citizens (ordinary men) who might otherwise, with some hope of success, object.

Helicopter Reporter Getting M to F Sex Change says Brain Shrinking

W.F. Price · 13 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Bob Tur, who covered the LA riots from a helicopter, is undergoing so-called "gender-reassignment," which involves surgery and the use of artifical hormones. Mr. Tur claims he was born with a female brain, but evidently not female enough, because the hormones he is taking are causing his brain to shrink and become more "feminized:"

> "There have been incredible changes that happen physically and mentally. Mental changes have already happened. The brain is plastic, so its gotten smaller and feminized. I'm thinking the same way a woman would think…"

That's the first time I've heard that female hormones actually shrink the brain, but it does sound plausible, as it is easy enough to shrink one's brain with other chemicals, such as a daily pint or more of whiskey.

I'd like to hear more from Tur about what "thinking like a woman" entails. I'm not sure he can give us an entirely accurate idea of how women think, because, after all, he has always been male, and he'll never know for sure whether women think like he does on female hormones, but he may have some insights.

Is it just me, or is gender reassignment becoming something of a national trend? Perhaps men have been so thoroughly culturally demonized and legally handicapped in our society that a number of them are deciding to "switch sides" so to speak. It really looks more to me like religious conversion than anything else.

UK Hospitals Hit with Wave of Obese Youngsters, Teenage Girls Lead Way

W.F. Price · 13 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As society crumbles in what used to be the center of the world's greatest empire, childhood obesity rates have exploded in England and Wales, sending thousands children to hospitals for problems such as asthma, diabetes and sleep apnea.

> Admissions rocketed to 3,806 youngsters in 2009 from 872 in 2000, a study by Imperial College in London has discovered, with teenage girls accounting for the biggest increase.
>
> "The burden of obesity is usually thought to have its serious consequences in adulthood, but we now see it manifesting earlier, in childhood," said Dr Sonia Saxena from Imperial's School of Public Health, who led the study.
>
> "It's important that doctors speak to patients about their weight, because any attempt to help their patients must begin by recognising the problem."
>
> Over the last decade, a total of 20,885 young people aged between five and 19 received hospital treatment for conditions linked to obesity.

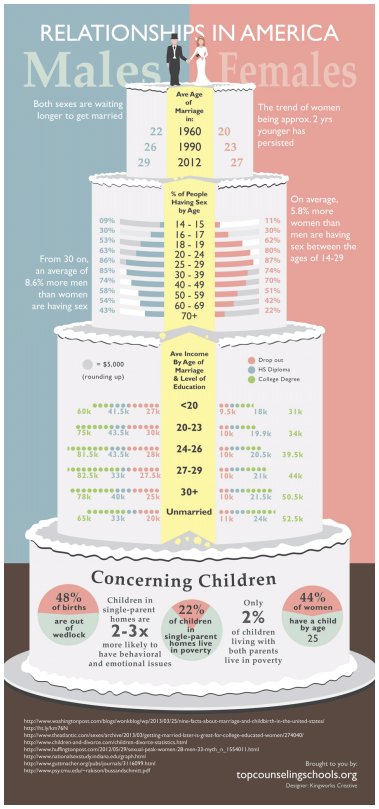
The rise of obesity in the UK has apparently happened very rapidly, over only a decade. While obesity is linked to health problems, I wonder why people don't often mention the quality of life factor as well. Surely it must be far less enjoyable to live in a country where a large proportion of young women are too fat to be attractive.

I think this may partly explain why British men are so fond of vacationing in Spain and Eastern Europe.

Relationships in America: an Infographic

W.F. Price · 14 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A reader sent in an infographic on marriage and relationships in the US, and I thought I'd pass it along for others. It contains several data points that people aren't commonly aware of, such as the fact that women have more sex earlier than men, and children of single mothers are over 1,000% more likely to live in poverty than those who live with both parents.



Source: Top Counseling Schools

Scientists: Men have Always Preferred Youth

W.F. Price · 14 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter Keyster just linked a BBC article blaming men for women's menopause, which is kind of a stupid premise given that evolution is shaped by environment rather than conscious preferences.

> Researchers have long been puzzled as to why it appears that human are the only species where females cannot reproduce throughout their lives.
>
> Previous theories had proposed a "grandmother effect". This suggests that women lose their fertility at an age where they might not live to see a child grow, and instead are available to care for younger women's children.
>
> The menopause was therefore seen as the block to older women from continuing to reproduce.
>
> But this latest theory suggests things work the other way around, and that it is the lack of reproduction that has given rise to menopause.
>
> Using computer modelling, the team from McMaster's concluded "preferential mating" was the evolutionary answer – men of all ages choosing younger women as partners.
>
> That meant there was "no purpose" in older women continuing to be fertile.
>
> Prof Rama Singh, an evolutionary geneticist who led the study, said men choosing younger mates were "stacking the odds" against continued fertility.
>
> He told the BBC: "There is evidence in human history; there was always a preference for younger women."

I think human males' preference for younger females might be a result of our partially monogamous nature. Of course, humans are not strictly monogamous, but we are largely so. What this means is that if a man secures a mate, it's important that he finds one with the most reproductive potential. If chances are that you're going to be stuck with one woman, from a genetic fitness standpoint you'd be best advised to choose a younger one so you can maximize reproductive success.

If humans were mostly polygynous like many herd animals, female age wouldn't be as important as the total number of females, because you could impregnate lots of them in a short amount of time and replicate your genes quickly without having to worry so much about their fertility down the road. For some supporting evidence, I'd point to the fact that in polygynous cultures it is common for the man's first wife to be older than he is.

So, I propose that preference for youth could be a result of the human tendency to engage in pair-bonding and monogamous reproduction.

As for menopause, the extended childhood of humans is likely a better explanation than any other. Pygmy women hit menopause by 30, and then die before the age of 50. Pygmies are sexually mature at about 12, hitting peak fertility at 16. Modern humans hit menopause at 50, sexually mature at about 16, fertility peaks in their early 20s, and they have a lifespan of around 70. Human women seem to be designed to last about as long as it would take their last children to become fully fertile.

Enjoy Father's Day, but Remember the Deprived

W.F. Price · 15 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, I drove up to Bellingham to pick up my kids, braving the terrible traffic created by the recent collaps of the I-5 bridge over the Skagit river in Mt. Vernon. On the way back, we took the alternate detour west of Burlington, inching our way through bucolic rural neighborhoods in the fertile Skagit Valley. Neatly plowed fields alternated with immaculate lawns in front of tidy little houses and churches, horses and other livestock happily grazing here and there. Above us, doves – not pigeons – gracefully flew from treetop to treetop.

Despite the traffic, it was a nice little diversion, and the kids held up very well on the long drive.

Being a father is something I've been forced by circumstance not to take for granted, but I have to admit that I have it a lot better than many. There are too many men out there who have lost all connections to their children through no fault of their own, and too many children growing up with that empty space in their heart from lack of a parent.

So, on Father's Day, we should all remember these people who have been unjustly deprived of their natural rights as parents and children. We should remember that in most cases they were not deprived by tragic circumstance or Act of God, but by the willful, evil hand of heartless people.

So even as we do our best to appreciate our children and give thanks for the blessings of family, we should remain vigilant against the homewreckers, the child-snatchers and the modern slavers who remain in a position of power in our society. Unfortunately, in our time Father's Day should be a day not only of celebration, but a day of remembrance and resolve.

That said, enjoy your time with your kids, your father and the important men and boys in your life, and cherish the memory of those who have passed.

Happy Father's Day!

Alienated Father Defaces Queen's Portrait in Cry for Help

W.F. Price · 16 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In a callous article in the Telegraph, Ian Douglas declares that desperate father Tim Haries, who has been kicked out of his children's lives, "set back dads' rights by decades" when he wrote "help" on a painting of Queen Elizabeth with spray paint. Douglas falsely assumes that fathers actually have any rights, or have won any. The fact is that there are no fathers' rights — as far as I know there is nothing in the law that says that fathers have any rights to their children. Sure, there may be guidelines for visitation that are sometimes enforced – if the father has the resources to go to court – but if courts can throw fathers out of their children's lives on mere unproven accusations (or for no reason at all) fathers have no rights.

So what Tim Haries did could not possibly have set back anyone's rights. His plea for help, which caused some 5,000 pounds of damage to the painting, comes off as remarkably tame considering his plight. Here's a man who has had his children seized, for God's sake. A little bit of spray paint in light of that is nothing. If I were in his position and thought it would do any good, I'd take a jackhammer to Michaelangelo's David.

If anything fathers in the Anglo world have exercised unbelievable restraint in the face of enormous injustice. Apologists like Ian Douglas should be told, in no uncertain terms, to stuff it.

Lesbian Sex in Movies “Unrealistic”

W.F. Price · 17 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A Lesbian who teaches French at Columbia says that artistic portrayals of lesbianism are unrealistic, exploitative, and a “spectator sport … by men, for men…”

> Cinematic portrayals of sex between women have often been seen as voyeuristic and exploitative. Unlike sex scenes between men, lesbianism is assumed to have wide appeal — straight women are curious, and straight men will apparently line up in any weather. Actual lesbians, and possibly gay men expressing solidarity, have generally been the only demographic offended by such scenes, but that doesn’t stop us from buying tickets, if only to see exactly how we are being exploited.

Does lesbian sex really have such wide appeal? I was under the impression that it was more of a curiosity than a standard male fantasy, invariably involving attractive women rather than “realistic” lesbians. If films included realistic lesbian sex, would anyone want to watch them?

Would even lesbians want to watch them?

Given the scarcity of pornography made for lesbian consumption (as opposed to the lucrative industry of gay male porn), I think the answer is pretty clear.

Making the Most of Two Americas

W.F. Price · 18 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Taking a couple diversions from the usual straight shot on I-5 last weekend, I travelled both west and east of the interstate to cross the Skagit river, testing alternate routes around the collapsed I-5 bridge over the river. To the west I drove through the rural Skagit Valley, past tidy homes with immaculate lawns and neatly plowed fields. To the east I drove up highway 9, through thick forests and picturesque lakes in the the Cascade foothills. Both routes are all but invisible from the freeway, which runs through the lowest, flattest points and thereby cuts most of the land off from view.

Driving up I-5, the surrounding landscape looks beautiful but foreboding — there are towering, snow-capped mountains looming over thickly wooded, gray-green hills. To the west, Puget Sound and the Strait of Juan de Fuca stretch out toward the Pacific, hemmed in by the Olympic mountains and interrupted here and there by dark islands that rise out of the water like the backs of giant leviathons. This is the outsider's view of a grand, imposing natural world that looks wild and inhospitable from the vantage point of the densely populated urban strip that runs north between the mountains and the sound. It's an impression that is comforting to many city people, who imagine they are living in a populated island in the midst of the wilderness, both close to and yet insulated from the wild. But it isn't really an accurate impression.

My little diversions reminded me of what I knew conceptually, but too often ignore from my neighborhood in the middle of the largest metropolitan area north of the Bay Area and west of Chicago. It reminded me that there is a civilization beyond the city, and a surprisingly diverse and healthy one at that. I should explain what I mean by diverse: it is not diverse in the polyglot, multicultural urban sense, but rather in terms of lifestyle. There are at least three general ways of life in exurban western Washington: the coastal, the farmland and the forest. There is significant overlap, but you are generally one or another depending on occupation and neighborhood.

Most exotic to me were the farmers, who live in the river valleys that sweep down from the mountains to the sea. To a city dweller, the farmers are at once familiar and distinct. They live near towns on orderly roads in neighborhoods that have an aura of both prosperity and thrift. Aside from the dimensions of their properties and the ubiquitous livestock, there is not that much to distinguish where they live from a conservative, middle-class suburban neighborhood, but there is an important difference: their homes are also their offices. They are people who work where they live. Rather than commute many miles to some sequestered parcel of land that serves as an office park, they get up and go to work in their front yards. Even those who work in town have a commute that most city people would envy. I find it ironic that despite lower population density, these people still manage to keep their work closer to home.

The coastal peoples are those who dwell in working towns on Puget Sound. Many work in shipping, transportation and associated industries such as timber mills and refineries, or the US Navy, which has a large presence in the area. They are essentially industrial workers, and in many respects closer to city people than other rural people, both politically and in terms of lifestyle. The biggest difference is that they have direct access to the bounty of nature, and don't need to make an expedition out of a boating or fishing trip, or hunting in the woods for that matter.

The forest dwellers are a mixed lot. The main industry in the forests is logging, but only a minority actually works in that. The communities in the woods make do with a mixed economy of timber, farming, service and government jobs, and contain a significant number of retirees and urban refugees. In many respects, the forest is the most beautiful landscape in the region. While driving along on the back roads, you'll be following some winding creek through rolling, thickly forested hills, and suddenly the scene will open up and a pristine lake or sweeping valley will be revealed. The dwellings range from run down shacks on gravel roads to giant lakeside estates, so there is a bit of a feudal air to the area, but that may be explained by the fact that natural beauty lures the poor as well as the rich.

What is remarkable about all these communities is that, despite being essentially invisible from an urban perspective, they are quite robust, and at least here in Washington state they are growing.

However, according to census statistics, despite modest population growth rural areas continue to decline relative to cities, which are gaining population from immigration. But the statistics can be misleading, because metropolitan areas have been defined as including a good deal of what is essentially rural land, so a farmer or logger who lives in east Snohomish county would be counted as “urban,” despite having little engagement with the city.

What I suspect is happening is that there is a great deal of movement from traditional suburbs and cities to nearby “exurban” or rural neighborhoods, and a change in lifestyle that isn’t reflected in standard population statistics. So most of these neighborhoods and towns I described are technically considered “urban,” despite being culturally and practically rural.

From any one perspective, it’s difficult to get a sense of the changing texture of the American population, but if one avoids the main routes, as I was forced to do by a collapsed bridge, and travels through every stage from city center to wilderness an emergent cultural bifurcation reveals itself. The contrast between central Seattle and the growing exurban neighborhoods is stark. Instead of rainbow flags adorning shops and homes, the stars and stripes flies above. Instead of dogs in parks, there are children. Community churches in the city tend to be unobtrusive and tucked away, whereas they are prominent in the “invisible” communities. In fact, what may best characterize the difference between urban and non-urban America is that those things that are hidden in the city are on display in the country, and vice versa. And, for all I know, the city is as invisible to the people in the country as their communities are to us city dwellers.

So how is this relevant to men in the US? It suggests that we have a choice, and perhaps more autonomy in living the kind of life we prefer than we did in the past. Now that it’s clear that two Americas are emerging, each with its own perks and drawbacks, we can make use of this new reality to pursue our life goals.

If you’d like to raise a family, for example, it would be best to arrange your life so that you could live outside of the urban cultural area. If, on the other hand, you have no desire to get married and raise children, the urban culture offers more in the way of companionship and convenience for the single man (although this is not a hard and fast rule). Cities obviously offer more sexual variety and opportunity, but they tend to limit reproductive potential. There are many other differences. Do you prefer “ethnic” food or fresh food? Do you like a quiet afternoon fishing in the river, or a shopping excursion downtown? Do you like being free from official oversight, or do you want a cop on every corner to keep you safe?

I think we’re at a unique point in US history in which men have a great deal of choice if they are aware of the options. Personally, I find it liberating to know that I am not tied down to either culture, and with some planning I may be able to enjoy the best of both.

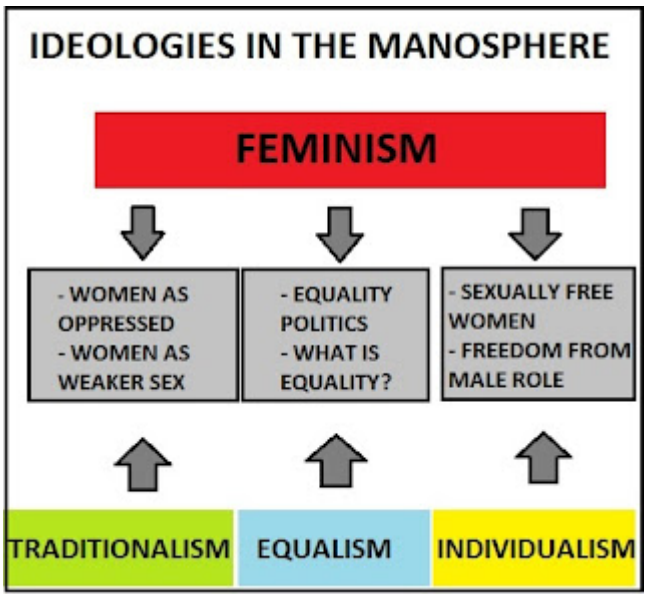
Main ideologies in the manosphere

Featured Guest · 19 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Henry Laasanen

There are 3 main ideologies in the “enlightened” manosphere:

1. TRADITIONALISM (traditional sex roles, family, theory of gender relations)
2. EQUALISM (MRA, masculism, equality politics, theory of equality)
3. INDIVIDUALISM (MGTOW, PUA, nihilism, hedonism)



All main ideologies in the manosphere have something in common with feminism. Traditionalists share the idea of protecting and providing for women. Equalists share the idea of equality politics and the theory of equality. Individualists celebrate freedom from the male sex role and freedom of female sexuality.

The main ideologies in the manosphere share more or less the same analysis of feminism and feminisms effects on the society.

Analysis of feminism in a nutshell

Feminism is a movement with the aim to give more power (and options) to women and reduce the power (and the options) of men. Feminism creates a state that operates as a substitute husband, distributing wealth from men to women with the goal of reducing women’s dependency on men.

Feminism creates laws that make a marriage a bad deal for men and laws, where nearly everything could be interpreted as sexual harassment.

The product of feminism is a matriarchy, where children are raised by women while men are marginalized.

Gradually men lose their motivation to contribute for the sake of the society.

In the end, the whole society is in the danger of collapse.

Traditionalists

Traditionalism is an ideology of “how gender relations in the society should be arranged”. Their answer lies in the traditional sex roles with traditional family values.

Main subcategories of traditionalism are the moral traditionalists and evolutionary biological traditionalists. Moral traditionalists highlight the wisdom of the past generations. Evolutionary biological traditionalists say that men and women are biologically different. It does no good to fight against biology.

Society can’t survive without noticing the importance of family and fathers. Feminism is an utopian ideology, which leads eventually to catastrophe by destroying families and men’s motivation.

Traditionalists think that the equalist men’s movement is (of course) right in pinpointing the fallacies of feminist equality politics. However, the equalist men’s movement doesn’t have solution to the problem of sustainable society.

While traditionalists agree that equal male reproductive rights, female conscription etc. are perfectly understandable demands from the point of equality, the equality of outcome itself is a ridiculous goal. If men’s equality will become true some day, society might be even sillier place than today’s feminist state.

Traditionalist understands the thinking behind the MGTOW and PUA ideologies, but in the end they present a nihilist and hedonistic choice by abandoning any hope for the successful society.

Traditionalist might ask the critical question: will the MGTOW and PUA men ever be as happy as man in a traditional marriage? Self centered nihilism is not a way for a long lasting happiness.

So, any hope for the society to survive lies in the traditionalist ideology.

Equalists

Equalism in the MRM is an ideology of “what equality is and what equality politics should be”.

Equalists often agree in some degree with traditionalist analysis of sustainable society. However, we live in the real world, where feminism has won every battle with traditionalists since the 60′s. Traditionalists are so badly beaten that a person with conservative values is often ridiculed.

The truth is that we have equality politics and it is going to stay that way for a long time. Either we let feminists run their equality show and continue their one-sided propaganda or we fight back by telling the male side of the truth of equality.

The traditionalist argument might be true: total equality of outcome might be silly and an unsustainable utopia. But we have gender equality politics and we want equality for men too, no matter how silly it might sound.

Feminists spread false theories of equality and patriarchy. Should we just be silent when we know the truth? Hell no!

We don't claim to know the answer for sustainable and reachable society, but we know for sure what equality should be for men too and we say it loud and clear.

And there is one other big problem with traditionalists. A large number of traditionalists are irritating "man up" white knights, who set up different standards for men than for women. We don't want to support any part of white knight traditionalists, because it advances indirectly female victimization and male demonization.

Individualists

Individualism is an opportunistic ideology to"benefit individually from the liberal loopholes of feminism".

Life is short and you should make most of it! You should prioritize your own pleasures, not what the state or women want you to do.

Enjoy the liberal ideas of feminism. Feminism supports your freedom from male sex role demands. And of course: feminism has freed womens sexuality for your benefit. Nowhere in human history has the average man had so many opportunities to get lucky!

Feminists have erased traditional morals. You are not expected to provide and protect. Exploit unintended consequences of feminism.

Traditionalist may have a point when they say that "the way to long term happiness is in the traditional marriage". However, marriage as a way to happiness has become too risky. And worse, there are no traditional women left for the "good old" marriage. Instead we have fat masculine sluts, who divorce you for your last penny.

The equalist men's movement are (of course) right in their equality arguments, but there is probably no hope to get real traction for the men's movement. Equalists have no powerful allies: they are against the coalition of conservatives and feminists. It's a battle that can't be won.

If I don't have anything useful to do in the evenings, I might write a line or two about men's rights, but I don't want to be too involved with the hopeless task of advancing men's issues.

Equalism might be a fun hobby to troll feminists, but it shouldn't be taken too seriously.

Where I stand

At my younger years I was a wannabe-nerd-PUA, nowdays I am masculinist and half-MGTOW in a relationship.

The equalist and individualist ideologies are easily combinable. In my public speach I am an equalist, but in in my personal life I am a half-MGTOW.

My recommendation for my fellow men is the combined equality/PUA/MGTOW-ideology.

I might consider becoming a traditionalist some day: just give me the traditional woman and male friendly legistlation first.

This writing was inspired by Dalrock's blog: What is the manosphere?

Why the Rationalization Hamster is Right

Ethical · 20 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Few creatures are more persecuted in the manosphere than the female rationalization hamster, the part of her consciousness which churns out the ridiculously broken and contradictory logic needed to justify doing whatever her "feelings" compel her to. I myself revile the rodent. I've had no success treating it as an equal and trying to tame it with reason. Every attempt ended in either playfully ignoring the hamster in exasperation, or eventually losing patience, and heartlessly clubbing it to death with shame, ridicule, contempt, or whatever other forms of verbal violence happened to be at hand.

Even now I won't say the treatment was ill deserved. Though I'm steadily removing myself from reach of its harm in the present, for most of my life I wasn't one of those men who could listen to the hamster indulgently. Growing up in a single mother home and living at the hamster's whim doesn't encourage a man to be generous when any woman launches into hamsterese. Having my ears filled with it inspired the worst in me. I always prided myself on carefully considering other people's arguments, so I resented every moment I spent listening to the hamster as if there were hope of discerning meaning from the verbal noise. Hearing such broken logic imposed on myself and others, the utter lack of humility of it all inspired a complete lack of pity in me. I found myself observing with spiteful satisfaction as the hamster talked its owners into believing they could rely on being able to start a family at 40, or that fat was beautiful, or that they didn't need a man to raise children. The truth of a hard cruel world would discipline them into either listening humbly or suffering. I didn't care which. Watching smugly, it would never have occurred to me that one day I'd learn that the person who should be listening humbly might be me. Because that one day I would learn the "rationalization hamster" was right.

The Contradiction

Yes. You read correctly. I know that from this point on some won't give this article the benefit of the doubt and will be too disgusted to read till my explanation comes. Admittedly this might be a wild departure, but this is one of the last bastions of free male speech on the web. If the truth can't be spoken here to the fearless red pill man, then where can it be?
But back to the primary question: if a woman's rationalization hamster works only to justify her delay of child-bearing until fertility costs as much as a new car, and other questionable life choices, how could it possibly be right? That an inherently illogical process could somehow be more beneficial than cold hard logic goes against all common sense.

Consensus and the Hamster

It looks that way, that is, until you start looking at some of the truly stellar achievements of hamster logic. Where men pride themselves on intellectual discipline, that is restricting themselves only to whatever positions can be justified rationally, the rationalization hamster allows women to achieve consensus on ANY issue where they merely FEEL the same, which they take comfort doing in great herds.

Take the question of equality between men and women. We men claim superiority in our logic, and even greater pride in having the strength to stand behind that logic alone. But while this solo male approach is a great asset when solving patentable engineering problems, it's a great liability when solving social ones. Where men break into innumerable different factions over the specific meaning of "equality" because each man adds up the facts slightly differently, women are FAR more effective at reaching and acting on consensus based on their communal FEELINGS about the issue. Women don't need to identify whether in objective terms its even true that women are treated unequally. It's true if they FEEL it. Women's success in gathering huge financial and political support for women's causes is in part based on this advantage.

Value-based vs. Objective Factual Reasoning

The difference boils down to women's tendency towards value-based reasoning versus men's tendency towards objective factual reasoning. Because it's easier to come to consensus on values rather than logic, value-based reasoning provides advantages on decisions requiring social consensus. Of course value-based reasoning is also related to the rationalization hamster in that the hamster has to start spinning its wheels afterwards to justify those value-based choices. However our contempt for the hamster's confused and convoluted path shouldn't distract from appreciating the sheer power of the value-based reasoning that fuels it. As a number of prominent psychologists have pointed out, in comparison with strict logical deduction, for certain problem domains the human brain is simply faster and more precise at using this value-based reasoning to add up the bewildering array of facts in front of us to come up with an immediate answer.

For example when a woman is asked her opinion about a value statement such as "women should be considered equal to men", her mind instantaneously and subconsciously interprets and assigns relative weights to possible meanings such as: "I could be asked to do things men do and get put in danger," or "I could be allowed to do things men do and reap additional benefits." In a dangerous environment like a war zone the weight of a woman's experience might produce an immediate negative emotional reaction to the statement "women should be treated as equal." She'd be right. In such an environment equality is an outright threat to her safety. On the other hand, in the safe nanny-state of most western liberal democracies, with the weight of a woman's experience telling her she lacks any need for caution, the same statement "women should be considered equal to men" might produce an immediate positive reaction. Here she would be right as well , as she has no likely negative consequences to fear and everything to gain. Either way, her value-based reasoning – her "feelings" – respond instantaneously. The statistics (facts) might not be available, and the (logical) reasoning frameworks to process those facts might not be discovered till some time far in the future. But no matter. Her value-based reasoning tells her what's true right now.

Made this Way for Good Reason

Anecdotally, though I've met some women who were quite a bit more logical than I can ever hope to be, women on the whole are far more predisposed to make value-based decisions. I suspect they're more psychologically adapted to do so. From an evolutionary or intelligent design standpoint such an adaptation would likely have arisen because human societies gained some advantage from it. I suspect it helped women build consensus on issues just as it does today, enabling them to band together to help each other in ancestral human tribes or villages. But if we imagine the rationalization hamster may have once protected us by providing social cohesion in our ancestral environments, now there's little doubt it is literally killing our sons and tearing our societies apart. What changed?

Value-based reasoning might have been optimal for allowing women to excel at sharing food or cooperatively caring for children in societies where (largely male) logic could be relied upon to build the bridges. But value-based reasoning seems less optimal in today's de facto matriarchies where it's taken over the wheel and not only been put in the position of caring for us, but has also gained prominence in every other aspect of life, in effect imposing itself on the work of building the bridges too. However the fact that value-based reasoning doesn't excel at the helm of societies doesn't negate the usefulness of value-based reasoning as a whole, or the benefit of women being predisposed to it. Men and women have always been different, and in the time scales of evolution, these differences likely have helped human societies thrive. By this reasoning the problem is not the hamster per se, but whatever neutered the hamster's male counterpart, the balancing force that in the past limited the hamster to the domains where it benefits us all.

Extinction of the Hamster's Natural Competition

By enabling women to support each other at all costs within the ancestral environment, the hamster did at one time appear to benefit us all. It's only now that the male counterpart of reason and responsibility has been neutered that the hamster has come off the chain to benefit women alone. Add in men's predisposition to protect women, and the current enslavement of men, such as with alimony and child support, is the only possible consequence. As is misandry. Once we'd been enslaved, the anger that feminists and white knights have for men who try to free themselves was inevitable.

To them a man's labor is not his own, but the property of the woman who lays claim to it by marrying him, by cohabiting with him, or by having children she claims to be his; whether biologically or by virtue of him having acted like a father. These traditional mechanisms are only the wealth transfers to individual women. Increasingly through woman focused government benefits combined with male focused taxes, a man's labor is also the property of any and every woman merely by virtue of him being a citizen of her country and him being allowed to live there.

A Slave-owners Rights to Her Property

If this is an innate part of woman's nature it's almost a waste of energy to combat the hamsterese spewing from the likes of Jezebel or Feministing except in so far as to let other men see the logical disconnect. We'll probably never have much success using (largely male) factual logic to dispel their (largely female) value-based reasoning, especially when it's their nature to protect their right to own a man's labor. Literally fearing men who've freed themselves, the only time they want to engage men on the subject is when they call their white knights to violently enforce their entitlement to that male labor. They despise men who try to escape in any way, whether by hiding their assets or income, or by becoming expats, not unlike the slave master during the days of black slavery in America. To the master any slave who ran away must have seemed just as evil. By running away the slave was depriving him (the master) of valuable property. The slave might even be encouraging other slaves to flee. He was putting the master's livelihood at risk, and therefore putting the master's family and all that the master held dear in peril as well. In the slave-owners view it's for the very good of all society that such violence against his interests as escaping must be met with extremely violent retribution.

Castration by Disinformation

If the hamster itself is part of human nature rather than a recent introduction, perhaps the culprit that neutered male reason to set the hamster free is the silence enforced against men. Aside from men being censored from championing men's interests in the main stream, men are effectively censored from even speaking hard red pill fact-based truths. The only arguments that seem to be allowed on sensitive issues in the popular discourse are value-based arguments (like "equality is good") that inevitably favor groups traditionally seen as victims (hint: not men). This limitation firstly feminizes discourse so open discussion is not permitted, and secondly makes any discussion essentially impervious to facts, particularly hard ones (like what precisely constitutes equality in terms of opportunity and/or outcome).

This societal resistance to facts devastates men precisely because most men don't worry about it. Through our own natural male predisposition for confidence in our ability to tackle the unknown, we disdain obsessing neurotically over things we haven't experienced ourselves. Particularly when young and full of piss and vinegar, the vast majority of us men don't bother looking past the superficial mainstream media to investigate issues that don't seem to directly impact us right now. So we're powerless against a feminized education system and mass media that indoctrinates us slowly over a lifetime. And we're castrated from acting in our own interests by this misinformation we're fed.

Our confidence has been turned from an asset to an Achilles heel by the illusion of control that allows us to stride into the risks men have always had to take to win in life. Under the dangerous illusion that they're in control because they can withdraw from marriage, or even from society, young men, even on the red pill sites, actively fight against men's rights activism. They're repulsed by the idea that they're in any way vulnerable. Meanwhile for their own safety they, like all of us men, are forced to abandon pursuit of the very commitments (like marriage) by which we men best ensure we'll achieve the very things that have always given meaning to our lives, such as leaving a legacy of thriving children. We couldn't have become more separated from our own interests if someone was actively trying to exterminate us. In withdrawing so far we've lost sight of the true conflict, like the lions in circuses whose roar says "if you trespass into my domain of control I will kill you". The ringmaster knows the lion will always be wild. His job is ensuring the lion doesn't notice as the domain of his control is shrunk to the tiny circle on the floor of the cage where the ringmaster has him standing on his two hind legs, dancing in a pink tutu to the sound of an out of tune piano, for the amusement of children in the audience.

The ring around our feet is closing as each new generation of white knights gives more, as each new generation of red pill men ignores the larger struggle and retreats more, and as the older generations run further from political incorrectness. Marching along doing these things separately, we all unwittingly contribute to our enslavement by the hamster's tiny-brained whims. Unlike women who commiserate and collaborate to expand women's domain of control in order to protect themselves, in our contempt for other men's failures (e.g. victims of the family court meat grinder) our domain of control continually shrinks.

The Nature of Man

But this male vulnerability is also natural. We're built for taking risks, for gaining the insight to make some new thing work ourselves. There a reason we value opportunity rather than valuing avoiding failure. There's a reason that if something's worth doing we'll do it ourselves even if we have to do it alone. We're built to walk into the unknown, not for waiting to be being patted on the head for doing what's already been done. You won't find many men huddling together fearfully, complaining about what's held other men back and collecting group sympathy so someone will act on our behalf. Other men's failures don't apply even to us. So not surprisingly when it comes to feminism the only anti-indoctrination system men generally have to rely on is personal experience. Unfortunately this usually amounts to us having to wait until feminism happens to us personally before we can get our red pill dose.

The End Game

Human evolution may be accelerating at a faster rate than ever before. Pervasive forces increasingly select who we mate with. In the upper middle class families that are now slowly splitting away from the rest of America the hamster might even be facing slow eradication. Because in a world where women can destroy a family at will, membership in the upper middle class more and more correlates with the mother's IQ and hence her understanding of the importance of having an intact family to the outcome of her children. In the wider population however, the hamster thrives. It appears to be a trait human societies have long had, and even relied on since ancient times for social cohesion. Without discounting the immense pain the hamster has caused many male readers, the hamster is NOT the root of the disconnect between the sexes that increasingly threatens to undermine the entire western world. The real issue is that some force has neutered the hamster's male counterpart so we can no longer choose to playfully indulge the hamster, or to ignore it, or to do whatever in our own best judgment is in our or our family's interest. This force is pitting men and women against each other. As natural halves to a whole neither gender can win a war that divides us.

Given men continue to be so powerless, most likely the solution will come from the subsequent wives and girlfriends forced to put up with their man's enslavement. When their numbers grow, when the pain imposed on them ratchets too high, they'll rally themselves with value-based arguments ("father are treated unfairly"). The subset of exceptional women who'll lead them are already marshaling their rational arguments ("children have statistically better outcomes when fathers are allowed to be involved"). On a long shot the solution might be technological, some guy working in his basement might come up with a new tool finally able to disseminate that truth widely in mass media , academia, and elsewhere without censorship. Wherever the solution comes from, as the red pill continues to spread, signs are everywhere that we will find it.

Phyllis Schlafly on Including Women in the Draft

W.F. Price · 21 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A lot of men see Phyllis Schlafly as an ally in the fight against rampant feminism. She may be, but actually Schlafly is an ally of convenience. When it comes down to it, Schlafly has women's interests in mind, hence her strong opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment and, most recently, including women in the draft.

> The real war against women is the announced plan of the Obama administration, using outgoing Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta as the fall guy, to assign women for the first time in American history to fight our nation's enemies in military ground combat. That's real war, with real guns, real bullets and real deaths.
>
> This war doesn't involve only women who have volunteered to serve in our military. It's a real war against all 18-year-old American girls, because for the first time in our nation's history they will be required to sign up for the draft and be ready for a letter from Selective Service ordering them to report for military duty.

I'd say it's true that including women in the draft as combat soldiers demonstrates real indifference to the fate of women, and probably in some cases outright misogyny, because women are not by nature suited for fighting. A grown woman at her physical peak is on par with a typical 14-year-old boy, and that isn't even taking psychological differences into account.

Many will say "since women have been clamoring for "equality" in every other field, why not let them fight and die, too?" Well, that's a reasonable argument I suppose, but only if you truly don't care about whether or not the US military is effective and efficient, and if you don't care much about drafted women and the men who would have to serve alongside them.

Having women in combat would present problems not only for the women themselves, but for male soldiers as well. How would you like to go into a combat zone with a weak, slow, frail and passive woman covering you? If you got wounded, would you want to rely on a woman to pull you out of the line of fire? Would you want her running a heavy load of ammo up a hill to your position, or would you prefer a man?

The military is a necessary evil. What soldiers do is terrible stuff. Shooting, burning, stabbing and blowing people up is the kind of work that should be done only when absolutely necessary, and it should be done as quickly and conclusively as possible. Who wants a long, messy war that can't be won quickly due to battlefield ineffectiveness? Only a monster.

I suppose we should also ask whether we want battlefield equality between our troops and the enemy, because throwing women into combat will definitely blunt our edge in warfare. This push for women in combat demonstrates how absolutely out of touch with reality our "leaders" have become. There is no doubt that women are, as a rule, inferior soldiers. We have always had moral qualms about using children in war; one of the most disgusting scenes of World war II was Hitler in his last days encouraging little German boys to go out and die in a hopeless cause. And yet when there is no pressing need for it the progressives want to use women.

Some "progress"…

Phyllis Schlafly opposes women in combat because she cares about women. I oppose it because I care about people in general. Those who support this kind of equality don't care much about either.

Stephen Marche: Let There Be Socialized Daycare

W.F. Price · 22 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Of all the major magazines, I must concede that The Atlantic covers the gender debates best, but its writers tend to have blind spots that detract from the value of their articles. The problem is that they all come from the same overschooled, credentialed pool of urban scribblers, having paid their dues at the same schools, followed the same curriculum and even married the same people. Their life experiences are therefore inherently limited. Unfortunately, these days getting a job writing for a major publication requires a limited set of credentials and life experiences. This is the price we pay for the academic orthodoxy and accompanying credentialism that took hold back in the 90s.

So, every now and then a writer sees a glimpse of the wider world and has a moment of clarity, but then tragically gets it wrong anyway. Stephen Marche, an author and editor for Esquire, wrote a piece for The Atlantic this month concluding that the debate about work-life balance is not really just a women's issue, but actually it's all about why we need socialism.

A passage:

> A year after The Atlantic published Anne-Marie Slaughter's "Why Women Still Can't Have It All," the plutocratic wave of feminism continues to roll in. Sheryl Sandberg's Lean In looks to dominate the best-seller lists for months to come. Both accounts are full of stories like the iPad in the delivery room, stories of women furiously multitasking, worrying about family over champagne at a United Nations event, or diagnosing children with head lice while aboard a corporate jet. Men are mostly offstage. Slaughter, to her great credit, talks repeatedly about her husband, noting that he has done everything possible to support both her career and their two sons, including taking on the lion's share of parenting duties while she commuted for two years from Princeton to Washington, D.C. Sandberg, too, talks about her husband's role at home (in her book's dedication, she credits him with "making everything possible"). But in the ensuing discussion of gender politics, which has been conducted almost entirely by women, for women, men are far more anonymous—implacable opponents of progress in the upper echelons, helpless losers elsewhere. Meanwhile, the good husbands—the selection of whom is "the most important career choice" young women can make, according to Sandberg—are as silent as the good wives once were.
>
> Men's absence from the conversation about work and life is strange, because decisions about who works and who takes care of the children, and who makes the money and how the money is spent, are not decided by women alone or by some vague and impersonal force called society. Decisions in heterosexual relationships are made by women and men together. When men aren't part of the discussion about balancing work and life, outdated assumptions about fatherhood are allowed to go unchallenged and, far more important, key realities about the relationship between work and family are elided. The central conflict of domestic life right now is not men versus women, mothers versus fathers. It is family versus money. Domestic life today is like one of those behind-the-scenes TV series about show business. The main narrative tension is: "How the hell are we going to make this happen?" There are tears and laughs and little intrigues, but in the end, it's just a miracle that the show goes on, that everyone is fed and clothed and out the door each day.

It gives me a smile to see Stephen taking it to the Sheryl Sandbergs and Anne Marie Slaughters of the world, calling their elitist brand of matriarchal cheerleading "plutocratic feminism." Any ordinary man facing the realities of getting by and trying to raise a family at the same time would have a hard time listening to these two overpaid women kvetch about the "hurdles" they leapt while wearing pantsuits and carrying briefcases like some kind of corporate relay runners.

But then I have to ask Mr. Marche whether it really is so strange that men are absent from the discussion about who works and takes care of the children. He thinks, and not without justification, that men should be involved in these matters. He, after all, is involved, and he, after all, does make these decisions, or at least he makes some of them. Later in the article, however, he cites a statistic that shows that family decisions are far more likely to be made by women:

> A 2008 Pew study asked cohabiting male-female couples, "Who makes the decisions at home?" In 26 percent of households, the man did; while in 43 percent of households, the woman did. The family has changed and is further changing, while at work, patriarchy survives as a kind of anachronistic holdover, like daylight savings or summer vacation.

I assume that this means that in 26% of households we have a traditional, patriarchal setup, while in 43% it is matriarchal. The remaining 31% must be egalitarian. If we're generous and split the egalitarian decisions down the middle, then we come up with a figure of about 60% of household decisions made by women. In the American home, men are essentially the minority partner, and we must keep in mind that in most cases they don't even have veto power!

It seems that this may be the case in Marche's household, because he describes his wife, over his gentle objections, barking demands while delivering their baby (yes, really) to the effect of "hand me that ipad so I can email the office!" He also admits to essentially throwing his dreams aside so his wife could obtain her "dream job."

> In 2007, my life was right where I wanted it to be. After the lean misery of graduate school at the University of Toronto, I had, at 31, landed a job on the tenure track at City College in Harlem, as a professor of Shakespeare. My second novel was in the windows of appealing independent bookstores in Brooklyn, it had a good review in The New York Times, and the lead singer of the Decemberists was recommending it in interviews. This was basically all I had ever hoped for. Then I gave it up. My wife was offered her dream job as the editor in chief of Toronto Life magazine (roughly speaking, the New York of Canada), and we returned home.
>
> You could see our departure as the triumph of egalitarianism, and in a way it was. I don't think my father would have given up a tenure-track job for my mother. But in my marriage, the decision came down to brute economics: My wife was going to make double what I made. Good schools and good hospitals are free in Toronto. These are the reasons we moved. And if I were offered a job where I would make double what she does, we would move again. Gender politics has nothing to do with it.

I feel for Mr. Marche. Giving up on your dreams must really be a letdown, but men have been doing this for family from the beginning. However, at least in the old days men were afforded a certain position and respect as "head of household." But not anymore:

> We were moving back to downtown Toronto, where people self-identify as socialists, so I expected open-mindedness. Yet the reaction to my reduced professional status and stepped-up involvement in child-rearing was sharply divided along generational lines. Among Baby Boomers, classic gender stereotypes prevailed. To them, I had become "the woman" and my wife had become "the man." Boomer men could not wrap their heads around what I had done, while the women would smile an amazed smile, their eyes glinting with a touch of self-satisfaction. A younger generation was completing what they had begun.
>
> Among people my own age, the reaction was more complicated. Our story possessed a sort of circumscribed romance: to academic friends, the idea that I had given up a tenure-track appointment was like the Charge of the Light Brigade—glorious professional suicide. At any rate, most friends and acquaintances in roughly my age group at least understood the nature of the decision. They appreciated that chasing jobs was part of 21st-century life, and that marriage sometimes requires sacrifice. Well over half my male friends have wives who make more money than they do. Nonetheless, in social life, I found myself more and more of an addendum: "This is Stephen. He's Sarah's wife."

Poor guy — this is all too familiar to me. What he didn't realize was that his compliance and submission to his wife would not win him any favors. Without being taught otherwise, we men tend to think that being reasonable and giving in will evoke the same response in wives that it would in husbands, but this isn't the case. Too often, we must learn the hard way, and for Marche that meant being treated like "the wife" at his wife's journalist social events. Sounds like hell on earth to me, but hey, she's making good money, so it must be worth it…

However, Marche does find a saving grace: socialized childcare. He says that because he and his wife can afford to warehouse the kids from 9 to 5, he's been able to get back to work and regain some self-respect:

> let us get down to the details—specifically the financial details. The key fact of our story, the overwhelmingly most important factor in our personal gender politics, is that in Canada, we have access to high-quality, modestly state-supported (though far from free) day care. Of all the privileges my wife and I gained, our boy being in a safe place we could afford between nine and five was by far the greatest. It's why this story has a happy ending; it is the thing that enabled me to build a new career for myself. Day care is not theoretical liberation. It is the real deal, for women and men alike.

He has a point. Without that perk, I doubt his marriage would have lasted; just this issue put the final nail in the coffin of mine. However – and this is crucial – this kind of socialization of home duties also obviates the family. Does a woman with access to state-subsidized childcare need a husband? Aside from saving money on housing, is there any reason for a two-parent household at all?

Of course, it's in the interests of the children to have two parents, and sober-minded Swedes and Canadians may recognize that, but most Americans? I don't think so. Not anymore, at least. This socialized model of family that allows each parent to have the freedom to pursue his or her preferred lifestyle while co-parenting kids is great for the kind of people who have advanced degrees – people like Stephen Marche and his wife – but for a growing proportion of American families it will lead directly to even more single mother households, and these households won't be cheap for the rest of us. Unlike in Sweden or Canada, every two-parent household in the US will end up subsidizing a single mother.

Marche writes that mediocre-quality daycare for two kids is on average more expensive than rent in the US. Does he really think that removing it from the private sector will make it cheaper? I don't think Marche understands the economics involved here. When most of the children born to young mothers are now illegitimate, and most of their fathers all but broke, the level of taxation required to give these women an additional $10,000 or so per year (that's a conservative estimate) on top of what we already spend will be unbearable. Sure, it works fine when you've got a Nordic welfare state full of responsible, productive citizens, but that is not the contemporary USA.

So, while Marche sees the light and correctly points out that work-life balance is not solely a "women's issue," he fails to address the fact that families in the US are de facto matriarchies – even more so if you take into account the single mother households (he does not) – and he displays his own kind of narrow-minded elitism in assuming that what works for him and his magazine editor wife is broadly applicable to the 300+ million people in the US. In the end, he only comes off as slightly more reasonable than Slaughter and Sandberg, and that's because he is not in the 1%, but rather the 10%. Sadly, I'm afraid that's the best The Atlantic can do.

Feminist Senators Horn In on Immigration Bill

W.F. Price · 24 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A number of female senators, including arch-feminist Patty Murray, have introduced an amendment to the immigration bill in front of the senate, proposing that women should be given preference despite their qualifications (or lack thereof).

> Saying the immigration overhaul bill now before the Senate would discriminate against future immigrants who are women, 13 female senators have introduced an amendment that would make it easier for foreign women to come to the United States under a new merit system in the legislation.
>
> The amendment is part of a new effort by supporters of the bill to attract votes by framing immigration as a women's issue. Its lead sponsors are two Democrats, Senator Mazie K. Hirono of Hawaii and Senator Patty Murray of Washington, and sponsors also include a Republican, Senator Lisa Murkowski of Alaska.
>
> On Tuesday, dozens of women from local and national organizations waged a lobbying blitz on Capitol Hill. Pramila Jayapal, a leader of a coalition that organized the women's campaign, said some of them visited senators who are leading the effort to pass the bill — including Senator Patrick J. Leahy, a Democrat from Vermont — wearing colored fedoras that they tipped to show their support. Other women turned up with feather dusters in the offices of a dozen senators who earlier this month voted against allowing the Senate to debate the bill, to encourage those lawmakers to "clean up their act," Ms. Jayapal said.

So how do they propose to stop "discrimination" against women? In the usual manner — they lower the bar for them:

> The amendment the senators introduced late Wednesday would make a major change to the bill now on the Senate floor. It would create a separate tier for professions typically held by women, under a new merit-based point system for future immigration that would place more emphasis on job qualifications and less on family ties, which are the priority in the current system.
>
> The senators said women in foreign countries often do not have the same educational and career opportunities as men. "We should not cement those inequalities into our immigration laws," Ms. Hirono said.

What a load. Women have more education in most developed – and developing – countries. What they don't have is in-demand skills such as engineering, programming and the like. This amendment is another example of how this immigration bill is really just another swindle designed to rip off ordinary Americans, including earlier immigrants, for the benefit of the elite.

Pramila Jayapal, who is a racial activist, is trying to sell the amendment as a way to get women on board, but I don't think most women would support it if they thought for more than a second or so about what it means. Each young woman immigrating from abroad is another option for American men, and there are millions of women from less obese regions of the world who would make the trip if it were convenient to them. In fact, a program allowing healthy, attractive and mentally stable women to immigrate might not be a bad thing from a male perspective.

So one might wonder what these feminist senators are thinking in carving out an exception for low-skill females. Actually, it's pretty simple if you think about it: they want more cheap maids and nannies.

Girl Scouts Broke, in Decline

W.F. Price · 24 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Girl Scouts of America is facing financial woes, bickering over property and questionable pension schemes that have prompted members of congress to call for an investigation of the 101-year-old organization.

> Just a year after its centennial celebrations, the Girl Scouts of the USA finds itself in a different sort of squeeze. Its interconnected problems include declining membership and revenues, a dearth of volunteers, rifts between leadership and grass-roots members, a pension plan with a $347 million deficit, and an uproar over efforts by many local councils to sell venerable summer camps.
>
> The tangle of difficulties has prompted one congressman to request an inquiry by the House Ways and Means Committee into the pension liabilities and the sale of camps.
>
> "I am worried that America's Girl Scouts are now selling cookies to fund pension plans instead of camping," wrote Rep. Bruce Braley, D-Iowa, in a letter last month to the committee chairman.
>
> Compounding the problems are tensions at GSUSA headquarters in New York, where several senior executives have quit or been ousted since Anna Maria Chavez took over as CEO in 2011. Last week, some of the roughly 325 employees there were invited to take early retirement, and Chavez said an unspecified number of layoffs are expected in August.

Back in the 90s, the Girl Scouts veered away from tradition and went with the fashions of the time. They eliminated the oaths to God, embraced sexual diversity and forged partnerships with Planned Parenthood. This book appeared right about when the shift to another guiding philosophy took hold, and probably marks the beginning of the end of the institution.

I suspect the Boy Scouts will follow the same trajectory.

But rather than look at it as a tragedy, I think we ought to have a little perspective. Scouting was founded by an American westerner named Frederick Russell Burnham who brought "Indian style" warfare to Africa, where he engaged in assassinations and espionage for the British empire. His prowess in uncivilized warfare was duly noted by Robert Baden-Powell, a British officer who formalized the scouting code and used Burnham's techniques to train a force of imperial skirmishers (including child soldiers), and then later went on to bring scouting to the world. Many daring killings and much adventure ensued as the white man conquered and plundered his way through the dark continent.

That politicians and preachers today could talk about scouting as though its origins are godly, clean-cut and wholesome is, quite frankly, hilarious. The origin of scouting has more to do with taking scalps than it does with religion, which couldn't have been more than an afterthought to the cutthroats applying its principles in the Transvaal.

Also ironic is the fact that the first real scouts upon which the Boy Scouts, and subsequently the Girl Scouts, were modeled were essentially in the employ of the most powerful homosexual of the Victorian era: Cecil Rhodes.

Of course, this isn't to suggest that scouting "needs to change" or anything like that; just that it's something of an anachronism and already far removed from its origins. You've got to admit that when little girls started selling cookies door to door to support scouting troops it was already over, long before people started marching in gay pride parades in Boy Scout uniforms.

Save the Economy: Tax Single Mothers!

Featured Guest · 24 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

America is in crisis. The federal deficit is spiraling out of control. State governments are turning over every couch cushion they can find just so they can make payroll. Whole cities are falling apart due to lack of funds. Close to a quarter of the nation's workforce is jobless and another quarter is massively underemployed, waiting tables and ringing up groceries despite having college degrees. There's no way out of this financial clusterfuck… or is there?

I've got a solution: a sin tax on single motherhood.

Sin taxes are so-called because they're an attempt to mitigate the negative consequences of certain behaviors. We tax cigarettes because tobacco smoke causes emphysema and lung cancer; we tax alcohol because drunk people have a reputation for being violent and getting in car crashes; we tax casinos because they encourage crime and because gambling addiction destroys lives.

So why shouldn't we tax single motherhood, given the massively destructive effects it has on society?

I'm not just talking about how much single mothers cost the government in terms of welfare: single motherhood itself is a net negative. When I speak of "single mothers," I'm including both poor, welfare-dependent "single mothers by choice" as well as divorced and widowed women. Here are the facts:

- Single mothers are on average poorer than married households, with an annual income of only $25,353, compared to married households' income of $78,699. The poverty rate for single mother households is 40.9 percent, compared to married households' 8.8 percent.
- Children of single mothers are 63 percent more likely to commit suicide, 75 percent more likely to become addicted to drugs and alcohol, and are 50 percent more likely to become criminals. They are also more likely to engage in these activities at a younger age.
- Nearly half of all child abuse cases are committed by single mothers alone.
- Children of single mothers are less intelligent than those of married mothers and consistently score lower on IQ tests. They are more likely to be diagnosed with mental disorders, more likely to drop out of high school and less likely to earn college degrees.
- Finally, children of single mothers are more likely to have children out of wedlock themselves, perpetuating a cycle of poverty and misery.

Put simply, any woman who has children out of wedlock—or divorces her husband without justifiable cause—is committing an enormously selfish and immoral act. She's not only damning her children to a wretched existence, she's placing a hugefinancial burden on society and the government. Single mothers aren't heroes, they're villains, crippling their children for life and saddling everyone else with the bill.

Ergo, the only justifiable solution is to make single motherhood as financially painful as possible.

I envision the Single Motherhood Tax as a highly progressive income tax, levied on all unmarried women with children. A single mother with one child automatically loses 15 percent of her yearly income, with the tax increasing by 15 percent with each additional child—30 percent for two, 45 percent for three, 60 percent for four—up to a maximum of 75 percent for five kids. For the tax's purposes, any child support, alimony, and gimmedats (WIC, SNAP, Oregon Trail Cards etc.) the woman is receiving will be considered part of her income.

"But Matt, why do we need a new tax? Why can't we just cut government aid to single mothers?"

Because welfare usage is just one of the ways that single mothers harm everyone around them. Even if an unmarried woman is completely self-sufficient, her children are still more likely to become criminals, drug addicts or otherwise a drain on society. The ultimate problem with single mothers isn't that they're dependent on the government, it's that they're single mothers. Taxing them all equally, from LaQuisha the Welfare Queen to the high-powered attorney having deformed in vitro babies, is the only way to combat the problem.

"What about divorced/widowed mothers? Should they be punished too?"

In the case of divorced women, absolutely. Given that women initiate the vast majority of divorces—and the vast majority of divorces are for frivolous and stupid reasons—exempting them from the Single Motherhood Tax would defeat the purpose of implementing it. I had thought about adding an exemption for women who divorce for a good reason—their husband was beating them or committing some other major infraction—but realized that it would lead to a wave of women falsely accusing their husbands of abuse. By financially punishing divorced women, we'll force wives to think twice before they end their marriages and encourage those who do get divorced to remarry relatively quickly. It might even incentivize women to vet potential husbands a little more carefully.

Widowed mothers should be exempt from the tax, but only for a short duration: two or three years. This is more than enough time for them to find a new husband. Since less than ten percent of single mothers are widows, they aren't a huge deal.

"This tax is a double standard! Why don't we punish single fathers, or men who impregnate women out of wedlock?"

Because single fathers are extremely rare; virtually all "single-parent" households are single mother households. Because our family court system advantages women over men, single and divorced fathers have far less involvement with raising their children than their mothers, and in many cases no involvement at all. Thus, it's almost entirely single mothers' fault for spawning a generation of deadbeat criminals.

"What about girls who don't know about or can't afford birth control? Should they be taxed as well?"

Let me explode this leftist lie right now: there are no girls who don't know how to use birth control, or can't afford it. Condoms are $6 a pack at Rite Aid, and most major cities have a Planned Parenthood office or similar clinic that offers free birth control. Given the ubiquity of sex education in public schools and information on the Internet, Amish women are probably the only ones in America who have no idea how birth control works.

In my experience working with poor single mothers in upstate New York, all of them knew perfectly how to have safe sex. The reason they had had children out of wedlock was not ignorance, but desire. They wanted to have a baby because they are so low on the socioeconomic totem pole that having a kid gives them power, someone to boss around; or more charitably, because they think caring for a child will be fun. Because of government programs, this sort of stupidity isn't only tolerated, it's encouraged.

The only way to cure stupidity is to punish it. The Christian/conservative solution of discouraging people from having premarital sex hasn't worked because it doesn't address the root of the problem. Having sex in and of itself isn't an issue: it's the byproducts of sex—namely, children—that strain public resources and tear apart communities. By hitting unmarried mothers in the purse, we'll remove the incentives they have to crank out bastards and/or divorce their husbands because they're not haaaaaappppppy.

Single mothers are the moral equivalent of crack dealers or alcoholics. It's time to take out the trash.

For more from Matt Forney, visit his blog.

From the Mouths of Babes

W.F. Price · 25 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Below is a YouTube opinion piece by Aimee Nicholls, a young British woman who had to fight family court to live with her father. Despite being a teen, she has a remarkably clear understanding of what family law is all about. The business of the court is really to extract money from men, supposedly for mothers and children, but really for the court and lawyers themselves, not to mention social workers. Most of the people involved in the industry have a financial interest in keeping children away from fathers, and they hide behind the “best interests of the child” doctrine.

Ms. Nicholls makes it perfectly clear that this is a sham, and speaks with impressive maturity on the subject, about which she obviously cares a great deal. I’d be quite proud of her if I were her dad, but given the obvious affection she feels for her father one can only assume he earned her loyalty.

I’ve all but given up on the idea of reforming family law from the top — it will never happen as long as the money’s there. However, there’s a chance that a younger generation, having grown up wise to the brutality of the system, will eventually reject it when they replace their elders in the courts. One can hope.

Here’s Aimee Nicholls making her voice heard:

Quarterly Report and Panhandling

W.F. Price · 25 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It has become a tradition for me to offer some information on the site and how it works when asking for support, so in the interests of continued transparency, below is a rundown of how the site is doing, and an appeal for support in keeping it online:

A couple weeks ago, I spent a day looking through The Spearhead's analytics stats to get a better, in-depth idea of the site's audience, and I thought I should share some insights in a quarterly report/fund drive.

What I noticed first was that organic traffic has continued to grow steadily, and seems to increase as the site adds posts and grows in size. This makes sense — the more there is to find the more searches will lead here. So, from about a year ago, the site increased from around 3,500 unique visitors per day on a weekday to just under 4,500 today.

Of those 4,500 unique visitors, just over half (54%) are "new" visitors, which means that the IP logged has never visited the site before. The average time a new visitor spends on the site is 1:18, suggesting that a lot of them are just clicking through. However, the average doesn't mean much, because some 40% of all visits last less than 10 seconds. This means that a significant fraction of new visitors are taking time to read articles, which is good to know. Reaching out to people who have never seen this material before is one of The Spearhead's more important goals. From the figures, I would estimate that around a thousand – or perhaps a bit more – people read an article on this site every day for the first time. At that rate it's safe to say that we are probably not far from having had a million people around the world read at least one article on the site (as opposed to just clicking through), which is kind of cool.

Now, regulars will probably be more interested in the stats concerning the dedicated audience. The over 2,000 returning visitors the site gets every day is actually a fairly close approximation of regular readers, despite the fact that it doesn't make any distinction between those who last visited yesterday and those who last visited six months ago. I know this because articles generally get around 3,000 views within a few days of their publishing date, and subtracting the repeat views and click throughs/new visitors leaves about 2,000 returning readers viewing each article shortly after it was published. I could probably add about 500 to that by including email and feed subscribers who access the site in that manner and regularly engage with the content.

So, I'd put the number of regular readers of The Spearhead – those for whom reading the site and its articles is a matter of routine – at well over 2,000 people, but probably not reaching 3,000. If I were to include casual and occasional readers, the number would be significantly higher, but it wouldn't be an accurate measure of the dedicated audience. The number is continuing to grow, although not particularly rapidly. The site accumulates new regulars, I'd guess, about as quickly as it adds Twitter subscribers, which is somewhere on the order of a few a day.

And I am quite satisfied with that. I consider this "manageable growth," and it allows me to focus more on quality and thoughtful content that faithful readers appreciate rather than frenetically trying to think up ways to appeal to the easily-distracted masses (although I'm not above doing so from time to time to attract a few new eyeballs). Furthermore, I've come to understand that running a sustainable online publishing outfit requires some moderation. First, there must be a moderate workflow, as I need time to think about what I'm writing and pay close attention when editing submissions. Then, I have to keep the site relatively simple and free from clutter. Some other sites focus more on community, but I've decided that I'd rather keep the focus on content. Drama has a way of muddying the water, and with community-based sites it's inevitable. Furthermore, I simply don't have the patience or tolerance (or talent, one might say) for management.

However, although it may suit me and readers, this isn't necessarily the best recipe for profit. In fact, if I really wanted to make decent money off the site, my best bet would be converting as many of those 2,500 or so first-time viewers each day into sales as possible. Unfortunately, that would require an entirely different approach to running the site, and would detract a great deal from my ability to give faithful readers what they want. This is why I ask for money to keep up the work and pay the expenses I incur running the site. Running it alone is actually quite a job, and takes up a great deal of my time every week.

So if you like what I do here, send over a contribution to help pay the bills and keep the site online, and I'll keep it running as long as I'm able. I've come to really enjoy publishing content here, whether my own or that of others, and if I can continue to do so without impoverishing myself I'd like to keep it up indefinitely.

If you're one of those people who reads the site regularly and finds some value in it, you can directly contribute to keeping the content flowing. Anything helps, and I always appreciate it.

Send support via the PayPal button on the top right sidebar, or send check or money order to:

Price Content
PO Box 28282
Seattle WA 98118

Gillard Sacked in Australia — "Sexism" to Blame

W.F. Price · 26 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Australia's first female Prime Minister, Julia Gillard, has been cast out of office by her colleagues in favor of former PM Kevin Rudd, whom she replaced three years ago. According to Australian feminist Van Badham, it was because of the very misogyny and sexism that Gillard famously whined about after becoming the most powerful person – male or female – in Australia.

Van Badham writes:

> The problem for Julia Gillard was not – as it had been with her predecessor Rudd – her performance. It was that, from to beginning to end, she remained female.
>
> From the outset, her detractors launched on her gender as a weakness – and it was. The opposition never let the public forget her gender and the media crucified her. Rhetoric and vitriol that even the caustic conversation of Australian politics would not allow of a male leader was unleashed with a rare bodily hatred.
>
> Opposition MPs reminded the public that the childless and unmarried Gillard was "deliberately barren". The opposition leader and members of his shadow cabinet stood in front of protest signs describing the PM as a "bitch" and "witch". Radio commentators suggested her beloved father "died of shame" and that she should be "dumped in a chaffbag and thrown out to sea" and asked, to her face, if her partner was gay. She was criticised after showing her cleavage in parliament, and even Germaine Greer appeared on television to say that Gillard's "arse was fat". She was scrutinised for what she wore, for her past lovers, held up to ridicule for liking to knit. Opposition MPs appeared at dinners where her "small breasts, big thighs and red box" were literally on the menu. A chaffbag was auctioned at a Young Liberal dinner. Some opposition MPs even physically bullied her in a Parliament House hallway.
>
> The gendered attention was belittling and that was its aim. Gillard the policy warrior was consistently rendered as an object of ridicule, an object out of place, something unnatural, sexual, not serious. She was the most powerful person in the nation, but not even she could stop the constant harassment about her body and her sexuality. The belittling had an effect; despite her towering competence and leadership, her international triumphs: children threw sandwiches at the Prime Minister when she visited a school.

Whenever these feminists bitch about how hard it is for women at the top, it brings up an obvious question: If women are too tender and vulnerable to withstand the scrutiny and heckling leaders of both sexes are subject to, are they suited for the job?

Actually, I think plenty of women can take it; women can be notoriously vicious to each other, after all, so they may have an advantage in dealing with nastiness and personal attacks. And feminists themselves are perfectly capable of attacking women every bit as aggressively as any male "sexist" — just look at how Sarah Palin and Michele Bachmann are treated by various women in media. However, Gillard was their kind of woman, so the feminists are doing what they do best here: blaming men and whining about "bullying."

You know, when grown-ups bully kids we all look down on that behavior. It isn't fair, it isn't nice, etc. But why is it considered a low, nasty thing to do? Because children are naturally subordinate to adults, and they can't do a very good job of standing up for themselves — or for anyone else for that matter. If the same applies to grown women, then, all else being equal, they don't belong in positions of authority. How could such a weakling possibly represent her constituents effectively, after all?

So whenever a feminist says that the political world is too rough for women, she might as well be telling us that women simply do not belong at the top.

So which is it Ms. Badham: are women really just such wimps, or can they handle the job? You can't have it both ways…

The Kermit Gosnell Case Raises Some Ticklish Questions For Black Feminists

Obsidian · 26 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The recently concluded trial of Dr. Kermit Gosnell, an African American abortionist who ran what some have referred to as a "house of horrors" out in West Philly, raises a whole host of very interesting and provocative questions for all sides in this year of the 40th anniversary of Roe v. Wade. While some have seen it as a kind of cause celebre in making the case for safe (and free!) abortions available for all Women regardless of color or class, others have seen it as the inevitable logical conclusion that Abortion on Demand would ultimately lead to, which is a cheapening of human life itself. These and other lines of inquiry, though, have been raised and thoroughly debated already over the past few years that since the Gosnell case first broke and its conclusion last month with Gosnell himself opting for a life sentence in prison to avoid the very real possibility of the death penalty. Today, I want to introduce, and then examine, what I consider to be a new area of inquiry:

That of how and why, the recent Gosnell case raises some very ticklish, and downright uncomfortable questions, for those who consider themselves Black Feminists.

How so, you might ask?

No matter where you find yourself ultimately falling on the Gosnell case – whether you saw him as something of a local folk hero providing much needed medical and reproductive services to poor (and more often than not, Black) Women in need; or whether you saw him as the Devil Incarnate – one thing is certain:

Gosnell is a staunch supporter of the right of Women – in this case, Black Women – to have an abortion.

In this respect, Gosnell is much like our current President of the United States, Barack Obama himself, who has been an unabashed supporter of a (Black) Woman's right to choose from day one.

In fact, when one really sits back and thinks about it, it's hard to come up with many examples of Black Men, especially prominent ones, who are vociferous opponents of abortion – if anything, nine times out of ten, they are ardent supporters of it, or at the least, they are neutral on the matter. Sure, we can name Black Men who oppose abortion, like Michael Steele, or Clarence Thomas; but in doing so, we are also admitting just how rare they are among Black Men as a whole, to say nothing of their persona-non-grata status in Black America itself. No, the general consensus seems to be, that Black Men, by and large, either overtly support abortion, or at the very least they don't try to get in the way of it. In this respect, it is hard to think up a Black Male analogue, to Todd Akin.

Which brings us back to our little conundrum for Black Feminists – how are they gonna make the case that Black Men are somehow inhibiting their reproductive rights, when, by all accounts, Black Men are more often than not, ardent supporters of them? Well, to ask the question, is to answer it – which explains why we haven't heard so much as a mumbling word out of them on these and related questions, because the truth is as plain as the nose on one's face: they can't make any such case, beause no such case exists.

The Gosnell case shines a light on the pitiful fact that Black Feminists really don't have a leg to stand on along these lines — lines that never existed to begin with. Black Men are hardly "holding the Sistahood down", demonstrated not just by the fact that they avail themselves of abortions more than any other group of Women nationally, and have for years; we also see this borne out elsewhere in the recent findings that Black Women are now more likely to be in college than any other Americans. More than Asians, Whites or Hispanics – male or female – and of course, more than Black Men. This is an issue I've written about in the past, well before the Gosnell case or the Black Women on Campus findings even came along.

As the wise man Biz Markie once famously said, "Damn, it feels good to see people up on it".

What might work well in the case of White upper middle class (UMC) Women along these lines – that the "Patriarchy" dominated their lives (and wombs) and that they had the right to fight against it – simply doesn't add up when it comes to Black Women, since not only did Black Men have nowhere near the kind of influence that White Men did in the Western World, but on top of that Black Women had formidable influence and power back home in the Motherland, as Return of Kings columnist Athlone McGinnis makes clear:

> "In Africa, women had long labored outside the home. Whereas European gender roles often restricted women from performing labor crucial to society's sustenance (e.g., working in the fields), African women had long played a crucial role in their society's economic sustainability, performing extensive fieldwork and other indelicate but necessary chores. This was true long before slavery, and is still true to this day. They, unlike European women, exerted direct influence on the production and transport of food and in other forms of labor. African women have long been expected by their men to have some sort of say outside of the domestic realm."
>
> [...]
>
> "Many African women also lived in matrilineal societies. Whereas European women long existed in a society that saw their marriage to a man as essentially a forfeiture of their economic and social independence, African women could maintain much of this due to matrilineal organizations that gave them greater control over family life and their children's future."
>
> [...]
>
> "Black men, for example, haven't had true dominion over their women for centuries. In Africa, the black man often had polygamy and certainly plenty of authority, but he also often dealt with matrilineal lines of social organization that limited his dominion and influence over his women and progeny…In the new world, the black man was essentially a pack horse for his first several centuries. He had no real power to keep his family together (it could be split apart at anytime should a slave owner choose, often deliberately), and he also had no power to guard the sexuality of his women. He had no status or influence relative to the white men who took near undisputed dominion over the sexual capacity of the black female.
>
> White men kept black women as mistresses or concubines and quite frequently impregnated them with very little opposition from black males who, frankly, could do nothing about it. Black men had no real power to stop their wives, sisters or daughters from being used in this way or sold indiscriminately. They had no control over black female mobility or sexuality…Thus, when white women (over whose sexuality white men did maintain some control) come out and complain about freeing themselves from the "oppressive" control their men had over them, it becomes difficult for blacks to interpret things in the same way. Black men have not historically controlled black women in that way.
>
> Black men also have not prevented black women from seeking roles outside the home in large part due to economic reality. Black males, unlike their white peers, didn't have the money to fund the stay-at-home mom lifestyle so many white women felt "oppressed" by during the mid-century prior to the second wave feminist explosion in the sixties. While white women were reading "The Feminine Mystique" and ruminating about the "oppressive" nature of their role as pampered suburban housewives, black women were working in what were usually less than ideal conditions.
>
> So how can black women adopt this white feminist narrative regarding the "patriarchy"? They can't, really…That narrative comes from a (usually well-off) white woman's perspective, and other groups simply haven't had the same experiences."

KA-BOOM.

Sure, Black Feminists (or as some like to refer to themselves, "Womanists") can make a case for being mistreated at the hands of a Black Man or number of Black Men, but no reasonable person could argue that this in any way compares to the omnipresent, all-pervasive construct that is Patriarchy as White UMC Feminists have imagined it, for the simple reason that Black Men in the West simply have never had that kind of systemic power and influence over their Women, and, when they did get some measure of said power and influence, they used it in favor of things White UMC Feminists drool over - again, note that there are few, if any, Black Men who are preventing Black Women from going to college or getting abortions, and more often than not are helping them to do/get both! Moreover, on the off chance a Brotha does indeed do a Sista dirty, chances are very, very high, that said Brotha WILL be going to jail, and for a good long minute at that. So again, not seeing the case here, Sista Feminists/Womanists!

You really do need more people.

Now adjourn your arses…

The Obsidian

Rare Execution of Woman Carried out in Texas

W.F. Price · 27 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

52-year-old Kimberly McCarthy was executed last night by lethal injection, becoming the 500th person and 3rd woman executed in Texas since the Supreme Court allowed executions to resume in 1976.

McCarthy was convicted of murdering an elderly woman for crack money in 1997.

The rate of women executed to men is slightly higher for the nation as a whole than Texas; 13 women have now been executed in the US since 1976 as opposed to well over 1,300 men. On average, in the United States, a woman is executed about once every three years, while men are executed at a rate of about one every ten days.

What DOMA Ruling Suggests: Marriage is for Old People

W.F. Price · 27 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday evening, I saw some footage of a DOMA rally in downtown Seattle near the federal building on the local news. I wasn't particularly concerned about the ruling either way, although I found Kennedy's opinion insufferably sanctimonious — the man says it "humiliates children," yet apparently had no concern about that a couple years ago when he OKed the continued jailing of poor, legally unrepresented fathers for being unable to repay the welfare mothers collect back to the state.

What stood out about the DOMA rally was that a clear majority of those involved were old. Decades past typical marriage age. Given that the issues involved, such as inheritance, social security and health insurance, are more likely to affect old people I suppose it makes sense, but even that brings up the question of what marriage is really about today.

Marriage in the US appears to have evolved into a geriatric institution, or at least one that has little to do with procreation. Given this change in the institution, I suppose it was inevitable that gay marriage would come to be seen as a human rights issue. Why shouldn't they get the same privileges as other people, after all, if marriage has strayed so far from its original purpose?

I think this explains much of the lack of interest in marriage among the young. Marriage itself is now simply a sexless legal construct that has more to do with tax law and health care plans than it does with two young people coming together to start a family. In fact, given the penalties young couples incur by entering into marriage, it's probably wise for most of them to avoid it. If you're a young couple – even a middle class one – it's usually better to allow the mother to make use of single mother benefits such as WIC than it is to marry her and report combined income. You can always get married when you're older – like they do in Sweden – presuming you don't break up somewhere along the way.

What we have today is a disincentive to marry for the young and fertile, and an incentive for the old and childless. Could it get any more backward than that?

The End of Male Gridlock

W.F. Price · 30 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

At first glance, the Kickstarter dustup over Ken Hoinsky's book project didn't seem like my issue. It's about Game, after all, and other guys cover that better than I do. Different priorities and all that.

However, the feminists' appeal to ban the project got the support of a lot of men (although fewer than it would have in the past), and I think it's worth looking into why that is and what it means in light of the past and present, and what it may portend for the future.

Men are of two minds about seduction and Game. On one hand, men tend to like the idea of "scoring" with women. They like it so much that many will put serious effort – and sometimes money – into an attempt to learn the art of picking up women. On the other hand, they really don't like the idea of other guys scoring with "their" women. Hence the classic macho guy, like Tony Montana in Scarface, who chases every pretty girl in sight but then menaces anyone who shows interest in his sister.

There are a lot of husbands, brothers and fathers out there who think, when they read this seduction material, that it's going to be used on some woman they feel possessive about, and even if they had no personal objections to it when single, other guys who are on the prowl for women suddenly become the enemy when they are settled down. And in many respects they are. Today, there's nothing stopping men from making a move on the woman (or women) in your life. For a lot of attached men, it seems like a terrible threat, so they instinctively react against anything like Game or seduction.

Feminists have learned how to play these conflicting male emotions like the strings of a harp. They pluck one or the other depending on the mood they want to create. When they are appealing to young, horny men they prattle on about the "patriarchy," which allegedly seeks to control female sexuality on behalf of "powerful men" thereby denying the young/powerless men lots of free and easy sex. When they want to rein in the young men, they raise the specter of rapists on the loose, pleading with the daddy state to protect them from these lust-crazed brutes who are out chasing daughters and wives. Being both kept and pursued is a woman's most decadent dream. It's also totally empowering in the real world if she can get away with it.

As a man, when you stop and think about it rationally, it looks like the worst kind of hypocrisy, but the point here isn't to be fair.

Because women in general (exceptions always exist) gain power from men in the real world by (a) being pursued by men, and (b) being kept by men, both Game and (traditional) marriage add to women's value. From a purely selfish perspective, having both would be ideal, but how does one accomplish this without alienating both groups of men? The trick lies in playing the keepers and pursuers off against each other. It's amazing how easy it is for women to do this, and feminists have been doing it on a national scale for decades.

I think this tendency to play men off against each other is so well ingrained that women do it without even consciously realizing what they are up to. I'd assume there's an evolutionary basis to it, just as something similar probably lies behind men's tendency to be possessive yet still crave novelty.

I suspect that feminist social and political power is entirely dependent on playing off these two male factions. When women want free birth control, freedom from "shaming" and easy access to abortion, they appeal to the pursuers. When they want state-enforced child support and police monitoring of boyfriends/lovers they appeal to the keeper faction. As long as there is a balance between the two, women will consistently win on any of their issues regarding sexuality/family law.

Historically and traditionally, there was not a balance. The "pursuers" were not a strong faction in the West until the sexual revolution. Because men generally married young and the voting age was 21 until 1971, appealing to men who wanted to get laid to support them politically didn't work very well for feminists. It took the demographic change of the Baby Boom to tip the scales in favor of the pursuers, but even through the 1980s and 90s the traditional "keepers" – exemplified by the Promise Keepers themselves in the 90s – were a strong enough force to keep the pursuer faction solidly in check.

The 1980s through the 90s was a time when the balance between pursuer and keeper was remarkably even. There was a slight excess in the 70s in favor of pursuers, but by the 80s most boomers had married and settled down. The high divorce rate and the disintegration of the black family effectively prevented reactionary traditionalism from returning in full force, so America settled into a sort of masculine gridlock where we had Candice Bergen glorifying single motherhood in Murphy Brown even as angry conservative men demanded the most severe punishment for "deadbeat dads." For feminists, this was a time when they could not lose; for men it was a disaster. It was truly the era of women.

Things have slowly but perceptibly begun to change. Due to immigration, falling fertility and the ongoing destruction of traditional marriage and therefore the family, the pursuers are beginning to gain a long-term demographic advantage. The illegitimacy rate is at an all-time high, and growing year by year. Hispanics and blacks, a growing share of the population with higher fertility, have seen the greatest declines in traditional households, with female-headed households the rule rather than the exception. The white working class is headed in the same direction, while a stagnant white and Asian middle class with European-level fertility is seeing its electoral clout shrink in proportion to the masses.

As the keepers slowly fade from prominence, winnowed and reduced by some of the very policies they supported, the balance will swing decidedly in favor of the pursuers, and our laws and culture will follow that change. Accompanying the decline of the patriarchal keepers will be a real loss of clout and influence for feminists — one that has already occurred among the millennials, who do not identify as feminists despite often living what many might think of as a feminist-inspired lifestyle. This may sound counterintuitive – that feminists could lose power with the fall of traditional values – but if one considers the balance between the two male factions as the basis of feminist power, it makes sense. When there is an internal check on male political self interest but none on female, then it stands to reason that feminists will have a run of success. When that situation ends, so does the winning streak.

Taking pursuer values into account, some of the likely legal and policy changes may include more tolerance and support for sexual precocity and promiscuity for young women, which would mean less emphasis on sexual abstinence. Furthermore, although support for abortion may not grow in terms of public approval, there will likely be no serious legal challenges to the practice, and the political will to outlaw it will decline. Excessively punitive child support laws and policies will be relaxed, and some protective programs for younger and single women either cut back or eliminated. Domestic violence enforcement will be scaled back as fewer men feel as much sympathy toward the young, single women who typically make use of police resources to manage their lovers. Domestic violence is predominantly a problem amongst the young and single; married men are much more likely to support heavy policing of "boyfriends" than are single men.

Welfare will probably become more evenly distributed as women represent a greater share of the employed and millions of single men find themselves overburdened. The male incentive to work and provide will diminish, and men will begin to demand a bigger piece of the pie in terms of government positions and kickbacks. Tax revenues will likely drop, and the politically powerless female lower classes will see a real decline in quality of life. Prostitution will become more common, and female options more constrained. The daddy state will wither as the US comes to resemble Latin America a little more and Utah a lot less.

But we must remember that the US is still a big country — very big. These changes will take time, and they will not happen everywhere at once. However, the winds have already shifted, and this little tantrum at Kickstarter is merely the rustling of the leaves to remind us.

Another Reporter Raped in Cairo's Tahrir Square

W.F. Price · 2 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It seems that raping Western women is something of a sport in Tahrir Square, yet female reporters are still sent there for some reason. In the latest incident, a 22-year-old Dutch woman was raped badly enough to need surgery, which sounds pretty vicious. The rapists were reportedly "revolutionists," which means they are opposed to the current Islamist government.

> Dina Zakaria, a journalist reporting for the "Egypt 25″ news channel affiliated with the January 25 revolution, shared the incident on her Facebook page Sunday: "A Dutch journalist in Tahrir was raped by men who dub themselves revolutionists. Her condition is severe and she is hospitalized."
>
> Meanwhile, a state hospital issued a statement that the journalist was admitted after being raped by five men several days ago. She underwent surgery and has been released. It was also reported that Egypt's Prosecutor General Talaat Abdallah ordered his staff to go to the hospital to hear the woman's story and reveal the circumstances behind the violent attack.

The rapists, in this case, are Egypt's version of secular progressives. I know it's hard for trendy American progressives to wrap their heads around the concept, but the left in, shall we say, "developing" countries, is not all about unicorns and rainbows.

As the United States, with the decimation of the middle class and the addition of tens of millions of low-wage workers to compete with those who are already barely employable, comes to resemble these countries more, I expect our "revolutionaries" will begin to resemble those in Tahrir Square more than they do the campus liberals who support feminism.

I wonder what form feminism will take when it becomes clear that your typical campus feminist – not to mention her "enlightened" boyfriend – wouldn't last ten minutes on the street in a real proletarian revolution. Perhaps things are already changing. Wasn't one of the problems that took the wind out of the Occupy Wall Street Movement's sails the touchy little matter of rape in tents?

Thelma and Louise star: feminists perceived as “strident bitches”

W.F. Price · 2 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When asked whether she would call herself a feminist in an interview with The Guardian, Susan Sarandon, who starred in the movie that marked feminism’s coming of age, offers more evidence that the label “feminist” has lost its appeal, saying that she prefers the term “humanist.”

> I think of myself as a humanist because I think it’s less alienating to people who think of feminism as being a load of strident bitches and because you want everyone to have equal pay, equal rights, education and healthcare.
>
> It’s a bit of an old-fashioned word. It’s used more in a way to minimise you. My daughter [Eva Amurri, from Sarandon's relationship with Italian film director Franco Amurri] who is 28, doesn’t even relate to the word “feminist” and she is definitely in control of her decisions and her body.

Although it’s nice to know that Sarandon has rejected the label of feminist, I’m more interested in the second paragraph, because it confirms my suspicion that young people are actually hostile to feminism. I suspect that Sarandon’s daughter herself thinks of feminists as “strident bitches,” as do many other young women.

When Sarandon calls feminism “old-fashioned,” that’s a clear tell that the young people she knows don’t have any use for it.

A Festive Weekend in Seattle

W.F. Price · 3 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A few Christians decided to “save” some people at the Pride parade, and showed up with signs denouncing drunkenness and pornography. Although I don’t think this was the brightest idea, I’ve got to admit that it takes some balls to show up at a Pride parade as an open Christian. Naturally, they were assaulted, but what’s notable is how the assault was instigated.

Basically, a woman, possibly named Rhiannon Sherbon (someone with that YouTube Name claims to have been the woman in the video), provoked a big, dumb fat man into attacking them. The woman was harassing the Christians and assaulting them herself. She was doing everything possible to provoke them. Her repeated efforts attracted attention, and some idiots stepped in and started shoving the Christians, too.

Punches were thrown (none by the Christians), police arrived and arrests were made. Immediately, the woman began speaking to the police in an attempt to get the Christians arrested. She may have been successful, as one person in addition to the fat man was arrested, and it may have been the younger Christian. The female provocateur was not arrested, although she clearly should have been.

Lest anyone say that the Christians provoked the Pride marchers, it should be pointed out that the first Pride parades in Seattle were held in my old neighborhood, which was still a largely Catholic neighborhood at the time, and despite the blasphemy (e.g. drag queens dressed as nuns), public sex and lewd behavior – all highly provocative to Catholics – marchers were never assaulted by Catholic residents.

What's wrong with men having equal custody so they can avoid child support?

W.F. Price · 3 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I gave an interview today, and while giving some suggestions for making marriage work for the 80 or so percent of the US population that is not part of the SWPL overeducated elite, I brought up the matter of equal custody. I said that people will often accuse men of wanting custody so they don't have to pay child support, but instead of saying "that's not true," I said "so what if it is?"

Most fathers really do love their children, so it's an unfair accusation and a low blow in most cases, but not wanting to pay child support is indeed a motivating factor in custody battles. Likewise, receiving child support motivates women quite a bit, and has been found to contribute directly to likelihood of divorce. Money matters.

But think about this: if taking care of one's child and being an involved father is a good thing, then isn't it good that men would rather take care of their kids than cut a check every month? Is there anything wrong with them preferring parenting over being an ATM?

Only if the mother has a problem with it, and that's exactly what's wrong with the current system of mother custody combined with state enforced child support. If anyone cares to know why fatherlessness became endemic in the black population, and now the Hispanic and white working class, it's just this refusal to allow men to act on this incentive to raise their kids. If the state were truly interested in reducing fatherlessness, fathers would be allowed to avoid child support by taking care of their kids half the time. If parents don't want their kids, then fine — have them pay CS. Otherwise, let them do their part and raise their own kids.

Such a policy could only have a positive social effect. Men with children behave better, boys with fathers around tend to stay out of jail, and girls are less likely to get knocked up. Furthermore, it would encourage those who don't want to raise their own kids to be more careful about getting women pregnant just the same as child support enforcement. Maybe even more. Seeing one's friends stuck at home or having to arrange a babysitter to get out tends to have an edifying effect on players who might otherwise think little about the consequences of fathering a child.

Would it be more dangerous for children? Not at all. Children are even safer with their biological fathers than with their mothers. When with dad, the kids' clothing might not be as well-ironed, or their hair as well-combed, but they'd have full bellies, they'd get to bed on time, and they'd feel safe and confident with daddy keeping an eye out for them, and they'd still have half time with their mother.

So what's stopping this? Basically, women on child support or welfare. Well, too bad for them. It would be better for the rest of us – including other women – if for once they didn't get their way.

Confronting the Feminist Obesity Apologists

W.F. Price · 7 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Having recently decided to pay a bit more attention to my own health, I've been looking for motivation by studying the effects of inactivity and poor diet on the body. It really isn't pretty. Blood sugar, which becomes harder to regulate in sedentary and overweight individuals, slowly rises with age, and begins to do serious damage to organs throughout the body. The eyes, kidneys, heart and nerves are at risk, to name a few. The body naturally slows down and function declines with age, but when a condition like diabetes develops things really start to fall apart — sometimes literally.

As I've looked at the numbers, I've come to the grim realization that the obesity epidemic – well-noted in the manosphere for its devastation of American women's looks – will eventually come to depress not only our libidinous impulses, but quite possibly our economy as well. Some of the statistics suggest that half of Americans will be either diabetic or prediabetic (likely to develop the full-blown disease within a few years) by 2020, at a cost of half a trillion per year. And that's only part of the toll of obesity…

When you think about the human misery and cost this represents, it highlights yet another of feminism's most glaring moral failures: the fat acceptance movement. Usually, when we discuss the evils feminism has either caused or defended with full vigor, we think of the obvious ones, such as broken families, mass abortion, illegitimacy and the like. When obesity comes up, it's usually to either mock the feminists themselves or gripe about the mammoth proportions of so many American women. We tend not to think about how much it will cost us down the road. However, now that we have a new healthcare tax, AKA Obamacare, it's impossible to ignore the implications.

I've seen what diabetes can do to people: blindness, amputations, dialysis — the works. It's a terrible affliction, and as I get older I find myself taking it very seriously. Hopefully, most of us can avoid it, but when I look around I'm not too optimistic. Another thing to think about is that many of the immigrants being brought in to care for the current crop of sick people are genetically at higher risk of developing obesity related diseases themselves. When they get sick, who is going to take care of them?

Unfortunately, it doesn't look like there's going to be an easy way out of this mess. We can't blame feminists directly for the obesity epidemic; it's a result of our lifestyle changing faster than the human genome can adapt. However, in promoting obesity as "acceptable" they are hampering efforts to address the problem while we still have a little time. The day of reckoning is approaching fast, and every day Americans get fatter is another day closer to a public health catastrophe. It's time to stand up to the fat acceptance feminists and confront them over this critical issue.

Summer Break

W.F. Price · 9 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I picked my kids up on the weekend for the summer vacation, and thankfully we've been rewarded with excellent weather so far. We've been spending time together as a family without the usual pressure of having to say goodbye in a couple days, and that's a big weight off of all of us. It's been a real pleasure for me to spend time out in the sun with the little ones, watching them thrive in the full glory of summer.

Not having the kids for most of the school year gives me a certain appreciation for these school vacations, but it has also given me the opportunity to reflect on modern life and what has happened to the concept of family over the years. For example, the idea that children should get up in the morning and then immediately leave the house to go to school on most days of the year just doesn't seem right. In fact, it seems downright unnatural.

Since the industrial revolution began to change the world, we've developed a lifestyle that seems designed to fracture the family. Parents and children leave the house and trudge off to work or school to perform unpleasant tasks among strangers during most waking hours. While there, they are managed by people who have no particular emotional attachment to them and graded and evaluated by fundamentally inhuman standards. Once home, tired and numb, they wolf down a dinner and sit, stupefied, in front of the TV or computer for some hours before hitting the sack and starting all over again.

This is all necessary, I suppose, but I wonder sometimes why there's been so little pushback from people in recent years against the steady march toward being a society of cogs in machines rather than mothers and fathers, husbands and wives, brothers and sisters and sons and daughters. Many of the social movements and reforms in the early 20th century were a very human effort to reclaim the family and home and make a stand against the all-consuming march of "progress." Perhaps it was politically easier to do so back then, when most people – even in the US – still had first-hand experience with a family farm or enterprise and the old way of life.

Today, so few of us have experienced anything besides the daily grind that we don't even know what we'd do without the "structure" of school and the office.

Think about it: From the age of five, we are expected to spend most of our days living at the convenience of an institution, and then only when old, broken down, and no longer "useful," we are to finally retire. For younger people, retirement age is expected to be about 70, so that gives us 65 years of institutional life to look forward to.

Is that "progress?"

Unfortunately, I have only seen this trend accelerate. There's been no evidence of popular resistance, and the destruction of the family has made it all but impossible to even think of rolling back the atomization of society. How could we survive, after all, without a corporation or state agency to provide for us? If most of us have no family to speak of, then anything that might weaken the institutions we rely on would be a threat. There's positive feedback at work: as we rely more on institutions, the family is weakened, and the weaker the family the more we rely on institutions.

But where does it end?

Why Defend the Indefensible?

W.F. Price · 11 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Since picking up my kids on the weekend I've been spending a lot of time with them and their grandparents, who are visiting from California. It's been hard to get anything at all done with such a full house. Add to that the fact that I've been preoccupied with catching up on some of the typical parenting duties and issues (e.g. school report cards, etc.) that, as a divorced dad, I don't have the option of dealing with on a day to day basis, and it's been nearly impossible to focus on much else.

I'm sure I'll be on top of things soon, but it does remind me of the difficulties faced by separated and divorced parents and, of course, their children.

For all the talk about divorce being "empowering," the truth is that for the most part it's an enormous pain in the neck. Rationally speaking, it's a bad idea — even if your marriage isn't awesome. If you have kids, you'd better have a damn good reason for it, otherwise it just looks dumb.

Often, when we discuss divorce, we think of middle-aged or near middle age couples. We imagine a wife seeking to maximize her share of the spoils while carrying on with the pool boy and extorting a windfall from her spouse. Sometimes, there's the stereotype of the middle-aged man running off with his young secretary or having some other similar midlife crisis.

The reality is significantly different. Divorce peaks at a young age. For women, the median age of divorce is late 20s, and for men early 30s (my divorce was right about on par with these statistics). Assets are usually low, and there is no windfall to speak of for either party. Financially, both suffer.

So why do people do it? Because they aren't thinking with their heads. In the typical American divorce, a young woman initiates divorce from a young man for what are often irrational reasons. In many cases, the motivation is purely instinctive. She has weaned her last child and, thoroughly disgusted with her domesticated and often demoralized husband (raising young children is hard for men, too), is ready to find another mate. Given the benefit of hindsight, many of them regret it, although few admit it openly.

I once heard a woman – right around the time I got married – tell me after a few drinks how much she regretted blowing her marriage to the father of her children by running off to have an affair with a male dancer. She was a nice, reasonable, and fairly attractive woman who had remained on cordial terms with her daughters' father. If she'd had the presence of mind while in her 20s that she did in her 40s, the divorce wouldn't have happened. Instead of fulfilling her dreams, she ended up with nothing but a big mess on her hands.

This is the typical divorce: the result of some dumb, impulsive mistake. It's sad and pathetic, and causes everyone involved some pain. Children are permanently scarred, and both husbands and wives end up financially worse off than they would be otherwise. The party who was abandoned/betrayed bears the greater emotional burden, and if male often suffers from poor health and a shortened lifespan.

But instead of warning people against making such stupid mistakes and encouraging them to tough it out, we have developed a culture and legal regime that goes to any length to justify divorce. When a young woman starts complaining about her husband, she instantly finds a pack of women to support her in her criticism. Instead of being chided for adding to domestic problems by running the man down, she is assured that he is the sole problem, and encouraged to place the kind of unreasonable demands on him that so often precede separation.

When she finally decides to really screw things up by initiating an affair or separation, an impenetrable wall of female support rallies around her, ensuring that there is no hope of reconciliation. In the meanwhile, an attorney sets the law into motion, the state steps in to garnish the man's pay, and a broken family is born.

The evils of divorce have become impossible to ignore, yet feminists have continued to defend and promote it long after it became one of the biggest social ills of our time. Their stubborness defies reason, and brings up the question of why they would so doggedly defend such an awful institution. Sometimes, the simplest answer is the only one that makes any sense: they are bad people.

Here's What's Wrong With Equal Custody

Keoni Galt · 12 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A Rejoinder to Mr. Price's Rhetorical Query.

What's wrong with men having equal custody so they can avoid child support? Nothing!

There is nothing wrong with men wanting to actually parent their children, then simply having his role reduced to nothing more than an arbitrary sum imputed from their check every payday, and perhaps some intermittent and infrequent "visits."

> So what's stopping this? Basically, women on child support or welfare. Well, too bad for them. It would be better for the rest of us – including other women – if for once they didn't get their way.

Of course.

Problem is, it would be better for the rest of us…but not the folks who constructed this infernal Family Court system in the first place.

They have an entirely different agenda, and "better for the rest of us" got nothing to do with it.

We can quibble about the speculative notions regarding the motives. We can also debate endlessly about WHO is responsible for creating the status quo. This, after all, goes to the heart of the differences between "conspiracy theory" and "conspiracy fact." None of that really matters when you get down to brass tacks.

Regardless of who or why, the fact remains: it is official U.S. Federal Government policy to fund a State Government level, child support collection and enforcement bureaucracy, in all 50 States.

Title IV-D of the Social Security Act, to be more precise.

For those who are not familiar with it, here's one non-custodial parent who was forced to pay an outrageous monthly sum of family court ordered child support, who researched the act and translates the voluminous legalese into laymen's terms:

State incentive to collect child support : Bigger piece of Federal funds pie

> Yup. CSSD collects child support from the parent who "is not worthy" (words taken from pleading of Timothy Lynn, granted sole legal and physical custody of our child and $5,300 per month to be collected by CSSD for him). California then receives a bigger share of the $483,000,000+ tax-dollar pie disbursed to reward states for collecting from deadbeats…like me… who can not possibly pay the ludicrous child support ordered, and who are denied any access to their own children with no trial by jury or legal representation.

Surprise, surprise, the "deadbeat" non-custodial parent in this case is the mother. From a statistical outlook, she's an anomaly; an outlier. The exception that proves the rule. But her outrage and sense of injustice are well placed.

The family court system is a machine, one designed specifically to chew up the nuclear family and spit out divorced spouses and children, damaged, dependent and more susceptible to State control. And it was built that way on purpose.

Why else would the Federal Government offer matching fund incentives for State bureaucracies to maximize their child support collections from non-custodial parents?

i.e. – the more they collect, the more the Federal Government gives.

Let's take a closer look at the matching funds incentive structure for which the Federal Government pays out to the State Government Family Court and Social Services bureaucracies:

The paternity establishment performance level.

The more children born out-of-wedlock for whom a man is identified as “Father” who is then financial liable for support, the more funds the State bureaucracy will receive. In other words, from the perspective of the State bureaucracy, the more children who are born out-of-wedlock and the more men are designated as “IT,” the more matching funds they get.

The support order performance level.

The more Family Court Judges issue support order’s to non-custodial parents, the more funding the State gets from the Federal Government.

The current payment performance level.

The more payments the State’s Child Support Enforcement agency collects from non-custodial parents, the more matching funds they receive.

The arrearage payment performance level.

The more past-due child support payments they can collect from “Deadbeat” non-custodial parents, the more matching funds they receive. Note that there is no negative variable to this infernal equation – i.e. any arrearages they fail to collect – because the non-custodial simply can’t possibly meet the ordered monthly amount – has no bearing on the matching funds. This is why they have no qualms throwing you in jail and letting you rot for being a “deadbeat.” They just have to go out and find more families to destroy and more out-of-wedlock mothers to receive benefits so they can establish paternity and garnish more wages.

The cost–effectiveness performance level

> The cost-effectiveness performance level for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the total amount collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part divided by the total amount expended…

That would be an incentive to collect as much child support as possible while spending as little as possible on overhead costs for running the entire Child Support Enforcement bureaucracy. This is one giant incentive to find, designate and order child support payments from as many non-custodial parents as possible.

Taken as a whole, what we have here is a Federal Government that PAYS State Governments to create as many non-custodial parents liable for child support obligations as possible.

There are no financial incentives from the Federal Government that reward State social work bureaucracies to resolve marital differences or reconcile separated couples.

There are no financial incentives from the Federal Government that reward State social work bureaucracies that restore children to two parent homes.

There are no financial incentives from the Federal Government that reward State social work bureaucracies that act with reason, temperance of compassion in reviewing the personal and financial situation of non-custodial parents charged with child support obligations . It’s pay the imputed income judgement or go to jail.

There are no financial incentives from the Federal Government that reward State social work bureaucracies for discouraging divorces, nor resolving child custody disputes.

But most of all, and in answer to our venerable site host and founder’s rhetorical question, There are no financial incentives from the Federal Government that reward State social work bureaucracies to support equal custody arrangements for which no money can be taken from a non-custodial parent and paid out to a custodial parent, so that matching funds can be paid out by the Federal Government to fund the Family Court bureaucracy.

In other words, the real answer to the question “What’s wrong with Men having equal custody to avoid child support?” is that hundreds of thousands of jobs, careers and livelihoods of the people who make up the work force of the Family Court bureaucracies and Family Law professions in all 50 States, depends on a steady supply of divorces and out-of-wedlock births so that matching funds from the Federal Government can fund the Child Support Enforcement regime.

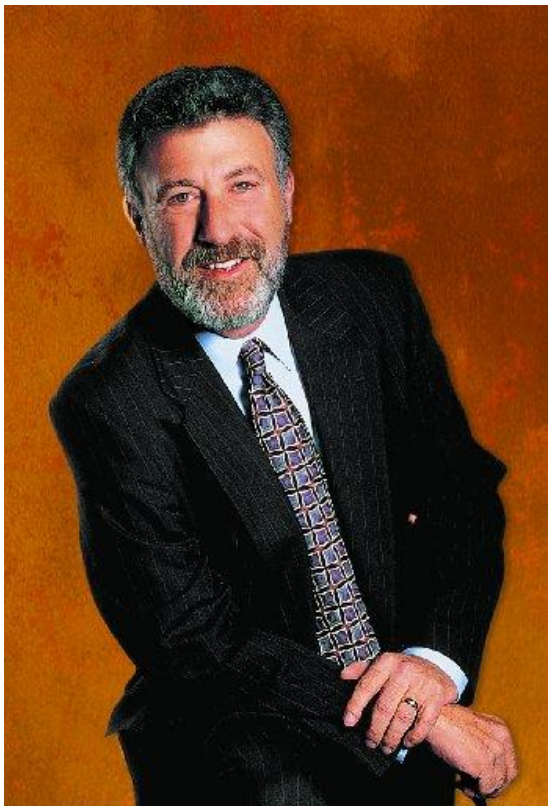
It is a beast designed to feast and grow on the most personal level of the citizenry and the foundation of civilized society – the family.

And they’re making us all pay for it, since all those Federal matching funds come from the Federal Government budget which is either collected as taxes from we the sheeple, or borrowed from the Federal Reserve System, so that we are indebted in perpetuity to fund this ghastly leviathan designed specifically and deliberately to devour the traditional Patriarchal-modeled family.

The Thrill is Gone

Uncle Elmer · 13 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Wearhouse needs a new Jew.



Most of you have probably heard about the Men's Wearhouse cashiering of George Zimmer, the company founder and reassuring front-man who has been pitching their suits on TV for decades with his classic "You're gonna like the way you look..I guarantee it" byline.

I haven't been following the controversy so won't make any ignorant remarks about the board's possibly reasonable decision to fire him. I am having a bit of communication problem with my own boss right now however, which might be detailed in my upcoming Spearhead essay You Just Got Canned. For that reason I am trimming my nostril hairs and cleaning up my gabardines a bit in anticipation of upcoming sales contacts, as described in Employment Game. So consideration of suit particulars is currently competing with other memes in my short-attention span brain.

ForeignBride has cable TV and I am often subjected to its proto-feminist outrages. I could not help but notice Men's Wearhouse latest ad campaign, minus George :

Where's George? I don't like it. I don't like it at all.

While the sight of shirtless muscle-boys may intrigue some women, as implied in the ad, it doesn't compel a man to consider getting a suit at Men's Wearhouse. Granted, they are trying to appeal to a younger demographic, but the message implies a loss of tradition and craft in lieu of pushing cheap, generic suits to impersonal corporate drones. The point of getting a tailored suit is to make you look great despite your imperfections. None of the buff diversity fellows in the above photo inspire me to drop by Men's Wearhouse over other multi-product mall stores, where the ladies' sections are glittering mazes of shiny counters and labyrinthine portals and the men's sections are mercifully simple in layout and close to the store exit. Men's Wearhouse's exclusive focus on men's attire was a good draw in that regard.

With the old George Zimmer ads, you knew that when you walked into Men's Wearhouse George would be there knowing his profession and putting you in a good-looking suit. He might have been a little pushy, mind you, but that was part of the shtick and you were willing to go along with it to wear your new threads with aplomb.

Because George Zimmer represented something else that still means something to a lot of men: legacy and passion for his chosen business.

George Zimmer could not remain as commercial spokesman forever, but he definitely could have given us another decade of his smooth intonation about proper attire for men. The bottom line is that Men's Wearhouse needs to hire a credible Jewish front-man to pitch their wares. They need to do a talent search and find a man who looks like George Zimmer's son and talks like he has been in the business living and breathing fine suits his whole life, with the craftsmen and connections to make you look like a pro. Tradition, craft, and legacy still have a place in this world and are still valued by many men seeking top quality products in a feminized marketplace.

Something is in the Air

W.F. Price · 15 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've been getting requests for interviews lately, and haven't been quite sure what to make of it. A representative of a national TV show recently contacted me, and although I'm skeptical, I agreed to at least talk to her on the phone if she wants. When I did an interview with a blogger a couple weeks ago, he told me that "MRA" has been coming up a lot lately in media, and he had just now become aware of its existence. I didn't really believe him at first, because I hadn't personally observed any major change in reporting, but that may simply be because I don't have my finger on the pulse of pop news, and never have to be honest.

However, there have been a few stories making the rounds. According to recent RooshV tweets, there's been a sudden increase in awareness of MRA. I trust Roosh, because he has an eye for this stuff. Also, some MRAs have apparently been making some waves in Canada. Something about rape posters, I gather. Even the police in Canada have been coming out to defend the rape posters, which is kind of silly. I mean, doesn't the top cop in Edmonton have something better to do than defend the lies promulgated by feminist rape posters? Maybe not… I think Canadians ought to question where their very heavy taxes are being spent in this instance.

But to get back on subject, it does seem that there truly is a growing national interest in "MRA" or men's issues. Maybe the work I and others have put in is starting to pay off. The activism some are engaging in might be catching people's attention.

However, one thing that concerns me is that so many people continue to be afraid of openly speaking their mind about men's rights/issues. For example, in the rape poster debate in Edmonton, an MRA who goes by "Razz" and has been putting up parodies of rape posters is reluctant to use his real name, and the local news used this to portray him as some kind of criminal by having the police chief denounce his efforts. It's a classic media technique: use an authority figure to give the impression that dissenting from political orthodoxy is somehow against the law. Unfortunately, it works quite well on the impressionable, which includes the majority of the audience.

Razz's posters are a perfectly fair critique of the sexist campaign that suggests that men must be taught not to rape. The implication is that men are all potential rapists, and yet the feminists who started the campaign, and the police who are inappropriately getting involved in the politics of it, bristle at the suggestion that women could be prone to lying.

Is it worse to paint all women as potential liars than to slur all men as potential rapists? That's exactly the message I take away from Razz's posters: they highlight the malicious, one-sided nature of the campaign. If men are fair game for public shaming because a few men are criminals, then women are fair game if a few women are liars.

Although I understand that Razz might put his job at risk if he revealed his identity, he's doing so anyway. If he's discovered, after all, then the effect will be the same. And because he won't own up to his campaign, people will be under the impression that he knows he's doing something wrong. It would be better, I think, to face the chief of police and ask whether men are any more likely to rape women than women are to lie to authorities. Ask the chief whether he thinks "rapist" every time he sees some man walking the streets of Edmonton, and if so, whether he really belongs on the job as police chief. Male taxpayers are paying the bulk of his salary, after all, and they shouldn't have to support the kind of public servant who has such a low opinion of them — especially when he has the power to arrest them. It's a clear case of the dog biting the hand that feeds him.

As for men who defend the feminist campaign, I'd ask whether they need to be frequently and publicly reminded not to rape. If not, then why do they assume other men need such prompting? Why not remind them not to steal, rob or murder, too? Is rape really such a unique crime that ordinary men cannot prevent themselves from raping without constant surveillance and reminders from authorities? If rape comes as naturally to men as, say, eating a hamburger, then that brings up the question of whether it's a serious crime at all. The law is supposed to reflect human nature, and it doesn't work when we criminalize normative behavior. So, therefore, if rape is normative, it shouldn't be a crime.

On the other hand, if rape is not normative behavior, then we don't need to hector ordinary men about it. To do so is offensive, obnoxious, and inappropriate.

Maybe people in general are getting tired of the casual demonization of half the population. I hope that's why MRA is on the radar screen, and that's what we should stress when we have the opportunity to make our voices heard.

The Trayvon Martin Shooting and the "Don't Be That Guy" Campaign

W.F. Price · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'm convinced that white liberals and blacks care about the Zimmerman/Martin trial for entirely different reasons. For blacks, I think it's largely anger at being profiled as criminals, while for white liberals it looks like the perfect opportunity to ban all guns! by making opponents of their agenda out to be vicious, racist killers. This is an angle of the debate that I haven't seen anyone else explore, but I think it's crucial to the media hoopla surrounding it.

I sympathize more with the blacks, not only because they are being more honest, but also because it is pretty lousy to be profiled, even if it's essentially inevitable for young black men (even Jesse Jackson admitted to profiling young black men). Personally, I think the profiling problem could be largely solved if police and officials started paying attention to the Bill of Rights, and stopped carrying out unreasonable searches of black males, but more liberal-minded whites think the answer is rendering all Americans helpless so they can be better managed by a bureaucratic police state (that just so happens to employ many of them). The liberals don't really have a problem with profiling; if they did they wouldn't continue to vote for people like Bloomberg, who recently defended profiling, which the NYPD has practiced with gusto under his administration.

So, because Feministing has declared solidarity with Trayvon while supporting the continued profiling of all men as rapists, I thought someone ought to point out the hypocrisy here.

Here's a question I'd ask these feminists:

How was George Zimmerman's profiling of Trayvon Martin for being born black any more (or less) morally objectionable than profiling all men as rapists for being born male?

Is it that some profiling is OK, but other profiling is eeeevil? If so, what makes profiling men as rapists perfectly acceptable while profiling blacks as criminals is awful? You say because men are more likely to rape than women and rape is a problem? Well, blacks are statistically more likely to commit crimes, and crime is a problem, too.

You see, from a feminist standpoint, profiling blacks is wrong because it implies that all blacks are criminals, or prone to criminality. They do think in such simple terms, and their rape posters prove it definitively. They really think all men are prone to rape, and the less diplomatic of them will openly say so. In fact, some feminists have even declared every single act of heterosexual intercourse to be an act of rape. If they didn't have this attitude, they certainly wouldn't support posters against rape that offensively target all men.

I, and most of my readers, understand that while one group may have a higher rate of some particular problem, that doesn't mean all or even most people in that group share it. Irish disproportionately drink too much, yet most Irishmen are not drunks. Chinese are disproportionately involved in counterfeiting, yet most Chinese are not selling fake goods. Muslims are more likely to commit religiously motivated violence, but the vast majority of Muslims do not do so.

Because of this understanding, we wouldn't produce an ad campaign targeted at Muslims with the WTC disintegrating in the background of a poster that said "don't be that Muslim." That would be a total dickhead thing to do.

And to put the Zimmerman/Martin debacle in context, George Zimmerman, when he profiled Trayvon and then took it a step farther by very rudely making him aware of it by tailing him, was being an asshole. What he did may have been legal, and it may have been within his rights, but he did provoke the kid. The reason Zimmerman was not – and shouldn't have been – convicted of unlawful homicide is that Trayvon didn't keep his cool, and he let his understandable indignation get the better of him, choosing to initiate a fight with Zimmerman*. In the cold eye of the law, his death was a result of that mistake: when someone is being an asshole it doesn't give you the right to assault him; if you do, and cause him to fear for his life, it does give him the right to use deadly force in self-defense. It seems unfair, and it is, but the law must reflect the often brutal laws of nature. Trayvon didn't deserve to die for his mistake, but neither does a kid who drives too fast too soon and fatally misjudges a turn. As Clint Eastwood said in Unforgiven, "deserve's got nothing to do with it."

One might reason that if feminists have a problem with the verdict returned by the jury, then maybe they would understand if some man, angered by their poster campaign profiling men, beat the crap out of one of them. But that would be to assume that feminists are reasonable, morally consistent people, and they are not that. In fact, I can say with certainty that I, and most men reading this site, have far more sympathy for Trayvon Martin than a feminist would for a man who got shot and killed for attacking a woman who provoked him. I'd like to hear a feminist deny that!

*Men with guns do not start fistfights — the closer your adversary the less of an advantage a gun provides. This is why I'm fairly certain Trayvon started the fight. If Zimmerman intended to shoot him from the beginning he would have drawn his gun well before Trayvon was close enough to touch him, and if he anticipated a fight he would have done the same.

Hello Young Men: A Vasectomy Is One Thousand Times Less Expensive Than Children

Joe Zamboni · 18 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Two weeks ago I attended the marriage ceremony of a clueless 26-year-old man, a nice enough guy full of good intentions, but also a guy living in a romantic fantasy world about what he had just gotten himself into financially. Little did he know that, on average, about 91% of his lifetime after-tax income was going to go to his wife (or wives) and children, not to himself. That percentage is not a typo. Stay with me as I go through a series of back-of-the-envelope calculations using publicly available statistics to come up with this astounding percentage. The bottom line of the calculations (which you can easily enough do on your own to confirm everything claimed here): fathers in America today are financial slaves.

It's essential that young American men see the long-run big picture. Yet many of them look only at the immediate short-term, in part because they're living a paycheck-to-paycheck existence, just barely making it financially. The big picture shows that if they get married and have kids, they probably won't have any significant life of their own. Beyond childcare, domestic chores, and other family matters, most of their waking life will then be devoted to making money to support the family. Young men need to seriously consider "the snip" (vasectomy), which, according to these calculations, is more than 1000 times less expensive than getting married and having kids. Again that is not a typo. Far too few young men are taking advantage of this reliable birth control option before they are surprised to hear that the girlfriend or fiancé is expecting a young one. In this area, planning ahead can make a hell of a difference.

The following calculations also reveal that feminist chants about "deadbeat dads" are unwarranted and manipulative attempts to get men to shut-up and get back to work. American fathers are desperately trying to meet their financial obligations, and these financial obligations are oppressive, unreasonable, and totally unsustainable. It is no wonder that the courts have resorted to cruel and unusual punishment such as throwing fathers in jail for, yanking driver's licenses for, and revoking professional licenses for, not being able to pay child support obligations. Such heavy-duty forceful maneuvers are required in an attempt to get men to comply with the provider role, which when viewed from an objective lifetime financial perspective, doesn't look like an attractive way to go.

This article was born out of my concern for the welfare of several heterosexual twenty-something men that I know, men who are surprisingly cavalier and relaxed about marriage and kids. Many of these guys accept these major life choices simply as part of being a man, and they expect one or both of the choices will be something they will do at some point in the future. The problem is that these guys, for the most part, don't seriously investigate what's involved, and that means that there will be big-time trouble later on. Marriage and children in America today are entirely different than they were just fifty years ago; they are now dangerously rigged games stacked against men. This stacked deck exists on many levels, but to keep this article relatively brief, I will focus only on the financial implications of marriage and children.

OK, let's get into the numbers. The average number of children per family, according to the 2010 US Census is 2.11 (Note 1). The total cost of raising a child, through age 17, in the US is now $235,000 (Note 2). Multiply both of these figures and you get $495,850, which is the average cost to raise children to age 17 in America today. Note that this cost is overwhelmingly paid by men; it is the father's traditional and legally-enforced role to be the provider. If you make a good salary, the cost to raise children will go up significantly above this average, because the alimony and child support payments that the courts determine are not based on actual costs. Instead they are based on the father's total salary or self-employment income. But to reveal the plight of the average American father, for the rest of this analysis, I will stick only with averages.

Next let's look at the other costs of having children, and providing for them beyond age 17. The average per year college costs paid by parents in America today is $8,752 (Note 3). It now takes an average of 4.5 years to get a bachelor's degree (Note 4). Multiplying these two figures, in conjunction with 2.11 kids on average, we see that the total average cost to parents to put their kids through college is now $83,100. Yes of course, some kids don't go to college. Consider that some other kids get advanced degrees. Please remember that this is a rough back-of-the - envelope analysis, so bear with me, and just go with the overall conclusion, and don't dismiss the analysis just because you don't like a simplifying assumption that I have made.

The average move-out age of children these days is 22, and the chances that they will thereafter move back into their parents' house is 60% (Note 5). The calculations in my analysis don't include the extra room and board for those children who don't immediately set up their own households. Whatever objections you might have about all kids going to college, in response to the assumption I made in the prior paragraph, might be addressed by saying that those who don't go to college will generally have a harder time getting jobs, and the latter kids will likely stick around the house for a while longer. So let's include the additional stick-around-the-house costs in the go-to-college costs mentioned in the prior paragraph.

The average costs employed in this analysis also don't illuminate the potentially very high costs associated with having a child who has special needs, such as an autistic child. This analysis is just about the average costs, not the probabilities of very high costs associated with child rearing. The chances of very high costs should nonetheless be a part of every young man's marriage and children deliberations.

So far, we have not assumed that the man got married. It gets worse if he gets married. Here, he simply had children and had to pay child support. The average unmarried father is looking at a total of $578,950 ($495,850 plus $83,100) in payments over the course of his lifetime, which might instead completely pay for a very nice house somewhere. Perhaps it would be better for young guys to be a good uncle to their sister's kids, or maybe be a devoted Big Brother? Sure you may like kids, but do you really need your own? The real eye-opener is how this total child support figure compares to average incomes for men in America today.

To get a ballpark sense of how difficult it will be for an average man to meet his child support payments, whether or not he is married, consider that the average income per household in the US is now $46,326 per year (Note 6). If one considers all types of taxes (income, sales, property, etc.), the total burden of taxes in America today is 59.70% of earned income (Note 7). Multiply these two numbers and you get the average after-tax disposable income, specifically $18,669. I am making an assumption that the man is making most of the income in the household, an assumption that is born out by the fact that men far and away make most of the money in America today.

Taking the total payments for raising children ($578,950), and dividing that by 25 (the average age when a child leaves the house (22), plus three years to take into consideration more than one child), we see that the out-of-pocket cost of having children is $23,158 per year. So the cost of paying for children ($23,158), on the average, exceeds the average disposable annual income ($18,669). No wonder a very large percentage of parents go into debt just to pay for their children and their children's education. No wonder there are so many men sweating the payment of child support.

When a man gets married, the story gets even worse. The average cost of a wedding these days is $28,000 (Note 8), and 62% of couples now pay for their own weddings (Note 9). I am not including the cost of dates, vacations, and the like which men are generally expected to pay. As a way to capture and summarize those courting costs, I figure that the man will pay for the entire wedding. The average cost of a diamond engagement ring in the US is now $3,500 (Note 10) and again the man pays for that. The average cost of a honeymoon is now $4,466 (Note 11) and I am assuming that the man pays for that too. Add these three numbers and we get the total average cost of going through with a wedding, assuming that the guy will pay, which is the traditional and often expected way these days (feminist claims of equality notwithstanding). That total amount is some $35,966.

We should increase this cost of marriage by the average total alimony paid, which is $7,209. This last number is arrived at by multiplying the average annual alimony payment of $30,000 (Note 12), by the number of cases in which alimony is paid, some 9% of cases (Note 13), by the average number of years for which alimony is paid, in America 2.67 years (Note 14). So the total average cost of getting married is then increased to a total of $43,175 ($35,966 plus $7,209). The average number of years that a marriage lasts is eight years, so if you're having kids these days, chances are that you're going to get a divorce at some point (Note 15).

So if you add the three total numbers from above, specifically the average cost to raise children to age 17 ($495,850), plus the average cost to send your children to college ($83,100), plus the total average cost of marriage and alimony ($43,175), you get a grand total of $622,125. Note that this does not include the cost to support your wife while married, including housing, food, clothes, etc. You could say this grand total is a rough overall total cost of having children in a marriage, for the average American guy.

These numbers are not exact, and they shouldn't be expected to be precise, because this is simply a back-of-the-envelope informal analysis. If you want totally statistically justifiable numbers, be my guest and go spend several hundred thousand dollars to perform a formal academic study. I wonder why no such study of men has ever been done — at least I can find no such study on the Internet. Plenty of similar studies have been done about women — but why are there none for men? Perhaps the powers that be (including feminist politicians like Obama) want to keep men in their place of financial slavery? Could it be that these powers don't want men to know the truth about the incredible financial burden that they are expected to carry?

Let's now look at the total cost of a vasectomy done on an outpatient basis, which is about $600 (Note 17). Many such operations can be found for less money. No, "the snip" is not generally paid for by health insurance. In keeping with my comments above, even though many birth control options for women are paid for via health insurance, the system evidently does not want men to step out of their traditional provider role, it wants them to continue to be financial slaves.

So how does this cost for a vasectomy compare with the total average cost of marriage and children ($622,125)? It's over 1000 times less expensive. This reliable male birth control option starts to really look attractive to men when you consider the average lifetime gross earnings of male college graduates (Note 16), which is $1,699,000. If we convert this figure into disposable income, using the total tax burden mentioned above (Note 7), we get a lifetime sum of earnings for male college graduates after taxes of $684,697. I am making a very conservative assumption that all fathers have a college degree here, and the actual situations of those men who don't have a bachelor's degree is going to therefore be much worse than is calculated below.

That means that over a father's lifetime, the percentage of his after-tax income that will be devoted to his wife and children will be 91% ($622,125/$684,697). Said a bit differently: many if not most fathers in America today will not get to have their own lives. If you are going to go ahead with the marriage and kids deal, whatever it was that you thought you wanted to do with your life, unless it was being a provider and a father, forget it. If you're having a wife and children, you are going to be totally focused on supporting them. That dream about climbing a mountain in Asia, or learning how to fly an ultra-light airplane, or becoming a hobby farmer of a rare strain of orchids, forget it. Unless these things bring in a lot of money, or unless you're exceedingly successful at your work, they're not going to happen. If you're an average married father, you're going to be in the provider saddle for most of, if not all of, your working life.

Notes:
(1) http://sbronars.wordpress.com/2012/12/05/more-thoughts-on-the-illusion-of-declining-birth-rates/
(2) http://elitedaily.com/news/world/study-average-cost-raising-child-235000/
(3) http://www.marketwatch.com/story/families-dig-deep-cut-costs-to-pay-for-college-2010-08-10
(4)
http://completionarch.collegeboard.org/completion/time-to-degree/average-time-to-certificate-an-associate-degree-or-bachelors-degree-us
(5) http://www.cafemom.com/journals/read/275953/Does_anyone_else_ever_feel_this_way
(6) http://www.mybudget360.com/how-much-does-the-average-american-make-breaking-down-the-us-household-income-numbers/
(7) http://taxfoundation.org/article/summary-latest-federal-individual-income-tax-data-0

(8) http://www.divorceroom.com/divorce-settlement/average-divorce-settlements.html
(9) http://realsizebride.com/blog/what-does-the-average-honeymoon-cost/
(10) http://www.dailyfinance.com/2012/03/12/engagement-ring-how-to-save-on-diamonds/
(11) http://realsizebride.com/blog/what-does-the-average-honeymoon-cost/
(12) http://www.ask.com/question/average-alimony-payments
(13) http://news.ufl.edu/2001/05/21/alimony/
(14) http://www.tmc-law.net/divorce-and-spousal-support-or-alimony/
(15) http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Divorce
(16) http://www.uploadexperience.com/statistics.htm
(17) http://www.vasectomyresource.com/Average-Cost-of-Vasectomy-Depends-on-Several-Factors.html

What a Father Can Do

W.F. Price · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've been spending a lot of personal time with my children since they came over for the summer. I'm trying to compress as much fatherhood as possible into the short time I have with them, and although it hardly seems like enough, I'm coming to realize how absolutely crucial this time is to children.

Actually, I already knew that; my own father was barely there when I was a child. It's something I haven't written much about, but it had a profound effect on me. It wasn't my mother's fault — she may not have always had the nicest things to say about him, but she never deliberately kept me away from him. In hindsight, it seems like she sometimes went out of her way to accommodate him and my paternal grandparents. No, it was him. He just wasn't up for being a father; maybe, not having been very close to his own father, he didn't think there was all that much to it. So for most of my childhood I'd see him no more than a couple times a year, and it wasn't until I was a teenager that I started to seek him out on my own. Despite his imperfections and general carelessness about his role, I still felt the need to know him and find my own way to love him. Ultimately, I did. He died three years ago, and I can say that by that time I had accepted him for who he was and come to terms with my disappointment. It's an enormous relief to me that I did so before he died.

However, the pain of being a child with an absent father left an indelible impression on me. I guess you could even call it a scar. A scar that was torn open once again when I lost my own children to divorce. All of the fears and pain of my childhood were brought crashing back with the terrible realization that I might lose my children for good, and they could suffer the same alienation I did. I immediately resolved on the very day my wife left never to stop fighting for my kids. Although I knew I stood a good chance of losing, I also knew that if I gave it my best shot they would never have to feel as though they'd been written off or abandoned by a parent. My life over the last five or so years has been devoted to that goal above all others. For me personally, it's been something of a disaster, but when you're a parent you learn not to think so much of yourself. Suddenly, your own future becomes much less important — even an afterthought sometimes. It's something that might be hard to explain to people without children of their own, but it's paradoxically fulfilling.

As I spend time with my children in this window of sweet, trusting innocence before they begin to really grow up, I find myself marvelling at the sheer importance of fatherhood. Children have a hunger for it that approaches need, and it seems so obvious to me that I am appalled when I think of the casual attitude our culture has developed around the institution. I can only conclude that, like my own father, people are fooling themselves into thinking it makes little difference. The only alternative explanation would be that most people have a visceral hatred for children, and I don't think that's likely.

I can't guarantee that my time with my children this summer or my frequent trips up to the border during the school year will make all the difference. So much of life is out of our hands that we have to concede a great deal to fate. But there is one thing I know: spending time with them is one of the few things I can do that will comfort my children for the rest of their lives. For that alone it's worth it.

Who Believes the Royals About Not Knowing?

W.F. Price · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ever since Kate Middleton got pregnant, she and Prince William have been making a big deal about how succession laws were to be changed so that the firstborn of either sex would become the titular head of state. I find it highly suspicious that this announcement was made right about when a normal parent would know for certain the sex of the baby. The claim that they "didn't want to know" whether it was a boy or girl strike me as disingenuous. All parents want to know. Some of them elect not to, but to me that says they really do have a preference, and don't want to be disappointed. If you really don't care about whether the baby's a boy or girl, might as well learn early so you can decide on a name.

So it came as little surprise to me that Middleton has given birth to a son. I think she and William knew full well the baby was a boy, so by saying it "didn't matter" and a girl could be the heir to the throne, they were playing to their biggest fans – women – while knowing that the conservatives in the aristocracy would feel relieved when the baby came out a boy. On the other hand, maybe Kate, like your typical European, doesn't want a big family, and figured she'd stop at one or two whether or not she had any sons.

Either way, the hoopla over changing royal succession doesn't matter much at all, because the royal family has become little more than a tourist attraction that appeals mainly to old ladies.

And finally, if they can throw out centuries of tradition on a whim, who's to say that the next king or queen won't change the rules yet again? The practice of designating the eldest son as a successor was a measure to promote stability, in contrast to the brutal internecine wars that broke out every time a prolific Muslim Potentate died as in, for example, the Ottoman Sultanate of Women period.

Mitigating the Virulence of Anglo-feminism

W.F. Price · 24 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've had the opportunity to get to know some of the different varieties of feminism as it is understood in different parts of the world. In truth, feminism is looked upon with abhorrence by the vast majority of the world's population. Even most Americans – including women – refuse to identify with it, and other than in the Nordic countries it is perhaps most popular in the US. In most of the global South, which includes the bulk of the world's people, feminists are seen as borderline criminals, and certainly bizarre, depraved women.

And I would definitely agree with my Asian, African and Latin American friends in that regard…

However, even I have to admit that there are certain kinds of feminism that just aren't as vicious, cruel and horribly effective as our own variety has been.

Take FEMEN and Pussy Riot for example. Both are examples of Eastern European feminism, and as obscene and repugnant as they can be, the net effect of their actions has been remarkably tame. Even their anti-religious stunts – hate crimes, really – have been little more than petty vandalism and hooliganism. Contrast that to our own "Christian feminism" that has all but subverted the Christian faith in a number of denominations. Or the feminism that laid waste to Reform Judaism, and threatens to do the same to Conservative Judaism. It wouldn't even surprise me to see a form of feminist Islam openly emerge in the near future. This is a distinctly Anglo phenomenon.

More important even than religious subversion is the stranglehold feminism has placed on family law in the entire Anglosphere. For all the noise Swedish feminists make and all the crazy anti-sex laws they've passed, the Nordic system of family law is remarkably humane compared to what exists in, say, Australia. In the land of widespread acceptance of feminism, equal custody is the norm rather than the exception. Perhaps this explains the Nordic male acquiescence to feminism, or at least the fact that it isn't all that controversial there.

So what is it about Anglo feminism that makes it such a nasty, deadly strain? A couple years ago, I suggested that the adversarial nature of Anglo government is largely to blame, and in considering the issue more I'm even further convinced that's the case. In the linked article, I focused on the adversarial relationship between the state and the governed, which is enshrined in Anglo law, and suggested that feminists have been able to play off the people and the state to their advantage.

> When seen in the context of the traditional Anglo antagonism toward government, it's pretty clear that feminists are, for all intents and purposes, allies of the state against the people. It is akin to a symbiotic relationship between two parasites feeding off the same host; something like the relationship between the mosquito, the plasmodium parasite (malaria) and the human being.

However, this would explain not only the power of feminism, but of all identity politics in the US, so it isn't all that specific in its effects.

I think it's a pretty important insight, but on second thought there's a lot more to it than just the wider political implications. On considering the brutality of family law in Anglo countries, which is unique in the world, it occurred to me that in no other part of the world is there a truly adversarial system of family law. In fact, Islamic Sharia family law is remarkably humane in contrast, although I'd give continental European civil law the highest marks.

The idea that a divorce is an occasion upon which attorneys can engage in the blood sport of custody fights, alimony and child support combat is unique to the Anglosphere. Without this adversarial system of family law, feminists couldn't have done nearly as much damage to the family.

With this in mind, I've begun to see efforts to introduce "no-fault divorce" in an entirely different light. As I've pointed out before, no-fault has been something of a disaster, but now is looks as though the people who pushed for and introduced it may have actually been trying to mitigate the problems caused by adversarial divorces. They failed, of course, but according to accounts I've read, prior to no-fault couples routinely invented slanders against each other to justify divorce, introducing a barbaric element to the proceedings. The reason no-fault failed is that instead of dissipating, the fighting simply moved from fault in marriage to another arena: the assets and children.

No-fault was a well-meaning reform, but it failed because it didn't go far enough. Instead of simply expediting the finding of dissolution, it should have also declared that if there is no fault in marriage, then there is no "fault" in custody as well, and both parents shall share equally just as they do marital assets. Unfortunately, at the time it was introduced the social norm was still a working father/stay-at-home mother couple, which is outdated today.

So, perhaps rather than criticizing the concept of no-fault divorce, we should embrace it in its entirety, and extend it to all aspects of the dissolution, including child custody. If "fault" truly exists, such as conviction for a violent crime against a family member, abandonment, a crippling addiction or disabling mental illness, then it may be introduced, but barring such circumstances a default judgment of no parental fault shall be entered, and custody equally shared.

The most effective way to neutralize feminism in the Anglosphere would be to eliminate the adversarial nature of divorce proceedings. By all means, keep it in criminal and tort law, but it doesn't belong in the family, and never should have been there in the first place. Politicians and reformers tried and failed to provide a remedy some two generations ago, and now they have an opportunity to finish the job. Let's hope they give this matter some serious attention. The time for reform has already come.

Single Motherhood: Strongest Predictor of Low Social Mobility

W.F. Price · 25 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

According to a much-publicized study on social mobility, i.e. the ability of poor people's children to rise above their parents' humble station, the single strongest negative correlation has been found to be the share of single mothers in any given region. Number two on the list is the divorce rate.

Here's a table (table 5 of white paper excel file):

> Tax and other Correlations with Intergenerational Mobility
> Dep. Var.: E[Child Rank|Parent=p25]
> (1) (2)
> Local Expenditure 0.215 (0.076)
> State Tax 0.199 (0.141)
> State EITC Rate 0.231 (0.109)
> Student Expenditure 0.251 (0.094)
> Highschool Dropout Rate -0.639 (0.064)
> Score 0.557 (0.086)
> College Return -0.276 (0.137)
> College Tuition -0.003 (0.060)
> Colleges per capita 0.102 (0.042)
> Inc. at p75 – Inc. at p25 -0.475 (0.089)
> Share of Income of Top 1% 0.178 (0.068)
> Share Black -0.605 (0.065)
> Black Isolation -0.513 (0.065)
> Segregation of Poverty -0.405 (0.063)
> Migration Inflow -0.184 (0.075)
> Share Foreign Born -0.016 (0.060)
> Migration Outflow -0.098 (0.069)
> Mean Household Income 0.109 (0.075)
> Income Growth Rate 0.561 (0.066)
> Share Manufacturing -0.260 (0.081)
> Trade Shock -0.274 (0.124)
> Social Capital Index 0.617 (0.091)
> Religiosity 0.510 (0.087)
> Crime Rate -0.326 (0.101)
> Share Single Moms -0.763 (0.078)
> Share Single Moms (kids of married) -0.652 (0.094)
> Divorce Rate -0.688 (0.108)
> Teenbirth Rate -0.550 (0.091)

Given the soaring rate of single motherhood, this is really depressing news. So much for those "strong, empowered single moms…"

Yet another blemish on the ugly legacy of feminism. Sometimes, I wonder how these people have the nerve to show their faces in public given all the damage they've done.

Is “Interactive Workplace” Code for Feminized Workplace?

W.F. Price · 27 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I first started publishing The Spearhead, I had a whole lot of time on my hands. For the two thirds of the time I wasn't taking care of my kids, the only living creature I had to keep me company was my ornery old tomcat. It took some adjustment to get used to being alone all the time, but in hindsight it was probably for the best — I wasn't in a very sociable state of mind for a couple of years post separation and divorce.

This solitude allowed me to throw myself into writing, editing and running a prolific site that posted up to 100 articles per month in 2010/11. Over time, I began to appreciate the opportunity to do my own thing, and I had that sense of being in “the zone.” Looking back, it was possible because I could focus on work without distraction. I may be a little more inclined to work alone than most, but that kind of “focus” is a masculine trait, and probably explains why men are so much more likely to come up with unique innovations. Of course, men work in teams, too, but I've always noticed that even when they do so they tend to keep interaction focused mainly on specific work-related problems (do athletes discuss their romantic relationships on the field?).

With women, it's different. Interaction is not a means to an end so much as it is an integral part of the work/life experience. Instead of the occasional banter and jibes that characterize male socialization at work and serve mainly to kill time during periods of inactivity, it becomes something of a necessity. Meetings for the sake of meeting, chat as ritual, after work socialization and so on.

For many men, this is fatal to focus and productivity. It certainly is for me. When I'm interrupted while writing, it takes me a long time to get back on track. Sometimes, while working, I am so absorbed in what I'm doing that I don't even notice what's going on around me. When forced to notice, by being interrupted for example, that concentration vanishes into thin air, and I find myself working harder than before to regain momentum. Incidentally, this is why I've been posting infrequently lately; having the kids over during summer break makes it nearly impossible to avoid interruption, so I might as well simply indulge them while I have my time with them.

According to my limited experience and what I hear from friends, constant distraction is the usual state of affairs in the typical corporate workplace. Interruptions are frequent, people do not leave you alone, gossip and innuendo abound, and socialization merely for its own sake is common. How, I wonder, does anyone get any work done in such an environment?

It may be that women are better at performing on the job while socializing; there is some evidence that women can “multitask” better than men. This is probably nature's doing, as mothers with young children must perform work while in a constant state of interruption (children are relentless in placing demands on one's attention). On the other hand, as hunters and tool-makers, men would have had to have a strong ability to focus on a single task to the exclusion of others. When stalking a deer, merely turning aside to deal with a distraction for a split second could mean going hungry that night. When using an axe or hammer, losing focus could also mean losing a finger. I used to work in carpentry, and when we were using tools – even simple ones – we left each other alone. Anyone in the habit of interrupting fellow workers wouldn't have lasted more than a day on the job. Now that I think of it, I have never met a female carpenter.

I strongly suspect men and women evolved different means of dealing with tasks due to their biological roles, which remain real even today. Sexual division of labor is very old, and has been found in every single primitive culture studied so far. It is even found today in so-called “progressive” companies, whether they admit it or not. However, there has been a trend since the 1980s to enforce a balance of the sexes wherever feasible. I wonder whether this isn't coming at the expense of productivity — specifically male productivity. While women may be able to do their jobs passably in an environment filled with distractions, there must be a lot of men out there who are not living up to their potential because of the more “interactive” workplace.

There are countless articles about the importance of workplace interaction, how it solves problems, mitigates disputes, etc. But how about when it causes problems, such as lack of focus and loss of concentration? Interaction may be part of the job for an airline stewardess, a waitress and a schoolteacher, but how about a pilot, a chef and an academic researcher? In the latter set of examples, I can see where an overly interactive workplace could lead to some serious problems.

Maybe it's time for men to assert their own workplace preferences. I have a feeling that, despite the warm and fluffy sound of concepts like interactivity, synergy and team building, most men would be happier if everyone would just shut up and shovel the gravel.

MGTOW is a Calling — it isn't for everyone

W.F. Price · 28 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago, I started writing a piece on MGTOW, but I didn't finish it to my satisfaction, so I saved it for later in the week. I'm glad I waited, because a post on Heartiste underscored my point.

It turns out that Mark Minter, who has written various MGTOW and anti-marriage posts, is engaged to "Kate," a woman who posts frequently on Heartise. They met through the manosphere, and now the once staunchly anti-marriage writer is ready to go through it again.

Naturally, there have been accusations of hypocrisy. How could someone who has denounced marriage in strong terms turn around and get engaged to a woman?

On Roosh's Return of Kings blog, Minter is profiled as "a commenter named Mark Minter who is dropping anti-marriage bombs all over the manosphere.":

> This is the most ridiculous logic I have heard. To call someone a pussy that counsels not to get married because of the risk is blowhard bullshit. You have a 1 in 1,000,000 chance of dying when you leave the house. You have 1 in 2 chance of divorce. 1 in 2. My opinion and observation of data is that your odds are higher if you marry someone attractive. Higher still if you were a player. So go to a roulette wheel and bet 40% of all of your future income on the red or the black. Same thing. It depends on your definition of Game. Some say Game is proactive and allows you to get the best out of life. I think it is somewhat reactive. I say it is defensive. Game enables you to avoid Oneitis and to make sane and rational decisions, to not be dragged, tricked, or manipulated into marriage.
>
> [...]
>
> You know what. I am going exactly the other direction from you. You are a pussy if you do marry. You are a coward that is falling for conditioning, that you need the social validation of it, that you are afraid that you will be alone when you are old, that you need to follow what you are told to do and man-up and meet your responsibilities, that you are afraid to stick your nose out there and continue to struggle to get what you want from women and from the world and you want a bitch to tell you what to do, that you are such a fucking wimp that you need a woman so you can lay your head on her chest and seek your mother like you were a little baby infant (Coco Chanel's word about men, not mine).
>
> Pussy.

I suppose it's a bit ironic that someone who wrote a comment like that is getting married again, but there are a few things we have to keep in mind. First, the people who tend to rail the most against contemporary marriage are those who made a large emotional investment in marriage, and then lost big time. Those who've never been through something like that, such as men who never cared much about their marriage in the first place, don't get bent out of shape over it. And those who invested a lot in their marriage are the type of people who are inclined to pair-bond by their nature, which makes them more likely to marry again in the future. So it doesn't surprise me to see people who denounce marriage in strong terms going back and marrying again.

However, it does make for some embarrassing contradictions, which is why I generally try to focus on marriage reform rather than make futile efforts to stop men and women from shacking up as couples. Most people, no matter what we do, are going to instinctively move toward arrangements that strongly resemble marriage, whether we call it that or not. The real problem, as I see it, is state interference with these natural couplings. Marriage will never be perfect no matter how it's officially handled, but it doesn't have to be a convenient weapon in the hands of moral degenerates as it can be today.

That said, I'd like to give my take on MGTOW, which I hold in high regard despite the fact that I don't practice it myself.

Several years ago, Zed explained MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) to me. According to Zed, it wasn't merely a response to the difficulties of dealing with contemporary Western women, but men as well. He told me that every time men got together to collaborate on some men's project, a circular firing squad would soon form and then the whole thing would go to hell. Other problems included men instantaneously dropping MRA activism when they met a woman. His solution, developed together with Rob Fedders (if I recall correctly) and some others, was to simply "go your own way." It sounds simple, but it does require a conceptual change: a rejection of social norms and expectations, some degree of deprivation and a radical self-reliance. This is even harder than it sounds, especially if you don't have any experience with it.

Because it's so difficult, men who can follow that path are worthy of admiration. Dick Proenneke, the man whose videos from the Alaskan wilderness (where he lived alone for some 30 years) are often featured during PBS fund drives, is a pretty impressive example of a man going his own way. So are a number of famous mystics and hermits, such as the Desert Fathers of the early Christian Church, Buddhist ascetics, Sufi holy men and others of various schools and sects. Of course, these are extreme examples, but the point is that there's something monastic about going your own way. It's definitely compelling – as a young man I was intrigued by the idea – but I don't think most people are up to it. I certainly wasn't. I blew the one opportunity I had to live a monastic lifestyle when I turned down some Buddhist monks who offered me a job teaching English in a monastery some 10,000 feet up in the Kunlun mountains, which surely would have resulted in a great deal of isolation. Why did I turn them down? Well, there was a girl back in Peking, you see… And there's where I, like most other men, failed at MGTOW.

And I know that if I tried it today I'd fail again. I'm just not cut out for it. After my divorce, I went my own way for about exactly as long as it took for me to emotionally recover from the event — about three years.

However, for those who can handle it, I think it's an important calling. Our society would be better off with more men who have a personal, unfiltered relationship with creation. There's something reassuring about the idea that a man can find meaning away from to the ceaseless buzzing of the hive mind. It reminds us that humans do not have the only word — nature itself can lead us to enlightenment and understanding. It lets us know that men can withstand solitude, and find peace within themselves. Paradoxically, this has a profound social value, and this must be why there has always been so much popular respect – even veneration – for men who choose to go it alone.

MGTOW is an esoteric pursuit. If it were easy and common, there would be no reason to admire men who truly go their own way. This is why it will never be a particularly popular lifestyle choice, and this is why it should be seen as a calling rather than a solution.

Generals Cave on Standards as Politicians Demand Less-Effective Military

W.F. Price · 29 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When the President ordered the military to integrate women into combat, several generals promised that women would be held to the same standards, vowing that women would undergo the same training as men. Back then, I pointed out that this was not really true even under the proposed "same standards" combat training, because despite the fact that women and men had to take the same physical tests, they were scored differently. For example, a man who scored well above the cutoff for women could still fail.

Now, however, even that isn't good enough for our intrepid, heroic female politicians, like Rep. Niki Tsongas of Massachusetts, who bravely spent the deadliest years of the Vietnam War as a political intern in Virginia and a social worker in New York.

Tsongas, in a profound insight, has suggested that men and women might not perform equally under the same standards, saying "To put in place a training regimen that is ill-suited to maximizing the success of women is not really the outcome any of us want to see." However, what she does want to see remains unstated.

I think I can guess. She wants to see an easier training regimen that qualifies them as "combat" specialists so that they can receive the extra pay and promotion privileges that entails. She may want to see a few new combat specialties added as well, such as combat desk specialist, combat smartphone operator, combat typist, etc. Those who bravely engage in combat typing, combat texting and the like would then be entitled to higher pay and higher-level job opportunities. Because, after all, they deserve a higher level of respect and authority than those loser non-combat MOS dudes who do worthless things like fix helicopter engines and operate radar.

Joni Mitchell remarks on “nasty” and “not feminine” feminists censored by CBC

W.F. Price · 29 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I recently came across some feminists complaining about some disparaging remarks Joni Mitchell made about feminists during an interview she gave to Jian Ghomeshi, host of CBC’s “Q” program.

Although it didn’t surprise me to learn that Ms. Mitchell is not a feminist – as a woman with such a beautifully feminine and artistic soul she would never fit in with, say, Amanda Marcotte – I was a bit surprised to read that she had such a strong personal aversion to Western feminism. I would have guessed she’d simply avoid those people and the subject.

So, to hear it for myself, I looked up the interview on CBC and listened to it. What she said, however (at 95:00), didn’t match the reported remarks; she merely said she wasn’t a feminist because she didn’t want to gang up on men. I thought that was a bit odd, so I listened to the interview on the CBC audio/mobile player. On the player version, she did indeed lay into the feminists (at 47:35), pretty much as reported. In fact, she goes on for about a minute denouncing feminists in fairly strong terms.

Here’s what I transcribe:

> No I’m not a feminst. I don’t want to get a posse against men, I’d rather go toe to toe myself… work it out. And that’s what I’ve done — I’ve got a lot of men friends. It’s too… too many Amazons in that community. Like [if] I saw a feminism in Africa I would join in a minute — [feminism] that was really feminine. The feminism in this continent isn’t feminine… it’s masculine — it’s contra… pseudo-male vs…. that’s just not feminine. Our feminism is masculinism — it’s not feminism. They tried to say to me – [when] I wouldn’t say I’m a feminist – ‘if you’re not with us you’re against us.’ I mean, all the feminists I have met have been so nasty and so hostile. I go ‘ooh, hoo-hoo-hoo,’ you know, I’m not joining your club, you know.

What appears to have happened is that the interview was edited for TV, and this section was removed from the video, whereas it remained on the radio version. On the TV version, the anti-feminist diatribe is cut right after she says “work it out.” Eyeballing the text, it looks like about 80-90% of it is missing, and that includes the juiciest parts.

Gee, I wonder whether there’s a feminist editor working on CBC’s video team? Do I even need to ask that question? A little shameful, isn’t it, that something spoken with passion and conviction would be cut out like that. But not surprising.

I’m glad I found the full version of Joni Mitchell’s remarks, because she’s one of my favorite female artists of all, and unlike most musicians I actually care what she says. I really love her music, and have always felt some connection to her through her soulful songs. I guess I could even allow that as a teen I had a bit of a crush on her (the younger version, anyway). It seems that we do have something in common, after all.

Here’s “California,” one of my favorites:

Why are Men left out in Immigration Debate?

W.F. Price · 30 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I frequently run across right wing Europeans, and now some Americans, too, arguing that uncontrolled immigration, especially from Muslim countries, should be opposed because of "misogyny," among other things. While I'd argue that the so-called misogyny (really just traditional Muslim gender roles) being transported to Western countries by various immigrants is a pretty trifling problem, and must not be having much effect given the behavior of native women in places like the UK, there are indeed problems caused by uncontrolled immigration, and these problems disproportionately affect men. The most important by a longshot is the depression of wages through flooding the labor market with people who need jobs. Seeing women wearing the niqab in one's neighborhood may bother some Western women, but really, that's nothing compared to being out of work and unable to find a job that pays a living wage.

What makes the situation even more unbalanced is that most of these traditional immigrant women don't work, so they are not competing with working native women, although they are indirectly competing with married ones (the few that remain) through their husbands.

Sometimes, I think politicians on the right are pretty foolish, because the native women they are courting are well aware that the oddly-dressed foreign women are little to no competition (as opposed to foreign brides), so these kinds of white knighting appeals are unlikely to change many votes. In reality, feminists see most immigrants as their allies in extorting more entitlements from those stingy old native men. If you wanted to court the native female vote by using immigration reform, you'd have to tell them that controlling immigration will help preserve their social welfare funds as they are running out, but no politician will dare broach the issue of women's entitlements these days.

On the other hand, feminist politicians have made great strides by restricting spousal immigration in the name of "protecting women and children," when the real purpose is obviously to reduce native women's competition.

So what about men's interests? Can immigration reform be implemented in a way that benefits men? Absolutely. Take illegal labor, for example. Governments could easily make a huge dent in illegal hiring by pursuing rogue employers with as much gusto as they go after men for child support, and this would make it much easier for working-class – and now even middle-class – men to find jobs and make enough money to support themselves. They could also put some teeth into the requirements that companies hire natives first, and stop subsidizing their profits by allowing them to import so much cheap labor.

Furthermore, the process of spousal immigration could be fast-tracked, as it is mainly men who marry non-citizens. Under the current system, it's often easier for a corporation, which has plenty of legal and financial resources, to sponsor an immigrant than it is for a spouse. From the average man's perspective, that's backward: we end up with fewer options and more competition in both work and marriage.

Men's interests are as legitimate as anyone else's, and their votes still count for just as much. I have yet to hear politicians on either side advocating immigration reform that would benefit native men.

I am a Feminist Who Believes In Equality, But Are Things Really Equal?

stompkinsnc · 31 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It may seem odd that a Man on a pro-male blog is writing an article proclaiming himself to be a feminist who believes in equality, but before you go and scream at the site owner, I encourage you to read the entire article before calling for my demise. In retrospect, the argument for equality for all humans is probably a silly one as it seems nearly impossible to reach equilibrium for everyone on every single issue that exists on the planet, but if modern radical feminist want to have this argument, I will be happy to oblige them.

In recent years, we have seen an explosion in empowerment for Women in the areas of college education and graduation, Women's healthcare, business ownership, Women who are now heading up major corporations, and those that are now the "bread winners" in their families. And this is a good thing. But lately I see major gender feminist groups attempting to downplay these advancements by offering silver linings to each of the issues I just outlined.

Of course, one really needs to ask the question, are these Women's groups really out for equality, or does equality scare the hell out of them? What happens if Women become exactly equal in every single issue that faces mankind? How are these groups going to continue to drive million of dollars to their organizations, write books, become political lobbyist, and appear on nationally syndicated talk shows if we have equality? How are the professional feminist and lobby groups going to put food in their mouth and money in their bank accounts if there is no inequality? And, it seems that every time there is an advancement of Women in major areas of life, there are radical feminist who stand ready to offer examples of why things really aren't any better.

To me, it seems clear that radical feminism needs female victims to continue their mission of female dominance and appearances of equality that looks more like dominance at the demise of Men. I honestly do not believe that the average garden variety gender feminist gives a damn about equality, I believe the goal is the demise of your sons, brothers, fathers, and husbands. In these feminist world, there will not be equality until Women control everything and even then I believe there will be some manufactured cloud of victimology placed over the heads of Women and Politicians so that this dominance is maintained.

But unlike the feminist I just took a shot at, I am one that believes in true feminism and real equality across the board for everyone. And in the next section, I am going to outline some areas that I hope the mainstream gender feminist will consider because for all your work, these issues slap you in the face each and every day and expose you for very dangerous Women who are actually hurting a lot of Women that you apparently have not considered.

So Let's Talk About Equality That Radical Feminist Want To Ignore

Yea Right!

- There will never be true equality until the numbers of Women coming home from war in body bags equals the same number of Men and I am encouraging leaders at the National Organization For Women to make this happen.
- There will never be true equality until the numbers of Women who are homeless equals the number of Men who are living on the streets. Therefore, I am calling on major feminist organizations to immediately start significant social media and traditional media campaigns to make this happen.
- There will never be true equality until the numbers of Men committing suicide equals the same numbers on Women who take this action.
- There will never be true equality until either feminist fix the U.S. family courts such that there is equally shared parenting across the board, or the numbers of Fathers getting sole custody equals Mothers that do.
- I am calling on feminist leaders at U.S. universities to immediately take to the streets in outrage and demonstration demanding that Mother's sons have Men's studies classes offered to them so that they can learn positive things about Men who helped this country grow. Additionally, I am calling on feminist leaders to level the playing field for young boys who look at the massive sprawling Women's Hospitals in every major city in the United States and probably wonder where they and their Father's go to get specialized healthcare. You have two options, you can either tear down these hospitals and offer gender neutral specialized care, or you can erect the same equal numbers of Men's and Boys Hospitals.
- There will never be true equality as long as Domestic Violence organizations are attempting to put ALL Men and young Boys into a nice neat and tidy box of probable and expected predators and abusers while providing excuses for Women who commit abuse and violence. In fact, we will never see an end to Domestic Violence until Men and Women come together and stop blaming genders and using politics to build organizations who actually benefit from abuse.
- Radical feminism and Women will never see true equality until they stop telling young boys they can't be baby sitters and play with dolls, then later in life tell them they can't be active and equal fathers because they aren't naturally protective and nurturing parents because they were taught to be that way, or at least not allowed to cultivate it. Should I remind Women readers of this article, in your pro-Mother centered family court activism, you have actually provided the strength needed to marginalize your sons and yourselves as marginalized paternal grandmothers?

Now I realize that feminist who read this post will either not want to address the issues just discussed, will be unable to explain why their movement encourages these issues, or they will use their federally protected status and claim that we are misogynistic and will cry to the Department Of Justice and Southern Poverty Law Center that this article and website should be taken down to protect women even though this article is about protecting Men and Boys and undermines their agenda. However, I for one am tired of being silenced by the threat to labeled as a misogynist because I speak out about Men's and Boy's rights alongside Women and Girl's Rights. If I am a misogynist because I hate, not Women, but the way Women and radical feminist treat Men and Boys then so be it.

About The Author

stompkinsnc is a blogger and shared parenting advocate in North Carolina who works with non-custodial families as they work to bring about comprehensive family law reform which moves this industry from one of gender and sexual politics to one of true best interest of children to have both parents and extended families.

Hugo Schwyzer Caught With Pants Down

W.F. Price · 1 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

46-year-old male feminist and gender studies teacher Hugo Schwyzer, who has recently been on a campaign against older men who lust after young women, has been caught in an affair with a 27-year-old sex worker. Schwyzer has a self-confessed history of sleeping with his students, attempted murder and paternity fraud. Given his brazen dishonesty and selfish behavior, I think it's reasonable to suspect that the man has psychopathic tendencies.

According to "The Real Porn Wikileaks," a hybrid porn/news site that features some pretty eye-opening material, Hugo's affair partner's boyfriend spilled the beans:

> The details of this marital infidelity are not known, but in January 2013, Schwyzer, then 45, had a brief but torrid texting, telephonic and online fling with a 27 year old woman named Christina Parreira, also known is "sex worker activism' circles as Christina Page — and in webcam/amateur porn circles as Gabriela "Ela" Stone. According to Parreira, Schwyzer acknowledged that revelation of their fling would be "career-killing" for him — Hugo has called older men who are "into" younger women – such as men in their 40s being attracted to and pursuing women in their 20s – dirty old men and "creeps."
>
> Parreira, a woman with ambitions in activism and lecturing, had introduced herself to Schwyzer online in 2012 after reading some of his articles. Like Schwyzer, she has been diagnosed with mental illness (she maintains they both suffer from Borderline Personality Disorder), and likewise acknowledges a long history of suicide, violence, attention-seeking behavior, promiscuity, and reckless drug and alcohol use.
>
> She has also admitted filing a false police report to pre-emptively discredit her on again-off-again boyfriend, writer/filmmaker Michael Whiteacre (whom, like Schwyzer, she became involved with after pursuing online).
>
> At the time of her long distance indiscretion with Schwyzer, Parreira had recently dropped out of the Psychology program at the University of Hartford, and moved to Wilton Manors, Florida.
>
> In early February, Whiteacre published screen caps of her private messages with Schwyzer via text, Facebook and Twitter direct message…

The pictures in the above article are graphic, including a series of shots Schwyzer took of himself masturbating following a trip to Ukraine, so you might want to exercise discretion. Given his statements over the last few years, the evidence of his hypocrisy and depravity is damning. It's so bad that Hugo has announced his retirement from gender politics (I'll believe it when I see it), saying that his critics have forced him to the brink of suicide:

> In the end, the question was a simple one: am I doing more good for gender justice by continuing to write, or will I do more good by falling silent. The consensus seemed to be split. What wasn't split was the cost to my marriage and my own mental health. When I give the critics the power to drive me to suicide, the onus is on me to pull away.

Hugo, when you behave in this manner, it isn't your critics who are causing your problems: it's you.

If there's anything that really stands out in the above, it's Hugo's superhuman ability to pity himself.

Given the damage Schwyzer has done to the credibility of male feminists, I sometimes wonder whether it wouldn't be better if feminists forgave the guy and let him keep on writing as a staunch male feminist. When he gets going full steam, you just know it won't be long before he goes off the rails again and crashes in spectacular fashion.

Finally, I'd like to point out how topsy-turvy things are when we have male feminists fooling around with porn stars and flying to Ukraine (Lord knows what Hugo was up to there) while manosphere writers cause scandals by settling down in monogamous relationships. It's a crazy world out there…

Officials use pressure to “denormalize” smoking, why not obesity and single motherhood, too?

W.F. Price · 1 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

According to research published by a Columbia University professor, public smoking bans are not really designed to protect the public, but rather to pressure people into quitting smoking. The professor, Ronald Bayer, says that officials should simply be honest about what they are doing instead of using baseless claims about the dangers of secondhand smoke.

The professor says he supports such nanny-state measures to influence public health and safety, but worries that the excuses and gimmicks politicians use to convince people to submit to more government control are too transparent.

> Public health officials don’t want to be tarred with the brush of the ‘nanny state’ (or) ’Big Brother,’ ” Bayer told PBS in a recent interview. “I actually think these bans on parks and beaches represent, I think, a kind of paternalism, a kind of nanny state. The question is, is the nanny state so wrong? If we could eliminate 400,000 deaths a year over time because fewer and fewer people smoke, would that be so bad? And I think not. But I think public health officials are afraid to make the case that directly, so they get caught in making a case that, I think, is easily picked apart.

I think Bayer gives the public too much credit. There’s little evidence that most people take the time to pick apart BS, or even question it at all. Lying to the public to implement policy has always been remarkably effective; if it weren’t people would hardly ever support war, for example. I’m not implying that it’s morally acceptable, but there’s no doubt it works.

With that in mind, I wonder why our benevolent public “servants” (as though they would ever serve us…) don’t tackle some other pressing problems, like rampant obesity and single motherhood.

Some may suggest that mayor Bloomberg’s soda ban in NYC is an anti-obesity effort along those lines, but it doesn’t go nearly far enough. Not as far, for example, as ticketing people for smoking in public or refusing to wear helmets.

If our health is the state’s business, and the state arrogates to itself the right to use “corrective” measures to change our habits, then why not start ticketing people for being publicly obese? Police could see a fat person in the local park, and then force this person to be measured by a tape and stand on a portable scale. The resulting BMI calculation could be used to determine whether or not to fine the offender for public obesity. The justification behind this could be some excuse such as the following: public obesity causes global warming due to increased methane gas excretion.

Likewise, when a woman is known to be engaging in single motherhood by choice, she should be forced to attend parenting classes, if not fined. And why not arrest people who are known to have anal sex? It’s a dangerous practice, after all, and very much a public health issue. How about we take it further, and ban pop music for advocating promiscuity, tack a carbon tax on all flights, and arrest parents who don’t put sunscreen on their kids every time they take them outside? Every one of these hazards could be justified on the basis of public health/interest. Oh, the possibilities for public revenue and healthy outcomes are endless!

But naturally, these measures will always be used selectively. It’s easy to target those scummy, working-class dudes who are smoking a cig on break. Punishing them is great! But try, in the West, fining a young mother who is foisting her burdens on the rest of society and the sound of howling will reach the moon. Try, even, fining a morbidly obese woman, and we’ll never hear the end of it.

This is the real problem with the nanny state, especially in a liberal democracy. Those we instinctively feel sympathy for, like young mothers, will never be held accountable, while the rest of us will. Naturally, this will simply increase resentment. So, the solution I'd suggest to the public servants:

Get out of our business. It will be cheaper, and we'll hate you less.

Governor McCrory, I Have a Solution To The NC Education Cuts And Teacher Benefits Debate

stompkinsnc · 2 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As I write this article, NC Republican Governor Pat McCrory is locked in a heated debate with teachers and teachers associations over sweeping education cuts he approved in late July of 2013. This article will not debate any merits of either sides position on this conundrum, but I am going to offer a solution that makes sense regardless of how hard it is for many to face. In this article, I am going to not only explore how NC Governor McCrory can find new money to prevent education cuts and teacher's reduction in pay, I am also going to show how he can save lives.

Sounds reasonable right? In this debate, it seems to me that each side in this matter is more focused on economics and principles rather that what is best for children. Governor McCrory has a State budget to balance to prevent collapse of the NC education system so that teachers have a job to go to, and teachers are worried about their pay and benefits. Oh sure, each has thrown in their fair share of the "It's in the best interest of children" which readers here will immediately recognize as a statement designed to prevent any dissent on your agenda because if you do then you must be for uneducated and starving children. This tactic is commonly used in the Men's Rights and Father's Rights community against our desire to be respected as equal partners in our children's lives by feminist and the family law system which throws this scripted phrase out on an hourly basis in order to quell any discussions of equally shared parenting regardless of how the system is actually hurting families and children.

But I digress, this article is supposed to be about finding money to avoid cuts in NC education and teachers pay and benefits.

The plan I am about to unveil will generate upwards of 500 million dollars in new revenue yearly that Governor Pat McCrory can then use to settle the concerns teachers and others have about the education system in North Carolina, but my points will not be popular for many.

Governor McCrory, if you fix the family courts then you will have TWO empowered parents and their extended families who can take the burden off teachers and other school resources in dealing with bullying, emotional, psychological, and sexual acting out.

My Six Point Plan That Governor Pat McCrory Can Use To Fix Cuts In NC Education And Teacher's Pay And Benefits

- If NC Governor Pat McCrory would immediately push legislation that brought about non-discretionary and unilateral equally shared parenting to a system fraught with two parents battling each other tooth and nail for 18 years in order to win in the family courts, or to prevent the other parent from winning, I believe this would save countless lives. You disagree? Have you considered the numbers of kids in broken families who commit suicide each year because they are forced to endure familial fighting between parents and grandparents that WANTS the other parent to be bad to maintain custody, or lose it? Have you considered the numbers of parents who commit suicide, murder, and domestic violence because they were marginalized by the courts to the role of visitor and payment provider four days a month? In a equal system, one where there is nothing to fight over, there will be less needless death. But how does this help Governor McCrory bring new money to State education programs and teacher pay and benefits? Under a shared parenting plan, where kids can enjoy a equal relationship with both parents, step-parents, and grandparents, there will be more involvement by the entire nuclear family which would take expended resources away from the schools and put the responsibility on parents where they should be.

- Currently in NC, via the family courts, we incentivize single parenthood by pushing one parent out of a child's life as a parent and making him/her a visitor who has very little decision making ability and ability to nurture his or her children. This is likely done because the State of NC needs a non-custodial parent paying child support to trigger federal Title IV-D money which replenishes Welfare. If you take the marginalized parent from the role of visitor and put him/her in a empowered position of parent again, then you will see more direct support from that parent which will negate the need for State and Federal programs to support the custodial parent. Governor McCrory can then take a huge portion of Medicaid and Welfare resources and put them into teacher's pay and benefits, along with averting educational cuts.
- Once step two is done, the former custodial parent will have the opportunity to go back to work or further his or her education because they have more free time. These newly working parents who were once in the position of not working in order to draw a State check will add more money to the tax system and create new jobs. NC Governor McCrory can then use these new tax benefits and put them towards education money and teachers pay, raises, and benefits.
- The NC Family Courts have become almost comical with the constant stream of parents coming to court in order to denigrate the other parent in order to maintain or get access to the Welfare system as the custodial parent. It seems to me nothing is ever solved in this system as it continues to be somewhat like a cattle call that just goes on and on and on. Now I realize this makes lawyers happy because they can bill for 18 years, but the reality is the average parent spends roughly $20,000 a piece in the family courts and studies show that they fight two of these battles over 18 years for a grand total of $80,000. If parents were not spending this money in the courts, I suspect they would be happy forking out a good chunk of this change towards teacher's pay, raises, and benefits.
- As stated earlier, there is a huge incentive to have children in NC and then dispose of the other parent so that the hopeful custodial parent can have access to educational assistance, medical/dental assistance, financial assistance, job assistance, housing assistance, food assistance, and tax incentives. Absent this obvious problem, you will see two things happen: 1) There will be less children conceived because both parents will be fully financially responsible for kids instead of just the non-custodial parent. 2) This will result in a decrease in overcrowded classrooms and children who are acting out physically, emotionally, sexually, and psychologically because they have the resources of both parents, step-parents, and grandparents to deal with problems that usually are dropped in NC teachers laps.
- Under a system where one parent wins, while the other parent is marginalized, there are often times very sick children and more times than not, social services has to get involved to sort or the details of what is going on and usually has to provide some level of services and programs. Under my proposed system, we take the parent we pushed out of the child's life in the courts, or by the parent wanting the other parent out to get access to social services programs, and we use them in the role of parent which negates the need for social services. Governor Pat McCrory can then take money from social services derived from an empowered parent and use it to avert educational cuts and teacher's pay, raises, and benefits.

Removing All The Incentives To Win In Family Court Will Result In Parents Not Doing Battle.

When Parents Are Not Engaged In Battle, There Will Be Less Emotional, Psychological, and Physical Abuse On Children.

We Are Calling On State Judges And Legislators To End The Abuse On Children.

In an effort to support this article, we ask that you extensively share this article on Facebook, Twitter, and Google+ so that others can learn more about this important topic. If you decide to tweet this article, please inform @PatMcCroryNC and encourage him to respond.

What are some other areas that we failed to mention where money that goes into sustaining a divisive family court system could free up money for education and teachers in States like North Carolina?

About The Author

stompkinsnc is a blogger and shared parenting advocate in North Carolina who works with non-custodial families as they work to bring about comprehensive family law reform which moves this industry from one of gender and sexual politics to one of true best interest of children to have both parents and extended families.

On Vacation

W.F. Price · 8 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Dear readers, I've been taking some time off to be with family. I am currently with three generations of my family, all in the same place, and quite frankly it isn't all that conducive to getting anything done, so I'm just going to put my effort into being a father/son/brother for the next week.

Sometimes, you just have to let things go and be a family man. Chances are that I'll survive it, and will be back to the normal schedule as summer starts to wind down.

I'll post if things let up for a bit, but no guarantees for the next week or so.

Hope you're all enjoying summer!

What's really behind the Hugo Schwyzer meltdown: he's about to get hammered in court

W.F. Price · 12 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There has been some confusion and speculation about why Hugo Schwyzer has been going through a period of insanity and acting like such a damned fool over the last couple of weeks. And what's up with the suicide attempt? It isn't as though cheating on a spouse and sleeping with young women is new for Hugo, nor is being a lying charlatan. Writers in the manosphere have been calling him out on his bullshit for years, yet he kept chugging along without a hint of shame.

So what's changed this time?

As someone who knows a thing or two about it, it's clear that Hugo has recently become aware that he is about to be pegged like never before in court. The desperation, the unnecessary confessions, the abject pleading for forgiveness, the suicide threats and the frenzy reminiscent of a trapped mongoose are all characteristic of the man who has just realized that he's about to be cooked and eaten for dinner by his wife and her attorneys.

His suicide threats, for example, are obviously a feeble attempt to bargain with his wife. If Hugo's dead, after all, she won't get much. I doubt she's buying it, though — during divorce women will usually call your bluff. That he's sunk to that level shows that his options are extremely limited, as is often the case, and if it were just about any other man I'd feel true empathy, having been there myself, but Hugo, well… Some guys just ask for it.

I've noticed with annoyance that some writers in the manosphere have expressed pity for Hugo Schwyzer despite his atrocious behavior. While we should all reserve a basic respect for human dignity and life, in Hugo's case I think "basic" pretty much sums up what he deserves. And, if he goes through California's family court system, as is looking increasingly likely, basic is about what he'll end up with.

As much as I oppose punitive, unfair family law and support guidelines, Hugo Schwyzer is a prime example of the kind of guy they were designed for. Not only has he demonstrated extreme callousness, as in, for example, participating in paternity fraud, he has egregiously violated his wedding vows, proved himself to be far from a fit parent, and made a lot of money through being a fraud and charlatan.

Hugo makes about $120,000 at Pasadena City College, and probably rakes in some more through writing. Through a back-of-the-envelope calculation using California's child support guidelines, he should be liable for about $3,200 in cash payments per month (assuming two children). That does not include health insurance premiums and increased tax liability as a newly single man without child tax credits and deductions, which his wife will keep if she works at all.

Things are probably worse for Hugo than he realizes. Because he has repeatedly bragged that he is essentially unfireable and his boss has confirmed the same, he won't be able to leave his job unless he finds one that pays more — a highly unlikely outcome for the disgraced feminist. In other words, his basic child support obligations are all but non-negotiable.

But wait, there's more! Hugo's troubles do not end with child support obligations. As a high earner and presumably a property owner, all property will be split down the middle, unless he signed a prenup. Knowing Hugo's past, I doubt he did; what woman would have married him with a prenup? If his children and wife remain in the family home, he will be ordered to pay mortgage and find himself a place to live elsewhere. His extra expenses, all told, could easily eat up more than 50% of his take-home pay. And keep in mind that he won't lose many (if any) of his old expenses — this one's going to hurt, badly.

Because of his self-confessed history of substance abuse, domestic violence, mental illness and sexual deviance, his ability to negotiate custody will be severely compromised. He will be at his wife's mercy, and she can easily extract concessions from him if he wants time with his children. In all likelihood, visitation will be contingent on mental health treatment, and unsupervised visitation, if ever allowed, on continued treatment. To be in a worse position than Schwyzer in this regard, one would have to be a convicted child molester.

Does he deserve all this? An unqualified YES! Schwyzer has been thumbing his nose at ordinary, honest men who are unjustly put through the same thing because they are poorer and less powerful, figuring all the while that he could get away with disgusting behavior by spouting feminist rhetoric and trashing his fellow men. And by all indications he was enjoying every minute of it. No, he is not a self-destructive, sad individual who needs help, but rather a man who has been taking every immoral advantage he could while assuming he could always hide behind his political allies whenever he committed some new crime or indiscretion.

It remains to be seen whether his wife will file for divorce and put Hugo through the wringer, but in his case I hope she does. Not because I believe family law is fine as it is, but because fair is fair, and those who perpetuate and support this system should suffer the same consequences as the rest of us. More so, actually, as people – influential ones most of all – deserve to get what they ask for, and get it good and hard.

Where Feminism and Class Intersect

W.F. Price · 13 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Not long ago, while trying to explain some of the toxic effects of family law – particularly where it concerns low and middle-income people – I was asked how much of this could be ascribed to class and how much to feminist influence. I had to stop and think for a minute, because while I am acutely aware that feminist bias in family law is a real problem, class issues are undeniably there are well. After a moment, it occurred to me why it was difficult to answer the question: rather than being independent variables, class and feminism act in harmony in family law, influencing and amplifying each other's effects.

Feminism is an esoteric ideology and lifestyle that only those above a certain income level can afford. For the woman working at Walmart, the woman on welfare or the mother with a working class husband, immediate needs trump issues like slut shaming and fat acceptance. Even income equality is beside the point; the kind of jobs feminists are concerned about leveling are unavailable to women at the average and lower education level. And besides, what good would it do the poor young mother if her child's father can't pay the rent or child support because he was kicked out of his job in favor of a woman?

So what you'll find is that as education and income rise, women increasingly describe themselves as "feminist." And, inevitably, these are the women who influence policy in legislatures and in the courts.

Because one finds a higher income disparity between men and women in the higher, educated classes, these women tend to have some sense that there is real economic injustice being perpetrated against women, despite the fact that as one gets down to the middle class this disparity diminishes, and in the lower classes disappears.

Higher class women, most of whom are supported by wealthy men, seek to preserve their own good fortune while enacting punitive anti-male policies that target males in lower classes. The result is that the effects of gender feminism are barely felt at the top, while they directly and disproportionately impact lower and middle income men and their families, often doing real harm to them and their children and thereby reinforcing inequality.

It occurs to me that there may be a subtle form of class warfare that cloaks itself in the "feminist" label. It's hard not to draw this conclusion after spending some time in a courthouse and observing how family law actually works and affects people of different backgrounds. For example, the men lined up at the DV diversion window are overwhelmingly lower and working class, while the wealthy couples tend to have the resources to keep things relatively peaceful and not overly disruptive. Despite this, the feminists who infest the courthouses still parrot the line about the "patriarchy" and control, even while dishing out the most punishment to men who have no power to speak of, and live in a social milieu that doesn't in the least resemble a patriarchy.

Sky News Conjures Lesbian Protest from Innocent Russian Kiss

W.F. Price · 19 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'm almost embarrassed by the Western media's attempts to incite hatred for Russia. When I was in the Baltic states last year I laughed at the crazy anti-Americanism of some of the Russian language tabloids for ethnic Russian consumption. I had the sense that the US must be doing alright if the Russians are so preoccupied with tearing us down while we pay Russia little attention. However, things have changed significantly since then.

Just a couple days ago, Britain's Sky News published one of the most outrageous lies about Russia I've seen in decades. After winning the women's 4X400m relay at the IAAF track and field championships in Moscow, two of Russian victors kissed on the podium — a traditional Russian gesture of affection and gratitude, much like the French custom of kissing people on the cheek. The kiss had no political or sexual overtones; sometimes a kiss is "just a kiss." However, that didn't stop Sky news from arbitrarily declaring the kiss to be a lesbian protest against the new Russian law on gay propaganda. It speaks to the depravity of Western journalists that, on seeing two Russian women kiss each other, the first thing that comes to mind is a lesbian sex scene.

While I am all for giving homosexuals the civil rights and protections granted to other people, I am starting to feel pretty uncomfortable about this global gay crusade against sovereign nations. The lies only reinforce my unease. Those who have a truly righteous cause shouldn't have to resort to deception to advance their agenda, and the case against Russia has been based on half truths at best.

Additionally, the rhetoric has grown so wacky that I wonder whether some of the most strident opponents of Russia are even in their right minds. For example, Stephen Fry has made comparisons to the Nazi regime, saying that holding the Olympics in Moscow is akin to the 1936 games in Nazi Germany. I suppose the implication is that we should prepare for world war III so as to make the world safe for homosexuality. Sorry, you can call me an isolationist or "appeaser," but I'm not signing up for that. To me, the idea of starting another Cold War on behalf of homosexuality is pure insanity.

It remains to be seen where this will all end, but somehow I doubt attempts to provoke a global clash in the name of homosexuality will ultimately play well in the US. I may be wrong, as the younger generation of Americans is apparently the gayest one yet, but I just don't see the issue as being all that effective as a war cry. At least I hope not.

Racial Twitter Campaign Reveals Active Faults in Progressive Coalition

W.F. Price · 20 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Nonwhite women who are fed up with contemporary feminism, dominated as it is by elite white females, recently started tweeting under the #solidarityisforwhitewomen hashtag. Mikki Kendall, who created the hashtag, brought up the Hugo Schwyzer debacle as proof that white women don't care about nonwhite women. Kendall is giving too much credit to Schwyzer; he has never provided anything but some lowbrow entertainment with his articles on facials, pegging and such and his penchant for attention seeking. The less said about Schwyzer from here on out the better, but he did at least provide Kendall with a convenient opening from which to launch an attack on the white feminist establishment.

Although a Twitter campaign doesn't seem all that consequential, and it probably isn't, the outpouring of rage directed at white feminists was quite a thing to behold. While nothing may come of the Twitter complaints for now, there is no longer any doubt about the hostility toward privileged white feminists from nonwhite women. White men, for their part, sat this one out, with the notable exception of one Tim Wise, who derided the hashtag, thereby bringing a barrage of angry tweets upon himself as well.

There are a couple things at work here, and neither looks good for the white progs who have been dominating the feminist and anti-racist movements to their own benefit for decades. First and most importantly, nonwhites are beginning to feel the growth of their political strength. They are no longer content to sit meekly in the background while white hucksters and smooth talkers putatively speak on their behalf. And I don't blame them one bit. It's demeaning to have others speak for you, mainly because their own interests always come first. As far as white progs are concerned, appearing morally superior among their white peers and keeping minorities peaceful rank high on the interests list. This is why they rarely bring up the routine civil rights abuses on the streets of "their" cities or in prisons — best not to speak of the brutal measures that allow them to traipse around the city in relative safety and shove darker people out of desirable real estate.

Nonwhites have begun to realize that they are no longer the subordinate party in the white prog/nonwhite coalition. Why should they continue to kowtow to a faction of whites who are a distinct minority even in their own race? Perhaps no more than a quarter of American whites – if that – are true left progressives, so why does their voice take precedence over the numerically superior nonwhites? While conservative and other non-progressive whites may be at odds with minorities on many issues, there is little conflict between the groups in a concrete, personal sense. On the most basic, personal level, there is considerably less conflict between conservative-leaning whites and nonwhites than between nonwhites and their progressive white overlords. This being the case, a power struggle between minorities and their declining progressive rivals is inevitable.

The next factor here, which is related to the first, is the growth of advocacy for men among nonwhite men. Although they have been standing up for themselves in one form or another for years, only recently have they begun to offer a serious and direct challenge to feminism in their own communities. It's a challenge that has been hard for their own women to answer, because the effects of feminism have been so utterly toxic to their communities. While white feminists have continued to have a reliable upper class of white men to rely on, black and Hispanic women have been left pretty much on their own while their men are economically and socially emasculated. When it comes down to it, women rely on their men, and when their men are disenfranchised, so are they. It is specifically this disenfranchisement of minority women that has placed white feminists in a position of power over them, and they are starting to become acutely aware of this fact.

This is thanks, in large part, to the efforts of men like Obsidian, who has been working tirelessly to challenge feminism and the denigration of men in the black community. We can't overemphasize the importance of this work, to nonwhite and white men alike; the master/slave dynamic in the progressive/nonwhite coalition puts the majority of all men at a distinct disadvantage vis a vis the overclass. If it can be broken, and I see some hope for that, we men of all races may come out of the current situation with significantly more self-determination than we had before.

I've long predicted the demise of feminism based on demographic and political trends, and it looks like these trends are finally beginning to make themselves felt. For now, we should keep working steadily on our angle, avoid petty bickering to the extent we can, and keep biding our time until the inevitable disintegration of the elite coalition begins.

Black Feminists Have A Hugo Problem, Too – Among Other Things

Obsidian · 21 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"The rationalization hamster is an analogy for the thought processes used by women to turn bad behavior and bad decisions into acceptable ones to herself and her friends. When a woman makes a bad decision, the hamster spins in its wheel (the woman's thinking) and creates some type of acceptable reasons for that bad decision. The crazier the decision, the faster the hamster must spin in order to successfully rationalize away the insanity."

-The Private Man, "The Rationalization Hamster Is Now Immortal"

The flurry of attention that Mikki Kendal, an obscure Black Internet Feminist, recently garnered with her Tweet heard Around The World "#SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen", where she rightly upbraided her erstwhile White Feminist sisters for their tripping over themselves to cover their backsides in giving disgraced academic and self-proclaimed male feminist Hugo Schwyzer a pass at the expense of Sista Feministas everywhere, was almost too good to be true – Black and White Women, the Feminists among them anyway, were finally gonna duke it out over what anyone with one good eye could clearly see was dogging "the movement" since Day One – that "Feminism" in truth, really meant Feminism for White and at least nominally middle-class Women - and any other kinds of Women, especially Black, had to get in where they fit in, if at all. It promised to be a rollicking time of highspirited drama and hijinx, which so accompanies disagreements of the ladykind. I for one eagerly looked forward to the fireworks that would surely ensue.

And ensue they did – only to be kinda sorta swept aside by another hashtag bombshell sent on Twitter by another member of the Sistarati – #BlackPowerIsForBlackMen – so sayeth one Ms. Jamilah Lemeiux,editor at Ebony.com – and we're off to the races. Just like that, the ire of Black Feminists went from chin-checking their White sisters-in-arms, to running off what could only be described as a Litany of White People's Problems in Blackface to their Brothas – and this time, the Brothas responded with a Hugoesque mea culpa of its own. Headed up by Duke University academic and gender expert in his own right, Mark Anthony Neal, "Brothers Writing to Live" – a gaggle of truly privileged Black Men – wrote a response to the Litany so drenched in #Empathy that the Porn Professor himself would be impressed.

If you're thinking that I am about to suggest that what we saw in the White Femisphere over the past few weeks with their Hugo Problem is something that is NOT unique to them and that the Black Femisphere has some challenges of its own along these lines too, step right up and claim your prize, because you would be spot-on. Hugo showed us all that in the end, he got where was was and still is, in no small part due to the fact that he had enough of the Right Stuff to win the (White) ladies/Feminists over - and the same is true with his analogues on the Blackhand side of things, too. Just like Hugo knew and understood Women and Seduction well enough to have the former eating out of his hand, the same exact thing can be said of many "new" Black Men, who clearly understand the sociosexual landscape and have no compunctions taking advantage of it. No, I am not saying that any of the Brotha collective of which Neal is a part, are suffering from mental illness, pathological liars or are serial monogamists; but what I AM saying, is that one has to either be completely naive, incorrigibly disingenuous, or suffering from an acute attack of the Rationalization Hamster not to see that a tremendous deal of these shows of "empathy" on the part of these kinds of Men, have at least as much to do with positioning oneself for the Poontang, as it does anything having to do with "Social Justice".

Look, in Black America, Black Men like Neal, et al, know they are a hot and relatively rare commodity - attractive, accomplished, high status, "gets it" and says all the right things to the (Black) ladies – who, let's be equally and as brutally honest, simply don't have as many chances to get such Men into their ciphers on a regular basis, compared to their White counterparts - hence all the chatter in more recent years about "Black Male Privilege", a concept that, on its face is an utterly laughable one – until you consider that what these Black Women are talking about ain't Charles Ramsey and his ilk; it's the Jewel Woods' and Mark Anthony Neals of the world – and the Woods and Neals are smart and saavy enough – in other words they have GAME - to understand that mouthing such nonsensical platitudes is what soooooooo many Black Women of a Certain Class want to hear - much like a certain White, privileged and good looking academic, did on the White side.

Sound familiar?

Black Women taking in the "I feel your pain" line from certain Brothas who have the media spotlight would be wise to, in the wake of the Hugo Crisis, take it all with a brick of salt, because, no, there's nothing wrong with your TV set, chances are high they're running White Knight Game on you, too, please do not fool yourself. Indeed, before bemoaning the supposed "oppression" they endure at the hands of Brothas, Black Feminists/Women need to consider how much trouble they get their own selves into by refusing to see the forest for the trees; in a recent interview with The Hairpin, both Mikki Kendal AND her partner in crime, Flavia Dzodan, couldn't even identify that the key reason why Hugo Schwyzer was the golden boy for White Internet Feminism when the evidence was as plain as their own noses on their faces, so deep were they in their Rationalization Hamster's centrifuges – "privilege" and "race", while certainly not non-factors, were a distant second to the simple fact that HE WAS HOT to their White sisters, and thus, he got on, even when – perhaps especially when - he acted like the asshat he is, and threw the Sistas under the bus.

If ever there was a validation and confirmation of everything that is taught and discussed in Game/Pickup circles, the Hugo Saga is it, and that includes the aforementioned interview. Read Kendal and Dzodan's answer to that straight-up question in The Hairpin and see for yourself. Look at those hamsters go!

But that, interestingly enough, is in fact the least of the Black Feminists' problems; from where I sit, they have at least two other big ones that they have to directly confront, if they want to still be in the headlines come August, 2014:

The first problem they have is one of increasing irrelevance - as I've noted several times over the past few years, despite their being repeatedly chumped, snubbed and dissed by their Whiter and higher class sisters, the fact remains that they – Black Women - have benefitted directly, and tremendously, from the (White) Feminist Agenda - and more often than not, with the aid and tacit approval of Black Men themselves. Today, Black Women get more abortions than anyone else, go to school more than anyone else, and have long outpaced Black Men when it comes to gainful employment. Wanna talk about violence against Women? Great – please tell me how so many Black Women's bodies are piling up at a time when, by every measure you can imagine, violent crime of ALL kinds has dropped significantly - I'll wait. Those drops in violent crime, have direct and immediate bennies to Black Women, in the form of fewer of them being raped, beaten or killed, because the single biggest victim of Black crime, is Black people, in this case, Black Women.

Black Women have documented higher senses of self-esteem, and when it comes to what Hugo referred to as "female sexual empowerment", part of the reason why out of wedlock births are so high in Black America is BECAUSE Black Women themselves prefer it that way - this was borne out in Edin & Kafalas' groundbreaking and critically acclaimed work "Promises I Can Keep" and Edin & Nelson's more recent follow up effort,"Doing The Best I Can"; and as comedian Chris Rock rightly observed, the single biggest fans and consumers of supposedly "degrading" variants of Hip Hop music are again, yup, you guessed it, Black Women, who shake and shimmy on the dancefloor to the beat all night long. None of this is to say that there are still aren't atomized instances of sexist holdouts among individual Black Men, but to deny the clear and present evidence of what I've just presented above is not just to be intellectually dishonest; its to be delusional in the face of incontrovertible fact.

The second problem facing Black Feminism is actually something that is, in some ways, not unique to them at all; as Susan Walsh, of the blog Hooking Up Smart, rightly noted recently, even (White) Feminists themselves have acknowledged that they have a branding problem when it comes to getting new recruits into the fold. Fewer (White) American Women than ever, identify with being a Feminist, and in fact if anything, will assiduously avoid being tagged with that label, and for good reason: because, in the minds of most (White) Women, being a Feminist is synonymous with being an unattractive, angry Man-hater.

In the Black community, Black Feminism suffers from a “branding” problem too, but one of a different kind: in the minds of most Black Women, ”Black Femism=Black Lesbianism” - and Black Feminists cannot claim that they are being tarred and feathered unfairly on that score. Indeed, Black Feminism’s roots hail from the fact that its leading thinkers were/are themselves lesbians, and the kinds of politics and interests, to say nothing of the style and tone, that they endorse are often off-putting to straight Black Women, who simply don’t see life in the same ways that they do. This has resulted in an ever-growing rift between those inside the Black Feminist tent, and those on the outside, and over the years, the former has, whether unintentionally or otherwise, alienated the latter.

Taken together – the Black Feminists’ own Hugo Problem; the question of remaining relevant in a truly Post-Feminist Age; and the alienation of straight Black Women away from the Black Feminist Brand -are far and away MORE important, in my view, than merely getting dissed, yet again, by their White sisters. After all, was that really any great shock or surprise, especially when you toss a charismatic, good looking White guy into the mix?

The Obsidian

A Matter of Faith

W.F. Price · 2 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As I end my short period of internet isolation (sometimes it pays to remind yourself that there is, in fact, a real world offscreen from time to time), I find myself glad to have had the opportunity – if only for a moment – to miss some of the goings on. It was nice to have a little respite from feminism and the other social ills plaguing our culture.

However, it's time to get back to the serious business of deconstructing feminism. On the male feminist front John Scalzi and PZ Myers have been engaged in some serious attention-seeking recently. There seems to be a certain histrionic flair in the male feminist, which suggests to me that they do in fact identify with women on some deep personal level.

Hugo Schwyzer (mercifully) seems to be out of the picture, and I'm not really interested in Scalzi's defensive boasting, as it doesn't contain any lessons or important information about anything other than Scalzi himself, but Myers' involvement in a rape accusation against a fellow atheist activist is worth some attention.

PZ Myers is known for a scathing hostility toward religion, and Christianity in particular, as opposed to the typical atheist's apathy. I'd guess that somewhere from a third to a half of men are skeptical about religion, having essentially the same attitude as St. Thomas, i.e. "I'll believe it when I see it." It's a masculine attitude, and entirely natural. In most cases this is exactly the Atheist position and the source of objection to religion, but in Myers' case something far different appears to be at work.

Rather than being driven purely by skepticism and a refusal to accept that for which there is no objective proof, there is something else that drives Myers' hatred for religion, and, apparently, for men in general.

A few weeks ago, Myers claimed to have received emails from a reader about Michael Shermer, who has attended a number of Atheist events and is a fairly prominent Atheist in his own right. This alleged reader accused Shermer, who is now nearly sixty years old, of being a serial rapist who stalks and assaults women at Atheist conferences. Myers has refused to divulge the identity of the reader because, I suppose, the right to confront one's accuser doesn't apply to rape accusations. Or perhaps he made the entire incident up.

Myers tries to cover his tracks by saying he has "no personal, direct evidence that the event occurred as described," but nowhere does he suggest that the "event" itself may be entirely fictitious. Instead, he claims that he is doing a good deed by lending credence to the accuser, because "she has no other option" besides making an anonymous accusation. So much for skepticism…

Indeed, one might think that a rational, skeptical individual would question an accuser who claims, seven years after the fact, that she was raped by a fairly old man at a conference attended by many people. There was no surprise ambush, no seizure by force, use of weapon, etc. Instead, at an event with many people, he brazenly coerced her into sex, and got clean away with it.

The accusation:

> At a conference, Mr. Shermer coerced me into a position where I could not consent, and then had sex with me. I can't give more details than that, as it would reveal my identity, and I am very scared that he will come after me in some way. But I wanted to share this story in case it helps anyone else ward off a similar situation from happening. I reached out to one organization that was involved in the event at which I was raped, and they refused to take my concerns seriously. Ever since, I've heard stories about him doing things (5 different people have directly told me they did the same to them) and wanted to just say something and warn people, and I didn't know how. I hope this protects someone.

It truly requires a leap of faith to take this accusation at face value, and even more so to take the step of publicly airing it. Repeating anonymous accusations has always been viewed with suspicion, and for good reason. When key elements of evidence are “secret,” there is no way for the outside world to verify the truth. In general, it is fair to start from the premise that secret or anonymous accusations are false. In science, much cherished by many skeptics as proof that religion is false, men deliberately set about to disprove hypotheses before accepting them as fact, and the idea that any secret or uncomfirmed results should be given consideration would be rejected immediately. Objective truth does not just take people’s word.

But that’s what PZ Myers has done with the Shermer accusation. And by refusing to name the accuser he has cast doubt not only on the story, but his own credibility as well. Myers is asking people to believe without any corroborating evidence aside from the alleged accusation of some mystery woman. It is more of a stretch than the miracles of the Bible, in which witnesses at least identified themselves. This behavior throws doubt on any previous claims Myers has made about his skepticism toward religion being based on reason. A man so willing to believe with so little proof has no leg to stand on in attacking people for their faith in God. He has revealed himself to be, above all, a malicious hypocrite and prejudiced bigot.

The other explanation, of course, is that PZ Myers is a scheming liar who made the entire thing up to discredit a rival. In that case, I hope Michael Shermer sues him for defamation.

Obama Supporting Patriarchal Rebels in Syria

W.F. Price · 3 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For all the talk about promoting women's rights worldwide, you'd think someone might mention that feminism and women's place is a contentious issue in the Syrian Civil War. Bashar al-Assad's regime, while authoritarian, is remarkably liberal by Arab standards where women are concerned. The rebels, on the other hand, are dominated by Muslim fundamentalists akin to the Taliban. You know, the type who execute women for fornication, keep girls out of school, force women to cover themselves and employ beatings and gang rape to keep them in line.

That the Obama administration and the US elite in general support these rebels suggests that feminism is amongst the least of their concerns in a global context. In fact, feminism is strictly for domestic consumption, and used as a tool to put ordinary American boys in their place. In the greatest of ironies, Obama is about to order American military personnel, who have had feminism shoved down their throats since he took office, to assist these ultra-patriarchal jihadis and attack Assad. In the meanwhile, many of them will have wives back home going out clubbing and fooling around with townies and other soldiers off base.

These inconsistencies of US policy reveal that ideologies like feminism are not really taken seriously by those in power, but are instead just a convenient tool or an effective weapon, like a Tomahawk cruise missile that destroys American families and renders children fatherless so as to prevent them from challenging the scions of our overlords.

However, in the case of Assad and the rebels I can't in good faith support either side. Assad has employed feminism in the same manner as our elites, while the rebels have a burning hatred for my civilization and religion. If I had to choose a side, I'd go with Assad, because at least he doesn't burn churches and massacre Christians (BTW, whether you call yourself secular or Christian, if you're an American you're still a "kafir" to these rebels). And anyway, the kind of patriarchy fundamentalist jihadis support is totally alien to my people and our tradition, which has always been a lot more moderate and benevolent in that regard.

So, when the cruise missiles start raining down on Damascus, keep in mind what a fraud Western feminism is. Hell, I'll bet even Patty Murray supports an attack on the Syrian regime.

Rage Over “50 Shades” Casting Choices

W.F. Price · 3 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Apparently, fans are taking the film adaption of Fifty Shades of Grey very seriously. So much so that the decision to cast Dakota Johnson and Charlie Hunnam has been met with a deluge of angry tweets.

> Since it was revealed over the weekend that Charlie Hunnam and Dakota Johnson landed the lead roles in the film adaptation of Fifty Shades of Grey, passionate fans have been in a fury, directing rage-filled tweets at author E L James and film producer Dana Brunetti and starting a petition lobbying for White Collar star Matt Bomer and Mad Men‘s Alexis Bledel to replace the duo as Christian Grey and Anastasia Steele.
>
> Brunetti tried reasoning with the angry mob, retweeting hateful messages and explaining how the casting process really works.

Fifty Shades of Grey is, quite frankly, pornography, and as a man I find the emotional investment in the stars to be bemusing. But maybe that’s because I’m a man, and it’s easier to emotionally disengage from sex.

However, that raises the question of whether female-oriented pornography might actually be more socially disruptive than the male sort. For men, porn is often an outlet. Although it can become an addiction, for the most part it’s simply a means to release sexual tension — a substitute for the real thing. Nevertheless, second wave feminists in the early days were staunchly opposed to pornography, although they have a history of going back and forth on the issue, possibly depending on where they, personally, stand in the sexual market.

Female pornography, however, seems to be more of an all-consuming fantasy that becomes confused with reality. The fictional beautiful maiden being ravished by some marauding sheikh, to be carried off to live in the opulence of a desert harem, becomes a part of the self-identity of the housewife reading the porn. The sheikh becomes her dusky lover, and all that stands in the way is that schlub of a husband who expects her to fix him dinner and get his suit ready for work (the nerve!). Her imagination runs away with her, and next thing we know she’s fooling around with some guy named Habib from the local Halal market (feel free to mix and match ethnicity of lover according to porn setting).

I wonder why men don’t take this female porn as seriously as feminists take the male variety. It seems to me that it’s more consequential, after all.

FEMEN Revealed to be Pimp's Brainchild

W.F. Price · 4 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Eastern European feminist group, known for topless protests around Europe, was founded by Victor Svyatski, a Ukrainian "activist" who hand-picked the girls for their looks and called them "bitches."

It's highly ironic (although unsurprising) that the guy who was behind the group treated his charges as though they were a part of his stable, calling them spineless and submissive.

From policymic's Andrea Nica:

> While, there is nothing wrong with having a man be part of a feminist movement, the validity of the movement is in question given Svyatski is the main leader and founder of FEMEN. Still, one could remain open-minded … that is, until he told 28-year-old Australian film-maker Kitty Green "These girls are weak" during the filming of FEMEN's upcoming documentary, Ukraine is Not a Brothel. The founder is known for calling the female activists "bitches" and "submissive." Sadly, the reputability of the movement has waned.
>
> It's difficult to stand behind a group positioned to end women's oppression politically, sexually, and religiously when these feminist activists are paradoxically led by a dictator they publically oppose. According to the Independent, Svyatski describes his hostile feelings towards the women he "hand-picked":
>
> "They don't have the strength of character. They don't even have the desire to be strong. Instead, they show submissiveness, spinelessness, lack of punctuality, and many other factors which prevent them from becoming political activists. These are qualities which it was essential to teach them."
>
> [...]
>
> With Svyatski as leader, this group cannot honestly fulfill their mission of empowering women and raising awareness against political dictatorships. To further support this opinion, one of the FEMEN campaigners tells Green, "We are psychologically dependent on him and even if we know and understand that we could do this by ourselves without his help, it's psychological dependence," she says.

This what pimps refer to as "breaking them in."

Never underestimate the power an immoral man without principles can exert over women, including the feminists who enthusiastically supported FEMEN throughout the West. Does anyone believe that Mr. Svyatski lost any sleep over the girls arrested in Tunisia, or the ones stripped and abandoned in Belarus? I suppose a better question would be whether the feminists who endorsed this pimp's efforts feel any remorse for their part in the scam.

I doubt it. Birds of a feather and all.

So much for "Ukraine is not a Brothel"…

Oregon Bar Owner Fined 400k for Telling Transsexuals to go Elsewhere

W.F. Price · 4 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've never concealed my skepticism about transsexuality. I became suspicious of the trans rights movement when I noticed how many transsexuals were involved in "deconstructing masculinity" and similar man-hating/gender-bending academic disciplines. While homosexuals have an apparently inborn sexual preference, transsexuals are by definition not "born that way." In fact, most of them are straight men, and many are fathers to children. Often, the desire to "become a woman" seems to arise in middle age, by which time full physical and psychological masculinization has already occurred. I suspect that transsexuality, for most men, is a form of pathological pedestalization of women. Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, after all, and it isn't uncommon for people to strive to become that which they most admire.

In general, I don't think people are viscerally offended by men who can genuinely "pass," but there's something about a big man with an adams apple and huge hands in a dress that disturbs people. Just as the transsexual claims to have been "born" a woman, I think I can say with some certainty that most people were born with an aversion to that kind of gender bending.

So when I heard Portland bar owner Chris Penner called up a group of transsexuals who had been congregating at his bar every Friday night and told them to stop coming, I naturally sympathized with the man. Can you imagine trying to make a living in the hospitality industry while guys built like linebackers wearing lipstick, dresses and heels occupy your business?

> A Portland, Ore. bar owner has been ordered to pay $400,000 to a group of transgender customers that he banned after claiming they affected his business.
>
> Formerly known as The P-Club and recently rebranded as The Twilight Room Annex, a group of transgender women known as the "T-Girls" had patroned the establishment every friday night for over a year before Cassandra, a member of the group, received a shocking voicemail from bar owner Chris Penner. As heard on the Fox 12 report above, Penner noted in his voicemail:
>
> "Hello, my name is Chris. I'm the owner of P-Club Bar and Grill. Unfortunately, due to circumstances beyond my control, I'm going to have to ask for you, Cass and your group, not to come back on Friday nights. People think that A) we're a tranny bar or B) we're a gay bar. We are neither. People are not coming in because they just don't want to be here on a Friday night now."

Penner made the mistake of leaving a message instead of using another, more ambiguous method to chase away the unwanted customers. Under Oregon's "Equality Act," it is illegal to discriminate against men for wearing outlandish clothing and violating cultural norms if they call themselves women. In any other comparable case, such as men dressed as "furries" or Civil War soldiers, it would be perfectly OK. If a man thought, for example, that he was born in the early 19th century and dressed the part, he could be legally kicked out of an establishment for annoying people. It's only when you think you're a different sex that such delusions are privileged by law.

From a Q&A on the Oregon Equality Act:

> Under Oregon law, gender identity includes what a person believes his or her gender to be, including how the person chooses to express his or her gender. Gender identity protection also encompasses any behavior that differs from what may be traditionally associated with the person's sex at birth. The law protects people who identify as transgender as well as people who do not fit into stereotypes of how a man or woman should look or act.

Again, I'd like to stress the distinctions between gay and so-called "transsexual" men. Homosexuality is a sexual preference, and therefore a private matter. Although there may be certain manners of speaking and acting associated with homosexuality, these by no means sufficiently – or even accurately in many cases – define what it means. Transsexuality, on the other hand, is a public expression. Identifying as a woman demands public acceptance. We are obliged to accept, regardless how we may feel about it and no matter how unlikely it may appear, that these men are women. For most of us, this is an affront not only to our sense of propriety, but our physical senses as well. If a man is homosexual, on the other hand, we have no obligations — he lives his life and we ours.

Also, importantly, if a gay man acts in an over-the-top, inappropriate manner, he can be asked to leave an establishment or job on the basis of his behavior. That does not constitute discrimination, because public behavior does not define homosexuality.

What this reveals is that extending rights to people based on gender "identity" rather than gender reality is going above and beyond the traditional protections granted to people. These are not rights, but privileges that the rest of us do not share.

If we could make any comparison, perhaps the closest one would be freedom of religion. One is free to believe things that others find preposterous, and to proclaim these things as truths. That is the only parallel I can see between transsexual rights and other rights. However, freedom of religion does not grant the right to force others to also proclaim belief — the freedom goes both ways. If Catholics were to enter a bar, perform a Eucharist, and declare the alcohol and bar snacks the body and blood of Christ, I don't think it would be called "discrimination" if the owner promptly tossed them out for disrupting his business. Likewise, transsexuals should be free to call themselves women, but when the state forces the rest of us to recognize and honor their declaration, it is an abuse of power and a step toward tyranny.

For Young People, “Feminism” Going Down Memory Hole

W.F. Price · 5 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I’m always curious about what’s going on with millennials, because a few years ago I realized that I am totally out of touch with youth culture. Today’s youth culture is more different, as far as I can tell, than my own (genX) was from my boomer parents’. Sure, we genXers were more cynical, skeptical and dark than the exuberant, colorful boomers, but we were entirely familiar with boomer icons throughout all avenues of culture. In many ways, we came of age in their shadows.

However, when I look out on the youth landscape today, it’s alien territory. With the exception of R&B and country – both conservative musical institutions – there’s little recognizable out there. Politically speaking, I don’t have a clue what’s going on. Occupy Wall Street? That fizzled almost as soon as it arose. Millennial politics are an unknown quantity at this point, and I don’t think I’m any more clueless in this regard than traditional media, which rarely if ever reports on youth politics, opinions, etc.

So I must rely on clues from the pop media sources, many of which are centered on entertainment gossip, which seems to be the voice of the new generation.

I’ve posted a few articles about pronouncements young stars have made about feminism. As far as I know, every single one has rejected the label of “feminist” when asked. Katy Perry, Taylor Swift and even Lady Gaga all denied being feminists. Perhaps they associate it with their grandmothers, just as I would have associated 1950s middle-class housewifery with mine.

However, it seems that some of the younger ones don’t even know what it is. Take “Teen Mom” star Farrah Abraham, for example. That teen mothers are now pop stars is pretty outlandish from my point of view, but I think it must say something about the cultural values embraced by millennials, and instead of ridiculing it I’d rather seek to understand (if possible).

Abraham, who made some money through pornography with Hugo Schwyzer’s fantasy beau (and possible former student) James Deen, was recently asked whether she considered herself a feminist. At first, she didn’t seem to understand the word, responding that she thought she was, indeed feminine. When the interviewer clarified, she said “What does that mean, you’re a lesbian or something?”

Maybe Ms. Abraham is a dim bulb and very vacuous, but then again she seems to have a keen business sense. It’s just that “feminism” isn’t even on the radar screen for her, and apparently never was.

This may seem like trivial stuff, but it strikes me as a very big difference from my own childhood. When I was a teen, young women almost all knew what feminism was, and most of them identified with it. Some considered themselves feminists in middle school and were militant about it by 9th grade. Feminism wasn’t only well-known, but pretty much normative in urban America around 1990. Girl bands were screeching about rape, take back the night marches were in full swing, and even male rock stars were earnestly pledging their support to radical third wave feminism.

How things have changed…

I predict that when millennials come to maturity, feminism will not even need to be rejected, because, if people like Farrah Abraham are any indication, nobody will even know what it is any longer. Perhaps in 20 years’ time, when you ask a young person “what is feminism?” the response will be something like this:

“What does that mean, lesbians or something?”

“New” Birth Control Trend: Pulling Out

W.F. Price · 5 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Chuck Ross’s GLPiggy site alerted me to a supposed trend in birth control amongst the hipster set. Because they think the pill is unnatural and condoms are a pain, they have resorted to the old standby of coitus interruptus. This has alarmed a number of feminists, including Amanda Marcotte, who called it a “worrisome” trend.

However, the kinds of women profiled probably have something else to worry about: childlessness. Sure, there’s a nod to the 15-24 age set, but when an article refers to women buying “organic kale,” you can rest assured that they are in the last trimester of their fertile years, or very close to it. Let’s say women are reliably fertile from 15 to 40 — a 25 year spread. Now go to a Whole Foods in San Francisco and take a look at the “young” women shopping there. They really aren’t very young; the median age is over 30. If we take the last trimester of fertility to be 32 to 40, most of them fall squarely in that age group.

It seems pretty clear to me that these women talking about “natural birth control” aren’t all that enthusiastic about birth control in the first place. If you’re in your early to mid 30s and still childless, and your boyfriend doesn’t want a kid, what better way to force the issue than to reject chemical birth control?

From the article Chuck linked:

> It’s no coincidence that the pullout advocates I know are women who have been sleeping with the same man for years. More than any other birth-control choice, the pullout method requires women to relinquish control and put a significant amount of trust in their partner. But it also comes with the benefit of sharing the burden of preventing pregnancy. After years of being the ones who had to remember to take a pill or replace the ring, pullout puts the onus on men. A friend of mine, who’s 32, says her current partner has more reservations than she does about using the withdrawal method. “He’s like, ‘I’m nervous. Sometimes I feel like I’m going to fail at my job,’” she says, adding earnestly, “It’s a lot of pressure for them.”
>
> She concedes that the pullout method is risky, but, she continues, “For the longest time I used the pill and condoms because I was terrified of getting pregnant. The older I get, the less scared I am. I’ve had an abortion” — when she was on the pill, actually — “and it’s not the end of the world.” These days, she’s more comfortable going condomless than her steady partner is. “The older I get, the more deserving I feel of pleasure,” she says. “When I was younger, men would be like, ‘It’s so much better to have sex without a condom!’ But it’s also more pleasurable for me. The more I connect with my sexual desire, the more I want to have sex without a condom.” And without hormones. And that means pulling out.

The reason I know this rejection of the pill is utter bullshit is that women in this demographic also happen to be the most enthusiastic consumers of fertility drugs and procedures. When it comes time to have a baby, “natural” is immediately tossed out the window in favor of “by any means possible.”

Amanda Marcotte likes to talk about the victimization of young women, but as Farrah Abraham, mentioned in my last post, demonstrates, younger women are currently not only proud of their fertility, but eagerly capitalizing on it as well.

Women want to have babies. Rejection of artificial birth control should be seen exactly for what it is: desire to be a mother.

Comment of the Week: A Millennial's Take on Gender Politics

W.F. Price · 6 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'm always happy to get some input from younger Americans because, as I wrote yesterday, their politics and views are a bit of a mystery to me. I'm curious about them for a few reasons. First, many of them are pretty close in age to me, and could be little brothers or sisters. My parents were boomers who had me at a young age (very young by today's urban standards), so a lot of millennials have parents who are from essentially the same cohort as mine.

Another thing that piques my curiosity is that the American lifestyle changed profoundly in the 90s. I finished high school in the early 90s, and by about 2000 it was clear to me that teens were living in an entirely different world from the one I'd inhabited less than a decade before. There was far more wealth, but at the same time fewer jobs and opportunities for young people. Instead of getting a job while still in high school, as I had, teens were being held out of the labor market, forced into college, and encouraged to be "interns" and the like. In the meanwhile, the jobs that used to be available to teens were filled by full-grown illegal immigrants. Culturally, that was a big change. I never countenanced working for free, but then again I never had the same financial support as a teen as millennials, who were driving shiny new SUVs while I was still taking the bus or riding my old motorcycle, a used Honda I bought with money I earned working construction the summer after my junior year (Honda built a good bike back then).

When I look at what happened to millennials, I think they have more cause to feel betrayed than anyone. Later genXers like me generally assumed that we'd never get the plum deal our parents had, so it wasn't such a letdown when things started falling apart — many of us were already familiar with relative poverty by the mid-90s. Millennials, however, came of age at the height of American power and wealth, and now all that has just about been wasted. I can't imagine how demoralizing it must be.

From Pancakes:

> As a long-time Millennial generation lurker, I think I can comment a bit on this.
>
> It's true that most of my group have 'forgotten' feminism in the academic sense-you will be hard pressed to find a girl now who will openly proclaim herself as a feminist. Oh sure my university had the militants and rabid feminists still who were all about Grrrrrl power and letting the world know at every waking instant what their very existence depended on, but these numbers have declined significantly compared to the height of the second wave back in the 1980s.
>
> No, what I see in my cohort is a near unconscious acceptance of all feminist principles while simultaneously rejecting the feminist label. Feminism to most 20 something girls is seen as icky, an obsession engaged in by their mothers that now is a mood killer at social events (the binge drinking, one night stand parties). These girls know how proclaimed feminists are viewed-cat ladies in training who couldn't secure a date even if they tried. Among the female hierarchy feminists are the bottom of the totem pole as they place little to no overt interest in relationships (they are patriarchal and thus hurtful in case you bigots didn't know). Millennial girls in my experience rather expect you to "just know" that all the feminist principles apply without having to tell you what is socially expected of you know, and that is if they can even list what they expect or understand; they basically want fun fun fun without all that talking stuff that kills the mood.
>
> Feminism in my opinion has become an academic wasteland, devoid of any intellectual thought, instead relying more upon appeals to the victim mentality to maintain its institutionalized subsidization through publications and articles that desperately try and find any new source of female suffering to legitimize its purpose. Millennial girls care not for feminism as an ideology, it's only those who have no hope in hell of attracting attention that join its ranks in hope of garnering some form of endearment. Nope the problem I see with my generation is not that feminism is dead, but that its principles have become unconscious and acknowledged as inherent reality; how can you even argue that they are wrong when no one can even envision an alternative?

Jim Jones: The Father of the Progressive Coalition

W.F. Price · 10 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I've found myself frustrated with a couple of senators, one Republican and the other a Democrat. Both John McCain and Dianne Feinstein have thoroughly alienated me with their hawkish, anti-populist stances on a number of issues, such as government snooping on citizens, Syria, gun control and illegal immigration.

Because the two of them have been on my mind, I decided to do a little research into their biographies, starting with Feinstein, and I came across quite a story.

Although I knew McCain was pretty old, it seems Feinstein has a good hairstylist and makeup artist, because I thought she was at least ten years younger than her 80 years. In fact, she was well into her 40s when she served as President of San Francisco's Board of Supervisors back in the 1970s, before she became mayor following Dan White's murder of mayor George Moscone and supervisor Harvey Milk. That was a long time ago!

The story behind Feinstein's career is fascinating, as it exposes the cultural displacement and upheaval in urban America during the 1970s, a strange time of which I have only the jumbled memories of early childhood, which are more of a collage than a sequence of events. But despite having been a small child, I clearly remember the stark contrast between the young and old; the modern and traditional. There were the old Irish women who wore black to church, and then the young women in earth tones who didn't bother going to mass. There were contrasts between the older and younger men as well. Mainly political views and ideas about traditional duties, such as fighting for one's country and being a family man. Not that all the older men were perfect in that regard, but young men and their fathers rarely saw eye to eye in those days.

The cultural gap between young and old was profound. There was disco on one hand and Lawrence Welk on the other. As for higher culture, public radio frequently played classical music if I recall correctly, while young people listened to folk songs, which I remember fondly, as my mother would sometimes sing them to me. It was an odd time to be a small child, because there was a sense of transition and alienation; of failure of transmission from one generation to the next as the young rejected wholesale all that characterized the old America. In hindsight, I'm glad I had the opportunity to witness a little bit of this historic time, if only for the perspective it gave me.

However, in addition to artistic and political culture there were other, equally important factors at work. It wasn't all simply a matter of the young hippies vs. the old squares. Entire cities were in transition, too. The young people born in urban neighborhoods were leaving them in droves. During the late 60s the flow of young people out of cities into suburbs that began after WWII began to increase, leaving some cities, like Seattle and San Francisco, depopulated and economically stagnant during the 70s. The people who remained behind were disproportionately those who had no reason to leave cities (the childless) or those who couldn't afford to (urban blacks). I have become convinced that the reason cities such as San Francisco and Seattle developed such a politically powerful gay bloc by the 1980s is that so many straight couples had moved out to the suburbs that the cities were left disproportionately gay. In my own Catholic neighborhood, almost all the people from my parents' generation – and there were a whole lot of them – lit out for the 'burbs.

What happened in the 70s was that formerly bustling urban neighborhoods that had been full of working-class descendants of immigrants, often Catholics and Jews, suddenly lost their youth, leaving empty nesters and lots of vacancies behind. This, I am convinced, is the reason so many formerly Catholic neighborhoods in the US (the list is long, and includes Boston, Denver, Seattle, San Francisco, etc.) became gay in the 70s. What better place for a young gay man than a dense urban neighborhood with low rents, decent infrastructure and relatively low crime?

We have to keep in mind that the cultural revolution of the 60s/70s wasn't exactly a hot war. Dan White's murder of Moscone and Milk notwithstanding, there wasn't much of a fight at all, but rather more of an abandonment of the field by one side. Conservative Americans who are fond of complaining about how the country was "taken over" by radicals would do well to remember the parable of the absentee landlord.

And it wasn't only minorities (sexual and otherwise) who inherited the cities, but other, stranger groups of people. The cultural dissonance of the time produced a bloom of odd cults, many of which temporarily occupied cities. In more demographically and culturally stable times, they wouldn't have been able to hack it, and would have faced a lot more scrutiny from officials and neighbors. But things being as they were, opportunistic politicians were willing to work with them, which, in San Francisco, made for one of the weirdest political partnerships in urban American history.

When Dianne Feinstein was serving as the President of the Board of Supervisors in San Francisco, the board was divided into two factions, one being more conservative, and the other – Dianne Feinstein's side – more progressive, to use contemporary terms. Even in the 1970s, the conservatives were a powerful political force, and controlled the board with five seats out of nine total. But all that was about to change, thanks to a new arrival who led an 8,000 strong congregation of faithful believers in a hybrid Christian/Communist religion of his own devising. The man was Jim Jones, the infamous leader of the People's Temple cult who, together with over 900 of his followers, committed suicide in Guyana by drinking grape kool-aid laced with cyanide (hence the term "drinking the kool-aid").

While in San Francisco, Jim Jones mobilized his thousands of supporters to win the 1975 San Francisco mayoral race for George Moscone, a progressive, who was running against developer John Barbagelata, a conservative who represented the older and more traditional residents of the city, many of whom were from the old Catholic communities.

From Salon's David Talbot:

> It was Burton ally Willie Brown – a rising force in California's state capital — who first recognized that Jones's organization could play a pivotal role in his friend George Moscone's run for mayor. Moscone, a charming and handsome state legislator, had electrified San Francisco progressives with his campaign for city hall. A champion of gays, women, minorities, tenants and organized labor, Moscone was locked in a tight race with a pack of opponents led by conservative realtor John Barbagelata, whose campaign evoked a nostalgia for an older San Francisco, when it was ruled by traditional Catholic values. A meeting was set up between Jones and Moscone in the office of Don Bradley, the candidate's veteran campaign manager. Bradley was initially cautious. "I was a little leery we were getting into something like the Moonies," he later recalled. But after he looked into the temple's campaign history and saw how effective it was in delivering victories, Bradley enthusiastically embraced Jones's volunteer army. Nearly 200 temple members showed up at Moscone headquarters, fanning out to campaign in some of the city's toughest neighborhoods, and helping the candidate finish first in the November 1975 election.

Ultimately, Jones delivered at the polls, and it made a difference: Moscone won by a mere 4,000 votes. We have to give some credit to Jim Jones for his political ingenuity. Despite his depravity, Stalinism and delusions, he pioneered what has become the national Democratic alliance between white progressives and minorities. One could even say that Barack Obama owes his presidency to Jim Jones and the tactics he introduced in San Francisco in the 1970s.

However, the time has come for a critical appraisal of the founding values of the progressive coalition, which is approaching a crossroads as its white beneficiaries are entering their twilight years. First of all, it is important to note that Jim Jones was a fervent Communist, and planned to take his followers to the Soviet Union. He decided on mass suicide after a congressional delegation led by Leo Ryan scrutinized his compound in Guyana, where he'd relocated with nearly a thousand followers in 1978. Some of Jones' henchmen opened fire on the congressman, killing him and several others, leaving the fate of the People's Temple in doubt and the prospect of a move to the USSR highly unlikely. This prompted the mass suicide, although Jones had apparently been planning and rehearsing it for some time.

In San Francisco, Jones made no secret of his passion for totalitarian Communist leaders, and his allies, including former San Francisco mayor and well-known California politician Willie Brown, praised him all the more for it. Harvey Milk, for his part, enthusiastically supported the People's Temple, even going so far as to write a letter to President Carter on behalf of Jones and his cult.

Then there was Jones' personal depravity. He was a drug addict, pimp and philanderer who farmed out underage black girls to white progressive politicians, then blackmailed them (according to former Temple members). He was arrested for soliciting sex in a men's restroom at a movie theater, and he sodomized his male followers – sometimes in front of their wives – claiming that he was only doing what they wanted him to do. To manage his mostly black followers, he employed a half dozen white women from his personal harem and put them in charge of what essentially became a tropical plantation in Guyana. In the end, he was the worst mass-murderer in American history, personally ordering and supervising the "suicide" of his followers.

Interestingly, Jones may well have been the inspiration for the rainbow flag, which flies prominently above Harvey Milk Plaza today, and thousands of others locations throughout the Western world. The history of the flag, first designed and sewed by Milk's personal friend Gilbert Baker, is obscure (intentionally perhaps?), but Jones was fond of proclaiming himself to be head of the "rainbow family." It is not at all far-fetched to suppose that it was Jim Jones who introduced the term to Milk and Baker, and hence the idea for the flag, which first flew in 1978, a few months before the Jonestown massacre and Milk's assassination. Further supporting Milk's connection with Jones is the strange and macabre fact that Milk's ashes were mixed with grape kool-aid before being scattered into the sea.

Very little of this history makes its way into the official story. I am glad I avoided the film Milk, and not because I object to the subject matter, but because learning about the lies of omission (Jim Jones was out of the picture) would have ruined it for me. Sometimes, historians get closer to the truth than those who lived it, because they are not constrained by political loyalties, taboos, and personal concerns. Hopefully, when enough time has passed and Dianne Feinstein, Willie Brown and Jerry Brown are but memories, someone will produce a film that truly does justice to the urban political revolution of the 1970s, which was the seed out of which the contemporary progressive machine emerged.

On looking back, it seems to me that Harvey Milk, George Moscone, Dianne Feinstein and Willie Brown, despite their political achievements, remain in the shadow of Jim Jones. For all their success and determination, they were children under the same father, following a vision they didn't come up with themselves. Dianne Feinstein and Willie Brown may have lived to see another day, but they, too, drank the kool-aid.

Amanda Marcotte: Refusing to Prosecute Husbands "Sad"

W.F. Price · 11 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

George Zimmerman, who is going through a divorce, was detained for allegations of domestic violence a few days ago after his wife accused him of attacking her and her father and threatening them with a gun. The event made the news, but despite Zimmerman's very high and controversial profile, reaction to it was muted, suggesting that people have grown accustomed to these allegations, and don't take them all that seriously.

However, Amanda Marcotte does, and she bemoans the fact that so many wives make an accusation and then later retract it:

> Statistics on victim recantation vary from district to district, but experts agree that it's an extremely common problem, reaching as high as 90 percent of cases in places like Queens, N.Y. It's long been assumed that the major reason victims recant is out of fear, especially the fear of the abuser retaliating. But a 2011 study out of Ohio State University suggests another reason: sympathy for the abuser. Researchers found by listening to recorded phone calls between men arrested for domestic violence and their victims that the abusers generally started off by getting the victim to question her own version of the story, insisting she remembered the whole thing incorrectly or that she's making mountains out of molehills. Once softened, he then starts to lean on her sympathy and concern for him. Often, by the end, the abuser has convinced the victim that they are a single unit, a couple standing against a vicious system that's trying to take him away from her.

This is personal for me. I was accused of pretty much the exact same thing Zimmerman was, and it could have gone very, very badly for me if my ex hadn't recanted. I wouldn't have been convicted at a trial, as my neighbor happened to witness the entire "incident" (which in reality was a mere handoff of the children with no threats or agitated behavior on either side), but I could have been shot or hurt badly by the police during an apprehension. Of the thousands of officer-involved shootings that happen every year in the US, a very high proportion are over domestic disputes, whether real or alleged. Police treat domestic disputes as very dangerous calls, and come loaded for bear. The results can be deadly.

Because of the lethal risks involved, police have become more cautious about these calls in recent years. They are also well aware that many of the allegations are exaggerations or outright fabrications calculated to give wives the upper hand in divorce proceedings. Attorneys specifically counsel wives to call the police if they feel "frightened," and that often translates into calling them when they feel angry or frustrated with an obstinate husband who won't give in to divorce demands.

What's left out in the domestic violence debate is that making a false or exaggerated accusation is in itself spousal abuse. Having others beat or shoot one's spouse is no less abuse than doing so oneself. In this sense, police often become the tools of an abusive spouse. They are the fists and guns of the enraged wife. To Marcotte, who truly fears and hates men, this is right and proper. The only way to achieve justice and equity is to beat, shoot and cage men. This is why she deplores recantations, which allow both parties to calm down and begin to deal with each other as grown-ups.

Marcotte hates men so much that she even lets her prejudices get in the way of women's best interests. Instead of a reasonable divorce, which is likely to be better for wives in the long run, she prefers escalation and the use of police and criminal law, which typically results in a wife getting nothing from her ex husband. How does it empower women to impoverish them?

More mature, intelligent women know better than to kill or lock up their spouses, because they know that it won't do them any good. But less sophisticated, i.e. average, women often don't understand, and lose their heads in the heat of the moment. When they make this mistake, the sick feminists like Marcotte step in to ensure that the family is not only broken, but smashed into tiny pieces, and then they call it "empowerment" and "justice." One of these days, when we can, we're going to have to put these people out of business. We just can't afford this kind of "equity" any longer.

Real Rape Culture

W.F. Price · 11 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the trackbacks to Monday's post on the newfound popularity of raping boys in America's schools led me to a truly horrific story. A Rose City, Michigan boy was repeatedly raped over a period of three years by teacher Neal Erickson, who was eventually caught after photos of his crimes surfaced.

This is bad enough, but what tops it off is that not only did he gain the sympathy of many of his colleagues, but their staunch support and written pleas to the judge to take it easy on him. Ten of his fellow teachers – all female by the looks of their names – wrote letters asking that Erickson be forgiven for his "mistake."

Keep in mind that these are public high school teachers, paid by locals through taxes, who have promised as a condition of employment to look after children's interests. Apparently, however, if you're a progressive high school teacher, sodomizing boys is no big deal. Just a regrettable little lapse in judgment, kind of like, say, not claiming tips on your income taxes.

> Teachers take sides
>
> That's when [the boy's parents] learned for the first time that numerous teachers in the school district wrote to the court to plead for a lenient sentence for their colleague. They were shocked to see several teachers – and school board member Mike Eagan – sitting across the courtroom with the sex offender's family.
>
> "Neal made a mistake," teacher Sally Campbell wrote to the judge, according to the Ogemaw County Herald. "He allowed a mutual friendship to develop into much more. He realized his mistake and ended it years before someone anonymously sent something in to the authorities which began this legal process."
>
> "I am asking that Neal be given the absolute minimum sentence, considering all the circumstances surrounding this case," wrote Amy Huber Eagan, a teacher and wife of board member Mike Eagan. "I am also hoping that he can stay remanded to the custody of the Ogemaw County Jail and not be sent to a prison facility."
>
> "Neal has pled (sic) guilty for his one criminal offense but he is not a predator," teacher Harriett Coe wrote, according to the Herald. "This was an isolated incident. He understands the severity of his action and is sincere in his desire to make amends. He has been candid and conveyed his action to his family, friends and co-workers."
>
> In all, 10 people, including seven WB-RC teachers, submitted letters of support for Erickson, most pleading for a reduced sentence. They included Campbell, Amy Eagan, Coe, Toni Erickson, Carol Rau, Marilyn Glover, Sandi Lee, Kathryn Weber, Kathleen Sheel and Kathleen Palmer, the Herald reports.

Fortunately, the judge didn't buy it. For repeatedly sodomizing the boy and probably screwing him up permanently, he sentenced Eriscksonto 15-30 years — not a high price for such a cruel crime.

As the father of a boy, I have to admit that it really disturbs me to see that teachers have such a hateful, dismissive attitude toward boys. When I see the picture of his poor father John Janczewski – far from a rich man from the looks of it – it fills me with hatred for these people. These are the same teachers who would go on about "rape culture" and "the patriarchy," and lecture boys about the need to treat women with respect. I am certain of that. But here they are, covering for a vicious pederast who took advantage of humble people then spat in their faces. For those of us who don't have the money to put our kids in private schools, these are the kinds of people who have authority over our sons. And they have the audacity to get up in front of a judge and say it's nothing to rape our boys. What male teacher would ever do that? What man would cover for a teacher who was sleeping with a teenage female student, which, despite being highly inappropriate, is a far more normal and less damaging thing than anally raping a boy for years?

I thought about writing what I'd be tempted to do if I were that boy's father, but on second thought I'd better not.

Suffice it to say that I hope I never come face to face with someone attempting to diminish or justify the rape of my son. That just couldn't end well.

You get what you ask for...

W.F. Price · 12 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jane Lynch, who has a role on Fox's gay teen drama "Glee" as a lesbian coach, and who is a lesbian in real life, is going through a divorce with Dr. Lara Embry, her gay-married wife of three years. Since landing the role on Glee, Lynch has been making very good money, on the order of a quarter million a month.

Embry, who has a ten-year-old from a a previous relationship, is now seeking almost 100k per month in alimony:

> The Glee star announced in July she was legally ending her three-year-marriage to the clinical psychologist, whom she split from in February and Lara is demanding a whopping $93,809 a month in spousal support, according to TMZ.
>
> In new court documents Lara revealed Jane's average monthly earnings are $234, 688 and said the pair regularly ran up $40,000 a month on credit cards.
>
> Lara's expenditure includes $6,500 on clothes, $12,000 on entertainment and $4,500 on eating out and the documents reveal much of the money for these has come from Jane's earnings.
>
> She said, 'Her income, investments and assets increased dramatically with her newfound acting success.'
>
> While Lara and her 10-year-old daughter are currently living in the house Jane bought, she is thought to be demanding the house, which the couple spent $3 million on renovating, or 50 per cent of its worth.
>
> The pair first met in 2009, got engaged in 2010 and married on Memorial Day the same year in an intimate ceremony in Sunderland, Massachusetts.
>
> It is believed they don't have a pre-nuptial agreement and despite their financial issues, Jane recently insisted they have remained civil.

Welcome to family law, Jane Lynch!

I might feel a bit of sympathy if it hadn't been for the fact that lesbians have been highly overrepresented in family law for decades as part of the plan to smash patriarchy. Not only are many attorneys and heads of social agencies lesbian, but a high number of petty officials who bully husbands into giving up their children and turning over their paychecks are as well. I, and countless other fathers, have had personal experience with these types.

Gay men are not as enthusiastic as lesbians about marriage for obvious reasons (why spoil a good deal when you don't have to?), so a high number of gay divorces are bound to be lesbian affairs. One might speculate about whether this will prompt changes in family law, as they backpedal from their earlier stance regarding the right of wives to plunder their spouses. It might, but I doubt the effect will be all that strong. The profit motive is now too strongly entrenched in the system for lesbians to have the same influence they did 30 years ago.

At least now, however, lesbians can share in the same joys of matrimony as the hated patriarchy.

An Epidemic of Violence, or Fraud?

Featured Guest · 13 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Tim Brown

It began when I was presented with a press release detailing two upcoming events sponsored by the DeWitt County Sheriff and a Domestic Violence group known as DOVE where “domestic violence experts” would be giving short presentations. Both events it was explained would be moderated by a sitting Judge.

Upon reading and re-reading the press release, I decided that it seemed reasonable enough that Illinois Fathers request permission to also present at this event, and if we were denied, we would hold a small protest outside while the event played out. These events are nothing new in Central Illinois. Typically, after the event, there is an article in the newspaper which gives glowing coverage to the Judge and DOVE regarding how very concerned they are about the serious problem of domestic violence. Obviously, a public slam at fathers. The press release itself can be described as grossly biased and bigoted against fathers as it gives the public the impression that fathers are beating the tar out of their spouses/partners and their children.

So I reached out to DeWitt County Sheriff, Jered Shofner, explained that I was the sitting President of Illinois Fathers and that we would like to seek permission to also present at his upcoming events. Sheriff Shofner and I had a rather lengthy phone conversation. It was civil enough, but we had a long back and forth. Sheriff Shofner obviously wanted nothing to do with Illinois Fathers at his upcoming Father bashing fest, but he did not want to grant permission for Illinois Fathers to present, nor did he want to deny Illinois Fathers permission to present. However, days later, he (or somebody) made the decision that Illinois Fathers would not be allowed to present, and thus the stage was set for a protest to be held outside of the Library in Clinton, IL where the first event would be held.

We had a respectable showing of a little less than 20 members show up. The bulk of us remained outside and held a few signs, passed out flyers, etc. A few of our more cerebral members went inside to attend the presentations and ask questions. I was informed that the presentations themselves were very safe and factual. No outlandish anti father statistics were offered. Obviously, the powers that be altered their strategy due to the knowledge that Illinois Fathers would be present. I was also informed that when one of our own brought up the subject of Emergency Orders of Protection being used as a divorce/custody tactic rather than as an actual means of protection, that the Judge moderating the meeting actually stated that it is a problem. We also had a couple of bites from local media, however neither outlet actually released a story. What can I say? Our opponents are everywhere, even working for media outlets. I was also surprised at the near complete lack of turnout for Sheriff Shofner’s event. Other than typical DOVE employees and some County Government employees, there was only one attendee present who was not on the government dole. I do not know for sure, but I would guess that many of the people there were compensated in one way or another for their time, travel expense etc. in order to attend this presentation. Illinois Father’s members on the other hand must pay their own way, volunteer their time, etc. Yet we had far more of a showing than did the opposition.

Then there was the August 12th event to be held in Farmer City. To cut to the chase, the DeWitt County Sheriff along with DOVE simply cut and ran. They did not hold the event. They made no public announcement that the event was cancelled. They did not inform Illinois Fathers that the event was cancelled, and thus several of our members who took the time and effort to attend were left standing on the curb realizing that the Sheriff and DOVE and the Judges had simply cut and run.

The entire series of events does leave a number of unanswered questions. First off, if DOVE is so very concerned about the “epidemic of domestic violence”, shouldn’t they go ahead and proceed with their August 12th event? What is Sheriff Shofner doing sponsoring this in the first place? Is it the job of the elected Sheriff to hold a father bashing fest ? Then there is the matter of Judge Garry Bryan and Judge Richard Broach. Fair and impartial? Excuse me? A sitting Judge showing themselves within 10 miles of one of these events represent a huge conflict of interest.

The secretary/assistant for Judge Garry Bryan is herself a big whig in the DOVE organization. Again, a huge, gaping conflict of interest.

Sadly, neither major political party will get close to this issue regarding what the Judges and the Domestic Violence groups are getting away with. I sometimes have to laugh when some special interest group proclaiming pro-family values gets all lathered up about children being separated from their parents due to some issue related to homosexuality. Children have been being removed from their fathers for decades now, and not one of these pro-family special interest groups gives a rat's tail about it. Where is the media in all this? Why isn't someone in the media doing an expose of the fraud that is perpetuated by these domestic violence groups? If a small backwater county like DeWitt county is giving $ 100,000 to DOVE, what is the money being used for? Why is a reporter not sticking a microphone in the face of Sheriff Shofner, or Judge Bryan or Judge Broach ? When will somebody in the mainstream media challenge DOVE and ask them, "are you really helping victims or helping divorcing/separating Mothers to secure custody and break up the family?"

People of the female persuasion tell me that I am taking things too far when I draw comparisons between the Divorce Industry and the Nazis in old Germany. Is it really such a stretch? When the Nazis were ramping up, Hitler would give passionate speeches where he would get large crowds all lathered up about the badness of Jewry. This all led to uniformed officers of the State removing people from their homes and sending them to camps. Today in America, groups like DOVE have succeeded in aligning with the likes of Sheriff Shofner to hold public, taxpayer funded anti-father events. DOVE has also succeeded in getting the Judges to grant Emergency Orders of Protection to divorcing/separating mothers, based simply upon the mothers statment that "she is scared of him". This of course leads to uniformed officers of the State with guns removing the Father from his home and informing him that the very act of fatherhood is now a criminal offense.

Probably the saddest chapter is this whole sordid story is the fact that many American Citizens demand that things be this way. They demand the power to break the family and secure custody on a whim. They demand the power to criminalize innocent fathers. They gloat and brag about their divorces and the trappings that they are granted by the Judge in the process.

Who are the real victims? Perhaps Illinois Fathers should hold an event for victims of "Family Court Judges". We would have no problem in gathering up a number of victims willing to publicly share their story of being forced into a divorce or separation that they did not want in the first place, and subsequently forced away from their child(ren). I wonder if Sheriff Shofner, Judge Bryan and Judge Broach would be willing to moderate this for us?

Tim Brown is the former President of Illinois Fathers

Black Men Don't Know How To Protect Black Women: An Open Letter To Lincoln Anthony Blades

Obsidian · 14 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"Of all our studies, history is best qualified to reward our research." — Malcolm X

I was cruising the Black Interwebs last week when suddenly, I happened across the following piece by Mr. Lincoln Blades, one of the newest class of Black Relationship Experts out there on the scene today. Now, to be fair and to fully disclose: me and Linc know each other, and to be honest, I like the guy. I wouldn't say we're best buds – we just know each other on Twitter – but we've chatted a bit back and forth, and we've retweeted each other a number of times. I'm all for another Brotha doing his thing, even when I find myself at odds with it; you see, it's my view that there are far too many Black Men out there who pander to what Black Women Want To Hear, and far too few Black Men who are willing to assist Black Men where it matters most. Linc knows this, just like all the other Black Relationship Experts do, but…well, you see, there's no money in assisting Black Men - and there's tons of money to be made in telling Black Women What They Want to Hear. There: I've said it — and if Linc values the late great Brother Minister Malcolm as much as he claimed in his article that he wrote for Uptown Magazine last week, about how Black Men Don't Know How to Protect Black Women, then he shouldn't have a mumbling word to say about the truth I just spoke above.

So, it should then come as no surprise, that he would pen just such an article; it's all par for the course among the "Good Black Men" crowd. As I've made clear previously, the Black community (more on this in a moment) is no stranger to the Hugos of the world. You see, while there's no money to be made in actually helping and focusing on Black Men, there IS money to be made in "shaming" them, because, again, it serves the Black Relationship Expert agenda, of telling Black Women What They Want to Hear; upbraiding Black Men puts money into the coffers of these people (the majority of whom, as the popular website Single Black Male rightly identifies, are Black Men themselves).

Imagine, if you will, Mr. Blades writing this article: "Why SHOULD Black Men "Protect" Black Women?" - and then proceeding to lay out the following facts:

1. That violent crime of ALL kinds, including rape and sexual assault, has dropped like a stone across America, to all time historic lows in locales such as NYC, and that Black people, and in this case Black Women in particular, have greatly benefited from this

2. That domestic violence is something that is hardly the sole preserve of Men, Black or otherwise, and that among other easily accessible examples of this, is the public violence "Queen of Hip Hop" Mary J. Blige visited on her hubbie at the same time Chris Brown was (rightly) being vilified for assaulting Rihanna (Blige was never held to account for her actions)

3. That Black Women do indeed enjoy lifestyles today never imagined by even White Women a half century ago, in large part due to the aforementioned dramatic reductions in violent crime, increased employment and educational opportunities and so forth - often with the tacit, if not overt approval, and assistance of Truly Privileged Black Males (while Black Men overall continue to languish on the margins of American life)

4. That Black Women are among, if not the, most prolific consumers and purchasers of "degrading" forms of Hip Hop - as Chris Rock rightly observed a few years back

5. That Black Women have a tremendous say on how they are viewed and perceived by the larger media world – from YouTube videos like "Twerkin' At The Wal-Mart" and "wilding out" at a MetroPCS store in Motown, all the way to primetime teledramas that feature a Black Woman mate poaching a (White) President and everything in between

6. That society not only doesn't reward those Black Men who DO step up and do the White Knight in Blackface

Thing, but actively disincentivizes it.

How do you think Uptown Magazine would respond to such a piece, hmm? How do you think Mr. Blades' core audience, nearly 70% of whom are Black females, per his Twtrland stats, would react to such a frank accounting of the facts – hmm?

And as for the notion of "uplifting the Black community" - an idea put forth by W.E.B. DuBois, nearly a century ago (and someone Malcolm himself would have, at best, mixed views about, if not outright condemnation for), the idea is at best, and at this juncture, a quaint one. As Pulitzer Prize winning journalist and television talking head Eugene Robinson made so poignantly clear in his book, "Disintegration: The Splintering of Black America", there IS no "Black community" anymore, hasn't been in quite some time (as the HBO landmark series "The Wire" regularly depicted with jarring clarity and, again to cite that erudite social critic, Chris Rock rightly observed some 15 years ago) and is likely to continue to "disintergrate" on into the foreseeable future. DuBois' notion of "uplifting" Black America was as romantic as his notions of a "Talented Tenth" – and neither proved tenable. Which explains why even he gave up on his visions and got outta Dodge in the final years of his life.

Everyone reading this knows that if and when a Black Man offends, be that spitting on the sidewalk or going upside anyone's head (other than another Black Man, that is), the chances are wildly high that he WILL be apprehended, he WILL be judged guilty, and he WILL go to jail, most likely to serve a lengthy sentence. That what some have referred to as the Prison Industrial Complex continues to grow apace amidst prolonged economic distress nationwide – some three decades running at this point and counting – puts to bed any notions that Black Women are somehow under siege by marauding Black Men On The Loose, as if we now live in a funny house version of Birth of A Nation, or something.

No.

The brutal truth of the matter is, that the single biggest impediment facing Black Women in our time today, are Black Women themselves, which, in a sane world, would come as good news, because it would be the fulfillment of both the Civil and Womens' movements of the 60s and 70s – the ability to chart one's own destiny, free and unfettered. And if Malcolm were around today, he would be among the first to make that point clear – and then would have some choice words for the Brothas who continue to pour saccharin into the ears of those same Sistas, for their own gain – monetary and otherwise, ahem.

The Obsidian

Chubby white American girl becomes “world’s first female Maasai warrior”

W.F. Price · 14 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Mindy Budgor, a privileged California girl who was bored with her healthcare job, decided to go on an African safari. Upon arriving in Kenya ahe found herself entranced with the “strong, African men,” and desired to be like them. When she asked how many women were warriors, the men said there were none, because women were too weak and not brave enough. Being a modern American woman, Mindy took exception to this, and declared that she would become a warrior. According to Mindy, she instantly became a heroine to all the poor Maasai women, who were suffering under the oppression of not being allowed to become warriors.

Somehow, she convinced the men to let her try to become a warrior, and they finally gave in and said they’d come up with some initiation ceremonies for her (I wonder what pranks they came up with).

As far as I can tell, her trials included making a bed for the men, killing a baby goat and carrying a spear. Evidently, she was allowed to take her nail polish into the bush.

I’d chalk this up to delusion on Ms. Budgor’s part, but apparently she had a plan all along: selling underwear. From Warrior Princess, her book on the experience (p. 54):

> “The company is Under Armour – an athletic apparel company – and I’m going to be part of an initiative to increase sales of women’s apparel.”
>
> “And explain why the Maasai are involved,” my dad prodded.
>
> “Because we’re working on a female empowerment initiative with the tribe that we believe will have broad-range appeal to women.”

So it’s all a big fraud after all. Such a terrible disappointment… Here I was thinking the Maasai had finally left the old ways behind and taken up the rainbow flag.

It would be good for a laugh, but, in a demonstration of how elites prop each other up, the BBC went as far as to promote the girl in this scam. Shameful.

In other news, Omar Hammami, AKA Abu the American, a half-American man who grew up in Alabama and went to Somalia on jihad (he said that his childhood in Alabama, largely spent outdoors hunting, trained him well for war), was reportedly killed in a battle with Al-Shabaab a couple days ago. I wonder, since Mindy Budgor calls herself a “warrior,” why she doesn’t go seek out the glory of the battlefield like Hammami. It isn’t as though there’s any shortage of opportunities for warfare in Africa, after all.

How to Easily Debunk the “White Privilege” Slander

W.F. Price · 16 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The idea that white people have unearned racial privilege is an insidious lie that justifies everything from discrimination against white children to reflexively blaming disadvantaged and poor whites for their misfortune. It’s a slander that serves the elite while slapping the common people across the face.

Fortunately, it’s very easy to debunk because of the nature of privilege.

Privileges, whether earned or not, give one an advantage over others who do not share them. However, the advantage is relative; it does not exist when the unprivileged are absent.

Therefore, one would expect that if white privilege were real, in order to capitalize on it white people would be rushing to surround themselves with nonwhites, avoiding white neighborhoods, going to majority nonwhite schools, doing business mainly with nonwhites and working with nonwhites.

In the meanwhile, nonwhites would avoid majority white neighborhoods, institutions, schools and workplaces, because they would be at a disadvantage in these places.

Do we see this happening?

Nope.

The concept of male privilege can be debunked in the same manner. If men really were privileged, why would women push so hard to gain entrance into male institutions, and men have so little interest in female ones? The implication here is not that men have privilege, but rather that women do.

So next time someone blathers on about “white male privilege,” simply ask: if it really exists, why is it that so few people take advantage of it?

Broader Horizons

W.F. Price · 17 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hi readers. You may have noticed that I'm writing about subjects other than feminism more often. Charles Martel has made some humorous allusions to the politically incorrect subject matter.

I'm doing it because, to be quite honest, I'd like to broaden my horizons a bit. In other words, too much feminism can get to be somewhat tiresome. Not that I'm giving up on that subject – by no means – but I'd like to also write about other things that strike my fancy too. I think it's necessary for me to keep myself motivated and engaged, and hopefully it will stimulate some reader interest as well.

My take on it is that I feel OK about expressing my opinion on social matters as long as I feel comfortable with my moral stance on issues. Race and class issues, for example, don't intimidate me because I think I treat people according to the dictates of my conscience. That's really all the authority you need to speak openly about them.

If you aren't advocating harm to other people, there's nothing wrong with standing up for yourself and your own and voicing your opinion. That's my personal standard.

So, while I will add my opinion from time to time on some controversial American issues, I'd be happy to have other writers of all races, creeds and persuasions do the same. If you disagree with me, prove me wrong. But always keep your basic humanity, and do your best to follow the golden rule.

Of course, advocating for men and fathers remains the most important goal, because I can't think of a more pressing social issue for all American and Western men and their children today.

This is just a heads up for those who might wonder what's going on. No serious changes in the works — I'd just like to make the job and the content a little less one-dimensional.

Your opinions are welcome.

Free App Promotes Testosterone Production While You Use the Internet

Uncle Elmer · 18 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Studies have shown that exposure to broadband light sources, primarily the sun, affects melatonin and testosterone production. Many of us work on our computers or "iPads" late into the night without consideration of what staring into a bright light source may be doing to our our hormone cycles. Feminists may have a point when they accuse us of living in our mother's basement based on some of the irascible comments we leave on their thoughtful media essays. Perhaps the computer is robbing us of our manly vitality and making us just plain bitchy.

Having struggled as well with poor sleep patterns from long winter nights or untimely office commutes, I have tried to improve the situation by installing broad spectrum lights and buying a Phillips Wake-Up Light.

So when my son mentioned a software app that adjusts screen color temperature based on time of day, I was intrigued. Made perfect sense, why didn't I think of that? Probably took some guy only a couple of lines of "Java" code to implement it, now he's lounging in a hammock somewhere in SE Asia while the passive income stream fattens his portfolio.

So I checked out the "f.lux" download page and installed it. I noticed that their page allowed Disqus comments, so I dropped one on them. Given Bill Price's new Spearhead theme of Broadened Horizons, I thought I might pen a testimonial about f.lux, but the raging feedback from their fanbase provided all the free content I needed. These people are more fun to troll than feminists :

[image]

Teaching Your Children Skepticism

W.F. Price · 19 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the regrets of my childhood is that I didn't listen more closely to my father. Although far from a perfect man, he knew a great deal about politics and the world, and saw right through to people's inner motivations. However, he stood out for being such a renegade, and because of that I dismissed a lot of what he said.

Most children swallowed what they were taught without hesitation, largely at the urging of their parents. Middle class families were the truest believers of all. I did get the sense that some of the poor and very rich counseled their children to be skeptical, but for the most part kids were told to "listen to adults," regardless of which adult was speaking.

In hindsight, I should have listened to adults a lot less.

So now that I have kids, I'm faced with a dilemma. How does a parent warn kids that not everything taught in school is true and not everything adults say is honest without making them disillusioned and unmotivated?

First, I think we must recognize that the United States has changed fundamentally even since people who are only 30 were children. It has become a truly multicultural country, like Syria and Iraq. There's no sense of being a part of a "nation" or, for the majority, an ethnic group at all. Even church affiliations have largely broken down, with the typical form of Christianity promoted today being a confused mass movement with no depth to speak of.

Of all white, Christian Americans, perhaps only Southerners can claim a sense of ethnic and cultural identity; for those of us in the north we might as well be a deracinated form of lumpenproletariat that embraces the lowest, most degrading form of self-flagellation and debased entertainment. Given such a bleak cultural environment, what is a parent to do?

If at a loss, I think it's worth looking at people who have not fallen into that trap. Of the people I know who are most secure and functional in our contemporary environment, most are members of successful minorities who come from a deep cultural tradition, e.g. Jews, Italians and Chinese. All three of these groups have managed to retain some dignity, sense of pride in their heritage and success in passing their values to the next generation.

This ability to function and prosper in a culturally chaotic environment may well be part genetic (inborn resistance to alcoholism, high intelligence, conscientiousness, etc.), but the cultural influence is probably even more important. All of the aforementioned groups have lived in multicultural, heterogenous societies for thousands of years. We tend to think of Chinese, Italians and Jews as monolithic groups of people, but this is far from the case. Italy is the most genetically and culturally diverse country in Europe, China is home to several different languages (Mandarin and Cantonese are not just "dialects") and countless regional variations, and Jews have a diaspora that, for the last 500 years, has stretched from the Americas to the mountains and steppes of Central Asia. Despite all these innumerable differences within and around their people, all have maintained a fundamental set of cultural values and practices that have prevented them from disappearing from the face of the earth — even as minorities in cultures dominated by others.

So, given our new reality, it would behoove Americans to take a few lessons from successful, ancient peoples, unless we really don't care whether we bequeath anything of value to posterity.

The first lesson, and the one I'd like to focus on today, is that our own values are more important than those of the culture at large. Teaching children that what they learn from their parents and family is more important than what they learn in school is a good start. This doesn't mean teaching them to reject everything learned in school outright, but rather that they should, with some family guidance, pick and choose which tools are useful and which to discard.

For example, having a child learn to read and write is important, but any so-called "history" that is taught in schools today ought to be taken with caution. Anything, in fact, that is open to political interpretation ought to be viewed with serious skepticism. This, unfortunately, includes some of the sciences, such as biology. If a biology teacher says something patently false, such as “men and women’s differences are social constructs,” you have to take the time to explain to your child that this is not true. Biology is probably the science most prone to abuse, as proven by totalitarian leaders like Stalin, Hitler and Mao Zedong, all of whom promoted immoral policy based on flawed science. Our schools are far from immune to this tendency, male feminist PZ Myers being a prime example of a mountebank using biology as a political tool.

Although I am not a supporter of Creationism – partly because the Bible contradicts itself in this story – I understand why parents would rather teach it to their children than allow charlatan biologists like Myers to have the final word. But this is ultimately a losing approach. The evidence for natural selection and an old earth is too strong, and, in any event, none of this requires one to deny the existence of God.

So the key, as I see it, is to instruct one’s children on what you consider to be fundamental values, and pick and choose what they should take from the wider culture. In other words, be a true believer in your own values and culture, and a skeptic where outsiders are concerned. In this day, handing one’s children over to so-called professionals for both moral and practical instruction is doing them a grave disservice, and when you feel your child is old enough to understand that, tell the kid why. Do not underestimate a child’s capacity for understanding, nor his or her desire to learn. “Because I said so” is never sufficient for a curious child — “because _____” or “I don’t know” is far better (if you don’t know something, offer to find out with the child).

When it comes to popular culture, pay a little attention, and deconstruct it with your child. Encourage him to view it critically, and to weigh the message and the messenger. If, for example, a rapper is advocating peace, love and understanding, ask why, in another song, he was rapping about shooting people, and whether that’s consistent.

Do the same with teachers. If a teacher is going on and on in some political crusade, blaming your children’s people for all the evil in the world, have a talk with your child about bullying. Ask whether good people like to insult and demonize children and their families, then tell the child that even some adults like to bully people, sometimes because it makes them feel strong and powerful. Because they can’t do it to grownups, they bully children instead, kind of like a fourth grader beating up a kindergartener.

Make sure that your children know that adults are not better people than children; they are just stronger and have more experience. This means that although they can do more good, they can also do more harm, so never trust an adult – even a teacher – unless you know for sure that she is doing good. And don’t stop there; explain to the child that good intentions are not the same as good outcomes. Even if an adult wants to do good, they might do bad because they are uninformed, or their beliefs are incorrect, and yes, adults can be wrong.

I mentioned history earlier, and I’d like to get back to that because it’s a great opportunity for a father to get involved with his children. Using history to entertain, teach moral lessons and learn about human nature is a great way for men to instruct and influence their children. If done properly, both fathers and children should find it interesting and fun. My son, for example, is fascinated by large buildings, machines and public works. This is a great opportunity for both of us to learn about classical Rome. My daughter, who takes after me a bit more in her interests, is fascinated by stories about the people and families involved in politics. There’s something for everyone in history, and leaving it entirely up to schoolteachers is a shameful thing for a father to do.

All this can apply to grandparents as well, if they have the time. The point is that while school can be helpful to parents and children alike, the most important kind of education comes from the home. Although we hear that so often that it has become something of a cliché, depressingly few people take it seriously, and rather than put in that little extra bit of effort, prefer to trust people they don’t know, and probably don’t even agree with, with the entirety of their children’s education.

Although it isn’t a pleasant thing to say, we must set aside this trust in public institutions for the good of our kids. A people doesn’t survive by letting the flavor of the month have its way with core values, so if you care about the future, you’d do well to treat your children as your own rather than wards of the state.

An American Divorce in Two Photos: The Gosselin Residences

W.F. Price · 20 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jon Gosselin was in the news again recently. He's currently waiting tables and taking care of his eight kids during his custodial time. He lives over fifty miles from his ex-wife Kate, and has to drive the entire distance himself to pick up the kids, and then back to drop them off. He said he doesn't see her at all — she just sends them out with the nanny and he picks them up. He doesn't talk to her, either, but why would he want to?

What reports have been dwelling on, however, are his job as a waiter and his new place, which is a rented cabin in the woods. Kate, naturally, got the house.

Where Kate lives:

Where John lives (from radaronline:

Some patriarchy we live in…

We Reserve the Right to Be Angry For You

Featured Guest · 21 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Left, the American Campus, and Boorish White "Activists"

By Ben Welton

Throughout the U.S., September 11, 2013 was celebrated and commemorated in predictable ways. While most Americans treated the occasion with a somber respect for the dead, a select few exercised their rights as Americans to be boisterous and brash in the face of state-mandated political correctness. By now we all know what two million bikers did in D.C., and more unfortunately we know what the slimy Florida Pastor Terry Jones tried to do.

In the inconsequential state of Vermont, an equally brazen act of remembrance occurred on the campus of Middlebury College. In keeping with a decade-long tradition, Middlebury's College Republicans and Democrats, in a show of solidarity and old-fashioned "good faith," planted 2,977 flags into the earth, each one symbolizing a victim from that day. Typically, the day is an easy one, if not a little boring. Sure, students will stop and take some time to reflect (then they go right back to their distraction screens), and during the orderly clean-up session, a few friendships will be made and memories shared.

This year's ceremony didn't go so smoothly, however. Sometime in the early afternoon, a group of activists uprooted all 2,977 flags in protest. Their cause? Native American rights. Besides a muddled bark of "American imperialism," the five dumb-witted defilers of tiny American standards claimed that the flags were impaling sacred Abenaki ground – a burial ground no less.

Color me stupid, but when I hear "sacred Indian burial ground," I generally tend to have nightmares about Jack Torrance limping up the stairs or pale, dead-faced children slicing Herman Munster's tendons. The problem with this Indian burial ground is it isn't one. Not only is there no evidence for an Abenaki resting place on Middlebury's campus, but, to make matters more ridiculous, the student-run, school-sanctioned 9/11 memorial does not even meet the criteria for grave desecration. Don Stevens, the chief of the Nulhegan Abenaki Tribe, has not only publicly denounced the protestors as "Disgusting," but claimed that "Putting flags in the earth to honor bravery would not be disrespectful." So even if Middlebury's campus was crawling with unclaimed and unknown Abenaki tombs, undead warriors would not start hacking off the limbs of the living over just a few thousand flags.

So, if the Abenaki (who have no love for the state of Vermont) were not against Middlebury's 9/11 memorial, then who was? Answer: white liberal activists. One of them, Amanda Lickers (who claims to be Native American) asserted that the act "said 'no' to settler occupation." In a written statement, Lickers said that she "took those flags…a small reclamation and modest act of resistance." Okay, we can quibble over "modest" here, but Lickers's justifications pale in comparison to her pale-faced co-conspirator Anna Shireman-Grabowski. Shireman-Grabowski, who has written for the Salon, claimed in her own written statement that "While the American flag on the Middlebury hillside symbolize [sic] to some the loss of innocent lives in New York, to others they represent centuries of bloody conquest and mass murder." After going deeper into her self-loathing by calling herself "a settler" (see: "white person"), Shireman-Grabowski asserts that "the campus is not big enough to hold a marker for every life sacrificed in the history of American conquest and colonialism."

Yawn! Anyone who has ever been on a college campus has heard this argument. It comes down from the bully pulpit of the tenured faculty member and it goes directly into the accepting mind of the suburbanite white student. To be even more specific, the suburbanite white female. Partially because they increasingly outnumber males on American campuses, and partially because they make-up one of the more liberal voting blocs for the Democrats, young white women are prone to such pointless displays of protest. To make matters worse, the have a bad tendency to go off into the world, writing about and proselytizing their actions as if they matter or are convincing to anyone. Shireman-Grabowski is just another overeducated bore decrying American colonialism from her safe, intellectually homogenous vantage point. Frankly, the most surprising thing about this story is how quickly the university, the town, and the Abenaki moved to condemn this gang of five. Usually, these blustering barbarians are allowed free reign for their unscholarly behavior because left-leaning campuses are bloodless or otherwise too scared of their own students.

Who knows what lies in store for Shireman-Grabowski and her brood, but I am sure she'll let you know when she makes her next move. Leftists are rarely good at keeping secrets, and the art of being inconspicuous is generally lost on them. I had a firsthand experience myself during a Veterans' Day celebration that I helped to organize on the campus of the University of Vermont – New England's Berkeley but with poorer hygiene and an embarrassingly bad fashion sense. After our group, which was comprised almost entirely of Army, Navy, and Marine Corps veterans, had finished planting flags and reading the names of those killed in Iraq and Afghanistan, we had to suffer through the expected cranks. One guy claimed (of course) they the dead had fought for oil, and that we needed to be enlightened to the fact that our service only meant more money for the already rich. Since this guy looked like he smelled like grizzly bear shit, we didn't take his prophecies too seriously.

We did however take the threat of a campus-wide protest seriously. Before we could even sing the National Anthem, a group of censorship-loving anti-imperialists threatened to boycott our ceremony. It took a lot of schmoozing to get them to back off, but even then their scattered presence throughout the crowd made the day uneasy. The University of Vermont is overwhelmingly female, and the state itself is almost completely white. Guess who I kept a lookout for when it was my turn at the podium?

Happy Birthday to The Spearhead!

W.F. Price · 22 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Four years ago, The Spearhead went online for the first time with a number of writers onboard, including Chuck Ross, Elusive Wapiti, Novaseeker, Whiskey, Zed, Ferdinand Bardamu and me. Soon, others got on board and within a few months we were cranking out up to a hundred posts a month.

We started with a lot of material and a lot of energy. Looking back on it, I'm not sure how I managed to pull it off, but as a recently divorced guy with no life to speak of, I had a lot of time on my hands. Sometimes, not having a woman in your life makes it a lot easier to get things done.

What made The Spearhead special was that it was a reader-supported, collaborative publication for men, in defense of men and by men. It wasn't the first men's issues site; there had long been bulletin boards and some blogs had been online for a while. But it was the first news and opinion site with multiple contributors to come out of the nascent "manosphere" that had begun to take shape in the mid to late 2000s. In that sense, it was a true novelty when it opened.

I originally came up with the idea after noticing how many men had started their own blogs on related men's issues, which comprised the Manosphere at the time, and then looking at some of the feminist sites. I figured that we could easily provide material that was just as compelling as the feminists, and if they had their own women's blogs, we men ought to have our own blog as well.

Additionally, I knew from personal experience how utterly dominated publishing is by women. For every male editor, it seems that there are about three females, and it's extremely rare for a publishing outfit not to have a woman calling the shots somewhere along the line. I figured that would give The Spearhead an advantage, because – sorry to say it but it's true – what women publish often bores men to tears.

There have been a number of ups and downs, mainly related to what's going on behind the scenes in my personal life. As is so often the case for so many men post-divorce, my ex doesn't make it easy or convenient for me to keep up my relationship with my kids. Also, moving on and getting involved in another relationship brings an entirely new set of obligations.

However, despite it all, the site has stayed online, and that's inspiring. And in addition, it seems to have finally made an impact. I don't think I've ever seen more skepticism of feminism in my lifetime than over the past couple years. As far as I can tell, the majority of men reject it outright. That the bad policy is still in place tells me only that, as always, there's a great deal of resistance to change from the current generation in power. Although they may still get their way for a little while longer, I sense change coming as soon as they age out office (hopefully they won't last as long as Strom Thurmond).

And this is where I think The Spearhead has made the biggest contribution: it has influenced the next generation of men waiting to have their day. That's been the goal all along — to educate the men who will take the reins in the future. And given the deep skepticism of feminism that is now expressed openly, I think it has succeeded in that.

Now that summer's over and things have calmed down around here, I think it's time to revive some of the old spirit, and kick things into high gear once again. To do that, we'll need contributions from quality writers and support from readers. So, this week I'll be doing a birthday fund drive and looking for people interested in becoming regular contributors.

Radical Feminists v Lifeboat Feminism

Elusive Wapiti · 22 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A feminism left in the hands of radicals threatens the have-cake-eat-it-too status quo enjoyed by the Sisterhood:

> The Military Betrays Women
> Even if there were a "war on women," the answer would not be to send unwilling women to war.
> By Elaine Donnelly
>
> According to the New York Times, Hagel got an earful. Staff sergeants worried that if women were assigned to combat, the high standards of the Marine Corps would have to be lowered, "family lives would suffer," and rates of sexual assault and harassment would increase. When Secretary Hagel asked whether it was right to deny the opportunity to a woman who wants to join, a fearless captain replied, "I haven't met a female Marine who is standing up and shouting, 'I want to be infantry.'"
>
> This must have been a shock, since the 15 Marines speaking to Hagel were not men; they were women. Similar opposition was registered when Military Times recently conducted an online survey asking active-duty female readers whether they would take a land-combat position if it were offered. Only 13 percent of the military women said yes, 9 percent weren't sure, and a whopping 77 percent said no, they would not take a combat job.
>
> Secretary Hagel and the Obama administration nevertheless are pushing forward with incremental plans to revoke all of women's combat exemptions by January 2016. Once women are eligible for direct ground combat, federal courts are likely to force women into Selective Service registration and a possible future draft.

This is the reduction-ad-absurdum of equalitarian philosophy. Ideological consistency demands that feminist purists seek to put women in combat positions and become eligible for the draft, thus setting men and women on equal planes as full-fledged citizens of the republic. While I applaud the intellectual honesty and integrity required to put their and their sisters' derrieres where their mouths are, were they to not do so, their putatively equalitarian movement would be exposed for the fem-supremacist ideology that it is. However, in doing so, the radical feminists threaten to undo the pretty sweet deal women have going at present…whether or not they acknowledge the feminist label …and threaten to finally make women "pay up" (woman up?) for their myriad choices (de jure or de facto unavailable to men) and political agency with political responsibility.

No wonder that women's self-identification as feminists is so low and continues to decline, and that several data points (here are three) suggest that most women reject the now radioactive feminist label.

It is fascinating to witness the outright lifeboat feminism–in a so-called "conservative" publication such as National Review, no less–at work in this very article. Clearly the authoress has an established history of deploring the specter of women in combat, yet I seriously doubt she would be so vocal in her challenge to other social changes for which political feminism can reasonably take credit. Like, say, unilateral divorce. Or default mother custody. Or chalimony. Or serial polyandry. Or female suffrage. Or (mostly) shame-free freemounting. Or unrestrained female sexuality. Or abortion. Or wives owning property independent of their husbands. I simply can't see women of Ms. Donnelly's stripe manning the barricades to reverse these Gramscian attacks on patriarchal social structure and wholesale conversion of the whole of society into something that more resembles the social pattern of a grass-hut matriarchy than a modern industrial society. No, their answer appears to be to preserve the benefits that benevolent sexism proffers to women, to include sending unwilling men to war (is that evidence of an ongoing war on men?) so that unwilling women may remain home, safe from harm, free to vote themselves benefits underwritten by the lives and labor of men.

What will be interesting to see is what camp will end up at the helm of Western organized feminism. Will it be the hothouse intellectual feminists, with their evil-yet-admirably-consistent ideology? Or the far larger group of cognitively dissonant accidental feminists, comfy in the preferential goodies their less agreeable sisters have won for them?

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to three, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

After Years of Looking, Feminists Finally Find Sports/DV Correlation

W.F. Price · 23 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In science, when someone comes up with an idea, people test it by trying to disprove it. In feminist social "science," feminists say whatever they want, and are given infinite time and chances to "prove" it. Its a sort of affirmative action scientific method that requires standards of proof that even pre-literate witch doctors would find lax, and are analogous to the "standards" women must pass to call themselves US marines.

So I am not surprised to find that, given public funding and reams of data, some feminist researchers have discovered that when Scotsmen get drunk, they attack people, including at times their girlfriends.

> Academics have, for the first time, found firm evidence of a link between domestic violence and 'Old Firm' football matches.
>
> The study, by the University of St Andrews, is the first to confirm long-held beliefs that reports of domestic violence in Glasgow increase following matches between Rangers and Celtic.
>
> The new paper, published online this week, shows a 'statistically significant' increase in domestic incidents following all 21 Old Firm matches between 2008 and 2011.
>
> Researchers say the results of the study provide 'compelling evidence' of the effect of Old Firm matches on reported domestic cases of physical, sexual and emotional abuse in the 24 hour period after kick off.
>
> The study was led by Dr Damien J. Williams, a lecturer in Public Health Sciences at the University of St Andrews.
>
> He said, "Media reports have long suggested that the number of reports of domestic violence appear to increase when Scotland's two largest, Glasgow-based football clubs, Rangers and Celtic (traditionally referred to as the "Old Firm") play one another.

Finding spikes in violence in Scotland is like shooting fish in a barrel. Scotland has one of the highest assault rates on earth, fueled largely by alcohol, poverty and family dysfunction. Sadly, parts of Scotland appear to resemble America's worse-off Indian reservations and ghettoes.

As for Scottish family dysfunction, well, I think the following clip speaks for itself:

Combine the above behavior with game-day drunkenness, and you're going to see a sharp uptick in "incidents" even if you aren't looking for it.

So congratulations to the feminists for finding that when you combine alcohol with economic and family dysfunction one result is domestic strife!

"But why the preoccupation with sports?" you might ask. Well, it's really pretty simple. It's a gold mine. American football teams have been bullied into throwing money at feminists to make them go away, so why not Scottish football (soccer) clubs? Football may be one of the few lucrative private enterprises in all of Scotland, which has little going for it otherwise. I imagine this makes it a prime target for aspiring feminists, who otherwise must beg for handouts from an increasingly stingy and borderline bankrupt government, not to mention the impoverished locals.

Is the Manosphere the Work of a Right-Wing Conspiracy?

W.F. Price · 23 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some time ago, I came across an article in The Guardian, in which a feminist accuses the Manosphere of being part of an "establishment" right-wing plot to subordinate women:

> The backlash started in the early 90s when to be laddish and un-PC was a bit a naughty. Liam Gallagher, described brilliantly by his brother Noel as "a man with a fork in a world of soup", was its pin-up.
>
> Right now we are dealing with something worse: a rightwing establishment and its lackeys who have managed to convince themselves they are mavericks and who are openly anti-feminist. From Toby Young to James Delingpole to Guido's bloggers, their putrid offerings are not outside the establishment but part of it. They are just fagging for the Tories.

While I admit that it's a refreshing break from the usual "you're all losers who are going into the dustbin of history" cant one hears from feminists, I must demur, and admit that "loser" is a much more apt description of me, personally, than member of the establishment. As one of the original members of what has come to be known as the "manosphere" who also happens to be a non-custodial father, I rank on the establishment scale just a small step above a prisoner or homeless person. Not that this really bothers me; I don't really see the single office workers who are at the next step above me as having a particularly enviable lifestyle. They are, after all, prisoners of another kind. And as for the establishment, I don't envy what I could never be. Not being much of a liar by nature, I wouldn't make the establishment cut.

But that said, the disconnect with reality Ms. Moore's article displays is truly bizarre. She must be living in an alternate reality, and her misplaced hysteria is odd to say the least. Perhaps she's going through some hormonal changes, such as menopause. Or maybe she's reflexively reverting to the old, traditional feminism of her long-lost youth.

As for the establishment, I think it's on its last legs. The Anglosphere's elites have gone past the point of return, and while the ordinary people (as always) will suffer most from this, their lifestyle and global hegemony is teetering on the brink. One significant military incident in East Asia, the collapse of Araby (happening now), or the ascendence of Russia could easily displace them from their commanding heights. It isn't a matter of whether at this point, but when.

I'd recommend abandoning dreams of elite status, and instead hunkering down and figuring out how to mitigate the damage. A full belly and freedom from violence – state or otherwise – is a good life.

Quarterly Report and Fund Drive

W.F. Price · 23 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Spearhead just passed the four-year milestone, and I'd like to see the site make it to it's fifth birthday. To do so, we'll need reader support.

For starters, I'll give the usual summary of how things are going behind the scenes.

Despite seeing highs in monthly unique visitors (around 95,000) in June, page views declined markedly in late summer. The explanation for this is simple: there were not very many posts. The more content The Spearhead posts, the more page views it gets. The relationship is near linear, so whenever productivity declines so does traffic.

However, despite this relationship between page views and posts, unique visitor levels remained above the historic average throughout the summer, which suggests that the depth and maturity of the content has made the site a regularly accessed point on the internet regardless of day-to-day activity.

This is nice to see, but when publishing online, fresh, also known as "evergreen," content is a necessity. There's a relentless demand for new content from readers, so keeping people's interest requires a constant effort. This effort is not always easy. I found it difficult to keep up with my children and family present for much of the summer (try writing with a couple elementary-school age kids and your parents storming around the place). It would have been much easier with an office, but alas, commercial rents are out of my reach here in Seattle.

Because early summer numbers were so encouraging, I think the site still has a good deal of unexploited potential. If it could return to the level of posted content seen at its inception, there's a decent chance it could reach the half a million page views a month mark (the record so far is just north of 400,000) by early next year, and that would be a nice milestone to reach.

One thing I'd like to make clear to readers is that I have not built this site as a "movement," which would require me to behave as though I am a political leader of some sort, but rather a publishing outfit that exists to provide ideas and information to readers. I modeled it more on Benjamin Franklin's publishing ventures than on some feminist or other personality cult. I'd far prefer that the message take precedence over the man here; as a mere mortal, I am just your humble writer and publisher, but ideas and words have life and reach far beyond the limited, earthly powers of human individuals.

In that spirit, I'd like to welcome others to join and add their message as well. Now that summer is over, I have the time to edit more submissions, and to do the work behind the scenes that puts them online and makes them available to thousands of readers.

In order accomplish this, I need help from readers. The situation is sensitive right now. Although the site is healthy, I won't be able to keep it that way if I don't have the funds and time to put work into it. Because regular readers number in the thousands, The Spearhead should be viable as a reader-supported site, but because of the nature of the internet it is difficult to capitalize on content. This doesn't mean it's impossible, but unless you focus on sex, sports, celebrities and games it gets a lot harder. Furthermore, politically sensitive and contentious subject matter does not tend to attract advertisers, although it does interest a fair number of people.

Because I'd like to keep the site going strong at least for the rest of the year, I'm going to keep up this fund drive until I have enough to know I can survive for that long. So I'd like to ask everyone who finds some value in the content here to support the site so as to keep it running and providing content.

I'd like to thank all the supporters and contributors who have kept this project alive over the last four years. I've enjoyed the work and am deeply grateful for the appreciation and support. Every bit of support humbles me and reminds me that this is a worthwhile effort.

To contribute, use the "donate" information provided on the upper right sidebar. If PayPal gives an error message, don’t worry — one of the variables in the button (my email, I suspect) has changed, but otherwise it makes no difference and works fine.

I’d also like to encourage regular readers to sign up as supporters, which allows unmoderated commenting and access to pages and posts not available to casual visitors.

“American” and “British” Boys and Girls Involved in Kenya Mall Raid

W.F. Price · 24 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Al-Shabaab has been taking Somalia by storm, eliminating enemies and now, apparently, taking the offensive beyond their borders. The US is quite clearly losing the war against the jihadis, who appear to have a wider base of operations today than ever, stretching from Mali to Afghanistan — just about the extent of the entire Mulsim world.

Worse, however, is the fact that a steady stream of fighters on the jihadis’ side is coming from our own home countries.

> There has been considerable speculation about the identity of the militants and how they managed to pull off a sophisticated assault that killed at least 62 people and kept security forces at bay. Kenyan Foreign Minister Amina Mohamed said Monday that “two or three Americans” and “one Brit” were among the perpetrators of the attack.
>
> She said in an interview with “PBS Newshour” that the Americans were 18 to 19 years old, of Somali or Arab origin and lived “in Minnesota and one other place” in the United States. The British jihadist was a woman who has “done this many times before,” Mohamed said.
>
> U.S. officials said Monday that they were pressing to determine whether any of the assailants were American.

Although many of these are young men and women of Muslim heritage, this is not true of all of them. This is even worse than it looks. In the Cold War, we had the problem of spies serving the Soviet Union, but with the exception of a very few people (e.g. Baader-Meinhof gang), no armed insurgents to speak of. Given the vast numbers of foreign born in the US, it looks like we’re facing some serious instability issues in the near future that could run the gamut from urban street crime to international narco-gangsters, and now jihadis too.

Dzhokar Tsarneav was just the beginning. As more and more young citizens receive training in warfare abroad, the chances that we will see armed conflict in our cities increase rapidly.

We often speak of the elite, inequality and instability, and what’s in store for the West in the future. Given low Western birth rates and recent mass immigration, I think we can predict with some certainty that we will face serious challenges, and possibly even insurrections within our own borders, just like the former Soviet Union.

This is a problem that was created by the people who are in power today. The post-Cold War political leaders who came into their own in the 1990s foisted their insane dream of a rainbow world, with everyone living in one big hippie commune headed, naturally, by a progressive white elite, on the rest of us.

Feminism is just one part of this political act of hubris, but it was enacted fairly early. Just as feminism and its effects have really started to make themselves felt over the last decade with skyrocketing illegitimacy, the failure of marriage as a social institution and the slow withdrawal of working-class men from productive enterprise, the next shoe to drop will be the spectacular failure of multiculturalism and integration.

That “Americans” are involved in such bold acts of warfare and terrorism abroad suggests that something is seething under the surface right here at home.

French Senate Votes to Ban Girls' Beauty Pageants

W.F. Price · 25 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

French feminists have gone over the top in a reaction against American-style child beauty contests, criminalizing adults who participate. The penalties introduced to discourage the pageants include up to two years in prison and a $40,000 fine.

Apparently, beauty pageants are a threat to gender equality:

> Facing growing fears of "hypersexual" young girls, the French upper house of Parliament voted Wednesday to end beauty pageants for those younger than 16.
>
> The Senate passed the new ban 197-to-146 as an amendment to a larger bill aimed at increasing gender equality. The measure now goes to the lower house, the National Assembly, for discussion and a vote.
>
> Pageants are popular in smaller towns across France, though far less frequent and less intense than in the United States. And France has no equivalent of American reality shows like "Toddlers & Tiaras" and its spinoff, "Here Comes Honey Boo Boo," that feature very young contestants.
>
> Still, the intense focus on beauty here, combined with a surge of images of sexualized, prepubescent girls, has raised fears that the pageants could take on the over-the-top quality of American contests.
>
> "It is extremely destructive for a girl between the age of 6 and 12 to hear her mother say that what's important for her is to be beautiful," Chantal Jouanno, the ban's champion, said Wednesday. "We are fighting to say: What counts is what they have in their brains."

Personally, I'm not a big fan of beauty pageants because I find them to be pretty boring. Sure, the women can be attractive, but as a normal male I have little interest in what they are wearing or how they do their hair. I'm pretty sure most men feel the same way.

However, as a father of a little girl, I understand that girls and women really enjoy showing themselves off in all their finery, so if they want to do so in a tasteful manner, what's the harm?

It seems the real problem is the intense competition, manipulation of children and vicious infighting that accompanies some of these events. But is it men or fathers involved in this? Far from it. Beauty pageants are for women by women, so it's disingenuous of feminists to suggest that they have anything to do with gender equality. It's just women doing their thing.

Actually, it looks as though beauty pageants are more a result of gender equality than an impediment to it. If fathers had more influence and say, the aggressive feminine competition in these pageants might be tempered somewhat, just as mothers play some role in preventing boys from acting too rowdy and overtly masculine.

Feminists often act on the false premise that giving women more opportunities and choices to do what they please will result in women and men acting more like each other. In reality it's the opposite. When men and women can do whatever they want, their actions diverge more than when they are constrained by the need to get along with the opposite sex.

Chantal Jouanno may have figured this out, and that's why she's taken it upon herself to force women to be more equal. If women don't want to do gender equality the easy way, she's going to whip them into it.

The Matthew Shepard Narrative: A Modern Blood Libel

W.F. Price · 25 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I was overseas when Matthew Shepard was murdered, and even from as far away as China I caught the news. This means it was a big story at the time, because a lot of news, including important stuff, just doesn't make it out there unless you really pay attention.

From the beginning, I knew there was more to the story than a simple matter of stereotyped Wyoming rednecks killing an innocent young gay man. If you grew up in a place like Seattle or San Francisco in those days there were plenty of stories that matched the Matthew Shepard case. So I assumed it was a run-of-the-mill robbery/murder committed by junkies (drug abuse – mainly speed and heroin – was a big problem back then in both urban and rural America). That the victim was gay didn't seem out of the ordinary at all. Many, many gay men were involved in the drug scene in the 90s — especially meth and ecstasy. They may still be, but I don't live on Seattle's Capitol Hill anymore, so I wouldn't know.

Around fall of '92, I knew a kid who was murdered in similar circumstances, and it was a horrific murder, too. I was friends with his cousin, who was a blonde hippie girl. The boy was a low level dealer — a meth addict who peddled drugs and stole to support his habit. I had no opinion about him either way; he was just one young hustler among many who drifted in and out of the cafés I frequented in my late teens.

He lived with a hippie couple, and some dispute arose amongst them over theft of electronic goods. The couple decided to take revenge. They got him high, lured him out into the woods, and while all were out of their minds on speed beat him and then hanged him from a tree in the forest near Issaquah. There he swung for some time until the female hippie spilled the beans, and then both were arrested, tried and sent up to the state penitentiary.

I have no idea whether the kid was gay, but he may well have been. In any event, it didn't matter, because there was no political point to be made. It was just another pointless murder over contraband and drug money. This is exactly what I assumed the Matthew Shepard murder to be, and it turns out that's pretty much what it was.

However, the difference in the Matthew Shepard case is that it occurred in a conservative town in Wyoming instead of a West Coast city. Therefore, in the febrile imaginations of leftists around the US, the place must be crawling with murderous Christian rednecks. Never mind that gay murder is far more common in Seattle than in Laramie — it confirmed exactly what progressives wanted to believe about small town America.

Whatever the circumstances of the murder, Matthew Shepard deserved justice. It doesn't matter whether he was killed by a redneck or by someone who happened to be his sex and using partner. Nor does it matter that he was gay or a drug user — he was a human being who had a right to live. Justice has been done in this case, and it must be kept in mind that the people of Wyoming ensured that.

However, the manner in which this murder has been used to smear an entire people is shameful. The fence where Shepard was killed is displayed as though it is the cross, and his story told as one of persecution at the hands of an evil people. There are very strong parallels to the blood libel — the ritual blaming of the Jews for the crucifixion, among other supposed crimes. I am not bringing this up to appeal to liberal sensibilities, but because blood libel was a fact. It was used systematically to justify expulsions and violent riots, the Spanish Expulsion of 1492 probably being the best-known example.

There was a criminal trial of Jews in Spain shortly before the expulsion edict. Some Jews, among them conversos (Jewish converts to Christianity), had been accused of killing a Christian boy in a mock crucifixion to ridicule and demean Christianity and Christians. It quickly became a famous case, and inquisitors themselves arrived on the scene, forcing confessions through the rack and waterboarding (it is a little-known fact that waterboarding was one of the primary interrogation tools of the Inquisition, and probably where the CIA got the idea).

Confessions were made, and executions carried out. Queen Isabella specifically cited the case in justifying the edict of expulsion, and Jews were kicked out of Spain with little more than the shirts on their backs.

While the Jews who were convicted may or may not have murdered a Christian boy – it is impossible to know for sure today – it was wrong to hold an entire people accountable for the actions of a few convicts. But it was politically expedient, because such is the nature of mankind.

Today, it is not the Jews who are subject to collective blame by the ruling class, but non-progressive whites — white Christians, to put it bluntly (blacks are subject to a similar collective blame, but not officially these days). Victims of pointless violence at the hands of criminals who hardly represent the people they live amongst are recast as martyrs, then used to bludgeon the founding culture of the United States with guilt and blame.

From a Dan Savage editorial accusing Christian conservatives of being "eliminationist" and akin to National Socialists:

> American Christian conservatives are attempting to introduce a new kind of anti-gay hatred: an eliminationist homophobia. In his book "Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust," author Daniel Goldhagen describes pre-war German anti-Semitism as unique and murderous, which he termed "eliminationist." German Christian churches inspired visions of Jews as "Christ-killers," and Jews came to be regarded as a poisonous anti-race that had to be eliminated in order to purify German culture. In America at the end of the 20th century, some American churches are creating an atmosphere of intolerance and hatred, with church-inspired visions of gays and lesbians as Christ-rejecters, and homosexuality as a "behavior" that must be eliminated to purify American culture.
>
> [...]
>
> Christian conservatives have attempted to distance themselves from the violence visited on Matthew Shepard. They must not be allowed to do so. Conservatives like to talk about accountability, so let the religious extremists who help make anti-gay violence a daily reality for gays and lesbians across this country be held accountable. The violence in Laramie is a deadly consequence of the hateful anti-gay rhetoric and eliminationist "ex-gay" ad campaigns.

On reading the above, it looks as though Savage wants to do away with conservative Christians (the overwhelming majority of Christians). Who is fanning the flames of hatred here?

Trayvon Martin, more a victim of recklessness and poor judgment than premeditated crime, was used in the same manner against the same target. There is no end to the search for martyrs. It is a relentless war of blame, and the idea is to justify collective punishment, including affirmative action, discrimination in access to government institutions and jobs, demographically targeted laws such as "hate crime" laws, and anti-discrimination laws that force Christians to act against their conscience in order to make a living or to keep their organizations from being sued out of existence. In some cases, it is responsible for violence perpetrated against innocent people, as in the case of a man in Seattle being forced to apologize at gunpoint for being a white male last month following the Trayvon Martin verdict. It is a systematic political assault justified by false stories and a twisted narrative, and it's getting dangerous.

But maybe that's the point.

Help with Running The Spearhead

W.F. Price · 30 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Dear readers,

for the first few years I was running this site, I had no life to speak of, and devoted a great deal of time to keeping it going. In a sense, it was my substitute child when I wasn't taking care of my kids, and kept me busy during lonely days and nights.

Things have changed. I am living a far more conventional life today, and therefore don't have the time or resources to devote hours every single day of the week to the site. In the first year or two of its existence, I was working on the site at least some every single day of the year – I never went a day without logging in at least once – and often put in up to 60 hours in a week. Time is money, and the site doesn't provide much in terms of compensation. It never has, but it's getting to a point where I am clearly working against my own interests by putting too much effort into it.

However, I'd like to keep it running, and I think a lot of readers would like me to do so as well. So what I'd like to propose is that some motivated readers help out with editing and perhaps some of the administration of the site. That way, I could keep writing and working on the site, and I could take my hands off it from time to time without worrying too much. It would also be much easier to edit and approve submissions, which I often don't have time to do these days. Unfortunately, this keeps a significant amount of material out of the site that readers would enjoy.

Just a few months ago, the site had record unique visitors, so it would really be a shame to drop it at this point. There's definitely still potential here, but I've just about reached the limit of what I can afford to put into it.

If anyone's interested, let me know through the contact form and we'll discuss it. I think there's still plenty of room in the manosphere for different voices, and with some help we can continue to be one of them.

ObamaCare's War on Men

keyster · 30 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Keyster

Despite Republican's desperate efforts to stop or at least delay the Democrat's Affordable Healthcare Act or "ObamaCare", it's coming and no one but Obama can stop it. The intention of the bill is to "fix" our healthcare system by making sure everyone, or as many people as possible, have access to "affordable" healthcare insurance. This requires "spreading the wealth around a little bit".

When the federal government mandates who and how a free market insurance company covers it's customers based on "fairness", there's bound to be unintended consequences; they're not going to LOSE money. One of the least discussed aspects of ObamaCare is "equalizing" what men and women are to pay in health premiums. Feminist Inc. has long complained that women pay more for health insurance and Obama's HHS secretary and former pro-late term abortion governor Kathleen Sebelius complied. "Why should women have to pay for birth control while men get Viagra for free?" – they shrieked, as if there's medical congruity.

In an analysis of ObamaCare (health insurance) costs by state, Forbes's Magazine discovered a huge disparity between what men will pay vs. what women will pay in increases. Well of course when the federal government mandates women MUST have free access (zero co-pay) to women's special healthcare needs, including "preventive care" exams and pre-natal care, someone needs to make up for the difference. Guess who that might be? That's right, because dammit it's not fair that women should have to pay more for healthcare insurance just for being born women – men should have to bare the burden of women's healthcare "equally". "When our women are healthy, society is healthy!" – or fill in your own Orwellian clap trap that Hillary Clinton or Nancy Pelosi might have spewed.

Insurance companies can't charge women more BY LAW because that's gender discrimination – so they'll glady pass the costs for women's healthcare on to men, who aren't organized and won't dare stand up for themselves as a "victim group" vis a vis women.

The disaster that is ObamaCare is about to turn one-sixth of our already weak economy upside down. But that's the Master Plan; to collapse the healthcare industry and usher in a single payer government system similar to Britain's HCS, where costs are controlled by government bureaucrats and people die waiting for service. Women will have all the "Free" preventive healthcare they can imagine, subsidized by men – but how long will they have to travel and/or wait for actual treatment? Another "victory" for Equity Feminism I suppose.

Next month is Breast Cancer Awareness Month.

You BETTER be wearing something pink or else you must hate women!

Feminism is the Red Pill

W.F. Price · 1 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Once you've been around long enough, you can get a decent sense of social change. It's kind of like watching a child grow. When you're a parent minding a child day to day, you don't notice the changes as they happen, but after some years you look at the kid and wonder how this could be the same little boy who needed to have his face wiped after every meal not so long ago.

Having been deeply involved in gender issues for some time now, I think I can say with some certainty that society's views on the subject have changed markedly in a relatively short period — only ten years or so ago feminism was orthodoxy in both official and popular culture. While I'm sure that our efforts have been partly responsible for this, there's the question of whether we were agents of change or products of it.

In my case it's the latter. I had no desire to effect change in regards to family law and feminist political power until they punched me right in the face. I was an unwilling participant in a process over which I had very little control. It was that shock that led me to try to exert some influence over it, and whatever impact I or this site may have made was touched off by changes that had begun years ago and motivated not only me, but millions of other men and their families.

The "manosphere" is part of a much larger popular unease with a radical form of feminism that began to generate resistance as it picked up steam. As it grew, the resistance grew. Slowly during the first decades of modern feminism, but then faster as the feminist triumphs of the 1990s began to bear their rotten fruit. Today, we find radical feminism discredited in the eyes of most people, although it remains institutionally strong. Contemporary feminist family law is similar to Jim Crow in the early 1950s — morally defeated yet still holding its ground.

The manosphere happened for a reason; it didn't appear out of nowhere. And it is only a small part of the general suspicion that now surrounds feminism. If all of the blogs of the manosphere were to disappear tomorrow, it wouldn't take long for something similar to take their place. Enough people have had enough.

This isn't to say that the manosphere is unnecessary or irrelevant, but rather that it's part of an organic process. It is a crucial part that has carried a heavy burden, and will continue to do so for some time, but it's important that we have a little perspective on what brought it about. I reject the idea that only a few people have taken the "red pill" — what we know of as the red pill is something that has been forced down many, many people's throats by feminists themselves.

This is exactly why we have the moral upper hand. Modern feminism came about at least partly because women ended up in a disadvantageous position during the cultural and sexual revolution of the 60s and 70s, but since then it has been a movement of aggression. The manosphere and associated movements opposed to feminism are essentially defensive. Feminists act as though these increasingly effective acts of self-defense are the true aggression. It's akin to when Soviets characterized Eastern European freedom movements as capitalist aggression, and it's becoming every bit as transparent.

The importance of emphasizing who bears responsibility for resistance to feminism cannot be overstated. If, as the feminists say, it is an insidious plot orchestrated by a mysterious patriarchal cabal, then they may be able to justify the brutality they have employed in their war against men, just as the United States justified atomic strikes on Japanese cities a few years after Pearl Harbor. But if it is the combined anger and despair of millions of men, children, mothers, sisters – and even wives – over having lost their loved ones, their livelihoods, their sense of security and well-being and even their freedom, then it's going to be a lot harder to explain it away.

If a feminist ever asked me what made me so strongly opposed to feminism – what caused me to take the red pill – I would look her in the eye and say "you did."

As John Rambo would say: "They drew first blood…"

Mother Nature Responsible for Patriarchy

Featured Guest · 1 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By Dave

When I came across the notion of Patriarchy in my more egalitarian days, I would vehemently deny that such a system ever existed. However, I can no longer deny that the feminists were exactly right in their assessment.

There indeed was a Patriarchy, many, in fact, all across the Earth in all ages. Most high-cultures had men in a place of dominance and women in a place of submission. Where I disagree with feminists is in the claim that such a system is, or was, bad. Consider for a moment that if Patriarchy is the natural organization of our species, then it is no more good or bad than a baboon's patriarchy or a hyena's matriarchy, for nature is valueless.

There are several reasons which, I believe, caused the emergence of Patriarchy as a social system. As a disclaimer, I make no prescriptive statements on whether this is good or bad, only that it is.

1: Sexual Asymmetry.

The foundation of Patriarchy is the natural, asymmetric features of men and women. The necessity of survival required men and women to take on different roles because fundamentally men and women were built for different things – women to bear and raise children, and men to do ensure their survival. Over time, men and women adapted physically and mentally to better complete these roles. This had a strong influence on who will be dominant and who will be submissive.

For men, the hostile environment crafted them to be stronger, faster, and have a greater endurance than women. This is just basic, biological fact. Yes, a female bodybuilder is stronger than some men, but when talking about averages, men are indeed physically stronger, faster, and have greater endurance. The strongest men are stronger than the strongest women. Average men are stronger than average women. Even weak men are stronger than weak women.

When it comes to attaining power, the strong have the advantage and thus men have the advantage over women. If anyone has witnessed, or been part of, a family argument between a mother and her teenage son, then you see the one-sided nature of physical force between the sexes. If the mother didn't have the leverage of money and resources that she could deny her child, or the father/police to step in when she needed it, then a physical altercation between them would not be in her favor. Ask, then, how stable is her authority if her son can usurp her power through violence? Such is the tenuous hold of a Matriarchy or any egalitarian sociopolitical setup.

Again, I'm not saying this is a good thing or a bad thing, only that a male's innately greater physical capability puts them in a place of dominance, and thus power. For women to overcome this handicap, they would need to become stronger, or have some mechanism to equalize the field.

2: Male Expendability/Female Security

Biologically speaking, males are the more expendable sex. This is because 1: the number of females determines how fast the species can potentially grow, not the number of males, and 2: women can only become pregnant from one man and carry one child at a time, whereas one men can impregnate many women at once.

Thus, if a tribe goes to war and sends out all of its men and half come back alive, then each woman in the tribe can still become pregnant and the tribe can still grow, just as it had before. If the tribe sends out all its female Amazonian warriors to fight, and half come back, then the tribe's growth potential is cut in half. It is thus necessary to keep women secure while also necessary for men to take risks and perhaps die doing so.

If the human males' greater innate strength wasn't enough to advantage Patriarchy over other systems, then male expendability puts them in the necessary position to become hunters, warriors, scouts, or any other role that comes with a greater amount of danger. And it is precisely those warriors, hunters, etc. that hold a significant amount of power.

Imagine a tribe, led by group of women, who decreed that they would go to war with another tribe for resources. Despite the women being in charge in a formal context, it is the male warriors who ultimately choose whether to follow those directions. If they choose not to, then there is little recourse from the female leadership.

It is the mother/teenage son analogy once again, but now at a larger scale.

The other side of the coin is that women, who are essential to the continuation of the tribe/society/species, need to be under protection from danger, and are thus put in a place of submission, rather than dominance.

It is this dynamic of male expendability and female security that further tips the balance in favor of a Patriarchy.

But it's important to note that the strength of this dynamic depends on the degree of danger in the local environment. In an environment where warriors and hunters are not needed, their power will be limited, even nonexistent. If little danger is present then there is less need for protection for women, and the advantage of Patriarchy starts to wane. It is in a placid, resource-rich setting that we see the world's few tribal matriarchies. In these environments, men's advantages in physical force pale in comparison to a woman's power over reproduction. In most places across the world, however, male power and male conquest led to expansion of the society, and it is why male-dominated societies became so successful.

3: Experience

As time went on in our early past, the necessity of men taking on dangerous roles also allowed them to diversify those roles.

A man of the tribe might have started as a scout, then warrior once he became strong and experienced enough, but once the tribe made contact with others on a friendly basis the role of warrior changed to peacemaker, negotiator, and what would later become the statesman. Hunters learned to domesticate animals while gatherers became farmers. The male's strength allowed them to become builders and craftsmen.

The early roles of males (the scout, the gatherer, the warrior) were a perfect springboard into more complex and diverse roles as society advanced. Thus, when it came to who would rule, men, who had the widest breadth of experience and the greatest expertise, were put at a greater advantage than women who did not. The scales were tipped even further to Patriarchy's favor.

4: Pregnancy and Opportunity Cost.

Even if women eventually caught up with men in terms of experience, pregnancy put women at a disadvantage when gaining power and influence.

If a man and a woman chose the same career path and had the exact same ability, the man would be at a comparative advantage if his female counterpart decided to have children. In the past, a child usually set women on the path of full-time motherhood and took her out of influence. Today, leave from work can range from a few weeks for just the delivery and recovery, to several months if a mother wishes to take off work to care for the child. This creates an opportunity cost associated with pregnancy, for if the woman is taken out of work then she misses the gains she would have achieved by continuing to work.

The degree of the opportunity cost depends on the length of time off and the field the woman works. Women in higher positions of power would see a higher opportunity cost than women at mid or low level positions. Men, however, rarely face that opportunity cost. They have nothing to distract them when seeking higher positions of leadership, further advantaging Patriarchy.

If highly-intelligent women did not choose to reproduce and instead focused primarily on gaining power and influence, then their innate abilities and intelligence would be completely removed from the gene pool, creating a dysgenic effect. This creates a catch-22. If women reproduce, the opportunity cost places them at a disadvantage in gaining power, but if they choose not to reproduce then the decline in population and the dysgenic effect would contribute to a decline in that society. Correcting for these effects requires a myriad of institutions all working together to promote it, as well as a paradigm shift in cultural beliefs, creating an ever more complicated, and ever more fragile, societal Rube-Goldberg machine which goes against natural dynamics.

Patriarchy, however, avoids these problems by focusing on a more efficient sexual division of labor.

5: Female Attraction to Male Power

In our early ancestry, women needed resources and security to survive. The men of the tribe, the hunters and warriors, ensured that women would get those necessities. Thus, the association between male power and continued survival became linked through a woman's attraction to men.

Today, that trend still remains in women's mate preferences. Women generally don't prefer to attach themselves to males that are weaker than them, less intelligent, and, most importantly, lower in status than they are. They do prefer to the opposite: strong, intelligent men with great power, wealth, and status. Female mate preference generally strives to be with men at the highest echelons of power and influence so that women themselves can be lifted into those circles, thus providing her with her own status and resource security for far less effort than obtaining it on her own.

Taken as a whole, it seems that women unconsciously advocate for Patriarchy in their mate preferences, since Patriarchy puts men in stations of power and provides women their ideal mate choices. If women are at the top, say in a Matriarchy, then they have no choice but to €œdate down€ to males of lower status, which does not generally suit their mating preferences.

6: The Nuclear Option.

Men's work and experiences led to whole societies being created across the Earth and throughout the ages, societies which are still largely maintained by men. This means that, for a society to continue, it needs men's labor. To get their labor, it needs their consent. Any society which does not meet men's needs will quickly fall as men see no reason to work in its favor and actively work toward its destruction. If the teenage son does not respect his mother's authority, and she cannot win through violence, then the only recourse is to appease him. If the warriors of the tribe are going to continue defending and hunting for it, then they too need appeasement. The easiest way placate men is to simply allow them to control that which they build and maintain, which is essentially what Patriarchy does. It gives men an incentive to keep working and creating.

Given how much men work to further their society, a Matriarchy or egalitarian society would only come about if men allowed it, and it would only remain if men tolerated it. The continuation of that society, however, would still rest in the hands of the men who could end it, if they wanted to.

Conclusion:

The social order which best reflects and capitalizes on the innate characteristics of mankind is going to be more stable and survive better than one that tries to go against the grain.

Patriarchy itself was not designed, but rather emerged organically and evolved over the millennia from the natural inequalities and unique circumstances between human male and human female. All these effects, added together, give strength to the Patriarchal social order over other systems, and it explains why so many cultures, nations, and societies all across the Earth have been Patriarchal, and why we still have it today. No other system, as of yet devised, has capitalized on the dynamics outlined above to such a degree as Patriarchy. Any system that does try to divert simple mechanics with complex, artificial institutions will become as unworkable as the equations for a geocentric universe.

Thus, I do not believe that Patriarchy should be avoided or dismantled. Once we accept what our species naturally gravitates toward, then we can start asking questions about justice, fairness, and our society's direction. Until we accept that one piece of the puzzle, we can only experiment in the dark.

Feminists Just Love “Breaking Bad”

Uncle Elmer · 2 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday Salon had at least 10 essays about TV’s “Breaking Bad” crime drama. In case you missed it, Breaking Bad is hot right now, and media outlets will find any excuse to publish a photo of Walter White to scavenge web-clicks as part of their business model.

While their deconstructions run the gamut from exaltation of the differently-abled to affirmation of the “angry white man” stereotype, along with the usual accusations of racism against, well, everybody, perceptive men can see the show’s riveting storyline as a complete refutation of boilerplate feminist media directives.

For who among us cannot see Jesse Pinkman’s chained servitude as meth cook for the Nazi gangsters as allegory to the modern divorced man’s state-enforced penury? And I am not even going to mention those dimwits Skylar and Marie, or that I am a long-time resident of Albuquerque and many of the scenes were filmed in my neighborhood. I even saw Pinkman at the airport, but did not accost him.

Obligations to women then and now

W.F. Price · 2 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Before the state involved itself in marital relations, there were cultural and social norms that determined what men's obligations to women amounted to. These were reciprocal, and women were expected to uphold their part of the bargain as well. In some cultures, brothers were expected to see to it that sisters were married to a decent man. In what our own culture used to be, that task fell on fathers. Those who couldn't marry off their sisters or daughters were expected to provide for them, which made a dowry seem cheaper in the long run. In other cultures, the practice of bride price sought to compensate parents for the difficulties involved in handling a daughter and marrying her off. Although one might think that bride price shows more respect to the prospective wife, it tends to result in stricter conditions for the girls and women involved, because when you pay there is a sense of ownership. Furthermore, parents are incentivized to push their girls to be "better wife material" so as to make the sale, so to speak.

Western norms of dowry were humane and even somewhat indulgent by global standards. The girl may not have been perfect, but her father would sweeten the deal by giving her husband an incentive to marry her, as well as a sense of obligation to her and her family. In return, the daughter was expected to behave herself and refrain from bringing dishonor onto her family. A common act of charity for fatherless girls and young women would be to provide them with some dowry to make them marriageable.

This practice slowly faded away by the 20th century, and all but disappeared when women were granted property and voting rights. Yet the obligation to provide some incentive for men to marry women remained. Thus, the state stepped in and made efforts to make them suitable wives. Although it may seem hard to believe today, it was common practice up to even the 1960s to make efforts to prepare women for marriage and wifely duties in public schools.

Not far from where I live, there's a park that is the former grounds of a public school for girls who were wards of the court — children of the original skid road. Girls who were prostituting themselves, getting involved in crime or who got pregnant as teens were sent there and received special training in basic homemaking skills. They were taught to be proper mothers and wives so that they could find a husband who would take them on.

> In 1925–26, 38 girls attended the Girls' Parental School. They ranged in age from 10 to 16. "In all things, the effort is to maintain at the school a home atmosphere. Many of the girls have never known what this means, and they frequently develop remarkably under its influence. . . . In addition to regular school work, the girls learn to do all the work of a home—cooking, serving, canning, sewing, mending, darning, laundry work, housekeeping, and gardening. Industrial work occupies about three hours per day for each girl."

Can anyone imagine a public school today teaching girls how to be homemakers?

Finally, these vestiges of the old obligation to help women become decent wives went by the wayside as well. During the chaotic times of the 70s and 80s following the liberalization of divorce law, there was no standard cultural practice for ensuring that women's needs would in the future be met by some individual man. The vacuum this created is what led directly to state-enforced obligations; if you can't convince men to willingly support the women our society turns out, then you force them to do so at gunpoint.

However, in tandem with state enforcement of male provision to women, a new dowry system emerged among the middle classes and above. Instead of directly compensating the husband with cash or an allowance, parents train their daughters to be paid employees who will bring home a sizable contribution to the family, and who can support themselves financially. This is the upper-middle-class marriage norm today. Well-educated urban men simply will not marry women unless these women can provide an income to the family. This is the basis of the marriage gap that has emerged in recent decades.

Women in the lower classes cannot provide the income desired by higher-status males, and they have nothing to contribute to the home of a working man, so few men are willing to take the chance and marry them. In fact, for many working class men, it is cheaper and easier to pay child support and be a part-time father than to put up a woman who can neither run a home nor earn any income to speak of. I have noticed that a working class urban culture is slowly developing in which men no longer even take the idea of marriage – even to the mothers of their children – seriously at all. On a positive note, I see many more of these men out and about with their children today than I did a couple decades ago.

Neither of the above trends amounts to empowerment of women, and for most women they are a step down. It still may not look that way today, but the trend is headed clearly in one direction: a restoration of reciprocity. The short-lived era of one-way obligations in favor of women is drawing to a close.

Feminists to criminalize elderly sex

W.F. Price · 3 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I recently came across a bizarre abstract of a paper on recent moves to set up a sort of VAWA for old people. The template of the new policy is explicitly feminist domestic violence law, so there's no doubt that it will be a VAWA offshoot, and if I were staring senior citizenship right down the barrel I might be pretty worried given the implications.

> Despite the tremendous growth of the criminal justice response to elder abuse, the legal academy has been almost entirely silent on this trend. This Article fills the void by providing the first substantive critique of the criminal justice response to elder abuse. Drawing on feminist critiques of criminal laws and policies related to domestic violence, the Article finds that the emerging criminal justice response to elder abuse holds the promise of protecting certain elder abuse victims and of positively affecting public attitudes towards elder abuse.

It looks like elderly abuse is set to become the next great social hysteria, which is how baby boomer women's issues seem to turn out every time. First, it's "free love," then free abortion, free divorce, and so on until you get to free colonoscopies for all, and now "elderly abuse" looms over the horizon.

So what are some of the measures they are thinking about enacting?

Criminalization of sex with senior citizens, apparently:

> Similarly, in the name of combating sexual abuse of older adults, some states have criminalized consensual sexual conduct that would otherwise be legally permissible. (72) For example, in the state of Washington, it is a crime for a disabled person age sixty or older to engage in consensual sexual activity with someone who provides that person with paid transportation. (73) In Vermont, it is a crime for anyone who works or volunteers at a caregiving facility or program to engage in sexual acts with any person whose ability to care for him or herself is impaired due to "infirmities of aging." (74)
>
> Likewise, the Wisconsin Individual-at-Risk Restraining Order makes it possible to obtain a restraining order over someone–and hold them criminally liable for violating that restraining order–even where the "victim" neither lacks capacity nor objects to contact with the third party. (75) The fact that an older adult is competent is not a basis for dismissal of the petition. (76) Moreover, an order can be granted even if the respondent does not pose a risk to the older adult, but merely poses a threat to an investigation of alleged mistreatment, interferes with an offer of services to the older adult (regardless of whether the older adult wishes to obtain such services and regardless of whether those services have been found to be in the older adult's best interest), or threatens to mistreat or mistreats an animal owned by or in service to the older adult. (77)

I can't help but wonder whether this is a backdoor way to keep grandpa from paying a little extra for "special services." It is well-known that old men are far more sexually active than old women, so the obvious implication of these laws is that it's going to make it a lot harder for older and disabled men to receive sexual favors in institutional settings.

It may not be particularly tasteful to think about, but there is in fact a thriving black market in both narcotics and sex in old folks' homes. I can't imagine that this will cease to exist as the largest generation in US history slowly begins to fill up these institutions.

Of course, sex isn't the only issue here. If dealing with elderly parents becomes as dangerous as dealing with American women, I'm pretty sure a lot of children will opt out. If, for example, grandma gets drunk and resentful and calls the police crying about how mean her children have been, the resulting arrest probably won't incline the child to go out of his or her way for her in the future. It could, however, give lawyers and social workers a perfect pretext for seizing an estate. This, I strongly suspect, is a motivating factor in the push to include elder abuse in the highly profitable domestic violence industry.

Women Underrepresented in Science? Blame it on TV...

W.F. Price · 3 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In a ten-page snoozer published in the New York Times, Eileen Pollack, a creative writing professor from the University of Michigan, identifies American culture as the culprit behind women's relatively poor showing in the sciences. To make her case, she singles out the popular Big Bang Theory television show:

> For proof of the stereotypes that continue to shape American attitudes about science, and about women in science in particular, you need only watch an episode of the popular television show "The Big Bang Theory," about a group of awkward but endearing male Caltech physicists and their neighbor, Penny, an attractive blonde who has moved to L.A. to make it as an actress. Although two of the scientists on the show are women, one, Bernadette, speaks in a voice so shrill it could shatter a test tube. When she was working her way toward a Ph.D. in microbiology, rather than working in a lab, as any real doctoral student would do, she waitressed with Penny. Mayim Bialik, the actress who plays Amy, a neurobiologist who becomes semiromantically involved with the childlike but brilliant physicist Sheldon, really does have a Ph.D. in neuroscience and is in no way the hideously dumpy woman she is presented as on the show. "The Big Bang Theory" is a sitcom, of course, and therefore every character is a caricature, but what remotely normal young person would want to enter a field populated by misfits like Sheldon, Howard and Raj? And what remotely normal young woman would want to imagine herself as dowdy, socially clueless Amy rather than as stylish, bouncy, math-and-science-illiterate Penny?

So the problem is really that science isn't sexy enough, and that drives women away. Although she doesn't come out and say it, the implication here is that men are not as concerned about the sexiness of science.

> Although Americans take for granted that scientists are geeks, in other cultures a gift for math is often seen as demonstrating that a person is intuitive and creative. In 2008, the American Mathematical Society published data from a number of prestigious international competitions in an effort to track standout performers. The American competitors were almost always the children of immigrants, and very rarely female. For example, between 1959 and 2008, Bulgaria sent 21 girls to the International Mathematical Olympiad, while the U.S., from 1974, when it first entered the competition, to 2008, sent only 3; no woman even made the American team until 1998. According to the study's authors, native-born American students of both sexes steer clear of math clubs and competitions because "only Asians and nerds" would voluntarily do math. "In other words, it is deemed uncool within the social context of U.S.A. middle and high schools to do mathematics for fun; doing so can lead to social ostracism. Consequently, gifted girls, even more so than boys, usually camouflage their mathematical talent to fit in well with their peers."
>
> The study's findings apply equally in science. Urry told me that at the space telescope institute where she used to work, the women from Italy and France "dress very well, what Americans would call revealing. You'll see a Frenchwoman in a short skirt and fishnets; that's normal for them. The men in those countries seem able to keep someone's sexual identity separate from her scientific identity. American men can't seem to appreciate a woman as a woman and as a scientist; it's one or the other."

So let me get this straight: It's all those terribly unsexy Asians and nerds who are to blame? How about just quarantine all the Asians and nerds in their own science room, and match every lady scientist with a Christian Grey type stud to pleasure her in the laboratory?

Surely fishnets, miniskirts and billionaire playboy boyfriends for every female scientist will result in a never-before-seen climax of sexy scientific achievement.

Feminist eugenics piece pulled for groupthink violation

W.F. Price · 4 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A new feminist magazine called "Feminist Times" recently ran a piece in their "Taboo Corner" section titled "sterilize her". It sparked a backlash for its brutal honesty, the likes of which can often be found in the manosphere, but is regularly whitewashed by feminist publications for reasons of "solidarity." So, despite my personal feelings about feminists, I am a little impressed with the boldness of Charlotte Raven's new magazine, and look forward to reading it in the future for more unfiltered feminist opinions (we'll see how long that lasts…).

Women have unpleasant thoughts at least as often as men, but they are much better at keeping them bottled up. Sometimes, however, as in the case of the woman who wrote the piece, a few drinks is all it takes to bring out the inner Himmler.

Because the magazine promptly chickened out and pulled the piece after much sputtering and outrage, I took the liberty to transcribe it from a screenshot I found to present it here under the fair use doctrine:

> I once exclaimed to a group of friends, after a few drinks, that I believed in forced sterilization.
>
> This shock announcement was pried out by one of the group, who also having had a few drinks, brought up that topic that you're not supposed to talk about with people you like… 'politics'.
>
> I couldn't see anyone else who was in the vicinity of the table, but the bar man was probably grimacing at the display that followed my outburst. A couple who were part of our group were shocked that I could ever say such a thing, one of them pleading that we stop the conversation. Everyone just wanted it to end. People began looking up taxi numbers. No one could imagine what had brought me to this extreme conclusion.
>
> I came to this idea from a personal experience which involves a family member who decided to bring a child into this world. It was her choice, like lot's [sic] of people everyday who have children, because that's what happens, we reproduce.
>
> However she also decided to neglect the child. Put the little girl in some terrible, dangerous situations which led to social services taking the child away from her. This isn't something new or unusual, it happens all the time. I understand that sometimes people can make mistakes and sometimes people have problems of their own that need to be addressed.
>
> One of our elderly relatives couldn't bear to see the baby go into care and grow up feeling unwanted, so out of her own selflessness took on the child and her upbringing. This wasn't as easy as written either. Social services became more of a hinderance [sic] than a help and she had to fight.
>
> So there's sort of a happy story going on here but what saddens me most is what happened next.
>
> Does the mother seek help? Want to get her child back and earn the right to be called her mother and look after her? No she doesn't.
>
> Instead she continues to sleep about with men, picks an ex convict, gets pregnant again and surprise surprise the cycle continues.

Feminists of the early 20th century were generally in favor of sterilization. In fact, many hygienic movements, which included prohibition, were largely the result of women's efforts, and went hand in hand with suffrage. Some justified sterilization on the grounds of compassion, some on grounds on racial hygiene (e.g. Margaret Sanger), and others merely to reduce public disorder.

It wasn't until feminism became a Soviet-funded movement in the postwar era that these proto-National Socialist tendencies were finally purged from the ranks.

However, it appears that the instinct remains the same, and it comes out every now and then that it's fairly common for feminists to want to prevent or do away with children that they do not approve of. What is Planned Parenthood's true mission? If you stroll around the neighborhoods surrounding many of the institution's abortion clinics, it's kind of hard to shake the feeling that a certain kind of child is in the crosshairs.

Just the other day, I saw an old episode of Law and Order in which this theme was very much on display. A woman with a drinking problem had chosen to keep her child, and the female detective clearly thought she should do away with the thing.

Women naturally have strong feelings about reproduction. It is often said that men try to play at being God with their inventions and scientific achievements. The impulse to control and shape human reproduction is the feminine counterpart of this masculine tendency.

If an official eugenics policy ever arises again, you can bet there will be a lot of women behind it.

Schwyzer now potentially involved in disability fraud

W.F. Price · 4 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

HT @realmattforney

Chuck Ross has kept up with our old friend Hugo, the closet-case posterboy for male feminism who fantasized to students about being sodomized by porn star James Deen in his classroom. Hugo told Chuck that he was holding out for disability in his job at Pasadena City College, probably figuring that would cover his imminent child support bills and qualify him for reduced rent and other bennies.

But Hugo's on record as a flaming liar, and it's plausible that he faked his online meltdown to bolster his claims of mental illness. Hugo's hysteria is, to say the least, unbecoming for a man (if you can call him that), and he might have taken it a step too far. Interestingly, his episodes seem to coincide with time he spends with his mother. Freud would have had a field day with this sissy.

It's starting to look like Pasadena City College doesn't want to pay for Hugo's pampers for the rest of his life, and they are calling his bluff despite California's indulgent treatment of public employees. Hugo may emerge as a test case for California, and ultimately the entire nation's colleges due to his notoriety and atrocious behavior.

Most of us ordinary men couldn't get away with one percent of Hugo's follies, so I am sorely disappointed with manosphere sites that held him out as an object of pity rather than the sociopathic predator that he is. However, it is encouraging to see that his place of employment is demanding some accountability. I think, in this instance, that even his professor brother will take a hands-off approach and leave him to his fate.

It couldn't happen to a man who deserves it more.

The Joys of a Feminist Childhood

W.F. Price · 7 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Charles Martel pointed out an article in the NY Times written by a woman who takes time to cook for her daughter because she, like so many post-feminist children, grew up in a domestic vacuum. Actually, her childhood reads like one of straight up neglect beyond that suffered by most "latchkey kids." She hints at malnutrition and psychological scarring:

> Once upon a time, I had a mother who inhabited the kitchen with care. The bliss of licking drippy, sweet things off the mixing spoon after she had stirred pudding or poured cake batter into a pan was often mine. I believed my mother loved those moments, and our entire home-based family life, as much as I did.
>
> Yet by the time I turned 9, my brother and I lived in a post-divorce household, with Dad in a new home and Mom in full feminist revolt. Dinners of chicken cordon bleu and baked desserts gave way to oven-roasted meats that were deemed done whenever my mother could tear herself away from making art and selling it — or, when she wasn't home, to no dinner at all, unless you counted the banana I nibbled while crouched in my closet, hoping any would-be attackers couldn't see me through the window as darkness fell.
>
> [...]
>
> For my mother, the kitchen felt like a trap. When the women's movement blossomed in the late 1960s, she was ready. She vanquished the spirit of homemaking the way Virginia Woolf had killed her "Angel in the House."
>
> And then a tidal wave of rage, disappointment and raw desire overtook her. I saw it in her vehemence toward my father and in the raucous consciousness-raising groups that met in our living room. I saw it in the changed contents of our dinner plates: a dried-out chicken leg, a potato collapsed inward from overbaking.
>
> When my mother banged out work correspondence on an electric typewriter way past bedtime, my needs had no standing. On other nights I would lie awake for hours, unable to sleep until she came home at midnight.
>
> Complaining got me nowhere. My mother was an unstoppable force, powerful, beautiful and finally happy. As her days and nights expanded to include solo shows, romance and the founding of feminist organizations, I could see in her radiant face and laughter that she was fulfilling her potential. Her red hair grew ever upward, a hood of curls that shouted out her freedom.
>
> She had suffered and struggled. She was talented. She deserved to thrive

That last part sounds like some form of Stockholm Syndrome.

And the following portrays her mother in an almost satanic light:

> But my body spoke my devastation. I went from being well fed and popular in third grade to near skeletal and often mocked in fifth. I wasn't anorexic; I just didn't know how to cook. I turned sallow and hollow-eyed and suffered headaches, eczema and stomach pains. On the windy playground, other children would crow, "She's so skinny, she's going to blow away."
>
> And I was lonely. On weekday afternoons I would let myself in using the key around my neck. If my mother was home, I would find her in her basement studio, wielding a torch of blue flame, shaping metal into sculpture. She wore a leather apron, elbow-high gloves, a polka-dot cap, a breathing mask and a plastic face visor. Her bushy red hair burst out the back of the cap, a sign of her uncontainable passion.
>
> "Mom!" I would yell, keeping my distance, because even the sparks could burn you. She would look up, turn the knob to stop the gas, pull down the breathing mask and tilt back her visor, showing her freckled face.

When you've got a mother like that, passive resistance is the only resistance you can get away with.

> If I had a plan, I told her: “I’m going to Phyllis’s house.” Or “I have homework.” But when I had social troubles at school, I wanted her company. “I’m bored,” I said. “I have nothing to do.”
>
> “Boredom is an opportunity,” she would say. “You’ll find something.” Then she would concentrate on melting metal for another several hours. Later I would learn she was right about boredom. I got great training in being creative and alone.
>
> But back then, on many afternoons, I would return to my bedroom, sit on my pink shag rug and cry. It seemed I mattered to no one anymore. My heart shrank into a knob of hurt and yearning.

I wonder how much therapy this woman has been through. Perhaps her return to the kitchen to cook for her daughter is a continuing form of therapy — a sort of refuge where she can go back to the comfort of her early childhood, before her mother went full-feminist.

> Because of my history, I know how much the mundane care of children matters. That is why I stop work when the school day ends and greet my daughter with a hug. I may be tired, stressed out or grumpy; I may bemoan the confinement, the repetition, the career limits. But I do it anyway. I pull away from paid pursuits and open myself to the opportunity to delight in my daughter.
>
> My delight comes freely, inspired by a leggy girl with rich brown eyes who has just come home. But our time together is about more than delight. When I hand her a snack and look into her face, seeking the stories of her day, I intend for her to feel how much she matters. She matters more to me right then than anything I could be doing without her. And we will not have these afternoons forever.
>
> When she told me on Mother’s Day that she loves what I do in the kitchen, I realized why I love it, too. For as I stir and chop and bake while she studies, sings, draws, chatters, rides a scooter and does an exceptional job of being young, I am drinking in some of the pleasures I missed.
>
> My husband also cooks. He is generous and competent in the kitchen. But for me, the kitchen is a place of healing. And when my daughter and I play our roles there contentedly, it is as if we have stepped into a feedback loop that sends good feelings cycling between us. We are bathing in a mutually enhancing sort of love, a larger version of the circle that breastfeeding or cuddling a baby can create: a give-and-take that affirms our value as parent and child.

This article, although carefully-worded, is a searing indictment of the monster created by radical feminism. According to feminists themselves, nothing excuses a father for not providing for his children, so what on earth could excuse a woman for failing to care for hers?

Making men victims victimizes men

W.F. Price · 9 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I know that a number of MRAs disagree with my take on the issue of male rape victimization, and the difference comes down to the different approaches Henry Laasanen outlined in an article published here some time back.

As an equalist, Henry might agree that men should push for equality in rape prosecution, as it's only fair that women should play by the same rules they try to use to their advantage. I, on the other hand, am deeply suspicious of any attempts to expand definitions, even if they are accompanied by equalist language, because I am certain that men will end up paying a heavier price, as they always do. My position is something I may have come up with indepently, but as it happens personal experience also plays a big role in it.

When I think of what people call "equality," I am immediately reminded of my own custody case. My case for primary custody of my kids was better than my ex's, because she was working full time away from home at the time, while I was not. In fact, I had taken time off – some three or four months – to help take care of an infant and a toddler so that she could get that full-time position, which she really wanted.

When we separated, she had her mother take care of the kids during her time with them (we shared them). Then, in court, despite the fact that I had been taking care of my kids for months and had all the time in the world to continue doing so, I got steamrolled, and for no particular reason according to the judge. This is what happens under so-called "equality" — it's a lie. Judges will still make subjective judgments based on gender roles and their own prejudices, and as more women enter the profession I suspect it will stay that way.

I'm sure the same thing will happen if the concept of rape is equalized, only it's even worse, because allowing men who have reluctantly had sex with women to be classified as rape victims will unreasonably expand the definition and result in far more men being classified as "rapists" when in some cases they may have simply begged for sex.

Abigail Rine, who wrote about discomfort with the feminist label in The Atlantic earlier this year, later wrote another article provocatively titled "Don Draper was raped," in which she describes an encounter in Mad Men from Don Draper's adolescence, when he is mounted by a prostitute while recovering from the flu. According to Rine, the young Draper was raped by the hooker.

> In an episode of Mad Men last month, a prostitute named Aimee has sex with a teenaged Don Draper (née Dick Whitman) after nursing him through a nasty chest cold. Actually, let me rephrase: Aimee doesn't just have sex with young Dick Whitman–she rapes him.
>
> Throughout most of the episode, Aimee serves as a surrogate mother for Dick; she lets him recuperate in her bed and offers him rest, comforting words, spoonfuls of warm broth. However, in their penultimate scene together, Aimee's maternal kindness turns oddly predatory. She approaches her bed where Dick is lying weakly, fever newly broken, and asks, "Don't you want to know what all the fuss is about? "No," Dick replies forcefully, averting his eyes and hugging the blankets tightly against his chest as she reaches under the covers to touch him. "Stop it," he says, clearly uncomfortable, even afraid. But Aimee doesn't stop.
>
> To me, this interaction was an unambiguous depiction of rape–and not simply statutory rape. Dick is in a physically weakened state and repeatedly makes it clear that he does not want Aimee to touch him sexually, much less "take his cherry." As a child of the '80s, I was raised on a healthy diet of "No Means No." Rape isn't just something that happens at gunpoint with a strange man in a dark alley; rape, essentially speaking, is being subjected to sex without consent. And Dick clearly did not consent.

I haven't seen the scene, but before calling it "rape," I'd have a few questions. Did the boy physically resist at all? Did he change his mind after saying "no?" Was he really too weak to resist?

Mind you, these are all questions I'd hope a defense lawyer would ask, because they are relevant. First of all, if someone doesn't comply, sex is not going to happen. People can be forced to comply (this is the definition of rape), but it's all but impossible to have sex with a conscious, physically normal individual who is not complying with the act for one reason or another. And, quite frankly, I find it hard to believe that a 14-year-old male, who is on average about as strong as a female at her physical peak, would be physically helpless around a rather small-boned prostitute, even after having the flu.

And this also gets to the heart of my objection to applying the victimhood mantle to the male. Making men as physically helpless and violable as contemporary feminists hold women to be is a form of social castration. One of the defining characteristics of masculinity is the possession of agency — the ability to act. Take this away and we are slaves, so removing this from men – even with a concept ostensibly meant to "protect" men – leads us down a hole, at the bottom of which we find ourselves bereft of our manhood both culturally and legally. And make no mistake: many people really do want to rob men of their manhood. Male feminist Michael Kimmel has made a career of it.

This is not to say that men cannot be victimized or real victims; they clearly can and this has always been recognized. But the most effective means of victimizing men has always been to reduce them to a state in which they are incapable of protecting themselves and acting in their own interests, and this is accomplished as easily by feminizing them as by direct force of arms.

When a woman appeals to people for help and protection, she is engaged in an empowering act. When men rush to a woman's aid, it demonstrates her female potency. When her "needs" are met by others, it does not detract from but rather adds to her status. For ancient, immutable reasons, this does not apply to men.

The man who cries "help" feels a certain shame. When he must apply for welfare, it is humiliating and emasculating. That men must swallow their pride and do so from time to time is a given, but almost all of us recognize that it is far from ideal when the necessity presents itself. Ideally, the man has agency, and can fend for himself. In a society that valued men, steps would be taken to ensure that men have the opportunity to do so. A society that enshrines male victimhood is the exact opposite.

Time Magazine Invents Sugar Daddy Myth to Hilite Shutdown's Impact on Women

Uncle Elmer · 11 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A new study published in the pestigious online journal Time Magazine reports that inquiries to "Sugar Daddy" websites have risen an astonishing 50% since the government shutdown began last week. This is raising concerns that women, especially single moms, are being forced into prostitution of the most scurrilous kind – that of servicing creepy older men – by the Republican's callous failure to mail out checks to our most neediest citizens. Some of them veterans!

The term "Sugar Daddy" (an acronym for Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics) describes consensual financial arrangements in which young females provide companionship to generous older gentlemen in exchange for funding so they can "go to school".

Many feel that this study shows that the shutdown affects women and minorities the hardest, citing that women of color are especially prone to exploitation by privileged older white males.

One doesn't have to be an expert to see the adverse affects the shutdown is having on the most vulnerable members of our society. On TV I saw a human-interest story about workers from the local military base being forced to stand in line to receive food donations from volunteers after their cupboards ran bare less than a week after the shutdown. The segment featured one obese afro-bunned white woman, described as a "single mom", struggling unassisted to get sacks of food into her $30K SUV. Another large man, having worked at the base for 28 years, could not make ends meet because of the government closing and felt humiliated to accept the food handouts, but what else could he do?

As the shutdown continues with no resolution in sight, we can expect to hear more heart-rendering stories about how it has affected the most vulnerable and needy citizens in our communities. While many lament the impact this has had on those clinging to hope for economic advancement under Democrat governance, others see it as a watershed moment revealing the heartless cruelty of the Republican leadership. Time will tell how this will all play out.

What Do Terms Like Bro And Brogrammer Really Mean?

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 14 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

After Pax Dickinson was fired from his job as CTO of Business Insider a few weeks ago, there has been a lot of talk by feminists about bros, bro culture, brogrammers (a combination of bro and programmer), etc. While the term, bro, and its derivatives have been around for a while, feminists have used Dickinson's firing to assert bros and bro culture is everywhere there is a concentration of men especially in the tech industry. Is this really the case? To figure that out we have to see what the definition of "bro" is. Urban dictionary provides several definitions. Here is the first:

> Obnoxious partying males who are often seen at college parties. When they aren't making an ass of themselves they usually just stand around holding a red plastic cup waiting for something exciting to happen so they can scream something that demonstrates how much they enjoy partying. Nearly everyone in a fraternity is a bro but there are also many bros who are not in a fraternity. They often wear a rugby shirt and a baseball cap. It is not uncommon for them to have spiked hair with frosted tips.

The urban dictionary definition covers what most people would think a "bro" is, yet such a definition means that terms like "brogrammer" are a contradiction in terms. The definition of "bro" is consistent with what most people think frat guys and jersey shore guidos are like, not programmers. Most people think of programmers as men who lack social skills and maybe even have borderline Aspergers syndrome. Their idea of a programmer is a man who neither is part of a fraternity nor is at a lot of parties. (While programmers can come from all walks of life, the issue in question when it comes to defining terms like "bro" and "brogrammer" is people's perceptions.) As far as most people's perceptions are concerned, a "brogrammer" logically can not exist. The question must be asked, "why does the term, 'brogrammer', exist?" and "why would anyone say that a lot of frat guys and similar types have taken over the tech industry?"

Looking at how the terms, "bro" and "brogrammer", are used by feminists reveals a different definition of the word being used by feminists. Ann Friedman writing in New York Magazine shows us what feminists really mean by terms like "bro" and "brogrammer":

> "Bro" once meant something specific: a self-absorbed young white guy in board shorts with a taste for cheap beer. But it's become a shorthand for the sort of privileged ignorance that thrives in groups dominated by wealthy, white, straight men. "Bro" is convenient because describing a professional or social dynamic as "overly white, straight, and male" seems both too politically charged and too general

To feminists terms like "bro" and "brogrammer" are synonyms for straight white male. As Ann Friedman reveals, feminists can't just say straight white men when they mean straight white men because it's too "politically charged". In other words, if feminists talk about straight white men, it's obvious that feminists just hate straight white men. Instead, feminists are now using the term "bro" to make people think they're only talking about a frat guy subset of straight white men when feminists are talking about all straight white men. It's a trick by feminists to avoid criticism because most people aren't going to defend stereotypical frat guy behavior whereas they might have a problem with blanket attacks on straight white men.

This also reveals that the term, "brogrammer", is really just an attack on men in the tech industry. The explains the contradictions in people perceptions of a bro and a programmer. It has nothing to do with the behavior of men in the tech industry. What feminists really have a problem with in the tech industry is that there is a large group of men employed in jobs that aren't under their control. Like with the term, "bro", using the term, "brogrammer", is an attempt by feminists to avoid criticism from people who might have a problem with blanket attacks on men working in the tech industry.

In conclusion, whenever a feminist use the term, “bro” or “brogrammer”, just replace it with straight white men or men in the tech industry as appropriate. By doing that, what feminists really mean when using those terms will become clear.

Why you might want to think twice about sending your daughter to college

W.F. Price · 14 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Although it's died down a bit in the last decade, the strident denunciations of patriotic American holidays still pop up with some regularity.

In the following article from the Daily Nebraskan, the student newspaper for the University of Nebraska, a buxom, corn-fed girl named Shelby Fleig resorts to obscenity and warped historical interpretation to spit in the eye of the country that fed her so well:

> If you are a more alert and higher-functioning human being, you know the fact that our country has a holiday to commemorate the genocide, slavery, disease, rape and hate that is Christopher Columbus is total bullshit. Fast facts to make up for our flawed public school system:
>
> 1. Christopher "Bad Daddy" Columbus arrived on Oct. 12, 1492, to a civilization close to 14,000 years old. He insisted that he had reached small islands off the coast of China, and even made his crew pledge an agreement with him. Columbus died maintaining he had reached Asia. What an embarrassing mess this dude is already.

It goes on for some time along these lines. Little Ms. Fleig certainly has it in for her forefathers, but is it really her fault? Probably not. She, like most other college girls, is simply parroting what's been fed to her by her profs. Girls are good at that, which is why teachers like them so much — they're easy.

If you're the father of an American girl, is this really what you want your daughter to absorb over the course of four years? Does it add any value whatsoever to the family or to the nation?

Your money would be much better spent sending her to sewing or baking school. Let's face it: Ms. Fleig isn't going to discover the cure for cancer. Despite being an attractive young woman, she isn't going to colonize Mars, either (at her size, she'd be too expensive to launch out of the Earth's atmosphere). In all likelihood, the best she could hope for is a nonprofit or government job fully funded by her father's and brother's tax bills.

And yet she represents 60% of college students. What an enormous, unsustainable waste. It's impolitic to point it out, but from a cost-benefit point of view, in most cases higher education is entirely wasted on women, and as in Ms. Fleig's case is often counterproductive.

How The Spearhead's advice becomes "feminist"

W.F. Price · 16 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've found that some time after I point out the obvious, such as the fact that it's a bad idea for women to go out drinking around strangers, "feminists" start saying the same thing. I don't know whether they've actually seen what I've written along those lines, but it has become a pattern. Somehow, the "reactionary" stuff (i.e. common sense) that gets me called names starts coming out of feminist mouths.

Emily Yoffe, writing for Slate's explicitly feminist "double X," wrote a piece telling women that if they want to avoid sexual assault, they ought to refrain from getting smashed in the company of strange men.

> In one awful high-profile case after another—the U.S. Naval Academy; Steubenville, Ohio; now the allegations in Maryville, Mo.—we read about a young woman, sometimes only a girl, who goes to a party and ends up being raped. As soon as the school year begins, so do reports of female students sexually assaulted by their male classmates. A common denominator in these cases is alcohol, often copious amounts, enough to render the young woman incapacitated. But a misplaced fear of blaming the victim has made it somehow unacceptable to warn inexperienced young women that when they get wasted, they are putting themselves in potential peril.
>
> [...]
>
> Experts I spoke to who wanted young women to get this information said they were aware of how loaded it has become to give warnings to women about their behavior. "I'm always feeling defensive that my main advice is: 'Protect yourself. Don't make yourself vulnerable to the point of losing your cognitive faculties,' " says Anne Coughlin, a professor at the University of Virginia School of Law, who has written on rape and teaches feminist jurisprudence. She adds that by not telling them the truth—that they are responsible for keeping their wits about them—she worries that we are "infantilizing women."

Compare this to a couple passages from articles I wrote earlier this year:

> …since at least the 1970s campuses have provided an atmosphere that attracts predators. High concentrations of young women, lots of drinking and partying, and a sexually permissive atmosphere are a good cover for those who would take sex by force.
>
> [...]
>
> …those who want to minimize their chances of rape must take certain precautions, such as not going out alone amongst strangers, getting loaded, dressing like a skank and generally acting like an easy target.

One of the benefits of being out of the "mainstream" is that you don't have to worry much about what the cool kids think, so you can tell it like it is without worrying about your job. But as the above demonstrates, this is also a social benefit.

If we as a society continue along with the trend of absolving women of any responsibility for their own safety, more women will become victims. Women do derive a great deal of power from their ability to shame and cajole men into protecting them, but there are limits. Just as the wife who pushes her husband too hard and too far finds that she now has neither protection nor provision, but a ruined, exhausted man on her hands, if the women of our society fail to take on any burden at all they'll eventually find themselves all alone in a scary place.

Since the feminists won't say it themselves because they are both clueless and conformist, it's up to people like me and other men who can't be bothered to toe the line on the latest cultural fad. For this, I think we deserve some gratitude. I certainly don't expect it from the thankless lot we now have to contend with, but it's in order all the same.

In due time, I suspect that some “feminists” will even start questioning the wisdom of stuffing our universities full of young women who will gain no benefit from it.

A Response to a Fairly Reasonable, Coherent Feminist

W.F. Price · 17 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I wrote a long response to REJ, because she comes off as pretty sincere and intelligent, and decided I might as well make it a post. I don't often admit it, but in general women who call themselves "feminist" tend to be a bit higher on the IQ scale. This doesn't necessarily make them better people, and oftentimes make them worse, but in some cases it makes for better conversation. It also motivates me to attack the concept of feminism with more gusto, because it tends to do the most real damage to intelligent women who follow its false promises.

The articles I write that most strike a nerve with feminists tend to concern the work/school/life tradeoffs, such as the recent post on sending daughters to college. REJ didn't like my post, and I don't blame her. It hits educated women where it hurts. But is it really better to tell pretty lies than to make an attempt to address the abysmal fertility of intelligent, educated women, which has become a major social problem that will have repercussions for subsequent generations?

You decide:

> The overall suggestion of this post is that women are stupid & that educating them is a waste of time. You literally recommend your readers reconsider sending their female children to college… because they are stupid and it would be a waste of time.
>
> -REJ

Hi REJ, thanks for taking the time to explain yourself. If you'd been reading me for a while, you'd know that I think there are too many men in college, too. However, I think it's more of a problem for girls, and it doesn't have all that much to do with intelligence, per se, although psychological differences exacerbate it.

First, let me point out that I would not recommend sending a son to college unless he was both ambitious and smart, and most people simply are not above average in both of those measures. There are plenty of good trades in which one can earn a living without having to waste time and money in college only to find oneself competing with more driven, intelligent individuals for the scarce good jobs. I wish I'd obtained a trade degree, to be honest (I'm not particularly driven where career is concerned), so I'm going to encourage my kids to get one before they try for a BA.

Now why do I think the money isn't well spent on daughters? My own experience, partly. I look around at my college-educated, urban friends who are around my age (genX), and unless they were born into money the women are lucky to have kids by 40. This is because they were paying off student loans, putting marriage off, and trying to work their way up to a stable job first. This is a tougher route than you might think, and due to a shorter window of fertility women pay a higher toll, although we all do to be honest. When our women – especially our intelligent, competent ones – do not have the opportunity to be mothers, we all lose from it.

Maybe you don't think family is important, and that's fine. But it is to me, and many other people. It is these people I am speaking to, so if you don't like the advice, you are free to ignore it. But then if you don't care much for family, you really shouldn't care what family-oriented people choose for their children — our values simply aren't your business. You see, I feel I have a stake in what my children choose to do with their lives. You don't, really.

In addition to the decreased likelihood of grandchildren, we also have to consider that certain feminists will teach our daughters that their fathers and brothers are bad people — their oppressors. They are taught to hate the men who love them most of all, and personally I think that's pretty sick. I would never pay for my daughter to go to class and be taught to call her family and her people evil oppressors. What fool would pay for that?

> This is what the men's rights movement is sorely lacking: honest self-criticism. Instead of being ashamed of > certain statistical facts- such as men being more likely to commit violent crime (note I said more likely not solely responsible)- you should FACE the issues, or else they'll never go away.

>
> For example- you should ask yourself WHY are men more likely to commit suicide? Is it because they feel like they are not allowed to show vulnerability and therefore feel emotionally isolated? Is the pressure of traditional masculinity harmful to men these days?
>
> (note that being critical of 'masculinity' is not the same as hating men. Feminists think critically about traditional femininity all the time, such as 'does it make us weak & dependent? Does is make us shallow & materialistic? Harsh questions with harsh answers, sometimes).
> Why are men more prone to violence? What could be the root causes? How can we, as men, make changes for the better?
>
> You can BET, if women were more likely to commit violent crimes, then feminists would be on it. We would be asking questions and trying to find answers. Why can't MRAs do the same, and get your own results instead of hating us for making improvements?

REJ, you are being disingenuous. Men are more physically violent due to biology. Males are more violent in all primate species that I can think of. But males are also more selfless, magnanimous and objective. You ask why we men can't criticize ourselves… Seriously? Who invented courts of law, prisons, police, etc.? Women are less critical of violent men than men themselves. If it weren't for men, for example, OJ Simpson would be walking free with a harem of young women today (as his mainly female jury decided in his first trial).

Admit it: women cannot really criticize themselves (with the exception of some older women past childbearing years, perhaps). You can't even do it, and I can tell that you're more objective than most. Here you say "if only women were so bad and violent like you men, we'd criticize ourselves." Heh. I'm used to this kind of dodge, so it doesn't get me riled up anymore. But still, I'll indulge you and ask why, since women are more prone to deception and perjury, they don't criticize themselves for that instead? Ask any trial lawyer after a few drinks who lies more and with more skill – a man or a woman – and she'll tell you it's the latter every time. This, incidentally, is why women can indeed make good lawyers, judges and detectives — they know their own kind, far better than most men.

> If the statistics embarrass you, don't hide from them. Do something about it. And certainly don't try to twist the statistics and blame it on the eeeevil women. Like I said, if you do that, you will never find the true source of the pain that men are suffering.
> Also, think about it this way; truly happy men don't commit violent crimes. The men that are committing these crimes are suffering. They need help and if they get the help they need then it helps the victims of crime, too (keeping in mind that men are more likely to experience said violence from other men). A world without crime is the ultimate goal of humanity, no?

Wrong on a few counts here. Truly happy men do indeed commit violent crimes from time to time. We know of these people as predators and psychopaths. Some people are really, truly sick that way, and most happen to be male due to the greater male capacity and predilection for physical force. It's a statistical thing, so there are women who do the same, but in significantly smaller numbers. Typically, women provoke violence by proxy because of their relative physical frailty. A woman's strength and danger lies in her greater ability to navigate and manipulate complex social structures, as feminists regularly do in, say, Capitol Hill. The really nasty thing about female sociopaths is that they can usually hide behind the dumb oaf they put up to the job and get off scot free. This is why I do favor empowering women in many circumstances — it often takes a woman to hold another woman to account for her crimes. Most men are blind and stupid where women's schemes are concerned, and always will be (I probably would be today, too, if it weren't for circumstance).

Also, do we really want a world without crime? This is an impossible utopian dream. If one sees criminal law as a means to move us closer to the ideal, and one accepts that ideals are impossible to achieve, then it follows that a world without crime is an impossible ideal. The concept of crime, therefore, is simply a tool to shape society that can never be discarded. This is why utopian movements like feminism can end up dangerous and oppressive; the impossible quest to create the ideal society through law enforcement can criminalize so many of us that we all end up under suspicion.

As for suffering, it is a fact of life. I read a very intelligent theologian's denunciation of the Book of Job, in which a man is tormented at the whim of God, who had made a bet with Satan. The theologian argued that this is a terrible God, and hardly one worthy of worship. How could God be so cruel and cause such suffering to a good, innocent man?

But what's the alternative? Nature, in which the wolf tears the calf to shreds, children are stricken with disease, and disasters slaughter hundreds of thousands? Is there any difference at all? Suffering has its merits. Learn to live with it, and learn to embrace the cathartic nature of suffering, and you will be better prepared for the rest of your life and its end.

> And look, I normally hate it when people write long-ass posts, but I'm writing this because I care about men. When I heard a few years so that there WAS a men's rights movement, I was actually excited. I thought it would be like the male version of feminism, where you think critically as a group about the issues facing your gender (even if the truth is harsh) and genuinely try for improvement and betterment for society in general.
>
> Instead, you find articles about how women are stupid and it's a waste of time that they get AN EDUCATION. Seriously? Come on

I enjoyed your long-ass post. When I come across reasonable, sincere criticism it gives me an opportunity to think things through.

In closing, I'd like to say that I don't think college is much of an education, to be honest, and I really meant it when I said that women would be better served learning to bake or sew. But I didn't mean it in the way you think. I bake, and I consider it a valuable skill — more valuable than writing about gender theory (I would know). Did you know that the word "lady" that denotes a woman of high rank derives from a word that means "she who kneads dough?" It proves, I think, that people don't care much about women's education when they assign them to studies that have no value beyond faddish appeal. It proves that it's all just a swindle and a waste of time. Men who encourage their daughters to learn real skills are doing them more favors than those who just ship them off to college to get stuffed full of the trendy crap that dominates humanities departments.

Adios, Paul

W.F. Price · 18 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Having recently been apprised of the impending 20-20 report on the "manosphere" that is slated to run on ABC tomorrow, I thought I'd look around and see what's going on.

I was contacted by the ABC people a few months ago, and had an email exchange. I never actually spoke to any of them on the phone. Partly because I was busy with family at the time (kids were with me for summer), and partly because I don't trust TV reporters, I never went out of my way to speak with the reporter in person. After I stalled for a while and showed very little enthusiasm, they left me alone.

In the meanwhile, I talked to a writer from Portland who was doing a piece for Newsweek, and gave freely of my time and opinions. Of course we had our differences, but I liked the guy. If he really nails me in the piece, which I don't expect but may happen, the ABC people should take a lesson from him in getting people to open up.

So now that these features are coming up, it seems the subjects are getting a little anxious about it. I checked out Paul Elam's site to see what's up on AVfM, and he is in something approaching panic mode which, quite frankly, surprises me. Why? Because the material, which was pioneered in blog format by the manosphere, was provocative from the outset. I deliberately modeled The Spearhead as a sort of mirror of these radical feminist sites, even choosing a name that reflected gender war. It was cheeky, but transparently so, like Feministing and Jezebel. However, I never expected the mainstream media to ever give me the same consideration these feminists enjoy. Jessica Valenti was on Bill Clinton's staff, for heaven's sake. I'm just lucky to see my children regularly and stay out of King County jail on a month-to-month basis.

Paul, on the other hand, apparently thought that he'd get a fair shake. In addition to flying out to New York for an interview (I hope he didn't pay for the airfare), he even invited the TV people into his home. Naturally, it didn't go so well. How could he have thought it would?

Well, it seems he thought throwing the "man-o-sphere" under the bus was the ticket to respectability.

Here's a recent comment he made suggesting that they should have treated him with more respect because he "divorced" himself from the manosphere long ago:

> Paul Elam says
> October 16, 2013 at 5:25 PM
> Not surprised at all. This was a big deal to Schnee. When I told him in New York that AVFM had publicly divorced itself from the "Man-O-Sphere" a long time ago, he appeared very concerned. He kept insisting that I was "The Mayor of the Man-O-Sphere" Like he desperately wanted that to be true.
>
> http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/adios-man-o-sphere/
>
> They have their whole shtick riding on that idea.
>
> One of the things we will do come Friday is bring that old post up for people to see.
>
> These people are intentionally orchestrating lies. And lies begat lies. Hell, they even have commenters to that article trotting out the "rule of thumb" canard.

I'll admit that I'm kind of angry about this, but sometimes you have to sit back and look at the situation objectively. I've known from the beginning that Paul wanted to do his own thing. I supported it for a while, giving him a platform on The Spearhead when his site was fairly obscure. I hoped Paul's approach would work. As an unmarried man without minor children or any major obligations, I figured he was in a pretty good position to put a lot of work into his project, and he has.

I disagreed with a lot of the thrust of AVfM, but I kept my mouth shut. I wasn't happy about some of the insults he flung around and some of the targets he chose, but still I kept my peace. When he went after Jack Donovan – an interesting and intelligent guy who is, objectively speaking, a better writer than Paul – on my own site, I was pretty pissed off, but practiced discretion anyway. I reasoned that it was for the greater good. Some guys started to call bullshit a while ago. Rob Fedders, never one to shy away from speaking his mind, ripped into Paul on a few occasions. Bernard Chapin chimed in with some critique starting last year.

Despite seeing some potential problems developing, and fully realizing that Paul intended to be the pre-eminent leader in the MRM (I was actually a bit relieved by this — I've never been comfortable with the "MRA" label), I figured we could all just "go our own way," but Paul's reaction to the predictable beating he's taken at the hands of ABC has left me skeptical. If he can't even understand that he's not going to be handled with kid gloves by the mainstream media, and then attempts to throw the blame for that on the manosphere that he clearly benefited from and, more importantly, deliberately used to his advantage, the guy's got limited utility.

So, Paul, if you end up looking like a chump on 20-20, don't think you can make it all better by blaming the rest of us. That's known as "shitty leadership." I'd also throw in the terms "ingratitude" and "poor judgment."

For God's sake, you thought you'd mosey on into New York and be treated as an "equal" by these people?

Have you learned nothing?

This is the stupidity of the "MHRM" in a nutshell.

Problems or Solutions?

W.F. Price · 22 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Had a great time with my kids over the weekend, and paid no attention to the Internet. I've come to truly regret the "evergreen content" nature of so many sites. While it does keep the page views high, it detracts from quality of life and quality of content in the long run. Dalrock seems to have the right idea, but he probably has a better excuse to keep his posts infrequent than I do.

I was a bit surprised by the tone of the Newsweek article that came out on Sunday, but I got along well with the author, who is also a Northwest native and a father of two. I think it also helped that he liked my wife. An attractive, cultured woman can have a positive effect.

Some people may be curious to find I'm married. It shouldn't be so surprising; I'm a father of two young children and a family guy, not a player. I didn't mention it online (although I told a number of other bloggers in personal correspondence) for the sole reason that I didn't want anyone to harass my wife. People – often other women – can be vicious to the wives of outspoken men. That's pretty much all there is to it.

So, given what's going down in the MSM, whither men's rights?

I think the latest media episode has been something of a reality check. One of the things that drew me to the manosphere was the honesty about human nature and psychology as opposed to the wider culture's ignorance. Unfortunately, as the MRM has grown it, too, has lost some of its perspective on these eternal truths about men, women and societies.

Over the years, I've taken a lot of heat from certain quarters in the MRM. A few people really seem to dislike me for being what they call a "tradcon," which is well wide of the mark, but I suppose it encapsulates the feelings of a particularly pissed off sort of individual (I've been there myself). I wrote a post about how men cannot be mothers and shouldn't try that earned me some enmity. To me, it seems like common sense. Saying that mothers and fathers are interchangeable is akin to the transsexual movement, which incorrectly holds that being male or female is merely a state of mind, or a "preference." It also denies the unique, important things men have to offer children as fathers.

Likewise, the idea that men can somehow take an equal place alongside women in society's sympathies is unrealistic. In an article written for AVfM, Warren Farrell admitted as much himself:

> Is a Transition from "Men-as-the-Problem" to "Men's Problems" Possible?
>
> If feminism's focus is on "men-as-the-problem" is there a way to make the transition to men's problems?
>
> There's are [sic] two potential paths: one financial; the other, legal.
>
> Financial first. Lakeland Community College in Ohio, and Pierce College in Washington State, found that men's problems could get attention if couched as an issue of retention. James Shelley at Lakeland explained that the new Ohio funding formula is based on success rates, including graduation and retention. And since men are more likely to drop out, the issues putting male students at risk might be more widely considered if it meant more money from the state.
>
> Similarly, after Pierce College's Bret Burkholder elicited data from colleges throughout Washington State, and discovered male students about four times as likely to be dismissed as women at all of Washington state's colleges, he got no traction when he presented it as a male problem. It too had to be presented as a retention problem.
>
> Burkholder and Shelley face a problem similar to that faced by people trying to find a cure for AIDS. Only when it was reframed as a disease that could be also contracted by heterosexuals and women was empathy catalyzed and funding materialized.

> Learning from this, Burkholder has framed his work less as about men per se, and more, for example, as about veterans, which clears through the patriotism filter; or work with single dads, since the beneficiaries are children.
>
> This approach, while gaining traction, is still slow. As Shelley puts it, "the premise is still, 'Men are the problem," rather than "Men have problems." And this from the man who directs one of only three university men's centers. (The others are at the U of Oregon, and the Houston area Lone Star College-Kingwood, just approved in 2013). And as far as men's rights organizations with college approval, the only one I'm able to identify is the new affiliate of the National Coalition for Men at Montana State University in Bozeman.

Farrell does identify one social pathology unique to the West: the idea that "men are the problem." However, when framed alternatively as "men have problems," people are immediately turned off. There's an instinctive hostility toward men who "have problems" that, as far as I can tell, can't be switched off. This is why, when in court, fathers who have problems (e.g. unemployment, gambling, drinking) typically face punishment or contempt, while women with identical problems are given support. This is a terrible, brutal thing, but it's normal throughout the world.

So how do we deal with this dilemma? It's actually not so difficult. But first we have to reject the false dichotomy that holds men to either have problems or be problems. Instead, we should focus on the fact that men can be, and usually are, the solution to problems. Women have always known this. When a woman's car breaks down, who does she call to tow it and fix it? If her roof is leaking, who patches it up? When women want to deal with a problem, they very often go to men for help.

But it doesn't stop there. Children look to men, too. So does the larger society. Men are good problem solvers. It may be our most valuable role.

So, if you want people to give men a fair shake, the last thing you want to do is give the impression that men "have problems" or are "the problem." Not only women, but pretty much everyone, recoils from such men.

Take, for instance, the issue of single mothers. Single mothers are most assuredly a problem in society. They are expensive, hapless and often incapable of doing what it takes to raise children well alone. This is an issue that, sadly, has been successfully cast as one of men being "the problem." However, people could just as easily accept men as a solution, and would be well-disposed toward the idea — we all love to see men solving problems. How about this: fathers who take on some of the burden of childrearing are not the problem, they are the solution! But it will never work if we frame the issue as one of these fathers "having problems." Even if they do have problems – and lots of them most assuredly do – being seen as part of the solution is far better for these men and their children than being labeled problematic.

In order to create a society that is good for men and women alike, men must be given the opportunity to be the solution. Often, we find that giving a man a productive role causes his problems to go away. Take that role away, and as in the post-collapse USSR his problems multiply rapidly, and he tends to rot in place.

It is a very simple and universal concept, and one that has been applied successfully on many occasions.

So why don't we apply it today?

Part of the reason for this is simply social decay. Large, complex societies tend to create many opportunities for parasitism and predation. Feminism, as it has developed in the West, is essentially a parasitic ideology that has been enabled by a predatory political and legal class.

People have found that by repeating the "widows and orphans" line over and over while casting men as villains causes a Pavlovian sympathy reflex. Just as a delicious hamburger on a TV ad can make us salivate and give us a desire to go spend some money on a burger, showing bruised women and angry men automatically prompts people to support the women, even if they are actually feeding lawyers and professional lobbyists. Or even scam artists: Anita Sarkeesian cashed in to the tune of a couple hundred thousand dollars using exactly this technique.

Incidentally, this is why it's such a bad idea to build a men's movement around guys who come off as angry thugs who want to punch women. You might as well cut a check to the National Organization of Women yourself to expedite the inevitable.

However, just as people have grown tired of the costs of obesity brought about by indulging our reflexive responses to stimuli, the cost of illegitimacy and single motherhood is putting a strain on us as well. Obesity is partly a result of profit-seeking at the expense of national health. The epidemic of single motherhood egged on by feminist policy is hardly different. It's time to frame this issue and other social ills related to radical feminism not in terms of men being the problem or having problems, but being the solution to our problems.

It's just so reasonable that it might actually work.

On the Value of Bailing

W.F. Price · 28 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Heartiste recently wrote a post on your best option when things go wrong in your love life. He went so far as to call his advice the most important he has ever given:

> I'm about to give the best piece of advice you'll ever hear on this subject. Advice that's worked for me when I most needed it. Here it is. When you feel that sinking feeling:
>
> Leave.

I've recommended the same before, and although I agree that it's very hard to do, it's the most important and effective option men have at their disposal.

I can't stress enough how much trouble this can save men faced with an impending breakup. Heartiste framed it in a different manner. He holds that it's one of the best ways to get her back and salvage the initiative, whereas I hold it's the best way to save yourself.

For married men with children, however, this may not seem like an option, but I'd like to elaborate and explain why it's actually an even better option for them in many circumstances.

First, if you can't save yourself, you can't do a thing for your children. Remember that if being a good father is your priority. This is what I'd repeat to any fool who demands you "suck it up" or "take it like a man." Ask these people what good a broken man is to his children.

When your wife wants to get rid of you in America, she has all the tools in the world to force you out and to take all domestic property by fiat. If you resist leaving, the police will remove you for her, giving you only a few minutes to remove essentials such as a few items of clothing and personal effects like your toothbrush and razor. It's far better to preempt this and leave of your own accord. At least that way you have more time to take what you need to get by, and there's no opportunity for manufactured "incidents" that you'll have to pay an attorney to explain away in court.

Furthermore, if you disappear for a while she can't serve you with anything. This will buy you time. Maybe you can go stay with a friend, or even camp in some state park if you must (I'd recommend avoiding your parents — they will sell you out for the grandkids). Even better, take a leave of absence and flee the country for a while. While gone, she can allege whatever she wants against you, but it has no standing in court if you haven't been given the chance to defend yourself. Even protection orders are worthless if they aren't properly served. And if you're the one who ran for it, she can't accuse you of stalking or harassment, which is practically standard these days.

You might think this will hurt your chances for getting equal custody with your kids, but guess what: you won't get it anyway. Being absent will simply make it easier to avoid accusations of abuse. The courts don't really care how much time you spent with your kids before separation — the idea is simply to make the man pay taxes and court fees to support the process and all the parasites involved in it. So long as you haven't had to run the gauntlet of social workers you'll get standard visitation if you ask for it.

If you stay away long enough, your ex will start to really understand just how much she's been relying on you to handle necessities for her, even if that's exactly what made her feel so much contempt for you in the first place. When she gets a real taste of what it's like to be a single mother, she'll be begging you to come back and help her out again. But here's where you have to be strong. Don't let sentimentality get the better of you. Make her cut a deal before you resurface IRL.

In most cases, discretion is the better part of valor. In today's world, what that means for men is that they should be the ones to take the initiative and bail out when there's smoke in the cabin and the warning alarms are blaring.

It often pays to listen to the old foxes who have been in the game for decades, even if they've never been married or had children. Our complacency as family men is our greatest weakness, and a little awareness can go a long way.

Paying Bills

W.F. Price · 28 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hi readers, I'm still around but have been hustling a bit to keep the site (and my life) from defaulting. I have bills to pay not only to keep The Spearhead running, but to eat, drive, live, etc.

In case you may have wondered about it, running a site dedicated to men's issues is not particularly profitable, although it is rewarding in its own way, so I intend to keep it running as long as I'm able. However, given present circumstances, my main priority is making enough to stay afloat.

Regardless, I'll be writing more soon — I couldn't stop if I tried.

Why not tell the rapists themselves?

W.F. Price · 29 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes all the talk about rape culture leaves me scratching my head. We hear about how likely rapists are to be the guy next door, an innocent-looking college kid, etc. But for all this talk about rape, I see precious little invective directed toward real, convicted rapists. For the most part, feminists leave these guys alone to languish in obscurity.

Instead of focusing on convicted rapists, they prefer to suggest that the rest of us are somehow complicit in rape by going on about a supposed patriarchal rape conspiracy.

I'd like to burst that little bubble. There are plenty of rapists, and thanks to sex offender laws they are very easy to find. I know because I get sex offender alerts in my email from the Seattle Police Department on a frequent basis. If I want, I can check my neighborhood for rapists so as to keep an eye out for them.

So I decided to do that today, and reveal the results. I used the local post office address as "home address" in the offender search, since that's already posted on this site and doesn't reveal my home address.

Here's half the page:

	5	Non-Compliant	GEORGE FORNAH Level: Level 1 Non Compliant	5300 BLOCK OF RAINIER AV	SEATTLE	98118	Home Address
	6	Non-Compliant	JOSEPH FRAZIER Level: Level II	3000 BLOCK OF S DAWSON ST	SEATTLE	98108	Home Address
	7	Non-Compliant	LOVELESS GOODEN Level: Level III	5300 BLOCK OF S 31 AVE	SEATTLE	98108	Home Address
	8		MICHAEL JORDAN Level: Level III	4200 BLOCK OF 42 AVE S	SEATTLE	98118	Home Address
	9	Non-Compliant	RICHARD BEARD Level: Level II	4200 BLOCK OF RAINIER AVE S	SEATTLE	98118	Home Address
	10		CHARLES SWEENEY Level: Level III	2800 BLOCK OF S HUDSON ST	SEATTLE	98114	Home Address

I didn't select for race of perp; the first half is essentially the same in that regard, and I couldn't fit all onto the same screen on a laptop. However, I did choose on the basis of names, because "Joseph Frazier," "Loveless Gooden" and "Michael Jordan" are more memorable rapist names than usual.

Altogether, there are eleven convicted sex offenders in a half mile radius from the local post office. Any feminist in the US could do the same search (I assume all states have some version of this offender database).

The young Joe Frazier has been convicted of rape in the second degree, Loveless of what I'd guess is pimping underage girls (communication with minor for immoral purposes), and Michael Jordan of third degree rape.

Charles Sweeney, one of two white sex offenders in the area, got busted for having sex with a fourteen-year-old girl and videotaping the act.

From what feminists write, you'd think most of the local rapists would be privileged patriarchal types. You know, well-heeled businessmen and college boys who are accustomed to rape sprees to hold women down and exercise their patriarchal privilege. But for some reason, that doesn't seem to be the pattern I'm seeing here. Now, you may say that this doesn't look like a very nice neighborhood, but in fact it isn't all that bad, and is above average nationally, and right around average for Seattle in terms of income. The only "privileged" sex offender I could find in a two mile radius from my house was an older man on Mercer Island who got busted for exposing himself in public places, and that's only one out of dozens. By far most of the guys look like they never had any privilege to speak of, and now they almost certainly never will.

The thing is, the typical narrative we hear from feminists about rape is a lie. When they say things like "men are responsible for rape," what they fail to specify is that it is a certain type of man who is responsible, and it isn't the kind of guy they are talking to. Rather, it is exactly the kind of man a woman would be well-advised to avoid provoking by dressing like a slut in his presence, or by getting drunk or going out alone where he might happen to come across her. Most of us guys have absolutely nothing to do with these types. We have no control over them. Shaming us doesn't make a damn bit of difference as to whether they will rape a woman or not.

Rape hysteria serves one purpose, and one purpose only: inculcation of guilt. Because a few degenerates like Joseph Frazier and Charles Sweeney commit crimes, we all must do penitence. We all must apologize and pay, merely because we happen to share our sex in common with them.

But would feminists ever accept it if we were to say that all women who abuse or neglect their children or steal from their families and wreck homes implicate all women? Of course not. They'd say these women have problems. That they are not representative of all women, and that it would be unfair to paint all women with the same brush.

If that's true, then the same goes for rape and sex offenses. From now on, whenever a feminist goes on about "rape culture" and such, I think I'll ask why she's wasting her words on us, and not the rapists themselves.

Besides the Accuser, Who's to Blame in Athens False Rape Accusation?

W.F. Price · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This hubbub about the Athens Ohio sex tape largely escaped my attention. I had a busy couple of weeks, and although I heard about it and skimmed a few comments on it, I mentally tuned it out because the combination of the words "rape" and "Ohio" have become so tiresome and repetitive over the last year or so. When you've read enough of this stuff, it all just runs together into one big, screaming rape obsession.

However, on reviewing the case today, I found that there are some interesting and new aspects to it. For one thing, there's video, and in addition a grand jury made it pretty clear that the accusation was, in fact, false. Feminists are still sticking their fingers in their ears and hollering "RAPE!", naturally, but this time it's just making them look like idiots.

However, a few of us aren't coming out of this looking too hot, either. It seems that Peter made the national news by republishing some 4chan speculation that the girl involved is some sorority girl named Rachel who bears a passing resemblance to the girl who was enjoying some oral in public on that fateful night.

Sigh…

First, anonymous is just as quick to jump the gun on alleged male rapists as it is on false rape accusers. It's a lynch mob mentality that we really ought to avoid for obvious reasons. If it can be turned against a girl, it can also be turned against a boy, after all. There's no justice in this kind of thing.

I am very skeptical about the allegations that this Rachel had anything to do with it. I feel pretty bad for her. Getting slandered for the first time sucks, badly. When it happened to me in my divorce it pretty much knocked the wind out of me. I trust it did the same to you, Peter. Think about that. Don't amplify the pain; try to rectify injustice. I'm growing tired of seeing a process I helped set into motion descend into barbarism. Yes, what men have been subjected to is barbaric, but given some of the rhetoric that's been going around I'm starting to wonder whether the proposed cure is much better than the disease.

However, if you can't find the accuser, and you really want to train your guns on a worthwhile target, why not aim them at the woman who encouraged this false accusation as part of her campus activism? A woman with far more authority than any sorority girl or undergrad inebriate copulating on the avenue in plain sight (for the record, I'd guess the accuser is a budding alcoholic, and she will pay dearly over her life for her problem).

According to A Voice for Male Students, Dean of Students Jenny Hall-Jones, an outspoken feminist, has been indoctrinating students in the false dogma of "rape culture" and tweeting indignant, sarcastic responses to the article in The Atlantic that wisely counseled young women to avoid getting drunk.

Instead of wasting our time attacking some girl who is probably entirely innocent, we should be asking why Ms. Hall-Jones, who apparently thinks there's nothing wrong with female students getting drunk, has such an important job at Ohio University. Doesn't she bear some responsibility for this incident? If the girl's inebriation contributed to her shameful exhibitionism, and her dogma about "rape culture" convinced the girl to make a false accusation, the dean should be fired, if only for liability reasons.

You'd think a responsible Dean of Students would care about her female students, and encourage them to drink responsibly if at all. She would also refrain from creating an atmosphere of hysteria that could incriminate innocent male and female students alike. On the one hand, she encourages problematic behavior, and then offers a witch-hunt as a solution to the inevitable fallout. What an awful choice for dean. And still the feminists have the nerve to tell me there's something wrong with my skepticism about the value of college for our daughters…

Let's drop this worthless speculation about some young woman who, in all likelihood, didn't hurt a fly and aim for bigger game. I don’t care if acting like a madman gets us more attention; it’s really pretty selfish to give the opposition a tool they can use to bludgeon us in the public sphere for the sole purpose of gaining a few thousands of page views.

Teen Girl Achieves Amazing Success by Ignoring 50 Years of Feminism

W.F. Price · 30 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A Georgia girl named Maya Van Wagenen, who at the age of 13 found herself socially anxious at a new school, picked up Betty Cornell's Glamour Guide for Teens, an etiquette book published in 1951, and used it as her blueprint for popularity. It worked, and she documented the process with a diary, which she recently sold to Penguin for $300,000. But it doesn't end there. Dreamworks, always on the lookout for material that will have broad appeal, made a deal with her to make a film out of the book. At 15 years old, she is the youngest non-actor to make a feature film deal with Dreamworks.

I find this pretty amusing, because it proves that traditional femininity, all the rage in the 1950s due to the adoption of a conservative, Freudian philosophy as the guiding standard for family life at the time, gets a girl farther than adopting a defiant, hostile and unattractive feminist stance.

The 1950s were far from perfect. There were clearly a lot of kinks that needed to be worked out, such as the problem of economically unproductive housewives, and Freud's ideas were based in large part on faulty assumptions, but it was closer to the ideal than the contemporary setup.

Media outlets are gushing over Ms. Van Wagenen, but the material in the etiquette book would give feminists fits. For example, girls are urged to wear a girdle and white gloves and learn to do tricks with strands of pearls (I have no idea what that means, but I assume it's innocent). There must be a little more to it than fashion (maybe not much), as the book also recommends being "open, honest and kind."

I looked the book up on Amazon, and found a couple reviews. According to one hefty feminist, it is "fascinatingly awful." Another writes "If you are a teenage girl, this book tells you that you better be skinny with perfect hair and make-up."

Then, I found a review on a website called "Embarrassing Treasures" that includes a few more quotes and some background on author Betty Cornell. It turns out that Cornell had been a big girl when young, and her advice revolves in large part around keeping a trim figure. To do that, she advocates what loks like a low-carb diet:

> Sample Menus for Weight Control
>
> Breakfast: Half a grapefruit, 1 poached egg on rye or whole wheat toast with small amount of butter, 1 glass of milk.
>
> Lunch: Small container of cottage cheese, fresh fruit, any kind of lean meat sandwich, consommé, milk
>
> Dinner: 1 glass of tomato juice, generous serving of broiled calf's liver, serving of cooked carrots, tomato and lettuce salad with lemon juice, fruit Jello, milk.

Cornell on identifying fattening foods:

> If you don't know what foods are fattening, ask your chubby friends, because they will know.

Here's why she recommends a girdle:

> Even a teen with a trim figure needs to coax her curves a bit when it comes to wearing slim skirts and slacks. To me there is nothing more repellent than a protruding fanny or a bulging tummy marring the outline of a narrow silhouette.

So much for the "changing beauty standards" fantasy feminists go on about.

Although it's tempting for me to write this stuff off as trivial, I can't think of anything that so clearly demonstrates the utter failure of feminism better than the enormous success and accolades that have fallen into young Maya Van Wagenen's lap.

Eat your heart out, feminists.

Terry McAuliffe Hates Fathers

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 31 October 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This year there is an election for governor in the state of Virginia. The two main candidates are Terry McAuliffe, the Democrat, and Ken Cuccinelli, the Republican. Terry McAuliffe is known for being a major Democratic party fundraiser and has a long history of questionable business dealings. McAuliffe has no real platform, so his campaign has resorted to using the mythical "war on women" to attack Cuccinelli with most of his attacks focused on abortion and birth control.

Invoking the nonexistent "war on women" is par for the course for Democrats. What is unique about the McAuliffe campaign's use of this tactic is that they are trying to connect Cuccinelli to fathers' rights groups. Here is an example:

The "leader" of the fathers' rights movement that Cuccinelli was representing was Ron Gringnol Jr., a former Virginia House of Delegates candidate, who was in a custody dispute with his ex-wife. Cuccinelli only "took time off" from being Attorney General because he was closing out the case from his private practice before being Attorney General, and the case was scheduled to be in court two weeks after he was sworn in as AG of Virginia. What this boils down to is that Cuccinelli was simply representing a man who wanted to see his children. He was representing a man who wanted to be a father to his children.

Terry McAuliffe does not understand men who want to be fathers to their kids since he doesn't care about being a father. When one of his kids was being born, McAuliffe left his wife in the hospital to attend a fundraiser for the Democratic Party. When McAuliffe's son Peter was born, McAuliffe stopped for another fundraiser while taking his wife and his newborn son home from the hospital. When McAuliffe's son Jack was being born, McAuliffe thought it was more important to argue with the anesthesiologist and obstetrician involved with his son's birth about socialized medicine than to just be there for his wife and newborn son.

While it's clear that Terry McAuliffe hates fathers to the point of not caring about being a father to his own kids, the views of his supporters on fathers are worse. The graphic shown above was posted to facebook, and here is the response from one of McAuliffe's supporters:

> I do not know him personally but any man who would delve into a woman's issue such as child bearing and raising children is obviously insane.

This woman is saying that any man who wants to be a father to their children is insane. She believes that fatherhood should not exist (although it's safe to assume that she doesn't want to give up the gravy train of men paying child support).

To cover up McAuliffe's deficiencies as a candidate for governor, his campaign has run the most anti-father (and anti-male) campaign in American history. Polls currently show that McAuliffe has a very comfortable lead over Cuccinelli. While there are other issues involved such as the recent government shutdown, this shows that McAuliffe's anti-father bigotry resonates with a section of the electorate. The end result of McAuliffe getting elected will be than even more young men will decide that it's too dangerous to become a father and to go their own way.

Do Poor People Deserve Children?

BC Dad · 3 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Do poor people deserve to have children? That's the question posed by Senior Policy Analyst Dr. Mijin Cha at Demos.org recently.

One might anticipate that a woman as well-credentialed as Dr. Cha would easily bring vital, cutting edge, and razor-sharp analytical tools to this query, but alas, her article serves instead as a reminder of the irrational populism which all too frequently characterizes the collective hive-mind.

The word deserve is defined as 'to be worthy, fit, or suitable for some reward.' In that sense, the question as posed is a non-starter, based on an irrelevant premise. Are children a reward? If so, for what? Who judges? Who sets the standard? The word does however serve to elicit sympathy – if poor people 'deserve' children, then they are without question victims, when circumstances such as poverty negate the possibility. Further, the unspoken assumption is that some one or some thing is responsible for alleviating the unjust suffering of these poor souls.

If one recognizes that the decision to have a child rests primarily upon the whims of the child-bearing half of humanity, then a re-statement of Dr. Cha's thesis might be in order, to wit; 'poor women deserve to have children.'

Why? According to Dr. Cha, it's because the SNAP (food stamp) program helps a lot more people than just hungry moms and kids, it helps people with disabilities too. Furthermore, there is little or no fraud in the SNAP program. Therefore poor women deserve to have children. (Yes, dear reader, the absence of logic is profoundly disturbing).

Plus, 'people refuse to let go of the image of the Cadillac Welfare Queen in all her racially tinged glory.' In other words, poor women deserve to have children because you're racist if you don't agree.

According to Dr. Cha, we are all slaves to the idea that poor people have only themselves to blame for their poverty. The reality, she claims, is that 'people are working hard, in fact harder than ever, and still can't make ends meet.' This might very well be true, however she doesn't mention whether or not these hardworking people include some, most, all or none of the moms collecting SNAP. Dr. Cha is conflating two groups, those who are 'working harder than ever' and those who are 'poor and deserve to have children,' without demonstrating any particular connection between the two or providing any substantiating evidence.

One point which seems reasonable on its face is that 'Our economic system takes the benefits of the work of many to enrich the few.' There is almost certainly some substance to this argument: children are unaffordable because some employment is unjust. Unfortunately, Dr. Cha's solution simply applies an almost identical injustice: let's take from the many (citizens who earn a taxable income) and give to the few (the poor who deserve children).

Last but not least: if you the reader don't agree that poor people deserve to have children, then you the reader are a raving lunatic with a morally repulsive mentality. That's right; YOU are the problem (and probably a racist too, don't forget).

Dr. Cha's arguments consist of straw men, ad hominem attacks, irrelevant evidence, unsupported generalizations, an absence of recognizable logic, and most importantly, a complete failure to bring her assumptions and conclusions into the light for critical examination. Based on this work at least, a PhD ain't what it used to be.

Her arguments also clearly transgress the boundaries of rationalism: they are indicative of a collectivist mentality which is profoundly female, based as it is on emotions, guilt-trips, false accusations and shaming. But the ultimate and totalitarian consequence of her position is even more disturbing: Dr Cha is openly promoting an increase in the use of force; yet more violence by the state against its own citizens. Accommodating the poor who want children (if we accept the premise that they 'deserve' it) can only be accomplished by forcibly seizing the property, and the very labor, of other citizens. Which is the greater injustice?

It is worth noting that in the past, many citizens voluntarily contributed their time, their energy, their property, their labor and indeed their very lives for the benefit of hungry moms and kids. These people were called husbands and dads. State violence against productive citizens (still mostly men) has replaced the voluntary contributions of those same men, and the collectivist demands of falsely-empowered females are the largest reason for this shift.

A quick read through the Demos.org website reveals that 'Demos is a public policy organization working for an America where we all have an equal say in our democracy and an equal chance in our economy.' It is apparent that 'equal say' and 'equal chance' are in fact synonyms for 'equal outcome.'

Demos is funded by the Rockefeller Foundation, the Rockefeller Brothers, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, and the Kresge Foundation, among others.

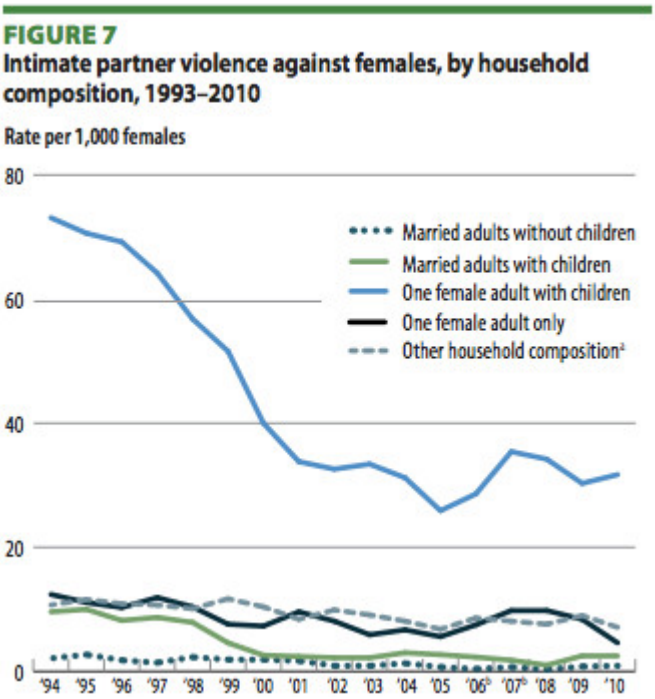
How to drastically lower domestic violence

W.F. Price · 4 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As I delve even further into statistics, the incredible social irresponsibility of standard Western feminist policies becomes ever clearer. Last week, I demonstrated that forcible rapes and sexual assaults of all sorts could be substantially reduced merely by ensuring that children's fathers have the opportunity to protect them.

However, I wouldn't have expected that this also had another, important implication: women who stay with their husbands are far less likely to be victims of domestic violence than those who go it alone.

It turns out that the safest place for women of all is in the marital home, living with their husbands. This goes for women with or without children, and the differences are dramatic. A single mother living alone with her children is almost thirteen times as likely to be a victim of domestic violence as a married mother. Married women without children at home are safest of all; their risk is about 3% that faced by single mothers and 10% that of single, childless women.



The highest risk group is separated women — those who choose to end their marriages. I'm sure the risk during separation is real, but I'd also be a bit wary of those statistics, because accusations fly during separation and divorce procedures, and this surely drives up the numbers somewhat.

However, in all "stable" household situations, it's indisputable that single mothers are at highest risk.

So, it seems that the typical battered woman is not an oppressed, timid wife in a patriarchal household, but an "empowered single mother." The typical batterer is not a controlling husband, but a badboy lover. The conclusion we can easily draw from the above is that the best way to protect women from domestic violence is to ensure that as many women as possible are in stable marriages living with their husbands under the same roof.

How often do we hear of this reality from feminist domestic violence advocates? Hardly ever. In fact, their primary goal seems to be to create as many single mothers as possible, which will necessarily drive up the rate of domestic violence by putting women in unsafe situations. Feminists are more concerned with removing women and children from safe places and tossing them into circumstances that, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, are clearly dangerous.

Why is it that feminists have so little concern for the average woman? Why do they pursue policies that endanger women and children even as they claim to be their saviors?

The shameful answer to those questions is that it is politically profitable. By creating problems then posing as the savior, they guarantee themselves a position of some importance. It is akin to the doctor who deliberately poisons people to increase his business and enhance his reputation as a healer.

There's really only one way to deal with these people: expose them for the frauds they are. It's time for men to stop handing responsibility for family affairs off to people whose only interest is in helping themselves. We must point out the obvious implications of ruinous family policy, and in the meanwhile ignore the hollow accusations feminists so casually toss around. Turn those accusations back on them. If they call you part of the "abuse lobby," point out that feminist anti-family policy is responsible for far more violence against women than you could be if you attacked a different woman every day for the rest of your life.

Accusations and arguments over responsibility aside, it's truly sad that the solutions to these things we have been arguing over for years are so simple and self-evident, yet so widely ignored. Again, we can see that women and children are safest with men who love them, yet we expend our efforts in attempts to drive them apart.

What's worse for children than a single mother household? A double mother household

W.F. Price · 4 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Although it used to be common knowledge that children do best in a stable home environment with both biological parents, a number of popular writers and magazines have asserted that gay couples are just as good at parenting, and in the case of lesbians even better.

A study out of Canada casts serious doubt on these assertions. According to University of Texas Austin Professor Mark Regnerus, out of all households, children of lesbian couples have the worst outcomes:

> While in the US Census same-sex households have to be guessed at based on the gender and number of self-reported heads-of-household, young adults in the Canadian census were asked, "Are you the child of a male or female same-sex married or common law couple?" While study author and economist Douglas Allen noted that very many children in Canada who live with a gay or lesbian parent are actually living with a single mother—a finding consonant with that detected in the 2012 New Family Structures Study—he was able to isolate and analyze hundreds of children living with a gay or lesbian couple (either married or in a "common law" relationship akin to cohabitation).
>
> So the study is able to compare—side by side—the young-adult children of same-sex couples and opposite-sex couples, as well as children growing up in single-parent homes and other types of households. Three key findings stood out to Allen:
>
> > children of married opposite-sex families have a high graduation rate compared to the others; children of lesbian families have a very low graduation rate compared to the others; and the other four types [common law, gay, single mother, single father] are similar to each other and lie in between the married/lesbian extremes.
>
> Employing regression models and series of control variables, Allen concludes that the substandard performance cannot be attributed to lower school attendance or the more modest education of gay or lesbian parents. Indeed, same-sex parents were characterized by higher levels of education, and their children were more likely to be enrolled in school than even those of married, opposite-sex couples. And yet their children are notably more likely to lag in finishing their own schooling.
>
> The same is true of the young-adult children of common law parents, as well as single mothers and single fathers, highlighting how little—when you lean on large, high-quality samples—the data have actually changed over the past few decades. The intact, married mother-and-father household remains the gold standard for children's progress through school. What is surprising in the Canadian data is the revelation that lesbian couples' children fared worse, on average, than even those of single parents.

That children of lesbian couples do even worse than children of single mothers has sobering implications. It definitely brings up ethical issues concerning sperm donation (would you want your own flesh and blood raised in that environment?), but it also demonstrates how reckless our cultural elites are being when they tinker with proven models of the family.

It seems that the welfare of children is of scarce importance when it comes to making a point about "equality," no matter how much of a stretch it is. In fact, the more equality points any given deviation from tradition and the norm can score them, the more children they are willing to sacrifice.

It makes God's test of Abraham look positively humane in comparison.

Mark Judge to Feminists: You Have Daddy Issues

W.F. Price · 5 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In a review of The Book of Jezebel, a book written by various contributors to the eponymous in-your-face feminist online magazine, Mark Judge takes issue with feminist rage, and suggests that the real problem is that these women (and many men) had lousy fathers for one reason or another.

> Deep down, America is a very angry country because of missing, absent, and lousy fathers. The social science is clear and unambiguous about the devastation the loss of fathers causes in terms of drug abuse, promiscuity and loss of self-esteem among young people. The psychological and emotional wounds go very deep. More than twenty years ago the poet Robert Bly argued in his bestseller Iron John than the loss of fathers has caused a tremendously debilitating and long-lasting psychic wound in America, and that a lot of what passed for political activism was often an attack on absent fathers. According to Bly, the 60s students who stormed the dean's office were lashing out at fathers whose wimpiness, stoicism, or distant jobs made them strangers. (Of course, there are awful mothers out there, but in general over the last few decades it has been men who have failed the children that they have brought into the world.) Bly, no conservative — in fact he's a champion of genuine feminism — indicted not only male irresponsibility but the Industrial Revolution, which separated fathers from their families. He also criticized warmongering and the punishing demands of consumer capitalism.
>
> I bring up Bly because when reading The Book of Jezebel you are confronted not just with humor and a high level of intelligence, but deep, deep rage. Not anger — rage. It goes much deeper than politics, although in modern America politics is where this rage find its expression. Thus the malevolence towards "dead white males" and the liberal obsession with feelings and personal grievance. The bogus "war on women" is really nothing but liberal women acting out against bad fathers. The frightening thing about this rage is that it is insatiable even as it demands resolution through politics. Before the 1960s and the disintegration of the family, a political revolutionary would map out his plan for correcting the flaws he saw in the political system. Today's radicals speak in tones that are more personal. Their opponents are not just wrong, or obstacles to get past to attain better living conditions — they are evil, they are guilty, and they are personally culpable for screwing our lives up. Politics can't cure this wound.

I sympathize with Judge's position, and it's one that deserves a lot of consideration, but if we are going to get deep into the psychology of man hatred and rage at fathers, maybe we ought to look at another recent example.

I'm thinking of postwar Germany, in which the crisis sparked by the loss of WWII created a generational backlash against everything German. European radicalism was most extreme in Germany in the 1970s, when postwar children came of age. Hatred of one's forefathers and German men in general was standard, and continued for decades up to, perhaps, a decade or so ago.

I remember walking on the beaches of Normandy as a boy, fascinated by the battlefield relics, the history and drama of the invasion that had occured some 40 years before. Along with me and my family was a youngish German woman; a friend of the family who had come along for some reason or another (I can't remember why). At one point, I found a spent 8mm Mauser cartridge in a field and, highly excited, raised it for everyone to see. It was a genuine artifact of WWII, and as a boy I considered it a great find.

The German was not happy. She looked uncomfortable and pained, and told me "it is better to forget about these things — you should put it back." Being a fairly dutiful and obedient boy, I reluctantly tossed my little treasure back on the ground, grumbled a bit and kicked some sand. At the time, I thought she was just being a bad sport. Sure, my grandpa's team may have won the war, but it's over now, I reasoned.

A few years later in high school, back home in the US, I had another, similar experience. One of my teachers was a German woman, and we were debating the Gulf War. She and another student held that the US wasn't prepared to win a war in the desert. I said that was nonsense. Hadn't the allies beaten Rommel in North Africa, after all? My teacher sadly conceded the point, and then, much to my surprise, started weeping. I was mightily embarrassed, and although I resented her emotional outburst, I couldn't help but feel a bit guilty.

With the benefit of hindsight, I can understand a little better where these women were coming from. Their fathers' shame became their own. In Germany it was particularly acute, but the same principle operates everywhere. We say that it is wrong to hold children responsible for the sins of their fathers, but whether or not it is fair, it's inevitable, just like the Good Book says.

When I see angry feminists, I don't see women whose fathers were mean, neglectful or abusive, although in some cases I'm sure they were. Instead, what lies behind their anger toward their fathers, and men in general, is that they were weak. They were ineffectual, losers, victims, and so on. They were beaten men.

Judge seems to miss the fact that as you go down the ranks of American society, contempt for men increases. At the top, we have daughters of billionaires and powerful politicians. They seem to be well-adjusted as far as relations with men are concerned. They love their daddies, they are devoid of rage, and for the most part they go on to have stable marriages and families of their own.

Go down to the middle class, and there's a great deal more ambivalence. By the time you get to the ghettoes, trailer parks, barrios and reservations of the US, hatred for men permeates the atmosphere. Few of these women bother to even marry the men in their communities. They use phrases like "good for nothing" to describe them. Black female literature, The Color Purple to name one example, often portrays black men as the lowest form of humanity. Is it any wonder that Jezebel founder Anna Holmes – a black woman – has such a virulent hatred for men? This is the true and most painful legacy of slavery in the US.

It is in women's nature to love strength and despise weakness in men. A generation of weak, defeated fathers will create a great deal of anger and disgust in daughters.

So perhaps we can look at the debacle of Vietnam as the catalyst for modern feminism. A generation of American men who "lost" a war and returned in disgrace primed the women for a long rebellion. It doesn't matter that it wasn't American men's fault, or that circumstances were beyond their control; it just happened that way.

As feminism went into full bloom and women were further empowered, a positive feedback loop was created. Men were divorced and dispossessed by their wives, replaced in the workforce, removed from the family home, etc. This may not have affected every level of society, but it did a lot of damage nonetheless.

The women of my generation – those who wrote the Book of Jezebel – are the children of those times. Our fathers weren't perfect, but for the most part they weren't all that bad, either. Their "sin" was their weakness and loss of power, and that's what is really behind all the feminist rage and acting out.

Prostitution and the Internet Effect

W.F. Price · 6 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A study showing that fewer men are paying for sex came out recently, prompting some to wonder what's going on and others to doubt the results. What I find interesting is that women do not seem all that happy about the results, but rather a bit put off or skeptical.

My gut tells me there's some truth to the study. I remember the streetwalker culture from the 80s and 90s, when previous studies found that around 20% of men admitted to paying for sex, and it just isn't the same as it used to be. Even strip clubs have declined considerably, and they would be a good place to start if you want to find out how prevalent prostitution is today.

Some suggest that the apparent decline in prostitution is a result of online porn, and others that it's because fewer men are in the military. I'd guess the former is more accurate than the latter, but there's more to it than that.

Due to the vast numbers of desperate single mothers out there and the very easy ability to hook up online, guys just don't have to pay up front these days. In other words, dating sites have pulled the rug out from under the traditional prostitution business.

I see it as similar to the collapse of the music industry when file sharing became common. Why buy the CD when you can go online and, with a little effort, find it for free?

Think about the vast possibilities a guy has today compared to the early 90s. Back then, you had to actually leave the house to meet women. You had to spend money at a club or bar, dress well and make sure you smelled pleasant. It was all so much more effort. If you weren't into that rigamarole, you'd hire a hooker. Today, you can fire up the computer in your sweatpants and a t-shirt and browse women online. If your standards aren't too high (and most guys who visited hookers in the past didn't have particularly high standards), there's bound to be some lonely single mom desperate for attention waiting for some man – any man – to show interest in her.

If all you're looking to do is get laid without expending too much effort, it's a lot easier than it used to be. And that's pretty much what guys used to pay hookers for.

I can understand why women don't want to accept this. It's kind of degrading to know that some guy looking for quick, no-strings-attached sex can get it for free. One can't escape the feeling that it would be more considerate of him to hand her a few hours' pay.

Actually, I don't like it much myself. When I browsed some dating sites and looked at the profiles, seeing the vast numbers of unattached single mothers in my vicinity (I'd have called it my community, but the word "community" is fast becoming an anachronism), I felt a bit depressed by it all. It's like peering behind the curtains and seeing a desultory scene of misery and incompetence. There they are, free for the taking, and nobody wants them for more than a quick lay. In comparison, prostitution at least has a certain dignity.

This brings up an interesting question: is it ethically more acceptable to pump and dump a hapless single mother or to pay a hooker for convenient sex? Despite having once been staunchly opposed to prostitution, I'm beginning to think it's the latter, and wonder why we continue to criminalize prostitution when the social effects are so much milder than the epidemic of illegitimacy. It's backward thinking that holds that free sex is somehow on a higher moral plane. Naturally speaking, there never has been anything free about sex; every species on earth pays a price for it in one manner or another. And I worry that we will indeed pay a heavy price for what's going on, if not as individuals, as a society.

Perhaps the market will adjust, as the publishing and recording industries have recently begun to adjust to the new digital reality. Maybe, like newspapers, women will stop giving it up for free, and require cash or commitment up front once again. But given the numbers, that probably won't happen anytime soon. There are just too many of these women out there — there's too much competition.

It’s both ironic and sad to see how the destruction of traditional norms, promoted every step of the way by feminists, has so devalued women’s sexuality that they are reduced to unpaid whores.

Millennial employment stats presage economic doom

W.F. Price · 7 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I was looking over some economic stats on young Americans, AKA "millennials," and they look awful. Much is made of the tendency of young Americans to still be living at home with their parents (40% of young men), but I don't see that as the biggest problem. It's more a symptom of the underlying disease.

The real bad news is in the employment numbers. Of young Americans from ages 18-29, only 43% are employed full time, and this is despite dropping marriage and fertility rates. Although my employment record was on and off until I was in my early 20s, after that I never went for more than a couple months or so without a job until the recession. Jobs were pretty easy to find. Since then, something has changed fundamentally in the economy and the way people are hired. It used to be that you could walk right in wherever there was a "help wanted" sign and get a job on the spot. I don't see those signs much these days, and the employment process has become extraordinarily tedious and convoluted. You have to present an impeccable resume, go through credit checks and provide references to drive a truck these days. Forget about getting an office job without an embellished resume and a college degree (which less than 20% of millennials have).

Businesses have gone from hiring healthy young people to trying their best to keep them out. I sometimes hear grumbling about age discrimination from older workers, but I think these people are complaining a bit too much. Look at the stats and it's pretty clear that it isn't the old who are being passed over, but the young.

This is going to be an enormous problem, because low earnings in youth tends to mean low earnings later in life. The poverty of America's younger generation all but guarantees that there won't be enough of an economy to support the socialist programs that are keeping the US from falling apart at the seams. Given the size of the US, there will be no easy fix. Immigration – even the selective kind that allows only wealthy immigrants – will not do the trick, and may exacerbate the problem even more than it already has.

Some say this means that people won't be able to retire at 65, but this is already part of the problem. Older workers are keeping jobs that should be open to people in their 20s or 30s. In fact, labor force participation has grown only for men older than 55, and women over 45.

Consider that the peak baby boom years were in the mid 50s, after which the boom started to tail off in the early 60s. These peak boomers will be hitting retirement age en masse by 2020, and for most of the 2020s millions will retire every year. The loss of income that represents simply cannot be made up given millennials' prospects. Entire sectors of the economy will collapse, and health care expenses for aging boomers will be a crippling social cost.

Of course, nobody really knows what the fallout from all this will be, but I think we can make a few predictions:

- The real-estate market will tank, badly.
- Immigration will be restricted as the reality of paying for millions of unemployable single mothers with anchor babies hits the budget hard.
- There will be increasing support for "assisted suicide" to dispose of the inconvenient elderly.
- Traditional professions such as law and medicine will contract as services are no longer affordable to most Americans.
- Prison and police budgets will be cut, and crime will rise as a direct result of this. In some places (northern cities), crime will rise significantly; in others (rural midwest), not so much.
- Education budgets will be hit hard, and we will see, for the first time in a long while, a serious decline in primary school standards, particularly in heavily Hispanic regions, which will become de facto foreign territory. Illiteracy will rise to levels unseen in decades.

I'm sure there's much more to it, but it really doesn't look like the good times are going to come back again any time soon.

So what are the implications for men? Although our standard of living will probably continue to decline, our relative status will likely rise. Without public largesse to rely on, women will start to think twice about ejecting husbands. However, I can see women becoming a lot more materialistic. For comfortable middle-aged guys with good jobs, finding a significantly younger girlfriend won't be too hard. As is the case in much of the world, younger men are going to have to learn how to "share" their girlfriends.

As for the awful family law that's still on the books, I doubt they'll repeal it, but I'd imagine that enforcement is going to be a lot less vigorous than it used to be. This cuts both ways, because women who violate court orders will get away with it even more than they do now, but on the other hand men will have a bit more leverage in custody disputes if women know that courts won't be as strict on them.

All in all, it looks like we're in for a pretty crappy couple of decades, at the very least. It's shameful to see what a raw deal young men are getting today compared to their parents, but corruption, selfishness, incompetence and greed are just facts of life.

Obamacare and child support

W.F. Price · 7 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the implications of Obamacare that I should have paid a little more attention to is the child support enforcement system. In a previous article, I mentioned that Obamacare will effectively extend child support to the age of 26 through the parental insurance provision. Judges will doubtless use the new law to justify ordering men to continue to pay for their children's insurance until the option expires. Anyone who thinks this is an exaggeration should spend an afternoon in family court.

However, I never took into account the fact that child support enforcement and welfare, being essentially tied together, will now have to be integrated with Obamacare into one big mess.

I found that out recently when attempting to pay some child support. While I used to be able to pay with a separate account that wasn't tied to other agencies, they are all being integrated now, and it's a big clusterf down at WA DSHS. There's no way to figure it out for now, and the phone lines are all jammed. I just hope I don't get my license revoked in the meanwhile.

What's behind this giant Obamacare mess is the ill-conceived idea to push a paper system online when the vast majority of public sector workers – including the politicians themselves – don't know the next thing about managing databases, encryption, website maintenance, online transactions, etc. It all sounds so nice and easy in theory: you have a simple, automated system anyone can use online. But that isn't how it works in the real world — especially not a real world that includes over 300 million Americans. In order for the system to work properly, it would have to be incredibly complex to respond quickly and correctly to all the changes in circumstance, errors, court orders, prescriptions and so on.

Just running this blog as a fully-hosted WordPress installation is quite a task sometimes (I'll probably have to overhaul it soon), and I don't have to deal with many variables at all compared to, say, a medical clinic.

So, naturally, there are problems with healthcare.gov. Big problems. I suppose anyone who has worked in IT should have been able to see this coming, but I doubt many of us considered the broader implications, such as integrating child support enforcement and state welfare agencies. But how about fraud? This is going to be a real killer. Intelligent, technologically capable people with no scruples will be able to manipulate this monstrous system for all sorts of nefarious purposes. If someone doesn't get on the ball, this is going to turn into a looting fest we haven't seen since the former Soviet Union fell apart in the 90s.

America, get ready to get ripped off.

Come the Revolution

BC Dad · 10 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It seems clear from the attention recently directed toward the M(H)RM, its flagship websites, and its spokesmen, that a significant number of people are being motivated to at least take a look and see what all the fuss is about. This fact alone informs us that more and more people perceive the existence of a problem and (hopefully) want to find a solution they can be part of.

The problems have been thoroughly described and well-analyzed – no mystery there, although they bear considerable further dissemination, discussion and publicity.

But what's the solution?

Dr. Gene Sharp's 1993 book From Dictatorship to Democracy offers extensive advice on the most successful methods for deposing an illicit system and substituting something more reasonable in its place. Although he casts the struggle primarily (though not exclusively) as one of freedom-loving democracy-seekers in their fight against totalitarian dictatorships, in truth the M(H)RM might well take some lessons from his work.

It is probably wisest to avoid terms such as 'revolution,' 'rebellion,' 'overthrow' and 'deranged despots,' but there is no doubt that those most heavily engaged in the men's issues battle are indeed revolutionaries of a sort, attempting to upend the status quo of regimes which routinely violate the basic human rights ensconced in the U.S. Constitution, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and other similar documents.

It's worth bearing in mind too that the enemy, as such, needs to be clearly defined. Herbert Spencer, in The Man Versus The State (1884) reminds us that the state always proceeds in the direction of greater control and money for itself, at the expense of citizens and individuals. Gustav Le Bon in The Crowd (1896) calls "the progressive restriction of the liberty of the individual" one of the two great dangers of even the ideal state (the other being financial waste). Frank Chodorov's 1959 book The Rise and Fall of Society describes the state's "proclivity for expansion… its inherent compulsion toward the acquisition of power (which) cannot be inhibited by law," and shows most importantly that "state power can grow only at the expense of social power."

An obvious ancillary conclusion must be that partisan politics is irrelevant in the face of abusive state power: no government, no form of centralized authority with a monopoly on violence, has ever escaped these expansionist tendencies. The notion that these tendencies can be magically restrained is a part of our political mythos which many still accept as legitimate.

In Western capitalist democracies, we are now witness to a psychotic agglomeration of quasi-fascist right-wing policies coupled with hard-left collectivist regulatory regimes which serve to aggregate financial and political power in an oligarchic and bureaucratic ruling class while stripping the general populace of power, money, liberty and justice.

Ideologues and populists can and do provide support to the state, but in fact are only the justification, the useful idiots (Lenin), for the relentless and inescapable march to state dominance – it matters little which particular ideology is employed, so long as the interests of the state are preserved. (Consider that during the recent U.S. 'financial crisis' the number of government employees increased by 22,000 persons). In democracies, right, left and centrist governments are statist: that is to say, they withdraw power, money and freedom from individuals and accrue it to themselves and their institutions.

Dr. Sharp advises that strategic planning is critical in attaining the desired outcome. In response to a legitimate and successful battle against abusive authority, societies can change in one of four ways, these being conversion (rare), accommodation, nonviolent coercion, and disintegration. It may not be possible to achieve the goals of the M(H)RM through convincing the state to adopt a posture of accommodation, however such an outcome might be preferable to the extreme of governmental disintegration.

The analysis of successful campaigns begins with noticing that "in extreme cases, the social, political, economic, and even religious institutions of the society — outside of state control — have been deliberately weakened… . The population has often been atomized (turned into a mass of isolated individuals) unable to work together to achieve freedom, to confide in each other, or even to do much of anything at their own initiative. The result is predictable: the population becomes weak, lacks self-confidence, and is incapable of resistance."

Sound familiar? Lest you doubt the viability or intent of such tactics, bear in mind that a record 27% of America's households are now solo occupant, a dream come true for radical feminists, corporations and rulers alike. In Tokyo, the average number of persons per household is less than two. In Canada the number of people living alone is at an all-time high and continues to rise. This socially destructive trend is occurring all over the Western world.

So what can be done? The bad news first: not every revolution is successful. But rather than lay down on the sofa, turn on the PS3 and dial up the porn channel, however, men should note the corollary: many struggles against oppressive authority are successful, and there are damn good reasons for that success.

Violence is clearly not the answer. In addition to moral and ethical implications, violence means attacking the state in its area of greatest superiority, hardly a winning strategy. In addition, violence often has the effect of mobilizing support against the initiators.

Elections are generally useless as well – the state is clearly not going to create and promote any electoral system which leads to its own demise. A quick look around the world should substantiate this point – with only very rare exceptions, the effective, underlying status quo does not change much, regardless of election results.

Negotiation has its own pitfalls, from serving to legitimize the oppressive regime to co-opting the resistance. And on fundamental issues, such as human liberty, negotiation is a path to failure. Negotiation is NOT based on the ability of each side to recognize the relative merits of the opposition's position and then compromise, it is based rather on an assessment of the power relationships involved. Guess who wins. The arguments of such as R. Tod Kelly, who want men to engage in reasonable dialogue in order to correct "civil rights discrepancies," are those of a person who misunderstands both the fundamental nature of the state and the goals of the M(H)RM.

Understanding and exploiting the weaknesses of the state are key to undermining its power. As well, activists must strengthen the oppressed population in their determination, self-confidence, and resistance skills; strengthen their independent social groups and institutions; create a powerful internal resistance force; and develop a strategic plan and implement it skillfully.

For a wide variety of reasons, Dr. Sharp contends that political defiance is the alternative of choice for activists. It enables attacking the status quo where it is weakest, undermining the state's sources of power, and it is difficult to defend against. Political defiance also helps distribute effective power across society, rather than leaving it solely in the hands of the state.

The strategies and tactics of political defiance need not involve breaking the law, harming others, or sacrificing one's self martyr-style to no purpose. Dr. Sharp describes 198 methods of nonviolent action which can be applied effectively – these are listed at Methods of Nonviolent Action.

But success can have its own difficulties and risks as well. Le Bon, also in The Crowd, summarizes the leading danger: "The idea that institutions can remedy the defects of societies, that national progress is the consequence of the improvement of institutions and governments, and that social changes can be effected by decrees — this idea, I say, is still generally accepted. It was the starting-point of the French Revolution, and the social theories of the present day are based upon it. The most continuous experience has been unsuccessful in shaking this grave delusion."

There is a certain bitter irony to this notion as applied to Dr. Sharp's work, since he envisions the attainment of constitutional democracy and all its institutions as the end goal of political struggle. What happens when constitutional democracy itself is the problem? History is providing the M(H)RM with an opportunity to help write a new chapter to this age-old story.

From Dictatorship to Democracy is considerably more nuanced and comprehensive than can be conveyed in one short article. Dr. Sharp has placed his work in the public domain, so it's free to download and read.

Sources:

- Gene Sharp, From Dictatorship to Democracy
- Herbert Spencer, The Man Versus The State
- Gustav Le Bon, The Crowd
- Frank Chodorov, The Rise and Fall of Society
- Where The September Jobs Were: Truck Drivers, Bureaucrats, Salesmen And Temps
- More Americans are ditching their roomies and living alone
- Living alone in Tokyo
- The Daily Beast: The Masculine Mystique
- 198 methods of nonviolent action

Hugo Schwyzer Facing Hard Time

W.F. Price · 11 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

At the height of his meltdown following his exposure as a fraud, Hugo got high on six milligrams of clonazepam and crashed his car, seriously injuring a young mother, who was medevaced from the scene by helicopter.

Because he was intoxicated, violated traffic laws and injured someone, he was charged with felony DUI, which carries a minimum sentence of six months in prison, but typically more.

Apparently, some felony DUI cases are known as "wobblers," which means that they can be reduced to a misdemeanor. I'm not sure whether that's the case in Hugo's crime, but even if it is, he'll likely be spending some time behind bars – or in a psych ward – regardless.

I'm not one to cheer when people are thrown in jail; there are plenty of people there who shouldn't be in a cage. Unless people are a menace to society or have intentionally done some great harm that causes considerable hardship to others, I'm skeptical about the value of imprisonment. Hugo, however, does appear to be a menace. Given his confessions concerning attempted murder in the past, I wouldn't be surprised if it turned out that he intentionally crashed his car.

I wasn't sure whether to believe the story he told about trying to blow himself and his girlfriend up in a gas explosion some years ago – I thought he might have ripped off the story from the Ken Kesey novel Sometimes a Great Notion – but now it seems a lot more likely to have really happened.

So, if Hugo does time in prison, what will it be like for him?

First of all, prison is often better than county jails, which are overcrowded, filthy and have a lower staff ratio. The real problem with prison is not so much the facility itself, but the other inmates.

Fortunately for Hugo, if he does end up there he may well be classified as a "sensitive needs" prisoner, which would entitle him to segregation from general population. Prisoners who would be in danger of assault or murder at the hands of regular prisoners stay in what is called the "sensitive needs yard." These special prisoners incude gang snitches, celebrities, physically frail prisoners, child molesters and homosexuals. They are essentially people who would be an easy, attractive or high-profile target.

Although I'm not an expert on this, I'd assume Hugo Schwyzer would fit the sensitive needs profile. As a feminist, liberal white male with bisexual tendencies, I can imagine that many of the general population inmates would quite enjoy giving Hugo a beating, for the entertainment value if nothing else. There's nothing that screams "hit me!" quite like a snarky, passive-aggressive white nerd in prison. If he is effeminate on top of that some form of violence is a near certainty.

I know this not only from anecdotal evidence (I have a friend who did time in California), but from my time in an inner city high school, which shares a number of characteristics in common with prison. It was always the white nerds who got smacked around, and the most brutal assault I saw was on a gay white student, who was punched so hard in the face that he needed surgery.

Of course, most prisoners are in low security prisons. There's a point system that determines one's security needs. Although Hugo may appear to be suited to a low security prison, his admission of attempted murder, suicidal tendencies and mental disorders will probably earn him more than a couple points. If he didn't come from a fairly well-to-do family, I'd guess he'd probably be looking at a level II (out of four) security facility, which is close to the median. For some context, level I is minimum security, and more like a college dorm, whereas level IV is reserved for the kinds of prisoners who murder guards (e.g. "Terrible Tommy" Silverstein) or are national security risks. Level III is where your garden variety violent psychopath goes, and although Schwyzer definitely has some socio/psychopathic tendencies, his ability to perpetrate serious violence and mayhem is limited by his physique and self-preservation instinct.

For Hugo, the most painful aspect of prison would be the isolation from the outside world and the limited opportunity for him to draw attention to himself. This is what will really hurt him if that's where he ends up. For narcissists, it is a severe blow to the ego to be quarantined.

If Hugo does time, I hope he gives the world an honest account of it, although that may be too much to ask. For his children's sake, I hope he makes some effort to reform himself in a positive way, and keeps himself optimistic throughout the experience. I doubt his career as a writer is over, so perhaps he can use the time served to improve his mental and physical health, and learn to use his talents in a less destructive way.

I do think some time in the pen will be both just and good in Hugo's case, and helpful to Hugo himself as well as society. I doubt he'll get hurt there, and because that isn't the point of incarceration I hope he comes out no worse for the wear. If he behaves himself and learns a thing or two, he'll be able to stand up straight and say "I've done my time." It's an opportunity few elite sociopaths are afforded these days, so Hugo should try to make the most of it. With some luck and self-reflection, he may actually emerge a better man with something to offer besides the usual lies and hystrionics.

If, however, he gets off the hook, expect no improvement. Hugo owes it to his fellow men to submit to justice, and only in paying his dues can he be rehabilitated.

They Start with a Lie

keyster · 11 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The “epidemic” of domestic violence.

The gender “pay gap”.

1 in 4 young women raped on college campuses.

Access to health care (reproductive services)…

You know the drill.

The latest outrage from the Feminazi Front is waging war on our military chain of command through the astounding increase of “sexual assault” among it’s ranks. And one very self-righteous and determined feminist senator, Kirsten Gillibrand (D-New York) demands the matter be addressed through turning the military legal system upside down…just for sexual assault cases; ostensibly because mean, patriarchal brass in the Pentagon (and Republicans) don’t care about women.

Luckily some in the media, being burned so many times before by feminist “studies”, aren’t buying it. In an analysis in the Wall Street Journal James Taranto dissects the issue down to the facts and Ms. Gillibrand’s attempt at inciting “moral panic”. Of course all we hear from the feminist sycophantic main stream media is what feminist activists want America to hear, the shocking headline - sexual assaults in the military “increased by a prevalence of 46 percent in the past fiscal year.” OMG! Unwanted sexual contact in the military is RAMPANT!

From Taranto on the authoress of a New York TImes article:

> Today’s New York Times has a fascinating little piece by reporter Jennifer Steinhauer, which begins: “Reports of sexual assault in the military increased sharply during the last fiscal year, new Pentagon figures showed Wednesday, just weeks before a defense bill with provisions to tackle the problem is expected to reach the Senate floor.”
>
> What’s fascinating is that Steinhauer does not betray any skepticism about these numbers, even though she enumerates several reasons to take them with a grain of salt–to wit: “The numbers included sexual assaults by civilians on service members,” which would not fit the common meaning of sexual assault in the military. “Sexual assault” was defined broadly, to include mere “touching of private body parts” (though not “sexual harassment, which is handled by another office in the military”).
>
> Here’s our favorite: “In a twist, the Pentagon found that a substantial number of the reported cases of sexual assault–something less than 10 percent–occurred before the victim entered the military.” That’s a hell of a “twist”! By this definition, the military could reduce “sexual assault in the military” by nearly 10% simply by asking recruits if they’ve ever experienced sexual assault and rejecting anyone who answers in the affirmative.
>
> Figures for “reported” sexual assaults, of course, also include false charges as well as murky cases in which it is impossible to prove either guilt or innocence–which, under American principles of justice, means acquittal is the proper outcome. Assault statistics–and indeed statistics on all crimes except homicide–are unreliable on the other side as well, for not all crimes are reported.

The Obama administration is strangely mum on the issue (they have much bigger fires to fight rigth now), and even some Democrat feminist stalwarts like Senator Claire McCaskill (D-MIssouri) oppose it, while Tea Partiers Ted Cruz and Rand Paul support the measure. Strange bedfellows indeed.

It’s unlikely the bill will pass the Senate with such bi-partisan opposition, and it wouldn’t make it through the House anyway. But it's very telling to see how some dare question feminist "studies" and "statistics", this one conducted by the infamous AAUW, and also how easily politicians and journalists can be swayed when Feminist Inc. shrieks about something.

> As long as politicians (and journalists) persist in exaggerating the prevalence of sexual assault in the military, the Pentagon will follow suit, and prosecutions on false or dubious charges will continue to proliferate. A decent resolution to this problem will remain impossible until the moral panic passes. One can only hope the effectiveness and morale of the U.S. military doesn't suffer too much in the interim.

Emasculating the military and destroying it from within is on the Feminist to-do list. More money for women's "needs" and less money for a band of violent, perverted men to play army. They start with a lie.

Somebody Owes Rush Limbaugh an Apology

W.F. Price · 12 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In an effort to pitch Obamacare, some publicly employed flunkie decided it would be a good idea not only to use infantile language (I'd correct a four-year-old if I heard it from him), but promote sluttiness and promiscuity as well.

I took a screenshot of the atrocious ad, which is an indication of just how depraved our public culture has become. Obamacare is evidently great because birth control is covered, and now women can screw around to their hearts' content:

Does anyone else remember Sandra Fluke explaining that sluttiness had nothing to do with women wanting the pill covered? Anyone remember the demands that nasty old Rush apologize to the tender maiden for insulting her honor?

Well, was he wrong? If the shoe fits…

The Inherent Honesty of Game

W.F. Price · 12 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

From time to time people, short-sighted mortals that we are, get a mass delusion that leads us to believe that we are on the cusp of a permanent utopia. It happens without fail. The gaudy, tasteless rainbow revolution of the 1960s and 70s was nothing new, but merely yet another iteration of the human tendency to reject all received wisdom in favor of an evanescent dream.

Back in the late 19th century there was a similar movement. Like the recent one, this movement espoused so-called "free love" and nature worship. Several communities associated with this movement arose in the Puget Sound region of Washington state, probably due to its isolation, temperate climate and material abundance, and played a key role in agitating for a socialist/anarchist takeover of the United States. After being accused of fomenting assassinations and harboring bomb-hurling terrorists, these communities came under suspicion, and narrowly escaped being burned to the ground.

One, known as "Home" Washington, harbored the infamous feminist Lois Waisbrooker, who advocated aggressive female sexuality. She was arrested on obscenity charges at one point, and given a slap on the wrist by a sympathetic judge. High society, it seems, was not all that negatively disposed toward radical feminists. At least no more so then than now.

What is truly fascinating about the previous movement is how little it differed from the free love movement of the 1960s. Feminism, socialism and sexual freedom were all high on the agenda. However, if one looks back even farther, a pattern emerges. All utopian movements, at least in their early days, are essentially the same, going back all the way to the Roman Bacchanalians, and even before to the golden calf story of the Bible.

What they all have in common is a "manna from heaven" attitude toward whatever it is that they desire. Food, shelter, and all our needs – including love – are to be "free" for the taking. Somehow, we will work out a scheme that eliminates the need to pay for any of it. That's what is at the heart of it all.

Today, we continue to live under the mass hallucination of our most recent cultural revolution, and pretend outwardly that love is free; that sex carries no cost. However, when we look around, it is obvious that this isn't the case. Sure, things have changed. The dangers of pregnancy can be thwarted, women have a great deal more leeway in their sexual behavior, and medicine mitigates much of the risk of sexually transmitted infections.

But this doesn't mean sex is free. When an alpha cad sleeps with dozens of women, there are dozens of men who go without, and guess who is paying for it all? It certainly isn't the cad who is paying for these women's subsidized visits to Planned Parenthood, their taxpayer-supported jobs, their welfare or their college tuition. No, it is the men who are sexually deprived – most men – who are shouldering the bulk of the load. And without these goodies, would the women be so free with their affections? Not a chance.

If someone else is buying your lunch, can you really call it "free?"

This is where Game comes into the equation. Those who promote Game say that with some work, some study and some ability men can find love. They are not selling free love. Maybe some of them exaggerate, and their methods may not always work, but they are clearly accepting that there is some cost involved. When it comes down to it they are far more realistic, and therefore more honest, than those who declare love to be an entitlement that should carry no cost.

One can argue about the morality of certain individual proponents of Game, but as for the concept itself, it tends to lead toward a far more conservative and morally tested understanding of human sexuality than most alternatives. I'd go so far as to say that Game operates on essentially the same premise as traditional religions: we all pay some price for love. It is ethically superior to much of modern Christianity, which holds that the cost should be borne by men alone, and feminism, which, strangely enough, entirely agrees with modern Christianity on this point. It is better than liberal factions of the men's movement that demand that sex be just as free for men as it is for women which is, quite frankly, such a laughable idea that it surprises me when anyone takes it seriously (sure, some men can get it for "free" but, as I wrote above, someone else is paying for it).

Some of the resistance to Game comes from a sense of hopelessness; the attitude that "it could never work for me." This is true in some cases, but it isn't all that common, and it would be even less common in a world where people had fewer delusions about the price of love. Some figure that the price of love is too high, and that's fine. These men, however, don't generally take issue with the efficacy of Game — they just don't want to put any effort into it.

However, to oppose Game on principle is akin to opposing the laws of nature, because that's what lies behind it. Game is simply a return to a rational appraisal of human sexuality, and although it looks messy and sometimes offensive, that's because it reflects its subject. In the long run, we would be better off in aggregate, happier and more satisfied if we, as a society, paid more attention to the truths it embodies.

Abortion: The Spearhead against Patriarchy

Featured Guest · 13 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By RICanuck

Once, about 15 years ago, I took my son into day surgery in Central Ontario, to have his shattered kneecap pinned back together.

The day surgery waiting area was crowded with middle aged women and several men. None of the men would make eye contact with anyone else, all just looked at the floor. The middle aged women were sitting quietly or quietly gossiping.

When my son's surgery was finished and he was coming out of anesthesia, I was told to go to the recovery room. He was the only male. Everyone else was a young woman, mainly teenagers. The behavior of the women coming out of surgery varied. One Filipina with a wedding ring, was crying that she wanted to get back to her children as quickly as possible. One of the local white trash told her to shut up it was no big deal, because she (the white trash) had already had four 'procedures' prior to this one. Most of the teenagers complained about abdominal pain, but one made serious attempt to flirt with my son, despite his grogginess.

I figured out what day it was. It was abortion day in the only facility that provides abortions between Toronto and Ottawa.

I was still pretty blue pill then, but realized that the men who had brought their wives, girlfriends, or daughters in to get an abortion knew deep down inside that they had failed as men. It seems to be a deep seated primal urge that men want to protect women and children. Being seen as a hero afterwards is an additional perk. If a man supports the abortion of his child or grandchild, he somehow knows that not only has he failed, but is also complicit in evil. One can often hear manginas loudly proclaim their support for 'freedom of choice', but the very volume of their claims makes it seem that they are trying harder to convince themselves than their listeners.

I have often wondered why feminists kick hard against any attempt to regulate abortion. If a State legislature attempt to impose licensing requirements, require a recovery room and resuscitation equipment, or require that only licensed practitioners only perform abortions, the abortion lobby will kick and scream against it. It is because the abortion license is not about women's freedom. If it was NOW would protest the compulsory abortions in China. It is not to relieve a woman of the life altering consequences of an inconvenient pregnancy. It is not about preventing the horrors of Dr. Kermit Gosnell.

The abortion lobby says they want to destroy patriarchy. That is the rule of fathers. They really mean it! Every dead fetus is one more blow against the patriarchy, it is one more nail in the closing coffin of the very real and very male desire of a man to have his own wife and children to support and sacrifice for. We also desire respect and admiration for building and protecting our families. The father/patriarch may not have much of a kingdom, it could be a two bedroom in the projects, or it could be a mcmansion in a pleasant leafy suburb, but it is his.

Abortion positive feminism is destroying this. Abortion is only the most politically visible means to destroy patriarchy. Since 1973, every state now allows no-fault divorce. Any would be patriarch can have his little kingdom destroyed on a whim with the destroyer's 'girlfriends' egging her on every step of the way. As an aside, to the men reading this, can anyone say that they have encouraged another man to seek divorce, except in the most extreme circumstances?

Many or most states recognize 'marital rape'. Prior to 'marital rape' laws, it was considered that husbands and wives belonged to each other and had claims upon each other. However, it was considered assault if she really put up a fight. But with 'marital rape' a husband always has a sword of Damocles hanging over his head. It destroys his patriarchal claim upon her, but she still has claim on the fruit of his labour.

Abortion, no-fault divorce, and marital rape are the legal pry bars to destroy patriarchy. The social aspects are even more pernicious. Check out almost all commercials for the depiction of fathers. We are all bumbling fools, barely tolerated by the smart, empowered wife, and the wise children. The only commercials that show men in a positive light are those for man things, like trucks. How many wives and children are with the man in these commercials?

The churches are also participating in the destruction of patriarchy. Check out Dalrock's commentary on the movie 'Fireproof'. I once saw an article about how Jesus provides all of a woman's needs, lifts her up, and makes her feel special. The article ended with the wish that their husbands could be just like Jesus. Jesus is also Judge. Would the authoress be willing to accept criticism from her husband without getting defensive? That article was an example of emotional and spiritual adultery, and because it involves an imaginary 'boyfriend' Jesus, it is also blasphemous. But almost no pastors or laymen will call it what it is.

This leads to the media phenomenon of herbivores in Japan. There have been a few media stories about this of late, but because it is the media, I hesitate to guess how true it is. The North American version is MGTOW and PUA. There have been articles asking why men won't leave the house, put down the video games, get jobs (good luck with that), and marry those sluts girls. In other words, why won't they try to be patriarchs? Well patriarchy is on its sick bed.

I am not sure that I, a baby boomer, have much useful advice to give to the younger men. After all I grew up in a country in which abortion, homosexuality, and artificial contraception were all illegal before 1969. I do advise that almost all Christian relationship advice is useless. Ian Ironwood's 'Red Pill Room' is a good source, as are Dalrock and the 'Rational Male'. Even Chateau Heartiste (Roissy) has useful information, but a Christian man should pay attention to his observations, but do not follow his morals. For those who wish to start their own little patriarchal kingdom have a read of http://www.thumotic.com/2013/01/08/how-to-find-a-wife/ . Our society is so misandric that the author does advise to keep in mind that you may fail, but if you accept the task, accept it with manly courage.

RICanuck is a 50 something expat Canadian who lives in New England.

Corporate Commissariat Coming Under Fire

W.F. Price · 13 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Since the 1980s, human resources departments have expanded to the point where nearly every midsize company has an HR department. The purpose of HR is ostensibly to manage hiring, employee retention and terminations, but this could be easily covered by ordinary management. The real reason HR has grown so much over the years is legal and regulatory compliance. HR is all about following the rules from on high, including affirmative action quotas, policies regarding discrimination and harassment and other ideological matters.

In this way, HR closely resembles the old commissariat of the USSR and other Communist countries. Commissars were a fact of life in Soviet factories, each of which had at least one "politruk" (political officer) who would enforce the rules and ensure adherence to Soviet ideology. In the final days of the USSR, the politruk was seen as something of a joke not to be taken too seriously, but for a long time people genuinely feared them.

In the US, people have good reason to fear HR, because they do exercise authority, and your job relies on being in good graces with the department. I learned this the hard way. While working as a temp for a large corporation back in the late 90s, I made the mistake of voicing my displeasure with constant schedule changes to a sympathetic coworker. A blonde, management type woman in khakis was walking past at the time, and I noticed that she turned her head and looked directly at me as she swiftly walked by.

No more than fifteen minutes later, a fat security guard walked up to my cubicle and told me to leave the premises immediately. He actually grabbed me by the arm and physically held onto me as I walked out, as though he was trying to provoke a fight, all for a mere complaint I voiced to a coworker. I learned my lesson. Since then, I have assiduously avoided working in a corporate setting, choosing instead to work in small businesses or freelance. Sometimes, you have to be honest with yourself and know your place. I simply can't survive in an environment that requires conformity and slavish obedience — it isn't in my nature. But that's what HR wants from its workers: silent, drone-like behavior.

Naturally, people working in HR have let the power go to their heads. They have started to hire employees that suit their own tastes, and the results have been curious. It turns out that because HR departments are so often stocked with single women, they are using their positions to shut out the sexual competition:

> In an experiment that involved sending out more than 2,500 resumes either with or without photos of the applicant, economics researchers Bradley Ruffle at Ben-Gurion University and Ze'ev Shtudiner at Ariel University Centre sought to answer the question of whether being good looking could help you find a job. The answer surprised them: Not if you're a woman. Pretty women faced an uphill struggle to get a chance at a job.
>
> The economists hadn't reckoned on the fact that 93 percent of the HR staffers deciding whether to call in someone for an interview were female. It turns out that HR women (who also tend to be young and single and hence still in the dating market for men) are eager to meet with handsome men. But they're jealous of beautiful women. So your business is losing out on talented people (and wasting time with untalented ones) based on their looks.

Of course, there's another reason to keep good-looking women out: they are more likely to attract men, and therefore more likely to marry out of the job or initiate sexual harassment lawsuits. Even so, I doubt that's the only – or even most important – reason young women in HR are round-filing applications from good-looking women. I'm sure plenty of women in HR would gladly "retire" if some higher-up proposed that one of them become his personal housewife.

The real problem, however, isn't HR itself. HR is only there because of the myriad regulations that have been implemented over recent decades. If these poltically mandated regulations were removed, companies would soon find HR to be a redundant department. More outspoken and honest people could breathe a sigh of relief, and the workplace might come to resemble a prison a little less.

It seems that companies have finally started to see HR as an undesirable institution. Hopefully, Americans will soon come to the conclusion that the body of law that created HR is an even bigger problem, and take steps to remove it. We can't fix our unemployment problems by continuously increasing the complexity and cost of employment, or by creating a workplace environment that demands inhuman standards of behavior so as to conform to nutty equalist fantasies.

100 years ago all over again, again

W.F. Price · 14 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Seattle has elected its first Communist in 97 years, as Indian American (as opposed to American Indian) Kshama Sawant beat out Richard Conlin for a city council seat. Our last bona-fide commie in city government, elected in 1916, was a precocious preacher's daughter named Anna Louise Strong, who died in Beijing in 1970 as a fervent supporter of Mao Zedong and apologist for Communist atrocities.

My bet is that aside from skin tone and some cultural distinctions, there isn't a dime's worth of difference between Sawant and Strong. Some of these Hindu women these days can hold their own with the worst of our old-time suffragettes, who were so terribly oppressed and put upon by society that they never had the opportunity to do an honest day's labor in their lives. Poor dears.

I could say it's ironic that a town like Seattle, which, if it were a human being, would be America's premier corporate lackey, would elect a slash-and-burn kook like Sawant, but then again I've met her opponent Richard Conlin in person. I don't think I've ever met a softer, slimier specimen than Conlin. To my everlasting disgust, I shook his hand at a community meeting some years ago, and it felt like I was grasping a wet toad. When I asked him whether Seattle's "sanctuary city" policy was legal, he lied to my face and smiled, and I went on my way with a newfound disgust for politicians, which is really saying something.

Sawant's socialism, like Strong's, is sure to be of the female supremacist sort that rankled serious male socialists like E Belfort Bax and George Orwell in the early 20th century. Making socialism a feminist issue – which is how it was framed in the teens and 20s of the previous century – greatly discredited the idea amongst the Anglo masses. How, after all, could working men support socialism if it was merely a transfer payment to goodtime girls and man-haters?

Naturally, this framing of socialism as a sort of paternalist slush fund for bad girls destabilized politics in the West, leading to a lack of consensus on labor policy that wasn't resolved until the situation deteriorated to revolutionary conditions in the late 20s and early 30s. We all know how that turned out (cue WWII).

Today is a time of imminent retrenchment. The general stupidity that passes for political consensus grows more and more absurd by the day, and although there is no credible source of resistance, a reckoning is nigh. As always, we humans are doomed to repeat our failures, and relive the mundane, swinish conditions we can't help but stumble our way into every few generations. I can only hope that this time we don't pay such a terrible price, but I'm not counting on it.

Americans Agree that Women Ideally Should have Children by 25

W.F. Price · 14 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the articles on this site that has attracted the most criticism from women stated that women are wasting time if they keep delaying family past the age of 25. From all the objections I have seen to it, you'd think that most of the US thinks I'm out to lunch, but according to a Gallup poll it turns out that most people agree with me:

> PRINCETON, NJ — In light of the importance that child rearing has on gender roles in society and, ultimately, on families, workplaces, and the economy, Gallup recently asked Americans what they think is the ideal age for men and women to start having children. The majority, 58%, say 25 or younger is ideal for women, whereas the majority think men should start having children at 26 or older. Still, the average perceived ideal age for each gender to have children differs only slightly: 25 for women and 27 for men.

Hmmm…

I'd argue that 25 is a bit late to be ideal, although not bad. If a woman wants a couple kids and starts at 21, she can have both by 25 and get on with her career by 30 if she wants to work. Not a bad proposition.

However, there is a deluded segment of the US population. Let's call them "feminists" for brevity's sake. These people employ what is known as "magical thinking" when it comes to motherhood and family formation. They believe it is never too late for anything. While having a child late (if possible) is better than never for most women, we're talking about the ideal here.

Ideally, people should have babies when young and healthy for a number of reasons. Most important of these is that it is physically safer for both mother and child. Next, conception is much more likely to actually happen when you're young. Finally, younger parents are more likely to survive and remain healthy until their children become adults. This is why being an older father is not ideal, especially if you have no prior children (it sucks to be fatherless and have no siblings at a young age).

However, many feminists prefer to put their fingers in their ears and shut their eyes whenever this subject comes up. They don't want to hear the truth, which is that there are tradeoffs in life. If you want to put your kids off for a long time, there's a good chance you won't have any at all.

It wouldn't matter too much if feminists only subjected themselves to this delusion that women can "have it all," but unfortunately they are evangelists. They want the entire world to validate their choices, so they go about trying to convince everyone else to make the same mistakes they do.

Here's an example of a feminist fighting reality:

> I had my first child at 33-years-old. Practically an old lady, according to all of you.
>
> As Slate notes, according to a new Gallup poll, most Americans think that women should start having children by age 25.
>
> That's the ideal.
>
> Do you know what I was doing at 25?
>
> Dancing on bars after 4 too many shots of Jagermeister. Dating as many men as possible to figure out that guys who kick in your car door probably aren't the marrying kind. Working my way to the top of the journalism food chain, first at FOX in Salt Lake City and later ABC in New York City, both of which involved 10-hour workdays. I was traveling. New York City, Mexico, London, Italy … you get the idea. I was grabbing myself a big ol' handful of life whilst trying very hard not to create it, because that wouldn't have been ideal. For me.
>
> What I'm telling you in a rather roundabout fashion is that 58% of the more than 5,000 people surveyed — the > ones who say women should have children in their late teens or early 20s — are just plain wrong. But that's not all. Anyone who says women should have children by any age is wrong.

Anyone who says that is wrong, huh? How about the 40-year-old woman who can't conceive any longer despite her best efforts, and now faces a "child-free" life? Is she "wrong?"

What if this 40-year-old woman said she regretted her empty life of drunken hookups and meaningless one-night-stands, and would give it all up for a baby. Is she wrong for that?

Sometimes, the sheer self-absorption of feminists can be appalling, as in this case. And yet hardly anyone calls them on it. I am one of the few who does, and I think women ought to be grateful for that. After all, where the rubber meets the road, who do you want to believe: a guy who tells it like it is, or some woman who drank and partied away her reproductive prime but was still lucky enough to have a child in her mid 30s?

Do you think you'll be that lucky? I sure wouldn't bet on it.

If Renisha McBride were Male Nobody Would Care

W.F. Price · 15 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some people are trying to draw parallels between Trayvon Martin and Renisha McBride, who was killed while intoxicated and banging on a man's screen door at 4:30 AM.

It isn't much of a comparison. The two are young and black and were shot by non-black citizens, but that's about it. Trayvon Martin was pretty much minding his own business when he was followed by Zimmerman, and died because he decided to repay the insult with blows, unaware that Zimmerman was carrying a concealed weapon (note to young men: always assume the other guy has a weapon). Martin was not drunk, and although he may have smoked some marijuana, there's a world of difference between someone who is smashed on booze (McBride's BAC came out to .218 — .08 is legally intoxicated) and someone who is stoned.

If Trayvon Martin had gone to someone's house and started banging on the door and making a scene in the early morning hours, and he had been shot dead for it, nobody would have heard much about it. It would have been considered cut and dried self-defense. If a homeowner doesn't have the right to use force on someone he reasonably thinks is trying to violently break into his home, then self-defense is meaningless.

I once had a situation similar to the McBride case occur at my front door. Late at night, a young black woman came to my door asking for help, saying she'd been carjacked. She was frightened and upset, but she was neither intoxicated nor deranged. I armed myself with my .45, because robbers sometimes use women to lower a victim's guard. Before opening the door, I checked the windows to look for anyone hiding in the bushes and asked the woman whether she was alone or not. She said she was, so I told her I had a gun and to move slowly and keep her hands in view. Everything went smoothly, and I locked the door behind her, sat her down on the couch and gave her the phone to call the cops. She seemed quite relieved to be inside with me.

The cops came and her story checked out. Some thug had carjacked her just down the street and taken off with her baby in the car! I was glad I had helped her, but I wouldn't have let her in if I weren't armed. Being an armed citizen allowed me to both help and protect her.

However, if she'd been drunk and acting violently, I wouldn't have known what to do. I probably wouldn't have opened the door in the first place, but what if I had and she lunged at me while I was armed? How would I know this wasn't the beginning of a home invasion robbery? Maybe I would have pistol whipped her, maybe I would have shot her. Who knows… You don't fool around with strangers at your door in the middle of the night, even if they are female. Incidentally, the IRA would often use women to stage a takeover of an apartment. They'd send a girl to ask whether she could use the telephone, and she'd come in, call her friends with some signal, then pull a gun and next thing you know the helpful guy who opened the door is hogtied and gagged while an IRA unit takes over the apartment to carry out an attack on British troops.

The question is, how was Mr. Theodor Wafer supposed to know that McBride was harmless? When someone is pounding on your door, there are a lot of variables you just plain don't know about. Is this person armed? Is she alone? Is she deranged? When you consider all the possibilities, race and sex don't even seem all that important any longer.

So why don't a few people try a little thought experiment. Remove the fact that McBride is a female, and replace her with an unknown male, intoxicated, banging violently on some stranger's door at 4:30 AM. If he gets shot by the homeowner, does it make the national news?

I didn't think so.

If IQ is rising, why do people seem dumber in some regards?

W.F. Price · 18 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Psychometricians and psychologists have long puzzled over the so-called “Flynn Effect,” which has demonstrated a consistent rise in IQ over the decades. So, a student who scored a 100 (which is both the median and mean score for the entire population being tested) back in 1920 would score low enough compared to today’s students today to qualify for special ed classes.

Is it possible that people are that much smarter today than they used to be? Obviously not, but the effect is real. Finally, it seems that a psychologist named Michael Woodley and a precocious 15-year-old named Elijah Armstrong have come up with a plausible theory explaining the rise in tested IQ over the years.

They noticed that certain subsections of the test showed a much larger rise in score than others. General knowledge, math and vocabulary have barely risen at all since the 1940s, whereas similarities and picture completion have gone way up. This suggests that some parts of the test measure innate intelligence – or “g” – better than others. In other words, some parts of the test are influenced by practice and study, like most ordinary school tests, while others reflect the subject’s raw intellectual ability, and are less susceptible to influence.

The similarities subtest has improved because children have a broader base of categorical knowledge than they used to. To use an example I read elsewhere, if you were to ask a child in the early 20th century what dogs and cats have in common, they might say “they both have four legs,” whereas today’s child would be more likely to classify both as mammals.

People who know certain rules are therefore more likely to obtain a high test score:

> Another aspect of being test savvy is the capacity to de-contextualise, that is, to be able to generalise about types of problem, without being confused by the particular context in which the specific example is presented to you.
>
> Armstrong and Woodley assert that, from the point of view of intelligence, education amounts to a vast re-testing enterprise. There are modest gains from rules of thumb, mnemonics and being “taught to the test”. Indeed, the reliance on exam results makes teachers and pupils confederates in ensuring that nothing is taught which is not taught to be examined. Incidentally, this view does not exclude what James Flynn calls “scientific spectacles” which more people now adopt when solving problems.
>
> Armstrong and Woodley rank tests according to how much “cognitive scaffolding” they have. Raven’s Matrices is level IV: rules are very helpful, only a few of them are required; Catell Culture Fair is Level III: rules help, but will not help you on many items; the majority of IQ tests are Level II: very many rules are required, but working out which to use is difficult, (and selecting the rule is what requires general intelligence); and Draw A Man test is Level I: no rule is of much help.
>
> [...]
>
> The authors say: “It is proposed that tests like the Raven’s are only highly g loaded when encountered initially — even basic familiarity with the rules and heuristics on a test, or familiarity with inductive reasoning itself, has the potential to radically diminish the g loading of this test over time, both under controlled conditions (such as in a retesting scenario) and over larger societal time scales (i.e., across generations in the case of the Flynn effect).”
>
> They continue: “The increasing capacity of societies to detect and explicitly utilize rules as a function of the Flynn effect may be related to increasing rule exposure via mass education and to ‘ways of thinking’ endemic to cognitive modernity (Flynn, 2009). It may also be caused by increased rule sensitivity as a consequence of changes in brain functioning that might relate to the prevalence of slower life history strategies in the modern era. These in turn might be in part a change in life history strategy due to dramatic improvements in > environmental quality."

I think this has interesting social implications. According to Armstrong and Woodley, as we become a more educated society we get better at following and applying the rules that "work" in day-to-day civilized life. This makes it appear that we are smarter than, say, someone fresh off the rice paddy from Vietnam. However, it also means that we take a great deal of these rules for granted, and assume that they work across the board, and will always work. But is this assumption correct? I doubt it, and this may partly explain why civilizations eventually decline: they become bound by the rules and are inflexible when the environment changes.

A good place to study this effect would be the former USSR, where the collapse of Communism was followed by a great deal of social dysfunction. When the transition to capitalism occurred, many of the rules that governed life in the Soviet era no longer applied. There was a subsequent increase in poverty, mortality and civil strife. What these people had learned through both cultural and institutional instruction turned out to be worthless, and they stumbled through life at a loss as to what to do. Viewed from our perspective, their behavior seemed irrational and stupid, but they had, at one point, been behaving in a functional manner in society.

Is it possible that the same rule-bound behavior could lead to problems in the West? I'm fairly certain it will, and probably sooner rather than later, because economic reality will eventually force a major change in the rules that govern our own society. There are, of course, already plenty of people who have lost out from rule changes, such as men who fell into the old school, marriage, house and kids routine then found themselves divorced and penniless. Many union members suffered, too, as we outsourced jobs to Asia. These are, sadly, people who followed the rules, but lost because the rules changed (I am one of them).

Today, we learn a lot of rules that allow us to get along and get by in a very complex, diverse society. Some require denial of reality, as in following the equalist fantasy that all people have the same abilities and potential, so long as they are raised in the proper environment (I call this neo-Lysenkoism). This may minimize strife in major institutions and allow for some semblance of civil peace, albeit at a high cost. But seen from an outside perspective, it looks like stupidity, and if the rules were to change, it would be dysfunctional behavior. Smart people can and do adapt, so they would probably do alright in the event of some radical change in circumstances. After all, after the transition, many of the old communist officials in the former USSR simply put on another hat and carried on as though little had changed. But the bulk of the population tends to have a much harder time.

When the rules change again, whether it be due to changing demographics, economic shifts or even geopolitical factors, it might turn out that the gains in "intelligence" we have made are more liability than asset. We may find that we've left our children burdened rather than "enlightened" with rules that work today, but may not tomorrow.

Camille Paglia: feminism dead, rape culture “ridiculous”

W.F. Price · 19 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Camille Paglia has a reputation for being outspoken, and despite being a lesbian who has long been associated with feminism, she never struck me as a man-hater. I’ve read some of her material, and it is suffused with sexuality. In her analyses of literature, she sometimes seems to go too far, but then on second thought it appears that she’s right. She has an uncanny ability to perceive sexual undertones that usually escape notice. Perhaps this is because she is entirely different from most lesbians. In general, I’ve found lesbianism to be a reflection not of an alternate sexuality, but of a lack of sexuality. Lesbians are, for the most part, women with dimished or absent sexuality for one reason or another.

Gay men, on the other hand, are men with elements of both male and female sexuality. Where gay men have something extra, lesbians have little if anything at all. Paglia, it seems, is actually gay — not lesbian. This is incredibly rare among women, and probably accounts for her creativity and keen insights; characteristics that have led to numerous disagreements with the feminist orthodoxy, which does not value outspoken creativity and intellectual freedom, but rather a borg-like conformity to the party line.

In an interview with Canada’s Macleans Magazine, Paglia delivers blow after blow to the feminist establishment. What surprises me most of all is that many of the opinions she expresses can be found right here on The Spearhead. In fact, aside the lesbian/pop culture stuff, there isn’t much I haven’t said at one point myself:

On careerism:

> Women are being told “you are future leaders.” Meanwhile, we are more than our jobs. One reason Sex and the City was such an enormous hit is that it expressed something that feminism won’t admit: we don’t know what we want. We don’t know if we want children or not. My generation produced the sexual revolution and your generation is stuck figuring out how it’s going to work. I want young women when they’re 14 to start thinking about what they want over the course of their lives. I think it’s criminal—child abuse—that they’re not told to do this [in school]. Right now it’s just sex education and putting condoms on bananas. Girls should be asked to think about what they want in their lives when they’re 50, 60 and 70.What’s been imposed on women is a male model of professional study and achievement.

Rape hysteria:

> It’s ridiculous … This obsession with rape [in North America] is neurotic. There are attacks on men also. This privileging of the female victim is a distortion. To see the world in terms of rape is absurd. Throughout history there have been atrocities of every kind. Throughout history honourable men don’t rape.
>
> [...]
>
> You can try to teach people to make ethical judgments. Telling a rapist not to rape? [Laughs] A liberal ideology is out there that people are basically good. It’s a bourgeois version of reality—this idea that the whole world should be like a bourgeois living room and anyone who doesn’t belong, you can retrain. No you can’t! I was raised in the Italian working-class way, which is “watch out!” The world is a dangerous place. It’s up to you to protect yourself, not just from rape, but from anything. The lack of imagination for criminality amazes me. There are people who are evil. The problem here is the inability of women to project themselves into the minds of men. Feminists say [proper, mocking tone] “women have the right to do whatever they want.” Of course we have the right to do whatever we want–to be jogging with earphones on with our breasts going like this [simulates breasts bouncing]. Yes you have the right to but it’s also stupid! I see with the eyes of the criminal. I must have a criminal mind.

Feminism:

> Feminism is dead. The movement is absolutely dead. The women's movement tried to suppress dissident voices for way too long. There's no room for dissent. It's just like Mean Girls. If they had listened to me they could have gotten the ship steered in the right direction. My wing of feminism—the pro-sex wing—was silenced. I was practically lynched for endorsing The Rolling Stones. Susan Faludi is still saying I'm not a feminist. Who made her pope? Feminist ideology is like a new religion for a lot of neurotic women. You can't talk to them about anything.

I wonder whether Paglia would have said the same thing ten years ago? At that time she was still concerned with sex positive feminism, but mainly kept her peace on the other issues. Today, she lets them have it.

Feminism has been coming under fire from a number of quarters recently. There's a palpable feeling that they've taken it too far. It will be interesting to see where this goes over the next couple years, but I'm happy to see that the manosphere appears to have made a real impact. Traffic numbers for manosphere sites in aggregate are growing by leaps and bounds, and taken together our sites constitute an entirely new – and rapidly growing – media sector. One effect this has had that I can point to is that people no longer feel the need to censor themselves as much regarding feminism.

For a Happy Marriage, Women should Calm Down

W.F. Price · 19 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

According to the US Department of Health and Human Services, when wives can calm down quickly, marriages are happier. Husbands' ability to calm down has no influence:

> From the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, I'm Ira Dreyfuss with HHS HealthBeat.
>
> This isn't about who wins the argument – but a study of hot marital fights indicates that when the wife calms down, the couples are more happy. Researcher Lian Bloch of the Pacific Graduate School of Psychology in Palo Alto found that in a study she did at the University of California, Berkeley. She looked at data that included recorded arguments by long-time husbands and wives.
>
> "The marriages that were the happiest were the ones in which the wives were able to calm down quickly during marital conflict."
>
> Bloch says calm wives were able to look constructively for ways to deal with the emotions and talk about ways to solve the problems. Happiness didn't change if the husband calmed down quickly.
>
> The study in the journal Emotion was supported by the National Institutes of Health.

This makes perfect sense, because men react physiologically to verbal confrontations to a far greater extent than women. Actually, women react physiologically to lack of verbal engagement. When a woman argues with a man, it reassures her, whereas the man can feel literally sick from it.

This sex difference has been found to contribute directly to marital problems, up to divorce. What happens is that the woman, feeling a need to engage for some reason, nags the man, and he feels increasingly uncomfortable, eventually clamming up and avoiding her. This leaves the woman feeling uneasy, and she starts to withdraw and look for a way out (often another man).

A local marriage counselor named John Gottman, one of the few I'd recommend, developed his entire practice around this finding. Gottman holds that the single best predictor of future divorce is a wife who shows contempt toward her husband.

Feminism peaked in 1990s

W.F. Price · 20 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've long thought feminism was at its most potent in the 1990s, based on personal observation. It turns out that this may be the case, at least according to Google's ngram viewer.

Blogger Audacious Epigone posted a graph showing how likely the word "feminism" has been to show up in articles over the years. It takes off about 1970s, peaks in the mid-90s, and by now is in rapid decline:

Audacious Epigone asks:

> How much of that is due to realization of biological differences and how much is due to female concerns being superseded by the concerns of 'victim' classes like blacks and gays who are higher up on the victimology pyramid?

I'm not sure any of these factors is all that important; I suspect the rise of feminism reflects the rise of a certain demographic that was heavily invested in the movement. Feminism's peak coincides with the peak of women in the labor force, which occurred in the late 90s. It was an empowering ideology for women born between, say, 1945 and 1964, who wanted in on the great economic expansion that lasted until about 2000.

Today, for younger women, it has limited utility. Younger women are, in general, poorer than their mothers. They are having a harder time obtaining support from men, let alone jobs. Feminism has little if anything to offer them, and may even be a net negative.

I have long thought that people's political opinions are driven primarily by selfishness. In Seattle, for example, people overwhelmingly vote Democrat, and I'm pretty sure they do so because Seattle is largely a publicly employed city. In other words, it's a college town, with the University of Washington being the largest employer by a longshot. Back in the early 80s, when the private sector was still fairly robust in Seattle, the vote was divided much more evenly between Democrats and Republicans.

As conditions change, people adjust their ideology so that it better reflects their personal interests. Women under the age of 40 or so are no longer feminism's winners, but are starting to look like its losers: single mothers with deadbroke babydaddies, women struggling with college loan debt, young women working menial, poverty-wage jobs and being used as casual sex partners (unpaid prostitutes, really) by men who are terrified of being enslaved by feminist family law.

Younger women know, deep inside, that feminism isn't doing them any favors. This is why feminism is in steep decline. It has become a dysfunctional movement not only for men and children, but for the majority of women, too.

A reminder on commenting

W.F. Price · 21 November 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Comments have been getting nasty again over the last week or two, and it has become unpleasant to deal with them. Criticism is one thing, but insults are another, and there have been a fair number of them thrown around recently. Also, I'm getting tired of reflexive negativity. I've been through it before, and don't care to relive it.

Just for some perspective, an average article is read by some three thousand people over the course of a few days. Out of those, perhaps only 20 comment on it. Out of those 20, only a few are actively picking fights.

So, if I have to ban certain commenters, it's relatively inconsequential.

I'd like to thank those who avoid the ad hominems and cheap shots. Mercifully, that's most of you. If it hadn't been for this restrained, thoughtful majority, I would have thrown in the towel on comments long ago.

Celebrating Patriarchy

W.F. Price · 5 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Given my current dilemma, which is pretty run-of-the-mill for a lot of fathers today, I thought a bit about how it relates to The Spearhead and its existence. On some reflection, it's pretty clear to me that I never would have thought to start a site like this if I hadn't been a father. It's a direct result of a deep need and desire to be a father to my children.

But in addition, it's also a result of the circumstances that were created when I did my best to create a life that would allow me to be a father to my children, despite all the roadblocks put up by the state, individual feminists, groups of feminists (they operate in packs, like hyenas), and the anti-family elite class. If I'd acted in my own and the system's best interests, I would have forgotten about my children, and probably would be in a much more comfortable situation today. There is no blame whatsoever attached to men who totally ignore their children, so long as they pay the minimum fees. "Good men," according to the system, are those who substitute a check for fatherhood.

Throwing a ball with your son, keeping an eye on the boys chasing your daughter and teaching your children are all meaningless to the state. What you are is a human resource — not a father. This is what I've rebelled against. It's what has given me the psychological motivation to keep the site running.

A lot of this is no doubt personal. My father wasn't there for me when I needed him, and that had pretty dire consequences for me. I don't want that to happen to my children, so I struggle on, despite all the hatred from feminists, who, when it comes down to it, just want to fuck and get paid for it. That's really all feminism comes down to: provision and protection for sex. It's so deeply ingrained in primate psychology that it won't change in a million generations. Children's interests have nothing to do with it. Feminists are only the prostitute lobby writ large.

If I am to attach an honest epithet to this site and my efforts, I would have to call it a patriarchal site. I believe patriarchy is the one family system that works best in sum for all involved. It's best for almost all children, for most women, and most men. For certain elite and standout specimens of both sexes it involves some sacrifices. It is not the best deal for extraordinarily attractive men or women, who can live a charmed life without taking on the responsibility of patriarchy. But why should they have priority over the rest of humanity? Does their pleasure and privilege raise the mean?

It does not, and this is the moral basis for patriarchy as a system for organizing families. If a few extremely attractive or powerful people can benefit, while the vast middle is dismantled, then a chasm develops between classes, and ultimately this is unsustainable for cohesive society. Sure, we want people to be more attractive on average, but giving all the power to the few extraordinarily attractive works in the opposite direction due to constraints on human female fertility and the non-selective nature of elite male sexuality (e.g. Arnold Schwarzenegger). What it does is limit reproduction in the middle and encourage low-investment r-selection in the hopeless lower class, which always outnumbers elites. We then become a disorderly society of a few aristocrats atop a vast mass of proles.

So, I think it's time to come right out and say that The Spearhead is not equalist, nor does it support "reinvention" of traditional sex roles, but rather is committed to restoring patriarchy as a just, family-centered principle of social organization. And not the despotic form of patriarchy that prevails in slave societies, but rather a more democratic form in which men are held accountable to one another, and the law. It is the ancestral Western model, and it's what made Western peoples strong, not to mention East Asians, Hindus, Jews and Muslims, who organized their societies on a similar basis, with varying degrees of success. The West prevailed in the 19th and 20th centuries not because of its racial, but rather its social superiority, which was closer at the time to the democratic patriarchal ideal than any other part of the world. Sadly, that has been lost, hence our Western decline.

The restoration of patriarchy should be the long-term goal of all righteous men who care about their families and people. It is the most just, humane and progressive form of social organization known to man. It's the only system worth fighting and dying for, and that's why it will ultimately prevail.

Update

W.F. Price · 5 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hi folks, I've been forced to take something of an extended delay past the holiday due to circumstance. Unfortunately, problems from divorce do not just go away after it's over, and mine have once again caught up to me. In short, I'm in trouble with DCS (child support), and this time it's pretty serious. This is because I was unemployed and had my income imputed on divorce (this means that they force you to pay at a previous income whether you have it or not), which led to accumulation of arrears. If you haven't read it before, here's the background on the situation. I was working it down for a couple years, but things have dried up lately, and I have to deal with it immediately if I want to see my kids for the holidays and stay out of the King County hotel.

Hopefully, I can come up with enough to do that and will be back to focusing on writing again soon. All in all, it's just another day in the life of millions of non-custodial fathers, so it isn't the end of the world. But it still sucks.

Hope you all enjoyed Thanksgiving!

Paternalism – not Matriarchy – is the Problem

W.F. Price · 6 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some time ago, Jack Donovan wrote that matriarchy does not really exist, preferring to call women-centered societies "matrifocal" or matrilineal. He's spent a lot of time studying cultures around the world to write books about men from an anthropological perspective, so he would know. Every supposedly matriarchal culture is, when you scratch the surface, ruled by men at the top; these matrifocal societies would be better termed "paternalist." However, this does not mean that every culture is patriarchal, at least not in the customary sense of the word.

Paternalism grows out of the "big man" societies in which there is a top-down system for wealth redistribution. All wealth flows to the chief, and he doles it out to his subjects, often favoring those who support him or otherwise please him. In some contexts, we refer to this as patronage, which is a common practice throughout the world, and is not always a terrible thing.

This form of social organization worked fairly well in small societies, such as pre-contact Amerindian tribes. The chief was obliged to patronize his warriors, which put a check on despotism and arbitrary acts. In many tribes, the chief would be amongst the poorest in the village, because he had to dole out gifts and war spoils as soon as he obtained them to maintain his position.

Ultimately, in some cases, this led to the development of a formalized system of patriarchy, in which it was legally recognized that each male householder had a privileged status in regards to his own family, if nothing else, which gave rise to the practice of patrilineal descent. This laid the groundwork for the development of civilization from barbarism, as taxation and patronage now required recordkeeping and certain conditions. A shift then began to occur away from a purely paternalistic society to one in which rulers had to adhere to laws that placed controls on their wealth collection and redistribution. Thus, social hierarchies flourished, social organization solidified, and increasingly large and complex forms of government evolved.

However, the codified patriarchy that led to the development of cooperative societies hasn't always lasted. When enough wealth and power has been accumulated, rulers tend to look for ways around it, because it isn't always convenient for them to follow the laws and customs which do, after all, put a check on their power. Getting rid of these impediments often seems like a good idea when you're in charge.

American politicians have been hard at work doing just that for decades. To increase revenue and political support, they have promoted and passed laws that shatter the concept of the patriarchal family. A few examples include preferential maternal custody, decriminalization of adultery, introducing no-fault divorce and preferential welfare to single mothers. Gay marriage, which is essentially a formal declaration that the government does not recognize patriarchy as valid or supported by any law or policy at all, is the latest example.

When patriarchy is smashed, as it has been in the United States, we are left only with primitive paternalism. We have local bosses, corporate titans, and a "benevolent" paternalist at the helm of our country. Perhaps it is fitting that the son of an academic feminist is the current president of the US. He is more a product of paternalism than any other president. I think it's the only system he really knows and understands, despite his tragic efforts to assign some purpose and meaning to his relationship with his father (efforts I understand myself).

So, what we're really facing today is not matriarchy, but an increasingly despotic paternalism, in which men's autonomy and authority is being steadily eroded in the interests of those in power. Our intimate relationships, our conditions of employment, and taxes all conspire to subjugate us to the powerful, who are working steadily to remove any checks on their own power and challenges to their authority. Almost every government-led initiative, whether it be population replacement through immigration, women's "empowerment," or highway checkpoints leads in this direction.

Will it ever end? Only when outcompeted by another system that works better. It is the nature of power and government to preserve itself, and as long as there is no credible opposition it will not change. You may ask, “where’s the opposition?” The phrase “there’s a lot of ruin in a nation” has become common these days, and maybe there is some grounds for pessimism. But then again, look at who’s in charge and where things are headed. Our president is creating a destabilized, weaker United States, and this is an enormous country. It requires a lot of working parts to hold a country together, and that isn’t even taking foreign affairs into consideration. With a growing and belligerent China, an increasingly assertive Russia, and a Latin American pope who clearly doesn’t have much regard for the US, there will be plenty of challenges ahead.

The signs point to an increasingly factious era, in which allegiances will be strained and challenges mounted to authority. In all such situations, it pays to have a few good men on one’s side, and this is the hope we have for reform: challengers who offer a better deal to men will have an advantage. Politicians and businesses that treat men as slaves will find themselves abandoned by their male constituents, and although under the contemporary enforced equality system they may think this is OK, they’ll find out that this is not how things work. Personally, I think we’ve already begun to enter this era, but it may take a few years before it really shows.

In the meanwhile, as men, we should hold out not for “equality” with women, which will never, ever, turn out equal, but a more desirable system of democratic patriarchy, in which all men are afforded equal rights to independence in their own homes and affairs and freedom from arbitrary paternalism.

We Shouldn't get Hung Up on the 50s

W.F. Price · 7 December 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I write about the superiority of patriarchy as a principle of social and family organization, a lot of people automatically assume I'm arguing for a return to Father Knows Best. While I do think the 50s had a lot going for them, our perceptions of that era (which really includes the early 60s, too) are often obfuscated by the fact that contemporary feminists are, for the most part, culturally ignorant, and only aware of children's programming of the time. Their concept of the 1950s is limited to the reruns of sitcoms and shows they themselves saw as children in the 70s (I remember the old 50s programming myself). Baby boomer feminists may have the same impression — only people around 70 or above would have been exposed to adult entertainment in the 50s.

Despite the conservative sitcoms and afternoon shows, 1950s entertainment was, in its own way, as subversive as anything we have today. Divorcées were portrayed as glamorous on the silver screen, hypergamy was encouraged by children's productions such as Cinderella, and leading men were rakish badboys as often as not. Sometimes, when I watch old films from the 50s, I wonder how people today can seriously characterize the era as so "square." It wasn't.

The reason people generally behaved in a conservative manner was not because the culture forced them to, but because the hard lessons of the Great Depression and war were such recent memories. Your typical middle-aged man in the 1950s, like my paternal grandfather, had been a struggling youth in the depths of the Great Depression, and young fathers had faced the very real possibility of death in uniform. My 90-year-old maternal grandfather, who flew 32 missions from '43-'44, watched men burn to death after bailing out of stricken B-17s. My uncle Buddy watched Shanghai burn as Japanese bombed the city, uncle Edgar's destroyer was bombed and almost sunk, and uncle Barney died in the Philippines. This is the perspective men had at the time. The idea that they could suffer through that and be bossed around in their own homes was unthinkable. Feminists who complain about how oppressed women were in the 50s never would have signed up for what grown men of the time had faced, and most women knew it, so they shut up and did the laundry.

To see things accurately, we must separate the reality from the myth of the 50s. Yes, there was a fair amount of lip service paid to the idea that men ought to be respected as head of household, but the culture was already moving away from that at a rapid pace. There is a constant, unyielding desire in the human heart to be liberated from reality, and to forget hard lessons. Those who sacrifice are always resented, despite our deference to them — we are not by nature an obedient, grateful lot. The decade was merely an interlude; a time of uneasy peace between husbands and wives and fathers and children. Founded on poverty and war, it was not built to last in a growing, increasingly wealthy society.

But what society is built to last without change? I look at what we have today, and the fact that societies never remain the same is one of the few consolations that remains.

Where is Bill Price?

Uncle Elmer · 4 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Questions are being raised after notorius MRA kingpin vanishes from the internet.

Seriously though, people are wondering what has happened to Bill. At this point it is a mystery that will eventually be revealed.

Since I have a user account on his esteemed blog, I can post essays and moderate comments to my own essays.

So I am setting up this open forum for friends and foes alike to offer their support for him.

When I get a round tuit, I will send him some pizza money through paypal. Given recent outpourings of financial support for amateur victim hoaxers, we can pull together and back up one of our own.

I will be offline this afternoon but will moderate comments when I return; if your words don't show up right away I will unclog them as soon as I can.

Let's hope this whole affair is just an elaborate hoax to gin up publicity for the manosphere.

What a Holiday Season...

W.F. Price · 5 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes you're just glad the season is over, but this year was a real coup de poing for me. First, we start with an untimely death in the family, then not long after that my stepdad, up in town to do a little post-retirement assistance at his old job, caught a guy he'd worked with for years secretly video recording some schoolgirls on a ski trip. This devolved into an international child porn investigation with US attorneys, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, DHS and lord knows who else involved.

Next thing I knew my mom was in town, the whole family in turmoil and general agitation, all with me recently finding out I'm going to have another kid as I'm trying to cut a deal with my ex. I decided to take the month off and wait until everybody calmed down and left, which happened the day before yesterday.

Sometimes, I really envy bachelors

I'd considered writing about the sex offense incident when it happened, but decided against it as it was still in the news and my stepdad was fairly upset about it. It's actually a pretty unbelievable story — one of those "what the hell was he thinking?" kind of things. The guy who got busted was a fairly successful bachelor who worked as a coach and an aviation writer for Wired Magazine. He's in his early 40s, and as far as I could tell had a perfectly good life. My stepdad has known him and worked with him since the 90s, and continued to help out from time to time after retirement.

Today, he's sitting in jail in British Columbia, awaiting trial on Canadian charges. However, his trouble doesn't end there. Because of the Child Exploitation Act, which he probably violated, he's looking at a fifteen-year mandatory minimum sentence back in the US after serving whatever time he gets in Canada. The local US attorney has made it clear that she intends to pursue the case, and given that the Department of Homeland Security got involved, I assume she means it. What's remarkable to me, however, is that this guy might as well have died that night he got caught. He made the news for a few days, there was an investigation, and now he's gone — just like that. He may not see the free world again until he's past retirement age. A long prison sentence really is an approximation of death.

If you're interested, you can read about it here.

After the dust settled from that incident, we all drove each other crazy for a few weeks, during which time I realized that I was not going to get anything done, and probably shouldn't try, because to do so would risk a major psychic malfunction, or possibly losing it at Christmas dinner, or perhaps both. Fortunately, we all survived, and the New Year is so pleasantly quiet that I have rediscovered that I actually have thoughts, and can hear them.

However, during my time offline, I was forced to confront a few realities that may have some implications for the future of this site. Quite frankly, the ROI isn't adequate given the time I put into it. Of course, that wasn't the point initially. If I'd started the site for money, I would have taken an entirely different approach (in fact, I would have avoided men's issues altogether). Instead, I was trying to make a social statement, and to challenge the dominant narrative concerning family law, sexual politics and human nature. I wasn't the only one, but my approach was unorthodox in that it wasn't particularly partisan by American standards. I think this made a difference, and I have noticed the narrative has shifted somewhat over the last few years. How much remains to be seen, as one still runs across feminist tripe with some regularity in trendy magazines and the like, but this isn't the 90s anymore; people don't take it as gospel.

For now, I'll keep The Spearhead going, but I have to start selling something, and fast. Getting by on donations requires a different style from mine — you have to have a movement and be an activist, which is a lot like being a preacher. As a natural skeptic, I can't help but feel that it's dishonest to make declarations of faith when I'm not certain about them myself. And I think that this skepticism is why a lot of people like to read what I write, so it would be unnatural to do an about face and start crusading as an MRA culture warrior. I'd have to fake it, and as we know a good fake is something of a contradiction in terms.

So from here on out, given what's headed my way this summer, I'm going to have to put more effort into paid work, including on the site. There comes a point where one can't afford to give one's time and effort away for free.

How Child Support Enforcement Works

W.F. Price · 6 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It seems some readers thought I got thrown in jail for being behind on child support. While this didn't happen, it was a real risk, but not because of a contempt charge (I'll explain further down). Until very recently, it was common practice for men with child support arrears to be thrown in jail on the basis of "contempt of court." The idea behind contempt is that people who are ordered by the court to do something must do it, or risk being jailed or fined. For example, if you get a subpoena, you have to turn over information, or you could be held in contempt. Sometimes, journalists are jailed for refusing to disclose their sources. Another example of contempt is refusal to pay a fine.

Civil contempt of court happens to be the only way, short of martial law, that people can be jailed without the right to representation.

However, judges are not supposed to jail people for contempt when they don't have the means to carry out the order. Say you ask a person to turn over some information, and he honestly doesn't have it. He can't (properly) be jailed in that case. Or say that someone is ordered to pay restitution, but he doesn't have any money. In this case, he shouldn't be jailed, because he cannot follow the order even if he wants to.

Jailing men on contempt came to be standard in the 1980s, particularly after the Bradley Amendment of 1986, which imposed extremely heavy burdens on noncustodial parents. As with most "get tough on social problems" type of legislation, the targets were clearly men, particularly the stereotypical ones you see on shows like Jerry Springer. I can recall a great deal of anger about "welfare queens" and such back then. The story was that some people – ghetto residents in particular – were irresponsibly having lots of children and leaving the rest of us to foot the bill. As usual, the politicians came up with a clever plan that would both protect their welfare recipient constituents and assuage the anger of the middle class. The idea was to not solve the problem, but to find someone to beat down so as to demonstrate their toughness, and grab some cash in the meanwhile.

The result was the Bradley amendment, which effectively resurrected slavery and debtors' prison in the United States. A number of states immediately interpreted this as a way to seize as much income as possible from noncustodial parents – disproportionately working class and black men to begin with – and turn it over to states and counties for welfare expenditure. Now, one thing you have to keep in mind when considering the idea that noncustodial parents are paying back welfare spent on the mothers is that, despite the window dressing, these state funds are fungible. There isn't necessarily a certain channel that goes directly to welfare, another for lawyers and judges, prisons, etc. There's a pool you draw from, which means that all sources of income are essentially the same. Say you have a shortfall in funds due to some unforeseen problem, such as a sudden need to build another wastewater treatment plant. Ultimately, it doesn't really matter whether the funds come from state income tax, licensing fees, or noncustodial fathers. If all else fails, one thing you can do is start shaking down the dudes to come up with enough to pay for everything.

Here's an excerpt from a 1992 article from the Philadelphia Inquirer:

> Pennsylvanians who have fallen behind in their child-support payments will have any lottery winnings greater than $2,500 seized by the state under a new law that went into effect Monday.
>
> The lottery-intercept program, which has the Departments of Public Welfare and Revenue working in tandem, represents the Casey administration's latest effort to ensure that parents provide financial support for their children.
>
> It also represents an extra push to pare down state welfare costs, which now hover around $3 billion.
>
> "Other states have done similar programs and have collected quite a lot of money," said Welfare Department spokesman Mark McGaffin yesterday. "We hope to collect quite a few dollars on this."
>
> Last fiscal year, Pennsylvania collected $766 million through child-support enforcement programs, the largest > net of any state, according to state welfare officials. Of that, nearly $123 million constituted a repayment of tax dollars used to support families needing public assistance.

>
> Under the law, parents owing support are required to relinquish their lottery prize money to make delinquent payments. The state has long garnished the wages and unemployment benefits of delinquent parents.
>
> The Revenue Department, which runs the state lottery, will cross-check winners of more than $2,500 with a list of parents who owe child support. The list is compiled by the Welfare Department. Revenue will then forward the amount owed to Welfare to fulfill the payments.
>
> About 400,000 parents are on the delinquency list, McGaffin said. The children of about half those parents are living on welfare.
>
> McGaffin said it would be too difficult to track winners of less than $2,500 because lottery-ticket vendors are responsible for paying prizes below that amount. He said the list of delinquent parents would be updated daily.
>
> Attorneys with Community Legal Services of Philadelphia, in contrast to its recent battles with the administration over welfare reform, had good words for the enforcement initiative.

This article makes the intentions of the 1980s child support laws perfectly clear. The idea was to increase state revenue by allowing state seizure of funds without traditional safeguards. This is why politicians loved it so much. Not only could they arbitrarily grab cash from men; they could sell it as a good deed! Hell, even the welfare attorneys loved it. They're getting paid from state funds too, after all. Note that in '92, Pennsylvania kept over 15% of what it collected, and likely spent most of its enforcement effort on obtaining that 123 million dollars (even if you pay without a hitch month after month, year after year, the state counts that as "collection").

However, not all funds are so easily taken as state lottery winnings. Sometimes, men keep cash, assets, private accounts and so on, and sometimes their loved ones have money. In this case, you've got to really twist their arms, and nothing does that better than threatening to throw them in county lockup. Even if they don't have the funds, they'll do whatever they can to get them when threatened with jail, including borrowing from family, not paying rent or bills, pawning goods, and sometimes stealing or even conning people.

It isn't commonly mentioned in public, but state enforcement typically has an open bias toward collecting the funds that states can access. If a woman works or has remarried, and is not receiving any state aid, her kids' father tends to be a lower priority for enforcement. Usually, the father whose kids are on welfare gets the third degree. This is, more often than not, the guy who is jailed. This is because his child support, as opposed to your non-welfare case, goes directly into state funds, which provides the state with extra motivation. If the mother is not collecting welfare, the state simply hands the money over to her and collects some amount of matching federal dollars that probably barely offsets the cost of enforcement in average cases (but pays off decently with high-dollar awards).

And this leads to the lowest priority collection of all: the non-custodial mother on welfare. An attorney friend of mine was trying to get a judge to sanction a woman who refused to pay her ex a single dime, was tens of thousands in arrears, and apparently getting high on a regular basis. The judge would not do anything. He wouldn't lift a finger in the case. The reason for this is simple: enforcement would be unlikely to collect any more than a pittance, and this wouldn't even offset state costs because the father was employed. On the contrary, it might simply cost more, so why bother? As far as the judge was concerned, he wasn't going to do anything that wouldn't help pay his salary.

By now, it's pretty clear there are incentives on the table for child support enforcement officers, judges, attorneys, and others in the state system. The first is collection of state funds from men whose children are receiving state aid, and the second is collection of federal matching funds for every dollar collected. The former leads to courthouse shakedowns of poor men, and the latter to setting unreasonably high awards.

If you're curious about the process in real life, the following exchange, which I came across on the Straight Dope message board some time ago, struck me as illuminating:

> Oakminster
>
> I used to lock up deadbeats at pretty much every court date back when I did child support enforcement for the state. I worked a circuit of multiple counties, often before the same judge. All child support cases in a particular county would be set on the same day, usually a motion day. I'd fill the courtroom with defendants. Judge would let me pick any of my cases to go first, and I'd always pick the worst deadbeat of the lot. We'd have a short trial, he'd be found to be in willful, deliberate, and contumacious contempt, and the bailiff would shackle the guy on the spot and lead him away. The judge would then announce that he'd be leaving the bench to deal with other matters, and encourage the remaining defendants to see if maybe they could work something out with Mr. Oakminster, otherwise he'd be back to hear the next case in a few minutes.
>
> Heh. Talk about shaking the money tree. Had guys falling over themselves to pay up. Especially in the summer time. It's mighty hot in the deep South, and some rural jails are not air conditioned…..

And the response from another attorney:

> Beniamino
>
> I love this! I'll pass that along to the county solicitors here; they'd get a chuckle out of it. In the Family Division Courthouse here, we have support contempts pretty much every Friday, and there's never more than a handful of cases at once, so you lose that "deterrent" effect. But what we do have is the holding cell clear at the other end of the building, so the defendants have to be paraded all the way across the floor in their orange jumpsuits and ankle and wrist shackles, past all the other support defendants who happen to be there awaiting their establishment/modification hearings. The message: "This could be you".

So there you have it: a couple attorneys openly admitting that the entire operation is a setup and a shakedown, in which state counsel beats up on poor men who can't afford a lawyer. It's really a travesty of justice, and makes a mockery of the concept of liberty.

Finally, a couple years after Oakminster made that post, someone else (not me) found it and took him to task for his attitude, asking him how he could face himself after treating unfortunate men in that manner. His response, in which he admits that helping custodial parents and children is an afterthought at most, puts it all in perspective:

> > jexter
> >
> > Absolutely incredible you can look in the mirror each day.
>
> Oakminster
>
> It was my first law job. I was good at it. Saved/recovered taxpayer dollars by enforcing court ordered support obligations, establishing paternity, and in some small way making life better for children and custodial parents in the process. I don't have any regrets about those cases.

What the lovely Oakminster describes above is pretty much how things were for a couple decades, but a recent Supreme Court decision – Turner v. Rogers – called this state of affairs into question. A man named Michael Turner, who had been in and out of jail on child support contempt cases for much of the last decade, argued that if he was going to be jailed, he should have the right to counsel. Ultimately, the court found that because it was a civil rather than criminal contempt case, Turner did not have the right to counsel, but to ensure that his 14th amendment rights weren't violated states should adopt guidelines that prevent incarceration of men who do not have the ability to pay.

While I first thought it was a bit of a cop-out on the part of SCOTUS (I would have preferred right to counsel), over time it has become apparent that this finding did in fact make some significant changes. The practice of summarily jailing parents in arrears appears to be in steep decline, with the Obama administration openly calling into question whether it is appropriate to jail fathers who cannot afford to pay child support. Finally, it looks like some sanity has begun to return to the discussion.

However, this doesn't mean that noncustodial parents are out of the woods yet. Not even close. Awards remain excessive, extortion by mothers using claims of physical and/or sexual abuse and other forms of slander/perjury is still a common tactic in the courtroom, and coercion is still the rule. Although contempt jailings are in decline, you can still easily end up in jail due to a license suspension. This is what had me worried last month. While I was (probably) not at risk for a civil contempt charge, I was facing license suspension due to being in arrears and missing a couple recent payments, partly because of a foulup in the online payment system I'm accustomed to using. If my license had been suspended and I didn't realize it at the time, I could have been pulled over, and I would have gone directly to jail. Not for child support, mind you, but for driving with a suspended license. This would have been a serious headache, and it does happen to a lot of guys who aren't paying close attention, or who missed notification due to a move or some administrative mistake (e.g. website malfunction like Obamacare).

So while the child support enforcement system is evolving, it still has a long ways to go toward becoming fair and humane. The main impediment at the moment remains the Bradley amendment, which is an atrocious piece of legislation that creates a form of federally-sanctioned piracy on the part of state child support enforcement agencies. If there is any reason for optimism, it is that both political parties are undergoing a fundamental shift, and the formerly critical feminist component of the Democratic party is losing ground to a mainly non-white coalition that is disproportionately harmed by predatory enforcement practices (e.g. a black or Hispanic woman whose partner is shackled with permanent debt to the state because of a previous child), and will probably be happy to see them go. Republicans, for their part, are generally the party of married, private sector workers, so they don't have as much of a stake in child support policy, and I doubt they'd put up a fight if Democrats had a change of heart on the issue.

What? Me, Married?

W.F. Price · 7 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jabberwocky asked me to write a bit about my marriage and how it's been, and I think that's a fair question, given that I've written a lot about marriage, including plenty of criticism as well as attempts to reform the institution.

He also showed some insight into my character, such as the fact that bachelorhood doesn't come naturally to me. This is true. Following my divorce, I avoided women for a few years because I was still recovering from the trauma it caused. I think that was a good thing, as it allowed me to focus on my kids and rebuilding my life (as well as building The Spearhead) without drama or distraction. However, by the time I started to feel normal, which happened almost exactly three years after my separation, nature once again took its course, and I met my wife.

We're a far better match than my first wife and I were. My first wife and I met when we were quite young, and I had this idea that I would be a normal, middle-class guy who could make a family and grow old in peace, then enjoy old age with grandchildren. I idealized that lifestyle because my parents divorced when I was very young, I grew up witnessing a lot of family turmoil, and had a fairly rebellious and unstable adolescence as a result of that. In my young man's mind, domestic peace and tranquility, decency, modesty and humility were goals to strive for, perhaps partly in defiance of the chaos of my youth.

So I married my ex, thinking all would turn out alright if I believed enough and followed the conventional steps. Although I had some gnawing doubts from the beginning, I figured that since we didn't argue, she seemed fairly loyal and we were both healthy, it would work. We had two kids in quick succession shortly thereafter, and with them this sense of confidence vanished. It turned out that the reason our relationship had worked before was because it was so easy and our needs so few. Suddenly my ex, despite having decent motherly instincts, was "not happy." Our income was much reduced, the babies were loud, I realized my pay was a lot lousier than it seemed before (especially for Seattle), and trouble with the in-laws began to boil over into real resentment. Less than a year after my daughter was born I already had the sense that things were not going to turn out well, and within just six months of that it was over. It was a short marriage. If it were a person, it would have one of those sad little inconspicuous children's tombstones you see at the cemetery which, despite their humility and small profile, are the most arresting of all.

This time, however, I found a woman I really like to talk to. One whose interests coincide with mine, who enjoys my sense of humor, and who says what's on her mind. We both have a love of the written word and are polyglots, covering five languages between the two of us (actually seven or eight if you use a more liberal interpretation), which is a lot of fun if you're into that kind of thing. It doesn't hurt that she has a lovely figure and pretty face with nice brown eyes (I've always liked brown-eyed women), but physical attraction is never enough to keep people happy, despite what some may think, and even the most beautiful women can come to be tiresome.

Another difference is that we openly express disagreement — a lot more than I ever did with my ex. This may sound bad to some, but voicing disagreement is communication. If there's a problem, it's much better to work it out with someone who is willing to argue than someone who will not. If your wife disagrees with you and is not willing or doesn't care enough to argue about it, guess what? Your marriage is in big trouble. It may already be over.

As for my men's issues writing, she sometimes disagrees vehemently, and gives me some grief over it, but she also agrees with a surprising amount. The main sticking points are support for mothers, which I think should be conditional, and she does not, and whether younger women really are sometimes proper for older men (she scoffs at the idea). But she isn't a typical American feminist — she's a NE European, with a more "Mitteleuropa" cultural sensibility, so some of the craziness of Anglo feminism, such as support for throwing women into battle or demanding that women "lean in" seems absurd and backward to her, and the opposite of what she'd call progress. Someone could probably write a book about the myriad philosophical differences between European and American feminism. Interestingly, as a European she's much more of a moderate on the abortion issue than American feminists, seeing abortion as a negative thing overall, especially in the context of small peoples like her own, and thinks the 12 week limit, standard in much of Europe, is adequate (it may surprise people to know that American abortion laws are, in general, more liberal than European ones). All in all, we probably agree more than disagree when it comes to sexual politics, with some notable exceptions.

As for whether she supports me writing about these things, this isn't really an issue. We're both pretty liberal about allowing each other to express ourselves freely, and in any event it's a form of honest work, even if it doesn't pay off all that well (I hope to make some changes in that regard). However, if I were writing obscene or otherwise sexually explicit material, I think that would probably be a dealbreaker, and that's fine by me — it would be unreasonable to expect a wife to tolerate that when I'd never accept it from her.

Will it last? I hope so, but part of marriage these days is accepting that you can only do your part. Actually, I suspect that's always been the case. Read Hosea for some Biblical context on the issue. I've come to understand that if someone really wants to go, the best thing you can do for yourself is to let them have their way and keep a philosophical attitude about it. I believe this is even expressed in the New Testament (1 Corinthians 7:12-16). In other words, I can only keep my promises in that regard, and that's quite enough to ask of one man.

Hopefully, this is enough to satisfy readers' curiosity. In general, I try to keep my family out of things, but since I'm writing about these issues so much it's bound to come up from time to time. As a final little note, we just found out that we're having a boy, God willing.

A Thank You to Readers, and a Little More Disclosure

W.F. Price · 8 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Despite not asking this quarter (I didn't think I should since I took leave for a month), readers have contributed enough to pay for operating costs for the remainder of this quarter. I'd like to let all of you know how much I appreciate the support. Despite my stated intention to make changes, I'm not going to shut down the site as long as readers are offsetting the costs. However, I do want to offer some services (in addition to my own content) that have commercial value, so I can actually make some respectable money off the site and sustain what I've started.

For years before I started The Spearhead, I worked for a small business that published documents and reference books in both print and digital formats. While there, I learned how to put books and documents together, print them and format them for inclusion in databases. It was a niche publisher that sold mainly to universities and government agencies, and was pretty profitable for the owner. It was a lot of work and often tedious, but at times it was fun, and I learned a fair amount by reading the material that passed through my hands.

I also learned a lot about the technical aspects of publishing, and that's something I think could be of value to our online community. I'm just one blogger out of many in the manosphere, and while I have some valuable insights to offer, I know I'm not the only one. However, I am probably one of the few who has experience putting out real publications, and when I look at the enormous amount of content out there on blogs, it's pretty clear that there's a lot of untapped potential.

I think of all the bloggers who write great stuff, but have neither the time nor the know-how required to publish books or studies. Sure, there's the Amazon and Lulu type services out there that will slap something together for you if you send them a Word document, but they're taking a cut, and they don't support or condone our message, nor do they particularly care about our audience, so dealing with them is an annoyance at best, and could sometimes be a risk, especially if you run across someone like the fellow at Automattic who was threatening to "disappear" Heartiste's blog. There really are a lot of petty tyrants among the technocratic class these days. More than I've ever seen before, and I certainly wouldn't trust these people with my work.

It will probably take some time to get my rusty formatting skills back in form, but if I'm going to stay in this business, I'm pretty sure this is the way to go. If I can pull it off, I think we'll see the beginnings of a publishing paradigm that breaks "the narrative" and can stand on its own. While I'd like to be able to say that I'd be happy to publish anything, I don't think I will. Free speech is under serious threat in the US, and at this point we should take the "fight fire with fire" approach. If it turns out that the only way we can make our voices heard over the din is to discriminate in our private venues, then that's what I'll do.

For starters I'm going to keep it simple. Just straightforward books, documents and studies in print and e-book form. That's all I can handle at this point, and there's nothing that guarantees failure like introducing too much complexity to a task. This also means that, unfortunately, I won't be able to edit material. Editing is an important job that takes a lot of effort. I often wish I could afford an editor, but I make do with cursory self-editing (which is never as good) and hope that readers are forgiving. If you do want to publish material, I'd recommend having an editor go over it if you can afford it. If not, do your best yourself, but don't be dumb and expect that just anyone can or will edit for you. For example, if you wouldn't have your carpenter brother-in-law fix your car, why would you expect a web designer or engineer to edit your text?

What I like about the model I've envisioned is that I don't have to own or control other people's content, host their sites, demand their obedience, shove them all into one tent, etc. Instead, I give them a handy tool, some valuable, personalized service, and a common platform where they can sell their wares on an equal footing with others both on my site and at major online retailers like Amazon, Ingram and Barnes and Noble. If all goes well, readers and customers are happy, writers make more sales, and I run a business developing and sustaining the market for the mutual benefit of all involved.

Nearly 70,000 Britons Convicted of Hate Crimes Over Six-Year Period

W.F. Price · 10 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I recently found an article that claims 55,000 British people were convicted of hate crimes in 2011, but that seems to be an error. Rather, it appears that 55,000 people had been convicted by 2011, with that number increasing to around 68,000 by 2012. Nevertheless, this was shocking to me. That's a whole lot of people, but according to the Crown Prosecution Service, it isn't nearly enough, because hate crimes are "underreported" (evidently, the correct number of prosecutions should be on the order of a quarter million per annum). Measures to increase prosecution include, among others, distributing hate crime action material to teachers so that they can identify child hate criminals in their classes and advice to prosecutors on how to best proceed against mentally ill or retarded hate criminals.

In the vast majority of these cases, no harm was done to person or property, although it appears that a great crime against liberty has been committed by the CPS.

Here is an alarming case study, in which secret witnesses (who also had an axe to grind) were used to determine whether a religious publisher had broken the law:

> This year saw the first successful prosecution of stirring up hatred on the grounds of sexual orientation. A jury at Derby Crown Court convicted three men in January 2012 of going beyond the legitimate promotion of religious values because they intentionally set about stirring up hate on the grounds of sexual orientation by producing and distributing a leaflet which was threatening.
>
> The prosecution made use of lay witnesses, from the gay community who received the leaflet and gave evidence about the effect of its receipt and the fact that they were threatened by its content. Special measures (screens) were applied for in respect of the lay witnesses and, due to the level of press interest, a press direction was obtained so that the names and addresses of witnesses could not be published.
>
> The law says: "for the avoidance of doubt, the discussion or criticism of sexual conduct or practices, or the urging of people to refrain from or modify such conduct or practices shall not be taken of itself to be threatening or intended to stir up hatred." This is the freedom of expression defence which means if a juror concludes the document may amount to no more than criticism of homosexuality and/or urging people to refrain from homosexual activity, then it would not be threatening.
>
> The judge in passing sentence said: "Our population is made up of people of all colours, creeds and cultures. For the vast majority of the time, the vast majority of us get along together very well and the greatest freedom that we all enjoy is to live in peace and without fear.
>
> The law has evolved and adapted to protect that freedom. In particular, laws have been passed to prevent written material being distributed which is intended to stir up hatred. This has proved necessary because a small minority of our broad community sometimes seeks to stir up hatred against their fellow citizens merely because those fellow citizens are perceived to be different in some way."

What really puzzles me here is that this level of censorship and repression is what one might expect during wartime, but Britain is not involved in a major war. Or is she? Perhaps the war is against her own people. Those accused of "stirring up hatred" are to be referred to Britain's Counter Terrorism Division, which determines the fate of citizens who are alleged to have used unlawful speech.

In case you were wondering, the overwhelming majority of people turned over to authorities are indigenous Britons:

> The majority of defendants across all hate crime strands were men (82.9%).

> 73.9% of defendants were identified as belonging to the White British category.
>
> 54.2% of defendants were aged between 25-59 and 28.9% between 18-24.
>
> 10-17 year olds involvement as defendants continues to decline from 23.1% in 2007/08 to 14.1% last year.

I don't know how anyone can include Britain in the "free world" with a straight face any longer. The term is a sad anachronism; today just about all that separates CPS from the Cheka is the troikas used for summary executions back in the 1930s. Let's hope it doesn't go there.

White Feminism Nearing Endpoint

W.F. Price · 15 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I have learned so much about the development of feminism at this point that the big picture is coming into sharper focus even as I'm starting to turn my attention to other matters.

For example, I can say with certainty that modern feminism as a mass movement (as opposed to a fringe of disaffected misfits) was born the day that women were included in the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which put all women – even white ones – in the same "disadvantaged" category as minorities. This was the work of a segregationist white, Southern senator who was obviously trying to dilute the impact of affirmative action.

The Civil Rights Act thereby gave companies and feminist activists a financial incentive to promote women of any race. Incentives matter, and quite a lot. Betty Friedan and Gloria Steinem just hopped on the bandwagon — they were merely hucksters who made little – if any – difference.

Now, we are getting to the point where white women are no longer seen as deserving beneficiaries of affirmative action.

In Seattle, of all places, white women's disadvantaged status has been called into question in a major construction project:

> A group of white women is threatening to sue if the Washington State Department of Transportation (WSDOT) removes them from a program that helps women and minority-owned businesses get work on highway projects.
>
> WSDOT hired a consultant to conduct a disparity study last year to determine if women and specific minority groups are continuing to experience discrimination when it comes to being awarded contracts on public works projects.
>
> Colorado-based BBC Research and Consulting issued a 678-page report last May that found firms owned by white women are winning enough jobs and don't need the extra help afforded them in the federal Disadvantaged Business Enterprise (DBE) program. Federal rules give DBEs a leg up on winning contracts on highway projects, as general contractors must hire disadvantaged firms to perform a set percentage of a project.
>
> Many white women who own DBE-certified firms are opposed to the change. A newly formed group, Women in Highway Construction, is threatening a lawsuit, arguing that discrimination is alive and well in Washington state.
>
> "Oh my gosh yes. They (men in the industry) don't want to talk to you, they don't want to deal with you, they're very uncomfortable dealing with you," said Colleen Hallett, who owns Mobile Electrical Distributors in Seattle. "I have salesmen come in here and bypass me and go straight to my male employees even though I'm the boss."
>
> The disparity study found that other minority groups continue to suffer "substantial disparities," including businesses owned by African American, Asian-Pacific Americans, Hispanics, Native Americans and South Asians.
>
> "While the other firms (minority groups) got little to no work, white women-owned firms continued to get work for that time (considered in the study). That was good for that group, but the other firms didn't get much work," said Brenda Nnambi, WSDOT's Director of the Office of Equal Opportunity.
>
> Based on the results of the study, WSDOT is seeking a waiver from the U.S. Department of Transportation to remove white women-owned firms from being counted toward project DBE goals. The waiver is being sought after white women have been included in the program for 31 years.
>
> "The study revealed that Caucasian women-owned firms actually received more contract dollars than > expected," wrote WSDOT Assistant Communications Director Kris Rietmann in a December 16 press release. "Lacking evidence of discrimination against Caucasian women-owned business in the local marketplace, WSDOT cannot include them in contract-specific DBE goals."

This inclusion of women-owned firms under affirmative action has been a great boon to a number of white men who happen to have good wives. Just keep the company in your wife's name, and it qualifies as a "disadvantaged" business. Affirmative action for white women has not done much for singlemoms, but it's made a lot of rich white folks' lives easier (their daughters could take advantage of affirmative action), and it has raised some others into the middle class or above. Those who can keep their marriages together despite having working wives have probably fared best. Overall, due to the negative effects on family formation, it's probably a wash, but possibly somewhat better for whites than if they were entirely denied affirmative action.

But now the jig is up. It had to end eventually. This grand coalition has too many takers today, and something must give. Apparently, that will be white women's privileges under affirmative action.

White women are not taking this graciously:

> "This is a war on white women, and we're not going to take it sitting down," said Mary Guthmiller, who owns DBE Electric. "It's going to cost the state of Washington a lot more grief and trouble to fight an injunctive action which we are willing to take if necessary to protect our right to be able to exist as businesses and participate in the program that we fought hard alongside our other minority businesses to even have any little bit of this construction dollar."
>
> At a public meeting Thursday in Shoreline, women told WSDOT officials the study which showed white women are not discriminated against is flawed. They cited several examples including that not enough women were interviewed for the report. Many also complained that the study counted inflated contract dollar amounts won by white women-owned businesses. The consultant counted the contract amounts promised to white women, not what was actually paid.

I'm afraid the white women are going to lose this battle. Today, white women are outnumbered by nonwhites in the Democrat coalition, and the numbers count. I've predicted for years now that ethnic concerns would eventually trump sexual politics, but I think a lot of people will be surprised by how quickly white women abandon feminism when it no longer provides them with any material benefits. This hasn't quite come to pass yet, but the writing is on the wall.

More of the Same From Michael Kimmel

W.F. Price · 17 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Kimmel has made a career out of pushing policies that do vastly more harm than good to children, and directly harm the American people, but still he manages to portray himself as the voice of reason. There's some blame to go around here for that, and as the publisher of this site I'll have to take some of the share of it (more on that below), but it's still my duty to expose the damage Kimmel does to society.

First, I should say that writing with rage and anger may be understandable, and justified in many cases, but it gives deceivers like Kimmel the upper hand. All he needs to do is sit back and point, saying: "see? Look how angry they are! I told you so!" Apparently, this is the theme of his newest book.

Provoking people and then crying for help is an age-old trick and often used in divorce, primarily by women due to the fact that an angry woman doesn't frighten people or command attention like an angry man. However, men with a dispassionate or effeminate nature can also take advantage of it.

In his book, Kimmel used an article written here on The Spearhead written by Paul Elam to portray MRAs as irrational men who are in a rage because they feel their privilege is under threat, or because they cannot control women. I've found that having men desire to control them is a powerful female fantasy, which is why bondage and harems so often figure into "romance novels" and other female literature, so perhaps Kimmel is simply trying to take advantage of this instinct by incorporating bondage into academic literature. Not a bad idea, actually. If he wrote case studies of dominant men who demand utter submission from lovers he could probably find a pretty good market, and perhaps even make some money in popular entertainment.

On the other hand, rage writing is often appealing to men. Think of the Iliad, which is filled with descriptions of rage and the excesses of the battlefield, and has endured for thousands of years as a popular account of the Trojan War. I'm sure there were far less passionate accounts of the conflict, but they have been lost to posterity. Because of this, I used to be pretty tolerant about allowing people to post those kinds of rage articles, but over time I've come to see that radicals on both sides are playing a game in which the majority loses, including most children. In fact, as I get older the entire thing is starting to look infantile to me. Both sides are acting like babies, and if it weren't for the fact that feminists like Kimmel are mainly responsible for this state of affairs, I'd be tempted to tell them all to go to hell.

But it is indeed the feminists who bear the greater share of the blame, so about all I can say about some of the excesses of some MRAs is that it's unfortunate self-indulgence, and should be frowned upon even if it is understandable. My own rage peaked about when I found out my former mother-in-law prompted a false accusation of domestic violence that almost got me shot. She had the gall to come to my house after that, and I lost my temper when she grinned at me over the incident, cursing and saying things I really shouldn't have said. Sure, that's understandable; who wouldn't be angry? But I should have kept my mouth shut given the circumstances. It was exactly her intent to break me down, and my temporary loss of self-possession was a victory for her. It showed a weakness on my part that I'm still a bit ashamed of. In a better world, I would have kept my cool, collected the evidence and sued her for substantial damages.

But we don't live in a perfect world, and never will, so the Michael Kimmels of the world will likely continue to get away with falsely portraying men who are upset over the screwed-up family law system as irrational, dangerous people who are angry over nothing but the loss of their privilege. It's an astonishing lie, but often those are the most effective ones, and unfortunately a lot of MRAs feed into that impression.

But instead of denouncing those on my side, I'd like to focus attention on Kimmel, and remind readers and anyone else who might come across this article that he has been a tireless proponent of empowering women at the expense of everyone else for the entirety of his academic career. His critiques of men are not limited merely to cultural issues, which are sometimes dysfunctional and fair game for criticism, but men's normal human nature. He argues for a new man that is no man at all, and thereby does a great disservice to the vast middle of normal men. Like most feminists, he sets the bar for proper male behavior so low that only the least masculine can crawl beneath it, which necessarily puts the rest of us in a difficult situation.

In doing so he and his feminist cohort all but guarantee the continued, steady destruction of the normal, patriarchal American family, which ensures the ongoing decline in the living standards and outcomes of the average American child. But does any of this concern him? Not at all. He simply doubles down and keeps at it, attacking men in general, white men in particular, and, one gets the impression, middle-class white men most of all. A true friend of the elite, this Kimmel — a hero of the new aristocracy, putting the vile mediocrities who make up the majority of America in their proper, lower place.

And what better way to do that than to see to it that their children do not have the benefit of living with their father? Does the vastly more prevalent child abuse, sexual assault, child murder, neglect and poverty of single mother homes concern Kimmel? It doesn't appear so. Perhaps he sees it as a feature rather than a bug. In any event, bashing on unfashionable working men is a good living these days, children be damned!

We're finally getting to the point where guys like Kimmel no longer control the narrative as they used to, so maybe it's time to put aside the attention-grabbing antics and belligerent rhetoric and get down to the work of mopping up the mess. So from here on out, perhaps a bit less of the self-indulgent rage and a little more self-control is in order. People are open to calls for a return to civility, so maybe we should make the first move, but all the while continue to point out the radical selfishness and vast social harm of feminism.

Facebook Hatecrime in Seattle: Man Arrested for online Rant Against Gays, Feminists, Socialists

W.F. Price · 18 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

While writing about hate crime prosecutions in the UK, which are nearing 100,000, it occurred to me that mentally ill, retarded and alcoholic people are probably vastly overrepresented among hate criminals. Most people, whether they agree with the prevailing political climate or not, have enough self-control to keep their thoughts to themselves if they know that they might violate protocol. However, crazy people, drunks and not-so-bright people often have a hard time doing this.

So when I saw on the news that Mitchell Taylor, a 32-year-old Seattle man, was arrested for making threats against Seattle's gay mayor and our socialist councilwoman Sawant, I suspected that he'd turn out to have some mental issues. According to the defense attorney, he has aspergers and hasn't been taking his meds, but I don't think aspergers calls for medication, so he's probably prone to psychotic episodes. After checking his facebook page, I noticed that he quotes Satan, and he made references to hell in his threats, telling Mayor Murray to "meet Harvey Milk." He also wrote "death to socialist councilmember," and made some antifeminist statements along similar lines.

For these threats, posted under his name on his account, he has been jailed and is being held on $600,000 bail, which is what you might expect in a murder case. There was a case last summer in which a young man was arrested in Texas for a similar indiscretion, and his bail was set at $500,000, so this isn't unprecedented, but sometimes I wonder what is the real point behind these arrests and the enormous bail. Is it deterrence, to show people who might really be thinking about assassinating gay mayors and socialist city councilwomen that the police are looking for them, or is it a real fear that people like Mr. Taylor will actually act on their Facebook posts? If it's the former, it might make some sense, but then it simply raises the stakes, but if the latter I wonder how our officials could be so credulous. As far as I know, nobody has ever followed through on an assassination or act of terrorism posted to their Facebook page. There is, however, a third possibility: the judge wants to force the guy to undergo a mental evaluation and thereby prevent him from accessing weapons (civil commitment makes people ineligible for firearms possession in Washington state).

Not long ago, a man did attempt to commit a real terrorist act in a Seattle gay club. He tried to start a fire in the club on New Years' Eve, and if it had worked lots of people – hundreds, possibly – could have died. I'm actually quite surprised it didn't make the national news. Fortunately, someone managed to stamp it out before it flared up, but the arsonist remains at large. This may have something to do with the high bail set in Mr. Taylor's case. The man who set the fire could also have been mentally disturbed, but there's no evidence (as of yet) that anyone made any threats before the incident.

Unfortunately, I think we're headed toward a time where these kinds of things will become more common. When you introduce more stressors to society people start to act out. First, it's the mentally ill, next those with impaired executive function, and finally the committed radical ideologues, who are most likely to successfully pull something off. However, as this happens, expect those who dissent – even peacefully – to be blamed for it. Merely holding views that run contrary to the party in power will be perceived as grounds for punishment. In fact, in comments under the Seattle Times article about Mitchell Taylor, a number of people seem to think he deserves jail time for being a "bigot" rather than for making illegal threats (which has not been established yet).

But all of this is a catalyst for change. Those in power up the ante, people begin to act out, and the authorities' response to misbehavior is disproportionate, leading to even more social anxiety, followed by more repression in a cycle of radicalization. Ultimately, you end up with a great deal of political instability, a breakdown in social order, and then finally a sweeping political transition. The last time that happened in this country was the 1970s, when the new left, which came into its own after the 1968 Chicago DNC riots, started its march to power.

It’s impossible to predict the future, but I like to think we can get a rough idea of where things are going by using the past as a reference. If so, perhaps the ravings of lunatics are indeed a form of prophecy.

Gay-Skeptical Bachelor Star Smeared Over Child Support Arrears

W.F. Price · 19 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Following some rather moderate, but politically suspect statements about gay relationships and whether they should be portrayed on TV, Juan Pablo Galavis has faced a lot of hysterical screeching from the usual quarters. On one entertainment site, he is being attacked for having gone into arrears on his child support for a child he fathered out of wedlock. Apparently, while he was playing soccer for Miami FC, he got a hot Latina actress named Carla Rodriguez pregnant, and then resigned from his soccer career. That doesn't sound quite right to me. If he's 32 today, and he resigned in 2008, then he would have been in his prime when he quit. Somehow, I kind of doubt he resigned from a successful career, but rather was forced to quit because it wasn't going anywhere. One of my cousins played pro soccer for some time, but a recurrent injury forced him out relatively early. It's nothing to be ashamed of, but a lot of guys drift a bit after playing pro sports (my cousin was lucky — he found a good job almost immediately).

It seems Juan Pablo and Ms. Rodriguez didn't last, and he was eventually ordered to pay pay back child support of a few thousand dollars. Not much, really, but enough to be scandalous by the standards of the pop site "Radar":

> The Florida Department of Revenue's Child Support Enforcement Program slapped Juan Pablo with an income deduction order, requiring employers to automatically deduct $243.94 per month for child support, plus $49.00 per month for retroactive child support until the outstanding balance of $3,574.57 was paid.
>
> "Juan Pablo has been hoping that news of his court-ordered child support didn't get out because he doesn't want 'Bachelor' fans finding out he's not the perfect father he portrays himself to be," a source revealed.

I think this idea that Mr. Galavis is ashamed over owing arrears is ridiculous. There's no such thing as a "perfect father," and anyone who has had a kid for a few years knows that. However, there is one reason he might be a bit embarrassed: the award shows his poverty in 2011. At $244/month, his pre-tax earnings under the Florida child support calculator would be about 1,000/month, or below the federal poverty guideline. That figure jumped out at me when I read it, because I was ordered to pay significantly more when I had zero income (imputation). Nevertheless, Washington state actually has a lower guideline than Florida.

So it looks like Ms. Rodriguez had a child with him, and then moved on because he was broke, possibly in an attempt to pursue the "alpha fux beta bux" strategy. Seeing him on Bachelor is probably driving her absolutely batty right now. I can only imagine the calls she is making to lawyers in an attempt to jack up the child support through the stratosphere. Poor Galavis — he's in for a rough time in court after this show.

Ordinarily, I wouldn't pay much attention to this celebrity stuff, but this gay thing is getting out of hand, and it's impossible to avoid it these days. Despite being quite tolerant in my personal life, I'm starting to have second thoughts about whether this official celebration and promotion of homosexuality is harmless after all. If one can't even publicly voice skepticism about gay marriage – which I think is a contradiction in terms – then who is truly "intolerant?"

Wendy Davis Shows How You Climb the Ladder, Feminist Style

W.F. Price · 19 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Relatively young and attractive, Texas politician Wendy Davis has made an impression by bringing yankee-style Democratic politics to the Texas state senate. Now, the ambitious blonde is aiming for the governor's office in the traditionally Republican state. A major part of the image she's running on is her self-made single teen mother story, which plays very well to elderly Northeastern Democrats, hence her favorable coverage in media outlets such as the NY Times. It helps, that she also has a degree from Harvard, but until recently the story behind how she got it has remained unchallenged.

The Dallas Morning News helps set the record straight.

First, she never was a single teen mother. In fact, she was married when she had her first child, and divorced her husband at the age of 21.

What she said:

> The candidate's compelling life story begins with 14-year-old Wendy Russell working to help support her single mother in Tarrant County. While still a teenager, Davis married, had a child and divorced, she has said.
>
> "I had a baby. I got divorced by the time I was 19 years old," she testified in a recent federal lawsuit over redistricting. "After I got divorced, I lived in a mobile home park in southeast Fort Worth."
>
> As a working mother raising a daughter, Davis enrolled in Tarrant County Community College.
>
> "With the help of academic scholarships and student loans, Wendy not only became the first person in her family to earn a bachelor's degree but graduated first in her class and was accepted to Harvard Law School," her website says.

The truth:

> There's no question Davis struggled financially. When her parents separated, her father, Jerry Russell, started a sandwich shop and fledgling dinner theater.
>
> "While he lived that passion, he never made money again and was never able to comply with the terms of my parents' divorce," she said. "What it meant for us financially is that things … completely turned upside down, and it was a real struggle. My brothers and I went to work young — and it was out of necessity, not about wanting to have a little bit of spending money."
>
> She was 17 and still in high school when she moved in with her boyfriend, a construction worker named Frank Underwood. She got pregnant, married and "some time between [age] 19 and 20 was when Frank and I separated," she said.
>
> Davis remained in the mobile home a few months, then moved in with her mother before getting her own apartment. She got custody of her daughter, Amber, and Underwood was ordered to pay child support.
>
> Under terms of the divorce, he got a boat, the mobile home and the responsibility for the mortgage on it. She got a 3-year-old Pontiac Grand Prix, a 1972 Firebird and a 1967 Chevy pickup. Davis was 21.

Very soon after her divorce, her father introduced her to an older man named Jeff Davis. Mr. Davis, a 34-year-old lawyer, began dating her, and married her within a couple years, when she was 24 years old. By this time, she had enrolled at Texas Christian University, and her new husband paid her tuition at the college. After graduating, she was accepted into Harvard Law School, which Mr. Davis also funded by cashing in his 401(k) and taking out a loan. In the meanwhile, he worked hard and took care of her daughters back in Texas while she worked on her Harvard degree.

In the years after Wendy Davis graduated from Harvard, her husband continued to pay off the loan that put her through Harvard and to be a father to her children.

This is what happened next:

> Over time, the Davises' marriage was strained. In November 2003, Wendy Davis moved out.
>
> Jeff Davis said that was right around the time the final payment on their Harvard Law School loan was due. "It was ironic," he said. "I made the last payment, and it was the next day she left."
>
> Wendy Davis said that as a lawyer, she contributed too.
>
> "I was a vibrant part of contributing to our family finances from the time I graduated to the time we separated in 2003," she said. "The idea that suddenly there was this instantaneous departure after Jeff had partnered so beautifully with me in putting me through school is just absurd."
>
> In his initial divorce filing, Jeff Davis said the marriage had failed, citing adultery on her part and conflicts that the couple could not overcome. The final court decree makes no mention of infidelity, granting the divorce solely "on the ground of insupportability."

Ah, the doleful life of the dutiful husband.

Despite having little regard for her politics, I have no doubt that Ms. Davis is an intelligent, ambitious and talented woman. She may be an effective politician, and a good advocate for her constituents. However, the missing part of the narrative is that she got where she is today by stepping on the back of a man. A man she used for selfish purposes, then betrayed.

That's what feminists call "heroism."

On the Dark Enlightenment

W.F. Price · 20 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I recently came across a link tweeted by Heartiste that points to an amusing article by some British "think tank" flunkey named Jamie Bartlett. Mr. Bartlett warns that the "Dark Enlightenment" is spreading fast, and followed by "angry white men," who must not be so angry, because he also describes them as "patiently awaiting the collapse…".

> Since 2012 a sophisticated but bizarre online neo-fascist movement has been growing fast. It's called "The Dark Enlightenment". Its modus operandi is well suited to today's world. Supporters are dotted all over the world, connected via a handful of blogs and chat rooms. Its adherents are clever, angry white men patiently awaiting the collapse of civilisation, and a return to some kind of futuristic, ethno-centric feudalism.
>
> It started, suitably enough, with two blogs. Mencius Moldbug, a prolific blogger and computer whizz from San Francisco, and Nick Land, an eccentric British philosopher (previously co-founder of Warwick University's Cybernetic Culture Research Unit) who in 2012 wrote the eponymous "The Dark Enlightenment", as a series of posts on his site. You can find them all here.
>
> The philosophy, difficult to pin down exactly, is a loose collection of neo-reactionary ideas, meaning a rejection of most modern thinking: democracy, liberty, and equality. Particular contempt is reserved for democracy, which Land believes "systematically consolidate[s] and exacerbate[es] private vices, resentments, and deficiencies until they reach the level of collective criminality and comprehensive social corruption."

Having been immersed in this online world for a few years now, I find it laughable that Bartlett is calling this a new movement. Moldbug, as far as I know, has been writing for seven odd years, Heartiste for about as long, and Steve Sailer (not mentioned here but surely part of this Dark Enlightenment) since the early 90s.

Some time ago, the Habitable Worlds blog posted a chart of the Dark Enlightenment network, which is worth a look if you'd like to check out some of the different nodes of this loose coalition. The Spearhead is included, as is Dalrock's blog, Heartiste, Chuck Ross, Hawaiian Libertarian and others readers may be familiar with. Personally, I am flattered to be included in the list along with other writers I admire, but I think some people may take it out of context, and attach more importance to the classification than is warranted.

I spent some time today reacquainting myself with Mencius Moldbug and catching up on Nick Land's writing, and I found myself in agreement with both on many points. I agree with Moldbug, for example, that modern progressivism is an outgrowth of radical Calvinism. I've argued on several occasions that equalism is nothing more than secularized Christian dogma. While I'd like to take credit for this argument (I did come up with it on my own), I think anyone with a solid background in international history and some familiarity with Abrahamic religions could easily ascertain the same themselves. If anything, these similarities lead me to believe that those of us classed as "Dark Enlightenment" bloggers have been thinking along similar lines for some time, probably because we're generally correct about these matters and have come to similar conclusions (a sort of convergent evolution).

However, this doesn't mean we are all the same by any means. Dalrock is a Christian Texan, while Moldbug is evidently an atheist of Jewish descent. Nick Land is a British futurist, while Dennis Mangan is a solid conservative skeptic. It's a pretty motley crew — hardly representative of some "neo-fascist" movement, as Mr. Bartlett would have his readers believe.

There are also pretty wide differences in style, and disagreements on certain of the finer points. I, for example, don't believe that "progressivism" has always been equalist, at least in regards to race, or that race is even so central to contemporary politics as it appears. Instead, I think it serves as a foil; a sort of tool for expiating guilt and shifting blame onto the less fortunate. My evidence for this is that the whiter and more affluent any given region is, the more politically correct it is outwardly. The same holds throughout just about any segment of society. Is a religion comprised mainly of rich white people (e.g. Episcopalianism)? Then it will surely be extremely liberal and politically correct, filled only with the beautiful people. Are most adherents simple, salt-of-the-earth commoners (Evangelicals)? Vile rednecks and bigots the lot of them! In fact, I think the move away from racial politics toward sexual politics reflects the imminent failure of the black/white polarization of the US that began with the Civil Rights era, and apparently the Southern Poverty Law Center Agrees with me — the organization has shifted toward LGBT rights even as it scales down its traditionally black-oriented legal program. Trayvon Martin and Paula Deen notwithstanding, the bulk of the American people are getting tired of racial politics. Racial diversity, it seems, has become mundane in its triumph.

What I see separating those of us associated with the Dark Enlightenment from the establishment is, above all, class. We are representative of the middle class, which has been under assault for almost fifty years in the US. We, despite some individual success stories, are the losers in the growing inequality of the US. Our status is much reduced, the “aristocracy” more dominant than ever. The war against the American yeomanry, waged with what Sam Francis called “anarcho-tyranny,” has been a smashing victory. The outward values of the aristocracy, whether “racial equality,” “gender equality,” or even the equality of gay and straight sex, are merely self-serving tools, and would quickly be dropped if they had no use. I have discovered that, in holding views that run contrary to human nature (yes, preference for one’s own kind is a perfectly normal human instinct), they set up a strawman that deflects attention from themselves and their naked self-aggrandizement at our expense. What better way to loot the country without resistance than to incite the people by holding up, say, sodomy as an example for their children, and have them expend all their energy fighting this manufactured outrage?

So the Dark Enlightenment is really a proto-revolutionary intellectual movement, drawing from disparate segments of the disenfranchised yeomanry, but I think it still has some ways to go toward identifying the correct priorities.

However, personally, I like to think of it as a great opportunity to finally free ourselves from constraints. How often is it that a generation is alienated enough to finally have the chance to speak its mind unfettered? The growth in popularity of our way of thinking and our blogs is a result of the fact that so many talented people have been alienated by the regime that we are getting to the point where we have better writers, better ideas and, more importantly, the truth on our side. If people only wanted to read about Scott Stossel soiling himself, or to watch Lena Dunham’s exhibitionism, then nobody would be reading our sites. As it is, we have a lot of readers, and more every day. We may not be Duck Dynasty at this point, but hey, I’ll bet there’s some crossover there.

Things are looking up.

Florida Mother Celebrates Teenage Son's High School Gay Porn Career

W.F. Price · 21 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A young Florida man named Robert Marucci is fighting his expulsion from school, allegedly for holding a job as a pornographer on the side, which his mother fully endorses. According to his mother, he took on the role of "man of the house" and has been supporting her financially with his porn earnings.

> Robert Marucci makes no apologies for performing in porn and considers his work like any other job. Until two weeks ago, the 18-year-old was like any other high school senior, but he said when students at Cocoa High School discovered his videos on an adult website, they started showing each other his explicit pictures on their phones at school.
>
> [...]
>
> His mother, Melyssa Lieb, said she knew her son was working in adult films, adding that he took the roles to support her financially.
>
> "I think he's the most awesome person in the world," she said. "He stood up and he was the man of the house when I couldn't be."

I don't know whether it's worse that his mother supports it enthusiastically – even to the point where one might suspect she pimps the boy out – or that dozens of students reportedly staged a rally in his support.

I can't blame the school for trying to remove him from campus, as the liability issues are enormous. High school student porn + teachers can easily equal decades of time in federal prison, as my family and I recently saw with the arrest of my stepdad's former colleague. It's really a very, very serious matter. And of course, the potential for lawsuits is enormous. Nevertheless, they probably don't have the right to kick him out for legal work.

This is one of the "social stressors" I was writing about the other day. When there is so much support for two practically contradictory policies, something has to give. This is the perfect case in point. A young man, just barely of legal age, engages in pornography to general acclaim, whereas a boy or girls less than a year younger doing the same warrants federal prosecution with much public approval of the harsh measures. It's a form of cultural insanity, and we should all be concerned about the implications.

Lena Dunham's Nudity as Handicap Principle

W.F. Price · 23 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A couple weeks ago, I came across an interview questioning Lena Dunham's decision to take her clothes off in Girls despite the fact that she has an odd, unattractive figure. Lena Dunham is not merely "average," but rather sub-average in that department. It's nothing to be ashamed of, but most people would tend to compensate for a deficiency by trying to make up for it in other ways. Dunham, however, does the opposite, taking every opportunity to display herself nude.

From a rational perspective, we might think this is counterproductive behavior. She will alienate viewers, inspire disgust and generally turn people off. However, something else has happened. Dunham has gained quite a following, and is held up as a hero by the socially dominant in-crowd of entertainers.

When Tim Molloy, a reporter from The Wrap, asked her what the point of the nudity was, he immediately provoked a hostile reaction from Dunham and her friends:

> At yesterday's Television Critics Association winter press tour, a panel for HBO's Girls became a tense battleground when The Wrap's Tim Molloy kicked off the event by asking creator Lena Dunham why so many of the show's characters were naked all the time.
>
> "I don't get the purpose of all of the nudity on the show, by you particularly, and I feel like I'm walking into a trap where you go, 'Nobody complains about the nudity on Game of Thrones,' but I get why they are doing it," Molloy said. "They are doing it to be salacious and, you know, titillate people. And your character is often naked just at random times for no reason."
>
> The reaction from the panelists — which included Dunham and the three other main Girls cast members and executive producers Jenni Konner and Judd Apatow — was swift.
>
> [...]
>
> Apatow verbally pounced on Molloy, as seen from the following transcript snippet:
>
> JUDD APATOW: Do you have a girlfriend?
>
> TIM MOLLOY: Yeah.
>
> JA: Does she like you?
>
> TM: Sure.
>
> JA: OK. Let's see how she likes you when you quote that with your question, and just write the whole question as you stated it.
>
> TM: Well, ask tell me —
>
> JA: Then tell me how it goes tonight.
>
> TM: Tell me why it's wrong.
>
> JENNI KONNER: Maybe she's a misogynist.
>
> JA: Let's move on to the next question.
>
> Later, Konner went back to the earlier incident while answering a question about being creatively flexible with the show.
> JK: I literally was spacing out because I'm in such a rage spiral about that guy that I literally could not hear. I'm so sorry. I really don't mean to disrespect you. I just was looking at him and going into this rage, this idea that you would talk to a woman like that and accuse a woman of showing her body too much. The idea, it just makes me sort of sick, and so I apologize to everyone. I'm going to try to focus now, but if I space out, it will be because of that guy. And I'm really interested in what publication you are from.

> [...]
>
> Molloy then wrote a piece for The Wrap to explain his position, noting that following the panel, executive producer Judd Apatow told him that his line of questioning was “sexist, offensive, and misogynistic.”

The hapless reporter was subjected to a smackdown live on TV, all for daring to ask a fairly mild question about one of the defining aspects of Girls.

The response to his question was illustrative. The idea that he could dare to ask Lena Dunham “why?” was met with a torrent of abuse. Because Lena Dunham is socially dominant. In this context, we see the reason for her nudity in the show. Because she can afford it.

Could some wannabe starlet from Texas pull it off? Not a chance. Judd Apatow would stand by with a smirk as she was eviscerated for baring it all. So would Jenni Konner. Some little nobody from the hinterlands would not have the social cred to shed her clothes in public. Lena Dunham’s nudity doesn’t have anything to do with “ordinary women,” but rather extraordinary people and what they can get away with. Lena Dunham is saying “look, I can take off my clothes and expose my unattractive body, and people will applaud, damnit!” It’s a powerful demonstration of social superiority, and a clear example of the handicap principle:

> The handicap principle is a hypothesis originally proposed in 1975 by biologist Amotz Zahavi to explain how evolution may lead to “honest” or reliable signaling between animals which have an obvious motivation to bluff or deceive each other.[1][2][3] The handicap principle suggests that reliable signals must be costly to the signaler, costing the signaler something that could not be afforded by an individual with less of a particular trait. For example, in the case of sexual selection, the theory suggests that animals of greater biological fitness signal this status through handicapping behaviour or morphology that effectively lowers this quality. The central idea is that sexually selected traits function like conspicuous consumption, signalling the ability to afford to squander a resource simply by squandering it. Receivers know that the signal indicates quality because inferior quality signallers cannot afford to produce such wastefully extravagant signals…

By showing that she can afford to be ugly and yet still be on TV, Lena Dunham is signaling greater fitness than other women. It’s a bit counterintuitive, but it makes sense if you think of what might happen if a lower-status actress from a lower-status part of the US tried to do the same. Her career would be over right at that moment, and nobody would bat an eyelash.

I’ve noticed more examples of the handicap principle at work in popular culture and the media as the class gap widens in the US. Scott Stossel, for example, recently wrote an article for The Atlantic in which he discusses his struggles with anxiety. You might think the article was an effort to bring a sometimes debilitating condition to light so as to offer some help to people afflicted by it, but instead it was a navel gazing expose of Stossel’s drug and alcohol abuse, incidents in which he shits himself and retches for hours and family dysfunction. However, throughout the essay, he drops allusions to his status, his high-class background and his professional success. We learn that despite his considerable handicaps, Stossel is still far better than most of us. He might as well be saying: “Look at me! I’m a pill-popping, scotch guzzling neurotic who has a better job and knows fancier people than you ever will.”

The sad thing about this is that it actually does work. Lena Dunham and Scott Stossel are admired by people. The assumption is that they are admired because they are ordinary people, but this is not true. They are admired because they are extraordinary outliers — people who can get away with things that would put most of us in a mental institution or on the street.

Does Breakdown of Traditional Relationship Model Encourage Paraphilias?

W.F. Price · 24 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've never before seen so many men who are into "alternative" sexual behavior in my life as I see today. Weird fetishes from child porn to bronies seem to abound, or is it just media attention? I can't say for sure at this point, but it's hard to shake the feeling that there are indeed a lot more odd obsessions out there than there used to be.

While this is speculation, I wonder whether societies in which relatively few men are involved in stable relationships with women tend to end up this way. Sexual energy is, more or less, a constant variable. Remove the traditional outlet, and it's bound to discharge elsewhere.

As I see men hauled off for child porn on the news, insane love affairs with cartoon characters and other abnormal expressions of lust, I wonder whether this would be so much of a problem if more men were paired off with women. Probably not.

When we talk about sexual freedom and its benefits, it seems we ignore the costs. When the number of unattached men hits critical mass, and we're headed in that direction, sexual order breaks down, and people begin to behave like pigs at the trough.

Yeomanry vs. Aristocracy

W.F. Price · 24 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Writing for the Washington Free Beacon, Matthew Continetti paints a picture of an American political aristocracy possessed of a childish lack of self-awareness:

> …I am referring to the cringe-inducing moments of false modesty. Wagner complains, "Every trip to the high-end knife shop in D.C.'s Union Market 'costs us about $500.'" Weisberg reports, "Friends describe Kass as reserved," despite the celebrity chef's multiple television credits. Weisberg writes, "Their ideal Saturday night is dinner with friends—not a red-carpet event," and then, in the very next sentence, notes, "In October, they attended the News and Documentary Emmys, at which Wagner was nominated, but sneaked in a side door to avoid the cameras." Wagner describes her horror when she broke a heel on the way to a job interview with George Clooney (she got the job). Mention is made of Kass's five post-college odyssey years, "cooking and eating his way around the world," including "planting corn with Zapatista farmers in Mexico." Weisberg describes Michelle Obama circa 2005-2006 as "an overtaxed working mom."
>
> But it would be a mistake to stop at the first read, for the reader to limit himself to his immediate reaction. Whatever emotions the article provokes, wherever one stands on the political spectrum, upon closer examination Weisberg's text becomes a discomfiting ethnography of contemporary meritocracy, an acid test of how power is transacted in America today. Our politicians and celebrities, Democrat and Republican, paint an ideal picture of life where one's success depends on hard work and initiative bolstered by community; where all Americans begin the race of life on an equal footing, and those who start off disadvantaged should be helped by some agency—whether in government or the private sector—until the contest is a fair one. The assumption is that, with the right institutional mix, one's natural talents will carry one to the appropriate social station. It is not who you are but what you do that is supposed to count.
>
> It is not every day that an article in Vogue magazine exposes the shaky foundations of democracy. But as I read "The Talk of the Town" for the second time I could not help noticing how these attractive, talented, up-and-coming thirty-somethings relied, again and again, on personal connections to get where they are today. Weisberg describes the couple's success in terms of "personal intensity and random luck." But the luck here is less random than he thinks. Kass and Wagner were lucky to be born to their parents, and if they have children their sons and daughters will be lucky to be born to them. They are members of a self-perpetuating milieu, a caste of right thinking yuppies whose position and wealth and patterns of consumption are the fruit of personal relationships spanning decades. There is income inequality, for sure, but there is also status inequality, and this latter form of inequality is a topic on which most bourgeois bohemians are silent…

It's hard to believe that these people are unaware of their own privilege, but you'd be surprised by how well the elite has managed to isolate its children – now young adults – from reality. I grew up with some of these people, and they really were unaware of the larger world around them — as children and youths, at least. It seemed that instead of teaching them about the world, their parents did all they could to wall them off from it. Sure, the brighter ones knew something was off, but they were very good at ignoring their position at the top, and reacted with naked hostility when it was mentioned. The people they hate and fear the most – and trust me on this one, I know it first-hand – are the white working and middle class. But it isn't really racial hatred. A lot of people mistake it for that because they see a lot of Jews among these new aristocrats, but these are Jews by ancestry only, and they are essentially indistinguishable from their gentile colleagues. In fact, they typically intermarry. No, the real reason for the hatred is fear. We are the workers, soldiers, farmers, tradesmen and businessmen whose loyalty is questionable, and who could turn on them at any time and ruin their beautiful, charmed lives.

> It was back to D.C. Wagner met with Democratic mastermind John Podesta—"an old Washington neighbor" whose relationship with her father was longstanding. Podesta gave her a job at his new think tank, the Center > for American Progress. Which led to a job in New York City at Fader magazine. Which led to the job with George Clooney. Which led to a gig covering the Obama White House for the now defunct Politics Daily. Which led to MSNBC. Her agent is Ari Emanuel, brother to Chicago mayor Rahm Emanuel and to Dr. Zeke Emanuel, a frequent guest on her show. "Wagner talks about the series of events that brought her from that Los Angeles pay phone to MSNBC's soundstage as if it were the most natural progression in the world," Elle magazine noted a couple years back. Of course she does. It was natural for her.

>
> What the Chinese call guanxi, networks of influence, benefited Kass and Wagner. It brought them together. The incestuous nature of the relationship between the media and the Obama White House is well established. Here is another example. Kass's friend, Richard Wolffe, is known as Obama's most loyal scribe—a title for which there is plenty of competition. He was the ideal fixer-upper of Kass and Wagner. And it was another node in Kass's network, Edward Cohen, a member of the Lerner family that owns the Washington Nationals, who arranged to have the park opened for that very special game of catch. I'm sure Cohen will do the same for you if you give him a call.

It's undeniable that personal connections – often due to family – count for a great deal in urban America today. Whenever you read about a young so-and-so opening a hot new restaurant in a trendy city, or some eclectic little business start-up, you can bet with reasonable confidence that his or her parents are well-connected. This is far more the case today than it was a mere generation ago.

> "The game is rigged," Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.) famously told the 2012 Democratic National Convention. What an odd situation in which we find ourselves, where the most influential figures in politics, media, culture, and the academy, the leaders of institutions from the presidency to the Senate to multinational corporations to globally recognized universities, spend most of their time discussing inequalities of income and opportunity, identifying, blaming, and attacking the mysterious and nefarious figures behind whatever the social problem of the day might be. This is the way the clique that runs America justifies the inequalities endemic to "meritocracy," the way it masks the flaws of a power structure that generates Brown-educated cable hosts and personal chefs who open ballparks with a phone call. This is how a new American aristocracy comes into being, one as entitled and clueless as its predecessors, but without the awareness of itself as a class.

Indeed. But there is also a great deal of lack of awareness on the other side as well. Middle and working class Americans – what I like to call the American yeomanry – are not fully apprised of their own status, and imagine it to be higher than it truly is. They think the door is open to them through hard work and talent, and have little idea of the hostility the new aristocracy holds for them. They think there is common ground, but this is no longer so.

It's time for us to admit that we have no place in their world, and set about removing them from ours.

From Liberal to Authoritarian

W.F. Price · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sean McElwee is an ambitious young man who, from the looks of his resumé, is set on becoming a "thought leader" attached to what pass for respectable publications today (fat chance — the kid didn't make the Ivies). He's anti-gun, anti-Evangelical Christian, anti-libertarian, anti-Walmart, etc. However, there is an important difference between Mr. McElwee and your old hippie-style liberals: he's an authoritarian who wants to silence people he disagrees with:

> For the past few years speech has moved online, leading to fierce debates about its regulation. Most recently, feminists have led the charge to purge Facebook of misogyny that clearly violates its hate speech code. Facebook took a small step two weeks ago, creating a feature that will remove ads from pages deemed "controversial." But such a move is half-hearted; Facebook and other social networking websites should not tolerate hate speech and, in the absence of a government mandate, adopt a European model of expunging offensive material.
>
> Stricter regulation of Internet speech will not be popular with the libertarian-minded citizens of the United States, but it's necessary…
>
> [...]
>
> American free speech jurisprudence relies upon the assumption that speech is merely the extension of a thought, and not an action. If we consider it an action, then saying that we should combat hate speech with more positive speech is an absurd proposition; the speech has already done the harm, and no amount of support will defray the victim's impression that they are not truly secure in this society. We don't simply tell the victim of a robbery, "Hey, it's okay, there are lots of other people who aren't going to rob you." Similarly, it isn't incredibly useful to tell someone who has just had their race/gender/sexuality defamed, "There are a lot of other nice people out there."
>
> Those who claim to "defend free speech" when they defend the right to post hate speech online, are in truth backwards. Free speech isn't an absolute right; no right is weighed in a vacuum. The court has imposed numerous restrictions on speech. Fighting words, libel and child pornography are all banned. Other countries merely go one step further by banning speech intended to intimidate vulnerable groups. The truth is that such speech does not democratize speech, it monopolizes speech. Women, LGBTQ individuals and racial or religious minorities feel intimidated and are left out of the public sphere. On Reddit, for example, women have left or changed their usernames to be more male-sounding lest they face harassment and intimidation for speaking on Reddit about even the most gender-neutral topics. Even outside of the intentionally offensive sub-reddits (i.e. /r/imgoingtohellforthis) misogyny is pervasive.

When I was a kid back in the 80s, we were taught that one of the main characteristics of conservatives is that they are "authoritarian." It was widely believed that liberals believed in individual freedom, including freedom of expression, sexual freedom, freedom of movement and so on. Until about that time, this may have been true to some extent. However, things started to change, and mostly from the top down. Political correctness took hold in universities in the 80s, largely at the demand of radical feminists. One might find it puzzling that liberating women would lead to greater restrictions on intellectual freedom, but that is in fact what happened.

As Heartiste pointed out in a recent article about women and liberalism, women are significantly more collectivist by nature, and have a lower threshold for the "disgust" reaction. Therefore, they tend to support measures that punish outsiders or people who act on individual initiative. I would characterize this as "herd" behavior, as opposed to more male-oriented "team" behavior (more on that soon).

Although they've played an important role, especially in universities, it isn't solely because of feminists that "liberals" have become authoritarian; it is the nature of power to seek to preserve itself. If you're at the top of the heap, it's mighty tempting to try to decide which thoughts are acceptable and which are off-limits. I suspect the Internet has given even more urgency to this impulse, as the mainstream media seeks to preserve its place as the font of respectable opinion. But you'd think that they would at least continue to defend – if not embrace – the concept of a free press. Unfortunately, that is no longer the case.

Today, as young McElwee demonstrates, denouncing the free press is the sort of thing that identifies a "good young man" — a right-thinker. When I was Sean's age, I realized that I'd never make the cut under the new rules – I'm constitutionally incapable of toeing their line – so I gave up on trying to join them. I could already see the writing on the wall around the year 2000, so I abandoned the idea of getting involved in mainstream media, choosing instead to lead a humble life. However, ironically, rejecting the constraints of contemporary political correctness has been a blessing and has given me many more opportunities to express myself. When you subordinate your own opinions and speak only within collectively-defined parameters, it feels like you've sold your soul.

So, in a sense I feel sorry for the young men out there who are doing the dirty work for left-authoritarians. I'd advise them, if they'd only listen, to feel free to be themselves, and to allow others to do the same. They should keep in mind that in striving to control, you can become something of a slave yourself.

Jessica Valenti Counting on Gender Card for Hillary 2016

W.F. Price · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jessica Valenti reveals that the basis of decades of Democratic success at the polls is stoking divisions and exploiting them:

> If Clinton runs again, it's doubtful that we'll see the same level of sexist vitriol against her. And that makes me, well, a little sad. If the misogyny flows as freely in 2016 as it did during Clinton's first presidential run, the Republicans are doomed. They're already in trouble with female voters, and it wouldn't take much to erode that standing further. So bring on the Todd Akins, the "life's a bitch, don't vote for one" T-shirts, the knee-jerk Hillary haters. This time around, it will only make her stronger.
>
> [...]
>
> Online takedowns of misogyny play a huge part in women's political lives — and their votes. Just recall Rep. Todd Akin (R-Mo.) and his comments about "legitimate rape." Or the conservative smearing of Sandra Fluke after she was not allowed to testify at a House hearing on insurance coverage for birth control. Or when Rick Santorum donor Foster Friess suggested to MSNBC's Andrea Mitchell that "the gals" could just put aspirin "between their knees" as a form of birth control.
>
> All these incidents drove the "war on women" rhetoric into the mainstream and influenced women's votes in the 2012 election. A Gallup poll of 12 key swing states released shortly before the election showed that 60 percent of women said government policies on birth control would be extremely or very important in influencing their vote, and majorities of both men and women said Obama would "better handle" that issue.
>
> "Every 2016 campaign will be run in an entirely new landscape, and that's due in large part to the gains women have made politically since 2008, especially the gains made in 2012," EMILY's List President Stephanie Schriock told me. "Republicans voiced their extreme and offensive views, and voters, particularly women voters, responded with one of the largest gender gaps in our nation's history."

I'm skeptical about Hillary Clinton, largely because Jessica Valenti is missing the big picture. Valenti, you see, is another white Northeastern elite, and therefore a member of a relatively small minority. Given that roughly 60% of white people don't vote Democrat (including 56% of white females), and people like Valenti represent something like half of those who do (probably somewhat less), we're only talking about 6-8% of the population in the hardcore Hillary demographic (white liberal females) at best. Granted, they are probably a little more highly represented among voting adults, bringing them up to 10% or so. That's very important, but it's dwarfed by minorities, who turned out in huge numbers for Obama. Somehow, I doubt these minorities will be as excited about Hillary Clinton, who is an old, white elite, as they were about Obama.

The "gender gap" in the latest presidential election was actually smaller for whites than it was during the Clinton and Bush years, despite the fact that "gender" was much more of an issue in the press. The gender gap was largest for Latinos, probably due to the relative poverty and high rate of single mommery in the female Hispanic demographic contingent. Feminism is not an entirely spent political force, but it is rapidly being eclipsed by race, and as the US edges toward majority nonwhite demographics, the process will accelerate. White women, aside from the tiny upper class (of which Valenti is sadly a member), will find themselves shut out of the spoils system, and they are not so stupid as to vote against their personal interests. Instead of a permanent Democratic majority of everyone against the middle-class white men, the US will take on a more Southern-style voting pattern, in which ethnic groups compete at the ballot box for advantages.

I don't know what point we'll be at by 2016, but my bet is that gender politics will already have started to clearly take a back seat to race by that time. This means that Clinton will have to choose between favoring minorities or white women. If she chooses white women, she'll get a somewhat larger share of their vote (although how much is questionable), but her losses among minorities due to lack of enthusiasm/hostility may more than offset that. It's a tough spot for Hillary, so I'm not sure she would be the best candidate. In fact, I think a white male married to a black woman, like Bill de Blasio, would probably have a better shot than Hillary (a white female married to a black male would have problems for obvious reasons — black women are not particularly big fans of that).

My prediction is that by 2016 – 2020 at latest – we'll see minorities emerge as a true credible national party constituency in their own right, with or without white women. White liberals will be older and less important, and the US will be essentially split into two camps on the basis of ethnicity — not sex. It's a change I'm not entirely averse to, because it's about time for white elites to put their money where their mouths are and take a back seat to the minorities who form the backbone of their support.

Title IX: Making Men out of our Daughters

W.F. Price · 27 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Title IX is an atrocious piece of legislation, but it also exposes some of the excesses of college sports programs, which are run like semi-pro leagues today. Because Title IX ridiculously mandates parity in male and female sports programs despite the fact that young men are naturally far more interested in sports than young women, finding enough women to fill the rosters has proven to be difficult for colleges. The need to find girls who can compete has led schools to recruit girls before they even enter high school, which is reminiscent of the USSR's systematic selection process:

> SANFORD, Fla. — Before Haley Berg was done with middle school, she had the numbers for 16 college soccer coaches programmed into the iPhone she protected with a Justin Bieber case.
>
> She was all of 14, but Hales, as her friends call her, was already weighing offers to attend the University of Colorado, Texas A&M and the University of Texas, free of charge.
>
> Haley is not a once-in-a-generation talent like LeBron James. She just happens to be a very good soccer player, and that is now valuable enough to set off a frenzy among college coaches, even when — or especially when — the athlete in question has not attended a day of high school. For Haley, the process ended last summer, a few weeks before ninth grade began, when she called the coach at Texas to accept her offer of a scholarship four years later.
>
> Haley is not a once-in-a-generation talent like LeBron James. She just happens to be a very good soccer player, and that is now valuable enough to set off a frenzy among college coaches, even when — or especially when — the athlete in question has not attended a day of high school. For Haley, the process ended last summer, a few weeks before ninth grade began, when she called the coach at Texas to accept her offer of a scholarship four years later.
>
> When I started in seventh grade, I didn't think they would talk to me that early," Haley, now 15, said after a tournament late last month in Central Florida, where Texas coaches showed up to watch her juke past defenders, blond ponytail bouncing behind.
>
> "Even the coaches told me, 'Wow, we're recruiting an eighth grader,' " she said.
>
> In today's sports world, students are offered full scholarships before they have taken their first College Boards, or even the Preliminary SAT exams. Coaches at colleges large and small flock to watch 13- and 14-year-old girls who they hope will fill out their future rosters. This is happening despite N.C.A.A. rules that appear to explicitly prohibit it.
>
> The heated race to recruit ever younger players has drastically accelerated over the last five years, according to the coaches involved. It is generally traced back to the professionalization of college and youth sports, a shift that has transformed soccer and other recreational sports from after-school activities into regimens requiring strength coaches and managers.
>
> The practice has attracted little public notice, except when it has occasionally happened in football and in basketball. But a review of recruiting data and interviews with coaches indicate that it is actually occurring much more frequently in sports that never make a dime for their colleges.
>
> Early scouting has also become more prevalent in women's sports than men's, in part because girls mature sooner than boys. But coaches say it is also an unintended consequence of Title IX, the federal law that requires equal spending on men's and women's sports. Colleges have sharply increased the number of women's sports scholarships they offer, leading to a growing number of coaches chasing talent pools that have not expanded as quickly. In soccer, for instance, there are 322 women's soccer teams in the highest division, up from 82 in 1990. There are now 204 men's soccer teams.

> "In women's soccer, there are more scholarships than there are good players," said Peter Albright, the coach at Richmond and a regular critic of early recruiting. "In men's sports, it's the opposite."
>
> While women's soccer is generally viewed as having led the way in early recruiting, lacrosse, volleyball and field hockey have been following and occasionally surpassing it, and other women's and men's sports are becoming involved each year when coaches realize a possibility of getting an edge.
>
> Precise numbers are difficult to come by, but an analysis done for The New York Times by the National Collegiate Scouting Association, a company that consults with families on the recruiting process, shows that while only 5 percent of men's basketball players and 4 percent of football players who use the company commit to colleges early — before the official recruiting process begins — the numbers are 36 percent in women's lacrosse and 24 percent in women's soccer…

Shoving girls into competitive contact sports like soccer is unnatural and dangerous. Girls who play soccer have a very high rate of devastating knee injuries, and basketball even higher. But because of Title IX, colleges that make good money on men's basketball and football must create numerical and financial parity between male and female players. This results in a financial incentive for families to push their daughters into sports designed for male bodies, thereby injuring girls and wasting money and male talent. It is almost as stupid and wasteful as putting young women in combat, although it isn't quite that bad.

I also have to wonder whether the scholarships are really worth the risk. If a girl gets a scholarship, but in the process blows out her ACL, is that a fair trade? Also, does it help her in terms of career and marriage? I doubt it. Men don't generally care whether a girl played in competitive sports or not, and women don't seem all that interested in the kinds of jobs athletes traditionally get after giving up sports (salesman, businessman, military officer, etc.).

I'd recommend keeping athletic daughters out of high-impact team sports, and instead giving them a choice of something like tennis, gymnastics, skiing, swimming or the like, depending on their talents, of course. There's nothing wrong with young women using their bodies in a vigorous, healthy way, but they aren't built for slamming into people while wearing cleats. I played soccer at a high level in high school (went to state championships), and it can be a very rough sport — I still have scars on my ankles and shins from being gouged by cleats. It isn't as rough on the joints as football, which, seeing the knee and hip surgeries most of the men in my family have to get in middle age, I am now glad I never played, but it's no pansy sport. Frankly, I wouldn't want my daughter thrown into the game, and I sometimes wonder about parents who push their daughters into it.

But this article sheds a little light on the practice: the government, through colleges, wants them there on the field. Being feminine, it seems, isn't good enough for our women; they have to act like men to get ahead. No wonder American women have such a gender identity crisis.

Our Meretricious Meritocracy

W.F. Price · 28 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We are supposedly living in an age of merit, where the best rise to the top through a selective process that rewards valuable traits. This so-called meritocracy is often used to explain away our growing economic inequality. Those who make it, you see, just have the right stuff. This idea of merit was largely invented and is fostered by elite institutions, which pride themselves on selecting for what they call merit. Perhaps it's a relic of Calvinist predestination, in which a member of the "elect" is destined to be graced by God.

While it's true that having talent, determination and grit still matters a great deal, we ought to take a closer look at the meritocratic process and what traits it professes to value. Additionally, the traits it fosters and its results are important indicators of what these people and institutions call "merit."

So, what do we find? A notion of merit that has no room for the traditional virtues yet encourages what used to be known as sin. We find a glorification of pride, greed, lust and gluttony, among others.

Using the seven deadly sins as a standard, let's examine our "meritocracy" and how it measures up:

1. Lust

   Promiscuity, licentiousness and all manner of sexual practices are cherished and valued in our elite institutions of higher learning. Not only are they protected, but often celebrated by students and schools alike. Extramarital sex is seen as a "right," while traditional marriage is frowned upon and ridiculed.

2. Gluttony
   Gluttony is not strictly about overeating; it also applies to those who do not eat simply, who seek out strange foods, and who have elaborate rituals around eating. The urban trends of shopping at Whole Foods, eating out at chic restaurants frequently, and seeking out trendy foods fits right into the category of gluttony. Obsessive preoccupation with health food is another example, as is binging and purging. Eating disorders are, for the most part, examples of gluttony, and are common among the people of merit.

3. Greed
   This one goes without saying. An important reason people strive to become members of the meritocratic elite is to make more money. They dream of fancy homes in upscale neighborhoods, isolated from the great unwashed. They want to take trips to Paris and Rome, own the newest, trendiest gadgets and wear the finest clothes.

4. Sloth
   Most people who make it into meritocratic institutions are not layabouts, but they do often fail to put any significant work into developing their spiritual/humanitarian side. Instead of striving to become better people, they focus on networking with the powerful, and thereby betray a general lack of sincerity in their contrived humanitarianism. An example of this is the filler "humanitarian" work they do only to pad out their applications and resumés rather than for any real concern for people in need. On the academic side, they have begun to cheat with alarming frequency, which demonstrates a form of laziness.

5. Wrath
   The rage many of our elites feel toward the common American people is all too obvious. Their searing contempt for what they call "ignorant" people, particularly the more humble, religious sort, can manifest itself in almost demonic denunciations and displays of ethnic and religious hatred. This is especially true of feminists, who have an inordinate fondness for hate porn, particularly when directed against those they perceive as part of the "patriarchy."

6. Envy
   Envy is often what is behind the desire to join the meritocracy in the first place. For many students and finished elites alike, the institutions themselves provide the tools and opportunities to seize that which they covet, and to profit from the losses of others.

7. Pride
   Pride is the foremost of sins, and it is also the defining characteristic of the new elite. They take enormous pride in being elevated above their fellow countrymen, and wallow in this pride to no end. The American meritocracy is, above all, a collection of the very proud, secure in their superiority.

Of course, we can point out sin in all sorts of groups of people, but my little exercise here was intended to get people to think about what it means when we throw terms like “merit” around. There’s no doubt that people who make it to the top usually possess admirable qualities and talents, but when these are put to use in rotten ways, what they call merit is actually meretricious.

I could find it in myself to excuse some of the excesses of the elite if they compensated for them with good works, but because they have rejected what most of us see as virtuous, it’s difficult to find much redeeming about them at this point.

The Atlantic Denounces Facial Hair

W.F. Price · 28 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been reading The Atlantic off and on for over twenty years, and have enjoyed a number of articles despite the fact that I've never felt that it represented my own point of view. I've even found some borderline feminist pieces engaging, including a couple written by Sandra Tsing-Loh, who, despite being a bit of a nutcase, sure can entertain in print.

But under Scott Stossel, scion of a Harvard clan, the magazine is going to shit, and that's quite literal in the case of Stossel, who regaled us with tales of his vomiting and diarrhea in a recent piece.

Now, according to the publication, the history of the beard is fraught with racism. Who would have thought that how we choose to wear our facial hair should provoke deep introspection on the matter of race? As a man, no matter what I do with that stuff that grows out of my face, I can't escape the vile legacy of racism. Do I shave? Do I grow it out? Ah, this is all such a conundrum. Perhaps I should hire a sensitivity coach to give me the proper advice.

The article, written by Sean Trainor, a man who majored in women's studies, begins with this subheading:

> "Washes and razors for foofoos," scoffed Walt Whitman. But the story of 19th-century facial hair is more tangled than modern nostalgists may realize.

Hmm. I have facial hair, so I'd better read on…

> Let me declare what many already know: 2013 was a landmark year for men's facial hair. From flamboyant beards to the proliferation of "old-fashioned" shops, evidence of the trend abounds, embracing groups as diverse as the Boston Red Sox, the men of Movember, and the Robertsons of Duck Dynasty. In dens of hipsterdom, one can hardly throw a PBR without hitting a waxed moustache. And the online craft marketplace Etsy now sells a limitless variety of wares imprinted with images of mustaches, from wine glasses to electrical outlets….

Ah, so having facial hair is cool these days. So far so good…

> What follows is the lost story of American facial hair. Like countless other histories, it is rife with contradictions. It begins with white Americans at the time of the Revolution who derided barbering as the work of "inferiors." It continues with black entrepreneurs who turned it into a source of wealth and prestige. And it concludes with the advent of the beard—a fashion born out of desperation but transformed into a symbol of masculine authority and white supremacy.

Oh crap… "white supremacy"?! Does this mean my beard makes me a Nazi? I'd really better read the whole thing!

> One of the barbers' most vexing tasks involved maintaining order in their segregated workplaces. While the gentility of many shops helped restrain customers' worst behavior, lapses were frequent. In moments like these, white patrons might squabble over politics, grow belligerent when "full of drink and insolence," or even light each other's hair on fire.
>
> Keeping the peace required the lightest of touches. The laws of white supremacy—both written and unwritten—effectively forbade men of color from giving orders to customers or physically restraining them. Besides, many barbers understood the cruel reality that customers' ability to flagrantly disrespect them was part of the space's appeal.
>
> But perhaps barbers' most difficult challenge was the simple intimacy of the shop: the physical closeness of barber and patron. Here, men of color listened in on the schemes and foibles of the American elite, keeping > their secrets in confidence.

>
> Little did his customers suspect that Natchez, Mississippi, barber William Johnson was studiously recording the rumors that permeated his shop—from vicious acts of violence to white citizens' gambling losses and marital infidelities. Johnson's diary even refers to a moment of unexpected intimacy between two townsmen: "Mr [Blank]," Johnson confided, "attempted to suck Mr [Blank]s El panio." Just as Johnson had intended, no one discovered this record until long after he had died.

Oh man, this is not good. Not only are we bearded white men violent drunks, but cock-suckers as well…

Finally, we learn that simply being able to grow a beard is racist:

> An anonymous "lady on beards," writing in an 1856 issue of the New York Tribune, made the case even more succinctly. The "bearded races," she proclaimed, "are the conquering races." And in "Song of Myself," Walt Whitman transformed the case for beards into poetry: "Washes and razors for foofoos … for me freckles and a bristling beard."
>
> But the "manly appendage," as one commenter grandly called the beard, also served a number of important functions closer to home. As historian Sarah Gold McBride contends, beards were one response to a growing women's rights movement, typified by the 1848 Seneca Falls Convention. Faced with threats to their prerogative, men grew beards "to codify a distinctly male appearance when other traditional markers of masculinity were no longer stable or certain." The 19th-century beard may have sprouted from a fear of razors and a distaste for black barber shops. But it grew into a symbol that set white American men apart from smooth-faced foreigners as well as powerful women at home.
>
> This may not be the story bewhiskered moderns would like to hear. It's easy to imagine the 19th-beard and barbershop revival as an homage to a quaint, innocent fashion trend. But today's revival presents a chance to redeem the legacy of facial hair with a more complete understanding of the men who shaped it—a better grasp of what to keep and what to cut.

As Trainor takes us on and on through the years, we can learn more fascinating tidbits about the violent, racist, misogynistic history of facial hair. Truly fascinating work. However, I am left at a loss. To be a proper, right-thinking American, how should I wear my facial hair? I'm not sure, but the implication seems to be that to be that I should simply stop growing it, period. Perhaps castration might help in that regard, but Trainor demurs.

Edging Closer to the Truth

W.F. Price · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ross Douthat, the NY Times' token youngish conservative, came out today with an op-ed provocatively titled "Social Liberalism as Class Warfare." This is a theme I've been hitting on a lot recently because I think it's an overlooked but nonetheless very important component of politics in the US. Douthat, in his usual roundabout, overly-sensitive and borderline deferential way (I wouldn't count on that kind of kid glove treatment from the other side), argues that the values espoused by upper class elites are toxic to the middle and working classes.

In his piece, he addresses an argument made by Randy Waldman, who called efforts to resurrect traditional marriage a "cargo cult" (you see, Mr. Douthat, these are not very nice people), and points out that while socially liberal norms may work fine for those with plenty of money and connections, they have had disastrous consequences for the rest of us.

> What people contemplating marrying down clearly should fear more than in the Eisenhower-era past are interpersonal problems — a spouse who comes from a broken home, who doesn't have positive models of marriage and parenting in her past, who carries a cloud of suspicion into wedlock because his own parents' marriage fell apart. Economic redistribution can help mitigate those problems (which is why I favor it, to a point), by creating a firmer material foundation for families. But the problems themseves just aren't exclusively material: They have a cultural element, and reflect a cultural change, that can't simply be ignored.
>
> This is where I look at Waldman's critique of how elite self-interest has contributed to marriage's decline and see a case study in what liberals are inclined to leave out of this story, and what implications they are unwilling to draw from their own premises. Because if the heart of your social analysis, the core of your conclusion, is the idea that the homogamous new elite's social behavior is essentially (if perhaps unknowingly) self-interested — that the pursuit of meritocratic success has led the mass upper class to "walk away without a care … from people who in other circumstances, even in the not so distant past, would have been our friends and coworkers, lovers and spouses" — then perhaps you need to apply the same cold-eyed perspective to that elite's cultural assumptions and attitudes as well, and to the blend of laws and norms those attitudes incline its members to support.
>
> By which I mean … is it just a coincidence that this self-interested elite holds the nearly-uniformly liberal views on social issues that it does? Is it just random that the one idea binding the post-1970s upper class together — uniting Wall Street's Randians and Harvard's academic socialists, a left-leaning media and a right-leaning corporate sector, the libertarians of Silicon Valley and the liberal rich of the Upper West Side — is a hostility to any kind of social conservatism, any kind of morals legislation, any kind of paternalism on issues of sex and marriage and family? Is the upper class's social liberalism the lone case, the rare exception, where our self-segregated, self-interested elites really do have the greater good at heart?

Obviously, they do not have the greater good at heart. Their clear hatred for the majority bears this out. As a resident of a deep blue city filled with people with elite pretensions, the viciousness toward anyone not on board with the socially-liberal, politically correct message is right out in the open. Unabashed, naked hostility toward dissenting points of view and advocacy for traditional values is what passes for progressivism in Seattle. No "live and let live" here… But I'll let Douthat make his point.

> if we're inclined, with Waldman, to see our elite as fundamentally self-interested, then we should ask ourselves whether the combination of personal restraint and cultural-political permissiveness might not itself be part of how this elite maintains its privileges. Waldman, for instance, makes the (completely valid) point that just telling a single mother to go get married to whomever she happens to be dating isn't likely to lead to happy outcomes for anyone involved. But is that really just because of wage stagnation and the truncation of the > potential-mates bell curve? Or could it also be that the decision to marry only delivers benefits when it's part of a larger life script, a way of pursuing love and happiness that shapes people's life choices – men as well as women — from the moment they come of age sexually, and that exerts its influence not through the power of a singular event (ring, cake, toasts) but through that event's place in a larger mix of cues, signals, expectations, and beliefs?

>
> If it's the latter — and if you're not an economic or genetic determinist, I really think it has to be — then it's worth recognizing that much of what the (elite-driven) social revolutions of the 1970s did, in law and culture, was to strip away the most explicit cues and rules linking sex, marriage, and childrearing, and nudging people toward the two-parent bourgeois path. No longer would the law make any significant effort to enforce marriage vows. No longer would an unplanned pregnancy impose clear obligations on the father. No longer would the culture industry uphold the "marriage-then-childbearing" script as normative, or endorse any moral script around sexuality save the rule of consenting adults.
>
> And following our hermeneutic of anti-elite suspicion, let's ask: If the path to human flourishing still mostly runs through monogamy and marriage, who benefits the most from the kind of changes that make that path less normative, less law-supported, less obvious? Well, mostly people who are embedded in communities that continue to send the kind of signals that the law and the wider culture no longer send.
>
> That can mean a religious community: In those red states with high divorce rates that liberals like to cite, frequent churchgoers are an exception to the pattern, or course Mormon Utah is the high marriage-rate (and, not surprisingly, high social mobility) exception to every post-1970s trend.
>
> Or, more importantly for our purposes, it can mean a community low in explicit moralism but high in social capital and social pressure, where the incentives not to date or sleep with the wrong person at the wrong time are sharpened by the immense rewards for not making personal mistakes, where divorce and single parenthood are regarded as major threats to the all-important intergenerational transfer of success, where young people are inculcated with the kind of self-control required to dabble in libertinism but not take major risks, and where the influence of a libertine culture is counteracted by the dense network of adult authority figures whose examples matter more than what you watch and read and consume. A place where the norms and rules and script don't have to be made explicit to carry immense weight. A place where everyone understands the basic secret of success.
>
> A place like, well, the modern meritocracy.

Ah, there's that word "meritocracy" again. Am I still the only one who fails to see the merit in these people's values and lifestyle?

> Now do I actually think there's some kind of elite-liberal cultural conspiracy to keep the masses in their social place? No, of course not – there's nothing so conscious and cynical at work. But then again, neither do I think there's a meritocratic conspiracy to withdraw into walkable-urban enclaves and leave the rest of society to fragment and decay. Yet that withdrawal and its consequences are still important facts for understanding the decline of marriage, just as Waldman says. An approach to life doesn't have to be calculated to be effectively self-interested, and in the context of a stratified country that self-interest is well worth pointing out.
>
> And the same is true of an approach to politics and culture. Again, I'm not alleging cynicism: Social liberals are entirely sincere in their belief that even self-censorship is unnecessary censorship (or, perhaps, that the internet has rendered cultural standards obsolete); in their conviction that laws banning abortion or restricting divorce are too punitive, illiberal and inherent sexist to be just; in their abiding sense that economic paternalism is morally acceptable but social-moral-sexual paternalism is not. But it is still the case that when we legalized abortion and instituted unilateral divorce, we helped usher in a sexual-marital-parental culture that seems to work roughly as well for people with lots of social capital as it did sixty years ago, while working pretty badly for the poor and lower middle class. It is still a reality of contemporary life that when anyone can get a divorce > for any reason, the lower classes seem to get far more of the divorces, and that when anyone can get an abortion for any reason, the poor end up having more abortions and more children out of wedlock both. And it is still a fact that if you tallied up winners and losers from the sexual revolution, the obvious winners would tend to cluster at one end of 1975's income distribution, the obvious losers at the other.

>
> This post's title is a provocation, of course: What I'm describing isn't literally a class war. But it really does have winners. And they're the ones most likely to insist, with great passion and conviction, that we can't possibly learn anything from the social rules and laws and norms that held sway in America's more equal and more mobile past.

Here's where Douthat constructs something of a strawman on behalf of social liberals. He's saying, essentially, that there's no conspiracy at work, and that they do in fact sincerely hold the beliefs they profess even if they don't act on them. Well, this may be true, but you don't need a conspiracy to explain a collective effort to do harm. There's a much simpler explanation: malice.

These meritocrats just don't like us. That's why they use terms like "cargo cult" to explain our values. That's why they instinctively take positions that are the exact opposite of ours. When they push policies that harm their lessers, it's because it makes them feel good to see us brought low. Maybe some people think this is a far-fetched explanation, but who can deny that hostility toward outgroups is a fundamentally human characteristic?

Obama Repeats Pay Gap Canard in SOTU Address

W.F. Price · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I listened to a little bit of the state of the union address, catching Obama's gender-baiting comments before turning off the TV. He hit just a couple feminist talking points and didn't dwell on them for too long, but got rousing applause from the audience. His nod to feminism got louder applause than anything else I heard come out of his mouth.

Here's the text of that part:

> Today, women make up about half our workforce. But they still make 77 cents for every dollar a man earns. That is wrong, and in 2014, it's an embarrassment. A woman deserves equal pay for equal work. She deserves to have a baby without sacrificing her job. A mother deserves a day off to care for a sick child or sick parent without running into hardship – and you know what, a father does, too. It's time to do away with workplace policies that belong in a "Mad Men" episode. This year, let's all come together – Congress, the White House, and businesses from Wall Street to Main Street – to give every woman the opportunity she deserves. Because I firmly believe when women succeed, America succeeds.

I think the enthusiastic response was as much a result of the composition of the audience as anything, but the difficulties working women face are real, and I understand the appeal of family-friendly policies. However, this "pay gap" lie is really damaging, and not only for men, but for everyone in a family. Taking everything into account, including hours worked, seniority and profession, women are not paid less for the same work. To force equal pay for women who don't work as much as their male counterparts would be a tax on men that primarily benefits single, childless women — not mothers, who obtain much of their support from their children's fathers.

So what you'd have is a situation in which careerist high-T type females would be living large while families would be relatively poorer. It's a terrible idea that would benefit the few at the expense of the many. A better way to immediately improve the lot of poor mothers would be to give men who pay child support tax breaks for their payments. It wouldn't be perfect, but it's better than a law that won't do a damn thing for the kinds of women and children who really do need the extra money.

Red Pill Advice from Art of Manliness

W.F. Price · 29 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some people took me to task for holding Brett McKay's Art of Manliness blog out as an example of a highly successful site that rejects "the narrative" out of hand. I'll admit that I, too, thought of it as pretty light fare for a while, but when the site gives solid advice to young men, as it has today with its article "14 Red Flags to Look Out for in a Relationship," you've got to hand it to the author for going where most social conservatives – including too many conservative Christians – dare not tread.

A few excerpts:

> You've probably had a friend who started dating a woman that really made you scratch your head. She was flaky, possessive, and high-drama. Everyone could see that the gal was toxic and really bringing your buddy down…everyone, that is, except your buddy.
>
> You tell yourself, "That would never happen to me."
>
> But then it does.
>
> [...]
>
> "Well," you say, "I'm a manly man, dammit. I don't let my emotions get the best of me in a relationship. I always think rationally."
>
> Hold on there, chief. Some research actually indicates that men, particularly men in their mid-twenties, "typically fall in love faster than women and are the first to take the lead in saying words of love in the initial stages of the relationship." Women, on the other hand, are generally more apprehensive in the beginning stages of a relationship. In other words, just because you're a dude, doesn't mean you're not susceptible to love blindness.
>
> Knowing that your judgment is clouded, it's important to enter any serious relationship with both your head and your heart. You need be able to distance yourself from the powerful emotions you're likely feeling in a new relationship so that you can notice any red flags that might indicate that you're destined for a relationship from hell. This is doubly important if you're considering marriage.
>
> But what sort of red flags should you be on the lookout for? While every man has his own personal relationship red flags or deal breakers, psychologists and marriage experts have found there are a few general red flags you should be aware of. Most of these are patterns of behavior in your partner that will likely (not definitely) result in a troubled relationship down the road.
>
> [...]
>
> 1. She's a self-proclaimed "Drama Queen." Beware of women who not only proclaim themselves to be Drama Queens, but also revel in the role. Drama Queens often swing from one emotional extreme to another; when life seems a little boring or flat, they'll go out of their way to stir up a controversy. They're often impulsive and demand to be the center of attention all the time. What's interesting is that Drama Queendom isn't just a character defect, it could actually be a psychological disorder called "histrionic personality disorder." Who knew?
>
> Drama Queens can be very alluring and attractive in the beginning of the relationship because of their seemingly outgoing and often seductive personalities. But the shtick gets old after a while and constant drama in a long-term relationship just makes people miserable.
>
> [...]
>
> 3. She says ALL her exes are jerks. There's a possibility that every man she's ever dated was indeed a jerk. If that's the case, what does that say about her judgment, and what is it about her personality that draws her to > losers? And that also means you're probably a jerk too, as people tend to follow the same scripts and patterns across relationships.

>
> The more likely scenario is that some — but not all — of her exes were jerks and she's downplaying her role in the relationships going sour. This scenario is just as troublesome – as it shows a lack of self-awareness and an unwillingness to take responsibility. We all know folks who got fired from a job, received a bad grade, or got dumped because their boss was jealous, their professor was out to get them, and their girlfriend was nuts. It's never their fault. Avoid relationships with this type of person like the plague.
>
> [...]
>
> 6. She expects to be treated like a princess. When one person comes into a relationship with a sense of entitlement and expectation that his or her needs should always come before the other person's, resentment, contempt, and anger are usually the results. Be on the lookout for subtle and overt clues that your partner has the "princess" mentality. (Hint: She has the word "Princess" stitched on the butt of her sweatpants.)
>
> [...]
>
> 13. She's violent. Did you know that women are at least as likely, sometimes even more likely, than men to initiate domestic violence? Sure, her punches may not hurt you, but if your girlfriend gets violent when you argue, that should be a bright red flag that you need to end the relationship. There's some underlying emotional issues there, and if she did it before, she'll likely do it again. Don't shrug it off – slapping can escalate into the use of weapons…

Good stuff. Frankly, I wish somebody had sat me down and hammered these lessons into my head when I was 18. Given that a lot of McKay's readers are young men, he's doing a yeoman's job here. Compare him to, say, Pastor Mark Driscoll of Mars Hill church, who lays into his young male parishioners for not marrying single mothers, and he's a beacon of light in the darkness.

We need more popular, practical advice for young men, who tend to get all the wrong messages today. When someone can provide that through an enjoyable, readable platform that has broad appeal, it's an enormous service.

Good work, Brett.

Intersectionality Feminism as Mexican Standoff

W.F. Price · 30 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As the American social hierarchy unravels due to demographic shifts, feminists have begun to lash out at each other in an apparent attempt to establish a new pecking order:

> In the summer of 2012, twenty-one feminist bloggers and online activists gathered at Barnard College for a meeting that would soon become infamous. Convened by activists Courtney Martin and Vanessa Valenti, the women came together to talk about ways to leverage institutional and philanthropic support for online feminism. Afterward, Martin and Valenti used the discussion as the basis for a report, "#Femfuture: Online Revolution," which called on funders to support the largely unpaid work that feminists do on the Internet. "An unfunded online feminist movement isn't merely a threat to the livelihood of these hard-working activists, but a threat to the larger feminist movement itself," they wrote.
>
> #Femfuture was earnest and studiously politically correct. An important reason to put resources into online feminism, Martin and Valenti wrote, was to bolster the voices of writers from marginalized communities. "Women of color and other groups are already overlooked for adequate media attention and already struggle disproportionately in this culture of scarcity," they noted. The pair discussed the way online activism has highlighted the particular injustices suffered by transgender women of color and celebrated the ability of the Internet to hold white feminists accountable for their unwitting displays of racial privilege. "A lot of feminist dialogue online has focused on recognizing the complex ways that privilege shapes our approach to work and community," they wrote.
>
> The women involved with #Femfuture knew that many would contest at least some of their conclusions. They weren't prepared, though, for the wave of coruscating anger and contempt that greeted their work. Online, the Barnard group—nine of whom were women of color—was savaged as a cabal of white opportunists. People were upset that the meeting had excluded those who don't live in New York (Martin and Valenti had no travel budget). There was fury expressed on behalf of everyone—indigenous women, feminist mothers, veterans—whose concerns were not explicitly addressed. Some were outraged that tweets were quoted without the explicit permission of the tweeters. Others were incensed that a report about online feminism left out women who aren't online. "Where is the space in all of these #femfuture movements for people who don't have internet access?" tweeted Mikki Kendall, a feminist writer who, months later, would come up with the influential hashtag #solidarityisforwhitewomen.
>
> Martin was floored. She's long believed that it's incumbent on feminists to be open to critique—but the response was so vitriolic, so full of bad faith and stubborn misinformation, that it felt like some sort of Maoist hazing. Kendall, for example, compared #Femfuture to Rebecca Latimer Felton, a viciously racist Southern suffragist who supported lynching because she said it protected white women from rape. "It was really hard to engage in processing real critique because so much of it was couched in an absolute disavowal of my intentions and my person," Martin says…

This brings to mind the Lord of The Rings trilogy, where one of the orcs, after losing a dispute with another, is thrown into a mob of hungry comrades, torn to pieces and consumed.

> Just a few years ago, the feminist blogosphere seemed an insouciant, freewheeling place, revivifying women's liberation for a new generation. "It felt like there was fun and possibility…a momentum or excitement that was building," says Anna Holmes, who founded Jezebel, Gawker Media's influential women's website, in 2007. In 2011, critic Emily Nussbaum celebrated the feminist blogosphere in New York magazine: "Freed from the boundaries of print, writers could blur the lines between formal and casual writing; between a call to arms, a confession, and a stand-up routine—and this new looseness of form in turn emboldened readers to join in, to > take risks in the safety of the shared spotlight."

>
> The Internet also became a crucial place for feminist organizing. When the breast cancer organization Komen for the Cure decided to defund Planned Parenthood in 2012, the overwhelming online backlash led to a reversal of the policy and the departure of the executive who had pushed it. Last year, Women, Action & the Media and the Everyday Sexism Project spearheaded a successful online campaign to get Facebook to ban pro-rape content.
>
> Yet even as online feminism has proved itself a real force for change, many of the most avid digital feminists will tell you that it's become toxic. Indeed, there's a nascent genre of essays by people who feel emotionally savaged by their involvement in it—not because of sexist trolls, but because of the slashing righteousness of other feminists. On January 3, for example, Katherine Cross, a Puerto Rican trans woman working on a PhD at the CUNY Graduate Center, wrote about how often she hesitates to publish articles or blog posts out of fear of inadvertently stepping on an ideological land mine and bringing down the wrath of the online enforcers. "I fear being cast suddenly as one of the 'bad guys' for being insufficiently radical, too nuanced or too forgiving, or for simply writing something whose offensive dimensions would be unknown to me at the time of publication," she wrote.

There's a subtext of racial hostility to this feminist civil war, and although this may seem like envy or sour grapes to the casual observer, there's a reason for the anger.

Back when second wave feminism really began to rise to power in the 80s, it was overwhelmingly a white women's movement. It wasn't explicitly supremacist, but the hierarchy was undeniable. White feminist radicals infiltrated social services throughout the land, including in inner cities, monopolizing what soon became a thriving industry. While white women had always been heavily involved in social welfare, in the earlier days they tended to be Christian and quite conservative by today's standards, even if their contemporaries would have thought of them as liberal. The new feminist contingent was not bound by these dated patriarchal conventions. Soon, they began monopolizing their charges, often taking young nonwhite women as lesbian lovers. Whenever there's a big power differential, as there is between social workers and the people who rely on them, abuses happen. It's inevitable, no matter what ideology the authorities ascribe to. So there was something akin to the Catholic abuse scandals going on in women's shelters and the like, only it was women taking advantage of women rather men taking advantage of boys.

This resulted in some strange outcomes that Americans in general are not aware of, but black feminists surely are. Today, lesbianism is highest among low-income black women. I suspect this is a cultural artifact of widespread exploitation of poor black women by lesbians in the 80s and 90s combined with the unavailability of black men. In fact, not having men to rely on has forced a lot of black women to rely on other women as surrogate husbands. In many cases, these were older white lesbians. You can probably guess who had the upper hand in these relationships.

> "I actually think there's a subset of black women who really do get off on white women being prostrate," Cooper says. "It's about feeling disempowered and always feeling at the mercy of white authority, and wanting to feel like for once the things you're saying are being given credibility and authority. And to have white folks do that is powerful, particularly in a world where white women often deploy power against black women in ways that are really problematic."
>
> Preening displays of white feminist abjection, however, are not the same as respect. "What's disgusting and disturbing to me is that I see some of the more intellectually dishonest arguments put forth by women of color being legitimized and performed by white feminists, who seem to be in some sort of competition to exhibit how intersectional they are," says Jezebel founder Holmes, who is black. "There are these Olympian attempts on the part of white feminists to underscore and display their ally-ship in a way that feels gross and dishonest and, yes, patronizing."
>
> This reached an absurd peak during the tempest over #Femfuture. Jamia Wilson was one of the black women > involved in the Barnard meeting, and she has since become part of the four-woman leadership team for the #Femfuture project, which continues to work on ways to make online feminism financially sustainable. She watched incredulously as white women joined in the pile-on about #Femfuture's alleged racial insensitivity. One self-described white feminist tweeted at her to explain that no women of color had been at the Barnard meeting "and that I needed to be educated about that," Wilson recalls. Somehow, activists who prided themselves on their racial enlightenment "were whitesplaining me about racism," she adds, laughing.

But it isn't entirely a racial issue (although I suspect that's the most important one) at work here. Now that transsexuals have managed to gain a foothold in this grievance racket, there's a movement afoot to abolish the sanctity of the vagina.

> In a revolution-eats-its-own irony, some online feminists have even deemed the word "vagina" problematic. In January, the actress and activist Martha Plimpton tweeted about a benefit for Texas abortion funds called "A Night of a Thousand Vaginas," sponsored by A Is For, a reproductive rights organization she's involved with. Plimpton was surprised when some offended Internet feminists urged people to stay away, arguing that emphasizing "vaginas" hurts trans men who don't want their reproductive organs coded as female. "Given the constant genital policing, you can't expect trans folks to feel included by an event title focused on a policed, binary genital," tweeted @DrJaneChi, an abortion and transgender health provider. (She mentioned "internal genitals" as an alternative.) When Plimpton insisted that she would continue to say "vagina," her feed filled up with indignation. "So you're really committed to doubling down on using a term that you've been told many times is exclusionary & harmful?" asked one self-described intersectional feminist blogger.
>
> Plimpton takes intersectionality seriously—A Is For is hosting a series of discussions on the subject this year—but she was flummoxed by this purist, arcane form. "I'm not going to stop using the word 'vagina' for anybody, whether it's Glenn Beck or Mike Huckabee or somebody on Twitter who feels it creates a dysphoric response," she tells me. "I can't do that and still advocate for reproductive freedom. It's just not a realistic thing to expect."

I guess this leaves Eve Ensler up a creek. Well, she's already at retirement age, so the imminent demise of the cis-normative Vagina Monologues may not make much difference at this point.

This "intersectionality" will be the demise of feminism as a powerful, cohesive force. Intersectionality is essentially multiculturalism on crack, and will prove to be impossible to manage. While feminism will always exist in one form or another, when it ceases to benefit a majority of women it will find itself largely ignored or avoided by most women. And as the US becomes a pluralist country there will be no clear majority, and no clear winners from a generic "feminism." Instead, there will be a thousand little feminisms, each for one particular group of women, and each hostile to the others.

Prediction: Dzhokhar Tsarnaev to be Next Anti-Death Penalty Poster Boy

W.F. Price · 30 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The feds have announced their intent to execute Dzokhar Tsarnaev for his role in the Islamic terror bombing of the Boston Marathon. As you may remember, in the aftermath of the attack, Dzhokhar became an object of romantic attention for a shocking number of young women and girls, some of whom even set up blogs demanding his release (into their open arms, presumably). The combination of Dzhokhar's dreamy boy-band looks with his blood-soaked infamy was apparently irresistible to throngs of nubile female admirers.

Now that he's facing a death sentence on conviction (the feds never lose), I predict that he will immediately become one of the foremost objects of sympathy and tender love in the United States. I wonder whether the Bureau of Prisons has already developed a protocol for dealing with the tons of love letters he's sure to receive. Now that I mention it, I bet they have.

We are prone to generalizing women as slaves to fashion and popular opinion, but when lust comes into the equation even women are willing to throw off the shackles of propriety. There will be women who, despite widespread disapproval and condemnation, will throw every effort their little souls can muster into attempts to join with the dark young prince of their dreams. Thus, on the path to his demise, Dzhokhar Tsarnaev will be accompanied by a procession of wailing, protesting women, defending their true love to his last breath.

The Coming Transformation of Identity Politics

W.F. Price · 31 January 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I've made a few statements that contradict each other from a conventional political perspective. For example, I've repeatedly said that ethnic politics will eventually trump gender politics, but at the same time I dismissed racial politics as less relevant than they used to be, and continuing to diminish in importance. This is because a profound change is occurring in the US as demographics reach a tipping point, after which the idea of one American nation will become an anachronism. We already have the basis for at least four proto-nations in the US.

I've numbered them below by population, with the first being the most populous.

1. White Northerners

2. White Southerners

3. Hispanics

4. Blacks

The largest change over the last several decades has been the decline of white northerners relative to the others. Since the Civil War, this has been the dominant ethno-cultural group in the United States, for better or for worse (mostly better, to be honest). They have been the majority not only of the country's population, but held most territory as well. With the addition of the new Hispanic subnation in the US, this has changed from a majority of the population to a plurality. What's really curious, though, is how oblivious northerners are when it comes to Hispanics. They don't seem to be aware, for example, that some 40 million Americans now speak Spanish as their first language, and that this number could well rise to double that within a couple generations. I'm not sure they've grasped the fact that they are not really "winning" because of this shift, but actually declining in relative power.

The old racial politics of the US, in which northern whites allied with blacks against southern whites, has given way to something entirely different. It isn't even clear who will have an advantage under the new reality, but the old north-south divide is no longer the only game in town.

I think this will change American racial politics because, from a broad political perspective, the Civil Rights movement that defines contemporary right-thinking was largely about the North reasserting political dominance over the South. Today, however, it isn't the southerners who are challenging northern political power, but Hispanics in California, who will almost certainly be a majority of that state's population within this decade. When Californian Hispanics really begin to flex their political muscle, there's no guarantee that they will be on board with northern whites in the same old game. What do they, after all, have to do with what is essentially an interethnic dispute between two groups of white Protestants?

However, one thing is for sure: they will not take on the old role of black Americans as a caste, but rather regard themselves as a distinct people. They have the numbers to do so, they have their own language, and they have a common heritage as Latin Americans. So when I write that ethnic politics will become more important while racial politics will decline, what I mean is that caste politics will take a backseat to a more nationalist form of politics, in which nations – not "races" – compete within our territory and political system.

The reason I think this signifies a coming decline in gender politics is that gender politics, like traditional American racial politics, is caste politics. Caste politics are subordinate to national politics, so if different ethno-cultural groups in the US start behaving more like competing nations, gender will decline in importance on the national stage, as will race (in the traditional sense). This doesn't mean that race won't matter, but rather that it will be subsumed into more of a national consciousness.

Because we conquered and populated North America so quickly, we Americans haven't experienced national politics like the rest of the world for centuries. We've all but forgotten what it means, and instead built our divisions around internal castes, which has recently so weakened us as a people that we are losing the enormous advantage we had. Maybe it was inevitable that our great fortune couldn't last forever, and now it looks like it's unraveling, which I take as a sign that our manufactured internal divisions, like feminism, will dwindle in significance as we find ourselves with bigger fish to fry.

However, in the meanwhile, northern white elites continue to behave as though nothing has changed, which is why they are increasingly seen as far out of touch with the rest of the country. I'm afraid they will continue to do so until some national movement displaces them from their place at the top, and it is exactly their fear of that happening that provokes them to such hysteria over even relatively inconsequential half-efforts like the Tea Party.

Super Bowl Sex Trafficking Fraud Back in the News

W.F. Price · 1 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Finally, even the mainstream press is starting to catch on to the fact that alleged sex trafficking during major sports events is a manufactured problem:

> TENS of thousands of people have descended upon the New York-New Jersey metropolitan area this week for tomorrow's Super Bowl, accompanied by the usual media frenzy. A now familiar feature of this coverage, wherever the Super Bowl is held, is an abundance of stories, from Reuters to CNN, reporting that the event will cause a surge in sex trafficking to capitalize on the influx of fans and tourists.
>
> Representative Christopher H. Smith, Republican of New Jersey and co-chairman of the House anti-human trafficking caucus, and Gov. Chris Christie announced a law enforcement crackdown. Cindy McCain, in advance of next year's Super Bowl in Arizona, flew in to stand at Mr. Christie's side, declaring that the Super Bowl is "the largest human-trafficking event on the planet."
>
> The problem is that there is no substantiation of these claims. The rhetoric turns out to be just that.
>
> No data actually support the notion that increased sex trafficking accompanies the Super Bowl. The Global Alliance Against Traffic in Women, a network of nongovernmental organizations, published a report in 2011 examining the record on sex trafficking related to World Cup soccer games, the Olympics and the Super Bowl. It found that, "despite massive media attention, law enforcement measures and efforts by prostitution abolitionist groups, there is no empirical evidence that trafficking for prostitution increases around large sporting events."

This story-that-won't-die is an example of how feminist lies and hysteria eventually corral conservatives into their cause. It's a very old story; the first example I can think of off the top of my head is reports of white slaving surrounding boxing matches in the early 20th century. It was as fake then as it is now.

However, for decades it was forgotten, until resurrected with claims by 2nd wave feminists that sports events were patriarchal oppression fests, during which men celebrated their dominance by beating their wives, enslaving women, raping, etc.

Somehow, the lies gained traction. I guess the "damsel in distress" trope will always have appeal, and stories of innocent young things being shoved into houses of ill-repute to be ravished by lust-crazed animals are titillating enough that media outlets can't resist but take advantage of using them to attract attention.

It turns out that this fear-mongering has real-world consequences. Despite the fact that there is no evidence for an increase in prostitution during Super Bowl weekend, hookers (johns aren't mentioned in the article, but who cares about them anyway?) are being tossed in jail at a higher rate than usual, clogging up the courts with minor offenses. Surely, tossing low-end prostitutes and the lonely johns who support them in jail is doing a great service to the women of the US, right?

I used to oppose legalization of prostitution, because it can be an ugly business. But I've come to realize that it isn't going away any time soon, and we aren't doing society or the people involved any favors by criminalizing their lifestyle.

But the primary lesson here is that letting feminists influence policy is always a bad idea.

Conservative Men and their Female Protégés

W.F. Price · 2 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Something I've noticed over the last fifteen years or so has been a trend for dynastic conservative publications and organizations to be slowly handed over to women, often those who are related to or otherwise intimate with the elder male founders/owners. Sometimes it is a sub rosa process that takes some investigation to uncover, but as often as not it's plainly obvious to all who care to take a look.

Usually, said women are significantly younger than their benefactors, and they are put in positions of authority over the men who keep the organization running.

I'm not sure exactly why this is happening, but maybe there are a few factors that can help explain it:

1. Young women are more highly credentialed than men today, and older Americans still believe strongly in the value of credentials

2. The increasing stratification of society encourages nepotism

3. The more volatile sexual marketplace gives younger women more opportunities to leverage their sexuality into power

Personally, I don't think it bodes well for traditional conservatism in the US. While a good husband and wife team can accomplish a great deal, and a strong marriage is far superior to a weak one for men's productivity, this isn't what's going on here. Instead, it's more along the lines of 50-70-year-old male partnered with 20-40-year-old female, who could be a daughter, lover or much younger wife.

For younger men, this is demoralizing, as it destroys the sense of camaraderie that underlies most successful team efforts. Young women also tend to have naturally weaker leadership skills — even in regards to other women. The dynamic between a young female authority figure and a male subordinate can be toxic, as it introduces sexual tension and frustration to an already unnatural relationship.

There's nothing inherently wrong with older men who have relationships with younger women (for whatever reason), but in these cases the man must be vigilant about maintaining a firewall between his professional, masculine life and his intimate life. Too often these men fail, and in so doing they can cause considerable disruption for their younger, male charges.

I know a lot of conservatives like to criticize President Obama for having such an overwhelmingly male staff, but this is an example of something he's doing right. He may be a hypocrite, but the man is doing a pretty decent job of keeping the ship of state in order. Conservatives, on the other hand, being relatively masculine and fond of women, let their feelings for the women around them get the better of them, and tend to be too indulgent. This is much to their detriment. Obviously, the feminists couldn't care less how you treat the women in your life; take their love for Bill Clinton and John Edwards, for example. So politically speaking, conservative men aren't going to win any points by letting their daughters, lovers or young female protegees have more influence than they should.

Sure, the idea of a "Charlie's Angels" lifestyle might be a nice fantasy, but it doesn't work very well in the real world. I'd say that if you really value your cause, you don't hamstring the men who serve it by making a young woman their master.

However, if you must put a woman in charge, make her an older one, past the age of childbearing.

Trolling the Natives in the Super Bowl

W.F. Price · 3 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Please excuse me for a being a little late on the post today — as a Seattlite I indulged a bit last night to celebrate our first Super Bowl victory. It seems that most of the country thought it was an awful game, but I rather enjoyed watching it.

I did notice the Coca Cola commercial that is causing something of a stir. I was mainly confused trying to figure out exactly which languages were being sung. It felt like I was in the Southcenter Mall down in Tukwila; a Babel of different peoples and tongues that is studiously avoided by the holier-than-thou white liberals who call Seattle home. I imagine that's exactly what bothered people about the ad — it's confusing and frustrating trying to navigate a truly multicultural environment, and a lot of Americans don't like it too much. Who can blame us? It isn't as though we Americans are uniquely evil in this regard. However, that hasn't stopped the usual crowd from denouncing Americans who dare to complain.

Given the demographics of the Super Bowl, which is overwhelmingly watched by English-only speakers, the ad came off as something of a troll. According to the most recent stats I could find (2011), about 80% of people watching the Super Bowl are white, 11% black, and 9% Hispanic. Surely there must be some crossover between white and Hispanic, leaving a couple percent or so of people who fit none of the above categories. Assuming almost all of the whites and blacks are English speakers, and probably most of the Hispanics, multilingual ads seem a little bit out of place.

However, this year they are even more inappropriate, as those who speak the largest minority language in the US had, courtesy of Fox Deportes, the first-ever opportunity to watch a Spanish-language broadcast of the Super Bowl entirely produced in America:

> On Feb. 2, when Fox Sports carries Super Bowl XLVIII from MetLife Stadium, so will Fox Deportes, the Spanish-language network that is also part of 21st Century Fox. The Super Bowl has never before been televised in Spanish in the United States.
>
> The two-year deal with the N.F.L. allows Fox Deportes to carry other Fox games, starting with Thursday's Thanksgiving Day game between the Green Bay Packers and the Detroit Lions, followed by all Fox's postseason games, culminating with the Super Bowl. That schedule will be followed in the 2014 season and will include preseason games. Financial terms were not disclosed.
>
> "Clearly, the Hispanic market has, and continues to be, a major priority for us," said Peter O'Reilly, the vice president for fan strategy and marketing for the N.F.L. "We have a large and growing Hispanic fan base, and we're seeing growth among the more Spanish-dominant segment."
>
> Fox Deportes will add a weekly 30-minute N.F.L. program and pregame shows.
>
> Research done during the past off-season demonstrated a desire among Hispanic fans to watch games with Spanish-language announcers and graphics rather than broadcasts with Spanish audio.
>
> The games under the Fox Deportes contract will be called by John Laguna and Francisco X. Rivera, who have experience calling N.F.L. games in Spanish.
>
> The league has a variety of other Spanish-language deals, including one announced during the season that put Super Bowl XLVIII on ESPN Deportes Radio. Those rights are rotated every other year with Univision radio.

What this means is that the standard FOX Super Bowl audience was probably well over 95% English-speaking, as those more comfortable with Spanish could watch Fox Deportes.

Now this brings up an interesting question: Do the Spanish-speaking viewers watch the same ads as the rest of us? Unlikely, but maybe some are the same. If so, was this stupid Coca Cola ad shown to them?

I really don't know, but for their sakes I hope not. Somehow, I don't think the gay dads on roller skates and pious Muslims would go over so well with the Hispanic demographic, so I kind of doubt it. Furthermore, I can't see Fox Deportes going so far as to insult their Hispanic audience by deliberately playing what sounds like gibberish to them. I mean, can anyone imagine Mexicans being forced to listen to a patriotic Mexican song in English, French and German, and during a national sporting event no less? Nah, it's only the redneck Americans who are fair game…

Local Job Ad Explains Pay Gap

W.F. Price · 4 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I was looking through one of Seattle's neighborhood blogs, and came across a help wanted ad that exhorts women to help close the gender pay gap by working for a Sheryl Sandberg "Lean In" event. Sounds like a great feminist job, so what's the catch?

It turns out that the job doesn't actually pay. Well, not money anyway — you do get sandwiches:

> This is a great resume builder.
>
> We are looking for an intern to help with a unique feminist event with historical proportions (of course we think big!).
>
> The Take The Lead Challenge Launch Event on February 19th is kicking off a national movement to close the pay and leadership gaps for women.
>
> This isn't the old feminist movement. We aren't about blaming or complaining or rehashing the sad statistics. We're about solutions and helping women move forward in their lives and careers.
>
> We are working on the event that features Facebook COO and Lean In author Sheryl Sandberg. We are pushing for 1 million viewers on the free livestream. How cool is that?
>
> We need some help with outreach.
>
> We are looking for someone who can work 4-10 hours a week. Some of that will be with us and some can be remote.
>
> You must understand social media and be able to write well and navigate Google Drive (formerly Google Docs) – or not be afraid of learning it. It would be awesome if you also knew Photoshop or had some technical skills and enthusiasm to learn some fairly straightforward instructions in the program.
>
> Above all, possess a sense of humor and the desire to do good in the world (whatever that means to you).
>
> This is an unpaid internship, lasting 4-5 weeks. We'll feed you and treat you well. We'll teach you what we know. We are pretty awesome human beings and love to have fun, work hard, and laugh. We'd prefer someone in West Seattle who can easily commute to our Alki location to work in-person 1x a week.
>
> Now, just because this is a feminist organization doesn't mean you have to be female to apply. Guys can be feminists too!
>
> Check out the event at http://www.taketheleadwomen.com/take-lead-challenge-launch-event/.

Am I the only one who sees the irony in an organization calling for women to fight the pay gap while requesting that they work for free? Maybe I should start a company telling women that if they work for me they can help to lower the wage gap, and pay them with donuts and coffee. Sounds awesome!

On a more serious note, this "internship" racket has to go. If you work for free for a non-profit, it's called "volunteering," and if you work for free for a private enterprise for some vague future promise of "résumé building," it's called slave labor.

Since this ad wants women to work for Sheryl Sandberg for free, is there any doubt now what all this "lean in" bullshit was about in the first place?

Why the Interracial Super Bowl Cheerios Ad Doesn't Bother Me in the Least

W.F. Price · 4 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I thought I'd address another Super Bowl ad that has caused some controversy:

Some people are angry about the interracial Super Bowl ad that features a black father with a pregnant white wife. This is misplaced rage. Instead of being angry at the white women who marry and form families with black men, we should be angry at the ones who birth children with them out of wedlock or divorce them and then run around asking for other men to support them. If a white woman finds a black man who intends to support her and their children, what business of mine is that? Why is that my problem at all?

If anything, I think white women who have relations with black men should be pressured to marry the men they love, and to be good wives to them. In fact, we should expect no less of these women, and hold them strictly to it. Instead, we have a backward culture that punishes the black men who get involved with these women, as though it was only the black men who had any influence over the relationship when we all know these days that women are free to make whatever sexual choices they please.

Rather than treating white women like little girls who have no responsibility for what they do, and using authorities to dominate the black men they have chosen as mates, we should instead grant them the opportunity to be good, dignified wives, and to honor their persons and families. To expect any less from them would be shameful and, ultimately, expensive for the rest of us.

White nationalists who want to hold white women's hands from birth through maturity are not thinking straight. White women can and will do as they please, and after the age of majority are not our responsibility. This is the law, and it isn't so bad in that regard. Let the woman – no matter what her race – who has made her choice stand by it, and don't stoop to cutting off the authority of the man she has chosen. It is entirely beneath a man to make excuses for a liberated woman, and to act in concert with her to cheat her husband.

It is, to put it in simple terms, to relinquish one's masculinity to collude in feminine treachery.

In most cases, when there is a problem with black male/white female pairings, it is usually the white female who chooses to either have a child out of wedlock with the wrong sort of man, or to abandon the right sort after marriage. In both cases, the black man is not at fault. Rape, while it does happen, is statistically a minor problem in this regard, and doesn't have anything to do with the ad in question.

Fault on the Road and in Divorce

W.F. Price · 5 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A common refrain that I've read and heard for decades is that "it takes two to destroy a marriage." This is usually told to a spouse with grievances, to make him "understand" that he, too, is to blame for a pending divorce. The marriage counselor – a fraud if there ever was one – makes his bread and butter by coaching people through divorce, and part of his job is to try and convince the husband to submit to the wife's desires and accept at least an equal share of the blame. The reason the marriage counselor is so dependent on divorce is that if it weren't for all the wives who leave their husbands he wouldn't have men willing to see him, and if he didn't do his best to encourage the man to acquiesce to the wife's demands, wives wouldn't show up in his office.

This idea that "it takes two" has become ingrained in the American collective consciousness over the years since no-fault divorce was introduced. So much so that people are reluctant to put any blame even on those who clearly and gleefully took the lead in wrecking their marriages. People just figure the other party must be equally complicit in some manner. "Why else would she be pregnant by someone else?" they might ask.

But let's apply this notion of no-fault to a car accident, and see how it holds up. I was rear-ended pretty hard last Friday, so the topic is on my mind.

It is officially acknowledged that there are rules of the road. You don't take a left into oncoming traffic, you stop at red lights, and you maintain proper distance between yourself and the car ahead, to name a few.

Say that whenever someone did one of these things and hit another person because of it, there was no apportionment of blame, but rather an equal sharing of fault. If two cars collide, after all, were there not, in fact, two cars involved in an accident? If the car that was hit wasn't hit, then no collision would have happened, so regardless of the rules, both drivers must share the blame. If the driver that ran a red light's car was totalled while the other car suffered only minor damage, then the driver who was hit must compensate him so as to share the damages equally.

It sounds ridiculous, and this would immediately undermine any sense that one should follow the rules of the road, but this is exactly how divorce works. The entire premise of equity in divorce is based on a logical fallacy: if two people divorce, then two people were involved in the divorce, and therefore the fault is equal.

It is exactly this tautological line of thinking that has demolished the rules that used to hold marriage together, just as rules allow traffic to flow through a city in a more or less orderly fashion without mass carnage and chaos.

Without these rules, the concept of marriage itself means nothing, just as the concept of traffic law would mean nothing if those who broke it were no more at fault than the victims of their infractions.

When Daddy Pays for an Ivy League Education...

W.F. Price · 5 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It blows me away that men are willing to mortgage their houses to put their girls through private school today. I know that it is mainly men who are paying, because most girls who actually make it into college come from intact families in which the father is the primary earner. Singlemoms and working women don't typically invest in their children all that much — women tend to take the idea that they should provide for anyone as a serious personal affront and enormous injustice.

So if you're curious about what these poor dumb fools' money pays for, take a look below:

While there's no doubt that the young men at Columbia appreciate the gratuitous amateur porn, the squandered resources this represents ought to give the rest of us pause. I mean, if that's what your daughter's doing in college, shouldn't she at least be able to pay her own way? What's the going rate in NYC for high-end escorts?

Oh, the girls have also produced a fellatio instruction video.

Anti-Feminist Revolution Brewing in France

W.F. Price · 6 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In recent weeks, French parents have been up in arms about plans to teach young children so-called "gender theory," which holds that the categories of male and female are purely social constructs. Socialist president Hollande denies that schools are going to teach exactly this, but he has implemented an "ABCD of equality" program that is supposed to counter gender stereotypes. The idea is to get the children while they are young so as to wipe out the pay gap and all the other terrible patriarchal injustices that cause most girls to act in an un-lesbian manner.

> Closing the gap
>
> The ABCD of Equality's stated aim is to stamp out sexual stereotyping at an early age, to "correct" disparities between boys and girls when it comes to the choices made later in life – for example, choosing subjects at high school or university.
>
> The government also believes eradicating stereotyping could help close the 25 percent pay gap, which still exists between men and women with similar qualifications.
>
> The program provides detailed advice online for teachers about how they can challenge young children's views about what is typically seen as "girlish" or "boyish." In acting out fairy tales, for instance, boys should be encouraged to play the part of Little Red Riding Hood, and girls the part of the wolf. The government also points out that many fairy tale heroines – in stories like Beauty and the Beast, Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, and Cinderella – are passive characters, which could tempt young girls to wait for a Prince Charming rather than pursue a career and skills of their own.

The program has prompted parents to remove their children from school, with some schools reporting that up to a third of their students have vanished from classrooms. Parents, for their part, have taken to the streets in large numbers in Paris to vehemently protest the child-indoctrination program. Government officials have responded by calling the concerned parents hate-filled conspiracy theorists. If you understand French, you can listen to a debate on the issue here.

What's interesting about what's happening in France is that the left/immigrant political coalition is split over this effort, with Muslims being some of the biggest opponents of the gender-bending initiative. However, this is not unprecedented. Students of 20th century European history should recall that the very weird Republican government in Spain in the 1930s was toppled with the help of large numbers of North African Muslim troops, who had no qualms about fighting Spanish Communists of that time, and were even willing to serve under a Catholic fascist to do so.

I wonder whether we are seeing the prologue of a revolution in France. Power has a way of inducing those who wield it to keep pushing until they finally cross a line, and in going after the French people's children, the leftists and their feminist enforcers may have finally taken a step too far.

“Nerdy White Guy” Turns Tables on Feminist Hack

W.F. Price · 6 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Chris McKinlay, a mathematician who “hacked” OKCupid in an effort to find a suitable mate, was written up in Wired recently for his innovative approach to online dating. It’s a pretty impressive story that offers the layman a bit of insight into the life and work of a mathematician. McKinlay comes off as a brilliant man with a hell of a work ethic. Put those two traits together and cool stuff happens:

> Even for a mathematician, McKinlay is unusual. Raised in a Boston suburb, he graduated from Middlebury College in 2001 with a degree in Chinese. In August of that year he took a part-time job in New York translating Chinese into English for a company on the 91st floor of the north tower of the World Trade Center. The towers fell five weeks later. (McKinlay wasn’t due at the office until 2 o’clock that day. He was asleep when the first plane hit the north tower at 8:46 am.) “After that I asked myself what I really wanted to be doing,” he says. A friend at Columbia recruited him into an offshoot of MIT’s famed professional blackjack team, and he spent the next few years bouncing between New York and Las Vegas, counting cards and earning up to $60,000 a year.
>
> The experience kindled his interest in applied math, ultimately inspiring him to earn a master’s and then a PhD in the field. “They were capable of using mathematics in lots of different situations,” he says. “They could see some new game—like Three Card Pai Gow Poker—then go home, write some code, and come up with a strategy to beat it.”
>
> Now he’d do the same for love. First he’d need data. While his dissertation work continued to run on the side, he set up 12 fake OkCupid accounts and wrote a Python script to manage them. The script would search his target demographic (heterosexual and bisexual women between the ages of 25 and 45), visit their pages, and scrape their profiles for every scrap of available information: ethnicity, height, smoker or nonsmoker, astrological sign—“all that crap,” he says.
>
> To find the survey answers, he had to do a bit of extra sleuthing. OkCupid lets users see the responses of others, but only to questions they’ve answered themselves. McKinlay set up his bots to simply answer each question randomly—he wasn’t using the dummy profiles to attract any of the women, so the answers didn’t matter—then scooped the women’s answers into a database.

It’s definitely worth a read. Good article about an interesting guy and his love project, which was ultimately successful.

However, along comes Katie Heaney, a staff writer over at Buzzfeed who thought she’d grab some page views and feminist accolades by calling him the online equivalent of a PUA, and therefore a creep. In her article, titled “Sorry, Guy: Math Can’t Get You A Girlfriend,” she trotted out the usual insults, branding him a “nerd,” a misogynist, the kind of guy who objectifies women, etc.

The result of Ms. Heaney’s work was decidedly less impressive than Mr. McKinlay’s:

> But first, let’s consider the statistical problems! McKinlay created 12 fake OkCupid profiles (“bots”), which were then used to data-mine thousands of women’s profiles, grouping potential matches by age, career type, and lifestyle, among other categories. The bots also gathered data about the types of questions answered most frequently by women in each cluster, so that McKinlay could A) pick a cluster he liked (in his case, “indie types, musicians and artists,” of course) and B) mimic their question-answering patterns. His program told him which questions mattered most to the women he was attracted to, and so he paid most attention to those.
>
> Not surprisingly, in terms of matching with more women he had previously decided he wanted to be matched with, here McKinlay was successful. It is true that if you ape someone’s OkCupid profile, your match > percentage with that person will go up. You, too, may be ready to start your Ph.D. in mathematics at UCLA. However! The entire ethos behind McKinlay's work requires an implicit belief in an impossible probability: that by simply increasing one's number of high-percentage matches, one is proportionately more likely to find a girlfriend.

>
> This is not how life works, and it's not even how statistics (which are admittedly not always that lifelike) work. If you toss a quarter 10 times, each toss is equally likely to result in heads or tails. On the 10th toss, you have a 50% chance of seeing either, no matter what happened the other nine times. This is also true if you toss a quarter 50,000 times. Similarly, as long as we're thinking of people as math problems here, if you ask out 10 women, each of them is still an individual with her own likelihood of saying yes. That personal likelihood doesn't change whether she's one of 10 or one of 50,000.

The depth of her folly is difficult to fathom, but as Friedrich Nietzsche said, when it comes to women there's no point in looking for a bottom, because you'll never find one.

Now here's where the story becomes downright funny. The same day Ms. Heaney published her hare-brained little hit piece, Buzzfeed contacted Mr. McKinlay to offer him a job. For some reason, he wasn't positively inclined toward Buzzfeed at the time:

> Last week Wired magazine published a feature article on how I hacked the dating website OkCupid and met my fiancée. I subsequently received the following job offer via email from Buzzfeed's Director of Partnership Development:
>
> I work at BuzzFeed, which if you're not familiar with writes a ton of fun viral content and also has a great journalism unit that is trying to create a new profitability model for the social era. Part of what I do here is manage a large content network (in the press we call it the BuzzFeed Network) and we track the urls on other websites (e.g. Daily Mail, HuffPost, NyT) and identify when those stories are "going viral." The algorithm we use for this is focused on acceleration. There's a large and great data science team at the company. If you ever wanted to move to NY, they would hire you in a second.
>
> Back to this in a moment. Earlier that day I'd had a personal taste of Buzzfeed's "fun viral content" courtesy of Katie Heaney, one of the staff writers from their "great journalism unit". Heaney's article, entitled Sorry, Guy: Math Can't Get You A Girlfriend, portrays me as a "nerdy white guy" and "weird mathematician-pickup artist-hybrid" that views women as "accessories [I'm] entitled to". She compares the mathematics I used to dating tactics used by pickup artists and then attempts to rebuff each separately on its own grounds (her mathematical reasoning is skewered by a one-liner in the comments). Heaney concludes that I had failed in my search for a life partner and adeptly brushes off any cognitive dissonance caused by contradicting facts…
>
> [...]
>
> I am white, a mathematician, and I did use my knowledge to meet with 88 like-minded women in an efficient way. Most of those dates were wonderful experiences. However I was looking to meet someone to start a committed relationship with, and I was being extremely selective because I could afford to be.
>
> [...]
>
> The Katie Heaney approach to "content" characterizes the Buzzfeed business model in general. They have earned their reputation for treating journalism as an accessory that their advertisers are entitled to. I don't need a penis or a PhD or a Director of Partnership Development to tell me that Buzzfeed's algorithms are focused on quantity and acceleration rather than countenancing people or ideas, I just need to pay attention.
>
> So thanks but no thanks Buzzfeed. Why don't you ask Katie Heaney? She seems to know a lot about probability and besides, she's your perfect match.

If you read the entire thing, you'll see that McKinlay makes a few unnecessary concessions to political correctness that blunt the effect, but it's an otherwise stellar response from a guy who isn't afraid to stand up for himself and refuses to stoop to Buzzfeed's level.

Truly a heartwarming story, and a happy ending in every way.

Great NRO Piece by Kevin D. Williamson

W.F. Price · 7 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In a column he wrote yesterday, Kevin D. Williamson, a roving correspondent for National Review Online, offered the best one-paragraph summary of the history of second wave of feminism I think I've ever come across outside the manosphere:

> Feminism began as a simple grievance, mutated into a kind of conspiracy theory (with "patriarchy" filling in for the Jews/Freemasons/Illuminati/Bohemian Grove/reptilian shape-shifters/the fiendish plot of Dr. Fu Manchu/etc.), spent the 1980s in grad school congealing into a ridiculous jargon, and with the booming economy of the 1990s was once again reinvented, this time as a career path.

It's nice to see that the word is finally getting around. Until people have an accurate idea of what feminism is about, there's always going to be a lot of smoke obscuring the issue, giving women like Sandra Fluke and Wendy Davis the opportunity to continue to present themselves as advocates for the common woman despite the fact that self-aggrandizement is clearly their first priority.

Feminism works for career politicians. It works for a lot of attorneys and rich, exploitative women like Sheryl Sandberg. It doesn't work for the vast majority, who have seen opportunities for social advancement slipping ever farther away year by year. It doesn't work for poor single mothers, who would be much better off with employed husbands. It doesn't work for fatherless children, who are 20 times as likely as children living with both parents to be victims of sexual assault.

Feminism is distilled selfishness, and Williamson captures that in a fine piece. It's refreshing to see such a good grasp of the problem in a widely read national magazine. It seems the work we've done in the manosphere has not been in vain.

Obtaining a Concealed Weapons Permit in Seattle

W.F. Price · 7 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Today, I went down to the Seattle Police headquarters to pick up a police report regarding the incident in which a hipster car-raped me last week. While at the desk, I noticed that there was a simple procedure for getting a concealed pistol permit, so I thought "why not?"

I went into the room where reports are issued, and after obtaining my accident report, asked whether I could apply for a pistol permit. The matronly woman at the desk assured me that it was a quick and simple process, so I paid the fee and filled out some forms.

Soon enough, a perky and attractive young African American lady, impeccably dressed in tight clothing that nicely complemented her impressive figure, came around to help me. She took my driver's license, went in the other room to perform a scan, and told me she'd be with me shortly. She wasn't exaggerating — she was back within the blink of an eye by bureaucratic standards. Then, she took me aside for the fingerprinting process, which is almost like a manicure.

First, she rubbed lotion onto my hands, then told me to rub it in so it wasn't too slick. I rubbed for a moment and said "OK, how about this?" She felt my fingers, and with a stern look, told me that it was inadequate, and proceeded to rub the lotion into my hands. It was a relaxing, pleasurable experience. Then, she deftly grasped my hands and pushed them onto the fingerprint reading plate.

One after the other, she took images of my prints. I thought that would be the end of it, but then she explained that she had to roll them for a full exposure. Grasping my fingers, one at a time, she slowly rolled them over the soft glass. By this time I felt warm and sleepy, but she evidently expected this response. With a sideways glance and an understanding smile, she said "just stand up straight, mister, we're almost done here." She finished the job, and gave me a parting caress with her warm, brown hands.

Suddenly businesslike again, she told me that if I passed the background check I should expect the permit within a month. Still feeling a bit dreamy, I asked whether that was all. She told me that I was done and could go now.

I put all the papers away and walked out feeling light and pleasant, then drove home.

I'd really like to thank the Seattle Police Department for making this such a pleasurable process. The stellar treatment I received during that short time in which I applied for the permit was almost worth the cost of the permit itself.

I would recommend that all qualified men in Seattle go get a concealed weapons permit. The Seattle Police apparently have a very good vetting process for their service personnel.

Nicholas Kristof Drags out Old Woody Allen Allegations

W.F. Price · 8 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Woody Allen is far from a perfect man, having married his ex wife Mia Farrow's adopted daughter and alienated at least half his family in doing so. This unfortunate turn of events caused Mia Farrow to mount an all-out effort to destroy him back in the early 90s. Farrow accused him of molesting daughter Dylan, who was a young girl at the time, and of being abusive toward his son Satchel. Allen was subsequently investigated and cleared, but ended up estranged from these children.

Now, over twenty years after Vanity Fair published a long article detailing all the allegations and essentially damning Allen, Nicholas Kristof of the NY Times has published a letter by Allen's estranged daughter Dylan, who is now in her late 20s. Dylan claims that she was indeed molested by Allen when she was seven years old, and that he never faced the justice he deserved.

First, we should remember what Nicholas Kristof did to Dr. Steven Hatfill, who was dragged through the mud by a hostile media following the 2001 anthrax attacks. Hatfill was exonerated, and another man eventually identified as the anthrax killer, but before that he endured damning accusations in the New York Times that destroyed his professional and personal reputation. Kristof was among the worst offenders, having essentially made up his mind concerning Hatfill's guilt. It's a good thing Kristoff is not a judge or a prosecutor, but as a journalist working for the nation's most important newspaper he can do a lot of damage all the same.

So Kristof's decision to publish a damning letter from Woody Allen's estranged daughter should be viewed in a critical light. Here he is, again tarnishing the reputation of a man who has never been convicted of anything. Here goes Kristof, repeating accusations without any corroborating proof.

I don't know whether Woody Allen molested his daughter, but whenever these allegations come up in the context of a custody dispute it's important to be very cautious in investigating them, and to take all motives into account. Seven-year-old children do sometimes conflate fact and fiction, they are very easy to manipulate – especially by their mothers – and if one forces them to choose sides they will almost always choose their mother. Mothers have nearly unlimited power over small children, and while most do not abuse that power, it can and does happen.

Often, ordinary child care can be interpreted in a sexualized manner. Small children need hands-on care, including application of ointments, dressing, and help in the bath. A father who performs these tasks can come under suspicion, despite being entirely innocent. When there's split custody, therefore, putting oneself at risk is unavoidable for fathers. Falsely accusing a father of molestation is a dirty, low-down thing to do, but it does happen quite often, because it's so easy to do. It's also a very effective tool that does the job whether the father is ultimately found guilty or not, because he is usually so terrified by the investigation and threats that he'll give in to the wife's demands.

I'm personally thankful I was never accused of that, but I was accused of lots of other things, including beating my daughter when she was only two, that were plain lies. Nevertheless, I was a lot more cautious around my daughter than my son. I let my son sleep in my bed sometimes, but not my daughter. I was hesitant to be overtly physically affectionate toward my daughter, and pretty strict about keeping both children clothed at all times outside of the bath. However, after I gave in and gave up on fighting for more custody, the accusations stopped immediately, vanishing into thin air. Once my ex got what she wanted, she left me alone.

In Woody Allen's case, it's different. Allen has a lot of money. Probably a lot more than Mia Farrow. He's more famous, and has a pretty good life. Dylan and Farrow still haven't gotten all they want, and evidently Dylan feels cheated. The bitterness over her father's success comes through loud and clear:

> That torment was made worse by Hollywood. All but a precious few (my heroes) turned a blind eye. Most found it easier to accept the ambiguity, to say, "who can say what happened," to pretend that nothing was > wrong. Actors praised him at awards shows. Networks put him on TV. Critics put him in magazines. Each time I saw my abuser's face – on a poster, on a t-shirt, on television – I could only hide my panic until I found a place to be alone and fall apart.

>
> Last week, Woody Allen was nominated for his latest Oscar. But this time, I refuse to fall apart. For so long, Woody Allen's acceptance silenced me. It felt like a personal rebuke, like the awards and accolades were a way to tell me to shut up and go away…

I wonder, if Dylan were not estranged from Woody Allen, whether her memory might be different. If she were in line for an inheritance, would she have written this letter to Nick Kristof? Some people would denounce that line of questioning, but it matters, and it matters a great deal.

Only in Russia: An Olympic Celebration of Femininity

W.F. Price · 10 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Hannah Rosin is perplexed by the sexiness of Sochi's female athletes, wondering what could have prompted such a display of femininity off the slopes and ice. According to Rosin, it's a backlash:

> Here is my own feminist-studies-style explanation of what's going on: a backlash to the rise of the female gladiator. Once upon a time, the Winter Olympics publicity machine put forward as its feminine ideal little pixies in sparkly outfits. The skaters might have worked just as hard as the skiers and endured just as many injuries. But the image they had to conform to was some combination of virginal and fetching, always on the verge of adult sexuality but never quite there. (Witness teenage Michelle Kwan in her not-a-girl-not-quite-a-woman phase, performing that unfortunate Salome number.) As fantasy, the nubile skaters were supposed to be as manageable as a school-girl manga drawing in a Japanese salaryman's briefcase, and a threat to no one. Then Nancy Kerrigan and Tonya Harding exploded that fantasy with their off-rink psychodrama and made it harder to believe that the dainty ice girl was quite as delicate as she looked.

But what do Russian athletes have to do with American cultural trends? I was rather under the impression that Russia entirely missed our riot-grrrl phenomenon, and went in an entirely different direction after the fall of the Soviet Union.

Here, Rosin betrays her own cultural narrow-mindedness and provincial view of the world. The tough girl trend has never been a global movement, nor has it even been pan-Western. In fact, it's restricted almost entirely to Anglo and Germanic countries; the rest of the world finds it bizarre and off-putting.

It's refreshing to see the Winter Olympics in a non-Western setting again, because we finally see that the tide of cultural transition may be shifting. For decades, the Anglosphere has been exporting culture abroad, and not just the good things. It seems that the rest of the world has grown tired of this, and quite a few of us here at home are tired of it as well. Maybe it's time we learn a thing or two from someone else for a change. If a lesson in appreciation of femininity is on offer, I have no problem with that at all.

Who knows, maybe some of this will rub off on American women. We can hope.

A Tale of Two Churches

W.F. Price · 11 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been reading up on the Amish recently, as they may have the most impressive population growth of any religious/ethnic group in the US today. Current Amish numbers are around 300,000 — more than double the figure in 1990, and expected to hit a million by 2050 or so. Actually, if current growth rates were to hold up, the Amish would make up most of the world's population within a couple hundred years. This is all the more amazing because the Amish do not generally proselytize; the increase in numbers is entirely a result of native fertility and very high (about 90%) retention.

For comparison's sake, I've also been looking at what was, and still is to some extent, the most fashionable church in the US: the Episcopal Church. Having an Episcopalian mother, I'm familiar with the Episcopal church, which is a branch of the Anglican Communion, myself. Despite having been baptized Catholic, I've been to Episcopalian services a number of times, and I even attended a summer camp for Episcopalian kids. I have fond memories of the songs we sang and the Anglican liturgy, which in my opinion is a lot better than Vatican II style Catholic services.

So it isn't exactly a pleasure to bear witness to the demise of the Anglican Church which, for all its faults, was for the most part a well-meaning sect that contributed to the moral development of the English peoples around the world, and served as a moderating influence in certain communities, including both New England and Ulster. Although certain of its members' behavior, such as the widespread rape of native boys by Anglican missionaries during the colonial era (hence Uganda's harsh laws against homosexuality), was inexcusable, the church was an overall positive and humane institution.

Today, however, the church is in steep decline. Members are old and near the end, and their children either haven't bothered to stay or haven't had many kids. It has rejected orthodoxy, disputes the Gospels, and ignores tradition. For all its progressive efforts, it has reaped empty churches and an openly defiant and outraged flock.

Today, a woman presides over the church's downfall, preaching feminism and social justice to vacant pews. Even the feminists cannot bring themselves to sit through mass on Sunday, nor do they care to open their purses to fill the coffers. To keep Episcopalian property, "bishop" Katherine Jefferts Schori has resorted to using the courts to repossess churches from parishes that have tried to bail out of the sinking ship.

The Amish, on the other hand, live humble lives according to a strict interpretation of the Bible. The patriarchal family is their central institution, and their fields and houses are filled with children. They shun not only progressive values, but many modern conveniences as well. Their communities overflow with youth and energy, the human abundance so great that new settlements spring up every week.

It is inevitable that some day a challenge will arise that slows down the rise of the Amish, but from the looks of it they will have the numbers to stand up for themselves by that time. The Episcopal Church, for its part, is in danger of extinction.

So what's the real difference between these two Christian communities?

I think it's fairly simple. The Amish use the Bible as a how-to guide for building a functional and cohesive society. For them, it is a practical tool with certain rules that, if applied consistently, work quite well. While these rules might not be necessary if they were as wealthy and well-educated as the average Episcopalian, they have adopted a way of life that guarantees continued reliance on this framework, and in so doing have created an essentially democratic, communitarian faith.

Episcopalians evolved in an entirely different direction. Their faith was based on cultivation of the individual in an institutional, hierarchical framework. From a philosophical and spiritual point of view, Episcopalians have reached far greater heights than any Amish we know of, but it seems they took it a little too far. Eventually, they neglected the practical relevance of religion, and all they had left was a patina of "goodness" that had little relevance to real life at ground level — that dust to dust and ashes to ashes part. This is why people are abandoning the Episcopal Church: it is no longer a practical guide to anything besides speaking “progressive” with a Christian accent.

Although I have my problems with atheists who refuse to acknowledge that there is anything adaptive about religion (if that were the case, religion would have died out long, long ago), those churchgoing people who reject the adaptive parts of their faith are the dumbest of the lot. What the Episcopal Church and the Amish have proven to us is that a sect can survive without the loftiest expressions of faith, but not without the fundamentals.

Feminist Sites Attacked by Patriarchy

W.F. Price · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It just came to my attention that a few feminist-oriented sites went down last weekend, allegedly because of a DDoS attack. Anita Sarkeesian's Feminist Frequency blog was hit, as was Skepchick, and the Free Thought network that hosts PZ Myers' Pharyngula went down, too.

Interestingly, nobody seemed to care much, or even notice, which makes me wonder why anyone would bother targeting these sites in the first place. This little axis of feminism is one of the seedier, ramshackle outposts, as opposed to bigshots like Salon, Jezebel and Valenti's Feministing. Maybe that explains why they were chosen as targets; without male techies on staff, they are doubtless easier to disrupt with low-tech attacks.

Which brings up a question I've been wondering about for some time. Who are the guys working for Feministing and the like? I'm certain they exist – women generally consider tech work beneath them – but I've never seen any indication of who they are. I think we ought to find out exactly which men work for these feminist sites, and encourage them to be do the right thing and find another place to work.

If it weren't for men on the job, I'm pretty sure these big feminist sites would cease to function in short order.

Is “Neoeactionary” a Proper Label?

W.F. Price · 12 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some people, including a number of men whose views overlap considerably with mine, have labeled themselves “neoreactionaries,” and although I understand why they identify with the term “reactionary” (they find their opinions more in line with conservative thinkers from long ago) I don’t think it’s a good idea to use terms the Marxists wore out years ago. By the 70s, “reactionary” came to be little more than a leftist slur directed at whoever the left felt was impeding what they call “progress.” Reactionaries could be religious people, aristocrats, landlords, businessmen, etc. They were essentially anyone who got in the way of the program.

However, by now it doesn’t seem that anyone is in the way of the leftist program in the West in any meaningful sense. This is their world, and has been for some time. It’s time for them to own up to the fact that people who strongly believe in the value system they have imposed have a lot more in common with the conservatives they hated back in the 60s and 70s than the radicals who fought them. If some people came along and tried to change the political system in the US or Britain today, they would face strong opposition from people who better fit the label “reactionary” than their foes. If, for example, I had the power to reform family law and made moves to do so, a mob of howling feminist reactionaries would descend upon me within minutes.

Instead of labeling ourselves reactionaries, I think “realists” would be a better term. “Truthists” might be more accurate, but thanks to Colbert et al it sounds kind of dumb. Unfortunately, being a realist about human nature isn’t always a popular position. I remember taking a college course years ago, and somehow a conversation about what people can achieve came up. Some girl in the class held that people can be and do whatever they want as long as they set their mind to it. Being a contrarian, I said that was nonsense, and asked whether she could jump off a building and fly away (without mechanical assistance) if she set her mind to it. For some reason, this question was highly offensive to her.

Although it took me years to finally accept it, this girl was fairly representative of the average person out there. People really do want to believe in fairy tales. If you debunk them, they will hate you for it. I’m not writing this to disparage ordinary people, because I’ve come to understand that hope and faith are essential to the human spirit, but we must recognize that they are also a barrier that has to be taken into account whenever we try to change views. We should also admit that intelligent people are equally prone to believing fairy tales, and are often more stubborn in clinging to fantasy than simpler folk, whose opinions are more easily influenced.

When I write something to the effect of “women make lousy soldiers,” it runs directly contrary to what years of indoctrination have taught people since childhood, and I am despised in some quarters for stating this fact. I get what is called a “reaction” from outraged parties. So who’s the reactionary here?

Because challenging people’s notions about the world, shattering myths and ridiculing logical inconsistencies is the opposite of what is understood as reactionary, we would be undermining our own efforts by identifying as such. Adding the prefix “neo” doesn’t help at all — people automatically think of neo-Nazis, neocons, neoliberals, etc.

So I’d recommend that those who are committed to learning the truth about the world reject the term “reactionary”. It sounds edgy, and maybe a little tough, but it’s inaccurate, and it’s untrue. Let’s be realists about these matters.

Feminist Coven Promoting Abortion at Catholic University

W.F. Price · 13 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Over the last couple decades, Jesuit universities have become some of the most radically leftist institutions in the US. I don't know whether that's the Jesuits' fault or an inevitable consequence of accepting government funds, but I'd guess there's plenty of blame to go around. For starters, it could have been prevented simply by putting a more selective hiring and admissions process in place. Just as liberal elite colleges discriminate against students from conventional, conservative middle class backgrounds, Catholic universities could discriminate against raging feminists and abortion activists, but have chosen not to.

The result has been the promotion of what, to a traditional Catholic, would appear to be some form of Satanism that stumps for the radical abortionist group NARAL:

> Seattle University Society of Feminists, a student group at the Jesuit university, is advertising for jobs and internships for NARAL Pro-Choice Washington on its Facebook page.
> The post has been up for about a month, according to the Facebook page. The site also features a video posting of a nude singer and keyboardist performing a satirical song titled, "Dear Daily Mail."
> Seattle University Society of Feminists, which was created by students in a Feminist Theory class in 2003, is now posting opportunities for the abortion-rights advocacy organization. The posting reads, "Travel Seattle and the surrounding areas; keep our communities informed about the ongoing war on women; work for a well-established social justice organization and toward a purpose greater than yourself."
>
> The student group's mission, according to the University's website, is to "promote feminism on the Seattle University Campus and the greater community, and to foster a community within which there is space for dialogue about gender relations."
>
> The group's website states that its members "aren't comfortable with the traditional, seemingly hierarchical, structure" for their internal governance, so they have implemented "a more matriarchal mythical tradition" that includes titles such as "the Maiden, the Mother, and the Crone."

I've had the NARAL people show up at my door asking for money. As they tell it, access to abortion is under grave threat here in Washington state, and they need everyone's support to not only fight the patriarchal threat, but extend abortion rights and privileges throughout society.

Of course, this is a load of bull. Barring an invasion through Snoqualmie Pass by the combined forces of Idaho, Utah and North Dakota, I don't think access to abortion will be challenged in Washington any time soon. In fact, in much of the US – and especially in überfeminist Washington state – abortion laws are significantly more liberal than in most of the rest of the world. Only China is ahead of us; the Chinese government is so pro-abortion that the government often decides that people will have abortions whether they want to or not. It wouldn't surprise me if NARAL had the same goal — that was on Margaret Sanger's agenda, after all.

So let's chalk this up as one more piece of evidence that proves feminist conspiracy theories about "The Patriarchy" are totally unfounded lies. If even supposedly "patriarchal" institutions have no control or influence over the feminists within them, it's pretty obvious who's really wearing the pants in our society.

Thoughts on MGTOW Forums Issues

W.F. Price · 13 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've read a few comments about the MGTOW forum's recent problems, but I don't really know what's going on there. This makes me think I should have paid a bit more attention to it, but I pretty much gave us on forums a while ago.

Perhaps I should explain why:

I started a forum here a few years ago, and while it was quite popular and resulted in lots of registrations, it was technically cumbersome and a real pain to moderate. It soon spun out of my control, as forums are wont to do, and I found my ability to do what I like to do – write content – seriously compromised. So I had to shut it down. Forums are very time-consuming and there's little reward for the effort one puts into them.

However, I had thought about contacting a friendly forum for some sort of cooperation. Being unwilling to get back into the business of moderating a forum myself, I thought some mod might want to handle a forum for The Spearhead's posts on his own board, which would bring him a lot of visitors and relieve me of moderation duties, but I never got around to it. It seemed like a possibly complicated job (depending on the software), and I wasn't sure how it would work out in everyone's favor.

In any event, forums are valuable resources, but given the amount of work they require they have to be subsidized somehow. Dealing with people flaming each other (or you) is not a pleasant task, and I think people deserve compensation for it. As I've put more and more effort into this site over the years, I've started to question whether it's appropriate to ask people for what amounts to free labor, and I've come to the conclusion that the practice is too often abused in the MRM. While it's OK for stopgap measures and enhancing a site from time to time, I think you cross the line when you start to rely on free labor, whether your own or others', to keep your enterprise afloat.

So while I hope there is still a strong community of people out there willing to run an independent forum, I would also warn the admins not to overextend themselves and risk flaming out. I'd also remind the users that the admin is performing a valuable service, and should be rewarded for it.

This Week's Ominous Sign

W.F. Price · 14 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I think I should regularly feature "ominous signs" of the coming apocalypse to increase new reader interest, if nothing else. But seriously, there are plenty of things going on that ought to worry all of us, so I'll bring them up from time to time as reminders.

This week's ominous sign may be taken as good news or bad news, depending on how you look at it. California's strict rules against concealed carry were declared unconstitutional yesterday, paving the way for a less restrictive concealed weapons permit law:

> SAN FRANCISCO — In a significant victory for gun owners, a divided federal appeals court Thursday struck down California rules that permit counties to restrict as they see fit the right to carry a concealed weapon in public.
>
> The 2-1 ruling by a U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals panel would overturn restrictions on carrying concealed handguns, primarily affecting California's most populated regions, including Los Angeles, Orange County, San Diego and San Francisco.
>
> The majority said the restrictions violate the 2nd Amendment's guarantee of the right to bear arms because they deny law-abiding citizens the ability to carry weapons in public unless they show they need the protection for specific reasons.
>
> "We are not holding that the Second Amendment requires the states to permit concealed carry," Judge Diarmuid O'Scannlain, a Reagan appointee, wrote for the panel. "But the Second Amendment does require that the states permit some form of carry for self-defense outside the home."
>
> The decision was hailed by gun rights advocates, who said citizens must have the right to protect themselves in public. Proponents of stricter gun control described the ruling as an aberrant and reckless expansion of law that would lead to more gun violence.

As an urban citizen who doesn't have enough money to live an insulated lifestyle, concealed carry is an option that I'm glad is on the table here in Washington state. I'm sure a lot of Californians feel the same way.

So what's so ominous about this development?

It seems that Americans, more than ever, feel the same way I do, which is not necessarily a good thing. When people start to feel so alienated by their surroundings that they feel strongly about the right to bear arms, it means that there are pretty strong currents of fear and distrust running through society.

More evidence for this is that the decades-long decline in household gun ownership, largely driven by urbanization, has finally reversed, with five percent more American households owning guns in 2013 than in 2012, which was the turning point. Urbanization has not slowed down, so this statistic suggests that most of these new gun owners are not buying weapons for sport, but rather for self-defense.

So what we are witnessing is a society that has unraveled to such an extent that people instinctively fear the consequences, and have begun to arm themselves. A low level of trust and a lack of consensus combined with a civilian rearmament definitely qualifies as an "ominous sign."

Olympics go Gay, Nothing Happens

W.F. Price · 15 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I watched the men's short figure skating competition yesterday, and boy was it fabulous. One after the other, obvious homosexuals skated out onto the rink to twirl, jump and gracefully glide in all their glory. Surely this can't be happening in Russia, I thought to myself. I expected that at any moment, spetznaz commandos would storm the arena to arrest these men, enforcing Russia's strict, homophobic laws.

But instead of a mass arrest, I saw and heard a cheering crowd of Russian women, delighted to see Yuzuru Hanyu perform leaps in tight pants and a sparkly white blouse. Even Jason Brown, the American capitalist homosexual who sallied forth in an embroidered green shirt to jaunty Celtic music, was cheered on and encouraged.

I was astounded. Maybe, I thought, just maybe, the Russians aren't such totalitarian fanatics as our news outlets make them out to be. Maybe they don't really harbor violent hatred toward gays, but rather just want some respect for the traditional values they hold dear.

What a novel thought… A people who value tradition who are neither violent nor hateful, but instead pretty much decent human beings.

Why Women's Suffrage is Inevitable in Democracies

W.F. Price · 16 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've seen a lot of people in the manosphere blame women's suffrage for many of the excesses of feminism. "If only women hadn't been granted the franchise," they say, "we could have avoided all of these problems." Sure, that's probably true, but in a one person one vote system like Democracy, politicians will always have an incentive to extend the franchise, as we are seeing today with the Democrats' push to give illegal immigrants citizenship.

There's a simple explanation for it:

Say you're a politician who wants to keep his job, and you have an opportunity to gain a lot of grateful, supportive voters who will keep you in office. If you're ambitious like most politicians, you'll do what you can to make that a reality. When that chunk of potential supporters actually exceeds 50% of the adult population, as women do, you've got an enormous incentive to be the guy who gave them the vote. This would give you great job stability.

Maybe some male voters would drop their support for a candidate based on that issue, but knowing men most would not, and even if a politician lost a large proportion of his male supporters, he could still come out ahead with significant female support, which would be all but guaranteed if he were the one who gave them the vote.

As one can deduce from simple arithmetic, the more voters one stands to gain, the stronger the incentive. I'm not sure what percentage a given population of non-voters has to reach to provide a strong enough incentive for a politician to defy his constituents on their behalf, but it's probably far lower than 50%. I'd guess it's around 15-20%, which suggests that if illegal aliens came to be that large a proportion of the national population, there would be overwhelming pressure to give them the vote. Whatever the number is, I think this would be the sort of thing on which a statistician could base a revealing study.

So why weren't women given the vote immediately after Democracy was implemented in the US? First, most of them didn't ask for it or care much about it. Female literacy wasn't all that high in the early 19th century. Then, there's the fact that traditions – even newly established ones – are more firmly followed in young, vigorous nations. Finally, in pre-industrial America men and women had essentially the same interests, so for most of the country the idea that there was a conflict of interest between the sexes was simply an alien notion, and therefore men and women in a given family would vote the same anyway.

The latter is highlighted by one of the first states to attempt to legalize women's suffrage: Utah. Because polygamy was still common in Utah in the mid 19th century, giving women the vote would substantially increase Mormon clout relative to non-Mormon neighbors. The Mormons did in fact give their women the vote, and they promptly voted in favor of polygamy and other Mormon norms, which ultimately triggered the federal suppression of traditional Mormonism and the delay in granting women suffrage in other parts of the US.

As we can see from the above, there will always be an incentive for some people to grant universal suffrage, and all it takes is one change to the law for it to become permanent. Therefore, if a country bases its political process on the one person one vote standard, women's suffrage is all but a certainty.

Sweden: From Feminism to Babyism

W.F. Price · 17 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sweden has taken Western liberalism to logical extremes, funding their Nordic fantasies with sales of cheap furniture and heavy weapons. While I find Ikea to have its merits, Bofors is highly overrated, like Saab and Volvo cars. However, I remain a fan of the Carl Gustav recoilless rifle, which is issued to US troops as the M3 MAAWS, and packs a substantial punch in a convenient, lightweight package. I would recommend the weapon to future insurgents, but I'd advise them to avoid the silly Bofors anti-aircraft rockets and naval cannon, which haven't been proven in serious combat in over 70 years.

But leaving Swedish material products aside, there are other Swedish exports of dubious utility. One of these is the children's rights laws that Swedes passed in the late 70s and early 80s. Swedish children, sweet little Nordic cherubs that they are, were considered "competent persons," and therefore qualified to make family decisions. Not surprisingly, this followed on the heels of female liberation. It is, after all, a logical "prog"-ression:

> "The kids of today, who are the children of parents who did not experience much discipline themselves, become very obstinate and self-centered," says Ida-Maria Lindros, 31, a teacher outside of Stockholm. A typical scene at her school might go like this: "I ask a child to clean up after himself, and he replies 'No, you're not my boss, you cannot decide what I'm supposed to do,' " she says. "They're very anti-authoritarian."
>
> Ms. Lindros says she and her husband try to set boundaries for their two small children. "We put them to bed at the same time every day. And we say no when we have to. We want our kids to be well-behaved," she says.
>
> "If you get your way all the time, you won't develop empathy and you'll have problems respecting other people's wishes," says Beatrice Nyström, a Swedish developmental psychologist.
>
> Strict child-welfare laws may make parents more hesitant to discipline children. Allegations of physical discipline are investigated by a team of police, psychologists and prosecutors, and fines can be steep, reaching the equivalent of $1,000. Arrests are rare.
>
> Core to Dr. Eberhard's argument is his observation of an increase in anxiety disorders and self-harming problems as Swedish children get older and find themselves "poorly equipped to deal with adult life," he says. Dr. Eberhard is head of the psychiatric ward at Danderyds Sjukhus, a hospital north of Stockholm. The connections he draws are his own "common sense" conclusions and observations, he says, rather than based on scientific studies.

Fast forward 30 years from the "reforms" and Sweden is seeing its international PISA scores tank even as conservative, "reactionary" Finland takes the lead in Europe. Must be humiliating for the patronizing Swedes to see themselves outclassed by their former subjects in Finland, but nobody can say they didn't ask for it.

Today, Swedish children can get their parents in a lot of trouble if they make a complaint to the country's all-powerful bureaucrats. Parents live in terror of their little dictators, and dare not discipline them for fear of fines and public censure.

While I'm no fan of harsh discipline for children, refusing to take responsibility for your kids' behavior strikes me as negligence. When my kids act out, I see it as my own fault. I don't put the onus on small children, as the Swedes do, because that detracts from their innocence and my obligations. Only a nation of people who do not value their children would abrogate their responsibility in that manner, but that is the law in Sweden.

However, this follows feminist anti-patriarchal logic. Only fathers are responsible under their system, yet when fathers exercise authority they are immediately under suspicion.

It's no wonder that Sweden is becoming a land of bratty children, promiscuous daughters and mediocre test scores. Men have been effectively emasculated in regards to not only their wives, but their kids as well. In due course, the Swedes will reap the rotten seed they have sown. In fact, it's already starting to happen.

Irrational Beliefs and Political Affiliation

W.F. Price · 18 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A paper about who believes in astrology has been making the rounds on conservative sites, because it exposes the fact that liberals and Democrats are no more likely to hold scientifically valid views of the world than conservatives and Republicans. This doesn't surprise me at all, but not because I think liberals are worse hypocrites or less rational people than others. Instead, it's because over years of observing human nature, I've learned that people are superstitious by nature.

When I lived in China, the official state religion was "no religion." God's a myth, religion is all superstition, etc. My Chinese friends and acquaintances were smug when I brought up the subject, declaring the idea of a deity to be an invention. However, when it came to other matters, they believed in some fairly incredible things, such as martial arts masters who could jump on top of multi-story buildings, the concept of "Qi" and the ability to "channel energy" through certain ritual movements or chants. They, too, often believed in astrology, declaring Chinese astrology to be superior to and more effective than Western astrology (to this day, I have no opinion on the matter).

Since then, I've seen evidence of irrational beliefs held by otherwise "scientific" individuals all over the place. One obvious example is the belief in "equality," which is clearly unscientific, yet passionately defended by some of the most strident public atheists* (e.g. PZ Myers). And these aren't just beliefs that can't be verified by science, like the notion of a creator God; they can actually be proved false by science.

Recently, I've been working on a theory about this aspect of human nature. I've come to see faith not as a mere vestigial appendage of the human psyche, but an integral part of what we are. For a couple centuries now, man has made countless efforts to eliminate superstition, but this "faith" just keeps popping back up in another form. The Communist revolutions were supposed to usher in a new era devoid of superstition, but almost immediately we see messianic iconography of Lenin, Stalin, Mao and Che arising from the revolutionary fervor. Technology was going to liberate us from magical thinking and backwards approaches to fixing problems, but the technology itself immediately becomes a kind of magical panacea embraced by the people on an entirely irrational basis. Environmentalism becomes an apocalyptic cult, genetic research gives rise to fantasies about demons and monsters of all sorts, and space exploration becomes the basis of new sects, like Scientology.

So of course it doesn't surprise me that liberals and Democrats are not entirely scientific in their beliefs; if they were they'd hardly be human. If there's anything that bothers me about this hypocritical (but normal) insistence that they hold the key to the "correct" way of thinking, it's the profound lack of self-awareness, and the depth of ignorance where human nature is concerned. But they are hardly alone in this.

In the meanwhile, I'm going to put some effort into my humble theory on faith, and hopefully I'll soon have something to offer that gives us all – believers or not – some food for thought on this matter.

* To be frank, this is one human trait where women come off looking a bit more reasonable – if somewhat less consistent – than men. Women tend to keep an open mind about these things, always ready to try something new, but just as swiftly abandon it if it doesn't work for them. They take the attitude that "hey, palm-reading might work, but if it doesn't, I'll just try something else." Men, on the other hand, will often attach themselves to an irrational belief and cling to it until the bitter end even in the face of overwhelming evidence that it is wrong.

Time to end Domestic Dispute Pretext for Police Assault, Murder

W.F. Price · 18 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Three policemen have been suspended pending investigation after Luis Rodriguez, a husband and father, was beaten to death in Moor, Oklahoma for trying to defuse a fight between his wife and daughter.

> Nair Rodriguez told KWTV that incident started after she slapped her daughter Lunahi Rodriguez at the Warren Theater in Moore, Okla. early Saturday morning and then stormed away. Her husband, Luis Rodriguez, then chased after her into the theater's parking lot, where he was confronted by police asking to see his information, the family said.
>
> Nair and Lunahi said Luis tried to bypass the officers and stop his wife before she drove away in anger. That's when the officers took him down and started beating him, according to the family.
>
> Lunahi Rodriguez said her father was beaten to death by five Moore police officers in the movie theater parking lot.
>
> "When they flipped him over you could see all the blood on his face… he was disfigured, you couldn't recognize him," Lunahi said.
>
> Nair Rodriguez said she recorded the beating with her cell phone, which police confiscated.

Police responses to domestic disputes result in a high rate of police assaults and killings, and along with "no knock" warrants have provided some of the most chilling examples of the abuse of expanding police power since the 1970s.

Nair, the newly widowed wife, asked "why?"

> "I saw him. His [motionless] body when people carry it to the stretcher… I knew that he was dead," Nair told KWTV.
>
> Nair said that her husband's only intention was to break up the fight between herself and her daughter.
>
> "I told [police] I hit her and he was just trying to reach me. Why didn't they arrest me?" she said.
>
> "My mom was taking a video and asking, 'What are they doing this for? Why?'" Lunahi said. "They didn't really give an explanation."

There's a simple answer: because it's their job. The policeman's job is to apply force where directed to do so. If cops are told to shoot people for, say, public drunkenness, they will do so. If they are told, over and over again, to apply force to men who are "abusers" that's what will happen.

VAWA ushered in not only a presumption that men are batterers until proven not to be in court, but a requirement that police apply force (make an arrest) in all cases where any suspicion exists at all — in other crimes an accusation or a simple suspicion would typically warrant further investigation prior to arrest. The police who killed Mr. Rodriguez were doing exactly what feminists have been demanding they do for over 20 years.

Procedures in the US in regards to domestic disputes are the most draconian on earth, and I'm not sure people who are presumably from Latin America would know about them. What would be seen as a simple family argument in all of the rest of the world often can and will become a police killing in America. Poor Luis Rodriguez had no idea that trying to smooth things out with his wife and daughter could get him beaten to death.

Morally speaking, there's no excuse for what those cops did to Mr. Rodriguez. It is quite clearly a murder. However, it was an entirely legal – indeed, encouraged – response to what they suspected was a violation of domestic violence statutes.

It’s time decent Americans recognized that legally-sanctioned murder is a problem in our country, and if we don’t speak out against it we tacitly support it. I’d like to see feminists held responsible for this, but we all know that will never happen, so I’ll settle for legal reform.

Harvard Crimson: “Justice” Trumps Freedom

W.F. Price · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I’ve been pointing out for a while how illiberal liberals have become, but that’s really nothing new. What is new is that they’ve dropped any pretense of support for freedom of speech and even freedom of thought. In an editorial written for The Crimson, Sandra Korn asks “why bother?” when it comes to defending academic freedom:

> In its oft-cited Statement of Principles on Academic Freedom and Tenure, the American Association of University Professors declares that “Teachers are entitled to full freedom in research and in the publication of the results.” In principle, this policy seems sound: It would not do for academics to have their research restricted by the political whims of the moment.
>
> Yet the liberal obsession with “academic freedom” seems a bit misplaced to me. After all, no one ever has “full freedom” in research and publication. Which research proposals receive funding and what papers are accepted for publication are always contingent on political priorities. The words used to articulate a research question can have implications for its outcome. No academic question is ever “free” from political realities. If our university community opposes racism, sexism, and heterosexism, why should we put up with research that counters our goals simply in the name of “academic freedom”?
>
> Instead, I would like to propose a more rigorous standard: one of “academic justice.” When an academic community observes research promoting or justifying oppression, it should ensure that this research does not continue.
>
> The power to enforce academic justice comes from students, faculty, and workers organizing together to make our universities look as we want them to do. Two years ago, when former summer school instructor Subramanian Swamy published hateful commentary about Muslims in India, the Harvard community organized to ensure that he would not return to teach on campus. I consider that sort of organizing both appropriate and commendable. Perhaps it should even be applied more broadly. Does Government Professor Harvey Mansfield have the legal right to publish a book in which he claims that “to resist rape a woman needs … a certain ladylike modesty?” Probably. Do I think he should do that? No, and I would happily organize with other feminists on campus to stop him from publishing further sexist commentary under the authority of a Harvard faculty position. “Academic freedom” might permit such an offensive view of rape to be published; academic justice would not.

Is it a good thing that so many of our recent presidents have matriculated from Ivy League schools, where totalitarian sentiments are apparently the norm? Do these schools hold the same values as the majority in the US?

It’s getting to the point where having attended an Ivy League school should not only raise suspicions about any given official, but in cases of national office should also be viewed as a potentially disqualifying credential. If we have another couple Ivy League educated candidates in the next presidential election, I’m not going to bother to vote. To do so would violate my conscience.

It's OK to be Supportive of Men's Issues Now

W.F. Price · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Long, long ago, one of the biggest obstacles to improving the lot of the common people was the notion that men didn't deserve any sympathy, and had earned their lot, whatever it was. That view came to be strained during and after the Great War, in which millions of men were senselessly butchered on the Western Front, but it had taken decades and enormous sacrifice before men's issues were taken seriously.

In the writings of the so-called Lost Generation, one can find what contemporary feminists would call a severe backlash against the de facto feminism of the Victorian era. Hemingway, Fitzgerald and Orwell were unabashedly masculist writers. The sympathetic characters were invariably male, while the females, if not outright villains, were rarely the flawless heroes that appear in today's fiction.

Hopefully, we can recapture some of that spirit while avoiding the enormous human misery of the early 20th century. It is starting to look like that finally may be happening. In an article titled The Year of the Male, The Telegraph offers a positive assessment of efforts to address men's issues:

> "In a post-apocalyptic world where the women won the war and wear the trousers, men stumble around, naked but for an empty tool belt, searching for new role models. Would-be Alpha males live at home ruing student loans and memorising the floorboards that creak, while lad mags sell them gadgetry they don't need and boobs their girlfriends can't afford. James Bond's got real and Peter Pan's chained to his Xbox …"
>
> That was the opening gambit of the press release for 21st Century Boy, a website I launched in 2006 for young men. Essentially, it was an online manual for growing up, aimed at my brethren: twentysomething males.
>
> I came up with the idea whilst studying in Falmouth. The truth was, I was a 24-year-old man-child. I didn't know how to change a car tyre, shave without ending up looking like a Picasso, or undo a bra in under fifteen minutes. But the fact I didn't know these things was symptomatic of something else – I was a fully signed up member of what I coined the Lost Generation.
>
> For me, the Lost Generation came around after the ubiquity of the metrosexual; which in turn had developed as a rebuke to the lad culture of the 1990s; which itself had emerged from the embers of post-feminism. Once the coals had cooled on this gender tit-for-tat, young men in particular didn't really know which way was up, let alone who was wearing the trousers.
>
> In my own life I'd observed that, bar millionaire footballers, young men were devoid of genuine role-models and older men to show them the ropes (only exacerbated by the ageless notion that men never ask for help). Our demographic was beset by a sense of unworthiness. A growth in women's rights had led to general confusion about what role a man should play in a relationship and the wider (heteronormative) world; while a surge away from largely manual and mostly masculine localised industries had left many men bereft of the badge of breadwinner. In short: we didn't know what to do, or how to behave.

Later, the piece does genuflect before feminism, but instead of the sarcastic "what about the menz?" taunt that feminists throw around (as though today's feminists have any idea of what hardship means), it demonstrates a genuine concern for men and the problems they face.

Of course, I don't think it goes nearly far enough; I am certain that the standard for human rights should be men's rights, because in nearly every society I've looked at the better off the men the better off society – including women and children – is in aggregate. However, it's a step in the right direction when we see widely circulated publications such as The Telegraph running articles that portray men's efforts to better their collective lot in positive terms.

If it weren't for the efforts of thousands of men, this never would have happened, so I'm happy to say that we have made some collective difference.

More Divorce: Good News for Economy!

W.F. Price · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Bloomberg points to rising divorce rates as a sign that the US economy is improving:

> The number of Americans getting divorced rose for the third year in a row to about 2.4 million in 2012, after plunging in the 18-month recession ended June 2009, according to U.S. Census Bureau data. Whatever the social and emotional impact, the broad economic effects of the increase are clear: It is contributing to the formation of new households, boosting demand for housing, appliances and furnishings and spurring the economy. Divorces are also prompting more women to enter the labor force.
>
> "As the economy normalizes, so too do family dynamics," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Analytics Inc. in West Chester, Pennsylvania. "Birth rates and divorce rates are rising. We may even see them rise strongly in the next couple of years, as households who put off these life-changing events decide to act."

Somehow, I'm not sure that a model where economic improvement leads to even more social disintegration is sustainable in the long run, but it looks like that's what we've got. Can't wait to see how much "better" the US will look in another 20 years…

Shooting Fish in a Barrel

W.F. Price · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A Seattle-area high school teacher has been arrested and charged with "attempted commercial sex abuse of a minor" after police set him up with an online ad:

> A 27-year-old Kentridge High School teacher was charged last week with attempted commercial sex abuse of a minor for allegedly agreeing to pay $100 to have sex with someone he thought was a 15-year-old cheerleader, according to King County prosecutors.
>
> A Seattle police detective in the department' s vice and high risk victims unit posted an ad in the "casual encounters" section of a popular website pretending to be a 15-year-old girl, charging papers say. He posted the ad — titled "Student looking for older men" — just before 9 p.m. on Sept. 17 and "a short time" later, began exchanging explicit emails with a man who identified himself as Brent Conley, the papers say.
>
> Conley was told the person he was communicating with was "a 15-year-old high school cheerleader who was looking to make some money by having sex," charging papers say. Conley exchanged emails and texts "of a sexual nature, detailing the sex acts" he wanted in exchange for $100, the papers say. He arranged to meet the "girl" the following day and planned to take her to his house in Fremont to have sex, according to the charges.
>
> Conley was arrested a little after 7 p.m. on Sept. 18 when he showed up at the agreed location, a McDonald's restaurant in Seattle's Sodo neighborhood, according to the charges. He had in his possession $100 cash and the cellphone that was used to communicate with the fictitious girl, the papers say.

Conley obviously screwed up, but would he have done so if the police hadn't placed the ad and convinced him to meet the "cheerleader" in the first place? If you want a quick arrest, using teen girls as bait seems to me a pretty cheap and easy way to get one. Too cheap and easy.

Say somebody were to set up a fake account and use the promise of meeting up with an underage girl to lure men to some place, and then rob them. It would be pretty easy to do. You could stick a gun in the guy's face, threaten to reveal the whole thing if he opened his mouth about it, then take him for all he had.

This would be a felony, and anyone who got caught doing it would face some pretty serious prison time. I bet it does happen, and more often than we know, because the victims keep their mouths shut.

So why is it that when cops do it we think they're performing a public service? Is it morally justifiable to lure a man with a fake hot girl? And yes, teenage girls can be very attractive, and there's nothing at all abnormal about grown men who find them sexually appealing. If men were disgusted by fertile females, the human race would have died out long ago.

It seems to me that luring men with what they are not allowed to have yet find attractive all the same is a questionable tactic. It's an abuse of power that serves no justifiable purpose. If the cops want to bust guys for going after underage girls, they shouldn't be allowed to entice them into it, but instead should find the men who act purely on their own initiative. But that would be too hard for them, and they don't like to work too hard. They are government employees, after all…

House of Cards Discussion Exposes Feminist Moral Depravity

W.F. Price · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I haven't watched House of Cards yet, but I suppose I ought to, having enjoyed Breaking Bad. According to reports, the show portrays Washington insiders as ruthless, power-obsessed villains, which sounds about right. In fact, even the women in the show are possessed of a demonic ambition and Machiavellian spirit. Unsurprisingly, feminists find this impressive, and have started to look at the characters as role models.

From Jezebel:

> With Frank being sworn in as Vice President, Claire's profile was raised considerably. The couple were scheduled to sit down for a live interview with CNN's Ashleigh Banfield, but a terrorism scare kept Frank on lockdown at the Capitol, forcing Claire to fly solo. It was a star-making turn for her.
>
> Claire was grilled about why she and her husband never had children in the 27 years they were married and asked whether she's ever been pregnant. Claire handled the interview with style, grace, and candor, admitting that she had been pregnant, and that she'd chosen to have an abortion. (Ashleigh, on the other hand, came across as a total abrasive asshole.)
>
> The real story is that Chair had three abortions, two as a "reckless" teenager and one second-trimester abortion while married to Frank. They'd decided to terminate the pregnancy because he was in the middle of a campaign. Unfortunately, she knew that she'd never be able to actually explain the real circumstances—that she and Frank didn't have the time or emotional means to care for a child.
>
> What she knew is that she wasn't ashamed of her choices, and wouldn't be made to feel that way. So she needed to think quickly, in order to maintain the integrity of her convictions, but not rub people the wrong way with her truth. So she came up with a version of the truth that also touched on a deeper injustice in Claire's life.
>
> Pressed to clarify the circumstances of her abortion, Claire told Ashleigh that was raped by a boyfriend while in college; the man is now a military general whom Frank recently had to honor at a public appearance. Claire even named him during the broadcast. It caused at least one other woman—also a member of the military—to come out of the woodwork and tell her story about how she was raped by the same man, who was her superior.
>
> Claire's story is mostly true; she was raped by her boyfriend who would go on to become a general. Decades later, Claire would have to watch Frank pin stars on her rapist. Of course, the general didn't actually impregnate Claire as she says he did (not that he would necessarily know either way) — as soon as Claire admitted that she was raped, that was the story the press would run with. The supposed pregnancy was a moot point; the rape is the real reveal. And with a small, maybe irrelevant falsehood, Claire was able to expose a greater, far more important truth: A decorated military general was a rapist. In the context of House of Cards' amoral, political spin machine, the end justifies the means.

Feminists love to deny that women ever lie about anything, but in the above excerpt a lie is celebrated as a powerful and effective tool to achieve the goals of retribution and preservation of personal power.

However, not all of the feminists' allies are celebrating the character. Connor Friedersdorf, writing for The Atlantic, identifies some of the troubling implications of anti-hero worship:

> Political elites will never be angels. But America is in deep trouble if the prevailing reaction to a ruthless, self-serving, power-hungry sociopath is to assess her political effectiveness, see if her policy positions accord with ours, and only then decide whether to reject her or, if she is "a winner," to embrace her as long as she stays one. Every moral judgment would quickly becomes suspect. Does the House of Cards audience really hate General McGuinness because he's a rapist—or is it because he is a disgraced loser? Forgive me for wondering > about the subset of the audience that cheers Claire for destroying him, then in the very next scene cheers Claire's political partner, the guy who threw Zoe in front of a subway car.

>
> In real life, it's easy to find excuses for the shortcomings of our leaders, especially those who echo our beliefs and might plausibly advance our preferred policies. Seeming depravity by a powerful person who agrees with us? Why, they're just playing by the rules of a corrupt system, unlike those people on the other side!
>
> David Brooks is always reassuring us about how well-meaning our elites are. In fairness to his perspective, benefits of the doubt aren't always wasted on the undeserving. Yet House of Cards reveals our alarming inability to resist or condemn the powerful even when their depravity is revealed to us in the most unambiguous terms. If any human beings are evil, then Frank and Claire Underwood are evil. A root cause of political corruption is our aversion to treating them as we would less powerful people who are equally evil. We need a Hank Schrader.

But Connor, didn't you know that power-worship is part and parcel of feminism, and feminine psychology itself? Women loved Bill Clinton not despite his womanizing, corruption and ends-justifies-the-means methods, but because of them. Who besides a superior man could get away with it? In fact, his blatant disregard for ordinary people's standards was not seen as a flaw, but rather proof of his status.

It looks like House of Cards will turn out to be a polarizing show in this increasingly divided nation, displaying the chasm between the values of disparate groups of American citizens. We may already know which side the feminists are on, but this show only makes it that much clearer for everyone.

NOW Demands WSJ Fire James Taranto

W.F. Price · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The National Organization for Women, a powerful, but declining institution that has, among other things, defended child murder, has called for the firing of Wall Street Journal columnist James Taranto. He provoked the group's wrath by daring to suggest that it can be difficult to ascertain who is at "fault" when two intoxicated people have sex:

> Winerip notes that between 2005 and 2010, "more than 60 percent of claims involving sexual violence handled by United Educators"–an insurance company owned by member schools–"involved young women who were so drunk they had no clear memory of the assault." We know from Sgt. Cournoyer that the accused young men typically are drinking to excess, too. What is called the problem of "sexual assault" on campus is in large part a problem of reckless alcohol consumption, by men and women alike. (Based on our reporting, the same is true in the military, at least in the enlisted and company-grade officer ranks.)

Taranto is merely pointing out that in an atmosphere of drunkenness, there will be debauchery, and both parties share some responsibility for that.

NOW isn't having it. In a press release, they demand he be put out of work:

> Surely this ugly kind of victim-blaming is beneath the dignity of The Wall Street Journal. Approximately one in four young women will be sexually assaulted during their college career – an alarming statistic that should spur all of us to seek effective policies to provide services to rape survivors and hold perpetrators accountable for their crimes. But Taranto seems determined to maintain or even deepen the rape culture that pervades campuses and indeed much of U.S. society. What does that say about The Wall Street Journal?
>
> Taranto's recent screed is not his first misogynist claim. On January 6, he said that the growing number of illegitimate children was a product of the "rise of female careerism" and women's choices given their access to abortions and birth control when he said, "the vast majority of children who are growing up without fathers are doing so in large part because of their mother's choices."
>
> James Taranto doesn't need a national platform for demeaning women and condoning rape. He has demonstrated how out of touch he is; now he needs to be out of a job.

James Taranto is one of the few writers at a national publication with the guts to tell it like it is. Let's hope the WSJ tells NOW to go to hell.

Where's FEMEN in Kiev Bloodbath?

W.F. Price · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Ukrainian feminist protest group FEMEN has been vocally antagonistic toward the Yanukovych government in Ukraine, with some members detained last month for causing a ruckus in Kiev, chanting "the dictator must die!" "create freedom," etc.

However, now that some real fighting has erupted, I can't find a trace of the group anywhere near the conflagration.

Does anyone have any footage of the brave feminists at the front lines of the conflict? Any topless girls storming the barricades? Anything?

It sort of looks to me like they helped get the brawl started and then quietly snuck out through the back door.

Are our Cities Sustainable?

W.F. Price · 21 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

About ten years ago, I made an attempt to flee Seattle. My first child was on the way, and I wanted to start anew in a simpler, more affordable place. My hopes were dashed when my ex and her mother decided that it just wouldn't do for us to move when a baby was on the way. I look back on giving in, and feel that I made an enormous mistake. Not because it would have ultimately saved my marriage (I doubt it), but because for younger GenXers like me, living in a city feels like spinning your wheels in the mud. We've watched home prices yo-yo, middle-class jobs disappear and rents skyrocket, all while public schools remain as miserably bad and controlled by clueless, elderly liberals as they were a generation ago.

Now, I'm in a similar situation, with another kid on the way, my parents finally on the verge of retirement and looking at a rental market that gets worse for tenants every week. Most of the people I grew up with in Seattle are long gone. Of those that remained in the city, few have children. People may point to this as selfish, adolescent behavior, but after my experience I sympathize. One thing goes wrong in a family in a high-cost city, and you're screwed. There's little margin for error here, and dropping out of the middle class can happen in the blink of an eye. Then add the cost of children. Kids aren't all that expensive in and of themselves, but if you care about them, the costs really add up. Do you want your kid to get his butt kicked on the playground by packs of feral, single mothers' kids? If not, prepare to spend at least an extra $500-1000 extra per month in housing costs to live in a "good" neighborhood, which is usually less convenient on top of being more expensive. Or else you can spend an extra $2000 per month for private education. Either way, it adds up.

So I've pretty much made up my mind. This time, I'm outta here. Maybe not for good, but for as long as it takes to rebuild a life and make sure the kids are doing OK. I'll stay close enough to visit the parents regularly, but the idea of living in a nice, quiet town where people are for the most part normal just seems heavenly. So does the notion of being able to go clamming and crabbing without contaminating myself with heavy metals or sewage, and being only five minutes from a forest filled with tasty mushrooms, salmon and game. Maybe I'll finally start getting out of the house again.

Because I know I'm not the only one who feels this way and has the same intentions, I wonder where this is going. For one thing, it looks like the traditional American middle class is essentially dead in our cities. Sure, there may be tens of thousands of well-paid young professionals willing to subject themselves to being corporate slaves in return for getting ripped off by landlords, but where will the people who make a city run go? How about the contractors, laborers and service workers? The barflies who add some character and texture to a neighborhood? The bohemian types? Will anyone still work at cafés or bookstores, or drive a cab?

If these people, who don't make all that much, can't afford to live in the city, will the commute be worth it? I wouldn't do it. If I still worked in carpentry or as a driver, I can't imagine it would be worth an hour-long commute to get paid peanuts in a city I can't afford. So, from my perspective, it looks like the cities are setting themselves up for some kind of failure. Maybe not an epic collapse along the lines of Detroit, but more of a long, steady decline as they cease to function as organic communities.

The implications are not all that pleasant for the highly-paid newcomers, either. Even the free-spirited young women will be pushed out; those that remain will demand financial support from their love interests, because they could never make it on their own. Young men who are paying $30k per year in rent will be pressured to pay even more, to marry and then to assume all of the burdens that family entails. Instead of finding their children growing up around working and middle class kids who are relatively well-behaved and socially mobile, they will find their kids outnumbered by the section 8 children of single mothers and polygamists. They will be hated by their less fortunate neighbors, resented by out-of-towners, and ruthlessly exploited by speculators even as their corporate bosses scheme to replace them with H1-B immigrants.

Makes one wonder whether the pay at Microsoft and Amazon is really even worth it in the long run.

Cognitive Dissonance over Kiev Struggle

W.F. Price · 22 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Steve Sailer points out that there's a lot of denial of reality going on in our press over the struggle between nationalist and pro-Moscow Ukrainians:

> According to a Reuters article, "Insiders say [Right Sektor] has its origins among nationalist-minded soccer fans – the word 'sector' in Russian denotes the spectator terraces of a stadium – and includes individuals from far-right organizations from across the country." But don't trust me to get translations right. (By the way, more than a few Right Sector fighters are Russian-speakers.)
>
> On the other hand, here is pro-Ukrainian Yale historian Timothy Snyder, author of Bloodlands: Europe between Hitler and Stalin, in the New York Review of Books trying hard to assure the New York Review's elderly leftist subscribers that Moscow, not Kiev, now represents the real right wing. In contrast, Snyder explains, "An important hotline that [Ukraine] protesters call when they need help is staffed by LGBT activists."
>
> I don't know, though. Judging from videos, the lads who retook Independence Square from the riot police on Thursday and who are (if still alive) presumably enjoying tonight the traditional rewards offered to a nation's brave young men by its appreciative young women don't look too gay to me.

Yesterday, I was listening to Timothy Snyder on NPR. He was trying to explain why people who are generally referred to as "fascists" and even "Nazis" by their opponents are on the same side as American progressives. Sure, they might use the Slavic version of the Swastika, they might have chosen red, white and black as colors, and they might have even shaved their heads, but Putin hates gays! Somehow, we're supposed to believe that the Ukrainian nationalists, on the other hand, are all about rainbow flags and Pride marches.

That's just laughable.

Right wing nationalism has a long history in that part of the world. Without it, there would be no Ukraine, and probably no Latvia, Lithuania, Poland or Estonia either. Add Romania, Hungary and a few others to the list.

Nationalist freedom fighters are folk heroes, much loved by men and women alike. They could give a damn about American values of "diversity" and "tolerance," and in fact are openly hostile to them (in no small part because they remind them of the hated USSR). And as the article Sailer links points out, Ukrainian girls lovingly supply and care for the men who are fighting for their Ukraine.

There's a cultural chasm between the US and most of the rest of the world, but it isn't often that Americans pay enough attention to see this for themselves. Maybe this time a few more perceptive Americans will get a clue and start to understand that our "values" are far from universal, and may actually be losing ground. Maybe we should start rethinking them ourselves, before we end up with our own Ukraine on our hands.

Why the Hate for the "Dudebros"?

W.F. Price · 22 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

While reading up on the urban rent phenomenon, one of the things I noticed was that there's a lot of animosity for the young techies who are supposedly responsible for driving up cost of living. People refer to them as "dudebros," which I'm pretty sure came from feminists, who really hate them. So what's the beef with these guys?

I can understand where economic resentment comes from, but even that should be tempered by the knowledge that these guys are about the most heavily exploited professional work force in modern times. Sure, they are paid a lot and given perks, but they have no job security to speak of, they are subjected to forced overtime all the time, and their employers, in collaboration with national politicians, are constantly trying to undermine their bargaining power. Are there any tech unions of note? Is there anyone arguing on their behalf in front of congress saying that Zuckerberg et al don't need access to hundreds of thousands of new H1-B workers every year?

There are a lot of tech workers in Seattle, so while I know people who have done well for themselves, I've also met a few who have been blacklisted and/or simply ejected after a certain age. Microsoft is not the worst offender in this regard (as far as tech companies go, it's a good place to work), but layoffs are common there, too. Amazon, according to what I've heard, is terrible. Unless you want to be Jeff Bezos' slave for 70% of your waking hours, don't bother. I'm not sure about the culture down in San José, but it can't be too different. Basically, those who have made it – most of whom are over 40 – have great lives, while the others work themselves to the bone and pray they can keep up.

The compensation is good, but on an hourly basis it doesn't add up to great. Baseline hours at Amazon are said to be 60 per week for a developer hire. Your starting salary is about $100,000. That comes out to about 8,300 per month, which works out to just under $35 per hour (with two weeks of vacation time and a few sick days). Sounds pretty good, huh? Well, consider that urban public school teachers with seniority can do a lot better than that on a per hour basis, and in addition to rock-solid job security and great benefits, they get their summers off. Maybe you think you'll be doing a lot better at a company like Amazon after you get some seniority. Think again. Chances are you'll be laid off before that happens. The average employee doesn't last two years.

So you're making $35 per hour, which is significantly better than most of your young peers, and you don't know the next thing about the city you've moved to. Never fear! Real estate developers have you covered. For only $2,000 per month, you can live in this swank, convenient apartment we just built on top of the rubble of a place that used to house low-wage workers. Nevermind that we built it on the cheap, and it will be a decaying eyesore within a decade's time — the city is just so awesome and progressive you'll have the time of your life in the few hours of leisure time you have every week.

This is the techie "dudebro" reality, and if you ask me, it kind of sucks. But the feminists hate these guys. Why?

It's because they haven't (yet) figured out how to take their money. Young professional men are not getting married at high rates, and most of them don't have time for a girlfriend. Women are very time-consuming, hence the romance fantasy of the unemployed billionaire, who keeps up his fortune by issuing orders to subordinates every now and then like some contented silverback gorilla placidly munching bamboo shoots in a jungle grove.

The other problem is that as much as women like the idea of getting paid $100k per year, they don't generally like spending 60 hours per week under a corporate whip. Not that I blame them for that, but come on girls, be realistic…

So the problem is really that all this profit is not going to the feministas. The traditional vector does not apply in this case. However, as we can see from the above, that isn't the tech worker's fault. No, it is all the other bastards who have figured out how to milk him for every ounce of energy and profit they can while he's still young, leaving nothing for the girls.

If the women really want to derive some benefit from these guys, instead of hating on them and denouncing them as sexist, racist assholes, which only plays right into the hands of their employers (having a politically marginalized workforce is awesome — ask Stalin about that), they should team up with them and demand better job security, better working conditions and less exploitation. But that will never happen, because the feminists aren't very imaginative people.

After Alienating Europe, FEMEN Looks to US

W.F. Price · 24 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Given FEMEN's criminality, the group gets surprisingly good press here in the US. Consider that FEMEN vandals targeted Notre Dame Cathedral, took a chainsaw to a cross in Ukraine, and desecrated altars throughout France. I wonder how many Christian American men could get away with doing the same to mosques, or Muslims to synagogues. Not a one, I'd wager. Merely disrupting a service while shouting militant slogans would earn the "activist" years in prison for terrorism with a hate crime enhancement.

But some animals are more equal than others, and anti-religious vandals have a way of escaping consequences for their actions, especially if they cloak themselves in fashionable causes such as feminism. However, after a certain point, even they can wear out their welcome:

> She quickly seduced French officialdom after arriving from Ukraine, winning political asylum within a year of her application. Her visage, framed in blond hair crowned with flowers, helped inspire France's latest postage stamp.
>
> Few French people knew back then that they were dealing with a radical soldier for the feminist cause, in town to organize the ranks of women for a radical insurgency with bare breasts as weapons.
>
> The sweet start for 23-year-old Inna Shevchenko is souring. The defiant chief of the Ukraine-born Femen movement now risks up to five years in prison and a 75,000-euro ($103,000) fine for bashing brand new bells at Notre Dame Cathedral a year ago — and allegedly damaging one. Dressed only in pantyhose, she and eight others were celebrating the resignation of Pope Benedict XVI.
>
> The trial for the nine was postponed from Wednesday to July 9. A second trial begins March 14 for a single Femen activist for simulating abortion in Paris' famed church, Eglise de la Madeleine.
>
> Femen has orchestrated a raft of bare-breasted protests with a range of targets: near the Vatican, in front of Russian President Vladimir Putin and German Chancellor Angela Merkel, near the Grand Mosque of Paris and in several churches outside France, including at Christmas Mass at Cologne Cathedral. There, a single topless woman with "I am God" painted on her chest briefly jumped onto the altar.
>
> Boldness is clearly in Shevchenko's blood. She fled Ukraine in 2012 after taking a buzz saw to a huge wood cross, risking prison. Today, she is nonchalant about that risk.
>
> "Of course, I was scared" after the Ukraine protest, she said in an interview with The Associated Press. "But this is not that fear that will make you stop your activity. We are scared to not be able to continue our activity."
>
> "We are not a political party who wants to find fans. We are not a rock band," she said. "We're a bunch of angry women."
>
> Shevchenko has announced plans to expand Femen's footprint from nine countries mostly in Europe to the United States, most likely in New York or Washington, D.C. The group's Ukraine headquarters has been shut down.
>
> "We are this sort of detonator," she said. "We go where the problem is."

You'd think that if Shevchenko were really such a hero who always headed for action, she'd have been in Kiev for the last couple of weeks. Instead, the group vanished after a few were arrested last month in Maidan Square, and it doesn't look like they have any plans to return. No, she wants to go to real "problem" areas, like Washington and New York.

However, in the US, perhaps she can carry her aggressive strain of anti-Christian activism to the next level, and this is why I'm not entirely opposed to her efforts. If she starts attacking Evangelical megachurches, maybe these institutions will finally get a clue about feminism. Perhaps their pastors will have to take sides on the issue, which they have skirted for years with the anti-patriarchal sermons and dogma that Dalrock so artfully exposes.

It could be quite a show.

Babies, Cats and Abortion

W.F. Price · 25 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I watched an ultrasound yesterday. It isn't the first time I've done so, but I don't think I've ever seen a baby this far along before. The baby boy is about 21 weeks old, and a little less than a pound in weight. It's a nerve-wracking experience for a parent. Well, it is for me, anyway. You can't help but be worried about the baby.

I've mentioned before in comments that I was never an anti-abortion fanatic, but after becoming a parent the idea of abortion became abhorrent to me. Newborn infants are at a very early stage of development, but are obviously human nonetheless. There may be people out there who argue that they are still subhuman and therefore do not deserve full human rights, but normal people are disgusted by the idea of slaughtering newborns. One would have to be extremely cold-blooded to do so. I don't have it in me. Even in a rage, I could never do it.

So when I see how human a fetus looks at 21 weeks, I wonder how anyone could enthusiastically support aborting him or her. He/she has a face, a brain, arms, legs, fingers and toes. In some cases, a fetus may not be viable. Then, I might understand a mercy killing, as heart-wrenching as that may be, but the debate over abortion has nothing to do with that in the US. What radical pro-abortion groups want is the option to terminate any pregnancy at any time. It is the logic of pure maternal ownership of a little human being, along the lines of livestock.

If I were to write that I'm tired of my cat, and have decided to take him outside and shoot him, I'd face wider condemnation than if I were to support the killing of my child. I like my old cat, but he's getting decrepit and doesn't offer much anymore. He doesn't even catch rats very often these days, so he hardly earns his keep. Perhaps he's an inconvenience. That being the case, maybe I should kill him humanely, with a bullet to the brainstem.

Of course, I'm going to try to keep my cat as long as he's healthy and happy, even if he is an old boy and not terribly useful. But if it came down to a choice between feeding my kids and feeding my cat, I'd pull the trigger on him in a heartbeat. Is it wrong of me to have different standards in this regard? Is it wrong to feel that killing a cat who is no longer useful is a far lesser sin than terminating a healthy fetus who holds the promise of humanity?

Sometimes, I think that the pro-abortion activists see a human fetus and a cat as essentially equal. If it isn't a sin to put down an old, useless cat, then why is it wrong to terminate a pregnancy, even if the little being is so human?

As I get older and more cynical, it appears to me that there is an enormous amount of hatred in this world, and most of it is directed at other human beings. There is nothing that confirms this so much as the pro-abortion movement.

Atlantic Taps Deseret News Series to Add Reality to Child Support Narrative

W.F. Price · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A friend sent me a link to a piece published in The Atlantic on how welfare and child support policies are destructive to families, which leads me to wonder, considering the garbage it usually puts out, whether the magazine isn't having some sort of identity crisis. It's a good article, produced "in collaboration with the Deseret News," that brings up many of the problems I've been writing about for a few years now.

> The 10-month-old twins call Frandy "Da Da." He changes their diapers, mixes up their formula, and helps shoulder the burden of providing food, clothing, and medical care.
>
> But the girls aren't his children; Frandy's girlfriend Cassie was pregnant when they started dating. When, a few months later, the two decided to move in together, "I knew raising the kids was part of the package," says Frandy, a 23-year-old from inner-city Boston.
>
> His own 6-year-old daughter lives across town with her mother and her mother's boyfriend. Frandy sends a check every month.
>
> Such complex family arrangements are becoming increasingly common, particularly among the poor, like Frandy and Cassie. Nearly 40 percent of unwed parents with low education levels share childrearing responsibilities with a co-residential boyfriend or girlfriend, according to a 2013 report from the United States Census Bureau. Oftentimes these couples share at least one biological child, but in 27 percent of relationships, either mom or dad is stepping in to raise children they didn't conceive.
>
> U.S. government programs designed to help such families, however, haven't evolved with the population. Based on decades-old stereotypes that single mothers are raising children alone and single dads are "deadbeats," the majority of United States anti-poverty programs almost exclusively serve women and children, says Jacquelyn Boggess, co-director of the Center for Family Policy and Practice,* a Wisconsin-based think tank that focuses on supporting low-income parents. The welfare system, as a result, can become a muddled mess of rearranging rather than relieving poverty. Single, non-custodial fathers bear the brunt. But dads don't suffer alone. Because the poor pull together to support one another, everyone absorbs the pinch.

When I spoke with Tod Kelly last summer, he was surprised to hear that welfare actually discriminates against low-income married people, and offers incentives for women to kick husbands out of the house and shack up with someone else. Sometimes, I take it for granted that people know about these things because they seem so obvious to me after years of research, but actually very few people outside of the poor themselves are aware of this.

> Cohabitating with a boyfriend who is not biologically related to any of the household's children is the most advantageous setup in most states. The children get the benefit of government help, but still have a second adult in the house to bring in cash. If the couple were married, Frandy's income would be factored into eligibility tests and Cassie might not qualify for help. Still, money is tight. Most of these government programs aren't designed to fully meet a family's needs, Berger says. The average monthly SNAP benefit, for example, provides just $1.50 per meal, according to the USDA's Food and Nutrition Service.
>
> The biggest flaw in current anti-poverty policies is that they don't take into account the increasing role that fathers play in children's lives, Berger says. As mothers go to work at higher rates, fathers are taking on more childrearing responsibilities. Even if parents are splitting the financial burden, though, only one parent can benefit from anti-poverty programs like SNAP or the earned-income tax credit. So, while mom gets help paying the bills, dad, who is oftentimes just as poor, is held responsible for his share of the costs.
>
> "Helping women and not men creates huge gender asymmetry, which makes it harder for couples to stay > together," says Harvard sociologist Kathryn Edin, author of Doing the Best I Can: Fatherhood in the Inner City. "Men can't earn enough money to earn a place in the family. They become dispensable."

It doesn't just make it harder for couples to stay together, it provides incentives for them to split up. Another issue brought up is the disincentive to work:

> Expanding the earned-income tax credit to include non-custodial parents could go a long ways in addressing poverty, Edin says. Not precisely welfare, the EITC is a tax subsidy for low-income workers that increases as wages go up. The idea, she says, is to make good on the promise that "if you work, you won't be poor."
>
> "Wouldn't it be better for everyone if men were rewarded for working?" she says.

I'd say the EITC isn't a bad idea, but it isn't the right place to start. First, let working men claim their children as dependents whether or not they are custodial parents. As it is, noncustodial single fathers face not only ruinous child support garnishments, but are taxed as though they are single, childless men, and cannot deduct child support. For a working class man, that means functional poverty. Say a young, single father makes $30,000 per year, which is typical in much of the US, and is paying roughly $600 per month in child support — about standard for that income. After tax deductions, he is pulling in just over $1,000 per month to support himself and save for retirement. After paying for an apartment, insurance and other costs, he has precious little for food, yet doesn't qualify for any government assistance. How could this man have a meaningful relationship with his children if he can't even afford to put them up at his place on weekends? It is a brutal system that does little for his children or society at large, and as often as not he is not at fault for his circumstances, unless you view becoming a father as a crime against society.

If that's the man's reality, what's the point of trying?

In a Corrupt Society, Nobility is Conflated with Servility

W.F. Price · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I came across a heartbreaking story of a young man who died before his time, and dedicated his last months to family. Some in the manosphere might be tempted to write the young man off as a beta chump, but I see it in an entirely different light. He was a young Welshman named Chris Price – perhaps some distant cousin of mine – and during his last couple seasons on earth, he spent his time with his wife and his stepchildren, all having a good time together.

However, accounts of his final moments paint him as an abject subject of his wife, who devoted his last hours to her and her alone like an obedient, servile dog:

> A boyfriend proposed to his girlfriend when he had just six months to live – then spent the rest of his days making his bride's dreams come true.
>
> Chris Price, 26, promised to give "love of his life" Ceri, 29, everything she ever wished for after he was diagnosed with terminal cancer.
>
> The pair had a plush church wedding with Ceri's four children as the guests of honour.
>
> Chris then took her and four children Halle, nine, and triplets Evan, Morgan and Georgia, six, to Disneyland Paris.
>
> And they had only been home a few weeks when he whisked Ceri off to New York for a weekend of sightseeing and shopping.
>
> Chris then splashed out on the £500 pair of Louboutin shoes – and a £900 Mulberry handbag Ceri had always wanted.
>
> The loving husband then booked to take Ceri to Las Vegas for her birthday … but sadly he ran out of time.
>
> Chris died in Ceri's arms and his funeral was held in the church where the pair had married just six months earlier.

The reporting here is borderline obscene. The man spent a couple thousand on gifts for his wife, knowing that he had no use for the money himself, and spent the rest on traveling with her and the children. Given the lack of sensitivity on the part of the reporter, I'm not sure whether the quotes he ascribes to wife Ceri are in their proper context, because they make her come off as a self-centered bitch, and although I'm far from an unqualified supporter of divorcées, I kind of doubt that's the case (if it were, she would have been off with another guy long before Chris was a corpse):

> "He was so positive he never talked about dying, he just wanted to see me and the children happy in the time he had left."
>
> Ceri, from Merthyr Tydfil, told how maintenance inspector Chris loved to surprise her and his four stepchildren.
>
> She said: "The Disney trip was something we had talked about in the future but when Chris knew he didn't have long he booked for all of us to go.
>
> "Then he told me he'd arranged a romantic trip for us in Dublin but on the way to the airport he told me we were going to New York.
>
> "We had the most magical time and I will savour those memories forever.
>
> "He knew I had fancied a pair of Louboutin boots but they were way too expensive for me to ever afford them.
>
> "But Chris bought them for me and got me an even more expensive Mulberry handbag."

When I read this kind of thing, I just shake my head. Is this what it all comes down to? Whether so-and-so bought a few baubles or not? How degrading. It's like being in family court all over again, with some filthy swine of a judge sizing you up by the thickness of your wallet.

No, that wasn't what it was all about for Chris. There was something in the man, some fundamental characteristic, that valued and treasured the family life. It wasn't the boots or the handbag, but the happiness of his wife and the children. In his last days, that was what motivated Chris Price. Seeing happy children and a wife who loved him. It was the alpha and the omega. It was a part of his very soul.

Chris did it not only for those he loved, but for himself and his values. He did what came naturally to him.

If it were not for the Chris Prices of the world, there would be much less joy, much less innocence, and much less beauty in the world. He did not spend his last months shoving tokens into a slot to satiate some solipsistic appetite, but rather giving the gift of his humanity to those around him. It is what men do, and when I see it reduced to purchasing a few items in fashionable stores I am filled with a desire to smash the edifice of our rotten society down to rubble.

“Tech Consultant” Attacked in San Francisco

W.F. Price · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A young woman in San Francisco wearing Google glass so annoyed patrons of a bar on lower Haight that they ripped the glasses off her face and took them out of the bar:

> A San Francisco woman who says she was attacked at a bar on Haight Street after refusing to stop wearing Google Glass has released video footage of the incident that she filmed with the new technology that spurred the confrontation in the first place.
>
> In a video posted to YouTube, tech writer Sarah Solcum provided a narrative for the footage, which she says captures the weekend attack.
> “This is the video that I got on Google Glass at Molotov bar on Haight Street after being verbally accosted and flicked off by the Asian looking girl, I turned on the video, and after I told them I was doing so they got pissed and came after me,” Slocum wrote.
>
> “Unfortunately, I had not extended the video so it cuts out after 10 seconds. Here you can see them — two people, a male and a female — trying to block the camera. The guy waving his hands in my face here later rips the Google Glasses off my face and ran out of the bar,” she wrote.

She also claims to have been robbed in the attack, but knowing that part of town I’d guess it was street people outside the bar who grabbed her purse rather than the angry bar patrons. In fact, I know that part of town quite well, and will be staying only a short walk from there for a few days next month during my yearly trip with the kids to grandma and grandpa’s place. This will be the last year I do that, as my mom is retiring and my folks are leaving SF.

I think this incident, while pretty silly and not too important in the grand scheme of things, does offer some insight into what we can expect more of in the future. There was more to this attack than a mere breach of etiquette, although some twenty years ago I saw a similar – although significantly more forceful – eruption in the same neighborhood when someone sat down on a biker’s bar stool. In addition to the patrons being angry about the glasses, I suspect they are not very happy about the techies in their neighborhoods and establishments.

As I was driving back from the border yesterday after a long weekend with the kids (South BC and Whatcom County were snowed in for a few days), I was thinking, somewhat pessimistically, that the relentless peonization and stratification underway in the US will not stop until people put up a fight, and by that I don’t mean a mere blogging campaign. No, if people want to reclaim a seat at the table, they are going to have to engage in good old street politics, just like great grandpa did back in the old days. It will probably be a while before this actually happens on a wide scale, but at the rate things are going it shouldn’t be too long.

Hopefully, though, instead of blaming tech workers, people will correctly blame the general atmosphere of selfishness, corruption and short-term thinking that caused the problem in the first place.

The New Opiate of the Masses

W.F. Price · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Regardless of which party they support, the rich tend to be far to the left of the typical American on social issues. Even the demonized Koch brothers are hardcore social liberals, supporting legalization of marijuana, gay marriage and global peace initiatives. In Washington state, the gay marriage initiative, which passed by a sliver, was lavishly funded by billionaires, including Jeff Bezos and Howard Schulz. The opposition was only able to raise one sixth as much as supporters of the bill.

What's behind this apparently reflexive support for all things progressive on the part of the richest men in the US? Is it because they are enlightened, superior people who know the way to a truly harmonious, good society? Are these modern-day buddhas, hovering in meditation within their multi-million dollar mansions?

It turns out that when it comes to the competition, they are not such enlightened, harmonious beings. Microsoft used to regularly dismember and devour innovative startups that offered better software and more choice to the consumer. Amazon's Jeff Bezos treats his workers like draught animals, and Howard Schulz is still putting independent cafés out of business. When it comes to business, they are ruthless, animalistic killers with a drive to dominate and destroy all who stand between them and profit.

So what's up with all the moral crusading and progressive mumbo-jumbo we hear coming out of their mouths?

I have a simple theory:

It's self-interest. What they really want is the government to spend time on something besides them. The last thing they want is for the state to step in and take a hard look at their union-busting, monopolistic practices. Anything but that. It is far better to keep the voters and legislatures tied up over other issues, preferably those that have nothing at all to do with their businesses.

Say voters were to say "hey, why are these companies getting such huge tax breaks even as they are undercutting wages and destroying jobs?" This is the kind of nightmare that keeps them up at night. It is far, far better that people focus on something like Alaskan polar bears, transsexuals in the military, or alleged sex slavery. Or, for that matter, the mythical gender pay gap.

Progressivism is the new smokescreen — it is the modern opiate of the masses. The rich use it in exactly the same manner they used to use the Christian faith, and just as cynically. Unfortunately, however, the progressives have yet to come up with architecture that rivals that of their predecessors, so I'm afraid there will be little to nothing left to show for their efforts besides a blasted society and a landscape littered with cheap, pre-fabricated buildings.

Despite Cutbacks, Military Still Committed to Putting Girls in Combat

W.F. Price · 27 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A couple days ago, Chuck Hagel outlined a plan to reduce the Army's manpower by some 70-80 thousand troops. Evidently, it's too expensive to keep paying all those soldiers while the fed injects money into banks. Given the justification, one might expect that fanciful programs, such as Obama's order that women be integrated into combat units, would fall by the wayside as well. But some things, like turning our young women into killing machines, are too politically valuable to neglect.

> The Pentagon ordered last year that women must have the same opportunities to serve in combat jobs as men, with thousands of positions slated to open to both genders in 2016. And while an Army survey shows only a small fraction of women say they want to move into combat jobs, it also revealed soldiers from both genders are nervous about the change.
>
> With roughly one in five Army positions considered combat-related, commanders are turning to science to find a unisex standard to judge which soldiers physically have the right stuff to fight wars.
>
> Testing at Fort Stewart and other U.S. bases is breaking away from the Army's longtime standards for physical fitness — pushups, sit-ups and 2-mile runs — to focus instead on battlefield tasks, such as dragging a wounded comrade to safety or installing and removing the heavy barrel of the 25 mm gun mounted on Bradley vehicles.

So, it looks like the Army has already dropped the physical fitness requirements. Can't blame them — it would be too hard to lie to taxpayers' faces when the test numbers are on paper, so they came up with another plan.

> David Brinkley, deputy chief of staff for operations at the Army's Training and Doctrine Command at Fort Eustis in Virginia, said some people think the Army is coming up with unrealistic requirements while others believe standards will be lower to let women fight on the front lines.
>
> "We intend to do neither. That's why we based this on the actual thing you have to do," he said.
>
> At Fort Stewart, a volunteer group of soldiers — 100 men and 60 women — are spending a month drilling on the most physically challenging tasks demanded of infantrymen, cavalry scouts, mortar launchers and tank crews. In March, scientists from the Army's Research Institute for Environmental Medicine will have the troops perform those tasks while wearing heart rate monitors, masks that monitor oxygen intake and other equipment to study the effects of their physical exertion.

You know, if you really want to save a few bucks, it would be a lot cheaper to use a stopwatch and a notepad…

But as usual, when it comes to gender equality, we must always – ALWAYS – find a way to keep things open to interpretation/manipulation. Say Sally drops a tank round on Bob's foot, and Bob starts yelling and cursing. Sally's heart rate remained within normal parameters, while Bob's went up significantly. Looks like Sally's performance was superior to Bob's! There you have it: proof that women are just as capable as men in combat roles.

Finally, in what should give it away entirely, we learn that the Army is using the same methods municipal fire departments had to resort to when ordered to hire women:

> Brinkley said the Army took a lesson from fire departments by not focusing on soldier's ability to perform pushups or pullups, which favor men because they test upper body strength. He said officials realize women do physical tasks differently, using more core strength and legs. By focusing on tasks rather than exercises, Army officials hope to eliminate gender bias from their study.

What a waste of everyone's time and money… If anyone doubted that generals were politicians before, I don't think there's any question about that any longer.

An Analogy for Thinking about Women in Combat

W.F. Price · 28 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've found that a lot of people have a hard time thinking in practical terms about the implications of manipulating standards so as to include women in combat. They'll often bring up the fact that women have actually been involved in combat at certain points in history, that they want to be in combat, and that they are "just as patriotic," etc. Some people will even say that they should be in combat "because equality."

Instead of thinking in human terms, let's think in military terms for a bit. Soldiers are weapons — not "persons." This is how war works.

So how about we compare two different weapons. Let's say you have two different man-portable air defense systems (MANPADs). These are shoulder-launched guided missiles that can bring down small aircraft, such as helicopters and fighter bombers (e.g. an F-18), at fairly short ranges. Different missiles have different strengths and weaknesses, and when you pack them into something small and light enough for a man to carry around by himself these tend to be exaggerated.

Sometimes, you have to sacrifice a bit of range for a more powerful warhead. Some missiles might be more accurate, but require more time to target and track enemy aircraft, exposing the operator for longer. Some accelerate faster but have a dangerous backblast, and so on. The military takes all these factors into account so as to come up with the most effective system in a convenient package.

So say you have a choice of two missiles. One of them is about 25% heavier than the other, but goes 30% faster, has 50% longer range and packs twice the force on detonation. Additionally, it requires less time to launch, has a lower rate of malfunction both in storage and in the operating theater, and is less prone to make casualties out of its operators. To top it all off, it is significantly cheaper.

So why would we even consider the other missile? It may be smaller and lighter, but it is less reliable, weaker at the point of impact, slower, has shorter range and is more fragile. It also has a tendency to malfunction in ways that put the entire unit out action, and costs a lot of money to purchase and maintain.

Ah, well, consider that the other missile is produced by influential members of a certain powerful politician's constituency. It may be a lousy, dangerous missile and terrible as far as cost effectiveness is concerned, but someone's political position relies on it.

So behind the scenes, we have politicians making deals, and a powerful member of congress strongarms others, forcing them to buy both the effective and the ineffective missiles. Soldiers, who are well aware from experience testing the missiles which one is better, predictably grumble about it, but their superiors tell them "there's nothing you can do about it, so get used to it." To make the choice look like a good one, statistics are manufactured, tests are rigged, and lies are told.

In the meanwhile, corporate media extoll the virtues of the lousy missile, showing it attractively painted and releasing photos and videos that make it look cool and effective. Media informs the opinion of the rubes, and most of them support the choice to use the inferior missile, because they saw how cool it was on CNN.

Ultimately, the taxpayer gets ripped off, the military is that much less effective, and collateral damage increases. The only winners are the politicians and a few powerful constituents who make the lion's share of profit from the great swindle.

Global Warming to Cause Mass Rape

W.F. Price · 28 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I suppose this is another take on the old "[something] happens, women hit hardest" headline that's been around since women first learned to read, but it's still always amazing to what extent publications continue to push credulity. In this case, Mother Jones is the offending party, which I suppose shouldn't be too surprising. As far as left-wing publications go, it's a far cry from Counterpunch.

From Mother Jones:

> "Looking at the past, we see a strong relationship between temperature and crime," says study author Matthew Ranson, an economist with the policy consulting firm Abt Associates. "We think that is likely to continue in the future."
>
> Just how much more crime can we expect? Using the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change's warming projections, Ranson calculated that from 2010 to 2099, climate change will "cause" an additional "22,000 murders, 180,000 cases of rape, 1.2 million aggravated assaults, 2.3 million simple assaults, 260,000 robberies, 1.3 million burglaries, 2.2 million cases of larceny, and 580,000 cases of vehicle theft" in the United States.
>
> Ranson acknowledges that those results represent a relatively small jump in the overall level of crime—a 2.2 percent increase in murder and a 3.1 percent increase in rape, for instance. Still, says John Roman, a senior fellow at the Urban Institute's Justice Policy Center, those numbers add up to "a lot of victims" over the course of the century.
>
> The study's results don't mean that defendants should be able to argue that they were driven to a life of crime by the weather. "The decision to commit a crime is a matter of personal responsibility," Ranson explained in an email. "Neither higher outdoor temperatures nor reduced police enforcement are valid excuses for individuals to commit criminal acts. Yet, from a statistical perspective, both cause crime to increase."

To be fair, the study says all crime is likely to increase, but the Mother Jones headline explicitly singles out rape.

As for whether warm weather correlates with crime, I suppose it might, but then again we can compare Detroit to, say, Singapore, and obviously other factors are at work as well.

But will global warming bring about an unprecedented era of mass rape? If so, whatever are we going to do? I have an idea. Maybe people, including women, should stop taking trips to resorts, using electronic devices, driving, and having access to top-notch medical care and fast emergency responses. This would surely lower carbon emissions. It might lead to a shorter lifespan and lower quality of life, but hey, less rape, right?

Another Bubble?

W.F. Price · 3 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Living in one of the epicenters of the latest tech boom, I have a first-person perspective on the situation, and it looks like another speculation boom to me. Soon, I'll see what it's like at ground zero in San Francisco. Things have really accelerated in the last couple years, and I'm at a bit of a loss as to why. Are the video games and apps my kids use on ipads really worth all that much money? Is Twitter really all that much different from instant messaging? Hasn't FaceBook lost its lustre?

I fail to see the added value adding up to what the market says it does.

This time, I think the bubble has the potential for being worse than the last couple, because it's a twofer. The first big bubble I saw in my life was the 1999 tech bubble, and then the next was the housing bubble. Today, it looks like we have both at the same time, although the housing bubble is a bit more geographically restricted this time. Nevertheless, the rental market is out of control in major cities, and this just can't go on forever.

Another aggravating factor is that inequality has skyrocketed since the 90s and industry has been thoroughly gutted, so if both tech and real estate fail we're in for some major pain.

Business Insider came out with an article about a month ago making the case that we may in fact be in another tech bubble. Here are a couple parts that caught my attention:

> If you think tech IPO data suggests a bubble of over-investment, then you'll be reassured/terrified by the new report on tech startup investment funding from PricewaterhouseCoopers: In 2013, the software industry received 37% of all venture capital for the year, the highest percentage since PwC began tracking investment since 1995.
>
> Internet-specific companies got more than $7 billion in new funding in 2013. In 2007, the peak year before the credit crunch recession, those same types of companies received just over $5 billion.
>
> [...]
>
> Here, verbatim, are a couple of quotes from the New York Times on the subject of Twitter's stock price. The background is that Twitter does not make a profit but its stock has hit $62 at the time of writing:
>
> "I just haven't seen something like this in a long time," said Robert S. Peck of SunTrust Robinson Humphrey, who had set a price target of $50 before the I.P.O. but cut his rating to hold two weeks ago when shares reached $59." They don't have earnings. They don't have free cash flow."
>
> As Barron's, an investment advisory publication, put it over the weekend, "At $45 billion, the company may have the highest market value of any firm that isn't generating any earnings since the dot-com bubble of 1999-2000."
>
> The New York Times quoted one tech investor:
>
> "We all know how this plays out," said Paul Kedrosky, a venture capitalist and entrepreneur. "There is no question that this is fueling some kind of bubble."

What worries me is that it seems that with each new boom and bust, we don't learn our lesson, but return immediately to speculation, neglecting the stable, reliable sectors of the economy. And if speculation is what underlies the bulk of our wealth, where does that leave us when it fails?

Obama: Putin has “Different set of Lawyers”

W.F. Price · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In what must rank high amongst the most clueless diplomatic statements any American president has made in decades, Barack Obama criticized Vladimir Putin’s interpretation of international law in an effort to gain the upper hand in the Ukraine crisis.

When I heard that I made a joke to my wife:

> Obama: Vlad, your lawyers are making a lousy case. You should concede and withdraw from Ukraine.
>
> Putin: Barack, if you please, I can arrange so that your lawyers may argue with my tanks. Can we agree to settle the issue in that manner?

We Americans live in a culturally isolated place. Vladimir Putin cannot send his tanks across the ocean to confront us. But he can certainly use those tanks in Ukraine. This is, as they say, where the rubber (or steel tread) meets the road. American power has come to be seen as something of a paper tiger, to quote Mao, and that’s something that may well have direct consequences for us, whether we like it or not.

We should be realistic about Russia, which will never be our good buddy. It is not a pushover any longer. We can’t buy influence like we used to, and we’ve squandered our real power on the ground in Europe. This leads to what is known as a power vacuum, and as anyone who can think knows, vacuums draw in what they lack.

Our country has become known worldwide for the opportunities it has squandered. We have squandered our children’s birthright, our international power, our patrimony, and our cultural integrity. All that remains is to squander what remains of our wealth, and I’m afraid that’s next.

In huge countries like the US or China (or Russia, for that matter), it’s very easy to imagine that one is at the center of the universe, and the rest of the world is irrelevant. But cruel reality has a way of throwing a wrench in the gears. We Americans will soon pay for our hubris, and it won’t be a pleasant experience.

In Beijing, I got the first taste of what could await us. I looked around at all the deprived, hard-working Chinese. There they were, breaking their backs for a few dollars a day, while back home stay-at-home soccer moms were driving SUVs around like some breed of contemporary mammoths. It was horrifying to me as a young man. I wondered to myself what we might face when this fundamental imbalance finally started to even out. Unfortunately, I worry that we may soon find out.

Preventing Victimization of Boys and Young Men

W.F. Price · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There are an awful lot of resources directed toward protecting young women and girls from sexual assault, and although I doubt the effectiveness of many of these programs (simply eliminating fatherlessness would prevent most rape in the US), that isn't an issue of concern. However, there's precious little out there to protect young men who find themselves falsely accused of sexual assault or railroaded by hostile authorities.

So how do we protect boys from getting involved in this situation? The most obvious solution is to tell them not to sleep with their fellow students, and to seek pleasure elsewhere if they must. However, that's probably a futile endeavor given youthful sexuality. Personally, I'd recommend a boys' school, but they seem to have fallen out of fashion these days, and they are typically conquered by lesbians with lawyers and subsequently integrated anyway.

So, given the reality today, you have to start teaching them from a young age. First, you have to teach them not to trust authority figures. People often lament the code of silence in the black communities across the US, but it wouldn't exist if there were not routine abuses of authority and wrongful convictions. Given the rate of incarceration of black men, there's no doubt a lot of them are in on either trumped-up or manufactured charges. This being the case, a code of silence provides some protection to the innocent as well as the guilty.

Given the lynch mob mentality out there, it seems that this is a lesson we ought to teach other children as well, especially if they happen to be male. So, for starters, remind your son or boys in your care that when accused of anything, they should never, ever speak freely with an adult who is not a family member, preferably a legal guardian. Stress that "authorities" are to be trusted least of all. I'd go so far as to recommend practicing this with play acting.

Also, stress the consequences of crime. Make sure it isn't a hypothetical, abstract thing. Take the kid to a juvenile or adult detention facility, and show it to him so that he knows it is as real as the ground under his feet. The main purpose of incarceration in the US is deterrence — not correction or rehabilitation. Let that sink in. Let him learn to respect authority not for any moral reason (there is no moral basis for authority these days), but for its power to do harm. This will protect him far more than any sermon ever could.

But do not neglect moral teaching. Tell him that there is a higher law and higher power than man alone. Both religious and non-religious people can call it "natural law." The rules of the natural world guide all things, and man's law is but an imperfect imitation. To cause harm to one's community, as in murder and rape, is a violation of natural law, and brings pain to oneself and others. Remind him that it is his duty to try to understand and live in harmony with natural law.

Above all, tell him that if he is to be a good man who wants to do well by others, he must first preserve and protect himself.

Finally, there are the practical measures. Avoid proven liars, such as adulterous wives and other unfaithful women. Never assume that an immodest woman is otherwise virtuous, and keep your distance from addicts, drunks and other dissolute women.

To put it in simple terms:

Avoid authorities and bad women, live a straight life and be vigilant.

It sounds a lot simpler than it is, but with some effort we can teach the overwhelming majority of boys to avoid circumstances that might land them on the wrong side of an interrogation desk or, failing that, prevent them from being wrongfully convicted.

Subscriber Content

W.F. Price · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Just a heads up for readers:

I'm going to continue to post most stuff publicly, but every now and then I'll be posting some pieces for subscribers only, particularly content I'd like to publish eventually and some more experimental thoughts and pieces. Getting feedback from the subscribers is important to me.

If you've contributed/donated to the site but aren't a registered subscriber, send me an email and I'll set you up with an account.

Voice vs. Texting

W.F. Price · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I must be getting long in the tooth, because I feel the need to write a rant about technology today:

Over the last year or so, I've noticed that getting in touch with people by phone has become a lot more difficult than it used to be. At first, I was a little mystified, and wondered why people seem to be dropping off the face of the earth. I knew it wasn't me, because this was not limited merely to acquaintances, but friends and family as well. My sister, my cousins, old friends — they all seemed to have vanished. After a while, I realized it was because they don't really talk on the phone any longer. They text.

I've avoided texting for a variety of reasons. Originally, it was because it feels clumsy to me. I first tried it years ago on the old folding cell phones, and not very impressed by this means of communication, I failed to make it a habit. I was also not particularly happy that people were being charged something like 20 cents a text. Knowing how little data is required to send an ASCII text, I realized what a massive ripoff this was. At 28.8 kb/s – standard for voice calls if I recall correctly – one minute of voice transmission uses vastly more data than a dumb little text message. Seemed to me that texting was a technological step backward to the days of IRC — maybe even the telegraph for that matter! And here the telecoms were charging people up to $50 a month for it.

Next, I realized that texts were stored electronically, and would always be there on the receiving party's phone (or at least they'd be there for a long time). While I'm well aware that voice calls can be tapped and recorded, it's far less likely, and for the most part when you hang up the words remain only in human memory. I may not be plotting any criminal activity, but the idea that innocuous personal communication will stick around forever still bothers the hell out of me. It's like keeping all the wrappers from the fast food you've eaten over the years. To think that some government agency is keeping all that info bothers me in the same way that it would if a cop were to go through my garbage and document it with a pen and notepad every day.

Another annoying thing about text is that you have no idea whether people will reply. You can text someone, and they respond at leisure, or not at all. If you ask someone a question on the phone, they respond, or they refuse to do so. Either way, you know where you stand. Texts are also a good excuse for blowing someone off without having to look them in the eye. Say you stand someone up for one reason or another. Instead of having to tell them and listen to a response, you can just shoot off a texted excuse that may or may not be true, and then just ignore responses. I can't even imagine what dating must be like in the age of texting.

Finally, I like talking and listening. Conversation is one of those uniquely human exercises and pleasures. To have a nice talk with someone is refreshing, enlightening and satisfying. A text just doesn't cut it. In fact, it's a crappy substitute, and I worry about kids who grow up using it as their primary medium of communication. Will they be able to speak with the proper cadence and intonation of American English? Will they end up sounding like robots? Sounds far-fetched, but the convergence of male and female styles of speech suggests that our young people may have some speech impairments from lack of practice.

For these reasons and others, I have refused to take up texting even as the rest of the world passed me by. Today, teens and young adults exchange an average of almost 100 texts a day, while I haven't sent a mobile text message in years.

Nevertheless, it looks like my little redoubt is under siege. I'm going to have to eventually embrace the silence and get a smart phone if I want to operate in modern society.

However, I'd like some encryption options, or perhaps something that erases texts after they've been read. If any readers have any suggestions along these lines, I'd be happy to hear them. So far, there doesn't seem to be much on offer, but perhaps the growing awareness of widespread snooping will wake a few companies up.

Congressman Alan Grayson Accused of DV, but Aide's Video May Save Him

W.F. Price · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Freelance reporter Chuck Ross pointed out in a tweet that Alan Grayson had "congressional privilege" in dealing with his wife's DV accusation, because most of us ordinary guys don't have aides who can document these kinds of things.

> Congressional privilege: Imagine if Alan Grayson didn't have a staffer hanging around to videotape his altercation w/ his ex-wife.
>
> — Chuck Ross (@ChuckGLP) March 5, 2014

One can't stress enough how important witnesses are in these situations, because the default assumption, as Chuck pointed out in a subsequent tweet, is that the male is at fault. This is despite the fact that women initiate physical aggression more often than men do in a domestic context. Personally, I am certain that this is because they have the legal advantage, and they know it.

When this scenario plays out with an ordinary man, there are usually no witnesses besides husband and wife. VAWA ensures that the presumption is that the husband is guilty, and demands an arrest. If Grayson had been an ordinary man, he probably would have been either taken to jail or charged with DV by this point. As it is, he's already been issued a rubber-stamped no-contact order following his wife's allegations that he beat her and his children.

But Grayson has lawyers on his side. He's a powerful man, and his wife may not be able to derive the same advantage from accusing the prominent Democrat that your typical American woman could when accusing her considerably less powerful and connected husband. Nevertheless, Grayson is currently under a court order to avoid his wife and children, and may as well be on parole for all the legal restrictions he faces.

I've always thought that using these extreme feminist methods to subjugate men is deeply problematic and detrimental to liberty, but for the most part powerful men have been spared the worst of it. Until now, that is. I don't expect Grayson to ever dare come out publicly against the worst abuses of VAWA, but it would surprise me if this precedent doesn't alarm a number of congressmen on both sides of the aisle. Where they were perfectly content to let us peons be pushed around and assaulted by police and courts who are ostensibly acting on behalf of women, when it happens to them personally I doubt they will feel the same old complacency.

Drag Show big hit at Kadena Air Force Base

W.F. Price · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I don't know whether there's much that needs to be said about the following, but I thought readers, a number of whom are former soldiers, might be interested:

A decade ago, who would have imagined it? I'm starting to think the next decade will bring even more surprises.

“House of Cards” Drama Playing out in Army Court Martial

W.F. Price · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I recently watched the House of Cards series on Netflix, and was alternately fascinated and disgusted by its portrayal of Washington’s political culture. The ambition combined with deeply flawed characters makes for great drama, and although I assumed that the series is generally accurate in its portrayal of the power elite, I thought it must also be quite an exaggeration.

However, the following from Stars and Stripes has me questioning whether it is off the mark in that regard after all:

> FT. BRAGG, N.C. — A military judge refused Tuesday to dismiss sexual assault charges against a one-star general, rejecting defense allegations that the Army has unfairly prosecuted the case in response to political pressure to crack down on sexual abuse in the ranks.
>
> The ruling came after searing testimony about the emotional breakdown last month of the then-lead military prosecutor, described as irrational and suicidal in the days before he quit the case. Lawyers for Brig. Gen. Jeffrey Sinclair had cited comments by the former prosecutor, Lt. Col. William Helixon, in alleging “unlawful command influence” by the Army chain of command.
>
> Helixon was described in testimony by a fellow military legal officer as “crying, irrational, incoherent” and a “functional alcoholic” holed up in a Washington, D.C., luxury hotel on the weekend of Feb. 8 and 9. Brig. Gen. Paul Wilson, a senior Army legal officer at the Pentagon, said he took Helixon to a military hospital in Virginia because he appeared suicidal.
>
> “I’ve never seen a human being so stripped of logic and rationality,” Wilson testified, adding that he feared Helixon would deliberately step in front of a bus.
>
> [...]
>
> Sinclair, 51, is charged with forcing a female captain to twice perform oral sex after she allegedly tried to break off their three-year affair, and threatening to kill her and her family if she revealed the affair. The charges are based on statements by the accuser, a captain who was 29 when the relationship began.
>
> In addition to testimony from military lawyers about Helixon, the current lead prosecutor cross-examined Sinclair’s lawyer. At issue was what Helixon may have said about unlawful command influence and the accuser’s credibility — and whether that was relevant to how the Army prosecuted the case.
>
> The judge, Col. James L. Pohl, ruled that the defense had not proved unlawful command influence in the Army’s rejection of Sinclair’s offer to plead guilty to adultery and conduct unbecoming an officer. Merely rejecting the plea was not evidence of improper command or political interference, Pohl said.
>
> However, the judge said a memo from the accuser’s special victim lawyer to a three-star general who turned down the plea offer was “inappropriate” and “does cause concern.”
>
> The victim’s advocate, Capt. Cassie L. Fowler, wrote to the three-star general that accepting Sinclair’s plea would “have an adverse affect on my client and the Army’s fight against sexual assault.”
>
> Sinclair’s case has played out at a time of heightened political and public concern about sexual assault in the military – and the role of commanders in deciding whether to bring charges. He faces life in prison if convicted on all charges.
>
> [...]
>
> The prosecution framed Helixon’s comments as those of a man in severe emotional distress because of concerns about his father’s health, marital issues, his own drinking and pressures of the case. The defense portrayed Helixon as ethically bound to quit a case he concluded was built on politically motivated charges.
>
> Scheff testified that Helixon told him that the prosecution was “driven by politics” and that everyone on the > prosecution team had grave doubts about proving the most serious charges against Sinclair. He said Helixon refused to stay on the case unless those charges were dropped.

>
> Stelle said Helixon had tactical concerns about proving the sexual assault charges beyond a reasonable doubt. But he said such concerns are common in “he said, she said” sexual assault cases like Sinclair’s.
>
> Stelle argued that any comments by Helixon were his personal opinions.
>
> “No offense to Lt. Col. Helixon, I don’t really care what he thinks,” Stelle told the judge. “Who cares? Counsels talk about cases all the time. That’s what we do.”
>
> A prosecution witness, Lt. Col. Jerrett Dunlap, the top legal officer at Ft. Bragg, testified that no one on the prosecution team received pressure or undue influence from the chain of command. He said there were no concerns among prosecutors over charges against Sinclair not holding up in court.
>
> Wilson said he rushed to the Ritz-Carlton Hotel when told that Helixon was drinking and acting irrationally.
>
> Wilson said Helixon was distraught over January testimony by the accuser; forensic experts concluded that she lied on the stand about a cellphone containing messages from Sinclair. The accuser testified that she belatedly found the phone in December while unpacking boxes from Afghanistan.
>
> Prosecutors said that although Helixon had concerns about the accuser’s phone testimony, neither he nor any other prosecutor doubted that she was telling the truth about the sexual assault. The captain testified in pretrial hearings that Sinclair grabbed her hair and forced her head down while demanding oral sex when both served in Afghanistan.
>
> Wilson testified that Helixon said of the accuser’s cellphone statements: “She lied to me…. Why would she lie to me?”

This might as well come straight out of the script of House of Cards. The similarities are uncanny. I’m beginning to wonder whether that show was not prophetic in some sense. I have no idea whether the general committed some sexual impropriety (which wouldn’t surprise me, although I remain skeptical about a general committing rape well past the typical raping age at the height of his career), but the politics involved contaminate the case. I wonder what kind of pressure was brought to bear on the prosecutor? Must have been something formidable. You don’t generally find people who made it that far in life holed up drunk in a hotel room crying and incoherent over nothing.

When I went through a divorce and was flat on my back, astonished that people could be so vicious and think so little of tearing my life and family to pieces, I figured it was because I was insignificant in the grand scheme of things — I was no more than a bug under their shoe. I assumed it wouldn’t have happened to someone with more influence and standing in society. Maybe I was wrong. Maybe the tools used to crush so many of us little people are now powerful enough to bring down a general.

If that’s the case, I expect to see some political resistance to the feminist juggernaut develop very rapidly.

Ukraine Invasion and the new Great Game

W.F. Price · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Since the fall of the Soviet Union, the US and Nato have been steadily working to contain Russia not only by politically isolating it from its neighbors, but by denying it access to ports. And where we haven't been able to deny this access, as in Kaliningrad and Murmansk, we've maintained near-constant patrols of NATO submarines and aircraft. In the 1990s, when the conflict in the former Yugoslavia pitted pro-Western (Croats) vs. pro-Russian (Serbs) peoples, we took the opportunity to strong-arm Montenegro, a small coastal country with a largely Orthodox population, into denying Russia access to a port on the Adriatic. We've signed up all of the Baltic countries with NATO, bribed North African strongmen, and most recently supported overthrowing Bashir al-Assad, who hosts the only Russian port in the Mediterranean. These are all geopolitical moves designed partly or entirely to consolidate our power over the seas and keep Russia's to a minimum.

It does make some sense, as the US is protected by the sea, and maintaining our advantage depends on having mastery over the world's waterways. However, trying to shove Russia out of the Black Sea would be a step too far. If there was any overreach that caused this invasion of Crimea, that was probably it:

> NAPLES, Italy — Russia's incursion into the Crimean peninsula in Ukraine has drawn attention to its naval base in Sevastopol and its Black Sea Fleet, a modest force of aging ships that military analysts say Russia is trying to modernize.
>
> Over the weekend, Russian troops moved into Sevastopol in response to what Moscow said was concern about safety of ethnic Russians who constitute the majority of Crimea's inhabitants. The Kremlin has charged that the new government in Kiev, which came to power after the ousting of Russian-leaning President Viktor Yanukovych, is illegitimate and made up of nationalist extremists.
>
> Sevastopol has been a seat of Russian naval power from the imperial 18th century to the Soviet era, giving its forces access to the Balkans, Mediterranean Sea and Middle East. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, Russia began leasing part of the port from Ukraine. That deal, scheduled to end in 2017, was extended to 2042. The move was heavily criticized by the opposition forces now in power in Kiev.
>
> Although Russia continues to construct a navy base in its own territory in Novorossisk, near Sochi, analysts agree that Sevastopol remains the navy's preferred base in the Black Sea region because of its size, location and infrastructure.
>
> "It's hard to speculate on motivations, but it may be that one of the main reasons for the (events) in Crimea was, legitimately or not, they thought they might lose the base in Sevastopol," said Dmitry Gorenburg, who researches Russian military reform at the CNA Corporation, an analysis group.

The Black Sea is surrounded by three different civilizations – Western, Orthodox, and Muslim – and has historically been of great strategic value in the region. It is right next to Russia's sensitive underbelly and the contested lands of Southeastern Europe. I can't think of an equivalent for the US, but eliminating a Russian base there would have similar consequences to our navy being ousted from Okinawa.

As Opus mentioned in comments, Russia has never taken control of Crimea lightly. About 160 years ago, Western forces invaded Crimea as part of the "Great Game" of the 19th century — a push for global domination that involved a protracted struggle with the vast Russian Empire. It was a desperate, bloody fight, and Russia ended up humiliated and all but pushed out of the Black Sea. The defeat and subsequent weakness of Russia was a lesson that I doubt has been forgotten by Russia's contemporary leaders.

Incidentally, as Opus also pointed out, the Crimean War had a strong cultural influence on the people of the British Empire, and is remembered in a number of poems, movies and even Irish songs.

The intrigues and brinksmanship around Ukraine are part of a very old game that has been ongoing for centuries now, and we should keep it in that perspective. It has nothing to do with democracy and gay rights, and the fate of ethnic Russians in most of Ukraine is not even all that important. What it really comes down to is geopolitics. If there's any lesson we can take away from it, perhaps it is that a weakened, diplomatically feckless US is in no position to manhandle Russia in her near abroad any longer.

Ascent of Regional Politics Causing Corruption, Gridlock

W.F. Price · 6 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Once again, American politics are becoming regional politics, which is a lousy thing for the typical voter. When you have the US divided into two camps (four at this point, really) based ostensibly on ideology, but really on geography, it's very easy for party politicians to keep their seats without offering much substantive to the American people. There's something of a microcosm of this in my home state of Washington. Most people think Washington state is pretty far left and deep blue, but as soon as you cross Snoqualmie Pass – only some 50 miles from Seattle – you enter Republican territory. The state becomes as red as Idaho past that point, and it's a long, long way to go yet before you reach the Idaho border. These days, Western Washington almost never elects Republicans, and Eastern Washington almost never elects Democrats. So what you end up with is politicians who can get themselves elected by demonizing the other side without doing much for constituents at home.

A similar situation existed after the Civil War. The North was solidly in Republican hands, while the South was ruled by Democrats. The result was lack of accountability, cronyism, exploitation of citizens and scandalous political deals. The wealthy end up with the upper hand, because they have a great deal more freedom of movement, especially in this world of free-flowing capital with little emphasis on hard assets. The middle class, on the other hand is geographically restricted because of its reliance on real estate as a a source of wealth. The lack of political options and the entrenched politicians limit choices, stymie reform and feed the vicious cycle that creates ever more inequality.

As long as a rough balance of power remains between the parties, it doesn't look like change is likely. As long as most of the US is de-facto one party territory, there's little hope of reform. So what can we do?

I suppose we could sit around and hope that one party or the other collapses. The Republicans look like candidates for that these days, but that might be wishful thinking. Isn't it possible that Democrats in power prefer the current state of affairs to one in which chaotic political developments might shatter the comfy, cozy order they have created? Sure, a few politicians on the frontiers of blue and red territory might lose their seats here and there, but is a Vermont Democrat or a Utah Republican really worried? These people have a pretty nice deal. If their constituents become disgruntled all they have to do is raise the specter of the other side sweeping in and denying abortions or banning the Bible. As far as I can tell, even in solidly democratic Seattle, this works like a charm, even though this is one of the last places a Republican could hope to win anything. In this extremely liberal city, there is an irrational fear of Republicans that is so hysterical at times that I used to wonder whether the Tea Party actually existed or was a figment of some feverish, paranoid collective imagination.

I'm beginning to think that the only thing that will shake up the status quo is widespread social disorder. The kind that is so expensive and unmanageable that it starts to worry those in power as well. There are some signs that this is beginning to happen, but we probably still have some years to go. Perhaps soaring housing prices will create armies of homeless and/or disaffected youths in cities. Unemployment and underemployment will lead to an increase in crime, gentrification will begin to go the other way, and people will come to feel increasingly alienated and insecure. If the US suffers an enormous blow to its stature internationally, and we may already have, capital will flow out, accelerating the process.

I'm not a seer in these matters, but just borrowing from what I've seen happen in other places over the years is enough for some perspective. Fortunately, I don't think people will literally starve, but some readjustment of standards has already happened, and more will come in time. As for what I intend to do about it, I think I'll just do my best to adhere to the ancient laws and advice that have always helped people through difficult times. I'd advise others to do the same. Pick up the old books that have stood the test of time, and take their lessons to heart.

How you put together a winning high school team in a progressive, childless city: you cheat

W.F. Price · 7 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My old high school alma mater has always had a pretty good hoops team (not that I ever cared much — I'm more of a baseball and football fan), but back in my day we generally recruited from local talent. Seems that has changed. Seattle, following in San Francisco's footsteps, is becoming a child desert, populated by single yuppies and aging boomers and noticeably lacking in ordinary families. The only people having kids in my neighborhood in respectable numbers seem to be the Somalis and Orthodox Jews. Playgrounds are literally empty, athletic fields are occupied by mixed-gender adult teams every evening and parks are dog territory.

So high schools that want to put together a good team have to be creative, which includes a lot of bending – some suspect breaking – of the rules:

> SEATTLE — Some rival fans are crying foul over the Garfield High School basketball team, accusing the Bulldogs of creating a "super team" by transferring six top players from other schools in just one year.
>
> Deeshawn Tucker, Brayon Blake, Tramaine Isabel, Reynaldo Cheney, Austin Anderson and Andro Benard are the players in question.
>
> All six basketball standouts transferred this year to Garfield High School. Now, in some rankings, the team is number one in the state. In fact, Garfield recently won the KingCo championship at a tournament in Kirkland, finishing the regular season at 23-1.
>
> There are many rival fans asking questions.
>
> "It's not fair," said Nicole Smith, a fan at a rival high school. "You try to build your teams from your kids because they go to your school."
>
> Suspicious rivals can't help but notice what can seem like a whole new team.
>
> "I don't really like it," said rival fan Pete Couty. "I grew up back in the old days; where you lived is where you played."
>
> Transfers in high school sports happen occasionally. But six? In one year? In basketball, where the starting line-up is just five players? We found no one who could remember that happening.
>
> Even some Garfield fans are chagrined.
>
> "Six?" Lee Pimpton said with a smile. "That's a lot."
>
> Rival players are more circumspect.
>
> "If that's how they want to play — I don't know. It just, like, changes how high school should be, I guess," said Roosevelt High School all-conference player Cam Haslem, whose team narrowly lost to Garfield.
>
> "I know some of them, it's just like they were trying to get on some super star team," said Aidan Woodford, also a Roosevelt player. "So it's questionable."
>
> Garfield Principal Ted Howard, whose son plays on the Bulldog basketball team, said suspicions have gotten so bad that he's seen rival parents follow his players with cameras after games, trying to prove they didn't live in Garfield's attendance area between I-90, Lake Washington, Elliott Bay and Montlake.
>
> With the controversy heating up, we asked Seattle School District officials to see whether any rules have been broken.
>
> Here's what we know:
> · Isabel switched from Lakeside High School.
> · Anderson also switched from Lakeside, sat out a calendar year, just joining the team for the playoffs.

> · Blake switched from Federal Way high school and won an appeal reversing his eligibility.
> · Tucker also switched from Federal Way.
> · Cheney moved from Michigan.
> · Benard switched from Mt. Rainier High School but lost an eligibility ruling.

Out of the above six, four were transferred in from the suburbs or out of state. This is not normal, and suggests that some behind the scenes recruitment is going on. While we always had a few kids come in from private schools, out-of-towners were rare. To see corruption creep down from college to high school sports is perhaps to be expected, but it isn't encouraging, and it certainly doesn't bode well for parents who plan to stay in the city and follow the rules. Say your son is hoping to make the varsity team by his senior year, but next thing you know a few standouts from poorer suburbs are brought in and suddenly he's warming benches. Kind of defeats the purpose of amateur youth sports leagues, which is to encourage competition and effort among kids whether or not they'll be famous stars someday.

But hey, this is modern progressive America: social darwinism is the rule.

In Washington State, DV Accusation May Lead to Gun Seizures

W.F. Price · 7 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Washington state senate has passed a bill that gives judges the power to seize people's guns if they find them to be a "credible threat" to women in their lives. No conviction or jury trial necessary.

> It comes seven years too late for a woman killed on the University of Washington campus, but the Washington legislature has taken a step toward protecting domestic violence victims from their abusers.
>
> Rebecca Griego had a protection order against her former boyfriend, but that didn't stop him from getting a gun and killing her in her University of Washington office. That was in 2007.
>
> The state Senate unanimously passed a bill Thursday that would require those with domestic violence protection orders against them to hand over their guns, if a judge rules them a credible threat.
>
> Senator Marko Liias spoke in favor of the bill. "This is one small step, but we have to do everything we can to protect these women and these families in these terrible circumstances," he said.
>
> The legislature has been haggling over this bill for several years while trying to balance gun ownership rights and protections for victims.
>
> This would be the first time that Washington gun owners could lose their rights without being convicted of a felony.

That last part is incorrect. Washington state residents, like pretty much all Americans, can lose the right to bear arms for any DV conviction (or plea bargain), whether it is a felony or not. Say you get charged with assault for grabbing your phone away from your girlfriend during an argument. If convicted, that means permanent loss of the right to bear arms. Sure, someone who commits crimes resulting in bodily harm to others should be subject to loss of this right, but many DV convictions are over such petty incidents that even most women could be convicted for something they've done at some point in their lives.

But this bill is indeed worse in some ways. Here, there needs be no proof of assault, no conviction, no real evidence to speak of. All a woman would have to do is show up in front of a judge and swear that some man had threatened her, and she feels scared. The man is then summoned to appear in front of a judge. If he can't prove he is not dangerous, then the police seize his weapons.

There have been more abuses of the Constitution in the name of protecting women than anything else over the last 30-odd years. And guess what? They don't even work. Violence against women has tracked violent crime in general almost exactly during that time. These laws do nothing but increase the power of the state relative to The People.

Saturday Night Live Promotes The MRM By Accident

Pro-male/Anti-feminist Tech · 10 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This weekend Saturday Night Live had Lena Dunham as its host. Because of that or perhaps because it was International Women's Day, the writers of Saturday Night Live decided to have a sketch attacking MRAs (mens rights advocates). The sketch is called "Jewelry Party" and can be watched either on NBC's website or on Hulu.

What happens in the sketch is that a hispanic woman originally from South America ends up bringing her boyfriend to a jewelry party that was really only intended for women. She gets her boyfriend to talk about how he's a MRA, and the boyfriend ends up being a feminist caricature of a MRA. He only protests when the weather is nice, is obsessed with shutting down Planed Parenthood, was a MRA because a girl dumped him at 18, was a virgin before he met his girlfriend, is a bad in bed, etc. Eventually, the boyfriend escapes leaving his car for his now ex-girlfriend. The sketch didn't even attempt to have a punch line.

People who don't have any sympathy for the MRM didn't find the sketch funny at all. Complex Pop Culture called it the "worst sketch of the night". TV Line said that its "one paragraph description can't convey the awfulness of the full sketch". Boston.com said about the sketch:

> To no one's surprise, a "jewelry party/men's activist" skit morphed into an infomercial for Dunham's various political causes and beliefs. It came complete with a painful-to-watch Hispanic Cecily Strong.
>
> Awkward.

It's guaranteed that most of the viewers wouldn't get what the sketch is talking about. Most people don't read feminist bloggers so they don't have the context of why the tropes are being used against the MRA. To them it looks like an extremely forced sketch that was designed to cater to Lena Dunham's biases. This would cause one of two reactions in the audience. A viewer would either find the whole thing absurd and forget about it entirely or would wonder what a MRA is and why someone would create such a bizarre and inconsistent caricature. Viewers in the latter group will end up researching mens rights on the internet and find something completely different. They will end up with an education about some real issues such as the false rape industry, corrupt unconstitutional family courts that impoverish men and deny fathers access to their children, paternity fraud, how nearly all deaths in the workplace are men, etc. This will lead many of them to become MRAs themselves in spite of the sketch.

What Saturday Night Live did this weekend is a case of no publicity is bad publicity. SNL gave a boost to the MRM even though that wasn't the intention of its writers.

Skills Based Employment Myth

W.F. Price · 10 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One often reads that the reason younger Americans are having a hard time finding work is that skills and knowledge are more important than ever. However, despite being the most educated generation in US history, employment rates for young people continue to lag far behind those of older workers. Being somewhere in the middle, I have a little perspective on this.

Older workers are not more tech-savvy, they are not more educated, and their skills, in most cases, can be learned relatively quickly by younger workers. However, in comparison to their younger counterparts, they are more connected, more politically powerful, and occupy jobs in which, despite the window dressing, things haven't changed much in decades. Perhaps most importantly, they are comfortable working and doing business with their peers.

Aside from a few specialized professions, most jobs do not require a particularly high skill level. On the high end we have surgeons and software developers, and on the low end human signs, but there's an enormous middle ground that includes real estate agents, insurance salesmen, teachers, mechanics, flight attendants and myriad others that require training but not necessarily superior talent. Over the last few decades I've watched this middle sector get steadily older and grayer (it's really obvious if you've been flying since the 1980s, for example). In the meanwhile, youth unemployment is chalked up to "lack of skill." Nonsense. It's pure demographics.

Sometimes, I wonder whether pushing kids – many of whom do not benefit from it – into higher education hasn't been a means of warehousing them in an economy that has little use for them.

If you think of the implications, this trend helps explain some of the breakdown in family formation in the US. Delayed employment correlates with delayed family formation, but it does nothing to stop biology, hence the rising illegitimacy rate among the young. It's only one of several important factors, but over the last decade it has been a growing problem.

Sheryl Sandberg Demands word “Bossy” be Banned in Self-Parody

W.F. Price · 11 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Along with a number of other rich and famous women, including Condoleeza Rice and Beyoncé, Sheryl Sandberg has kicked off a self-promotion campaign that aims to ban the word “bossy,” because, as far as I can understand, it somehow holds bossy women like Sandberg back. Apparently, it has something to do with self-esteem, which is sorely lacking among female super-rich types (poor babies).

The ad that goes along with the ban bossy campaign ends on a frightening note, with the confident wealthy women staring us in the face and saying “I’m not bossy; I AM the boss!”

After that display, I don’t know how these women are going to find employees. In some ways, I suspect they’re now even more intimidating to women than men.

The few times in my life when I’ve worked under female authority haven’t been pleasant, and I suspect this attitude that women have something to prove as authority figures is highly relevant to those experiences. There is nothing worse than working with a boss who lacks confidence and the implicit trust that goes along with it, and who seeks to boost him or herself through constant demonstrations of status and superiority.

While I’m sure there are good, confident female managers and bosses, and I know there are terrible male ones, it seems that in general women under a certain age are more difficult and more problematic as authority figures. There is typically sexual tension with male employees, and sexual competition with female ones. This, as the military might put it, destroys unit cohesion, and probably goes some ways toward explaining why lesbians tend to advance much more rapidly than normal women in predominately male environments. It is why I recommend that if you’re going to work for a woman or hire one as a manager, make sure she’s an older one past the age of childbearing. At that point, she may even have some advantages over male authority figures in some (although not all) regards.

The idea that one should exercise authority by micromanaging speech and behavior goes directly to the root of what bothers people about female authority in the first place. The little girl who tells her classmates how to speak and behave is rarely appreciated for her efforts. No more than the boy who pushes kids around to get what he wants. The bossy girl is, in fact, the female equivalent of the bully boy, just as the “bossy” boss is just a bully in a dress.

Where's the Conflict Between Feminism and Polygamy?

W.F. Price · 11 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As contemporary culture degenerates apace, a new reality show about a polygamous family has been trotted out on TLC. The target audience is obviously female. Any grown man who wants to watch a TV show about a household full of wives must be mentally ill, in my humble opinion.

Adding to the appeal of the show, the husband and his wives all declare themselves to be feminists.

> It's among the most patriarchal domestic arrangements you can sign up for. In polygamy, husbands are king.
>
> But one polygamist family is insisting that it's the exception. The Williams clan, which lives outside Salt Lake City, comprises wives Paulie, Robyn, Rosemary, Nonie, and Rhonda. There are 24 children. And, one other person … oh, right, husband Brady. He's a construction manager and philosophy major who's currently enrolled in a feminist theory course at a local college and who refuses to accept the title "head of the household." He doesn't like the sexist connotation.
>
> A one-hour special about the Williamses aired on TLC last fall, and the family's new 9-part series, My Five Wives, is set to debut on Sunday. Earlier this week, the six parents sat down for an interview.
>
> When asked who among them identified as a "feminist," six hands shot up as if propelled by jack-in-the-box springs. For the wives, this brand of feminism involves sleeping with their spouse only every fifth night, consulting their husband's other wives if they want to adopt a child, and—as Rosemary puts it—fighting their own psyches to keep jealousy locked in a cage like the wild animal it is.
>
> Brady insists that he's about equality in his relationships. "And that can exist with more than a man and a wife. That can exist with a man and a wife and a wife and a wife and a wife and a wife."

The kind of polygamy practiced by fundamentalist Mormons is not typical from an anthropological standpoint. Traditional polygamy has always been rare due to the roughly equal sex ratio at birth. It has usually been confined to apex males, such as rulers and the extraordinarily wealthy. Where it is institutionalized, there are certain protocols, including harems, eunuchs and rankings of wives, with the first typically being in charge. Institutional polygamy is pretty awful for all but the people directly involved. A good first hand account of it can be read in in the book White Gold, a biography of a Cornish man named Thomas Pellow who was kidnapped by Barbary pirates and sold into slavery. His master was the notorious Mulai Ismail, the 17th and 18th century Moroccan despot who is said to have fathered 888 children. His wives frequently plotted against each other and murdered each other's children, children conspired to gain power, and when their father died a bloody civil war broke out, as is usual with polygamous ruling clans.

To ensure enough wives for rulers such as Ismail, ordinary men had to be either killed in battle, castrated or deprived of the chance to have a wife of their own, and slave raids were conducted as far south as Ivory Coast and as far north as Iceland, and possibly Greenland to procure slaves of both sexes — there has been some speculation that the the Norse Greenland colony was wiped out by Barbary Corsair slavers.

Mormon polygamy, on the other hand, was conjectured by English ethnologist Richard Francis Burton to have come about due to the need for labor in the early Mormon church. Rather than hire female servants, the solution was to marry them. While Joseph's Smith's supposed penchant for sexual variety may have contributed, there's little doubt that the practical matter of rapidly settling and populating the Western Desert made polygamy an attractive option. In the long run, to continue with polygamy would have meant the gradual adoption of the slave society culture that has always traditionally sustained polygamy in mature societies.

Either way, there's no indication that polygamy, taken as a whole, is any worse for women than for men. In fact, women's station may be raised by it, as we see in the Sultanate of Women in the early modern Ottoman empire. In the 16th and 17th centuries, favored concubines and wives, many of Slavic origin, were often able to seize power and rule in the names of their minor sons and wield enormous influence over the vast Ottoman realm. From a feminist perspective, this may represent the height of female influence in a geopolitical context, and therefore should be of great interest to Western feminist theorists, however, they are not known to be the most historically aware of "scholars."

So, I wonder why exactly is polygamy any less feminist than Christian patriarchal monogamy? It's pretty clear that it is far worse for most men, but this doesn't appear to be the case where women are concerned. In fact, Brady Williams' self-professed feminism comes off as more credible and plausible than a de facto feminist Evangelical minister's endorsement of monogamy would. He is more honest than the preacher who cultivates a flock of female parishioners while demanding that their husbands both support and serve them. Mr. Williams actually marries his flock and supports it with his own labor. And perhaps that explains feminist suspicions concerning honest polygamy; while it might be theoretically better to share one alpha than to own one beta, in practical terms it is easier to extract resources from one de facto cuckold while simultaneously sharing the patronage of a powerful man (or government).

What we have in contemporary America, therefore, is what might be best termed cuckold polygamy, in which women share a powerful husband and reap the benefits of a fully owned and subordinate manservant. It is truly the best of both worlds, but it is not monogamy.

San Francisco Meetup

W.F. Price · 12 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'm headed down to SF in less than two weeks' time, and this could be a good opportunity for some of us to get together and enjoy a little conversation and fellowship. I'll have a pretty flexible schedule down there, and would be happy to arrange a gathering that could accommodate the maximum number of people. What I'm thinking of is a relaxed, humble atmosphere where we can be at ease, make friends and feel comfortable with like-minded men. The goal is a fraternal atmosphere.

I'll lay down a few simple ground rules:

1. Accept other men as they are. Rich, poor or in between, and whatever ancestry or cultural/religious heritage. This isn't about ethnic, economic or religious politics, but rather liberty and the universal advancement of men's interests. I really don't want to see men bashing each other because of class or racial issues. Let's just give what we have to offer and enjoy each other's goodwill and company.

2. I don't want this to degenerate into a woman-bashing fest. We shouldn't be united in bitterness, but mutual support and advancement. Whatever relationship (or lack thereof) men want to pursue with women, it isn't relevant. That said, this will be a male environment. We don't need sexual competition or female attention-seeking to introduce divisiveness, so leave your wife or girlfriend behind.

3. No brawling or bad will. Come with an open heart and open mind, as a friend and brother. This isn't about dominance, but rather seeking mutually beneficial solutions. It isn't about sex, either, so if you are gay don't try to hook up with anyone.

4. Enjoy yourself!

I don't know how many people we can scrape together, but I'd like to shoot for a half dozen or more. If you're concerned about anonymity, I'm perfectly willing to accept that, and others should do so as well, although I seriously doubt it would be an issue. I'd rather meet up in a neighborhood other than downtown, so that we can have a little space, privacy and freedom of movement. San Francisco is a very pleasant city with plenty of options, so we don't need to restrict ourselves to the trendy places. Frankly, I'd prefer to avoid them.

I'm not sure which online services are best for organizing meetups, so if anyone has any suggestions along those lines I'd be happy to hear them so we can reach more people. There isn't much time, but I imagine a couple weeks can suffice with a little work.

I hope we can pull it off, as there are a number of readers from the Bay Area I know I'd be happy to meet in person.

Doodle Link for SF Meetup

W.F. Price · 13 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A friend suggested I use a Doodle poll to see when people might be available to meet up in San Francisco, so I chose a few days and times that are probably plausible for me (for now). If I can get a few people to commit to something early it will be easier to settle on a good day.

It's a "hidden" poll, so your info is confidential. Feel free to add notes. Unfortunately, it will have to be on a work day, but I'm up for evenings. Whether or not we can put a group together, I'd be happy to have a couple one-on-one meetings here and there when time allows.

https://doodle.com/mfr3dct8b3nysctz

Feminist Professor Assaults Minor over Pro Life Signs

W.F. Price · 13 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For years now, campus liberals have been getting away with shameless bullying of anyone who openly disagrees with their radical politics. They have grown so bold that one University of California (Santa Barbara) feminist studies "professor" named Mireille Miller-Young attacked a couple of kids – including a 16-year-old – who were holding anti-abortion signs. Before assaulting the girls, she incited a mob, which is a tactic frequently employed by campus liberals. After the assault, she stole their signs and then destroyed them.

So, Dr. Miller-Young, a who teaches students about black history, pornography and prostitution, apparently committed the crimes of assault, theft and destruction of property. Perhaps one could add on a violation of civil rights (free expression) lawsuit. Incidentally, I've often wondered why the absolute worst kind of black women are so often promoted in universities, almost as though those in charge are deliberately creating a caricature of black women as offensive political radicals who revel in smut and abnormality. I look around at my socially conservative black neighbors – who are far more religious than your typical white Seattlite – and wonder why they get passed over. By promoting pornographers like Miller-Young as "professors," one could draw the conclusion that academics are deliberately promoting negative racial stereotypes and actively encouraging young black women to behave badly, when they need exactly the opposite message.

What is most frustrating about these episodes is that police selectively enforce the law depending on who is involved. If some feminists were promoting abortion and divorce and I were to violently grab a sign and destroy it, you can bet I'd end up in jail that same day. Hell, I'd probably even make the news as an "extremist," and face widespread condemnation. I might even be charged with a hate crime. But when a liberal – a professor no less – does the same on a college campus, cops laugh it off. According to the students who were attacked, police refused to take any action until they saw video of the assault and theft.

While it may annoy me sometimes, I support the right of people to bring up issues on college campuses — especially public ones that are funded with taxpayer money. Whether it's Lyndon Larouche groupies or pro-lifers, they all have the right to free expression, and they all deserve equal protection under the law. But we don't have that today. Equal protection is a farce on college campuses, and someone needs to send a strong message that this must change.

That being the case, let's call for prosecution of Professor Miller-Young, and hope that the girls who were attacked bring a civil suit against the university for violating their right to free speech.

Lena Dunham had a Bad Week

W.F. Price · 13 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It looks like Lena Dunham's performance on SNL last weekend, which was widely panned, has led her to re-think her career and consider quitting acting. The skit with the lowest ratings was the one in which she attacked MRAs, but her Bible skit didn't sit all that well with viewers either.

Dunham's rise to stardom has always been somewhat implausible. She has neither the acting skills nor the natural beauty possessed by most others in the industry, but she did fulfill a role as a modern young feminist. However, that role, which may be celebrated by cultural elites, apparently has limited appeal amongst the population at large.

One lesson we can take away from this is that while MRAs may be scorned by elites, the underlying issues that have created the MRM are really not very funny at all, and there's a vast amount of hidden sympathy out there. When I started The Spearhead I figured that must be the case. After all, if the divorce rate is 50% then there must be scores of millions of men out there who have seen their lives damaged very badly by feminism. Add the children and other family members of these men, and it quickly becomes clear that the majority of Americans have been negatively impacted by feminism in one way or another, with only a minority benefiting from it.

However, the question of how to deal with the problem still remains. But I think I may have an answer: time and effort. It takes hours and hours of dedicated work to make a difference. There is no silver bullet; only day after day of work to unravel the web of influence and interconnected interests that have created this monstrous injustice. When I saw Lena Dunham fall flat on her face in an effort to discredit those of us who work to support and represent men's interests, I finally realized that all those days and hours I and others have put in have made a difference on a national scale. It's a sort of vindication, despite her malicious intent.

It seems we've finally arrived.

Hoist on our Own Petard

W.F. Price · 14 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Why is the West politically helpless in the face of Russian neo-Soviet aggression in Ukraine? Because the Russians are playing by the same script our cultural elite has embraced for the last two decades, and doing a better job of it. In Germany (and some other European countries), left wingers and progressives are siding with Russia because protesters in Ukraine included "fascists" and right wingers. This is true, and because that has become the ultimate sin in the West, Russia holds the trump card.

> The deputy leader of Germany's left-wing Die Linke party has called on Western powers to accept the results of an "illegal" referendum due to take place in Crimea on Sunday.
>
> "There are political realities which one must accept," Sahra Wagenknecht said on Wednesday.
>
> Wagenknecht acknowledged that the referendum was not strictly in line with the Ukrainian constitution but said the same applied to the current interim government in Ukraine, which she claimed includes "neo-fascists" and "anti-Semites".

During the Cold War, the US tolerated authoritarian regimes around the world as a less awful alternative to International Communism. South Korea, for example, was not a democracy until well into the 1980s. Instead, it was a right-wing regime that could plausibly be called fascist. Today, of course, fascists are the bogeyman, largely because of Nazi Germany's genocidal policies. But even among fascists Nazi Germany was unique in that regard. Neither Spain nor Italy – both of which had fascist governments at the same time – engaged in systematic genocide. Stalin, on the other hand, did so on an extensive scale through deportations, population transfer and mass murder.

The Soviets had a history with fascism that predated WWII. Fascists and Communists hated each other long before Nazi Germany unleashed war in Europe. After the war, the hatred remained. Authoritarian fascist governments in Asia, Latin America and Spain resisted Communism up to the very end of the Cold War. If it were not for fascist-allied elements in Israel, that country may well have aligned with the USSR rather than the West.

The results speak for themselves. Today, would you rather live in North or South Korea? Belarus or Spain? Chile or Cuba? Fascist governments tended to transition to democracy with relative ease, because their economic systems were, compared with Communists', more free and mature. After the Cold War, however, the US transitioned from anti-Communism to the global crusade for democracy. Authoritarian governments became the new enemy. It isn't exactly clear why, but perhaps leftists in the US really did seize a great deal of power. Since then, we've systematically destroyed authoritarian regimes, mainly in the Middle East, with predictably chaotic consequences.

Throughout the 90s and 00s, there was a drumbeat of anti-fascism reverberating throughout the US. Saddam Hussein was Hitler, so, somehow, was Slobodan Milosevic (but incredibly the neo-Ustashe in Croatia was A-OK); Bashir al-Assad is Hitler, Qaddafi was Hitler, etc. Yet the only ideology at the time dedicated to the destruction of the US was international radical Islam, which also opposes authoritarian Middle East governments.

Today, with Russia's annexation of Crimea, we are wandering around confused. What should we call Putin? Some have tried to compare him to Hitler, but that is absolutely absurd. Even worse, it is counterproductive, because to the Russians themselves Ukraine represents the fascist enemy in the Great Patriotic War against Nazi Germany. Russian mobs in Donetsk – this very day – are vigorously protesting the "fascists" in the new Ukraine government. Russians in Crimea have vowed to fight the fascists and imperialist Americans. They are dead serious.

And what do we have to say in return? Nothing but criticism for nonsupport of homosexuality and vague comments about "international law." And that doubly confirms the Russians' zeal, because homosexuality, despite what clueless Westerners may think, is considered to be a fascist practice by Russians, and international law is a tool of the imperialist robber barons.

We have nothing. No political leg to stand on at all. American inconsistency and play-acting at being the most leftist of all people has come back around to slap us in the face. We are in an ideological quagmire, and it will take time to dig out of it. The Russians can outdo us in antifascism even in their weak moments, and we have no ideological defense, because as far as the American people know today, anti-fascism is the raison d'être of the US, which leaves us subordinate to Putin's newly reconstituted USSR.

Putin's seizure of Crimea despite Western opposition will come to be seen as a turning point in history. Perhaps it will be referred to as the point at which America lost the initiative, and lost its way. I hope not, but for the moment it looks like the biggest diplomatic humiliation since Ayatollah Khomeini seized the US embassy in Tehran, and perhaps worse even than that.

Finally, if anyone – anyone at all – could articulate a new position, it would be the oldest of the old Cold Warriors, most of whom are dead. Kissinger, for all I know, is in his dotage. But there may yet be hope. These dead men told tales. Maybe it's time to dust off the old books and relearn what it meant to be American before we were overtaken by hubris in the wake of the Cold War.

The Diversity and Influence of the English Diaspora in The US

W.F. Price · 15 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've long been interested in linguistics and dialects of English, so I've spent a considerable amount of time thinking about the people who came from the motherland: who they were, when they came, which parts of England they came from, etc. Roanoke, The very first English colony in US territory failed, probably as a result of conflict with local Indians. However, even before Roanoke, fishermen were visiting New England and setting up temporary camps to dry fish and gather supplies. This is how Samoset, an Indian originally from Maine, learned some English and used it to welcome the Plymouth colonists.

The second settlement in Jamestown, Virginia, founded in 1607, somehow managed to survive, becoming the first permanent English settlement in the Americas. Next, the Plymouth Colony planted its roots and set about populating New England. These first two settlements were settled by different varieties of English. The New Englanders were primarily northern English, while the Virginians were mainly from the south, and included a number of Welshmen as well. Over time, the political situation in England influenced the development of the English colonists in the colonies, with the English Civil War having a profound and divisive effect. Being Puritans, the New Englanders were supporters of the roundheads, while the Southerners tended to side with the cavaliers. Some hold that the American Civil War was simply a recapitulation of the English Civil War fought on American soil.

There was another, later stream of immigration from England that has also had a profound effect on the US population. These were largely poorer English who saw America as a land of opportunity in the early 19th century. Many of these people joined the Mormon church, which had an English character from the beginning. The Mormons eventually settled Utah and other parts of the inland West, making Utah the most English state in the Union today.

Today, in maps of ethnicity, we see that "English Americans" are concentrated mainly in New England and Utah. However, what's missing from the picture is the fact that Southern whites are of overwhelmingly English extraction, yet tend to refer to themselves simply as "American." The least English parts of the US (by white population) are the Midwest and the West Coast, which are dominated by German ancestry. In fact, in a vast expanse of the US – perhaps the majority by territory – there are more Germans than members of any other ethnic group.

However, despite not having great numbers or territory, the major political divisions in the US are best represented by the three major English-American factions. In other words, the more English a given region, the less political and ideological flexibility one finds in that area among white voters. Major swing states such as Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, Wisconsin, Colorado and Nevada are primarily German, while one-party Utah, Vermont and Alabama are primarily English.

So it seems that even today the English are setting the tone, and retain an outsized influence over the population and politics of the United States.

The Murky World of Sex on Campus

W.F. Price · 16 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The LA Times published a correction yesterday to an article published late last year. In the article, which appeared on the front page, the LA Times reported that Occidental College did not disclose a number of sexual assault reports.

> A front-page article in the Los Angeles Times on Dec. 7, 2013, was incorrect in reporting that Occidental College failed to disclose 27 alleged sexual assaults that occurred in 2012.
>
> The article ("College shelved more assault reports") dealt with Occidental's obligations under the federal Clery Act, which requires schools to publish statistics annually on reported crime on or near campus.
>
> Occidental representatives approached The Times early this month to seek a correction. Documents reviewed by The Times this week show that the 27 incidents did not fall under the law's disclosure requirements for a variety of reasons.

So why weren't these incidents disclosed? Because they were apparently not crimes, but rather accusations of sexual harassment, or they occurred some distance from the school.

> Some were not sexual assaults as defined by the Clery Act. Rather, they involved sexual harassment, inappropriate text messages or other conduct not covered by the act. Other alleged incidents were not reported because they occurred off-campus, beyond the boundaries that Occidental determined were covered by the act. Some occurred in 2011, and the college accounted for them that year.
>
> Subsequent Times articles published Dec. 20 in the LATExtra section and Jan. 23 in Section A repeated the original error regarding the alleged underreporting of sexual assaults.
>
> The Times regrets the errors in the articles.

Additionally, it seems that the reporter was sleeping with one of his sources:

> Separately, as they began looking into the complaint, Times editors learned from the author of the articles, staff writer Jason Felch, that he had engaged in an inappropriate relationship with someone who was a source for the Dec. 7 story and others Felch had written about Occidental's handling of sexual assault allegations. Felch acknowledged that after the relationship ended, he continued to use the person as a source for future articles.
>
> Times Editor Davan Maharaj dismissed Felch on Friday. Maharaj said the inappropriate relationship with a source and the failure to disclose it earlier constituted "a professional lapse of the kind that no news organization can tolerate."
>
> He added: "Our credibility depends on our being a neutral, unbiased source of information — in appearance as well as in fact."

Although it isn't clear who Mr. Felch was sleeping with, this unfortunate breach of ethics appears to me to be a typical case of feminist corruption. The feminist will have sex with males and then use them to advance her agenda. It happens in courts all the time, and yet for some reason it is still considered "ethical" for an attorney to sleep with a client.

In order to stay in his lover's good graces, Felch wrote a slanderous article that exaggerated the threat of rape and suggested that the school was hiding a rash of sexual assaults. Instead, he may have exposed a feminist racket.

It turns out that alleging rape can result in a payout from the school. Media attention in these cases then becomes leverage for complainants in civil suits. Looks like Mr. Felch got used, and he took the fall.

Asset Forfeiture as Institutionalized Corruption

W.F. Price · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Over the years, constitutional safeguards protecting people from arbitrary seizure of property have been gutted, and due process tossed by the wayside. There were two parallel legal developments that contributed to this trend. Both happened at around the same time. One was the "war on drugs," and the other was family law, or, as it might more reasonably be named, the "war on fathers."

People are finally starting to realize that we created a monster. States and counties were given a license to steal, otherwise known as privateering, from citizens, so long as the money is spent on law enforcement (e.g. bonuses, higher salaries, new toys, bigger facilities):

> Allegations that law-enforcement officers in northern Nevada unlawfully took tens of thousands of dollars from passing motorists has spurred an official review and bolstered critics of such asset-forfeiture programs.
>
> The Humboldt County District Attorney said Friday that some cases in which officers seized cash from motorists raised "procedural issues" and that the office would review similar cases. But the district attorney also said sheriff's officers had done nothing wrong and that the money was lawfully seized.
>
> Under asset-forfeiture laws, police can seize money from suspected drug traffickers and others to fund local law enforcement. Law-enforcement officials say the practice helps bring down dangerous drug traffickers and that innocent people aren't targeted for their assets.
>
> But critics say the Nevada situation shows the laws can be abused, particularly because civil-forfeiture laws don't require a suspect to be found guilty of a crime. "This is an example of how the perverse incentive of civil forfeiture undermines law enforcement and the rights of ordinary Americans," said Eapen Thampy, executive director of Americans for Forfeiture Reform, an advocacy group.

In case you may have been wondering how the cops got all their "tacticool" gear over the last couple decades, this fills in the picture considerably. Just as pirates grew more powerful and bold with each success, our police become greedier and more intimidating every time they get away with theft, and that's all the time. Minnesota has introduced a bill that would prohibit police from keeping any property seized in investigations unless those arrested are convicted:

> After a scandal in which the Minneapolis Metro Gang Strike Force was found to have illegal seized hundreds of thousands of dollars from innocent people, the Minnesota legislature is now considering a bill that would require a criminal conviction before police could keep the money and property they've seized in an investigation. If the suspect is never charged, or is acquitted, the suspect gets his property back. That what seems like a perfectly reasonable policy would be one of the boldest forfeiture reforms in the country speaks to just how far down the rabbit hole we've fallen on this issue. The bill is of course facing aggressive opposition by all the usual suspects.

The Minnesota bill represents merely a return to normalcy and Constitutional procedure, yet it is considered "radical."

How did it come to this point? We can't be honest about asset forfeiture if we ignore precedents set in family law courts, where the Constitution might as well be a foreign document. To think that family law and criminal law have no influence on each other would be a big mistake; after all many of the judges and lawyers who practice and judge in one also work in the other. If judge so-and-so sees no problem in seizing money from a man on behalf of his ex wife, why not let the police seize suspects' money as well? It doesn't matter whether or not a man is guilty in family court, so what's the big deal? The interests of the state and court clearly outweigh the rights of the guy who got pulled over or hauled in as a suspect, just as the interests of the state outweigh the divorced husband/noncustodial father's Constitutional rights.

Judges and police quickly grow accustomed to power. It makes life that much easier. Sure, it's hard on the little people, but who cares about them when you've got to pay your kids' tuition at some expensive school?

Pussy Riot and Fred Phelps

W.F. Price · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Fred Phelps, patriarch of the Westboro Baptist Church, is reportedly on his deathbed following a falling out with other members of his church and family. I have tried not to pay much attention to Fred Phelps, because for all intents and purposes he is working for the destruction of traditional family norms in the US through his caricature of homophobia. At times I wondered whether he was being paid to put on his act, although it seems more likely that he was simply using it as a publicity stunt to drum up business for his law firm which, according to commenter Geography Bee Finalist Himself, is quite profitable.

You might wonder how someone who is almost universally condemned can actually use it to his advantage, but over time I've noticed that people are drawn to that stuff for some reason or another. Think of all the bad press Satan has gotten over the years. And yet Anton LaVey managed to make a good living off his Church of Satan. Controversy fascinates a lot of people. Black metal rockers are not the only ones who can cash in on it these days.

So why did Phelps get kicked out of the church? My guess is that it was just another case of family greed. He was getting old and losing his touch, so someone made a move to grab what she could before he started playing that final game of doling out favors in return for attention/power that sad old folks all too often resort to.

But I'd like to make a comparison to Pussy Riot, which serves a very similar purpose in Russia. Where the Westboro Baptist Church picketed military funerals and so on, Pussy Riot invades churches and smashes icons. Fred Phelps condemned America; Pussy Riot condemns Russia. Both are deliberately offensive provocateurs. Both serve essentially the same purpose.

However, credulous Western media take Pussy Riot seriously, and defend their highly offensive behavior. Maybe it's because because they declare themselves feminists, or maybe because they denounce Vladimir Putin. I'm not sure, but it makes American journalists come off as ignorant blockheads.

The following article, written by Lizzie Crocker for The Daily Beast, is an example of this dunderheaded thinking about Russia:

> Feminism has long been a dirty word in Russia. Just ask Svetlana Smetanina, a journalist for the state-owned Rossiyskaya Gazeta newspaper who, in a 2010 article, voiced an opinion that many Russians seem to share: women who self-identify as feminists are harpies, she wrote, "unfulfilled in their personal lives and bent on revenging themselves on men for their own unhappiness."
>
> Smetanina's op-ed is representative of the outright disdain in Russia toward feminists—an attitude on full display in recent months, crystallized in the Western mind by images of the punk art collective Pussy Riot being whipped by Cossacks in Sochi and of brutes in Crimea violently choking young, topless activists from the radical group Femen, whose bare-breasted protests against patriarchy and dictatorship (in this case Putin's invasion of eastern Ukraine) have made them media darlings in the West. Love them or hate them, these women are at the vanguard of the fight against Putin's repressive state at a time when the domestic opposition has been effectively neutered.
>
> But radical feminism is very much in its nascent stages in Russia, so much that ostensibly educated women like Smetanina prefer to deny any reason for its existence. In her argument against the need for a homegrown brand of feminism, Smetanina invoked the Leninist past ("no discrimination on the basis of sex" during Soviet times) and a 2010 report by the World Bank on Women Business and Law which, she claims, found "women in Russia have more socio-economic and labor security than in the United States and in many countries in Europe."
>
> A common theme in Russia's state media is that feminism is a Western plot, an imported ideology threatening the country's patriarchal status quo. (Incidentally, the same argument was made about democracy, which > explains why Putin and his allies continue to dismiss legitimate domestic dissent as Cold War-style meddling). When told to fight for gender equality, Smetanina maintains that Russian women "sincerely do not understand what people are talking about since they do not feel discriminated against as compared to their husbands." Naida Azizova, a blogger for the Russian propaganda channel RT, agreed, saying that feminism is an idea "made in the USA" and that America's bra-burning feminists have "only made their lives more complicated" in adhering to ideas of gender equality. The grim result, she laments, is that "gentlemen have given up their traditional behavior."

The Russian journalist is mostly right. Women in Russia and Eastern Europe were "liberated" from domestic life long before Western women. Roughly 50 years earlier, in fact. However, second wave feminism was actually "made in the USSR." Betty Friedan, the godmother of second wave feminism, was a Communist agent — an honest to goodness Stalinist. The Feminine Mystique, her seminal book, was based on work she did for the Communist Party in the 40s and 50s. However, since then feminism has mutated into an American product that would barely be recognizable to good old Uncle Joe.

Because Russian women got a long head start in feminism, they discovered long ago that gender equality is not all it's cracked up to be. It's much easier to get a free dinner and a bunch of roses in return for sexual favors than to, say, serve as a partisan on the Eastern Front. American women still think they can have their cake and eat it, but they're just finding out that it doesn't work that way, hence the constant state of confusion that seems to afflict young American women.

> Indeed, feminism is such a dirty word in Russia that Women in Russia, a "non-feminist" political party encouraging the "restoration of the family…through the family of Russia's spirituality," was founded in 2012. "We are not feminists," party leader Galina Khavrayeva stressed, adding that they "have about 50 percent of male members and these are heads of our regional offices."
>
> Given these attitudes, it's no surprise that Pussy Riot and Femen are far more popular in the West than in Russia. Both groups have become celebrities in the U.S., with their eye-catching protest tactics and performances dedicated to freedom from oppression. Indeed, the girls of Pussy Riot were treated like rock stars last month at a concert in Brooklyn organized by Amnesty International, just six weeks after they were released from prison. Madonna introduced them and Yoko Ono assured them backstage that "every step you take will change the world."
>
> While Pussy Riot is hardly an American plot, it's true that the women have drawn inspiration from punk feminist icons in the West. "We were already interested in the idea of feminism," Katia Samutsevich told VICE in December. "But we decided to find out if there were any feminist artists in Russia…Honestly, we searched for a long time and we couldn't find anything. As we researched further and further, we learned about the second feminist wave in the U.S., which included punk feminism. We like this idea and started searching for punk feminist banks in Russia. And again, we didn't find any. Maybe they exist, but they are not seen—which got us quite upset."

Pussy Riot is far more popular in the West than in Russia because they haven't been taking a crap on all that we hold dear. Amnesty International is shredding what's left of its credibility in supporting these vandals, and as for Madonna and Yoko Ono, well, I feel vaguely ashamed whenever they set foot outside our country (why couldn't Japan have kept Yoko?). It's hard to believe that Pussy Riot could be an American plot because it would be such an incredibly stupid one. I like to think the US is still above that level of childishness. Could we possibly be that incompetent?

Maybe. Seems Obama hired a radical lesbian, a big Pussy Riot fan who advocates the extermination of the traditional family, to run our propaganda outreach to Russians. This woman would be too much even for contemporary Americans to stomach.

Obama's utterly submissive policy in regards to Russia confounds me. Viewed from afar, it almost seems like he's deliberately sabotaging America's position. What's going on here? Does Vladimir Putin have an original Kenyan birth certificate for one "Barack Hussein Obama" in a shoebox in his office? Does he have pictures of the president shacked up with a gay lover? I'm half serious here. I can't imagine what else could cause our foreign policy in regards to Russia to be so haphazard and amateurish other than some very persuasive "kompromat," as the Russians call it. After all, when China made feints toward the Diaoyu Islands, we sent B-52s and a carrier on patrol. Why the limp-wristed approach to Russia?

Finally, in the "dream on" category:

> When topless Femen protesters mobbed Putin in Germany last spring, the Russian president dismissed the affront with thinly veiled condescension: "To be honest, I didn't really hear what they were shouting because the security [guards] were very tough. These huge guys fell on the lasses. That seemed not right to me, they could have been handled more gently."
>
> But such condescension, once the norm in a country dominated by the Orthodox church, in which only 14 percent of parliamentarians are women, and where feminists are dismissed for "revenging themselves on men for their own unhappiness," is finally being challenged by insurgent feminists like Femen and Pussy Riot.
>
> For Putin and his ilk, feminist groups like Pussy Riot are contributing to "the destruction of the moral foundations of [Russian] society." They accuse it of being "made in the USA," brought into the country like a virus. But if those leading the feminist brigade contribute to the destruction of Putinism and the "moral foundations" of institutionally sexist Russian society, they may soon be celebrated as much at home as they have been in the West.

Pussy Riot will never be celebrated in Russia. No more than Fred Phelps will be in the US. Both are self-promoting clowns who may as well be working for those they claim to oppose.

Update on San Francisco Meetup

W.F. Price · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Looks like next Tuesday afternoon/evening may be the best time for meeting up in San Francisco. So far there are just about a half dozen people who have expressed interest (four on Doodle), which sounds good to me. However, more are welcome, so feel free to check in on the Doodle link if you're in the area and let me know if you are interested.

https://doodle.com/mfr3dct8b3nysctz

Wimpy Young Pundits

W.F. Price · 18 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I don't tend to make judgments about men by their appearance, but when there's a widespread trend in any given place – that is, they all share something in common – I pay attention. Lately, Heartiste has been pointing out the blatant effeminacy of the elite young punditry. He has a point. I can't think of any mainstream media pundits under the age of 40 who come off as genuinely masculine.

Take Chris Hayes for example. His wife looks like she could bench press more than he can:

As far as I can tell, this is what you get when academia and media become dominated by feminine sensibilities. Female teachers often do not – cannot – handle typical boys and young men. The males who thrive in this environment are physically passive mama's boys who are never intimidating. From a female perspective, this may seem quite alright: keep the men who work in their company nice, tame and obedient. They want dogs rather than wolves as peers.

However, for men, this can be problematic. These types, when ambitious, tend to harbor a genuine hatred toward more typically masculine males, so they embrace politics and stances that are directly opposed to your average guy's interests. It explains a lot of their liberalism and contempt for the average man. I wonder whether the courtiers in late 18th century France weren't pretty much the same.

More Info on San Francisco Dinner/Meetup

W.F. Price · 19 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Although I've received a half dozen confirmations on the Doodle meetup page, I made the poll confidential and didn't ask for emails, so I'm having a bit of a tough time getting in touch with people who indicated interest there (altogether it's looking like we'll have around ten people). So if you signed up for the meetup on Doodle and have questions please email me at wfprice at welmer dot org. I will keep all your info confidential both online and at the meeting. You can say as much or as little as you want about yourself — it's entirely up to you. If you don't email me, just keep your eye on the site and I'll announce the location soon. Another solution would be to put your email address in a comment in Doodle. I'm the only one who can see the comments, so it's safe.

Doodle link one more time:

https://doodle.com/mfr3dct8b3nysctz

I have a place in the inner Richmond on Geary Blvd. in mind. A Chinese place. If anyone has a problem with Sichuanese food, speak now or forever hold your peace. There will be spicy food, and meat cooked in broth — Mongol style (there will also be non-spicy options). This is the plan for now, and I'll nail it down by this weekend. Whether or not it will be that particular restaurant, I'm sticking with Geary Blvd. and the Richmond for the get together.

I will show up at the place at 6 PM next Tuesday evening, but you can come at your convenience if you can't make it that early. I plan to stay until everyone has arrived — the place closes at 10PM. I'll have all night, so if a few people want to go out after dinner we can do that, too (within reason — I'm not 20 anymore). At this point, I've heard from about ten people altogether, but more or less is fine — we'll figure it out one way or the other. The important thing is that people don't get lost or left out.

So, once again…

If you have any questions, Email me! I promise to get back to you. I'll handle the location, but I have to get a better idea of time and numbers.

What the Hell Does Feminism Mean?

W.F. Price · 20 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

These days, it's getting harder and harder to find a consistent cultural message about anything, so it is to be expected that certain political movements and ideas are plagued with confusion, but nothing beats "feminism" for mixed messages. Recently, the most prominent feminists in the news have been Sheryl Sandberg, Katy Perry (who just discovered her feminism), and that porn star student at Duke. They might as well all be babbling nonsensically as far as I'm concerned, but I keep seeing the word "feminist" in their quotes.

Aren't the senior feminists a bit embarrassed by this? A White House insider cum billionaire executive, a pop singer and a porn star are all calling what they do feminist, but if that's true, what isn't feminist? Is feminism just a state of mind, or a party affiliation (apparently not — the porn star is a libertarian)? Is it having lots of money? Being proud of oneself?

There is one thing the above examples have in common, and it might just be the key to understanding what feminism means today. They are all shameless self-promoters. Apparently, feminism is about "me, ME, ME!" That's all there is to it. It has nothing to do with values, conscience or a desire to make the world a better place. It's transparent self-interest. Distilled selfishness. It brings to mind little more than pigs in the trough.

The last pretense has been abandoned. The original, utopian idea that women would stop wars, bring a kinder and more caring society, correct injustices and so on hardly comes up any longer. Maybe this just allows us to see feminism for what it was all along, but how can anyone respond to this revelation with anything other than disappointment and spiritual exhaustion? This must be what civilizational decline feels like.

For Tuesday SF Meetup Recognition

W.F. Price · 23 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When I meet up with people in San Francisco, it might be helpful if they can recognize me, so I'm posting a very recent picture. Below, you can see me with my wife a couple weeks ago on her birthday. I'm still sporting my Northwest winter coat in the pic (unshaven and in need of a haircut — it's a local tradition), and I'll be a little more cleaned up in SF, but I'll still have a beard. Also, as you can see, I've been eating well lately (perhaps a little too well), so I will not be a diminutive presence. As an aside, I am quite proud of the chicken you can see in the picture — I smoked it myself that day and it turned out just about right. I'll write up the recipe for interested parties at some point in the future.

I don't know at this point how many people will show. My guess is a half dozen, which is about what I'm hoping for. Seems like the perfect number for an informal meeting. However, more or less is fine.

I'll put the location online tomorrow, but for now just think Geary Boulevard in the inner Richmond. I'll send an email to everyone who has expressed interest via email tonight, but if I don't have your email just check out the site tomorrow and you'll see where it is.

Looking forward to some good conversation!

See you in SF

Grand Hot Pot Lounge

W.F. Price · 24 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've chosen the Grand Hot Pot Lounge on 3565 Geary Blvd for our get together.

Here's the Yelp listing, which includes a map. I'll be there at 6PM Tuesday (tomorrow) evening. If you'd like to confirm, send me an email at wfprice (at) welmer (dot) org. Otherwise, just show up and I'll be there.

Sichuanese food can be spicy (depending on what you order), so if you prefer to avoid spicy food just check with the waiter before you order and he'll let you know. Also, there are two main types of spice used in Sichuanese cooking. One is the usual capsaicin/chili pepper "hot" spice, and the other is something called "huajiao" (flower pepper), which is a pepper that gives a sort of numbing, tingly sensation. Supposedly, it makes it easier to eat hot peppers due to the slight numbing effect, but I've simply found that it's a unique spice with a flavor and sensation all its own. It's a new experience to most westerners, so feel free to try it if you're adventurous, and don't be alarmed by it. Sichuanese duck is excellent, and flavored with star anise. Not sure if they'll have the duck, but I'd assume so. It's second only to Peking duck in my opinion, and a bit more exotic.

But the main course is hot pot, which was originally a Mongol dish that spread across China. Sichuanese hot pot consists of a divided pot with one spicy side and one side with beef broth, so you can enjoy it whether you like spicy food or not. You take very thin slices of beef, lamb or pork and put it in the pot along with some noodles and vegetables, then scoop it out after it has cooked and eat it along with your rice.

The reviews for this place are mixed, but most of the negatives seem to focus on the fact that the servers don't speak English too well. Don't worry about that. My Chinese may be pretty rusty after all these years, but I used to eat in Sichuanese restaurants all the time in Beijing so I'm sure can navigate the menu without much trouble and understand what the waiters are saying (even with that heavy Sichuanese accent). I'm confident that the food will be authentic, and it will open up a new area of cuisine to those who haven't tried it before. Sichuan is the breadbasket (or rice bowl, if you will) of China, and as such has an amazing variety of foods and flavors.

Additionally, the way it's served tends to encourage a "round table" atmosphere where everyone is part of the meal. In Chinese culture, the meal is perhaps the most democratic of all gatherings, and that is just the atmosphere I'd like to cultivate.

A Good Time

W.F. Price · 26 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'm happy to announce that I had a great time during our little Spearhead rendezvous in San Francisco. A half dozen of us spent time together eating, conversing and getting to know each other at the Grand Hot Pot Lounge. Despite being from various and diverse occupational, religious and ethnic backgrounds and spanning three decades in ages represented, we got along as only men united in common cause can. I am also pleased to be able to honestly say I personally liked every single attendee.

I'd like to give some credit to Brian for providing the persistence and motivation that convinced me to follow through on the idea, and thank everyone for coming. For those who couldn't make it, maybe there will be a next time in the Bay Area. I hope that's the case!

Motivated readers might want to think about setting up dinner meetings in their own locales. If they all turn out as well as ours did tonight, I think we'd soon see something productive emerge from these face to face meetups. There's really no substitute for personal interaction, and that's too often forgotten in these days of smartphone/internet obsession.

One final observation I'd like to add is that keeping the meetup all-male was crucial in creating such a productive, fraternal atmosphere. There's always plenty of time for the women – they make sure of that – so sometimes we have to take care to create a space of our own.

How Liberal Democracy Discriminates Against Traditional Families

W.F. Price · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We Americans don't have much of a tradition of criticizing our political system because until recently it has worked pretty well for us. This is in stark contrast to most other modern nation states, which have gone through far more broad political changes than we have over the last couple hundred years. Aside from the events surrounding the Civil War, change has been incremental in the US.

But whether or not we're at a crisis point, and it doesn't look like we're there yet, something has changed over the last fifty-odd years. There's a sense of stagnation and decay. We've reached the end of our expansive stage, and entered a politically conservative era (not to be confused with culturally conservative — the two often do not align). I suppose we could call it the late middle age of our republic. So now, as the vigor and quality of our nation and culture declines, perhaps it's time to look at where we may have erred and miscalculated.

In a recent post, I explained why universal adult suffrage is inevitable in a one person-one vote political system. It's often in politicians' interest to extend the franchise so as to gain more constituents, so more and more people will be added to the voter pool when possible and advantageous to parties and politicians. I don't have much of a moral opinion on universal suffrage. I'm no more a fan of a male majority imposing its will on me than a female majority. Both can be tyrannical.

However, the tyranny of the majority isn't a threat merely to individuals, but the most basic communal unit of society as well. In our political system, the family is at a distinct disadvantage due to both numbers and economic realities. One might think that those with large families are destined to gain political power over those without, and that may be true in the long run, but it takes at least a generation, and probably more time than that. Those with large families are at a political disadvantage for most of their lives. This is because children are not politically represented, and they are not economically productive.

If we look at the political landscape from a household rather than individual perspective, the disparity is obvious. A family with a husband, wife and four children shares two votes between six people. They also share from one to two incomes. Contrast this with the childless urban single professional, who has one vote per household and one income. This single professional household invests the same political and economic power in one person as the family household does in three. From a purely individualist perspective among adults, this seems fair, but children cannot survive as individuals without communal (family) support. So, given human nature, the single childless individual is privileged. One could say that he or she is, both politically and economically, a member of a higher class.

This means that there is an incentive to avoid family formation built into our political system. Those who do so have relatively more political and economic privilege. Where political and economic pressure is higher, as in dense urban environments, the incentive is stronger. And politics being what they are, there is also a tendency to push one's advantage and use power differentials as leverage. Therefore, the more advantage a small household has over a large one in a given area, the more anti-family that area becomes. Some examples of anti-family practices include promoting density and, counterintuitively, walkability. The modern family relies on the automobile to a greater extent than the adult individual, because cars are a safe and effective way to move children through a city, and can carry more groceries and supplies. While walkable neighborhoods are potentially better for children, for this to be the case they would have to be safe and not too expensive, too. In today's cities, the safe walkable neighborhood doesn't have family-oriented stores and markets with reasonable prices, but boutique businesses that provide a third of one's daily caloric needs for no less than $10, and usually more. While this is great for the young professional who wants a nice lunch in a pleasant atmosphere, it isn't much use to harried parents. Unfortunately, the neighborhoods with more reasonable prices are not walkable, because you stand a much higher chance of being accosted and robbed on the way to the store.

This political reality has pushed working families directly out of cities, leaving only the wealthy and the hapless poor with children in any numbers. The former have them because they can afford it, and the latter because they are not very good at responding to incentives.

Is there a potential solution to this? I think so. Why not give those with dependent children the opportunity to vote on their behalf? If a parent is the head of household, why not multiply his or her vote by the number of dependent children? If you're head of household and have two kids, your vote counts three times. If that sounds like too much, then maybe a half a vote per child should suffice. Whatever the formula, giving children zero representation strikes me as unreasonable, because they can easily be pushed around by the growing population of single, childless adults.

With some representation for children, politicians would be forced to pursue family-friendly policies, blatant discrimination against families such as forced busing would be harder to pull off, and developers could be held to account for corruption and cronyism in city halls. It's an idea whose time has come. Perhaps it isn't necessary at the federal level, but it is something states should start to consider today if they want to avoid a dismal, childless future.

The Cowardice of the SPLC

W.F. Price · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It came out a few days ago that the SPLC's official partnership with the FBI has been severed for one reason or another. It was always inappropriate for the SPLC to be involved in federal criminal justice operations, as it is a blatantly biased organization, and perhaps the SPLC's relentless attacks on Christians have finally become a political problem for the feds. Now that Morris Dees is in his dotage, the organization is past its prime. Without the charismatic, talented frontman (whatever you may think of Morris Dees, he's quite an operator) at the helm the organization's leadership has begun to blunder about and screw up. The SPLC is to the political left what the John Birch Society was to the right, and it is following a similar trajectory, only some thirty years later.

At this point, what bothers me most about the SPLC is not that it is dedicated to politically marginalizing conservative whites (which it is), but that it has become such a transparent fraud. While some of its earlier cases may have had merit, it no longer does much besides sue the government on behalf of sexual activists. I wonder how the Southern Poverty Law Center can include poverty in its name when it neglects the very people it was ostensibly founded to represent: overwhelmingly poor black men who bore the brunt of legal discrimination.

Finally, I found a case in which a young black man is being defended by the SPLC. The organization is suing Montgomery Alabama for throwing the young man in jail for being too poor to pay his traffic fines.

> By Jacob Denney
>
> I was preparing to leave the municipal courtroom in Montgomery, Ala., when the bailiff announced that the inmates were being brought in.
>
> A handful of men entered the courtroom. Handcuffed and shackled, they shuffled to a long bench and sat down. One by one, they were called before the municipal judge. None was appointed an attorney. Most had been arrested for warrants relating to unpaid traffic tickets. The judge asked if they had the money to pay the balance. Most didn't. When they couldn't pay, he sentenced them to jail to serve out their fines – one day for every $50.
>
> One of the last called was a young man who appeared to be in his early 20s. He wore a jumper that looked at least two sizes too big; he hung his head when the judge spoke to him. His mother, who had been waiting inside the courtroom, rushed up the aisle to be with him. The young man owed $2,736 in old traffic tickets and misdemeanor fines.
>
> Municipal courts in Alabama act mostly as debt collectors. Their brand of justice is limited to the scope of traffic tickets and other misdemeanors. Most towns in Alabama have them, and almost all rely on them to supplement meager city budgets.
>
> Neither the young man nor his mother had the money to pay. She tried to hand the judge a piece of paper, but he refused to look at it. I learned later that it was a letter from his employer, explaining that work had been slow for the past few months and that he had not been given any shifts. They expected things to pick up, though, and he would be starting to work again in two weeks. He had been the victim of a shooting before that and had spent almost six months unable to work. His medical bills were piling up, and he had a newborn daughter.

For once, here's a case I can get behind. If a man doesn't have any money to pay fees heaped upon him by the court, then the court should not have the power to jail him. It's an abusive, cynical practice that is antithetical to freedom.

However, where on earth has the SPLC been all these years as hundreds of thousands of men – disproportionately black men – have been ejected from their families and then tossed in jail because they didn't have the money to pay the support fees levied by the courts? Has the SPLC ever once raised a peep of protest about this practice, which is the biggest civil rights violation of the last 30 years? These are overwhelming poor men, and the system is set up to squeeze out every ounce of their blood, sweat and tears.

Even if the SPLC had the same anti-white, anti-Christian ideology, I'd have to give the organization some grudging respect if it stood by its ideals, but it hasn't. Ignoring the war on fatherhood, which has devastated the black family, is morally indefensible. And this isn't merely a recent development. This has happened right under the SPLC's nose for decades, and they haven't devoted one single hour of legal work to it. Think of the thousands of southern men imprisoned because they were poor, they were victims of false paternity claims, or they weren't even aware that they were in arrears! How could the SPLC not know about this? Obviously, they knew very well what was happening, but they cravenly chose to align themselves with feminists for political expedience, poor fathers and their civil rights be damned. That is sheer hypocrisy. It's inexcusable, and it reveals the organization for the cynical, cowardly fraud it is.

Entry Level Drone – Experience Required

Featured Guest · 1 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor: A reader submitted this interesting piece on the modern workplace, which offers some insight into why young men may not be all that ambitious these days.]

By HGW

I have a Job Interview. I'm wearing a suit. Dressed 'accordingly'. Why though? Why the suit? Why do we have to dress the same? Is it to show willing to conform? The absence of existentialism? It must be a test to identify the requisite character flaw; "He wore the suit, therefore he can be easily and swiftly indoctrinated". And what the fuck is a tie? Just some massive, swinging phallic symbol dangling from my neck. No balls. Very appropriate. It symbolizes my mental castration and evolution into the modern day eunuch; I believe what they tell me, I'm no threat to the establishment, no threat to power. I assume it once served a purpose, the tie. Like the general election or the penny-farthing. But you don't see people commuting on a penny-farthing out of a sense of tradition. I'm going to make a stand; no more tie. Right after this interview.

I'm on time. Being punctual is my first lie. I'm always late. Always. The second lie is the smile I greet the interviewer with. It's nothing like my real one. It's my camera smile. The one in all of my photos. The one people will think was my smile when I'm dead and buried. I'm not the only duplicitous one; The interviewers greet me with multiple camera smiles. The eyes give it away; they're empty, cold. This whole thing is just a charade. A play. Maybe this time I can mix it up, give honest answers to the interview questions:

Do you have your resume? Of course I do, I spent six months on the bastard. I've got a folder full.

What do you know about the company? What I googled last night. The only information I gleaned was "the company exists to make profit". That's it.

What do you think you'll bring to this company? Probably what most people bring. As little as possible. Everybody will be so busy covering up how little they do themselves that my ineptitude and laziness will go unnoticed like the death of an enemy civilian.

What are your strengths? I have incredible stamina for reading sport analyses online. I can hunt down anyone I see in day to day life on social media. And bench press. I do it a lot.

What are your weaknesses? I'm lazy, yet judge myself as better and smarter than other people. All people come to think of it. So I'm arrogant and delusional. I also have a soft spot for bread and butter. Mostly the butter part.

Tell me how you handled a difficult situation? I punched a guy in the face.

Why was there a gap in your employment? Because I didn't have a job. I actually have a lot more gaps but I extended my other employment to cover it. One of those jobs isn't even real. The contact details you have are my friend's, he's going to pretend he's the CEO and tell you what a sterling worker I am.

Where do you see yourself in 10 years? I can tell you something, I didn't see myself in this shithole 10 years ago.

Would you work holidays and weekends? Go fuck yourself.

I'll answer them that way. Next time. This time I regurgitate the same answers they always hear. The 'right' answers. The 'best' answers. They listen and nod. Then they tell me I look uninterested. You have the qualifications but you look uninterested. You fit the bill but you look uninterested. Your answers were great but you sound uninterested. I am uninterested. It's a job. It's uninteresting. I need the job so I should probably try harder, hide my true feelings, work on my poker face. Yet that's a face of uninterest. Maybe I should work on my pocket rockets face. The silent joy, the eagerness to proceed, the constant excited foot tapping. I couldn't keep that up. I'd become uninterested. They know this because they feel it too, deep down. Deep down behind that smug, conceited, subservient exterior.

They just don't realize it. They'd be happy for me to fake interest, fake curiosity, fake enthusiasm because they know the facts: I'm at the mercy of the employer; They'll own me; I'll be their property; I have no option but to obey them; I need the money.

I'm essentially applying for the position of "slave". These interviewers, these middle management muppets, they're the equivalent of the Uncle Tom, working hard to please their oppressive masters. The Commerce Uncle Tom. Or C.Un.T. for short. They'll decide whether I get to be a low level slave to the people who actually run our "free" countries. The people who decide stuff. Own stuff. The people who tell us we need these things. These things we buy. The things we're basically brainwashed into doing so. To get these things you need to work. Worse; buy it on credit and they have you. They own you. You need to work for this guy to pay the same guy back for the thing the guy convinced you to buy. You're fucked. You're a modern day slave eunuch. Still, things could be worse.

They tell me I'll be informed of their decision shortly. "Good luck" they say. "Good riddance" they mean. I sit at home and convince myself all of my eggs are in this basket. This basket marked "slave eunuch". I'm praying that they'll allow me to give away the majority of my time during my best years to make them more money. My fingers and toes are crossed. Please let me have the job, Mister, please let me make you money, please, Mister, please.

Those Corporate Motherfuckers.

Fighting for Equality for Fathers is a Fool's Errand

W.F. Price · 1 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When the divorce industry really took off in the 70s, fathers' rights groups soon emerged. Men were getting hammered by attorneys and judges, and there was an immediate backlash. From that moment, fathers began to frame the debate in terms of equality. There was even a widely-viewed film starring Dustin Hoffman – Kramer vs. Kramer – that (accurately) portrayed men as caring, capable parents. Many men have been involved in this struggle, including my late father, who was denied access to my little half-brother by his second wife. While there have been a few successes, the overall trend has been one of failure. We stand up and get knocked down, over and over again, like soldiers at the Somme. I'm a casualty, my father was a casualty, and my son could end up as one, too.

Yet despite this string of failures, men continue to fight with the same feeble weapon: equality. They may as well be rushing a machine gun nest armed with swords, like the Japanese in their bloody, futile banzai charges. "Equality!" we cry, inspiring amusement among feminists, who encourage this feeble tactic knowing full well that they can never lose this game.

The problem with gender equality is that it means different things to different people. Men tend to focus on the positives while ignoring the negatives. Women, on the other hand, take both into account, and strive to press their advantage where it is favorable to them. In truth, creating equality in marriage would require turning all wives into husbands, or all husbands into wives. It would be a kind of universal gay marriage without specific roles, which are common even in gay marriages. In a sense, fighting for equality in marriage is the same as fighting for what is currently referred to as "marriage equality;" i.e. gay marriage, and whatever you may feel about that, it has nothing to offer fathers in general, straight or gay.

With this in mind, one can deduce how much success your average heterosexual father will have in the courtroom when he argues for equal rights as a parent. Unless he can present himself as a eunuch, he's going to have a very tough row to hoe. Worse, he'll come off as dishonest, or perhaps an inadequate father. At best, he'll be seen as a sort of poor facsimile of a mother.

I know that it is not men's intent to deceive when they argue for equal parental rights. Fathers love their children, and are crucial in raising them. Fatherless children have always been pitied for good reason. The Biblical refrain of "widows and orphans" was to emphasize the importance of caring for the children of the community who had suffered the loss of their fathers. Kids with fathers do better on every measure, and are far safer than those without. A father is a bulwark against an unkind world, and a teacher who separates the wheat from the chaff. A child with a loving father knows he or she has a sanctuary at home, and a strong ally.

When we call for more paternal involvement in children's lives, equality is the wrong argument to use. After all, does a child need two mothers? We should argue that fathers provide something different. Fatherhood and motherhood are not equal, and therefore both are important to children. Would one feed children only vegetables or only meat? Teach them only arithmetic or only reading? Instead of striving to prove that men are just as good at parenting as mothers, which automatically places us in the disadvantageous position of letting feminists define what good parenting means, we should argue that fathers have much to offer that mothers do not, and it is cruel to deprive children of those benefits.

So let's get off this equality merry-go-round and adopt a different strategy. Proudly proclaim ourselves to be different from mothers, and much better fathers than they are. Conflating mothers and fathers under the label of "parents" is not productive; "Parents" are like "persons" — both are generic terms that leave little room for any unique qualities. To describe what we do when we raise children as "parenting" is to sell ourselves short. Instead, let's call it fatherhood.

I know it may come off as mere semantics, but words embody concepts, which influence how we think and behave. We are on much more familiar territory as fathers than we are as mere parents, and staying in that frame of mind requires abandoning any pretense of parental equality. It also precludes competition between mothers and fathers, which is the worst kind of poison in any custodial arrangement. When both mother and father embrace their respective roles, both they and the children win in the long run.

Feminists Promoting White Knighting in Bars

W.F. Price · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jake Blumgart, writing for Slate, proposes a new effort that's almost guaranteed to go horribly wrong: bouncers and bar staff getting more involved in policing interaction between men and women at their establishments. Bartenders and bouncers already deal with unruly customers, but that isn't enough. Now, we need a sort of barroom VAWA that requires intervention on the slightest suspicion of impropriety:

> Anyone who frequents bars or clubs is familiar with the wide variety of creeps who inflict themselves upon the female population. The guy who tries to grind up on every woman on the dance floor; the cocky, insistent jerk who won't stop coming over, no matter how uninterested—or scared—the women he's approaching are; the man who sidles up to the drunkest girl in the room.
>
> The bartender and the bouncer notice these guys too. "That's a normal day at work," my friend Candace, a bartender in Philadelphia, told me. When Candace sees a guy talking intensely in a female customer's ear, she'll often ask the woman whether she's OK, and if she's not, Candace will order the guy to scoot down the bar and find himself another stool. Feminist activists across the country are trying to ensure that more bars have someone like Candace serving the shots. While universities are attempting to promote the idea of "bystander intervention"—that is, the notion that the best hope of curbing campus sexual assault is to convince peers to look out for each other at parties, in the dorms, and in bars—a growing number of activists are focused on enlisting bartenders and bouncers to take some responsibility for protecting their customers.
>
> And their customers need it. A recent study, " 'Blurred Lines?' Sexual Aggression and Barroom Culture," found that the drunkenness of the target (usually a woman), not the perpetrator, heightens the persistence and invasiveness of harassing behavior, and that "staff are unlikely to act as guardians because sexual harassment and sexism are integral to bar culture."
>
> Apart from the actual aggression itself, "the biggest problem with sexual aggression is that nobody intervenes," says Dr. Kathryn Graham, one of the lead researchers behind the study. "We saw lots of instances where the bar staff could see it, but they just didn't think it was anything for them to intervene in. We saw women complaining to bar staff and they still didn't do anything."

Not long ago, women who hung out at bars were considered indecent. I still happen to hold this negative stereotype, perhaps because I've been to enough bars in my time to know that it's true. Women do not go to bars merely to sit and read Jane Austen in the corner. They go to bars to "hook up" with men, i.e. have sex with them. Maybe not every time, but then why the makeup, sexy clothes and heavy drinking at clubs? Men go for the same reason, so a major part of the purpose of bars is clearly sexual congress. This being the case, what the hell do these feminists think is going to happen in bars? A spontaneous knitting circle?

The reason bar staff don't intervene when they see customers interacting with sexual intent is that they went to the bar for exactly that purpose in the first place. Would the owner of a café go about closing laptops and plucking reading material from his patrons? If he did, he'd shortly find himself out of business, because many people go to cafés to read. Shutting down pickup attempts would have the same effect on bars. Most customers would leave, and all you'd be left with are the ornery drunks who decorate the stools of dying watering holes.

Furthermore, there's little more effective way to start a fight than to horn in on a guy's territory when he's talking to a girl. If she's his girlfriend you're really asking for it. More than a few clueless white knights end up dead every year from doing just that. Even cops tread very carefully around this territory. Rather than take chances, police regularly open fire on angry men during domestic disputes, making them the most deadly calls of all. In fact, the only way to increase safety for all involved in bars would be to ban women altogether, but that's never going to happen, so the next best thing is a light touch and judicious discretion.

A light touch, however, is the opposite of what the feminists are calling for. Instead, they want intervention and confrontation as policy. I can't see many bar owners signing on with this, nor would I expect bouncers to be happy about the idea. It's just too much to ask.

Instead, there's a much simpler, safer solution: cut off visibly intoxicated people – male or female – and call them a cab. If they refuse to leave, have the bouncer remove them. Drunk females are as much of a liability as drunk males, apparently, so why would anyone want one in his bar?

Violent UCSB Feminist Professor Victim of “Trap”

W.F. Price · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Poor Mireille Miller-Young, set up and trapped by cunning teenage pro-lifers, is just a hapless tool who was “triggered” into committing crimes. After all, who could expect an adult with a postsecondary education to behave in a rational manner around a provocative teen?

> You want a recipe for confrontation?
>
> Take a bunch of graphic photos of aborted fetuses onto a University of California campus — or maybe any college campus — and watch the fireworks.
> Emotions can run high when liberal college students debate the morality of abortion with religious evangelical opponents. Especially when the parties are standing next to grotesque, bloody photographs of human remains.
>
> Bringing those posters onto college campuses is a deliberate act of provocation on the part of youthful anti-abortion ministries such as Survivors of the Abortion Holocaust. (Your mother got pregnant after the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision that legalized abortion, so you are a “survivor” — get it?)
>
> But none of that can excuse the actions of a UC Santa Barbara associate professor who, along with some of her students, appears to have walked off with a big, poster-sized photo of an aborted fetus in early March because, as she later told campus police, she felt “‘triggered’ in a negative way by the imagery.”
>
> (More on the concept of “triggering,” as it’s understood by UC Santa Barbara students here.)
>
> Mireille Miller-Young, who teaches in the UCSB Feminist Studies department, did not just do her students, and herself, a giant disfavor when she disregarded our great tradition of free speech in the very place you expect it to be respected most — a college campus.
>
> She gave Survivors of the Abortion Holocaust a publicity boon beyond their wildest dreams when she walked off with their poster, then scuffled a few minutes later with a 16-year-old abortion protester.
>
> The protester, Thrin Short, claimed she was scratched by Miller-Young during their elevator skirmish, which was caught (badly, and with explicit language) on videotape.
>
> On March 21, the Santa Barbara Independent, which has been on the story from the beginning, reported that the Santa Barbara County district attorney’s office charged Miller-Young with misdemeanor counts of theft, battery and vandalism. She is to be arraigned on Friday.
> You are a sucker, Prof. Miller-Young.
>
> And you’ve got to be incredibly insulated not to grasp that any act of aggression, however minor, against an anti-abortion protester is going to be blown into a national story by the anti-abortion political-industrial complex and its media partners.

I’ve been annoyed a number of times on college campuses. My sex, my race, my religion and my nationality have been flat-out insulted in the classroom on more occasions than I can count, and often in classes where they weren’t even relevant. I was expected to put up with it anyway. If I hadn’t, I would have been tossed out of the classroom. But trashing white males is not considered a “recipe for confrontation,” because that’s expected on college campuses. In fact, that’s about what a feminist gender studies professor’s job consists of.

This is why there’s some national interest in the Miller-Young case. It isn’t because of some vast, right-wing media conspiracy; it’s because it so perfectly exposes the hypocrisy of politicized academics. Robin Abcarian, who wrote the above piece, is also an example. She exposes just how biased and off-base opinion writers for mainstream media outlets tend to be. The willful blindness of these people is profound.

I don’t like gruesome pictures much — I’m kind of squeamish that way. But then again, they depict reality. Maybe a reality people should be made aware of, just as the Rwanda genocide was brought to life with pictures of fields and rivers of corpses. Does anyone call those pictures “triggering” or “inappropriate?” No, because we Americans weren’t involved in it, and have no guilt on our consciences. The reason feminists want to suppress pictures of dead fetuses is because they don’t want people – or themselves – to ponder something distasteful for which they hold a good deal of responsibility.

That’s all there is to the professor’s assault. It was a crime committed in the name of suppressing truth, and nothing more. I can guarantee that a gruesome picture of a bludgeoned woman with a caption decrying domestic violence would have been left unmolested, and more likely promoted by the same professor. Mireille Miller-young was no victim of a trap; she’s exactly why the 1st Amendment exists.

Hanna Rosin Chimes in on Helicopter Parenting

W.F. Price · 3 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've come to have a grudging respect for Hanna Rosin, because despite the fact that she so often comes to the wrong conclusion about things and has such a difficult time seeing the root cause of problems, at least she's bright enough to see where things have gone wrong. In an article for the Atlantic, she examines the "helicopter parent" phenomenon, and points out that it might not be the best way to raise kids.

> It's still morning, but someone has already started a fire in the tin drum in the corner, perhaps because it's late fall and wet-cold, or more likely because the kids here love to start fires. Three boys lounge in the only unbroken chairs around it; they are the oldest ones here, so no one complains. One of them turns on the radio—Shaggy is playing (Honey came in and she caught me red-handed, creeping with the girl next door)—as the others feel in their pockets to make sure the candy bars and soda cans are still there. Nearby, a couple of boys are doing mad flips on a stack of filthy mattresses, which makes a fine trampoline. At the other end of the playground, a dozen or so of the younger kids dart in and out of large structures made up of wooden pallets stacked on top of one another. Occasionally a group knocks down a few pallets—just for the fun of it, or to build some new kind of slide or fort or unnamed structure. Come tomorrow and the Land might have a whole new topography.
>
> Other than some walls lit up with graffiti, there are no bright colors, or anything else that belongs to the usual playground landscape: no shiny metal slide topped by a red steering wheel or a tic-tac-toe board; no yellow seesaw with a central ballast to make sure no one falls off; no rubber bucket swing for babies. There is, however, a frayed rope swing that carries you over the creek and deposits you on the other side, if you can make it that far (otherwise it deposits you in the creek). The actual children's toys (a tiny stuffed elephant, a soiled Winnie the Pooh) are ignored, one facedown in the mud, the other sitting behind a green plastic chair. On this day, the kids seem excited by a walker that was donated by one of the elderly neighbors and is repurposed, at different moments, as a scooter, a jail cell, and a gymnastics bar.
>
> The Land is an "adventure playground," although that term is maybe a little too reminiscent of theme parks to capture the vibe. In the U.K., such playgrounds arose and became popular in the 1940s, as a result of the efforts of Lady Marjory Allen of Hurtwood, a landscape architect and children's advocate. Allen was disappointed by what she described in a documentary as "asphalt square" playgrounds with "a few pieces of mechanical equipment." She wanted to design playgrounds with loose parts that kids could move around and manipulate, to create their own makeshift structures. But more important, she wanted to encourage a "free and permissive atmosphere" with as little adult supervision as possible. The idea was that kids should face what to them seem like "really dangerous risks" and then conquer them alone. That, she said, is what builds self-confidence and courage.

Isn't it telling that overeducated Hanna has to learn about how children used to play from "Lady Marjory Allen of Hurtwood, a landscape architect and children's advocate?" When many of us were growing up, this kind of environment was the norm (although typically with less garbage). Free from supervision, we kids actually shaped our own environments, digging little tunnels, making rope swings and building bike jumps. Adults simply left us alone for much of the day. Presumably, they had more important matters to attend to.

Only the children of the budding new elite had the "privilege" of living in highly-controlled environments brimming with "enrichment" activities. The rest of us were left to ourselves to play and get around town. By the age of twelve I could, among other things, get all around the city on a bicycle or by public transportation, avoid being mugged, protect my property, get my own books from the library, buy food at the store and get myself to and from sports practice alone. It all sounds like such simple basic stuff, but many would be surprised by how few of today's children can pull it off.

Because I attended a private school on scholarship, I have a little perspective on this. Helicopter parenting had already begun by the early 80s, but it first started to become a popular trend in the upper middle class. Few of my classmates could get around as I did, but it was no problem for most of my neighbors. I had friends who started working at the age of 12 while others were in playgrounds and clubhouses in fancy gated communities or private golf and tennis clubs. As the boomers grew wealthier, they invested more time in their children and put more effort into controlling their environment, mimicking the upwardly mobile.

As society grew increasingly stratified, people instinctively sought to separate their children from "others," often for rational reasons. By the late 80s some urban neighborhoods were so dangerous that it would have been foolish not to do so. But rather than let up when they had removed their children from these environments, people doubled down. The real pressure behind this was the steep decline in social capital that accompanied the New Left's rise to power after 1968. Trust was evaporating; communities were falling apart. Letting one's children get out and about in an unknown world full of potentially hostile strangers came to be seen as neglectful and dangerous.

Rosin touches on this, but gives it short shrift when it really deserves to be the main point of the piece:

> The gap between what people fear (abduction by a stranger) and what's actually happening (family turmoil and custody battles) is revealing. What has changed since the 1970s is the nature of the American family, and the broader sense of community. For a variety of reasons—divorce, more single-parent families, more mothers working—both families and neighborhoods have lost some of their cohesion. It is perhaps natural that trust in general has eroded, and that parents have sought to control more closely what they can—most of all, their children.
>
> As we parents began to see public spaces—playgrounds, streets, public ball fields, the distance between school and home—as dangerous, other, smaller daily decisions fell into place. Ask any of my parenting peers to chronicle a typical week in their child's life and they will likely mention school, homework, after-school classes, organized playdates, sports teams coached by a fellow parent, and very little free, unsupervised time. Failure to supervise has become, in fact, synonymous with failure to parent. The result is a "continuous and ultimately dramatic decline in children's opportunities to play and explore in their own chosen ways," writes Peter Gray, a psychologist at Boston College and the author of Free to Learn. No more pickup games, idle walks home from school, or cops and robbers in the garage all afternoon. The child culture from my Queens days, with its own traditions and codas, its particular pleasures and distresses, is virtually extinct.

This is Hanna Rosin's – and most contemporary social commentators' – problem. They strain at gnats while swallowing camels. One can't address the issue of the physical and social isolation of children without tackling the main problem: the atomization of American society. When community is destroyed – even outlawed as it was with forced busing – people hunker down. They hide their kids and avoid neighbors.

This problem will not go away as long as the New Left holds the reins of American culture. To give children a chance at the kind of freedom to interact with the world those of us born before 1980 had, parents must flee the urban centers. I'd recommend going somewhere that is neither diverse nor progressive. If you're raising kids, stick with your community, whatever that may be. If not, feel free to enjoy the progressive lifestyle, which can be a great environment for childless adults, but think twice before you inflict it on kids.

No amount of playground engineering, criticism in magazines or government spending is going to encourage parents to go against their instincts and turn their children over to strangers. The only solution to this problem is for the social engineers to find another line of work and let nature take its course. Because that will not happen until the state runs out of funds for these jobs, our only good option as parents now is to avoid them to the extent we can. Fortunately, that is currently also the cheaper option.

In the meanwhile, I welcome you to join me in a cultural secession from progressive America.

A Humble Suggestion for Conservative Opponents of Same Sex Marriage

W.F. Price · 4 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As Brendan Eich is being dragged over the glowing coals of gay fury, some have pointed to his forced resignation from Mozilla as an example of gay McCarthyism, others of the intolerance of the left in general, and on the other side some are celebrating an enemy getting what they think he had coming. Because the latter sentiment is the most disgusting, I'm inclined to be more sympathetic to Eich than his haters. However, I think he, and all other conservative opponents of gay marriage, are going about achieving their goals in entirely the wrong way.

When it comes to the definition of marriage, I agree with the conservatives. Gay marriage is not marriage as I think of the institution. Marriage is the socially recognized union of a man and woman for the purposes of procreation and childrearing. Some gays would counter and say "if that's the case, then why should infertile couples or older people get married?" I'd respond by saying that unless their genuine intent is family formation (i.e. they hold out some hope that they can have a child), they shouldn't. Marriage without the potential for new life is not marriage at all. It may be good for people who love each other to partner and spend their lives together even if children aren't in the cards, but the term marriage should be reserved for the relationship that ensures humanity's survival. We've already paid a high price by watering it down to include all sorts of other things, and adding yet another certainly doesn't help matters.

But that's just my opinion. Perhaps it is an opinion shared by most of the world, but apparently it is in the minority in fashionable American circles.

So, the problem we have run up against is one of differing interpretations. To me, marriage is about procreation and childrearing. To others, it is about what they consider love (keep in mind that the incidence of divorce skyrocketed after "love" marriages became the norm), and for yet others it is about tax status and government survivor benefits. Therefore, it has come to be seen as a basic human right, which is a direct and inevitable result of government meddling in the institution.

However, what Eich and other conservatives want is more government involvement. They want the state to define marriage according to their view, even though this is exactly what created the problem in the first place. This is the fundamental flaw in their argument, and why they cannot win in a liberal democracy. Let's face it: the US is a pluralistic society. For better or for worse, there is no more dominant national culture or identity. Therefore, attempts to impose one will always meet resistance or fail.

Instead of bashing their heads against a wall in an effort to persuade everyone else to see things their way, conservatives must accept the inevitable and make allowances for pluralism. Doing this requires removing the ability of the state to define marriage. No more official gay marriage; no more official straight marriage. No official polygamy or divorce, either. It's an elegant and easy solution. Allow people to enter into conjugal civil contracts enforceable by civil courts, and remove the word "marriage" from the lawbooks. People can call themselves married, or whatever they please. I don't have to agree with your version of marriage; you don't have to agree with mine.

This is how marriage is handled in much of the world, including Israel and Islamic states, which due to circumstance must make allowances for pluralism (Islam is far more pluralistic than most people realize). It is the historical norm in most of the world, and it has worked for thousands of years. Conservatives who want to preserve marriage should cut their losses and start keeping what they still can. Their attempts to universalize "Judeo-Christian" (kind of a fabrication — Jewish and Christian marriage are not the same) marriage will only backfire in justifying greater state power over the definition of marriage. Twenty years ago, before gay marriage was popularized by a relentless media campaign, it would have been a lot easier to accomplish this, but the conservatives, in their pride, overreached, leaving them exactly where they find themselves today.

This isn't to say that they deserve to be kicked out of their jobs for holding their views, but rather that they should have seen this coming around the time Tom Hanks starred in Philadelphia. On the other side of the divide, I'd warn gays that they should think twice about indulging their vengeance fantasies. When you're a member of a small minority, it isn't a good idea to lord it over and humiliate those who vastly outnumber you, because it might cause trouble later. However, perhaps Hans Hermann-Hoppe was on to something when he claimed that homosexuals tend to be present-oriented. Maybe, because most have no children, the future is of little concern, and they really don't care about the eventual consequences of their actions. If that's the case, then perhaps attacking Christians without any regard for the potential consequences is perfectly in character.

Divorce Corp: A License to Steal

W.F. Price · 5 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

After reading a few reviews, I watched Divorce Corp, a movie released earlier this year that exposes the inner workings of family law courts, which have become the most rapacious of all public institutions and spawned a particularly vile class of professionals who feed off of broken families like packs of hyenas. Not long into the film, I was surprised and a little amused to see that I personally know one of the people interviewed for the film, and not through fathers' rights or MRM circles. In fact, this person (who will remain unnamed) probably has no idea The Spearhead exists. It seems that family law touches multitudes, or else it really is a pretty small world out there.

Aside from seeing a former acquaintance, not much in the movie came as a surprise to me, although it suggests that the divorce industry may be even more lucrative than I had thought. This is because of the power vested in the court to seize properties and assets and distribute them to lawyers and wives. People with substantial amounts of money and property are robbed blind during the process, especially when children are involved. Sometimes, wives miscalculate and end up with less after divorce than they would have without litigation, because their attorneys made off with all the gold. I never had to go through this part of the divorce process, not having had any property worth fighting over at the time, so even I can be a little shocked when I see the figures.

However, the real story is the corruption in the courts themselves. Lawyers and judges collude in the family law racket, protecting each other and the cash cow it represents. They fund each other's campaigns, give each other private work and purchase gifts for each other. Cronyism is the rule. Worst of all, they join ranks whenever challenged by those from outside the system. In a particularly egregious case, a man was sentenced to five years for criticizing a judge online. None of the local attorneys wanted to take the guy's case because the "victim" was a judge they might see in court. Some of the stories about the vindictive and unethical behavior of judges are very disconcerting.

Unfortunately, for those of us familiar with divorce, this movie doesn't have too much to offer. I'd still recommend watching it, but I've already covered pretty much everything it addresses here on The Spearhead. But for people who are unaware, it's a good educational film. I think it should be mandatory content for high school kids when they approach their 18th birthday and near the legal marriage age, and for anyone considering marriage. As a pure critique, it doesn't get into practical measures to mitigate risk, which do exist and are not all that well-known, probably because nobody in this game has a financial interest in telling people how to keep their money (although I don't see why there shouldn't be a market for that kind of material). Pretty much all the film does along those lines is compare the American to the Scandinavian family law regime. In Scandinavia, divorce is both easy and cheap, as it would be in my own "no consequence divorce" proposal.

One thing I took away from the film is that judges and lawyers appear to be getting a bit nervous and defensive about this issue. If they weren't, they wouldn't be throwing people in prison for speaking out about it. They should be nervous. You can't make an industry out of ruining people and expect them to put up with it forever. Eventually, family courts are going to have to face the music and reform, and whether that happens the easy way or the hard way is up to those in the business.

Comment of the Week: How Men Lost the Political Gender War

W.F. Price · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Shlomo goes into some detail explaining why men's issues have failed to gain traction:

Over 30 years ago, women's groups in Massachusetts held hearings to change divorce laws. Per usual, they were active, informed, and organized.

Men's groups, on the other hand, were blase about the whole thing. They felt no need to attract new members (and money!), showed no interest in getting covered in mass media. Some group leaders would begin meetings by handing out coupons to get free yogurt samples, like he was a Tammany Hall ward boss doling out patronage. Something to see. Like a clown premiering his act as the Titanic sank.

Nearly every suggestion I made to his and similar groups was scoffed at or ignored.

The bills women's groups presented were lobbied for and got passed. The ladies knew how to work the system. They knew how to get covered in media and show their numbers.

Soon the state was granting funds to women's groups, allowing for full-time paid staff. Ergo, a woman seeking divorce could now get state-funded "free" legal advice from battered women's shelters, etc.

Guys, because they saw no need to unite and fight, found that joining a men's group helped them not a jot. They still were expected to hire their own lawyer. The father's groups felt no need to apply for grants, seek out celeb fathers who'd been shafted, contact the Playboy Foundation, etc. They acted like highschool kids visiting state capitols for mock senate sessions. Like Boy Scouts fighting the Wehrmacht.

When I attended some of their meetings, the men's group's leader would pitch benefits to newbies (who usually came with boxes documenting their "case"), promising help. Current members joked about it, calling the process "fleecing the sheep." They knew that once newbs paid dues, they'd learn the group could do relatively little. They still hve to pay $10K retainers to lawyers who, in most cases, did little for them.

And yes: usually one of the group's leaders was a lawyer who did quite well off the pain of members.

Think what could have been done if the groups had been more active, working-the-media! They could have convinced men to pay $500 to join and thus avoid $10-50K lawyer bills…because the laws themselves would have been changed.

They could have reached out to college guys, too: not only informing them, but harnessing their activism like feminists did women to promote abortions rights, etc.

But no. The men's groups chose not to deal with "men's issues," thinking fathers were not demonized AS males. That is, the groups wouldn't join forces with other kinds of men's groups.

Plus most so-called leaders of groups eschewed media. The few times they GOT media coverage, some lame-looking Chester would wheeze on and on about arcane legal statutes putting audiences to sleep. On the same show a hot-looking feminist lawyer would fire off sound-bites about "abusive males" and the "needs of children" and so on.

There was no contest. The MRAs (who lived almost entirely in their left, linear brains) got nuked by right-brained feminists masterfully applying the arts of emotional suasion.

Thirty years later and hardly anyone knows men's groups in the state, much less one related to fathers' rights. On the other hand, scores of women's groups geet millions in funding (fighting DV, SH, etc.) and are well known by all reporters.

It's no mystery why men keep losing: they keep refusing to fight. And when they belatedly due, they use Bronze Age weapons in an Internet Era.

Most men would rather lose their kids than stop rush-hour traffic with a protest that garners media attention. They are like clueless businesses that think products sell themselves. They think making a great product will get them out of the warehouse. The think being “right” is enough.

On the other hand, women’s groups mastered marketing and PR and advertising and promotion. They sell the sizzle, not the steak.

So it continues to amaze me when guys complain that things are getting worse. Of COURSE they are! What do fathers think happens when bullies are not opposed? What do they think happens when bullies know that can get rich robbing victims who never fight back?

Men know war. Real war. Feminists, on the other hand, don’t. They’ve won most gender battles by default, the MRM never showing up. The irony is, the first time men showed up things would start to change. By third battles, feminsts would be retreating. Yet men ever show up. A man will throw himself on a grenade to save his buddies, but will let his own flesh and blood be stolen by the state…fearing he might be publicly called names by some woman somewhere.

It’s angering to watch. And tragic.

It’s been almost 50 years now, this iteration of “women’s rights.” For the most part, men have yet to begin fighting back. They mistake talking for taking concrete action.

It’s like Western men are still compiling white-papers to present to Adolf, urging him to not be so mean.

Why there is still no NRA-class men’s rights organization remains a mystery. A very malignant, misandric, culture-destroying mystery.

Teams vs. Herds

W.F. Price · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Shlomo's comment prompted me to think about why men aren't making much headway in promoting their political interests. The obvious answer is that men compete with each other and tear each other down, but then again women do the same. However, men and women compete in a different manner. Women compete as individuals. For example, girls who are friends quickly stop cooperating when both want the same thing, but they bond together as a big group in their collective interest. Men, on the other hand, are pretty good at bonding on an individual level – often selflessly – but they compete as small groups — teams in other words. This is the basis of warfare, economic competition, hunting (in paleolithic times) and many other activities. The ability to work as a team is hardwired in men. Nerds, jocks, criminals, police and even politicians do it.

The thing is, teams of men instinctively compete with other teams of men. Men have an aversion to joining one big group where everyone toes the line. They like to divvy up and compete. Herding men is very difficult. But it's easy for women. Trot out some authority figure and women will obey as a single group without open dissent. They walk, talk and act in unison.

In our democratic political system, herds are more effective at the ballot box. Voting rules out individual competition, so women can all happily vote in their own and their fellow women's interests (or what they perceive as such) without any conflict. We have, in essence, "herd rule."

So how do you fight it?

Instead of trying to herd men, why not work with men's strengths? Winning through sheer numbers will never work if we can't effectively herd men, so let's abandon that idea. Instead, we should be the cowboys rather than the cattle. Teamwork is a force-multiplier. By working intelligently and purposefully, a dozen men can be more effective than a thousand-strong herd.

So I propose a new form of organization for MRAs. Develop local political teams, and give men roles. A few spokesmen running blogs is really pretty useless if people can't cooperate on the ground. I may be able to educate people and spread the message, but what can I do about some problem judge in Sacramento? Not much besides expose him online, and although that might bother him, there's little chance I could influence the vote there without having someone in local media on my side.

If a few bright, energetic men in Sacramento got together and thought of ways to remove him from the bench, that judge might be in trouble. These few men could even work to replace him with someone who supports fathers' rights. The herd that casts the votes wouldn't even have to know. They wouldn't be paying attention in any event.

So, instead of focusing on building a few herd-oriented organizations to "reach out to men" or whatever, what I and others who are putting work into changing the current state of affairs ought to be doing is offering some means for facilitating team formation. We should channel our efforts toward enabling men to work on solutions and concrete achievements. One way to do this is to encourage meetups, like the one I had in San Francisco. Let guys get to know each other and enjoy each other's company, and give them a basic action plan. Start by practicing on easy targets (e.g. get some writeup in the local paper), and move onto bigger game as you get better at it. Sounds like fun to me.

I'm going to keep putting some work into this concept, but I could use some help from those who like to organize and lead projects (not my strong suit). Perhaps someone with military experience would have some valuable experience in that regard. I know there's interest out there, so I'll keep at it until we see some results.

Gay Orthodoxy v. Tradition and Religion

Featured Guest · 7 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dogma v. Individual Authority and Personal Choice: A Libertarian Compromise on the Issues

by John Savage

The conflict between Gay Orthodoxy, Tradition and Civil Rights as can be seen in the Eich/Mozilla Affair can be resolved with a conversion of the right of Gay Marriage to one of the right to Civil Unions, with all of the same rights and privileges contained therein.

On the surface of things this compromise seems to have the same desirability as the doctrine of "separate, but equal." In the case of minority rights, "separate, but equal" leads to continued discrimination and a lack of social cohesion. But in the case of Gay Civil Unions, the reverse is true.

The insistence on the right to Gay Marriage has led to a breakdown in the cohesion of our society. Those who do not conform to the orthodoxy of Gay Political Dogma are the ones that are discriminated against and face the possibility of real political persecution and legal prosecution. This flies in the face of First Amendment Rights of the freedom of religion, the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press. This has led to a situation akin to a tyranny of a minority over the majority. This is a distinctly un-American development.

This situation is untenable and creates a divergent plurality rather than a convergent one and threatens to disrupt, if not destroy, the cohesion of American society and culture… or worse. This is not the course of "e pluribus unum."

The compromise of Civil Unions is the optimal legal solution, though perhaps not the ideal one from any particular and rigid perspective. It gives gays the right to form civil unions and share all of the same rights and privileges as married heterosexual couples, but preserves the First Amendment Rights to freedom of speech and freedom of religion, etc., for ALL.

It respects the civil rights of individuals even while we disagree with them. It allows for the possibility of agreeing to disagree and yet maintains social cohesion. It maintains individual liberty, the spirit of the U.S. Constitution and the concepts that inform Classical Liberalism. It defuses dogma and short-circuits the temptation to persecute others with whom we disagree. Additionally, it puts an end to legal prosecution of those who by tradition, religion and/or personal belief wish to define their union in a way that they choose, be that "marriage" or "civil union" by Justice of the Peace.

Further and perhaps more importantly, "civil unions" preserve the integrity of the individual. No longer does the individual have to make one set of claims publicly while maintaining another set of claims privately. The individual will be allowed to stay true to him- or her- self. A person will be allowed to keep a job or a business while maintaining this integrity even if it flies in the face of company policy or social convention. This leads to increased self-esteem, mental health, self-determination, the integrity of American society and its conception of individual liberty.

It is time we put an end to this civil war that we call activism for tolerance. One cannot demand respect and expect to gain it. Respect is a mutuality, it is something that is earned, not taken. We respect the right of others to determine for themselves how to see society and reality in general… and in turn they respect us. We cannot force ourselves upon one another.

This is an honorable compromise regarding this most divisive issue of our day and is in line with the Libertarian moment that seems to be increasing in magnitude and scope in our exceptional nation.

Using the Fireteam as the Model for Political Activism

W.F. Price · 7 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

To get things done at a local level, we start with small, tactically agile teams that resemble the smallest military unit: the fireteam. The infantry of the US Marine Corps and Army is built around the fireteam, which is comprised of four soldiers. Each soldier in the team has a role, including rifleman, grenadier, automatic rifleman and either team leader or assistant automatic rifleman depending on whether it's the Army or Marine Corps.

Fireteams were developed in response to trench warfare in WWI. Massed tactics, which had been the norm for centuries, no longer worked in the age of the machine gun, so armies began to experiment with small teams that could attack in a more deliberate manner. The Germans were the first to implement a new form of assault, called "infiltration tactics" at the time. Special units of "stormtroops" were created for the purpose (these were the original storm troopers), and Germany began to apply the tactics on the eastern front. They proved successful, and were next used in Operation Michael, the final German offensive of the war.

Operation Michael was initially successful, breaking the stalemate of trench warfare for the first time in years, but as American troops arrived to reinforce the Allies and the flu pandemic broke out, the offensive stalled, and the Allies eventually gained the upper hand due to superior manpower and logistical support. However, despite ultimately failing to win the war, the stormtroops revolutionized infantry warfare, and their tactics were adopted by modern armies, evolving into the contemporary fireteam.

Perhaps the most important advantage of infiltration tactics was that it allowed well-trained, committed units to avoid needless chaos and slaughter by deliberately bypassing direct combat and attacking more important objectives in the rear. Another advantage, cited by former senator Jim Webb in a 1972 paper, is that a fireteam is much more cohesive, maneuverable and flexible than a "12-man mob":

> At the outset of World War II, the Marine rifle squad was composed of 12 men, with no particular internal organization. This setup literally came under fire early in that war, as it proved immensely difficult for a squad leader to maintain control over as many as 11 men at one time. Therefore, after a number of attempts to rectify the situation, our present fire team organization was instituted in 1944. It has a number of advantages over the former system, and has been widely heralded due to its "triangular concept" which offers maximum control, maneuverability, and firepower. Indeed, when compared to the "12-man mob" its advantages in these areas are striking:
>
> *Control. This was perhaps the greatest advantage of the new system as the squad leader had three subordinate leaders in his span of control instead of 11 men. This produced more effective supervision.
>
> *Maneuverability. With the creation of a four-man fire team, a smaller tactical unit capable of independent maneuver evolved. This served to eliminate the spur of the moment "you take Smith and Jones and go over there" approach and ostensibly brought into existence a bonafide maneuver element below the squad level.
>
> *Firepower. The fire team was created to gain maximum employment of the Browning Automatic Rifle (BAR). In fact, the whole fire team concept was built around the BAR, which provided the nucleus of the team's firepower. Fire team formations were designed to protect the automatic rifleman, and one rifleman was assigned a secondary mission of aiding the automatic rifleman in finding targets and reloa[d]ing magazines.

All of the above are germane to our efforts at activism, because although we do not face artillery and machine gun fire, engaging an entrenched system such as exists in our courts and government is akin to rushing headlong into no-man's land. As our political system has grown increasingly complex and refined, mere mobs can no longer achieve important objectives, just as massed infantry could not advance in the face of accurate automatic weaponry in WWI. Instead, we have to infiltrate and focus our firepower on high-value targets while doing our best to avoid engaging in the kind of pointless activism that will simply bog us down.

To accomplish this, I propose a political “fireteam” organized along the lines of the USMC fireteam. We need small groups of 2-5 men – ideally four – working to accomplish specific goals. Each man should have a defined task, and one should take on the role of tactical leader.

Here is the composition of the activist team I propose:

1. Administrator: As organizer and tactical decisionmaker, he serves as leader.

2. Investigator: Does research, detective work and security for the team.

3. Communicator: Produces written content, talks to people on the phone, performs outreach and creates media.

4. Technician: Handles technical matters, such as internet, audio-video, publishing, photography, etc.

On an even lower level, I’d pair off the Admin and Investigator and the Communicator and Technician into two-man teams.

The beauty of this concept is that it is simple and could create quite an effect with minimal time and effort. If one man keeps track of schedules, one does research, one makes content and another handles the technology, a few hours of work from each every week could make a significant impact. It would be far more effective than one man putting in the same hours, and infinitely more than a mob showing up on some streetcorner, making some noise, and then leaving.

Additionally, it could be an enjoyable project. The team could get together once every week or two to discuss and decide things, then unwind with a beer. Another advantage would be that leadership pressure would be low. If the “leader” is simply the guy who has to organize efforts and keep track of who’s doing what, it will not be cause for rivalry. Basically, everyone is doing his own job, and the spirit is one of cooperation rather than hierarchy and dominance. In fact, it doesn’t even really matter who the leader is, because anyone could take on the role if needed and capable. This is the ideal male work environment.

While I’m not sure how easy it will be to create groups of four men, it will be a lot easier than coordinating national conferences or trying to get people at loosely organized public meetings to do anything effective. In major metropolitan areas, one should be able to find the manpower without any trouble. The closer the members are geographically, the better, but problems of distance can be overcome with technology and people with stronger commitment than average.

Talent may be an issue, but one relatively talented member in a team of four should suffice so long as the others are capable of putting in work. This is one of the greatest strengths of teams: they can free up the hardest hitter so that he doesn’t have to waste time on other tasks, thereby making sure his firepower is not diluted, but rather enhanced.

Yale to Thin Young Woman: Fatten Up or Leave

W.F. Price · 9 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The feminist crusade against thin resulted in a petite Yale student of Chinese descent being ordered to eat more and fatten up or be forced to take medical leave from the Ivy League school. Frances Chan, all of 5'2″ and 92lbs., was deemed unhealthy due to her small size:

> A Yale University student became a junk-food junkie because her Ivy League school thought she was too thin and demanded she gain weight or take a medical leave from the university, she says.
>
> Frances Chan, 20, says she felt forced to eat large amounts of food because school officials believed she had an eating disorder and needed to gain weight.
>
> The young woman, originally from Plainsboro, N.J., wrote a provocative article in the Huffington Post about her struggle with her weight.
> "They won't look past the number on the scale, to see the person right in front of them," Chan wrote.
>
> Yale can't comment on individual students' cases because of federal government regulations, but the "health and welfare of all of our students is our primary concern," according to a statement from Tim Conroy, the New Haven, Conn., school's press secretary.
>
> California nutritionist Lisa Drayer told ABC News, "Eating disorders are common among individuals who are high achievers. We see a lot of these types of students at Ivy League schools."
>
> Standing 5-foot-2 and weighing 92 pounds, Chan is small, though she says she's healthy and does not have an eating disorder.
> But after a medical checkup in September, she says, university officials threatened to put her on medical leave if she didn't agree to weekly mandatory weigh-ins and medical appointments because they told her that her weight was too low.

While 92 pounds is pretty tiny, it isn't unheard of for healthy women of Ms. Chan's height. Light individuals are also more common in East Asian populations. In Vietnam, for example, she would be small, but not unusually so. At 5'2″, a young woman who weighs 92 lbs. is not necessarily unhealthy, and in fact is probably healthier than one who weighs 140 lbs. However, schools rely on the BMI scale to determine proper body weight, which is flawed due to its height bias.

Ms. Chan's BMI comes out to 16.8, which is considered "underweight." A BMI of 18.5-25 is considered ideal.

The problem with BMI is that it does not take into account that humans are three rather than two-dimensional. It squares height when it should be cubed. This is why you get silly results that would put a man who is 6'4″ and 206 lbs. in the overweight category, while he would still be considered "normal" at only 153 lbs., which is below the average weight for American women, who average only 5'4″ tall. At the other, lower end of the height spectrum, fatter individuals have lower BMIs than their body shapes would suggest.

So it seems that school doctors were relying on a BMI scale, and trying to push her up to 18.5+, which would come out to a gain of about ten pounds, or over 10% of her bodyweight, which is quite significant.

Now I'm not a fan of schools telling adults who are paying good money for an education what to do with their bodies, but it seems to me that fatness is a bigger problem than malnutrition in this country, so if the school is forcing this young woman to eat more to achieve a "normal" weight, I wonder why Yale isn't threatening to kick out fat girls who refuse to drop some pounds? Would an Ivy League school dare tell a girl who isn't morbidly obese to the point of immobility to lose weight? Somehow, I doubt it. I can imagine the screeching that would emanate from the women's studies department if anyone was so presumptuous as to do so. Fatness is inviolate; it is sacred and holy. Thinness is always suspect, and must be thoroughly investigated when identified, and if necessary "cured."

Doctors with scales, calipers and clipboards stand ready to fix the poor, thin young women and protect them from themselves.

The idea behind this is that the patriarchy is forcing women to try to be thin, when everyone (yes, everyone!) knows that women are healthier and more beautiful when they can't squeeze their asses into pants that would have fallen off their grandmothers' hips.

Kirsten Dunst Offers Reasonable Opinions on Marriage, Sex Roles, is Immediately Attacked

W.F. Price · 10 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Miley Cyrus (mentally disturbed/obscene), Beyoncé (bitchy/materialistic) and Lorde (weird/unattractive) have taken up the feminist banner, and are much celebrated for doing so. Kirsten Dunst, on the other hand, who comes off as genuinely pleasant, attractive in a girl-next-door kind of way and inoffensive, says that femininity is undervalued, and being a wife and mother in the traditional sense isn't all bad. She also says relationships work best when men can be men and women women. Is this such a terrible, awful thing to say? Something that should immediately be shouted down? Apparently so, despite the fact that people seem to instinctively agree with her, if all of history and global culture up to now is any indication of human norms.

Our culture has gone so far off the deep end that I don't think it's worth taking it seriously anymore. America, the global joke, where a politician can't promote anything but androgynous "gender equality" and a CEO can't even say marriage is between a man and a woman. It's getting close to time to call it quits on this political experiment. Frankly, if you were born in the US and don't look at our flag with some combination of pity, sadness and contempt, there's something wrong with you at this point. I feel bad for having to put it in those terms, but it's true.

Small Dogs: Companions on the Road to Extinction

W.F. Price · 11 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As birth rates among young women plummet, small dog ownership has risen rapidly in America's urban centers.

> America's next generation of youngsters should be called "Generation Rex."
>
> If you're wondering why playgrounds around the city are so quiet and dog runs are packed, a new report has an answer: More and more US women are forgoing motherhood and getting their maternal kicks by owning handbag-size canines.
>
> Data from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention show that a big drop in the number of babies born to women ages 15 to 29 corresponds with a huge increase in the number of tiny pooches owned by young US women, reports the business-news site Quartz.
>
> Dog-crazy New York ladies told The Post that they aren't surprised by the findings — and that they happily gave up diaper changes, temper tantrums and college funds for the easy affection of their doggy "child."
>
> [...]
>
> The federal data behind the report show that over the past seven years, the number of live births per 1,000 women between ages 15 and 29 in America has plunged 9 percent.
>
> At the same time, research by the American Pet Products Association shows the number of small dogs — under 25 pounds — in the United States has skyrocketed, from 34. 1 million in 2008 to 40.8 million in 2012.

I can confirm that there are more dogs than children at urban parks. Every afternoon and weekend, people congregate with their dogs at a park down the street from me. There is a playground on one side of the park, and a dog area on the other. The dogs outnumber the children roughly four to one, and maybe more. I used to take my kids to the park on a regular basis, and my then two-year-old daughter was terrified of the dogs that careless, irresponsible owners allowed to run free. On a couple of occasions, I had some words with people about that, but their attitude was along the lines of "if your daughter is scared of dogs, maybe you shouldn't take her to the park."

So, there is at least one good thing about the small dog trend: the little dogs are less of a danger and less frightening to small children. I should admit that I'm not much of a dog person. I developed an antipathy toward dogs as a small child living on the fringes of a ghetto neighborhood. Back in the early 1980s, people didn't think twice about keeping attack dogs, and many let their dogs run wild in the neighborhood. Some of those ghetto dogs were vicious beasts. I was convinced a rottweiler around the corner wanted to kill me, and I don't think I was wrong. Every time I rode my bike past its house the monster would hurl itself full force against a rickety fence in a fury.

But those dogs served a different purpose from these little lapdogs. As much as I hated them, I have to admit that they performed some utilitarian function; it's a lot harder to break into a house with a snarling rottweiler in its yard than one without.

Despite the fact that the small dogs are not as scary as the big ghetto dogs I knew as a child, both breeds say something unflattering about the neighborhood. In the past, the dogs suggested that there was a lot of crime in the 'hood; today, the dogs suggest that children are an inconvenience. There's no other conclusion to draw when one sees that dogs are dominant while children are few and outnumbered.

Do dogs really bring as much happiness to their female owners as children? Perhaps not, but if the women interviewed for the story are any indication, maybe they bring them enough happiness. The lapdog may be the most humane way to ease the white, urban SWPL's headlong rush into demographic oblivion, which is all but a done deal. Without children and grandchildren, legions of small dogs will be needed to see them through what would otherwise be a lonely life. Perhaps some day in the future, when they are all gone, the people occupying what is currently the United States can erect a statue in their memory: a statue of a woman with an iphone, a purse and a tiny dog by her side, walking blithely into the great unknown.

Funny How Progress Looks Like Proletarianization

W.F. Price · 14 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Many of the recent developments I've seen in American urban centers bring back memories for me — of late 90s China. Microhousing, AKA "apodments," have been going up all over Seattle, gypsy cabs are all the rage and people are renting out their bedrooms, in some cases to hookers:

> Hookers are using the controversial Airbnb home-sharing Web site to turn prime Manhattan apartments into temporary brothels, The Post has learned.
>
> One escort service is even saving a bundle by renting Airbnb apartments instead of hotel rooms for clients' quickies, says a 21-year-old call girl who works for the illicit business.
>
> "It's more discreet and much cheaper than The Waldorf," said the sex worker, who spoke on condition of anonymity.
>
> "Hotels have doormen and cameras. They ask questions. Apartments are usually buzz-in."
>
> The prostitute, a buxom brunette who charges up to $500 an hour, said her escort service generally rents an Airbnb apartment in the Financial District or Midtown West for up to a week at a time — then cycles numerous hookers through the place for trysts around-the-clock.

It's almost as though there's a case of collective amnesia about the problems associated with overcrowding and class stratification. Well, to be fair, people don't read much history in the "information age," so maybe they never learned in the first place.

From the 50s through the 00s, the US went through a remarkable period during which quality of life steadily improved, but that trend is clearly over. I wonder, in this new age of diminished standards, how well exotic ideologies like feminism and multiculturalism will hold up. Practically speaking, I think they'll be gutted, whether or not people continue to pay lip service to them. When getting by means leasing your guest room to hookers, living in a virtual chicken coop and paying for your car by giving rides to strangers, what does all that high-minded stuff really mean anyway?

Breastfeeding to Become Civil Right in Seattle

W.F. Price · 16 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In Seattle, the right to breastfeed in stores, restaurants and other businesses open to the public is to be enshrined in law, making it an offense to tell someone not to do so on the premises.

> A few years ago, Melissa Miller was shopping in an upscale Seattle kids' clothing store when her baby became hungry. So she sat in a chair at the back of the store to nurse him.
>
> Soon, a clerk asked her to move to a dressing room with a tone that was clear: The store wanted her hidden.
>
> "I just felt this was wrong and told her I was comfortable right where I was," Miller said. "And then I ignored her."
>
> A proposed Seattle law would make it easier for women to nurse in public, by making breastfeeding a protected civil right. It would make it illegal for a business to ask a nursing mom to stop, leave, move to a private area or cover up. Only businesses open to the public would be applicable, such as restaurants, stores, pools and libraries.

While breastfeeding is obviously an important human biological function, there are some places where it may not be appropriate. Libraries, for example, don't strike me as the kind of place women should choose to take their infants.

It's also ironic that this law is being passed in Seattle, where people hardly have any kids anyway, so maybe it's just another peripheral issue. But these Civil Rights laws do have the cumulative effect of reducing everyone's freedom. If I own a restaurant, I have that much less control over my business. Eventually, when enough of these laws exist, there's a strong disincentive to risk starting a business at all.

Ultimately everyone, including mothers of infant children, suffers from overregulation as fewer people are hired due to higher barriers on economic activity.

So I guess the question should be:

If someone asks you to feed the baby elsewhere, is it really worth suing them over it?

MySpacification of Facebook

W.F. Price · 16 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been spending some time in my local library, which is very vibrant, and it appears that 95% of computer use is dedicated to Facebook among the folks who, five years ago, were mainly on MySpace. I wonder whether social media follows trends along the lines of car and clothing brands, and if so, whether Facebook has all that much of a future.

Another important thing to consider is that social media is used mainly by women, and they are very fashion conscious. One of these days (probably already happened), Facebook will be "out" and something else will be "in." When that happens, will Facebook still have enough to offer to remain viable?

I doubt it.

Prediction: Google will eclipse Facebook in social media/networking despite being less trendy because it offers a more utilitarian platform that will keep people using it whether or not it's in style.

Once a Man, Always a Man

W.F. Price · 16 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Nothing exposes the fraud known as transsexualism quite like what happens – and always will happen – when a transsexual runs up against a real woman.

> A prominent advocate for transgender and women's rights in the tech world has been charged with raping her wife, The San Francisco Examiner has learned.
>
> Dana McCallum, a senior engineer at Twitter who speaks and writes about women's and transgender-rights and technology issues, was arrested Jan. 26 and booked into County Jail on suspicion of five felonies, according to the Sheriff's Department.
>
> McCallum, 31, who was born a male, openly identifies as a female and whose legal name is Dana Contreras, was charged Jan. 29 with five felonies, including three counts of spousal rape, one count of false imprisonment and one count of domestic violence, according to the District Attorney's Office. She has since pleaded not guilty.
>
> [...]
>
> "I'm just disgusted that, you know, this is going on," Runfola said. "Dana is an employee [at Twitter] and is about to come into a large amount of money. … This whole thing is about money."
>
> The couple had been separated, he said, but were still having sexual relations. McCallum served her wife with divorce papers the day before the incident, Runfola said.
>
> The incident in question, according to Runfola, happened in a small condo in the Mission when four teenagers were in the house.
>
> "No one heard 'rape' or fighting or anything," he said.
>
> There are no witnesses for the prosecution, except one teenager who allegedly heard "no" through a door, Runfola said regarding police files.
>
> According to McCallum's profile on the online publication Model View Culture, for which she wrote about transgender people and women in tech in January 2013, "Dana McCallum has been working in software engineering and engineering leadership since 2000. As an advocate for women in technology and the LGBT community, Dana helped create advocacy teams at Twitter and other companies, served as a delegate on women's issues in India, and speaks regularly at events focused on women and LGBT people in tech."
>
> A December story in Business Insider listed McCallum as one of the most important gay people in the tech world.
>
> "Dana McCallum, a senior engineer at Twitter, is one of the geniuses behind Twitter. As a transgender woman, McCallum has previously said that she finds Twitter a great place to work when it comes to being LGBT-friendly," the publication noted.

Since when did heterosexual males get to call themselves gay? If a straight man castrates himself and calls himself "Sally," he's both a woman and homosexual?

Maybe according to the latest fashion, but I'd like to see how a judge feels about that in a rape or divorce case. Dana McCallum can call himself a gay woman until he's blue in the face, but during this divorce and criminal prosecution he's going to be treated like a man.

Dana's actually in pretty big trouble, having been charged on five felony counts. This isn't your run of the mill accusation that so many of us divorced men have had to deal with, but real, criminal charges. The feminist activism, castration, LGBT awareness work, interfering with India's culture — all for naught.

A woman’s privilege is her birthright, and a man can’t earn it no matter how hard he tries.

“Hypergamy” Enters National Political Lexicon

W.F. Price · 17 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As far as I know, the word “hypergamy” was coined by F. Roger Devlin, who wrote the seminal works of the manosphere. Devlin’s work exposing feminism is a real tour de force, and he introduces a number of concepts that have done us great service over the last decade.

You can find a good list of his essays here.

However, many of these concepts have remained unknown outside our online community. Perhaps the most important is hypergamy, which Devlin defines this way:

> Men have a tendency to seek sexual variety, but women have simple tastes in the manner of Oscar Wilde: They are always satisfied with the best.

Phyllis Schlafly, perhaps the original anti-feminist of the second wave era, recently argued that the (mythical) “pay gap” would promote marriage if it actually existed, citing women’s hypergamous instincts:

> Another fact is the influence of hypergamy, which means that women typically choose a mate (husband or boyfriend) who earns more than she does. Men don’t have the same preference for a higher-earning mate.
>
> While women prefer to HAVE a higher-earning partner, men generally prefer to BE the higher-earning partner in a relationship. This simple but profound difference between the sexes has powerful consequences for the so-called pay gap.
>
> Suppose the pay gap between men and women were magically eliminated. If that happened, simple arithmetic suggests that half of women would be unable to find what they regard as a suitable mate.
>
> [...]
>
> The pay gap between men and women is not all bad because it helps to promote and sustain marriages. Since husband and wife generally pool their incomes into a single economic unit, what really matters is the combined family income, not the pay gap between them.
>
> In two segments of our population, the pay gap has virtually ceased to exist. In the African-American community and in the millennial generation (ages 18 to 32), women earn about the same as men, if not more.
>
> It just so happens that those are the two segments of our population in which the rate of marriage has fallen the most. Fifty years ago, about 80 percent of Americans were married by age 30; today, less than 50 percent are.
>
> Just a coincidence? I think not. The best way to improve economic prospects for women is to improve job prospects for the men in their lives, even if that means increasing the so-called pay gap.

So why is it important that Schlafly used the term? Because national politicians actually listen to her. She is a wealthy, upper class member of the political elite, unlike us poor divorced guys slaving away in the fields. While she may be considered something of a radical, she has clout. Enough, apparently, to spike the ERA.

We could hold her opposition to the ERA against her, but let’s be realistic: it never would have been used to level the playing field. Instead, it would have been used as a cudgel against the “patriarchy,” resulting in interminable lawsuits and an even more powerful feminist legal regime than we have today (if such is possible). Because men and women are not equal, no human law can make them so; it can only make life worse for most of us.

More legislation purporting to equalize men and women will have the same effect this legislation always has had: it will grow and enrich legal professionals and bureaucracies and introduce more expense and complexity into the lives of the common people. Schlafly is right to oppose it, and it’s good to see she’s taking some cues from the manosphere as well.

Pep Talk

Featured Guest · 17 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

By HGW

I walk in to the packed room with caution and am the only guy. Surprise. Immediately half the heads present spin in my direction, whilst the remaining heads continue sucking thumbs, fingers, breasts. I am greeted with a friendly 'hello' but the undertone whispers 'enemy'. A proportion of the eyes say 'snake, there's a snake in the nest'. The same eyes didn't expect me to be here. I should be out earning a living, panning for gold, drilling for oil, or at the very least drilling my secretary. What they do expect is for me to be out of my depth, unable to cope. They're just waiting for me to drop the baby at any minute, like looking after him is a task too far. This is my first Postpartum Education for Parents (PEP) meeting, it's a weekly gathering for new parents. This group is in its third week. I'm an outsider before we even get to my genitalia.

I take a seat, at the back, on the edge of the group. Each person is taking a turn to discuss their highs and lows of the week. I feel like an observer rather than a participant and it gives me a novel perspective of proceedings. "Hi my name is Karen and my high of the week is that Jessica smiled for the first time, which was just fabulous. And my low of the week is…" a 10 minute monologue follows, detailing the banal "low". This pattern continues for the majority of the participants. A brief high lasting 5 seconds before an extensive low that never strays from the ordinary. How can they moan and whine so much? I look around the room as others talk to read faces. Some listen intently and pander to the speakers lust for attention, knowing it'll be their turn soon, their turn to whimper, to be dramatically indulged.

I realize that these are the women that make up the majority of facebook traffic. The buzzfeed and upworthy sharers, the I'm feeling sad today updates, the clamor for attention please talk to me comments, the I knew somebody who died and I need people to think I'm caring and not an attention seeker statuses. NB: There's no need to address the deceased in the message. They can't read it. There's no facebook after death. Whether you believe in Heaven, purgatory or nothingness, facebook being present would disprove the statement. However, they do have facebook in hell, I'm certain. The lord of death, leader of the underworld, Mark Beelzeburg, wouldn't miss that opportunity. And to be honest I can think of no greater punishment than an eternity logged into facebook. Given the option I'd snatch your hand off for fire, torture and perpetual, satanical sodomy.

Back to the meeting. Another lady finishes a cursory high before moving on to an everlasting low. She hasn't slept much this week, her baby has been crying every few hours. What was she expecting? It's a new born baby for fuck's sake. Other people delight in the fact they aren't the only sufferers. Listening to other people's problems and stresses makes them feel better about their own. Humans are great.

A few jokes are mechanically delivered by the volunteer hosts. 'There's no point crying over spilt milk, unless it's breast milk!' 'Whoever thought of the phrase "sleep like a baby" can't have had children or must've been a man' they get a laugh Eddie Murphy would have been proud of in his prime. I'm bemused once again. I feel like I'm getting my first peek behind the curtain, the first glimpse of the Martians in their natural habitat, and it's not as fantastical as I was expecting. It's like finding out how a magic trick works, smoke and mirrors hide a simple, underwhelming reality.

I search for the women who look blank, uninterested. The women I relate to. The women who have a similar perspective to mine. The women whose eyes say "Where is the fucking wine?" There's a few of them here. I think I'll talk to them at the interval.

I turn my attention to the other 50% of the humans present. The little people. The babies. The potential is endless. Each of them is unburdened by preconceptions, stigmas, dogmas. Yet to have self doubt, yet to lose hope or feel sorrow. Everything is wondrous to them, everything treated equally. It dawns on me what a responsibility it is not to just care for a child but to nurture it, let it develop into an individual. It's my first real responsibility of my life.

I emerge from my thoughts to realize all eyes are on me. I'm prompted for my highs and lows. This should be easy. "Hello everybody. I guess my high of the week is anytime I get to spend with my son because how could it not be? And, honestly, I don't really have a low, it's just all part of the package." A small white lie. I couldn't tell them my low was this meeting. They all smile at my response. Some of the smiles are forced, almost a sneer. But only some of them.

Moral Evisceration Renders West Helpless Before Putin

W.F. Price · 18 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The head of our propaganda outreach to Russians, a radical feminist lesbian supporter of Pussy Riot named Masha Gessen, wrote an op ed a couple weeks ago that essentially makes Putin's case for him. Gessen, of course, sees herself as an ally of "progress," but she and her cohort are responsible for alienating an enormous number of native born Americans including, incidentally, those who would traditionally be most inclined to sacrifice themselves for the flag and nation.

Following are some excerpts from her remarkable opinion piece:

> "This is not another Cold War that we're entering into," President Obama said Wednesday in Brussels, presenting the post-Crimea world order as he sees it after consultations with other NATO leaders. "After all, unlike the Soviet Union, Russia leads no bloc of nations, no global ideology."
>
> President Vladimir Putin would surely beg to differ. Over the past two years, a new ideology has taken shape at the Kremlin. Insistently pushed out over the airwaves of state-controlled television, it has taken hold as Russia's national idea — and is the driving force behind its newly aggressive international posture. Russia is remaking itself as the leader of the anti-Western world.
>
> During his annual state-of-the-federation address to parliament in December, Putin articulated this ideology. This in itself was novel: For his preceding 13 years at the helm, Putin had stuck to the pragmatic in his speeches. Now he was putting forth a vision for which many Russians had longed in the nearly quarter-century since the Soviet Union collapsed, leaving a giant hole where its citizens' identities used to be.
>
> In his December speech, Putin said that Russia had no superpower ambitions in the sense of "a claim to global or regional hegemony." Yet, he said, "We will strive to be leaders." In explaining Russia's new identity with relationship to the West and its claim on leadership, he said:
>
> "This is absolutely objective and understandable for a state like Russia, with its great history and culture, with many centuries of experience not of so-called tolerance, neutered and barren, but of the real organic life of different peoples existing together within the framework of a single state." Putin was placing Russia's very approach to life in opposition to the Western one. The "so-called tolerance" he mentioned as the key feature of Western civilization is, from this perspective, nothing but a slide into immorality. More likely than not, that includes homosexuality, which is why tolerance is described as "barren and neutered."
>
> "Today many nations are revising their moral values and ethical norms, eroding ethnic traditions and differences between peoples and cultures," he continued. "Society is now required not only to recognize everyone's right to the freedom of consciousness, political views and privacy, but also to accept without question the equality of good and evil, strange as it seems, concepts that are opposite in meaning."
>
> Finally, said Putin, it was time to resist this scourge of tolerance and diversity creeping in from the West. "We know that there are more and more people in the world who support our position on defending traditional values," he asserted. Russia's role is to "prevent movement backward and downward, into chaotic darkness and a return to a primitive state."
>
> In short, Putin intends to save the world from the West. He has started with Crimea. When he says he is protecting ethnic Russians in Ukraine, he means he is protecting them from the many terrible things that come from the West. A few days after the December address, Alexei Pushkov, head of the Duma committee on foreign relations, defined that threat on the floor of the chamber: "European Union advisers in practically every ministry of any significance, control over the flow of finances and over national programs, and a broadening of the sphere of gay culture, which has become the European Union's official policy."

Gessen focuses on homosexuality to the exclusion of other fraught cultural issues, clearly because she is biased in this regard. However, it is not only coerced acceptance of a redical redefinition of family, which Gessen explicitly supports, but the annihilation of distinct cultures and peoples through a radical form of multiculturalism and promotion of “diversity” at all costs. Naturally, the peoples who succumb first are the smaller nationalities, but ultimately everyone loses as a fundamental part of their humanity – their culture – is amputated or otherwise mutilated to fit some poorly defined common form that every man, woman and child can be stuffed into. Adding to that, America’s aggression against non-belligerents, foreign adventurism and coercion of weaker nations and peoples to impose its will has added an element of terror to our crusades. In truth, the American “right” and “left” differ only in their means, but the end goal is the same: the obliteration of any and all that stands in the way of unrestricted expression of the id. It is, as Putin correctly notes, a descent into “chaotic darkness and a return to a primitive state.”

The contemporary American elite’s vision for the future is a horrific nightmare in which anything goes, and therefore nothing is distinct or cherished but pure power to do as one pleases. There are to be no limits but the physical: no moral restraint, no customs, no traditions to stand in the way of unfettered action on primal desires and appetites. Putin, it seems, is genuinely opposed to this mission on a personal level, and has articulated his opposition in a manner that has galvanized the Russian people into a politically united force.

Russia, as strange as it may seem to those of us who came of age during the Cold War, has taken the moral high ground, and much of the rest of the world is aligning behind it in an effort to halt the orgiastic Western juggernaut:

> Now, Russia is not leading a bloc of nations in this new anti-Western crusade — at least, not yet. But it is certainly not alone in its longing for “traditional values.” Russia has been assembling an informal “traditional values” bloc in the United Nations, where the Human Rights Council has passed a series of Russian-sponsored resolutions opposing gay rights over the past three years. Russia’s allies in passing these resolutions include not only its post-Soviet neighbors but also China, Ecuador, Malaysia and more than a dozen other states.
>
> The anti-gay agenda may seem like a thin basis for forming a militant international alliance of state-actors, but it has great unifying potential when framed in terms of a broader anti-Western effort and, indeed, a civilizational mission.

Again, institutionalized homosexuality is only one issue, but it may have been the one that finally crossed a red line. Considering that even in my very liberal state of Washington legalization of gay marriage passed by only about one percentage point in late 2012, and then only after enormous campaign donations from the globalist billionaires in the state, it is probably too costly even for the US to successfully convince the rest of the world that it is a good idea. But for whatever reason, progressives have made it their defining cause and staked their movement’s claim to the future on it. This act of hubris may prove to be progressivism’s Achille’s heel, but in the long run what matters – and hurts – the most for those of us more traditional Americans is our dramatic loss of faith in our own nation.

To see the US reduced to little more than a platform for the greedy and licentious when it used to be a beacon of liberty and common decency in a savage world is profoundly unsettling. It is also why I am all but certain that our decline is a fait accompli rather than an imminent threat.

At this point, we can only hope that nihilistic radicals like Masha Gessen refrain from plunging us into a catastrophic war on their behalf, sacrificing our sons for ideals that we despise from the bottom of our hearts.

The Men's Rights Movement Should Change its Name

Featured Guest · 21 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor: Calling for "gender equality" actually does work out pretty well for everyone involved in the Nordic countries. However, it's a disaster here in the US. Why is that? I'll offer my own opinion in the next post, but Henry Laasanen's stance poses a question we should all think about, especially in regards to our own failures over the years in the US following sexual liberation.]

By Henry Laasanen

I am from Finland and we don't use "men's rights" terminology here. We use "equality for men" (EfM) type of speak. The masculist organization in Finland is called "Equality for men".

Strategically it's better to emphasize equality than rights, because equality is widely accepted goal and because the word "rights" could mean anything from equality to radical chauvinism.

I see all the time, how feminists use the MRA and MRM terminology to paint evil stereotypes of masculists. For many people MRA terminology bring to mind angry and shouting conservative male, who demand more rights for men than for women.

EfM type on terminology sounds much more reasonable, justifiable and liberal.

MRA terminology gives the feminist too easy time to mix conservative Christians and Men's equality activists to the same bunch.

It's easy to ridicule someone, who demands rights for his group, but it's not easy to ridicule someone, who demands equality. Very rare people are against equality.

In the last years have read many English articles, where evil stereotypes of MRA are very much alive without any connection to the reality of masculism. When I read the comment sections, majority of commentators don't know anything about masculism – they just know the feminist made evil stereotype of conservative chauvinist who want take the right away from women.

I can say that "Equality for Men" terminology has worked very well here in Finland. We are immune to the kind of negative stereotyping that English speaking manosphere suffers all the time.

Maybe you have some advanced masculist media strategy, and you use MRA terminology to give easy target to generate publicity. Maybe any publicity is good publicity?

Anyway, I'm surprised by the lack of discussion of proper masculist terminology with different pros and cons.

Why “Equality” Doesn’t Work in America

W.F. Price · 21 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In response to Henry Laasanen:

When Nordics and Americans call for gender equality, we usually assume that they mean the same thing, even if they aren’t speaking the same language. But this is far from true. Despite the lexical similarity, the concept is entirely different.

The Nordic countries operate on the basis of “consensus;” they tend to see themselves as playing on one team, all with a similar goal. Americans, on the other hand, have an adversarial outlook on life. We are not all on the same team. Americans want to beat the other team and be the winners. It’s how our businesses, courts and political contests work.

Therefore, when a Nordic person thinks of equality, in the back of his mind he is really thinking about something that is good for all men and women, and even children. Equality means a general feeling that everyone is satisfied in roughly equal share.

When an American thinks of equality, it is more along the lines of making a contest even. The National Football League constantly strives to manipulate the rules to make football teams as “equal” as possible, thereby making the competitions more interesting. This is why weak teams get the first choice in the draft, etc. In our courts, we try to even the playing field by imposing rules on prosecutors and providing a lawyer to the accused. In politics, we are strict about campaign financing for the same reason. The goal of American equality is not to make everyone happy, but to create the conditions for a fair fight. At the end of the day, there is still a winner and a loser.

Because Nordics and Americans have different concepts of equality, they use different methods. Nordics negotiate with each other, air grievances and either give or ask for concessions. When there is a disagreement, they mediate. Americans attack each other from the get go, make accusations, always try to gain the upper hand, and instead of negotiation or mediation they litigate upon disagreement.

This is why the concept of “gender equality” is so awful for Americans. It means an endless war between men and women in which the worst and most partisan of all women – typically radical feminists – will have the most sway. It also means that there will be endless demands to handicap and weaken men to “equalize” the two sides and make it possible for women to “win.”

Ultimately, most people lose in such a contest. Most women and most men, who are not interested in outright gender warfare, find themselves dominated by the gender warriors, whose goal is necessarily an androgynous, sexless society. Their world – a world where there is no difference between men and women – is an inhuman monstrosity. It is an ugly imposition on the rest of us, a dystopia of freakish she-males, and a confusing wilderness to children.

In conclusion, to Nordics equality means that everyone is equally satisfied, while to Americans it means everyone is equally miserable.

GitHub Founder Forced to Resign after Catfight

W.F. Price · 22 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Former GitHub CEO Tom Preston-Werner resigned following allegations of sexual harassment and intimidation at the company, which enables the exchange and sharing of software code. Software developer Julie Ann Horvath accused him and his wife Theresa of being disrespectful to women at the company when she resigned last month, prompting an investigation. Evidently, Mr. Preston-Werner had to take the fall because his employee didn't get along with his wife.

According to the NYTimes blog piece on the story, Horvath's resignation was "an example of the sexism and alpha-male culture that are endemic in software engineering."

I don't know what planet these people at the NY Times are living on, but it bears little resemblance to what I'm familiar with. Alpha male and software engineer are pretty close to mutually exclusive terms. Sure, such people do exist, but they are rare, and don't even come close to defining the culture. Have any of them ever worked on a construction crew or in any kind of male job that requires physical labor? The wimpiest guy on a crab boat, for example, is a lot more intimidating than your typical tech worker. Not all that long ago, I was violently yelled at by a logger for getting in his way on a dirt road near Oso (that town where a mudslide just killed dozens of people), and I was carrying a rifle! Can anyone imagine a software engineer letting loose on an armed man?

The reason these feminists go after the software guys is because, like dogs, they can smell fear. Incidentally, I think they can also smell money, but that's a lawyer-assisted ability. They can also sense weakness and a propensity to give in to women.

Back in the 80s, feminists were mounting a full-on assault on municipal police and fire departments. This was largely prompted by sexual harassment laws and the bonanzas they promised successful litigants. For a while, it seemed like every female cop and firefighter wannabe and her lawyer was filing suit. They were going to break the "old boys network" and equalize the force. But guess what? The cops didn't flinch. They retained the same cynical asshole attitude they've always had. Sure, they hired a few women for PR, and allowed the cities to tut-tut them and make a show of being angry, but since then they've only grown more powerful, better armed, safer and as male as they were thirty years ago.

It turned out that not only were women generally uninterested in being cops in the first place, they really were intimidated by true sexist alpha male behavior.

So the lesson here is that if you want to avoid being pushed around by feminists like Julie Horvath, the key is to stop being nice to them. If you try to be soft, progressive and understanding, women like Horvath will sense weakness and strike. When you play by their rules, you might as well hand over your wallet along with your balls.

Personally, I like men who act in a civilized manner, try to play fair and are considerate people. I enjoy their company much more than that of pushy assholes. But even gentlemen need to stand up for themselves and, as the saying goes, "cast not your pearls before swine." Just remember: if you aren't dealing with a lady, you don't have to treat her like one, and feminists are not – even by their own definition – ladies.

I Can’t Believe I Missed the Feminist Porn Conference

W.F. Price · 22 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I know that Toronto is a vibrant center of feminism, but who knew that these screeching banshees did sex work on the side? Just a couple weeks ago, the University of Toronto hosted the Feminist Porn Conference, featuring plus-sized porn star Courtney Trouble, whose awards include Best Trans Films, Best Dyke Film, and Most Diverse Film (seriously).

How come nobody tipped me off?

In addition to her artistic work, Trouble is an activist, having founded International Fisting Day “to create awareness around feminist and queer-related censorship in adult media.”

What a disappointment. I probably could have met half the staff of the Southern Poverty Law Center there and burnished my credentials as a human rights activist. There’s nothing that says “progress” quite like fisting.

Passing the Hat

W.F. Price · 22 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Bills are piling up again, so it's time for me to ask for help keeping the site online. It's been about seven months since the last time I asked, which is a good stretch, but I can't wait any longer at this point.

First, a short update on how the site is doing. Daily unique visitors are running in the 3,500-4,000 range on the site proper during weekdays, and a bit less on weekends. However, I have noticed that people have started to read content more on the feed for some reason. Just the other day some 1,600 people accessed the content through the feed, which is a record, and the number has regularly surpassed 1,000 recently. Given the number of people reading each article on the site itself (about 2,000+ per article), I'd estimate that regular, near-daily readers number around 2,500. It's much harder to get an idea of how many occasional readers are out there, so I'm not going to try to come up with a figure, but it would be in the thousands as well.

Overall, the numbers are fairly consistent, and neither growing quickly nor declining, although usage patterns have changed somewhat. It seems that readers see the site now as a regular publication offering content they enjoy reading, and I think that's a good thing, because it shows more permanence.

However, publications, like all endeavors that require work, have to support themselves somehow, which necessitates this fund drive. So if you enjoy reading the content here on The Spearhead, please send a donation my way through the PayPal button at the top of the right sidebar, or send a check or money order to:

William Price
PO Box 28282
Seattle WA 98118

Addressing the check or money order to my name (William Price) is fine, as I'm a sole proprietor and I've found that it doesn't really matter for tax or accounting purposes at this point, although that may change again after I move and start working on outside projects again.

I'd like to thank all those who have contributed to the site over the years. Without your help, I never could have put as much work into it as I have or published nearly as many posts.

Because I'm moving and am going to be stretching things thin, I'll keep posting reminders until I have enough to guarantee I can keep working on the site through at least the next quarter. I enjoy putting in the work, but I'm far from independently wealthy, so if you like to see the site updated regularly send in some funds and I'll stick to it.

Thanks again. I consider it an honor to work for our readers, and hope to keep doing so for a long time to come.

Woman Flunks USMC Officer Training Course, Blames Female Privilege

W.F. Price · 22 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sage Santangelo, a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps, signed up for the Marine Corps' Infantry Officer Training Course, but promptly failed on the first day. Out of 14 women who have attempted the course, all but one failed on the first day of the thirteen week course. To be fair, the first day is one of the hardest, as it features the combat endurance test.

> Several hours into the test, I jogged past a lieutenant who was overcome with cramps and vomiting on the side of the road. The temperature hovered just above freezing. A blister bled on my foot and sweat poured down my face, yet I felt relatively good. I had completed all the tasks so far within the time allotted, and I was determined to make it to the end without showing any weakness. A packet of MRE cheese spread gave me new life. I shook frost from my uniform, threw my pack on my back, slung my rifle and jogged on through the woods.
>
> But there came a point when I could not persuade my body to perform. It wasn't a matter of will but of pure physical strength. My mind wanted more, but my muscles quivered in failure after multiple attempts. I began to shiver as I got cold. I was told I could not continue.

Cruel biology! There's no way in hell I could pass that test today, but I could have done it in my late teens when I rowed crew, which is a brutally taxing sport. I remember running stairs until my legs were wobbly, finishing races with a sensation of a thousand needles stuck into my body, which I figure must have been due to oxygen deprivation, and other unpleasantries. Honestly, I didn't enjoy rowing all that much, even though I was pretty good for a relatively short rower at six foot one. Playing baseball was a lot more fun and less painful.

Given that most men will avoid that kind of experience when possible, I wonder how many women would willingly sign up for it. Not many, I'd guess, so I'll take Santangelo's word for it when she says she doesn't lack the will.

Santangelo is an exception. Vanishingly few women will willingly subject themselves to anything like that merely for the privilege of being an infantry officer (she's already a lieutenant, so she's got the officer part covered). Female dancers and athletes will go to great lengths and push through pain for the adulation and adoration that successful performance can bring. Female gymnasts and figure skaters even risk their necks for it, and ordinary women admire and envy them. Little girls look up to them, too, and often wish to become such a champion. But if you asked little girls if they wanted to wear shapeless combat fatigues, carry a gun and march through hostile territory while being shot at by people who hate them, you'd have a hard time finding one who would say yes.

Little boys, on the other hand, love the idea for whatever reason. Hell, throw a group of boys into the woods, remove adult supervision, and next thing you know tribal warfare has broken out.

So even if there were women who could pass the combat endurance test, only a tiny fraction of them would be interested in it. Instead, the few women who do have the physical ability to pass the test (and that's very few women), will be content to pursue other options, like a full-ride athletic scholarship to a prestigious university.

But Santangelo has a great idea for helping women pass the infantry officer course. Instead of offering women incentives and privileges for joining the USMC, such as lower standards and perks, they should be treated exactly the same as the real soldiers. That way, she argues, they will be better prepared to pass:

> So what's held women back in the Marines Corps Infantry Officer Course? I absolutely agree that we shouldn't reduce qualifications. For Marine infantry officers, mistakes mean risking the lives of the troops you are charged to protect. But I believe that I could pass, and that other women could pass, if the standards for men and women were equal from the beginning of their time with the Marines, if endurance and strength training > started earlier than the current practice for people interested in going into the infantry, and if women were allowed a second try, as men are.

>
> [...]
>
> The Basic School, where I reported after graduating from Bowdoin College in 2012, has long been co-ed. But physical double standards persist. In the Physical Fitness Test, for example, a male perfect score is achieved by an 18-minute three-mile run, 20 pull-ups and 100 sit-ups in two minutes. A female perfect score is a 21-minute three-mile run, a 70-second flexed-arm hang and 100 sit-ups in two minutes. There was a move to shift from arm hangs to pull-ups for women last year. Yet 55 percent of female recruits were unable to meet the minimum of three, and the plan was put on hold.

I'm all for this idea. Give the women the standard treatment from the start. Of course, it would reduce female enlistment in the armed forces by some 90% almost immediately, but that's a good thing given all the problems associated with a sexually integrated military. Ultimately, though, it wouldn't make women any more likely to pass the infantry officers' combat course, because the pool would be even smaller than it already is, so Santangelo is wrong on that score.

However, that result is not what the politicians – or the feminists – want. They are the ones who have been demanding more women in the military, and in order to oblige them the USMC and the army have been forced to lower standards for women — in other words to give women special privileges. It's the only way they can boost the numbers and please their civilian bosses.

So Santangelo's proposal will never, ever come to pass until the US or whatever comes after it reverts to cultural sanity. People will talk about it, and there will be much hot air. Everyone will agree that we must make two contradictory things happen: women must be given preference and standards must be the same for both men and women. Nobody will be allowed to notice that this is a logical impossibility. In the end, more women will be stuffed into make-work jobs and given rank and money for contributing nothing whatsoever to national defense, a few complainers like Santangelo will be bought off with undeserved promotions, and a lot of perfectly competent, patriotic male officers and enlisted men will be sacrificed for the sake of "progress."

Feminist Biology?

W.F. Price · 23 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The University of Wisconsin Madison is preparing to offer the first post-doctorate program in "feminist biology" in the US. So what is feminist biology? Apparently, it is not science at all, but rather more "intersectionality" gibberish:

> UW was granted the opportunity by Gertraude Wittig, a German Ph.D. biologist in the 1950s, Janet Hyde, professor of psychology and director of the Campus Center for Research on Gender and Women, said. Wittig suffered through bias and sexism that many women faced during that time frame, she said.
>
> After working for the U.S. Department of Agriculture for several years, Wittig researched universities nationwide with strong gender and women's studies programs to find one she believed had a strong emphasis on the intersection of gender and science, Hyde said.
>
> "She concluded that ours was the best one to give the money to partly because we have a long history of representing biological research in our program, which is unusual for women's studies programs," Hyde said.
>
> Hyde said they hope to make advances in approaches to science that detect gender bias in traditional biology and also pioneer new approaches to biological research that counteract those biases.
>
> Houck said the department has a strong history of feminist analysis of science and biology and health. The post-doc is important for the department to continue its strong, innovative legacy, she said.
>
> "For the larger university, what this does is sends a message to the academic community that UW-Madison cares about feminist science, they're willing to promote feminist science and we want to be known as a university that supports and nurtures feminist science," Houck said.
>
> [...]
>
> Fellows working in the program will be responsible for two parts, Hyde said.
>
> The first is conducting biological research incorporating a feminist point of view, Hyde said, and the other is instructing a course for gender and women's studies each semester. She said they have not had a faculty member be able to teach this course because of budget cuts over the past several years.
>
> "What we need to do is produce more feminist biologists," Hyde said. "We're hoping to encourage that now and to make it a much larger and vibrant field."

As colleges are beginning to fail around the US, instead of doing the sensible thing and eliminating useless departments like gender studies altogether, some are apparently choosing to wreck the legitimate disciplines by dumping contaminants like feminist biology into them.

When the universities inevitably go into steep decline, they will have only themselves to blame.

Rod Dreher Asks “Who Cares?” About Sex Ratio in College

W.F. Price · 23 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Upon reading this title, some people might assume that I’m about to attack higher education for discriminating against men and boys. But actually, I think it’s a blessing in disguise. Dreher’s little comment on the matter highlights the hypocrisy of a higher education regime that sees no problem with discriminating against males, so he isn’t writing that he doesn’t care that men are underrepresented. Like most decent people, he thinks it represents a problem.

I, on the other hand, don’t think it’s a problem at all. I will even go so far as to say that there are already too many men in four-year colleges, and it would be better if there were even fewer than there are today.

Let’s start with an obvious fact: a lot of young men who are in college on athletic scholarships do not stand to benefit from a college education, and in fact are being cheated. Why is it that young football and basketball players, who earn an enormous amount of revenue for colleges, are unpaid, despite the fact that the work they put in will probably never result in a paycheck? Is the semi-literate kid from the country or inner city who is a superior athlete but not professional caliber really going to benefit from college? I don’t think so. He’d be better off playing a few years in some minor league team and getting paid for it than taking classes he’ll never care about or fully understand. Best would be for him to learn a trade while playing semi-pro. If his athletic career doesn’t pan out, and it doesn’t for most college athletes, he’ll be a lot better off as a cop, firefighter, construction worker or even trucker than he would be as a burnt out athlete with no job skills whatsoever.

Next, there are the young men who are of average to high-average ability. Do they need a four-year degree for their future career? Far from it. What they need is experience on the job combined with some refinement of business and personal skills. A two-year degree will do the job just fine. Most mid level technical jobs do not require a full bachelor’s degree. Why incur debt and waste time taking useless classes from leftist ideologues when they could be earning money?

A full Baccalaureate should be reserved for men in the upper quartile of intellectual ability who can go on to be administrators, professionals and teachers. And even in that upper quartile it isn’t always necessary, because a lot of intelligent young men are better suited to getting things done than listening to lectures. Therefore, I think only about 15%, or one in six young men, really ought to go the distance in college.

As for young women, higher education is an enormous waste in most cases. They spend their time learning from lesbian pornographers, drinking, whoring and learning to look down on their male peers even as they debase themselves. The old idea that it will help them find a suitable mate is so outdated as to be laughable, but it’s what keeps parents paying for college tuition for their daughters: they hope that daddy’s little girl will get hitched to some conscientious beta male instead of knocked up by a hoodlum. This is the single biggest reason parents send their daughters to college, and it’s a gamble that will only pay off about half the time these days as the female to male ratio approaches three to two at universities (not all college-educated men marry college-educated women, or marry at all). Not a good bet for roughly $100k, but it supports legions of hard-left ideologues, which explains the enthusiasm for the failing system in mainstream media outlets.

The best-case scenario would be a total collapse of the education bubble, and thousands of useless academics bagging groceries at Whole Foods while electricians, plumbers and network administrators who went to trade school drive well-built vehicles and live in single family homes, and their wives eat healthy food and have plenty of time to raise the kids. The highly-educated types with useful skills, such as doctors and technological innovators, could dedicate their lives to serving their communities, and be rewarded with a modestly distinguished lifestyle featuring high culture and the finest of products produced by the grateful and fairly-compensated beneficiaries of their talent.

Prediction: Out of Character, Stephen Colbert Will Bomb

W.F. Price · 24 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Rush Limbaugh recently denounced CBS's choice of Stephen Colbert to replace David Letterman on The Late Show, but I don't see why. I never "got" Letterman, who has always come off as little more than a bitter, snarky asshole to me. Doesn't seem like it would be hard to find a better replacement for the guy, but maybe at the tender age of 39 I'm just not sophisticated enough to appreciate his brand of humor.

Instead of improvement, the network appears to be trying to stay true to message, and plans to replace him with another bitter, snarky asshole. Only this time, the guy has built his career on a supposedly odious character who is probably more likeable than the man himself.

Stephen Colbert has risen to prominence by portraying conservative Americans as moronic imbeciles. It plays really well to the left, and gets a few laughs from the right, too, because conservatives are better sports, and can actually laugh at themselves. His character in the Colbert Report is likeable in the roughly the same manner as Bill McNeill in News Radio, played by the irreplaceable Phil Hartman, who was tragically gunned down by his cokehead wife some fifteeen years ago.

However, Phil Hartman had a lot more talent than Stephen Colbert. He was funny in more than one character, and could spoof people no matter where they were on the political spectrum. In fact, he did a great Bill Clinton on Saturday Night Live before the show became the knee-jerk prog shithole it is today.

Stephen Colbert hit it big with his spoof of right-wing talk hosts, but that's the only thing he's done of any note whatsoever. Colbert is a one-trick pony. His acting skills are not bad (I've seen him on Law and Order), but his charisma is scraping the bottom of the barrel. I can't imagine why anyone would want to watch Colbert being himself. It's a horrible decision on the part of CBS to give him a real talk show, but then again it doesn't bother me much when major networks screw up.

Watching a poor, flaccid imitation of a boomer liberal like Dave Letterman is going to be a lot less exciting than taking cheap shots at conservatives, so I expect people to simply change the channel when they see the treacle that characterizes the real Stephen Colbert. It will be like pulling the curtains away from the Oz of progs, revealing the squinty, beady-eyed little mediocrity Colbert trying to be "with it" despite being nothing more than an out-of-touch Irish nerd who is generally reviled by the demographic he's been hired to represent.

Good luck, CBS. You would have done better with a Spanish-language bimbo talk show about Mexican telenovelas.

Cliven Bundy Lost in Translation

W.F. Price · 25 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What I find highly ironic about the recent condemnation of Cliven Bundy is that he is being pilloried for speaking more like black Americans than urban whites. Even his name would sound black if you made a slight change from "Cliven" to "Clayvon."

Mr. Bundy's American English is so archaic that he still uses "Negro" (also used more by blacks than whites) and says "they was able to" and "didn't get no more." The content of Bundy's message, which wouldn't have been all that controversial if spoken by a black preacher, was deemed hateful partly because he didn't say it in the proper, coastal elite way.

So I'll do Bundy a favor and offer a translation.

Original statement to NY Times:

> "I want to tell you one more thing I know about the Negro," Bundy said during one of his daily press conferences. "[B]ecause they were basically on government subsidy, so now what do they do? They abort their young children; they put their young men in jail, because they never learned how to pick cotton. And I've often wondered, are they better off as slaves, picking cotton and having a family life and doing things, or are they better off under government subsidy? They didn't get no more freedom. They got less freedom."

Newspeak version:

I'd like to address another issue concerning African Americans. Now that they are under government management, how are their lives? Their young women have the highest rate of abortion and their young men the highest rate of incarceration, because they have few job skills and therefore few opportunities. This brings up the question of whether they are really much better off today than under slavery. Indeed, by many measures they are even less free today.

Another untranslated Bundy statement:

> Are they happier now under this government subsidy system than they were when they were slaves, and they was able to have their family structure together, and the chickens and garden, and the people had something to do? And so, in my mind I'm wondering, are they better off being slaves, in that sense, or better off being slaves to the United States government, in the sense of the subsidies. I'm wondering.

Translation:

How can one say that the federal government serves African Americans any better than plantation owners under slavery, when at least they had families and the opportunity to work the land under that system. Is it really better to be totally helpless and dependent on the state and the US government than the status quo ante?

The translations obviously sound more "acceptable," but still wouldn't go over well unless Bundy made it clear that he was not supporting slavery, but rather condemning government management of people's lives. For some reason, people tend to automatically assume that white people are supporting slavery when they say something is "worse than slavery," but this is not usually the case. Most white Americans do not, and never have, supported slavery, which was always an elite institution.

Let me present an ancient, and somewhat famous, example of another white man making a "worse than slavery" statement:

> Continuous with the Suiones are the nations of the Sitones. They resemble them in all respects but one — woman is the ruling sex. That is the measure of their decline, I will not say below freedom, but even below > decent slavery.

>
> Cornelius Tacitus in Germany and her Tribes

Making comparisons to slavery is a rhetorical device, and can work well if you do it the right way. Cliven Bundy's attempt to do so fell flat because to many people he sounds like a Southerner (although he is in fact a Westerner), and he didn't realize that white men cannot use it without immediately falling into the black/white trap of dualistic American race thinking.

So I'd recommend that American men should just steer clear of making these comparisons, not because there's anything inherently wrong with doing so, but because it immediately sets off the shrill screaming we're hearing now about Bundy, although black people are not among the screamers and don't seem to care about the Western cattle rancher (which says a lot about what's really going on).

There's nothing any more racist about Cliven Bundy than your typical New York SWPL who goes through all sorts of contortions to keep his spoiled progeny out of a "bad school." In fact, Bundy, who probably has little if any negative interaction with black folks may be more positively inclined toward them than the New Yorker.

I think he genuinely believes that blacks would be better off with a life like his — working the land in God's country, raising a family and relying on the community rather than an impersonal government for support. Bureaucratically managed city living represents some form of hell to this old rancher, and as a city dweller I can sympathize.

Finally, there's a lot of stupidity in the widespread condemnation of Bundy by urban liberals. They say he's "stealing from the government" and taking advantage of taxpayers. Anyone who lives in the inland West knows this is BS. The federal government owns most of the land in this region, and most of it is worthless for most purposes. People like Bundy are actually making it profitable, creating wealth out of what would otherwise be a wasteland. The government and taxpayers benefit from these ranchers. One of the coolest things I've seen in the West was a Basque shepherd on horseback in Idaho, grazing his flock in the Targhee National Forest and thereby helping prevent forest fires by clearing underbrush. It was a great example of people working with what they have and helping manage public land without costing the rest of us a cent. When city people condemn these people for doing all that and adding to our tax base, I just shake my head at the small-minded malice of it all.

The most environmentally destructive projects in the West today are mainly large, publicly funded projects like the Grand Coulee Dam and Hanford Nuclear Reservation (there are literally radioactive rabbits hopping around out there) — not independent ranchers. Driving these people out of business by raising grazing fees is not good policy, but it makes it easier for the likes of Harry Reid to push the little people around. Good for Cliven Bundy for standing up to him.

A New Place to Live

W.F. Price · 28 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I finally secured a place in Whatcom County after a couple months of intensive searching. I am really looking forward to being able to see my kids without spending ten hours on the road for one measly weekend. An extra motivating factor is that I'll be paying perhaps one third of what the equivalent space would cost in Seattle.

However, it wasn't easy to pull it off. Being a divorced dad who has struggled to pay bills and child support does a lot of damage to your credit, which raises landlords' eyebrows. I'm lucky in that I don't owe too much overall and have a flawless tenant record, but I might as well have set my credit rating on fire in order to pay the lawyers and child support, and that's with some family support, without which I would have had to give up on being anything more than one of those "dads" the court so gleefully consigns to irrelevance.

One thing I can tell young men who might wonder what it's like to go through a bad divorce is that you learn to accept your lot with a great deal of fatalism. I've often found myself thinking "well, at least I didn't get murdered," or "at least I'm not in prison." In order to put things in perspective, I think of all the decent men who died in the world wars. It's really that bad. Don't listen to the family law parasites who try to justify it — they are merely bandits with a license to steal.

I don't know how this move is going to work out in the long run, but I'll be closer to my kids, and I'm going to keep fighting the same fight from a couple degrees north of where I am today. Given the lower costs, I think I'll have more resources at my disposal. This is another lesson. If you're a young man, go for the best deal you can get, and never pay a premium for "prestige" if it doesn't pay off in the short term. I wish I'd left Seattle ten years ago. I would have saved tens of thousands, and I wouldn't have had to live with the half-men (male and female alike) who dominate our cities today.

I'll be moving in a couple weeks. The only thing that will change here on The Spearhead is my PO Box address and the post volume (higher) once I'm settled in.

I'd like to thank those who have helped keep the site online as I've tried to turn my difficult experience into effective action. Like I said, I'm not dead and I'm not in jail, and I feel I owe it to the men who have suffered more than I have at the hands of the criminals who profit from the destruction of families. These men are legion, and they deserve justice. I will never forget that as long as I live.

Small Cities, Big Ideas

W.F. Price · 6 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been preparing to move, so I took a short break from writing to get in better shape both mentally and physically. My upcoming relocation is a pretty big deal for me, because I've never lived anywhere besides a fairly large city (Seattle) and a really huge city (Beijing), and I'm about to move to a place where the "big city" has only about 85,000 inhabitants (about twenty percent of whom are students at the local university), and most of the surrounding land is either rural or wilderness. In fact, the entire county I'm moving to has fewer inhabitants than just two out of Seattle's four bordering suburbs combined. Given the burgeoning international trade through the I-5 corridor it's growing fast, so that may not last forever, but there's still a whole lot of room.

Naturally, the social milieu and political scene are very different, and I've been making an effort to learn a thing or two about them. For starters, I've discovered that the Tea Party really does exist, and isn't merely a figment of urban liberals' paranoid imagination as I had previously suspected (half seriously). Sometimes, I forget how many urban liberals actually came from small towns, and don't take into account that many of them have a lot more personal experience with flyover America than I do.

These days, there aren't all that many natives left in Western coastal cities, and there will be even fewer in the future as the extinction of the urban family accelerates. Most of the young people in Seattle, for example, are transplants from the suburbs and towns of the Northwest who came to the big city for jobs, fun or simply the status that comes with being an urbanite. Most of my childhood friends are long gone, as the cost of raising a family is just too steep in the city. Those who have stayed have, for the most part, inherited properties from their parents.

So I am in the strange position of being entirely urban, but also essentially alienated from the city of my birth. However, instead of seeing this as a bad thing, I'd like to take advantage of the fact that I have no psychic scars associated with small-town conformity to seize the opportunity and make a run for it while I still can. Do I feel sorry for the smug, liberal parents in my neighborhood who will have to face the music when their little ones hit kindergarten age and either shell out 20k+ per year on private school or send their progeny to schools in which some Cushitic dialect from the Horn of Africa dominates the playground and the little girls wear hijabs? Not at all. Perhaps because they despised the suburban and small town homogeneity they ran from so much, they'll really enjoy shopping for goat products at the halal markets going up all around the neighborhood. Ah, the 98118, where the burqa and SWPL collide…

As for me, I'll have access to a nearby Dutch farming community that provides the best dairy, meat and produce in Western Washington.

I may be getting ahead of myself here, but I'm really looking forward to becoming an advocate for my adopted community. I can bring the same passion for an alternative lifestyle that so many of the obnoxious SWPLs I encounter in Seattle had when they first rolled off the turnip truck, fresh from some bleak potato farm in Eastern Washington or Idaho, or maybe some cookie-cutter suburb on the eastside.

I'm beginning to think that one of the most important reasons cities have become so overwhelmingly liberal over the last generation is because people came to cities not so much to work and raise families as they used to, but to experience the "lifestyle." For those of us who grew up in cities, much of this experience was an annoyance or, at best, a source of amusement. The things we really liked about the city, such as the convenience, the sense of community in the old neighborhoods and the tolerance for assorted characters who wouldn't fit in anywhere else is gone, replaced by left-fascism, overpriced goods and real estate, congestion and endless fees and taxes. The entire place has turned into an amusement park, replete with hucksters, freaks and overpriced fare.

In my disappointment, I've been looking for answers, and I've found one man who has a particularly enlightened take on the state of urban America. He's a professor (of all things) named Joel Kotkin. A native New Yorker, he moved to California in the 1970s, eventually ending up in Los Angeles, where he advocates for more family-centered urban policy. Calling himself an “urbanologist,” Kotkin takes on both leftist fanatics and the new oligarchs of the US. In addition to deflating the arguments of the pro-density Bladerunner-America proponents, he criticizes our broken immigration policy that places a higher priority on ethnic politics than valuable skills.

While absorbing his material over the past few days I found that his take on contemporary America is remarkably similar to mine. In fact, he’s given me some motivation and a sliver of hope for the future. However, I’m afraid that the big cities may not be receptive to change, and we may have to start in smaller cities and towns in the growing inland and Gulf Coast states, which are seeing continued economic growth even as stratification and social rigidity come to characterize the metropolitan titans of contemporary America.

That said, I think I’m going to shift my focus. I’ve been railing against feminism for some years, and it’s come to be akin to flogging a dead horse. Not that it isn’t a good cause, but I’m fighting the symptom instead of the root disease. I’ve known this all along, and have said so a number of times right here, but until recently I didn’t feel that I’d said enough about it. Feminism has become another one of those discredited but mandatory ideologies, like multiculturalism, blank-slatism and cultural relativism — we all know they are wrong even if we have to pretend not to while at work. But that’s changing: female newspaper and magazine columnists are openly stating that there are inborn psychological differences between men and women from time to time, and eventually the taboo will ease up. The intellectual battle against feminism is over. The feminists lost. They may still be sitting down next to the big kahuna and have undeserved political power, but everyone knows they’re frauds, and I don’t feel the need to make the argument any longer — at least not on a daily basis.

Instead of going over the same argument dozens of times, I’d like to take aim at a bigger adversary: the political and financial establishment. I’d also like to do so in a more concrete manner than merely blogging (not that I’ll give that up). I think there will be some opportunities to do so locally in my new home, and although I’m not sure how the site will fit into that, I’d like to keep readers in on it.

There is going to be a great deal of political and social change over the coming decade, and I don’t intend to sit on the sidelines.

Futrelle Supports Agenda Guaranteed to Lead to More Domestic Violence, Child Abuse and Rape

W.F. Price · 8 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

David Futrelle is still running a blog in defense of feminism, only under a different domain now. Instead of "Manboobz," a name that apparently backfired on him, he's under the wehuntedthemammoth.com url. Otherwise, there's no difference that I can ascertain.

I've criticized Futrelle in the past for failing to offer his own opinions. His blog's raison d'être has always been to highlight expletives, malapropisms and other "improper" ejaculations uttered by his readers' political opponents. He uses amateur blogs and comments to harvest these, because they are easy pickings, hence the "cherry picking" charge so often laid against him. It's a valid criticism, because this kind of political advocacy is based on intellectual sloth, especially when unaccompanied by any clear arguments on the critic's part.

However, every now and then David does endorse a point of view, as we can see from a recent plug for a feminist book:

> Lundy Bancroft is an expert on abusive relationships and the author of Why Does He Do That? Inside the Minds Of Angry and Controlling Men, a book I've found very helpful not only in understanding abusers but also in understanding the behavior and "activism" of Men's Rights Activists.
>
> In a recent post on his blog, he warns about the ways in which "Men's Rights" ideologies can justify, and made worse, abusive behavior from men who are already abusive, or who have abusive tendencies.
>
> [...]
>
> It's not surprising that a philosophy rooted in male entitlement would appeal to men who already feel pretty entitled – and often quite bitter that the women in their lives, not to mention the world at large, doesn't seem to regard them as quite so deserving of adulation as they think they are.
>
> As I've mentioned before, I used to think it was unfair to label the Men's Rights Movement "the abusers' lobby," as many domestic violence experts have done, because I felt that the movement did raise some issues that MRAs at least seem to sincerely believe reflect discrimination against men. But the more experience I've had with MRAs, the more I've begun to see the Men's Rights Movement not only as an "abusers' lobby" but as an abusers' support group, and an abusive force in its own right, promoting forms of "activism" that are little more than semi-organized stalking and harassment of individual women.
>
> It's not that every MRA is literally a domestic abuser, though I wouldn't be shocked to find domestic abusers seriously overrepresented in the Men's Rights ranks; it's that the Men's Rights movement promotes abusive ways of thinking and behaving.

Calling men who advocate for fathers' rights the "abuser's lobby" is right up the fanatic Amanda Marcotte's alley. It's a calculated slur designed to play to base emotions, and even worse, it's a damned lie.

But most disturbing of all is the fact that anti-family policy leads to highly elevated rates of domestic violence, rape and child abuse.

Families in which both biological mother and father are together have the lowest rates of domestic violence, child abuse, and rape. Child fatalities due to abuse and neglect are far lower in traditional families than they are in single-mother homes, yet feminists – and David Futrelle – support this arrangement by demonizing fathers. Futrelle suggests that men who promote patriarchal values, i.e. pro-family values, are more likely to be abusers. But this is not borne out by statistics. In fact, it is quite the opposite. Single mothers are most likely to be battered by sex partners who are not their children's father, and fatherless children most likely to be murdered, raped and abused.

Yet somehow, fathers' rights advocates are suspicious, scary people.

David, do you really hate children that much? Do you want to see more women beaten? More children raped and murdered? If so, by all means, support people like Lundy Bancroft, who profit from advocating dissolution resources. Lundy Bancroft is a member in good standing of the divorce industrial complex. He literally lives off misery and destruction of families. I don't see how anyone could claim to advocate the safety of women and children while promoting a self-interested, home-wrecking charlatan like Bancroft.

It is immoral, it is evil, and it hurts innocent people. How, David, can you defend that?

Shakers: Then and Now

W.F. Price · 8 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Contemporary feminists don't often bring up the Shakers, an early, egalitarian feminist Quaker offshoot, but they are a highly relevant sect with an uncanny resemblance to feminists. Founded in the 18th century by a charismatic English priestess named Ann Lee, who subsequently emigrated to New York, the faith rose to some prominence and renown by the mid-19th century before dwindling almost to extinction in the 20th century. Today, three Shakers remain.

Ann Lee pioneered a form of goddess worship, and held herself out to be the second coming of Jesus — a component of a mixed-gender, quadrune God. Long before modern feminism, she enforced strict gender equality at every level of her church, communal ownership of property and ritualized purity. Shakers were known best for their bizarre form of worship, from which they derived their name. Shaker services featured ecstatic dances replete with speaking in tongues, rolling around on the ground and, at times, barking like dogs. However, despite their energetic religious expressions, Shakers were generally a sober, industrious people, and their settlements could be enormously productive. Even today, antique Shaker furniture, known for its rugged, tasteful simplicity, commands a high price, and the style is widely imitated.

So what became of the Shakers?

To put it simply, they just died off. One of the tenets of their faith was that marriage and sexual relations caused spiritual pollution, and that in order to achieve perfect equality men and women should be as brother and sister to each other rather than husband and wife. Furthermore, families were an impediment to the communal lifestyle, as parents naturally favored their children over the rest of the community. Mother Ann, the female incarnation of the messiah, therefore banned them outright.

Enforcing celibacy in mixed communities would seem to be an impossible task, but the Shakers set up a strict hierarchy of Elders and Eldresses and deacons and deaconesses to enforce the sexual prohibition. Shakers who spent time outside the community were interrogated upon their return. Outside visitors were held to strict rules, and much of the community was off-limits to them. On occasion, when young local men attempted to elope with Shaker girls, the "sisters" were known to have attacked and beaten them with mop and broom handles. Typical boys' play, such as wrestling and playing ball, was prohibited, and close male friendship strongly discouraged, presumably to suppress masculinization. Eldresses employed spies to keep track of the whereabouts and activities of the young and lusty.

The result of this was that young Shakers, who could choose to leave at the age of 21, left in droves — especially the males. The retention rate was only 25%. Shaker numbers were augmented by accepting foundlings and poaching husbands or wives from nuclear families and keeping the children. This prompted a Kentucky law that permitted divorce on the grounds of a spouse joining a Shaker community, with property and child custody remaining with the non-Shaker parent.

So why, with all the difficulties caused by enforced celibacy, did the rule remain in effect? According to Shaker historian Glendyne R. Wergland, it was how Shakers maintained gender equality:

> Celibacy was the key to Shaker equality. By eliminating marriage, Shakers eliminated the source of men's traditional authority over women. Living as virgins, male and female alike, Believers diverged from mainstream traditions that valued women's virginity but did not apply the same standard to men. The Shakers rejected the hypocritical double standard and established women;s equality by applying the same norm of chastity to men and women — and upheld it in practice as well as in theory. This study shows how women working together consolidated their gains, then expanded their power. Here, then, are examples of women serving in equality with men, women in partnership with men, and women in ascendancy over men. By the end of the nineteenth century, even outsiders recognized that Shaker society had become a gynocracy.

Perhaps, then, the price for gender equality is ultimately ethnic extinction, and this explains why patriarchy has always been the norm, and gynocracy the exception. This would also explain why major religions are invariably patriarchal, while female-oriented faiths, like Shakerism – and now the Episcopal Church – eventually die out.

However, more ominously today, it is not only some odd sects or cults that have adopted the Shakers' values, but an entire political party, and indeed the secular orthodoxy that dominates the national narrative. Are Americans destined, under an equalist, gynocratic rule, to dwindle and die out? To the Shakers, that wouldn't have been a tragedy; the equalist heavenly kingdom is not concerned with such trifles as the survival of peoples, as it is eternal. The rest of us, however, might do well to ask whether the destiny of our posterity concerns us, and if so, why we should allow today's neo-Shakers so much power over its fate.

One reason you shouldn't wait too long to have kids

W.F. Price · 14 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'm still moving, so I was loading some old junk the other day with the help of my stepdad and neighbor, both of whom are past retirement age. Naturally, the really heavy stuff was my job. Despite being out of shape and pushing 40, I'm still pretty strong, but that clearly doesn't last.

As I heaved a sofa into a flatbed, I found myself wishing my son were old enough to help out with heavy lifting. Fortunately, he will be within six or seven years, and hopefully at that time I'll still be doing OK, too. However, if I'd waited until 40 to have my first kid, I'd be pushing it. Even more so in my mid to late 40s — I'd be 60 years old before the kid's back was strong enough for a man's work.

I understand the logic behind waiting before having kids, but as I proceed into middle age I find the idea of having strong, grown children somewhat more appealing than toting helpless babies around. Past the age of 30 or so, waiting to have kids has diminishing returns, even for men.

Where does “Barefoot and Pregnant” come from?

W.F. Price · 16 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For most dads, the answer to this question is pretty easy, but for some time “barefoot and pregnant” has been an anti-motherhood slur feminists used to denigrate the family life. Eventually, it even evolved into something men were blamed for, as in “keeping her barefoot and pregnant.”

Most young people today have only come across the term in its feminist context, and not having become parents yet don’t know its benign origin.

The truth is that it comes from a simple physiological process. When women are pregnant, especially late term, their feet tend to get swollen and puffy. So instead of stuffing them into shoes, they often prefer to walk around barefoot, because that’s much more comfortable.

“Barefoot and pregnant” simply refers to a woman who is walking around at home, happily preparing for the baby in the most comfortable manner. Keeping your wife barefoot and pregnant means you’re doing what’s expected of a traditional husband, which is allowing her to stay home and be relatively carefree while carrying a baby to term.

That it became an attack on men is merely evidence that feminists are a spiteful, envious lot. How many of the early lesbian feminists of the 60s and 70s could say they had pregnant wives who were contentedly walking around without shoes? How many could say so today?

It’s all just sour grapes, as it always has been. A barefoot and pregnant wife is almost always happier than a trussed up working wife, so when keeping her “barefoot and pregnant” men are doing their wives a favor.

Even Japan has a Problem with Absent Fathers

W.F. Price · 17 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been reading about the "hikikomori," an enormous group of Japanese men who have, for all intents and purposes, abandoned society. They are young, but not all that young. The phenomenon seems to have peaked with Japanese males born around 1980. Japanese are concerned about the social cost these young men represent, having come to rely entirely on their aging parents.

The consensus seems to be that something is wrong with the family. The hikikomori themselves often point to family problems as the impetus for their withdrawal into the home.

From an article written last summer in Japan Today:

> A survey the government's Cabinet Office released last April quantifies the disquieting rise of the problem. In 2003, the number of single people aged 35-44 living with their parents was 1.91 million. In 2007 it was 2.62 million; in 2012, 3.05 million. Journalist Masaki Ikegami, who has researched the issue extensively, tells Shukan Post that of people aged 20 to 64 living in Tokyo's Tamachi district, at least one in 20 is in a state of hikikomori – and 30% of them are over 40. That suggests a nationwide total of 300,000 hikikomori people over 40.
>
> [...]
>
> Is it entirely the children's fault? Or society's? True, the economy collapsed just as they were coming of age, creating one, two or three (depending on who's counting) "lost generations" of young people who never had a chance – or who, some say, were too spoiled or spineless to rise to the challenge. But counselor Fujiya Tomita claims it's the parents who have most to answer for. "The parents were busy at work," he says, "and the harder they worked the more prosperous they grew. Child-raising was left to daycare centers, to schools, to juku. The parent-child bond grew weaker." Something snapped in the kids as a result, he seems to be saying – maybe the gumption that would have seen them through the tough times ahead.

There are economic issues here, but this phenomenon doesn't seem to be an issue in Spain or Greece, where tough economic realities have curtailed young people's options, but not so much their ability to interact with the outside world.

The difference between Japan and the Mediterranean countries is that many of these Japanese were essentially raised without a father in their lives. The "salaryman" of the 1980s hardly spent any time at all at home. His life was at work amongst colleagues all day and much of the night. Little boys therefore grew up with protective mothers or in neighborhood daycare centers and rarely saw their fathers. They had no chance to develop that sense of security and independence that comes from paternal presence in one's life.

Without that crucial ingredient, it is harder for boys to become functional adults. Many can and do, but it's on the margins where the effect shows up. Those who could go either way are at risk. Although we don't see young Japanese men hanging out on street corners selling dope like many of our fatherless youths, the hikikomori problem is nonetheless a real social pathology. This is something we Westerners ought to think about as we re-establish the family in the post-industrial age. It isn't enough, apparently, that the father is a fully-employed provider in good social standing.

First Thoughts on My New Home

W.F. Price · 20 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I finally left Seattle behind yesterday, and today I've been acquainting myself with my new neighborhood by walking all over the place. It's a beautiful day, sunny and about 65 degrees, so it's a pleasure to be outside. I'm still in the comparison stage, so I find myself weighing the advantages and drawbacks of the new place. First of all, it isn't the tidy, well-kept city Seattle has become over the last 20 years. Where I live now has more of a suburban feel, with some empty lots, seemingly haphazard (but energetic) development, lots and lots of cars on the main arterials, and not many pedestrians. If there's anything I already miss about Seattle, it is being able to walk down sidewalks in a well-tended neighborhood with mature houses and orderly streets. However, the other kind of maturity – the human kind – is a bit oppressive in Seattle. There isn't much in the way of youth outside of a few enclaves. Seattle claims to have a high proportion of young people, but that is mainly because of the University of Washington and Seattle University, which have a combined enrollment of over 50,000. Remove the college students – most of whom neither engage much with the rest of the city nor plan to stay – and the city is old. You rarely see people between 18 and 30 in the residential neighborhoods. For example, when I'd take my kids to the local park while they were still in preschool the average age of the other parents looked to be early forties, or roughly ten years older than I was at the time.

I've been to a couple local grocery stores in my new place, and there are lots of young people. All sorts of them. I saw more young mothers over the last 24 hours here in Whatcom County than I'd see in Seattle in a week. Another thing that strikes me is that there is considerably more diversity of lifestyle. There's less racial diversity (although there's some of that, too), but people here seem more comfortable being "different." In Seattle, there's a great deal of conformity. Not only political conformity, but style as well. It's almost as though there's a standard white guy uniform. This was not always the case. There used to be an entire range of affiliations, styles, interests, political positions, etc. That freedom to be different, however, has been snuffed out by a sort of progressive fascism that has taken hold over the years. Now, everyone wears the same clothes, votes the same way, has identical positions on issues and supports the same causes. It is an incredibly stifling atmosphere for independent-minded people.

In my new place, however, I see hippies, rednecks, jocks, nerds, "people of Walmart," stylish young people, fatties, beanpoles, hipsters, farmers and many more. It's already far more interesting in that regard. I've also noticed that people are much more open and friendly — the older folks in particular. I've already had a couple strangers say "hi," make comments in passing and tell little jokes. Could these old people out here actually be happier, despite being less affluent than those in Seattle? Their demeanor and cheerful attitude suggests that they are.

Thos. asked how the move went. Not bad all told. My stepdad helped me out, and put me to shame. At 70, he's in better shape than I am. While I can carry more weight, he just keeps going and going like the little engine that could while I'm sweating, overheating and cramping up. Despite several joint replacements, he just keeps exercising, and it sure pays off — seeing how he's holding up is pretty remarkable. So far nothing's missing or stolen, and most stuff is already put into its proper place.

There will be more to tell in the future, but my main priority now is getting back to work. I'll be trying to drum up some business locally, and also writing and editing a lot more here and elsewhere.

Many College Grads Now Unemployable

W.F. Price · 21 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Unemployment has become a serious problem for new graduates, particularly those with liberal arts degrees. To mitigate the problem, which has been largely caused by colleges themselves, a Seattle startup has begun to teach real job skills to recent grads:

> One Monday afternoon in early March, a group of about a dozen college students gathered in an office space in lower Queen Anne. The mix of male and female coeds were all approaching graduation, most from liberal arts degree programs, but they were all still missing one key skillset: The tools to navigate a challenging job market.
>
> Hillary Spanjer, a 2013 Eastern Washington University grad, was one of those students. “My mom found an article on LinkedIn about Koru. She said it was put in her path for a reason,” she says. “She knew I had just graduated and was struggling to find a job in a more professional atmosphere. She was concerned my resumes were going into a pile of resumes.”
>
> Koru, a startup founded in Seattle last year, provides career counseling workshops to college seniors facing a looming and intimidating job market. It’s not all dry lecture or classroom learning though. Koru sets itself apart by bringing together students with professionals hiring for actual job opportunities at growing Northwest companies like Julep, REI and Zulily.
>
> The company is backed by a strong leadership team. Co-founder Josh Harrett is the former head of the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation’s higher education innovation unit and co-founder and CEO Kristen Hamilton headed Microsoft’s Educator Strategy and Marketing division before founding two different companies — most recently Onvia.
>
> The pair have raised approximately $4.35 million in funding for Koru from major investment firms that include Maveron, Battery Ventures, First Round Capital and Andreessen Horowitz. The forum will expand to San Francisco this summer.
>
> Hamilton’s inspiration for the program came from the children of her friends, recent grads having a hard time getting a foothold in a slow job market. “It’s lonely and it’s challenging,” she said. “The problem with losing the connection with your university’s resources, such as career centers, [is that] the network has changed and typically recent grads will apply too broadly and it’s sensed by employers that there is lack of interest or passion when looking for a new hire.”

There’s a real lack of practical thought concerning education in the US. This is due, in large part, to the fact that higher education itself has become such a powerful industry. The University of California, for example, was the single largest institutional contributor to Barack Obama’s reelection campaign. Even as it has grown more expensive and less useful, higher education in the US has become an entrenched bureaucracy that serves its own interests.

Germany, which has some of the lowest rates of higher education attendance in the developed world, has amongst the lowest youth unemployment. Instead of indoctrinating students in progressive orthodoxy, Germans have chosen to teach them the skills necessary for the modern workforce.

It wouldn’t be too difficult to do the same in the US, but the media and state cheerleading for the education industry is slowing us down even as it impoverishes the younger generation and takes years away from their productive lives. That young men are not as enthusiastic about liberal arts degrees is encouraging, but unfortunately their wives-to-be have picked up the slack, burdening future households with college loan debt that has no guarantee of ever paying off.

What needs to change first is the postwar idea that college practically ensures entry into the middle class and a chance to attain the American dream. Parents in particular should think about teaching their children job skills before they choose to pursue a degree. This way, young people can use their time in school to hone skills that they already know they will need in their future careers.

As for a liberal arts education, I'm afraid that it has become nothing more than a useless exercise in ideological conditioning. While the original purpose of such a degree was to teach young people how to think critically and draw from a broad knowledge base, these programs now accomplish the opposite. Colleges tolerate no dissent from orthodoxy, ban contrary ideas, and relentlessly persecute those who challenge the party line. Our best hope is to starve these departments, or perhaps to eliminate them so that we can start anew. Unfortunately, the latter is unlikely to be possible, so as long as college is optional, I'd recommend a boycott of all liberal arts programs that receive federal funding. This would give young people the opportunity to focus on survival skills instead of trained subservience, and it would diminish the influence of the education lobby, or at least expose it for the special interest group it has become.

The New Frontier

W.F. Price · 23 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In my new borderlands home, there's a dynamism that doesn't exist in the stale city. An odd fusion of young and old culture, people and civilizations. I stood in line today with American Indians, Asian Indians, Anglos, Slavs and Chinese. There's a stream of Canadians of all ethnicities pouring across the border every evening to stock up on cheaper American goods and gasoline. While at the local discount gas station, I came across a Chinese man filling a half dozen ten gallon gas cans to take back across the border. I couldn't resist asking him in Mandarin Chinese whether he intended to start his own gas station. He answered in a heavily accented dialect, as do most of the local Chinese, who come not from the established cities but the hinterlands. It's truly amazing to me to hear this, as I feel I've once again taken some excursion to the provinces in China, except this time in the United States.

I'm on the edge of a fertile valley, not far from the sea and foreboding mountains. Just off my left shoulder when walking south there's an enormous, snow-capped peak scored by glaciers. When walking north, ahead of me there are bucolic fields, wetlands and low, rolling meadows. To the west there's the Strait of Juan de Fuca, which channels a cool, wet breeze over the Frasier River Valley, and the bounty of the Salish Sea. To the east there's a rugged mountain range impassable except by a single highway some forty miles to the southeast.

I can hear seagulls, songbirds and crows. Bald eagles circle overhead, and hawks scour the flatlands for prey. Deer browse the lush fields nearby, growing fat on the late spring grasses and shoots.

There's a notable absence of police, but that isn't a problem, because the dark pathology of the city hasn't yet crept in. There are beggars and poor folks, but the hard edge of urban crime is conspicuously absent. That menacing specter of urban crime, which creeps up like a dark shadow to mindlessly beat and kill its prey, has so far stayed away from this virgin territory.

The people here are simpler, but in many ways more attractive. They are taller, more athletic and better-looking. They are also more prolific judging from the number of children. In comparison to city people, they probably aren't as bright, but it's a negligible difference, and hardly a failure all told. A tall, beautiful young man or woman here walks and moves with a natural grace and nobility that is conspicuously absent amongst the bent, glowering progressives that cautiously navigate the streets of the contemporary fascist polis. There's an openness, an ease of movement and a carefree, benevolent attitude that I haven't seen in decades in the city.

Instead of bitter ideologues, there are people with open minds and a willingness to engage with others. Rather than a fanatical devotion to sodomy and abortion, there is an appreciation for life, and a true respect for mothers — the hatred of children that characterizes urban Americans is notably absent. In some ways, spending time out here is like a rebirth into a community that has a true respect for humanity and life rather than a futile materialism and a burning hatred for mankind.

Feminists, as we know them, do not exist here. The women would be confused by the terms and the arguments. They live in communion with the men, and embrace motherhood and femininity. Likewise, anti-feminism means nothing to the men. It's just irrelevant.

Working on Books

W.F. Price · 23 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Today, I've been putting some pdf files together for ebooks, starting with Uncle Elmer's "Employment Game" for practice. Now that the manosphere is mature and there's already an enormous amount of content out there, I think it's time to add some permanence to the material, so I'm adding this kind of publishing to my repertoire. Unfortunately, it turns out that upgrading my OS has made it necessary for me to download an entirely new TeX engine, and that's going to take until well into the night, so no new documents just yet.

If any other manosphere bloggers out there are reading this, I've got you in mind, too. I intend to make it very easy for you to put out ebooks, or even print books if that's what you want. We really need a bigger platform for our content, and we shouldn't have to rely so much on blogs.

PUA Hater Identified as UC Santa Barbara Gunman

W.F. Price · 24 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Elliot Rodger, apparently an incel (involuntarily celibate) who posted on PUAhate.com, has been identified via a Youtube video (not police so far) as the shooter in the Los Angeles rampage that has claimed the lives of at least seven. In the video, an eerily calm Rodgers, seated in a black BMW, expresses his hatred for the women who reject him and all sexually active men, vowing to snuff out their lives in a bloody killing spree:

I've heard of PUAhate.com (the forum has been shut down since the shooting — Business Insider has an article with some comments here), but I've never checked it out, as getting laid is not an issue that concerns me too much. In fact, when Heartiste wrote some time back that mass murder could be caused by lack of access to sex, I thought he might be exaggerating, but when I read about the shooting last night the thought did cross my mind. Seems he was right.

Here's a darkly prescient passage from the above-linked Heartiste piece:

> …as the West reverts back to the ancestral sexual market that is currently in operation in sub-Saharan Africa, we are going to see a growing eunuchracy of involuntarily celibate betas and the marginalized men in their ranks decide that exiting in a blaze of hot lead beats living in loveless obscurity.

I do feel bad for incels, but have some trouble understanding why they think that getting laid will end their troubles and make them happy. In my experience, sex has caused me more trouble and cost me more than any other activity I've engaged in. Not that I advise avoiding it, but rather that one should be careful what one wishes for.

I also find it hard to relate to people who can't get laid. Especially when they are 22, not all that bad looking, and driving a BMW. Hell, at 22 I didn't even have a car and I was getting more action than I needed. Never had a dry spell until my divorce, and that was entirely voluntary. My main regret is not having exercised more restraint when younger. It leads me to wonder whether Elliot Rodger didn't have unreasonable expectations. He did mention hot blonde sorority girls, so maybe that was his problem: he was playing out of his league.

In any event, some feminists are now trying to blame MRAs for the killings, despite the fact that Elliot Rodger clearly doesn't care about anything other than sex, and in fact hates men who do have sex, which includes the overwhelming majority of men who care about men's issues/rights.

Elliot Rodger's Story: The Toll of The Sixth Deadly Sin

W.F. Price · 26 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I took the time to read Elliot Rodger's life story, and above all it is a tale of pathological envy. Elliot was not a normal kid, but from reading his story, it's clear that he wasn't that weird. No killing puppies, violent behavior, compulsive lying, sexual abuse or anything of that sort seem to have been a part of his childhood. Instead, he's consumed with an overwhelming sense of grievance for not measuring up to the standards he saw as normative. While he had difficulties when small, his descent was gradual at first, and took place mainly in late adolescence. Before then, if his account is to be believed, he may have had a chance.

From what I can make out, it looks like his mass murder could have been prevented if he'd been brought up in a different environment and a few simple guidelines had been followed. Not to say that he would have been a typical, cheerful adult, but rather that he would have had a chance to become functional instead of a spree killer.

Elliot was born to middle/upper middle class parents who had decent, if not entirely stable, careers. However, rather than the lifestyle one might expect from this socioeconomic group in most of the US, which would probably consist of a rather bland, but comfortable, house in a suburban neighborhood surrounded by peers of equivalent wealth and status, he grew up surrounded by California's ultra-rich and powerful. Both of his parents worked in film and socialized with the rich and famous. He spent a lot of time as a boy surrounded by these people, and eventually developed a strong desire to attain that status and lifestyle which included, of course, hot blondes.

Eventually, as he entered puberty, status issues, strongly tied up in the taboos of race and sex that consume contemporary America, drove him into a state of social withdrawal, and he spent a few years (most of high school) glued to a computer screen playing World of Warcraft. He was extremely conscious of class, feeling deeply disappointed when his parents couldn't keep up with the people he admired. He frequently refers to this or that school or neighborhood as "bad," and expresses shame when he is forced by circumstance to attend certain schools or live in certain neighborhoods.

I can understand where he's coming from, having attended a school where I clearly didn't belong due to class differences for most of my childhood. However, having some distinctly working-class and unpretentious middle class family members with whom I identified and was very close, I never felt that sense of alienation as profoundly as Elliot did. It was relatively easy for me to accept that I wasn't one of these people, and that I didn't really want to be in any event, nor did I particularly admire or look up to them. Nevertheless, it was far from ideal, and I held a bit of a grudge for a few years after I managed to escape from that environment.

But for Elliot, there was no escape — only a binary world of success or failure. He apparently had no idea that there was a different, equally rewarding way of life out there. Sure, most of the rest of us don't live in such opulence and style, but we're hardly the worse for it, and I'd venture to say that the ultra rich – the heirs in particular – have a tendency toward moral failure and depravity. Not all of them by any means, but the experience of being on top of the world as a child doesn't tend to incline one toward humility and empathy for others. I remember, for example, saying that I wanted to get out of high school early (because I really hated the social environment) and intended to enroll in a running start program at a community college. One of the kids in the class laughed at the notion of going to a community college, and said "what do you want to do, work in McDonald's all your life?" Unfortunately, my parents wouldn't let me enroll in the running start program – something I regret to this day – but at least I was able to transfer to another school shortly thereafter and leave the insular attitudes behind.

So Elliot Rodger was one of these little snobs, only he couldn't back it up with the real money or status. He identified with them, yet he was not one of them. This desire to be a part of the California elite is a constant refrain in his life story. Either he learned it from his parents or they encouraged the development of this attitude through lifestyle and social choices.

His reaction to attending a private Katy Perry concert after his mother obtained tickets from a rich friend:

> …There was upbeat music playing the entire time, and a lot of wealthy families with their kids attended. Every family there must have had a net worth of at least twenty million, to be able to hire private jets. I tried to pretend as if I was part of a wealthy family. I should be. That was the life I was meant to live. I WOULD BE! If only my damnable mother had married into wealth instead of being selfish. If only my failure of a father had made better decisions with his directing career instead of wasting his money on that stupid documentary.
>
> I couldn't help but feel a bitter form of envy at all of the rich kids at the concert. They grew up in lavish mansions, indulged in excessive opulence, and will never have to worry about anything in their pleasurable, hedonistic lives. I would take great pleasure in watching all of those rich families burn alive. Looking at all of them really drilled in my mind the importance of wealth. Wealth is one of the most important defining factors of self-worth and superiority. I hated and envied all of those kids for being born into wealth, while I had to struggle to find a way to claim wealth for myself. I had to be ruthless, and do whatever it takes to attain such wealth. After all, it was my only hope of ever being worthy of getting a girlfriend and living the life of gratification that I desire.

This brings us to the first important lesson for parents. Do not inflict your own delusions of grandeur on your kids. If you are ambitious, that's fine, but if you are not one of those people, and it's very easy to tell who is by simply adding up assets and comparing houses, don't try to put your kids on an even footing with theirs, because they will instead inevitably end up as the low man on the totem pole, and some kids react very badly to this.

Elliot was also deeply embittered by the consequences of his parents' divorce. I have no idea who was at fault in the divorce, but it clearly caused some financial pain for the family, as divorce almost always does. He also despised his stepmother, a Moroccan woman with whom he failed to see eye to eye. His father, ever the beta, consistently allowed himself to be dragged into disputes between his son and his wife.

His mother, on the other hand, seems to have lived a lackadaisical life, subsisting mainly on child support and odd jobs. Elliot desperately hoped his attractive mother would marry a rich man, thinking that would solve all his problems. However, it seems that her rich boyfriends were not all that keen on the idea of marriage.

So the second lesson is do not divorce. Maybe it seems like a good idea sometimes, but it usually isn't, and children tend to pay for it for a long time, if not for life. Of course, if you're a self-centered, vapid type, perhaps nothing can stop you, but it should be commonly known what a train wreck divorce typically causes in people's lives.

One of Elliot's biggest problems in high school was an addiction to online gaming; World of Warcraft in particular. Perhaps most people don't take it all that seriously, but an addiction to gaming can be a very serious problem. I have first-hand experience — a WoW addiction was probably the most important factor in the destruction of my first marriage. Because I'm male, readers might think I'm admitting to having been a compulsive gamer, but sadly it was my ex who was on the game some 40 hours a week. After a year of this, we were strangers in the same house, and I was so demoralized that I stopped trying to act like a husband.

Third lesson: If your kid develops a gaming addiction, toss the computer out (quite literally if it comes to that). It's unhealthy, antisocial and an enormous waste of time and talent. If he or she screams and throws a fit, don't give in. Come down firmly on the matter. Tell the kid that this gaming is a disgrace, and he has to get out and do something productive. This is much harder when two households are involved (one parent might let the kid play to curry favor), which brings us again to the second lesson.

Finally, Elliot's parents never spoke frankly with him about sex and relationships. Perhaps that's because they assumed that was something schools handle. I've come to see support for sexual education in schools as a form of parental cowardice — people don't want to have to do the job themselves, so they outsource it to teachers. Bad idea. Not only because teachers cannot be trusted to do a good job; they must also teach with a room full of students rather than in a private setting where a kid will feel more comfortable and open, and willing to ask questions about what troubles him. Elliot Rodger expressed deep shame and confusion over his sexuality, and assiduously avoided the subject when around his parents. His parents apparently were relieved by this, but I bet they don’t feel that way anymore.

The fourth lesson, therefore, is that if you want your child to have a mature understanding of sexuality and relationships, you’re going to have to take on the job of teaching him yourself. As a parent, it’s your duty, and no teacher or sex-ed program can make up for it if you fail to perform it yourself.

At this point, we’ll never know for sure whether Elliot Rodger’s rampage could have been averted, but his life story – as he wrote it – does strongly suggest that it might have been if he’d been raised differently. Unfortunately, it seems that by late adolescence/early adulthood he was already broken and headed for a serious crisis. He began stalking and assaulting people – romantic couples first – eventually leading to him being on the receiving end of a severe beating that left him with a broken leg. By 2013, he alienated his friends, became increasingly paranoid and delusional, and began to develop elaborate schemes of vengeance. Early this year, he was losing his mind, describing hope as a faintly flickering candle in the midst of darkness and formulating his final act — his “day of retribution.” After his mother saw some angry, disturbing Youtube videos he posted, he was visited by the police, who he claims could have foiled his plans by searching his room. He managed to calmly reassure them that everything was fine, and they left. A couple weeks later, he went on his rampage, and now it is history.

And this is how Elliot Rodger left the world, consumed and driven to madness by envy.

My Latest Effort

W.F. Price · 27 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I wrote a few days ago that I'm going to start making books, and I've put some serious hours into getting used to my typesetting program lately. The work has paid off. It's getting easier to use it all the time. Fortunately, I have some experience with markup languages, so I'm not starting from scratch, but LaTeX is not for the faint of heart. Most people who use it to write books and papers are apparently high level scientists, so it has all sorts of tools for expressing equations and the like, and of course many different "packages" and document classes for producing anything from scientific articles to screenplays. However, despite the fact that it can be a bit of a cranky old program, I'm growing rather fond of it.

So in order to warm up a bit, I decided to put out a few practice documents and see how they came out. First, I typeset Uncle Elmer's "Employment Game," and it came out looking quite nice. However, Elmer and I agreed that the content needs a little more tweaking, so we'll have that ready later.

Today, I spent hours on an old novel I found written by none other than Jacques Futrelle, David Futrelle's great grandfather. It's in the public domain now (I pulled it off the Internet), so I figured "why not?" I doubt anyone has bothered to publish a readable version in years, and it turned out to be an interesting project. My rendering of the novel turned out pretty nicely, if I do say so myself. It's kind of a hybrid ebook/print book, so it could serve either purpose. If I'd chosen to make it strictly one or the other I'd have made a few changes, but not many.

Naturally, I added an introduction that puts the novel in context for our readers. Because aside from the introduction it all came from public domain material, feel free to do what you please with it. Copy it, print it, send it around — it's yours to use as you wish.

Let me know what you think of the way the ebook looks. I'd be happy to have some feedback.

Here it is:

The Chase of the Golden Plate

Futrelle on NPR: 45 Minutes of Hating on Men

W.F. Price · 28 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been listening to the NPR program Futrelle spoke on for a couple minutes yesterday, and man is it a bore. There's a feminist named Soraya Chemaly who goes through the interminable feminist talking points, then Futrelle chimes in with his "expertise" on men's sites, and finally this effeminate little guy named Robert Heasley who sounds like an old lady and somehow gets paid to run a "men's studies" program.

You might think the point of the program is to use the Isla Vista massacre to single out guys who write on men's issues or MRAs, but actually it's almost entirely about how all men are to blame! Ironically, it's exactly this attitude that pushed me into online men's advocacy. Being part of the collectively "guilty" class can really suck. It has real life consequences, especially for men who go through divorce/custody disputes. As if having only a 10% chance of getting equal custody of your children is somehow a privilege…

Frankly, I'm glad they took the approach they did on the program. Admitting that the real goal is collective blame of men is a good start. It will alienate more men and prove that our views are moderate in comparison to the feminists'.

So keep up the good work, people!

Listen here (make sure you aren't operating heavy machinery — you may fall asleep):

In other news, for those who haven't seen it yet, I'm still offering the writings of David Futrelle's benevolently chauvinist great grandfather to showcase my ebook production skills:

The Chase of the Golden Plate

Maya Angelou, A Woman who Loved Men, Dead at 86

W.F. Price · 28 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> The sadness of the women's movement is that they don't allow the necessity of love. See, I don't personally trust any revolution where love is not allowed.
>
> –Maya Angelou

I've never been a big fan of contemporary poetry because so much of it is so bad that I can't be bothered to go through it all to find the good stuff. But Maya Angelou was not one of the awful ones. She also really appreciated men. She loved them as only a healthy woman can, and I'll bet in her time they loved her back.

She wrote a poem about men titled, quite appropriately, "Men."

> When I was young, I used to > Watch behind the curtains
> As men walked up and down the street. Wino men, old men.
> Young men sharp as mustard.
> See them. Men are always > Going somewhere.
> They knew I was there. Fifteen
> Years old and starving for them.
> Under my window, they would pauses,
> Their shoulders high like the
> Breasts of a young girl,
> Jacket tails slapping over
> Those behinds,
> Men.
>
> One day they hold you in the > Palms of their hands, gentle, as if you
> Were the last raw egg in the world. Then
> They tighten up. Just a little. The > First squeeze is nice. A quick hug.
> Soft into your defenselessness. A little > More. The hurt begins. Wrench out a > Smile that slides around the fear. When the > Air disappears,
> Your mind pops, exploding fiercely, briefly,
> Like the head of a kitchen match. Shattered.
> It is your juice
> That runs down their legs. Staining their shoes.
> When the earth rights itself again,
> And taste tries to return to the tongue,
> Your body has slammed shut. Forever.
> No keys exist.
>
> Then the window draws full upon
> Your mind. There, just beyond
> The sway of curtains, men walk.

> Knowing something.
> Going someplace.
> But this time, I will simply
> Stand and watch.
>
> Maybe.

RIP Maya Angelou.

The National Consensus is Fading Away

W.F. Price · 28 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As the US becomes more diverse and less of a nation, I've noticed that there's no longer a consensus about things, especially amongst the young, who are united not by a sense of common cause and country but by universal fashion trends if anything at all. Back in the 90s, when I came of age, young people still took causes seriously. Sure, they were stupid causes, but people were passionate about them. I went to a soundgarden concert back in 1990 — the main event at Seattle's Bumbershoot festival. As a younger teen, I was a huge fan. I watched Chris Cornell belt out "Hands All Over" and was absolutely thrilled. It's the best concert I've ever been to; every one I've attended after that has been a disappointment.

But in hindsight, Hands All Over is a thoughtless environmentalist song. The lyrics stink, and go on and on about killing and raping your mother (earth). Trees are being cut down "like dying soldiers." Here's an excerpt:

Hands all over the coastal waters
The crew men thank her
Then lay down their oily blanket
Hands all over the inland forest
In a striking motion trees fall down
Like dying soldiers

It's terrible and socially irresponsible. I wonder whether formerly lower middle class Chris Cornell, living in his mansion paid for with royalties from album sales, ever bothers to think of all the timber and energy workers on the Pacific Coast who lost their way of life during the 80s and 90s. Not to say all the forests should be mowed down and oil dumped in the water (both would be wasteful), but rather that hysteria over the environment has cost us a great deal over the years, and all we've done is outsource bad practices to countries like China, where no attention whatsoever is paid to environmental impact. Taking the entire earth into account, we've actually made things worse!

Today, however, I've noticed that it's the same people who are holding up the torch for the cause, only they're about twenty years older. Likewise, the feminist activists, gay activists and, to tell the truth, MRAs, are mainly over 40. Whenever there's a "student protest," it's invariably organized by older faculty members (for which they should be summarily fired), and almost all youth causes are entirely contrived by aging activists.

Part of the reason for this is the horribly repressive nature of contemporary society; it seems that the freedom loving radicals of the 70s weren't so keen on the idea of freedom once they rose to power. But it's also because young people just don't give a damn. They are so immersed in their gadgets and electronic social circles and so confused about the meaning of life due to the overwhelming number of conflicting messages out there that they've just put it out of their minds.

For example, millennials are said to be big supporters of gay marriage. I don't think they have strong convictions either way, but rather just think that people should be able to do what they want. The biggest libertarians out there tend to be people who have led the most sheltered lives of all, and that's an understandable reaction for people who grew up in the most incarceration-happy regime in history, although I'm not sure they understand the implications of running a society based on self-gratification.

This youth apathy toward political causes and "anything goes" mentality is something we ought to take into account when reaching out and spreading a message. What it means is that we don't really have to worry much about the screeching of the feminists, because theirs is just one more voice kids tune out when they hear it. In this recent Elliot Rodger incident, feminists have felt that this is the one big opportunity to win big forever and all time, but I did a little research into my traffic recently, and found that I was getting an enormous amount of hits from millennials who were searching for "Elliot Rodger blonde," as I suspected might happen when I posted those pictures. Somehow, I don't think they give a damn about MRA or feminism — Rodger himself certainly didn't.

In fact, their concerns square pretty much with Rodger's. They are preoccupied with sex, status and fame. Theirs is a caste society in which a vast number of tribes of varying races and ethnicities live in some disjointed post-national empire. They don't care about serious issues that older people hold dear, they have no cohesive national identity, and they don't pay attention to the national narrative. The "America" we knew back in the 1980s is old. Most of it is pushing senior citizen age or already there, and its youngest citizens are almost 35. Within a year or two, it will be a numerical minority — if it isn't already. What comes next is up in the air, but I can feel the cries of traditional activists growing weaker and fainter every day.

At this point, it's time to prepare for a new kind of politics, and a new society. Some of the younger guys I've been in contact with, like Matt Forney and Chuck Ross, instinctively understand this. Matt, for example, doesn't appear to care at all what feminists think of him, and rather than chalking that up to youthful bravado I tend to think it's because hardly any of his peers do, either. I sincerely think we should adopt the same attitude. Who under the age of 35 cares what feminists say about MRAs in the Washington Post? Who listens to NPR? Every single day, their relevance is fading away. Let's not make the same mistake by putting our faith in the traditional information outlets — it's time to leave it behind and carry on.

Looking for a Graphic Designer for Book Covers

W.F. Price · 29 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I could probably find someone locally, but for manosphere projects it would be nice to pass some business along to a fellow traveler. Anyone interested should get in touch through the contact page and send a couple samples or a link to a portfolio. When I get ebook or print jobs, I'll contract out the cover design to a graphic designer partner.

What do Feminists, Elliot Rodger and Ta-Nahesi Coates Have in Common?

W.F. Price · 29 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Right before the Isla Vista massacre, The Atlantic published a long screed by Ta-Nahesi Coates which, by listing grievances against whites, made the case for reparations for blacks. I read the article, and found parts of it to be highly disturbing, particularly the implication that white Americans should be held collectively responsible as Germans were following World War II. However, effusive praise for this naked display of racial hostility dominated the progressive twittersphere, some of which was so over the top it read as parody. I've come over time to sympathize with the plight of working and underclass black men, particularly after being exposed to the criminal justice system through divorce (divorced, non-custodial fathers are automatically and without exception placed on something akin to parole and treated for all intents and purposes like convicted criminals), but when I see some spoiled, privileged young scribbler for an elitist publication tell me and my kids that we owe him a living, it really sets my blood to boiling.

However, as soon as the accolades for Coates racial grievance screed began, they were cut short by Elliot Rodger's massacre, which rapidly became the number one news item. When his life story came up online, I read it through and found it to be an extremely long list of grievances, much like Coates anti-white article. His near hysterical sense of having been violated even contributed to the impression that there was something unusually effeminate about him. Almost immediately, the feminists responded with an extremely long list of grievances, not against Elliot Rodger, but against all men. The last week has been a true jamboree of grievance victimhood.

Could it be that incessantly listing grievances – and feeling excessively, unreasonably aggrieved – is a characteristic of entitlement? It looks that way. Those who lack entitlement also lack a voice; they are not even given an opportunity to make their case. And indeed, one of the explicit goals of the feminist response to Elliot Rodger's attack is to shut down dissenting opinions. Their logic goes something like this: "if men are allowed to have any say over gender issues, it will lead directly to violence." Sounds like they fear an insurrection. In fact, it brings to mind the old attitudes about allowing slaves to speak out. Don't you know that if slaves are allowed any say over their fate some John Brown will immediately lead them to slaughter all those living off their labor? It is a plantation mentality. Feminist notions of "the patriarchy" bear an uncanny resemblance to old "Curse of Ham" arguments used to justify maltreatment of slaves.

It should also be pointed out that while Elliot Rodger did in fact kill some people, entitlement feminism has arguably led to far more deaths. By placing more women and children in the most risky category of single mother household, they have caused untold numbers of assaults, deaths through neglect and homicides. Six dead is a drop in the bucket compared to the toll of the broken family in the US, the responsibility for which lies squarely at the feet of gender feminists, who have tirelessly worked to destroy the nuclear family, thereby sending countless Americans to ruin, and many to their graves.

Grievance breeds a sense of entitlement, and a sense of entitlement is used to justify aggression against others. When it comes to using this as a tool, Elliot Rodger was a rank amateur — he accomplished nothing but a pointless act of vengeance against his roommates and a few strangers, immediately followed by his own death. Feminists, on the other hand, recycle their grievances constantly, using them year after year to extract ever more resources from the rest of us and use the state to commit violence by proxy against families, all the while portraying themselves as victims.

Tell me, who's really entitled here?

Removed Rodger eBook, but Need More Projects

W.F. Price · 30 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

At Dalrock's request, which was reasonable, I took down the post containing the eBook of Elliot Rodger's manifesto from the main page. I'm keeping the file, but moving it to a resource for academics and law enforcement, because it may actually be true that the general public will think I had something to do with inspiring the ebook, because most of the general public doesn't read. Sometimes I forget these things — it used to be part of my job to compile terrorist manifestos and the like, and I thought open sourcing intelligence was a great way to solve problems. After all, if anyone wants to see whether Elliot Rodger has any connection to or inspiration from the manosphere, all they have to do is read his manifesto, and they will see that he does not. The problem is, as Dalrock implied, most of them will not bother to do so.

So instead of wasting my skills on projects that will bear no fruit, I'm going to offer to put together eBooks for some leading manosphere bloggers, and entirely for free, as both a gesture of goodwill and an advertisement of my services.

So how about it, Dalrock? Have a list of your best articles? Just hand them over and I'll crank out a tidy book in either print or eBook format — your choice.

The Allure of the Mountains

W.F. Price · 1 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Just about every year it seems someone dies on Mt. Rainier, but the truth is that it isn't quite that common — that's just the average. However, if you consider all the climbing and skiing deaths in all of Washington state, people do die pretty much every year. That doesn't include those lost in the woods or drowned in the cold water of rivers, lakes and the sea — those numbers are probably significantly higher, but apparently less remarkable.

So it didn't surprise me all that much when I read about the recent climbing accident on Mt. Rainier, which looks to have claimed the lives of six. By global standards, Mt. Rainier, named after Royal Navy Rear Admiral Peter Rainier, is of middling height at only 14,411 feet (4,392 meters). However, it looks very formidable, because it starts near sea level and towers over the cities and towns to its west as well as surrounding peaks. Because it stands above all else in its vicinity, its topographical prominence is the highest in the lower 48, and at #21 worldwide higher even than K2.

The mountain is largely encased in ice, and considered one of the world's most dangerous volcanoes. If it blew, it would eject billions of tons of ash and send rivers of boiling mud rushing down valleys toward Puget Sound, destroying all in their path. Nevertheless, it's a beautiful peak. Standing on the south beach of Seward Park, so near my old home, one can see it looming over the horizon like some enormous, shining god, appearing to float in the air on a hazy day. There's something about such peaks that beckons a certain type of adventurer, and thousands from all over the world make the trek to conquer the mountain every year. Roughly half of the attempts are successful.

Today, I live close to another one of Washington's volcanoes – Mt. Baker – which at 10,781 feet (3,286 meters) is a somewhat smaller version of Mt. Rainier. It has a similar shape and is also covered year-round with ice. Mt. Baker has the distinction of having the highest yearly snowfall on earth, which accounts for its heavily glaciated slopes. Almost a hundred feet of snow fell at the Mt. Baker Ski Area in 1999; a more typical total is between fifty and sixty feet per year.

A rather common view from my neighborhood:

The peaks of Washington state hold a particular attraction because they are located in a temperate, fertile environment reminiscent of Western Europe. In Washington state, one can find an approximation of rainy Britain on the coast, Spain on the inland plateaus and deserts and Switzerland in the rugged mountain ranges. Near where I currently live, there's something of a little Netherlands in the Nooksack/Frasier River valleys. Far to the east, the rolling, golden hills of the Palouse bring the Auvergne to mind.

If there's anything lacking in the region, it's a sense of history and culture, but in time that will come — hopefully before the fanaticism of the progressives can destroy its development. This is a real threat; we need only look at China and Russia as examples of how far back a highly motivated and politicized urban minority can set an entire nation.

However, even tragedies such as the recent deaths of six climbers on Mt. Rainier can provide some cause for optimism; if there's something so majestic and stunning about our land that people are willing to risk their lives to see it from on high, then perhaps that noble part of the human spirit that inspires us with love for our land will see us through these troubling times and onto something better.

Advice for Seattle Tech Workers Who Want to Meet Women

W.F. Price · 2 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Having suffered through Tricia Romano's long whine about how hard it is to find hot guys in Seattle, I thought I'd offer some suggestions for the tech workers who have to weed through these types in order to find a decent girl. Anecdotally, I've heard that Seattle has a lousy dating scene. I wouldn't really know, because I haven't dated in Seattle since I was a teenager. Not to say I never met girls, but I never went on dates. Instead, I'd see a girl I was interested in, gauge her interest in me, engage in some small talk, then get her contact info. If she's interested, you'll know before you go out for coffee or whatever it is people do for dates, so you don't have to engage in the job interview style mood killer that characterizes the typical "date." But that's what Game is for, and writing about it isn't my specialty. Look to Heartiste or Roosh for more details.

What I do know about is how the demographics of the city have changed, and why there's a shortage of opportunities compared to the old days of the 90s. There are fewer attractive women in Seattle than there were 20 years ago, and there are several reasons for this:

The national obesity trend

Young women are significantly fatter today than they were in the 90s. This sadly applies to Seattle, too, although perhaps not as much as some other regions.

Families with children have fled Seattle

Attractive young women are not too long out of school, and these days most young people are broke. Because of this, they tend to stay close to home – or at home with parents – even if they have attended a university. Many families were pushed out of expensive cities like Seattle by the real estate bubbles, and very often their daughters have remained in the suburban/exurban communities they relocated to. Because most young women (and most young men these days, too) lack the skills and/or experience needed for a job in the city that pays enough to make rent, they are stuck there, often unemployed or working for low wages in retail/service.

Women are not very enterprising

Young women are not generally high earners; they need support. It isn't because of the patriarchy or any other feminist fantasy, but rather because they don't want to or can't perform the difficult jobs that pay well. Additionally, men tend to be mobile, going where the money is, while women often stay behind. Detroit has very few opportunities, and therefore has a big surplus of women, the men having left to find work; North Dakota oil country, which has lots of job opportunities, has a lot more men than women. Likewise, the Seattle and San Francisco tech sectors are overwhelmingly male, resulting in a male-skewed sex ratio among the young in these cities.

So here's my advice: don't invest too much effort in Seattle proper. Get out on the weekends. It's only a twenty minute drive (at most) to get out of the city limits. Preferably, you should even get out of King County, or at least go to the quieter parts of the county. Find places outside the tech centers where the young people hang out and be friendly to both men and women. You won't find all the women up to standard, but there will be many, many more to choose from. They will also be less entitled than Seattle females, and more open to meeting new people. They may even appreciate the fact that you work hard and make decent money — it could compare favorably to the local boys who can barely make ends meet. Also, if you aren't from Seattle yourself (and that's probably the case), you might find them more like the people you grew up with, and that will make it easier to relate to them.

I'm a Seattle native, born and bred, but like most natives I finally had enough of it and left. It isn't a family-friendly city these days, and I am at a point in life where that's an important consideration. But when I was young it was not too bad, and lacking the extreme criminality seen in many of America's cities at the time actually quite a nice lifestyle. There were lots of young, independent types living on Capitol Hill and in the U-District back in the 90s.

You could work part time at a low-skill job and it would pay enough to cover your rent and allow plenty of time for your music or whatever interested you. If you've ever seen the grunge-era movie Singles, where Matt Dillon's character delivers flowers part time to subsidize his rock band, it isn't far from the reality of that time. Today, your typical one bedroom on Capitol Hill goes for more than a low wage worker earns in a month working full time.

Because women like and value the carefree, comfortable lifestyle even more than men, your best bet is to go where it exists. Did the 49er prospectors go up into the hills to find women? No, they went there for gold, and when they got it they went straight to San Francisco, where there were women. Think of our tech sectors today as analogous to the mining camps of the 19th century. It's an odd inversion from an historical perspective, but it's today's reality. All you'd find in the mining camps would be a few hard-edged, flinty old broads who have serviced hundreds – if not thousands – of men. If you wanted any quality at all, you'd go where the ladies were. Today, that's the exurbs, the small cities and towns.

In these idyllic locales, instead of leathery, tattooed feminists with graduate degrees and dozens of notches on their belts, you'll find pleasant, attractive young women whose romantic notions haven't been transformed into hardened cynicism by years of one night stands. And if you're a normal young man that's exactly the kind of women you prefer.

So go ahead and make your money in Seattle, but get out for love! And when you have kids, stay out for your sake and theirs. Maybe we can bring back something like the good old days at some point in our lives, but I think it's going to take a while.

Middle-Aged Journalist Blames Lack of Love Life on "Brogrammers"

W.F. Price · 2 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tricia Romano, who apparently went to grad school at the University of Washington in the 90s, which would put her right around 40 give or take a couple years, has declared that techies are responsible for her lackluster sex life. Not to dump on Ms. Romano too much, but she doesn't exactly stand out from the crowd by any stretch of the imagination (the tattoo isn't helpful). She's passable, but she isn't a hot young thing anymore, and she should probably adjust her expectations accordingly.

However, instead of accepting the approach of the wall, she has chosen to blame guys who work at Amazon.com, much as other embittered feminists are blaming techies for San Francisco's housing problems. I don't care much for Amazon, but some of my friends have worked there, and there's nothing wrong with them that I can see. For the most part they are overworked, chewed up and spit out by a ruthless corporation that shows absolutely no loyalty to employees (which is why I despise the monopolistic, megalomaniacal Jeff Bezos). Even if they are making $100k, it's not all that much on an hourly basis, as many are expected to work up to 3,000 hours per year and be on call 24/7 (urban public school teachers with mid-level seniority can easily make more per hour than programmers). They are also ruthlessly exploited by real estate developers and speculators, who have jacked up rents and property values so high that a six figure income barely supports a family of three in West Coast tech centers. Again, how are these overworked, exploited guys to blame for predatory urban capitalists, much less Tricia Romano's desultory sex life?

But somehow she finds a way. She claims they aren't sexually appealing to her, because they don't know how to talk about the most fascinating subject on earth: Tricia Romano.

> I sat across from him and listened. He was trim, tall, bearded (as they all seem to be), a recent transplant, having only lived in Seattle for a year or so and worked at a start-up, after burning out at Amazon (as they all seem to have). He rode his bike around town; he had good taste in food and wine; and he lived across the street from where we were meeting. He was a software engineer or did something in tech (as they all did). And he was utterly unmemorable.
>
> I don't think he asked me a single question about myself. Our date—if you call these impromptu Internet meetings, dates—lasted an hour. It felt more like a job interview, but not the way a date is supposed to be a job interview. There was no grilling about where you were from and what your family was like and what you were looking for.

Romano dates herself when she nostalgically recalls the good old days of the 90s, back when Seattle was hip and alternative and interesting (and she was in her 20s):

> This wasn't what I'd signed up for. I'd moved back to Seattle, in particular to Capitol Hill, because when I'd lived here during the '90s it was a beacon of diversity for weirdos. (I stress "weirdos"—there are few people of color in Seattle.) The weirdos were: young gay boys, old hippies of varying sexuality, straight artists and musicians, softball lesbians, punk-rock dykes who played house music, metal musicians, ravers, or people into the fetish scene. They were not straight, white guys from flyover country or California imported by a software company. They spent their time doing things other than making Jeff Bezos more money.

I can sympathize a bit here. I myself miss the "weirdos." In fact, it isn't just the weirdos who have disappeared, but the people she'd probably find "weirdly normal" (i.e. married, middle class families) as well. Seattle has become a left-fascist corporatocracy administered by a junta of rainbow warriors. Their primary goal, as far as I can tell, is waging war on the American working and middle class for the benefit of the parasitic classes at the top and bottom of society. This is accomplished by destroying the low and middle-income private sector jobs that support an independent lifestyle (for artists and bohemian types, too), overtaxing the working poor and middle class, cronyism and speculation — all in the name of "progress." If this means shoving out the "weirdos" in order to make room for a corporate drone tax base to fill government coffers and please billionaire overlords like Jeff Bezos, then so be it.

But unfortunately for Ms. Romano, social ills are not the source of her amorous troubles. Instead, her problem is so obvious that it should hardly need to be pointed out, but for her benefit I'll do so anyway: She's 40 and she's acting like an adolescent. Doesn't she know dating is for kids? Normal, sexually active middle-aged adults are typically in longstanding monogamous relationships. Does she seriously think, at her age, that there are going to be a lot of "interesting" men at her beck and call? Or that they will be interested in her? I hear a lot about men's supposed entitlement, but hers takes the cake. 40-year-old spinster can't find a man! Stop the presses and listen to her complain! Something must be done!

No, it isn't the techies, but the fact that the guys she was sleeping with back in the 90s have grown up and moved on, and she hasn't.

Extortion and Appeasement

W.F. Price · 3 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I heard about the AVfM Detroit hotel controversy a few days ago, and thought I'd keep my mouth shut until Paul Elam made up his mind about how to handle it. It seems donors came through and paid off the protection fee plus associated insurance, which came out to $25,000 — about what I guessed they'd want. Actually, I guessed $20,000 for the cops alone, not taking the insurance fee into account.

I'm glad the conference is going ahead as planned, and I hope this is the last of its troubles, but I wouldn't count on it.

I took a look at the letter the hotel sent to Paul, and quite frankly it screamed bullshit. I don't believe anyone threatened the staff and other guests, for starters, and I don't even think there were any credible threats at all. Honestly, the hotel's letter had the same tone one sees in those 419 scams. In my opinion, it was just the good old Detroit PD's extortion racket plus in all likelihood a kickback to the hotel manager. Do I think a feminist called the hotel? Probably. I'm sure someone even said nasty things about AVfM. And it is always possible one of those street junkie Marxists made a threat by phone. But if the latter had happened, then where's the police report? Surely, if AVfM is required to cough up $25k, then there must be some corroborating, official evidence, even if it has been manufactured out of whole cloth. I mean, did the police or the hotel even bother to check the phone logs?

Following is the text of the letter for those who haven't seen it (AVfM took it down for some reason, but it's still archived on Google):

> DOUBLETREE SUITES
>
> May 29, 2014
>
> Mr. Paul Elam
> A Voice for Men
>
> Houston, TX _
>
> Re: Quick Confirmation Agreement – Revised between A Voice for Men (Group) and Fort Shelby Hotel Master Tenant lLC (tlOwner") regarding the event contracted from June 26-29, 2014 at the DoubletreeSuites by Hilton Detroit Downtown – Fort Shelby (the "Agreement").
>
> Dear Mr. Elam: Regarding the International Conference on Men's Issues scheduled at our hotel, the DoubleTree Suites by Hilton Detroit Downtown – Fort Shelby, we have received numerous calls and threats and are concerned for the safety and well-being of our employees, our guests and your attendees. The threats have escalated to include death threats, physical violence against our staff and other guests as well as damage to the property. The callers have indicated that they will be stationed within the hotel as guests, which raises our level of concern.
>
> We take these threats seriously and for the protection of our staff and guests, Under Section 8 of the Agreement, we may require you to provide, at your expense and in our discretion, adequate security in light of the nature of your Event. Based upon the nature of these threats, we have determined that adequate security measures include the engagement of the Detroit Police Department (DPD) to secure the building. Based upon the number of access and egress points we will require 2 Detroit Police officers in the lobby and 3 officers on the meeting room floor, each on a 24 hour basis. As the threats include accessing the guests floors another 3 officers on the guest floors on a 24 hour basis. This is a minimum of 7 officers at all times, 24 hours a day but could increase based on further threats orcircumstances that warrant the addition of security.
>
> As noted in Section 8, the cost associated with this enhanced security is the responsibility of the Group and the Group must provide us with proof and evidence of such security being engaged.
>
> Accordingly, you will need to contact and contract directly with the DPD for such services. Such contract must > be a firm commitment with no contingencies. Once you have contracted with the OPO, we require a copy of the signed contract for our files.

>
> In addition, the Section 19 of the Agreement requires you to Commercial General liability Insurance with limits not less than Two Million US dollars ($2,000,000 US) with the Hotel and “Hotel Indemnified Parties” added as additional insured under all applicable polices (in addition to the other requirements under Section 19).
>
> Page 2
>
> In light of the upcoming announced protests in advance of your meeting and the need for advanceplanning, we must receive (1) confirmation and a copy of the contract with DPD and {2} evidence of insurance in accordance with Section 19, induding additional insured status by no later than June 6, 2014 for your event to proceed.
>
> We also remind you of your obligations under the Agreement to control the conduct of your event (Section 9 of the Agreement). Accordingly, we will ask the assistance of the Group and your attendees to abide by any security measures we deem necessary as we move closer to the event date and to participate in your actions to minimize the disruption to the hotel’s business.
>
> While we understand your commitment to move forward with this event, I am sure you will agree that the safety and well-being of your attendees, other guests and our staff cannot be taken lightly.

Seems whoever wrote the letter can’t even count… 2+3+3 = 7?

The entire substance of the letter boils down to this:

“Somebody called and made threats, so fork over a large sum of money and don’t get any ideas about trying to negotiate.”

And with absolutely no corroborating evidence (that I know of, and knowing Paul he’d have already broadcast it if there were). This, my friends, is what extortion looks like.

Sometimes, it is worth it to hire an attorney to look over an agreement before you sign it.

However, I do fully believe that Paul and the people at AVfM believe the threats were credible. There’s no reason to make something like that up from that end, as feminists are suggesting. I think they’re being naïve, but there’s no sin in that.

The problem with Detroit is that it is the most left-wing city in the US, and AVfM, despite its best efforts, simply doesn’t fit into that coalition. AVfM is comprised mainly of men – and mostly white men at that – and if they are allowed on the grievance train, who is left to take from? Certainly there are men in Detroit who have had it hard, and it’s a shame, but the city now has one of the highest female-to-male ratios of any city in the US. And trust me, the females in Detroit are not dumb enough to think that they’ll derive any advantage at all from siding with men who don’t want to be forced to support women.

So politically speaking there’s probably subzero support for AVfM in Detroit. Holding an MRA conference there is roughly akin to holding a reparations conference in Boise, Idaho — the locals aren’t going to like you much. However, at least in Boise there’s a very low crime rate, and an effective city government. Detroit has neither advantage, and has earned a reputation of being one of the most corrupt cities in the US.

Finally, there are ethical issues with paying off people who may very well be profiting from threats, if indeed they were made. Is it a good idea to provide a profit incentive to those who might be tempted to use these methods again in the future? If people learn that one can simply phone in an anonymous threat that will cost their opponents a lot of money, and they will either spend nothing or even perhaps in some isolated cases get paid to do so, then won’t some of them quickly adopt this tactic?

This is why appeasement has become a dirty word over the years. When the innocent party must take responsibility for the wrongdoer's actions, it creates an incentive to commit crimes to achieve goals.

This is simply my take on the matter. I had nothing to do with organizing the event, so the attendees and organizers are obviously free to make their own choices. But I do think it sets a dubious precedent.

However, it does seem to have resulted in a fair amount of publicity and attention, and if something does go wrong, after being forced to pay off the Detroit PD AVfM could come out looking like the victim here.

In any event, best of luck to the attendees and speakers, and hopefully all goes smoothly, but next time I'd recommend a qualitatively different venue.

Feminists Resort to Accusing AVfM of Wire Fraud

W.F. Price · 4 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Now that AVfM has raised the money required to pay the police to hold their conference in Detroit, feminists are attempting to deny that, following alleged phone threats, the Doubletree Hilton in Detroit demanded $25,000 in protection and insurance money for the June event, instead suggesting that the threats were manufactured by AVfM as a means to solicit money and gain sympathy.

This is a very serious claim, and preposterous on its face. Although I've had my differences with Paul Elam in the past, he is not that dishonest, nor is he anywhere near stupid enough to so brazenly commit a federal crime such as wire fraud.

However, this issue is not going to go away, as some rather large media outlets are already picking it up and reporting that the hotel owner denies knowing about any threats and the police, for their part, claim they haven't heard anything of the sort, either.

> A police spokesman told The Detroit News that the hotel had contacted the department about hiring off-duty officers to provide security, but he told the newspaper that police had not been notified about any threats against the hotel or the conference.
>
> The hotel's owner told the newspaper he was unaware of the conference and any threats made against it, but he said it wasn't unusual for hotels to require additional security for some events.
>
> "We have received numerous calls and threats and are concerned for the safety and well-being of our employees, our guests, and your attendees," hotel officials said Thursday in a letter to Elam. "The threats have escalated to include death threats, physical violence against our staff and other guests, as well as damage to the property."
>
> Esmay said event organizers had not been provided with details about the threats, but he suspected they might have been made by some of the controversial group's outspoken critics.
>
> "We've had ongoing problems with the feminist establishment, which is a multibillion-dollar hate industry, for years," Esmay said.

This simply strengthens my suspicion that the entire thing is a shakedown, and management lied about threats in order to justify the expensive police detail and obtain a finder's fee (i.e. kickback). Making a police report would have complicated things, so this detail was omitted. Keep in mind that whoever wrote the letter was so careless they couldn't even bother do simple arithmetic correctly (2+3+3=7).

In any event, someone is responsible for this, and it is the person who wrote that letter. In order to clear this up, all AVfM has to do is identify the Hilton employee whose name appears on the letter they received. If he didn't notify police about threats, he must not have thought there was anything to worry about, so his demand clearly constitutes extortion, which is illegal. Men who stand up for their rights should not have to appease extortionists every time they want to speak their minds, so it's time to send the message that this kind of thing will not be tolerated.

This could kill two birds with one stone: it would take the wind out of the feminists' sails, and it would let people and businesses know that men will not be cheated out of their right to free expression. And if the feminists persist in their libelous accusations after AVfM has been proven to be the victim of an extortion scheme, they could be sued for defamation.

Seattle's Regressive Progressivism

W.F. Price · 4 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Seattle's new $15/hour minimum wage is making national news because it's such a sudden and large increase. Washington state already has the nation's highest minimum wage at $9.32/hour, but that wasn't cutting it in Seattle, where costs have skyrocketed over the last five years or so. The median rent for a two bedroom apartment, for example, has climbed 90% over the last four years.

So I suppose it's understandable that service workers feel insulted when they aren't even paid enough to cover the rent of a modest apartment when working full time. However, the logic behind arguments for the minimum wage hike, which has been the favorite cause of socialist city councilwoman Kshama Sawant, is flawed. A common argument claims one of its benefits is that as the poorer people in Seattle make more money, they will spend more, thus boosting the overall economic health of the city.

But this is not necessarily the case, because most of the bills these poorer people pay go to national or international corporations that do not keep the money in the community. For example, I expect some people (the ones who keep their jobs) will use the extra money to purchase iphones and other electronic trinkets. Maybe they will buy them from local stores, but in all likelihood they will purchase them online, and then the associated bills will be paid to some company in California. The people who spend the most in the city are already making well above the minimum wage. Independent restaurants are too expensive for the working poor, for whom even fast food is a treat. But guess what? These fast food franchises will be the hardest hit, because even though they are run by independent franchisees, they are treated under the new law as large national companies. I expect businesses like Taco Bell, KFC and others to flee the poorer neighborhoods when they find their profit margins no longer viable due to higher labor costs, leaving the working poor with no choices at all AND fewer local jobs.

The primary beneficiaries of the minimum wage hike (in the short term) will be landlords, who will gleefully raise rent even higher than it already is, especially in the low-rent neighborhoods.

So the first people to take a big hit will be franchisees in low-income neighborhoods, and the low-income workers themselves, as they find jobs less plentiful and rent steadily rising.

The next group to be impacted will be independent restaurants who unfairly received a grace period of several years, as if some guy trying to bootstrap himself into the middle class by running a Subway franchise is a corporate monster while a bistro purchased with trust fund money catering to wealthy customers is the poor little underdog. What will these independent restaurants do? Well, it's going to be tough for them, but since Seattle is a "sanctuary city," I think we can predict who they are going to hire instead of local citizens: illegal labor paid under the table. I am certain that we will once again see an influx of illegal Latin American workers into Seattle's restaurants, probably paid under the table at a rate significantly less than $15/hour. Isn't that wonderfully progressive? More indigenous poor squeezed out of the labor market because they are "too expensive" to hire.

Finally the little convenience stores run by Asian immigrants, mainly Koreans, will take a hit. This is sad because they perform a vital community service. They do business in marginal neighborhoods where they have to put up with people most of us would prefer not to run into more than once a year on a daily basis. As they run these businesses, they perform a service for the neighborhood. I always liked these guys, and went to their well-run, clean stores all the time instead of driving to the nearest supermarket for small items. If they go out of business, the city's walkability, much prized by the left, will be reduced substantially.

Even the big stores will have to make some painful changes. They will raise prices, automate more and cut security. At my local Safeway, just a few days before I left town, an old lady got beat up and robbed by a bunch of "youths" right outside the front door. Expect this to be a more common occurrence as stores cut back on hiring off-duty cops for security.

I know Seattle as well as anyone, and here I am looking back at my city and shaking my head. Once again, they've managed to change a “progressive” cause into a de facto war on the unfortunate. Fortunately, the rest of the state is growing impatient with this head-in-the-clouds brand of progressive liberalism, and is refusing to fund Seattle’s pet projects. As the working and middle class and small business tax base shrinks, Seattle will face tough choices, and I’m not sure they can count on their favorite billionaires to bail them out. They are trying some fairly radical experiments, and we’ll see how they work out. Somehow, I don’t think it’s going to end in an eternal hipster utopia.

New Brunswick Shootings

W.F. Price · 5 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As I've been settling in up here on the Canadian Marches, as I like to call our formerly contested borderlands in the Northwest (kind of an inside joke for local history buffs), I've found that I get a lot of broadcast Canadian TV channels. So, as I've been watching the news it's been nice to have a refreshing break from the usual senseless violence that characterizes much of urban American news while the province of BC frets and fusses over a teacher's strike (having dealt with a particularly incompetent Canadian teacher last year who tried to pathologize my son's lack of interest in her lessons, I'm not a big fan of Canadian teachers at this point, but my mind remains open, as his current teacher is not so bad).

So imagine my surprise when I learned that an Acadian madman is on the loose in New Brunswick, and he has not only killed three cops and injured two, but managed to escape into the woods as well. 24-year-old Justin Bourque, a metal fan and shooting enthusiast, posted some anti-establishment lyrics and donned rambo gear before going on a rampage. I wonder whether this, too, will be blamed on "toxic masculinity"… Actually, I probably don't even need to ask that question.

I've written on many occasions that young men act out when social systems break down. It's a law of nature, and happens every single time. We see it in the Middle East, Ukraine, Mexico, Southeast Asia, Africa and even here. One of civilization's most important features is its ability to channel young male passion and energy into creativity and productivity rather than warfare. And perhaps the most important tool for that goal over the years has been marriage and family. Young men with a wife and children are invested in society. Take that option away from them, and they are alienated and, in many cases, come to see authorities and society in general as an enemy.

However, instead of giving young men an ideal to work toward, and something positive to hope for, the current progressive regime tells them that the problem lies in their masculine nature, and that they should give up any expectations for a life other than that dictated to them by those who would use them as little more than slaves. To liberate themselves, they are told, they must change their very nature. It is a profoundly inhumane message, because the overwhelming majority of young men cannot change their nature no matter how hard they try. But despite this fact, this is the only option they are given in school and by authorities. This is bound to lead a number of them to feel hopeless, and some of these hopeless young men will act out violently. Not all, of course, but some violence is a statistical certainty even in the best of times, and more violence when things break down.

In our civilization, things are breaking down for young men. They are facing limited opportunities, lower wages, lower status and less hope of finding a mate. This is either ignored or celebrated. I can't for the life of me figure out why taking out social aggression on young men is considered just, because they have never had any institutional power to speak of, but it's all part of the twisted progressive logic of a moral hierarchy based on race and gender that places males – particularly "majority" males – at the bottom of the totem pole.

If we want to get these young men back on track, we need to offer them something to hope for and the ability to feel good about who they are as men — not the kind of self-denial and hatred espoused by the Michael Kimmels of the world, whose message will only bring them shame and failure. One can never say for sure whether or not the Justin Bourques or Elliott Rodgers of the world would have acted out in different circumstances, but when enough of these incidents occur in a fairly short period of time, it's safe to say something has gone wrong.

And no, it isn't about guns. Gun control is extremely strict in most of Latin America, yet it has the highest gun murder rate on earth. And from the looks of Bourque's gear, while he does have what appears to be a Norinco M-14 (a common rifle in the Canadian bush), he could have done the same job with a bolt action .308 hunting rifle (same round). People are not generally aware of this fact, but for the lone gunman who wants to take out authority figures like cops, a hunting rifle is about as good a weapon as any, and if someone wants to slaughter innocent strangers at close quarters a legal shotgun and pistol are the equal of any assault rifle. Assault rifles are designed for the infantry squad; the deadliest lone soldiers are almost always snipers using bolt action rifles that are little more than precision-built deer guns. If I were a cop, I'd be a lot more frightened of a skilled hunter with a $400 Remington 700 than some spree killer with an AK-47. He could drop me from 400 yards before I even knew where he was.

If we're honest about the real problem, we'll find that it comes down to the denial and ignorance of fundamental human nature. When our social systems, designed by conscious men, begin to deny social realities, they become like machines that deny the laws of physics. Perhaps when the mistakes are small they can still run fairly well, but when they come to characterize more and more of the system, major malfunctions occur with increasing frequency. When this happens, what we need are objective people to step in and fix them, but we've lost all objectivity, and that won't happen, so I'm afraid we're doomed to a period of rising social dysfunction for some time before we come to our senses.

D-Day: Was it Worth It?

W.F. Price · 6 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My grandpa had a bird's eye view of the D-Day landings, seventy years ago today. He flew tactical bombing missions, watching the invasion unfold beneath him. Compared to his earliest missions in '43, it wasn't that dangerous. The Luftwaffe had already been reduced to hit and run attacks, and couldn't challenge the US Army Air Force. Somehow, despite a long life enjoying cigars, scotch whiskey, martinis and huge amounts of beef, he's still alive at 91, but he's not all there anymore. However, I like to think some of those memories linger in his mind, as they do for an ever shrinking number of WWII veterans.

Forty one years after my grandfather, I visited Normandy's beaches with my family as a ten-year-old boy. We lived in Brittany at the time, which borders Normandy, so it wasn't all that far from our place. In fact, some of the fiercest fighting took place in Brittany, particularly around St. Malo. Evidence of warfare was still very common in France at the time. Many of the building still showed bomb damage, and occasionally one would run across discarded equipment. As a boy, I was fascinated by the bunkers, spent shells and rockets and crater-pocked landscape. The beaches and countryside were a sober monument in themselves; looking out over the vast fields of graves in Normandy gives one a sense of the reality of the sacrifice. It also filled me with a feeling of pride for my country and the brave men in my family, some of whom never came home, who fought in the war,

I won't get into the horror of what happened there, because it's easy enough to imagine it oneself after seeing the broken concrete, craters, twisted metal and sheer cliffs. But I would like to ask, given what the US has become today, whether those volunteer veterans, like my grandfather, would have chosen to make that sacrifice. I don't think so. There's no way FDR could have sold that war with feminism and multiculturalism. My grandfather told me he fought against tyranny, and the naked aggression displayed by Tojo and Hitler. It wasn't so that his great grandchildren could grow up to be despised minorities in the country of their birth. It definitely wasn't so that his male descendants would be subordinated to some feminist imperative. If this had been the goal of the US war effort, American men would have put down their guns and walked away from it.

Given what the US has become after emerging from WWII as the sole superpower, it's fair at this point to ask whether the young American men who made the ultimate sacrifice weren't cheated, used and betrayed. It's also fair to ask whether they should have even fought the war in the first place. If it means accepting some version of Michael Kimmel's ideal society, I'd have to say it was all a big mistake. Now, I look back at my youthful pride with a feeling of sadness.

What a damn shame…

Another Couple Shootings; More to Come

W.F. Price · 9 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On Friday, a young man opened fire with a shotgun at Seattle Pacific University, killing one and wounding several others. He was subdued by a student security guard with pepper spray while reloading. The shooter, named Aaron Ybarra, was delusional and and had homicidal fantasies for years. Yesterday, a young couple killed two policemen in Las Vegas before being confronted by an armed citizen, who was shot in the back by the wife, not realizing she was in on the attack. It seems that the confrontation may have bought police some time, and the couple committed suicide shortly thereafter.

This reminds me of a shooting in a mall in Tacoma Washington some years back, in which a man pulled out an AK-47 and opened fire before confronted by a man with a concealed weapon, who was then shot and paralyzed, but in the process scared the gunman into hiding and allowed shoppers to flee, saving some lives — ultimately nobody was killed (although the paraplegic hero ended up in poverty last I heard). Armed citizens can and do prevent mass killings; it is much, much easier to slaughter people when nobody is shooting back.

In any event, the rash of shootings in North America is not necessarily tied to ideology, but rather social alienation among the young. The high youth unemployment rate, the breakdown of the family and the growing chasm between haves and have nots will inevitably push marginal young people over the edge.

What we are doing today resembles a sort of mass social experiment, except there's nothing at all scientific about it. Casting traditional norms aside, trashing values people used to take for granted and unleashing the hounds of usury and privateering are all recipes for social disorder. Even so, our leaders embrace the policies that cause this disorder, and seem determined to keep pushing it until we have a real mess on our hands. Productive work is punished, we have created a rentier economy, and taxes – including hidden ones such as subsidized divorce – disincentivize honest labor.

At this point, if young men didn't act out, I'd think there was something wrong with them. However, senseless shootings are just that. Instead of blasting innocent people with a gun, why not try some activism? Get outside for a change, confront some authority figures in public and try to make the news without committing a felony. It is possible; it just takes a bit more creativity and foresight.

Modern Day Mail Order Brides

W.F. Price · 9 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In a new twist on a very old practice, a professional matchmaker recently founded a startup to fly young women from New York to the Bay Area to meet men in the tech industry. The idea is that there's a surplus of women in New York, and a surplus of men of means in the SF Bay Area, so add the two together and you have happy couples. Nothing's perfect, of course, but it sounds like a venture with a reasonably good chance of success. As I've heard said, it's much, much easier to find women in New York than in San Francisco (or Seattle, for that matter). I can personally vouch for the fact that East Coast women are more feminine, although perhaps ethnically somewhat different from Westerners; there are relatively more European Catholics and Jews in NYC, and relatively more Germanic Protestants and Asians in Silicon Valley.

Here's the ad for the startup:

Back in the 19th century, importing women from "back east" (we still say that) was standard for reasonably successful men, and exists to this day in certain traditional Western families from old money (e.g. the Gates family). The practice is referred to in Sometimes a Great Notion, Ken Kesey's great novel about a Northwest family in a timber town. The frontier was so rough that the local women were not generally quality marriage material, and those who were married off so quickly that there weren't enough to go around. Today, although the industries have changed, there's a similar situation. Look upon the women of Portland, Seattle and San Francisco and behold their many tattoos, their odd piercings, wine-stained teeth and shabby, masculine clothes. Listen to their rough speech, their fervent, baseless opinions and unending litany of Marxist slogans. Smell their malodorous, unwashed hair, the bottom-shelf whiskey on their breath and the skunky stench of marijuana in their clothes.

Ah, the West!

It was a lot easier to import women in the 19th century due to the enormous death toll in the Civil War. So many men were dead that women were strewn around like apples after a September storm. Some of these unfortunate widows and potential spinsters boarded boats and trains and headed to destinations on the Pacific Coast. An enterprising Seattlite named Asa Mercer recruited a group of about a dozen women from Boston, sailing back through San Francisco (via the Isthmus of Panama) on the way to Seattle. San Francisco men tried to poach the women, but Mercer fought them off and brought the ladies back to Seattle, where all married except for one who died from illness and one who, at age 35, couldn't find a husband even in Seattle, then went on to become a feminist schoolmistress. A subsequent trip to bring back a greater number of ladies ran into problems when New York journalists accused Mercer of planning to sell the girls into servitude to old men, or put them to work whoring on the wharves. Nevertheless, despite the opposition he did manage to bring many back to Seattle, where most ended up happily married.

Today, perhaps unsurprisingly, the matchmaking startup to bring women west from New York is running into similar problems. It seems that East Coast journalists haven't changed much over the last 150 years, and are denouncing the effort by comparing it to Japanese WWII sex slavery (WTF?), portraying the women as terrified and in tears and generally slandering the Bay Area men as weirdos.

Business Insider highlights an incident in which some of the women (unwisely) decided to eat marijuana brownies and, unprepared for the potency of West Coast weed, ended up tripping out and crying. The site also mentions that one of the male participants looked down on those involved, and that some of the men at a party were eccentric. Nothing positive is mentioned, leading us to believe the entire trip was a failure and terrible idea.

However, according to one of the participants, it was a good trip:

> Since the initial planning, there has been some ugly press surrounding the project — press that isn't worth quoting here. But, let's just say the presumptions made about the women going would make my father very angry.

Trolls will be trolls, but as an avid traveler and adventurous kinda gal, I'd like to highlight the real motivation of this trip, and a valuable experience worth shedding light on.

We did not fly to San Francisco to bag ourselves some nerdy millionaires, or to offer some charitable companionship to "undatable techies." It was not a last-ditch effort of bitter, single women, fed up with the men that make up their own zip code.

Dating is frustrating as Hell, yes, but committing yourself to exploring a new city for love shows an optimism towards dating that's pretty rare these days. We were open to possibilities.

These women were all impressive, inspiring figures whom I was thrilled to call friends by the time our weekend wrapped up. There was a firefighter, a speech therapist, a medical student, a life coach, an actress and a writer, among others, who each impressed me in their own unique way and made me feel a little better about being single myself.

There was nothing desperate or dirty about this trip. It was simply a group of women, willing to have an adventure, think outside of the box, and put themselves out there in a new place for the possibility of a little romance.

And you know what? As a social experiment, it was not only fascinating, but successful for some as well.

As the coupling of East Coasters and West Coasters unfolded, the cultural clichés of our two cities were front and center. The pervasive tech scene of San Francisco became a running joke among the girls as each and every date would cite the startup they currently worked for. And when half of us arrived at the bar wearing black leather jackets and commanding conversations with Big Apple flair, I was repeatedly told that our "New Yorkness" shined through.

Each side had their frustrations with dating. San Francisco men claimed a shortage of females in the male-dominated technology industry that ran the social scene. Our New York contingent spoke of men who can't commit, thanks in part to the tempting array of options provided by the country's largest city.

But we all had one thing in common: Dating is getting harder for everyone, it seems. The game is changing, the rules are shifting, and in the age of digitized social lives, people are increasingly lonely. Meeting all of these new people in person was at the very least, a refreshing escape from the online options that dominate our lives on both coasts.

Cultural caricatures and dating frustrations aside, many of the matches worked out.

One of the ladies regaled us with the story of a kiss beneath the Golden Gate Bridge and plans to spend the next day with her date and his friends at a food truck festival.

Another girl beamed into her cell phone, struggling to describe her new crush as she furiously texted while we played tourists at Pier 39.

On the final night, there was a romantic drive to the mountains for one lucky lady, and a butterfly at the window to wake her up the next morning. It was a San Francisco Fairy Tale that we all fell for as she glowed on our picnic blanket in Alamo Park, reliving the story, detail by romantic detail.

As for myself, I had some great experiences through the dates orchestrated through The Dating Ring in San Francisco. But, ultimately, I bailed on the last party — exhausted by the cameras covering the trip for Nightline and the curated conversations surrounding every drink. I joined two of the girls in calling a Lyft car and headed to a local beer bar in the Mission District. Moments after arriving, I was making eye contact with a curly-haired guy playing pool.

"You're too Springy for San Francisco," he said as he approached me at the bar.

Glancing down at my exposed mid-drift, I had to agree. In New York, I may have been taken aback by his bluntness, but in this new city, I was charmed by his honesty. And with the surprisingly chilly wind outside, my > outfit was definitely that of an out-of-towner.

>
> I left that night with his number and an invitation for sushi the following day.
>
> “It’s the right coast for raw fish,” he assured me.
>
> Maybe it was the thrill of seeing a new city with a new acquaintance, or maybe it was just a coincidence that I would hit it off with someone on a trip specifically designed to pair me with someone new. But, whatever it was, it felt right, and I left San Francisco with exciting possibilities that no tasteless criticism will ruin. I can do that myself if it comes down to it.

So it seems the techie guys aren’t so bad after all. Geez, you’d almost think that with better options than Tricia Romano they might really hit it off with some girls. Who would have guessed it?

A Criticism of MRA

W.F. Price · 10 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Over the last few years as I've written about and studied "gender" issues, I've come to the conclusion that women are not going to change — at least not in our lifetimes. Nor will men. I suppose one could call it cynicism, but I prefer to think of it as acceptance.

Are women going to start taking responsibility for the men around them? Are they going to stop appealing to men for help when the going gets tough? Will they ever love weakness in men? I really don't think so, and that being the case, what's the point of criticizing them for it? We should just accept it for what it is and work with reality.

However, I've noticed that a big part of what MRA has become involves criticizing women merely for being what they are, as though they could change. It's the mirror image of the Michael Kimmels of the world. "If only we had equality, then surely we'd live in a genderless utopia!"

It's a dangerous fantasy, and not something you'd want to use to build a functional society.

So, instead of bashing on women for what they are, and pointing out their shortcomings when compared to men, why not advocate sex realism? Women, in general, are one way, and men, in general, another. Male and female are intrinsic parts of people's nature, and should be taken into account. The idea that they are flexible and can be changed with social engineering is scientifically baseless, notwithstanding the efforts of transsexuals and the like. Yet I notice some MRAs suggesting that things would be better if only women changed.

You can change a woman's environment, you can offer incentives and you can encourage women to adopt this or that custom. But none of these efforts will work if you don't first take her intrinsic female nature into account. There is no greater amount of good or evil in male or female; there is just nature. When we take nature's path, we take the "good" way. This is what Christians call "God's will." When we fight nature, we err, and conscious error is sin.

First and foremost, we must seek to understand nature to the best of our ability, and then we can use what we learn to do good, and to effect change for the better.

The Dogs Who Watch the Gates

W.F. Price · 11 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One day, after being hassled by the so-called “bao an,” a sort of unofficial police force in China comprised of shiftless youths, I vented my frustrations to a Chinese friend. “Don’t worry,” he said, they’re just “kan men de gou.” What that means is they’re just dogs who watch the gate. The Chinese way of phrasing it sounds a lot less positive than “watchdogs,” so he was voicing some contempt for the bao an. Unfortunately for me, I didn’t have the same rights as a Chinese citizen — the Chinese really do make a distinction between foreigners and citizens in their cities, unlike American “sanctuary city” policies. A Beijing resident with a hukou (internal passport) could tell the bao an to shove off, whereas I was pretty much at their mercy.

While at the time I was mightily annoyed by my experiences with the low-level thugs who comprise the bao an, and felt that it reflected poorly on China in general, now that I’ve gained some perspective I can see that gatekeepers exist in American society, too. However, here you won’t find them roaming the streets with red armbands and electric batons, but rather sitting in offices in large public institutions. Millions are employed as teachers, professors, bureaucrats and administrators across the United States, and although they are subtler in their methods, the results are, ultimately, just as repressive.

I’ve come to see these watchdogs as the main impediment to success and a productive life for young American men. At every turn there is an ideological gatekeeper waiting for the opportunity to hold back one class of people while promoting another. For all the talk of “meritocracy,” they cast objectivity to the wind as they choose who deserves breaks and who doesn’t. Armed with theories that promote the notion that one class of people – white males in particular – are inherently privileged, they have an enormous advantage over those of us who believe that everyone deserves a fair shake and equal treatment.

As this class of people grows, the effect of their efforts multiplies along with them. They are responsible for fewer men in college, the flight of moderates from cities and public institutions, and the steady decline of the small businessman and middle class. People say that President Obama is a clueless, weak president, but he has built an enormous cadre of supporters by strengthening government bureaucracy and integrating it with finance and big business to an extent never before seen in peacetime. One of the core components of that cadre is the gatekeepers — the people whose most important job is keeping others on the “outside” and keeping them weak and powerless. I used to wonder why schools would cut STEM departments before cutting gender studies, but now it’s clear: as gatekeepers the gender ideologues perform a more important political function than mere science professors.

This bureaucratic machine has grown so strong that it’s hard to imagine anyone seriously challenging it at this point. This has chilling implications for the future of American politics, and what’s left of our civil liberties. If any gatekeeper can use the power at his or her disposal to arbitrarily prevent someone from making a living or a business from staying solvent, then how can we claim to have freedom of speech or other rights?

If there’s any hope, it’s that the bureaucracy itself is extremely hierarchical, with those at the top commanding much higher salaries and better benefits than their underlings. In states such as California, the senior bureaucrats may just crash the system with their expenses, and in universities underpaid adjuncts and part time professors may stage some sort of academic coup. Additionally, teachers in the bureaucratic stronghold should decline in number as children disappear from our cities, forcing them into less complacent non-urban school districts.

For now, we should avoid the gatekeepers, and challenge them only from a position of relative strength. We can’t deal with them until the problem has been clearly identified, and that will take both time and effort. A good first step is identifying them as a class. Heartiste calls them part of “The Cathedral,” while Joel Kotkin calls them “The Clerisy.” Both are descriptive, although as usual Heartiste’s dramatic flair captures the imagination a little better. If we want to be simple and precise, however, perhaps it should be “institutional progressives.” These are the dogs at the gates; the red-fanged core of the progressive coalition.

Goodbye, Grandpa

W.F. Price · 12 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My grandfather died yesterday at age 91, leaving me with no surviving grandparents. I'm sad he's gone, but he lived a good, long life.

Aside from the war, there was little that went wrong for him. Born into a wealthy New York family that lived on Long Island Sound, he decided to carve out an independent life for himself in the Pacific Northwest after his service in WWII. He married my grandmother, a good-looking, vivacious blonde (also from a well-to-do family), and headed out west to look for work. After a couple years, he got a job at Boeing, and worked there as an aerospace engineer for over 35 years, working on projects such as the Saturn V rocket, the 747 and other innovative endeavors of the time.

In the meanwhile he raised three sons and one daughter – my mother – and lived a peaceful, middle class suburban life in Bellevue, across Lake Washington from Seattle. As an aviation enthusiast, he had plenty of opportunities to indulge his passion for flight and frequently went to air shows, toured his fighter pilot son's carrier, and flew all over the country.

He had quite an appetite for roast beef, cigars and martinis. Although he had a few health scares toward the end of his working life, he was remarkably robust, and kept his wits about him until a series of strokes caught up to him right around the age of 90. As a young man, he played collegiate football and wrestled; he was built like a bull.

However, I knew him well enough to know that some things in life were hard on him; the war in particular. He spoke more openly with me on a couple occasions than with his own children, and told me how disillusioned he was by the experience. As a boy in love with the idea of aviation, he signed up with the US Army Air Force as a volunteer, and was assigned to the Eighth Air Force. He ended up on a B-17 crew as a belly gunner and bombardier, and flew thirty two missions over Europe out of his base in England.

He told me how terrified he was on his first mission when the flak began to detonate around his formation, and he first understood what it meant to have people trying to kill him. He was part of a replacement crew for losses in the disastrous Schweinfurt raid of 1943, so the mood was glum when he first took to the skies. On one early mission, his plane was so badly shot up that his pilot was knocked unconscious by shrapnel and his navigator severely wounded in the face. The pilot slumped over the controls and the plane rolled upside down. Being in the lower ball turret, he found himself looking straight up into the sky, and only chose not to bail out because he could see the props spinning and the engines in good working order. The copilot righted the plane, and they made it home, where they found considerable damage to the aircraft and an unexploded 30mm shell in the fuel tank.

He saw stricken planes burning and doing loops as they fell from the sky. He saw men bail out and open their parachutes amidst the spray of fuel and flames, only to have the silk chutes burn in midair. He said they looked like little ping pong balls burning in the sky. This experience – seeing his childhood dream of aviation put to use to kill and destroy – was rough on him, and left a lingering streak of hardness in his nature that took decades to soften.

Toward the end his loving, generous nature became predominant. Always loving and caring toward the little ones, he was thrilled to see his grandchildren and great grandchildren on our many family get togethers. I'm fortunate to have had him in my life for so long, as I gained a great deal from being close to a man who lived in and characterized those fateful times of the 20th century. I also had the opportunity, through knowing my grandfather, to get to know myself better as well.

As always, when one chapter closes, a new one begins. With another boy due in a few weeks, a little more of my grandfather will come into this world just as he leaves it.

Creepy Feminists Won't Leave Pop Stars Alone

W.F. Price · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There has been a recent obsession amongst feminists with having female pop singers and stars come out as feminists. They are doing their best to recruit them to "the cause," and have had some success, but only with the R&B demographic of Beyoncé et al., and the one teenage pop star – Lorde – whose mommy happens to be a feminist.

The others are all telling the feminists, in so many words, "leave me alone."

Is it just me, or is there really something creepy about pushing girls and young women to adopt a sexually loaded ideology? There's definitely something stalkerish about their obsession with these girls.

Just a few weeks ago, it was Shailene Woodley who, like Katy Perry and Kelly Clarkson, rejected the label. More recently, it's Lana Del Ray, who has declared herself "bored" with feminism (I sympathize). Each time this happens, there a hue and cry about how these young women need to be "educated" about what feminism means, even though feminists themselves openly admit that no one definition will suffice.

But what I'd like to know is how much more feminist education will it take? Feminism is blared out to the world in every print publication from the New York Times on down, and faithfully taught in schools across North America. How could these young women not know what it is?

Actually, I'm sure they do, but they're too polite to let on. When they think of feminism, they think of tattooed, burly slutwalkers marching around in cities and making great noises. They think of ancient Marxist academics and activists so far removed from the modern world that they ought to be shuffled into rainbow-themed nursing homes.

In their minds, feminism equals hairy pits and saggy tits. That's about all it comes down to. If I were a pop star, I'd avoid the subject at all costs, too.

For those who might wonder why I happen to be interested in this subject, it's because I have an eight-year-old daughter.

The Talk for Young Men in the Military

Elusive Wapiti · 16 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dr.Φ at the blog Delenda Est Cathargo has had a front-row seat to the military's latest effort to make the armed services safe for military women…from military men. He has three posts up thus far on this topic, entitled "War On Nerds: SAPR Edition", "SAPR Day Scenarios", and "People vs Values", with likely more to follow.

Reading these posts, and seeing the aggressive feminist and rape-culture-hysteria and frankly misandrist slant to the materials presently being force-fed to military men and women in mandatory propaganda femeducation commander's calls, perhaps it is both timely and wise for more senior military men, perhaps commanders, but certainly supervisors and peers, to do what women leaders in times past did for the female subordinates in their charge: warn them about entanglements with the opposite sex–for their own safety.

As one in the military, you are to be strong. A warrior. As a man, you are widely thought to want sex, any sex, at any time, and are grateful for it whenever it happens. These two factors combined mean you will not be believed if you yourself report being sexually assaulted or sexually coerced by a woman. You want it by nature, she doesn't. A woman who accuses you of the same, will be.

Moreover, the culture still assumes that men are the aggressors in sexual relationships, and that women are passive. You will not be believed if you yourself report being sexually assaulted or sexually coerced by a woman, despite recent research that shows near parity in which sex perpetrates sexual assault. A woman who accuses you of the same, will be.

Further, it is men who are uniquely held accountable for sex when alcohol is involved, no matter how much or how little either party has been drinking. As little as one drop of alcohol invalidates female agency. You will not be believed if you claim that you had consent. A woman who accuses you of taking advantage of her inebriated state, on the other hand, will be. The simple fact of the matter is that, as far as the SAPR office and Victim Advocates (note the slanted term victim, not the more neutral and legally correct accuser) is concerned, sexual assault is something that men do to women, men do to other men, rarely women assault other women, and women never assault men. Offenders (note again the slanted language) must be stamped out. The default position is to believe the accuser victim. This cannon is pointed at you, not-so-fortunate son. Innocence is no longer presumed.

But fear not, there are many steps you may take to minimize your risk and protect yourself, and it's not blaming the victim to pass them along to you:

1) Limit interactions, be they over the phone, via email, and especially face-to-face, to official business only. In general, it is advisable to avoid interactions with women in the military for numerous reasons (i.e., false sexual harassment charges, false charges of fraternization, etc), but in this case, it is to reduce your risk of a career-ending FRA. If you must interact with them, do so in a public area with witnesses. Avoid situations where you may be alone behind closed doors with a military woman without a wingman as witness.

2) Speaking of wingman, have one whenever going out or when you may be faced by mixed-sex situations. This brother is your witness and can vouch for your upright behavior.

3) Don't fraternize with lower-ranking military women. Not only is this a UCMJ issue, but it is also wise counsel anyway. Lower-ranking military women are less mature and more likely to be star-struck by your greater maturity and higher socio-sexual status than either her or her peers. You will also be more likely to be seen as the aggressor if they levy an accusation. Keep it professional, and stay safe.

4) Avoid mixed-sex situations and alcohol. The vast, vast majority of military sexual assault cases involve alcohol. When the booze comes out, and there are females about, that's you cue to leave. Male-only company is your friend.

5) Be upright in your behavior. The vast, vast majority of military sexual assault cases involved extra-marital sex in addition to alcohol. This means don't be a player (sorry cads). The fact of the matter is that one's risk of being hit with a sexual assault allegation is a lot lower if you keep your fly zipped.

6) If you find avoiding extramarital sex too difficult or too Christian / Jewish a value to uphold, then record your encounters. It may initially seem Rob Lowe-level creepy, but it has saved at least one man, and likely untold more, from being convicted of rape on the basis of a malicious FRA. Video is best.

These steps may be small, but will do much to mitigate your risk of being caught on the wrong side of an accusation of sexual misconduct. Remember that the system is looking to isolate and prosecute "offenders", that women who bring sexual assault allegations are to be believed, false accusations will not be prosecuted or punished, and that you will be counting on the justice system to protect your assumed-innocent status. The process is as much the punishment as any conviction would be. Stay away, stay safe, and stay frosty.

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to four, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

Cracked.com Going Full Prog With J.F. Sargent Hire

W.F. Price · 17 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of Cracked.com's editors, a fellow who goes by "J.F. Sargent," has been making the rounds building a case against men who stand up to gender feminism. He's been channeling the SPLC, which gives us a good idea of where Sargent is coming from.

Frankly, I think the guy should identify as J.F. Sebastian, who was killed by Roy, Rutger Hauer's character in Bladerunner, after developing an unfulfilled crush on Pris, Darryl Hannah's character. Sebastian is an aspergery dweeb with Methuselah syndrome. He invents little toys to keep him company, because he doesn't have any friends IRL. Hot blonde replicant Pris manipulated him at will, which proved to be his undoing at the hands of the vastly superior and more desirable Roy, who was Pris's lover.

Given that Sargent is enlisting the SPLC, which is a domestic blacklisting resource with ties to left-wing terrorists like Floyd Corkins, it's only fair that we keep an eye on Sargent as well. At this point, I don't think Cracked.com would fire him, but putting some pressure on the guy is probably a good idea.

J.F. Sargent attended Garfield High School in Seattle, as did I, which gives me a little insight into the little fellow. He isn't originally from Seattle, but thrived in its prog scene for years, and was clearly indoctrinated there. When he went to Garfield in the 2000s, it was a far more elitist institution than it was in the early 90s when I attended the school. He may well know anal rap virtuoso Macklemore, also a Garfield alum, personally.

I'm not sure why Cracked hired this guy, as I know a couple Cracked writers personally, and they are stand-up men. Certainly they don't buy into his bullshit. But I can only assume that someone in upper management put his (or more likely her) finger to the wind and figured out where the gas was coming from, and ASSumed that America's men would buy into the garbage little twats like Sargent dump on them.

So if you're reading this and care to do a little activism, why not write Cracked.com and ask why they are alienating one of their most important demographics by hiring a little partisan bloodsucker like Sargent. Do we really want to read his missives on "misogyny" and "white male entitlement?" It's like listening to a toddler tell you off for not cutting the crust off his bread and filling his baba with apple juice, and that isn't funny. It's annoying as hell.

Write Cracked here to tell them what you think of Sargent. I'm sure the feminists love him, but feminists are about as funny as a cancer diagnosis, so they hardly count. If Cracked wants to go full feminist, I invite them to do so. The site has already cast the first stone, so it's fair game at this point. Frankly, I invite them to ridicule us even more.

When men have their children taken away and are reduced to poverty, it's so god-damned funny after all, right?

We'll see.

Rowing The Cut

W.F. Price · 17 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[I've been feeling a bit nostalgic lately, so I wrote down one of my memories from the early 90s in Seattle. Some things about the city - or what it was - are worth preserving.]

Each morning the alarm would sound at quarter to five, and each time my eyes would open seconds before it went off. The routine was so steady, so precise, that my internal clock was as accurate as the quartz timekeeper on my bedstand.

When I awoke, the first thing I'd do was pull on my shorts and tank top, then head to the kitchen to eat a couple huge bowls of cereal washed down with a quart of milk. I ate mechanically, devouring the food within minutes, then quickly put on a jacket and pants and grabbed my schoolbooks to head off into the darkness.

After twenty or so minutes, I'd arrive at my destination, park the car and head to the boathouse, which was located in an old warehouse underneath the Aurora bridge. Others arrived like ghosts, pale figures walking into the yellow sodium lamplight of the lot out of the navy blue of the early spring morning.

There wasn't much time for warmup; after a minute or two of stretching the coach would assign us to our boats and announce the day's workout, and then we'd haul the boats off the racks, grab our oars and make for the dock. We'd set the boats down in the water, gingerly step in so as to avoid a spill into the cold water, then fasten our oars and shove off.

The eights and fours stayed together like a convoy, but since I was in a pair we had relative freedom. My bow rower and I would set off on our own across the still waters of the early morning, headed east or west depending on instructions. There was a brewery just to the west of our dock, and in the early morning the smell of roasting malt and hops would pour out over the water, lending a thick heaviness to the moist Pacific air. Sometimes, a sea lion who had slipped through the Ballard Locks to poach salmon from the fish ladder would raise his head from the water, give us a look, then quickly dive to reappear elsewhere a minute later.

The light of the city blocked out most of the stars, but the reflections from the surface of Lake Union made up for them. The sights and smells were as rich as at any time of day, and accentuated by the quiet in the midst of the sleeping multitudes. We'd glide across the water, hearing only the distant traffic, the gentle splash of our oars and the occasional horn from a train or freighter off in the distance. If we proceeded east toward Lake Washington, the sounds grew quieter for some time as we made our way to Union Bay. If we went east toward the Locks, we traveled through the narrow cut toward Fisherman's Terminal and the industrial workyards of lower Ballard. There was often a sheen of oil on the water that gave it the quality of stained glass, and a faint, accompanying smell of diesel fuel.

The best part of these morning excursions was the solitude, and the peace of being on the water. On Lake Union, I'd see the lights in the houseboats flick on as people got up to prepare for work. Sometimes, I could make them out as they sat at their kitchen tables drinking coffee in their bathrobes as I silently swept past in the darkness. Despite the intense physical effort, I felt as though it was a time of spiritual retreat; each stroke of the oar was like a note in a meditative chant.

After a couple of hours of pulling our boats through the water, we'd pack it up and head off to school to shower and change. I'd eat another breakfast to refuel for the day, and then go through the motions until the sun sank low and the day drew to a close. Day after day and week after week I went through this routine, my body and mind becoming a machine that adapted to the effort and discipline. It is the closest I've ever come to the monastic lifestyle, and I've never been healthier before or since.

I never really took to rowing as a sport, because in truth it isn't one; there's a great deal of labor involved and little "fun" about it. However, it taught me that it is not only sport and play that sustains the body and soul, but discipline as well.

Obama's Children's Crusade: Probably a Smuggling Racket

W.F. Price · 18 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The sudden "Children's Crusade" of Central American kids across our southern border has outraged Americans, but nobody seems to know who is behind it. Certainly, it's partly Barack Obama's fault for enticing the Central Americans with promises not to deport kids, but how could tens of thousands of children suddenly make it all the way across Mexico to show up in such large numbers on our border?

After reading an LA Times article on the invasion in which a woman at the border surrenders herself with her kids in the belief that single mothers will not be deported if they are apprehended [she's probably correct: I recently read a report written by a border patrol officer who reported that people who are not from bordering countries are simply issued summons to court and then released on their own recognizance -- he said they simply turn themselves in, get the summons, then disappear], I figured there must be some kind of organized effort to move these people.

I decided to do a little research, knowing that few people bother to go to the source even here in the US, so the number of Americans paying attention to Central American sources must be tiny. It turns out that the governments and media of Central American countries are very much complicit in the human trafficking, possibly assuming that remittances will be a source of income for their crime and poverty-infested little fiefdoms, and that in any event they can keep the cash flowing to their criminal cronies – and ultimately themselves – by subsidizing the smuggling industry.

It turns out that they are not only publishing advice and encouraging stories for would-be migrants, but also making a pretense of standing up for their countrymen who have illegally immigrated and – get this – they are even adjudicating civil suits between migrants and smugglers to impart an aura of legitimacy to the entire operation. El Salvador is probably the largest source of these Central American migrants and, incidentally, the source of the ruthless Mara Salvatrucha criminal gangsters who have murdered their way to prominence in a number of American cities. Could there be any doubt about a connection between the gangsters on our streets and the gangsters in office back home? These crooks running banana republics have been making a living off organized crime for decades.

After reading a few articles in "La Página," an online El Salvador news outlet, all of which were highly supportive of illegal immigration to the US, I checked out the comments. It doesn't seem that Salvadorans are proud of either their politicians or this recent border fiasco. One commenter suggested that it is a national humiliation, and that El Salvador will look "worse than Haiti," asking "how did our government allow these embarrassments abroad?" Most were more concerned about the right to legally travel — not to emigrate. These are the type of people in El Salvador who actually bother to comment in newspapers; I suspect that the people showing up on the Texas border are from a somewhat less educated demographic. Could it possibly be, as many Americans suspect, that the government of El Salvador is deliberately trying to foist its poor and hapless off on the great big, dumb American milk cow? Something like that, but it's actually even worse: they're also shamelessly ripping off their own poor.

What's going on here is that a number of people are taking smuggling fees from these would-be emigrants (reportedly $4,000 a head from point of origin), moving them through Mexico, then when they make it to the US border, Presto! The US picks up the tab from there. If the DHS prediction of 90,000 children smuggled to the US this year by these gangs is correct, that makes kid-smuggling alone a $360,000,000 per year industry, and probably more. What does it matter if they are eventually deported anyway? Somebody got rich off the scam. The only real losers here are the desperate fools who think they'll be granted amnesty and the US taxpayers footing the bill for this fiasco.

And why am I so sure they won't get amnesty? Because we can't afford to give it to them. Illegals currently prop up the US social security system, having funded roughly ten percent of its reserve and paid in somewhere around $150 billion a year. Give them the right to benefits, and the entire thing would collapse very quickly. Without this illegal subsidy, social security would have started paying out less than it takes in by 2009. Obviously this scheme isn't going to last forever, but if illegals got amnesty it would be over immediately and the fallout would be painful, to say the least.

However, another part of the scheme involves making sure that those who do sneak in are fit enough to work and pay into the system. If they can swim a river, cross some desert and evade ICE, they probably are. But if they are kids or single moms who just plop themselves down in front of the nearest border patrol officer and wait for air-conditioned accommodations, they're far more likely to be an expense. So we Americans are really getting a raw deal with this latest wave.

As much as it's tempting to say that this or that American political party or official is responsible for what's going on or that it's part of some deliberate plot, it's starting to look like the entire thing is just another example of incompetence and poor judgment on the part of our "leaders." They've been caught with their pants down on this one. They actually let themselves get tooled by a gang of Central American hustlers, and now they have no idea what to do about it. I wonder whether our politicians can even admit to themselves how stupid and irresponsible this talk about amnesty for children was. They were simply providing a free advertisement for the coyotes.

Well how about this for an idea: find the head honcho in charge of each of these little countries, and tell him to put an end to it immediately or we'll sink his yacht and drop a couple 500 pound bombs on his hilltop villa. Sounds rough, but what kind of a scumbag puts kids at the mercy of the criminal gangs who run both human and narcotics smuggling operations in Latin America? One I wouldn't lose much sleep over if he happened to end up on the business end of an airstrike. This won't happen in the current administration, of course, but another, better president would have done it.

Tricia Romano Pouts in Response to “Trolls”

W.F. Price · 19 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When I wrote about Tricia Romano’s Salon piece, I wasn’t all that hard on her. Sure, she gave her piece a nasty title, trashed an entire class of men and exhibited an outsized sense of entitlement, but as far as I know she’s never actually screwed a guy over personally. I try to save the heavy artillery for those types.

Nevertheless, she was hit pretty hard in comments, and took it very personally. She also objected to being called “middle-aged” and not someone who stands out from the crowd, although both are objectively true, and not really insults. Her retort to me personally was to imply that I am sexually unappealing because I’m a “deadbeat dad” (nice try, Trish, but no cigar — you don’t end up owing child support because you can’t get laid, dummy).

> Here are the things I learned about “myself” from some of my commenters:
>
> I am a whore and a slut.
>
> I’m ugly and I look like a Jersey girl. (This is half-true. My family is from Jersey.)
>
> I’m old.
>
> I’m middle-aged (which somehow seems worse than merely being old). And, I “don’t exactly stand out from the crowd.” (This same writer also admitted to being a deadbeat dad. So, you know.)
>
> But even though I’m dumb, ugly, and old, a totally over-the-hill Jersey girl, I’ve managed to get laid so much that my vagina is a loose gash.
>
> I should just buy some sex toys and be done with it.
>
> I probably have a height requirement on my profile. (Dude, I’m four-foot-eleven.)
>
> I’m entitled.
>
> [etc.]

What she’s really demonstrating here with her butthurt sniffling and pouting is that she can dish it out but she can’t take it. Oh, it’s all well and good when you slam techies, call them unattractive dweebs and blame them for women’s dissatisfaction, but when someone turns it around and takes a shot at Tricia it’s so mean that it’s “trolling.” There oughtta be a law or something…

I’ve taken a lot of shots in life, and some of them took a hell of a toll. I’ll probably never fully recover from some. So now, when I see someone calling me names or insulting me online, it’s really so trivial that it hardly matters. How could it possibly compare to being menaced by men in uniform with assault rifles and legally raped in court? But for these female writers, it’s a horrible violation. Something they cannot bear.

What outdated Victorian nonsense! I thought they were all tough riot grrrls here — especially in Seattle.

So along with my previous bit of advice to Tricia that she stop acting like an adolescent girl, I’ll add something else:

If you don’t want people to attack you personally, don’t personally attack an entire class of people. Because if you do, you’d better be prepared for them to bite back.

If you can’t take the heat, you know…

Feminist Fathers

W.F. Price · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some guy in New Jersey got a lot of online attention recently because he was wearing this laughable t-shirt announcing to the world that his daughter makes the sexual rules. Because his daughter is 20 and lives in American society, that's pretty much a given in any event, but he felt the need to broadcast it all the same.

Here's his feminist statement:

> "Rules for dating my daughter
>
> 1. I don't make the rules
> 2. You don't make the rules
> 3. She makes the rules
> 4. Her body, her rules
>
> Feminist Father"

It seems to me that the implication is that this should start as soon as a girl sexually matures, which is pretty damn early. Sexual maturity (not to be confused with full adulthood) begins in middle school for both girls and boys. The genitalia and reproductive organs are in full working order generally by fourteen, and the sex drive is as strong as ever.

Any father who tells his adolescent daughter that she's free to do whatever she pleases sexually is being neglectful at best. Fortunately, very few fathers are this way, and those who are tend to be borderline retarded or criminals/predators. Yes, there are fathers (and mothers) out there who get off on this sort of thing, but fortunately it's very rare.

I doubt the Jersey dad wearing the dumb t-shirt is one of these. Instead, he may just be trying to rationalize the fact that his daughter is loose in a world of hedonism over which he has practically zero control. I kind of sympathize. I may well be in the same situation myself in ten years.

But he's going about it all wrong, and here's why:

When I was an adolescent I loved those "progressive" kinds of fathers. In general, fathers were terrifying. I got busted by dads on a couple occasions, and had to beat a hasty retreat out the back door. If it weren't for most fathers, things would have been so much easier — the girls themselves were as willing as I was. Even little runty guys could suddenly fill me with dread when I saw the anger flashing in their eyes as they caught me trying to pull some smooth move on their daughter. The deterrence factor can hardly be overstated.

Stepdads, in general, didn't care, and had little authority anyway. Single moms — who takes them seriously? But real, honest to goodness present dads were a major problem. Messing around with their daughters was like walking around barefoot in rattlesnake country. Sure, it was possible, but much more hazardous.

However, there were a few "enlightened" dads. Their daughters were the easiest of all. Some were so bad that most of us guys didn't even want to be caught alone with them, for fear of the ridicule we'd face for slumming it. But in some cases they were pretty good looking, so what the hell? I can remember these poor girls, and I still feel a bit embarrassed for them. One had a dad who was a super-liberal Reform Rabbi. Another a nudist French Canadian father.

I can't help but wonder whether the fact that their fathers were so laissez faire didn't teach the girls that their own sexuality was devalued. If your dad doesn't give a damn what you do with your body, then maybe, if you're a girl, you don't think your sexuality is anything special or worth much at all.

Sure, we hear about girls who act out despite having very strict, conservative parents. But that's the exception — not the norm. In my experience, it was typically the girls without fathers or whose fathers were very casual about these things who were the easiest — the sluts, so to speak. Those whose fathers were firm about sexual morality demanded that guys put a lot more on the table before they'd even consider it.

So what kind of daughter does Mr. "I am a feminist father" have? I think this picture says it all.

[update: the pic has been flagged, but still can be found on her media page]

Family Court Judge Threatens Deployed Submariner With Loss of Custody and Issues Arrest Warrant

W.F. Price · 21 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to file this under "things that would never happen to a woman." A family law judge in Michigan, otherwise known as a kidnapper in a robe, has ordered Matthew Hindes, a man who is serving somewhere deep under the waves on a classified mission, to show up in her courtroom. If he doesn't, she'll issue a bench warrant and reassign custody to the child's mother, who was judged unfit by child protective services. First, I have to say that for a woman to be declared an unfit mother, she has to be really lousy. It doesn't happen all that often. You know all those kids you hear about dying from neglect? Often, their mothers had already been evaluated by CPS and found "fit" — sometimes on multiple occasions.

I have seen the rare creature known as the noncustodial mother in court. One in particular I remember because she didn't look all that bad in person. However, when she opened her mouth in front of the judge and made every excuse in the book for failing heroin tests and violating probation time after time, it was pretty clear why she lost the kid. Evidently, it's kind of hard to take care of your child when you're in jail.

Although it's unclear what exactly led to the sailor's ex losing custody, the Michigan judge has declared that if the child is not presently in the custody of the father, she must be returned to the mother post-haste. The stepmother is currently taking care of the girl, and while that isn't ideal, given the CPS action it's probably a safer situation.

But the judge doesn't care. In fact, she doesn't even care that a law called the Service Members Civil Relief Act was passed explicitly to protect men like Hindes. According to the law, Hindes is entitled to a 90-day stay of proceedings, but judge Margaret Noe has ruled that this law doesn't apply, because, in her opinion, he should have handed the child over to her (unfit) mother before he set foot on a submarine.

This case says a lot about the value of serving one's country today. If a family court judge – some gussied up divorce lawyer in a robe – can ignore laws meant to protect him while deployed and order his arrest because, you know, he should teleport back from under the arctic icepack or wherever, then what's the point?

Seattle Minimum Wage Blowback: Daycare Set to Become Really, Really Expensive

W.F. Price · 22 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A lot of the arguments for the 50% minimum wage hike in Seattle are along the lines of this:

> "What's the problem? You'll only have to pay a little more for your hamburger or pizza, and that's nothing to complain about."

This is really how your typical Seattle progressive thinks.

However, they weren't thinking too hard about what's going to happen to essential services used by the empowered working mom, childcare being the most important among them. Because most young people in Seattle are newcomers, they don't have family to help them out, so unless the woman is married and her husband is making a six figure income (median household income in Seattle is around $64,000, so obviously most are not), daycare is essential.

Much of daycare's cost is wages, and despite the cost, which runs around $14,000/year for toddlers (full time), wages for childcare workers are low. The reason the cost is so high is that law mandates a low child to worker ratio. So if you have one worker per three kids (standard) and that worker is making around $12/hr. (also standard), the labor cost per child is about 60% of the total daycare cost.

Now raise that $12/hr. to $15/hr. That's a 25% increase right off the bat, which means, all else being equal (which is unlikely), daycare costs will rise 15% from the labor cost increase alone, which brings the cost of daycare in Seattle up $2,000 to a discouraging $16,000+. Just another dollar for my hamburger, huh?

This means that a working family with a respectable income of $100,000 will be paying 16 cents on every dollar merely for daycare. Add that to rent or mortgage and taxes and what's left over? Not much. If you have two kids you might as well just give up. If you're a single mom, forget about it! Your best course of action (sad, but true) is to drop out of the labor force and go on welfare.

On the positive side, an enterprising, competent woman who likes children can pull in over $40,000 per year with relatively few skills and little education simply by setting up a home-based business and doing the work herself and still undercut the competition. But how many women in Seattle would deign to do so? Precious few I'd wager, and it's hard to blame them given what you get in that town for $40k.

I've been wondering for a while when women would start to pay the price for the socialist, redistributionist policies they've been supporting for years. Looks like that time has come.

The Slow Shift South

W.F. Price · 23 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In just a week or so, the International Longshore and Warehouse Union is set to renegotiate contracts for its West Coast port workers. The ILWU has a long history in Seattle and San Francisco, and has won incredibly sweet concessions from ports over the decades. A foreman, for example, makes over $200,000 per year, and a normal employee about $130,000. Getting into the ILWU has become something of a dynastic process. The jobs are passed from father to son and even grandson. Outsiders are treated terribly by those in the union, which prevents them from ever making it in themselves. From all appearances, the ILWU has become little more than a gang.

This is the real problem with unions — like unrestrained corporations they can eventually become monopolistic guilds that reward only insiders at everyone else's expense.

But it's a big world out there, and the ILWU isn't really as "international" as its name suggests. It has no authority over East Coast and Gulf Coast ports which, given the recent expansion of the Panama Canal, has put the union in a tenuous position. Added to this is the refusal of a number of West Coast ports to ship coal to China, "because global warming" or whatever (actually, many locals are simply so spoiled that they don't like the idea of coal trains going through town, even if they add jobs and inject cash into the local economy). Finally, US manufacturing is shifting to the South as the greens gain political prominence on the West and East Coasts, and high land and labor costs drive manufacturers elsewhere. To Chinese and European shipping magnates these may be mere annoyances for now, but these things all add up, and it's the bottom line that counts in business.

As I look at the West Coast with its "progressive" leftist policies, which are not a result of need so much as the entitlement born of prosperity, it's apparent that the entire region is willfully setting itself back in all areas except high tech, which itself is significantly more mobile than manufacturing (i.e. the companies can easily pick up and leave if it's in their interest). If tech isn't enough or, heaven forbid, it also leaves, West Coast states are going to be in big trouble. At this point, I don't see the progressive momentum slowing down, but rather a doubling down on the policies that are undermining the fundamentals of a modern, diversified economy.

The development that is capturing businesses' attention is the transformation of the formerly slow, lazy and impoverished South – and the Gulf Coast in particular – into a global energy, manufacturing and shipping powerhouse. Despite its relative poverty and reputation for being backward, its growth has been impressive, with states like Texas and Louisiana adding jobs and wealth. In the meanwhile, aside from tech and finance, the coastal cities grow older and stagnant, and families suffer under increasingly burdensome property values and egregiously high working class unemployment, straining social welfare services.

I have no doubt that Asian companies will continue to ship products through West Coast ports, but in the future – thanks in part to the Panama Canal expansion – we can expect to see more of these ships bypassing our ports entirely to head on to friendlier Gulf Coast ports that are not only cheaper, but also offer products that can be shipped back to Asia. In the meanwhile, it's time for our West Coast politicians to get their act together and change course before they succeed in hollowing out our industrial base. If they aren't up to the job, they shouldn't be in office.

Interesting Comment of the Week

W.F. Price · 24 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter hindsight2020 recently left a comment on the April 16 article "Once a Man, Always a Man" that I thought was worth sharing. He writes about the "Hijras," India's transgender/eunuch caste. It isn't a pretty picture, and perhaps it's something we ought to keep in mind as the US marches onward toward institutionalized transsexualism.

I can provide a clearer picture of the eunuch situation on India. They are called Hijras and have an ancient and active Hijra community with their own temples, laws and bizarre practices. They live unencumbered by society and get a free pass since they are believed to have magical powers. They were guardians of concubines and harems due to their male strength and inability to have sex with the women.

Eunuchs are a revered (prayed to out of fear) group in India. They show up at weddings, and at childbirths and have to be paid off to go out of fear of a curse, kidnapping or simply to get them to leave and not make a scene. Their primary revenue is begging through intimidation, running brothels and child trafficking. More recently some banks started hiring eunuchs as debt collectors for their ability to humiliate people at their homes and offices.

Actual birth defects are extremely rare and seldom are they sent to eunuchs. Most Eunuchs are of 2 kinds: Transvestites (men who act like eunuchs during festive season and on Fridays) and castrated ones. Thats the bizarre part. Eunuchs get their children through kidnappings or as promised offerings for a wish fulfilled. Boys are preferred. Girls are put to work in brothels. The boys are taken to their temple. The boy's penis and testicles are tied tightly with a thread overnight till its numb. It is then severed with a razor blade. Over weeks, if the boy survives the bleeding and infection, he is now a blessed hijra. He is then trained and put to work as a sex slave till he is old enough to get into the intimidation business. This community continues its practices under the guise of religious freedoms and no government has the capacity to deal with this small fragmented group all over the country while it faces bigger national challenges.

Hijras appear on TV, movies and almost every popular bollywood actor has played one at some point.

Post liberalization in the 90s, Indian NGOs needed cool new initiatives and thus the pride walks came about. No one cared. They got their permissions without a hitch, police escorts for the march, massive press coverage as they walked chanting government oppression. The parades lacked the color and drama of trannies like in the west. Trannies were co-opted into this parade to bring the requisite color, flamboyance and other garish antics a true pride parade needs.

All they have done is give modern societal sanction and glamour to a bunch of vile criminals and the cruelest child abusers.

India gets its daily share of environmentalists, evangelists, SJWs and nobodies from the LGBT community who condescendingly believe their quick visit and listening to NGO sales pitch before heading to party in Goa… was somehow instrumental in changing India. Broadcasting their new found mysticism and 3rd world badge on twitter and fkbook alongwith with posed photographs of destitute kids on a dust road (with mandatory cow) after they retire in nice coffeshops and lounge pubs to update their feelings on their macbooks about (insert suffering) they are witnessing and then helping themselves to sanctimonious credentials on introduction bios.

Sorry about the rant. It pissed me off so much I had to comment.

-hindsight2020

Mormon Church Draws Line in Sand, Excommunicates Feminist

W.F. Price · 24 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A woman who has consistently defied church elders, doctrine and repeated orders to stop pushing her agenda has just been excommunicated by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

> The decision by the Mormon church to excommunicate the founder of a prominent women's group marks a stern statement at a time when the church is under pressure to recognize gay rights and allow women into the priesthood.
>
> Experts believe the move essentially draws a line in the sand to show church members how far they can go in publicly questioning church practices.
>
> The ousting of Kate Kelly is rare and brings down the harshest punishment available on a church member who created an organization and staged demonstrations in a push to permit women to join the faith's lay clergy.
>
> "It does more than excommunicate Kelly," said Jan Shipps, a retired religion professor from Indiana who is a non-Mormon expert on the church. "It warns everybody."
>
> Shipps said The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is implementing "boundary maintenance," using Kelly as an example to show people how far they can go in questioning church practices.
>
> The message seems to be that "organizing pressure groups, and trying to cultivate a following for such groups, crosses a line that will trigger disciplinary action," said Armand Mauss, a retired professor of sociology and religious studies at Washington State University.

I'm not a Mormon, and obviously not an LDS leader, but if I were the decision wouldn't have been a tough one. Give her a pass and more will be encouraged until finally one gets her foot in the door, then it's bye-bye Mormon Church, just like the Episcopal Church. Sometimes, you just have to draw the line, and anyway, since she doesn't seem to have much faith in other Mormon decisions and doctrine, I doubt she even puts any stock in an excommunication. Just think of it as an eviction notice so as to keep her from disrupting other Mormons.

But what always gets me about these attempts to push this or that church to "reform" is the fact that anybody – women included – can start his or her own church in the US. Ms. Kelly could start her own Mormon offshoot called "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Goddesses" or something like that. For some reason, however, churches started by women don't have a very good track record in the US (not to mention the world). To me, this says that the churches should hold firm and ban females from the priesthood if they want to survive, although I'm sure that feminists think it's the patriarchy or some other Lord of Darkness holding them down. The only female church I can think of that had any success over the years was the Shakers, and that's only because they managed to use 19th century child custody laws to gain adherents, but today they're down to about four members.

Still, that shouldn't stop Ms. Kelly from giving it a try. Maybe she'll be the first one to make it work.

Feminists to "Boycott" Men's Conference

W.F. Price · 25 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Spearhead needs your help to stay online. Without support soon, the site cannot survive as a resource open to all visitors. Please contribute financially to maintain men's journalism as a viable opinion and news outlet. Anything helps.

In a stunning admission of defeat, feminists are urging fellow-travellers to boycott the AVfM-sponsored International Men's Conference in St. Clair Shores, Michigan. One can sense a shifting of the tide – a loss of initiative – as instead of confronting, challenging and shouting people down feminists have scattered into the woods. It's really pretty funny that they're calling it a "boycott." Hamster much?

> Their continual promotion of violence through their writing should not be tolerated. Actions such as proclaiming that October's Domestic Violence Awareness Month be renamed to "Bash a Bitch Month," saying women don't just desire but beg to be raped and their hosting of a manifesto by Tom Ball that calls for the firebombing of court houses. We are not in opposition to real issues that men and boys face in our society but their hatred for women that they are using those issues to hide behind.
>
> We have had numerous people reach out to us to let us know of the very real danger we could be in by protesting. Due to concerns for physical safety we have decided the best way to oppose the conference that is now going on in St. Clair Shores is to keep our distance. With AVFM's history of attempting to provoke protestors, harassing individuals by following them to their cars or home, and filming or photographing them in order to release their private information online we don't feel that protesting at the VFW hall could keep people reasonable safe.
>
> While there may be others who decide to protest the conference, we want to make it perfectly clear that there are real concerns for safety. If you are planning to protest the conference, please make sure the people who are coming are informed enough about the kind of vicious tactics that AVFM has used to derail and trivialize the response to their own ideology.

This is actually a pretty significant development. Of course, anyone with any knowledge about women's nature could have predicted that once men actually started to stand up for themselves this would happen, but in my life I can't think of one example of feminists retreating in such an ignominious manner. It's sad that it took so long for men to finally make a stand, but better late than never.

I suspect that one of the reasons feminists are hiding is that they are afraid one of their own will actually be arrested or justifiably smacked down for some especially stupid threat or attack. This proves that Paul Elam's tactic of announcing his willingness – actually, desire – to trade blows if it comes to it was pretty savvy. If you announce that you won't fight back, then people think that gives them a license to attack you — it's human nature. For example, the Christian admonition to "turn the other cheek" is frequently misunderstood as requiring Christians to helplessly submit to attacks, whereas it was actually a highly contextual piece of advice in a legalistic society. It's a warning to people to avoid falling into the trap of provocation.

One thing that I have observed in my studies of gender politics is that supplicating to women does not win men favors in politics any more than it does in a pickup scenario. However, women will always say that it does. Conservatives, for some reason, fall for it, and believe the stories about how they need to supplicate in order to win votes. But all one needs to do is point out that AVfM has never supplicated, yet the organization enjoys a great deal of support from women (even a little too much for my tastes). How could this be possible? Obviously, it's because women generally admire men who stand up for themselves, whereas they despise those who don't.

The only men's movement that will ever get anywhere is an unapologetic, and even sometimes a little savage, movement.

Now that one has finally arrived, I think I'll enjoy sitting back and watching the opposition scatter to the winds until all that's left of it is a few blabbering, clueless male feminists wondering where all their female allies disappeared to.

Support Independent Men's Journalism

W.F. Price · 25 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear readers,

I've greatly appreciated providing you with regular commentary, news and essays for nearly five years at this point. It has truly been a labor of love.

Currently, I write for about 2,500 regular readers, with an average article being accessed about 3,500 times through the site. I'm quite satisfied with those numbers, because I know people aren't reading the site to be part of some club or forum, or because they were misled by promises of cash or sex, but rather for the content. Too much of the Internet is cluttered with clickbait and thoughtless text aimed primarily at search engines. I'm not concerned with garbage content, nor do I want garbage traffic.

However, I am consciously bucking the trend by not using the standard gimmicks that make money online. I like to publish thoughtful material. I don't want to promise that people can make a quick buck or get laid using my techniques. I'd be lying anyway, and lying doesn't come naturally to me.

The result of this idealism on my part (some might call it obstinacy) is that The Spearhead doesn't exactly haul in bags of cash. At this point, however, I need cash — badly. I have another baby due any day. I have bills due, and I just moved to a new place where I have no network to speak of, and therefore few opportunities as of yet.

If you're a reader who appreciates the content offered up on a regular basis on The Spearhead, I'd appreciate some support. I've cleared up my issues with Washington state DCS and I can now deposit checks and money orders without worrying about the bank dinging me with a $100 "garnishment fee" (yes, they are that brazen in theft) every time I make a deposit, and I'm in what seems to be a stable family situation. Things could be worse, but times are pretty lean, and when there's a baby that only adds to the stress.

So if you enjoy The Spearhead on a regular or even casual basis, please offer some support so I can keep it online and keep writing for you and offering featured articles by others. I guarantee that my perspective will remain independent, but always loyal to readers and to the principle of making the world a better place for men and their families.

Thank you.

Please donate through PayPal or send check or money order to:

Price Content (or William Price)
PO Box 31041
Bellingham, WA 98226

(sometimes the button returns an "error" message after payment, but the payments still go through without a hitch — it's merely an issue with the button's redirect code)

Donate

For those who would like to support the site on an ongoing basis, please consider becoming a supporting subscriber.

Jewish Father Faces Death Threats as Wife Tightens Vice

W.F. Price · 26 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Rivky Stein, mother of two and Orthodox Jewish wife to Yoel Weiss, has not found civil family law courts to be quite enough for her. Although she's accused her husband of rape and of punching her in the stomach when she was pregnant (which could bring an attempted murder charge), and even had him falsely arrested on multiple occasions for allegedly violating a restraining order (dismissed each time), she won't be satisfied until her husband abandons the only card he has left: the Jewish custom of the "get," which stipulates that only men can grant divorce under religious law.

> An Orthodox Jewish woman who has been unsuccessful in her attempts to secure a religious divorce from her husband has brought her case to social media, hoping to convince him to finally grant her a "get."
>
> With the help of family and friends, Rivky Stein, 24, created a Facebook page detailing her purportedly nightmarish relationship with hubby Yoel Weiss, 31, whom she married in a religious ceremony shortly after she turned 18 years old, in 2008.
>
> "I want my get very badly," she told the News. "But this is not just about me. It's about fixing the problem so it doesn't happen to anyone else."
>
> They had two children together, but Stein left Weiss after a series of alleged abuses, which she says included raping her and punching her in the stomach while she was pregnant. She says she never sought to have him criminally charged, but is now speaking to the Brooklyn District Attorney's office.
>
> Weiss, who runs an Internet search engine optimization firm, denies abusing his estranged wife.
>
> The couple never formally obtained a civil marriage license, both partners said.
>
> Instead they used a Jewish marriage contract, called a ketubah , which is technically illegal [editor: Not true. The Ketubah is a legally-enforceable civil contract and not "illegal"] but still recognized by family court.
>
> According to strict Jewish law, a woman is considered married, locked in and unable to remarry, until her husband grants the formal divorce document. That means Stein cannot move on with her life until she gets the get .
>
> He insists he'll give it to her as soon as their messy custody battle is hashed out in family court.
>
> "This is something that's settled together," he said. "That's how the Jewish thing goes. Ever bought a house and moved into it without paying?"
>
> But community leaders contend that's a poor excuse.

This is just the latest in a string of stories about Jewish men facing down lynch mobs incited by their wives for the purposes of obtaining a get and forcing husbands into unconditional surrender in civil courts. If Mrs. Stein used only the civil courts, like most women, she'd almost certainly emerge victorious in custody and child support fights. She'd also have no trouble obtaining a civil divorce if she'd bothered to get a civil marriage in the first place. No contract – Jewish or not – can override family court decisions on these matters. Actually, what she's trying to do is force civil courts and/or opinion to make a ruling on a marriage that doesn't legally exist in the state of New York.

However, in the Orthodox Jewish community, she'd be ineligible for an Orthodox Jewish remarriage regardless of what the state says. Although I don't know the facts in this case, if a woman is so dead set on being able to remarry immediately after separation, that's a red flag for adultery. It means there's a high likelihood that she's already got another man lined up. Mrs. Stein, who is a svelte, cute 24-year-old, probably wouldn't have a problem finding another man in a community where most young women are already married and the men without wives have limited options. If she hasn't already, I'd be highly surprised. If not, it would be easy to let the dust settle and then when Mr. Weiss calms down and they have a custody schedule they can both live with, he'll give her the get.

But no, Rivky wants it Right Now!, and she isn't about to make any concessions on custody that might limit her mobility and force her to cooperate with her icky husband. So she's pulling out the big guns, gathering an army of beta white knights, some of whom have, according to Mr. Weiss, threatened him with death, and now she's using the media to paint her husband as a monster. She's even using the typical treacly feminist pablum about "freedom" and "rights." Feminists have a childish conception of freedom and rights that essentially means "freedom from responsibility" and "right to do whatever I want." I'm sure she genuinely feels that her freedom and rights are being violated, but you know, this isn't the Pale of Settlement, but rather New York, where she's free to abandon the dictates of her religion if it doesn't suit her, and has every right to do so. What more could she ask for?

A lot, apparently.

From The Spearhead to the National Debate on Marriage and Interpartner Violence

W.F. Price · 27 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A couple weeks ago, I noticed that Heartiste posted a Bureau of Justice Statistics graph I used last year to demonstrate that feminist fearmongering about husbands was putting women in danger. Heartiste retweeted the post when I first published it, so he gave The Spearhead credit for the research, and I'm glad he reposted the graph recently, because it makes such a powerful statement.

> The safest place for women is in the marital home, living with their husbands. http://t.co/QZMg35yIeR @Jezebel heh.
>
> — heartiste (@heartiste) November 4, 2013

Shortly after Heartiste's repost, I noticed that the graph had appeared in the Washington Post of all places, which essentially repeated my conclusion that single motherhood is a dangerous situation, and far from ideal. The Washington Post article even referenced statistics I used in the article I posted immediately prior to the domestic violence article, which concluded that children who live with their fathers are far safer than those who don't (ya think?). I'm all but certain that one or both authors (Bradford Wilcox and Robin Fretwell Wilson) read my articles before submitting their text to the Post and Wilcox's subsequent article for National Review. Now I see that Anne Cools, a Canadian senator who is speaking at the Men's Conference, has repeated, almost word for word, what I wrote last year in the original article:

> "The safest place for a woman is in a home living with the father of her children." Canadian Sen Anne Cools #icmi14
>
> — Quince Mountain (@QuinceMountain) June 27, 2014

While it does feel nice to see one's labor bear fruit, it's important to stress that for a long time hardly anyone bothered to do the nitty gritty research into these issues except for gender feminists. They have had a lock on academic gender studies for decades, and virtually everything published along those lines comes from their perspective. Instead of putting their access to material and knowledge to work to do good, they have pushed a selfish agenda the entire time. Every study that did not conform to their radical misandrist worldview has been either ignored or tossed out, and the gullible masses went on for years simply repeating their talking points.

But now things are starting to change. Feminist theory is being challenged more boldly than ever before as the monopoly on information is being destroyed by the Internet. Although it may be a sad statement about the current state of scholarship, every time the truth makes it out into the wider world we have won a victory — not only for those of us who are concerned about men's issues, but human decency as well. Feminism, because it denies human nature, is a profoundly inhuman philosophy. When put into practice it hurts people, just like Stalinism and Maoism. Not just a few people, but millions of them — from children on up to grandparents.

It may be easier now to bring the truth to light, but it still involves a considerable amount of time and careful research. It also requires focus, consistency, and the cultivation of credibility through sustained effort despite repeated feminist potshots and obfuscation.

In short, it's a job, and an important one.

This is why I'm asking for support — so I can continue to perform and make a difference. Those who have chipped in deserve both thanks and credit for making it possible and thereby influencing the national debate and advancing public understanding, and I'd like to invite others to do the same. As stated before, The Spearhead has at least 2,500 regular readers, and by regular I mean near daily. There are over 2,000 unique, returning visitors (not page views) per day, about 1,000 people (out of a couple thousand subscribers) access the content through the feed per day, and hundreds of others subscribe through email. To be conservative, rather than add all these up I subtracted about a thousand to account for “occasional” readers and those who use more than one method to access content.

It’s great to have so many loyal readers, and rewarding in itself — working for others suits me very well. But because the site is mainly free to all, and I want to keep it that way to the greatest extent possible as a resource for others who could find it useful (such as the authors of the Washington Post piece), it’s hard to monetize. Fortunately, however, if everyone chips in even a little it’s enough. And trust me: on my budget I certainly appreciate the small contributions as well — everything counts.

So if you haven’t already, please consider a contribution to keep me at it and allow me to continue in my role as an independent and prolific advocate for men and families.

PRIDE Toronto Boots CAFÉ

W.F. Price · 1 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Barbara Kay, who spoke at the Men's Conference in Michigan, wrote a column yesterday about the arbitrary ejection of CAFÉ from Toronto's Pride parade, held last weekend:

> The annual Pride event in Canada's biggest city is supposed to be a celebration of all things and causes relating to gay culture and, more broadly, to formerly marginalized sexual identities. It's supposed to be a big tent. But as the treatment of CAFÉ shows us, only those groups with a politically correct agenda are seen as acceptable.
>
> According to its own policy, Pride Toronto doesn't permit cancellations after June 21 — thereby ensuring that groups have an opportunity to respond to complaints lodged against them. CAFÉ, which has charity status (giving them more legal standing than most of the other participating groups), took part last year without incident and had two months ago successfully registered to walk this year, their name appearing in official Pride literature.
>
> CAFÉ was given no substantive reason for the rejection, just a note from the Pride organizers: "It has come to our attention that the work of your organization may contravene the spirit of the mission, vision, and values of Pride Toronto and WorldPride." And that was it. Their right to march was withdrawn. At a stroke, CAFÉ was lumped in with pedophilia-promoting groups such as Men Loving Boys Loving Men, the only other type of group I could find to have been spurned by Pride as inconsistent with its mission.
>
> Although CAFÉ's broad mandate is freedom of speech, much of its activity has focused on raising awareness of men's issues — including those that affect, say, the right of gay men (and all men) to have equal parenting rights under Canadian law. But feminists regard any such advocacy as a threat to their dogma. And so feminist activism, occasionally aggressive, has attended almost every men's rights speaker sponsored by CAFÉ on Canadian university campuses. (I was one such speaker two years ago.) It therefore isn't much of a stretch to infer that CAFÉ was booted from Pride because of the complaints of militant feminists.

Kay mentions the irony inherent in Pride's rejection of CAFÉ, but perhaps as a Canadian she isn't aware of the height of hypocrisy it represents. Gay organizations have been fighting for years to butt into American parades and organizations, such as Boston and New York's St. Patrick's Day parades, which are Catholic, family-oriented events. They weren't fighting merely for the right to participate as marchers, which has never been an issue, but rather as out-and-proud homosexuals. In recent years they've enlisted mayors' support, and a number of mayors have indeed condemned the Irish Americans for choosing not to celebrate homosexuality alongside their ethnic heritage and Catholic faith.

So one would expect the Pride parades themselves to be bastions of tolerance and fairness, right? Wrong! Step out of line just a tiny bit from the official dogma, which includes gender feminism, and you're not welcome. Remember that "LGBT" starts with L, and most lesbians don't take kindly to straight men who ask for equal treatment under the law.

Personally, I avoid these Pride parades if at all possible. The only time I saw one was as a kid when I lived near the neighborhood that used to host them in Seattle. That was over twenty years ago. But some MRA groups, including CAFÉ, think that the best way to advance men's rights is through the same left-activist route that worked for women, gays and minorities.

I'm not so sure, but it can't hurt to try, so I support the intrepid souls who are willing to give it a shot. Might as well work all angles, and see which one pays off.

There is actually precedent for radical shifts in the left coalition. Take the support for Zionism, for example, which was pretty much ironclad in the left from the 1970s through the 1990s. Somehow, that unraveled in the early 2000s, and now anti-Zionism is the new norm, with groups of gays actually marching against Israel, despite that country's tolerance of homosexuality to a degree unseen in the rest of the Middle East.

Could the same happen to feminists? It's possible. The radicals, mainly aging lesbian gender-feminists, are not really natural allies of the trans people or the gay men. More like a marriage of convenience. If CAFÉ affirmed trans rights, for example, the organization could start to make some headway. That's something I'd never sign up for (I'm highly suspicious of any group that denies the reality and immutability of one's sex at birth, because that carries a high potential for abuse of men), but as a tactic it might work.

So support for CAFÉ is in order, even if some of us might think their efforts are doomed to failure. Simply pressing the issue does make a difference and, after all, we might be wrong.

Preparing for New Baby

W.F. Price · 3 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've got another little one on the way and he's due right about now, and complicating matters I picked up the kids for the summer today. These things can't be predicted with much certainty, so if there's radio silence for a little while that's the likely explanation.

Once we're settled in, it will be back to normal, thanks to readers and supporters who have given me the leeway to make it through the summer. In the meanwhile, I'll still be posting on a near daily basis if possible, but the schedule might be a bit unpredictable.

Thanks, everyone. There are interesting times ahead, and I intend to stay in the thick of it.

At the Baby Center

W.F. Price · 6 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been in and out of the local childbirth center over the last 24 hours, and like most dads I am above all hopeful that everything will turn out alright.

It's a nice little hospital with lots of young first-timer parents and a few veterans like me. I love seeing the young fathers, despite the danger fatherhood poses to young men today. It gives me hope for the future of my people, and knowing that there are still plenty of young men going through with it is reassuring. Maybe I'm a little partial to the American fathers, but I don't think it's a sin to feel that way. I do what I can to offer some reassurance to the young men and their wives, and make funny-but-true jokes about parenthood to both set them at ease and give them a bit of an idea of what it's like.

Millennials sometimes get a bad rap, but these young men and women are really no different from the generations that came before. I guess I'll just say that I really like them — the kids are alright.

However, what might interest readers is some of the godawful literature in the waiting room. I picked up a couple pamphlets on how to call the authorities on your babydaddy. First, the "voluntary" paternity test. Sure, it's voluntary — for the mother. All you have to do is fill out a little form naming who you think the father might be, and turn it in to DSHS. The messy part that comes later isn't spelled out, but I imagine it involves a court summons and a court ordered blood test to anyone who gets named.

Now, in a fair society where men knew where they stood and had some reproductive rights, this might not be such a terrible thing, but right next to these pamphlets is a poster saying that women are free to anonymously dump their babies at the hospital, no questions asked. The caption read "we don't judge" or something like that. Of course, that doesn't apply to reluctant fathers.

Next, there was a domestic violence pamphlet. This one followed feminist dogma to the letter. Domestic violence is apparently about "power and control." Abuse includes so-called "emotional abuse," and according to the pamphlet it's all illegal. This is obviously untrue; if emotional abuse were really illegal millions of women would be in jail.

So what I see at the birth center is pure, hopeful nice young parents and parents to be, and then a bunch of feminist pamphlets littering the place. It's like dogshit in a cathedral.

Maybe I'm naïve, but I see family as sacrosanct, and I think allowing these feminists to intrude upon it right where it starts is a gross violation that calls out for punishment. The many women working at the birth center are competent, well-meaning and conscientious. I don't blame them at all. But some higher-ups in the hospital and Washington state's government decided to dump their trash right there — right where hopeful parents-to-be are about to experience a trasformative experience that may well be the most important step in their lives.

We have to do figure out how to deal with these people. They're a problem crying out for a solution.

Das Baby

W.F. Price · 7 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Well, another little guy has come into the world. I'm happy and relieved that all went well and he's a healthy, vigorous boy. Despite the pain and exhaustion, my wife has been a trooper throughout it all, and now she's a happy mama. I'm proud of her, and intend to give her all the help I can. She's a beautiful mother, and I love her more than ever.

Below are a couple post-delivery photos of me and baby. He looks like a doll in the picture with me — I'd almost forgotten how tiny they are at birth.

And here's my little hero himself:

I'm a pretty happy guy right now.

I also really appreciate the words of encouragement from readers. It's genuinely touching.

One thing I'd like to say to young men out there who may become fathers some day themselves is that children teach you that there aren't really limits to your love. You might think you only have so much, and it has to be shared like pieces of a pie, but that isn't how it works.

It's more like a tree that keeps growing as long as it's alive. Every new child is like another branch on the tree, and as it grows so do the previous branches. It's a wonderful thing that way.

The Myth of the Empowered Working Class Single Mother

W.F. Price · 16 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been pulling the early morning shift with the baby for most of the last week so my wife can have some time to sleep, and then she in turn gives me time for sleep, but despite all that I didn't get a full night of sleep for about two weeks. When there's a newborn baby in the room, it's pretty much impossible to get enough sleep, so to get needed rest one of us has to be awake with him in another room while the other sleeps. What it really comes down to is me giving him the bottle and performing associated de-gassing activities at least once while she's sleeping so mom only has to do one or two night feedings instead of three or four — you've got to limit the bottle-feeding this early so the baby doesn't get "nipple confusion." Babies sleep a lot, but it's a highly punctuated sleep. You're lucky to get more than two straight hours of downtime between feeding times, and they can fuss for an hour or more with a very grating cry that I am certain nature made impossible to ignore.

The reason human newborns are so difficult is that they are highly inefficient little beings who must eat ravenously to grow. With oversized heads, humans require many calories merely to keep the brain growing that, in other animals, would go into rapid physical development. Humans are also born without the ability to consume all that much at a time, so regular feedings are necessary. My son gained exactly one ounce per day following discharge from the hospital, or nearly 1% of his body weight every day, all by consuming two-ounce portions of milk every one to three hours. Taking into account their considerable needs and helplessness, human infants are, without a doubt, the most high-maintenance young of any species on earth.

Despite the high emotion of the first couple days post-partum, we've already created the foundation for a working system. Cooperation makes an enormous difference, and really takes the edge off. For ordinary – i.e. not filthy rich – families, I suspect this has been the norm since the dawn of time. Sure, there may have been parents around to help at times, but mortality was so high until the last century that I doubt it was all that common. Add to that the fact that the overwhelming majority of cultures are patrilocal (the wife moves in with the husband's tribe/family), and it's unlikely that many new mothers had their own mothers or sisters around to help. So it was typically up to their husbands to ease the considerable burdens of motherhood.

However, even as I see the benefits of cooperative childrearing first-hand, I've been coming across a lot of articles about how working and lower middle class women are better off raising their kids "alone." It's a bit baffling, really, because taking care of a baby alone is a special kind of hell — even for women: you're practically guaranteed sleep deprivation for months, there's no way you could reasonably do so and hold a job, and even if you could, without at least an upper middle class salary daycare for infants is unaffordable ($20,000/year in Seattle last I checked).

You'd think that having someone around to help, even if he isn't bringing in much income, would sure beat the alternative.

So what gives? Why are all these women going it alone? Actually, they aren't. What is happening in the working class is the ghettoization of working Americans. We are seeing a family model that first arose in the northern urban black community become more and more the norm throughout society.

When I was growing up, I had some friends from the nearby projects. One kid, Ernest, lived down near the community swimming pool at Rainier Beach High School, so after swimming lessons we'd sometimes hang out in his neighborhood. I never recall seeing Ernest's mother — it was his grandmother who took care of him. All told, she did a respectable job. He was a nice kid and, unlike most of the others stuck in that lousy situation, had a grandmother who actually bothered to teach him the basics (like how to swim). These little things add up to a lot over the years.

Over time, I found out that Ernest's family arrangement was the norm in that neighborhood. I have no idea what most of the mothers were doing, but they were definitely not "empowered single mothers" by the commonly understood definition. They were hardly mothers at all. It was their mothers who were doing the heavy lifting.

Lest some say that this is a natural family arrangement for blacks dating back to Africa, it really isn't. Africa may be different from Europe in important ways, but it never was, nor has it ever been, a matriarchal utopia. This state of affairs occurred after the great migration, and it was an urban phenomenon.

Instead of some natural matriarchal love-fest, it is more properly termed "multi-generational female dependency." It's an insidious kind of charity, because it renders men socially superfluous even as it encourages women to depend on the state for support, which creates an entire community that is a net drain on the surrounding society. Of course, there are incentives built in all along the way.

For example, if a woman gets section 8 housing after having a daughter, then raises her to adulthood on public assistance, when her daughter has a child she can stay with her mother (who will provide daycare) and collect welfare while she waits to get her own section 8 voucher. The daughter then gets her section 8 apartment, and the cycle repeats itself. I'm sure there are many families today entering their fourth generation of this lifestyle. For the men, the choices are significantly more limited. A lucky few may hit it big somehow, a large fraction will be arrested and incarcerated for something or other, and a minority will finally escape through the military or a reasonable job. Many will be reduced to the humiliating, demoralizing state of "mooching" off women who are state-supported. Naturally, this has incentivized favoritism toward female over male children amongst the underclass. Poor urban women invest more time and money in their daughters than their sons. This is sad but rational, because state assistance flows toward the female of the species — not the male.

When I see writers for Salon or some similar publication declaring that working class women are better off going it alone, I don't think they quite understand what's happening here. Instead of taking a hard look at the incentives, they tend to focus on the alleged shortcomings of the male, and rarely bother to get his side of the story (a glaring omission considering that the women in question deliberately chose to be impregnated by a particular man). They assume that it's a matter of working class women earning more money and being better providers than the males. Perhaps most stupidly, they assume that a working class woman can be a single, go-it-alone mother of an infant and a productive worker:

> Lily had grown up in a rural town, more than an hour from Kansas City, Mo. She was four months pregnant and not feeling well, and she was in tears. She was also not married, but that's not what was upsetting her. The car that she needed to get to her two jobs in the city had broken down, and she had no other way to get to work. We asked whether her boyfriend, Carl, could help her. Lily frowned. She had recently broken up with Carl, she explained, because "I can support myself. I always have. I can support myself and our kid. I just can't support myself, the kid, and him."

Lily sounds positively heroic. How could she possibly handle all this responsibility? Does she plan to strap the baby to her breast while she stocks shelves at Walmart?

The next paragraph gives us a clue as to what's really going on:

> Was Lily just being stubborn? Unrealistic about what it actually takes to raise a baby? Soon after the baby was born we interviewed Lily again. A lawyer had helped Lily get a refund for the car. Her parents, devout Christians who supported both her decision to have the child and her decision not to marry Carl [editor: some "Christians"], were helping with child care. Carl was still not part of the picture, and Lily had no regrets. In her mind, Carl would get in the way of her ability to raise her child.

Aha! Lily's mother is going to be taking care of the kid. This is exactly how it begins.

Back in the bad old days, women had two realistic choices when they got pregnant out of wedlock: marriage or adoption. The alternative – becoming a "single mom" – was not generally supported by parents, and for good reason — they usually ended up paying for it. But there has been a new development since then: a huge, comprehensive welfare state. Instead of having to buy groceries for the child grandma can now be added to WIC checks, use the EBT and sign up for a childcare voucher. Yes, states will actually pay grandmothers, if they take a couple remedial classes, to watch their daughters' kids. With a little planning, mother, daughter and grandmother can all get a piece of the pie. Carl, for his part, is eligible for nothing, although as non-custodial father he may well be forced to reimburse the state for paying his child's grandmother…

This puts the women's willingness to eject Carl from the situation in some perspective. Why share with him if they don't have to, and especially when on top of that he can be forced to pay them? Lily has zero financial incentive to create a traditional family, and her mother – a so-called Christian – has an incentive to discourage her from doing so. It all sounds very trashy, and unfortunately it is, but before we lay all the blame on Lily and her mother, we must remember that highly-educated people from "good families" came up with the legislation that created these incentives.

Instead of using welfare as a relief measure to help families through rough times, our brilliant leaders created a self-perpetuating single motherhood mill. Now, women have no incentive to become partners in productive nuclear families, and men have no incentive to be husbands and fathers.

What could go wrong?

Trans-Thor

W.F. Price · 17 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Marvel comics has decided to change Thor, the Norse god, into a woman. But that doesn't mean the new she-Thor will be a goddess, oh no:

> This morning on ABC's The View Marvel announced that Thor, Marvel's God of Thunder, will be a woman in the comics. The news is a major shift in Marvel's continuity, since Thor is one of the oldest superheroes in the Marvel universe. The new storyline will launch this October, penned by series writer Jason Aaron.
>
> Whoopi Goldberg, The View's moderator, didn't mince words when she talked about the announcement. The character is a god — not a goddess — and will wield Mjolnir (and even the god's name) just like her predecessor, who was deemed unworthy of its power.

I'm not sure whether this is an attempt to grab some publicity or a true appeal to feminists/transsexuals, but it's a risky move in the long-term. While adults might tolerate the switch as an amusing diversion, comics are fundamentally children's literature. I learned French reading Astérix as a boy, and my eldest son is now a fan of Sonic the Hedgehog. As a child, if I'd seen a comic book with a female hero, I wouldn't have bothered to pick it up, nor would about 96% of other boys. It had nothing to do with feminism, but rather the fact that women just aren't all that interesting to pre-pubescent boys (however, just a few short years later lewd jokes about Wonder Woman were all the rage at school).

So I wonder whether this new storyline is intended for an adult audience, and if so, whether it's a signal that Marvel either doesn't care about the base market for comics, or has already been surpassed by other companies that appeal better to boys and has decided to give up. Maybe there's another explanation: the company is simply being poorly managed.

Imagine what would happen if some underling came up to Steven Spielberg and said: "You know, I have this great idea! Let's make Optimus Prime a female robot…" Whoever came up with such a stupid idea would likely be fired on the spot. Politics are one thing, but sales are quite another. Get the two mixed up, and you'll get smeared by the competition (incidentally, this is why the manosphere can survive despite being politically marginalized: even with the huge funding advantage feminists have, lots of people prefer our material). There are, after all, only so many David Futrelles out there.

And if Marvel thinks it can make up for the loss of interest in boys by picking up girls, it's time to think again. Normal girls (as opposed to future feminists) far prefer feminine characters doing ladylike things — not dominatrix types holding giant hammers. In fact, girls' preference for femininity goes just as absurdly far as the over-the-top masculinity of pro wrestling and GI Joe. Wonder Woman, with her less-imposing weapon (the lasso), fashionable armor (bracelets), leggy, model physique and beautiful mane of black hair at least made some effort to appeal to feminine tastes. The new trans-Thor, on the other hand, wields a hammer, wears a helmet with a facemask and apparently has big, burly arms. I can't see my daughter being all that interested in that kind of female character.

Finally, adult women who like Thor will not be all that happy about this. Thor's main appeal to women is as a Nordic hunk. It's hard to overstate the appeal of manly warriors with flowing blond hair — especially to white women. Changing Thor into a woman is going to seriously anger some of these female fans; perhaps even more than the men.

Feminist-run Shelter to House Illegal Children and Young Mothers

W.F. Price · 19 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When you want to find urban corruption today, the first place to look isn't Italian mobsters and greedy Irish cops, but the "social justice" crew and their associated powerful backers. I'm convinced that nonprofits, which don't have to disclose funding sources in most states, are the primary centers of political corruption in the US today. In the article I linked above, NARAL New York asked for and received an exemption from New York's transparency laws, citing "threats." I can unequivocally call bullshit on that one, because NARAL was the most aggressive door-to-door fundraiser in my old neighborhood, and the organization was exactly the opposite of timid. They were so bold that when one showed up at my door and I said that as a parent I thought the request was in extremely poor taste, and in any event disagreed with their stance on late-term abortion, the doorbeller just ignored me and started loudly talking over my shoulder to get my pregnant wife to give the organization money for pro-abortion efforts!

How could these people be "frightened?" As we see, even when citizens try to legislate transparency, the people involved in these organizations are so powerful that they can ignore the laws.

Now, it turns out that YouthCare, a Seattle youth homeless shelter run by a real butch type named Melinda Giovengo, has been confirmed to be hosting the illegals in two locations in Seattle. Doubtless there is some quid pro quo involved, which may or may not include the chance to woo winsome young Mayan mothers, but almost certainly involves federal cash. I looked up the other staff members, all of whom are women, and they are all feminist ideologues and profiteers. One of them is a DV counselor, which means she's probably going to be providing "expert" recommendations to DHS on pending refugee/asylum cases these women and children will inevitably file (with publicly-funded lawyers). This is how Obama will avoid sending these kids home to their villages and families, despite his promise to do so. Just think of how many thousands of taxpayer dollars will be spent on each one of these illegals in legal fees, food, housing, professional services and education, and suddenly a "mere 60,000″ becomes a lot more significant. These border jumpers are going to be very, very expensive, but they will provide jobs and money to thousands of liberal Obama supporters.

Remember the "federal contractors" from the Bush administration? This is something similar, but instead of being rewarded for assisting the invasion and occupation of a foreign country, these people are being rewarded for complicity in the invasion and occupation of the United States of America. To me, that's what the difference between the Democrats and Republicans comes down to. Both are lousy, corrupt, and immoral in many ways, but at least with the Republicans I am not the target in a sub-rosa civil war. Others may disagree, but having lived for most of my life in deep blue Seattle, I'm all too keenly aware of what the "liberal agenda" comes down to.

A few questions I'd like to ask these women running the YouthCare center include:

-If these women and children – illegal aliens who have already admitted to breaking the law – are entitled to free legal services at public expense, why aren't US citizen fathers provided with the same when tactically accused by wives of abuse during child custody proceedings?

-Are you making any effort at all to determine whether any of the children were removed from their country of origin without their fathers' consent?

-If the mothers are claiming to be domestic violence victims, thus potentially qualifying them for some form of asylum, are you making any effort to investigate these claims and hear the other side of the story?

-Since several of you are lesbians, why not prove your good intentions and save the taxpayer some money by marrying one of the women yourselves and taking on personal responsibility for her and her children?

There's a lot these people should answer for, as they are clearly going to come into a bonanza of federal funds for hosting these illegals. But I doubt we'll hear a peep. Instead, all the deals will go on behind closed doors, and we'll end up footing the bill.

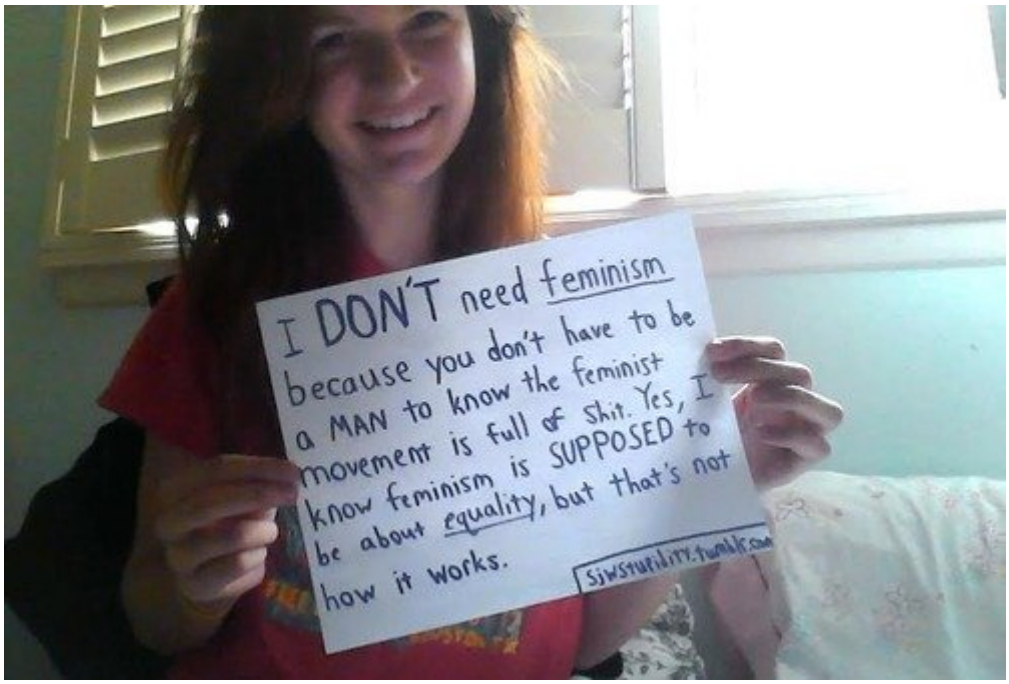
The Disposability Paradox

W.F. Price · 21 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Just a few years ago, triumphalist screeds about the "End of Men" were all the rage, but somehow the younger generation of women didn't get the message. Instead, they've been rejecting "feminism" in stronger terms than I've ever witnessed in my life.

A new social media trend called "women against feminism" (#womenagainstfeminism on Twitter) has emerged. Those declaring themselves against feminism are overwhelmingly young, and often quite attractive. Some 10,000 have already signed on to the campaign(!), and more are coming online every day.

Here's one young woman with a healthy perspective on feminism:



I'll admit that feminists' reaction to it provides me with some amusement, but this development does call for some speculation.

What I think is going on here is that younger women need men more than their older, feminist counterparts did in their heyday. But how could that be? According to Michael Kimmel et al, young men are a bunch of infantile losers. They don't make as much money as their fathers did at the same age, and often not even as much as their girlfriends. Doesn't this mean that men are "on the wrong side of history?" That they are suited only for the garbage heap of humanity?

Far from it. Male disposability is a paradoxical thing. The more one can afford to dispose of men, the less women "need" men. What this means is that when there is a surplus of men or men have a surplus of goods (the two usually go hand in hand, e.g. mining camps, oil rigs, etc.), women are more independent and need men less on an individual basis. Stories abound of independent-minded women in the old West who chose not to marry, but led a privileged, easy life nonetheless. However, go to the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, where women outnumber, outearn and outlive men, and you'll find third world living standards.

The less men have – and the less men there are in general – the more women need them. Without men or without men of means, there can be no surplus, no you-go-grrrrl feminism, no fancy restaurants and no nice houses. Everything just goes to crap.

Now, with the millennials, we are seeing a generation of largely impoverished young men. Millennial girls are looking at what life is like for most of their peers and thinking “if you feminists don’t want a man, that’s fine, but I do, so I’m no feminist.” But what use could a man possibly be if he has no money to speak of? Only someone who has never lived with a woman could find that one hard to answer. A healthy young man with no money can drive, carry things, fix things, protect his mate, solve problems, save money, do chores — the list goes on. And when he gets a job, he will pay his way and do all these things, even if he makes less than his girlfriend. It’s a much, much better deal for a woman than a female roommate. Add to this the fact that most pink-collar jobs are low-wage service jobs, and having a man around who contributes anything at all is mighty helpful for the typical young woman.

What created this “independent woman” myth was the great prosperity of the baby boomer era, which lasted from roughly the mid 60s to the mid 2000s. Men abounded, and they were flush with cash. Businesses could afford to hire superfluous cute girls and give them nice salaries. Family courts could rob men blind and they’d still have enough left over for a reasonable lifestyle and a chance to start over. Men were harvesting the fat of the land, and there was more than enough to go around. My blue-collar father bought a house on Capitol Hill in Seattle when he was in his mid 20s. Today, that same house would sell for about a million dollars — even a well-compensated professional would have a hard time affording it.

Things have changed. Young men’s status is markedly lower, so there’s a lot less left over for young women, who are working harder than their mothers and getting less in return. Most young mothers need state assistance merely to give birth (actually, about half of all mothers need it today), which proves that young women are not exactly making money hand over fist themselves. When you’re poor, life is a lot easier if you can share with someone, and nobody shares more with girls than boys. So merely finding a man to share burdens is a considerable relief to young women. Is a feminist going to fix a car, carry a TV upstairs or take her to the hospital to give birth? Will the feminist voluntarily share any of what she earns with the young woman? Yeah, right…

Male scarcity in either numbers or resources effectively prevents feminism. Surplus enables it. In a sense, one could say that feminism’s own downfall is built in to the ideology itself, because it contributes to male scarcity.

Wars between the sexes accomplish nothing in the long run, but they do highlight the complementary, interdependent nature of the sexes: when one sex “beats” the other, both lose. Today’s young women seem to understand that a lot better than their foolish mothers ever did.

Growing up in the Belly of the Beast

W.F. Price · 22 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Marion Zimmer Bradley has been in the news recently because her daughter wrote an exposé of her horrific childhood abuse at her mother's hands. Bradley's daughter, classical harpist Moira Greyland, alleges that she was sexually abused, beaten and, on a couple occasions, nearly drowned in the bathtub by her mother. She also tells tales of incest, orgiastic parties and serial rape by Walter Breen, Bradley's husband at the time.

Sometimes, it's good to withhold judgment when these accusations are made, because it's hard to know exactly what's going on in other people's families, and simmering resentments can motivate people to stretch the truth to exact revenge. However, there's actually court evidence in this case. Walter Breen was arrested and convicted of sodomizing boys, and Bradley is on the record saying she knew about it but did nothing. Additionally, Moira Greyland's brother Mark has corroborated the stories.

Mark credits his sister for her courage in exposing Bradley's crimes, and goes on to describe a hellish childhood surrounded by hostile, depraved feminists. Honestly, as a father, when I read about what Mark went through as a child it's emotionally difficult to bear.

> CS: In what ways have you been affected by the abuse you experienced?
>
> MG: Day by day, hour by hour by … you have to be joking.
>
> I flinch. My reflex to be quiet when bad things happen is so profound I was unable to scream when a gentleman broke into our house and stole the television while I was standing back pressed against the wall trembling.
>
> My reflexes are all wrong and I am working every day to create normal behavior. But fear is my companion, moment by moment. I flinch at loud noises, at traffic sounds, doors slamming, sudden cries of the young.
>
> I trance out and visions fill me at the drop of a hat, then the cold spot from everything you agreed to being a joke and the sound of screams rise and I'm balling up and "too late, too late could I have done more" wars with "she never listened anyway you are nothing and the pain for her rises and …."
>
> I speak in poetry and melodrama to shield myself from having to say any of this. I make up a me and let it play for you. I've gotten so good at it I can just go hide in the corner while my fingers type and my mind runs on. I can write for facts and I can also write for feelings. Those feelings are over there and I don't have to handle them except in lines of print. I polish the lines of words until it becomes the music and songs that let me hide.
>
> CS: Do you think other people were aware of your mother's abuse of you and your sister at the time? If so, in what ways did they respond?
>
> MG: You assume that I would have felt free to say anything. There was always drama and there was always the invisible blade of what would happen if all of this dreadful secret got out. The atmosphere of fear of discovery was simply everywhere and there was no place to hide.
>
> Worse, I was ashamed. When you are small you believe stuff, and I felt with my whole heart that I was responsible when she would go bad. There was absolutely no way I was gonna drag the mountain onto my head. And that made every day a drama, a thick clogged tube of waiting for the dreadful, the un-nameable horror.
>
> And nobody spoke. Everything was always fine and that was my clown suit. I thought everyone knew and that I was such a bad person no one would speak to me. My echo chamber filled me with such fear of exposure I would do anything to make the shadow go away. And I did. The shame paints my world yellow and pink and brown. I don't want to say these things any more.

Marion Zimmer Bradley's star rose with the feminist movement. She was a luminary for feminists who were seeking a form of spirituality they could call their own. Her Mists of Avalon, published in 1983, provided just what many of these women were looking for at just the right moment; as the cheesy New Age spirituality of the 1970s wound down, Bradley's invention of a world of Celtic druids and priestesses struggling against fierce Saxon masculists and Roman Catholic patriarchs offered a mythology that many Anglo women could relate to on a deeper, ancestral level.

I read the book myself in the early 90s, and although I was disturbed by much of the content (the incest in particular), I found it to be a good read. Marion Zimmer Bradley undeniably had talent — she added an entirely new perspective to the Arthurian genre. However, little did I – or most other readers – know that the book described some of the goings on in her own household.

Of course, the Celtic legend that Bradley invents bears little resemblance to what we know of ancient Celtic religion, but then again how can we know more than an outline of what used to be a very rich spiritual tradition in a preliterate culture? Even in historical times, the remaining superstitions and legends of the Celtic fringe were enough to confound those who tried to make sense of them. I've been to one of the ancient pilgrimage roads myself, and the ancient grottoes and fairy mounds are still there, only now putatively dedicated to this or that Christian saint. Even today, some people still believe in the fairies, and attribute considerable powers to them.

So it isn't entirely surprising that many women took Bradley's creation and ran with it. For some time, feminist occult practices were popular, occurring even amongst some of my friends' mothers and at least one of my teachers. The teacher, an apostate Irish nun with a penchant for strong drink and rough speech, led séances at a friend's house back in the mid 80s. Being a boy at the time, I was not particularly interested in the practice, but I do remember that my friends and I had the vague sense that it was something we ought to avoid if at all possible.

Mark Greyland, it seems, had the same sense that it wasn't something he wanted to be involved with, but the poor boy couldn't avoid it, as his mother was the star of the show:

> CS: How do you feel about the way your mother's been regarded by many as a feminist and/or neo-pagan icon?
>
> MG: What she did is to tell stories; long and hard enough she would act them out. When women started approaching her saying stuff like "you saved my life; now I don't have to kill myself", she started wearing new faces around them and more and more of them would gather around her.
>
> Some of them were so angry they treated me like I was a crime for daring to be male around her. Others would give me the deer in the headlights look then look away.
>
> There were times these unhappy women would gather around her by the dozens and I would stand back and watch her on stage and happy. I saw the rituals and the other weirdness close up and then at a distance. What they got out of it was something I did not understand, but I could see that the people were volatile and likely to blow up for invisible reasons.
>
> Feminism to me was a lot of very unhappy women telling stories to each other about how they had been hurt. They were getting ready to change the world and I didn't want to be in front of that train when it started rolling. It didn't matter what I thought about it when it was erupting right in front of my eyes in our back yard. I was already primed to be frightened of emotional scenes so I knew better than to try to introduce myself to these people, but it happened anyway in dribs and drabs and occasional floods.
>
> I don't have to feel any way at all. I saw the transformation and the aftermath which continued after I left.

Mark was at ground zero of the second wave feminist movement, and it was an absolute nightmare for him. Keep this in mind when feminists prattle on about how much good they've done, what wonderful people they are, and why they are a benefit for everybody. Take it from a boy who was in the middle of it, and who grew up broken because of what one of their prophets did to him.

Naturally, dilettante feminists are shocked! Male feminist John Scalzi seems genuinely taken aback to discover what this witch was up to years ago. It doesn't come as a surprise to me, because I am relatively close to Mark Greyland's age, and I grew up with some of these women as peripheral (thank God) figures in my life. My latest brush with them came during my divorce, during which a gang of these types intervened in my custody case. They can be extremely malicious, evil people, and for those who don't have personal experience with them it can sometimes be hard to believe how vicious they can be. Perhaps the best way to let people who are otherwise unaware know what they are capable of is to point out the many times they have let the mask slip and come out in support of infanticide or genital mutilation of men. And not just theoretical support, mind you, but support for the real thing.

Like Mark, I'd like to commend Moira for having the guts to take a stand despite her mother's status as feminist cultural icon. There's really no better sibling a man can have than a good sister.

Debunking the Patriarchy Myth

W.F. Price · 24 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists believe that all of recorded history is one litany of subjugation of womankind, ended only in recent times by the brave and stalwart feminists, who wrested power from the patriarchy (how they did so is not usually explained). It's bunk, and people only believe it because they have extremely limited knowledge of history. The idea that women have been disenfranchised is based on such things as the right to vote, which white women gained approximately one century after white men in the United States. However, keep in mind that universal men's suffrage was only extended to all American men after white American women already had it. American Indians were not granted full suffrage until 1965 — a full forty years after women's suffrage, and decades after they had already been declared US citizens. This was almost one hundred years after women had already been granted suffrage in Western states such as (highly patriarchal) Utah.

Of course, for a couple thousand years, almost no ordinary citizens had voting rights in any country.

But I'd like to address the cultural misconceptions as well. Particularly the idea that women's lives were filled with drudgery and chores while men did nothing but enjoy themselves. A few posts back, I wrote that husbands have probably always been in involved in helping out around the house and with childcare. Many more men worked out of home before the industrial revolution, so it stands to reason that it would be so. Just yesterday, I found proof from a 17th century painting from the Netherlands.

The painting depicts a man doing what I spent a great deal of time doing back in the late 2000s, and will be again from here on out for a couple years. The title is "Unangenehme Vaterpflichten," which translates to "unpleasant fatherly duties." It was painted in 1631.

"Unangenehme Vaterpflichten" by Adriaen Brouwer (circa 1605/1606–1638) – Painting by Adriaen Brouwer Own work, photo 2007. Licensed under Public domain via Wikimedia Commons.

So there you have it: The Patriarchy in action — changing diapers. This is before feminism, before women's suffrage and before Susan B. Anthony's great grandparents were born.

The painting is pretty funny to me, because I can so easily relate to the poor guy in the picture who has to wipe the kid's butt. You can see him recoiling from the stench, arm hung to the side in resignation.

Tell me, if men were so privileged back then, why would they ever have to wipe a kid's butt?

G.K. Chesterton

W.F. Price · 25 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, a commenter pointed out that G.K. Chesterton had made a point very similar to my own and in very similar terms many years ago. Not having seen it previously, I was a little taken aback by the similarity. Not because I thought the idea was entirely original when I wrote it down, but because I wouldn't have expected it to have been framed in the same terms a century ago.

So I looked into Chesterton's writing on feminism, and found more of the same themes you'll find on these electronic pages at The Spearhead. It seems I'm only covering territory that other, greater men than I, have surveyed before.

Following is a passage from What's Wrong With The World Part 3: Feminism, Or The Mistake About Woman — 3. The Emancipation Of Domesticity:

> …Supposing it to be conceded that humanity has acted at least not unnaturally in dividing itself into two halves, respectively typifying the ideals of special talent and of general sanity (since they are genuinely difficult to combine completely in one mind), it is not difficult to see why the line of cleavage has followed the line of sex, or why the female became the emblem of the universal and the male of the special and superior. Two gigantic facts of nature fixed it thus: first, that the woman who frequently fulfilled her functions literally could not be specially prominent in experiment and adventure; and second, that the same natural operation surrounded her with very young children, who require to be taught not so much anything as everything. Babies need not to be taught a trade, but to be introduced to a world. To put the matter shortly, woman is generally shut up in a house with a human being at the time when he asks all the questions that there are, and some that there aren't. It would be odd if she retained any of the narrowness of a specialist. Now if anyone says that this duty of general enlightenment (even when freed from modern rules and hours, and exercised more spontaneously by a more protected person) is in itself too exacting and oppressive, I can understand the view. I can only answer that our race has thought it worth while to cast this burden on women in order to keep common-sense in the world. But when people begin to talk about this domestic duty as not merely difficult but trivial and dreary, I simply give up the question. For I cannot with the utmost energy of imagination conceive what they mean. When domesticity, for instance, is called drudgery, all the difficulty arises from a double meaning in the word. If drudgery only means dreadfully hard work, I admit the woman drudges in the home, as a man might drudge at the Cathedral of Amiens or drudge behind a gun at Trafalgar. But if it means that the hard work is more heavy because it is trifling, colorless and of small import to the soul, then as I say, I give it up; I do not know what the words mean. To be Queen Elizabeth within a definite area, deciding sales, banquets, labors and holidays; to be Whiteley within a certain area, providing toys, boots, sheets, cakes and books, to be Aristotle within a certain area, teaching morals, manners, theology, and hygiene; I can understand how this might exhaust the mind, but I cannot imagine how it could narrow it. How can it be a large career to tell other people's children about the Rule of Three, and a small career to tell one's own children about the universe? How can it be broad to be the same thing to everyone, and narrow to be everything to someone? No; a woman's function is laborious, but because it is gigantic, not because it is minute. I will pity Mrs. Jones for the hugeness of her task; I will never pity her for its smallness.
>
> But though the essential of the woman's task is universality, this does not, of course, prevent her from having one or two severe though largely wholesome prejudices. She has, on the whole, been more conscious than man that she is only one half of humanity; but she has expressed it (if one may say so of a lady) by getting her teeth into the two or three things which she thinks she stands for. I would observe here in parenthesis that much of the recent official trouble about women has arisen from the fact that they transfer to things of doubt and reason that sacred stubbornness only proper to the primary things which a woman was set to guard. One's own children, one's own altar, ought to be a matter of principle–or if you like, a matter of prejudice. On the other > hand, who wrote Junius's Letters ought not to be a principle or a prejudice, it ought to be a matter of free and almost indifferent inquiry. But take an energetic modern girl secretary to a league to show that George III wrote Junius, and in three months she will believe it, too, out of mere loyalty to her employers. Modern women defend their office with all the fierceness of domesticity. They fight for desk and typewriter as for hearth and home, and develop a sort of wolfish wifehood on behalf of the invisible head of the firm. That is why they do office work so well; and that is why they ought not to do it.

Well said.

When Billionaires and Looters Make Common Cause: Jack Dorsey in Ferguson

W.F. Price · 18 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I just sent my kids back to their mom for the rest of the summer, so a semblance of peace and quiet is returning to my little home. My son really likes his little brother, and my daughter is growing up fast and becoming quite competent for an eight-year-old. I'm still a bit of a softy on the chores, but the kids are finally pitching in meaningfully. Nevertheless, two small children without school to keep them busy and a newborn are quite a handful, so "vacation" hardly describes my life over the last couple weeks.

For the last week or so, the story dominating the news has been the death of Michael Brown following a robbery. I've found myself frustrated and disappointed by the massive support Brown is receiving from some quarters. One of the reasons I left Seattle recently is that with kids the only places I could reasonably expect to rent are in neighborhoods where robbery is a regular occurrence. Alone, I could live with it, but with children it just isn't worth it.

Judging from the sympathy for Michael Brown, a lot of people seem to think that strong-arm robbery isn't a serious offense. "He was unarmed," they say, as though that means he wasn't a real threat. Bullshit. Just days before I left Seattle, several "unarmed" teens robbed an elderly woman in front of my local Safeway, knocking her to the ground and snatching her purse. Fortunately, she wasn't badly hurt, but a broken hip or skull fracture can lead fairly directly to an old person's death. And at 300 lbs., Michael Brown was as big as a bear — he wasn't some skinny kid an average cop could handle with ease; more like an offensive lineman in the Big Ten who could knock a Division I linebacker on his ass. If a guy that size came at me, I'd say a prayer and unload as fast as I could, too.

Strong-arm robbery is just a stepping stone to the armed variety, which makes neighborhoods intolerable even for the young and healthy. At my local convenience store in Seattle, robbery was a fairly regular occurrence. Over the years, I made friends with the Korean store owners and workers, who were working class young men trying to bootstrap themselves into the American dream. They were responsible, hard-working and honest in their business. One day I stopped by and it happened that a robbery had occurred earlier in the day. There was a fresh bullet hole under the counter. The robber had fired his weapon either as a mistake or to make a point, but whatever the reason, it must have been terrifying for the poor guy working there.

Soon enough, the owner started having problems keeping employees. Nobody wanted to work where there were violent thugs coming in and menacing customers and cashiers.

The point is that robbery isn't just a simple property crime, but a crime against the entire community. Not only is the store owner losing money; others are discouraged from opening businesses or shopping anywhere without an armed guard. People are afraid to walk down the street. Business insurance rates go through the roof. Trust is markedly lowered, and young black men are inevitably profiled. This last point bears repeating: when thugs like Michael Brown rob people, law-abiding young black men face the consequences in increased scrutiny and police attention, and that is an entirely natural and understandable reaction.

However, while I am far from pleased to see Reverend Al Sharpton and Jesse Jackson stirring up trouble over the subsequent shooting incident, which has yet to be fully investigated, what I find truly inexcusable is the presence of a white billionaire amongst the protesters and looters. Jack Dorsey, cofounder of Twitter, has taken it upon himself to express solidarity with the crowd that is running around looting stores in the name of a dead violent criminal.

Jack Dorsey, who threw his friend, Twitter cofounder Noah Glass, under the bus while he was going through a painful divorce. Jack Dorsey, who lives in a ten million dollar house in an exclusive San Francisco neighborhood, and is worth almost $2 billion.

If Jack Dorsey hadn't stumbled into Noah Glass's operation and hit the jackpot, he'd be an ordinary Joe lucky to be able to afford to live in San Francisco at all.

So what does Jack Dorsey do with his great success and fortune? Why, he sides with the kind of people who smash the American dream with their fists. He expresses solidarity with those who would deny a humble shopkeeper the right to do business in peace. He is the epitome of the new elite/underclass coalition; a true child of San Francisco's city-on-a-hill mentality.

If Dorsey were a middle-class programmer – which he would have been without Noah Glass's connections – and he had gone back to his hometown of St. Louis to marry and have kids, guys like Michael Brown would have terrified him, and with good reason. The Michael Browns of the world are the people who walk up to smaller kids and demand their lunch money in elementary school, then later on their iphones. Fortunately for Jack Dorsey, he doesn't have to worry about that. If he ever has any kids, he can send them to an elite San Francisco private school and afford the $40k+ yearly tuition without even noticing it.

Jack Dorsey will never have to work in a dangerous neighborhood where he faces the risk of robbery. He'll never have to empty a safe while worrying that somebody will show up and steal a month's worth of profit. And, of course, he'll never have to face the prospect of getting shot in the face over the contents of a cash register.

If there's anything more disgusting than an entire community rallying in support of one of the thugs who is actually wrecking their community and innocent people's ability to make a living, it's one of our billionaires descending from on high to offer political and moral – and most likely financial – support for this destruction of civil society.

It's time we started asking ourselves who on earth these guys think they are.

Who are the Anarchists in Ferguson, and Who's Funding Them?

W.F. Price · 18 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Daily Mail has a picture of the white rioter shot and critically wounded in Ferguson, and he is surrounded by a few other whites who have the typical anarchist getup of masks and hoods. The police did not open fire that night, so the logical conclusion is that he was shot by another protester during the disturbances, perhaps in self-defense.

Ferguson police chief Thomas Jackson blamed much of the mayhem on white anarchists, saying that they were rejecting peace and provoking black youths to violence:

> In an exclusive interview with msnbc, Jackson said his fear is not of the understandably angry residents, but "the anarchists that are coming in, the people that don't want healing, the people that just want to continue to fight."
>
> "Those are the people I'm concerned about," he said.

In the meanwhile, anarchists are organizing mayhem online, condemning all who urge peace and calm.

This brings me back to the subject of today's earlier piece: Jack Dorsey.

Dorsey, a filthy rich billionaire, is a known anarchist sympathizer who coordinates his activities from a clifftop compound in the San Francisco area. Not content to enjoy his loot in peace, he has joined the Ferguson riots in support of dead robber Michael Brown. It is fitting, actually, that he is fighting the little bourgeois shopkeepers with his billions, as he seems to regard himself as a modern-day warlord. A strong middle class, after all, could only get in the way of his aspirations to be the supreme leader of New York City.

This might be somewhat laughable in another, more stable and sane America. But it's pretty serious now, at a time when the President and Justice Department have forged a coalition with enfant terrible sociopaths like Dorsey.

Given Dorsey's biases and his presence in Ferguson in conjunction with anarchist agitators, I think someone ought to be taking a very close and careful look at who he's supporting in the area. Those gas masks and printed signs don't come for free, you know.

If it turns out that he's been throwing money at people who are filling bottles with gasoline and handing them out to clueless protesters, the man ought to be held to account for it, just as you or I would if we were fomenting violent unrest during a period of social disorder. If I, for example, were to hand out incendiary devices to men protesting unfair family court law, I expect I'd spend most of the rest of my life in prison.

Fair's fair, Jack. If you're fighting a proxy war against the American yeomanry in Ferguson, we'll figure it out, and you'll pay for it one way or another. If your idea of anarchy is placing yourself above the law atop an enormous pile of money, you're eventually going to end up buried in your ill-gotten gains, or naked without them.

Why Aren't There More Women in 3D Printing?

Uncle Elmer · 27 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I have railed in the past about the emergence of "coding bootcamps" for women so no need to get unhinged here about how these initiatives are really just gravy trains for strip-mall colleges and phony social justice warriors.

Many community colleges provide better resources and costs for learning computer technology, and Albuquerque's Community College of New Mexico is a good example. CNM has recently opened a "Stemulus Center" featuring a "coding bootcamp", a "Fast Track Business Administration Degree", a 3D printing workshop, and an entrepreneurship program.

The photo on their 3D printing workshop page made me laugh though, and only needs a title : "Why Aren't There More Women in 3D Printing?". You can bet this will be changed in the near future to a more female-inclusive photo, such as this one celebrating Girls In Coding :

[image]

Paternal Leave

W.F. Price · 28 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The last six weeks have served as a reminder of what it's like to have a baby in the house all over again, and they've brought the matter of parental leave back to mind. If, as things stand today, both parents are expected to work to get by, maternal leave should be a given due to nursing needs, but what about paternal leave?

For the good of the child and the family, I think paternal leave should also be included in any parental leave legislation. For some men, it might be easier, depending on the living situation, to avoid the house and go to work every day, but for most it isn't. It wasn't for me, even when there was a grandmother to provide support. For one thing, the baby doesn't sleep on your schedule, so your ability to follow routines and get enough sleep is severely compromised. Anyone who is familiar with a baby's cries knows that it's almost impossible to ignore or sleep through them, and that's by design. For guys who work with heavy machinery or have long commutes, this could be downright dangerous. One solution, if the house is big enough, is to sleep in another room. But even that doesn't always do the trick, and sleeping on a couch is far from ideal.

Another issue is that the mother can't take care of housework as usual. Babies are extremely demanding, and if it comes down to feeding husband or child, baby wins. Despite birth, mother and child remain a "unit" for months postpartum. When she leaves, the baby gets upset. Experienced fathers like me have some tricks up our sleeves for calming babies, but they don't always work — sometimes nursing is the only thing that will calm them down. So, unless you want to be stuck with a screaming baby watching the clock as you wait for mama to return, you've got to do a lot of the errands, and when there's a new baby in the house, there are a lot of errands to do.

Given the extra workload on mother and father, the best solution is to give both some time to dedicate to the new baby while he or she progresses past the neonate stage and starts to develop a routine.

In Washington state, women are guaranteed three months of leave if they work for a company with over 50 employees. Men have no such guarantee, although many companies will work with new fathers and give them some time off. Paid leave, unfortunately, is usually the privilege of the professional class; a perk extended to those who already get paid pretty well. Ordinary workers have to make do on savings.

While I'm not usually a proponent of socialism, rearing the next generation, despite genocidal leftist fantasies about electing a new people, ranks pretty high up there in national priorities. And if it's about the bottom line, parental leave can mitigate a lot of the stress of early parenthood which could otherwise result in higher rates of family dysfunction, divorce and the resulting loss of productivity and human capital. From my own experience, a combined total of six months parental leave would be a fair and realistic standard to shoot for in the US. Perhaps parents could split it up as they choose, with the mother taking four months and the father two in a typical situation (most men are plenty happy to go back to work after two months at home with a baby).

If that sounds generous, consider that Sweden allots a total of 480 days of paid leave, 120 of which are to be used exclusively by each parent (both mothers and fathers must take at least 60 days off to reach the full 480). By European standards, American parental leave laws are extremely stingy (now that I think of it, even the tight-fisted East Asians have considerably more generous parental leave policies than the US). While this may not have been much of a problem when America had a social contract of sorts, today's corporate titans are hardly concerned with the lot of what must seem like little insects from the glass towers they inhabit, and as they suck more out of our government coffers than a million babies could, it's looking more and more reasonable to force them to rectify some of the problems they've caused, such as, for example, the need for a double-income household.

Some of the more purist MRAs may want to demand exact equality in parental leave, and in fact that's what the Swedish socialists would prefer. However, I don't think most men would appreciate that all that much. As much as we love our babies, it can be dehumanizing to be forced out of work for too long, and that in itself can cause problems just as denying us an opportunity to provide crucial support in the first couple months can.

The New Queen of Indie Gaming

W.F. Price · 28 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When Uncle Elmer linked news of the Zoe Quinn affair(s) last week, I looked over the story and found myself mostly just appalled by the behavior of these "adults" involved in the gaming scene. Quinn herself isn't much of a surprise, but given how easy it was for her to sleep with so many guys in the same industry in such a short timeframe I wonder how desperate these game developers must be. For starters, Zoe Quinn isn't a stunner. Far from it. She doesn't hold a candle to some of the manslayers I've come across in my day. It's really one of those "no contest" sorts of things. She might hold her own in a place like Ketchikan, filled as it is with lonely fishermen, but the Bay Area? Pathetic.

I also have to say that I'm not too impressed by her boyfriend, Eron Gjoni. Sharing all the intimate details instead of sticking to the basic facts of a failed relationship is bad form. It's a high school level of self-indulgence. For those readers who might be tempted to do the same, don't. It's best not to name names, post photos, publicly air text messages or trash the other party, even if they are in the wrong, because it reflects poorly on you. Longtime readers will know that I rarely mention my ex, and only do so when I have to explain important, relevant facts. I wouldn't dream of posting her picture or any private correspondence. Nevertheless, I'm glad Zoe's ex did it, because now I know a little more about the culture in the most economically dynamic part of America (nothing flattering), but eventually I just got tired plodding through all the gossipy details. After reading the story, I showed it to my wife, and she was pretty amazed that such childish people populate one of the wealthiest places on earth. I wonder sometimes whether these people – several of whom look to be in their thirties already – are aware of how outlandish and adolescent they appear to ordinary folks who are just trying to get by.

Because I was tired, I hoped that someone else would dig up some more of the facts, and Matt Forney has now done so. In his piece on Quinn, Matt delves into the hypocrisy and and pretension of the "SJW" indie gamer culture, cutting through the fraud and BS that has characterized the "official" response to the scandal Quinn caused.

Aside from that, what really ought to raise a few eyebrows is how much of a scam this gaming industry has become. As a parent, I've been exposed to Lord knows how many video games that my kids pull out of nowhere. These are mainly free games, and they are about as sophisticated as the Nintendo games I used to play in the 80s. Aside from the graphics, there isn't much difference (I'm not talking Call of Duty here), but for some reason the mobile gaming industry is huge business. People are putting their faith in this useless crap, even investing billions in it. It's driving paper profits and speculation. Instead of investing wealth in energy and infrastructure, we're blowing our cash and human capital so that my son can race cars and my daughter spray makeup on Barbie on an ipad. This is the kind of investment that has negative returns on human capital, as kids get sucked into the screen instead of getting out and learning to survive in the real, physical world. Perhaps this explains the stunted emotional and social development of the gamers featured in the saga of Zoe Quinn.

Matt links Quinn to Anita Sarkeesian, another one of our favorite feminist scam-artists, who took a couple hundred thousand dollars to make a couple amateur videos. But unlike Sarkeesian, who rode a pity wave to the big bucks, Quinn apparently has some real clout. She strategically slept with a number of developers, businessmen and journalists to promote herself and her clique, and has simultaneously managed to motivate a lot of men to white knight for her. Developers and journalists who criticize her are threatened with termination, and outside critics are silenced with accusations of misogyny. In one bizarre article in the Globe and Mail, Emma Woolley claims that corruption and nepotism in the gaming industry is not such a big deal, because the real problem with gaming is the gamers (i.e. customers) themselves. How's that for feminist business acumen?

This brings up a perplexing question: how on earth did this third-rate tramp manage to assemble so much backup?

I have a little theory about that. Since she slept with some six different men over two months while still carrying on a "relationship," she's a seasoned expert in whorecraft. With these women, six guys is nothing. That's just how many her boyfriend knew about. The actual number of men she slept with over the past year could easily run into the dozens. It's the factory trawler technique. Cast a wide enough net and one of these days you'll pull up a treasure chest.

My theory, for which I have no evidence other than the fact that she allegedly slept with a married boss, is that someone – possibly a married someone – is highly embarrassed or frightened and wants the entire affair to go away. Or perhaps someone's boss or investor feels that way. No sense in stirring up the natives, eh?

It's just a thought, but there was sound reasoning behind the anti-adultery and anti-fraternization rules in corporate management and military officer corps that used to be the norm. Most of ultra-progressive Silicon Valley may laugh at these quaint practices, but I'll bet there are a few guys out there who are really sweating right now.

Even so, what I can't wrap my head around is "why Zoe Quinn, of all women?"

Shouldn't these guys be ashamed of themselves?

Finally, if these are the kinds of people who will be running the tech industry – a major pillar of the American economy today – in ten years' time, we're in for a major "adjustment" at some point in the near future.

Beyoncé Clarifies Meaning of "Feminist"

W.F. Price · 31 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Beyoncé has been flying the feminist flag for a while now, despite being a bit ambivalent about the term just a couple years ago. I suspect it's her husband Jay-Z's idea — a PR stunt to deflect criticism of the raunchy sexual exploitation he's relied upon for years to make the big bucks. It has proven amazingly effective. Nerdy feminist scribblers the world over are gushing in ecstasy over Beyoncé's endorsement of their cause. "Oh, finally, a really cool woman is calling herself a feminist. I feel soooo vindicated!"

For readers who prefer to operate under the radar, I'd recommend the same tactic. If you do anything that could be perceived by feminists as suspect, such as, say, rapping about "bitches and hos", simply wave the feminist banner and you'll get a pass.

But what does this say about feminism? It says that it doesn't mean a damned thing. If you doubt me, just watch Beyoncé's VMA awards video, during which she displays the word feminist during one song. After reading the jubilant response from feminists, I thought the word would be stamped on the screen the entire time, but it was just up for about a second. It followed a performance that featured a number of women lying on their backs and holding their legs in the air to display juicy, glistening buttocks and a clear shot of the pudendal cleft (at about 7:00), and then a pole-dancing routine (10:00).

Get More:
2014 VMA, Artists.MTV, Beyoncé, MTV VMA Video Vanguard (Medley), Music, More Music Videos

All in all, it was a ludicrous juxtaposition. Is feminism now merely the fig leaf that covers vulgarity, or does it go hand-in-hand with the obscene? It seems that it doesn't matter anymore.

When the "women against feminism" were confronted by feminists, they were denounced for "not understanding" what feminism really means. "The definition is right there, in the dictionary!" shouted the suddenly pedantic feminists (the dictionary definition was helpfully included in the Beyoncé performance, which merely served to highlight the bizarre nature of the feminist interlude). Supposedly, feminism is defined in the dictionary as advocating for equality between the sexes (whatever that means), but if that's the case, what on earth does it have to do with women displaying naked asses and dancing on stripper poles?

Like the feminists, I, too, view the Beyoncé statement as a triumph. First we had the slutwalks, and now we have this. For women with any sense, there's bound to be some cognitive dissonance. Feminism began as something approximating an intellectual movement, but it has devolved into pushing fantasies of becoming a stripper on little girls. At first, the feminists wanted to be astronauts and scientists; now they want to dance on the pole.

It's really hilarious when you think about it.

A Practical Definition of Feminism

W.F. Price · 1 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter Schopenhauer states that women's power is based on their sexuality, dismissing feminism as a "pure power grab" and not in the least intellectual.

> Feminism was never anything even approaching an "intellectual movement." It was always a pure power grab. I drove this point home to my sons the night they were watching this awards show. I pointed out how every female "artist" appearing on the show was dressed provocatively to heighten her sexuality. I told my sons that this is because their sexuality is the entire basis of women's power.

I mostly agree, and I've made similar statements before. However, I don't think sexuality is all women have to offer, but considering what feminism has turned out to be it certainly can appear that way. Women have always been economically important, and a major driver of cultural innovation and change. If you have a daughter, like I do, it's pretty clear that women and girls have a very important influence on language and customs, which remain as important today as ever. Men, for example, tend to be more conservative in speech, while women innovate. As my children have grown, I've had the opportunity to observe this phenomenon first-hand.

Feminism, however, has nothing at all to offer but sexuality and identity politics. I've compared it to prostitution before, but that might be a little hard on prostitution, because at least in those transactions a man generally gets what he paid for.

This blustering about equality we hear from feminists is pure smoke. When a feminist mentions "equality," she knows it's a labile concept, to be shaped into whatever is useful at any given time. Say some men discover a new source of energy and make a huge pile of money off it. Immediately, feminists will show up demanding "equality" – i.e., a piece of the pie – by virtue of their sex, and that alone.

The term equality means nothing but freedom to shift the goalposts whenever convenient, so it's misleading to include it in the definition of feminism. But through observation and experience, we can identify an accurate definition:

Feminism is the collective promotion of women's interests at men's expense by the ancient and effective means of sexual leverage. It is the use of female sexuality and identity to extract social, economic and political power from men.

Women who achieve power or acclaim without using their sexuality or identity as women are not benefitting from feminism. Feminism did nothing for Marie Curie, Margaret Thatcher, or Angela Merkel, to name a contemporary example.

It has done a great deal for Madonna, Hillary Clinton and Gloria Steinem, all of whom rely on either female sexuality or identity, or both, for most of their wealth and power.

Feminism is socially harmful because its very nature is non-productive; it encourages women and girls to strive for gain without offering anything in return. Further, it explicitly tells them that they owe nothing to anyone but their fellow feminists. While something approaching this attitude might be appropriate for a young woman who is choosing a mate, when it becomes a mass social movement it has destructive long-term consequences. En masse, women are encouraged to remain in an adolescent frame of mind for the entirety of their fertile years, after which they suddenly find that it doesn't work anymore, and it turns out they've squandered an enormous amount of resources on nothing but self-gratification.

To embrace modesty, humility, self-sacrifice and service to a greater cause, such as a family, is to betray feminism. Likewise, to elevate oneself without resorting to the use of female status and identity is to reject the feminist path.

If more of our women disavowed feminism, we would be collectively wealthier, happier and healthier. Yes, that includes most women, too.

SPLC Evokes Elliot Rodger to Smear MRAs

W.F. Price · 1 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I noticed that the SPLC's newest Intelligence Report featured Elliot Rodger, and then attempted to tie him into Men's Rights, which his manifesto proves is an absurd association. Rodger was a narcissist with an extreme sense of entitlement and a pathological case of envy. Some tie him in with the incels (involuntary celibates), but even that doesn't make much sense, as technically there was nothing involuntary about his celibacy: he could have simply loosened his extremely exacting standards. Elliot Rodger was not an MRA, and there's no evidence that he identified as such, or was even interested in or aware of MRA issues, which have very little to do with getting laid.

But then this is the SPLC we're talking about; an organization that feeds on paranoia and fear, and goes to great lengths to exaggerate threats so as to provide some justification for its work, which these days amounts to suing local governments for not spending enough on their favored constituencies.

Every year, according to the SPLC, the threat of extremists grows in the US. There's always a new menace on the horizon, whether it's traditional Catholic nuns or people who support the US Constitution. Or, as suggested in the latest Intelligence Report, MRAs.

No less a man than Mark Potok took it upon himself to write about the Elliot Rodger case:

> America's latest mass murder left seven people including the killer dead, the campus of the University of California, Santa Barbara, and the nearby community of Isla Vista in shock, and the so-called men's rights movement, which some blamed for the slaughter, defensive, angry and resentful — its usual attitude.
>
> It didn't take long after 22-year-old Elliot Rodger stabbed and shot six people to death, injuring another 13 before committing suicide as police closed in, for the world to learn of Rodger's hatred of women. He left behind a 140-page manifesto, an explanatory YouTube video entitled "Elliot Rodger's Retribution," and postings across the Internet that all testified to his burning misogyny.
>
> [...]
>
> Rodger's postings at PUAHate immediately focused public attention on the so-called "manosphere," an ugly subculture of websites run by men's rights activists that is typified by its loathing for women in general and feminism in particular. (PUAHate is dedicated to criticizing "pick-up artists" who sell men advice on how to bed women and fail to deliver, but it is dominated by vicious attacks on women.) Although these sites and some real-world men's rights groups certainly have some legitimate complaints about family courts, sexual abuse of men and the like, the tone of many of them is remarkable for its woman-bashing, sex-starved flavor.
>
> The manosphere was explored in an Intelligence Report article more than two years ago, but most Americans had never heard of it when Rodger's rampage burst into the news cycle. Still, it didn't take long for a national debate to develop about the role of the men's rights movement in Elliot Rodger's mass murder.
>
> While some commentators focused on the issues of gun control and mental health, enormous numbers of women wrote about their experiences of misogyny and sexism under the Twitter hashtag #YesAllWomen — 65,500 of them per hour at their peak two days after the killings. Major news outlets wrote lengthy pieces about the manosphere and men's rights movement, along with speculation about the role they played in Rodger's thinking. And men's rights activists went into overdrive, arguing furiously that they had nothing to do with the bloodbath in Isla Vista.
>
> They had of a point, kind of. [Kind of? Seriously?]
>
> The manosphere did not create Elliot Rodger — that much seems clear. Rodger was mentally ill, and he developed his obsessions with women over the course of many years. He was bullied badly in school. But it seems undeniable that PUAHate and very likely other websites in the manosphere reinforced Rodger's > mindset, telling him, in effect, that he was perfectly right to be enraged at half the human race. Men's rights activists did not tell Rodger to kill — but in their writings, it seems like many of them wouldn't mind doing some killing of their own [emphasis mine].

>
> [...]
>
> Now, Elam E-mailed the almost 200 people planning to come to his June conference in Detroit — a fading industrial city chosen because it represented "masculinity" — to warn them to be on their very best behavior. Anyone "trash-talking women" or "making violent statements, even jokingly" would be summarily thrown out, he warned. Enemies of the men's rights movement, Elam continued, "will be looking for anything they can to hurt us with. They will be listening, eavesdropping, and if they can, gathering things to harm us with." The man who two years ago was posting photos of women who had committed "offenses against men" and vowing to "fuck their shit up" even told arriving conference-goers that his goal was to "build bridges between men and women instead of walls."
>
> That didn't sound too much like the Paul Elam who has emerged as probably the best-known men's rights activist in the United States. It wasn't long ago that he declared October to be "Bash a Violent Bitch Month," explaining, "I mean literally to grab them by the hair and smack their face against the wall." Elsewhere, he asserted that many women who are raped asked for it, saying "women who act provocatively; who taunt men sexually, toying with their libidos for personal power and gain, etc., have the same type of responsibility for what happens to them as, say, someone who parks their car in a bad neighborhood with the keys in the ignition."
>
> "A lot of women," he continued, "get pummeled and pumped because they are stupid (and often arrogant) enough to walk through life with the equivalent of a I'M A STUPID, CONNIVING BITCH — PLEASE RAPE ME neon sign glowing above their empty little narcissistic heads." Elam has misleadingly cited certain research to make the claim that 40% to 50% of rape allegations are false. But the best scholarly studies show that between about 2% and 8% of such allegations are actually false — a rate that is comparable for false allegations of most other violent crimes.
>
> In the end, Elam's conference was in fact relatively subdued, although he claimed he had to spend $25,000 on security because of death threats from the movement's enemies. Most of the speakers — almost all of whom had made far worse comments in other venues — kept their vitriol to a minimum. Some, like the speaker discussing men's grief, even contributed some useful ideas.
>
> But that didn't negate a basic lesson of the whole Santa Barbara tragedy. Just as white supremacist websites help fuel the violence of professional racists, and just as the propaganda of the militia movement has nurtured terrorist attacks by so-called "Patriots," the manosphere and what Elliot Rodger characterized in his manifesto as its "War on Women" provides moral support to angry and violent Americans.

Note that Potok claims that "it seems like" MRAs want to kill people, and then dismisses death threats against the men's conference as "claimed." I still think the death threats were an extortion scam by some pea-brained, greedy bastard in Detroit, but from what I've read the letter claiming death threats was sent via courier by someone at the hotel, and if it was extortion, it was extortion based on death threats, which means they were real, verified death threats. In other words, felony extortion.

So what we have here is Potok making a tenuous connection between MRAs and a psychotic spree killer – a connection he even admits doesn't exist – and then blowing off a serious crime committed against the people who attended the men's conference. It's extremely biased reporting, designed to stir up exactly the kind of anger for which he condemns Elam and AVfM. The only real difference is that it's more "genteel" — it has a smoother delivery, and it's less honest.

In Opposing Govt. “Brother’s Keeper” Program, Gloria Steinem Reveals Extent of Female Favoritism

W.F. Price · 2 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In perusing the news today, I found an article about Feminists’ involvement in the Ferguson disturbances. My first reaction was to wonder what on earth feminists have to do with the Ferguson police shooting of Michael Brown. Could they really be concerned about police killing men? Impossible. Domestic disturbance incidents, usually involving women, are probably the single biggest source of police killings in the US. I’d put money on the fact that more men of every race are killed by police in domestic disturbance incidents than any other category of police killings. Very, very rarely is a woman killed by police in these responses. It’s almost unheard of. Kind of makes you wonder about this whole “patriarchy” thing, doesn’t it?

So I just had to take a look. Turns out the article is nothing more than a Democrat plea for solidarity.

> Compared to the responses of black women soon after the shooting on August 9, the personal essays with titles like “thoughts on ferguson as a white woman” and “Feminism Is Not Just About Women’s Oppression” came relatively late. But to Perez, it demonstrated a significant shift.
>
> “In feminism, I don’t think you get a lot of people talking about whiteness and privilege in such a high level way,” she said. “People felt called to voice something about what happened. It’s very emblematic of the crisis we face and because [the situation in Ferguson] is so racialized, they have to call that out.”

You get the picture.

However, buried within is a statement I found more interesting than the transparent feminist coalition-building:

> American Enterprise Institute scholar Christina Sommers, author of “Who Stole Feminism?,” told She The People that young men in the United States, especially young men of color, are “far more vulnerable than their sisters,” but Steinem’s remarks on Ferguson counter the criticism she has launched in the past.
>
> “We now have hundreds of special programs for girls and young women, but almost nothing for boys. But when the White House recently initiated a small program, My Brother’s Keeper, to help vulnerable black and Hispanic young men, there was an angry reaction from many feminists, including Gloria Steinem.”

I looked it up, and sure enough there’s the old crone Steinem’s name on a letter to the NY Times:

> Help Boys, but Don’t Shortchange Girls
> A Plea From Gloria Steinem, Pamela Shifman and Girls Inc.
>
> To the Editor:
>
> There is a pervasive myth in the United States that girls, including girls of color, are faring well. Thank you for publishing Kimberlé Williams Crenshaw’s Op-Ed essay, “The Girls Obama Forgot” (July 30), documenting the fact that nothing could be further from the truth.
>
> Since the $300 million or more pledged to the White House initiative My Brother’s Keeper comes largely from private foundations, we would like to point out that foundation funding directed to girls and women remains less than 7.5 percent of all foundation funding; funding dedicated to girls and women of color has, to our knowledge, never been counted.
>
> Given the high rates of violence, poverty and inequity facing girls and young women of color, this should concern all of us. According to Black Women’s Blueprint, nearly 60 percent of black girls in the United States have experienced sexual violence before the age of 18.

> Foundations know from their work in Africa, Asia and Latin America that when poor girls and women are supported, their well-being accelerates justice, health and economic outcomes. Why isn't that knowledge translated to girls and women in the United States? What if instead of blaming women and girls for being poor, or victims of violence, or shaming them for being single parents, we supported them to thrive?
>
> We are thankful for foundations that commit significant resources to address the pervasive and systemic racism in American society, but we wonder why the problems facing boys and men of color are taken more seriously than the problems facing girls and women of color. We need to invest in creating real, meaningful opportunities for our sisters as well as our brothers. You can't solve a problem by rendering half of it invisible.
>
> PAMELA SHIFMAN
> GLORIA STEINEM
> New York, Aug. 1, 2014
>
> Ms. Shifman is executive director of the NoVo Foundation [Editor: of course she is], which focuses on girls' and women's rights. Ms. Steinem is the writer and activist.

Now that's just a mean-spirited lie to say that people take the problems of "boys and men of color" more seriously. She must be joking. For all the lip-service paid to young black men, their rates of educational and professional achievement are far below those of young black women. Their rates of incarceration, however, are top of the heap, while black women lag far behind even white men in this distinction.

A major reason for this is that black women receive so much more support due to structural bias against working class males that black boys are starting from far behind their sisters as soon as they reach adulthood. This structural bias includes rewarding female behavior in school, saturating the market with low-wage illegal labor, thus depriving black boys of the opportunity to begin learning a trade or obtaining job skills as teens, aggressive, constitutionally questionable policing and extremely punitive child support laws that criminalize fathers while rewarding mothers for having children out of wedlock with both seized cash and generous welfare (hence the sky-high illegitimacy rate among blacks).

As a realist, I doubt this program to help non-white boys is going to make much of a difference. I'm also not sure whether it's appropriate for it to be racially exclusive when it's endorsed by the federal government. If you're going to allow that sort of thing, then let's work out a nationalities policy here in the US and give each race/ethnicity collective rights in regards to its members, and make us all "tribes" (might not be a bad idea, actually).

But it might help in some small ways, and adding a boys' program is a good start. Maybe fund some sort of boys' camp in the country, like Jimmy Stewart's character proposed in Mr. Smith Goes to Washington[image]. Imagine that — in 1939 helping boys was considered a noble, patriotic idea.

But in flies Steinem, the wicked witch of our time, to shoot it down because women only get 7.5% of all foundation funding dedicated exclusively to them. Wait a minute. Did I read that right? Nearly 7.5% of everything goes exclusively to women? That is an enormous amount of untaxed money. What goes exclusively to men, .075%? Sometimes, when these feminists open their mouths a big fat toad flies right out and starts hopping and croaking in plain view.

But as ugly as it is, this is what Steinem is paid to do: advocate for women at men's (or boys' in this case) expense. It's feminism in action, and fits right into the definition I provided yesterday. If some of us weren't paying attention, this kind of thing would fly right over people's heads.

The Jennifer Lawrence Hacks and Sexual Capitalism

W.F. Price · 3 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Guys probably find themselves confused by the conflicting messages feminists put out about nudity, empowerment, victimhood, male gaze and so on. While men generally agree that it isn't appropriate to violate people's privacy, we see images from slutwalks and feminist breast-baring demonstrations that leave us wondering why a few nude photos are such a big deal.

In order to understand, you have to tune out what the feminists say in public and pay attention to the following explanation:

The feminist imperative is to gain from sexuality. Sexuality serves utilitarian purposes, whether they are political, social or economic. "Good" sexuality is when a woman profits from it in one way or another. Arguably, Jennifer Lawrence probably will profit from these nudes, especially considering that they are quite flattering compared to what one sees in the Enquirer and other magazines that feature candid celebrity photos. But that isn't the most important point here.

What's most important is the principle: a man took hold of these pictures without paying for them, and many men have had access to the material without Ms. Lawrence having first had the opportunity to capitalize on her sexuality.

Feminists see it as a theft of sexual capital, and to them this is one of the greatest sins a man can commit. Sexuality is the currency feminists trade in, so any restrictions on its use are violently opposed even as they push for the most draconian of laws to protect those who own it.

This is why we see them promoting ridiculous things such as prostitution laws that exclusively target customers, but not those who sell sex. It's also why rape takes on such a high significance, and the requirements for "consent" have been tightened to the point that the definition of the word has changed so that it has now come to mean what "assent" formerly defined.

So to understand the hubbub surrounding the Lawrence photos, or any other issue involving women's sexuality, you just have to keep in mind the first question feminists always ask in these situations:

Cui bono?

Sarkeesian at it Again

W.F. Price · 4 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Anita Sarkeesian has alerted authorities and gone into hiding because of tweet threats composed by some unknown entity going by "Kevin Dobson." Return of Kings has a good analysis suggesting that the tweet threats were likely fakes, probably generated by Anita Sarkeesian herself or a friend.

A few things about the screen shot she used don't add up. First, whoever took the screenshot somehow managed to capture all of the ten tweets ever made on the account, despite the fact that he/she was not logged in, all tweets were made in a three-minute timeframe, and the last tweet occurred 12 seconds before the screenshot. The timing is very, very suspicious.

Additionally, the tweets themselves are laughable, featuring vampire fantasies and expressing desire for Anita Sarkeesian. They probably wouldn't even pass the "criminal threat" test because they are neither imminent nor likely threats.

They also apparently contain information about Sarkeesian's family. I'm pretty sure very, very few people even amongst her detractors care about her family or their whereabouts, and since Anita herself knows about her family, it significantly increases the chance that she was responsible for the tweets.

Finally, this is exactly how Anita Sarkeesian made money the last time. A full $160k. I think she lives in San Francisco, so she could easily have blown through that much money in a couple years just living an ordinary life. If it worked before, why not try it again, right?

If she did make the threats, I doubt there will be an investigation. Feminists have built a myth about oppression of women in gaming around her, so politically she's off limits. If Twitter smells a rat, they'll keep their mouths shut unless subpoenaed, and I doubt it will get that far.

Threats do prompt people to contribute to victims, whether they are real or not, and sometimes for justifiable reasons. For example, the threats against AVfM's International Men's Conference led to $25,000 in donations to cover security costs.

However, I tend to think threats are usually a silly distraction, and exposing them only encourages more of the same. When I lived in a particularly rough neighborhood, I had one guy threaten to kill me at my house. He'd been beeping his horn outside my window at 1AM, so I came out and told him to "shut the f*ck up." His response was, "I'm going to come back and kill you." I was pretty worked up after that, and actually called the cops, who told me the guy was just full of it. After some thought, I realized he probably was just full of it. But I armed myself all the same.

Sometimes, I get threats on this site or in email, but not very often. I invariably throw them in the trash with hardly a second thought. It would be ridiculous to think someone would bother to try to kill me – risking their own neck in the process – over ideological opposition to feminism. Would a woman do it? Oh please…

But these threats do exist. There's one online right now at a leftist site affiliated with David Futrelle, but sadly I can't honestly claim to be frightened, even though it's more credible than the absurd "threats" Sarkeesian claims to be so scared about. And I highly doubt I could cash in on it, either.

That's the difference between me and Anita Sarkeesian: I'm a man, and she's a woman. People don't care very much when ordinary men are threatened, and I can live with that.

However, what I can't live with is bullshit, and as I suggested in yesterday's post about the Jennifer Lawrence photos, the most revealing question whenever feminists make a fuss over something is "cui bono?"

In the case of these so-called threats against Sarkeesian, the answer is entirely clear.

Futrelle Stews over NPR's Reluctance to do his Bidding

W.F. Price · 5 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

David Futrelle has been on a one-man anti-anti-feminist crusade for several years now, and while he's racked up a couple small achievements, such as bringing the declining Southern Poverty Law Center on board, much of his effort has been frustrated. His notable lack of charisma, which stands in stark contrast to pro-feminist sociopath Hugo Schwyzer, explains a fair amount of it. For example, his over-the-top love of cats comes off as kind of gross. Pictures of his greasy, grimy cats in his fur-soiled home do not exactly add to his already compromised image. I mean, I like cats alright, but come on. They're much more endearing, clean and tolerable when they spend most of their time outside, as nature intended. Can anyone imagine a dinner at Futrelle's house, replete with tufts of cat fur floating through the air, a vague smell of ammonia in the background and a layer of cat dander on the furniture?

In his latest failed broadside against the patriarchy, Futrelle went on NPR to talk about the menace of MRAs, but the program didn't turn out nearly as derogatory as he'd hoped. NPR actually gave Warren Farrell a fair hearing, presenting his views in a neutral-to-positive context, and didn't come down hard on Paul Elam, either.

> Leaders in the movement say they want to bring more attention to the problems of men and boys. Critics worry, however, that these sites are a breeding ground for misogyny.
>
> For his part, Farrell actually tries to avoid the phrase "men's rights."
>
> "It's like somebody saying we're in favor of the king's rights," he says. "The average person thinks that men are already at the top of the political structure. They have all the rights, they made all the rules, [and] if anything is going wrong with men, it's their fault, because after all, it's just a consequence of men's rules."
>
> But that perspective, Farrell says, is "just completely missing the point."
>
> 'Cries Of Pain And Alienation'
>
> Farrell doesn't deny that men make up the vast majority of members of Congress and corporate boards. But he says that fact tends to obscure the problems facing millions of men and boys that don't get enough attention: that fathers are often separated from their children by the family court system, that there is no White House council on men and boys, and that there are women's studies — but not men's studies — departments at universities.
>
> Boys also drop out of college and commit suicide at higher rates than girls, Farrell notes.
>
> "We need to know not only why are our sons committing suicide, but also why are our sons much more likely to be the ones to shoot up schools?" he says. "We're all in jeopardy if we don't pay attention to the cries of pain and isolation and alienation that are happening among our sons."
>
> This is a dramatic turnaround for a man who was once a leading voice for feminism. In the 1970s, Farrell served on the board of the National Organization for Women in New York City. But he broke with the feminist movement when it strayed, in his view, from the idea that men and women should be equally involved in the workplace and the home.
>
> Now, men's rights advocates argue, feminism is more concerned with promoting the interests of women — often at the expense of men.
>
> "Once we can establish that, by the way, men are human beings — so are boys — it is OK for us to stand and talk about their issues," says Paul Elam, who founded the website A Voice for Men in 2009. "[We can] seek solutions even if, God forbid, they're not solutions that are prescribed through the feminist lens."

The transcript goes on to feature a few detractors, including Futrelle and a feminist named Gwyneth Williams:

> Futrelle says the leaders of the movement have done little to discourage misogyny in their ranks.

> “Essentially, the issues they bring up are little more than an excuse or an opportunity for them to attack women and blame women for pretty much everything that goes wrong in the world.”
>
> [...]
>
> Observers say the anonymity of the Internet has changed the tone of the discussion. Even so, complaints about feminism are nothing new. Men have been making these arguments since the late 1970s, says Gwyneth Williams, a professor of political science at Webster University.
>
> She agrees that some of the problems that men’s rights activists talk about are real. But the argument that feminism is to blame simply hasn’t taken root in mainstream culture.
>
> “You have to ask yourself, why is it that the claims aren’t resonating, you know, in a broad-based way with a lot of men, the way feminism did?” she says.
>
> But men’s rights advocates insist the movement is growing. Paul Elam says he’s making plans to hold a second conference on men’s issues next year in Washington, D.C.

It’s actually a pretty fair and balanced piece. As a regular NPR listener (yes, I must admit I listen to NPR more than anything else on the radio), I’m pleased and mildly surprised.

Futrelle, on the other hand, is bummed about it. From his site:

> I haven’t heard the segment yet, but reading the transcript i have to say the piece is pretty poor, giving MRAs in general and Warren Farrell in particular way too much credence.
>
> [...]
>
> Well, I’m glad they included some critical comments from me and from Gwyneth Williams, but I have to say I expected a lot better from NPR. It was much too sympathetic to what is in its essence a hate movement devoted to harassing women.

Oh, too bad, Dave. Well, at least you’ll have plenty of time to get used to it.

ISIL in Context

W.F. Price · 5 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's a bit off the usual topic here, but I can't help but add my two bits to this national conversation about ISIS/ISIL or whatever they're being called today. I used to work in this field so I know a thing or two about it, although I'm not as up to date as I used to be.

What bothers me is that this group is referred to as though it's something new. It isn't. ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant) is just al-Qaeda under a new name. These people have been in Iraq from the beginning of the 2003 invasion.

Another thing people are generally unaware of is that we did their work for them for years. Without American involvement in Iraq, there would be no ISIL to speak of. When we invaded Iraq on the false pretext of Iraqi WMDs and involvement in 9/11, one of the first priorities was something called de-Baathification, i.e. the removal of those in the ruling Baath party from power (and often from ordinary jobs, too). It was modeled on the old "de-Nazification" of the immediate postwar era, but in some ways it was more severe, because all Sunni Iraqis fell under suspicion, and were ethnically cleansed from government in large areas of the country.

The reason the Sunnis dominated the Baath party was that Arab nationalism was a largely Sunni phenomenon in Iraq (unlike Syria). Our new Shiite "allies," like Nouri al-Maliki, were aligned with theocratic Iran (al-Maliki is essentially an Iranian puppet).

During the early years of resistance against the US occupation, the remnants of the Baath party comprised the core of the resistance to the occupation. Over time, they lost, because they were facing the US armed forces and the majority Shiites, and it's kind of hard to fight main battle tanks and attack helicopters with kalashnikovs, improvised explosives and RPGs. In the meanwhile, al-Qaeda in Iraq avoided confronting the Americans, choosing instead to carry out a brutal terrorist campaign against Shiites and Baathists. When the Baathists were beaten into submission by US forces, this left al-Qaeda in Iraq as the dominant Sunni power. At this point, Sunnis in Iraq had nobody to turn to but the Islamists.

Ironically, this is what Osama bin Laden had wanted from the beginning: to destroy the secular nationalist opposition to a new Sunni caliphate. He intentionally drew us into a war in the Middle East, anticipating the outcome we have today. If we had attacked Syria's Baathist leadership, as many of our idiotic politicians wanted fairly recently, we would have only made things easier for ISIL/al-Qaeda.

Now, we are fighting ISIL, dropping bombs on northern Iraq and helping the Shiite puppets of Iran to prevent them from taking Baghdad. This shows that the invasion of Iraq and subsequent de-Baathification campaign was an enormously expensive blunder, because we have two crappy choices in regards to Iraq today: Islamic fanatics or Iranian allies. Saddam Hussein was a troublesome dictator, and his removal nothing to cry over, but dismantling Arab nationalism was highly destabilizing and expensive in terms of American wealth and lives.

Now that we're looking at another war in Iraq, I really hope more Americans can come to a better understanding of how badly mismanaged our Middle East policy has been. I'm afraid I hope in vain, because I suspect there are a lot of people who prefer the status quo of eternal instability, and they have a lot of power over foreign policy.

I don't expect ISIL to go head-to-head with the US. This is not its style. Instead of facing the US, they'll double-down on terrorist attacks on internal enemies, and perhaps carry out some attacks in the West to bolster their street cred with the burgeoning Muslim population in Europe. Our bombs will make little difference and just further alienate the Sunni people who happen to live where they explode.

Do Women's Sexual Choices Contribute to Domestic Violence?

W.F. Price · 8 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

During a discussion about Elliot Rodger, I brought up the fact that ideological opposition to feminism and "misogyny" count for an infinitessimal amount of male on female violence. The single largest source of violence against women arises out of their sexual relationships with men. Not men they reject, mind you, but men they have slept with. Men they freely chose to sleep with; men who are dangerous people.

Now it has recently come out that Ravens' running back Ray Rice got caught on video knocking his fiancé Janay Palmer out cold in an elevator. For this, he has been kicked off the team and is suspended indefinitely. It's probably the end of his career, and if there's any justice he'll do time for it, especially considering that so many men are arrested for trifles like pushing a woman away when she's trying to attack. It's a sad sign of the times that men who commit such minor infractions are treated similarly to brutes like Rice.

In the TMZ video, it's pretty clear that Rice wanted to give the woman a beating. He waits until they're in the elevator, smacks her, and then when she retaliates drops her with a left cross. As she goes down, her head slams the rail and she's out like a light.

Unfortunately your browser does not support IFrames.

Ray Rice — ELEVATOR KNOCKOUT … Fiancee Takes Crushing Punch [Video]
If you watch through the video, when the elevator opens he casually drags her limp body out the door, then walks a little ways away and stands there while onlookers help her to her feet. It's pretty brutal.

It's shocking that intimates are sometimes so nasty to each other, but it does happen. However, perhaps what is even more shocking is that one month after getting KOed by Rice, Ms. Palmer walked down the aisle with him. Of her own free will.

I know people instinctively and reflexively sympathize with the victim of a brutal attack, but there comes a time when one has to ask whether or not the victim bears some responsibility for putting herself in this situation. Does Janay really think that will be the last time Rice gives her a beatdown? And even if she does, what statement is she making in marrying a man willing to treat her like that?

The statement is clear: she thinks the violence is a reasonable tradeoff for whatever she gets in return for her relationship, whether it's sexual gratification, status or money. Women make that statement all the time. Ask a cop someday about DV cases, and he'll tell you he has to deal with the same couples over and over. The guy gets hauled off to jail, and then as soon as he's out the couple is right back together.

But feminists would have us believe that domestic violence is a patriarchal imposition, despite the fact that married women in patriarchal families suffer the lowest rates of domestic violence of all partnered women in the United States. Maybe feminists think the patriarchy has secretly implanted little chips in women's brains that lead them to seek out men who will beat them up.

Somehow, instead of choosing granola-crunching lesbians, these women make a beeline for musclebound athletes, beefy bikers and ghetto thugs. Even when their hyper-masculine men are in prison, they faithfully visit them and initiate intimate contact during visiting times. This is such a problem that prison officials have to enforce a strict dress code in visiting rooms.

But maybe it isn't the patriarchy. Maybe there's something about female sexuality that defies feminist ideals. Perhaps it's kind of a chaotic, anarchic thing that doesn't pay attention to pronouncements about what's right and proper.

Maybe, just maybe, the only way to really cut down on intimate violence would be to restrict women's sexual freedom.

Would I advocate for that? No. As adults, women should make their own decisions in that regard. However, to blame men in general for the results of women's sexual decisions is absolutely unacceptable. I am not responsible for domestic violence. Neither are most husbands, boyfriends or lovers.

Let those who commit crimes be judged by a jury of their peers. Leave the rest of us out of it.

A Good, Simple Rule of Thumb for Parents

W.F. Price · 9 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There's a lot of hand-wringing about whether or not it's politically correct to raise your kids in one place or another, and a lot of guilt-tripping about life choices regarding where one chooses to live. For example, a lot of leftists despise suburbs and want everyone to live in densely populated cities. Still, even those who mouth leftist slogans often have a change of heart when their kids reach school age.

Although I don't like the hypocrisy, I fully understand why they engage in it. Your kids are more important than trendy slogans and political positions. If you think otherwise, you might not be psychologically suited for parenthood.

So here's my formula, which applies to the vast majority of American parents:

If, for whatever reason, you would be afraid to put your kids in the neighborhood public school, you should move somewhere else.

With the exception of the extremely rich, who can afford real insulation, it applies even to parents who want to put their kids in a private school, because the local public school's quality speaks volumes about the neighborhood, which is also important.

It's a very simple test, and only requires honesty with oneself, which is a lot easier when you're thinking about your children.

Most people already go by it, but if every parent followed this formula, it would require cities and other leftist-ruled areas to enact reform or face demographic death.

So go ahead and vote with your feet.

Cat Lady Economics

W.F. Price · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the biggest drivers of where people – especially the young – choose to live is sexual opportunity. It's an enormous part of the draw of college choice, which neighborhoods people decide to live in and which cities are considered "hot." One of the most obvious historical movements in this regard was the gay migrations to certain neighborhoods in the 70s and 80s. I can remember it myself, as I was a schoolchild in the 80s and my grandparents lived on Seattle's Capitol Hill, which was the gay capital of the Pacific Northwest until about a decade ago. Broadway, the main street on Capitol Hill, was a meat market that, from the looks of it, was nearly 50% gay. It seemed that nearly the entire gay population of Washington, Idaho, Oregon and western Montana had picked up and moved there. That's an exaggeration, but the movement was real, and likely did represent a significant proportion of the greater region's gay population.

With straight people, the picture is more complicated, because accessibility of sex is only part of the picture. Although young men may simply be looking to score, women have expectations for the future. The city is where you meet up, form a relationship and then get on with life. Or that's how it's supposed to work.

This model justifies the extra expense, social opportunities and exciting nightlife that cities offer. Young people can strive to impress each other, check out their options, engage in a little conspicuous consumption and generally put some effort into proving themselves worthy mates.

Some time in the early 2000s, developers figured out that they could capitalize on this, and they've put enormous effort into turning cities into these "playgrounds" that cater to the young, single and childless set. It worked very well, and those who best documented the results were people like Roissy in DC and Roosh, who described the sexual free-for-all of East Coast cities.

But the problem with this model is that eventually it runs up against a wall; a wall we in the manosphere are all quite familiar with. What has happened is that the Sex and the City set that made cities rock around the year 2004 or so is hitting that wall hard, and as they've aged into middle class salaried workers they've driven up prices so far that younger, hotter women can't afford cities any longer. Millennials are fleeing Washington DC, Boston, and other high-cost cities. In Seattle, college students, who comprise a large fraction of the city's population of young people, have petitioned the mayor to do something about out-of-control rent increases.

If millennials really do bail out of cities, and at this point it doesn't look as though they'll have any other option, a major part of the allure of cities will disappear. Middle class families are already gone, so all that will be left is childless professionals, wealthy landlords and immigrant service workers. If cities' target demographic remains middle America, I don't see what cities will have to offer young people heading into the next decade. Do post-wall cat ladies, elderly rich folks and ESL types really add all that much to the "vibrancy" and dynamism of a neighborhood?

Developers who have pushed young people out of cities have put themselves in a precarious situation. With one economic fluctuation taking the wind out of the sails of industries that employ that nucleus of well-compensated young people who keep the house of cards from toppling, the entire edifice could come crashing down, leaving urban centers hollowed out just as they were in the 70s and 80s.

I predict that will happen within about five years, when the largest cohort of millennials (born just before 1990) hits 30 and starts thinking seriously about raising kids. At that point, they'll weigh their options, look at local schools, and most of those who still remain in cities will flee. When that happens, I wouldn't want to be left with costly rental properties on my hands.

Hate Crime Prosecutions Finally Take Toll on FEMEN

W.F. Price · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The radical feminist group FEMEN, originally a Ukrainian activist group founded by a male political radical who came up with the ingenious idea of promoting his cause with naked young women (such is the state of modern feminism), has all but evacuated Ukraine and moved to France. This despite the group's warmongering in Ukraine and not insignificant part in the street protests in Kiev that brought on the current Ukraine civil war.

While it shouldn't surprise anyone to see feminist activists cut and run when things get rough, it's refreshing to see that French authorities are fed up with the group's nonsense, and starting to take a hard line against their vandalism, trespassing and sacrilege:

> Earlier this summer, a Paris court ordered Femen fined and evicted "without delay" from the disused suburban utilities property that its members had occupied as squatters since being turned out of their previous residence and headquarters, a dilapidated theater called the Lavoir Moderne Parisien, in November. Notre Dame Cathedral is suing the group for reportedly damaging a bronze bell during a raucous February 2013 protest-celebration there of Pope Benedict XVI's resignation; each activist has already been fined €1,500 (nearly $2,000). During Vladimir Putin's June visit to Paris, veteran Ukrainian activist Yana Zhdanova—topless, with "KILL PUTIN" scrawled in red on her chest—invaded the famed Grévin wax museum and, wielding a wooden pick, stabbed the Russian leader's effigy. She faces trial in September and fines totaling almost €50,000. Another Femen militant, the singer Éloïse Bouton, will be tried in October for "sexual exhibitionism" after simulating, topless, an abortion in the landmark 19th-century Church of the Madeleine.

Although it will be nice to see an end to these provocations, it's pretty shocking that it's taken so long to deal with these constant assaults on French Catholics. If a FEMEN activist had actually entered a mosque and engaged in these acts, it's doubtful that she would have emerged in one piece. Goes to show just how thoroughly cowed and subjugated traditional Europeans are today in the West.

We Must Confront the OJ Effect to Prevent Another Legislative Disaster

W.F. Price · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Ray Rice incident immediately brings to mind the media hoopla over another domestic violence case, albeit a significantly bloodier one. When OJ Simpson cut his wife Nicole Simpson's throat along with her friend Ronald Goldman, popular revulsion provided the impetus for the passage of VAWA as an attachment to the 1994 crime bill.

VAWA has been a disaster for millions of families, arguably worse than mandatory minimum drug laws that saw minor offenders thrown behind bars for decades.

First, we have to make it absolutely clear that OJ Simpson and Ray Rice are not the norm. Men who murder or knock out their fiancés/wives are a tiny proportion of the male population. Such behavior is not, and never has been, common or acceptable to the vast majority of the US population.

Furthermore, sexual violence is not one-sided. There is a dynamic that exists between the men and women who experience and perpetrate intimate partner violence. Janay Rice married Ray Rice after he knocked her out in an elevator. Nicole Simpson remained with OJ Simpson for years despite his tendency to hit her. This is not because of the "patriarchy" or men in general. Given no-fault divorce laws and strong penalties for men who hit women, we can only conclude that these women chose violent men, and chose to stay with them despite the violence.

While this is unfortunate, ordinary men must not be forced to pay for these poor choices and criminal outliers.

And if there is any additional legislation on top of what we already have, ordinary men (and sometimes women) will be forced to pay.

How? As follows:

1) More liberal restraining orders kicking people out of their homes based on suspicion rather than proof

2) Stepped up, costly prosecutions based on flimsy or absent evidence. These can permanently destroy careers and families, whether the accused is guilty or not

3) Extortion in divorce based on threats of false accusations

4) More no-knock home-invasions by law enforcement, potentially resulting in dead men, pets and even women and children at the hands of pumped up, heavily-armed SWAT officers

On top of this, any legislation can only serve to swell the ranks of nosy feminist bureaucrats, who can and will abuse their power to wreck families and permanently damage children during their formative years.

Not all women are Janay Rice; not all men are Ray Rice. Comprehensive legislation that would treat us as such would be harmful and wrong.

An English Perspective on Scottish Independence

W.F. Price · 11 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Opus's quote pertaining to Scottish independence was too good to pass up, so here's an excerpt for those reading the feed:

> Note that the English have absolutely no say in whether they remain joined at the hip like struggling Siamese twins with the Pipe-playing Porridge eaters. Of course we would like our Nuclear deterrent back if only to deter the Scot. We have yet to be allowed to determine whether we wish to remain part of the EUSSR and frankly given a choice we would rather tolerate the Jockanese than the Strasburgians – but first things first.

Read the full quote here.

Why Scottish Women Oppose Independence

W.F. Price · 11 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A pending referendum on Scottish independence has the UK political and financial establishment in a state of panic, which I must admit gives me no small amount of satisfaction. If I were a Scot, I'd look across the Irish Sea and compare the lot of my Irish neighbors not only with myself, but with the unfortunate English who are being squished under the boot-heel of a globalist, treasonous elite.

Compared to UK residents, Irish are currently richer, happier and not subject to cultural and population displacement. And the Irish don't even have any oil! Imagine that: a nation of peat bogs, sherry-swilling priests, spiteful fairies and soda bread is happier and freer than the formerly Great Britain.

However, there's a fly in the Scottish ointment: the women are not so sure about independence. Why might that be? Are women constitutionally averse to national independence? I don't think that's the case, because women in Eastern European countries were among the most vocal supporters of the early, anti-Soviet independence movements. And the IRA counted quite a few determined, nationalist women in its ranks, the most notorious of whom may be the Price sisters (not direct relations — the American Prices came straight from Wales around 1610) who lit up the Old Bailey in the early 70s.

So what could it be? I have a theory, based entirely upon my observation of American women and their preoccupation with the Royal Family:

Scottish women are addicted to the pomp and drama surrounding the royals just like women everywhere. They enjoy being a part of that, even if only in a secondary role. To reject the UK would be to betray the queen, and to symbolically sever connections with one of the world's most glamorous families.

Therefore, I think that all the UK elite has to do to spike the independence vote is have the queen, prince William and Kate make a direct, emotional appeal to the ladies of Scotland. Perhaps include the royal baby in an ad spot, and pictures of the royals surrounded by the dramatic Scottish countryside.

That's all it would take.

Enabling the Hamster

W.F. Price · 12 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's a relief to see that Futrelle is back on my case again. I was feeling a bit neglected lately, and wondered whether I still had it in me to stir up his cat lady audience. That question has been answered in the affirmative.

So, since it's been such a long time, I thought I'd look through his comments for some more self-validation. I found that and then some ridiculousness on top of it. My post on Ray Rice that argued that women who stay in abusive relationships are partly responsible for subsequent violence, in the same way that alligator wrestlers and snake handlers are partly responsible when they are bitten, had some of the ladies fanning themselves and making exclamations of horror.

But most informative were the lengths some would go to in trying to explain why women's choices have absolutely nothing to do with anything nasty that might befall them, and are always valid and rational in any event.

One commenter, aptly named "Policy of Madness" came out with some real doozies:

> Here's a perspective, for whoever wants it and for whatever it's worth. There is a concept in economics that says that people always do what is in their own best interests, to the best of their knowledge. In other words, you always do the best thing, for you, at the time when you do it.
>
> I want to repeat that: If you stayed in a bad and abusive relationship for any number of days or months or years, you did the best thing, for you, at the time.
>
> That may seem counterintuitive, and you may regret staying as long as you did, for any number of reasons. You may think you should have left sooner. That's a legit feeling, but the only way your actions could have changed would be for your circumstances to have changed. You could have had more/different information and reached a different decision, for instance. But, factually, at the time, your circumstances were what they were, and your information was what it was, and based on the situation at hand you made a rational decision, and that decision was the correct decision based on the information you possessed.
>
> So, why did Janay Rice marry that dude after what he did to her? I don't know, but I know this: the decision she made was the correct one, the best and most rational option available to her. If it doesn't seem that way to me, that's because I don't have the same set of information that she does.

Why, that almost sounds like my argument. Janay Rice stayed with Ray Rice for a reason; a reason that most men have little if anything to do with. However, where I depart is the notion that these reasons are always rational.

The idea that when some women return again and again to dangerous men they are always acting in their best interests is, quite plainly, a stupid one. But at least Policy of Madness correctly places the responsibility for Janay's decision to marry Ray Rice where it belongs: on Janay's shoulders.

Another stellar quote from PoM:

> …dude sometimes I will be judgmental. Many people will prioritize the wellbeing of their pets over themselves. How many people do you know who will take their pet to the vet whenever the animal seems unwell, but when they are themselves sick they just handwave it and won't see a doctor? I know lots of these folks. Then there are the ones who prioritize their pets at the bottom rung, and don't seem to comprehend that animals can feel pain and they think that another case of beer is worth more than a vet visit.
>
> I will judge the hell out of those people. They are acting correctly according to their priorities. Their priorities are immoral. I'm not obligated to stand by when someone is acting on immoral priorities and say nothing.
>
> Now, the priorities that put people into abusive relationships and cause them to stay are not immoral. In fact, abusers frequently prey on our best instincts, our instincts to care about people besides ourselves, and our > instincts for self-preservation. That doesn't mean that a person in abusive relationship cannot, or should not, reorganize the priority list. It just means that you can't do that reorganization on another person's behalf. And that's the source of the frustration.

So let me get this straight: it's OK to judge people who have dysfunctional relationships with their pets, but not those who have dysfunctional relationships with other people? So, say your daughter lets her cat scratch your grandkids and piss all over the house and lets her psycho boyfriend beat the crap out of her. Then, as a caring parent (and grandparent), what you should do is stage an intervention over the furry, ten-pound feline, and tell her it's unacceptable, but keep your damn mouth shut about the violent, 200 lb. biped in her house. Hmmm, sounds reasonable to me…

I have to say, Mr. Futrelle, that encouraging this attitude is not at all socially responsible. Here I am, excoriated for telling women how it is, and how they've got to take some responsibility for their relationship choices for their own well-being (applies to men, too, of course), and on an anti-anti-feminist site we have women making any excuse they can pull out of their nether regions to justify the shitty sexual choices that get women AND CHILDREN killed.

That's a point I'd like to see these feminists explain away. It's too bad Janay got knocked out, but if she let her choices put a child in danger I'd lose any sympathy for her I might have had in the first place.

Girls Who Code Produces First Killer App

Uncle Elmer · 12 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Efforts to close the “coding gap” between girls and boys are starting to pay off as two teens participating in the “Girls Who Code” program have released an exciting new arcade game that rips the lid off the social ignominy of menstruation.

In a society that normalizes gun violence but levies a huge stigma on menstruation, the game attempts to overcome taboos by arming the player with tampons which she can shoot at hard-hatted aggressors until she has accumulated enough points to win a resupply of tampons.

While some might scoff at the primitive gameplay, most would agree that a compelling storyline trumps graphic realism. Teen male programmers could only be depended upon to produce gratuitous violence and objectification of women. The daring victim’s narrative and empowerment exemplified by these upstart lady programmers is a harbinger of a bright future for the game industry, as more and more women reclaim gaming for feminism and produce titles that both entertain and educate gamers on sexism and other social justice concerns.

Ugly Republicans

W.F. Price · 14 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Palin family is in the news again for a dustup at a Wasilla house party, embarrassing themselves and Alaska yet again. This time, the fight was over a remark about Willow Palin, which triggered a brawl that involved young single mother Bristol throwing punches at a young man. The entire clan got into the fight, which ended with two of the Palin men injured (not seriously).

It's a familiar scenario. Sarah Palin's first nationally reported scandal was "Troopergate," in which she abused her power as governor of Alaska to intimidate and attack her sister's ex-husband. A few years later, when Bristol's shotgun marriage fell apart, the Palins brought their guns to bear on Levi Johnston, demanding so much child support that he ended up nearly $70,000 in arrears in only a couple years. When he fought for equal custody as a remarried man with another child and a stable home life, a judge Sarah Palin appointed denied him outright. Now, the combative, clannish family has attacked yet another man in support of a woman in the family.

Is it just me, or does anyone see a pattern here? If my son were to come across some good-looking young woman with a family like that I'd be tempted to lock him up in the basement until she (inevitably) found another beau. That family is a man-wrecking machine.

Despite all this, left-feminists scoff when Sarah Palin claims to be a feminist, saying she must be insincere. Well, I have news for you city-slicker genteel feminists: She's damn serious. She is more of a feminist than most of you ever will be.

I know this type of feminist all too well. In fact, if anyone is responsible for my strong opposition to feminism, it is exactly these kinds of people, with whom I very unfortunately have had a lot of experience. Not so much the enfeebled, overeducated, passive aggressive East Coast types, but rather the real, Western shoot-to-kill and take no prisoners feminist archetype; the kind of women who "go to war" during divorce by using methods calculated to have at least a chance of killing their opponent. I mean real killing, like, dead.

Given Palin's continued influence in the Tea Party, I have to conclude that the Tea Party is not in the least anti-Feminist, and in fact may be somewhat inclined to support the lawless, family-wrecking type of feminism practiced by the Palin clan. Unfortunately, the mainstream Republicans are not anti-feminist either, although they may be a bit more moderate than the Palinites. What this means is that there is no one party that supports men's interests; only less bad parties and candidates.

For now I recommend voting against Democrats, because the overwhelming majority of feminist bureaucrats are Democrats. So are most feminists nationally, but that's really more a reflection of their inability to make a living in the private sector than it is a reflection of the party's innate feminism. The Democratic Party of today is merely a coalition forged to dispossess and loot the former American majority. When that has been accomplished (not if), it will collapse into several warring factions, just as the Hunnish army did following the demise of Attila and the end of the loot and tribute caravans from Asia Minor.

In the meanwhile, if you're a young man or have a young son, keep a close lookout for anti-male patterns of behavior in families regardless of political affiliation.

Here are a few important warning signs:

1. Any allegations against previous boyfriends, husbands, or even in some cases brothers and fathers, even if they didn't result in any litigation or arrests.

2. Look at families' divorced friends. If they are mainly women, that's a problem. It means they chose sides. If there is bad blood between them and the ex-husbands of their friends, stay away.

3. They have lesbian friends. This one is self-explanatory.

4. The women display a sense of entitlement to men and men's income yet feel no reciprocal sense of family duty or loyalty.

If you open your heart, don't close your eyes!

Is Sending the Army to Fight Ebola a Good Idea?

W.F. Price · 15 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

President Obama has declared that the US armed forces will now be involved in the effort to contain the ebola virus, which is proliferating throughout West Africa, leaving corpses scattered across streets.

While the army may have a significant reservoir of medical expertise, its job is not, and never has been, to contain foreign epidemics.

In fact, armies tend to do just the opposite:

> The American military experience in World War I and the influenza pandemic were closely intertwined. The war fostered influenza in the crowded conditions of military camps in the United States and in the trenches of the Western Front in Europe. The virus traveled with military personnel from camp to camp and across the Atlantic, and at the height of the American military involvement in the war, September through November 1918, influenza and pneumonia sickened 20% to 40% of U.S. Army and Navy personnel. These high morbidity rates interfered with induction and training schedules in the United States and rendered hundreds of thousands of military personnel non-effective. During the American Expeditionary Forces' campaign at Meuse-Argonne, the epidemic diverted urgently needed resources from combat support to transporting and caring for the sick and the dead. Influenza and pneumonia killed more American soldiers and sailors during the war than did enemy weapons.

I can't think of a better way to introduce ebola to North America than to send military personnel into the heart of the epidemic, and then back home to bases on US soil.

Nobody really knows how transmissible this virus is at this point; given the many infections and deaths among healthcare workers it must be fairly contagious. This use of our army strikes me as dangerous, of questionable value and carrying considerable risk. You also have to wonder what it will do to recruitment efforts.

Moral Re-Armament: The Original "MRA"

W.F. Price · 15 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Today I thought I'd throw in a little bit of history as our world order enters yet another period of uncertainty and change.

Not long ago while reading about Christianity in Europe and the US during the age of dictators, I came across a powerful Protestant social movement I'd never heard of. I should have heard of it, but it seems that traditional Anglo Protestantism was all but washed from social consciousness in the later postwar era while some of the spiritual movements, such as New Age (e.g. Theosophy), that contributed to the development of a rudimentary National Socialist ideology, flourished in the 1960s and beyond.

Today, mainline American Protestantism is a dying social force that has been subsumed into an enfeebled liberal universalism that is lacking in any real moral conviction and standards.

However, it wasn't always that way. During the 1920s and 1930s a number of Americans sought a spiritual cure for the social ills that had taken hold of the country. Greed, promiscuity, speculation and the resulting political radicalism were threatening to tear the country apart. A terror campaign that put the 1970s to shame spurred the creation of the FBI, radicals took over towns and factories, and the government seemed to be losing control of much of the country.

America's social chaos and high levels of economic inequality were propaganda fodder for Communist and Fascist politicians, who rejected democracy as a failed political system. China was in turmoil, Japan's military seized power in the midst of social unrest, Stalin was consolidating power over the USSR and Spain lapsed into full-scale civil war. Fascist Italy and Germany were comparative oases of calm and prosperity, and a number of European and Asian countries took note and followed the fascist path. Fascism was promoted by political parties in the US, UK and even Jewish Palestine.

Having grown increasingly isolated from the rest of the world, America was adrift. In the midst of this alienating loss of direction, some sought a spiritual cure. One such man, a Pennsylvania Lutheran of Swiss descent named Frank Buchman, had a religious awakening in a church in England in 1921, subsequently channeling his newfound zeal into building a social movement that eventually had a profound effect on Europe and the US. First called "A First Century Fellowship," it was eventually renamed the Oxford Group in the early 30s after Buchman's teachings found a great deal of support in Oxford University.

Soon, the Oxford Group's message began to filter through American Protestant society. One man who fell under its influence was Bill Wilson, founder of Alcoholics Anonymous. While it didn't cure Wilson's habit (that came about during a treatment with hallucinogenic herbs), its teachings provided many of the principles of Alcoholics Anonymous. Today, that organization is the most important remaining institution brought about due to the Oxford Group's influence.

Buchman's great talent for gaining the ear of high status elites, perhaps through a skillful use of flattery and avoidance of politically-sensitive statements, allowed him to enlist high ranking Americans and Europeans, including heads of state, including Franklin Roosevelt himself, in his cause. In what may have been the greatest political mistake of his career, Buchman made overtures to Adolf Hitler, hoping to prevent the fuhrer from waging war on what he saw as the great Protestant civilization of Northwest Europe and North America. His attempts to placate Hitler failed, as the Nazis had little regard for Christianity, seeing the world instead as the setting of an epic racial rather than spiritual struggle.

When war loomed large over Europe and factories began once again to churn out bombs and cannon, luminaries at the Oxford Group decided that another form of re-armament was needed as well: a "moral re-armament".

Thus was born the "MRA," an organization dedicated to promoting a Protestant spiritual revolution throughout the Western world.

Buchman headed the new organization, propounding his four principles of absolute honesty, absolute purity, absolute unselfishness, and absolute love.

The recommended spiritual practices were as follows:

1. The sharing of our sins and temptations with another Christian.

2. Surrender our life past, present and future, into God's keeping and direction.

3. Restitution to all whom we have wronged directly or indirectly.

4. Listening for God's guidance, and carrying it out.

Note the strong similarity to AA teachings.

During the war itself, MRA had little direct influence. However, the Oxford Group had a significant impact in the Nordic countries before the war, and may have contributed to the impressive local resistance to the Nazi occupation in Denmark and Norway. Norwegians put up a stiff fight against the invasion, and their resistance contributed to a number of essential operations in the North Atlantic theater. The Danes practiced a courageous civil disobedience that effectively stymied Nazi efforts to deport Danish Jews and other enemies of the Nazi regime.

Perhaps the most important work of the MRA came in the immediate postwar period, when it opened headquarters in Caux, Switzerland and invited officials and heads of state to participate in the rehabilitation of Europe. Buchman stressed the need to bring the defeated Germans on board in the effort, and focused on regions with strong Communist support to put a check on Bolshevik influence and bring Germany back into the European fold. Back in the US, the MRA directed its efforts to bring workers and owners together in common cause by hosting MRA seminars for union leaders and management. This latter effort was apparently a success; class conflict in the US was effectively kept at a minimum during the sensitive early postwar years when the global economy was very fragile. Stalin recognized the influence of the MRA, prompting Bolsheviks to rail against the organization as an impediment to class warfare.

After Buchman died in the early 60s, the MRA slowly fell out of favor with the new generation of intellectuals. Its old, revivalist Protestantism seemed out of place in the rapidly modernizing world, and campus radicals described it as a right-wing cult, which was hardly fair given its considerable contributions to the defeat of fascism and the triumph of democracy. But the old-school Christianity and message of unselfishness were highly unfashionable in that era of self-actualization. By the 1970s, progressive spiritual movements had either adopted Eastern mysticism (as interpreted by Westerners) or a grassroots Christian fundamentalism that was so essentialist that it broke even with traditional Protestant tradition.

Today, all that remains of the MRA is an NGO that appears to work mainly with third world countries promoting quixotic solutions to the insurmountable problems that plague much of the developing world. The animating Protestant spirit behind the original organization has all but vanished, as has its influence in the West.

When I look at the course of the MRA, which effectively spanned five decades from the beginning of Buchman's First Century Fellowship, I wonder which institutions will be next to fall out of favor, and which ones we can look back at as having made an important contribution to the world we have known for the past couple generations. There are many candidates, but what strikes me today is that some of them, such as the Open Society Foundations, have already begun to make a slow exit from the scene. I wonder, in some fifty or sixty years' time, whether our children's children will even know that they ever existed.

Rotherham and the Future of Blue Cities in the US

W.F. Price · 15 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The real dirty secret in Rotherham is that the underground sex-trafficking rings were facilitated by the politics of contemporary multicultural Western cities. Ironically, in Muslim run cities in the Middle East, while these things happen, local officials are not likely to be complicit in them, because this kind of behavior has a way of (literally) exploding in their faces. And despite the claims of the local Rotherham Labour politicians, it looks as though they were complicit, going so far as to order police to ignore the crimes, and in some cases threaten white parents who complained with charges of "racism."

While it's unlikely that Muslim gangs could operate underage sex rings with impunity in the US at this point, certain politically favored groups do get away with a lot. One such group is gay men, who are almost never arrested by local police for hiring prostitutes, including underage males. The majority of those arrested for such crimes are either arrested outside the city proper, or arrested by federal agents. There's an unstated rule that you "leave them alone."

One-party politics is essentially a system of quid-pro-quo deals. Ideology ceases to matter much, because, after all, only one viewpoint is really tolerated anyway. For example, local Labour officials in Rotherham were so emboldened in their quest to quash dissent that they seized foster children from one family because the family supported the UKIP.

But political support still matters a great deal. There are still elections, and the candidate who wins is generally the one who can promise the most to the most people. And because cities have become essentially collections of interest groups that vote en bloc, certain communities can demand not only goodies, but a free hand to do as they please in certain spheres of influence. Hence the remarkable tolerance for Sharia practices in cities that otherwise smack down the religious with a heavy hand.

If a community is cohesive enough and grows to a certain proportion of the population, it can exert outsized influence on the entire city's politics. Majority Americans, who are essentially atomized individuals who don't see themselves as a united group, are no match for these communities because they are not very good at hanging together. Furthermore, they don't generally see the city as a "home" so much as a place to make money and play for some time before leaving to a more family-friendly community.

But that may also help prevent a Rotherham in the US; the white working class family has already been all but evicted from many urban areas, so it wouldn't be all that easy for urban gangs to exploit their children.

So, instead of sex-trafficking rings in US cities, I think we'll see something else develop: widespread exploitation of the elderly. Old white residents of cities will be at risk for theft, exploitation and fraud. This could happen in the form of confidence scams, burglary, false romance and brazen robbery, not to mention credit card theft and the like.

If you have elderly middle class parents in one-party blue cities, I'd recommend encouraging them to move to safer areas. This is going to become a real problem very soon, as the population of elderly is set to explode in coming years, and they will be the easiest targets of all in our decaying society.

Men's Health: Guys Need to Cultivate Relationships

Elusive Wapiti · 16 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Back in March 2014, S1 and S2's grandmother passed unexpectedly of heart failure during surgery for an unrelated malady. In fact, she "coded" as S2 was just entering the hospital to visit her in recovery. S2 took her loss especially hard, as he was close to her, but the person who took it the hardest, as one would expect, was my former father in law. He (f. FIL) always thought it would be him that checked out first, given his slowly deteriorating health–a function of being a few years older than his wife, being very very very overweight, eating poorly, and having lived a physically rougher, harder, more challenging life. He was ready for him to die first, had life insurance policies all set, paid off the house, etc. As a result, f FIL thought f MIL, with her network of close friends and stable financial position, was comparably "set", and didn't worry much about what would happen to him if the inverse occurred. Thus he wasn't psychologically ready for her to precede him and, while not challenged for money, he found himself without his only real friend. Suddenly alone, with few relationships to aid his resiliency, he reportedly found solace in casinos and other dissolutive activities and places which helped him pass the time and distract him from loss.

This reaction is in line with previous research that finds men take the loss of their wife harder than wives take the loss of a husband–suffering a 30% higher mortality rate. (For their part, according to the article, women grieve the loss of a child far more than they do the loss of a husband). Indeed, this description of widowers' experience seems to fit f.FIL's reaction quite well (bolded emphases mine):

> While women who lose their husbands often speak of feeling abandoned or deserted, widowers tend to express the loss as one of "dismemberment," as if they had lost something that kept them organized and whole. The Harvard Bereavement Study, a landmark investigation of spousal loss that took place in the Boston area during the late 1960s, reported that widowers often equated the death of their wives with the loss of their primary source of protection, support, and comfort. This went to the very core of their overall sense of wellbeing. It has been described as "being lost without a compass," usually due to their profound loneliness but also because widowers often depended on their wives for many things like managing the household, caring for their children, and being their only true confidant. This sense of being lost is more profound when widowers need help but have difficulty obtaining or even asking for it. They also can experience ambiguity about the emotions they are feeling and the uncertainty of how to express them.

Reading the passage above, it appears that widowers and widows experience their loss differently. She loses covering, protection, partnership. He loses his helpmeet, his sole confidante, his primary and often only significant relationship. And it is the context of this loss of relationship, and the importance of them, that the following excerpts of a post over at Art of Manliness, summarizing the findings of the Grant study, got my attention as a "life hack" for men. Fellas, the takeway is this: you gotta cultivate relationships and be relate-able for your own good.

> When Vaillant crunched the numbers, he discovered no significant relationship between a man's level of flourishing and his IQ, his body type (mesomorph, ectomorph, endomorph), or the income and education level of his parents. The factors that did loom large, and collectively predicted all ten Decathlon events [career success, professional prominence, mental health, physical health, a good marriage, supportive friendships, closeness to one's children, the ability to enjoy work, love, and play, and subjective happiness], had one thing in common: relationships. This rubric included:
>
> - A warm, supportive childhood
> - A mature "coping style" (being able to roll with the punches, be patient with others, keep a sense of humor in the face of setbacks, delay gratification, etc.)

> - Overall "soundness" as evaluated during college years (resilient, warm personality, social, not overly sensitive)
> - Warm adult relationships between the ages of 37-47 (having close friends, maintaining contact with family, being active in social organizations)
> - Vaillant found that the men who had the best scores in these areas during their youth and mid-life, were the happiest, most successful, and best adjusted in their latter years. This is the finding of the Grant Study that has emerged most prominently: "It was the capacity for intimate relationships that predicted flourishing in all aspects of these men's lives."
>
> The powerful effect of intimate relationships can be seen in a variety of factors in a man's life, including their income levels:
>
> - Men with at least one good relationship with a sibling growing up made $51,000 more per year than men who had poor relationships with their siblings, or no siblings at all
> - Men who grew up in cohesive homes made $66,000 more per year than men from unstable ones
> - Men with warm mothers took home $87,000 more than those men whose mothers were uncaring
> - The 58 men with the best scores for warm relationships made almost $150,000 more per year than the 31 men with the worst scores
> - Remember that these men all entered the workforce with a Harvard education. Also remember that their parents' socioeconomic status turned out not to be a significant factor in their own future income.

But for those of us with children, it's not just our own relationships that matter, but the investment we make in our own sons that echoes into the future. To this end, the Grant study also found, unsurprisingly to this author, that the environment fathers and mothers make for their children in the home significantly impacted their sons' material success and ability to secure and sustain relationships later in life:

> In addition to finding that warm relationships in general had a positive impact on the men's lives, Vaillant uncovered specific effects that stemmed from a man's childhood, and from the respective influence of his mother and father…[T]he Grant Study found that abundant familial love, when coupled with an emphasis on autonomy and initiative, actually produced the most stoical (able to keep a stiff upper lip) and independent men. Such men, Vaillant explains, had learned to be comfortable with their feelings, and "that they could put their trust in life, which gave them courage to go out and face it."
>
> [A] mother who could enjoy her son's initiative and autonomy was a tremendous boon to his future…mothers who celebrated their boys' boyishness bolstered their chances of achieving a successful, mature manhood…the Grant Study found that a warm relationship with his mother was significantly associated with a man's:, effectiveness at work, maximum late-life income, military rank at the end of WWII, inclusion in Who's Who, IQ in college, verbal test scores, class rank in college, [and] mental competence at age 80.
>
> The Grant Study also found influences that were associated exclusively with dads. Loving fathers imparted to their sons [an] enhanced capacity to play, more enjoyment of vacations, greater likelihood of being able to use humor as a healthy coping mechanism, better adjustment to, and contentment with, life after retirement, less anxiety and fewer physical and mental symptoms under stress in young adulthood.
>
> In the negative column, it "was not the men with poor mothering but the ones with poor fathering who were significantly more likely to have poor marriages over their lifetimes." Men who lacked a positive relationship with their fathers were also "much more likely to call themselves pessimists and to report having trouble letting others get close."

> If there was ever any doubt, fathers matter, a lot: When all is said and done, a man's relationship with his father very significantly predicted his overall life satisfaction at age 75 — "a variable not even suggestively associated with the maternal relationship."

This last passage about the impact of fathers is significant, for it tells us that men who themselves cultivate relationships and teach their sons to do the same grant substantial advantage to their children that echoes for generations.

But there is another relationship that hasn't been mentioned yet: That of marriage. Marriage has long been known to benefit men, extend their lives, encourage them to be more productive, and to be the most ideal relationship within which to prepare their sons for a happy and successful life of his own. Conversely, the lack of it is associated with poor outcomes not only for men in the present, but for themselves in the future, many years down the road:

> Vaillant evaluated the men according to "Adult Adjustment Outcome determinations" (a kind of earlier version of the Decathlon of Flourishing, from what I gather), he found that: "all of the fifty-five Best Outcomes had gotten married relatively early and stayed married for most of their adult lives. (And by the time those men were eighty-five, we learned later, only one marriage had ended in divorce.) In contrast, among the seventy-eight Worst Outcomes, five had never married, and by seventy-five years of age, thirty-five (45 percent) of the marriages had ended in divorce. Proportionately three times as many of the Best Adjusted men enjoyed lifelong happy marriages as the Worst."
>
> The effect of marriage was even starker for the inner-city men of the Glueck Study: "two-thirds of the never-married were in the bottom fifth in overall social relations, 57 percent were in the bottom fifth in income, and 71 percent were classified by the Study raters as mentally ill."

Thus while lifelong marriage is a key predictor for a man's long-term happiness, the lack of marriage, or having been divorced but not re-married, foretells poor social relationships overall and lower overall happiness and life satisfaction. Moreover, as marriage is the primary vehicle through which fathers invest in their children, being and staying married to the mother of one's children provides a man's children with greater opportunity for the sorts of warm father-son relationships that boys so desperately need to prepare them to be good husbands and fathers in their own right–and to enjoy a satisfying and successful life once they leave the house.

This is both hopeful and sobering news–hopeful in that this body of data clearly tells men that yes, they are important to their families, more than they probably realize, and sobering that a great many men are unable, for whatever reason, to invest in their children, and so many boys are raised in fatherless homes.

I'll close this post by quoting a final line from Vaillant's manuscript: "We don't breed good officers; we don't even build them on the playing fields of Eton; we raise them in loving homes." Men would be well advised to not give short shrift to relationships but should instead make a point of liberally investing in them…with their wives, with their male friends, and with their sons.

About the author: EW is a well-trained monkey operating heavier-than-air machinery for a living. His interests outside of being an opinionated rabble-rouser are hunting, working out, motorcycling, spending time with his family, and flying. He is a father to four, a husband to one, and is a sometime contributor here at Spearhead. More of his intolerable drivel is available at the blog The Elusive Wapiti.

NFL Names Prosecutor Involved in Rape Case Mistrial to Domestic Violence Round Table

W.F. Price · 18 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

NFL players and union representatives should take note of the fact that Lisa Friel, former Manhattan DA and now hired to serve on an NFL advisory panel of four women, was involved in a prosecution of New York policeman Kenneth Moreno that resulted in a mistrial and Friel being fired for prosecutorial misconduct. Friel is known for her aggressive and sometimes unconstitutional prosecutions of men.

According to a lawyer hired by Mr. Moreno, Friel went after the cop despite lack of any physical evidence:

> NEW YORK, July 31, 2014 – New York Civil Rights Attorney Eric Sanders, Esq., of The Sanders Firm, P.C., files a $175 Million dollar lawsuit on behalf of Mr. Kenneth J. Moreno against the accuser, Manhattan District Attorney's Office, Home Box Office, Inc., and the accuser's law firm for conspiracy to violate his constitutional rights for their pecuniary gain.
>
> Mr. Moreno was a tenured civil servant close to his 20th year anniversary when he would have been eligible for full retirement benefits.
>
> Mr. Moreno alleges the New York County District Attorney's Office under Robert Morgenthal and Cyrus Vance investigates, prosecutes and makes other charging decisions based upon race, political affiliations and other improper factors designed to ensure their own pecuniary gain. In the verified complaint, Mr. Moreno notes differences in how his case was handled as opposed to Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Fox News Anchor Greg Kelly, both Caucasian males with privilege and political power.
>
> The original callout alleging Mr. Moreno raped Ms. Katherine Chow was assigned to Detective Second Grade Diane L. Davis for the initial part of the investigation. After interviewing Ms. Chow, Detective Davis found her not credible. In Detective Davis's opinion, she believed this matter was not criminal but a form of misconduct based upon similar matters handled by the NYPD.
>
> Ms. Chow alleged Mr. Moreno raised her pelvic area and had vaginal sex with her from behind. Mr. Moreno denies having any sex with Ms. Chow. There was no physical evidence to support Ms. Chow had sex with Mr. Moreno. On Ms. Chow's Facebook personal page, she messaged her friend but says nothing about allegedly being raped until she meets with her friend attorney Ms. Yasmine R. Saeed. They begin meeting with the NYPD Internal Affairs Bureau and the New York County District Attorney's Office.
>
> Prior to the criminal trial, Ms. Chow maliciously filed several frivolous federal civil rights lawsuits in the Southern District of New York alleging Mr. Moreno raped and assaulted her in an attempt to extort monies out of him and the taxpayers, according to the verified complaint.
>
> Prior to the criminal trial, the New York County District Attorneys' Office obtained a search warrant and seized a hair sample from him, which yielded no credible evidence to support any criminal charge.

Even worse, she has allegedly gone from being an unethical prosecutor to being paid to cover up sexual abuse of men and boys:

> The lawyers hired by Yeshiva University in January 2013 to investigate allegations that the Washington Heights school had covered up decades of sexual abuse didn't leave any stone unturned.
>
> The investigators spent 6,300 hours on the case, interviewing more than 145 people, including victims and school employees accused of sexual abuse. They reviewed millions of emails and thousands of pages of documents, including personnel records, legal files and board meeting minutes.
>
> The investigation was led by Karen Patton Seymour, the former chief of the criminal division of the U.S.

> Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York, now a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell, the Manhattan white-shoe law firm with offices across the globe. Seymour and S&C brought in Lisa Friel and her security firm, T&M Protection Resources, to assist with the probe.
>
> Friel assumed an even bigger stage on Monday, when embattled NFL commissioner Roger Goodell announced that he had hired the former chief of the Manhattan district attorney's sex crimes unit to advise him on criminal cases and violations of the league's personal conduct policy.
>
> The T&M vice president, one of four women Goodell said will help guide the NFL through the worst crisis in its 94-year history, is already reviewing the cases against Adrian Peterson, the Minnesota Vikings star who was indicted last week on felony child abuse charges, and Greg Hardy of the Carolina Panthers, who is appealing his domestic violence conviction.
>
> But if the Yeshiva case — where Friel's work and independence have come into question — is any indication, transparency and victims' concerns may take a backseat to NFL public relations. The lawyer representing 34 men who claim Yeshiva officials covered up the sex abuse allegations says the university used Friel and her investigators as "unwitting cogs" in an ongoing conspiracy to conceal the abuse. It was an effort, he says, to allay alumni anger and public outrage — and shield the Orthodox Jewish university from any liability.

Good going Goodell! Hopefully you'll be smart enough to pay Friel NOT to do anything in her position as NFL feminist PR woman in chief.

Theme Issues

W.F. Price · 19 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Readers have probably noticed some problems with the site, and the comments in particular. This is due to the fact that I'm using an old theme, and WordPress has upgraded many times since it was first installed.

I can and will fix it quickly, but it will require hacks and will be a pain in the rear. What I really have to do is get a new theme, and do all the work that entails.

I think for the next theme I'll choose something simple and elegant that is easy to customize and upgrade. I've realized that nothing beats simplicity for saving time and making the reading experience pleasant.

However, I'm considering archiving all the old posts to cut down on clutter and database size. Maybe I'll save all of my own posts on a wordpress.com site so those who are interested can browse them as they please. If anyone has any suggestions for good archiving techniques feel free to let me know — when the comments are working again, that is.

Life Changes

W.F. Price · 16 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My son is now three months old and becoming more engaging every day, so I have a lot to be thankful for. But I've had to confront a few realities lately. Importantly, I haven't been able to consistently or effectively work from home for reasons that other parents probably understand. This is probably my biggest stumbling block right now, and given what self-employment entails, it's an enormous problem.

Secondly, my father fell gravely ill when he was about exactly my age, and although he lived another quarter century he never recovered from it either financially or in terms of his health. In fact, the remainder of his life was pretty lousy, and he died a sick man with a number of nasty conditions that left him prematurely disabled. From the age of 12 to 36, I witnessed his long, painful decline and many of its awful details. This has been weighing heavily on my mind as I consider my own age and mortality and the fact that I have a young child.

Although I don't take the same risks my father did, there's plenty of room for improvement, and the thought of ending up on an operating table in my 40s quite frankly scares the crap out of me.

For now, I need to find a profitable way to get out of the house every day, and a place where I can keep writing. Hopefully I can kill two birds with one stone, but I can't afford to be choosy, so I'll take what I can.

Please excuse me for dropping out of sight for a while — this is a problem I can't fix online. If I can't keep the site up due to costs I'll host the content on my wordpress.com site and direct readers there.

Where to go from here?

W.F. Price · 25 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

If this post reaches anyone following my long hiatus, hi there!

I'm going to start writing again, but probably not on this particular blog. Not only would rebuilding the site be more trouble than I can handle at the moment; I'm tired of writing exclusively about gender issues and want to explore other topics. I'd like to start with a new (although not entirely different) focus and see if it goes anywhere.

I'm a bit sorry I missed all the excitement of late 2014, but trying to write (or do anything that requires quiet and concentration) with a baby in the house just wasn't working, and I had to take a break to maintain my sanity. If anyone reading this is tempted to try it, think long and hard about it first.

I'll do what I can to keep the site up, but I'll probably have to let it go down for at least a little while so I can transfer to cheaper hosting, as I'm stretched too thin right now.

Sooo, there's a good chance nobody will even see this post (at least for a while)! But I thought I ought to at least put it out there just in case.

See you all in the next incarnation!

New site thoughts

W.F. Price · 26 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I still haven't decided whether I want to use this url for a new site or not, but I'm leaning against it because I'd like a fresh start and The Spearhead deserves to be what it was. If I can, I think I'll keep it online as it is just for reference purposes.

However, comments stopped working when I updated WordPress last fall, and that pretty much convinced me I needed to take a break. I just don't have the time to fiddle with the code or to rebuild the site with an entirely new theme, which would have been necessary. If I did it myself it would have taken weeks (I'm not a professional developer), and on top of that I'm not really inspired by what MRA has become as its themes have gone mainstream. Not that this bothers me – it's a welcome development – but I'm constitutionally averse to engaging in debates that have already been settled. And feminism has been discredited. The recent election, which saw politicians running on feminist themes get slaughtered, pretty much drove that point home. So has the Rolling Stone rape fantasy article and its spectacular shootdown.

This doesn't mean that feminism is done for just yet, but it is listing to port and limping badly. Its primary champions are well into old age, and resurgent religious and political movements are running away from it.

So I'm going from gender issues to something I think is a little more salient today, which subsumes the issue. I'll be a bit more explicit soon, but I still have some reading and writing to do to work it out some of the ideas I've come up with in the local library over the last couple months.

In the meanwhile, I'll try to get in touch with other writers I respect to see what they think, and perhaps we can come up with some sort of new focus that brings manosphere ideas into a new, more comprehensive cultural effort.

Balance — not Equality

W.F. Price · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'm going to stay on this subject because it's very important that people think about it. Concepts matter, and the idea of gender equality is a concept that has done a great deal of damage over the years.

First, let's lay out a few reasons gender equality is undesirable.

For normal people, sex differences (inequalities) enhance life. Men like feminine characteristics in women, and women like masculine characteristics in men. These characteristics are what define "men" and "women." Make men and women equal, and the sexes cease to exist. For normal people, this would be a nightmare.

Say we did manage to eliminate "gender" and men and women became indistinguishable. Such a society, if sexual at all, would be homosexual by definition. Homosexuality would not be a paraphilia, but rather the default for all human sexuality.

Additionally, the phenotypic diversity of the human species would be considerably diminished. Instead of having two major types of humans, there would only be one androgynous "type." This sounds repugnant to me, but perhaps some people like this idea.

Finally, and this is counterintuitive but would be true, the balance the sexes provide to both the species and society would be gone, and humanity could easily veer off in grotesque and strange directions.

Gender equality in practice would be a dystopia by most people's standards.

If equality is therefore undesirable (and we must include legal equality, because law that defies nature is tyrannical, bad law), then what values can we strive for regarding the sexes?

How about the very values nature intended:

Balance and harmony.

Men and women are different, and these differences balance the species and provide communities with common cause. If masculine tendencies go too far, feminine notions restrain them, and likewise the reverse. The differences between men and women are not a curse on humanity, but rather an essential part of what keeps us centered and stable. Making us equal removes that advantage and weakens communities, which may provide an explanation for why hostile elites are so inclined to support gender equality: it makes us easier to exploit.

I have to turn once again to legal equality, because commenters are still writing in to support this idea. Everyone, it seems, agrees that legal equality of the sexes is a wonderful thing (even though it is repeatedly rejected at the ballot box and in the courts). This idea is so pervasive in our society that hardly anyone stops to question it. But if they did, and they spent some time thinking about it, they would start to see problems with it just as I have.

Law is intended to be a reflection nature. There's an ancient concept called "natural law," long held in esteem in the former Christian civilization, that holds that there is a universal law, distinct from laws of custom ("common law" in the English-speaking world), based on the natural world. Aristotle is generally considered to have developed this idea, and it inspired, among other things, the US Constitution.

While natural law has been used to justify concepts of human rights (i.e. "natural rights"), laws are longer valid when severed from their roots in the natural world, because this brings chaos and injustice. The Chinese have a similar concept concerning divine favor; when rulers fall out of favor with heaven, as evidenced by calamities and natural disasters, they are said to have lost their mandate, and it is time for a change.

So, when we begin to defy nature itself, and take it upon ourselves to do foolish things such as declare men and women equal, we undermine the basis of our law, and bring misery on our heads. This is what is behind the dismal state of relations between the sexes in the contemporary West.

As a simple example, much of our law is based on the physical nature of things. If we were to ignore the distinctions between these things, injustice results. If someone were to attack another with a knife, we would hold it to be assault with a deadly weapon. Now say someone attacked with a spatula. The spatula and knife could be roughly the same size and weight, and made from the same material, so perhaps the crime should be the same. Would that be fair? Of course not, because regardless of these superficial similarities, knives and spatulas have different properties that matter a great deal in the real world. So do men and women, and if we don't take these different properties into account the law is all but useless.

Therefore, for the good of mankind and the benefit of society, and for justice and human happiness, we must reject the notion of sex equality. Instead, we should strive for a balance that benefits both societies and the individuals within them, and to achieve this balance the sexes must be seen and treated as they are: distinct and different from each other.

Equalists vs. Realists

W.F. Price · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The biggest problem with the men's rights movement is its failure to see the big picture. For some reason, people think they can separate feminism and gender issues from a larger philosophical problem. This is wishful thinking. It can't be done.

There's a reason the feminists latched onto Marxist philosophy like a child to his mother's teat. It provided them with a philosophical framework – a faith, really – that allowed them to deny the realities of human nature by assigning inequalities to political struggles. There are some truths in Marxism. Political and economic inequalities are real, and often stand in stark contrast to natural inequalities, hence the use of the concept of natural law to strike down privileges of birth and other "accidental" advantages enjoyed by some over others.

Today, however, people fail to see the original intent of these movements. In fact, they have an often inverted notion of them. For example, the idea that a woman should be privileged over a man in hiring preference is more akin to the old notion of nobility by birth than it is to the Founding Fathers' concept of equality.

In fact, the notion that men and women are equal would have been very strange to even the most radical of Enlightenment thinkers. Yet by mysterious twists of fate (and possibly liberal English resistance to French Republicanism), the feminists have coopted the ideology.

So what we are left with today is a twisted interpretation of what was a flawed philosophy to begin with. Now that Enlightenment and Marxist notions of inequality as a more or less purely political, cultural construct, have been discredited, we are left with an increasingly dysfunctional guiding faith in a fallen god.

Is the key to cling to the old idols, hanging on with eyes tightly shut against the mounting body of evidence that we were wrong, or to accept that we made some mistakes along the way and move on? To me, the latter seems far more reasonable.

But in order to move on, we have to reject all that follows from the errors — not just those things that we personally dislike. So if it turns out that, say, men and women are not by nature equal, then we can't say we want equality on our terms. Instead, we have to make an effort to learn the truth, and then we can go about accommodating it.

So the real problem is not merely feminism, but the original error, which includes a great deal more than that.

Therefore, if you oppose feminism and its associated evils, the most effective way to fight it is to debunk the false philosophy that supports it. And this means we cannot indulge men who adhere to the same principles, whether they are on "our side" or not.

What it really comes down to is truth vs. error, but because "equality" is such a powerful concept today, it must be attacked head on and by name before people can begin to perceive the error. Hence my recent articles on the subject.

Who's Really Making a Difference?

W.F. Price · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Commenters are asking when I'll get comments fixed. Probably in the next couple days if I can afford a new theme. After installing that, I'll likely archive The Spearhead's old site and leave it online, perhaps at the same domain, perhaps not, depending on whether I'll keep blogging at this domain.

While I was taking time off from blogging, I spent a lot of time reading. Some at the local library, but mostly on other blogs. As one commenter noted I was commenting a fair amount on the Unz Review, where I've seen a couple other Spearhead readers and at least one writer (hi Elmer!).

Commenting is a nice way to indulge my compulsion to write without having to put as much effort into thinking things through or editing myself. In other words, it's something you can do with a baby hollering in the background.

Over at Unz, Steve Sailer, one of my favorite bloggers, played a big role in early December exposing the Rolling Stone rape fantasy article as the fraud it was. The first journalist to point out that there might be something wrong with the piece was Richard Bradley, who formerly worked with disgraced journalist Stephen Glass. Glass got caught fabricating stories out of whole cloth while writing for The New Republic back in the 90s. Interestingly, Hannah Rosin was one of his colleagues and chief supporters. If you're interested in the Stephen Glass story, I'd recommend watching Shattered Glass, the movie about his escapades.

Bradley, who had been duped by Glass, noticed that certain elements of the Rolling Stone article didn't look right. Perhaps in an effort to vindicate himself, he took the plunge and went public on his blog with these observations. For days, nobody paid any attention. Nobody, that is, except for Steve Sailer.

Sailer, who is really unique in that he pursues the truth regardless of the consequences, pointed out more inconsistencies in comments on Bradley's blog. When he was finally convinced that there was something wrong with he article, he went public on his own blog with his and Bradley's observations.

Immediately, people started to pay attention. Articles popped up with questions about alleged victim "Jackie," and calls went out to Sabrina Rubin Erdely, author of the piece, for clarification.

Our very own Chuck Ross, newshound that he is, picked up the scent and came up with even more damning inconsistencies. Suddenly, the story came crashing down like the tower of lies it was. Sabrina Rubin Erdely went into hiding, Rolling Stone apologized and a hideous false rape accusation went down in flames.

Of all people who deserve credit for this, perhaps we should start with Richard Bradley. He was the first journalist, after all, who seriously questioned the story. However, the man who deserves the most credit for the story's spectacular failure is Steve Sailer. His dogged determination and analytical thinking combined with his popularity as a blogger dealt the decisive blow to the great lie. It was a spectacular coup, and vindicates my loyalty to his iSteve blog.

When we ask ourselves who is making a difference, results should be foremost in our considerations. Did anyone else in 2014 do more to discredit gender feminism than Steve Sailer, besides the feminists themselves? If so, I don't know who it could be. Yet a lot of people keep throwing good money after bad supporting people who not only espouse an ideology that is virtually identical to feminism, but who seem to be working half the time to discredit us.

Unz has put together an impressive roster, and Steve Sailer is not the only writer worth reading on his site. I'd also recommend Fred Reed – who is surely well-known in these quarters – and anthropologist Peter Frost. Frost doesn't concern himself with gender so much as demographics, but he writes about the most interesting subjects – human beings – in ways that few dare, and from a fascinating scientific perspective. For those who are interested in the unique and diverse characteristics of human individuals and populations, Frost is a great read.

Discerning readers prefer clear thought over bluster and results over boasting, so I thought I'd point out a few writers who can offer those. Unless we just want to stand around patting each other on the back who we support matters, and those who offer nothing of substance don’t deserve that support, no matter what kind of show they put on.

Social and economic liberalism have the same effect

W.F. Price · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One of the great curiosities of the modern era is the idea that so-called socially progressive policies are generally held to be good for the downtrodden. Nobody worth taking seriously ever thought so before, but it's held to be a fact these days.

However, loosening the controls on social behavior has the same effect as loosening controls on the market: the strong gain at the expense of the weak.

When banks are deregulated, the rich get richer at the expense of the poor. When sexual mores are relaxed those with more sexual capital totally dominate the market. Furthermore, those better able to control themselves and live a disciplined family lifestyle with minimal pressure have an enormous advantage over those who give in to temptation. This is why marriage has collapsed for large segments of society. Socially progressive policies not only tolerating but promoting an "anything goes" form of sexuality victimize those who need some external controls on their behavior.

Same goes for feminist policies promoting "equal" relationships between husband and wife. For most people, these relationships simply don't work. Most need clearly defined gender roles that take natural human tendencies into account. Without them they become confused, dissatisfied and demoralized.

So when I hear people say they believe in social justice, and use that as a justification for a laissez-faire attitude toward social mores, I tend to think they're either cynical, evil bastards or hopeless fools. Social justice and social liberalism are inimical to each other. This doesn't mean that people should be strictly controlled in all aspects of life, but rather that there should be some balance in the matter. While there will always be people who are by nature sexually ambitious or deviant, they shouldn't be held up as examples to the masses.

Why progressives can't see this was long a mystery to me. I thought that maybe it was because they live isolated lives, but I'm not sure that's true, because a lot of urban liberals have conservative, small town roots, and plenty have experienced their share of family dysfunction.

Recently, I've come to see it as a matter of faith. A large segment of our population has a religious belief in what are called "progressive" values, nurtured by thousands of hours in front of the family altar: the TV set. What we are seeing in contemporary America is the fruits of a false religion. When progressives rail against religious fundamentalists, they are blind to the fact that they are as much religious fanatics as anyone. When they poke fun at Evangelical creationists, they ignore gaping holes in their own reasoning, and they react with all the fury of a zealot if one dares to gently point out how the facts contradict their beliefs.

What we are dealing with in the West is, above all, a crisis of faith. This is why people are so confused about simple truths, and so willing to believe black is white, up is down and two plus two equals five.

Buzzfeed article on Paul Elam

W.F. Price · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I recently read Buzzfeed's exposé on Paul Elam, and frankly I think it fell flat. For the same reason, I might add, that I think Elam's brand of MRA falls flat for a lot of younger guys today.

Essentially, it's a rehash of the same old mutual recriminations so popular in the 80s and 90s. A lot of old feminists will feel vindicated by the article, and a lot of older MRAs will be angry about it. But the problems younger men face are of an entirely different nature, the destruction of traditional family being a fait accomplit for some time now, so I don't think this changes anything.

What the article boils down to is this: Paul Elam is an asshole.

OK, well, that isn't exactly news to anyone who has dealt with him personally, or read his articles for that matter. But he's an asshole who has made salient points about gender issues during the very important transitional period during the 1980s.

Elam's experience proves, for example, that telling your wife and kids to screw off when your marriage goes bad is a better strategy if you're concerned about yourself than trying to be a niceguy. What could be a more damning indictment of feminism than that?

Furthermore, it proves that being an asshole doesn't torpedo one's prospects with women. Quite the opposite, in fact: Paul's many walks down the aisle are testament to the fact that there's something about the guy that contemporary women find appealing. Elam's a major hit with women to this day. And I don't write this out of envy; on the contrary, I think his popularity with women has probably been his biggest problem in life (Futrelle wouldn't understand).

However, the part about his daughter is truly sad. From what I know personally of Paul Elam, he actually likes his daughter, and has affectionate feelings toward her. I'd go so far as to say there's some love there. I think being estranged from her truly hurts him. I bet it hurts her, too.

So I hope Bonnie – if that's her real name – can eventually come to love her dad for who he is without taking it personally. I learned to do that despite having a problematic father myself, but it requires a philosophical acceptance that is rarely encouraged these days. Of course, as I am also an imperfect father, I hope my kids can forgive my failings and find it within themselves to love me flaws and all.

When considering Paul's life after his first marriage, it's important to keep in mind that the man was faced with the loss of his children no matter what he did, and if he chose self-preservation it was only because the alternative was martyrdom, and men shouldn't have to face that choice just to be fathers.

So if feminists were to say to me that Paul Elam proves that MRAs are terrible people, I'd respond by saying "he's the product of your philosophy, not mine."

When the Equalist Fantasy Falters, MRAs and Feminists Will Join Forces

W.F. Price · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Sometime in the not too distant future, the Equalist ideology that gained ascendancy in the West in the late 1960s will begin to unravel. My guess is that the impending demographic implosion of its creators and sustainers will start the process, possibly within the decade.

When that happens there will be a strong reaction against those who espouse another philosophy, and we'll see the different sides of the Equalist camp join together in common cause to defend the faith.

One such alliance will likely occur between feminists and Equalist MRAs, who will set aside their differences to fight any new concept of the relationship between men and women. MRAs and feminists may oppose each other, but that's because they see male and female as opposing forces due to their worldview. To them, it can't be any other way. Struggle between the sexes is right and natural, because, to put it in Marxist terms, it's a class struggle. Eventually, in their eschatology, one is supposed to emerge victorious at some distant undefined point, but they really suspect this struggle is more or less eternal and a fundamental part of life, similar to the struggle between good and evil that characterizes some Christian thought.

When someone comes along and challenges that worldview, both feminists and MRAs will see it as a threat, and both will confront this challenge. In doing so, they will work together, as they did in the beginning when Equalism overthrew the old Western order.

I think I'm already beginning to see signs of it. Challenge Equalism, and immediately feminists start defending some MRA causes, and MRAs will begin to say that feminism is only bad in practice, not theory (try it yourself if you're curious). It's similar to the way in which different factions of Christians were bitter enemies when dealing with each other, but united in common cause when faced with an external threat.

That external threat is coming. It is gathering forces and preparing for a long campaign. When it mobilizes, we'll see Equalists of all persuasions align themselves against it.

A Reply to a hidden comment

W.F. Price · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dragnet commented and asked to explain something in my last post, and I'd like to respond to the following:

> Welmer—good to see you back and writing again. Can you elaborate a bit more on this part:
>
> "That external threat is coming. It is gathering forces and preparing for a long campaign."
>
> Or perhaps that is the subject of your next post?
>
> Hope all is well
>
> -dragnet

Dragnet's asking a good question. That was kind of an ominous final note, and I should explain it.

First, I wrote it while I was thinking in terms of macrohistorical trends, like the rise of Islam. That explains the dark tones behind it.

What I meant was that there is going to be a rearrangement of the world order, and that's plain to see for anyone paying attention. The people and ideas that dominated the world for the last couple centuries are going to see that dominance challenged and probably overwhelmed.

I can't attach much moral significance to it at this point, aside from the fact that as humans living on planet Earth we'll have to find a way to adjust so as to avoid another round of cataclysmic struggles.

Equalism cannot provide the answers to what we're facing. It was a hothouse flower nurtured in a particular environment by a particular people (17th and 18th century NW Europe), and these people's star is past its zenith.

So the "gathering forces" are demographic and cultural challenges mounting against the ethny and philosophy that has ruled the world in the modern era.

For my part, I'm willing and eager to dispense with the old philosophy, which is going nowhere fast, but it's going to be much more difficult for a lot of people to do so, which means that there will be another cultural upheaval coming soon. Very soon, I think. I can almost feel it in my gut already.